HOME AND HEALTH.

KITCHEN REMEDIES.

If any physician wishes to leave the "Latin kitchen" as a store-house of medical provision for extreme cases, he is nearly sure to find remedies for certain cases out of the articles of every day's use. He will find that common herring, especially the roe, taken in the morning on an empty stomach, serves as a good expectorant.

Grains of black pepper, taken in the morning (two or three pieces) for a certain time, often cure dyspepsia. The daily use of black prunes, cooked with sugar, serves as a good laxative. Common table salt is a good remedy in catarrh of the throat as a gargle; for nervous headache, as a snuff (in powder); for the hair, as a tonic; it serves for rubbing those parts of the body that are afflicted by rheumatism; salt also stops pulmonary hemorrhage, and prevents epileptic fits. Hot tea is a good sudorific. Coffee excites circulation, is an antidote for morphine, and alleviates headache from drunkenness. Roasted and crushed coffee berries, when mixed with iodoforn, destroy the odor of the latter; when not roasted, but crushed, eight or ten berries diminish fever; it destroys the odor of tobacco in the mouth, and the odor of onions. Lemon juice is a good remedy for rheumatism, destroys also bad taste in the mouth, is an anti-emetic, serves as a cosmetic for the face and hands, as a washing in sun-burns, as a medium of quieting great thirst, as a refreshing remedy in summer heat. Decoction of parsley is a good diuretic. Honey is a laxative; mixed with flour, ad pasta, serves to ripen abscesses. Potatoes applied to the temples and forehead, in thin slices, alleviate headache and agreeably refresh. Soup made from onions is a stomachic tonic; it also strengthens the breath. The kernels of black olives increase the gastric juices and promote digestion. Celery acts on the nervous system. Garlic, cooked with milk, is a good remedy for pin-worms. Scraped horse-radish, or burnt feathers applied to the nose in fainting fits, serve as exciting agents; horse-radish can also replace mustard plasters, and acts even stronger than the latter. Sweet oil and the yolk of an egg serve as a dressing for burns. Abundant use of watermelon juice is a good diuretic. For colds of the feet, and as a prophylactic remedy for colds, put mustard powder in the stockings.—Dr. S. Seilikovitch.

TO SERVE WITH TURKEY.

There are some things that are understood by most people to be necessary adjuncts of the roast turkey, among them being giblet sauce, cranberry sauce, celery, and certain kinds of vegetables, says Maria Parloa in her department in the Ladies' Home Journal.

For a change one might have mushroom or chestnut sauce and currant jelly. The celery might be cut into pieces about three inches long and then be cut into narrow strips, placed in iced water for two or three hours, and then served on a bed of ice. Here are some combinations of vegetables appropriate to serve with roast turkey or chicken:

Plain boiled potatoes, squash, cauliflower with white sauce.

Potato balls or cubes, with parsley butter, scaloped tomatoes, spaghetti with Bechamel sauce.

Plain boiled potatoes, scaloped sweet potatoes, mashed turnips, French peas. Casserole of potatoes, creamed onions, Lima beans in white sauce.

Stewed celery with cream or Bechamel sauce, mashed potatoes, squash.

Escaloped cauliflower, potato timbale, vegetables a la jardiniere.

Plain boiled potatoes, squash, cauliflower with white sauce.

Potatoes, boiled onions in cream sauce, glazed sweet potatoes.

Macedoine of vegetables, potato croquettes, macaroni with brown sauce.

HAM BOILING.

A friend told me that in Kansas City last winter, says a lady, she entertained a dozen or more "cowboys" at an old-fashioned dining. The idea occurred to her to serve some of the despised swine's flesh to these boastful "beef eaters," and thus test their pretended dislike.

Her side-table was graced with three tempting viands—the inevitable roast beef, a roasted turkey, and a boiled ham. She said, "The boiled ham unmistakably carried the day." "What was the reason?" I asked. "Simply this," she said, "I boiled that ham all day."

A few days after this conversation, my own stove might have been seen glowing good-naturedly many hours, keeping the water bubbling around a ham of goodly size, which I had tied tightly in a bag, after first trimming and cleansing thoroughly, and placed a saucer in the bottom of the boiler to prevent the bag from scorching; then I made up the undying fire.

In the evening I carefully lifted the ham out by the mouth of the sack and left it undisturbed till morning. When perfectly cold I took off the wrapping: it was beautifully congealed, by the attraction of its own gelatinous substance, into perfect solidity; the color was a clear pink throughout, and all as tender as a fresh cheese. It was kept sweet in the refrigerator, and even down to the last scrap was voted a perfect success. For sandwiches nothing can surpass a ham cooked in this way.—Anonymous.

WHAT TO DO.

If a kitchen range is well blacked once a week with some reliable polish to which a little turpentine has been added, and then wiped well with a dry cloth every morning, it will always look well.

In setting your table, always have two teaspoons laid at each person's plate. This method will effectually prevent the constant passing of the spoon-holder or the handling of spoons in any other way, as one rarely has need for more than two at the ordinary meal.

It is said that a piece of zinc placed on the live coals in a hot stove will effectually clean out a stove pipe, the vapors produced carrying off the soot by chemical decomposition. This is a useful thing to know for those who burn wood and are fearful of chimney fires. It is at least worth a trial.

How to save money is a problem that interests everybody. One way to do it is to invigorate the system with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Being a highly concentrated blood medicine, it is the most powerful and economical. It is sold for a dollar a bottle, but worth five.

FARM NOTES.

FOR FRUIT-GROWERS.

The time to trim deciduous trees, shrubs, vines, etc., is from the time the leaves are all off, when circulation ceases, to the time they start up again, for the reason that if the tree, vine, or shrub is supporting too much wood, it can safely be cut out when the sap is down. Then what remains is directly benefited. This is one of the strongest reasons for pruning in the winter time.

It requires long years of observation and experience to be able to discern the different qualities of wood in a tree, and also to know how to properly thin out the trees and leave tops well balanced. After a tree is properly trimmed it should be scraped, provided it has old loose bark on it, and care should be taken not to irritate the sap bark. It should be scraped well up into the branches, and after this is done the tree should be washed with a solution prepared as follows: Take one-fourth of air-slacked lime to three-fourths of green cow manure, add about two tablespoonfuls of pulverized alum to a pailful of this wash, and mix all together as thick as can be put on with a brush.

Thousands of insects house under this old bark and lay their eggs, and when the trees start out they go up into the blossoms, and the fruit matures with them in it; and that is the reason of so much wormy fruit. Scraping also opens the pores of the tree and brings the sap bark to the natural heat and rains. Lime will destroy the insects and eggs, the cow manure will soften the bark, and the alum will help to hold the wash on longer. The tree, vine, or shrub should also be attended to at the roots; for on these they depend for support. The ground should be loosened around as far as the small roots go, which is generally as far as the branches extend, and a good amount of old rotten manure worked in. If it is grass ground, take the sod off carefully and spade in the manure, and then replace the sod. If this is done once in six or seven years, it will be found very effective; but suckers should always be kept out, as they are rightly named.

PLOWING WITH STICKS.

It would make an honest American farmer smile out loud to see the way the land is plowed by Peruvians. From six to a dozen teams of oxen are put at work in a field of twenty or thirty acres. The oxen are yoked by tying a heavy beam across their foreheads and in front of the horns. To this beam the plow is attached, all the force being applied by the head instead of the shoulders.

The plow is a crooked stick or branch of a tree, the point faced with iron. Peruvians contend that they do not need to plow more than two or three inches deep, simply enough to loosen the soil so as to enable the seed to take root. The water used in irrigating is said to be rich in plant food, further obviating the necessity of deep plowing.

Improved plows suitable for this country are now manufactured in Europe and in the United States, but they are very different from the plows used by an American farmer. They are light and small, having a close resemblance to the original crooked stick.

Every Peruvian plow has but one handle. The driver carries in one hand a huge goad, twelve or fifteen feet in length, with which to touch up his team, and he manages the plow with the other hand. The irrigating ditches must then be connected with the canal which brings the water from the river and which traverse the field at a distance of three or four feet apart, and six to eight inches deep.

They are so arranged that the whole field can be instantly flooded by turning on the water, and every hill of corn or potatoes or sugar cane will be thoroughly soaked. Of course, the fields must slope in the right direction, and if nature has not so made it the level is reduced sufficiently before it is plowed.

sugar beets raised on his farm near Red Wing. The analysis, made at the State University at Minneapolis, shows a ration of 250 pounds of sugar to the ton, or 12 per cent. Mr. Danforth says that the beets can be raised very profitably on the bottom lands of Douglas county, and hopes to induce some of his farmer friends in this region to give the crop a test, and in time a plant to utilize the product may be erected. The variety Mr. Danforth produced is known as the Vilmorin French White Improved.—Leader.

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION AND LAZINESS.

I hear the farmers complaining to-day of high tariffs, and it may be that they have a right to complain; still no tax on iron was ever so great as the tax he pays who leaves his mowing-machine unsheltered in the storm. The tax on land is high; but he pays a higher tax who leaves his meadows to grow up to white-weed and thistles. The tax for good roads is high; but a higher toll is paid by the farmer who goes each week to town in mud knee-deep to his horses. There is a high tax on personal property; but it is not so high as the tax on time which is paid by the man who spends his Saturdays loitering about the village streets. All the farmer's income arises from the wise use of his time. One-sixth of his time means one-sixth of his income. If he has learned to make use of his time, all other ills will cure themselves.—President D. S. Jordan, in the October Forum.

Never Questioned.

The superior purity, strength and wholesomeness of Royal Baking Powder is never questioned. While other baking powder makers are exposing the impurities and shortcomings of the powders of their competitors, and the official tests by the Government are revealing the improper ingredients, the low strength, and lack of keeping qualities of other brands of baking powder, no question is raised, no doubt is entertained of the great qualities, the absolute purity and efficiency of the Royal Baking Powder. It stands alone, above suspicion.

Do not permit the grocer or peddler to substitute any other brand in place of the Royal.

NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION, IN THE

DECEMBER 9TH AND 10TH, 1891.

[SEE OFFICIAL CALL, ON PAGE 9.]

OHIO STATE CONVENTION.

The OHIO STATE CONVENTION will be held in the College Chapel of Muskingum College, NEW CONCORD, on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, beginning on TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 8TH, and closing on the 9TH.

Rev Dr. Morehead, we regret to say, is unable to attend the Convention. He writes: "I cannot well undertake any more than I am now trying to do. My health broke somewhat, last summer, and I am obliged to 'go softly.'"

We have, however, a strong list of speakers, in Rev. William Dillon, editor of the Christian Conservator; Prof. Joseph Moore, of Earlham College, Richmond, Ind.; Rev. J. D. Irons, D. D., president of Muskingum College, and possibly Hon. J. M. Scott, of Alexandria, Ohio. Agents Hinman, Hawley and Fenton are now in Ohio, and will be at the Convention.

Look for the Cynosure next week.

Our Iowa correspondent has again failed to forward his report of the proceedings of the recent anti-secrecy convention in that State. We had hoped to receive it for this issue.

At the recent convention of the Knights of Labor, at Toledo, Ohio, it was decided that all who do not accept all the principles enumerated in the platform must either leave the order or be expelled. It was also decided that the general master workman should appoint a committee to amend the constitution. A resolution was adopted recommending that, as a rule, assemblies refrain from electing to membership any one holding or seeking a political position. The report of the finance committee was submitted, showing an increase of 20 per cent. in the membership from the increase of the per capita tax. An industrial conference is to be held on the 22d of February next, in which labor questions will receive special attention.

The reports of the Galesburg convention indicate a degree of denominational union, approximating, at least on the subject of secret societies, to the apostolic injunction, that "all speak the same thing." There appears to have been no uncertainty in the trumpet's sound voiced by so many different denominations, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodist Episcopal, Wesleyan Methodist, Swedish Baptist and anti-denominationalists. Surely so many different denominations, all speaking the same thing of this particular truth, is a mark of the work of the Holy Spirit, especially when we consider the social church ostracism consequent upon such utterances by church representatives.

ture to make him confess his connection with the crimes against foreigners committed in Hunan, but he would confess nothing. It is said, however, that compromising documents were found upon him at the time of his arrest, and it is believed that these papers have given the Chinese authorities a clue to the perpetrators of the more recent attacks upon foreigners, for it is said that numerous arrests of secret society men have been made. The government has greatly increased the severity of its measures against criminals of this class, and seems determined to exert all its power to protect the foreign residents of the empire. Under European and American pressure, the Kaloa Hui is likely to be righteously stamped out.

REV. A. J. GORDON, D. D.

The Knights of Pythias have just revived an old lodge in Chicago—"Welcome, No. 1"—which was organized in 1869, and relinquished its charter in 1878. Such instances in secret societies are rare, and have no significance except as mementoes of a dead past, since it is quite as easy to organize a new one.

The death of Wm. J. Florence, whose name was originally Conlin, and who had a wide reputation as a versatile and popular play-actor, recalls the fact that he was the founder of the "Order of the Mystic Shrine," which is one of the many side-issues of Freemasonry, having an Arabian flavor, and perpetuating names and peculiarities supposed to be of Arabian origin. He was also a Roman Catholic, and a member of the order of "Knights of St. Patrick." Notwithstanding he was a thirty-third-degree Mason, he was buried with Roman Catholic ceremonies.

Intelligence from China, via Paris, Nov. 19, shows that the energetic interference of the representatives of foreign powers has had a salutary influence upon the disposition of the Chinese to threaten and attack missionaries and others from other lands who reside in the province of Hunan. The chief of the Kaloa Hui, the great Chinese secret society, one of whose objects is to drive all foreigners from China, was recently arrested in the French "concession" at Shanghai, and his chief subordinate, Chen Kin Lung, was soon afterwards captured in the vicinity of Shanghai. The latter, it is reported, was subjected to tor-

THANKSGIVING.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

The Indian summer smileth
Far o'er the sunny plain;
The fragrant winds sigh gently o'er
The fields of garnered grain.
Around the pleasant fireside,
We think of that winter day
When the Pilgrim Fathers landed, down
By Plymouth and the Bay!

They landed, brave and fearless,
Daughter, and sire, and son;
The warrior's sword was by his side;
His hand still grasped his gun.
For a wily foe was on their track;
There was danger, night and day;
But they built their homes, those Pilgrims, down
On Massachusetts Bay!

From the hills of fair old England,
They crossed the ocean's foam,
And the ice-bound coast of Plymouth
Welcomed the wanderers home.
The days and months rolled onward
Till two years passed away,
When first they kept Thanksgiving
By Plymouth and the Bay.

Bright are New England's mountains;
Her skies and waves are blue;
Her sons are noble, brave and strong;
Her daughters pure and true.
So we keep our bright Thanksgiving,
With grateful hearts to day,
As long ago they kept it, down
By Plymouth and the Bay!

VALID OBJECTIONS TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

BY REV. A. J. GORDON, D. D.

Membership in the secret lodge is certainly incompatible with usefulness in the Christian church. If I ever doubted this fact, many years of experience has put it beyond question. I would base this proposition on the following grounds:

1. No Christian is able to maintain the divided allegiance which is involved in such a double association. The heart cannot be halved; and he who attempts to love the church of God with one hemisphere of his heart, and the secret society with the other, will speedily find that he is very much more of a lodgeman than a churchman. This is my first and most emphatic objection to the secret lodge: That it alienates the hearts of Christians from their allegiance to the church of Christ. On a recent evening, being called to address a united meeting of the several evangelical churches in a certain city—the occasion being one which ought to have called out the fullest attendance of the responsible members of these churches—the marked absence of such was explained by a pastor on the ground that "it was lodge night, and it was utterly impossible to get anything like a full representation of the male membership of the church in such circumstances." This incident speaks volumes.

2. The very fact that the lodge is claimed to be a semi-religious organization, having forms and ceremonials with which we have all been made acquainted on funeral occasions, makes it more objectionable. Imitations of the church are more to be dreaded than opponents; especially as such imitations often involve the performance of religious services—the reading of prayers and the recitation of liturgies by unregenerated men, and sometimes by those notoriously irreligious in character. Our own observation on this point has been such as to create a profound aversion to the whole lodge system.

3. Then, especially, do we object to a Christian's holding membership in a lodge, since he thereby establishes a center of social gravity outside of himself and outside of the church which may prove exceedingly perilous. It is a law of gravitation that a body attracts in proportion to its weight and bulk of matter. The force, therefore, of an enormous body like that of the Freemasons, is such as to overpower the will of any ordinary man and constrain him to courses to which, personally, he might strongly object.

This is indeed the peril attaching to all great organizations, such as political parties and secular associations. The safety of membership in the church consists in the fact that Christ himself is the center of gravity therein. If Christ is left out of the church, as in the case of many apostate bodies, the membership in such a church is dangerous. In other words, one cannot safely put his center of gravity outside of himself except he place it in Christ, who is the heart of the church. We see, therefore, the strongest objection to Christians being identified with secret societies of any sort. The law of Christ concerning his disciples is separation from the world. That law cannot therefore be right for a Christian, the aim of which is to bind him to a worldly society by the strongest possible ties.

Boston, Nov., 1891.

A MASON'S EXPERIENCE—III.

BY JOSEPH HOPSON, OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

I now began to suspect that Freeborn had been appointed to watch me to see how far my initiation had been effectual. This as I afterwards learned is a most important point to ascertain, for if the initiation has not been effectual the candidate retains his spiritual liberty, and the authorities of the lodge have no mystic nor magnetic power over him. He feels himself under no bond but what the oath and penalty impose, and that he feels imperfectly; and generally he in a little time deems it right to decline conformity to their ancient usages and customs, and to quit the fraternity. But if the initiation has been effectual he is under a strong spiritual and mystical influence and is effectually subjected to the powers and authorities of Masonry, and their property in him is secure. Hence, most of what has been discovered of Freemasonry has been imparted by Masons on their death-beds, or found after their death among their writings, and these in general related chiefly to their forms and were of no vital importance. But it more frequently happens that such as are anxious to unbosom themselves on their death-beds are unable to do so owing to the strong Satanic influence they are under, though the assurance of eternal salvation should be the result.

When Freeborn had left me, I began to consider what might prove to be the consequence of the declaration I had made. So surely as he was set to watch, and to sound me to ascertain the effect of my initiation, so surely he would have to make his report; and I felt convinced that I would, on the very first meeting of the lodge, be called to account, punished in a way that I had no knowledge of, and placed under additional bonds and penalties, or privately murdered and made away with. To add to my conviction, Freeborn estranged himself from me from that moment. He visited me no more as formerly, and I judged from that circumstance that a storm was gathering against me and I began to consider what was the best mode of defence; submission, under such circumstances, I saw to be out of the question. A little reflection satisfied me; that if I let the circumstance of my opposition to Masonry remain a secret for any length of time, they would take advantage of it, and seize an opportunity of putting me out of the way. A similar fate, I understand, happened to a private of one of Her Majesty's regiments at Trichinopoly. He was initiated, divulged some of the proceedings, disappeared, and never was heard of more.

About the year 1839, when my regiment, the 5th Light Cavalry, was stationed at Arcot, a Mrs. Hughes, wife of a commissariat overseer, repeatedly assured me, in the presence of her husband, that she had seen such an execution. And her husband often told me that he believed it. Her account of the affair was as follows: The Masons used to assemble in a private house, and over the room in which they assembled was another in which herself and another girl prepared to watch them, through a hole or opening that was in the floor. Several Masons had assembled, and at length a countryman came and got admittance. As soon as he entered, two or three of them proceeded to seize him; but being a stout young fellow he knocked them down as fast as ever they came near him. At last they overpowered him and stretched him on his back on the table, and the first thing they did was to cut away his private parts. This, she assured me in the most solemn manner, in the sight of God, she had seen, but that she was so terrified that she did not stay to see any more. Shortly after telling me this, she was afflicted with an issue of blood that brought on her death, which occurred in the year 1840. And Hughes himself died shortly after, the same year.

I had no doubt that they would make away with me in some way or other, and I saw that the only chance of escape left me was to make the affair as public as possible, and then if I should be made away with, the public would know who made away with me and might set the necessary inquiry on foot, though the Masons insist that they are exempt from interference on such occasions. On the evening of that day as I attended on my troop commanding officer, at stables, I told Beswick of the pain I had in my breast, and asked him if he felt the like after initiation; and his answer was, "I felt as if I had a red-hot ball of iron in my breast for a month after I was initiated."

I had before resolved on breaking with the Freemasons and ejecting everything that I had learned of their secrets from my breast; but now I saw that there was no time to be lost, and that I must break with them as soon as possible; so as soon as the duties of the day were over, I commenced a circumstantial account of my initiation, with the view of getting it forwarded to "The Society for the Suppression of Vice," in the hope that means might be taken by that society for the suppression of Freemasonry. Owing to what had been buzzed into my ears for months, of the impossibility of any one divulging any of the secret words of Masonry and living, I set to write under a weight of superstitious apprehension; but having begun, I got on freely till I came to the secret word "Boaz;" then a fear came over me, a flush passed through my frame, my hair stood up and I felt myself under an invisible but powerful restraint, and the idea of instant death, in some shape or other, took possession of my imagination. It was the dead of the night when I came to this part of my narrative; not a sound was to be heard; the profound silence gave my feelings such a distinctness that I fancied myself in actual contact and struggling with invisible beings.

I waited, uncertain of being attacked in case I proceeded. I reflected on the justice of my cause and the treachery of the Freemasons in ensnaring me as they did. I turned my thoughts heavenward, and felt I had nothing in this case to upbraid myself with, except it was that of swearing at all. I resolved on proceeding, yet lowered my hand very cautiously towards the paper, ready to withdraw it in case I encountered any unexpected sensation. I reached it, wrote "Boaz;" and the deed was done.

But how can I express the relief, satisfaction and delight I now experienced? I was carried, as it were, out of myself with joy. The spell was broken. I was once more free. I had ejected the last token of the subjection I was under to the infernal powers; they had no longer any place or property in me, nor claim to me. My breast was no longer a repository of any of their spells. There was not a word in any language that I was not at liberty to speak and write. There was not a subject of an intellectual or doctrinal kind that I was not at liberty to speak about; not to a circumscribed few, but to all, and that without fear of consequences. I could relate all I knew about Masonry as freely as the occurrences of a morning's walk. With what truth may it be said that the service of God is perfect freedom, when compared with the adamant chains of Satan, the iron shell in which he limits and bounds the mind! Satan's rule admits of no mediator; in the event of a breach of his laws nothing but the destruction of the breaker can appease his wrath. His discipline holds out no reward to obedience; he who enters his service must enter it blindly and unconditionally, and yield implicit obedience under the iron rod of fiendish arrogance.

I finished the rough draft of my statement that night—Wednesday, 31st Jan., 1827—and nearly completed the fair copy on the following day. In the meantime, I was not idle, but I acquainted my friends with my altered views of Masonry; and with all that I knew about it. The novelty of the thing insured me enough of hearers. I satisfied their curiosity as regarded the ceremony of initiation, the secret word, the sign, the grip, the wonderful light, and other objects that a Mason sees at the conclusion of the ceremony of the initiation. I found several that had a hearsay knowledge of some of the points that I told them of, but had no confirmation of the truth of it, till I afforded it to them. And some there were that had a knowledge of some of the vital points of the mysteries which I had corroborated to me afterwards by the Masons themselves, though indirectly, and unintentionally, and also by their books. Among these was the fact in the mysteries of Masonry, that none but a perfectly virile man, who has not broken the seventh commandment, can divulge their secrets with impunity.

When I had finished my narrative, on the 2nd of February, I took it to the Rev. Mr. Malkin, the chaplain of the station, Bangalore, told him what it was about, and requested that he would forward it to "The Society for the Suppression of Vice." He took it without hesitation, said he would look into it, and if I would call on him on the Monday following he would let me know the result. I called on him Monday, as desired. I found him in his compound, in his morning gown, with a long-handled hoe on his shoulder for hoeing up the grass and weeds that he might meet with in his walks. I asked him his opinion of it. He said he had read it attentively; it was but a simple statement of what had occurred; that he should certainly consider it his duty to act to the suppression of Masonry if he knew it to be a bad thing, but that my account of it did not afford him sufficient ground to act upon. After some further conversation, he returned me my statement, and expressed a wish that I should drop the subject for fear of the trouble it would bring me into. I declared that it was my intention to proceed against Masonry by every means in my power, regardless of consequences. Some visitor now drove up to the door and put an end to the interview. Previous to this he brought me into his house to explain to me, from a Hebrew Lexicon, the meaning of the word "Boaz," which was, "In it is strength." But although he urged me to drop the subject, I afterwards learned that he acquainted some of his friends among the Freemasons with what I had done; and among them Major Wetherall, of the Royals, the patron of the lodge, and it was from him also that they had learned my intention to proceed against them.

MEXICO AND MASONRY.

Mrs. Ralph Emerson writes in the Home Missionary among other incidents of a trip through Mexico that in its capital city her husband was introduced to a leading Mexican of great intelligence and refinement. On asking him about the relative strength of the various religions in Mexico, he with great dignity remarked:

"There are two leading religions in Mexico, one is the Roman Catholic, the other is Freemasonry."

Mrs. Emerson adds: "This was said in the most earnest, matter-of-fact way as an assertion not to be gainsaid. Now as we women are not allowed to be Freemasons it is not surprising that most of the worshipers in their churches were females. In the most fashionable churches we saw very few men of any education or refinement of countenance."

An English paper, from statistics taken from the press of the United Kingdom, reports the records of murders of women by inebriated husbands, since January 1, 1889 to January 1, 1891, to be 3,004.

THE ILLINOIS CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE GALESBURG CONVENTION.

GALESBURG, Ill., Nov. 12, 1891.

The Illinois Christian Association met, according to call, in the Brick Congregational church, at 7:30 P. M. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. H. H. Hinman.

At 8 o'clock Pres. Charles A. Blanchard was elected chairman pro tem.

Rev. H. A. Bushnell delivered the address of welcome. He was glad, he said, that he had a chance to hear them talk and see how they got at the subject. He wished them God-speed in their work. They should be welcomed on the ground of Christian freedom of thought and speech. After all, much of the talk about freedom of speech is nonsense, is not freedom to speak the truth, to call things by their right names, to strike down iniquity wherever it is. There is now as much need of this freedom as ever. The speaker then held that there is need of a bolder proclamation of the truth by the church. Mr. Bushnell then spoke of that church as having Dr. Edward Beecher for its first pastor, the fearless preacher, the advocate of the abolishment of slavery, a man favoring free discussion. If lodge men are being unfairly dealt with, they should come out to refute the charges made. So long as God is on the throne of the universe, the lies, if they are lies, will do no injury; truth will prevail. Those present were commended as having dared to attend and present their side of the case. The Association was eulogized as in the possession of one of the sublimest secrets, that of Christianity, and the secret societies were condemned as assuming one of God's prerogatives. He wanted to know if a minister did not have a right to welcome the Association. He found that the secret lodge gnaws away at the life of the church as a rat gnaws at cheese. As a business man has a right to oppose what is undermining his business, so a minister on the same ground has the right to oppose the lodge system. Mr. Bushnell then contended that the lodge system is an insidious foe to Christianity in that it deadens the minds of men to their religious needs. He again welcomed all, desiring arguments in a Christian spirit.

The temporary chairman responded for the Association. He expressed his pleasure at Mr. Bushnell's remarks. He thought that all knew that there are some good men in the lodges. So were there, he believed, in the Ku Klux Klan, and cited their oath to show that good men may have been inveigled even into that organization. So he could understand how temperance men could be drawn into temperance organizations, and how the business men and mechanics could be drawn into Odd-fellowship. He contended that you cannot tell the character of an organization by the character of its members. Both worthy and unworthy men belong to these secret organizations, and why then are they not both good and bad at the same time? If only the good men are to be considered, then slavery was a good thing, for was not Washington a slaveholder? So also liquor-drinking and the tobacco habit are on the same ground good. The Association does not say that all members of lodges are bad, but that the general tendency of them is evil; that the good men should come out and that bad men should not be allowed the power such membership gives them. In order to their highest good, even excellent men require the restraining influences of publicity. He repeated a remark about two preachers in a lodge of whom it was said that instead of restraining the others none could tell smuttier stories than did they. He then spoke of the practice of Masons stripping candidates nearly naked and compelling them in this condition to go through the ceremony. This is because the doors are closed. Mr. Blanchard considered the effects of such practices on the home deleterious, and contended that the exactness and secrecy of the lodge room are one of the agencies that have caused the divorce rate to increase. The members are trained to a partial divorce from their wives. The speaker held that this could be the plainer seen if the tables were turned and the wives should be going out evenings to attend lodge meetings and keeping everything from their husbands. A wife, he claimed, has a right to know what her husband is doing, and vice versa. God did not plant Masonry or any other secret society, and what God does not plant will be rooted up. The speaker believed that secret associations are opposed to good government and tend to undermine public confidence in the courts and make it hard for a poor man to secure justice. He cited a graphic incident from Missouri to show how Masonry interfered with the dealing out of justice to a murderer. The case of McGarigle was cited, and the fact that this boodler, a Knight Templar, under the care of Sheriff Matson, also a Knight Templar, escaped, was laid to Freemasonry, as was also his treatment after his return. A man who is under oath to a part of the public, has no right to hold office over all of the public. A third reason for opposing the lodge system was that God had established the church and that this is the only means of redeeming the world. Where secret societies flourish the churches lack the men prominent in these societies. Lodge members hold that if they are good Masons or Odd-fellows, they are good Christians. In closing, Mr. Blanchard indulged in some reminiscences. He called on lodge members present to correct any inaccuracies.

At the close of his remarks, the temporary chairman introduced Rev. Samuel H. Swarts, of Chicago, who addressed the convention upon the subject, "Odd-fellowship: How Should it be Regarded?" From personal knowledge he considered it a very dangerous institution, dangerous as are all secret organizations. The meeting of men behind closed doors is always dangerous to the man; in the same way the gathering of women alone in secret would be dangerous. The men who are brought most often in close contact with women are generally the best and the purest. He cited the fall of an uncle as due to a separation from women. The system was deemed dangerous to national life and personal liberty, and as an illustration he cited the Clan-na-Gael and the murder of Dr. Cronin. So Masonry removed Morgan, now termed an allegory. So a Boone county man was put out of the way. So when the doors are closed who knows what shall become of the member who may be in possession of dangerous knowledge? Odd-fellows are bound together to stand by one another, right or wrong. That is the unwritten law. The workings cause one to forget sacred things. He, the speaker, was once rebuked, when he occupied the position as chaplain, because in the prayer he used the expression, "the Lord Jesus Christ," and was told that he must confine himself to the ritual. He had been shocked when at an Odd-fellow's funeral, to have the service rendered by one whose breath smelled so loud of rum that he went off farther lest he too should be intoxicated. At the most, Odd-fellowship can produce only moral men; its teachings give no hope of immortality. Again, it is a false teacher of benevolence. It is a beggarly piece of benevolence. One gets what he pays for. If you don't get sick, you don't get anything. This world needs true benevolence. The needy and the maimed can't get in the Odd-fellow lodge. (Asa A. Matterson, who has but one arm, corrected the speaker, saying that he had been through all the offices.) The speaker said in reply that it used to be so in the New York jurisdiction to which he formerly belonged. He continued that this lodge had shut out the Negro, the poor, the needy, or those who can't pay the initiation fee. He eulogized a benevolence that is broad and knows no set, race or class. The church is crippled hand and foot for lack of funds, while with the secret organizations it is different. The lodge does not teach men to throw open their hearts to mankind everywhere. Again, he felt that the moral influence of the lodge room is not good. He told why he quit, and thanked God that he was firm in the Christian faith. Three young men, whom he was instrumental in getting to join, by the associations growing out of the lodge were ruined. Good men in the lodges know these things, and excuse it by saying that there are bad men in the church. True enough, but they are not covered up. There are men in these lodges that one would not introduce to his home circle. If not fit for the home circle, are they fit companions for one in the lodge room? Can one withstand the influence? As a remedy, it was advised that work be done among the young. As one who had been on the inside, he pronounced Odd-fellowship a hollow sham, a false religion, selfish, and with downward tendency.

Then followed a sharp discussion in which the Odd-fellows present took part. They objected to some of the speaker's statements. One of these related to the chaplain's prayer, the impression having been left that the name of Jesus Christ had been purposely omitted from the Odd-fellow ritual, and that the organization is an infidel one. The reply was that there is no form of prayer in the ritual, and that a chaplain is free to pray as he desires. One member said that he had belonged to Odd-fellowship for thirty-five years and that in all of that time he had seen neither a written nor printed Odd-fellow ritualistic prayer.

Mr. Swarts, in reply, referred to a Noble Grand whom he knew, as an open infidel. Mr. Grubb retorted sharply that no open infidel can become a member of Odd-fellowship, as one of the conditions of membership is a belief in the Supreme Being.

Mr. Blanchard then remarked that Mr. Grubb was using an incorrect idea of the word infidel. That word does not mean necessarily a disbeliever in God.

Mr. Grubb requested him to consult a dictionary.

Mr. Matteson expressed the conviction that the man who was opposed to the naming of Jesus Christ in the prayer mentioned was a crank and a fanatic. Some people, he averred, would object to the Lord's Prayer.

Mr. Chambers interposed some interrogatories at this point, wanting to know if the use of the name of Christ had not been forbidden by the highest councils in Odd-fellowship.

Mr. Blanchard interrupted and held that in Grosh's Manual two forms of prayer are printed, orders to follow the spirit of which are given, and that from these the name of Christ is omitted. He also instanced a Grand Chaplain who had been directed to omit this name.

Mr. Grubb said that in Odd-fellowship there is a religious burial service. It is not essentially a Christian service, but the intention was to give one a decent burial. Odd-fellows, he asserted, do not pretend to be a Christian organization, although they are a religious one.

Mr. Blanchard warmly insisted that all religious organizations should be Christian and that all not Christian are heathen. He contended that if all of the people of the United States were Masons or Odd-fellows, this would be a heathen nation.

Others of the Odd-fellows claimed that Mr. Blanchard put their institution in a false light, that while it is not a Christian institution, or one designed to carry on the work of the Gospel, yet it is imbued with the spirit of the Gospel and is founded on a real benevolence.

It was denied by Mr. Grubb that Odd-fellows put any name above the name of Christ. He also showed that in their local charities the Odd-fellow lodges have helped those not members and have recently voted money out of their treasuries for outside benevolent purposes.

Mr. C. S. Harris made some remarks showing that Odd-fellowship is not exclusive and selfish, even though, like churches, its first duty is to its own members.

Mr. Swarts' statement that Odd-fellowship does not admit cripples, was disputed.

E. E. Hammond, chaplain of an Odd-fellow lodge, who was present, said that he used the name of Christ in his prayers and that no one had ever rebuked him for it. He was asked whether he would give up Odd-fellowship if he found out that the Supreme Lodge had forbidden the use of the name of Christ. He said that he would stick to the lodge. This was construed by Mr. Blanchard to mean that he put the name of Odd-fellowship above Christ, which position the other Odd-fellows present declared was unfair.

Near the conclusion of the meeting some one asked Mr. Swarts if he had left his lodge in the regular way. He replied that the members had kept up his dues for three years.

This brought from Mr. Grubb the thoughtless remark, "the darn fools."

Mr. Blanchard suggested an observance of the proprieties of the place, and the admonition was kindly received.

Announcements were made and a recess was taken until 9:30 Friday morning. Benediction was pronounced by Rev. S. H. Swarts.

FRIDAY'S SESSION.

The convention opened at 9:30 A. M., on Friday. Devotional exercises were conducted by Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard.

10:00: With Pres. C. A. Blanchard in the chair, the following committees were appointed: Miss Evelyn C. Pinkney, acting as secretary pro tem.

Committee on Nominations: Rev. Wm. Pinkney, Rev. H. H. Hinman, Rev. David Thompson, D. D.

Committee on Resolutions: Ex-Pres. J. Blanchard, Mr. Cyrus Robbins, Rev. H. H. Hinman.

Committee on Finance: Rev. Azariah Hyde, Royal Hammond, Wm. A. Armstrong.

Letters were read from Rev. D. W. Wise, Wheaton; Rev. B. F. Worrell, Glenwood; Rev. J. W. Thompson, El Paso, and Pres. A. A. Smith, Naperville.

Extended remarks were then made by a number of those present, including Rev. Jacob Thompson, D. D., Dr. J. Blanchard, Wm. Pinkney, W. A. Armstrong, Royal Hammond and others.

Rev. H. H. Hinman then read a paper, the subject of which was, "Is the Grand Army of the Republic a Beneficent Institution?" War he declared to be an unmitigated evil. The Grand Army of the Republic was formed after the close of the war and therefore was unnecessary. He objected to it as unscriptural and irreligious, and fashioned in its forms and obligations after Masonry and other secret societies. He claimed that it gave opportunity for secret political schemes; for selfish personal advancement; that in this country there is no reasonable excuse for a secret society to foster patriotism; that such an organization kept and encouraged a war spirit and prevented peace between different sections of our country. Admitting that many good men belonged for a noble purpose, so was it with the Jesuits. The Janisaries, 125,000 strong, were referred to, showing the danger of such organizations. The speaker said that Daniel Webster, Wendell Phillips, Gen. Grant, Joseph Cook, Geo. Washington, and others, had warned their countrymen against the evils resulting from such combinations of men. On the matter of pensions quite an effort was made to prove the Grand Army accessory to an enormous increase. So that from the sum General Grant said would be amply sufficient, $26,000,000 or $27,000,000, it had reached $130,000,000, and the speaker believed $200,000,000 would be needed. This he thought was of serious concern to all, costing per capita every voter eleven dollars—and should be looked after closely.

After the paper the chairman asked for questions or remarks. Dr. R. Law, being called on, made an earnest defence of the aims, rules and design of the organization, stating that their by-laws forbade their manipulating in politics. They are strictly a social, beneficent society, to look after the worn-out veterans and their families, aid them in sickness, assist them in burying their dead. Their objects were Christianlike and commendable in the highest degree. The doctor spoke with great feeling and from personal knowledge of the subject and was questioned by the chairman.

It was ordered that the paper be published in the Cynosure and that Dr. Law's reply be published in the same paper.

On Friday afternoon, after a season of devotion, the following committees reported:

On nominations of officers: For President, C. A. Blanchard, president of Wheaton College; Vice President, Wm. Pinkney, pastor of Wesleyan church at New Windsor; Recording Secretary, Miss E. C. Pinkney of New Windsor; Corresponding Secretary, A. W. Parry, pastor of Free Methodist church, Aurora.

Executive Committee: Rev. B. F. Worrell, Tracy; Rev. F. D. Christie, Chicago; Prof. W. H. Fischer, Wheaton; Mrs. E. A. Cook, Chicago; Rev. D. F. Carlson, Galesburg; Mrs. Andrews, Chicago.

The committee on resolutions reported as follows:

The Illinois Christian Association, in convention assembled, with malice toward none and with charity for all, respectfully makes the following declaration of principles:

1. We believe that no organization which seeks lawful and worthy ends requires secrecy in order to its highest success.
2. We believe that secrecy is always an element of power, and that since it is not needful to lawful purposes, it is liable to be used for lawless ones.
3. We believe that the family, the church and the state are the three divine institutions; and that they and the institutions subordinate to them require all the time, thought, and money of honorable men.

4. We believe that Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship and similar secret orders antagonize and tend to destroy all three of these divine institutions.

5. We believe that the preponderance of women in our churches, and the miscarriages of justice in our courts, are, in large part, the result of the lodges which swear men to conceal and not to reveal the proceedings of lodge meetings and the secrets of brother lodges.

6. We believe it to be the duty of all Christians, especially all Christian ministers, to expose and withstand those lodges which reject our Lord Jesus Christ and unite believers and unbelievers in unequal fellowship.

7. We believe it to be the duty of all Christians who are opposed to secret societies to aid, by prayer, gift and personal labor, in the work of keeping young men out of the secret lodges; and we especially commend to them the Christian Cynosure as a good medium through which to learn of the progress of the work, to aid in carrying it forward.

8. We desire to return hearty thanks to the pastor and members of this church in which we are met, and to the friends in the city who have kindly opened their homes to us, for the Christian hospitality which we have enjoyed; and,

WHEREAS, The secret societies of China have recently, in spite of the efforts of the government, destroyed mission property and murdered Christian missionaries; therefore,

9. Resolved, That we regard this as a clear evidence of the heathen and anti-Christian character of the secret lodge system, and as a providential indication that Christians should everywhere protest against it.

The resolutions were taken up in their order, and, after discussion, were adopted without dissent.

The committee on finance reported that the expenses of the convention had been met by collections.

The address of Friday afternoon was by Rev. A. Hyde, of Galesburg, on "What I Know About Masonry in Early Days." It was full of practical instruction. He told of a visit to a lodge-room, in the ante-room of which he saw many empty glasses and decanters, and other evidences of a "good time." He then gave the history of the abduction and death of Morgan. He next went through an expose of Masonry according to Morgan and showed the method of initiating a candidate. He gave the oaths and pledges exacted of its candidates and warned the young against uniting with any and all secret societies. He contended there is no true benevolence in Masonry.

Rev. Wm. Pinkney, Wesleyan minister, New Windsor, in a carefully prepared address, discussed "The Relation of Members of Secret Societies to the Church, and How They Should be Dealt With." He prefaced his address by giving the testimony of John Quincy Adams, Joseph Cook, and others eminent for piety, statesmanship, learning and patriotism, as to the dangerous tendencies and disastrous results of Masonry, and secret orders generally; and said with such witness, and the direct teaching of God's Word, we could come logically to no other conclusion than that members of secret societies should be excluded from the sacrament and denied church membership; but he exclaimed: "Some will say such discipline would tend to cause discord and break up the church. Better a church should break into shivers than to remain in fellowship with workers of iniquity. Come out from among them and be ye separate, saith the Scriptures. Christians must obey the teachings of the Founder." The address was plain and radical throughout.

The meeting of Friday night was well attended, especially by the students of Knox College. The addresses were by Rev. O. F. Carlson, pastor of the Swedish Baptist church of Galesburg, and by Rev. J. Blanchard, former president of Knox College. The first was a plain and clear statement of reasons why a Christian should not join any secret lodge. Dr. Jonathan Blanchard's address was on "The Influence of Masonry on the Destinies of Nations." As a prelude to his lecture he gave a resume of his life and labors in Galesburg as president of Knox College, when the city did not contain a secret society, and was noted for its piety. So noted that a band of horse-thieves had their hiding place here, under cover of the good name of Galesburg, knowing that no one would think of looking for them here. He spoke in high terms of the graduates of Knox College. The honored names of Judges Craig and Smith, Hon. E. P. Williams and others are among the many noble graduates of honored old Knox; men who are and have been an honor to the college. The freedom that Galesburg enjoyed at an early day because it was free from secret societies made it possible to train up noble men. He commenced his address proper, by giving the history of Masonry from the days of Solomon to the present time. Solomon was led into Masonry by his alliance with heathen wives, and the fall of the Kingdom of Israel and the total extinction of the ten tribes were brought about through the influence of Masonry. In York, England, in 926 A. D., it was again revived; and in a grog-shop in London, in 1717, Freemasonry again was started on its mission around the world, and in twenty-five years it had spread into nineteen countries, and had girdled the globe with its baleful influence. The terrible revolutions of England were all traceable to Masonry in some degree. The bloody times of French history the past century were all the result of secret societies. In an able, graphic way, and in a caustic manner he told of the hand of Masonry in the affairs of our own country, claiming that even our civil war was the direct result of the work of Masonry, and that even the KuKlux gangs of the South, who committed so many foul murders, were but the fruits of Masonry. He maintained that Masonry is a foe to free government and an enemy to the church, and that it is the great evil of our time.

The address was an able one and held the close attention of a large and intelligent audience. His language was keen and sarcastic and was characteristic of the speaker. If there was any disagreement with him in his interpretation of historical events and in the importance that he attached to the lodge-room rites, he was certainly believed to be sincere.

Thus ended the work of this convention, which the friends of the anti-secrecy reform regard as a success. It bore strong testimony to the excellency of the cause in which the Association is engaged, and to the evils of the lodge system which it so earnestly and persistently opposes in the name of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The Convention.—The W. C. T. U. and secret orders.—Lady Henry Somerset.—Other noted figures.

The eighteenth annual convention of the National W. C. T. U. has passed into history; but as for describing it—the organ draped with flags of all nations, and behind the flowering plants grouped on the platform the calm-browed, grand-faced leaders of the white ribbon hosts that filled the floors and packed the galleries and then overflowed and filled up Park and Bromfield street churches, almost as soon as the Temple was opened—who is sufficient for these things? The W. C. T. U. has grown from that little Gideon's band that first went forth to fight King Alcohol in his strongholds, to be literally "an army with banners," and truly "terrible" must the sight have been to the liquor-sellers of Boston, and the corrupt politicians who do their bidding. I thought, as my eye rested on the motto which was the center piece: "Christ for the world," what multitudes of Christian women, as sweet, as pure, as brave, as noble in their whole-hearted consecration as any of these, would have rejoiced to see this day, but died without the sight. Ah! but if they had not wept, and prayed, and struggled, would the womanhood of this generation be standing now where it does? "The Lord gave the word. The women who publish it" "are indeed 'a great host,'" and may he speed the time when Joseph Cook's words, which formed another of the mottoes conspicuously displayed, shall come true: "No sex, no shirks, no simpletons, in suffrage."

The first day of the convention was not a satisfactory one in all respects,—not, at least, for the many disappointed ticket-holders, who had bought their seats months before and found it impossible to get in; or to the still greater number of those who applied at the eleventh hour and found them all taken up. But it is much easier to find fault than to manage such a vast assemblage without friction or jar. Miss Willard was the same that she always is in the chair,—tactful, graceful, sweet and dignified, ready for all emergencies;—it is simply marvelous. What would the women of fifty years ago, who were, generally speaking, as innocent of all knowledge of parliamentary rules and usage as they were of Greek and Hebrew, have said to see her?

Her address was, of course, full of telling points; but I think had she fully realized the temper of Boston as regards the public school question, she would not have given its enemies a seeming indorsement by going out of her way to praise up Bishop Ireland. Also, her allusion to Gov. Russell as that "noble youth," the "fittest survival" of his party, was quite too flattering for his deserts, and had better have been left out. Perhaps Miss Willard herself thought so, when both he and Mayor Matthews found that they were in absolute need of rest after the arduous labors of the late political campaign, and had made arrangements to be out of town at the time the convention was held, thus making it impossible for them to attend. What was it but a bid for the saloon vote? These gentlemen have not been chary of their presence on much less important and significant occasions. They have not been remarkably afraid of seeming to favor Catholics or saloon-keepers. Why were they afraid to indorse, by appearing on the platform, this great and unique assembly of Christian women gathered from all lands in the interests of temperance, purity and national righteousness?

If anybody doubts that the vast majority of the women in the W. C. T. U., are in favor of open methods and opposed to the lodge, even when it swears by the sacred name of temperance, the manner in which the audience received its fraternal delegates when introduced was in itself a whole volume of testimony on this point. They had been very free in their expressions of applause up to this time, but when the delegate who represented the Sons of Temperance came forward he was received with dead silence,—so marked as to be apparent to every one. He made as good a speech as was possible, however, under these somewhat depressing circumstances, and remarked, among other things, that the Sons of Temperance were to blame for the crusade, meaning that the first impulse in this movement came from one who was a member of that society. To blame it certainly was, though in a different sense from what the speaker intended;—to blame, that after having had the field to itself for a score of years, it had so far failed either to reform the drunkard, or shut up the dramshop, that the women in their desperation and despair had to take the matter in their own hands and inaugurate in prayer and faith a new departure. Mother Stewart followed as World's delegate from the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of Good Templars; but the applause which greeted her, it was plain to see, was a tribute to herself personally, and not intended in the least for the order she represented. This became evident enough as she proceeded to speak in behalf of that order amidst an almost oppressive silence, which she seemed to feel, for she paused at one point in her remarks and asked, "Isn't there any Good Templar here? If there is, why don't you cheer?" Yet even this direct appeal brought out no response. I am sure now of a fact which I always suspected, viz.: that the lodge is very unpopular with the great mass of the W. C. T. U., and I trust that the dear woman who stands at the head of the white ribbon organization will learn that any attempt to rope in and affiliate with us those who are of diametrically opposite methods and principles, is a most impolitic measure. The new tract, "Boston Ministers," containing the testimonies of Drs. Gordon and Gray, Joseph Cook and Rev. R. D. Grant, was distributed in all the seats on floor and galleries by Bro. Stoddard and a few faithful co-workers; and also in Faneuil Hall at a rally of the Independent Women Voters, held at noon on the closing day of the convention, and attended by many of the W. C. T. U., in order to hear from the president of this association, Mrs. E. Trask Hill, about the public school agitation, and the part taken by the women of Boston therein. The Western delegates will go back with clearer views regarding this great question and be better prepared to meet the enemy whose plans for the subjugation of American liberty can have no sectional limitations. The seed-sowing so faithfully done at this convention can hardly fail to show good results before another year goes by. At Bro. Stoddard's I had the pleasure of meeting the State President of Colorado, Mrs. Eva Higgins, and two of her delegation,—sweet, refined, cultured women, as hospitable to new ideas and reforms before unthought of as befitted the wide-awake, progressive State from which they hailed. The singing of John B. Hutchinson struck a chord of memory and carried me back to my childish days, when for the first and only time I heard the Hutchinson family, of whom there is now but this one left. His rendering of Mackay's well known hymn, was highly appreciated by the audience. Women of action they surely are. Think for a moment what the work these leaders have done would amount to in the aggregate; the miles of land and sea they have traversed, the meetings they have held, the alms-houses and jails they have visited, the literature they have scattered, the souls they have won to Christ and the ways of peace and purity;—often in weakness of body and under the pressure of many and distracting cares. Well may they be called the "women of action," whose motto, as quoted by one of them, has always been, "Do all the good you can, in all the ways you can, to all the people you can."

"Men of thought and women of action Clear the way,"

And now for a few pen pictures, putting the observed of all, Lady Henry Somerset, at the head of the list. She is a remarkably pretty woman, with the fresh color peculiar to our English sisters, but her greatest charm lies in her gentle, unassuming manners and her musical voice, but, above all, in the spirit of sincerity and entire consecration which marks her every utterance. Whether she would create quite so much of a furor if she was plain "Mrs." is a question I will not pronounce upon. An earl's daughter is not to be seen every day in democratic America, and perhaps it is well that worshipers of titles, which class I am happy to think are not very numerous in the W. C. T. U., should occasionally see one and learn that a genuine lady is the same thing the world over, with or without a title. Lady Somerset, as Dr. Gordon well said when he introduced her at the overflow meeting in his church, is the Lady Huntingdon of this century. On this occasion Amanda Smith, the colored evangelist, occupied the platform with her. Very beautiful it was to me, the sight of these two "daughters of the King," so vastly different in the circumstances of their birth and social position, and yet engaged in the same work; meeting on the same level. Truly, the Gospel is the great teacher of human equality, and only in Christ is there neither bond nor free, black nor white.

Mrs. Frances W. Harper has a peculiarly sweet, intelligent face and a manner full of native refinement, besides a rare gift of eloquence. Never did I hear from human lips a more thrilling appeal than hers, given at one of the overflow meetings, in behalf of her long-suffering and persecuted race. Mary Clemmer Leavitt, the all-around-the-world missionary, has a pleasing personality; and the fall of black lace over her head gives her a certain distinguishe appearance. One would look at her twice, even in the midst of a crowd. Mrs. Mary M. Love, the Australian delegate, sweet and gentle-faced, with that peculiar softness of voice which seems part and parcel of such a countenance, was another noticeable figure. Japan sent us Portia, in the person of Mrs. Tel Sono, who is a lawyer from the empire of the Mikado; and if she succeeds in her plan of establishing a Bible training-school for her high caste sisters, the rising sun on the flag of Japan will begin to mean something to the women of that far-away nation.

Time will fail me, as well as Cynosure space, to give more than a bird's-eye view of this great convention, but I hope in my next letter to take up some of the interesting threads which I am for the present forced to drop.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 18, 1891.

Washingtonians have become so accustomed to the presence of distinguished bodies of churchmen, owing to the unusually large number of them which held meetings here this year, that it will seem odd when a week goes by without such a meeting in our midst. Yesterday the fourteenth annual session of the Episcopal Church Congress was opened here with an impressive sermon by Bishop Phillips Brooks, a divine who has recently occupied a very conspicuous position in the newspapers, both secular and religious, owing to the unfortunate controversy over his being elected bishop. Ex-Senator Edmunds is the presiding officer of this Congress, which in some respects is a very unique body, particularly as to its aims and objects. It will listen to able papers on some of the most vital questions of the day, and will discuss the same with a great deal more freedom than would be permissible in a legislative body of this or any other single denomination. The mere fact that it can take no action upon any subject that will be binding upon anybody, opens wide the doors to a general theoretical discussion, which is always enjoyed by men of much learning, and this Congress is made up entirely of that class of men. Considerable discussion was caused by the refusal of Bishop Paret of this diocese to preside over the discussion, as the custom has been for the bishop of the diocese in which the Congress is held to preside. Bishop Paret says that as the Congress is not under the authority of the church, and is neither an administrative nor a legislative body, it is no part of his ecclesiastical duties to preside over its arguments, which he regards as those of any other body upon which the attendance is entirely voluntary. Senator Edmunds, in his opening address, referred regretfully to the absence of Bishop Paret.

It is stated as one of the effects of the example and influence of the Christian men and women who have been met here during the last two weeks, that never before has there been so much activity in Christian work in Washington, both inside and outside of the churches. The women and children, ever mighty factors in the cause of moral reform, are enthusiastically at work in the Master's cause.

The Princeton College students, Pierson and Goldsbury, who, although young men, have already made enviable reputations as working evangelists, are conducting a week's services in the interest of young men at the Y. M. C. A. building in this city. These young men have the happy faculty of being able to reach the consciences of other young men in ways that appear to be almost irresistible, and their meetings are proving very successful, the conversions already reaching nearly one hundred. An old clergyman was asked to what he attributed their success. "To the manner in which they impress their deep earnestness upon those they talk to," was the reply, without a moment's hesitation.

That the licensing of the liquor traffic is an evil, must be acknowledged by any one who will take the trouble to look into the matter. Yesterday, an attorney, in arguing in favor of the granting of licenses to bar-rooms in a disreputable locality which had been refused by the District Commissioners, made that point unusually clear. He took the ground that so long as his clients outwardly complied with the letter of the law the Commissioners had no right to refuse them licenses; and, to clinch his argument, he said to the Commissioners: "Why, every month in the year you draw your salaries from the proceeds of the tax on this very business." This lawyer was but restating the old argument of the liquor dealers, which is, in short: The license tax makes the selling of liquor legal.

One of the several cases involving the validity of the anti-lottery law—that section closing the mails to newspapers which contain advertisements of lotteries—was argued before the Supreme Court this week. It is impossible to say how soon the decision will be handed down. *

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM A LODGE-RIDDEN CITY.

BRISTOL, Conn., Nov., 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I write a few lines to let you know how Bristol is getting on. The Masons are building a large temple here, and of course the press has to throw out a sop for the unwary, to catch them if they can.

I had quite a long talk with the editor of the Bristol Press, who came out with an editorial this week which I send you. [It is the ordinary fulsome praise of "mystic tie" charity, friendship, benevolence, and all the rest of the lodge twaddle, which has been refuted and exposed a thousand times.—EDITOR.] I gave him the Cynosure of last week, and told him to read the article "Odd-fellowship a Religious Institution," and showed him the notice of Bro. Tuttle's death, which you printed.

We have thirty-five lodges in full blast in Bristol at the present time. Many have been bled by the different "Get-Rich-Quick" orders, in which you pay them $50 and get $100 in one year—if you may believe their managers; but many of these frauds go to pieces, and so the dupes fail to get the money.

I sent you two copies of Puck, showing the "secret society crank," "a bad day for umbrellas," and "the pope best in the dark ages." It is a fact that God has judged his foes, and has put it into the hearts of the Italians to hate the harlot, for strong is the Lord God that judges her, and they are eating her flesh and burning her with fire. She is howling, and truly let her howl. Rejoice over her, for our redemption draweth nigh. She fell in 1870, never to again have any temporal power; but deliverance is near. Even so, come Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Let us sound the alarm, and give only a certain sound against evil. I will, by the help of God! Your brother in Christ,

E. M. R.

BRO. HINMAN CRITICISED.

MILTON JUNCTION, Wis., Nov. 11, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—In your this week's issue is an article from Bro. H. H. Hinman, purporting to explain what he meant in his report, published Oct. 22, in which he says: "What I meant was, that it would be unsafe to trust our religious rights to the hands of saloon-keepers and anarchists—the men who hate all restraint upon their passions." This is all right as far as it goes.

What gave offence was the following statement: "They (Seventh-Day Baptists) are willing to join hands with those who hate all laws, and all restraints;" which is about as untrue as it can be. I do not believe there is a class of citizens more undeserving of such a charge. No licensed saloon exists where Seventh-Day Baptists have a controlling vote, and has not for forty years. We are opposed to all liquor saloons on all days. We think it is a partial winking at the sin, to say they must not sell on a particular day of the week and fine them for that, and not for selling on other days of the week, but license them to do so, as though it is comparatively innocent to carry on the business on other days; as much as to say, the time of their selling is the chief part of the sin. It would be like forbidding men to steal on Sunday.

No denomination furnished a larger proportion, according to their number, to help defend our government and put down lawlessness, in our civil war, than the Seventh-Day Baptists. No class can be found that is more resolutely opposed to lawlessness of any kind; and hence our opposition to all human enactments that trench upon Divine law. Hence, our opposition to all enactments enforcing religious institutions, and thus getting between God and his subjects. We believe that Cæsar should have only what belongs to Cæsar, and not what belongs to God. We believe that citizens should never be required to ask of legislators how far they may be permitted to obey God without being fined and imprisoned because they do not honor human enactments above the Divine; as is already the case in some States, and which many seem anxious to have exist in all, with a change of the Federal Constitution to correspond. Yours for truth and justice, (Rev.) N. WARDNER.

THE REAL ISSUE.

AVALON, Mo., Nov., 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The political armies are deploying their forces for '92. The heavy skirmishing in the several States indicates the determination of the two old parties. It is an "off-year," and the time for outside elements to show their weakness or their strength. Both the so-called "People's party" and the Prohibitionists have signally failed to materialize satisfactorily at the ballot box.

The Voice of Nov. 12th, says: "Now, let us see what the People's party is made of. Can it stand a knock-down any better than its predecessors, the Union Labor, Butler's People's party, and the Greenbackers?" A Voice editorial in the same issue, on the Prohibition outcome, introduces such sentences as: "We ought to have done better," "There is something wrong," "The fault this year," and so on. The effort of the Voice to down the People's party and supplant it in the lead of the despotic rebel Alliance, recoiled on Prohibition at the polls. Multitudes of men and women believe with Rev. J. M. Foster, in the Christian Cynosure: "The time is at hand when the lodge will be regarded as a public evil, a foe to the Republic, more dangerous than the liquor traffic, more hurtful than speedy and easy divorce. It is the Goliath of the enemy's camp defying the army of the living God." We Americans found that out some years since, and thousands are fast arriving at the same conclusion. The times are ripe for anti-secrecy agitation. Fall in! Fall in to line, patriots! and let us overthrow the pagan and un-American lodge, and then other reforms will be feasible. Are you ready?

M. N. BUTLER.

OF INTEREST TO "CYNOSURE" READERS.

YORK, Pa., Nov. 9, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—To aid in extending the circulation of the Cynosure, and also to assist in the organization of the anti-secret forces in New York, Ohio, New Jersey, Maryland and Pennsylvania, I make the following offer, to hold good until April 1st., 1892:

All readers of the Cynosure, residing in the five States above named, may send me a list of honest and intelligent persons, with addresses, and one red stamp for each name, and I will mail to each person seven anti-secret and anti-Catholic documents, including a Cynosure prospectus.

I desire to say that I only ask for the names of persons who have not yet heard of the anti-secret reform.

EDWARD J. CHALFANT.

PITH AND POINT.

ONE OF THE BEST.

"I like the Cynosure, as it is one of the best papers placed on our family table. The 'angels' are very busy gathering the tares and binding them into 'bundles' (secret societies), which, as our Lord predicted, is to take place at 'the time of the end.' We may look for a speedy change of dispensations, and that our dear Lord Jesus will very soon come, to crush all evil powers, secret societies, worldly kingdoms, etc., and to establish his own kingdom, in which righteousness shall reign."—HERMAN L. GLOEGE, Mouroe, Wis.

A HEARTY COMMENDATION.

"I am more than ever profited by reading the Christian Cynosure. May it long live to enlighten and bless the race!"—REV. I. C. WEIDLER, Biglerville, Pa.

A MORAL LIGHTHOUSE.

"I am glad to receive some more samples of this excellent Christian reform paper—the Cynosure. I consider it a moral lighthouse in this dark world. . . . I am endeavoring, with the Cynosure and tracts, to let the light into some of the dark corners in and about Birmingham; also by lecturing privately and publicly. I am laboring to put the Cynosure into the hands of every colored preacher in this part of the country, as well as other literature on the subject of secret societies."—REV. C. POWERS, Birmingham, Ala.

A VALUABLE PAPER.

"I am a constant reader of your valuable paper, the Christian Cynosure, and have been distributing them, as soon as I read them through, to members of my church in particular. They think it a valuable publication against secret societies."—REV. G. W. DAVIS, Bayou Youla, La.

TO WHICH WE SAY, AMEN.

"Let us thank God and take courage. Much love to the Cynosure and all its correspondents. God bless them in their warfare against Satan's kingdom."—REV. A. J. MILLARD, Little Rock, Ark.

LITERATURE.

ALL AROUND THE YEAR, 1892. Entirely new design in colors, by J. Pauline Sunter. Printed on heavy cardboard, gilt edges, with chain, tassels, and ring. Size 4¼ by 5½ inches. Boxed. Price 50 cents.

This most charming calendar is composed of heavy, gilt-edged cards, tastily tied with white silk cord, and a delicate, silvered chain attached, by which they may be hung on the wall or elsewhere, and are so arranged on rings that they may be turned over as each month shall be needed for reference. As fresh in design—even outshining its brilliant host of predecessors, which have been sent out each year to the calendar-loving world—as it is fresh in the fair whiteness and the soft delicacy of its workmanship, each card contains not only the calendar but a design both charming and appropriate, and an equally timely sentiment. It is a study for an artist—in fact, twelve studies in art, of original and beautiful designs, and worked out in the highest style of the printer's art. The drawings are in Mrs. Sunter's picturesque style and executed in sepia tint and color,—so quaint and bright and sweet that one is charmed beyond expression. Altogether, it is a charming piece of work, a thorough pleasure to the eye, and sure to win a welcome wherever it goes. They are of convenient size, four and one-fourth by five and a half inches, and in their neat boxes, take the lead among the calendars of the season. As a holiday gift, there is none prettier or daintier, equally suitable for the library and office, or "my lady's chamber." Published by Lee & Shepard, 10 Milk street, Boston.

Lee & Shepard (10 Milk street, Boston,) announce for the fall trade some new and charming publications, for young and old—for holiday presents—for fireside reading—books, in great variety, to amuse and instruct. Send for catalogue.

The November issue of Our Day has for its heaviest oration Joseph Cook's Boston Monday Lecture on Prof. Briggs' Self-Contradictions; and Promises and Perils of the Newest Criticism of the Bible, which is without doubt the best criticism of the Professor's ambiguous position in theology that has yet appeared, and leaves his especial beliefs badly scarified. Another timely and strong paper is that of Rev. W. F. Crafts on The Sunday Closing of Saloons—a subject that Christians cannot too often or too deeply discuss. F. H. Underwood has a review of James Russell Lowell's position as a reformer and poet, that possesses peculiar interest. Prof. James Buckham shows that the tremendous condensation of modern life in cities, and liberalism—extreme individualism and selfishness, on the one hand, and unlicensed freedom of thought and action on the other—are sources of our increasing modern savagery. The Boston Hymn of the month is by J. E. Rankin—Sons and Sires—as sung at the Tremont Temple on the delivery of the 221st Monday Lecture. The usual editorial departments are replete with minor thoughts of interest and value to those who admire the researches of others or delight to think for themselves. The publication of Our Day will, with the new year, be transferred to the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, Chicago, of which Mrs. F. H. Rastall is the manager. The advertising department of the periodical is to be in charge of Mr. R. S. Thain, of the Association. The editorial management and proprietary interest of the magazine will remain unchanged, and will continue at 28 Beacon street, Boston, where all communications for publication may be addressed.

The survey of history-making events in politics and society is a feature of the November Review of Reviews, most comprehensive and valuable. If the political organs which are read from week to week could lay before their readers the salient facts of party movements and legislation with something like the same clearness, precision and candor of judgment, it would be an untold blessing. The bearing of the fall State elections, of the discussions of peace or war in Europe, of the Russian famines, of the Chinese threats of our missionaries, etc., are among the topics taken up most intelligently in this number. While dealing in its principal character sketch with the vivid personality of William II., Emperor of Germany, this number has also a group of articles that must attract wide attention, under the head, "Three Fallen Leaders." These articles comprise sketches of the late Messrs. Parnell, Boulanger, and Balmaeceda. Mr. Arthur Stedman also contributes a noteworthy sketch of the once world-famed author, Herman Melville, who has died within the month, almost wholly forgotten after many years of strict retirement from authorship and society. The number contains also a summary of the legislation enacted by those State legislatures which have been in session in the present year, 1891. Published at 13 Astor Place, New York City.

The Missionary Review of the World for December contains as the leading article in the Department of "Literature of Missions" a full report, covering seventeen pages, of the Foreign Mission day at Northfield, Mass., last summer. Among the other articles of special note are: "European Literature in the Mission Fields," by F. F. Ellenwood, D.D.; "The Evangelization of Israel," by Prof. George H. Schodde, Ph. D.; etc. Two valuable tables in the Department of "General Missionary Intelligence," and compiled by Dr. D. L. Leonard, give statistics of missionary societies in Great Britain and on the Continent for 1891, and statistics of Woman's Missionary Societies in America and Europe. A valuable index, furnishing a means of ready reference to all the subjects treated in the Review during the year, accompanies this number. Published by Funk & Wagnalls Company, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York. $2 per year; 25 cents for single numbers. In clubs of ten, $1.50.

The December St. Nicholas will be, as usual, a Christmas number. It will contain complete stories by J. T. Trowbridge, Thomas Nelson Page, Miss Elizabeth Bismal, Edgar W. Nye, and others, and the first installment of Charles E. Carryl's nonsense story, The Admiral's Caravan, with illustrations by Birch. A new serial story by Brander Matthews began in the November St. Nicholas.

OBITUARY.

RICHARD R. DeLONG was born upon Lake George, in Canada, October 21, 1802, and died at Warren, Jo Daviess Co., Illinois, October 20, 1891—one day less than 89 years of age.

He was the son of a Revolutionary soldier. When twelve years of age he was apprenticed to Gen. Brown, of Brownville, N. Y., renowned in the war of 1812, and during that war was captured on an American vessel, made a prisoner of war, and carried to Kingston. He was, however, shortly afterwards released and allowed to return home.

The greater part of his early life was spent in Jefferson county, N. Y. He was a manufacturer by occupation, and at one time owned a woolen mill at Black River, six miles above Watertown, New York.

He was married in January, 1826, to Miss Julia A. Clark, who for 65 years, as a faithful wife, has shared with him the burdens and joys of life. Of their four children the two daughters have gone on before; the two sons remain.

He came West and settled in Duntou, Ill., now Arlington Heights, in 1857, and in the spring of 1864 came to Warren, where he lived until his death, occupying the same house for 27 years.

He was raised a Methodist and joined the church when he was about 28 years of age. At one time in the East he left the Methodist Episcopal ranks and entered the Wesleyan Methodist church, which was born of ultra abolition views and, as he felt, more in sympathy with his convictions than the other church. Coming to the West, he joined the Methodist Episcopal church again, and for many years was an active worker and a faithful attendant upon the social means of grace. His clear testimonies are well remembered by some of the older brethren who are yet in the effective ranks.

In ante-Rebellion times he bore the honored name of "black Abolitionist." At the outbreak of the Rebellion, though 58 years of age, he enlisted for the war as a volunteer, but on account of age and infirmity, he was rejected by the medical examiner, much to his disappointment.

He was very patriotic in his sentiments, an ardent abolitionist, a strong peace man, an earnest advocate of temperance, and opposed to secret societies.

For several years prior to his death he was nearly deaf, and his lameness became so bad that it was useless, he thought, for him to attempt attendance upon the services of the church or public meetings or any kind.

He always enjoyed good health, having never but twice, in the memory of his wife and children, been confined to the house on account of sickness. The first occasion was about seven years ago, when, on account of accident, he was compelled to keep his room for a couple of weeks; and the second instance was last winter when the grip prostrated him for a time. About a fortnight before his death he injured his knee, and cold taken a few days later caused the injured joint to swell and inflame. From this he suffered intensely for about two weeks, when he peacefully passed away.

The funeral services took place at the family residence Thursday afternoon, Oct., 22, at 1:30 o'clock, conducted by Rev. Wm. E. Wilkinson. The remains were laid to rest in Elmwood cemetery. Thus closed the earthly career of one who was a good citizen, a kind friend, a loving husband and father—a man of convictions and courage, respected by all who knew him.

CLEANLINESS NEXT TO GODLINESS.

We read that Cleanliness is akin to Godliness, that the two are nearly inseparable. We will not dispute the point, nor attempt to even argue it, but will be content to say that without the former the latter cannot be attained.

Naturally the question arises with us all how to become clean (occasionally), even if our vocation is such that we cannot keep so.

of Mess. J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., in this issue this question is readily solved. This firm rank among the most extensive manufacturers of soaps in the world. They are aggressive, pushing men of marked business ability and integrity.

The offer they make to the readers of this paper is certainly a remarkable one. When we received the order for the insertion of this advertisement we at first thought they offered more than they could do. To satisfy ourselves upon this point we ordered one of the Combination Boxes (as described in the adv't), that we might see if all they offered would be fulfilled. The Box came at once. And we can truly state that it is all that they claim, even better.

The Chautauqua Piano Lamp is worth all that the box costs. There is enough Sweet Home Soap to last a family one year. Also toilet soaps and toilet preparations to please the entire family.—Eds.

"Aren't you ever going to grow old, like the rest of us?" asked a man of an acquaintance he hadn't seen for some time. "Well, not so long as I can purify my blood with Ayer's Sarsaparilla," was the apt reply. This man knew what he was talking about.

If that lady at the lecture the other night only knew how nicely Hall's Hair Renewer would remove dandruff and improve the hair she would buy a bottle.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1891.

MASONRY PERFECTLY DESCRIBED IN THE SCRIPTURES.

[Ephesians 5: 11-13.]

Have no fellowship with those who celebrate the heathen mysteries, which being transacted in the darkness of night, are really the unfruitful works of darkness, as they bring no fruit to the initiated except eternal death: but rather even reprove them. For the impure and wicked actions which are secretly done in the mysteries by the initiated are so abominable, that it is base even to mention them. Now, all these reprobable actions, which are practiced in celebrating the mysteries, are made manifest as sinful by the Gospel: and seeing everything which discovers the true nature of actions is light, the Gospel, which discovers the evil nature of the actions performed in the mysteries, is light.

"Have no fellowship." Chandler observes that this word was used by the Greeks to denote "a participation in their religious rites and mysteries." Wherefore, by this precept, the Ephesians were forbidden to enter into any of the heathen fellowships; a sense of the precept which is confirmed by the following verse. "Unfruitful works;" that is, works which produced no good, either to those who wrought them, or to society. "Works of darkness." The apostle calls the heathen mysteries works of darkness, because the impure actions which the initiated perform in them, under the notion of religious rites, were done in the night time; and by the secrecy in which they were acted, were acknowledged by the perpetrators to be evil. "But rather even reprove them." The Greek word signifies to reprove, (1 Tim. 5: 20); to confute, (2 Tim. 4: 2); to convict, (John 8: 46); and to convince, because the effect of reproof and confutation, properly administered, is to convince. The apostle wished the Ephesians to use their superior knowledge, derived from the Gospel, in showing the initiated the absurdity of the mysteries, and the sinfulness of the things done in them. "It is base even to mention." The initiated were taken engaged not to divulge the mysteries. Here the apostle insinuates that the engagement was prudent, because it was base even to mention the things that were done in these mysteries. "Everything which maketh manifest is light." By this observation the apostle hath showed how absurdly the heathens gave to their mysteries the appellation of light, and to the initiated the appellation of enlightened persons. For if these mysteries had been really light, they would have made the evil actions of the initiated, especially those which were done in the mysteries themselves, manifest in their true colors. The honorable appellation of light belonged only to the Gospel, the mystery of Christ; and of enlightened persons to the initiated into that excellent mystery. (1 John 1: 5.)—Macknight's Translation and Commentary of the Epistles, (1795.)

It being now a well-known fact, and acknowledged by Masons themselves, that Freemasonry is in many important particulars a reproduction of these same religious heathen mysteries denounced by the apostle, how base and blasphemous is the insinuation that the Lord Jesus Christ (as claimed by some—Rebold's History of Masonry in Europe, pages 375 and 392) was an Essene (or Mason) in principle if not in deed. Solomon, too, could have been familiar with these gross mysteries only after he, through the influence of his heathen wives, had forsaken the true God and fallen into their pagan practices. If he ever was a Mason, that was the time.

Indeed, Mackey's Lexicon of Freemasonry is very explicit on this point. In 1 Kings 11: 7, we are told, "Then did Solomon build a high place (temple, or altar,) for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem." Verse 9, "And the Lord was angry with Solomon because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel."

What this "Chemosh, the abomination of Moab" was, is shown in Numbers 25: 3, "And Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor"—the worship of the gods by the Moabites—"and the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel." The plague followed—verse 9—and 24,000 of these pagans perished.

Read Mackey's Lexicon, article "Phallus," (in connection with article "Point within a Circle.") In the former, phallic worship is traced to Egypt; from Egypt it was introduced into Greece; and, later, "it was adopted by the idolatrous Israelites, who took it from the Moabites in the Wilderness of Sin, under the name of Baal-peor."

In view of these evidences, we repeat: If Solomon was ever a Mason, it was after he had forsaken the God of his father David and become a worshiper of Baal-peor, "Chemosh, the abomination of Moab," in whose honor he built a high place, a place of worship. Masonry, therefore, has no connection with Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem.

—Did ever anybody see an official Thanksgiving Proclamation that recognized the Lord Jesus Christ as the greatest benefactor of our race?

—Not much has been heard from the Prohibition votes in the several States in which elections were recently held, but it is understood that little or no defection in the real strength of the party is visible. When a more important election occurs—say, in the fall of 1892—they expect to have a full hand in the contest.

—The fact that Indianapolis, Ind., as reported by Bro. Porter, has no greater institution of learning than the common graded schools, detracts nothing from the value of these schools. It is somewhat surprising that so important a city, and the home of President Harrison, has not exhibited more enterprise in this direction.

—Governor Fifer, in harmony with the proclamation of President Harrison, has also appointed Thursday, Nov. 26 (to-day), a day of Thanksgiving to be observed by the people of this State. This is right and proper. As a people, we can never be too thankful for the blessings we enjoy, or too thoughtful of the poor and needy around us, who, on this day, have especial claims upon our benevolence.

—Keeley's bi-chloride-of-gold-cure-for-drunkenness hospitals are becoming numerous throughout the country, and well-patronized, the Dwight institution having 800 patients recently, with accommodations for only 300. Other parties are also establishing similar sanitariums, alleging that Mr. Keeley is not alone in his knowledge of the proper treatment for the removal of the drink-habit. The question of permanence in the cure is still an open one.

—A "Catholic Knight of America," John Bar, Supreme Secretary of that order, is to be examined by an official board, on charges of negligence in office, preferred by a committee. The charges, as we learn from a dispatch to the Inter-Ocean, from St. Louis, Nov. 9, are serious, and will be investigated during the latter part of this month, when the books of the secretary and treasurer are to be examined. The principal wonder is that the affair was ever made public.

—A general order, just issued by General John Palmer, commander-in-chief of the G. A. R., commands every post in the United States to at once make substantial contributions to a fund of $300,000 to $500,000, to be used in the erection of an imposing memorial hall at Decatur, Ill., the birth-place of the order. In most cases, for such an object, subscriptions are commonly solicited; in this, it takes the form of a command. Who says that the secret lodge is not autocratic and intolerant?

—News comes from Rockford that "John G. Garver, a prominent member of the bar, has been laid up for two months. It has just become known that he was injured while undergoing the initiation ceremony of a secret society known as the 'Knights of the Globe.' The injury is a serious one, it being supposed that a blood vessel is broken in one of his limbs. It is also supposed that the injury was caused by a severe blow or fall, and he may never fully recover the use of his limb." The ritual of this order would seem to be "impressive," in more senses than one. This victim may well ask, "Was it worth the trouble to undergo so much to gain so little?"

—It is worthy of remark that the Women's Christian Temperance Alliance, engineered by Mrs. Foster of Iowa, and which originated in a split of the Women's Christian temperance Union because the seceders thought that partisan politics should be ignored in the Temperance work, has forsaken this position and is now at liberty to work for any political party that it may select. The constitution of the Alliance, as originally constructed, forbade its members making partisan speeches in any political contest; but at its State meeting in Chicago, not long ago, it was decided to strike this provision from the constitution. The Alliance, it is understood, will support the Republican ticket in 1892.

—"It is stated by those who know that since the anti-secret society meetings that were held last week a large number of applications have been received by the several secret organizations of the city for membership. This is especially true of the Odd-fellows' lodge. The meetings seemed to act as an advertising card for the societies."—Galesburg (Ill.) Mail. The devil always shows himself on the battle-field—after the Christian workers have returned to camp. Those of his followers who have joined the Odd-fellows at a cost of from $10 to $100 might have saved their money. We can teach them the entire work of the lodge, encampment, cantonments, etc., with grips and signs in full, for fifty cents.

—On the 1st of November, at Logan, Utah, Mormon President Wilford Woodford said: "We have had prophets and apostles among us. They have worked here in the flesh and have saved many souls. They have died and gone to the spirit world. Joseph Smith holds the keys of this dispensation. He will hold them to the endless ages of eternity, no matter who may lead the church after him." Mormonism is evidently still alive—a very hot-bed of hypocrisy, or a woefully misrepresented form of Protestantism; but it bears the stigma of being a man-made religion; and no further testimony is required to prove it than the foregoing passage—a secret, untrustworthy system of church-and-state-ism, without which any country is better off.

—The People's party suffered in the recent State elections and the returns show a remarkable diminution of strength and popularity. In Ohio the party seems to have polled about 12,000 out of a total vote of 700,000; in Iowa 15,000 out of 375,000; in Kansas it carried one judicial district out of ten, and was defeated in seventy-five counties. Last year, out of 424 principal county offices in the State the Alliance got over 300; this year it gets only 125. The Democrats combined with the Republicans and swamped the People's party. In South Dakota its vote was reduced one-third; in Nebraska it seems to have polled issues and cast no independent vote; in the South it did not appear. It looks as if it is not to be a potent factor in the Presidential election next year.

—At the Women's Christian Temperance Union's Annual Convention, in Boston, last week, Miss Frances E. Willard was re-elected president, receiving 393 votes of 396. Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge was elected recording secretary; Miss Caroline E. Buell, of Chicago, corresponding secretary; Miss Esther Pugh, of Chicago, treasurer. The board of superintendents and organizers was also elected at the fourth day's session. Mrs. Caroline E. Buell was placed in charge of the department of organization. The superintendents are classed under the general heads of organization, preventive, educational, evangelistic, social and legal, each department having a long list of sub-departments. The President's prize banner was presented to the State of Maine. The banner of the National Juvenile Association went to Iowa. The convention was quite spirited, and showed a fair progress made during the past year.

—Our Reform friends in Canada are discussing the evils of secret societies quite extensively and with great apparent earnestness and power. At a recent meeting of the Presbyterian Council of Toronto, Rev. Dr. Parsons, pastor of Knox church, proposed as a subject for discussion at the next regular meeting, "The relation of church members towards organizations outside of the church." When asked to explain what he meant by organizations outside of the church, Dr. Parsons stated he meant all those who did not require their members to be members of an evangelical church. He said societies, such as the Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Foresters and others of a similar character, were formed with a grain of morality covering up a multitude of sins. He could not see how members of the church who gave themselves and all they had to Christ could consistently belong to the societies mentioned. This is the line of work upon which the N. C. A. has been for years opposing these societies, their pagan religion, their spurious charity, and their murderous obligations; and this is the work in which the churches ought to be engaged, instead of fellowshiping with members of the lodges.

—Syracuse University recently achieved a reputation in rowdiness seldom equaled at a respectable secular institution of learning. "The newspaper reports," says the New York Catholic Review, "describe the opening exercises in the chapel, the singing of the hymn, 'Before Jehovah's Awful Throne,' the reading of the Gospel, and the prayer of the chancellor for a successful year. At the close of the prayer, in the very chapel itself, in the presence of the officials and the lady students, the students began a row that would have disgraced the precincts of a beer garden. It continued until the contestants were exhausted." The faculty may not be responsible for this outbreak, but should be held strictly accountable if another similar offence is committed. Why cannot students be gentlemen?

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Bro. H. H. Hinman writes from Massillon, Ohio, Nov. 21, that he has been very unwell, and has been unable to do anything in the line of his work. He certainly has the prayers and sympathy of all his Cynosure friends.

—Rev. Josephus Chcaney, the "Texas Giant" temperance lecturer, has been and is now laboring nightly at the revival services in the Belden Avenue Baptist church, of which Rev. Mr. Barber is pastor. The work is progressing favorably.

—Bro. S. F. Porter, the College agent, writes from Indianapolis, Nov. 12: "I think I shall work from this point for a week or more. . . . This city does not seem to have any institution higher than graded common schools, and there are plenty of these. My health is not first-rate, but I trust the Lord will give me strength to do the present important work."

—The Wisconsin Anti-Secrecy Conference, at Vernon, properly and promptly appointed Rev. W. W. Ames, of Menominee, State agent to prosecute the local reform work. Bro. Ames is well known to Cynosure readers as a sturdy adherent of the cause which it represents, and he has, also, the credit of being its first cash-paying subscriber. Of his earnestness and ability there can be no doubt.

—Bro. I. R. B. Arnold, writing from Milton, Ky., on Saturday, Nov. 14, says: "All the churches in this city unite in Gospel service on the (floating) chapel to-morrow night. We sometimes turn away hundreds of people at a time; more come than can get in." Bro. Arnold made no mistake when he entered upon this prosperous river work, which God is signally blessing to the salvation of souls.

—The Cynosure's earnest friend and co-laborer, Mrs. Laura S. Haviland, who, on the 20th of December, will, if spared, reach her eighty-third birthday, has gone to Cottonwood, Shasta county, Cal., to spend the winter with her invalid brother. She underwent the fatigue of her long journey remarkably well, and with much enjoyment. Her mind, notwithstanding her years, maintains its clearness, and her physical strength is greater than is usual in persons of her advanced age.

—Rev. A. W. Parry, one of the most devoted adherents of the anti-secrecy reform party, is at present pastor of the Free Methodist church at Aurora, Ill. Not long ago, he opened his doors one evening to Bro. H. H. Hinman, for a lecture against secret societies. There was a fair audience to hear him—those who remained after the others had found out that the lodge was to be handled without gloves. The truth is seldom palatable to the lodge worshipers. Bro. Parry is now in a position to aid materially in the dissemination of the truth.

—Bro. Geo. W. Clark, of Detroit, under date of November 16, informs us that he had for over two weeks been suffering from a severe attack of the grippe, leaving his head, nostrils, throat and lungs in a bad condition, with an almost incessant cough that greatly strained his system. His daughter is also similarly, and nearly as severely, afflicted with the same distressing malady. "May we have your prayers," he writes, "for release from this terrible grasp, not only upon our throats, but upon our systems?" Will our readers everywhere make them a subject of earnest prayer?

REV. A. J. GORDON D.D.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—You ask for a sketch of the life of Adoniram Judson Gordon, the beloved pastor of the Clarendon Street Baptist church, in this city, and one of New England's most eminent and pious ministers.

His birth and early training occurred on a farm at New Hampton, N. H., where he was converted at 16 years of age. After completing his academic studies, he took a regular course at Brown University, R. I., and was graduated from Newton Theological Seminary in 1863.

After a brief and successful pastorate at Jamaica Plains, he accepted a call to the Clarendon Street Baptist church in 1869, where he still remains the leader and "under shepherd" of a flock numbering 1,050 souls, and constituting one of the most aggressive and spiritually active churches in this city. The "arduousness of power" is wonderfully exemplified in his thoroughly Gospel discourses, and pervades the entire arena of his varied field.

Catching an inspiration through their pastor's words and example, the body of believers extend a helping hand to every good work and to the needy everywhere. Besides caring for their large Sabbath-school, a Chinese school, and a Jewish mission, two outposts for general mission work are under their special care, and six evangelists are constantly employed to go into the waste places of our own land and "preach the word." In India, Africa and Burmah are seven devoted missionaries who look to this church and its pastor as God's agency for supplying their daily needs. A training school for missionaries has been successfully carried on by this church for several years. It has thirty-five students upon its roll at the present time.

Mrs. Gordon, who is a leader in the Prohibition movement, and president of the Boston W. C. T. U., has the entire co-operation of her husband, whose words against the liquor curse are like "arrows in the hearts of the king's enemies." Speaking of the prayer-meetings at the Clarendon Street church, one has said they are "models." They are made emphatically meetings for the people. The time is given to them, the pastor usually merely indicating some line of thought, and giving direction and impulse to others. To be known in any true sense, the pastor must be seen behind all the varied machinery of this ceaseless activity, planning, directing and inspiring his co-workers by his own faith, courage and zeal, in "every good word and work."

"The Christian Portrait Gallery," London, England, writing of his life and labors, says: "This honored servant of God and the American churches was unknown, except by repute, on this side of the Atlantic, until the gathering of the United Conference on Foreign Missions in 1888. . . . But his name is a household word throughout the United States." Farther on, this same author says: "He is a man of such large-hearted views and catholic sympathy, that he can scarcely be called a specialist in his teachings. No subject comes amiss to him. . . . His mind seems saturated with Bible truth and Bible phraseology, which gives color to every thought and expression."

Having made the acquaintance of Doctor and Mrs. Gordon, at the London missionary meetings, the Scottish ministers present invited them to visit Edinburgh and other important points and hold evangelistic services. After noting the various cities in which they labored successfully, the writer closes with the statement, "During the Scottish course, many women's meetings were held, at which one of the principal speakers was Mrs. Gordon; her addresses were listened to with great interest."

This family presents a beautiful picture of Christian home-life, mutual co-operation in temperance and church work, and no bond or covenant of secrecy to mar the harmony or detract from the mutual enjoyment of those "whom God hath joined together," and has forbidden any man to "put asunder." NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 9 AND 10, 1891.

THE OFFICIAL CALL.

The Annual Meeting of the New England Christian Association will be held (D. V.) in the United Presbyterian church, corner of Berkeley and Chandler streets, Boston, Dec. 9th and 10th, 1891. Dr. A. J. Gordon, Mrs. M. E. R. Gleason, Mrs. E. Trask Hill, Rev. R. A. McAyeal, Rev. J. M. Foster, and Rev. I. A. Mesler, are among the speakers engaged. Joseph Cook has also agreed to speak, if within reach at the time. A number of seceders from Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship and other branches of the secret empire will be present and testify from personal experience in the orders. Friends in New England are urgently requested to attend and aid, by their counsels, and their prayers, and contributions, in carrying forward this great work.

Beloved in the Lord, there are practical questions confronting us in the work we have undertaken in behalf of the church of Christ. Ought not these questions to be met at a meeting where they may be carefully considered? One of these is the question of Incorporation. Would it not be well for those who desire to co-operate by prayer, by counsel or by contributions, to meet and confer on the advisability of becoming known in law as a corporate body, thereby assuring greater efficiency and permanence in our work?

Ten o'clock A. M., December 9th, would be a convenient time for such a conference in Boston, preceding the opening of the convention on the afternoon of the same day. The laws of Massachusetts relating to such corporations and other required documents could be in readiness, and if, after due conference, it should seem best to incorporate, legal forms could be expeditiously complied with. Believing that whatever action the brethren might deem wise in the matter, such a conference would be helpful in our work, I hereby request that all who can, meet in the U. P. church, Boston, at 10 A. M. Dec. 9th, to consider the wisdom of incorporating the N. E. C. A., according to the laws of the State of Massachusetts.

We have given some thought to this matter and will state a few reasons why an incorporation would be helpful:

1. It would give legal existence to the Association, which must otherwise remain unknown in judicial proceedings.
2. It would be accepted by the public as evidence of permanence and an intention to conduct business upon a responsible basis.
3. It would encourage individuals and churches, favorably disposed, to put the Association's work on the list of home missions, to receive regular contributions.
4. It would facilitate negotiations for funds, and enable the Association to accept trusts and bequests in aid of its work.
5. It would give legal competency to hold so much real estate and other appliances as are necessary in the prosecution of its work.

The importance of having a local habitation becomes more and more apparent as the work advances, and the efforts of the opposition to checkmate our movements and hedge up every way and close every church door possible against it, is revealed in the results of their underhanded methods. Let us seek heavenly wisdom and come together in the spirit of the Master, in the full assurance that ultimately the "will of God will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

"PRAY WITHOUT CEASING."

"It is time to seek the Lord," and cry mightily unto God for the deliverance of his church from the grasp of the secret lodge.

We cordially invite friends in New England and everywhere to unite with us in special prayer, on Sabbath, Dec. 6, for the baptism of the Holy Spirit on our annual meeting, Dec. 9th and 10th. Remember the word of our Lord, "Without me ye can do nothing."

A light lunch will be served in the vestry at the annual meeting noon and evening, for those from out of town. All who desire entertain for the night will please send their names to Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, 218 Columbus avenue, Boston. Tremont St. and Columbus Ave. cars cross Berkeley street, a couple of blocks from the church. J. A. CONANT, Pres.

E. E. FLAGG, Secretary.

THE HOME.

THE HEART POSSESSED.

"To-day I must abide at thy house."—Luke 19:5.

Heard I Christ, the Master, say,
"I must bide with thee to-day."
But I looked within my heart—
Sin-defiled in every part—
And I said, "Oh, not to-day!
Please thee, Christ, to turn away.

"How can I, so poor and vile,
Full of wickedness and guile,
Entertain within my breast,
Thee, divine and heavenly guest?
Wait, Lord, till I holier be;
Then mayest thou abide with me."

But I heard his voice again
(How unlike the sons of men!)
Heard him speak in words of love,
Rising clear earth's noise above,
"Open, child, thy heart to me:
I bring light and purity."

Then I said, "O, guest divine,
Come, possess this heart of mine!"
And he came with all his grace,
Put on me his comeliness,
Gave my soul the bliss to know,
Christ and heaven together go!

SAVED IN THE MIST.

Two centuries ago when eight or nine hundred persecuted Waldensians were seeking to return to their own country, they suffered sore hardships and peril. As they reached Mt. Cenis, where is now the station of San Bartram, they seemed to be completely hemmed in.

The angry river had a bridge across it, but on the other side were 2,500 French troops, under the celebrated French Marshal Catenas, to oppose their progress. These French troops had defeated the Germans, and had taken Alsace and Lorraine. They were the flower of the French army, and flushed with victory. Already they saw the Waldensians in their hands, and ropes were provided with which to hang all who might be taken alive.

In the extremity one of the Waldensians stepped forward and said, "Brothers, there is hope still; in the place over there, where it seems that only goats can walk and eagles can fly, I know a path; I remember it now, I discovered it one day when going after my goats, and when the night comes we will take it."

The night came, but the enemy seemed to have suspected the movement, for fires were lighted all around. And to add to the perils of the situation the night was clearer than the day had been. At length a mist appeared on the mountain top, and gradually it settled down, enwrapping the Waldensians and completely concealing them. And along that narrow path, where a single slip of the foot would be death to its owner, since he would fall down among the rocks thousands of feet, the entire band passed in safety.

The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of trial. Beset before and behind, hated, hunted and persecuted, he knows the rocky hiding place, and he can make our feet like hinds' feet to scale the barren crags; he can wrap his misty mantle about his persecuted saints, and shelter them beneath the shadow of his wing. For he is their rock, their tower, their stronghold, their refuge, their home through all generations.—Peace and Goodwill.

A RICH MAN WITH NO RICHES.

The following story, says the Wayside, is told of Jacob Ridgway, a wealthy citizen of Philadelphia, who died many years ago, leaving a fortune of six million dollars. "Mr. Ridgway," said a young man with whom the millionaire was conversing, "you are more to be envied than any gentleman I know." "Why so?" responded Mr. Ridgway. "I am not aware of any cause for which I should be particularly envied." "What, sir!" exclaimed the young man, in astonishment. "Why, are you not a millionaire? Think of the thousands your income brings you every month!" "Well, what of that?" replied Mr. Ridgway. "All I get out of it is my victuals and clothes, and I can't eat more than one man's allowance, or wear more than one suit at a time. Pray, can't you do as much?" "Abl but," said the youth, "think of the hundreds of fine houses you own, and the rental they bring you!" "What better off am I for that?" replied the rich man. "I can only live in one house at a time; as for the money I receive for rents, why, I can't eat it, or wear it. I can only use it to buy other houses for other people to live in; they are beneficiaries, not I." "But you can buy splendid furniture and costly pictures and fine carriages and horses; in fact, whatever you desire." "And after I have bought them," responded Mr. Ridgway, "what then? I can only look at the furniture and pictures, and the poorest man who is not blind can do the same. I can ride no easier in a fine carriage than you can in an omnibus for five cents, with the trouble and attention to drivers, footmen and hostlers; and as to 'anything I desire,' I can tell you, young man, that, the less we desire in this world, the happier we shall be. All my wealth cannot buy back my youth, cannot purchase exemption from sickness and pain, cannot procure me power to keep afar off the hour of death; and then, what will all avail when, in a few short years at most, I lie down in the grave, and leave it all forever? Young man, you have no cause to envy me." The fountain of content must spring up in the mind, and he who has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his disposition, will waste his life in fruitless efforts, and multiply the griefs which he proposes to remove.

FIGS AND THISTLES.

The oyster coming into the church generally has a good deal to do with keeping the Lord out.

Give a tenth of your income to God, and you will always have an income from which to give.

"When thou saidst, Seek ye my face, my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek."

The devil will never be discouraged as long as he can look into the church and see a hypocrite.

There are too many people who would like to go to heaven if they could take the devil with them.

Describing sunlight to a blind man is an easy task compared to letting a sinner know how good God is.

There are people who wouldn't lie with the lips for anything, and yet they live a lie every day in the week.

There is no such thing as receiving the Bible as the Word of God, and keeping Christ out of the heart.

There is something wrong with the religion of the man who never looks happy except when he goes to church.

The devil is always afraid of the man who never goes to war without first asking God for marching orders.

Looking too closely at a dollar doesn't make it any bigger, but it very often makes the soul a good deal smaller.

When a man is seeking God with all his heart, such questions as where Cain found his wife don't bother him much.

If some people could have their way, when they pray for rain they would pick out the ground for it to fall upon.

There are plenty of people who will follow the devil all the way to the pit, if he will salt the path with money.

There is a difference between sitting before the fire and thinking about doing good, and going out into the cold and doing it.

The laborers who were sent into the vineyard at the eleventh hour had probably been at work somewhere else up to that time.

God needs people who can eat a cold dinner without growling, a great deal more than he needs louder talking in the class meeting.—Indianapolis Ram's Horn.

THE TWO FOXES—A FABLE.

In the depth of a forest lived two foxes who never had a cross word with each other.

One of them said one day in the politest fox language: "Let's quarrel."

"Very well," said the other; "as you please, dear friend. But how shall we set about it?"

"Oh, that cannot be difficult," said fox number one; "the two-legged people fall out, why should not we?"

So they tried all sorts of ways, but it could not be done, because each would give way. At last number one brought two stones:—"There," said he, "you say they are yours, and I'll say they're mine, and we will quarrel and fight and scratch. Now, I'll begin:

"These stones are mine!"

"Very well," answered the other gently, "you are welcome to them."

"But we shall never quarrel at this rate," cried the other, jumping up and licking his face. "You old simpleton, don't you know it takes two to make a quarrel any day?"—Anonymous.

WHAT BOYS SHOULD LEARN.

Not to tease boys or girls smaller than themselves.

Not to take the easiest chair in the room, put in the pleasantest place, and forget to offer it to mother when she comes to sit down.

To treat their mother as politely as if she were a strange lady who did not spend her life in their service.

To be as kind and helpful to their sisters as they expect their sisters to be to them.

To make their friends among good boys.

To take pride in being gentlemen at home.

To take their mother into their confidence if they do anything wrong, and, above all, never to lie about anything they have done.

To make up their minds not to learn to smoke, chew, or drink, remembering that these things cannot be unlearned, and that they are terrible drawbacks to good men and necessities to bad ones.

To build a fence correctly.

To fill the wood-box every night.

To shut doors in summer to keep flies out.

To shut doors without slamming.

To shut them in winter to keep the cold out.

To do errands promptly and cheerfully.

To get ready to go away without the united efforts of mother and sisters.

To be gentle to their little sisters.

To wash dishes and make their beds when necessary.

To sew on a button and darn a stocking.

To be kind to all animals.

To ride, row, and swim.

To be manly and courageous.

To let cigarettes alone.

To tell the truth.

To observe all these rules, and they are sure to be gentlemen.—Exchange.

SOMETHING FOR BOYS.

A few weeks since I saw a touching and beautiful sight. Driving through a rugged part of the country my attention was directed to an elderly lady trying to pick her way over a rough hill-side. She came very slowly and carefully. The hill was quite steep, and I was pitying her, and thinking if it would not be well to offer my services, when I heard a whistling boy coming up behind the carriage. He bounded past, and, running up the hill, put his arms around the lady and steadied her steps, saying pleasant words, I know, for the face incased in the warm hood looked beaming and bright with happiness. As we passed, I heard her say these words: "It is so nice to have a boy come and help a mother down the hill." They passed on and went into a farm-house at the foot of the hill; I knew they were mother and son. There was a sermon in those few words. I thought, I wish every boy could have heard them.

You boys are all of you here to help mother down the hill of life. You don't all do it, though; more's the pity. Some of you make it harder for her. You do things that trouble her: she is anxious about you, and then she has to pick her way over places a thousand times rougher than walking down a steep hill. Perhaps you are getting into bad habits, and will not obey her counsel. Her heart is bruised and torn by your conduct. She knows what the results of evil doing are: that if a boy begins habits that he only considers light as cobwebs in his youth, by and by they may become iron chains about him, and when he is a man he will be a slave to them.

Now, boys, if you would help the dear mother down the hill of life, and make the path smooth for her, do things she wishes you to do. And if you are all right as regards bad habits, perhaps you are not as thoughtful of the "little things" that make up life as you might be. Be as polite in waiting upon your mother as you are in waiting on other boys' mothers. Don't speak in rough tones to her. Be always gentle when you speak to her, and careful to remember what she wishes you to be particular to do at different times and different places.

"It's so nice to have a boy to help a mother down the hill." Yes; when weary and worn with life's hard work, and age begins to come, it is a great satisfaction and source of gratitude to know that a strong, upright boy is coming to help mother down.

And you boys who have gone from the home altogether, you cannot literally put your arms around mother and steady her steps, yet you can write her good, long letters, and tell her you wish you were in the old home again, so you could hug her and kiss her as you did when you were a little fellow and loved to climb up in her lap. One of the greatest blessings in the world is that of having a praying mother. Make yourselves worthy of the good mothers God has given you, and take your mother's God for your God in the days of your youth.—Anonymous.

TO THE CHILDREN.

At Vevay, Ind., some little girls were invited to eat with us. I gave them cups of hot water, and as I handed one to each—asked, "Did you ever taste of the sweet sap of trees?" They replied, "Yes, ma'am." "Well, you just put some sugar in your cups and then taste and see if it doesn't taste like sap."

The girls tried it and liked the delicious drink so well that one of them had her cup filled again, saying, "It's good and it makes you white." Lorin, the young hired man, had always been used to coffee before coming with us, but readily took to the hot water, and now says he would rather have it than coffee. He lives at Florence, Ind., a little above here.

Tobacco is one of the staple products of the farms in these hilly regions. I hope you Wesleyan children will have your teacher or parents write out the form of an anti-tobacco pledge and then get all the people you can to sign it; especially, get all the children in your neighborhood to sign.

Lorin has just been telling at the dinner table, that horses and cattle sometimes eat the tobacco leaves if they get where there is a lot of tobacco dried, and that it kills them. They suffer much after eating it. Their nerves are so terribly affected that spasms of jerking come on; and even when they have been dead half an hour the legs and feet will jerk frightfully. Now who will dare think a boy can go to heaven if he uses a poison like that, besides spending money for the vile stuff. Of course I do not look for Wesleyan boys to be tobacco lovers; and much less do I think they injure their valuable nervous system by drinking tea and coffee.

Mr. Arnold saw a book advertised, called, "The Man Wonderful in a House Beautiful." This book was bought and we found it a sort of physiology. It speaks against tea and coffee, and tells us if we have begun its use we had better stop short or we may find ourselves fast in this habit.

When you write children's letters, why not tell how many names you have got on a pledge against tobacco? and I think it would do no harm to have one against tea and coffee.

When I was a country school girl at Brush Point, Ill., I made such a pledge and a few signed it.

I now want to tell you children that a woman went up in a balloon at Cony Island and then performed on a crossbar beneath; unfastened the protection strap from the waist, hung by feet, then by hands, when one hand slipped off, then the other, and down she came, and was crushed to death. Poor lost soul and body. Cony Island is near Cincinnati, O.—Mrs. I. R. B. Arnold, in the Wesleyan Methodist.

Judge Blydenburgh, prosecuting attorney of New Haven, Conn., employed two boys to visit saloons and get drinks. They succeeded in getting drinks at one hundred and twenty saloons; and that number of warrants was made out at the instance of Judge Blydenburgh. This judge may be a pretty smart lawyer, but he is a pretty poor man. The boys, by the by, were not his sons.

ONLY.

Only a mortal's powers,
Weak at their fullest strength;
Only a few swift flashing hours,
Short at their fullest length.

Only a page for the eye,
Only a word for the ear,
Only a smile, and by and by Only a quiet tear.

Only one heart to give,
Only one voice to use;
Only one little life to live,
And only one to die.

Poor is my best, and small;
How could I dare divide?
Surely my Lord shall have it all.
He shall not be denied!

All! for the last and least
He stoopeth to uplift;
The altar of my great High Priest
Shall sanctify my gift.

TEMPERANCE.

LADY SOMERSET'S ADDRESS.

A Washington correspondent referring to a recent address by Lady Henry Somerset, says: "Two thousand jammed into the Metropolitan church to listen to this woman. Washington has had its orators and audiences, but never before has an English lady of almost royal line appeared on one of its most popular platforms to reason just as she reasoned 'on temperance, righteousness and judgment to come.'" She is a charming lady as she stands there, manuscript in left hand, face and form on fire as she tells the simple story of her own awakening to rum's direful work, and her solemn promise to God to spend the rest of her life in trying to arouse others to stay the carnage and overthrow the curse. She read at times, then grew too eloquent for written words. Her utterance was so musical, so clear, the most distant hearer could not fail of her meaning. She goes to other cities, and multitudes will see and hear her. Her history reads like a romance. Of highest birth, with abounding wealth, personal charms, culture of the best schools, a queen in fashionable society, what cared she for the lowly? In offering her wine, what thought she of the drunkard's starving ones! One day she heard Hannah Whitall Smith's Bible reading. Then a Deborah was born to lead the army of God. She dashed her wine-cup away and resigned the dance for temperance toil. She is now president of the British W. C. T. U. and vice-president of the World's W. C. T. U."—Herald and Presbyter.

IS DRUNKENNESS CURABLE?

For years, and now especially, the minds of the medical profession have been and are greatly exercised upon this subject.

It has been studied by the ablest and most cultured men in the medical and clerical professions; it is looked upon both as a habit and a disease.

The pathological, psychological and physiological effects of alcoholism are well understood.

Its relations to digestion, assimilation and elimination are thoroughly well known; its action upon the brain and blood, upon mind and body are not hidden from the light of modern science.

All have given their verdict as to the curability of drunkenness or alcoholism, within reasonable limits.

Why all this stir and commotion about one of the simplest and most preventable conditions of disease mankind is subject to? Why talk about curing disease, while politicians, health boards, excise boards, and the dear people are doing their level best to manufacture, propagate and extend its ravages?

You cannot cure small pox or yellow fever while you studiously propagate and grow its pestilential organisms, and prepare with diligent care the soil for the reception of these cultivated germs.

The politicians, and excise boards, with the aid received from health boards, police boards with proficient police regulations, pandering to the lowest habits and instincts of evil, are manufacturing drunkards, alcoholics and debauchees faster than all the physicians, clergymen or elecmosynary and religious institutions of this land can cure them.

Close up these manufactories so numerous that most street corners can boast of three; shut up every saloon in this city and land. "Save the young!"—educate our boys and girls to shun those who use liquors or narcotics, or frequent those places where they are stored, sold or given away. In a word, when the people with one voice say with their ballot, in view of our climate, average surroundings and conditions, "Prohibition" enforced, manufacture and sale stopped, the strong remembering for the good of my weaker brother, "I will eat no meat" (or drink a glass of wine). The advertising of this traffic shall be a misdemeanor, enforced by public opinion, degrading alike to advertiser and advertising. Alcoholism will at once cease. Society will see the truth of the old adage, "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure."

Then will the laborers know and realize that they govern the world; that they are the real capitalists; that they are rich in mind and body, and that they are ever growing richer by the elasticity of their sinews, that long life, health and happiness is the reward of total abstinence.

Stop manufacturing drunkards, and those now existing will soon be cured.—A. B. Whitney, M. D.

SMASH THE SALOONS!

The two great agencies on which we must depend for the suppression of the liquor traffic are the Gospel of Christ and the strong arm of the law, and of these two the first is by far the greater. We have no faith in the permanency of any reformation which does not aim first of all to reform the hearts of men. The Christian church could do more, if it would, to bring about the abolition of the liquor traffic than all the temperance societies and temperance parties in the world put together. We do not say this in disparagement of these societies and parties either. They are doing a noble work—much of it a work which the churches have either refused or neglected to do, the more shame to them. We thoroughly believe, too, in the agency of the law, in its educative power, in its power to repress and discourage evil men in their evil ways. It is a good thing to reach the hearts of drinking men, if you can, with the Gospel; it is also a good thing to put temptation out of the way, if you can. The flesh is weak, and it is a risky thing to turn a newly converted drunkard out of a church into a street lined with gin-mills and odorous with the odor of the beverages of hell. Let the church go ahead with its work inside, but don't let it forget to work outside, too. Smash the saloons.—Christian at Work.

WHAT SAVED HIM.

H. Clay Trumbull, the able editor of the Sunday-School Times, spoke thus in his lectures before the Yale students. The statement comes in casually, and for that reason is more significant. "It was forty-six years ago that I became a member of an organization known as the 'Cold Water Army,' which had its companies in most of the towns and villages of my native State. It was by means of the special training which I received in that organization, and as a result of the reflex influence of my activities in connection with it, that my personal opinions and habits in the line of total abstinence became fixed and abiding, and subsequently proved, under God, a means of my preservation from utter ruin."

NUGGETS.

Carroll D. Wright, the most trustworthy statistician, says that for every dollar paid in by the saloons for their licenses, about twenty-one dollars is paid out by the people.

Judge Taintor, of Hartford, Conn., decided that wholesale liquor-dealers located outside the State cannot sell liquor in Connecticut without taking out a license in each county where the liquor is sold.

As a result of the Democratic victory in Iowa, and the hope that the prohibition law will be soon repealed, the Union Stock Yards in Sioux City announces that it will soon begin the construction of a large brewery there.

LESSON X.—Fourth Quarter.—December 6.

GOLDEN TEXT.—For Christ also hath once suffered for sins.—1 Peter 3: 18.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Jesus crucified.—vs. 17-22. How can we read these pathetic words, "and he, bearing his cross, went forth," and shrink ourselves from taking up the cross and following in his own blessed footsteps. Christ sank under the cruel weight, and another bore it for him—Simon of Cyrene. The name of this simple peasant has thus been preserved to all time as the first in the long line of Christian cross-bearers. Though it can never be given to us to literally bear the cross for Jesus, yet we know that everything we do for those he loves is done for him. How many a poor disciple may be sinking under his cross of poverty, affliction, or reproach, while we stand aloof, forgetting that by practical aid and sympathy to all such, we are given an opportunity to share with Simon the glory of being a cross-bearer for Christ! Pilate had weakly delivered up Jesus to be crucified. Without doubt, his uneasy conscience made him restive, and whetted anew his feelings of hatred to the Jews, whose fanatical cruelty had coerced him to the act. He saw a chance to annoy them by writing the customary inscription over the cross in such a way as to convey a double taunt; first, by implying that a crucified king, dying the death of a malefactor, in shame and ignominy, was an appropriate one for such a nation; and, secondly, that they had now literally "no king but Cæsar." They had been taken at their word. They were bound hand and foot to the Roman power, with no possibility of redemption. Being in three languages, so that all passers-by could read it, there must have been some thoughtful minds to interpret the words as the world has ever since interpreted them. The chief priests, at least, were not slow to comprehend Pilate's ironical meaning, but their deputation was met only with scorn. Like all weak characters, he seems to have been vacillating in large matters, while stern and unbending—in common phrase, set—about comparative trifles. Had he shown the same spirit to the mob when they were shouting "crucify him!" what a different record would Pilate have left in history?

2. Incidents at the cross.—vs. 23-27. The prophecies center about Christ; and in his life, but especially in his death, their minutest details are fulfilled, even to the casting of lots for his garments. Jesus himself is the spirit of prophecy. Then how important that the prophetic books of the Bible, and especially Revelation, be seriously studied. But there were others beside the heartless soldiers, or the still more heartless priests, who witnessed Jesus' sufferings. His mother, and other holy women, who are mentioned as constant attendants upon him in his ministry, stood by the cross. Old Simeon's prophecy in the temple could seldom have been absent from the mind of one of whom it is said that "she pondered all these things in her heart." But only once do we read of her taking counsel of her maternal fears and uniting with the rest of the family to prevent his carrying on his work. If Mary had been the perfect being that the Church of Rome considers her, she would never have showed, even in one solitary instance, such a want of faith in her divine Son. And, on the other hand, little as the Gospels tell us of her, we know that she must have been a brave, sweet, unselfish woman. John may have been in better circumstances than the others. There is no proof of this, however, and it could have been, even if this was the case, only a secondary reason why our Lord should commit his mother to his care. It was rather a recognition of those qualities in John, which even now, after a lapse of eighteen hundred years, separate him in our mind from the others;—his womanly tenderness, his spiritual insight, his supreme devotion to her Son—all gave him a peculiar fitness to assume this sacred charge. How often some lowly duty of ministration may be laid upon us which, if we could read it rightly, we should see was really a token of loving appreciation from Him who sees in us just those qualities of mind and heart that fit us for the work—qualities that pass for little in the eyes of the world, and perhaps with many of our fellow Christians.

3. "It is finished."—vs. 28-30. When Christ had received the vinegar, there remained nothing more of Scripture to be fulfilled. His redeeming work was done. We can but be impressed here with the importance attached to the Bible as regards its strict veracity. Christ, even in his dying agonies, was careful that the last iota should be fulfilled, thus showing that he was indeed the Truth. Very precious are his last words, "It is finished," to the heart of Christianity. They mean (1) an entire and perfect redemption for every sinner who accepts it. It is complete now. A saint in heaven is not more fully redeemed than he was while a forgiven sinner on the earth. (2) Nothing more can be added to it;—no so-called "works of merit," no fastings, no prayers. This would be to belie the dying words of our Redeemer; as if he had left incomplete what he asserted with his last breath was finished. (3) Our part is to personally appropriate his sacrifice, and proclaim to the world in every way what a perfect and almighty Saviour is ours.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The Baptist laymen of Chicago have pledged themselves to raise $120,000 for city missions. One hundred thousand dollars of this amount is to be set apart as a permanent endowment fund; $10,000 will be used for current expenses of the present church extension work in the city, and the remaining $10,000 will be applied toward a central mission station in the down-town district.

—A letter from Mississippi speaks favorably of the mission work done in the South. All denominations share in the gatherings, but the Baptists everywhere have large returns in conversions and additions to the churches. The colored people are fast coming to the front in education, with good school-houses and teachers, churches often better than white people, and good ministers; in property and wealth, with fine farms and homes, and some in thrifty mercantile business.

—In May, 1880, the total property owned by Baptists in Buffalo, N. Y., was valued at $154,000. Now the entire property of churches and missions is worth $457,000—an increase of $303,000 in eleven years. The church membership increased, same time, from 1,860 to 3,556, and mission scholars from 400 to 2,300.

—In Iowa, this fall, the total Baptist church membership is 31,926. The total baptisms last year were 2,441. With one exception this is the largest number of baptisms ever reported in one year.

—The Baptist Mission among the Telugus in India is reported as being wonderfully blessed. Nearly 10,000 have been baptized since last Christmas.

—The New York State Pastors' Conference (Baptist) at a recent meeting reported 168 pastorless churches. It is authority for the statement, "1,000 villages in the State (N. Y.) have no churches whatever."

CONGREGATIONAL.

—Oct. 25, Rev. A. J. Bailey, Ogden, preached in the Mormon Tabernacle in that city. A crowded house—1,000 or 1,200—listened attentively to the sermon from Acts 1: 8. The Mormons were highly pleased with the service, and many have expressed the wish that Mr. Bailey might preach to other Mormon audiences.

—A three weeks' series of evangelistic meetings has just closed at Atkinson, in which pastor Arnold was ably assisted by Rev. J. D. McCord, who, though taking a well-earned vacation, could not resist the opportunity of service. There were twenty-five conversions, the first fruits of which were gathered Nov. 1, when fourteen united with the church, six heads of families. The work goes on though the special services are discontinued. The church has been greatly awakened.

—Rev. Dr. Freeman, who has just accepted a call to Naperville, Ill., has been pastor of the Presbyterian church at Honeoye Falls, N. Y., for twenty-two years, and the Rochester presbytery dismissed him to accept the call with extreme reluctance. He is yet a young man, in the full strength of his powers, a scholarly preacher and a faithful and beloved pastor. Though having spent all his ministerial life in the Presbyterian church he comes of Congregational stock, having spent his boyhood in Hanover, N. H. He graduated from Lafayette College in '57, and from Princeton Seminary in '61.

—Iowa College has in attendance something over 400 students. A Y. M. C. A. building is to be erected, the students starting the enterprise with a subscription of over $6,000.

—The church at Swanzy, N. H., has just celebrated its 150th anniversary. It has sixty-three members. The Chichester church celebrated its one hundredth anniversary Nov. 2.

EVANGELICAL.

—The Mills Gospel meetings in the West Division of Chicago have prospered greatly. The churches where they were held have been filled from the beginning by audiences numbering nearly two thousand. After one or two meetings, a call was made for those who desired to lead a Christian life, and from fifty to two hundred have risen at every meeting. The men's meetings on the two Sabbath evenings which Mr. Mills has spent here have been among the most remarkable, and about two hundred men have risen at each meetings. About two thousand cards have been signed by those expressing a desire to lead a Christian life. The largest proportion of these have come from the Sunday-school children and the young men.

—D. M. Hartsough, of Des Moines, began special work at Humboldt, Iowa, Oct. 18. His sermons have been on the fundamental principles of the Christian religion, without sensationalism or emotional excitement, but plain and intensely practical. During his three weeks' meetings seventy-four were added to the church, all but eight over sixteen years of age, and forty-eight heads of families. He lays especial emphasis on the absolute necessity of church membership in a Christian life.

FRIENDS.

—The Southern committee of New York yearly meeting has decided to push the work among the colored people in North Carolina. At present the main work is at High Point, under the care of William Elmore Meade. It is expected that the Ashboro' property will be sold, and the proceeds applied at High Point.

—The revival meeting at Friends church in Chicago, is making very hopeful progress. The Friends are beautifully united in support of the work, and have been from the time the subject was first considered and a call extended to John Henry Douglas to come. The meetings began on the 8th inst., and have now held over three Sabbaths. The meetings are constantly growing in interest and life.

LUTHERAN.

—A strong effort is being made to remove the Theological Seminary from Gettysburgh, Pa., to Washington, D. C. The change is deemed practicable and advantageous, and will probably occur.

—According to the German edition of the Joint Synod Almanac, the Ohio synod shows 353 pastors, 86 school-teachers, 498 congregations, and 66,675 communicant members.

—The Swedish Lutherans of Kansas are happy. The cause is the final liquidation of the heavy debt of $75,000 which has hung about the necks of the managers of Bethany College for a number of years like a mill-stone. This brilliant success was achieved chiefly through the agency of the indomitable Swenson, pastor of the Lindsborg church, and recently elected president of the college. This money was raised by the Swedish people of Kansas, few, if any, subscriptions exceeding $50.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The annual meeting of the board of education of the Methodist Episcopal church will be held at the office of the board, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York, Wednesday, Dec. 2, at 2: 30 P. M.

—A glorious revival closed at Schaller, Iowa, Nov. 8. Eighty-eight were converted and reclaimed; forty-one united with the M. E. church, many of them heads of families and several entire families, and several joined other churches. A number will still be gathered into the church. Rev. C. W. Garlock, evangelist, of Smithland, Iowa, conducted the meeting. A. Brown is pastor.

—Methodist city missions in Chicago: Missions organized in 1891, fourteen; children gathered into Sabbath-schools, 1,500; number united with our societies, 537; churches erected, ten; increase in church property, $100,000; missions sustained, forty; aggregate cost per mission, $375.

—The Methodist preachers of Camden county, N. J., have been waging war against book-making and racing. They recently secured the indictment of the president of the Gloucester race track association, charging him, under the gaming law, with maintaining a nuisance and disorderly place. If the present law is sustained on an appeal at present before the court of errors and appeals, horse racing and book-making in New Jersey will be ended promptly and for good.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—Epworth leagues in the Methodist church in Canada numbered 300 April 31st, with 17,230 members. The growth since then has been very rapid.

—A religious lay electoral conference, in Iowa, recently, voted to defend prohibition irrespective of party. That is to say, the conference, which was composed of both Republicans and Democrats, declared that it will not allow the old issue to be negated or defeated through party considerations of whatsoever kind. This is a notice to both parties in that State which ought not to be ignored, as indeed it cannot be.

—Efforts are being made to complete certain buildings and an endowment at Grant Memorial University, Athens, Tenn. That school is being outfitted still further as a memorial to Gen. John A. Logan.

REMEDY FOR EARACHE.

"I am afraid I have greatly interfered with my own practice," said a celebrated aurist. "by giving the following advice to many of my friends: 'At the first symptoms of earache let the patient lie on the bed with the painful ear uppermost. Fold a thick towel and tuck it around the neck; then with a teaspoon fill the ear with warm water. Continue doing this for fifteen or twenty minutes; the water will fill the ear orifice and flow over on the towel. Afterward turn over the head, let the water run out, and plug the ear with warm glycerine and cotton. This may be done every hour until relief is obtained. It is an almost invariable cure, and has saved many cases of acute inflammation. The water should be as warm as possible, but not too hot.'—Exchange.

THE VIRTUES OF BORAX.

The excellent washerwomen in Holland and Belgium, who "get up" their linen so beautifully white, use refined borax as a washing powder instead of soda, in the proportion of one large handful of powder to about ten gallons of boiling water. They save in soap nearly one-half. All the large establishments adopt the same mode. For laces, cambrics, etc., an extra quantity of the powder is used: for crinolines, requiring to be made stiff, a strong solution is necessary. Borax, being a neutral salt, does not in the slightest degree injure the texture of the linen. Its effect is to soften the hardest water, and therefore it should be kept on every toilet table. To the taste it is rather sweet; it is used for cleaning the hair, and is an excellent dentrifice, and in hot countries is used in combination with tartaric acid and bicarbonate of soda as a cooling beverage. Good tea cannot be made with hard water. All water may be made soft by adding a teaspoonful of borax powder to an ordinary-sized kettle of water.

MUTTON TALLOW.

Pure mutton tallow is one of the most useful and inexpensive of medical agents. For that class of sores and wounds where a cooling, healing application is indicated, its value is beyond compare. Many an obstinate sore or ulcer has been healed permanently by pursuing the following simple method: Wash thoroughly, but gently, once or twice a day, with warm water and castile soap, dry with a soft cloth, and cover with a coating of the tallow. This should be spread upon a piece of linen or cotton, the tallow being sufficiently thick to prevent the cloth backing from adhering to the wounded or diseased surface. The importance of the utmost cleanliness in dealing with all troubles of this nature should by no means be overlooked.—Good Housekeeper.

YOUNG PEOPLE SHOULD SLEEP.

A German specialist, Dr. Cold, has recently pleaded for giving young people more sleep. A healthy infant sleeps most of the time during the first weeks; and, in the early years, people are disposed to let children sleep as much as they will. But from six to seven, when school begins, there is a complete change.

At the age of ten or eleven the child sleeps only eight or nine hours, when he needs at least ten or eleven, and as he grows older the time of rest is shortened. Dr. Cold believes that, up to twenty, a youth needs nine hours' sleep, and an adult should have eight or nine. With insufficient sleep, the nervous system, and brain especially, not resting enough, and ceasing to work normally, we find exhaustion, excitability, and intellectual disorders gradually taking the place of the love of work, general wellbeing, and the spirit of initiative.—Scientific American.

MEDICAL DON'TS.

Don't carry chlorate of potassium tablets about with you. A patient carrying these wrapped in paper in his pocket heard a detonation as he sat down, one day, and before he could remove his clothing was seriously burned. In the pocket was a penknife, and it is supposed that they exploded under the influence of concussion.—La Pratique Medicale.

Don't correct or punish a child who is afflicted with St. Vitus' dance because of its "clumsy actions." Keep the child away from those who might ridicule or imitate its motions.—Hugo Engel, M. D.

Don't forget that the nerves must have a sufficiency of rest. The person who keeps in bed only half the time he should must expect to suffer from nervous derangement.—Nineteenth Century.

Don't forget that an egg is a very delicate, perishable creature, and it sometimes gets so sick that there is as much danger in eating it as in eating the flesh of any other sick animal.—Good Health.

DON'T DELAY TO

Stop that cough! Else the bronchial tubes will be enlarged and the delicate tissues of the lungs exposed to injury. No other medicine is so speedily operative in throat and lung troubles as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. A few doses have been known to break up an obstinate and distressing cough. Sufferers from asthma, bronchitis, croup, consumption, sore throat, and whooping cough find a sure relief in the use of this preparation. It soothes the inflamed membrane, promotes expectoration, and induces repose. Don't be without it in the house. Sallie E. Stone, Hurt's store, Va., writes: "I have found, in my family, that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral was always a certain cure for colds and coughs."

"Five years ago I had a constant cough, night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, and had been given up by my physicians. I began to take Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and was completely cured."—Anga A. Lewis, Ricard, N. Y. *

FARM NOTES.

CHEESE MAKING.

The first stage in the making of cheese is that by which the curd is separated from the whey. This is done by heating the milk to a given temperature, varying according to the season, and afterwards adding a certain proportion of rennet. When the cheese is to be colored, the dyeing matter is put in before the rennet. In less than half an hour after the heat has been applied the coagulation has so far progressed that the curd, from which the whey has been drawn, is ready to be cut.

Almost the only instrument used in the making of cheese is the curd-knife, a curious-looking arrangement something like a double cob with long teeth. The immature cheese is both cut and stirred with this, the curd being separated into small bits, none of them being larger than an ordinary walnut. The stirring and heating must go on until the curd has reached a proper stage of what is called "digestion." It is then torn into narrow strips like ribbons, for the curd by this time is as firm in fibre as the breast of a roasted chicken, and indeed looks like it. These strips are then fed into the salting-mill, where they are thoroughly mixed with salt and made ready for the cheese-press in order that all the whey, that by any possibility remains, may be squeezed out.

From the press the cheese is taken to the drying-room, a large airy chamber, where it is left for days, months, or even years, according to the quality desired. It is frequently turned, and much care is expended on it. All cheese must go through the same stages, the different varieties being made by certain combinations of cream, fresh and skimmed milk.—Harper's Young People.

TO MAKE HENS LAY.

There are a great many women who would like to go into the poultry business if they only knew how to make their hens lay when they want them to. Hens have a habit of going on a strike when eggs are highest, and of piling up the eggs when they are worth nothing. Now I think I have solved the problem of making hens lay at any time in the year. I have one dozen hens, and have not failed to have eggs every month in the year, and almost every day in the month, for the last ten years. I will give my mode of operations:

Say we begin in the fall, just after the moulting season. If you have fed Sheridan's condition powders through the moulting season, your hens will be almost sure to be in a good condition. You must begin feeding regularly twice a day about the first of October. We suppose your hens are running out. In the morning I feed a soft feed of wheat screenings, if I have it, bran and corn-meal, about one-third of each, about a quart at a feed for a dozen hens, into which I stir before wetting one teaspoonful of Venetian red. In cold weather I scald the feed. I give this every third day, with one teaspoonful of red pepper twice a week. Do not use the pepper with the Venetian red, but use alternately. Give this until they begin to lay, which will be in a week or ten days; then give once a week of each as long as you want eggs. At night I give a quart of whole corn, field peas or cane seed, either of which is good, the peas especially, for laying hens. Give plenty of pure water with lime in it.

The above rules closely followed will give you plenty of eggs and healthy chickens. My chickens never have the cholera or anything else the matter with them. The Venetian red is harmless for the chickens. You can obtain it at any drug-store. In the spring you will not need to feed so often; and if you want setters, you must stop feeding it entirely. I have given this recipe to several, and always with the best results.—May Martyn, in the Housekeeper.

FROSTED EGGS AND APPLES.

An egg expands when it is frozen, and breaks its shell. Apples contract so much that a full barrel will shrink until the top layer is a foot below the chime. When the frost is drawn out the apples assume their normal size and fill up the barrel again. Some varieties are not appreciably injured by being frozen if the frost is drawn out gradually. Apples will carry safely in a refrigerator car while the mercury is registering twenty degrees below zero. Potatoes, being so largely composed of water, are easily frozen. Once touched by frost they are ruined.—Northwest Trade.

Your things won't shrink, and they'll be softer, brighter and better, than ever before. That's the beauty of Pearline—washing is not only easier, but better and safer. Things that you wouldn't dare to trust to the wear of the washboard are washed perfectly with Pearline.

PLANTING NEAR BUILDINGS.

A mischievous error, and one too frequently perpetrated, is that of placing trees close to buildings. Although trees and shrubs are the chief decorative ornaments of a place, they become not only disagreeable, but positively injurious to animal life, when closely massed around a habitation, by shutting out light and preventing the rays of the sun and drying their salutary influence on the walls, which in consequence are damp and unhealthy. Where large trees are allowed to spread and overhang the roofs, choking the gutters and water leaders, and causing a deposit of mold and other fungoid growths as far as their influence extends, it is impossible for the house to be dry, comfortable or healthy for human beings. Many of the older houses throughout the country are rendered almost uninhabitable by the dense surroundings of trees and shrubbery, and the evil is greatly aggravated when the trees are evergreen.—Wm. Saunders.

If there remains any doubt that the Cynosure is a reform paper, a reference to the valuable reform news in this issue, crowding out editorials and other interesting matter, will remove it. The agents are in the field, and at work.

Among the prominent features of the program of the annual meeting of the New England Christian Association, at Boston, on the 9th and 10th inst., we observe that our esteemed correspondent, Miss Elizabeth E. Flagg, is to read a paper, Wednesday afternoon, on "New England Reformers and Reforms." We are sure that those who hear it will greatly enjoy it.

Bro. A. Sims, of Uxbridge, Ontario, Canada, writes to this office, November 26: "I think if you could put several lecturers to work in this Dominion, the results would be grand. Any of our preachers here would be glad to co-operate with them. Orangeism is a powerful secret foe in this country. On one of our circuits, last year, there was a glorious revival of religion at an appointment where this lodge was all powerful as to members. This revival nearly cleaned out one of their lodges. Ronayne's Handbook of Freemasonry did excellent service in opening the eyes of many." The suggestion is full of encouragement. Canada is overrun with secret societies, and the field is a promising one for our reformers. Who will go there in behalf of the anti-secrecy cause?

On page 3 of this issue we print the reports on secret societies adopted by recent conferences of the Free Methodist church in East Michigan and Minnesota and Northern Iowa. The former is a strong indorsement of the anti-secrecy work carried on by the methods of the National Christian Association, and is full of encouragement for all who are interested in the downfall of these strongholds of Satan. The first paragraph is a solemn declaration of facts that demands the most serious consideration; and there is not the shadow of moral weakness in the entire document. In the second report there is also a good spirit manifested, although it is doubtful whether the objection to expositions of lodge evils is valid. To people who do not know the bad character of the secret system, these expositions tend to give a better understanding of its wickedness and dangers. In making known these things, as our East Michigan friends express it: "These facts make agitation a necessity, and constrain us to state frequently our objections to these secret combinations. As the highest earthly and eternal interests of the people are at stake, neutrality is impossible, and silence would be a surrender, because there is no middle ground." If people do not know the evils of lodgery how can they intelligently argue against or rebuke them? Agitation is the life of all wholesome reforms. Let us agitate.

The Geneva (Ill.) Patrol notices the case of a mechanic and a family man, in that place, who was sent by citizens to Keeley's Sanitarium at Dwight for bichloride-of-gold treatment for alcoholism. Afterward he returned, apparently cured, and promising to be a man and a help to his family. But alas, he has lapsed into his former habits, and last week indulged in one of his old-time sprees. "He admits," says the Patrol, "that he had no desire to drink, so far as appetite is concerned, but went deliberately to work to have a big time. By this act he has forfeited all claims to respect and made it more difficult for others who need the treatment to obtain help from the citizens. It is said that few men who thus violate all reason long survive, and it must be admitted that it is difficult to have much pity for them." Similar cases are reported from other sources.

Something besides medical treatment seems to be necessary. It is the grace of God.

THE UNKNOWN DEAD.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Strike your harps, oh, poet-sages!
Catch the inspiration's ray;
Leave the old romance of ages
For the romance of to-day.
Gild with gold the glowing picture
Lips of fiery valor tell,
How some gallant, patriot hero,
Bravely fighting, fighting fell.

But where tower the Adirondacks,
Where the Mexie's waters roar,
Where Atlantic's billows thunder,
By the calm Pacific's shore;
In Chautauqua's pleasant valley,
By the Ohio's sandy bed,—
There are those who mourned, but vainly,
For the gallant unknown dead.

On the well-worn oaken threshold
Of a humble farmhouse door,
In the gloaming of the evening,
When the day's long toil is o'er,
Sits a feeble, white-haired father,
Reading with his tear-dimmed eyes.
How the boys he blessed at parting
Died beneath the Southern skies!

From the prairie-settler's cabin,
Where Ontario's billows roar,
Once there rose a wail of anguish
For the brave who are no more;
By thy shore, oh, Alleghany,
And where tower the pines of Maine,
Women mourn the brave who perished
On the Southern battle-plain!

Hear the golden trump of glory
Sounding for the titled dead,
While for others, just as tender,
Not a single word is said.
Poet-lips may tell the story
With their pens baptized in fire,
Singing songs of fame and glory,
Thrilling nations with their lyre;
But be mine the touch that leads thee,
Where our starry banner waves,
O'er the host of heroes, lying Nameless, in their soldier-graves.

A MASON'S EXPERIENCE—IV.

BY JOSEPH HOPSON, OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

The whole cantonment soon became acquainted with my case; there was great excitement and consultation among the Freemasons, and it was decided that I should be made away with. As I belonged to the artillery, my artillery friends were charged with the task, the execution of which it was decided was especially the duty of Freeborn, my proposer. It was, I believe, on this day (Tuesday) that he came in quest of me. He found me in a friend's room—Hobday's. When he came in he was evidently in great distress of mind, and much exhausted from long and intense excitement. After taking his seat he looked at me, and shook his head, as much as to say: "It is all over with you." This he did two or three times, without uttering a word. I laughed at him, and asked him what all that was about. This gave him utterance, and, heaving a heavy sigh, he said, in a dismal, mysterious tone: "Oh, Hopson, Hopson." I answered, "What Hopson? What is the matter?" Freeborn: "Ah, you'll catch it—you'll catch it!" Self: "Catch what?" F: "You'll see in a day or two—you'll see! I would not be in your jacket for all that I ever saw or heard of." Self: "Why, I see nothing amiss with my jacket?" F: "Ah! There's no use in speaking to you."

This occurred early in the afternoon. After evening stables were over, he came to me again.

I believe I was outside when he came. He asked me to go aside with him, as he had something to say to me. I went, and when out of hearing of those in the rooms, he asked me in a mysterious tone if I would accompany him to the fort next day; that Lieut. King of the ordnance department wanted to speak to me. I immediately suspected that there was some plot in hand, and made up my mind not to be intimidated by them. I asked: "What about?" F: "Why, you will see when you get there; but will you come?" Self: "To be sure I will." F: "But you must bring some one of the lodge with you; who will you bring?" Self: "I'll bring Raildon." F: "No. You cannot bring Raildon; it must be one of your own corps. I am going to take Guerrin." Self: "Well, I'll take Rowlands." F: "Yes, he may do. Then how are we to go?" (The fort was four miles off.) "We must have a coach and be there by eleven in the forenoon. Will you get a coach?" Self: "I will." F: "But who will pay for it?" Self: "I will." F: "Mind, you must have it here early." Self: "I will send for it in the morning, and have it here as early as you like; but we will not be at liberty to go till after nine o'clock." Seeing that I was aware of some plot against me, and that I was not to be intimidated, he dropped the subject. "Ah!" said he, sighing heavily, after a pause, "you came with nails in your shoes, after me telling you not to come with such shoes." Self: "Well, and what of that?" F: "What of that?" This he said in such a tone as assured me it was of the utmost importance, but whether it was that my having nails in my shoes might prevent the magnetic influence having effect in me, or whether they had a prophecy among them that one coming with nails in his shoes would injure them, I have not been able to make out. Self: "Why, even if I had no nails in my shoes, it would have been all the same with me, for I had a good deal of iron in my body, and the initiation would have had no more effect on me than if I came with iron nails in my shoes." Here I alluded to iron wine that I had taken at times as a stomachic. F: "Hem. You might not have been so much afraid; there was no occasion to be so particular." This was apparently in allusion to the condition I annexed to my declaration. In all this he appeared to have acted under the instructions of the lodge for the purpose of ascertaining satisfactorily whether the initiation had taken effect in me, and if I was duly baptized with the baptism of fear; fear being one of the effects which the initiation produces in a man. And his communication not having the effect of daunting me, as was intended, he was satisfied that it had not taken effect; which circumstance it was that made him lament, and reproach me with coming to the lodge with nails in my shoes, the cause to which the failure of my initiation was attributed.

I was not urged on the following morning to perform my promise of hiring the coach to take us to Mr. King. This I thought would be the case, from the abrupt manner in which he turned from the subject on the preceding evening to upbraid me with coming to the lodge with nails in my shoes, and, above all, with iron nails. In fact, there was a perfect understanding between us, although neither of us chose to speak out.

There was a full lodge on Tuesday evening, and my case was discussed, and I was informed afterwards that much blame was attached to the members of the lodge that took on themselves to convene a special meeting to get over my knotty case, which it was said should have been decided on in a full lodge; and Raildon who had shown me the Entered Apprentice's grip, and told me the name of it, which was the secret word Boaz, and had also explained to me the real use of the tools, was removed by Major Wetherall from Band Sergeant to private musician. At this meeting it was resolved to call a general meeting of all the Freemasons in the cantonment, to whatever lodge they might belong, and summon me to attend, that I might be dealt with according to the usages and customs of Masonry, and so put a stop to further disclosures, and deter others, by the example made of me, from acting similarly. No time was to be lost; the general meeting was appointed to take place on Friday, and Thursday was to be employed in issuing summonses to those Masons in the cantonment that did not belong to that lodge, and making the necessary preparations; and I was duly summoned to attend. To insure the delivery of the summonses to me, advantage was taken of the evening stable hour, when they would be sure to find me out of doors. Spence and Guerrin, two of the highest Masons in the lodge, were selected to carry the summons to me. They came upon me as I was waiting on my troop commanding officer at the head of the horse lines, before he commenced his inspection. I had seen them coming for some time, and was waiting for them, believing they wanted to speak to me, but was now about to follow my commanding officer, who was moving into the lines, when Guerrin called out to me, in a portentous and threatening tone: "Stop a little; we have something to say to you." "Well," said I, "what is it?" They came up to me, and handing me the summons, said: "Here, read this." On looking into it, the first thing that met my eyes was the large, black stamp of the lodge at the head of the page, with a hand brandishing a trowel in the manner of a dirk. The summons commenced with, "Brother Hopson," and it required me to attend on the following evening to answer certain charges that had been preferred against me. It was signed by the secretary, and their manner told me that they were brooding vengeance against me. As soon as I had read it, I handed it back to Guerrin, saying, "I'll have no more to do with you." "Won't you?" said he threateningly. "No; I won't," said I, angrily. "We'll see," said he; "you will pay for your sport."

On this we parted. They retraced their steps towards their barracks, and I hastened after my commanding officer into the horse lines. They lost no time in informing the lodge of my determination, and the consequence was that Major Wetherall wrote to my brigade commanding officer, Lieut. Colonel Showers, requesting him to order me to attend the lodge on Friday evening, as directed in my summons.

The serving of the notices and summonses for the general meeting had the effect of publishing through the cantonment my breach with the Masons, and gave rise to such conflicting opinions that the community was divided into two parties. The well-disposed took a friendly interest in my behalf; but the adherents of Freemasonry were exasperated against me, and foolishly committed themselves in many respects, which I afterwards touched on in an address to them; which address I believe brought them to their senses, so far at least as to cause them to leave off their endeavors to annoy me and my friends.

ARE SECRET SOCIETIES INSTITUTIONS FOR PECUNIARY BENEFITS, OR RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION?

[This article is translated from Die Religion der Geheimen Gesellschaften, by Rev. Prof. Gottfr. Fritschel, D. D.: Wartburg Publishing House, Waverly, Iowa, by Rev. Geo. Fritschel, son of the deceased author, who also edited the German articles. The translation is free, and here and there a few new passages have been added, or a different arrangement has been adopted.]

The secret societies are one of the most dangerous impediments with which the church meets in America; and especially is this the case in the larger cities. In many of the Lutheran churches (but not in all), an earnest fight is kept up against them. Other denominations, also, have declared themselves against them, whilst, on the other hand, others are wholly indifferent, yes, hundreds, and even thousands, of the ministers of the American denominations are themselves members. This is the result of the great danger that threatens the English-American churches, viz., that Christianity is degraded in many places to a mere general moral Christianity.

Very frequently simple Christians are not able to discover the underlying real religious tendencies of the secret societies, and are drawn into them by the assertion that the lodge had not the least to do with religion, but are merely mutual aid societies in case of sickness and death. One can hear this argument repeated in numberless forms. It is the main medium for attracting members of Christian churches. It is for this very reason a duty of the church to instruct her members as to the real essence of the secret societies, and to show the absolute opposition of the two. Of course, this must be done by explaining and illustrating the religious principles from the writings of such writers as have authority in the lodge. Only in this way the utter impossibility of harmonizing church and lodge can be proven. Members of secret societies very frequently assert that the lodge has nothing to do with religion; they are claimed to be societies for mutual aid. But this is an open falsehood; and even Masonic and similar authors reject this view decidedly and most emphatically.

The lodge is offended if such a low and mean object—of being simply a beneficial institution—is assigned to it.

"A too common error, that Odd-fellowship is a mere beneficial society." (Rev. O. F., page 64—charge of Past Grand at initiation.)

"This order can never be made a merely beneficial institution." Jour. Sov. Lodge, 1880, p. 8213, quoted in Rev. O. F., pp. 113 and 154.)

It claims much higher objects, and those who have no higher conception of the lodge are blamed.

"It is unfortunate for our order, and for not a few of its members, that too much prominence has been generally given to its feature of pecuniary benefits in seasons of sickness and death; and pecuniary aid in circumstances of want and distress." (Grosh, O. F. Man., p. 110.)

Every candidate before being introduced is asked, and must affirm it under oath, that he has not been prompted by expectations of pecuniary advantage.

"The applicant for Masonic light is required to declare, even before he enters the lodge-room, that in his application he is prompted not by mercenary motives." (Morris' Dictionary, Art. Disadvantages.)

"Secretary: Do you seriously declare, upon your honor, that unbiased by the improper solicitation of friends, and uninfluenced by mercenary motives, you . . . offer yourself." (Mackey, Ritualist, p. 21, quoted in Freem. Ill., p. 94.)

It is declared to be a misfortune that so many have such a low conception of the order. The pecuniary benefits make hardly a tithe of the grand and noble objects.

"This, though a laudable and useful trait in our operations, is hardly a tithe of our aims and objects." (Grosh, O. F. Man., p. 80.)

"It is time that those who unite with us . . . but for the loaves and fishes should learn that they have mistaken THEIR AIM." (Grosh, O. F. Man. p. 261, quoted by Brockman, O. F., p. 30.)

"Most dishonorable is the motive of him who tries to find in the lodge external advantages and advancement of selfish ends." (Translated from Allgem. Handb. I., p. 105.)

"In general it must be maintained that Freemasonry is no beneficial institution, although the same will never forget to do good to every man." (Translated from Allgem. Handb. I., p. 409.)

"There is a common idea that lodges of Masons and other Masonic bodies are, by some secret law, organized forms of benevolence, relief and charity. There is no greater mistake. . . . There is no law of Masonry which compels a Masonic lodge to contribute one dollar to support an orphan, a widow, or even a brother." (G. M. H. G. Reynolds, of Ill., quoted in Cynosure, June 25, 1891.)

The secret orders themselves declare that their ideal is much higher:

"Masonry:—It rises above all human institutions and forms." (Cunningham, Man., p. 20.)

"Odd-fellowship:—It is as lofty as human thought and inspiration can inspire." (Jour. Sov. G. L., 1880, p. 2813, quoted in Rev. O. F., p. 113.)

"Temple of Honor:—The Temple of Honor is second to no other institution on earth, not excepting the church." (Temp. of Hon. Ill., p. 8.)

We can see by looking at the outside that the lodge takes the form of a church organization. The hymns, the prayers, the selections from the Scriptures, the benediction, a kind of liturgy, the solemn form of dedicating lodges, the funerals, the altars, the chaplains and priests and high-priest, the rich symbolism of the cult, the cemeteries, even occasional imitations of baptism and the Lord's Supper; all this goes far to show that the lodge tends to be an imitation of the church. Everything throughout has a tinge of religion. Definite religious ideas underlie the whole action and doing, and find their expression in prayers, hymns, the whole service, in the lectures, in the ceremonies and symbols. It is a consequence of the religious view which comes to the surface in the remotest detail of the rich symbolic service. The authors discussing secret societies admit this without reserve that the order is areligious institution. They not only admit it by the titles with which they embellish the same (such as "religion's handmaid" or "the sister of religion,") but they call the order a moral, yes, a religious institution. (See Mackey, Ritualist, p. 190, and Oliver, Dictionary, p. 458.)

Let us hear how it is called a moral institution, a system of morals. And we must keep in view that a moral system can only be the product of a system of religious views. Now, Freemasonry and similar secret societies beyond doubt claim to have moral aims and to have for their object moral advancement of the members; at least, if we can in any way believe their bulletins, speakers and standard authors. Says Sickel:

"The acknowledged definition is: Freemasonry is a moral institution, established by virtuous men, a beautiful system of morality veiled in allegory. (Sickels' Monitor, p. 7 [in F. M. Ill., p. 37], the definition is taken from Mackey, Ritual, p. 548 and has become the standard definition.)

"Masonry is a universal system and teaches the relative and social duties of man... He can hear moral precepts inculcated." (Oliver, Dict., p. 471.) Well, what it teaches is of the moral sphere.

"It has always been understood to have a distinct reference to the worship of God and the moral culture of man." (17 Oliver., Theocr. Philos., p. 11.)

As professing to "embrace in body and substance the whole duty of man as a moral being." (Freemasonry, by a M. M., p. 759. Grd. Ch. N. Y. in Town., p. 23.)

The Grange is "assembled for intellectual and moral advancement" (p. 24), and the prayer is (p. 68) "be with all orders and associations having for their object the advancement of education and the moral welfare and happiness of mankind." Grange, Ill., p. 24, p. 68. These orders and associations are the secret societies.

"The aims of other secret societies are essentially economic (?), industrial, social, and, at the best, charitable (! ? ?), while those of Masonry superadd moral and, as many think, spiritual. (Morris, Light and Shadow, p. 265.)

"Masonry is indeed not the only moral, but the only simply moral and most purely modified moral institution, because it adopts neither fear [as the state], nor hope [as the church], but sincere love towards mankind as a motive for highest morality." (Translated from Allgem. Handb. L., 433.)

"The object and design of our institution, I could inform our opponents, are no secrets. They are everywhere made known and may be found in every page of our history—the permanent union of good men for the promotion of their moral and eternal well-being. This is our object and ever has been. In its very foundation Masonry is a religious institution." (Address of J. J. Shepard, before Lincoln Lodge A. L., 5831, Boston, p. 9.)

"As morality is the great doctrine of an apprentice, etc., so religion of a broad and universal character is the prime inculcation of the master's degree." (Morris, A Practical Synopsis, p. 271.)

"Odd-fellowship has a moral, a religion, a theology." (Lodge Bulletin, July, 1871, quoted by Brockman.)

These quotations clearly show that the standard authors are well aware that moral precepts cannot be separated from religious ideas. It is openly conceded that Masonry, etc. has a religious basis, is a religious system, has religious aims, gives religious instruction, and so forth.

(To be concluded next week.)

SECRET SOCIETIES CONDEMNED.

[Report of East Michigan Free Methodist Conference, 1891.] Our position always has been and is that of open and unyielding opposition to secret societies. Knowing the aim of the projectors and leaders of organized secretism, namely, the overthrow of the Christian religion and all legitimate civil governments, and the establishment in their place of a universal Masonic government and a universal Masonic religion, or absolute secularism; and knowing the magnitude of this atheistic despotism, as well as its cunningly devised methods, we cannot do less than maintain a humble and courageous anti-secrecy testimony in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, whose name, authority, word and work Masonry or secretism scorns and rejects.

We are constantly receiving into our societies and conferences persons who know but little about these reform questions. Many persons in the community and in the various religious denominations regard affiliation with secret societies as innocent pastime or financial advantage, and nothing more; large numbers of lodge members are kept in total darkness respecting the ultimate design and real character of the lodge system; and lodge managers diligently take advantage of the ignorance of the people to weaken the testimony and destroy the influence of Anti-masonic churches.

These facts make agitation a necessity, and constrain us to state frequently our objections to these secret combinations.

As the highest earthly and eternal interests of the people are at stake, neutrality is impossible, and silence would be a surrender, because there is no middle ground.

Every Methodist elder has taken a solemn vow to "be ready with all faithful diligence to banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's Word." The vow does not impose the duty, but commits the person to a duty in the nature of the case inevitable.

Nothing could be more at variance with reason and truth than the religious philosophy of the mimicry of church and state called Masonry; therefore that preacher who is indifferent, inactive or silent relative to such a question, must be in a state of moral insensibility.

To make an exception of such minor secret societies as the temperance lodges, the so-called Grand Army of the Republic, or college secret societies, is a grave inconsistency. First, there is no good reason for their secrecy, for all that ought to be done can as well and better be accomplished by open means. Then, to approve such societies would be to give up our general ground of opposition to secretism, which is the basis of our opposition to secret societies. To tolerate them would be to invite such dissension as divided and practically destroyed the United Brethren denomination. We believe that the secretism, or the thing concealed, is a trap, and the apparent good or pretended good is a bait, and that the trap is all the more dangerous for such bait.

We believe that to vote for the conference reports on secret societies and not oppose secret societies during the year is a gross inconsistency.

We favor a prudent distribution of anti-secrecy tracts at our camp meetings.

We think our only hope is the conversion of people to Christ, and we believe that the church of God is the only reform institution to which Christians should belong; for to depend upon anything else than the Gospel is to be ashamed of the Gospel.

We believe that the present strength and ruinous influence of the lodge system is due largely if not chiefly to the general encouragement and direct aid it receives from mercenary preachers and worldly church-goers who are enemies of the cross of Christ.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference that every religious covenant other than the Christian covenant, is a covenant with death and hell; and all religious fellowships besides Christian fellowship is fellowship with iniquity.

MINNESOTA AND NORTHERN IOWA F. M. CONFERENCE.

"In secret have I said nothing." Our position on the subject in hand is very radical; probably more so than any other denomination known. So far as we are known the people know that we make a conscience of our position. We admit of no exempt cases. There are no members of secret orders admitted to our communion. We congratulate ourselves that we find no disposition among us from east to west to deviate in the least from our position.

It is said, "A strong assertion is a strong argument." But we think that our position firmly maintained against secret societies is an argument many fold stronger than the strongest assertions that can be made, and perhaps will weigh as much or more than a true and labored exposition of the orders. Therefore, as a people, let us be bold and firm, but mild in our position and strict in the enforcement of it, and always ready to let our position be known. But the labored and protracted exposition of secretism leave to those who are specially called thereto. We would not in the least set aside the importance of this much-needed reform, but at every opportune time we should set our heel upon the head of this subtle enemy. But we should not in our Gospel work incense the people against ourselves and the truth by making this a speciality, ride it as a hobby, and defeat the salvation of souls that we are laboring to secure.

DENOMINATIONALISM IN AMERICA.

Undoubtedly, there are too many denominations. Every principle is liable to abuse. There are the two great denominations, numbering millions of members each, and there are numerous small bodies which never get above a membership of a few thousands in the entire country. It should be understood, however, that the great bulk of the church membership in the United States is included in a few easily distinguished denominations. According to the Independent, which has special facilities for securing the statistics from official sources connected with the Census Bureau, there are in the United States 18,156,424 communicants of Christian churches, reckoning the Catholic church by the ratio of communicants to population used amongst the Lutherans, viz., 1 to 177 of the population. The more recent Bulletin of the Census of 1890 [No. 101, July 23, 1891,] uses a ratio of about 1 to 117, including as communicants the entire Roman Catholic baptized population, except children under nine years of age, who are estimated at about 15 per cent of the population. The former ratio affords the fairer comparison with other denominations, but the latter, having been officially adopted in the census report, will be used in the following table. Reckoning the various branches of Methodists in one body, and of Baptists and Presbyterians similarly, it will be found that of the entire number of communicants (19,730,177) there are 18,809,797 (95 per cent), in only seven great denominations. There are 6,250,045 Roman Catholic, and 13,480,132 Protestant communicants, as nearly as can be made out at present.

The Protestant bodies are as follows in order of members:

1. Methodists.....	4,980,340
2. Baptists.....	4,292,291
3. Presbyterians.....	1,229,012
4. Lutherans.....	1,086,048
5. Congregationalists.....	491,985
6. Episcopalians.....	480,176
Total.....	12,559,752

Thus it will be seen that more than 95 per cent of all church members in the United States are grouped in seven easily distinguished denominations; more than 92 per cent of all Protestants are grouped in six denominations; and more than 87 per cent of these are grouped in four denominations (the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Congregational denominations, with 11,013,524 members), which have great harmony of belief and action, uniting for many purposes of evangelical activity, quite as effectively as if they were a single denomination. This practical church-fellowship is becoming yearly more prevalent.—Chicago (Baptist) Standard, Nov. 12.

A VERBAL WILL; AN HONEST FAMILY.

Napoleonville is a little village in Louisiana, on the upper part of Bayou La Fourche. It stands in the midst of a dense plantation population. Plantation quarters and villages fairly line the bayou on both sides. Formerly there was a little Congregational church in the place. Some six years ago the pastor, Rev. J. K. Jones, was killed by a kick from his horse. Previous to this the church building had been blown down, and meetings were held in the parsonage. Since the pastor's death the flock has been scattered. The church property was owned by Mr. Jones. Before his death he expressed a wish that it might be given for church and school purposes. This wish has been held sacred by his relatives, though they are poor, Mrs. Jones supporting herself by cooking in the family of a planter. They seem not to have understood how to carry out the wish of Mr. Jones or with whom they should communicate; so they patiently waited through the years, trusting that a way would be revealed. Upon the first visit of a missionary to look after the scattered flock, they tell him of the verbal will, and their desire to execute it. The plot of ground is a beautiful one, well located in a wide and needy field.—Rev. C. H. Craeford, in the American Missionary for November.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

A famous Boston minister.—Why some evils are easier to see than others.—The aftermath of the great W. C. T. U. Convention.—A word to friends about our Annual Meeting.

Probably—and even this adverb I might safely leave off—not another minister in Boston has the power to attract weekly such an audience as greets every Sabbath the pastor of the Clarendon street church, Dr. A. J. Gordon. His wife is almost equally famous in her own sphere as a Christian worker, and the beloved President of the Boston W. C. T. U.; and thus it seems quite a matter of course that with the echoes of the great convention still ringing in our ears, with its ever-shifting panorama of bright, earnest faces and gleaming white ribbons, there should blend a side picture of the man whom the whole evangelical world delights to honor.

When we hear and see a celebrated preacher for the first time, it is always an additional pleasure to see him in his own pulpit—the place where of all others he will be most individual, most thoroughly himself—and, secondly, to hear him on some one subject in which he is greatest. We were favored in both these particulars as Dr. Gordon's sermon happened to be last in a series which he has been preaching on the Second Coming,—a favorite line of thought and study with him, as everybody knows who has read his printed volumes. He took his text from the parable of the net, in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew: "Thus shall it be in the end of this world, or age." Had I been asked, at the close, what most impressed me about his preaching, I should have said, the exquisite clearness of his language and simplicity of his manner. Nothing about him savors of display. There is no straining of the voice. His few gestures are unstudied, while he has the rare art—not always found, alas! even among great preachers—of choosing just the word best fitted to convey clearly and directly to the understanding of the hearer the thought he utters. But these are only the elements of pulpit power. Something more is needed to unite and make them the living, spiritual force that Dr. Gordon is to-day. As he went on, in his nervous, graphic style, to speak of the portentous signs on every hand; the spirit of scoffing unbelief, showing itself even in the sacred desk; and the solemn responsibility laid upon us, in view of these things, to be ready for our Lord's appearing, I realized the full meaning of that quaint expression more frequently heard in former years than now:—"as dying men unto dying men." It is this intensity of personal conviction, and singleness of desire to make every soul that hears him see the truth as he sees it, that gives him his wonderful power as a preacher. He is of average height, and his features, with which the readers of the Cynosure are already familiar through the cut published last week, combine the practical and the ideal temperament in an unusual degree. The singing in Dr. Gordon's church is congregational, and very inspiring and uplifting. The people "sing with the spirit and with the understanding also," and that miserable travesty on worship, the paid quartette, is conspicuous only by its absence.

Rev. Louis A. Banks, pastor of St. John's Methodist Episcopal church, at South Boston, in a recent sermon on the decay of the home life, classes the lodge among its worst foes. This is one among many encouraging signs that the ministers of New England, so long asleep on this subject, are now being roused to see that it is already a question of life or death with the churches. Dr. Banks has dealt vigorous blows against the saloon and the "sweating" and tenement house systems; and the reason he and many other clergymen with strong instincts towards reform see the lodge evil last of all, can be explained by an incident of the great convention, told in Alice Stone Blackwell's vivacious little paper, The Woman's Chronicle: "One woman asked another, as they stood in the surging crowd that filled the vestibule of the Temple, 'Why cannot we have audiences like this at suffrage meetings?' The other answered in the words of Lucy Stone, 'Because it is so much easier to see a drunkard than it is to see a principle.'" Never was a wiser saying. It explains the whole thing in a nut-shell. It is always easy to see evils that appeal directly to the senses, but the most subtle and dangerous of all;—those evils which hide from the public eye; which are an underlying cause rather than a clearly perceptible result;—a mischievous principle, sapping the life and soul of a nation; the dry-rot at its heart, while outwardly all looks fair and prosperous,—these are the things that society is very slow to perceive, and reformers on such lines have need more than others to cease from man and rely on God alone.

What of the influence on Boston at large of the great convention which has just been held? It must be salutary and far-reaching. Among the most interesting presentations was one of a beautiful banner from a Loyal Legion among the Maoris children of far-away New Zealand, and responded to in a bright little speech by the recipient, Miss Anna Gordon. Alluding to the inscription being in Maoris which no one in the convention could read, she said that the W. C. T. U. had the gift of tongues, and were at no loss to interpret the familiar motto: "Tremble, King Alcohol; we shall grow up!" I believe this assembly of representative women from all parts of the world has caused more "trembling" among the liquor-sellers of Boston and their political allies than anything which ever happened at the Hub before. The daily press has, on the whole, given fair reports—though as women have no votes the papers have naturally not devoted so much space to it as they would have done to the proceedings of a Democratic or Republican convention; and many of them, in fact, not so much as to a baseball match. Of course, I except our grand prohibition daily, the Traveller, which is so far above its contemporaries that no one thinks of mentioning it in the same breath. One exchange very gently criticizes "the too-effusive use of sweet expressions towards everything and everybody," but considerably adds that "this is not a bad fault among ladies." It is certainly not a very common one in the conventions of the opposite sex. To me it was a revelation:—the perfect knowledge of parliamentary rules, combined with the sweetest courtesy towards each other, even where there were essential differences of opinion; the spirit of the apostolic command, "In honor preferring one another," so clearly manifest in all their doings, made me long unspeakably for the time to come when the motherhood of the nation shall be represented in our legislative halls. Certainly the expeditious way in which they transacted their business could be imitated with much advantage by our law-makers, both at Washington and under the gilded dome. Of course, these women talked; it is what they came there for, and, furthermore, they all talked to the point. Think how the dreary Saharas of legislative debate would blossom as the rose under such streams of womanly eloquence! "Not one dull speech among them," said one lady to me, after listening to the reports of the State presidents. "Of how few men's conventions could that be said!" It would be interesting to know the various ways in which these women have been led out into public work, and how many, before duty impelled them to go on to the platform, shrank from the sound of their own voices. Had there been no W. C. T. U., how, in most cases, their grand capacities would have gone to waste, simply because they found no medium for development.

But now for a word regarding our own convention, the call for which I trust has received due attention from all friends of the anti-secret cause in New England. It is going to be in some respects the most important meeting we have yet held. Bro. Stoddard, with the help of his noble wife, has done a grand work in the two years that have past; and yet, viewed in the light of his plans and hopes for the future, it is but the beginning. Let me urge the fullest possible attendance of delegates from all the New England States. And to the friends in Boston and vicinity to whom this paper may come—friends whose faces I perhaps have never seen, but hope to at this convention—try to bring some one with you who needs to be instructed on the anti-Christian and anti-republican nature of the lodge. The secret club-rooms of Boston, which outnumber the churches three to one, need to have the light turned on, that all may see the real character of these counterfeit religions that are keeping men from Christ, and which, if allowed to go to seed, will bring forth here the same deadly harvest that they have in other lands.

Above all, let us pray for God's presence and blessings;—pray as if we fully expected it. And then what remains but for all that can to attend the meeting, and each do his or her part to make it the most gloriously successful one ever held in New England?

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 25, 1891.

Those who doubt that total abstinence from intoxicating liquor is one of the necessary steps towards the purification of politics in this country, should have been in Washington during the last few days. They would certainly have been convinced. Parlors of one of our finest and largest hotels were turned into bar-rooms, and free bar-rooms at that, and the distributors of alcoholic beverages were highly respected and eminent business men of the several cities that were competing before the national committee for the next Republican National Convention, who seemed to think that it was necessary to open free-rum shops, and to keep them open all day last Sunday in order to influence the members of this committee in favor of the city they represented. Such an idea is of course ridiculous, or, at least, it ought to be; but as long as it is recognized by the leading men in the business world it will be accepted by others.

Sermons are often heard outside of churches. I heard one to-day, and it was a good one, although short. It was delivered by a gentleman who is not a church member, and was inspired by a paragraph in the society column of a daily newspaper, referring to the increase in Washington of the French custom of holding receptions on Sunday afternoon or evening, under the name of "teas." He said: "Although not connected with any church, I am a believer in the great and living truths of Christianity, and I have a reverence for the Sabbath day which makes it absolutely painful for me to see that day desecrated. There is, in my mind, some excuse for the ignorant and vicious who desecrate the Sabbath day; but there is no excuse for such desecration by educated and cultivated people. With them it is a deliberate and intentional insult to Christianity, and if something is not done by the church people of Washington to stop the spread of these Sunday entertainments, they will do incalculable harm. The line must be sharply drawn, and the words of Christ—'He that is not for me, is against me'—must be taken for a motto and literally lived up to. Let those who give and those who attend these Sunday entertainments be tabooed by Christian men and women, and they will soon be dropped. The Administration is regarded as the head of official society, and the President and a majority of his Cabinet are fortunately church members; it is from them and their families that Christianity at large has a right to look for help in throttling this attempt to lower the social tone of the national capital of the United States to that of atheistic Paris." This sermon reminds me of the truth of the remarks quoted in this correspondence, several weeks since, about the need of missionary work among the occupants of the "best sections" of our large cities.

The Princeton student-evangelists closed their week's work in the Y. M. C. A. building Sunday afternoon. The result of the week was that 150 persons signed cards announcing their purpose to try to lead Christian lives.

The celebration of the thirty-ninth anniversary of the organization of the Y. M. C. A. of Washington, which took place on Monday evening, was an event of more than usual interest. The principal address was delivered by Rev. Dr. K. S. MacArthur, of New York, on "The times we have, and the men we need," and a most beautiful and eloquent address it was. But the most important event of the evening, to the association, was the raising of $2,100 in cash, which enabled it to cancel a floating indebtedness of $2,000.

The Washington Presbytery has been in session this week. The principal subject under discussion was the old one of revision, which was represented in this case by the recommendation of the committee on revision of the Confession of Faith appointed by the General Assembly of 1891, that sections 3 and 4 of chapter 3 be erased from the Confession. By a vote of 16 to 8 the Presbytery endorsed the committee's recommendation. This is regarded as committing the Washington Presbytery to revision.

Rev. Dr. Byron Sunderland has been so long in charge of a Washington church that it is difficult to discuss the progress of Christianity and moral reform in this city without constantly referring to his work. He celebrated his seventy-second birthday last Sunday by preaching a vigorous sermon, and to-morrow he will preach a Thanksgiving sermon to the united congregations of four of the largest Presbyterian churches in the city. He is a remarkably well-preserved man for his age, showing a vivacity possessed by few men of fifty.

The city is rapidly filling up with Congressmen and those who are interested, in a thousand-and-one ways, in a session of Congress. *

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE NEW ENGLAND AGENT.

WORCESTER, Mass., Nov. 23, 1891.

In response to an invitation from the Worcester Ministerial Union, I spoke to about forty of the brethren. The time allotted me was thirty minutes, but they kindly gave me an hour and twenty minutes, by extending the time. There was apparent interest and close attention on the part of all present. After my prepared address, there was a call for an explanation of the chart which I hung on the wall and used by way of incidental reference in the course of my address.

A few intelligent questions were asked, and one pastor spoke in very strong terms against the whole secret lodge system. As there was a 12 M. appointment for a prayer meeting in the hall, there was no opportunity for general discussion, but the hearty hand-shake of some of the brethren, with hearty God-speeds, indicated the feeling of some, at least, who were present. Arrangements for the distribution in several churches of tract No. 6, N. E. series, was made, and I can but feel that good results will follow.

Between three and four thousand tracts were distributed in the National W. C. T. U. Convention in Boston, that have gone to all parts of this and to many other countries.

On Friday morning last, Mrs. Stoddard and myself, accompanied by Bro. McIntyre, took a train for the New Hampshire State meeting at Alton. Arriving at noon, we found a goodly company, who reported: "The Lord is with us." We were assigned for quarters to the home of an Odd-fellow and Knight of Pythias, and were very hospitably entertained by our somewhat erratic and very social host. The afternoon had been assigned to a consideration of the secret lodge, and the discussion was of unusual interest. Seceders from Good Templars, the Grange, the G. A. R., Knights of Pythias, and one sixteen-degree Mason, spoke of what they personally knew of the work of the orders. Mrs. S. and myself both gave our testimony; and Mrs. Stoddard spoke on the lodge for an hour in the evening from a woman's standpoint. It was a real Holy Ghost meeting, showing wise generalship on the part of Bro. Kimball and his associates, and indicating a bright future for the cause in New Hampshire. Other engagements compelled me to leave before the convention closed, but I had no misgivings as to results in the hands of Bros. Kimball, Hoyt, Wm. F. Davis, Baker, Pike and others, who never strike the enemy at random. Ten delegates were appointed to the New England meeting, Dec. 9th and 10th, and all expect to be present.

Sister Powers and Mrs. Stoddard are arranging for the entertainment of those who come from abroad, and request that such as desire their assistance send their names to Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, 218 Columbus Ave., Boston. I am trusting and believing for the most spiritual and effective convention ever enjoyed in New England. Brethren and sisters, come up to the feast.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

COLLEGES OF SOUTHERN INDIANA.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Nov. 27, 1891.

In visiting the colleges of Southern Indiana I stopped a few days at Indianapolis. This place is well supplied with graded common schools; but it has no college nearer than Irvington, which is some five miles east of the city. On Nov. 12th I took the electric cars out there, and called on the president and Prof. Brown, librarian of Butler University, who took me through the library, but said he must consult the faculty before receiving our anti-secretory books.

At Franklin, which I visited a day or two later, I found some of our books, which Bro. Woodsmall placed in the library four or five years ago. Pres. Wm. T. Stott invited me to lead in the religious exercises in the chapel, which I did. This is one of the most flourishing institutions of learning in the State, and the only place where I found anti-secretory books; and the Christian Cynosure was on the table in the reading-room.

Danville College, where I went next, would have nothing to do with our literature. It seems to be run by Odd-fellows and Masons; for the president, I. A. Joseph, said that he was one, and L. I. Campbell, the librarian, seemed to confess to the same. So they would not listen to me for a moment.

At Bloomington I found an academy sustained by the Quakers. I reached there about the time of their mid-week meetings, and was invited to go in. There I broke the silence with a brief address on the universal brotherhood of man. But even here the narrow brotherhood of Satan had an advocate, who declared that while the priest and Levite passed by the poor man who fell among thieves, the Samaritan, presumably a Mason, helped him out. But he failed to tell us whether the poor fellow was sworn into the secret lodge, or had paid up his dues to the time. There is a large population of Friends here; and I think those who oppose secretism are much the most numerous. But they are pestered by the secret crawling snake which is worming its way in among them. Mr. Mitchell, the principal of the academy, seemed more than willing to receive our five-dollar library, which I arranged to send them.

On the 19th I left Indianapolis for Greencastle, where De Pauw M. E. University is located. It appears to be a large and well-endowed institution, with a theological department, but very much under the influence of oath-bound secret fraternities. I found Dr. Poucher, the librarian, sick and in bed when I called. He was friendly, but said it would be utterly useless to attempt to place our books there. So I went on my way to Terre Haute, and visited the State Normal there. They have a stately building, with well-furnished recitation rooms and library; and Arthur Cunningham, the librarian, agreed, without hesitation, to receive our reform books.

Prof. Bryan, president of the college of Vincennes, where I next went, said he would not dare to put our books in the college library. Indeed, according to my observation, most of the institutions of learning of South Indiana are under the supervision of Freemasons and other oath-bound secret orders. It was so at Mitchell, in the Southern Indiana Normal, where I talked the matter over with Prof. Williams, who dare not take reform books. At Moore's Hill College, where they have a large and stately building, up in the third story there is a Masonic lodge on the one side, and an Odd-fellows' lodge on the other, waiting, with the cunning of the serpent, to swallow the young students when they arrive at maturity.

S. F. PORTER.

BRO. FENTON IN OHIO.

DAYTON, Ohio, Nov. 26, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—It was due to the kind hospitality and diligent exertions of ex-President C. H. Kiracofe, of the United Brethren church, that the U. B. church of this city was well-filled with people last evening to hear a lecture on the "Lying and Overwhelming Blasphemy of Freemasons."

The pastor presided as chairman of the meeting; Rev. C. H. Kiracofe led in the opening prayer, and Bishop Milton Wright pronounced the benediction. Owing to the fact that the principles of Masonry require its subjects to deny the truth, when such denial is essential "for the good of the worshipful fraternity," opportunity was given for a denial in the presence of the audience of anything said in the lecture. Doubtless the Masons thought it wisest to keep their "jewel"—"a silent tongue"—until a favorable opportunity. The audience appeared to be convinced of the real lying and blasphemy committed by Freemasons in the lodge work.

Rev. J. W. Martin, D.D., of Mt. Perry, Ohio, is holding revival meetings here in the U. P.

church, but he will be present at the State Convention. Bro. Martin is the president of the Ohio State Christian Association, opposed to secret societies. There are others here who desire to attend the convention. Bishop Wright regrets that, owing to his engagements in his Western field, he will not be able to attend.

The Dayton Evening News had agreed to print a notice of the meeting last evening; but, observing the subject of the lecture, hesitated and declined to send a reporter, nor did the notice appear in that evening paper. We know that the god of the lodge is prince of darkness, and that the lodge alias of this prince is Hiram, and by that name is personated by every one that takes the Master Mason's degree. Is the Dayton Evening News under the control of the devil?

XENIA, Ohio, Nov. 27, 1891.—I have just been speaking to the faculty and students of the seminary. Dr. Carson is not at home, but I expect to see him this evening.

I saw Dr. Morehead, who dismissed his class fifteen minutes earlier than usual, to give me time to address the students. I spoke three-quarters of an hour, to the best of my ability. Dr. McDill and Dr. Harper were present.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PROPHET'S BEAST AND ITS IMAGE.

FAIRHAVEN, Ill., Nov. 8, 1891.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Your issue of November 5 is very interesting, on account of the explication of Revelation 13:11, by Rev. W. C. Boardman, and by L. Meader, of Delaware Grove, Iowa, where the "great whore" is called Freemasonry; citing Rev. 17:5—on her forehead was written, "Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." That this passage means the popish religion, is certain, without proof. The harlot, or woman, is called (Rev. 17:18) a city which has the rule over the kings of the earth. "City" here signifies doctrine, and "earth," the people of the church.

The Lord Jesus Christ compares those who heard the word and kept it, to the good ground (Luke 8:15; Matt. 13:23-38). In this passage it is plain that "the world," or earth, denotes the people: "He who soweth the good seed is the Son of man; the field is the world; the good seed are the sons of the kingdom," etc. (Matt. 13:37,38.) The Word of God is called the good seed in Luke 8:11; in Matt. 13:19-43, it is plain that the good ground is the kingdom of heaven, or church, on earth; in verse 24, the kingdom is the good field.

To call Freemasonry the woman, or city, who has the rule over kings of the earth, is not in accordance with the Bible. The Masonic order is by no means the good ground, or the good seed, in our Saviour's explanation of the parable of the sower. The Masonic worship is not the plain and simple worship of the Bible. If the institution was ever divinely ordained, it must have been before our Bible was written.

The theory, or notion, that Freemasonry is the harlot (Rev. 17), or the beast (Rev. 13), is not well-grounded on the Bible, nor well-founded on the Rock of Ages, because it is not possible to prove it by both Testaments. There are many theories and explanations, by various writers, but they all differ in opinions. Roman Catholics charge the Protestants with being in error, and vice versa.

This prophetic part of the Scriptures is not well enough understood in our times. A certain Rev. Mr. Krueger claimed that he was inspired by the Holy Spirit to explain the Revelation. He took the orthodox Lutheran ministry for the beast (Rev. 11:17), because they make the sign of the cross over the infant's forehead in baptism; "take the pupils by the hand when they confirm them," and "allow no minister of any other denomination to be officered in their church."

"The beast came out of the earth." The question is, is the Protestant church the field, earth, in this passage and in Matt. 13; or is it the Catholic church; or Freemasonry? What is meant by harlot is plain to be seen in Ezekiel 23—an apostate church, or people, by whom the doctrine is falsified and the inventions of men, or traditions, are put in its place—"a people who keep not the commandments of God."

Where Masonry originated is very uncertain; but from its oaths and grips we are justified in concluding that it had its origin under the papal Inquisition. If the Doesburg exposition is correct, it has some landmarks of the ancient worship; but if it was the genuine worship, it would have to possess the knowledge of its correspondence, and ought to recognize the hieroglyphics of ancient writing, some of which were discovered and deciphered in 1844. There are many arguments against the claim that Masonry is the harlot of Revelation. B. APPEL.

[Modern study of the Revelation makes the "beast" itself the scarlet woman, and "the image of the beast" Freemasonry, and this distinction makes the subject much more intelligible. Both the papacy and Masonry have "mystery" on their frontlets and in their practices. The "ancient mysteries" are ages older than Masonry, but the latter adopted them, and then altered them to suit their own ideas. The papacy has always been a bundle of mysteries, all of which are now exposed; and even the secret work of the Jesuits is said to closely resemble that laid down in the Masonic rituals. The one is the true beast—the other its image, or imitator; and both are notoriously opposed to Christianity, and that by their own confession.—EDITOR.]

THE DIVINE TELESCOPE.

IRON HILLS, Iowa, Nov., 1891.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Astronomers may be enabled to look into the mysteries of heavenly bodies and give to humanity a true and positive account of things which are in existence; but all their wisdom will never discern the hidden mysteries of the future as Daniel predicted the world's history in a few words, covering now in all near 2,500 years.

Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, had astonished all the astrologers, magicians and sorcerers in the kingdom by commanding them to not only give the dream which he himself could not recall, but also the interpretation of the version. The penalty for failing to do this was, that they were to be cut in pieces and their houses to be made a dung hill. Daniel, realizing the peril and approaching dangers, said to his three companions that they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning the secret, and that he and his fellows would not perish with the rest of the wise men in Babylon. Then, we read in Dan. 2: 19, was the secret revealed to Daniel in a night-vision. The prophet said when he came in the presence of the king: "Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible. This image's head was of fine gold; his breast and his arms of silver; his belly and his thighs of brass; his legs of iron; his feet part of iron and part of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them in pieces."

The prophet gave now, also, the interpretation of this dream which described the four great kingdoms of the earth with the fall of the last in rotation, the Roman Empire. He began with the Babylonian king, saying: "Thou art this head of gold."

This Babylonian kingdom began according to history about 747 years B. C., and ended with the year 538 B. C. Daniel continued, saying: "And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth."

The Media-Persian kingdom began with the year 538 B. C., and ended with the reign of Alexander the Great, called the Grecian kingdom, near the year 331 B. C. The prophet predicted the rise of a fourth kingdom which we now call the Roman Empire. He said: "And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: for as much as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise."

Most of the historical writers ascribe the rise of this empire to Augustus, 30 years B. C.

This temporal power is here designated as being as strong as iron. The monarchs, or Cæsars, held the reins of government in their hands until the year A. D. 500, before this fourth kingdom was effectually bruised with the papal throne of Rome. Pope Leo III. caused it to break in pieces, in the Western portion seceding from the Eastern. The temporal power came in collision with the spiritual. The prophet said, Dan. 2: 41: "And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potter's clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided, but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, for as much as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay."

For 1006 years, or from A. D. 800 until 1806, this fourth kingdom stood over humanity with a two-fold power, the papacy as the spiritual, and the emperors as the temporal rulers of Christianity. Daniel, as a prophet of God, saw no divinely, infallible, spiritual representative as vicar of Christ upon earth, as the papacy has assumed to be, but saw something erected of an earthly nature mixing itself in with the government of this last empire in its declining state of existence. He prophesied further, verses 42-43, to-wit: "And as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay."

History fails to give any record of any true Christian fellowship between the power of Rome, or clay, and the emperors, or iron, during this period of time. Napoleon Bonaparte proved to the world that they could no longer cleave together in the midst of national calamities; the bond of union ceased with the year 1806, and with it the fourth kingdom of the earth.

The Roman empire was composed of ten toes—ten horns or, figuratively, ten kingdoms, in the beginning of the Reformation; namely, England, Scotland, Denmark, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Austria, Hungary and Poland.

The papal throne, with its anti-Christian foundation, is also to go to destruction like all those kingdoms which the prophet foretold would come to pass. It is given in plain language, as follows, verses 44, 45: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter; and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure."

The potter's clay of Rome, which the prophet had interwoven so wonderfully in the dream, shall not even have a preference to other heathen rulers; it shall be consumed like all other kingdoms. Christ shall reign as the supreme Head of the church during the Christian era; he shall be the King of kings and Lord of lords. His kingdom shall never be destroyed, nor be left to other people, which includes the Roman pontiffs.

The Babylonian image has attained the great age of 2,409 years from the time Daniel explained the dream until the end of the last kingdom of 1806. The power of the Gospel was to manifest itself before the day of judgment, which period is being literally fulfilled in this century.

IN THE SUNSHINE.

"Men are needed who are out of the darkness of paganism, where homes, wives and children are sacrificed upon the altar of negligence in order that husbands and fathers may worship at the shrine of Masonry or Odd-fellowship. I think we have men who are in the sunshine in the persons of the editors, publishers and contributing staff of the Christian Cynosure. I am out in the sunshine, and am determined to go with you until the battle shall have been fought, the victory won, and the whole human family brought to Christ, who stands out in the bright sunshine, 'the fairest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely.' Hoping that the grand cause may have still more prestige in the near future than it even now has, I am yours in the sunshine."—Rev. C. S. MOORE, M. D., Navasota, Texas.

READY FOR THE BATTLE.

"It would seem odd, indeed, to not see the Cynosure lying on the stand, as I have read it for years. I desire to say that there is no paper equal to it. I am decidedly opposed to all secret societies; had the pleasure of giving them a 'flogging' in a public discussion, last winter, and have a challenge standing all the time; but no one seems anxious to accept it. 'Abhor that which is evil,' is the injunction; and, again, 'Come out from among them and be ye separate.' The words of so many, that these societies often pervert justice, were proven to be true in the decision of the Supreme Court of this State, not long since, in apportioning the rights of property in the United Brethren case. My prayer is, May God bless you and your paper to the accomplishment of lasting good."—JACOB LIFE, Redkey, Ind.

LITERATURE.

Through the courtesy of Rev. C. H. Kiracofe, of Dayton, Ohio, we have received a neat 28-page pamphlet, entitled, "Christian Giving; or, The Divine Rule of Benevolence," of which we rather suspect that our friend and brother is the author, although it is printed anonymously. It is a careful review of the ancient known methods of giving for religious purposes, tithing, and setting apart during the week what was to be given on the Lord's day; the injunctions against robbing God of his just dues by neglecting to give of one's substance; the obligation to make frequent and liberal donations to the cause of Christianity; the evils of covetousness, and the blessedness of giving freely of one's means. The requirement of God and the church seems to be: That every one shall give something; that he shall give regularly and systematically, and that he shall give proportionately, or according to his income. To which may be added, give only to those objects that are entirely in harmony with the propagation of the Gospel and the relief of suffering humanity. The author also argues conclusively that wealth is a sacred trust from God, and that men will be called to account for the administration of that trust; that covetousness is a fearful sin; that riches are dangerous, and that the danger increases as the riches increase; that liberality has great reward; that self-denial is a great virtue, and that wills should be made in the interest of godly institutions. The topic is ably handled.

The Arena for December (Boston), beginning a new volume, is embellished with a fine, full-page portrait of John G. Whittier, of whom George Stewart, D. C. L., LL. D., contributes a very pleasant sketch. Other papers of interest are: New Discoveries in the Heavens, by Camille Flammarion; Protection, or Free Trade—Which? by Hon. David A. Wells; The Woes of the New York Working-girl, by Edgar Fawcett; Citizenship and Suffrage, by Francis Minor; Qualification of the Elective Franchise, by Robert Henry Williams; Divorce, by Carroll D. Wright. Helen Campbell and Hamlin Garland furnish each a story; the former a "thrilling novelette," dealing with hypnotism, morphine and insanity; the latter a very readable country sketch, entitled "Uncle Ripley's Speculation." The heavy dogmatic features of the month are comprised in Faith in God as a Personal Equation, by Rev. C. A. Bartol, based on human history as the exponent of God-power, and The Logic of Port Royal and Modern Science—a curious study, by Prof. T. Funck-Brentano. Helen Campbell has, also, a review of modern association in clubs, with its bearings on working-women, which has a wide application in these days of white ribbon, Christian endeavor, temperance union and a hundred other similar societies.

The "Christmas" (December) number of St. Nicholas is bright and cheery and replete with pictures, stories and verses reminiscent of the holiday. It opens with the tale of The Christmas Inn, by Ella F. Mosby, with a characteristic frontispiece illustrative of its incidents. The Admiral's Caravan is a breezy narrative, just begun, which promises much of interest. J. T. Trowbridge contributes The Corner of the Column—A Traveler's Adventure, copiously embellished with views of Italian scenery, and relating a stirring event. The Long Hill-side tells the story of an exciting hare-hunt in old Virginia, by Thomas N. Page. Tom Paulding, by Brander Matthews, is continued, with interesting new features. Another beautifully illustrated article that will attract the attention of old and young, is Strange Corners of Our Country, by Charles F. Lummis, including views of the Grand Canon of Colorado, etc. Other notable contributions are: David Cameron's Fairy God-mother, by Elizabeth Bisland; The Complaint, by Tudor Jenks; Honors to the Flag, by W. J. Henderson, etc. This number is a true chef d'oeuvre of this sprightly and fascinating periodical. Published by the Century Co., 33 East 17th street, New York.

—Congregations have been organized in Seattle and Tacoma, Wash.

—Rev. W. L. C. Samson, one of the seven young men suspended by the Pittsburgh Presbytery, of the Synod R. P. church, was installed pastor of the Homestead U. P. congregation Oct. 13.

OBITUARY.

The Anti-secrecy Reform cause has recently lost another warm supporter in the death of Benjamin M. Mason, who died at Moultonborough, New Hampshire, Nov. 10, 1891. The twelfth in a family of thirteen children born to Lemuel B. Mason, he entered upon his earthly existence at Guilford, N. H., October 25, 1811. With one exception he outlived the others of his family, the only survivor being W. H. H. Mason, an eminent physician residing in Moultonborough, where he has practiced for many years.

Benjamin M. Mason, with his father, moved from Guilford to Moultonborough when in his eighth year, and there he has lived and labored on a farm the principal part of the time since. During winters he devoted himself many years to the instruction of the district schools in that town and Sandwich. He was deeply interested in the educational development of the young, giving much careful thought to the work, and was interested in every good cause, and labored for the moral elevation of man. In connection with the district schools, singing schools were taught by him in Centre Harbor, Sandwich and Moultonborough. He instructed the public schools at Moultonborough Corner twenty-seven terms. He was superintendent of the town schools about thirty years, and was school commissioner for Carroll county in the year 1855. He also served as one of the trustees of the Normal school at Plymouth, and was road commissioner for Carroll county for two years. He represented his town in the State Legislature in 1855 and 1856. He was county treasurer in 1863 and 1864, and was moderator, selectman and treasurer for several years. In July 1838 he married Ann E., daughter of John G. and Joanna Brown. She died April 5, 1885. He leaves two children, Wm. H. and M. Ella, to mourn the death of their father.

Early in life he became a Christian and united with the First Congregational church in Moultonborough in the year 1840. His religion seemed to be a matter more of profound conviction and courageous principle than of mere emotion; consequently his life was a steady glow rather than intermittent flashes, and his step was steadily onward from the beginning to the end. In this spirit for fourteen years, he was a continuous and devoted reader of the Christian Cynosure, and strongly in sympathy with its teachings.

During the last two years he had suffered from ill health; and at times during the last few months his sufferings were severe, which doubtless tended to tinge the latter part of his life with a shade of sadness; and yet those who knew him best discovered beneath his shaded exterior an abiding trust in Christ, and a joyful expectation of ultimate triumph and everlasting victory. A good man has fallen from our ranks. He now rests from his labors and his works do follow him.

"At last, I can eat a good square meal without its distressing me!" was the grateful exclamation of one whose appetite had been restored by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, after years of dyspeptic misery. A teaspoonful of this extract before each meal sharpens the appetite.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1891.

"M QUAD" ON OLD AND NEW WORK.

I have been a Blue Lodge worker in the old way and in the new, and my experience proves very good results for the new. In the old way—without robes or accessories or spirit—if we had an average attendance of twelve in a lodge numbering one hundred members we were highly pleased. If a brother came once or twice after taking his third degree we did not expect to see him again unless on some great occasion. If the Master and his officers got through the work somehow there was no one to criticize. If it so happened that not enough members turned out on a rainy night to open a lodge there was no great wonderment about it. The brother who could post a candidate and work his way into a strange lodge was looked upon as a great man. The brother who could fill more than one station in the work was thought to be a prodigy.

And what did the new way do for my lodge in two years? It made every worker perfect in the key; it increased the attendance four hundred per cent; it gave up three sets of workers on the floor, where we formerly had one; it brought back scores of brothers who had grown cold in Masonry; it helped to collect our dues; it brought us visitors; it posted every man until every one could post a candidate; it created an enthusiasm and an interest which quadrupled the number of candidates; it created an ambition which incited every brother to learn the work so that he could fill a station; it was an example to be followed by other lodges, and it was followed to the benefit of the order all over a great jurisdiction, I refer to Michigan. She is to-day leading every other jurisdiction in America in number of candidates, in perfect key work, and in the detailed exemplification of the work. This is not only true of her Blue Lodges, but of Chapters, Councils and Commanderies.

The above is a fair sample of the sacredness which Masons attach to an oath. At the very beginning, the Mason swears not to write, print, stamp, stain, hue, cut, carve, indent, paint, or engrave the Masonic ritual on anything under the sun. The design was to hand down the degrees by oral tradition and to make the man who could go through the ritual a "great man," "the one who could fill more than one station a prodigy." Of course, this was a foolish provision, and exalted men with small intelligence and little business to the chief places in lodges.

Nevertheless, it was Masonic law and oath that Masonry should not be printed. Yet here is a great Masonic jurisdiction using a key, i. e., a cipher Masonry, that any one familiar with the revelations may read almost as readily as he can plain print. This is for substance the very thing which caused the Masons of 1826 to murder William Morgan. Every Mason who buys a key and uses it, constructively prints it and encourages others to do the same.

The natural result of such profane and wicked oaths as Masons take is to produce disregard for all oaths. The penalties which are assumed intensify this tendency. When men swear under penalty of having throats cut, tongues torn out, hearts and vitals taken out, etc., the first effect is to degrade the oath; the second, to train men to murder.

But another thought is suggested. If the obligation not to print Masonry can be thrown to the winds, why cannot Masons put the name of Jesus into their prayers, swear Masons not to commit adultery with any one, instead of protecting the relatives of Masons alone, or do away with the oath not to steal from Masons, and obligate initiates not to steal at all? The fact is, they could if they would. They could as well make the order an open society as to adopt a key. Why do not the worthy men who are members of the order insist that it be "ended or mended," as Morley said must be the case with the House of Lords? If the wretched oaths, the Christless prayers, the obligations to keep secret the unknown, the murderous penalties, and the absurd initiations were thrown off, the order might do good. Since an entire Grand Lodge can break the oath, why not let it go?

THE FOUNDATIONS OF MASONRY.

"The three solid cubes on which the Masonic edifice stands are antiquity, universality, and unchangeability."—John C. W. Bailey.

Bro. Bailey here refers to the system of Freemasonry, not the ambitious Masonic temple recently erected in Chicago; but there seems to be one corner left without foundation, and his poetic description is incomplete, unless he intended to compare the order to a three-legged stool. He forgot to mention religion as the fourth cube on which the system rests.

"The whole doctrine of the resurrection,—that doctrine which underlies the principles of Masonry as Mount Moriah underlay and bore up King Solomon's Temple; that doctrine," says the same authority, "from which the term 'sublime' is derived as applied to the Master Mason's degree,—the whole of this doctrine is taught in one brief ceremony," (the latter half of the Master Mason's degree).

Even on this evidence alone, Masonry is a religion, or has a religion, most of which is derived from a former age when heathen philosophy, psychology and devil-worship flourished among the ancients; and this religious bias with a pagan basis is really the only element of antiquity of which the order can rightfully boast. Its universality is greatly to be deplored, but is a solemn fact; and its unchangeability, almost as deplorable, does no credit to it. "The evil that men do lives after them;" and Masonry can sing, with Tennyson's Brook: "For men may come, and men may go, but I go on forever!" More's the pity!

A SPLIT IN THE FARMERS' ALLIANCE.

The announcement was made recently, from Indianapolis, that the so-called political "People's party" had captured the Farmers' Alliance, owing to a disastrous split in the Alliance on what is known as the "sub-treasury scheme," on which the advocates and opponents were quite equally divided. The scheme is somewhat complicated, but includes a proposition that provision be made by the Federal Congress for government loans of money to individual citizens upon farm mortgages as security or to the demand for government ownership or control of railroad property and transportation. These schemes are declared "to be unconstitutional, impracticable, conflicting with the spirit of the Alliance movement and tending to government paternalism and State socialism." When the protest of the anti-sub-treasury people was taken up by the supreme council of the Alliance, a somewhat animated debate occurred as to the best means of disposing of it with the least possible friction. Finally, after two hours of wrangling, the committee of the antis was informed that they could not be heard unless they furnished the council with a copy of the protest. This the antis refused to do unless they could present their protest in person, and that ended negotiations between the two wings of the Alliance.

The sub-treasury advocates then re-elected L. L. Polk, president; J. H. Loucks, of So. Dakota, vice-president; J. H. Turner, secretary and treasurer, and J. F. Willetts, of Kansas, national lecturer; and the leaders of the People's party were jubilant over the result.

The executive committee of the anti-sub-treasury party will now proceed to Texas, where 127 sub-alliances have already declared against the sub-treasury scheme, and will begin the work of organizing a new alliance. A call for a national convention has been issued. The end is not yet.

—The Christian Statesman, of Philadelphia, has passed into the hands of a new management, and will hereafter be published at Pittsburg, with Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, the well-known Sabbath-Reform advocate, as managing editor. Rev. T. P. Stevenson, its editor for twenty years past, will be numbered among the able contributors to its columns. The paper will continue to operate with the National Reform Association, "but will also, as in the past, re-enforce all kindred organizations that advocate moral reforms from a Christian standpoint;" yet among the many of these enumerated, we do not find opposition to the lodge system mentioned. The omission is a little remarkable, as Bro. Crafts is not in favor of these un-Christian institutions, and we hope that he will not ignore this important topic and do injury to his own honest convictions. We wish the Statesman the eminent success which it deserves.

—We are credibly informed that the secret society people are stealthily creeping into the United Presbyterian church, and that before they are aware of it they may find themselves in the condition of the United Brethren, with the civil courts giving their churches to the lodge sympathizers. We are very sorry to hear this. There is no safe ground for denominational rule against secretism, except that maintained by the Augustana Synod of the Swedish Lutherans—requiring its members to unconditionally surrender their affiliation with the unholy lodge, or to suffer excommunication from the church. There is not sufficient vitality in any Christian denomination to uphold the cause of Christ and anti-Christ. "Ye cannot serve two masters," said our Lord; and the lodge is so tyrannical that the church which affiliates with it is sure to lose its spirituality and usefulness in the cause of Christ.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Rev. B. R. Jones, editor of the Free Methodist, at the Thanksgiving rally in the May street F. M. church, last week, while others were returning thanks for marked progress during the past year in temperance, political and other vital reforms, spoke pointedly of the anti-secrecy work that had been and is now being accomplished. In substance, he thanked God that although opposition to the lodges was not so prominent in public discussions as temperance, politics and some other reforms, there is an element bubbling up in antagonism to secret societies as a great evil that will yet be felt, and forcibly, too, in pulling down these strongholds of Satan. And this declaration was approved with hearty "amens" from the congregation.

—Colonel Geo. R. Clarke and his assistant, Harry Monroe, both of whom were obliged, several weeks ago, to abandon their Christian work at the famous Pacific Garden Mission, at the corner of Van Buren street and Fourth avenue, on account of severe illness, have returned in greatly improved health and with an intention of renewing their religious labors at an early date. In this work they expect to have the co-operation of the Chicago Baptist City Mission Society, which is endeavoring to hire the old Quinn chapel, in that neighborhood, for an auxiliary mission, to assist Col. Clarke in his Sunday-school, Kindergarten and Chinese work. The field is an excellent one, and a large one, and its cultivation, as shown by the long-continued and arduous ministry of Col. Clarke, may be made profitable in rescuing precious souls from sin and death.

—Rev. Francis J. Davidson, pastor of a colored Baptist church in New Orleans, whose persecutions on account of his open opposition to secret societies have been severe, as heretofore noted in the Cynosure, was also editor and proprietor of a paper named the Teller, in which he freely published his antagonistic views of the lodge system. He now writes to us that he has sold his subscription list to the proprietors of another paper—the Ferret—and discontinued the issue of the Teller. The principal peculiarity of the copy of the Ferret received at this office is a full column of "Lodge and Society Notes," in the interest of these institutions. On this account, and because the Ferret also prints the advertisements of liquor and cigar dealers, we liked the Teller much better. We hope that Bro. Davidson has made no mistake in selling out to the agents of the devil.

—Bro. Elbert Marcy, an old and valued friend of this paper and the cause it advocates, sends us the following account of a dastardly and unprovoked assault upon his wife by parties who, at the time of writing, were unknown. Bro. Marcy's home is at Emporia, Kans. "Four weeks ago to-morrow night we were coming home from meeting, about 9 o'clock, when some mean scamp came up behind my wife (I being about six rods before her), and threw a stone weighing about 2 lbs. 6 oz., and nearly broke her back. It being about 100 rods from our home, and she unable to either stand or walk, I secured help and carried her home in a rocking-chair. For twelve days she lay between life and death, and then began to get better. The doctor says that by good nursing she will get round again, but never recover her strength. She can now stand and walk a few steps, but suffers much and eats only a little light food. We did not know that she had an enemy in the world."

as opportunity has afforded, and secured the renewal of several of our colored friends to the Cynosure. Over one hundred subscriptions to our paper were secured among members of colored churches here last year. Many who were induced then to subscribe belonged to from one to half-a-dozen, or more, secret societies. When the sifting time [the time for renewal] came, some of these fail to renew; but let us hope that in the year past some seeds of truth have been sown by its weekly visits that will bear fruit in years to come. My heart has been made glad by many renewals and words of commendation given by pastors and others. Last Sabbath morning I spoke, by invitation, in the Virginia Avenue Baptist church. The attendance was not what it should have been. This people have a fine church property, but are having a hard struggle to pay for it. Nearly every device known to churches for catching money from the world has been resorted to, but still the load is heavy. Several spoke with approval of my effort to bring them the truth. Among the follies which the people were invited to attend, was some so-called grand affair to be given by "the Sons and Daughters of Abraham." I could but wonder if any of them ever tried to prove their title to their name. I question if Abraham would be very proud of his so-called sons and daughters. I suppose the founders of this lodge thought they must have a big name to have a big thing. The devil's trap would not be worth much without bait. If the members of this church who are paying into lodges would pay what goes to the lodge into the church it would be in a better financial condition, and Christ's name would receive more glory.

I expect to speak Sabbath morning for Rev. Mr. Dailey's people [Congregational], and on Sabbath evening in Rev. S. Alexander's [Baptist] church, in Georgetown. Yours in the work,
W. B. STODDARD.

ANTI-SECURITY IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE FIFTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NEW HAMPSHIRE CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Association met in Muzzey's Hall, at Alton, N. H., November 19, 1891, at 7 o'clock P. M.

A season of worship, lasting one hour, was led by Dr. E. B. Pike, editor of the Bible Christian, Exeter, N. H. There was a good attendance, and the presence of the Lord was manifested in a very blessed manner.

At 8 P. M., the annual sermon was preached by Pastor J. Phillips, of Gilford Village, who was born in India, a son of the sainted missionary, J. Phillips. His text was Psalm 2:8, and his theme "Christian Mission Work." His sermon was radical, deep, and grand.

On Friday morning, November 20, at 8 o'clock, worship was led by Pastor J. Phillips, and a blessed season was enjoyed.

Standing committees were appointed by President Samuel Rowe.

At 11 o'clock, A. M. the Association listened to an excellent sermon by Elder J. H. Bartlett, from Luke 16:9.

Re-assembling at 1:30 P. M., another season of worship was led by Bro. H. A. Flanders.

The afternoon was devoted, in part, to the confessions of seceders from secret lodges. Seceders were present representing all the leading secret fraternities of the State, including Good Templars, Sons of Temperance, Grangers, Crispins, Knights of Pythias, Odd-fellows of all degrees, Grand Army, several Master Masons and one 16-degree Knight Templar. No words can describe the value, interest, power and blessing of this hour. The glory of God filled the house, and unspeakable joy the hearts of Christians, as these brave and honest men confessed the grace that opened their eyes and led them to renounce the works of lodge darkness.

S. C. Kimball, of Newmarket; Dea. S. Rowe, of Gilford Village; Dr. E. B. Pike, of Exeter; Elder J. H. Bartlett, of Barnstead, and others, laid bare the sin and folly of the minor orders. The power of God rested on Bro. Ezra T. McIntyre, of Boston, a 16-degree Freemason, as he unfolded to the astonished multitude the horrid wickedness of Masonry. He spoke with perfect freedom and irresistible power of his personal experience in being let down into the vault in quest of the "Ark of the Covenant," and drinking wine out of a human skull. He held up to just public scorn the professed ministers of the Gospel with whom he had shared in Knight Templar revelry and blasphemy.

I have heard Rathbun, Springstein, the two saintly Browns (J. H. and J. F.), the two Blanchard giants, father and son, Ronayne, Stoddard, and many other able men, expose the evils of lodgism; but I have never seen the power of the Holy Spirit witnessing against Baal-worship of the lodge as during Bro. McIntyre's humble and quiet utterance of what he knew to be true. The truth completely and gloriously triumphed.

Mrs. J. P. Stoddard then spoke for the women, and Rev. J. P. Stoddard, from his chart, exposed the so-called "secrets of Masonry."

At 7 o'clock in the evening there was another season of worship, followed by an address by Mrs. J. P. Stoddard on secret societies.

At 8:30 Dr. Pike preached.

On Saturday morning, November 21, at 8 o'clock, devotions were led by S. C. Kimball.

A petition was presented, asking for a public examination of John H. Bartlett, a candidate for the Gospel ministry. The petition was granted unanimously.

At 10 A. M. the following officers were chosen for the ensuing year:

11 A. M. There was a sermon on Divine Healing, by Rev. A. Hoyt, of Cambridgeport, Mass. 1:30 P. M. Worship was led by Rev. E. B. Pike.

2 P. M. The report of the Home Missionary was read by S. C. Kimball; followed by Wm. F. Davis, of Boston, Rev. J. P. Stoddard, A. B. Sawyer, R. A. Frohock, J. F. French, Ezra T. McIntyre, and Rev. C. L. Baker.

At this time, and during the convention, about $50 was paid, and about $50 more pledged, to forward the work of the Lord.

Resolutions of respect were passed in memory of our departed ex-Presidents Benj. M. Mason and Elder James G. Smith; in favor of the oneness of the church and prohibition; against organized secretism; returning thanks for free entertainment and reduced railroad rates, and gratitude for the services of Rev. J. P. Stoddard, the New England agent of the N. C. A., and Mrs. Stoddard, publisher of the National Home Guard.

7 P. M. Worship was led by Bro. Littlefield, of Barnstead.

8 P. M. An able lecture on Temperance was delivered by Wm. F. Davis, of Chelsea, Mass.

Sunday, 8 A. M., November 22, there was worship till 10:30 A. M., followed by the ordination of Bro. John H. Bartlett, of Barnstead Center, to the Gospel ministry. The opening prayer was offered by Rev. E. B. Pike; the sermon was preached by Rev. A. A. Hoyt; the ordaining prayer was made by Rev. C. L. Baker; the charge by S. C. Kimball, and the benediction by Rev. J. H. Bartlett.

At the close of this service, a messenger from the Congregational church of Alton cordially invited the N. H. C. A. to move to their house of worship and occupy it to the close of the Convention, which invitation was accepted.

1:30 P. M. Worship was led by S. C. Kimball. A sermon by Rev. E. B. Pike, followed. His theme was "Bible Holiness."

The Lord's Supper was then administered by Wm. F. Davis and S. C. Kimball, assisted by R. A. Frohock and A. B. Sawyer. The Lord manifested himself to his people in the breaking of bread.

7 P. M. Worship was led by Rev. C. L. Baker, and a sermon was preached by Wm. F. Davis.

Muzzey's Hall was not large enough to hold the people, but the courtesy of our Congregational friends removed the difficulty. Let us praise God for this, one of the largest and best annual conventions of the N. H. C. A.

S. C. KIMBALL, Sec'y.

NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SECURITY CONVENTION.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 9 AND 10, 1891.

THE OFFICIAL CALL.

The Annual Meeting of the New England Christian Association will be held (D. V.) in the United Presbyterian church, corner of Berkeley and Chandler streets, Boston, Dec. 9th and 10th, 1891. Dr. A. J. Gordon, Mrs. M. E. R. Gleason, Mrs. E. Trask Hill, Rev. R. A. McAyeal, Rev. J. M. Foster, and Rev. I. A. Mesler, are among the speakers engaged. Joseph Cook has also agreed to speak, if within reach at the time. A number of seceders from Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship and other branches of the secret empire will be present and testify from personal experience in the orders. Friends in New England are urgently requested to attend and aid, by their counsels, and their prayers, and contributions, in carrying forward this great work.

Beloved in the Lord, there are practical questions confronting us in the work we have undertaken in behalf of the church of Christ. Ought not these questions to be met at a meeting where they may be carefully considered? One of these is the question of Incorporation. Would it not be well for those who desire to co-operate by prayer, by counsel or by contributions, to meet and confer on the advisability of becoming known in law as a corporate body, thereby assuring greater efficiency and permanence in our work?

Ten o'clock A. M., December 9th, would be a convenient time for such a conference in Boston, preceding the opening of the convention on the afternoon of the same day. The laws of Massachusetts relating to such corporations and other required documents could be in readiness, and if, after due conference, it should seem best to incorporate, legal forms could be expeditiously compiled with. Believing that whatever action the brethren might deem wise in the matter, such a conference would be helpful in our work, I hereby request that all who can, meet in the U. P. church, Boston, at 10 A. M. Dec. 9th, to consider the wisdom of incorporating the N. E. C. A., according to the laws of the State of Massachusetts.

We have given some thought to this matter and will state a few reasons why an incorporation would be helpful:

1. It would give legal existence to the Association, which must otherwise remain unknown in judicial proceedings.

2. It would be accepted by the public as evidence of permanence and an intention to conduct business upon a responsible basis.

3. It would encourage individuals and churches, favorably disposed, to put the Association's work on the list of home missions, to receive regular contributions.

4. It would facilitate negotiations for funds, and enable the Association to accept trusts and bequests in aid of its work.

5. It would give legal competency to hold so much real estate and other appliances as are necessary in the prosecution of its work.

The importance of having a local habitation becomes more and more apparent as the work advances, and the efforts of the opposition to checkmate our movement and hedge up every way and close every church door possible against it, is revealed in the results of their underhanded methods. Let us seek heavenly wisdom and come together in the spirit of the Master, in the full assurance that ultimately the "will of God will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

"PRAY WITHOUT CEASING."

"It is time to seek the Lord," and cry mightily unto God for the deliverance of his church from the grasp of the secret lodge.

We cordially invite friends in New England and everywhere to unite with us in special prayer, on Sabbath, Dec. 6, for the baptism of the Holy Spirit on our annual meeting, Dec. 9th and 10th. Remember the word of our Lord, "Without me ye can do nothing."

A light lunch will be served in the vestry at the annual meeting noon and evening, for those from out of town. All who desire entertainment for the night will please send their names to Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, 218 Columbus avenue, Boston. Tremont St. and Columbus Ave. cars cross Berkeley street, a couple of blocks from the church. J. A. CONANT, Pres.

E. E. FLAGG, Secretary.

THE HOME.

STORM THE FORT.

["Hold the Fort" is out of date—"Storm the Fort" is in order."—A. C. Dixon at Y. P. S. C. E. Convention, Utica.]

Up, ye soldiers, to the battle,
For the foe is strong;
In our hearts the strength of Jesus,
On our lips a song.

CHORUS: "Storm the fort, for I am with you!"
Hear our Leader's shout,
"Up, my soldiers, drive the fœmen
From their ramparts out!"

Storm the fort! No time for wailing—
Wailing will not win;
Firm within their ramparts shielded
Are the hosts of sin.

Storm the fort! For in its dungeons
Many captives pine!
For the love of men, our brethren,
Forward, all the line!

Storm the fort! Though bayonets bristle,
Cannon threaten grim,
Christ's own strength is in his soldiers
When they fight for him.

Storm the fort! The end is certain,
Sharp though be the fight,
Victory shall crown our banner—
God is for the right.

—Rev. P. W. Crannell, of Baldwinville, N. Y., in Christian Inquirer.

THE CONDITIONS OF EFFECTUAL PRAYER.

"And all things, whatsoever ye believe," etc. Have we not sometimes been tempted to think that here, at least, is a case in which our Lord has not literally and always kept his word? in which we do not get quite so much as the plain English of the promise might lead us to expect? If so, well may he say to us, "Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures, neither the power of God?" If we had known the Scriptures by searching, we might have known more of the power of God by experience in this matter; for this is no unconditional promise. This marvelous "Whatsoever" depends upon five great conditions, and if we honestly examine we shall find that every case of seeming failure in the promise can be accounted for by our own failure in one or more of these:

1. "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do." Really, not verbally only, in the name of Jesus; asking not in our own name at all; signing our petition, as it were, with his name only; coming to the Father by our Advocate, our Representative. Do we always ask this?

2. "Believing that ye shall receive." The faith-heroes of old "through faith... obtained promises," and there is no new way of obtaining them. Is it any wonder that, when we stagger at any promise of God through unbelief, we do not receive it? Not that the faith merits the answer, or it any way earns it or works it out, but God has made believing a condition of receiving, and the Giver has a sovereign right to choose his own terms of gift.

3. "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Ah, here is a deeper secret of asking and not having, because we ask amiss. Not, have we come to Christ, but are we abiding in him; not, do we hear his words, but are they abiding in us? Can we put in this claim to the glorious "Whatsoever?" And if not, why not, for this is his commandment, "Abide in me." And this leads us to see the root of our failure in another condition.

4. "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight." Only as we are abiding in him can we bring forth the fruit of obedience, for without (apart from) him we can do nothing; only in walking by faith can we do those things that are pleasing in his sight; for without faith it is impossible to please him.

5. "If we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us." When what we ask is founded on a promise or any written evidence of what the will of the Lord is, this is comfortingly clear. But what about petitions which may or may not be according to his will? Surely, then, the condition can only be fulfilled by a complete blending of our own will with his; by his so taking our will, so our undertaking it and influencing it for us that we are led to desire and ask the very thing he is purposing to give. Then, of course, our prayer is answered, and the very pressure of spirit to pray becomes the pledge and earnest of the answer, for it is the working of his will in us.

Two comforting thoughts arise: first, the very consciousness of our failure in these conditions shows us the wonderful kindness and mercy of our King, who has answered so many a prayer in spite of it, according to his own heart, and not according to our fulfillment, giving us of his royal bounty that to which we had forfeited all shadow of claim; secondly, that he who knoweth our frame knows also the possibilities of his grace, and would never tantalize us by offering magnificent gifts on impossible conditions. Will he give him a stone? Would you? Therefore the very annexing of these intrinsically most blessed conditions implies that his grace is sufficient for their fulfillment, and should lure us on to a blessed life of faith, abiding in Jesus, walking in obedience unto all pleasing, and a will possessed of his own divine will.—Frances Ridley Havergal.

"AVENGE NOT YOURSELVES."

An Eastern story tells of the haughty favorite of an Oriental monarch who, as he was passing, threw a stone at a poor dervish or priest. The dervish did not dare to throw it back at the man who had assaulted him, for he knew the favorite was very powerful. So he picked up the stone and put it carefully in his pocket, saying to himself: "The time for revenge will come by-and-by, and then I will repay him for it." Not long afterward, this same dervish, as he was walking in one of the streets of the city, saw a great crowd coming toward him. He hastened to see what was the matter, and found, to his astonishment, that his enemy, the favorite, who had fallen into disgrace with the king, was being paraded through the principal streets on a camel, exposed to the jests and insults of the populace. The dervish, seeing all this, hastily grasped at the stone which he carried in his pocket, saying to himself: "The time for my revenge has come, and I will repay him for his insulting conduct." But, after considering a moment, he threw the stone away, saying, "The time for revenge never comes; for if our enemy is powerful, revenge is dangerous as well as foolish, and if he is weak and wretched, then revenge is worse than foolish; it is mean and cruel. And in all cases it is forbidden and wicked."

"POOR OLD CAP."

The following is a true story of Florence Nightingale when a little girl:

When Florence Nightingale was a very little girl, and living in Derbyshire, England, everybody was struck with her thoughtfulness for people and animals. She even made friends with the shy squirrels. When persons were ill, she would help to nurse them, saving nice things from her own meals for them.

There lived near the village an old shepherd named Roger, who had a favorite sheep dog named Cap. This dog was the old man's only companion, and helped in looking after the flock by day, and kept him company at night. Cap was a very sensible dog, and kept the sheep in such good order that he saved his master a deal of trouble.

One day Florence was riding out with a friend, and saw the shepherd giving the sheep their nightly feed. But Cap was not there, and the sheep knew it, for they were scampering about in all directions. Florence and her friend stopped to ask Roger what had become of his dog.

"Oh," he replied, "Cap will never be of any more use to me. I shall have to hang him, poor fellow, as soon as I go home to-night."

"Hang him!" said Florence. "O, Roger, how wicked of you! What has poor Cap done?"

"He has not done anything," replied Roger; "but he will never be of any more use to me, and I cannot afford to keep him. One of the mischievous schoolboys threw a stone at him yesterday, and broke one of his legs." And the old shepherd wiped away the tears which filled his eyes. "Poor Cap," he said; "he was knowing as a human being."

"But are you sure his leg is broken?" asked Florence.

"Oh, yes, miss; it is broken, sure enough. He has not put his foot to the ground since."

Then Florence and her friend rode on.

"We will go and see poor Cap," said the gentleman. "I don't believe the leg is really broken. It would take a big stone and a hard blow to break the leg of a great dog like Cap."

"Oh, if you could only cure him, how glad Roger would be!" exclaimed Florence.

When they got to the cottage, the dog lay on the bare brick floor. His eyes sparkled with anger at the intruders. But when the little girl called him "poor Cap," he grew pacified, and began to wag his short tail. Then he crept from under the table, and lay down at her feet. She took hold of one of his paws, patted his rough head, and talked to him, while the gentleman examined the injured leg. It was badly swollen, and to have it examined hurt him very much; but the dog knew it was meant kindly, and though he moaned and winced with pain, licked the hands that were hurting him.

"It's only a bad bruise; no bones broken," said the gentleman. "Rest is all that Cap needs; he will soon be well again."

"I am so glad!" exclaimed Florence. "But can we do nothing for him? He seems in such pain."

"Plenty of hot water to foment the part would both ease and help to cure him."

"Well, then," said the girl, "I will foment poor Cap's leg."

Florence lighted the fire, and tore up an old flannel petticoat into strips, which she wrung out in hot water and laid on the dog's bruise. It was not long before he began to feel the benefit of the application; and to show his gratitude in looks and by wagging his tail. On their way home they met the old shepherd coming slowly along with a piece of rope in his hands.

"O, Roger!" cried Florence, "you are not to hang poor old Cap. We have found that his leg is not broken, after all."

"No, he will serve you yet," said the gentleman.

"Well, I am glad to hear it," said the old man; "and many thanks to you for going to see him."

The next morning Florence was up early to bathe Cap. She found the swelling much gone down. She bathed it again, and Cap was grateful as before.

Two or three days later, when Florence and her friend were riding together they came up to Roger and his sheep. Cap was there, too, watching the sheep. When he heard the voice of the little girl his tail wagged and his eyes sparkled.

"Do look at the dog, miss," said the shepherd; "he's so pleased to hear your voice. But for you I should have hanged the best dog I ever had in my life."

This is a true story. It happened many years ago, and is now told, with pleasure, of that lady who, in later years, grew up to be the kind, brave woman who nursed so many soldiers through the Crimean war, and has done so many other things for the poor and suffering wherever she could.

A LITTLE FOX.

It was in a Sabbath-school, among a large number of little children, that I saw one of the "little foxes that spoil the vines," and I thought I should like very much to catch it. Just think of it, children, a sly, cunning little fox running loose right in your midst. I want you to help me capture it. I wonder if you ever saw it? It often gets in among the large children, and even troubles the grown people, but I think if the small boys and girls will help to take care of it, we can keep it away when they get older.

I will tell you how it acted. It came with a nice-looking boy. Somehow the little fellow did not seem to know that he had any such little fox with him. He didn't think about it. And right here I want to tell you that if you help to catch it, you must not look at any other boy or girl, but simply keep watch of yourself.

The boy who had this fox in the first place, did not know anything about the lesson, and he did not act as if he wanted to learn. He turned this way and that way, and once or twice tried to put his hat on. The little fox he carried began to bother another boy, who was near him, so that the teacher was troubled, and the fruit of the lesson seemed to be all eaten up by the fox.

I wondered if there would be anything left to take home.

There were a good many other things that it did, but if you watch you will find out all about it for yourselves. Perhaps if I tell you its name you can catch it right away and stop the harm it is doing.

It is thoughtlessness. A long name for a little fox, but you will all know what it means.

Do try and see if you cannot keep it from going with you to any place.

Think about things, and that will put away the little fox and keep it from spoiling the good fruit you may have in your lives.—Selected.

At the closing session of the W. C. T. U. Convention in Boston, recently, the following was adopted: That this convention, representing a paid-up membership of 150,000 women, through its general officers memorializes Congress to ratify the treaty submitted by the Brussels conference of nations proposing the exclusion of intoxicating liquors and the abolition of the slave trade from large portions of Africa. To pass the bill introduced at the request of the W. C. T. U. for a commission composed of both men and women to investigate the social vice. To pass the bill reported favorably last year, providing for a commission of inquiry on the alcoholic liquor traffic; also that women be appointed upon such committee. To provide for separate buildings for men and women prisoners in the Indian Territory. To settle all difficulties within our borders or with other nations by arbitration; and we also memorialize the World's Fair commissioners to close the gates on Sunday and to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors upon the grounds. All honor to these brave women for these expressions! Now let the Christians of the country aid them in carrying out these measures.

The Barley Syndicate of Chicago, has purchased 250,000 acres of land in North Dakota, on which it is proposed to place German farmers, to raise barley for malting. The immigrants will be owners and not tenants, it being proposed to sell the lands to them on easy terms. The crops will be bought by the company.

THE SONG OF THE ANGELS.

(Luke 15: 10.)

When a soul, with grief distressed,
By its weight of guilt oppress'd,
Bows in prayer, for pardon pleads,
And his cries the Saviour heeds,
Angels pause the sight to view,
Strike their golden harps anew.

CHORUS: Hark! what music thrills the skies,
When a soul for mercy cries!
All the courts of glory ring
With the songs that angels sing.

When the Lord the guilty spares;
Hears the contrite sinner's prayers;
Speeds the sinking one to save;
Breaks the bonds that bind the slave;
Far resounds the joyful song
Sung by heaven's angelic throng.

"Spread the tidings all around,"
Angels shout, "The lost is found!
Christ has rescued, cleansed and saved
Precious souls by sin depraved!
Seraphs, sing! with rapture sing
Alleluias to your King!"

TEMPERANCE.

THE WOMEN'S PLEDGE.

At the recent "first meeting of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union," held in Faneuil Hall, Boston, a declaration of the principles in the nature of a pledge, binding the members to work for the ends of the Union and asking all others to make common cause against liquors and narcotics, was adopted. The preamble of the declaration is as follows:

"In the love of God and humanity, we, representing the Christian women of the world, band ourselves together with the solemn conviction that our united faith and works will, with God's blessing, prove successful in creating a strong public sentiment in favor of personal purity of life, including total abstinence from the use of all narcotic poisons, the protection of the home by the outlawing of the traffic in alcoholic liquors, opium, tobacco and impurity, the suppression by law of gambling and Sabbath desecration, the enfranchisement of the women of all nations and the establishment of courts of national and international arbitration, which shall banish war from the world."

A plan of work throughout the world was approved. It includes a provision for a half dozen Christian Temperance missionaries in foreign lands. A half cent per annum is to be paid by the members throughout the world for the support of these missionaries and the maintenance of the work for the wide world.

The convention earnestly requested the Board of Managers of the Columbian Exposition to prohibit the sale of liquor on the grounds at any time, to close the gates on the Sabbath and to require purity of art in the exhibitions.

JERRY SIMPSON AND PROHIBITION.

A prohibitionist recently asked the Hon. Jerry Simpson, of the People's party, the following questions. His answers show that he is for prohibition, only he is not working at it much these days:

"But, Mr. Simpson, would not the prohibition of the liquor traffic remove one of the great economic burdens of the people?"

"Well, this is what I tell my prohibition friends about that. They tell us that we spend $900,000,000 for liquor yearly. They tell us that under prohibition this money will go into legitimate business. But competition is already so sharp in the chances of legitimate business that the poor man has no chance. And then what are you going to do with all the men who are engaged in the liquor business? They will have to go into competition with the other laboring men. For example, the prohibitionists tell us that this money and labor expended in liquor can be used making shoes for the barefooted. But what about those poor fellows who are now trying to make a living making shoes?"

"Mr. Simpson, do you think that prohibition will ever be adopted by the People's party?"

"Prohibition will never get into our platform. If they try to get prohibition in it at the next convention they will be so completely sat down upon that they will remember it. But I wish it understood that I am opposed to the liquor business. When a man drinks he demoralizes himself, and I am opposed to the drink habit."—Union Signal.

SAVING A DRUNKARD.

Edward Payson Weston, the once famous pedestrian, is living in England and working in the cause of temperance. In a recent address he related the following incident:

The other day I saw a man striking a woman outside a public house. I went up to him and said, "Don't be such a coward as to strike a woman—strike me." "I will, if you don't mind your own business." "Well, do it; but don't strike that woman. It's a manly thing to strike me, but it's cowardly to strike her."

He struck me, and was amazed that I didn't return it. "What!" he said, "you won't strike me back?" "No; but if you and your wife will come and take a cup of tea with me I shall be glad of your company."

We went into a coffee palace hard by and we had some tea. He said, "I don't know your name, but you've made me ashamed of myself. Will you shake hands?"

I said, "You need not be ashamed of anything you've done except striking that woman. Ask her to forgive you, and go home quietly with her, sign the pledge, and you'll be twice the man you were before."

That man has taken my advice, and his wife told me that although he was out of a situation then, he has got one to-day, and all is going on well with him and his home.—Exchange.

A VICE, NOT A DISEASE.

"Alcohol drinking is not a vice, but a disease," says Dr. Keeley. Therefore, some argue that it should be cured, not prohibited. There are several things wrong with this argument. Even if thirst for alcohol is produced by disease, still the disease is produced by a vice or by a vicious habit of drinking,—which causes the disease rather than the disease which causes the habit. The vice of drinking causes a disorder of the system, and that disorder creates a desire for more drink. Many vices cause diseases, which in turn increase in the vice. But do the vices therefore cease to be vices? The next thing wrong in the disease argument—we came near saying the diseased argument—is, that the main question is evaded entirely. Prohibitionists say nothing about prohibiting drinking. They wish to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor as a beverage. Full prohibition, of course, would interfere with drinking; but there is a great difference in the two questions. One from habit, or disease, may hunger for tainted meat. The law does not forbid him and his fellows gathering around a dish of carrion and eating to their heart's content. It is said that the flesh of crows, many days dead, is thus eaten by some. No law forbids it. Yet the law does forbid the butcher to sell any flesh the least tainted. So there may or may not be a law against drinking, and yet be a just law against selling liquor. The third great defect in the argument against prohibition is that the conclusion is not logical. The error is in the major premise, which is cunningly in some cases and ignorantly in other cases suppressed. "Drinking is a disease; therefore, drinking should be cured, and not prohibited," say our sophists. The full argument is this: "The spreading of no disease should be prohibited." But the spreading of disease is prohibited, and should be prohibited by law. Small-pox is not a vice. It is a disease. Yet the State has a right to prohibit the spreading of small-pox. Even if for some strange reason many persons wanted to have the small-pox, wishing to feel the delirium of its fever, or to be secure against future attacks, or to have their faces spotted and marked, yet the law would forbid one exposing for public sale garments which had been infected with the virus of small-pox. Because "drinking is a disease" is one good reason why the State should prohibit the sale of liquor, by which the awful disease is spread.—The Omaha (U. P.) Midland.

In a total poll of 176,000 votes in the city of Philadelphia, the Prohibition vote was 1,250, at the election on Tuesday of last week.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. At the sepulchre.—vs. 1-4. We must bear in mind that John, in his narrative of the resurrection, follows the same independent plan that characterizes his Gospel from its opening chapter. He tells what others omit, and the very seal of truth is in these graphic touches. "Very early;" "while it was yet dark." Mary and these other devoted women could not wait for the daylight before they were on their way to the sepulchre with their balms and spices for a dead Christ. No thought of a risen Saviour seems to have dawned upon their minds. Possibly they had not heard his words to the disciples, that he would rise again. It is noticeable that the very thing which would have filled Mary's heart with joy unspeakable, had she understood what it meant—the stone taken away from the sepulchre—filled her instead with fears and misgivings. How often this is repeated in the experience of those who have been brought out of the errors of Romanism, when they first begin to see the light. All the Christ they have known has been a dead Christ, wrapped in the grave-clothes of tradition and priestly fable; and when the stone is taken away, and they see that they have been bringing their balms and spices to an empty tomb, is it strange that their first feeling is so frequently one of bewilderment and terror? "They have taken away my Lord and I know not where they laid him."

2. Two types of character.—vs. 5-10. John and Peter were the Mary and Martha of their sex. Peter, active and stirring, went at once into the tomb and examined for himself; while John, deterred, we know not by exactly what feelings, would not go in until he had heard Peter's report. Then, in the simple but sublime words of the record before us, "went in also that other disciple which came first to the sepulchre, and he saw and believed." The evidence of those empty grave clothes, and the careful way in which the napkin had been folded up and laid away in a place by itself, was enough for John without any vision of angels to tell him the Lord had arisen. Blessed faith! Is not here a lesson, that when our religious life seems empty, and the routine of church services does not satisfy us, it is a sign that we have been making them the grave-clothes of a dead Christ. Well for us when we do find them empty, if it sets us to searching for the risen One. Mere forms and doctrines may serve to wrap a dead Saviour, but just as soon as our souls begin to long for his living presence, we shall find that those swaddling bands will burst. They can no longer hold him. "For as yet they knew not the Scriptures." Not that they had not often read the Scriptures, or at least heard them read every Sabbath-day from the synagogue, but they had failed to grasp their hidden meaning. This was partly the fault of their religious teachers, who, blind themselves, tried to keep the whole mass of the people in darkness; but we must not forget that it was partly their own fault, or why the rebuke, "O fools, and slow of heart," from the lips of him who never condemned unjustly? Doubtless the ministry are largely responsible for the blindness which generally prevails on many points of prophecy, especially as regards the Lord's second coming; but this does not free us from our own personal responsibility. The disciples had their Master's solemn word that he should rise again, but they were unbelieving; so we have his equally solemn assurance that he will come again to his waiting church; and though he seems to tarry long, what excuse have we for not studying the Scriptures which tell us of the manner and time of his appearing, and thus being able to answer for ourselves the argument of the scoffer, even in ministerial ranks, who asks sneeringly, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

3. Mary and the risen Christ.—vs. 11-18. Mary's grief had taken such complete possession of her that even the angels were not recognized as such by her tear-filled eyes. This, however, does not seem so extraordinary as her failing to recognize Jesus. Perhaps the dawn had as yet hardly penetrated the dim shadows of the garden, and perhaps, like the disciples at Emmaus, her "eyes were holden." What a rapture of joy must have thrilled her sad heart at that word, "Mary!" We can only dimly imagine it, and yet is it not a blessed thought that joy like this awaits every Christian's heart in the first moment of meeting with his Redeemer on the other side? For, just as we have here our own individual communion with the Master and our personal call to his service, so it will be there. And perhaps it will be a joy even more perfect, more unalloyed, than hers. For Mary had to be reminded of their changed relations. "Touch me not," must have made her conscious at once that she was to know him no more after the flesh, but must take her place with the future generations of believers who can only know him by spiritual apprehension. But in heaven all bars to perfect communion will be taken away. "My Father and your Father; my God and your God." If he is not ashamed to call us brethren, shall we then be ashamed of him or of his cross?

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

ASSOCIATE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The membership of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian church of the South, as reported to its late Synod, is 9,899. The Associate Reformed Presbyterian states that if full statistics had been received, the number would have been at least 10,000.

BAPTIST.

—Dr. R. S. Storrs has just completed the forty fifth year of his service as pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn, N. Y. As he is in robust health, and has only within a few weeks passed his seventieth year, there is reason to believe that he may round out the full half-century. The pastorate of Dr. Storrs' father at Braintree, Mass., ran on to a period of sixty-five years.

—The restored building of the Immanuel Baptist church, Chicago, will be opened with appropriate services on Sunday, Dec. 6. The new pastor, Rev. O. P. Gifford, will be present, and the occasion one of joy and gladness. Mr. B. A. Robinson, formerly of Boston, now of the Immanuel church, Chicago, is organizing a chorus choir, expecting to enroll seventy or eighty persons, to be ready for the re-opening of the church in December. This is in accordance with the desire of Rev. O. P. Gifford, the new pastor.

—The London Baptist Social Union has indorsed the proposition to hold an ecumenical conference in Chicago in 1893. The effect of such a conference would no doubt be helpful in the direction of church federation.

CHRISTIAN.

—The first term of the thirty-second session of Butler University is now far enough advanced to admit of a safe judgment as to the year's work. The prospect is gratifying. The attendance shows a decided increase over former years. The faculty has been strengthened by changes and additions, and the curriculum extended. The standard of the school is being constantly moved forward, in order that it shall not be surpassed in the thoroughness and excellence of its work.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—The Mills union meetings in Chicago have continued, with constantly increasing power and evident results. The meetings on Sunday week in the Third Presbyterian church were of very extraordinary impressiveness. Mr. Mills held his last service here Thursday afternoon—a true Thanksgiving service. It is believed that all the churches in Chicago will feel in some marked degree the effects of this great religious awakening in the churches on the West Side.

—Mr. Mackennal declines the Secretariat of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. The reason assigned is the difficulty of withdrawing from his church engagements.

—Nebraska has now 329 Christian Endeavor Societies, with a membership of 10,100, an increase during the year of more than double, both in societies and membership, representing the following denominations: Methodists, 23; Congregationalists, 91; United Presbyterian, 4; Presbyterian, 56; Baptist, 16; Church of Christ, 42; Lutheran, 10; Union, 38; denominations not reported, 46.

—The fiftieth Congregational church in Chicago was organized on Sunday week. It is located at 1010 East Fifty-first street, and is to be called the Washington Park church. Rev. Sylvester Fisher, who has built up the church, was elected pastor, and the new organization begins with twenty-one members.

LUTHERAN.

—Luther's doctrine is preached in Minnesota in the German, Norwegian, Danish, Swedish, Finnish, Icelandic, and Bohemian languages. Where is the English?—Lutherischer Anzeiger.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—Methodist college presidents to the number of eighteen were in session recently at Cleveland, Ohio, and effected an organization. The burden of the meeting was to make sentiment in favor of methodizing the educational development and of establishing some sort of unit by which the grade of a school may be determined.

—At the twenty-second annual meeting of the executive board of the woman's foreign missionary society, held in Kansas City Oct. 28, 29, Mrs. M. S. Huston was elected president for the ensuing year, and Mrs. J. T. Gracey, secretary, a position she has ably filled for many years. Reports show the total receipts of the year to have been $263,620.69 as against $220,329.96 last year. There are 5,481 organizations with 143,169 members, a decrease of 79 organizations, and a gain of 5,019 members. The society supports 120 missionaries, 101 in foreign fields, and 19 at home on leave of absence. The work shows a steady progress, and interest in it increases.

—Centenary church, Chicago, H. W. Bolton, D.D., pastor, and Thomas Westerdale, assistant, has had a period of unprecedented prosperity since the last session of conference. During October seventy-eight were received by certificate and twenty-three on probation. From Nov. 1 to 22 special meetings have been held by evangelists Potter and Miller, assisted by Dr. Kean and J. P. Hillis for a few days. There have been 250 seekers at the altar, most of whom were happily converted.

—The late Hon. John T. Wilson of Tranquillity, Ohio, bequeathed $5,000 to the Elizabeth Gamble deaconess home at Cincinnati; $10,000 to the missionary society; $5,000 for Southern educational work, and $5,000 to Ohio Wesleyan University.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—The New York presbytery discussed the proposed revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith at its recent session, and a report was formulated to be transmitted to the General Assembly. An amendment struck out the changes made in the chapter on Free Will by the Detroit General Assembly. The fore-ordination doctrine was opposed by Dr. Van Dyke, and a majority voted for a shorter and a simpler creed. A proposed modification of chapter 25 was also secured. One committee wanted "mankind" substituted for "the elect," but agreed to "the children of God." The presbytery was not willing to recede from the historic view of "monastic vows," which will remain, as heretofore, "superstitions and sinful snares." A minority report will be presented to the General Assembly.

SALVATION ARMY.

—The Salvation Army has had another week of self-denial. The first summed up $25,000. In 1889 week the sum total was $100,000. Last year the amount was $150,000, and this year bids fair to be $250,000.

—Salvation Army officials recently accepted plans for a large temple, which will be erected in New York City next spring as a memorial to Mrs. Gen. Booth. In its national headquarters will be located. The site is not definitely determined. The estimated cost of the building complete will be about $200,000.

—General Booth, of the Salvation Army, has reached Australia in his tour of inspection. As a result of his appeals there he has received $50,000 for his work in England. The General is certainly a great money raiser.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

—The Fourth International Sunday-school Lessons Committee met in its first regular session in New York City, Wednesday, Nov. 11, remaining in session two and a half days. The committee arranged a general outline for the work for the six years for which it is to serve, and selected the lessons for one year, 1894. Two and a half years of the term are to be given to studies in the Old Testament Scriptures and three and a half years to the New. The plan of selection will vary somewhat from that of previous courses, one whole year being set apart for a chronological study of the life of Jesus as presented in the four Gospels. The studies for the first half of the year 1894 will be in the Old Testament. The chronological studies in the life of Jesus will then begin in July and be carried through to June, 1895. It was also decided to recognize so much of the church year as to provide special lessons each year for Easter and Christmas. The term is to extend through six years, instead of seven, as in the three previous courses, in accordance with the recommendation of the International Sunday-school Convention, at Pittsburg, in June, 1890.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Presbytery of New York has made a net gain of 582 church members in three years, or a net gain of twenty-five per cent, and this, notwithstanding some of our congregations were vacant for some time, and the rolls had been carefully but deeply cut down. All but two congregations are settled, and so far as known, the congregations are in peace and harmony.

—Special services were held by the Englewood, Chicago, congregation from Nov. 8 to 15, under the leadership of Rev. J. D. Rankin. He spoke each evening to a crowded house, and the interest manifested was remarkable. At the communion, Nov. 15, twenty-one members (six by profession) were publicly welcomed by Mr. Rankin into the church. United Presbyterianism was never more talked about or more popular in Chicago.

HOME AND HEALTH.

HOW TO REST.

In addition to the night's sleep, it is a good plan to take a short nap in the middle of the day. It divides the working time, gives the nervous system a fresh hold on life, and enables one to more than make up for the time so occupied. It is well to guard against too long a sleep at such a time, since that is apt to produce disagreeable relaxation. There has been much discussion regarding the after-dinner nap. Many believe it to be injurious; but it is, nevertheless, natural and wholesome.

Much can be accomplished in the way of resting, otherwise than in sleep. It is very important to economize the opportunities for rest during working hours in the day. The great principle that underlies daily rest is relieving one part of the organization from duty while the others are at work. This can be done to a great extent.

When the muscles are tired and worn from mechanical work that requires but little attention of the brain, stop motion and set the brain at work. The laborer can read, think and speak while his limbs are at rest. His brain need not be idle because the hammer or chisel has dropped from his weary hand. On the other hand, a man can work with his hands when his head is tired. The book-keeper, whose head is weary with business facts and figures by 5 o'clock in the afternoon, has considerable time in the evening to sing, play, dig in the garden, or black his boots, all or either of which he may do while his head is partly at rest.

There is another very important way of obtaining rest mentally; that is by changing from one occupation to another. The dexterous gold-beater, when he finds one arm getting tired, takes the hammer in the other; and so may the man that hammers thoughts out of his brain exercise one set of mental functions while the others are at rest. One may read until tired, and then write; may acquire knowledge until weary, and then teach it to others.—Medical Age.

THE SECRET OF HEALTH.

Don't worry.
Don't hurry. "Too swift arrives as tardy as too slow."
"Simplify!" "simplify!" "simplify!"
Don't overeat. Don't starve. "Let your moderation be known to all men."
Court the fresh air day and night.
"Oh, if you knew what was in the air."
Sleep and rest abundantly. Sleep is nature's benediction.
Spend less nervous energy each day than you make.
Be cheerful. "A light heart lives long."
Think only healthful thoughts. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so he is."
"Seek peace and pursue it."
"Work like a man; but don't be worked to death."
Avoid passion and excitement. A moment's anger may be fatal.
Associate with healthy people. Health is contagious as well as disease.
"Don't carry the whole world on your shoulders, far less the universe. Trust the eternal."
Never despair. "Lost hope is a fatal disease."
"If you know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."—The Laws of Life.

HEALTH RESORTS.

The American Health Resort Association has sent a physician to New Mexico, to select a site for its sanitarium for the curing of consumptives by fresh air and sunshine. The late convention of doctors in Chicago decided that the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, with its great altitude, dry, pure air, and perpetual sunshine, was the most favorable spot in the world for people with lung troubles.

PRACTICAL HINTS,

Fruit Cookies.—Two cups of sugar, one of butter, two of chopped raisins, two eggs, two tablespoonfuls of sour milk, two teaspoonfuls of cinnamon, one teaspoonful of nutmeg, cloves and soda. Bake same as other cookies.
Corks steeped in vaseline are excellent substitutes for glass stoppers. They are not affected by acids and never become fixed through disuse.

Oyster shells are good to clean the fire-brick of the stove. Lay a number of them on top of the hot coals, and when the fire burns down it will be found that all the clinkers have scaled off the bricks.

Hot milk is recommended by a medical journal as an excellent substitute for beer, whisky or other alcoholic stimulants, in cases of great fatigue and over-exertion of body and mind. Its reviving influence, when taken as hot as can be sipped, is remarkable. Its effect is promptly felt and lasting.

A simple cement for broken china or earthenware is made of powdered quick-lime sifted through a coarse muslin bag over the white of an egg.

Instead of putting food into the oven to keep hot for late comers, try covering it closely with a tin and setting it over a basin of hot water. This plan will keep the food hot, and at the same time prevent it from drying.

To restore, thicken, and give you a luxuriant growth of hair, to keep its color natural as in youth, and to remove dandruff, use only Hall's Hair Renewer.

Sermon on Masonry. By Rev. J. Day Brownlee. In reply to a Masonic Oration by Rev. Dr. Mayer, Wellsville, Ohio. 5 cents each

HE Missed his Opportunity! DON'T Miss Yours, Reader. The majority neglect their opportunities, and from that cause live in poverty and die in obscurity! Harrowing despair is the lot of many, as they look back on lost, forever lost, opportunity. Life is passing! Reach out. Be up and doing. Improve your opportunity, and secure prosperity, prominence, peace. It was said by a philosopher, that "the Goddess of Fortune offers a golden opportunity to each person at some period of life; embrace the chance, and she pours out her riches; fail to do so and she departs, never to return." How shall you find the golden opportunity? Investigate every chance that appears worthy, and of fair promise; that is what all successful men do. Here is an opportunity, such as is not often within the reach of laboring people. Improved, it will give, at least, a grand start in life. The golden opportunity for many is here. Money to be made rapidly and honorably by any industrious person of either sex. All ages. You can do the work and live at home, wherever you are. Even beginners are easily earning from $5 to $10 per day. You can do as well if you will work, not too hard, but industriously; and you can increase your income as you go on. You can give spare time only, or all your time to the work. Easy to learn. Capital not required. We start you. All is comparatively new and really wonderful. We instruct and show you how, free. Failure unknown among our workers. No room to explain here. Write and learn all free, by return mail. Unwilling to delay. Address at once, H. Hallett & Co., Box 1750, Portland, Maine.

Faded, jaded, tired, overworked women—weak, nervous, delicate and suffering ones. These are the women who are helped to health and strength by Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It's a legitimate medicine, that corrects and cures; a tonic that invigorates and builds up; a nerve that soothes and strengthens. And if it doesn't do what its makers claim for it, they don't want your money.

For all the functional derangements, painful disorders, and chronic weaknesses that afflict womankind, the "Prescription" is a safe and certain remedy—a guaranteed one. In "female complaints" of every nature, periodical pains, internal inflammation and ulceration, leucorrhoea, and all kindred ailments—if it fails to benefit or cure, you have your money back.

No other medicine for women is sold on such trying terms. If any could be, you may be sure that it would be. Is something else which pays the dealer better, likely to be "just as good?"

FARM NOTES.

POULTRY PICKINGS.

When turkeys are kept confined they need heavy feeding.

Yellow dropping often means indigestion rather than cholera.

Young chickens will eat wheat very readily when two weeks old.

The best turkeys for breeding are those that are two years old.

A good dust bath gives the fowls a chance to clear themselves of lice.

Sulphur and tobacco burned in the poultry house will rid it of red lice.

Cooked food fattens rapidly; one reason for this is that it is easily digested.

If the hens are expected to lay regularly during the winter the quarters must be so warm that water will not freeze.

During the winter, if comfortable quarters are provided, the laying hens should have a good feed of wheat daily. There is nothing better for eggs.

Turpentine and sulphur given in the food when the weather is damp is one of the cheapest and best preventatives of gapes. Keep the fowls dry after giving sulphur.—St. Louis Republic.

BRIEFS.

There are on many farms good deposits of muck that may be carted upon the poor uplands to advantage; some of them contain a large percentage of nitrogen, but it is usually in such combinations that it is only very slowly absorbed by plants, and the benefit consequently lasts for many years. This peculiarity of muck adapts it for use in heavy dressings upon land to be seeded down to grass, or when it is desired to enrich the soil for other permanent crops, such as orchards, etc.

The October report of the Department of Agriculture relates to yield per acre of grain, and condition of corn, potatoes, buckwheat and tobacco. The estimated average yields are: Wheat, 15 bushels; oats, 29.3; barley, 25.8; rye, 14.4. The condition of the corn crop is 92.5; buckwheat, 92.7; potatoes, 91.3; tobacco, 93.8. The yield of wheat in threshing has in most districts proved higher than the apparent condition of the crop at harvesting would indicate.

Respecting the wood-lot: there is always more or less dead or decaying wood there that should be cut before cutting good sound wood, and when we get to the latter, we should study to take out first those trees which, to speak metaphorically, offend most their brothers.

It has long been the practice of the best farmers in Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio to alternate their grain crops with clover; the clover occupying the land one or two years in a rotation of three or five years.

The beneficial effects of a clover sod are not confined to the nitrogen it contains; the mechanical effect in loosening the soil, especially heavy soils, is an important item, and it also serves as a mulch in retaining moisture in time of drought.

Too much praise cannot be given to the manner of working roads with road machines. They give a uniform width to the beaten track, and whatever the kind of soil, it becomes hard after being traveled on.

One of the most silly things a farmer can do is to try to grow crops at a profit with a scant supply of manure, or, as some do, with none at all.

The London Times says the crops are the worst in years and give no chance to the farmers to recoup themselves for recent losses by improved crops of this year.

The yield of winter wheat in Kansas, as returned by threshers, is 56,106,750 bushels; of spring wheat, 2,202,869 bushels. Total for the State, 58,309,619 bushels.

If corn is to stand in the crib for some time the silk as well as the husk should be taken off.

If husking from shocks we do not think it pays to throw the corn in piles and then pick it up again. If you have work for the team "set" the wagon and

SHEEP NOTES.

It is not a matter of over-production at all, but of under-consumption. There is not too much wool grown in the world but not enough of it gets on the backs of the poor.

Wool is the consummate product of the sheep, the touchstone of quality. We cross mutton and get a good result, but we cannot cross wool, or, if we do, the result is abominable.

The Briton who breeds the Lincoln or the Leicester is as proud of his pure blood as the owner of the Merino, and resists just as stoutly any crossing with what he calls "broken breeds," or "mongrel breeds."

Lime and sulphur are the greatest enemies the American wool grower has to fight. If you want to help keep the standard of American wool below that of other wool-producing countries use lime and sulphur. May the day soon come when our wool growers will discard it. As an enemy it has wrought far more damage than the wolf or coyote.

Sheep are so nice in their tastes and preferences that a pasture of any considerable extent, especially if it has a diversity of soils and exposures, is apt to become patchy if left entirely to the sheep. They depasture it in irregular extent. A few young cattle with the sheep will give their attention to the north slope and the rank pasture spots while the sheep are grazing on the shorter feed.

NO LIME IN Royal Baking Powder

The ROYAL BAKING POWDER is made from Cream of Tartar specially refined and prepared for its use by patent processes by which the Tartrate of Lime is totally eliminated.

This highly important result has been attained only with great care, labor and expense. In money alone a half a million dollars has been invested in patents, machinery and appliances by which the crude Cream of Tartar, being procured direct from the wine districts of Europe, and subjected in this country to these exclusive processes, is rendered entirely free, not only from the objectionable Tartrate of Lime, but from other foreign substances.

This adds greatly to the cost of manufacturing ROYAL BAKING POWDER; but, as all its other ingredients are selected and prepared with the same precise care, and regardless of labor or expense, an article is produced that is entirely free from any extraneous substance, and pure in all respects. The ROYAL contains no ingredients except those certified by the most eminent chemists necessary to make a pure, wholesome and perfect Baking Powder.

It costs more to manufacture the Royal Baking Powder than any other; but it is, as shown by chemical analysis, the only "absolutely pure" Baking Powder made.

Mischief is evidently brewing in Italy. A secret papal consistory is to assemble at Rome on the 14th of this month, and we all know that whenever the Vatican resorts to secrecy, it bodes evil to something or somebody. Whether it is King Humbert's administration, or the American public school system, that is to be attacked, who can tell? The hierarchy antagonizes those secret societies that oppose its religious control, but does not hesitate to resort to secrecy when the interests of the Vatican demand it. And those interests are dreadfully one-sided affairs.

It is reported from Iowa that "the Democratic managers in this State will prevent, if possible, the repeal of the prohibitory liquor law by the Legislature, for the purpose of keeping alive the temperance issue in the Presidential campaign of 1892." State Senator Schmidt (Democrat) declares that he is opposed to voting for any Republican bill for the repeal of the Prohibition law, or for any bill that does not originate in a Democratic caucus. The report is that enough Republican members to secure its passage will stand ready to vote for a compromise license bill; and Senator Schmidt's declaration is the answer to this latter statement.

News from China reports an important revolt on the 18th of November, by two secret societies, named Tsinthan and Tsaili, against foreigners and Christians dwelling in the district of Tchayoyang, in Mongolia. According to estimates received at Paris, from 300 to 500 Christians, several native priests, a Mongolian prince, and some unconverted natives were massacred. Many churches were pillaged and burned, especially in two of the Mongolian towns. As soon as the Emperor learned of this outbreak, troops were dispatched to the scene of the revolt. An engagement between them and the rebels, November 25, resulted in the defeat of the latter, who were so severely punished that they fled to the mountains. The imperial troops, who suffered but little loss in the campaign, have been instructed to protect all religious establishments and prevent further massacres. These secret societies are composed of emigrants from China proper, and are a fruitful source of trouble in the Empire, by their malevolence towards foreigners who profess Christianity.

At the date of this issue of the Cynosure the State Convention of Anti-secrecy Reformers in Ohio has just closed, and the District Convention of New England is in session at Boston. It is, at the time of going to press, Tuesday morning, too early to report the work of either; but it is designed to print the proceedings of the Ohio Convention in our next number, and also to present a fair review of the progress of the cause in New England, where the signs of promise are, this winter, unusually encouraging. Most of the agents in the field have been actively employed for weeks in preparing for these conventions, and in disseminating the truth in various parts of the country. The Washington agent is now in New England.

On another page we print a synopsis of the proceedings of the convention of the Iowa State Association opposed to secret societies, which was held at Crawfordsville, Ia., last month. There seems to have been a lack of preliminary work performed in the interest of the convention, which would undoubtedly have increased both the attendance and interest in its deliberations; yet the spirit manifested was creditable to those who were present, and the resolutions adopted indicate an unfaltering trust in the aims of the Association, and a determination to press forward for greater and better results than have yet been accomplished in that State. Although it appears that no State agent was appointed by the convention, it is understood that Iowa will be quite thoroughly canvassed in behalf of the cause by volunteer workers.

The religious papers, as well as the more thoughtful of the secular journals, are awaking to the fact that crime and lawlessness are surely and rapidly increasing, and this statement is so frequently made that its truth is beginning to impress itself upon all the better classes of society. The cause of this increase of vice and criminality is also receiving wide-spread consideration, and it is rapidly becoming a most important problem. How shall we reach the sources of all this wickedness, and stay its devastating effects? Theologians and moralists are alike puzzled by the situation. Yet very few place a large portion of the blame where it really belongs—the ravages made by the secret lodges upon the strongholds of Christianity—the churches which are, or ought to be, in entire and perfect harmony with the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, but are not, because the influence of the Christless lodges has invaded them.

The record of a great national calamity like the recent tremendous earthquake, or series of earthquakes, in Japan, by which over 4,000 persons were killed and over 400,000 more were left homeless, and almost without clothing, appeals forcibly to the people of all other nations for their sympathy and material aid. The face of the entire district appears to have undergone remarkable changes, forming new lakes, elevations and depressions. It is now believed that the disaster was caused by the Fujiya Mountains slipping into caverns that had been previously and mysteriously formed in their vicinity. A section of the railroad from Tokio to Kijato, thirty miles in length, was nearly destroyed. On the 9th of November the earthquake was still in progress, 730 shocks having occurred within twenty hours, or more than two a minute. The strangest part of the disaster is found in an anonymous letter sent to the government, two months ago, in which a calamity was predicted to befall the nation on October 28, the very day on which the earthquake began. The letter is carefully preserved by the government. "God moves in a mysterious way," and holds the heavens and the earth in the hollow of his hands, even as he also holds there the destinies of our race. - Perhaps the world needs to be reminded of this occasionally, as Japan has been.

The man who does public work for God, in God's own way, will win popularity from God, and, through him, from his followers. Very often has this truth been manifested, as in the cases of Brainard, Payson, Spurgeon, Moody and many others, and is now forcibly brought to view in the letter which we print in another column from Rev. Amos Judson Bailey, of Ogden, Utah. For him God has surely opened the door for a mighty work among the Mormons, to preach the everlasting Gospel in their own places of worship, and given him grace to find favor in their sight. For the first time in the history of the Mormons in Utah have their pulpits been filled by a minister of another denomination, or their people heard, from a stranger's lips, the message of salvation preached in love. The world moves. The tabernacles of Ogden and Salt Lake City have now echoed the true Gospel of Jesus Christ, and its hearers have honored it and heartily welcomed its messenger.

"The saloon, brewing and distilling interests of Chicago are a majority in her government," we are told, "and she cannot free herself from them." We fear that this statement is too true. When we remember that 50,000 or more voters, whose legitimate and reputable business is done in Chicago, while they dwell outside the city limits and have no voice in its government, we have found one serious cause for the success of the saloon element in our municipal elections; but that is not the worst of it. We are told in the Declaration of Independence that "all governments are dependent upon the consent of the governed; and it would seem from the manner in which the city is ruled that the majority prefer whisky and beer to sobriety and good government. And as long as the reputable citizens who do live in the city prefer to vote for either of the political parties who foster the liquor interest, perhaps the suburban folks are not so much to blame after all for the existing condition of our political affairs. There is too much deathly apathy manifested on this subject.

A MASON'S EXPERIENCE—V.

BY JOSEPH HOPSON, OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

On Friday afternoon I received an order to attend at the quarters of my commanding officer, Lt. Col. C. M. G. Showers, who was also at the time in temporary command of the cantonment, at half-past six in the evening. I went a little before the time, to avoid the dusk, as I was apprehensive I might be waylaid and seized by the Freemasons, and for the same reason I took the precaution to take my sword. My mind, during the day, had been worked up to a high pitch of desperation, from the persuasion that nothing was likely to occur in my favor; that I would be completely deserted, and that the Freemasons might succeed in persuading my commanding officer to place me in their hands, when, however they might make away with me, they would find means to defeat the law and hush up the matter. I was accordingly resolved not to go to the lodge for any order or argument, and to resist to death.

After waiting some time at the commanding officer's quarters, I was called in. He asked me, in a kind and feeling tone, what had befallen me. I told him I had been initiated a Freemason, and that I had withdrawn from the institution as I found it to be of an anti-Christian character, and had given the Rev. Mr. Malkin an account of it, that he might make a report of it to the Society for the Suppression of Vice with a view to its suppression. He said he believed it to be a bad institution, and that it ought to be suppressed. He told me that I should not have gone to Mr. Malkin, and said, in a truly paternal tone, that whatever troubles or difficulties I might get into at any time he was the person I should apply to for relief. I excused myself by saying that as it was not a military matter it did not occur to me as proper to me to bring it to his notice. He, in a most kind and paternal manner, cautioned me to do so in future. I promised to do so. He then asked me if I would attend at the lodge that evening; that a person had written to him to send me. Under the impression of my previous resolution, I said I would not go. "Hopson," said he, "I don't want to force you to go; I merely want to know your sentiments on the subject—whether you are willing to go or not—that I may send an answer to the person that wrote to me about you. I was thus made sensible how rude it was of me to give him such an abrupt and unqualified answer, and made amends by saying, in as soft a manner as I could command, that I did not wish to go. "Very well," said he, "go home to your quarters and keep yourself quiet, and I will send an answer to him that wrote to me." I thanked him, saluted him and came away.

On my way home I was met by riding master Sergeant Sellers, who had come purposely to escort me home, having a dirk concealed in his bosom. We reached home in safety, for a party that had been sent to seize me and take me by force to the lodge had come to our lines by another road, the lower (or Ulsoor) road. I had just laid by my sword and had come out of my room to give my comrades an account of my interview with the colonel, when one of them gave me notice that some of the Masons were coming. I looked in the direction he pointed to and saw Beswick, followed by two men of the Royals in Masonic dresses, namely, white jackets, waistcoats, and trousers. My comrades, from some unaccountable cause, left me, and Beswick, seeing me alone, called out to those behind him: "Aye, this is he; come on." He had been at the lodge, and had been worked into a frenzy; he was perfectly frantic. The others were more cool, and I could see that the brethren had made him their tool and had charged him with the conduct of the present mission. As he came near me, he said loudly: "We are ordered to take you to the lodge." I answered: "I will not go; you can have no order to that effect. I am just returned from the colonel's, and he gave me no such order." He said: "We have an order from Captain Gregory." Captain Gregory was commissary of ordnance and the senior officer of artillery, and was among the Freemasons. "We have an order from Captain Gregory," said he, "and you must come." At the same time he told the two men to take hold of me. As they rushed on me, I asked them who they were. They answered: "It is no matter; you must come with us." They then took hold of me, saying, "Now you had better come quietly; if not, we will tie you and drag you." I said: "You are not able." They began to pull me, and I took hold of them, one in each hand; and whether it was that the consciousness of the unlawfulness of the act weakened them, or whether the desperateness of my case and the countenance of my commanding officer gave me additional strength, I succeeded, in spite of their utmost efforts, in dragging them into and across the verandah, and getting inside my door. The door was in two halves, as most doors in India are. I got my right knee and hand against one side, and took hold of the handle of the latch that was on the other with my left hand, and exerted myself to the utmost to shut it, but their extended arms as they kept hold of my collar prevented me from shutting it, and they could not pull me out. The struggle being thus brought to a stand, they resorted to threats. "You must come," said one; "we'll make you come. We'll kill you, we'll kill you." I understood them to mean when they had got me into the lodge. "Kill me where I am," said I; "I will not go to the lodge." Beswick now rushed into the room under my arm, and endeavored to loosen my grasp of the latch handle, but he was not able. He then got at my back and pushed me, while the others pulled me with all their might; but I remained immovable.

My comrades, who at the commencement of the struggle appeared to be panic-stricken, now rallied. Sellers went to report the case to the colonel; Quartermaster Sergeant McGregor went to bring Lieut. Burgoyne, the adjutant; Hobday, the orderly sergeant, remained at his quarters, but could not be prevailed on by his wife and other women to come to my assistance. Believing that he was afraid to take a personal part in the fray, I called to him to bring the guard. Being ordered, he obeyed with the greatest alacrity, and brought the guard in a very short space of time. The women, in the meantime, came to my assistance, and with cries of "What are you doing with the man?" "Are you murdering the man?" they laid hold on their arms and tried to pull them away from me. The Masons endeavored to prevent their interference, saying: "It is no affair of yours: This is no woman's affair. He is a Mason." Beswick screeched out, in distraction: "He has divulged our secrets. He has divulged our secrets!" The women said, in return: "What is your secret to us? Are you to murder the man?"

Sergeant Sellers now returned and joined in the rescue. The cries of the women brought a crowd; and Beswick, seeing no chance of taking me by force, slipped out of the room, and taking his sword out of his own room, rushed on me with cries of "I'll cut him down! I'll have blood! I'll be the death of him!" As he came on, intent on striking me or running me through, our assistant apothecary, J. King, pushed him aside and he stumbled and fell over a bucket that stood in the verandah; the sword, at the same time, flew out of his hand, and one of the crowd secured it.

Sergeant Hobday now arrived with the guard; the Masons let go their hold of me, and I then came out and ordered them off to the guard. Beswick interfered to prevent their confinement. Sergeant Hobday asked me whose order he should take, mine or Beswick's. I told him he should take mine; he was my troop orderly sergeant, and Beswick had been engaged in an unlawful act, and so lost his authority. To this Beswick had nothing to say, and the two men were lodged in our standard guard, which was composed of natives.

The women, Misses Hobday and McGregor, begged of me to go into my room and bolt the door, and I did so. I had now time to examine my clothing and see the effects of the struggle. My regimental jacket was torn to pieces about the neck and back; my waistcoat and shirt were also torn; and my shoulder was chafed with pressing against the door.

When all was over Quartermaster Sergeant G. McGregor arrived, with Lieut. and Adj't Burgoyne. He was most unwilling to come. He was aware that Sergeant Major Beswick and his party had come to seize me, and he was afraid that his presence might prevent their effecting their purpose of seizing me and carrying me off. It is likely that he gave Serg't Major Beswick permission to seize me, and he fully expected they would succeed in their attempt. Finding them defeated he took their part, but too late. He called me out, and it was evident that his excitement was but a little less than Beswick's, but he had more command of himself. He asked me angrily, "Are you a Mason?" I said, "I don't acknowledge to be one." "But are you a Mason, I ask you?" said he again. "I have been initiated," said I. "Then why don't you do as they require you?" said he. On this came Lieutenant and Quartermaster Amsinck. He was at the colonel's, both when I was there and when Sellers made the report of their seizing me, and came furnished with the colonel's instructions. He interrupted Mr. Burgoyne, placed Beswick in arrest, and put a double sentry over my door to prevent my being further molested. He also ordered the men of the Royals that had come to seize me to be removed from the native guard, where Sergeant Hobday had placed them, to the European guard—that of the C. Troop, 1st Brigade Horse Artillery. There, as I was afterwards informed by several, and by the corporal of the guard, Corporal Lennan, they boasted loudly of their attempt to carry me off, and declared that if they had got me out of the lines, they would have murdered me, and thrown my body into the tank, (the Ulsoor tank that lay a little to the right of the road leading to the lodge), let the consequence be what it might; and the circumstance of the lodge overriding the law by sending men to apprehend me before Major Wetherall had received my commanding officer's answer to his request to send me to the lodge, goes far to prove the truth of their declaration. It was discovered, presently afterwards, that men were waiting for them outside, to assist them in their murderous work had they succeeded in getting me out of the lines. So many of them came prowling about the lines that we expected another attack and prepared for it; and I was told afterwards that a number of the men of the C. Troop, H. Artillery, felt so much annoyed by their lurking near their lines, that they turned out with sticks to drive them away.

The two men of the Royals were sent home to their lines on the following morning, and were immediately released by Major Wetherell, and in a few days both of them were promoted to corporal for their meritorious conduct on this occasion.

ARE SECRET SOCIETIES INSTITUTIONS FOR PECUNIARY BENEFITS, OR RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION?

[This article is translated from Die Religion der Geheimen Gesellschaften, by Rev. Prof. Gottfr. Fritschel, D. D.: Wartburg Publishing House, Waverly, Iowa, by Rev. Geo. Fritschel, son of the deceased author, who also edited the German articles. The translation is free, and here and there a few new passages have been added, or a different arrangement has been adopted.]

[Concluded.]

"The meeting of a Masonic lodge is strictly a religious ceremony. The religion of a Masonic lodge is strictly a religious ceremony. The religious tenets of Masonry are few and simple, but fundamental." "A meeting of a Masonic lodge is a religious ceremony... and Masonry is, in many features, a religious as well as a moral institution." (Morris, A Pract. Synopsis, pp. 284 and 231.)

The Worshipful Master is said to be the priest of the lodge and the leader in the religious ceremonies. He chooses the Scripture passages to be read, etc. But he may delegate the religious part of his duties to an assistant called chaplain. (Morris, Pract. Synops. p. 231.)

"All the religious ceremonies of our order are prefaced and terminated with prayer, because Masonry is a religious institution." (Mackey's Lex., Art. Prayer.)

"Genuine Freemasonry, my brother, is a system of morals, a pure religion." (Macy, Eastern Star, p. 20.)

"Hutchinson defines F. M. to be at once a religious and civil society." (Mackey, Mystic Tie, p. 5.)

"In its very foundations Masonry is a religious institution." "Masonry is purely a religious and charitable institution claiming great antiquity." (Address of J. J. Sheppard before Lincoln Lodge, Boston, pp. 9 and 13.)

"It is a moral and religious institution." (Thompson, Sermon, p. 59; the same assertion pp. 8, 9.)

"The principal aims proposed by Solomon in the organization of Masonry were: 1. to teach true religion," etc.

"The principal results of this organization of Masonry have been: 1, religious; 2, moral; 3, social; 4, scientific. The personal qualifications of Solomon were a thorough knowledge of revealed religion [true Masonry over against spurious], as the mind of God had divulged it." (Morris, Light and Shadow, p. 257.)

"She can and will educate the pious man to that higher religion in which all men can agree." (Steinbrenner, quoted in Cynosure June 18, 1891, p. 4.)

These statements that Masonry, etc., is a religious institution has to be proven, and some authors try to corroborate their statements by giving the reasons.

Dr. Oliver observed: "If Masonry is not universal religion, it forms a most beautiful auxiliary to every system of faith." (Masonic Advocate, p. 48.)

"To be truly Masonic in every sense of the word in which I can understand it, is to be truly religious, both in motive and in action." (Mackey, Mystic Tie, p. 6.)

"There is not a duty enjoined, nor a virtue required, in the volume of inspiration but what is found and taught by speculative Freemasonry. The whole duty of man is clearly and persuasively exhibited to the mind." (Town, quoted in Stearns, p. 19.)

"There is no duty man owes to God, his neighbor or himself, under the patriarchal or Christian dispensation which is not fully illustrated, and effectually enforced by our system of symbolic instruction." (Masonic Advocate, p. 727.)

"Speculative Freemasonry, as a system, evidently embraces in body and substance the whole duty of man as a moral being." (Town, p. 23.)

The definition of Preston has been adopted "by common consent" as a part of the modern ritual, namely: "That it is an initiation so far interwoven with religion as to lay us under the strongest obligations to pay that rational homage to the Deity which at once constitutes our duty and our happiness." (Mackey, Mystic Tie, p. 6.)

"The sober and discreet will rejoice in Masonry as a compendious system of moral and religious instruction; while the pious and devout will embrace it as an auxiliary to human happiness." (Town, p. 15; Freemasonry by a M. M.)

"That Freemasonry should be spoken of as a religious institution, or as imparting religious instruction, undoubtedly sounds strange to those who think religion must be necessarily confined to a particular sect of theological dogmas, or, in other words, be sectarian." (Macoy, Cycl., p. 325.)

"Freemasonry is not a religion; it does not claim (?) to possess any of the renovating efficacy of consoling influences; Masonry, then, is not a religious sect. But, although Masonry is not in itself either religion or a substitute for it, it is evidently a religious institution." If it is the object of religion "to direct us in the conduct of the present by a standard which is to be applied in the future,—then, in such a sense, Freemasonry is emphatically a religious institution." (Mackey, Mystic Tie—Freemasonry and Religion.)

"It can be said that this order became for many a real religion." (Transl. from Allgem. Handb. I., 417.)

"The word Mason is derived from the Greek, and means a member of a religious sect, or one who is professedly devoted to the worship of the Deity." (Dalcho, p. 11 in F. M. by a M. M., p. 233.)

"Freemasonry is not religion, but it has religion. The religion of the Freemasons is not as well understanding of doctrine as devotion to God and confidence in God; practical religiosity." (Transl. from Allgem. Handb., I., 410.)

"If it is the object of Christianity to bind us to the performances of duty by the sacred obligations we owe to God, to point us to the hopes and expectations of another, better world—then Masonry is so far a religious institution." (Masonic Advocate, p. 48.)

"It is a science which engages us in the search after divine truth. Freemasonry is then also a religious institution. The very science which it inculcates is in itself the science of religion." (Mackey, Mystic Tie, p. 3.)

"Freemasons adore the Grand Architect of the Universe; therefore, the order of Freemasons is religious in its teachings and practice." (Macoy, Cyclop., p. 278.)

"A brother asks: 'Is Masonry a religion?' Assuming that he means, Is Masonry a sect? we answer, it is not, but it is religious, in recognizing and reverencing God, in inculcating faith, hope and charity, in making the Holy Bible its first great light, and in requiring the practice of all the virtues." (Voice of Masonry, Aug., 1891, p. 640.)

So we have put Masonry upon the witness stand, and the result of the investigation is: Masonry is not intended to be merely a beneficiary institution. Lodge benefits are by far not the principal object. The real object is moral and religious education and instruction on a world-wide basis. So it is of the world, and against Christ and his church.

A preacher in a Clayton (N. J.) church offered the following prayer a few mornings ago: "O Lord, we pray that the excursion train going South on the West Jersey R. R. this morning, may not run off the track and kill any church members that may be on board. Church members on Sunday excursions are not in condition to die; and, besides this, it is embarrassing to a minister to officiate at the funeral of a member of the church who has been killed on a Sunday excursion. Keep the train on the track and preserve it from all calamity, that all church members among the excursionists may have an opportunity for repentance and that their sins may be forgiven for Christ's sake."

THE LODGE CHARITABLE.

The arrogant boastfulness of secret lodges is offensive to people of good Christian sense. Frequently some needy person is given help by a lodge, or lodge-men, and very soon we see the fact blazoned before the world as a specimen of lodge benevolence. This is often contrasted with church or Christian benevolence, and always to the advantage of the lodge. Several facts deserve notice. First, lodge benevolence, as a rule, is of the most selfish and partisan kind. Lodge men aid their own brethren, but these brethren have paid into the society more than they ever receive in return. About twenty years ago a man about fifty-five years old, and poor in earthly goods, offered himself as a candidate for membership in a Masonic lodge and was rejected. The reason for rejecting him was given privately that he was so old and poor that in a little while he would be unable to pay much into the lodge, and would rather need help. Such men were not wanted. Second, contrary to the command of Jesus, the lodges boast of their benevolence, and cause more to be said about it than they should, while the church, in obedience to the command of our Lord, goes quietly to the work of ministering to the needy. Many a dollar is given to aid some needy one, regardless of creed or church-membership, or former condition, and no one makes any public show of such benevolence. The difference between the lodge benevolence and Christian benevolence is very great. Any one who is caught by the glare and show of lodge benevolence would do well to think soberly of our Lord's commandments concerning things done to be seen of men.—Bible Standard.

NATIVE FREEMASONRY ON THE KONGO.

[From "Life on the Kongo," by Rev. W. Holman Bentley. Copyrighted, 1891, and published by the Pacific Press Publishing Co., Oakland, Cal., by whose permission we reprint from it the following extract.]

There are two customs which prevail through the country—Ndembo, and another, very like Freemasonry, called Nkimba.

The Nkimba custom is an introduction from the coast of comparatively recent times. An initiatory fee of about two dollars in cloth and two fowls is paid, and the novice repairs to an inclosure outside of the town. He is given a drug which stupefies him, and when he comes to himself, he finds his fellow Nkimbas wearing a crinoline of palm frondlets, their bodies whitened with pipe clay, and speaking a mysterious language. Only males are initiated into this rite, which is more like Freemasonry. Living apart for a period, varying from six months to two years, he acquires the mysterious language, and at the end of his time he is reckoned a full brother, mbwamve anjata, and all Nkimbas in all districts hail him as a brother, help him in his business, give him hospitality, conversing freely with him in the mystic language. It is no gibberish, as that attempted by the Ndembo fraternity, but until quite lately no white man could get any collection of words. I have, however, been able to get over two hundred words and forty sentences; and while still unable to understand thoroughly the principles on which it has been made up, it is evident that it has been made. The vocabulary is limited, and is characterized by the system of alliterary concord. Some words are slight changes of ordinary Kongo, and others bear no resemblance.

The common people are given to understand that the Nkimba know how to catch witches. In the daytime they wander in the grass, and dig for roots, and gather nuts in the woods, often beating people on the roads who do not run away on their approach. At night they rush about screaming and yelling and uttering their wild trill. Woe to the unfortunate man who ventures out of his house in the night for any purpose; a beating and heavy fine will surely follow.

There is no other nonsense to add to the mystery and fear, but the whole raison d'être is the establishment of this fraternity, or guild, for mutual help and protection; and the period of separation is for the acquirement of the useful mystic language. Ndembo is an unmitigated abomination; Nkimba is comparatively harmless, and, in the absence of something better, useful. It is making its way in from the coast, and may be found interiorwards on the South bank for one hundred and seventy-five miles.

An instance of the usefulness of Nkimba is supplied in the story of the founding of our Bay-veston station. It was decided that a premonitory jutting into the river near Vunda would be a more advantageous site for a base of water transport on the piece of river between Isangila and Manyanga. We were then using the wild river there because the road by land was blocked. We had carried overland for fifty miles our steel sectional boat, the Plymouth. Landing on the promontory, Messrs. Comber and Hartland pitched their tents for the night,—sending a message to the towns on the hills by a fisherman that they would like to see the chiefs in the morning. Up to eleven o'clock no one appeared, and they determined to go themselves. As they neared the towns, all was in the wildest excitement; no white man had ever been there before. The women had been sent into the woods, and the men advanced in the grass with their guns, to fight the intruders. The missionaries had with them a head man who was a Nkimba, and seeing the dangerous state of affairs, he rushed forward, uttering the Nkimba trill; this was replied to, and all was quiet. The missionaries were received by some of the principal men, who agreed to let them have the headland, and, a fortnight later, they signed the contract, selling the land to us, in consideration of a fitting present. Some of our best native scholars are called away sometimes to be initiated into Nkimba.

THE CAMORRA.

Mr. John A. Mooney in the Quarterly has a second study on Italian political conditions of earlier years, with the title "The Two Sicilies and the Camorra," in which he gives a picturesque and lively description of the methods by which the Italian kingdom was formed. He says of the Camorra that it "was found in a secret society, whose members were not, nor are they, workingmen in the honest sense of the word. To be admissible to the order, the first requirement is that the aspirant be a man of wicked life (Mala Vita). His word will not suffice to establish his bad character. Either he can give proof—he has been in jail, or he is known to have a criminal record, or else he can satisfy the society's agent that he is bad enough to deserve the title of 'an honored youth'—a title synonymous with that of 'Mala Vita,'—under a severe master, the novice is trained in all manner of villainy. In the use of the dagger he is trained scientifically, just as the Carbonari were. To cheat and deceive he must be able." This is a picture to shudder at.

MASONIC MARRIAGES.

Another step towards the organization of civil marriages with semi-religious pomp and ceremony has been taken in Paris, this time by the Freemasons. The idea of borrowing a few hints from the church in order to make matrimonial unions performed by mayors attractive and picturesque, originated in the mind of a metropolitan tradesman, who found a civic functionary ready to carry out his suggestion. Accordingly, several weddings took place in the Temple District, the prosaic ceremonial of Code being set off by orchestral music, while ornamental objects—such as flowers and lights—were not forgotten. Now there has taken place another marriage of the same kind in the Salle des Fetes of the Grand Orient Lodge of France, in the Rue Cadet. The bride and bridegroom, after having been joined in matrimony by their Mayor, entered the Salle des Fetes of the Masonic Lodge with their friends. There all sat down and listened patiently to three addresses delivered by leading Freemasons. Then small bouquets were presented to the sisters, cousins, and other relatives of the husband and wife who were present, and the newly-married couple received their wedding rings from the presiding Mason, who in the name of his craft imprinted a "kiss of peace" on the cheeks of the bride. The ceremony concluded, as it had begun, to the sounds of music, the orchestra playing a wedding march as the bridal party left the hall.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The shortening days.—Second Adventism growing popular.—A new convert to Romanism.—A peculiar liquor case.—A legal sarcasm.

There is a charm in these shortening days;—these mornings that are gone before you are aware of it; these afternoons that fade into gray night by four o'clock, and leave you wondering where the day has gone to. It is a charm, too, that is rather hard to define, for who has not felt a chill go through him even in the heat of dog-days when he first realizes that the shortening process has fairly begun. I suppose it is something like finding our first gray hair, or becoming suddenly conscious that we have passed the limit of middle life;—neither of which discoveries are in themselves pleasant. We must get used to old age and find how sunshiny, and mellow, and sweet a thing it can be before we fall in love with it. The real charm of these "shortest days," I fancy, is in looking beyond them, and thinking how soon mother earth will turn her face springward, and we shall talk of "the lengthening days"—days of whirling snowflakes and howling winds and zero cold;—but they bear an evangel in their bosom.

"You Second Adventists are the thinkers of the world," was remarked the other day to a friend of mine who belongs to this persuasion, by a gentleman of opposite views with whom she was carrying on a lively discussion regarding Dr. Kinnear's articles on Christ's Second Coming, now being published in the Saturday's Traveller, and which are attracting wide attention among that paper's numerous readers. The lady, though young in years, is old enough to remember when the term "Second Advent" was synonymous in the popular mind with fanaticism and illiteracy. So I did not wonder that she repeated this remark to me with considerable glee. It is, nevertheless, a true one. William Miller was, par excellence, a thinker, even though his conclusions were erroneous; and to-day the world is finding it out. Kinnear's articles are easier to follow than Totten's, as he does not soar so high into the regions of abstract mathematics. The wide-spread interest in this subject is shown by the fact that such articles are sought for by the secular press; but, beside it, looms up another fact of ominous portent. Is there any abatement of Pleasure's mad revel? any halt in the still madder race after Mammon? Is not gambling, with all kinds of fraud and speculation, public and private, as rife as ever? and every form of political corruption just as rampant? Verily, as it was in the days of Noah so it is now. Quite likely many of those antediluvians went to hear Noah preach, and just as many read Prof. Totten's article now—because it is the latest sensation.

Rev. Dr. Spaulding, rector of Christ's church, Cambridge, has resigned his charge and gone over to the Romanists, for reasons more clear to himself, I imagine, than they are to other people. The chief cause, however, which he gave in his farewell sermon was "the wonderful growth of rationalism in the church;"—in other words, that spirit of religious liberty which is the essence of Protestantism. That Episcopal clergymen can be found "who deny that there is any inherent grace in the laying on of hands," and that the grace of God was just as much given to Calvin and Luther for their work, as to the Apostles for theirs;"—all this is cited by Mr. Spaulding, as if for anybody inside that communion to think for himself in religious matters was indeed the abomination of desolation. As he was a Presbyterian before he became an Episcopalian, it seems to have been a process of gradual evolution which has now landed him high and dry on the steps of the Vatican as a humble subject of the Pope.

Rev. J. M. Foster is taking his place as a power among Boston's ministry. His sermon, last Sabbath, on the "Ideal Church," was full of the old Covenanting ring. Rev. O. P. Gifford's farewell sermon has been preached, and Boston is sorry to lose him; but, as some one from Chicago wittily said at the last Baptist Ministers' meeting, "he was glad Mr. Gifford was coming to that city to which the passage could well be applied: 'For where sin did abound grace did much more abound.'"

A rather peculiar liquor case has just been decided in the Supreme Court. It appears that a certain man doing business in Lawrence, Mass., ordered, by letter, a large consignment of ale from the Suffolk Brewing Company at Portsmouth, N. H. He failing to pay for it, the company sued him, only to lose their case in the Supreme Court, which decided that the liquor being sold in violation of the laws of this Commonwealth, the price of it could not be recovered. When carried to the Supreme Court, however, the learned judge decided that the actual transfer took place in Portsmouth, which has no law on her statute book prohibiting such sales; therefore it was all lawful, and the company could recover cost. What would the lawyers do if the rum business, which gives them so many hair-splitting points to quibble over, should be stricken out of existence?

Rev. Henry T. Cheever, of Worcester, has issued an address to the Republicans of that city, "officials and file," calling upon them, if they would save their party in Massachusetts, to cast their votes for No License in the pending election. The letter contains some excellent advice which multitudes of Christian men all over the country would rejoice from their hearts to see adopted. This crazy desire of the Republican leaders to win an uncertain liquor vote, whose natural affinities being all on the Democratic side, is liable to veer about with the slightest change in the political wind; and the insulting way in which they treat their natural allies, the Prohibitionists, whose vote would be cast solid for the grand old party should it once unfurl and steadily maintain the banner of No License, is one of the strange things which, if King Agur had lived in these days, he might well have added to the four which he enumerates as "too hard" for him.

It is said, with some show of truth, that Gov. Russell owes his election, and Allen his defeat, to the endowment orders. But their day is well-nigh over. Every town and village in Massachusetts has its quantum of-sorrowing dupes. When an injunction against the Golden Lion was lately sought for in the Supreme Court, Judge Holmes gave them this cold comfort, viz.: That "when people entered into gambling contracts he did not feel like interfering when the defrauded persons began to cry, especially when it was not claimed that the defrauded ones were insane or minors, or under any other legal disability." The sarcasm was just, but it must have been hard to bear. What a blessing to multitudes of hardworking people the money would now be which they have paid into these concerns, with as little prospect of ever getting it again as if they had thrown it into the deep sea.

The outlook is very encouraging for our annual meeting, of which my next letter will (D. V.) contain a report. Doors hitherto tightly closed are opening before Bro. Stoddard in every direction. His faithful, earnest heroic work, these two years past, is telling wonderfully. Can I close better than with his own words in a private letter just received: "Let us walk softly and humbly before God, ever mindful of our weakness, and that with Him is the power and the victory."
ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 2, 1891.

Probably the most unique argument ever made for the prohibition of the liquor traffic was contained in a petition sent to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, this week, signed by 140 inmates of the workhouse, asking that no more liquor licenses be granted here. This petition, which is, as far as I know, the first of its kind, is worthy of a wide circulation, so I will not apologize for quoting it: "We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, temporarily residing in the Washington City Asylum, commonly called the workhouse, would respectfully but most earnestly pray your honors not to grant any more liquor licenses. We have been informed from high authority, and we fully believe from our own observations, that the curse of the Lord Almighty rests upon the drunkard, and woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth the bottle to him and maketh him drunken. It is our earnest desire to overcome the shame and disgrace to which intoxicating drink has, directly or indirectly, brought us, and to again become worthy and law-abiding citizens. To this end we ask for honest employment and fair wages, and that all places of licensed temptation and rum may be forever banished from the capital of our nation. We, therefore, beseech you to aid us by granting this, our prayer."

Secretary Foster has been confined to his room ever since his recent trip to New York City, and it is thought that he will not be able to resume his duties this week. His physician says he has a well-developed case of "la grippe," which was so prevalent here a year ago.

The annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, made public this week, is a very interesting document. It shows that the General Land Office is, for the first time in many years, almost up to date with its work; that the Indian bureau is accomplishing the disintegration of the Indian reservations, the severance of tribal relations, and the education of the Indian youth; it tells much about the workings of the Pension bureau, which disburses more than one-fourth of our national income; it tells something of the work of the Geological survey in the irrigation of the arid lands in the far West and Southwest; it says that the Railroad bureau is preparing for the maturity of the debts due the government from the Union Pacific and other subsidized railroads; that the Bureau of Education has distributed the fund allowed to the various State Agricultural colleges, and is now engaged in planning for the accumulation and distribution of information for these schools and for bettering their management; and that the Patent Office, which this year celebrated its centennial, is advancing in the volume and variety of its investigations. It also has something to say of the Yellowstone National Park, the Yosemite National Park, the Sequoia National Park and the Hot Springs of Arkansas; all of which are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Justices of the United States Supreme Court are nearly all connected with the faculty of some of our colleges. Justice Brown, the baby of the court, that is to say, the newest member, has joined the faculty of Georgetown University, and this week delivered the first of a series of lectures on Admiralty law.

The Supreme Court, this week, heard the arguments in the three cases attacking the constitutionality of the present tariff law. For convenience, the three cases were heard as one, although it is expected that separate decisions will be handed down. One of these cases is based on the ground that the sugar bounty clause of the law invalidates it; one that the reciprocity clause is a delegation of the taxing power to the President, and therefore unconstitutional, and the other that the omission of the tobacco rebate section from the bill as signed by the President makes void the whole.

A Bible is used regularly in the Sunday-school of one of our churches that, on account of the manner in which it was presented to the Sunday-school, should be valued more than if its leaves and binding were pure gold thickly studded with diamonds. A little girl, the daughter of a family whose acquaintance with poverty is too familiar to be altogether comfortable, and a scholar of the Sunday-school mentioned, was taken sick. No one supposed that she was in any danger. One day she called one of the family and said with much earnestness: "If I should die, I wish you to take the money in my little bank and buy a big Bible for our Sunday-school; we have never had one since I have been going there." The child died, and the family took her savings and purchased a handsome Bible, which was duly presented to the Sunday-school, in the name of its dead scholar. Isn't that a valuable Bible?

The Evangelical Alliance of the city, at its annual meeting, held Monday evening, issued a call to the local churches for the observance of a week of prayer from Jan. 3 to 10, 1892.

With the first day of the approaching New Year will begin the regular publication of a new semi-monthly reform paper of twelve pages, entitled The Political Dissenter, "an exponent of the social and political principles and practice of 'the Covenanters,'" having its principal office at Pittsburg, Pa. Starting out with the standing motto at its head: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," it proposes to teach the Bible principle and political duty of separation from all immorally constituted social and political organizations—to oppose Sabbath-breaking, and especially the opening of the Columbian Exposition on that day; the encroachments of Romanism upon our civil, religious and political institutions; Teed's Koreshan fraudulent religion; the marriage of Christians with unbelievers; the increase and arrogant pretensions of secret societies, and whatever is opposed to good government, social purity and the vital principles of Christianity. In its mechanical arrangement, as in its earnest and open discussion of important topics, it promises to be a most attractive visitor. Its editorship seems to be wholly impersonal, but we happen to know that, notwithstanding, it will be competent in a very high degree to meet all the demands of such a periodical. Its cheapness (50 cents per annum) places it within the reach of all.

An herb, as alleged, has been found in Yucatan that will cure almost any case of insanity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BRO. FENTON IN OHIO.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 4, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—On last Sabbath I preached twice in Xenia; Anti-masonic sermons on both occasions. On Monday evening I lectured in Cedarville, the pastors of the Covenanters and U. P. churches of that place co-operating. Tuesday evening I arrived in this city, and on Wednesday afternoon I addressed the students of the Lutheran Theological Seminary. To-night I am to lecture in Marzetti Hall. The Lutherans express themselves very emphatically against secretism, and welcome agitation as a means of preserving the faith of their denomination, and the souls of their people from the lodge fate presaged by that of the children of Israel for the same idolatry as that of the lodge, practiced on the plains of Moab—worshiping that which is symbolized by the "point within a circle." REMINISCENCES OF THE MORGAN MURDER.

RIDGEWAY, N. Y., Nov. 19, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The pamphlets I ordered from you have all been received. Thanks. I did not call for them because I wanted more "light" on Masonry. I remember those times when Morgan was abducted very well; and when "the light of Masonry burnt a black mark on Miller's printing office." The Republican-Monitor of Cazenovia was the first paper, after Miller's, that took a stand against Masonry; I had a list of subscribers for it, and rode about town weekly, distributing from one hundred and fifty to two hundred copies, and selling a great number of Morgan's book and that of J. G. Stearns', besides other Anti-masonic works.

Recently I was present at a Masonic burial, with a grandsou thirteen years old, and he fell to asking me questions about Masonry,—the meaning of their emblems and ceremonies, etc.; and the Morgan outrage naturally came in for a share of notice, and so I sent for the books for his instruction.

I would like to know what you know about the "Morgan lambs;" that is, the lambs which were reported to have been brought forth in different places in western New York, in the spring of 1827, having, apparently, the throat cut and the tongue and under-jaw entirely wanting. In the tracts you sent me I find no notice of it. I would like to know whether you consider the report credible. I know something about it.

I live on the celebrated "Ridge road," along which Morgan was carried; and in sight is the graveyard where one lies who drove the carriage with his own team between here and Lewiston. The square and compasses, and the "faint resemblance of the letter G," are chiseled on his monument. R. F. COTTRELL.

A CONGREGATIONALIST IN MORMON PULPITS.

OGDEN, Utah, Dec. 1, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Your request for a letter in regard to my preaching among the Mormons is before me. Perhaps I can answer your questions most satisfactorily by stating the facts in the order of their events.

The readers of the Cynosure may know that I took a somewhat prominent part in a political movement in this Territory, known first as a Citizen's party. This movement began as a protest against the saloon and gambling influences, which amounted to absolute control in the anti-Mormon party. As the movement developed, the Mormons disbanded their political party, and joined the new movement. After the Ogden City election the Citizens' movement was succeeded by the organization of the Democratic and Republican parties. And this movement became general throughout the Territory. As the people of this Territory were not familiar with national politics, it was natural that they should welcome speakers who had been brought up in the States, where every voter had learned to be a politician.

For these reasons I found myself at the front in the campaign, which was more a campaign of education than of political strife. In this work I spoke in nearly every place of public meeting in our own county, and in some places outside of this county. I became acquainted with leading Mormons; and I may say that I seemed to gain the confidence of the people.

The election for which this campaign was begun, was held in August. The Liberal-anti-Mormon party had a ticket in the field; but the Democrats carried the election, the Liberals and Republicans standing about equal in the number of votes. The new movement proved a success, and the people generally, except the most radical of the Liberals, felt that a new and better day was beginning to dawn in Utah.

After the election, and when the people were rallying their more sober judgment on the situation, it seemed a fitting thing to impress on the minds of the people the moral responsibilities of the present time and opportunities. Accordingly, I announced to preach, on a certain Sabbath morning, on "The Future of Utah and the Mormon Church." I invited a number of leading Mormons to attend the service, some of whom accepted and were present. My main point was that the Mormons had, in the late campaign, shown a desire to become politically Americanized; and the question now is, what shall be the moral influence and power of the Mormon people in the shaping of public sentiment in Utah? I said that if the Mormon people, sustained by their church, shall be equal to their opportunities, the moral standard in Utah may be equal to the best moral sentiment of our nation and the world.

This sermon—in which I tried to be faithful to God, and to the people—was printed in full in an Ogden daily. The Mormons read it eagerly, and heartily indorsed its spirit and sentiment. The Deseret News, the official organ of the Mormon church, reprinted the sermon, and gave it a hearty indorsement. President Woodruff, in an address at the annual conference, spoke of that sermon with favor, and welcomed its sentiment as an omen of good.

With such endorsements, no wonder that doors were opened to me. An appointment was made for me to preach in the Tabernacle in Ogden, on October 25. This was the first time that any but a Mormon had preached in the Tabernacle at a regular Mormon service; and so far as I can learn, the first event of the kind in the Territory. The Tabernacle was full—1,000 or 1,200 persons, mostly Mormons, being present—though a few non-Mormons came, having an interest in the movement. I was introduced by Apostle Richards. The opening services were conducted in the usual way by Mormon officials. The sacrament was administered, as is their custom on every Sabbath. The sermon was a plea for holiness of life, since the Christian is led and sustained by the Holy Spirit; that is, the spirit who leads is holy, salvation means holiness, and heaven is a place of holiness.

A two-and-a-half column synopsis of this sermon was printed in the next issue of the Daily Standard. All classes of people have spoken favorably of this event, many with enthusiasm. There have been no public criticisms. Many are amazed, as they realize the significance of this innovation—this breaking down of old barriers.

But the best is yet to follow. Salt Lake City is the stronghold of Mormonism; and the Tabernacle in that city is the very center of Mormon thought. Yet the doors of that Tabernacle have been opened to an outsider. Sunday afternoon, November 29, I preached in the Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City. It was the hour for the regular service, and the sacrament was administered before the sermon. Beside me sat Angus

M. Cannon, who introduced me to the audience, Charles W. Penrose, Patriarch Smith, and many other high dignitaries of the church. Before I was called on to speak, Mr. Penrose said to me: "We want you to feel at perfect liberty to take all the time you need. The people have come to hear you, and they want you to feel no restraint."

An audience of 7,000, or more, was before me as I rose to speak. As I looked into that sea of faces, I felt a burden of responsibility to be loyal to God and the truth, such as one must feel when he realizes that he speaks not for himself but for the cause he represents.

The Deseret News has printed the sermon in full. The Standard says that only words of praise and enthusiasm are spoken concerning the speaker and the event.

I have told the story; it is not necessary to express an opinion, or utter a prophecy.

As some of the papers have spoken of my services as being held in the Mormon Temple, I want to correct the statement. There are three temples now in use in Utah. The great temple at Salt Lake City is nearly but not quite completed. But no public meetings are ever held in the temples. These are for the secret rites of the Mormon religion, and for other similar purposes. They have smaller meeting-houses for public services; and in the larger villages and cities they have large assembly rooms which they call tabernacles. They hold all sorts of meetings in the meeting-houses, such as lectures, socials, political and business meetings. But the tabernacles are reserved, more especially, for religious meetings, though these are sometimes used for other purposes. Yours faithfully,

AMOS JUDSON BAILEY.

OUT IN THE SUNSHINE.

NAVASOTA, TEX., Nov., 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Consistency is a jewel that should be desired and possessed by every one. But, alas! how many rational beings fail of this most important attainment.

You will allow me, by way of argument and illustration, to refer to a few of our shortcomings. Light and darkness cannot reign at the same place at the same time; for light was created to dispel darkness. When the sun peeps up from behind the vaults of heaven, and begins to shoot his golden rays across the concavity thereof, bursting asunder the cloudy vaults of the skies, the little hills and towering mountains, the humble valley and exalted plain, the little rivulet and the busy river, the great lakes and the mighty oceans, the fields of waving grain and the dreary desert, the beasts and fishes all join in swelling the solemn doxology:

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow;
Praise him all creatures here below."

They praise him that sends the light which he calls day. On the other hand, when the day begins to dawn, we can see the different beasts, fowls and men who "love darkness rather than light," going sneaking by to their dens or strongholds. The bat is an inhabitant of dark places; therefore he cannot travel where there is light, because he is blind. This plainly illustrates the fact (as I see it in my humble judgment), that light and darkness have no affinity for each other. And how some men claim to have left off serving Belial and still affiliate with him in committing deeds of darkness, is something that I am a Tyro in understanding. I would like to have some of the brethren who fully understand this puzzle to come to my rescue and make me understand, if being ignorant of it unto death will debar me from living with my Creator on the other side of the river. No one need undertake the task, though, that cannot produce sufficient evidence to convince me that God is the author of evil. Having learned who he is light, and that in him there is no darkness, I am of the opinion that he wants his creatures to be able to stand the penetrating rays of the light of the Gospel. But, to the contrary of this, we can find in nearly every land and clime men who will commit deeds of so frightful a character that they would not have them brought to light for the millions of Vanderbilt and Gould together laid at their feet.

But thanks be to God, the Gospel is steadily gaining ground and the light penetrating the darkest hells in this our Southland. There are very few anti-secretists in Texas, either among the laity or clergy. But the few that are for Christ are staunch. Among them is the Rev. Mr. Shivers, of Bryan, Tex. Our very souls were made to rejoice a few nights since as we listened to him pealing forth the truth in thunder tones to his people, teaching them how wrong it is for parents to allow their sons and daughters who are just budding into man and womanhood to visit society (lodge of course) balls, festivals, etc., simply to be estranged from the true path of righteousness. He said that there the daughters were subject to the insults of low-bred whites, who would make it a business to be out around such places, and that the sons would be beguiled by ill-famed women. Shivers carried the question over some of his members who are lodgeites. He stood out in the sunshine and sang praises to God, while the homely and ever-malicious bear of secret-societyism went stealthily to his place in darkness.

John Wesley and Martin Luther had to get out into the sunshine before they could bring the church of Rome to convulsions and shake the world with their doctrine of church reform. The Sun of Righteousness gave them strength to preach the truth regardless of the bulls of the pope and the ridicule of the laity. Now another reform is on, with principles as grand as those of the sixteenth century. And men are needed who are out of the darkness of paganism where home, companion and children are sacrificed upon the altar of negligence in order that we may worship at the shrine of Masonry or Odd-fellowship. I think that we have them (men who are in the sunshine I mean) in the persons of the editors, publishers, and contributing staff of the Christian Cynosure. I am out in the sunshine, and am determined to go with you until the battle shall have been fought, the victory won, and the whole human race brought to Christ, who stands out in the bright sunshine the "fairest among ten thousand and altogether lovely." Hoping that the grand cause may have still more prestige in the near future than it even now has, I am yours in the sunshine. (Rev.) C. S. MOORE, (M. D.)

PROGRESS OF ANTI-SECRECY IN CANADA.

CHESLEY, Ont., November 30, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—A year's residence in Canada has convinced me that the secret empire meets with little opposition in this part of the Queen's dominion. In our beautiful village, of a little less than two thousand souls, the Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Orangemen, Foresters and Good Templars boast of thriving lodges, while the Patrons of Industry are "roping in" the farmers roundabout. Their membership embraces most of the influential citizens, most of the leading church-members, and some of the ministers. Most of the people outside the orders are too indifferent to investigate the character of the societies, and simply say that they have nothing against them. There are five churches here, and ours alone testifies against the lodge by refusing to admit secretists into communion.

This fall a Freemason applied for admission, apparently to test our faithfulness on this point. He had taken his degrees in Scotland; and although he has been in this country for thirty years, has never been in a lodge. He claims that Masonry in America has been corrupted by Jesuitism—so much so that he cannot go with the Masons here. He further claims that Scotch Freemasonry is a most beautiful and noble institution; and he is so charmed by it that he would not promise never to enter a lodge again, or never to advise others to join it; and so we could not allow him church privileges. However, as he still continues to worship with us, we hope he will yet come to the light.

I think our village fairly represents the whole of Canada. Very few actively oppose secret orders. Most are indifferent. The churches, with a few exceptions, take no notice of the secret empire. Hundreds of ministers are involved in the sinful obligations of the lodge. The most of the remainder have never taken the pains to examine their principles and workings, and are content to say: "I see no harm in them." Many would change their attitude if they only knew the truth. A remarkable instance of this sort came to our ears recently. A Presbyterian minister, located southwest of this, was asked, a few years ago, what he thought of Masonry. He replied that he knew very little about it, but saw no harm in it. Sometime after he attended a Masonic funeral. He noticed that there was no reference to Christ in the first prayer, but thought it was an oversight. Perceiving the same omission in the second prayer, he stepped up to the chaplain and asked: "Have you no intercessor? Do you not pray in the name of Christ?" The chaplain replied: "You have heard it all." Then and there—in the midst of the funeral ceremonies—the minister administered a scathing rebuke, and pointedly condemned their Christless order. From that day he began to purge his church of secretists, and was so happy as to win from the lodge all who had been led away by it. Light is what is needed.

Happily there is a little glimmer just now. The paper read by Dr. Parsons at the Presbyterian Council, at Toronto, Nov. 2, "On the Relation of Church Members Toward Organizations Outside of the Church," has caused some discussion in both pulpit and press. The doctor, however, only sees "men as trees walking." His attitude is not that of uncompromising opposition to lodgery. The secret society men turned out in large numbers to hear him, expecting to hear their societies castigated. They were disappointed. He did not go farther than some of the society men were ready to go with him. While the doctor does not see the necessity of "secrecy in connection with deeds of blessing," he has "not a word to say in criticism of those, who, not seeing eye to eye with us as to the requirements of the Gospel, are moved by compassion and philanthropy to their noble deeds." We hope that he will soon see clearly the horrid iniquity of the secret system and become an uncompromising champion for truth. We are thankful that he has set some men to thinking, and we look for some interesting talk when the council resumes the discussion on the first Monday of December.

DE AMICITIA (Concerning Friendship) of Marcus Tullius Cicero; with Life of the Author, Topics for Discussion, and Brief Biographical Dictionary. By MARY E. VAUGHAN. One volume, paper, pp. 75. Price, 15 cents. Chicago: Albert, Scott & Co., publishers, 106 Wabash avenue.

Cicero scarcely needs an introduction to intelligent readers, to whom his fame has descended as one of the most erudite and pleasing of ancient statesmen and philosophers. His philosophy, in the light of divine truth, may be often erratic, but it possesses a charm that rivets the attention, even if it fails to convince the understanding. "De Amicitia" is one of a series of treatises on various subjects, and very clearly illustrates his methods of thought and system of pagan morality, which often challenge those of our modern philosophers to produce their equal. Mrs. Vaughan has very properly reproduced it without critical or explanatory notes, beyond a few sketches of contemporary authorities.

The same publishers have also issued a larger work on the same subject, entitled "Friendship," in which are comprised the three essays of Cicero, Bacon and Emerson, a happy mingling of ancient and modern ideas (Roman, English and American) on this delightful topic. The collection has special reference to holiday and social sentiment, and is tastefully issued in an octavo volume, bound in white parchment cloth, with gilt top. Price, $2.

The publishers of Scribner's Magazine, in view of the increased popularity which it has achieved during the present year, propose to greatly increase its attractions. It is not possible to enumerate in a brief space the details of all the choice new features now in preparation for its pages; a few of them may be named as an earnest of the desire on the part of the publishers to maintain and augment the excellence which it has already achieved. Papers will be printed, relating to the poor in the world's great cities; unpublished reminiscences and letters of Washington Allston, the eminent American painter; important moments—the beginnings of the Atlantic cables, the telegraph, the telephone, etc.; out-of-door places—life and adventures therein; Parisian theatres and concerts; the Nicaragua Canal; rapid transit in cities; Australian railways; the great streets of the world, etc., offering a melange of captivating literature through the year. The December issue is rich in illustration and replete with interest. The frontispiece, illustrating The Oak of Geismar, by Henry Vandyke, is The First Christmas Tree (a German tradition). Other articles and authors are as follows: Afloat on the Nile, illustrated—E. H. and E. W. Blashfield; Espero Gorgoni, Gondolier, illustrated—E. Hopkinson Smith; A Charge for France, illustrated—John Heard, Jr.; Winter Lilacs, by Mrs. James T. Fields; A Painter of Beautiful Dreams, illustrated—Harold Frederic; The Wrecker (continued) Robert Louis Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne; Peter Rugg the Bostonian, illustrated—Louise I. Guiney; A Little Captive Maid, illustrated—Sarah Orne Jewett; The Land of Poco Tiempo, illustrated—Charles F. Lummis; Peleus to Thetis (decorated)—Bessie Chandler; A Fresh-water Romance—Geo. A. Hibbard; Elmwood—in memory of James Russell Lowell—Thos. Bailey Aldrich; The Point of View: The Virtue of Receiving—Mr. Spencer as an Instance. Published monthly by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $3.00 per annum, or 25 cents a number.

There is no magazine in America that as the exponent of current literature exhibits a higher degree of ability, combined with artistic attraction, than the Century. The December number is exceptionally fine, both from a literary and artistic view. The only fault seems to be a disposition, in the article on "Science and Immortality," to "drop into" obtuse philosophy, which might better be left for discussion in the heavier Maga, and seems quite out of place in the genial pages of the Century. The frontispiece proper, as becomes a "Christmas" periodical, is a copy of the Holy Family printed by Frank Vincent du Mond,—very finely executed, as are all the principal illustrations of this number. The principal authors and contributors are as follows: Raphael (with three full-page copies of his paintings)—W. J. Stillman; The Shepherds, illustrated—Edith M. Thomas; The Christmas Shadrack, illustrated—Frank R. Stockton; The Naulahka (continued)—Rudyard Kipling and Wolcott Balestier; The Rapture of Hetty, illustrated—Rose Terry Cooke; Mozart after a Hundred Years, illustrated—Amelia G. Mason; A Christmas Fantasy, with a Moral, illustrated—Thos. Bailey Aldrich; The Bowery, illustrated—Julian Ralph; The Ocean from Real Life, illustrated—John A. Beebe; The Golden Age of Pastel, illustrated—Elizabeth W. Champney; Wulfy, a Waif—Vida D. Scudder; Au Offertory, illustrated—Mary Mapes Dodge; Characteristics, with a portrait—Dr. S. Weir Mitchell; Sherman and the San Francisco Vigilantes—Posthumous paper by General Sherman. Besides all these, there are several poems, Christmas fancies, and numerous other features that make this as good a number as any previously issued, if not better than any since its publication began. New York: The Century Co., 33 East 17th street; $4.00 per annum, or 35 cents per number.

The Ladies' Home Journal has a strong and attractive prospectus for 1892. Mrs. Gladstone is to write a series of practical articles for mothers on "Hints from a Mother's Life;" Mr. Howells' next novel, a story for girls, will appear in the Journal; Mamie Dickens, the eldest daughter of Charles Dickens, is to write eight reminiscence papers on "My Father as I Recall Him;" Mrs. Burton Harrison, author of "The Anglomaniacs," will portray "Social Life in New York," which Mrs. Admiral Dahlgren will also do for Washington and Mrs. Reginald DeKoven for Chicago; Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher will continue to tell of "Mr. Beecher as I Knew Him;" Mrs. McKee, President Harrison's daughter, is to write on the training of children; Palmer Cox's "Brownies" will appear all the year; Robert J. Burdette is to have a regular humorous department; Sarah Orne Jewett's next novel will be printed, while Chauncey M. Depew, Mr. Wanamaker, Mrs. ex-Secretary Whitney, and a score of other "diners-out," will tell whether or not the use of wine is decreasing at fashionable dinners. The December number accentuates the usual gratifying melange of good reading, both in the number and variety of its pictorial and literary contributions, including many of the excellent features of the past twelve-month, and as many new ones of special interest. Published monthly by the Curtis Publishing Co., 433-435 Arch street, Philadelphia, for $1.00 per annum; single copies, everywhere, 10 cents.

The Cosmopolitan for December, while claiming no specific "Christmas" attractions, is brilliant with artistic embellishments and literary contributions. The frontispiece is a beautiful copy of the Madonna and Child, painted by Dagnan-Bouveret, and the following finely illustrated papers: A Sketch of Egyptian Travel—From Philæ to Wady Halfi, by Gebel Effendi; The Mad Piper (poem), by John Vance Cheney; "On Earth Peace, Good-Will Toward Men," by T. V. Powderly; A Daughter of the South, by Mrs. Burton Harrison; Rapid Transit, by Lewis M. Haupt; My Father's (General W. T. Sherman's) Letters, by his daughter, Maria Ewing; With Sherman in his Army Home, by Theo. R. Davis; American Entertaining, by M. E. W. Sherwood; A Hindoo Romance, by John Hamilton Gilmour; Ten Days on the Mississippi, by Wm. G. Eggleston; Social Life in Richmond (Va.) during the Rebellion; Massacres of the Roman Amphitheatre, by C. Osborne Ward; also, The Pilgrims of the Sky (poem), by J. L. Spalding, and With Ambers (poem), by Titus M. Coan; with Current Events, by Murat Halstead; Social Problems, by E. Everett Hale, and About Books of Travel, by Brander Matthews. The Cosmopolitan is uniformly excellent the year round, and, so far as we have seen, is never disappointing. Published at office, Fifth avenue, Broadway and 25th street, New York City, for $3.00 per annum; single numbers, 25 cents.

LODGE NOTES.

Every man but one on either ticket in the late election in New York State, belonged to the Masonic fraternity.—The American Tyle (Detroit), Nov. 19, 1891.

Nearly $530,000 was expended by the I. O. O. F. in Pennsylvania last year in relief. The receipts of the lodges was nearly a round million. The relief amounted to $1,457.80 per day, or $60.40 for each hour in the year. So says Grand Secretary Nicholson.

In the case of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania vs. Eilbert Lodge, No. 582, of New Hamburg, which disbanded and refused to surrender to the Grand Lodge the property held by its officers, the Court of Common Pleas of Mercer county rendered a decision which reiterates the rulings of the courts, that lodge property is a trust and cannot be diverted to personal uses.

New York is glorifying over the magnificent gain last year in membership in her subordinate I. O. O. F. lodges; and it was a very gratifying one. She is after Ohio closely. Yet in the Rebekah Lodge members Ohio is "a length and a half" ahead. January 1st, 1891, Ohio had 14,606 members in Rebekah Lodges, while New York had only 8,271. During the year 1890, Ohio gained 1,454, and New York 910. Both have been growing during the ten months of this year just past, and we hope to hear of still larger results when the "grand count" is made in January, 1892.—Odd-fellows' Companion.

The departure of a lot of visiting Pythians is described by an organ of the order in the following choice terms: "When the time of departure of the cantons arrived, Col. Geo. T. Hughes picked up an escort composed of Colonels, Majors, Captains, and 'high privates,' and the procession led by the French Band started for the depot to see the Superior boys off. It is said by those who witnessed the evolutions that 'Uncle Sam's' finest regulars couldn't 'hold a candle' to Hughes' 'scrubs.' Some say that it wouldn't be wicked to swear by them, for there is nothing beneath the sun, under the earth or in the sea like them. With three 'whoops' for the Patriarchs the 'scrubs' disbanded to meet again (some of them) before morning, as will be seen by looking in another part of this issue."

The name Freemason, says the Freemason's Chronicle, appears for the first time in Statute 25 of Edward I., of England, A. D. 1350. The term signified a "freestone mason," one who works in free-stone as distinguished from the rough mason, who merely built walls of rough stones. It was not until the beginning of the seventeenth century that persons who were not operative masons began to unite with the Freemasons, and were distinguished from the regular working masons by the denomination of Accepted. By the year 1702 the speculative lodges in England began to decay, and became so degenerate as to be applied to the purposes of gain and self-interest. "Masons made here for 12s" was then a frequent public announcement in the riverside streets of London and Liverpool; but 1717 saw a complete change, when the so-called revival was affected.

The Grand Lodge and Grand Encampment, I. O. O. F., State of Illinois, were in session at Springfield, last month. The report of the Grand Scribe, John C. Smith, shows the receipts of the office for the past year to have been $2,904.75, and the expenses $2,570.74. The gains in membership and finance have been substantial, and live encampments have taken the place of dead ones. There are now 174 encampments working, only four of which are delinquent. The membership is 6,273 and the gain 80. The report of the Grand Representatives show that on Dec. 31, 1890, there were in the jurisdiction of the Sovereign Grand Lodge 2,198 subordinate encampments, with 115,644 members, an increase of 37,442, and 2,016 Rebekah degree lodges, with 132,898 members, an increase of 17,415. The total relief expended by the order was $2,917,688.13, an increase over the preceding year of $261,159.01, the total revenue being $7.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1891.

THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC AND THE WESLEYAN METHODIST CONNECTION.

We are not set for the defence of the Wesleyan Methodists. Their able preachers and editors are quite well qualified to defend their position on the secret society question. We refer to it because of the very general onslaught made on them and their action at their late general conference by the secret society press. The Pythian Knight says:

"The Wesleyan Methodists have the anti-secret society craze in a large degree. Even the patriotic organization known as the 'Grand Army of the Republic' comes under the ban of the bigots, who are in the majority in that church. At the Quadrennial General Conference, recently held at Grand Rapids, Mich., one of the delegates was unseated on the ground that he was a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and a resolution was at once adopted condemning all secret societies, including the G. A. R. Those bigots who thrust this Christian brother out into the world, become as infuriated at the sound of the name of a secret society as the bull in the Spanish arena does at the waving of a red flag, and rush pell-mell at any object they may meet in the way of their maddened rush."

We would simply say that any member of any organization who purposely violates a rule of long standing, has no right to complain if his name is dropped. We should not feel disturbed if a member of the Knights of Pythias who had violated a solemn covenant, was counted out of the order, nor do we see any occasion for this display of sympathy on the part of the Pythian Knight. Whether the rule was a good one, or whether the G. A. R. is a good institution, is a separate question.

The same writer says: "Surely a distinction should be made between secret societies that are secret for illegitimate reasons, like the Mafia, and those like the Grand Army of the Republic, that maintain a diaphanous veil of secrecy simply for purposes of protection." Doubtless there is a difference between secret societies, at least in degree; but the distinction between those organized for legitimate, and those with illegitimate, purposes, is by no means the only distinction. A secret society with purely legitimate objects may become an injurious institution: first, by its unrighteous methods, and, secondly, by its perversion to other and pernicious ends. It is just for these reasons that we disapprove of the G. A. R. Conceding the legitimacy of the original purpose of the organization, we nevertheless affirm that its secrecy is both needless and illegitimate. There is not a rightful object of this organization but can be much more easily attained by open methods than by secrecy.

"Self-protection!" The members of the G. A. R. have, in common with all citizens, the just and equal protection of our laws. Besides this, a large amount of special legislation in their behalf has been passed by our national and State legislatures. Besides pensions, there have been homes provided for all indigent soldiers, and millions of money are annually spent to secure their comforts and well-being.

To say that such a body of men need a secret organization for their protection is to do violence to common sense.

Their secret methods are unjust to the great mass of the people, who have a right to consider and participate in whatever concerns the well-being of the soldiers; not only because they pay the bills, but because those who have served the nation have become objects of public concern.

Again, we object to the G. A. R. because it has (we believe) been perverted to selfish and unpatriotic purposes.

There can be little doubt that but for the combined and secret workings of this organization, the estimates for pensions made by Generals Grant and Garfield, and which they declared would never be exceeded, would have been the limit of appropriations. That our annual pension appropriations are now more than four times that estimate; that we pay more for pensions than the cost of the largest standing army in Europe; that each voter pays, on an average, about eleven dollars a year, with the prospect of increase,—is due mainly to the mighty power of "the soldiers' vote," which is given for those who do most to put more money into the pockets of the voters.

Says the Gospel Record and Bible Standard: "We have positive and unequivocal evidence that the 'Grand Army of the Republic' has figured in a secret way, and by secret methods, in the recent election in the State of New York. The methods are not new, but they are inimical to good government, and contrary to the independence and integrity which should surround every man's exercise of the franchise. The method to which we refer is somewhat as follows: The candidates are marked, and 'pastors' are passed around to the comrades, indicating who are G. A. R. men, and who are not. Of course, when thus informed the brethren govern themselves accordingly. No Christian man should join himself to any such combinations."

Of course, it is impossible to tell all that has been done under the veil of secrecy; but if we may judge the secret utterances of the members of the G. A. R. by the words of their orators and their publications, we must conclude that their chief aim has been to reduce the national surplus by methods in which the people of the nation were not to be taken into their confidence or to have any rights except to pay the national and State taxes.

IGNORANCE OR BLASPHEMY—WHICH?

The Fraternal Exchange says that a brother of a Masonic lodge in one of Maine's country towns having died, his lodge adopted the following:

From the lodge of _____ to the Master of the Celestial lodge above, submissive:

WHEREAS, Thou has seen fit in the fulfillment of the last rites of thy great law on earth (as we suppose) to call forth our brother, _____, to that lodge that we are taught exists in thy realm above; and

WHEREAS, We regret the absence of him as a brother and member of our lodge, and feel to sympathize with his kindred and friends, we have mingled with our sadness a feeling of joy in believing that he is received by you into that lodge above and given a position that he merits; and

WHEREAS, We hope this will be received in the same spirit that it is written, that is of submission and prayer, and that we may all at least be worthy of the same honors that we sinerely ask for our departed brother.

Will not all our Masonic readers who care for the Bible and pray, give attention to the above extract from a Masonic paper? What state of mind and heart must a lodge be in thus to address the God of heaven, who made, sustains, and will shortly judge us? The fact is that the unseemly mingling of holy and profane things in lodge rituals, the frequent appointment of Godless men to religious offices, and the pronouncement of burial services over those who have lived and died in unrepented sin, is adapted to produce just such minds as must have framed the above. Paganism not only destroys the heart—it damages the intellect as well.

TAXES FOR THE MASONS.

The property of the Illinois Masonic Orphans' Home is worth about $50,000, and is free from incumbrance. The trustees' report shows that thirty children are cared for there, at an expenditure of only $6,923.64. The net receipts aggregated $8,007.08. The City Council of Chicago presented a piano to the Home. The institution is reported as being well managed and in a very satisfactory condition.

We do not understand this note, which we clip from the Masonic Chronicle for September. Did the City Council vote out of the depleted treasury of the city money to buy this piano for the use of these thirty Masonic orphans? Or did the Council take up a subscription, and thus raise the required sum?

Those who understand how Masons secure positions where the taxes are accessible can understand how public funds are squandered on inefficient servants, or stolen without redress; but it is a new thing to have city councils, even those made up in large part of saloon-keepers, voting public money to buy pianos for secret society orphanages.

WHERE DOES THE CHURCH COME IN?

The world is full of want and sorrow; has many tears to dry. Grow to your full stature in your efforts to neutralize the false distinctions of human society. Join as many lodges as your means and time will permit. Join none whose meetings you cannot frequently attend. Be zealous and active in all, help the distressed, relieve the suffering, and when the heavy hand of misfortune reaches forth and dwells with you, there will be extended to you from all sides that comfort which all the philosophy of time does not offer and which is the greatest solace to a broken and despondent heart, the warm hands of fraternal fellowship. —Southern Lodge Secret.

Will not every Christian read carefully the above extract from a prominent secret society organ? Of course men of the world who do not believe in God or his Son, our Saviour, or in the church, will not see anything to criticize in this suggestion. It is in accordance with the spirit of the age. But what will be the result to the church; and if our religion be true, what will be the result to the souls of dying men?

Is it better for a man to spend the evenings with his wife and children in the home and the church, and, dying, leave the precious legacy of a Christian faith, or to spend his evenings in lodges, often in the company of drinking, smoking, swearing men, and, dying, go down to eternal darkness, leaving $2,000 to children who never heard him pray or had the least soul-help from him? Most women prefer living husbands to insurance on dead ones.

DOES MASONRY CONFER IMMORTALITY?

Whether it does or not, it pretends to do so, and the proof is at hand.

Much reliance is placed upon Town's Lectures on Speculative Freemasonry by Masons, whose good opinion of them will serve to make his testimony all the more valuable for our purpose.

"The origin of the institution, its principles and design," says Mr. Town, "have occupied many pens in every age. But, notwithstanding these numerous as well as great exertions, so often and so ably repeated, much still remains. The subject is not, neither can it be, exhausted. The great and paramount point has never been clearly and fully presented to the world. That point is simply this, that the principles of Speculative Freemasonry have the same co-eternal and unshaken foundation, contain and inculcate in substance the same truth, and propose the same ultimate end, as the doctrines of Christianity taught by divine revelation. . . . If we would add universal celebrity to our institution, the world must be convinced that the foundation is laid in evangelical truth. . . . When evidence is exhibited to this effect, the great point is fully accomplished. The ignorant and superstitious will be constrained to behold the LIGHT; the sober and discreet will rejoice in Masonry as a compendious system of moral and religious instruction; while the pious and devout will embrace it as an auxiliary to human happiness, and a guide to A BLESSED IMMORTALITY." (Pages 13, 14, 15.)

"The absurdity, the folly, the impiety of these pretensions," says an unknown Master Mason, "place them beyond the reach of comment."

Note the assertion that Freemasonry is "a guide to blessed IMMORTALITY." Some modern Christians assure us that "immortality is conditional;" that is, it is reserved only for the faithful disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ. Others, again, as the ancient philosophers, believe that the souls of all men are immortal. All believe that it is a very desirable condition or blessing, however attained. Mr. Town's idea is very practical: Unite with Freemasonry; pay your dues, and live up to your obligations. Result, immortality! Can any other inference be drawn from his assertions?

Thus we have seen that Freemasonry, in search of something to exalt its pretensions and attract the ignorant and unwary, sets up the dogma of salvation through its mysteries; for, as previously shown, Mr. Town states that "the principles of Speculative Freemasonry have the same co-eternal and unshaken foundation—contain and inculcate in substance the same truth—and propose the same ultimate end—as the doctrines of Christianity taught by divine revelation." The end of Christianity is to glorify God by the salvation of men through the sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus Christ, and through his resurrection to confer immortality upon them.

All this, as further shown in the foregoing passages, is conferred upon the true Mason. Additional evidence that the above dogma is accepted as a Masonic truth is found in the Chicago Voice of Masonry for October, liberal extracts from which were printed in the Cynosure for October 22. Now, if the order can, as intimated by Town, confer upon its faithful adherents all the benefits to be derived from Christianity, this salvation, thus secured to Masons, must enter into the being of every member of the fraternity who has solemnly taken upon himself its obligations, and bestows upon them, also, the boon of immortality.

Of course, no Christian, untrammelled by lodge affinities, can or will believe this dogma, which is only a device of Satan.

What is this claim of Freemasonry but anti-Christ in its scriptural meaning, or prophetic form, arrayed against the God of heaven and his blessed Son? Furthermore, can any man, a Mason in his heart—we know that the ritual says that he must be prepared in his heart to become one—ever be forgiven? Has he not committed the unpardonable sin, in attributing to Freemasonry the power to confer immortality, or eternal life, which is the direct gift of God, through Jesus Christ, and planted in the Christian's soul by the ministry of the Holy Ghost? As soon would we believe that there is any connection between Masonry and eternal life, as we would that the offspring of any human being is assured of immortality because his father was a Freemason. The one dogma is as plausible as the other, and both are devilish and irrational in the highest degree.

BARBARISM IN LODGES.

Under the title of "Barbarous and Dangerous Ceremonies of Secret Societies," "J. B. B." contributes to the Chicago Legal News of November 21, the following article:

For over two months Hon. John Garver, one of the leading attorneys of Rockford, Illinois, has been laid up with an injured leg, the cause of the injury not being made public until last week. It is said that he was injured while being barbarously and inhumanly initiated into the mysteries of the society known as the Knights of the Globe. The injury is quite serious, as it is supposed that a blood vessel has been ruptured.

All the cases of Mr. Garver at the October term of the court were either continued or turned over to other attorneys to try.

The frequent injuries inflicted upon candidates in passing through the ceremonies of initiation into secret societies show that such societies should be compelled by law to treat candidates as gentlemen and not to rush them over a rough and rugged road that not only endangers their lives but often inflicts serious bodily injury upon them. Some societies even use the skeletons of the dead to terrify the living. The skeleton of one of the sons of John Brown, who lost his life at Harper's Ferry, was used by the Knights of Pythias in Indiana, to bring candidates to a realizing sense of their danger if they revealed the secrets of the order. Several ribs of the skeleton were broken in the ghastly encounters with candidates. The skeleton was rescued from the gallant Knights and taken by Mrs. John Brown, and his brother, and buried by the side of his father.—J. B. B.

Hon. James B. Bradwell, husband of the esteemed editor of the Legal News, is a Mason of high degree, and has, undoubtedly, traveled the "rough and rugged road" of the Royal Arch initiation ceremony, in the ritual of which this significant expression occurs.

It was in going through this initiation of the Royal Arch degree that on the 10th of January, 1890, in the Masonic lodge room at Huntingdon, W. Va., the Rev. J. W. Johnston, of the M. E. church, was so severely injured that he died soon afterward. The accident occurred at that point in the ceremony where the candidate was being lowered by a tackle into the room below, to rescue the miniature "Ark of the Covenant" from the pile of rubbish in which it had been placed. The depth of the room below was thirteen feet, and by the giving way of the rope he was precipitated to the bottom. At first rendered unconscious from his fall, he began to suffer great pain from external and internal injuries. The initiation was on Friday night, and on the following Sunday morning death came to his relief.

The story of the skeleton of John Brown's son, related in the Legal News, is something new, and aptly illustrates to what depths of barbarism and folly intelligent and reputable men will stoop for the sake of performing the most senseless ceremonies for the perpetuation of lodge devilry.

—Rev. Amos Judson Bailey, of Ogden, Utah, the first Congregational minister ever admitted to the Mormon pulpit in Utah, has long been an esteemed special correspondent of the Christian Cynosure. While a student at Wheaton College, he exhibited an intense interest in the anti-secrecy reform, and labored arduously in calling the first meeting of the friends of this cause—a conference that soon afterwards resulted in the organization of the National Christian Association, and, subsequently, the publication of the Cynosure. Bro. Bailey is just such a man as God wants and can use to his glory.

—Rev. M. A. Gault, of Iowa, agent of the National Reform Association, writes under date of the 2nd instant: "I have been unusually busy the past few months. During October and November I have addressed thirty-six audiences in Platte, Andrew and Harrison counties, Mo. I tried the experiment, in Harrison county, of beginning at the county-seat and addressing meetings in nearly every town and country church. Putting the Sabbath-rest question at the front, I find very few churches that refuse to open their doors for meetings. In August and September I held meetings in Minnesota and Northeastern Iowa, and in Carroll Co., Iowa, where a veteran anti-secret reformer, A. J. Loudenbach, spent a week with me taking me from point to point."

—The very interesting "Experiences of a Mason," by Joseph Hopson, of the British Army, which have been printed in several past numbers of the Cynosure, are continued in this issue, and will be concluded in the next two installments. Truth is mighty to prevail in breaking down the strongholds of Satan, and this writer's testimony against the lodge secus to be a model of candor and intelligence.

—Rev. F. J. Davidson, pastor of St. Matthew's Baptist church (colored) in New Orleans, is preaching a series of sermons, each Monday, Thursday and Sunday evening, beginning on the 6th inst., and ending on the 20th, against unjust class legislation and popular evils of the day. The animus of these sermons is found in a law of the State to provide separate cars for white and colored passengers. On the 20th a grand union meeting is to be held, to raise money to help test the constitutionality of this law, and an attractive program is on the bills. Bro. Davidson's address is 392 Magnolia street, New Orleans, if any of our readers wish to contribute to this object.

THE IOWA STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

LINTON, Ia., December 4, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE AND READERS:—Although a trifle late, I send you a report of the recent meeting of the Iowa Association, opposed to secret societies.

Our convention was held in the United Presbyterian church at Crawfordsville, Iowa, to which the congregation, represented by their pastor, the Rev. H. B. Turner, welcomed us.

The convention was not all that could have been desired; neither was it all that it might have been, had more work been done directly toward it, before it was held. And yet it was a good one, sounding the tocsin on no uncertain key.

The Rev. J. V. Potts, who devoted two months to work in the State, before the convention, was present, and spoke one evening.

The address of Dr. McMichael, President of Monmouth College, was the great occasion of the convention, and closed it. In a most masterly and convincing manner the doctor dealt with the fact that God had organized society, with the family, the church, the state, and that when these institutions were administered as they were intended to be, no room was left for secret associations. He showed not only that they are not necessary, but, what follows as a sequence, they are baneful in their influence. There is one thing to be regretted, and that is that a larger audience did not assemble to hear the admirable address.

The convention elected the following officers: President, Rev. L. Mendenhall, Fairfield, Iowa; Secretary, Rev. T. P. Robb, Linton, Iowa; Treasurer, W. L. Eulow, Birmingham, Iowa. These constitute the Executive Committee.

The following are the resolutions adopted:

1. Resolved, That this Association is in favor of all movements and organizations which tend to the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ upon earth.

2. That we are opposed to all institutions and practices which tend to hinder the coming of Christ's kingdom.

3. That Freemasonry is a system of false worship, antagonistic to Christianity, and, in its governments, is dangerous to our free institutions.

4. That all the minor secret orders are built on the same principle as Masonry, and are therefore to be condemned.

5. That standard Masonic law and literature prove it a sinful institution, beyond doubt or cavil.

6. That we urge all patriots and Christians to be active and energetic in helping to forward this anti-secret reform.

I may say that the Executive Committee has under consideration a plan by which we hope to make these resolutions, especially the last, operative. We hope to secure the services of many friends of the cause, who will each, without remuneration, speak on the subject several times during the winter. If this is accomplished, the cause may be expected to grow in Iowa.

T. P. ROBB,
Secretary I. C. A.

INCREASE THE CIRCULATION OF THE CYNOSURE.

There is no more important work. Few will question but that the gravest crime against man is to cut him off from a Mediator between himself and his God. The Bible treats it so. Thousands of idolaters lay dead in the wilderness, that Israel might not forget how the world religions are regarded by the Almighty Father, who so loved the world that he gave his only Son as its redeemer.

These world religions have their altars in every hamlet of our loved land! If the plague was staid among the Israelites, largely because of the faithfulness of one man against the religion of Baal-peor, what ought every reader of the Cynosure to be doing over against his own house and village?

If you warn not your neighbor, "his blood will I require at your hands."

Thank God for his faithful ones, who have not labored in vain for their friends, and have not ceased to labor that the Cynosure might bear faithful testimony against the modern form of Baalism. There are thousands who will like the Cynosure if you will patiently labor for it.

Will you not send for sample-copies and renew the battle at once, "in his name?"

Do not fail to read, on page 13, WHAT WE WANT, for a plan is often equal to half the campaign.

We are encouraged by the unsolicited commendations of the readers of our paper, and that you may also be helped, we append a few:

Nov. 24, 1891, M. L. W., of Missouri, writes: "Mr. Boardman's article converted one minister here. I have been in the coils of Odd-fellowship, having taken all the degrees; but now denounce and reveal its secret work. I am willing to work for Christ."

Nov. 11, 1891, L. D., of Oklahoma, writes: "Your paper has been a source of constant blessing and enlightenment to my wife and myself since we had the good fortune to have it pressed upon us by dear brother Stoddard."

Nov. 10, 1891, Mrs. N. R. Weede, of Kansas, writes: "We used to think we had to take a Prohibition paper, but the Cynosure is sound on that question. . . . We manage to get along without the Voire. We find that secret societies are one of the chief hindrances to the enforcement of the Prohibitory law in this place, and it is quite likely true of other places in Kansas."

The Cynosure has known no more faithful friend than Rev. M. A. Gault, agent of the National Reform Association, who writes under date of the 2nd inst: "Allow me to say that the Cynosure is more and more a welcome visitor in our home, to which it has come regularly since 1875, and you have, by your life-long devotion to the anti-secret cause, won the undying confidence of the friends of the movement. Our times demand men who are immovably anchored to great moral principles, who will stand like a rock on the ocean's shore though the waves of centuries may rush and dash against its breast."

Under date of Nov. 27th, ult., our talented correspondent, Miss E. E. Flagg, writes: "Have just opened the Cynosure of Nov. 26th, with Dr. Gordon's portrait in it, and really think it the best number I have seen yet, which is saying a good deal."

A private letter, dated Dec. 4th inst., from one of the oldest and best-known Christian reformers of the present day, contains the following complimentary notice of the Christian Cynosure for December 3, 1891: "I have read the last Cynosure more than any number for a long time, and am charmed with it. I seldom get time to read beyond the ninth page, but Mrs. Havergal's exceedingly able article ('The Conditions of Effectual Prayer'), and Florence Nightingale's care for and saving of the shepherd's dog, drew me on. The news from the East is grand."

The W. C. T. U. has gained in membership 10,369 during the year. Of this increase Ohio furnished 1,800, Illinois 1,600, Oregon 1,000, Indiana 750, California 650, Texas 350, while in Virginia the membership was doubled, and Japan gained 960.

THE HOME.

"WAITING FOR CHRIST."

Hark! a strain of thrilling music,
Floating on the air
Like a distant trumpet echo,
Greets my listening ear.
Christian, can thy soul interpret
What that music saith to thee?
Listen: "Lo, the Bridegroom cometh!
Trim thy lamp and watchful be."

Look! a faint and far-off glimmer
From the quiet stars
Falls within a cheerless dungeon,
Through the prison bars.
Christian, canst thou read the message
Penciled by those lines of light?
"Christ, the Morning Star, is rising;
Soon he'll come to end thy night."

List! a sound of "freedom" ringing
In a captive's ear!
Quick his fetters fall asunder—
His Deliverer's near!
Christian, can thy heart responsive
Answer with exulting tone
To the Saviour's "I come quickly,"
"Even so, Lord Jesus, come?"

Sound in ears benumbed and heavy,
Jesus' dying love;
Point sad eyes, grown dim with weeping,
To the heavens above;
Show them how the crimson glory
Deepens o'er the eastern hills;
Bid them listen to the sounding
Of Christ's coming chariot wheels.

FALSE CHARITY.

Anyone seeking for the truth in regard to the workings of secret societies, can soon satisfy himself. For convenience, let us take the Masons as a sample. Their great claim is their boasted benevolence; but it is evident that this is nothing more than the essence of selfishness. They first exclude all paupers, or those needing assistance, and then charge exorbitant fees to others. They profess to help the widows and orphans; but a case with which I am personally acquainted will illustrate how it is done. The family were in poor circumstances, but the father, having paid in his dues for years, died in good standing in the order. They came in great pomp and parade to bury him. They ordered a fine coffin and made all the display desirable. After it was all over, they made the poor homeless widow sell her only cow to help pay the expenses. Was that benevolence? Here was a grand opportunity for them to exercise their boasted charity to the poor and needy, but they were "weighed in the balance and found wanting." Let us all add our mite, that this system may be held up to the world in its true light. Yours for the right.
—Aunt Alice, in the Free Press.

A NEEDED AGITATION.

Public attention is slowly arousing as to the enormity of the "sweating system" and its accompaniments. A shock ran through Rev. O. P. Gifford's audience last Sunday, when, in his striking way, he said that the citizens of Boston were wearing the bed-clothes of the lazaroni.

We saw in a single afternoon's visit to the North End, and that to the quarters which had in part been touched by Christian influences, enough to convince us of the essential truth of the remark, and the reports of investigations made by others, now at our disposal, disclose a state of affairs of which many do not dream.

Mr. Flower's testimony in the Arena is already before the public. In his visits he found a woman supporting an invalid husband and two children. She was completing an enormous pair of "custom-made pants," of very fine blue cloth. He says:

"The suit would probably bring sixty or sixty-five dollars, yet her employer graciously informed his poor white slave that as the garment was so large he would give her an extra cent."

He says further:

"The little children are already practically machines; day by day they engage in the same work with much the monotony of an automatic instrument propelled by blind force. This conclusion was impressively emphasized by the following touching remark of a child of 12 years of age, who was with her mother busily sewing: 'I am 43 years old to-morrow,' remarked the mother, 'and,' said Mr. English, 'I shall be 42 next week.' 'Oh, dear,' broke in the child, 'I should think people would grow tired of living so many years.' Was ever utterance more pathetic?"

Dr. Bank's recent book, "White Slaves," does not, as a whole, put the case against the "sweat shops" more strongly than the committee appointed by the English House of Lords put it, or than the Massachusetts Legislature.

The ordinary pleas in defence of this whole system and the usages that have grown around it, fall to the ground when confronted by Christian ideas. These things cannot stand before the stern and blasting public sentiment that is sure to rise against them when the real condition of affairs is thoroughly known.

A public meeting of the citizens of Boston, at which the whole matter may be thoroughly ventilated, is under consideration in influential quarters, but whatever form the movement may assume, it is plain that it has been undertaken none too soon, and that it should not stop before a radical reform is effected.—Exchange.

CHILDREN AS TEACHERS.

The little children, I sometimes think, are God's best teachers. One day, some years ago, I was coming out of a restaurant in New York with my wife. I stopped for a moment to pay my bill. While doing this I heard the voice of a child in terror crying: "Mamma! mamma!" Before I had fairly time to look about me and see what it meant, my wife, with woman's instinct quicker than man's slow-moving mind, had divined its meaning, and had caught the hand of the little child separated from her mother in the throng, and had uttered a word of good cheer and hope to her. It was a beautiful picture I caught as I turned. I have often wished that I could paint it. The child, taking the hand of the unknown and looking up into the face of calm and confident love that looked down on hers, the diamond tears stopped on the eyelash, the cry halted at the parted lips, and though the little heart still beat quick, the child drank in the life of confident courage from the unknown who held her by the hand. She knew nothing about her protector; she believed nothing about her; she received no instruction from her; mystical courage passed from the one heart to the other, and made it brave. In less time than it has taken you, reader, to read this little incident, the mother had come hurrying back for her child, and the child, crying again with the same words, but with what different tone, "Mamma! mamma!" sprang from the hand of the stranger into the arms of her mother, and the two disappeared. So the human race, lost, homesick and longing, cries in despair for its Father. So to it, in its terror and its need, comes out of the Infinite the Unknown, and holds out a hand of greeting and of strength. To have faith in Christ is not merely to receive his instruction, still less to receive the instruction of others concerning him. It is to take his hand, look up into his face of love, receive from his strong personality courage and hope and truth and righteousness and love, and wait, in the assurance of faith which his life has imparted, and is forever imparting, for the appearing of God our Father to take us to himself, and make us finally and forever his own. This is the Real Presence; this is to eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of God.—Lyman Abbott.

HOW SOME HEATHEN WORSHIP.

The people called Gallas, in Africa, worship a large tree, that grows on the side of one of their rivers. Crowds come from every part of the country, to ask of it everything they desire; one asks for health; another, for good crops; and another, that he may overcome his enemies. Only the men are allowed to present their prayers at this spot. They think that females are not good enough to pray to the great tree.

Another heathen tribe, called Tartars, have a praying-machine. It is a round, hollow box, fixed upright like a grindstone; a string leads from it to what is called a spindle. By treading on the spindle, the machine turns round, just like a grindstone, when men sharpen their knives. In the inside of the box are rolled up long pieces of parchment, joined together, sometimes to the length of several hundred feet.

On the parchment a prayer is written over and over again, perhaps as many as a thousand times. When the box goes round the prayers are moved around. The heathen think that this is very pleasing to their gods, and will surely bring down a blessing. This is praying by wholesale. Every time the box is turned the Tartar considers that he has offered one thousand prayers. When we read of such things it should fill us with pity for these poor, ignorant creatures. It should also make us glad and grateful that we have the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, which tells us of the true God, and how we may be saved.—Selected.

NO ONE IS WITHOUT INFLUENCE.

Some people fall discouraged on the highway of life because they cannot be this or that great or eminent person. Why should they not be willing to be themselves?

No person is without influence. Why not make the most of what you have? Since you cannot grasp that which you wish, why let what you have slip through your fingers? No person in the world is exactly like you. You have your own faults, but you have also your own excellencies, individual to yourself. Give them air.

Because you are not a poet, should you not be a good merchant? Because you cannot go to college, should you therefore forswear the alphabet? Because you cannot build a palace, should you not rejoice in your own humble roof, and that because it is your own? Will not the sun also shine into your windows if you do not obstinately persist in shutting it out? If you cannot have a whole hot house full of flowers, may you not have one sweet rose? Accept thankfully whatever blessings you have and try to make the most of them.—Anonymous.

HOW TO MAKE LIFE HAPPY.

Take time; it is no use to foam or fret, or do as the angry housekeeper who has got hold of the wrong key, and pushes, shakes and rattles it about the lock until both are broken and the door is still unopened.

The chief comfort of life lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in cultivating our undergrowth of small pleasures.

Try to regard present vexations as you would regard them a month hence.

Since we cannot get what we like, let us like what we can get.

It is not riches, it is not poverty; it is human nature that is the trouble.

The world is like a looking-glass. Laugh at it, and it laughs back; frown at it, and it frowns back.

Angry thoughts canker the mind, and dispose it to the worst temper in the world—that of fixed malice and revenge. It is while in this temper that most men become criminals.—Selected.

BITS OF ADVICE TO GIRLS.

WHAT TO AVOID.

A loud, affected, whining, harsh or shrill tone of voice.

Extravagances in conversation—such phrases as "awfully this," "beastly that," "loads of time," "don't you know," "hate" for "dislike," etc.

Sudden exclamations of annoyance, surprise and joy, such as "bother!" "gracious!" "how jolly!" yawning when listening to any one.

Talking on family matters, even to bosom friends.

Attempting any vocal or instrumental piece of music you cannot execute with ease.

Crossing your letters.

Making a short, sharp nod with the head, intended to do duty as a bow.

WHAT TO CULTIVATE.

An unaffected, low, distinct, silver-toned voice.

The art of pleasing those around you, and seeming pleased with them and all they may do for you.

The charm of making little sacrifices quite naturally, as if of no account to yourself.

The habit of making allowances for the opinions, feelings or prejudices of others.

An erect carriage, a sound body.

A good memory for faces, and facts connected with them, thus avoiding giving offence through not recognizing nor bowing to people, nor saying to them what had best be left unsaid.

The art of listening without impatience to prosy talkers, and smiling at the twice-told tale or joke.—Selected.

IF! IF!

If every boy and every girl
 Arising with the sun,
 Should plan this day to do alone
 The good deeds to be done;
 Should scatter smiles and kindly words,
 Strong, helping hands should lend;
 And to each other's wants and cries
 Attentive ears should lend;
 If every man and woman, too,
 Should join these workers small,
 O what a flood of happiness
 Upon our earth would fall!
 How many homes would sunny be
 Which now are filled with care!
 And joyous, smiling faces, too,
 Would greet us everywhere.
 I do believe the very sun
 Would shine more clear and bright,
 And every little twinkling star
 Would shed a softer light.
 But we, instead, must watch and see
 If other folks are true,
 And thus neglect so much that God
 Intends for us to do.

TEMPERANCE.

POOR FOOD, OVERWORK AND DRUNKENNESS.

The prevention of alcoholism is a physiological life. The cure of alcoholism is a return to a physiological life. The ways by which either the prevention or cure of alcoholism are to be attained are as multiform as the individuals involved and the varieties of human existence. At another time we have called attention to the part that good food, well cooked, so as to be easily digested, plays in the prevention or cure of this disorder. We know of no such potent means for preventing alcoholism as the presence upon every table, at every meal, of such food. Labors toward this end should be encouraged by all who desire to see alcoholism wiped out of the community. Another means of preventing alcoholism is the avoidance of exhaustion. The overworked literary, scientific or business individual must get rid of worry and fatigue, as he feels that he must continue the race though he knows the penalty. A hopeful outlook for the future is the greater attention given to this matter. It is needful to urge the laborer to avoid exertion beyond his strength and thus avoid the nervous exhaustion that entices to the consumption of alcohol, etc. We have no faith in any specific for drunkenness.—Dr. Connor, in the Lancet.

PRACTICAL PROHIBITION.

There are many people in the temperance reform movement who cannot agree with each other as to the best means to be employed to advance the cause of total abstinence. Some there are who profess to believe that by statutory prohibition of the liquor traffic alone is to be found a remedy for the evil under consideration. Others adhere to the old idea of moral suasion and public sentiment as the very best means to cure the disease which has fastened itself on the body politic; and all believe that intemperance is a curse for which the open saloon is very largely responsible. How best to control the monster is a subject which may well engage the attention of the most brilliant minds among the brightest of men or women in this last decade of a most wonderful century. The apologists for the traffic usually advocate its regulation, seeming to forget that if it is a good thing there is no consistency in imposing a tax upon it, and if it be an evil the State becomes a party to the evil by permitting its continuance for a price. On the other hand, the extremists, who advocate the claims of a political party with prohibition as its principal object, seem to forget that no law can ever be enforced unless backed up by a preponderance of public opinion, and a law not enforced is a positive hindrance to the progress of the movement and the ultimate triumph of prohibition principles. What is wanted is more practical prohibitionists.

There are sections of country where the educational work of the temperance movement has been thorough, and where the people are ready to enforce temperance legislation by the selection of public officials in sympathy with total abstinence. The State of Kansas furnishes an example. So firmly established are the principles of prohibition in the Grasshopper State that all political parties have accepted the inevitable, and the question has ceased to be an issue in State campaigns. The alleged failure of prohibition in Massachusetts was due to the fact that the officers of the law whose duty it was to enforce the statutes were not in sympathy with it, and only winked at its flagrant violation; and the people were not sufficiently unanimous in support of the law themselves to turn the enemies of temperance out of office and put friends in their places. In the State of Georgia a few years ago the Legislature enacted a local option law, and under its operations nearly the entire State, voting by counties, drove out the accursed traffic. Even in the city of Atlanta the temperance people were successful for two years in closing the saloons, but at the end of that time the liquor powers overcame them, and the city once more became a stench in the nostrils of its most respectable citizens. But the sentiment created by these years of local option in Georgia have borne fruit at last. The State Legislature has just passed, and the governor has signed, a bill prohibiting the manufacture or sale of spirituous or malt liquors within three miles of any school-house or church. Of course the enemies of temperance will claim that the law is unconstitutional. But we predict that the statute will be upheld by the courts. The people are fast coming to believe it to be a legitimate function of government to protect the morals as well as the property of its people. The Legislature of Georgia evidently took its cue from the act of the Fifty-first Congress prohibiting the manufacture or sale of liquor within one mile of the Soldiers' Home in the District of Columbia. Now let the work be extended until the charmed circle round the Soldiers' Home shall embrace the entire District of Columbia, and until every State in the Union shall do as Georgia has done in protecting the people from the contaminating influences of the saloon. If the school-houses of Georgia are not close enough together to result in complete prohibition under the present law, then there should be more school-houses erected. What is wanted in the South, as well as in the North, is more school-rooms and fewer bar-rooms. Education is the watchword, and with it the liquor traffic cannot stand before the wrath of an enlightened people. The temperance people of Georgia have shown themselves to be as wise as serpents in their movements to bring about the present practical solution of a vexed question, and are deserving of commendation. Their example may well be followed by reformers in other States.—Rehabite Advocate.

THE ONLY WAY OUT.

At the recent National W. C. T. U. Convention, says Woman's Column, Frances E. Willard sketched vividly the evil condition of our politics, and said:

President Andrew D. White says: "Without the slightest exaggeration, and with very few exceptions, the city governments of the United States are the very worst in Christendom—the most expensive, the most inefficient and the most corrupt."

I do not see any way out for this country, which cannot very well go back on its position as to manhood suffrage, except to improve the quality of the voting by admitting its intelligent women, and barring out the ignorant women, thus putting a premium upon knowledge and character as conditions of the voter. It is my opinion that if matters go on as they have done for the next ten or twenty years, the best manhood of the land will come to the women, imploring them to accept the franchise and deliver the country. Last year, half a million foreigners, of the baser sort, immigrated hither. We cannot indefinitely stand such a strain as that, and in no way can we bring the American element into our governmental life except by introducing the women. Such a test as I intimate would bar out the ignorant colored women and foreigners, and place the balance of power in the hands of the abler classes, mentally and morally, among the men and women of the republic. This would be done in no spirit of unfriendliness toward the classes debarred, but only to give them the highest possible motive for improving their minds—namely, the promise of participation in the government—and in order that, when thus improved, we may have a decent government for their participation and development.

PROHIBITION IN IOWA.

We print in this issue three articles which aim to explain the recent Republican loss of governor in Iowa. The said articles imply that there is room for explanation, since if the result had been foregone there would have been no occasion to explain that result. We frankly admit that the result was a complete surprise to us. We regarded the election of a prohibition ticket as foregone. It is certain that no Methodist minister, or member of our church, failed to stand erect on the vital issues that shook that noble State of Iowa. Methodism is true as against the enemies of prohibition, and neither our church nor its organ, the Northwestern, has anything with respect to which it needs to reproach itself. That main battle was fought out years ago, and in times to come the same old cohorts, this paper included, may be counted upon for resistance to the death. It would seem that the Legislature is safe for prohibition, whatever be the preferences of the governor-elect. Woe to him who resists the will of Iowans, expressed more than once or twice. The little red school-house is sure to prevail against the blood-red saloon.—Northwestern M. E. Christian Advocate.

REPUBLICAN PROHIBITIONISTS.

Is the National Republican party preparing to adopt prohibition as a political issue? If the Republican party is not coquetting with prohibition why does it make Mr. Clarkson of Iowa, thoroughly identified with prohibition in that State, the chairman of its national committee? Mr. Clarkson aided his party in Iowa to place the prohibition law on the statute book. He stood with his party two years ago in preventing its repeal. He opposed Horace Boies as a proponent of a rational license law. Like his party in Iowa, he is committed completely to prohibition. It cannot be said in fairness that the Republican committee made him chairman because he is an Iowa Republican-Prohibitionist. Indeed, it may be claimed in some quarters that the committee's action was taken in spite of Clarkson's well-known record. But the fact remains that quasi indorsement has been given by the central authority of the party to Republican alliance with prohibition whenever and wherever it can be attempted with any show of party advantage.—Chicago Times.

THE DEVICES OF SIN.

An exchange records the following horrible device of the liquor fiend:

The latest method of selling liquor under a guise to deceive the authorities and evade the law was described at a Christian Workers' Convention a few days ago. One of the workers said in her search for neglected children for a Sunday-school in a certain city she found one house with crape on the door. Upon careful investigation she discovered that no one was dead within, but liquor was being sold on Sunday, and this scheme was resorted to in order to deceive the police, who would not be attracted by the entrance of many callers, supposing that they were going in to see the corpse. No other trade drives those who pursue it to so many "ways that are dark" and tricks that are vain."

One of the official documents of the Salvation Army is the following: "I do here and now declare that I will abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquors and also from the habitual use of opium, laudanum, morphia, and all other baneful drugs, except when in illness such drugs shall be ordered for me by a doctor."

Chicago has one saloon for every 200 people, while there is but one church for every 3,000 people. Where such is the condition we can expect very little respect for the Sabbath.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Jesus' first appearance in Galilee.—vs. 1-4. The disciples were now in Galilee, in obedience to the command of their risen Lord, who had promised to meet them there. This was the message of the angels at the sepulchre: "Behold, he goeth before you into Galilee." Yet they seemed to have tarried for quite a while in Jerusalem. It was not until their faith had been confirmed so that even Thomas, the most incredulous, could no longer doubt, that they were ready to return to what was, in the case of most of them, their native province, and there wait patiently till he should manifest himself; just as they afterwards waited in Jerusalem for the gift of the Holy Spirit. As a rule, the greater the work God lays upon his servants, the longer must be the waiting time before they are prepared to take it up. The future was all shrouded in mystery to the disciples. They had found out their mistake in dreaming of a temporal Messiah; and though just before his ascension they asked, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" it is plain that the evil spirit of jealous striving among them as to which should be greatest in that kingdom was effectually laid. In proportion as they had now more exalted views of Christ and his work, they had humbler ideas of themselves. At Peter's suggestion they were willing to return to their old employment of fishing. It was true they were waiting for their Lord, but this is no reason why they should eat the bread of idleness. We may note (1) Honest labor never interferes with, but rather helps, our waiting upon the Lord. (2) It is in the way of our daily duty that Christ manifests himself. (3) We are to "occupy till he come," and however humble our work, let us be found doing it like faithful servants.

2. The draught of fishes.—vs. 5-10. No earthly glory seems to have attended these appearances of the risen Christ. It was his words and acts, and the mysterious way in which he came and went, that marked him out as being no longer in the flesh. Standing at some distance from them on the shore, in the early dawn, it was not strange that they failed to recognize in him anything more than a would-be purchaser of the fish which had cluded their nets after toiling all the night until day found them weary and disheartened, but yet ready to obey the stranger's counsel: "Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find." They might have said: "How can this man, who perhaps never went fishing in his life, counsel us who have been fishermen from our youth? and after a whole night's fruitless toil, why should we let down our nets at his bidding, in all likelihood only to fail again?" Let us all, as Christian workers—and none who profess the name of Christ have any right to be anything else—take a lesson (1) Not to be above learning better ways and methods even from those who seem to be standing on the shore, mere idle spectators of our labor. We must not forget that their very position gives them a vantage-ground from which they can often discern the cause of our failure better than we. (2) Let us not be weary in well-doing. Many of the grandest workers for Christ have had their night of toil, when they drew up empty nets; but, as with these disciples, the darkest hours of waiting were just before the dawn. There are missionaries whose trophies for Christ can scarcely be counted, who labored through long years of discouragement, winning scarce a single convert. But they would not give up, and so in the end they triumphed; and the weary night of heathen darkness had its morning. It is this quality of perseverance which tells in Christian work more than any amount of zeal and enthusiasm without it. Up to this time they had not recognized the mysterious stranger. Only when they found the net so heavy with fishes that they could not draw it to land did it dawn on John's mind, and then on Peter's—slower in spiritual intuition, but quicker in action, "It is the Lord." So Jesus is with us as much in our sorrow as in our joy; our defeat as in our triumph; but it is when the blessing comes for which we have longed, and prayed, and worked, that we are most apt to recognize him, and say with the beloved disciple, "It is the Lord."

3. Jesus and his guests.—vs. 11-14. Very grateful to these chilled and dripping fishermen, no doubt, was the fire and breakfast which they found waiting for them on the shore; but to their hearts, sick with hope deferred, how passing sweet must have been this new evidence of their risen Saviour's identity! This care and thoughtful consideration for their bodily comfort proclaimed him to be the same Jesus;—"Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day and forever." It seems to have cleared away every lingering doubt (if any existed) in the minds of the disciples. In awed and blissful silence we can see them sitting down while those dear hands, pierced for them and for us, distributed the food in the old way they remembered so well. Christ has promised to be the guest of every believer, but once let him into our hearts, and we shall find that we are his guests instead; and we shall need no testimony that "it is the Lord," beyond the fact of his presence abiding in us, and providing for our every want. This is the inner witness which we dare not question, any more than the disciples dared ask the risen Jesus, "Who art thou?"

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—At the Baptist Social Union in London, England, Friday, November 13, the following resolution was adopted: "That the proposal to hold an International Conference of Baptists in Chicago, in 1893, the year of the exhibition, meets with hearty approval and sympathy of the London Baptist Social Union, and that the president, Colonel Griffin, be requested to intimate the same to the president of the Chicago Baptist Social Union with fraternal greetings."

EVANGELICAL.

—In the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, the eighty-three young men who are students represent eleven denominations and fourteen States besides twenty-six from England and Canada. And there are fifty-six women from seventeen States.

FREE METHODIST.

—General Superintendent E. P. Hart has decided that only the Mission Board of the church has a right to appoint foreign missionaries. This decision brings him into antagonism with the "Pentecost Bands" of the church, who recently proposed to send one of their number abroad as a missionary.

FRIENDS.

—A site has been bought for a meeting-house in Constantinople. It cost $1,550, and double that sum will be required for the building.

LUTHERAN.

—The United Norwegian church is now firmly united, and will be one of the leading bodies of the Lutheran church in this country. The recent Synod adopted articles of complete incorporation, whilst the consideration of the constitution was left to the next session. Fifty congregations were added to the body during this meeting, and twenty-six young men were solemnly ordained to the office of the ministry. It was decided to keep the preparatory school at Augsburg for the present, and to establish a teachers' seminary in the place offering the best inducement. The synod took a forward step in deciding that English churches should be organized at once wherever necessary. Twelve thousand dollars were appropriated for Home Missions, and a mission superintendent was elected at a salary of $1,200 per year, with the understanding, of course, that he give his whole time to the work.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The six New England conferences have a total membership of 105,168, showing an increase during the past year of less than one per cent. Two of these conferences show a decrease.

—Beatrice, Neb., reports a successful union meeting in which six churches joined, and which were conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall of Philadelphia, for three weeks. Three hundred professed faith in Christ. Twenty-six united with the church, and as many more will join it as the direct result of this meeting. Dr. Munhall is an earnest and efficient worker.

—The Methodist church has extended so rapidly, and the requirement for preachers has been so great, that they now find that only fifteen per cent of their ministers have had any sort of training in theological schools. Under the lead of Bishop Vincent, they are trying to mend matters by organizing "Itinerant Clubs" and "Conference Schools of Theology." This may meet a temporary need, but nothing can take the place of regular colleges and Bible schools for preparing men for the ministry thoroughly.

—The Methodists in Japan will petition the next General Conference for a bishop to reside in that land and for the establishment of a branch of the Methodist Book Concern in Tokyo.

MISSIONS.

—The American Missionary Association closes the forty-fifth year of its history with gratitude for its enlarged opportunities of service and the increased support which has enabled it to meet so many of them. Three years ago its current receipts were $376,216.88; last year they were $408,038.97; this year they have been $430,974.65. This sum does not include the income of the Daniel Hand fund. The aggregate of the means put into the charge of the Association this year is $482,419.21.

—The M. E. General Missionary Committee received for the year ending Oct. 31, 1891, $1,228,888, which splendid sum is an increase of $93,616 over last year. The above total comes from conference collections to the sum of $1,078,544 (an increase of $26,902); legacies, $117,515 (an increase of 58,834); lapsed annuities, $16,436 (an increase of $12,395), and sundry receipts of $16,436 (a decrease of $4,513). The last general missionary committee authorized the treasurer to receive sums for missionary work in India to be expended as donors prefer. This plan has brought $22,169, which sum has been forwarded, while $5,975 already given remain to be similarly forwarded. Missionary funds from conference collections have steadily increased since 1882, when the total was $629,381, to 1891, when the conference collections sum up $1,088,544.

—The Missionary Reporter is authority for the following figures referring to Protestant missionary work throughout the world. There are 500 separate fields containing 20,000 stations supplied by 40,000 missionaries. There are 25 Sabbath-school scholars to each station, or 500,000 in all. There is an average of 50 native communicants in each station, making a total of 1,000,000. To these are to be added about 2,000,000 adherents.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Madison Avenue Presbyterian church, New York City, under the leadership of its pastor, Dr. Chas. L. Thompson, proposes to transform itself into a "People's church." To carry on this new line of work the sum of $15,000 has been raised. Besides the regular church services and the Sunday-school, there will be other lines of activity with a force of workers supplemental to the pastorate. The pastor will have an assistant and there will be Bible readers and visitors who will do missionary work within certain prescribed districts. This new movement contemplates the evangelization of the unchurched masses.

—The New York Presbytery have decided to recommend to the General Assembly that the question of revision of the Westminster Confession be dropped, and that steps be taken to secure for use in the denomination a simple form of statement upon the several doctrines of the Christian faith. In such a case the Confession will stand, in itself and in its history, as a notable chapter in the annals of Christianity.

—The case seems to be this: In his inaugural address, Dr. Briggs explained away some of the Bible. In his defense before presbytery, he explained away some of his address. In his recent sermon he explained away his defense. But that will cause no trouble. When he comes before Synod he can explain away his recent sermon.—The Midland.

—It is said that a movement for a separate Presbyterian church for the colored people of the South is meeting with favor, especially in the South church.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—The Society of the Holy Ghost has for its object the conversion of the savages of Africa. The vast missions assigned by the Holy See, to the Holy Ghost Fathers, extend 4,000 miles on the West Coast of Africa, and penetrate 2,000 miles into the interior, and on the East Coast, 1,700 miles. There are 430 missionaries and nine bishops in the Society of the Holy Ghost, and 400 nuns laboring for this great work in Africa.

—The Pope has formally established a Catholic hierarchy in Japan, with the metropolitan at Tokyo and suffragans at Nagasaki, Osaka, and Hakodati. The Vatican has received from the interior government the fullest assurances that absolute liberty will be allowed to the Catholic church in its work of evangelization.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The National Convention of the American Sabbath Union will be held in the Central Presbyterian church of Des Moines, Iowa, Wednesday and Thursday, December 16 and 17. Col. Elliot F. Shepard, President, New York, will preside, and celebrated speakers are expected, including Bishop Newman of Omaha, Drs. Herrick Johnson and P. S. Henson of Chicago, Dr. Knowles of New York, and others of National and State reputation. All friends of the American Sabbath are urged to attend.

—The U. P. church will probably have a second congregation in Boston, Massachusetts. About 60 members of the Reformed Presbyterian church have withdrawn and will ask to be organized into a separate congregation under the care of Boston Presbytery.

Which—Man or Shirt?

Has the man grown, or has the flannel shrunk? Usually, the shirt's to blame. No, not that, either—but the way it's washed.

Flannels ought to be washed with Pearline. If you're buying new ones, start right. Have them washed only with Pearline (direction on every package) and they won't shrink. As for the old ones, Pearline can't make them any larger, but begin with it at once; it will keep them from growing smaller. It will keep them from the wear of the washboard, too.

Danger As one wash is sufficient to ruin flannels, great care should be exercised as to the use of the many imitations which are being offered by unscrupulous grocers or peddlers. Pearline is never peddled. 314 James Pyle, N. Y.

HOME AND HEALTH.

HOME REMEDIES.

It is said that a strong solution of epsom salts in water will cure burns if applied immediately.

To remove warts, wet them thoroughly with oil of cinnamon three times a day until they disappear.

Beef suet boiled in fresh milk is very good for a cough. Take small quantities at a time, but often.

Headache almost always yields to the simultaneous application of hot water to the feet and back of the neck.

Alcohol is a good remedy for burns if applied immediately. Keep the burn moist with it for two hours.

A simple remedy for hiccough is a lump of sugar, saturated with vinegar. It will stop it in nine cases out of ten.

Cramps in the stomach and many other minor complaints, as well as many more important ones, can be cured by a stimulant.

To cure cold sores keep them dry from saliva and touch them once very carefully with carbolic acid, and then apply alum occasionally.

Hot water taken freely half an hour before bedtime is helpful in case of constipation, and has a most soothing effect upon the stomach.

When poisonous matter has been swallowed induce vomiting at once. Luke-warm water containing a little mustard or salt is a prompt emetic.

A fresh egg well beaten, sweetened and flavored to taste and added to two-fifths of a goblet of milk, is a form of nourishment acceptable to invalids.

Turpentine will take the soreness out of corns, and bunions, and will sometimes cure soft corns. Be careful about using too much of it, for it will weaken the joints.

It is a mistake to give a glass of lime water and milk soon after or before an invalid takes a dose of calomel. The action of lime water changes the character of calomel.

When children have taken cold there is nothing better to give them than molasses, butter and vinegar. To half a cup of molasses take a tablespoonful of butter and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, cook a few minutes and give a little frequently. Quite young children can take this.

A strong solution of extract of licorice destroys the disagreeable taste of aloes. Peppermint water disguises the nauseous taste of epsom salts. Milk is a good abater of the bitter taste of Peruvian bark, and cloves that of senna. Castor oil cannot be tasted if beaten and thoroughly mixed with the white of an egg.

SOME THINGS WORTH KNOWING.

That salt fish is quickest and best freshened by soaking in sour milk.

That milk which has changed may be sweetened or rendered fit for use again by stirring in a little soda.

That salt will curdle new milk; hence in preparing milk porridge, gravies, etc., the salt should not be added until the dish is prepared.

That fresh meat beginning to sour, will sweeten if placed out of doors in the cool air over night.

That a tablespoonful of turpentine boiled with your white clothes, will greatly aid the whitening process.

That clean boiling water will remove tea stains. Pour the water through the stain and thus prevent it spreading over the fabric.

The wise man paints his house in the fall or winter. This is preferable to spring or summer. The reason is that the paint has time to harden before the hot sun dries out the oil, causing the paint to crack.

That beeswax and salt will make your rusty flatirons as clean and smooth as glass. Tie a lump of wax in a rag and keep it for that purpose. When the irons are hot rub them first with the wax rag and then scour with a paper or cloth sprinkled with salt.

The importance of purifying the blood cannot be overestimated, for without pure blood you cannot enjoy good health.

At this season nearly every one needs a good medicine to purify, vitalize, and enrich the blood, and Hood's Sarsaparilla is worthy your confidence. It is peculiar in that it strengthens and builds up the system, creates an appetite, and tones the digestion, while it eradicates disease. Give it a trial.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is sold by all druggists. Prepared by C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

CROUPY SOUNDS

At night, from baby's crib, are distracting to parents who are at a loss for a medicine equal to the emergency. Not so with those who have Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in the house. A dose of this medicine affords certain and speedy relief. To cure colds, coughs, sore throat, asthma, bronchitis, hoarseness, and the various disorders of the breathing apparatus, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has no equal. It soothes the inflamed tissue, expectorates, and induces repose. Cap. U. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children were subject."

Call For

"I use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my practice, and pronounce it to be unequalled as a remedy for colds and coughs."—J. G. Gordon, M. D., Carroll Co., Virginia.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Sold by all Druggists; Price $1; six bottles $5.

FARM NOTES.

AGRICULTURAL.

The corn crop of the United States for 1891 will not be less than thirty-one bushels for each man, woman and child in the country.

The average yield per acre of potatoes for the country this year is estimated at 93.9 bushels, the largest since 1883, when it was 91 bushels.

A twenty-four-year-old Kansas maiden with the aid of another woman, does all the work on her 140-acre farm, which she owns free from debt.

The past season I raised fifteen hundred bushels of ears of good sound corn on eleven acres. I planted four feet apart each way, with five stalks to the hill. I plow in the fall, and scatter all coarse and fine manure on top; cultivate each way as soon as the rows can be seen across the field. I cut and grind my stalks for cow fodder."—D. M. Davis, in Farm, Field and Stockman.

In writing us about the "short course in agriculture" at Champaign, Ill., Prof. Morrow says: "For the regular classes we have selected the subjects of most direct value to the largest number of young farmers in the State. The short lecture courses are designed to give elementary instruction in the sciences as well as practical useful information. We believe the course ought to be useful and popular."—Ibid.

A Chenango, N. Y., correspondent to the Rural New Yorker, says: "In traveling about a mile and a half from here I could see three mowing machines left out, not for lack of room to store them, but out of pure negligence; two of them have remained out so long as to have become worthless, and their owners bought new ones a year or so ago. So it is with wagons and sleighs. This does not lighten the farmer's burden much."

HORTICULTURAL.

Scrape your fruit trees and wash them with scapsuds.

Small fruits are as easily grown as are any of the farm crops.

Prune when the tree is dormant. If you want to impart vigor to its growth.

If you want to check the growth of a tree trim it when in full leaf or just before.

Among Germany's exports to the United States is a large quantity of canned asparagus.

A. J. Downing once said: "Were I to preach a sermon on horticulture I would take as my text, 'Stir the Soil.'"

Why not make the acre of ground around the country school-house a paradise of trees, shrubs and flowers, a beautiful experimental garden?

The tulip mania was at its height in the middle of the seventeenth century when $6,000 was sometimes paid for a single bulb. It was a form of commercial gambling and had very little to do with admiration for or cultivation of the flower.—Tribune.

Every owner of a swamp should realize the fact that a ton of the air-dried muck may be worth from three to five dollars for its fertilizing value, as estimated for its nitrogen alone and as compared with the same element in artificial fertilizers. Those who have used it as a litter in stables have found each ton of it to double the value of manure. Thus it becomes to the owner worth precisely as much as the manure.—Southern Floral Magazine.

POULTRY.

An Arkansas subscriber asks "what to feed hens to make them lay." First have young hens—last spring's pullets or a year old last spring. Give a mixed diet, with but little corn, grain, green food and some meat. Make them scratch for what they get by putting the grain among litter of leaves or straw. Give them plenty of fresh water or milk, sand, gravel and a good dust bath and they ought to give you eggs.—Farm, Field and Stockman.

The duty imposed by the McKinley bill upon eggs imported into the United States caused a drop of from 12,750,000 dozen to 7,350,000 dozen in quantity of eggs exported from Canada to the United States during the year ending June 30 as compared with 1890; while in the number exported from Canada to England there was an increase from 3,600 dozen to 950,000 dozen. The customs duty levied upon eggs imported into the United States has caused a loss of $750,000 in that item alone in the exports of Canada during the fiscal year ending June 30 last, as shown by advance figures furnished by the customs department at Ottawa, Canada.

CHEAP DISINFECTANTS.

A disinfectant should be one that not only destroys any odors arising, but at the same time prevents disease by destroying the germs. A solution of a pound of chloride of lime in twenty gallons of water makes an excellent disinfectant, but where a large surface is to be treated something less expensive should be used. Among the substances that will always be found beneficial, whether used alone or in combination, is lime. It also colors the water so as to assist in its application, the bare places being easily discernible. Dissolve a pound of sulphate of copper and a pound of sulphate of iron (bluestone and copperas) in ten gallons of boiling water. At the same time mix a peck of unslaked lime with twenty gallons of water (first slaking the lime with boiling water) and mix the two solutions. Then sprinkle the mixture freely wherever it may be required, and as it will cost but little it may be used frequently.—Mirror.

No other Sarsaparilla possesses the combination, proportion and process which makes Hood's Sarsaparilla peculiar to itself in merit and curative power. Be sure to get Hood's.

For a dinner pill and general family cathartic, we confidently recommend Hood's Pills.

A Sudden Change of Weather

Will often bring on a cough. The irritation which induces coughing is quickly subdued by BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, a simple and effective cure for all throat troubles. Price, 25 cents per box.

All scalp and skin diseases, dandruff, falling of the hair, gray or faded hair, may be cured by using that nature's true remedy, Hall's Hair Renewer.

Secret Societies, Ancient and Modern. Table of Contents: The Antiquity of Secret Societies, The Life of Julian, The Eleusinian Mysteries, The Origin of Masonry, Was Washington a Mason? Fillmore and Webster's Deference to Masonry, A Brief Outline of the Progress of Masonry in the United States, The Tammany Ring, Masonic Benevolence, The Uses of Masonry, An Illustration, The Conclusion. 50cts each.

It fills the bill—a dose of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, Sick or Bilious Headaches, Dizziness, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels are promptly relieved and permanently cured.

But not in the way the huge, old-fashioned pill tries to do it. They cleanse and regulate the whole system naturally. In other words, they do it thoroughly, but mildly and gently. There's no disturbance to the system, diet or occupation. They're the smallest in size, but the most effective in result—purely vegetable, perfectly harmless. Only one little sugar-coated Pellet for a laxative—three for a cathartic.

They're the cheapest pills you can buy for they're guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money is returned. You pay only for the good you get.

This is true only of Dr. Pierce's standard medicines.

All accounts from the New England Anti-Secrecy Convention of last week concur in the opinion expressed in a card from Bro. J. P. Stoddard, that it "has been a success in every respect. Every speaker advertised was present, and spoke in the power of the Holy Spirit." Next week's issue of the Cynosure will be devoted to A FULL REPORT OF THIS CONVENTION, with as many of the addresses as our space will allow. Those that do not then appear will be printed in the following numbers of the paper. A large edition will be sent to press, extra papers having already been ordered, and many more will probably be required to meet the demand. Orders should be sent in at once.

So far as eloquence was concerned, the New England Convention, representing the whole six States embraced in that district, displayed a brilliant galaxy of orators—including Joseph Cook, Rev. A. J. Gordon, Rev. J. M. Foster, and other talented speakers. What is better, their addresses form an equally brilliant symposium of hearty as well as intellectual Christianity that speaks volume of encouragement for all who believe in the mission work of the National Christian Association and are praying for its success.

Now, that the State and District Anti-Secrecy Conventions for this year are ended, a glance over the entire field may not be inappropriate. Everywhere there has been good work done. Praying and working men and women have been active in their respective stations, and the special agents of the N. C. A., men who have the cause against the lodge system at heart have manfully wielded the sword of the Spirit, with fearlessness and faithfulness. The older warriors have gone forth with good counsels, and the younger ones have aggressively attacked the evils of the lodge from the pulpit and the forum, notwithstanding the opposition which they frequently encountered, and which they expected to meet on every hand. The seed they have sown has already begun to show good fruit, and the future is full of promise if we neither faint nor falter in the path of duty. In the eyes of God "the post of duty is the post of honor."

It is rather remarkable, not to say providential, that in the contest for Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the new Congress, which met last week, a staunch temperance man should have been chosen to preside over its deliberations. In this respect, our Washington Letter is interesting, as presenting Speaker Crisp's honorable antecedents as "a total abstainer and in favor of prohibition." One seldom finds such a pronounced reformer in favor among so heterogeneous a crowd as usually constitutes a modern Congress; and his election may be accepted as an omen of promise for the temperance cause.

On page 6 will be found a characteristic letter—"Freemasonry Promotes Assassination"—from Past Master Edmond Ronayne, formerly of Keystone Lodge 639, in this city, which, with great clearness and vigor, denounces Freemasonry, through its secret oaths, as an institution of murderous instincts and designs. The sooner that this disposition of the Masonic order is understood by the public at large, the sooner and more extensively will it be abhorred. That it is founded upon and practices a pagan religion has often been shown; that it is a barbarous, throat-cutting, disemboweling institution is as easily demonstrable. Verily, "the image of the beast" is no less detestable than "the beast" itself.

Ten men who follow liquor-selling are members of the City Council of Chicago, or about one-fifth of the entire body of municipal law-makers. Has morality or the Protestant religion anything to expect from these men, except discouragement and abuse? Yet they have in their care the interests of this great and prosperous city. Unitedly, they may be a power for good; together, they may use a powerful influence in the support of the most pernicious enterprises against the peace and welfare of the city. "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" asked the Scribes and Pharisees; but there did from out that despised city come the greatest and best of Reformers. Hopeless as the case of Nazareth seemed, it is easy to believe that its chances to achieve a more worthy reputation were ten times better than are those of the districts represented in our municipal legislature by these ten instruments of Satan. The World's Fair city ought to be able to rise above such a disgraceful condition and assert her independence of them.

Two epidemics are now abroad in the land, bringing sickness and sorrow and distrust into many households and even into the high places of the nation. One of these is the very great number of cases of la grippe which have recently appeared in many places—for instance, in Oakland, Cal., Denver, St. Louis, and other well-known towns. The other is the prevalence of dangerous "crankism," the modern term applied to a species of insanity, sudden and destructive, endangering the lives and property of individuals and creating excitement in the public mind. Among the effects of this singular malady may be cited the attempt to kill Russell Sage, the New York broker, in his office, the other day; and the force of that event has awakened fears in the mind of Governor D. H. Hill, of New York, to an extent that requires him to be guarded by detectives. Many of these singular aberrations of intellect, less important in their results, are noted in the press. The person who invaded Sage's office with dynamite, with fatal results to himself and others, it is alleged, has been identified as H. L. Norcross, a Pearl street broker in Boston, who is described as a man of good education, and generally regarded as harmless but rather eccentric. The cause of these insane freaks has not been traced, but in the grasping, ambitious, lawless spirit of the age, promoted by irregularity of living, alcoholism, tobacco, opium and other stimulants, one may find, no doubt, a very prolific source of the present epidemic.

THE OLD HOUSE ON THE HILLSIDE.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Oh, where has the old home gone, mamma!—
Where has the old home gone?—
Our hillside home, with its sunny slope,
Its smooth and grassy lawn?
I am not happy here; the town
Is dreary with its din,
Its restless tumult and its noise—
Shall we ever go home again?

Shall we ever go home again, mamma?
Back to our childhood's home,
Where the deafening bustle of the town
With its tumult cannot come?
I am tired of this restless town, mamma—
Oh, why did we ever come?—
I long for the hills and quiet wood—
Oh, mamma, take me home!

I cannot take thee home, my child—
I cannot take thee back;
Never again shall our footsteps press
The old time's shining track.
They all are gone, those dear old woods,
Our peaceful hillside home,
Ne'er to be ours again, but lost—
Lost by the demon, Rum!

Shall we never go back again, mamma--
Never go back again?
Must I watch you weep your life away
Through days and nights of pain?
I am tired of this restless town, mamma,
I long for the fragrant flowers
That grow on the slope of our hillside home—
The home that's no longer ours.

Our home on the hill, our childhood's home,
Can never, never be thine;
But weep not, child (yet who has shed
Such bitter tears as mine?)
Ah! may the Father keep thee, love,
In the tender Shepherd's fold,
Till we rest, at last, in the Father's house,
In the city paved with gold.

A MASON'S EXPERIENCE—VI.

BY JOSEPH HOPSON, OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

As another attack was apprehended, I was advised by one of the women to quit the lines and conceal myself in the practice battery, about a mile off, till morning. She must have been under an evil influence to have given me such advice; but the probability of throwing myself into their hands, for they would think of such a hiding place as well as I, and the painful suspense I must be in for want of intelligence of what was passing in the lines, determined me to stay where I was and await the event.

At about 9 o'clock three Masons, dressed as the former, came into the lines and were challenged by the sentinels at my door. Sergeant Hobday and I went up to them to know why they were come. They wanted to speak to Sergeant-Major Beswick, but were told they could not be allowed, and would give no account of themselves as to who they were and who sent them.

At about half-past 12, three more men entered, dressed as the former. They proved to be Lieutenant Ormsby, Corporal Fraser, and one of the men that came before, at 9 o'clock. The challenging of the sentinels brought out Sergeant Hobday, the orderly, who asked them what they wanted. One of them answered that they wanted to see Sergeant-Major Beswick. He was told that he was a prisoner and could not be seen. The speaker said, "I am an officer," expecting that his saying so would obtain him an interview. Upon this, Sergeant Hobday called me out, saying: "There are three other men come, and one of them pretends to be an officer; I wish you would tell me what is best to be done with them." I went with him to see them, and on the way told him that if he thought he was an officer it would be best to take him to Lieutenant Amsinck, who, if he was an officer, would no doubt know him. On going up to the men, I found the man that said he was an officer engaged in talk with Sergeant McDicken, another sergeant of the troop I belonged to. He asked him what officer was in charge of the guard. McDicken told him we had no officer on guard, but that we had an orderly officer of the week, who was in his quarters. He then asked if we had no non-commissioned officer on guard. McDicken told him that a Havildar was in charge of the guard. He said he did not mean a native, but a European. McDicken told him that we had an orderly sergeant of the week, and pointed to Sergeant Hobday as the person. He immediately turned to Sergeant Hobday and asked him: "Are you the sergeant on duty?" Hobday said, "Yes." Stranger: "Then you are not dressed?" Hobday: "I am not on guard. I am orderly sergeant of the week, and not supposed to be always dressed." Stranger: "Very well; then, pray, what are your orders?" Hobday: "I don't know who you are?" Stranger: "I am an officer." Hobday: "I don't know that; you have no more appearance of an officer than the others; but, whether or no, I don't think it right to give you up my orders." Stranger: "Then we shall go." And, so saying, turned about and moved off.

Hobday: "No. I cannot let you go till I know further." They did not heed him, but continued moving off. Hobday now called to one of the sentries to stop them. Stranger: "Mind, sir, what you are about, at your peril." From their anxiety to escape, and the stranger not having given his name, I concluded that he was not an officer, and ordered Hobday to take them to Lieutenant Amsinck, as he was the nearest officer to our lines. When arrived at his quarters, Lieutenant Amsinck's brother was the first to make his appearance. The stranger complained to him that they had taken him prisoner, and ordered him to be confined to the guard. Corporal Fraser here interposed and said: "No, sir; he did not order you to be confined to the guard. He said he could not let you go till he had seen Lieutenant Amsinck."

Sergeant McDicken, still doubtful as to his being an officer, suggested to Mr. Amsinck that if he was an officer it would be better for him to give his name, "which," said he, "no gentleman would deny." The stranger now said: "My name is Ormsby, of the Royal Regiment." Lieutenant Amsinck at length came out, and on recognizing Lieutenant Ormsby, set him and his companions at liberty.

The meeting kept up their sitting to a late hour in the hope of my being brought to the lodge, dead or alive; but learning from the report of their scouts that such an event was hopeless, they, as Beswick afterwards told me, unanimously adopted a resolution to abhor me, and dissolved the meeting.

Thus ended a notable attempt of Freemasons to enforce the laws of their institution in arrogant contempt of all authority, civil or military, in the seizure and murder of a fellow-subject. Being foiled in their attempt, they resolved to wreak their vengeance on all who assisted in my rescue; and the next day, learning who they were—namely, Sergeant Hobday, who brought the guard and took the two men that seized me prisoners, and Lieutenant Amsinck, who put a stop to Lieutenant Burgoyne's exertions in their behalf. Against Hobday Lieutenant Ormsby preferred a charge of drunkenness when on duty, and for highly unsoldierlike and disrespectful conduct towards Lieutenant Ormsby of the 2nd Battalion of His Majesty's Royal Scots, in endeavoring to seize him, after being repeatedly told by many present that he, Lieutenant Ormsby, was an officer. And they commenced a system of annoyance against Lieutenant Amsinck.

With respect to the charge of drunkenness preferred against Sergeant Hobday, it is to be observed that if he believed him to be drunk when he was speaking to him, that was the time to call on persons to witness the circumstance, or he should have mentioned it to Lieutenant Amsinck when he was at his quarters. That he was strongly inclined to complain of him at the time, is certain, from his resorting to a lie in complaining that he had taken him prisoner and ordered him to be confined to the guard; and it is evident, from that circumstance, that if he had any graver charge which he could at the time have brought against him he would have done it. But his adoption of that course on an after-thought, or on the suggestion of some one else late on the following day after he had come to the knowledge of the active part that Hobday had taken in my rescue, shows the reckless spirit of revenge with which he was actuated. The fact of the matter I believe to be that he himself was not in a condition to judge of a man's sobriety. A party issuing from a Masonic lodge at 12 o'clock at night is not likely to have gone many hours without refreshment, or to be perfectly sober.

A charge was preferred against Sergeant-Major Beswick, on the same day, 10th February, 1827, for being out of his lines after hours without leave, and for drawing his sword with intent to injure me. And that may have led to Lieutenant Ormsby's attempt at retaliation. His trial showed what Freemasons can do in behalf of a brother. The court was composed of a president and three or four members, only one of whom was uninitiated. A man of the name of Duffy, a gunner in the C troop horse artillery, a pretender to Masonry, was suborned by Lieutenant Ormsby to prove that Beswick did not attempt any violence against me, though it was well known that he was in a drunken sleep in a ditch that separated the horse lines from the parade ground during the whole time of the transaction, and knew nothing of it till the following morning. His evidence contributed to Beswick's acquittal, and he himself completed it by stating that he drew the sword in his own defence, he having been assailed by Assistant Apothecary King, who pushed him over a bucket; which assertion was gladly admitted by the court, although they well knew that he was rushing on me with cries of blood, with the sword already drawn, and in his hand, when he was pushed aside by King, and was thus to all appearance prevented from murdering me.

(To be concluded next week.)

THE SALE OF INDULGENCES PREDICTED.

BY B. EISENTRAUT.

The Bible gives a graphic account of the rebuilding of the Jewish temple, with its great opposing power from the surrounding country, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Zerubbabel, the son of Shealthiel (Haggai 1: 12), acted as treasurer and governor of Judah at the time. He himself was of the genealogy of David, down to Christ, as we find in Matt. 1: 12, 13. Another temple was to be erected through this representative and treasurer, pointing directly to Christ as the personage with seven lamps or the divine candlesticks of the Christians, as we find in Zechariah 4: 6, saying: "Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." The holy hill in Jerusalem, with its temple, was to become a plain, as is stated in the verse following, saying, "Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain; and he shall bring forth the headstone thereof with shoutings, crying, Grace, grace unto it!" The treasurer of Judah found faithful protectors and defenders in his undertaking, through the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, as is stated in Ezra 5: 1, 2. Zechariah saw that the temple of Christ would have also two olive trees by its side which would aid in the reconstruction and reformation of the same. In Zech. 4: 1-3 we read: "And the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep, and said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which are upon the top thereof. And two olive trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl and the other upon the left side thereof."

When Martin Luther and Ulrich Zwingli had measured the teachings of the Bible with the Roman idolatry and the throne of the Pope, they began to cry out to humanity, "Grace unto the headstone of Christianity, unto Christ, grace unto it, and not the papacy of Rome." St. John is seemingly referring to this special prophecy of Zechariah in saying, in Rev. 11: 2, 3: "And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and three score days, clothed in sackcloth. These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth."

Luther was ordained as a priest in May, 1507, and Zwingli in September, 1506. They preached and labored in their ministerial capacity for near 1,260 weeks, or over 24 years before the spiritual agitation and controversy came to its final test and crisis of a Christian faith in the Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, before a Roman tribunal. The sale of indulgences had aroused both of these men to take a firm stand against its evils, and to preach boldly against such blasphemous documents of the papacy.

In returning again to the language of the prophet Zechariah, we find a perfect harmony with the days of the Reformation after he saw the two olive trees standing by the golden candlestick and reconstructing the temple, not by might, nor by power, but through God's Spirit.

In the first three verses of the fifth chapter, we see this sinful, speculative, degrading, defiling, un-Christian letter recorded, to-wit: "Then I turned, and lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold a flying roll. And he said unto me, What seest thou? And I answered, I see a flying roll; the length thereof is twenty cubits and the breadth thereof ten cubits. Then said he to me, This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth: for every one that stealeth shall be cut off as on this side according to it: and every one that sweareth shall be cut off as on that side according to it."

We find in the first of Kings 6: 3 that the porch of Solomon's temple was 20 cubits long and the breadth 10 cubits. The Pope, Leo X., sold these indulgences for the entrance of another temple, the temple of heaven itself, whereby every purchaser was to meet with no condemnation of his sins at the hour of death, on this side of eternity. He was assured of this by the highest recognized authority of Christianity upon the earth, by the Pope himself; whosoever remained obedient in the fold of the Roman church was to enjoy eternal happiness according to it.

Merle D'Aubigne, the historian of the Reformation, gives it in the form as offered by Tetzel and others, to-wit: "May our Lord Jesus Christ have pity on thee, N. N., and absolve thee by the merit of his most holy passion. And I, in virtue of the apostolic power entrusted to me, absolve thee from all ecclesiastical censures, judgments, and penalties, which thou mayest have deserved; moreover from all excesses, sins and crimes, which thou mayest have committed, how great and enormous soever they may have been, and for whatever cause, even should they have been reserved to our most holy father, the Pope, and to the Apostolic See. I efface all the marks of disability, and all the notes of infamy which thou mayest have incurred on this occasion. I remit the pains which thou shouldst have to endure in purgatory. I render thee anew a partaker in the sacraments of the church. I again incorporate thee into the communion of saints, re-establish thee in the innocence and purity in which thou wert at the hour of thy baptism; so that, at the moment of thy death, the gate of entrance to the place of torments will be shut to thee; and on the contrary, the gate which leads to the heavenly paradise will be opened to thee. If thou art not to die soon, this grace will remain unimpaired till thy last hour arrive. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

That the stewardship of this power was to cease with this blasphemous act is plainly revealed in chapter 5: 4, as follows: "I will bring it forth, with the Lord of hosts, and it shall enter into the house of the thief, and into the house of him that sweareth falsely by my name: and it shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it, with the timber thereof, and with the stones thereof."

The words of the prophet foretold that it would not end at this special time, but that it would remain with the house as an act of condemnation and as a curse against its throne. The signal of time is so minutely described by this prophet that even the division of the adherents of Luther and Zwingli was prophesied, showing that two branches or churches, figuratively women, were to arise out of this dilemma, which were to take the Bible itself, or God's ephah, for their measurement of faith while the mouth of the other woman, or church, was silenced and rejected before his majestic and heavenly throne. Verses 7-9 give the explanation to-wit: "And behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead: and this is a woman that sitteth in the midst of the ephah. And he said, This is wickedness. And he cast it into the midst of the ephah, and he cast the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof. Then lifted I up mine eyes, and looked, and behold, there came out two women, and the wind was in their wings; for they had wings like the wings of a stork: and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven."

Luther and Zwingli failed to agree upon the use and definition of the holy sacrament, but united together in the proper use of the Bible, so as to elevate it before the eyes of mankind; they lifted up the ephah which Rome and its hierarchy had placed in places of obscurity. Zechariah desired to know what was to be the result of this strange scene, in saying, verse 10: "Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah?" History, since the days of the Reformation, is in full accord with the answer which the angel gave, saying (verse 11): "And he said unto me, To build it a house in the land of Shinar; and it shall be established, and set there upon its own base."

The city of Babylon was located in the land of Shinar (Daniel 1: 2); another city governed the Roman empire which we must call Rome. In the midst of the latter realm two olive trees arose to defend the Word of God, where it was reared up and established upon its own foundation of truth. The storms of persecution have been blowing against the circulation of the same since the days of the Reformation, but it stands unmovable upon its own base.

A SECRET BAND OF MURDERERS.

Last week the country was startled by the news that a supposed lunatic had exploded a dynamite bomb in the broker's office of Russell Sage, in New York City, after demanding from the broker $1,250,000 in money. By the explosion the applicant was blown to pieces, and one or two others in the office were killed. Mr. Sage escaped with some serious injuries from which he is now recovering.

The detectives have been very active in tracing out the origin and animus of this outrage which ended so disastrously to the principal perpetrator; and in last Wednesday's Inter-Ocean appeared the following dispatch from New York, revealing a strongly-suspected secret plan of robbery and murder:

Though the head of the dead bomb-thrower has not been positively identified as yet, everything points to its being that of "Professor" A. A. Denton, a well-known crank, who for years had frequented dime museums, and was a well-known figure at Coney Island.

W. D. Southworth, the crank who is said to have been an associate of the bomb-thrower, was examined at Bellevue Hospital to-day by Drs. Douglas, Fitch and Field. Drs. Fitch and Field spent two hours with him yesterday but came to no conclusion. If pronounced insane he will be sent to the asylum on Ward's Island at once.

Bits of evidence are coming to light from day to day which must eventually disclose the conspiracy—if there was a conspiracy.

A morning paper has carefully investigated every portion of Captain Harry Horne's story, and so far it has been corroborated in almost all its details. The arrest of Southworth, and the discovery that for years he has been preaching the doctrines which Horne told Inspector Byrnes were to be forced on the people by lectures first and dynamite bombs afterward, was an important link in the chain which is tightening around the alleged conspirators.

A still more startling confirmation of the story has been unearthed by reporters. Since the hour when Wall street and the money centers of the world were thrown almost into a panic by the news that one of the most prominent kings of finance had been attacked, they searched unceasingly for clues to the identity of the fanatical assailant. The most systematic overhauling of the debris of the financier's wrecked office has been made, and every bit of cloth, every bit of paper, every piece of wood or iron that might by any possibility give a clue to the identity of the bomb-thrower has been examined.

There was reason to believe that the desperate maniac had made careful preparation for his deed, and had discarded all papers or other belongings that, if found after his death, might reveal to the world his identity and that of his associates.

Search has at last been rewarded, however, by the finding of a piece of blood-stained red, white, and blue ribbon, as well as a bit of watch chain. The ribbon is probably the most important bit of evidence connecting the bomb-thrower with Southworth and the other members of the "R. U. V."—or Grand Army of Labor Society—that has yet turned up.

It will be remembered that in Captain Horne's detailed account of the Grand Army of Labor organization he told of the badges worn by the members. Southworth, the man whose head is now at the morgue, and the twelve other fanatics who talked of proselyting lectures and dynamite bombs in the same breath, wore badges of red, white and blue, the colors corresponding to the three degrees of the order—red being emblematic of the highest degree. Horne saw these badges on the men who talked to him of bomb-throwing, and he said they were worn on the waistcoat, suspended from an eagle or bar by a piece of red, white and blue ribbon. The ribbon worn by the man who exploded the bomb in Russell Sage's office has been found.

This morning among those who called at the morgue was James Skillman, of Miner's Eighth Avenue Theatre. He made a careful examination of the head and said that the face much resembled that of a crank who was about there some months ago. The man was always covered with medals and talked about Jay Gould and millionaires in general. This description tallies exactly with that of Denton.

John Weber, a performer in the Globe Museum on the Bowery, called and viewed the head. He said the features were similar to those of Denton, and declared he knew him well, as they were at one time on exhibition together. Several others who called were positive it was the head of Denton.

CLOSE THE FAIR ON SABBATH.

This was the subject of an address by Rev. M. A. Gault, on a recent Sabbath, at a union meeting in the Campbellite church at Bethany, Mo.

"It would be a fearful crime," he said, "against the rights of God and humanity for Congress to permit the World's Fair to open its gates on the Lord's day. It would then rob tens of thousands of laborers of the Sabbath rest, and violate a great law of nature written upon every bone and muscle and nerve of man and beast. No more important right belongs to every individual than the rest of this day. It was an insult to the poor wage-earner to say that he could only enjoy the Exposition by robbing God of his sacred time, while the rich could attend on week days and go to church on Sabbath. Is it not the duty of the government to protect human rights, by placing every person upon an equal footing before the law? But if it allows the Fair to be open on the Lord's day, it shuts out me and hundreds of thousands of Sabbath-keeping citizens. We should be as effectually excluded as though Congress would prohibit us from attending. Thus Sabbath-breaking citizens would have a great advantage over the others. Can Congress afford to put its Christian citizens under such disabilities? Can it afford to pay this premium on infidelity and irreligion? None but Sabbath-breakers could then find employment in the Fair, or patronize it. It would seriously interfere with religious liberty and violate the first amendment of the United States Constitution. It would violate a fundamental principle of the moral law, by not only taking from men the opportunity of getting that light which comes from beyond the stars, but it would be training a great army of men and women connected with the Fair to trample under foot not only the law of the Sabbath, but God's authority behind it, and every other moral law. It would be a heavy blow struck at the foundations of morality and our foreign missions. It would set the example not only before our own citizens, but before the world, of a government disregarding God's law of the Sabbath and the law in nearly all of its State constitutions. It would thus be undoing the work of our foreign missionaries, who inculcated Sabbath observance as a fundamental precept of Christianity. It would antagonize the teachings of the Bible and of nearly all the churches and pulpits in the land. We must be careful to avoid a union of church and state, but equally careful to prevent the state from antagonizing the church. The question of closing the Fair on the Lord's day is one of awful moment to Chicago. It involves a great law of Divine Providence. There are innumerable instances of Divine retribution following the sin of Sabbath-desecration.

"The Centennial Exposition closed its gates on the Sabbath, and it was a financial success. The New Orleans Exposition opened its gates on the Sabbath, and it was a financial failure. If the gates of the World's Fair are opened on the Sabbath, it will be certain to be a day of carnival, drunkenness, and crime, for Sabbath-desecration and the sale of liquor go hand-in-hand. If the one is allowed, the other cannot be restrained. Cheap travel will attract millions from all lands, and a free Sunday and free whisky will attract among these a vast number of the anarchistic element. Chicago must not forget those years when its Exposition building was crowded with tremendous and unexpected uprisings of the socialistic and communistic elements, when, without a note of warning or line of advertising, every foul slum and moral and social sewer seemed to have vomited its contents on the street, and all day on the Sabbath the great Exposition hive swarmed, and buzzed, and chewed, and smoked, and drank, and cheered, and yelled, while the red-flag revolutionists celebrated the anniversary of the Paris Commune. These demonstrations have ceased for a number of years. Anarchists have found it necessary to conceal their operations from view, in order that they may more thoroughly prepare for the great outbreak. Our social structure is now more widely and deeply permeated with anarchistic principles than ever before, and there is every evidence that it will soon precipitate the great conflict of the ages.

"The old theory of the divine right of kings has been exploded, but its more dangerous successor, the supremacy of the people, with God's law and authority ruled out, is now on trial and will likewise be exploded. Who can tell but that Chicago, if it opens the gates of its World's Fair on the Sabbath, will be the theatre where, before the world's gaze, will be enacted this drama that will forever decide that no nation, or city, can live and prosper while it tramples upon God's law.

"Who can tell but that if Congress and the managers of the World's Fair turn a deaf ear to this truth as it is echoed by the millions of petitioners, and from the lips of thousands of ministers and Christian citizens, they may hear it from the mouths of cannon? They may hear it in the crash of dynamite bombs that will lay its towering buildings in ruins; they may read it in the glare of great fires that will reduce its grandest structures to ashes."

THE SABBATH ASSOCIATION OF ILLINOIS.

The Sabbath Association of Illinois will hold its annual meeting (D. V.) in Springfield, Ill., December 28 and 29, beginning at 7:30 Monday evening.

Will not all who are able to attend at that time make a note of this date, and arrange their plans so as to be present?

Further announcement concerning program and place of meeting may be expected.

CHAS. A. BLANCHARD,
President.

There will be four sessions of the convention (D. V.). The topic for the first one, Monday evening, Dec. 28, 7:30 P. M., will be Sunday Newspapers. For the second session, Tuesday morning, the 29th inst., the theme will be Domestic Labor and Pleasure on the Sabbath. The third session, Tuesday afternoon, will discuss Sunday Trains and Cars, and the fourth session, Tuesday evening, will consider the opening of Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath. The list of speakers cannot be positively announced until next week. We hope to hear from Rev. O. W. Fletcher of Springfield, Rev. Dr. Henson and Rev. Dr. Gifford of Chicago, Hon. G. P. Lord of Elgin, Pres. Tanner of Jacksonville, Rev. Harry Taylor of Normal Park, and others. Programs will be ready in the near future. We request all persons interested in the recovery and preservation of the Sabbath rest for the wage-worker to be present at this meeting. If not present, to send to us a contribution for carrying on the work together with suggestions as to the method of doing so. All correspondence may be addressed to Charles A. Blanchard, president of the Association, care of Rev. O. W. Fletcher, Springfield, Illinois.

"Men declare that they couldn't get along without their beer or whisky," says the warden of Joliet prison, "but in two weeks after I get hold of a drinker he no longer craves for it, and in a month there is such a change in him for the better that you would hardly know him."

REFORM NEWS.

THE WASHINGTON AGENT IN NEW ENGLAND.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 11, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Before starting for North Easton, Mass., where I am billed to speak tonight, I wish to pen a few lines regarding the convention just closed. It has been a great spiritual and intellectual treat to me. God's presence and power were manifest in every session. The disciples gathered were, indeed, with one accord in one place. Nature, providence, and the Divine Spirit beautifully combined in its favor. The weather was mild and pleasant. More than enough for the temporal needs of those from a distance was provided by warm-hearted friends, and to all, the heavenly Dove brought a peace and joy that the world knows not of.

The details will be sent you by others. Suffice it for me to say that I have never met a more thoughtful, earnest, consecrated people than those who gathered from all of the New England States in this convention.

As chairman of the Enrollment Committee, I reported the names and addresses of 140 of the friends in attendance. This report was necessarily incomplete. A goodly number of those who were enslaved in various lodges were present. How much good the convention may have done them eternity alone will reveal. Judging from some angry expressions which I heard, there were those under conviction.

The friends have largely returned to their several homes, I believe, with a renewed zeal in the Master's work. Let us pray and look for great things in the year to come. The echoes of this great meeting will not be confined to the "vine-clad hills" of New England, but will reach over our Western plains to the Pacific slope, causing joy in the hearts of many who were not privileged to hear the profound logic of Joseph Cook, or the soul-stirring arguments here brought forth. Every speaker on the program responded and others were added.

W. B. STODDARD.

BRO. FENTON IN OHIO.

EDITOR OF CYNOSURE:—The Anti-masonic sermons preached on the 29th of November, in Xenia, Ohio, and alluded to in my last report, were delivered in Baptist churches; that in the morning in Zion Baptist church (colored), Rev. J. M. Meeks, D. D., pastor. The congregation was large and manifested interest in the subject. Many belonging to this church are members of secret lodges. The pastor enumerated twenty societies, fifteen of them being secret organizations. He also manifested much concern because of the liability of his church to be swallowed up by the lodges, and yet, during the service, he wore a Masonic badge in plain sight, indicating that he belongs to Blue Lodge, Chapter, and Commandery. Is he going in the way of all lodgemen, and leading his people in any other way?

In the evening of that day a plain Anti-masonic sermon was preached in the Baptist church for white people. Rev. J. S. Wrightnour is its pastor. He belongs to no secret society, and is not a secretist. Apparently he does not quite realize the nature of the conflict between the lodge and the truth. The theme of the sermon was advertised in the Saturday evening paper—"Modern Idolatry."

The pastor received the preacher kindly, invited him to dine with him, and the invitation was accepted. I trust the expose of the lodge, which is the "Modern Idolatry," was not in vain.

On Friday, Dec. 4, a meeting was held in Marzetti Hall, Columbia, at which Rev. Mr. Harley, pastor of Saint Mark's church (Lutheran), presided. After stating to the intelligent audience the position of his denomination with reference to the lodge heathenism, he introduced the speaker who was to preach the Gospel to that neglected class of heathens, which had been especially invited to attend that meeting—Masons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias, and such like. The National Christian Association, the Ohio State Convention and the Cynosure were not forgotten.

After the meeting one subscribed for the Cynosure.

The Ohio State University was visited and President Scott interviewed. He has been initiated into Masonry, and, although prompt to disown Masonry, he declined an offer to speak to the students about it. If the president will discharge his duty to those committed to his care, by warning them to keep out of the lodges, there may be no occasion to regret his declination of the offer. His words, in connection with his experience in the lodge blasphemy, would have great weight; and has not the Saviour a right to his testimony, provided he has got salvation and real deliverance from the lodge bondage?

On Monday evening Dec. 7, a large audience of Lutherans assembled in Grace Lutheran church to hear the Gospel for Masons. Several pastors were present, and one of them conducted the services, introducing the preacher. In his introductory remarks, he observed a necessity for making the specialty of opposition to secret societies a Gospel necessity, owing to a lack of information on the part of pastors. Brother Beck is the pastor of the Grace Lutheran church, but, owing to the illness of his father, was absent from the service. He is heartily in sympathy with the movement against the lodges, and he manifested that sympathy in a material form, as well as spiritual.

Brother Orvis was ever instant in season to render efficient service with his horse and buggy in the cause of reform.

On Tuesday morning, Dec. 8, I departed from Columbus to attend the State Convention at New Concord. Several delegates entered the train on the way. Arriving at our destination we found friends of the convention awaiting our arrival at the depot; and in the evening a large audience assembled for the exercises. Others having the subject in hand will report the work of the convention.

ANTI-SECRECACY IN OHIO.

OUR SPECIAL REPORT OF THE OHIO STATE CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, AT NEW CONCORD, OHIO, DECEMBER 8 AND 9.

NEW CONCORD, Ohio, Dec. 9, 1891.

Our convention met last night in the College Chapel. The weather was lovely; there was a fair attendance from other parts of the State, and the local attendance was full and fairly sympathetic.

We were called to order by Rev. David Paul, who nominated Rev. Mr. Wylie as chairman, pro tem.

Mr. Wylie made a few introductory remarks, and then offered prayer for a divine blessing.

Dr. Paul then conducted the devotional exercises for half an hour; after which President J. D. Irons, of Muskingum College, made the address of welcome, which was able and conciliatory, even to our opponents. He welcomed us all in the interests of truth and free discussion, and assumed that even the secret societies ought to and would welcome the truth.

The response by Capt. J. M. Scott, of Alexandria, was logical and impressive.

He was followed by Rev. Wm. Fenton, of St. Paul, Minn., who spoke for an hour on the claims of Freemasonry as a religious institution. Those who have heard Bro. Fenton need not be told that it was learned and logical, and could not fail of making an impression on the students who listened.

We were gladdened with the presence of Rev. Wm. Dillon, of the Christian Conservator, and others of the Radical U. B. church, as well as our Wesleyan brethren.

On the whole, the outlook for our convention and work is quite encouraging.

NEW CONCORD, Ohio, Dec. 10.—Our Ohio State meeting has come and gone. It seems to me to be one of the best I have ever attended. The weather was, for the season, remarkably fair. The college faculty, the ministers and most of the people were heartily sympathetic. The speakers were nearly all men of ability, and spoke with great force and appropriateness. The attendance, even during business sessions, was excellent.

The following officers were chosen for the ensuing year:

President—Rev. Wm. Dillon, Dayton.
Secretary—Rev. W. O. Dinius, Dayton.
Treasurer—Rev. J. M. Faris, New Concord.
The convention agreed to employ Rev. C. F. Hawley, agent of the N. C. A., for the Northwest, to make such a canvass of the State as his other duties would allow, and raised, in cash and pledges, $26.20 towards his support.

The expenses of the convention were all met, and there was entire harmony in all our proceedings.

The following spirited declarations were discussed and adopted:

DECLARATIONS.

We, members of the Ohio Christian Association, believing that all societies and organizations that are based on secrecy, or which make it an essential element of their constitutions, are wholly needless for the promotion of lawful objects, and always liable to be perverted to evil objects; believing, moreover, that such societies are inimical to republican equality, and opposed to the letter and spirit of the Christian religion, do hereby declare:

1. That we renew our protest against all such organizations, and call on all Christians and all citizens to unite with us in seeking their removal.

2. That Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, the Knights of Pythias, and all societies that inculcate a religious worship and yet do not profess to be Christian societies, are teachers of a false religion, and trend to the subversion of Christianity and of Christian civilization.

3. While we deeply sympathize with the cause of temperance, and heartily approve of any righteous method of promoting the prosperity of the farmers, we do not believe that in either case a secret society is a needful method of securing the desired end; and we protest against the Jesuitical doctrine that it is right to do evil that good may come.

4. While we acknowledge the debt of gratitude that the nation owes to the Union soldiers in the late war, and while we favor ample pensions for all that were disabled in the service of their country, we believe that the Grand Army of the Republic and the Sons of Veterans would be quite as beneficial and far less liable to criticism if they would eliminate from their constitution the element of secrecy.

5. That we recognize the National Christian Association and the Christian Cynosure as among the best means of promoting the anti-secrecy reform, and we commend them to the attention and support of all Christian reformers.

6. Our thanks are due to the faculty and trustees of Muskingum College for the use of the college chapel, and to the people of New Concord for their generous hospitality to the members of this convention.

W. DILLON,
JOHN D. IRONS, } Com.
O. H. RAMSEY, }

The convention dispersed with a quickened and renewed interest in our reform.

H. H. HINMAN.

BRO. HAWLEY'S REPORT.

The convention was held, as announced, in the chapel of Muskingum College.

Dr. Irons, the president, gave the address of welcome. It was an able and cordial address—a model of its kind.

Captain Scott, of Alexandria, responded in behalf of the convention, with a stirring speech.

Then came the address of the evening, by Rev. Wm. Fenton, of St. Paul, Minn. It was able and scholarly, showing that the relation of Freemasonry is a revival of the ancient idolatry of the Egyptians and Grecians, into which Israel fell while in the wilderness, and afterwards in the land of Canaan. He uncovered the system of Masonry, and exposed its iniquity and blasphemy with a fearless courage that would have done credit to Martin Luther himself.

Wednesday forenoon the usual business was transacted, and the agent of the Western Department of the N. C. A. gave an address, presenting Freemasonry as a Satanic Counterfeit of our Holy Christianity, and urging the churches to united and vigorous action against this malignant conspiracy of Satan, to heathenize and infidelize the young men of our nation, through the agency of the secret lodge system.

In the afternoon we discussed the resolutions reported, and listened to an address from our N. C. A. agent, Rev. H. H. Hinman, of Oberlin, Ohio, on the Grand Army. He showed conclusively that all the good they sought could be accomplished by open methods, and appealed to them, as Americans and patriots, not to add to the popularity of the pernicious system of secrecy, by their methods.

In the evening a subscription and collection was taken which amounted to about $34.00, of which $21.00 was in pledges to aid the Western agent of the N. C. A. in working Ohio as a part of his field.

A resolution was adopted, inviting the Western N. C. A. agent to spend as much time in the Ohio work as he can, consistent with other duties.

The address of the evening was given by Dr. Dillon, of Dayton, Ohio, the editor of the Conservator, the organ of the Old School United Brethren church. His subject was "The Evils of the Secret Society System," which he presented in a very clear and convincing manner.

This address was the closing exercise of the convention.

I will only add that the meetings of the convention were well attended. The students and faculty of the college manifested a lively interest.

I can not speak in too high terms of Dr. Irons, the retiring president of the college. His very cordial welcome was followed by an earnest and growing interest in the convention to its close; and we deeply regret that Dr. Irons feels compelled, by his failing health, to retire from his college work and seek, by change of climate, the recovery of his health.

I will but add, in conclusion, that the Ohio Convention was a success. If I cannot say, with Bro. Hinman, that it was the best anti-secret convention I ever attended, I can, at least, say that it ranks high among the good conventions of the past.

In humble reliance upon Christ, our Prophet, Priest and King, let us go forward in this work of reform, trusting in HIM to work with us, fight our battles for us, and ultimately give us triumphant success.

We must rescue the church from the foul embrace of the lodge, and our young men from this snare of the wicked one.

Come up to the help of God, brethren, and put forth personal effort, and see that the N. C. A. does not lack funds to vigorously prosecute its God-given work.

Yours for Christ and the coming of his kingdom,
C. F. HAWLEY.

—On Wednesday of last week, at Madison, Wis., a union of the non-secret branch of the Farmers' Alliance in that State with the secret branch was effected, and the former were forthwith instructed in the secret work of the order. The fascination of secrecy in any political or social organization, it would seem, is as irresistible as it is damaging to the best interests of the State and nation. The political "farmers" are usually better at working grips than at raising potatoes.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM AFRICA.

SHAINGAY MISSION,
(West Coast of Africa), Oct. 22, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—That the African is down, and needs—yea, is entitled—to the sympathy of Christians everywhere, no person can deny. He needs sympathy because of the wretched condition of his race, which only those who live among them can understand. They are entitled to it from Christians because Christian nations have been the principal actors in placing them in their present degraded condition. The troops of slave-hunters that have chased them as wild beasts are chased; the ship-loads of the vilest spirits and tobacco that are daily being discharged among them, together with the pernicious habits of the people who have come here from Christian countries as adventurers, have done their work. The scientific rascality, coupled with the lower and meaner vices of the civilized world, mingled with heathen vices, heathen customs and superstitions, have placed the African about as low as it is possible to reduce a human being. This has been going on for many centuries, and is still going on, for the laborers are few. Who will not sympathize with them?

Coming out of a mission chapel, a few Sabbaths ago, a very old, blind man also came out, feeling his way with a cane. I said to him: "Daddy, what country are you from?" "I am from the Paw-Paw country," he answered. "When I was a very small boy, my mammy sent me to granny; and when I was coming along the road, and one boy with me, people caught us and took us to the Portuguese, and they sell me plenty times. I don't know where the other boy go, but me they put in one ship, and plenty people, slavey ones, were there too. That time one English ship chase me and fire cannon upon the ship. They seize me all, and carry me to Sierra Leone. The white people put me in school there, but my head was not able to learn book; but I learn to know God, and I thank God for that. My children all learn book—thank God!"

A few years ago, a man from the Galenas country came here, and several of his neighbors accompanied him. As I do not know their names, I will call them Mr. A., B., C., D., and E. After being here several days, Mr. A. took on credit some money. Cloth, rum and tobacco are all called money here, and even slaves are spoken of as money. A few days later he went to another town on business; and, after some months, as he did not return, Messrs. B., C., D., and E., were sold, to pay A.'s debts.

If a leopard or an alligator catches a person in a town, all the people in that town are fined, and sometimes the town is plundered. If a man or woman is killed on the road, the nearest town is plundered, and often the people are sold.

If a man owes a debt, any member of his family, or any of his people, may be sold to pay it. If it be the head man of a town, any of the people of the town may be sold to pay the claim.

These are just a few of the established laws of the old people; and it is thought to be sacrilege for any person to attempt to change the laws or customs of the old people.

Not long ago, a woman was converted to Christianity. An older Christian saw her beating out rice flour, and asked what it was for. "It is for my child that died," was her answer. "You must not do that now," said the questioner; "you are a Christian, and that is not allowed." "Well, then, I will give it to my mother," she said. Her mother had been dead many years. She thought it very hard not to be allowed to cook for her mother.

These are a few of the fetters with which these people are bound, and nothing but the power of God can free them. They are sick and tired of their bondage; and shall we not have the pity, the sympathy, and the prayers of Christians everywhere?
(Rev.) J. GOMER.

CHURCH DIVISIONS AND THEIR CAUSES.

CHICAGO, December 5, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The following letter originated in a conversation between two church members of different denominations:

DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—The interest you take in the spread of the Gospel of Christ, the risen Son of God, and in the views expressed when we last met, induce me to try again to show more plainly, perhaps, than I did the reasons for my belief about visions, lodgery and the two positive ordinances of Christianity.

That divisions obstruct the Gospel is acknowledged at home and abroad. Missionaries testify to this fact, and the heart of every true believer the world over would rejoice to know that the prayer of our Lord, John 17: That all might be one, so that the world might know and believe in him, was being answered. Can we hope for this without the Oneness for which he prayed? Therefore, let us all be one in him and cease to be of Paul or Luther, or any other name—even of John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus. For you know our Lord tells us that "no greater man than John had ever been born; yet he that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." (Revised Version, Matt. 11:11.) What kingdom? That of the King of Truth, who, when falsely accused, declared that his kingdom was not of this world, else his servants would fight. This kingdom is one within his people, whose only sword is the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God; not the steel sword of the civil governments, not even when wielded by popes or other usurpers of such power, for the risen Christ alone is the true head of his "one body," visible to the world, first, by the two visible positive ordinances of that Gospel's two great facts, viz.: That Christ died for our sins and arose from death to life for our justification, and, therefore, we are justified by faith, and have peace with God by him. (Rom. 4:25 and 5:1; 1 Cor. 15:3, 4.)

The shortest way out of the lamentable divisions is to drop using their names and abide by that of the Master himself. As learners of him we shall be taught aright and led aright.

We mourn over the death of Jesus as his disciples did, and we rejoice, or ought to, as they did over his resurrection. Yet many shrink from obedience in that form. (Rom. 6:3, 4.)

But Romans 4:25 shows our justification by the resurrection, as we have said, and therefore (Rom. 5:1) justification by our faith shines in splendor as the gift of God, who in Christ beseeches men to accept it and be reconciled to him (2 Cor. 5:19); to have peace with him through Christ and not by any righteousness of mere mortal man. For "if Christ be not risen we are yet in our sins." (Cor. 15:17.)

We spoke also of the secret orders. The speech of Dr. Thomas at the new twenty-story temple glorifies Freemasonry and its religion; and a recent speech of Ingersoll glorifies infidelity. In the Holy Scriptures we are warned against all such bodies as Masonry and Mormonism (see Matt. 24:26). Freemasonry and other lodgery and cobwebs pervade the churches to-day as much as or more than sentiment approving slavery did before the war.

Romanism is also very active through, and upon our public schools and politics, and probably a time of trial and purification awaits churches in this country and Europe similar to past experiences across the ocean. Americans thought civil war an impossibility. American churches may have an experience as little dreamed of as the civil war, before they shall be purified from their sinful practices, among which are the Romish wafer and sprinkling, with doctrinal divisions, and holding fellowship with secret orders, or other works of darkness.

The true character of Christ's kingdom is as little understood to-day by many people as when the popular cry against Jesus was: "He is a rebel against Cæsar and a blasphemer—away with him!" Alas, many imagine that the civil power should stretch out its arm to support the ark (of which both of our political parties have been guilty in several ways); but such a course is fatal to the best interests of both church and state. The Pope is the Jeff Davis of Christendom. The various sects are as if the different States had claimed to have each its own banner during the rebellion. I leave to your own reflection what chance of success the North would have had against a united South in such a case.

Oh, for the answer to our Lord's prayer: That all his people may be one, so that the world may believe and be saved! Amen. SENEX.

"ENTERED, PASSED, RAISED."

GETTYSBURG, Pa., December, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Not long ago I was present at the licensure of some and the ordination of other young men to the Gospel ministry. They had all entered college and seminary, passed through the prescribed course of study, and on examination in the same and a formal profession of the faith of the church, with most solemn vows and promises of loyalty to Christ, fidelity to the truth, and willingness to spend and be spent in his service, they were set apart, by prayer and the "laying on of the presbytery," to work whereunto they believed they were called. Obligations could not be stronger and more binding than those which they took. It is true they invoked, in case of unfaithfulness, no physical dismemberment, such as having "the tongue torn out by its roots, the left breast torn open and the heart plucked thence and buried in the rough sands of the sea," and the rest; for the forms used came down from no barbarous age, and were not contrived after any hobgoblin idea to appeal to the fears of men so destitute of all sense of moral turpitude that they could be reached and alarmed only by the fear of being torn to pieces after the manner of the most debased savages and cannibals; no, the forms of induction into this office were conceived in the spirit of Christianity, and were administered openly and solemnly before God and men. These young men were entered after due examination, passed, as to the licentiates, after due trial in the work, and finally, by ordination, raised to "the sublime degree" of the ministerial office as master workmen who need not be ashamed.

I ought, perhaps, to beg pardon for using the Masonic terms, "entered," "passed," "raised," in referring to an exercise so holy as that of ministerial ordination; for in the mind of one familiar with the barbarous and blasphemous oaths used in conferring Masonic degrees, it seems scarcely less than shocking to associate these things together; yet to one who may have witnessed both, the thought, at least, of contrast, is not unnatural.

But I must confess that my mind wandered a little during the service. I imagined the scene of these young men—alas, not an unusual one!—after all their religious and theological training, standing half-naked in the ante-room of a Masonic lodge, blindfolded, with ropes around their necks, knocking for admittance, saying: "We are in darkness and are seeking light"—Masonic light; and their being sworn on the Bible, square and compass to eternal secrecy, outside of the lodge, as to what was about to be told and given them as Masonic light.

The whole thing arose before me as so incongruous, so preposterous, and so abominably wicked, that I had to reassure myself of the knowledge of actual facts before I could believe the thing possible. Possible? O shame! Such things are not so infrequent as not to make men of God blush for the infatuation of ministers who kneel and swear secrecy at Masonic altars.

Entered, passed, and raised, through the good and holy degrees of the ministerial calling, then, as half-naked savages, knocking at a lodge of heterogeneous faiths, from Deism to Christianity, confusedly mixed, and morals too diverse for classification, and often too unsavory for description, is an inconsistency which needs the apology of "moral insanity" to bring it within the range of Christian charity. Thank God, there is forgiveness before God and good men, upon sincere repentance and renunciation of such fellowship, for any such erring brethren. My exhortation is to all those who have become entangled in these "unfruitful works of darkness," at once to come out from them and have no further fellowship with them, but rather reprove them and totally renounce them.

Ask God to forgive you for ever consenting to be entered, passed, and raised through these degrees of blasphemy!

FREEMASONRY PROMOTES ASSASSINATION.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Some days ago I received a letter from a reverend gentleman in Ontario, asking about the former spelling and the present meaning of the word "hail," as used in the Masonic ritual. That little word "hail" occurs twice in each degree—in the first part of the oath and in giving the grip—but what does it matter what the meaning of that particular word is?

It is not about the meaning or spelling of "hail" that we want to concern ourselves, but whether the very oath itself is illegal, and whether the man who takes that oath can fully perform all the duties that may devolve upon him as a good citizen. I claim that he cannot; and I further claim that every Mason who lives up to that oath, must of necessity violate the law, and even get so far as to assassinate a recalcitrant brother Mason. There is no variation nor shadow of turning with the Masonic oath. Every Mason is rigidly sworn under the most awful death-penalties that the very ingenuity of cruelty could invent. He is sworn "to have his throat cut and his tongue torn out"—"to have his left breast torn up and his heart plucked out"—"to have his body severed in two, his bowels taken from thence and burned to ashes." Can anything be more horrible than all this human butchery which every Mason swears to have inflicted on his body for the disclosure of the silly nonsense which comprises the different Masonic degrees?

And who is to perform all this infamous butchery of the seceding Mason? When the lodge condemns a man to death, who is to be the assassin? Who was it that assassinated Captain Morgan in western New York, in 1826? Did the Masonic fraternity hire out that work of death, or was it performed by Masons selected for that purpose? Every Mason is sworn under pain of death to keep it a solemn secret that he ever took such oaths; hence it is not at all probable that Masonry is going to hire outsiders to do its awful work of butchery; and so poor Captain Morgan met his death at the hands of his brother Masons, just as Dr. Cronin, here in Chicago, a couple of years ago, met his death at the hands of some of the members of Camp 20. I repeat it: Every Mason is sworn, under the most terrible and inhuman of death-penalties, and he can no more evade or avoid being the executioner of those death-penalties than he can publicly reveal the stupid blasphemy and the lying farce of the Masonic degrees. He must kill, if called upon to do so. This is the conclusion, and the only conclusion, to be drawn from the Masonic oath; and I hereby challenge the Voice of Masonry, or any reputable Mason in Chicago, or throughout the country, to deny this charge.

The Voice of Masonry, in its own peculiarly prosy fashion, can sometimes talk very learnedly and very piously of the religion of Masonry, and extol to the skies its so-called charity. But what kind of religion, let me ask, can be taught or practiced among men who are solemnly sworn, under horrible death-penalties, or what sort of charity is that existing among men who, if they live up to their abominable oaths, must become the butchers of the bodies of brother Masons? Dare the Voice answer these simple questions? Dare the Rev. Dr. Thomas, or ex-Mayor Cregier, or Henry G. Perry, answer them? How is it, gentlemen? are you, in this evening of the nineteenth century, in these United States, and in the very face of our grand civilization—are you sworn, and do you swear others when conferring your Masonic degrees, under such horrible butchery of the body as might justly bring the blush of shame to the cheek of a savage? Have you got these death-penalties in the oaths of your lodges? I say you have, and that I have administered them myself in Keystone Lodge, No. 639, in Cashman Lodge, in D. C. Cregier Lodge, and in other lodges in this city, and you dare not deny that you are bound under the most terrible and inhuman death-penalties which it is possible to express in language.

Furthermore, the public at large are coming to know this; and were it not for the miserable hypocrisy of the preachers you have got among you, your lying legends and pagan humbuggery would to-day be a by word and a stench in the mouth and nostrils of this American people. But the day of Freemasonry is certainly doomed, notwithstanding its present apparent popularity; and the time will come when every one who passes by shall laugh in patriotic derision at your empty parades and your twenty-story monstrosity. But tell us about your Masonic oaths. Deny them if you can, and then seek for some place to hide your shame.

During my full term as Worthy Master of Keystone Lodge, I told every candidate of the sham and fraud and humbug of Masonry, and to this they can testify to-day, unless, like more pious Masons, they have forgotten to tell the truth. I went in to Keystone Lodge, in this city, in October, 1874, and there in open lodge told the Worthy Master, Mr. Joe Dixon, and the rest of the members then present, what I thought of Masonry, and that I intended in the near future to publish the silly farce to the world. I have done so, and I intend to continue doing so; and so long as I live and escape Masonic vengeance, I shall hold the various Masonic lodges as vile schools for teaching Masonic perjury.

LITERATURE.

Vick's Monthly Magazine, the publication of which was suspended some months ago, has been revived, and will be issued, in future, by the Vick Publishing Co., Rochester, N. Y. The November number begins the fifteenth volume, in a new form, at a reduced price. Instead of $1.25 per annum, as formerly, the subscription price is now only 50 cents a year. The magazine was always a good one, and popular, and the present issue indicates a desire on the part of the publishers to make it a highly acceptable visitor. In a general way it will contain a clever story once a month, with other choice literature and "a good sprinkling of articles on floriculture and home interests." The illustrations are numerous and attractive.

The Doll's Dressmaker, a magazine for girls, reached its first birthday with a beautiful December number just at hand. This highly practical periodical has been well received by mothers and their daughters, who find in its pages much instructive and entertaining matter suitable to employ the minds and the sometimes mischievous fingers of their girls. The price is only one dollar a year, postpaid, and we feel quite sure that sum could not be used to better advantage towards the education of our girls than through a subscription to this highly interesting magazine. The Doll's Dressmaker would make an admirable holiday or birthday gift. At any rate, send to the publisher, Jennie Wren, 35 East 77th street, New York City, for a sample copy.

OBITUARY.

On Monday morning, the 14th of September, 1891, MRS. ABIGAIL A. FRENCH, my mother, winged her flight to mansions above. The battle was over, and the victory won.

After about five days of unusual pain, and some mental derangement, the worn-out tenement of clay was laid down for its final rest, and the weary wheels of life stood still, at the age of nearly 92 years.

Mother was born on the 29th of December, 1799, in Peacham, Vt.

After spending her youthful days in the towns of Peacham and Danville, Vt., at home and among relatives, she married Fordyce French, of Hardwick, on the 27th of March, 1823.

Hardwick then was but newly settled, some parts of it being a wilderness, broken here and there by a settlement. It was a great sacrifice for her (as I have often heard her say) to leave the society and surroundings of her youthful home, and go into so new a country as the western part of the town then was. But, in accordance with the tide of emigration then moving, she bore her part faithfully.

Father died in 1862; and consequently she has traveled the down-hill road of life for the last twenty-nine years alone. Great has been her bereavement and loneliness, and often has she expressed it.

One son, Samuel A., died in 1834, aged 1 year and 7 months; Orrill V., in 1854, aged 28 years and 6 months; and Mary, the oldest daughter, 1867, aged 36.

Mother's ancestors, some of them, lived to an advanced age, and were men of God.

In company with her father, Joseph Ames, she visited an aged uncle in New Hampshire, who, placing his hands upon the head of the boy she had with her (then between one and two years old), and who was of the fifth generation from himself, blessed him in the name of the Lord.

She experienced the salvation of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ about six or seven years after her marriage. In regard to the great and glorious change thus wrought, she has often expressed herself substantially thus: "How good everybody looked to me;—even the most uncouth, and rough."

Since that time, she has always done what she could for the religious education and training of her children—taking unusual care to have them attend meetings.

She was baptized in 1855, by Elder William Cummings, and joined a union society, which was about that time formed in the neighborhood.

Having changed her place of residence, she joined the M. E. church in 1868, which relation she held until her death.

Not long after this an exposition of Masonry fell into her hands, which she read and re-read. And greatly to her praise, be it said, she became strongly convicted of its diabolical character. Since then, she has done what she could to circulate tracts and other literature of enlightenment on the subject.

For the last eight years of her life, I have been almost constantly with her. During a part of that time, her religious experience has been unsatisfactory to herself. She did not have that evidence of her acceptance with God that she desired. Long and severe was her struggle on this point. Her language in reference to it was: "All I want to know is, that I am ready to go." This was the language of her heart, and she expressed it frequently. Whenever my business has admitted of it, I have heard her closeted in prayer daily.

One of her favorite hymns: "My latest sun is sinking fast," I have sometimes refused to sing, for fear of giving false encouragement. About three years ago, the evidence of her acceptance came, bright and clear, and since that time I have always sung that hymn when called for, and sometimes when not called for.

For the last twenty-two years of her life she has lived, most of the time, with her youngest daughter, Mrs. A. W.

Many a life has been lost because of the taste of cod-liver oil.

If Scott's Emulsion did nothing more than take that taste away, it would save the lives of some at least of those that put off too long the means of recovery.

It does more. It is half-digested already. It slips through the stomach as if by stealth. It goes to make strength when cod-liver oil would be a burden.

DO MASONS APPROVE, BY SILENCE?

Certain members of the Masonic fraternity are now busily saying to people, "Didn't we rub it into Manning, Tuesday? He will find that there are a few votes in town that can get square with Anti-masons."

This refers to a falsehood spread by John P. Munroe, H. R. Cummings, Benjamin F. Parkhurst, and others, to the effect that Mr. Manning is an open enemy of Masons and Masonry, and this was whispered into the ears of men who did not know the facts.

Their purpose was, for reasons which they did not disclose, to poison the minds of their auditors, against a candidate of the Republican party.

If it is to be understood that they have authority to introduce Masonry into politics, let the fact be clearly understood; if they had no authority for raising the Masonic issue, and a false one at that, let their associates hunt out the Masons who worked for the defeat of a candidate in the name of Masonry and deal with them as the facts demand.

There are a few thousand men in the Republican party who are not Masons who want to know if Republican candidates are to be hatched with faked stories hearing a grip and a pass-word.

Mr. Manning and many other Republicans who do not happen to be Masons have for many years been voting and working for Republican tickets bearing the names of Masons almost from top to bottom; that is the kind of "Anti-masons" they are.

Suppose that, in consequence of this silent and unfair warfare, they should conclude to call a halt?

Suppose they say that at the next election they will vote for no Mason unless these plotters have been properly disciplined?

If this betrayal of the confidence of Masons, in the name of the order, goes uncheked, many Republicans would naturally feel that the votes of non-Masons are not desired for the solid row of Masonic names that usually appear on the Republican ticket, and that these men desire only Democratic votes. It is time to find out whether these candidates and their friends have any votes for a Republican nominee when he happens, one time in ten, to be not of their number.

Let it be distinctly understood that these men employed the name of Masonry to defeat the Republican candidate; non-action by the bodies of which they are members, is a distinct approval of their political use of Masonry against a Republican candidate.

If the many members of that organization now in office, and their friends, believe in sustaining the Republican party whether they are the candidates or whether, as rarely happens, a solitary nomination strays outside their number, let them rebuke their plotters, who steal their name.

We take the above from the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Telegram of November 7. It complains of what has become so common as to awaken no audible remonstrance in this part of the country. The offices are parcelled out among the Masons and those whom they can use. It makes no difference which party puts up the ticket, the same lodge-look is presented by the ballot. And if occasionally a stray name gets through the convention, the lodge brethren secretly use the knife to defeat the man it represents, at the polls.

Of course, some of these lodgemen make worthy officials. Secret societies do not render all their members tricky and dishonorable. None the less is it true that a man who swears allegiance to a secret order is practically an alien. He belongs to the secret empire and is not qualified to be the official servant of a free people. The Anti-Secret League should have the name of every public-spirited man on its rolls.

THE LORD'S PRAYER AND MASONIC WORSHIP.

A subscriber says that the lodges reply to the charge that "in the prescribed forms of prayer in Masonry and Odd-fellowship there is no mention of our Lord Jesus Christ," that this is equally true of the Lord's Prayer, and that, therefore, our objection proves too much. He asks us to give our views:

We answer:

1. That all authority for religious worship is contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, and that any other worship is forbidden; at least, to those who have a knowledge of God's Word.

2. That all true prayer includes at least three things, either expressed or implied: Confession of past sinfulness, and consequent ill-desert; an invocation of the Holy Spirit, and the recognition of an atoning sacrifice. This was true under the old as well as the new dispensation, and is evident from the original institution of sacrifice, dating back to the time of Abel; also from the prayers recorded in the Old Testament Scriptures.

3. The difference between the prayers of the old dispensation and those of the new, is that in the old the offering was presented by man, and prefigured in the great atoning sacrifice made by our Lord, which had not yet been consummated; but under both covenants it was equally true that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission." (Hebrews 9: 22.) Hence it followed that while all prayers recognize a sacrifice and an atonement, New Testament prayers recognize THE atonement, and are made in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.

4. The prayers of the old dispensation continued, and were divinely authorized, until the death and resurrection of Christ. Since then, all prayer is to be offered in his name. It was in his last instructions, just before his betrayal and crucifixion, that he said to his disciples: "Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name he will give it you. Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name. Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." (John 16: 23, 24).

5. It is sufficient answer to the objection to say that the Lord's prayer was given before this. It belonged to the old dispensation. The time had not come for them to pray in the name of Christ. In the nature of things, they could not recognize Christ as the Mediator, since he had not taken upon him his mediatorial office.

6. But since Christ has gone to his mediatorial throne, where "he ever liveth to make intercession for us," there can be no acceptable prayer that is not presented through his intercession. He says: "I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but by me." (John 14: 6.)

7. It follows that the Lord's prayer was designed rather as a synopsis of what we should pray for, than as an exact form of prayer; but if it is used with a distinct recognition of its divine authorship, it does recognize Christ, and is acceptable; but if it is offered in a system of worship from which the name of Christ is expressly excluded, then it is liable to all the objections of other un-Christian and forbidden worships. But since Masons recognize the use of the name of Christ as "sectarian," they are debarred from the use of the Lord's prayer, as such.

8. The objection to the prayers of Masonry and Odd-fellowship is, that they exclude all of the elements of acceptable prayer. They express no penitence for sin. They ask no aid from the Holy Spirit, nor do they recognize him; and they make no reference to any Mediator or atoning sacrifice for sin. They are not prayers made to "God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," since they do not honor the Son. "For he that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father that sent him." (John 5: 23.)

ABOUT "SPURIOUS" MASONRY.

The Voice of Masonry for December says that "Sir" James A. Guest, Grand Commander of Knights Templar in Iowa, in his address at the late annual convocation of the Grand Commandery in that State (extracts from which were printed in the Cynosure, Nov. 12), had reference to the "Cerneau" branch of the order, and not to the "regular" body of Free and Accepted Masons. The Cynosure has no desire to thrust itself into any family quarrel between the two branches, and accepts the correction.

But the reference of the Voice of Masonry to the "Cerneaus" as a non-affiliated clan of Freemasons leads the way for a brief consideration of "genuine" and spurious Freemasonry, as affecting the general public.

This is what "Sir" James said: "The Right Worshipful Grand Lodge of Iowa has legislated, by severe enactments, against a class of Masons in open rebellion to her authority—a class who, I am sorry to say, place a higher value upon a false system of so-called higher degrees than they do upon Ancient Craft Masonry, upon which all systems bearing the Masonic name are founded."

The Voice of Masonry objects to our classing the Chapter and Knight Templar work of the "regulars" in "Sir" James' "false system of so-called higher degrees;" which is his language—not ours.

All students of modern or "revived" Freemasonry know perfectly well that the order established at the Apple Tree Tavern, in London, in 1717, covering the three degrees of Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft and Master Mason, embraced Ancient Craft Masonry, "upon which," says Mr. Guest, "ALL systems bearing the Masonic name are founded." Whence, then, came the present Chapter and Templar degrees, which the fraternity so arrogantly affirm are "legitimate"?

President J. Blanchard, in his annotations on Doesburg's Expositions of Chapter degrees (page 230) says: "Templar Masonry, . . . every Masonic author tells us, is French Masonry; and Robinson and Barruel show abundantly that the degrees above the blue lodge were invented by priests and persons educated by, and, many of them, for priests, who took popery for their model and made Masonry in its image and likeness." Again, on page 420, he says: "Chapter was a church term applied to a head-priest and his clergy. It was first used in Masonry by French priests after the London (blue lodge) had crossed the English Channel. There, as in this country and elsewhere, myriads of degrees sprung up, like mushrooms in a night. Disappointed aspirants, or scheming speculators, having capacity and cunning, invented and sold new degrees, and others would buy them, as thousands first join lodges, in self-defence, lest the new lodge should take secret advantages of them. And, after a while, these new swarms of degrees would be weeded and condensed into systems or rites. So poor and contemptible was the origin of Chapter Masonry."

A. T. C. Pierson, "Grand Inspector General 33°," and other titles, in his "Traditions of Masonry" (page 254), says: "The fraternity (Masonry) became very popular, and designing men sought to use it for their own selfish purposes. New degrees were created and became the rage everywhere, but more particularly in France and Germany, which became the hotbed, as it were, of so-called Masonic degrees, whose number was legion. . . . Many of these degrees were arranged in systems or rites, most of which had their day and died out; a few, however, became popular, and have continued to be cultivated." Pierson also informs us (page 258) that the present caputular lectures were manufactured in the United States by Webb and Cross, about the year 1810, and are a series of mongrel compositions, compiled from both the Ancient York and Scottish Rites. Their adoption by the "Sovereign Grand" magnates of American lodges is their only claim to legitimacy. We shall have more to say on this subject next week.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The message of President Harrison to the Senate and House of Representatives is one of ability and dignity, and will compare favorably with that of any of his predecessors. While there are in it some things that are personal and partisan, there is much that will commend it to every thoughtful mind.

It will be remembered that in a previous message he recommended national legislation for the protection of the right of suffrage, and that the Federal Elections bill, which came so near passing, and which caused so violent an opposition that it was defeated, was the result. He now says: "I believe it would be possible to constitute a commission, non-partisan in its membership and composed of patriotic, wise and impartial men, to whom a consideration of the question of the evils connected with our election system and methods might be committed with a good prospect of securing unanimity in some plan for removing or mitigating those evils. The constitution would permit the selection of the commission to be vested in the Supreme Court, if that method would give the best guarantee of impartiality."

We believe it is exactly because both of the great political parties mean to use unfair means to secure their ends, that they do not want the real facts as to their Gerrymandering and "counting out" to be considered, that they will oppose such a commission. The game of fraud "is one that two can play at," and neither side will give it up at present.

But some things in the message are conspicuously absent. Alluding to our relations with China, and the declination of that government to receive Minister Blair, he fails to say that they could not have done so with any self-respect, since we have singled out that government among all the nations of the earth and rigidly excluded all of its people from landing on our shores. What he failed to say was, that when we treat the Chinese people precisely as we treat others, and as we demand of her government that it treat our citizens, then we may expect an amicable relation. Mr. Harrison truly says that it was not Mr. Blair, but our legislation, that was at fault.

That we may rightfully restrict immigration is doubtless true, but we have no right to put such restriction on the ground of race or nationality. When will nations learn that the divine law of justice is just as truly binding on them as on their subjects?

Another remarkable omission is, that no allusion is made to either of two business questions that are now occupying the public mind. The first is, that Congress ought to right speedily settle, Shall the World's Fair at Chicago be opened on the Lord's Day, or shall it be subject to the same regulations as other business matters? Congress is to be asked to grant an additional $5,000,000; and it would be easy to affix a condition that the money should not be used to make exhibits that a majority of the people hold to be injurious to public morals.

Another more important and more difficult question is, What to do with the liquor-traffic, especially in the District of Columbia and the national Territories? Mr. Harrison very properly asks that female virtue be protected in the District. How about male virtue? How about the protection of the innocent from the consequences of running more than one thousand saloons in the city of Washington? Polygamy is rightfully suppressed in Utah, New Mexico and Arizona. Why not the liquor traffic? It could scarcely have failed to occur to the President that just such a non-partisan commission as he asks for, to inquire into the perversion of the rights of suffrage, has been long and earnestly asked for to consider the evils of intemperance and to report what legislation was needful for their suppression. Had not Mr. Harrison been one of the possible candidates for the Presidency in 1892, he might have given these matters more consideration.

ALL HONOR TO ENGLAND.

On page 138 of a "Selection of Leading Cases in Common Law," recently published in England, we are told that one Cowan was the secretary of the Liverpool Secular Society, and the defendant, the proprietor of some assembly rooms there. Cowan engaged the rooms for a series of lectures to show that our Lord's character was defective, and his teachings erroneous, and that the Bible was no more inspired than any other book. At the time the defendant let the rooms, he did not know the nature of the lectures to be delivered, and when he found out he declined to complete his agreement. The secularists sued him for breach of contract, but the court decided that the purpose for which the plaintiff intended to use the rooms was illegal, and the contract one which could not be enforced. "Christianity," said Kelley, C. B., "is part and parcel of the law of the land."

"PRESS COUNCIL 71, NATIONAL UNION."

"The National Union" was organized as a secret fraternal order at Mansfield, Ohio, eleven years ago. To foster and promote the spirit of patriotism, the order was fashioned in its rules and laws after the Federal Government, having a national president, a senate and various State assemblies and councils. There are now between 500 and 600 councils in the Union; eighty-five of these are to be found in Cook county, which is one of the strongholds of the order. The total membership in Cook county is something like 7,700.

Press Council was formed about seven years ago in this city, and was originally restricted to newspaper workers, or "persons connected with the press" in one way or another. At length, however, railroad officials broke into the Council's ranks, and now well-known men of that calling preponderate over the newspaper workers in the membership. Press Council has a membership of 250. Besides the social, fraternal and patriotic features of the order, it has also the mutual benefit plan of life insurance.

This secret order was brought prominently before the public in Chicago, last week, by its fashionable banquet at the Auditorium Hotel—its first annual festival. A daily newspaper says: "American flags of immense size were festooned on the parapet of the balcony. Above these national colors a group of musicians with stringed instruments played a series of familiar melodies tinged with the sentiment of patriotism. Besides, nearly every lady present wore a tiny flag of red, white and blue at her corsage, while every gentleman had a similar emblem displayed on the lapel of his dress coat. After the menu came a long toast list, beginning with 'Our Nation,' and ending with 'Our Flag.'" About 300 men and women attended the banquet. The motto of the order is: "Pro protectione dependentium nostrorum." It is the strangest thing in the world that a purely "patriotic" and "charitable" institution should resort to secrecy, when it ought to have nothing to secrete if it displays its real character on these festive occasions.

—In another column, on page 3, we print the program prepared by the Evangelical Alliance for the uniform observance of the annual Week of Prayer—Jan. 3-10, 1892. It is very comprehensive, embracing a fine field in which all Christians should be deeply interested. Revelation, history and experience have sufficiently demonstrated the power of united, earnest, persistent prayer, where the object is for the glory of God and offered in accordance with his will. This program deserves a wide circulation, and may be had at 117 Bible House, New York City, by ordering it from Josiah Strong, secretary. The price is 50 cents per hundred.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Bro. Wm. Fenton has given nine anti-secrecy lectures within the past two weeks.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard writes that he has five appointments for lectures in the vicinity of Boston.

—Elder Rufus Smith, of Wheaton, one of the well-known reformers of that district, was prostrated, several days ago, while alighting from a train, by a stroke of paralysis, and has since been confined to his house. As his condition is now considerably improved, it is hoped that he will eventually recover.

—A letter from Lumberton, N. C., last week, informs us that "Mrs. Bushnell, of New York, sent Dr. L. A. Rutherford, of Lumberton, a 'Gospel wagon,' to be used by him in Gospel and temperance work among the freedmen in North Carolina. Dr. Rutherford is also interested in the anti-secrecy cause as advocated by the Christian Cynosure." A nice gift, worthily bestowed.

—Bro. Wm. Fenton, in the report of his work performed in Ohio printed in the Cynosure of October 29 (page 9), penned this sentence: "When the stars seem to fight against a man, he had better be calm and as good-natured as possible, and let the Spirit and the Word of God do the fighting." This passage, and the accompanying adverse criticism, belong to his experiences at Tiffin, and not to Mansfield, and were inadvertently transposed in writing up the report. Rev. R. J. Gault, pastor of the Covenanter church at Mansfield, and his people are in hearty sympathy with the work of the N. C. A.

—Bro. H. H. Hinman left here about a fortnight ago, to labor in Ohio in behalf of the Ohio Anti-Secrecy Convention of last week, but was taken ill at New Concord, in that State, and obliged to relinquish his active work. Kind friends promptly rallied to his relief, and under their ministrations he was enabled to attend the convention, and, with great difficulty, to deliver his appointed lecture. It is hardly expected that he will be able to resume his labors. His contract with the N. C. A. will expire with the close of the year, and he will then probably retire from the lecture field. It is hoped, however, that he will, from time to time, continue to contribute to the columns of the Cynosure, in which his articles always find interested readers.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 9, 1891.

The opening of the Fifty-second Congress brought together the usual nondescript crowd,—the crowd which, it is said, increases the consumption of alcoholic liquors in this city from 25 to 33 per cent by its presence. In addition to the usual incidents accompanying the beginning of the first session of a new Congress, was the very unusual one of the House of Representatives having to adjourn from Monday to Tuesday without electing a Speaker, owing to the inability of the caucus of the majority party to agree upon a candidate. This has not happened before for nearly forty years. An agreement was reached on Monday night, and at yesterday's session Judge Crisp, of Georgia, was elected Speaker. This selection is pleasing to the temperance people, even those unacquainted with and politically opposed to the new Speaker, because of the attempt of the liquor interests to make votes against him on account of his being a total abstainer and in favor of prohibition. He voted for the "original-package" bill, which became a law at the last session of Congress, and was widely talked about at the time. His election has encouraged the hope that some legislation restricting, if not absolutely prohibiting, the traffic in intoxicating liquors, may be secured during this Congress. It must be admitted, however, that there is little tangible basis for such hope, as, owing to the Presidential contest next year, the probabilities are that the first session will be almost entirely taken up with politics and matters relating thereto.

The unusually large number of new members, both in the Senate and the House of Representatives, makes the opening of Congress very interesting to the people of Washington, although it will be quite a while before the habitues of the Capitol can become accustomed to the absence of so many faces with which they had long been familiar and the presence of so many new ones.

The first act of Speaker Crisp after he took his scat, and before the other officers of the House were elected, was to request Rev. Dr. Milburn, the blind chaplain of the House, to offer prayer. Dr. Milburn said: "Almighty and eternal God, in whose hand our breath is and whose are all our ways, we render thee devout and hearty thanks that thou hast brought so many of the representatives of the people to the halls of this time-honored Capitol, consecrated by the memory of so many patriots, sages, heroes and statesmen. Breathe into the soul of every man on this floor a solemn sense of the lofty trust confided to him to maintain the Constitution, the dignity of the republic, the honor, safety and welfare of every citizen, the humblest toiler in the mines, at the forge and in the mills, as well as the rich and prosperous. Endue these, thy servants, with largeness of mind, kindness of temper, hospitality of spirit, with courage and devotion to the interests of their constituents and of the whole country. Grant thy blessing to thy servant, the Speaker of this House, who has just taken the oath of office. Uphold him and every member of the House, keeping them in health and peace, and help them so to discharge the duties of their trust as that the country shall say, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant'; and that the welfare of the country shall be prospered and carried forward by their labors; and to thy name, O Father, shall be all the honor and glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

Postmaster General Wanamaker spoke twice on Sunday evening at the Central Union Mission rooms; first, at the opening of the meeting, appealing to his hearers in a plain, straight-forward business talk to lead Christian lives, showing them how much more profitable, both in a material and spiritual sense, such a life always is, and giving an account of how, thirty years ago, when a country boy, he was converted. Later, during an experience session, Mr. Wanamaker gave his testimony in such a convincing way that a dozen persons requested the prayers of the meeting. The benefit of the example of a man of Mr. Wanamaker's prominence and experience publicly pleading for Christianity is incalculable, particularly upon the young, and it is to be regretted that more of our prominent public and business men do not do likewise. It is, of course, good for our substantial citizens to attend church regularly and help to maintain their congregations; but is it not better for them also to take a hand in the mission work among those who do not attend church?

President Harrison's annual message, which, on account of the delay in nominating a Speaker of the House, was not sent to Congress until today, is being read, as I write, in the House and Senate. It is a little longer than that of last year; consisting of about 18,000 words.

The assembling of Congress recalled to one of our local ministers the memorable reply of President Lincoln to the hope of one of his callers that "God will be on our side." "No, gentlemen," said Mr. Lincoln, "the greatest anxiety is to be on God's side."

THE HOME.ONE LESS AT HOME.

One less at home!

The charmed circle broken; a dear face
Missed day by day from its accustomed place;
But, cleansed and saved and perfected by grace,
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

One voice of welcome hushed, and evermore
One farewell word unspoken; on the shore
Where parting comes not, one soul landed more,
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

A sense of loss that meets us at the gate;
Within, a place unfilled and desolate;
And far away, our coming to await,
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

Chill as the earth-born mist the thought would rise
And wrap our footsteps round and dim our eyes;
But the bright sunbeam darteth from the skies—
One more in heaven!

One more at home!

This is not home, where cramped in earthly mold,
Our sight of Christ is dim, our love is cold;
But there, where face to face we shall behold,
Is home and heaven.

One less on earth!

Its pain, its sorrow and its toil to share;
One less the pilgrim's daily cross to bear;
One more the crown of ransomed souls to wear,
At home in heaven.

One more in heaven!

Another thought to brighten cloudy days,
Another theme for thankfulness and praise,
Another link on high our souls to raise
To home and heaven!

One more at home—

That home where separation cannot be,
That home where none are missed eternally,
Lord Jesus, grant us all a place with thee,
At home in heaven!

JOHN WESLEY'S HOLD UPON GOD.

I have been a student of Wesley's works for a number of years, and the thing that has impressed me more than anything else, is the wonderful hold he had upon God. He lived in a spiritual atmosphere, and he obtained this privilege by constant prayer. I am glad to see this phase of his character made prominent. Education is a good thing, and we should rejoice at the growing facilities of the church to give education to all our people; but we should not forget that all human learning is powerless to lift humanity into the kingdom of God, without supernatural help, and this help comes to none until they learn to pray. In our modern revival work there is a remarkable absence of that praying spirit that characterized the labors of Wesley and those who wrought with him. And there is a remarkable absence of that Holy Ghost power that followed their labors. I am not a pessimist or a croaker; I rejoice at whatever good is done by any of the servants of our Lord; but is there not a need for a praying revival? I was much pleased with a point made by Bishop Keener, in his lecture to the class received into the North Carolina Conference at our last session. He exhorted the young men to fast, and shut themselves up in their rooms, and pray all over the room. He told them that they would get power in this way that they could not get in any other. But how prone we are to forget all this goodly advice, and let our duties on this subject and our vows fall into desuetude. An eminent divine who has gone to his reward, preached a sermon before his conference of great power. After the sermon, a young preacher approached him, and said: "Doctor, tell me the secret of your pulpit power." The doctor said: "Brother, did you ever pray thirteen consecutive hours?" The young man said: "No, sir." The doctor said "I have." That was the secret. We had a man in the North Carolina Conference, who went to his reward a few years ago, who was not brilliant nor learned, but he was a power in his day. He shook every community he went into with a spiritual earthquake; and he spent many nights in prayer to God. Like his Master, he was much in the mountain; and often rose a great while before day and retired to pray. Oh, that God would pour upon the ministers of the present day "the spirit of prayer and supplication!" I fear we are drifting away from the source of our power. When we get fully in the spirit of prayer there is no need for prayer-books. The Book of Common Prayer, as good as it is in itself, could not hold John Wesley to its forms when his spirit was full of the presence and power of God. There is an insidious evil here that is dangerous, especially among fashionable city churches. When the true spirit of prayer is gone, it is so easy for us to conclude that a liturgy is a proper thing; and we unwillingly drift off into formality.

In conclusion, let me say: The same kind of praying Mr. Wesley did will bring to us of the present day Mr. Wesley's power. Let us all try it. Let us pray.—Christian Advocate.

RICHARD BAXTER'S WIFE.

Original letter of Mrs. Richard Baxter to her husband, Rev. Richard Baxter.

I will pray for you according to the best of my ability, and I will tell you for what, that you may know what to pray for yourself.

1. I will pray that your thoughts may be turned to the magnifying of God's love; that you may remember that he is as good as he is great; and that you may be as sensible of his mercy as of your own unworthiness.

2. I will pray that you may have so lively an apprehension of our everlasting felicity as may make you long to be with Christ.

3. That you may have more self-denial, and more of the humility which will make you little in your own eyes.

4. That you may be less tender and liable to commotion and disquiet of mind, and less sensible to unkindness and bodily dangers—yea, and of sin itself, while the sense of it hinders the sense of mercy. A meek, a quiet, and a patient spirit is of great price in the sight of God. I will pray that you may be delivered from too much inward passion of fear, grief, and discontent.

5. I will pray that no creature may seem greater, better, or more regardable or necessary to you than it really is; and that you may look on all as walking shadows, vanity, and liars, farther than you see God in them, or they lead you up to him; and that they may never be over-loved, over-feared, or their thoughts too much regarded.

6. Above all, I will pray that you may be less self-willed, and not too passionately or immoderately set on the fulfillment of your own will, but may have a will that is compliant with the will of God, and can change as he would have it; and will follow him, and not run before him; and can endure to be crossed and denied by God and man, without discomposure and impatient trouble of mind.

7. I will pray that seeming wisdom may not entangle you either in the concealment of anything that needs your friend's advice, or in the hiding of your talents by unprofitable silence, as to all good discourse, upon the enmity which you have to hypocrisy; and that you will not live in sins of omission for fear of seeming better than you are. By this you know wherein I think you faulty. The best creature's affections have a mixture of imperfections, and we therefore need some gall to wean us from the faulty past. Oh, this miserable world! where we can have no fire without smoke, and where our dearest friends must be our greatest griefs; where we begin in hope, in love, and joy, and, before we are aware, we fall into an answerable amount of distress! Learn by experience that when any condition is inordinately or excessively sweet to thee, to say, "Hence must be my sorrow!"

A HANDSOME "SMOKE-HOUSE."

Here is a story whose moral is unmistakable:

A man who lives in Albany, and whose business is that of a clerk, said that he had lately built a house which cost him three thousand dollars. His friends expressed their wonder that he could afford to build so fine a dwelling.

"Why," said he, "that is my smoke-house."

"Your smoke-house! What do you mean?"

"Why, I mean that twenty-five years ago I left off smoking, and I have put the money saved from smoke, with interest, into my house. Hence, I call it my smoke-house."

Now, boys, we want you to think of this when you are tempted to take your first cigar. Think how much good might be done with the money you are beginning to spend in smoke. What would you think of a man who, to amuse himself, should light a paper twenty-five cents, and see it burn? Is it more sensible to take for your quarter a roll of old, dry, brown leaves, light it, and see it smoke?—Anonymous.

THE POWER OF GENUINENESS.

Prof. W. G. Blaikie, of Edinburgh, relates the following story, well nigh a century old, that has only now seen the light, in the Life of Prof. Sedgwick, the distinguished geologist:

Sedgwick was the son of a simple-minded vicar, in the remote dale of Dent, in the highlands of Yorkshire.

One of his parishioners, an ungodly-minded man, who had no faith in the Scriptures, called one day at the vicarage, and being directed to find his way to the study, came unawares on the aged pastor, whom he heard, as he supposed, conversing. He waited and listened, and found that the converse was indeed prayer. "My father," said Prof. Sedgwick, "being absorbed in feeling, was unconsciously uttering aloud the breathings of his soul before his Maker." The man remained spell-bound for some minutes, and then went away without saying a word. But he had heard that which convinced him of the reality of religion; he had found true and genuine faith, and, in reality, ceased to be an unbeliever.—Selected.

MARION'S EXTRACT.

Everything had gone wrong with Marion Douglas that Monday morning. In the first place breakfast was late, and she had spoken unkindly to the cook, and been reproved by her mother. Then her little sister Allie had accidentally upset her cup of coffee, and spilled it all over her new plaid merino. She arose from the table very angry, and rushed upstairs to change her dress. Some words which her Sunday-school teacher had said to her only the morning before crossed her memory.

"It is of no use," she said aloud, "for me to try to be a Christian; I might as well give up."

As she stood, a few moments later, with her hat and cloak on, ready for school, she remembered that it was her turn to learn and repeat four lines of a poem from some author. She caught up her book of extracts, and opened it.

What was it that caused the tears to flow from her eyes, and her lips to move in prayer?

She stood a moment, committing the lines to memory, then went down and spoke pleasantly to the cook, and kissed her mother and Allie good-bye, and went away to school. And when it was her turn to give an extract, she arose, and with a bright, unclouded face, repeated slowly—

"The little worries which we meet each day,
May lie as stumbling-blocks across our way;
Or we may make them stepping-stones to be,
Of grace, O Christ, to thee."

—Christian at Work.

FAMOUS FARMER BOYS.

There are some people foolish enough to laugh at the homely virtues of farm life. They are fortunately few, and they are fortunately growing fewer. But it is well sometimes to look at the list of great men that came up from the farm—not all of them, for that would fill a thousand volumes, but some of the most able ones that flash into mind in a moment. Nearly three-fourths of the men who have been chosen by the people for the great offices of the nation are men who were early familiar with wooded hills and cultivated fields, says the Kansas City Times; for example, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Hamlin, Greeley, Tilden, Cleveland, Harrison, Hayes, Blaine, and many others almost equally conspicuous in current events or living memory. Among journalists, Henry Watterson spent his early life in rural Kentucky, and Murat Halstead was born and lived on a farm in Ohio. W. H. Vanderbilt was born in a small New Jersey town, and early engaged in the business of ship chandlery. Russell Sage was born in a New York village. Jay Gould spent his early years on his father's farm in New York State. Whittier and Howells spent their youth in villages, the former dividing his time between farm employment and his studies. Follow the list out yourself, and see how long it will become.—Young Men's Era.

THE PICTURE.

A painter wanted a picture of Innocence, and drew the likeness of a child at prayer. The little suppliant was kneeling beside his mother; the palms of his uplifted hands were reverently pressed together, his rosy cheek spoke of health, and his mild blue eye was upturned with the expression of devotion and peace. The portrait of young Rupert was much prized by the painter, and hung up on his study wall, and called Innocence. Years passed away, and the painter became an old man. Still the picture hung there. He had often thought of painting a counterpart—the picture of guilt, but had not found the opportunity. At last he effected his purpose by paying a visit to a neighboring jail. On the damp floor of his cell lay a wretched culprit, named Randall, heavily ironed. Wasted was his body, and hollow his eye; vice was visible in his face. The painter succeeded admirably, and the portrait of young Rupert and old Randall were hung side by side, for Innocence and Guilt. But who was young Rupert, and who was Randall? Alas! the two were one! Old Randall was young Rupert, led astray by bad companions, and ending his life in the damp and disgraceful dungeon.—Sabbath-School Teacher.

JESUS.

"There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved."—Acts 4:12.

Is thy heart of sin aware?
Jesus is the sinner's friend.
Do thy faithless friends forsake thee?
Jesus' love is without end.
Thou wilt seek in vain for rest
Elsewhere than the Saviour's breast.

Dost thou doubt if God doth love thee?
Hark! and let thy doubts be done;
"God so loved the world" of sinners,
That whoe'er in him believe
Might eternal life receive.

Dost thou think, "Ah! well, perhaps so;
But there's time enough for me?"
This is only Satan's whisper,
He'd be fain detaining thee.
Every hour that passeth by Brings thee near eternity.

Friend, I pray thee, cease this folly,
And this trifling with thy God.
Jesus waits, with love and mercy,
Pleading still his own life's blood.
How he died that thou might'st be Glad for all eternity.

Jesus is the blessed Saviour,
And his heart is e'er the same.
His the love, the power that saves us;
And there is none other name
Which on earth has e'er been given
Whereby we may enter heaven.

TEMPERANCE.

A RUMSELLER'S LETTER TO THE DEVIL.

To HIS SATANIC MAJESTY:—Dear sir, I have opened apartments, fitted up with all the enticement of luxury, for the sale of rum, wine, gin, brandy, beer, and all their compounds. Our schemes, though different, can be best attained by united action. I therefore propose a co-partnership. All I want of men is their money—all the rest shall be yours.

Bring me the industrious, the respectable, the sober, and I will return them to you drunkards, paupers, and beggars.

Bring me the child, and I will dash to earth the dearest hopes of the father and mother.

Bring me the father and mother and I will plant discord between them, and make them a curse, and a reproach to their children.

Bring me the young man, and I will ruin his character, destroy his health, shorten his life and blot out the highest and purest hopes of youth.

Bring me the young woman, and I will destroy her virtue and return her to you a blasted and withered thing—an instrument to lead others to destruction.

Bring me the mechanic and the laborer, and their money—the hard-earned fruit of toil—shall be made to plant poverty, vice and ignorance in his once happy home.

Bring me the professed follower of Christ, and I will blight and wither every devotional feeling of his heart, and send him forth to plant infidelity and crime among men.

Bring me the minister of the Gospel, and I will defile the purity of the church and make the name of religion a stench in the land.

Bring me the lawyer and the judge, and I will pervert justice, break up the integrity of our civil institutions, and the name of law shall become a hissing and a by-word in the streets. Awaiting your reply, I am, yours truly,

A RUMSELLER.

—H. S. Parmelee, in the Gospel Banner.

IN NORWAY AND SWEDEN.

An habitual drunkard in Sweden and Norway is treated as a criminal in this sense, that his inordinate love for strong drink renders him liable to imprisonment, and while in confinement it appears he is cured of his bad propensities on a plan which, though simple enough, is said to produce marvelous effects. From the day the confirmed drunkard is incarcerated no nourishment is served to him or her but bread and wine. The bread, however, it should be said, cannot be eaten apart from the wine, but is steeped in a bowl of it and left thus to soak an hour or more before the meal is served to the delinquent. The first day the habitual toper takes his food in this shape without the slightest repugnance; the second day he finds it less agreeable to his palate, and very quickly he evinces a positive aversion to it. Generally, the doctor states, eight or ten days of this regimen is more than sufficient to make a man loathe the very sight of wine.—Exchange.

EXHIBITIONS AND ALCOHOLICS.

The British Sanitary Institute, which lately held its eleventh annual Congress at Worcester, England, when certain intoxicants were first sent to its Health Exhibition in 1884, adopted the following commendable rule, to which it still adheres:

No reward can be given to alcoholic liquids intended to be used as drinks, and the fact of any article or appliance being allowed a place in the exhibition, shall not entitle it to trial for the purpose of competition for rewards.

This is a praiseworthy precedent which the managers of the American exhibitions would do well to follow.—National Advocate.

THE ROOT OF THE EVIL.

Of the three-fold cord that binds us to the support of the liquor traffic, the strongest strand is avarice. The drinker's loss is somebody's gain. The enormous profits seduce first the distiller, the brewer and the rumseller. They first sell their souls for unjust gain. But they can do little alone. This inhuman traffic if left to itself would kill itself through its excesses and the indignation of an outraged public. It could never have reached its present colossal magnitude without government protection, which has created a privileged class with immense resources and political control. Where the carcass is there will the birds of prey be gathered together. The newspaper vulture, the official buzzard, and the clerical eagle meet around this carrion, and feast upon it. When the occasion demands, the newspaper press pours forth a broadside of lies in defense of the traffic; the politician fortifies it by every device known to corrupt legislation; and the minister, soaring into the clouds of metaphysical speculation, says, "If it is not a sin per se to drink a glass of beer, a Christian may support the liquor traffic and still read his title clear to mansions in the skies." The Presbyterian elder and the Methodist class-leader sit cheek by jowl with the rumseller, or even take the lead in planning the defeat of Prohibition, as the Ministerial Union of Philadelphia did in 1877.

Through this consent the national and State treasuries have long been gorged with innocent blood; and more recently this impure current has been turned into the treasuries of cities, counties and townships for the purpose of forcing this poison into every vein and artery of the social body. The nation is sick, dangerously sick of blood poisoning. God is, and he is holy and just. He will not hold us guiltless. Such crimes bring their own punishment; and when perpetrated by States, nations and municipalities, and the leaders of society, and acquiesced in by the people at large, they bring swift destruction and the enduring wrath of almighty God.—Westleyan Advocate.

WOOD ALCOHOL.

A subscriber living near where wood alcohol is distilled, writes asking if it is ever used for compounding drinks. We referred this question to the editors of The Scientific American as high authority, and received this answer: "Ordinary wood alcohol is not used for drinks unless in exceptional cases. Its offensive odor can not be disguised, and it would be poisonous unless greatly diluted. The process of purification is expensive." Here, as we have before pointed out, is one step toward removing objections to the manufacture of alcoholic beverages. Every prohibitory law, constitutional or statutory, has been fought with the assertion: "The manufacture of alcohol is absolutely necessary for mechanical purposes." But wood alcohol is available for that use, while there is very little danger of its being used for drinking purposes; the risk is too great both to seller and drinker. A few years ago in this State, five out of six young men who had drank such a decoction, sold them in a low-down saloon, died, and the man who sold it to them is behind prison bars. With alcoholic wine banished from the communion table, non-alcoholic medication demonstrated by our Temperance Hospital, and wood alcohol for use in mechanics and the arts, there is no longer any need for prohibitory laws to make the exceptions "for mechanical, medicinal and sacramental purposes."—Union Signal.

A BEAUTIFUL RESPONSE.

During the convention of the World's and National Temperance Union held in Boston, a meeting of great power and enthusiasm, when it was announced that Miss Frances Willard was re-elected president of the National Society, and also of the World's Christian Temperance Union, a telegram announcing the fact was sent to Miss Willard's aged mother at Evanston, Ill. At a subsequent session the following beautiful response was received by telegram. "Your message gratefully received. As one who stands upon the shore, and sees the lifeboat speed to save, and all too weak to take an oar, I send a cheer across the wave."

NOTES ON SUNDAY SALOONS.

When Minneapolis secured Sunday closing of saloons, the saloon ravens croaked out the prophecy that there would be more drunkenness than ever through secret drinking. But here are the facts: From April to December, 1888, the last nine months of the wide-open regime, there were 720 Sunday arrests, and for the same time in 1889, 408, giving a margin of 312 in favor of Sunday closing. The Minneapolis Rest Day League are moving for a return of such days.

We hear less than formerly from the "Personal Liberty Leagues," so publicly and defiantly organized a few years ago, but it is probable that the quiet is due not to inactivity, but to the discovery that the "still hunt" is more effective than open defiance.—Christian Statesman.

NUGGETS.

True goodness and bad whisky won't mix.

Mr. Spurgeon signed the abstinence pledge in 1866.

No man who really believes as Christ taught, ever sells whisky.

The man who makes a practice of drinking when he wants to, will some day have to drink when he don't want to.

Dr. Norman Kerr says: "Total abstinence is the surest way, all other things being equal, of attaining the highest physical, mental, moral and every other kind of health."

From a consular report just issued it appears that the population of Munich consumes the enormous quantity of 485 quarts of beer per head per annum.

Sweet the moments, rich in blessing,
Which before the Cross I spend,
Life, and health, and peace, possessing,
From the sinner's dying Friend.

With my tears his feet I'll bathe;
Constant still, in faith abiding,
Life deriving from his death.

Truly blessed is this station,
Low before his Cross to lie,
While I see divine compassion
Beaming in his glorious eye.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The new Chicago University is said to have $2,000,000 worth of land, $2,400,000 endowment, and $100,000 for buildings. This is so far a good beginning. The money wherewith to cover the twenty-four acres of ground with the necessary buildings, it is expected, will be forthcoming. Ground has been broken for the new buildings.

—The Baptist laymen of Chicago have pledged themselves to raise $120,000 for city missions. Of this amount $100,000 is to be set apart as a permanent fund, $10,000 is to be used for the current expenses of church extension work, and the remaining $10,000 will be applied to the establishing of a central mission station.

—Rev. O. P. Gifford, recently of one of the leading Baptist churches in Boston, has begun his pastorate of Immanuel Baptist church in this city, as successor to Dr. Lorimer, who has returned to Boston. Dr. Gifford has a fine record as an able, eloquent and successful minister. His coming brings a strong reinforcement to the evangelical pulpits of this city.

—Large numbers of Baptists are emigrating from the Baltic provinces for Brazil, owing to restrictions placed upon their freedom of worship by the clergy of the Russian orthodox church. The Baptists, because of the missionary zeal which characterizes them, are the most unpopular body in Russia. A number of them are at the present moment either in jail or banished to Odessa.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—Mr. Victor F. Brown, of Chicago Seminary, has preached two Sundays to the boys in the Illinois Industrial School at Glenwood. One hundred and fifty-seven out of one hundred and eighty boys have expressed a desire to become Christians; and fully 125 seem to have taken a decided stand for Christ.

—The Chicago West Side churches which united in the meetings under Rev. B. Fay Mills will continue meetings in their own churches two or three evenings in the week. About 2,850 signed the cards pledging themselves to a Christian life. Upon the same card each signer indicated his church preference; and the names have been handed to the committees of the respective churches to be looked after.

—All the various ministerial bodies of Chicago are to unite in a Pastoral Alliance, and to hold four meetings a year. Their united voice may thus be felt against the wrongs of the day.

—The Baptists and Congregationalists of England are corresponding with the view to consolidating on lines that will permit of their worshipping together (even coming together, one account says) and working together.

—The historic chapel in York street, Walworth, England, where George Clayton preached and Robert Browning was baptized, has been adopted by the London Congregational union as the headquarters of a "forward movement."

EPISCOPAL PROTESTANT.

—Lord Nelson, a churchman of influence, has been criticising the bigoted, persecuting section of his own church for displaying an un-Christian temper toward nonconformist, and especially Methodist, churches. He declares that "the Church of England cannot be the mother of English Christianity unless she displays a motherly tenderness for all who love Jesus Christ."

—The Rev. Dr. J. S. Jenckes, pastor of St. Paul's Episcopal church of Indianapolis, has resigned. Dissatisfaction has been felt in his church on account of a series of sermons recently preached by him, in which he insists that the close of this dispensation is to occur on Easter of 1899.

—It is said that Phillips Brooks refuses to wear the bishop's ring or any other jewelry that indicates his episcopal dignity, and that he is as severely simple and unostentatious in this respect as were the early Methodists.

LUTHERAN.

—The Lutheran Church in this country now numbers more than 5,000 ministers, 8,500 churches and upwards of 1,200,000 communicants. Sixty per cent of these belong to German churches, 20 per cent to English, 12 to Norwegian, 6 to Swedish, 2 per cent to Danish, Icelandic, Finnish, Slavonian, Bohemian, French, Negro, and a few other organizations. A church that is the home of so many different languages and nationalities, and whose members are found in every State and Territory of this land, naturally has many divisions. There are 60 synods, 47 of which belong to the four general organizations (General Synod, General Council, Synodical Conference, and United Synod in the South), while 13 maintain at the present an independent position, among them all the Norwegian, Danish, Icelandic and Finnish bodies. For the education of her ministers the Lutheran Church maintains 23 theological seminaries, besides 25 colleges and many academies. Her eleemosynary institutions number 69, to wit: 35 orphan's homes, 3 homes for aged and infirm persons, 9 hospitals, 4 deaconess institutions, 1 institution for deaf mutes, and 7 immigrant missions and sailors' homes. There are 94 church papers which have a more general circulation, of which 22 are weeklies, 41 are German, 29 English, 10

Norwegian, 8 Swedish, 4 Danish, 1 Icelandic, and 1 Finnish.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The M. E. General Committee of Missions, at their late meeting in Cleveland, voted to appropriate $1,600,000 to the work of missions for the coming year, in the proportion of forty-five per cent for home missions, and fifty-five per cent for foreign missions.

—Asbury Methodist Episcopal church, in Washington Square, New York, has re-opened its wood yard for the season. It announces that seventy men can be kept off the streets if three cords of kindling wood can be sold each week. The wood is sold at market prices.

—It is customary for two hours about noon to throw open London churches to business men and others for retirement and prayer. It is now proposed to extend this in connection with nonconformist churches, Dr. Stephenson and Mr. R. W. Perks advocating this at Wesley's chapel, City-road.

—Ground has been secured, costing about $25,000, for the new Wesley Hospital in Chicago, and plans for buildings to cost about $200,000. It is intended to commence the first building early in the spring, the estimated cost of which is about $75,000.

—A liberal citizen, whose name is withheld, announces the determination to erect in Chicago new buildings, for the Northwestern (M. E.) University medical college, the cost to be at least $100,000. Dr. Ingalls gives $50,000 to found a professorship, while a like sum from Mr. Wm. Deering will probably found an additional professorship. We are informed that $15,000 toward a fund of $50,000 for still a third professorship have been subscribed.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—A majority of the Presbyteries thus far favor revision. The Troy (N. Y.) presbytery voted by 31 to 7 approving the revision on the lines marked out by the general assembly committee. A minority of the presbytery favored relinquishing the work of revision and substituting "a new, shorter and evangelical creed in place of the Calvinistic confession." Union Seminary favors revision and Princeton opposes.

—The London (Eng.) Presbyterian says that in England, since the union in 1876, forty new congregations have been established, and the membership in these is about 7,000. Twenty of these congregations are within the bounds of the now divided presbyteries of London. This does not, however, by any means represent all the work done by the church towards its extension, because, immediately prior to the union, an unusual number of new charges were begun.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Rev. J. M. Foster, who for five years has been in the Sabbath Reform work, has accepted the call of the Second Reformed church of Boston and has removed from Cincinnati, where he has made his home for fourteen years, nine of them as the highly-esteemed pastor of the Clinton Street Reformed Presbyterian church.

—It is reported in Boston church circles that the minority of the members of the Second R. P. congregation over which Rev. J. M. Foster has recently been installed as pastor, will go into the United Presbyterian church, and have asked to be organized into a new U. P. congregation in Boston.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—In Italy there are 8,487 religious brotherhoods, with a total wealth of $20,000,000. The bulk of the interest is used for processions, festivals and the like, and only one-fourth for charitable purposes.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The United Presbyterian states that the real estate belonging to the estate of Daniel Speer, has been sold for $130,500. This is the property that has been in controversy between the Associate and the United Presbyterian churches.

—Rev. O. B. Milligan, student Jas. J. Dunlap, and Rev. J. F. Carson, are among those who have preached, or will preach, to the United Presbyterian congregation of Boston, formed by persons who have withdrawn from the Second church there. Most of the sixty persons who remonstrated against the call from the Second church on Mr. Foster, have signed the request to the U. P. presbytery desiring to be organized as a United Presbyterian church.

—A committee of one from each presbytery has been appointed by the Associate Reformed Synod, South, to confer with a similar committee from the U. P. church to prepare a basis of union between the two churches.

WESLEYAN METHODIST.

—The London Methodist Times, on the basis of a calculation made by a distinguished layman, estimates the wealth of the Wesleyan Methodists of England to be at least £80,000,000 sterling, or nearly $400,000,000.

—The population of the Fiji Islands is estimated at 123,000. Of these, 103,775 attend the services of the Wesleyan churches, and about 10,000 are Catholics. There are 40,000 children in the schools, under the care of 1,095 teachers; and there are ten European missionaries, 72 native ministers, 40 catechists, 1,838 local preachers.

HOME AND HEALTH.

A simple liniment for sore throat is made by a mixture of two parts of sweet oil and one part of spirits of hartshorn.

In making custard, pumpkin, or lemon pie it is better to partly bake the crust before adding the mixture, so that it may not be absorbed by the paste.

If you would take the best care of your umbrella, do not shut it up after using it in rainy weather. Keep it open to its full extent until quite dry, then stand it away on its handle. If you wish it to wear well, do not crush it up, or put it into a tight-fitting cover.

Cotton batting is frequently used as a cover for jelly. It is laid over the jelly in place of the brandied paper formerly used. Those who have used it say their jelly never molds when treated in this way, as it frequently does when covered with brandied paper.

The serving of fruit with breakfast adds much to the attractiveness of the meal. In homes where oat-meal is a favorite dish, this will of course be the breakfast staple. For the remainder of the bill-of-fare variety must be studied. The dishes here suggested can be recommended for their simplicity and wholesomeness, if for no other reasons.

Fish that is to be fried should be laid in a cloth to lose some of its moisture, then rolled in fine crumbs or corn meal. Those kinds that are liable to break must be dipped in beaten egg, then in crumbs. The fat in which it is fried, whether it be lard, butter or oil, must be very hot. All fried fish should be garnished with parsley.

The meal of the daily three most likely to be neglected by the cook is breakfast. It is a pleasure to prepare an elaborate dinner or a dainty tea, but, for want of time and previous planning and preparation, the morning meal is often hurried and unsatisfactory. Yet breakfast is the meal at which the average appetite requires tempting, and ought to be, therefore, the one to whose preparation the most care and thought is given.

One of the small annoyances of life occasionally is the attempt to draw an obstinate glass cork. Immersion in hot water for some minutes is sometimes efficacious, but far from always. A sure method is to lock a bureau drawer, tie a cord to the handle or key, holding the other end firmly, and over this taut cord run rapidly the neck of the obstinate bottle. In less than two minutes the glass will be too hot to touch and will have expanded all around the refractory stopper, which will fairly fall out.

WALKING.

Walking in the open air is one of the most healthful of exercises when properly executed. Walking is a perfectly natural exercise, a knowledge of which it would seem it should be intuitive with man, as with lower animals. Nevertheless, it is a fact, of which any intelligent observer can readily assure himself, that good walkers are very rare. Grace and strength are so mutually dependent and so constantly associated with healthful activity, that it may be considered as an axiom that to be a good walker a person must first of all have a good muscular development, which means not only strength but symmetry of development. One may possess the strongest of legs without being a good walker, says a writer in Good Health.

To walk healthfully and gracefully (says the same authority), one must take care:

1. To maintain a correct poise; in walking, the tendency will be to let the body fall out of poise, either forward or backward, or to allow the momentum of the forward movement to impart to some other part of the body undue amount of movement. In the correct walking poise, the chest and head will be carried well forward, so as to keep the weight of the body balanced over the balls of the feet, when the feet are together, or at a point midway between the balls of the feet when one foot is in advance of the other. The hips must be carried as far back as possible without bending the trunk for-

Peculiar

Peculiar in combination, proportion, and preparation of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses the curative value of the best known remedies of the vegetable kingdom. Peculiar in its strength and economy, Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which can truly be said, "One Hundred Doses One Dollar." Peculiar in its medicinal merits, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown, and has won for itself the title of "The greatest blood purifier ever discovered." Peculiar in its "good name at home,"—there is more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell than of all other blood purifiers. Peculiar in its phenomenal record of sales abroad no other preparation ever attained so rapidly nor held so steadfastly the confidence of all classes of people. Peculiar in the brain-work which it represents, Hood's Sarsaparilla combines all the knowledge which modern research has developed, with many years practical experience in preparing medicines. ward. The stride should not be long, and the heel of the advanced foot should not strike the ground much before the toes. It is impossible to walk as some trainers direct, placing the toes before the heels.

2. The whole body should be energized, the skeleton not being allowed to assume the irregular movements naturally imparted to it by the springing action of the feet in throwing the body forward.

3. The lungs must be kept well inflated in walking,—taking deep, slow respirations, well expanding the chest.

4. The step should be elastic, but care should be taken to avoid a teetering or swaggering gait. A stiff, inelastic step is always fatiguing.

5. In walking for exercise, one should avoid a loitering or strolling gait. One often sees people upon the street taking a constitutional, walking with a slow, measured pace, and air which suggests a funeral procession. Such a mode of walking is exhausting rather than invigorating.

FARM NOTES.

WINTER CARE OF HORSES AND COWS.

Be careful in feeding green corn. It is easier to tie up the tails of the horses than to clean them after they get muddy.

If Jack is bound to slip his blanket nights, sew an old harness crupper to it and put a second surcingle around him across the loins.

The good mare should be employed the year round. Doing the farm work in its season, and taking care of a fine sucking colt during the winter.

If your horse is not doing well, and you think he ought to, look at his teeth. Young horses sometimes have rough teeth; if so go at once to a veterinarian and have them evened.

Don't let the colts spoil for lack of exercise. Give a part of it in general training. When they drive fairly well, little loads may be drawn with them short distances every day, and it will be surprising how much they will accomplish, 200 pounds at a time on a light wagon. At two years old they ought to be broken single and double, and afraid of nothing past which their owner would drive them.

For cows—ground oats mixed with the bran and cornmeal will be sure to increase the flow of milk. Have you oats? Try them.

Look out for the cow that coughs. She may have consumption and communicate the disease to those who use her milk or butter.

Have the drain behind your cows to carry the urine into a barrel-well, dip it out with a bucket and pour over the manure in the shed when it is too dry.

Careful, intelligent and judicious treatment of all the dairy animals in the country for one decade would go far towards liquidating the national debt. If one doubts it, let him increase the value of all such animals in the United States by only three dollars each and see what it would come to!

Some cows have a taste for weeds that spoil their milk, and that is one of the chances incurred in pasturage. When cows are soiled, their food can be controlled much better than when in the pasture lot, woods or swamps. The growth of ragweeds that follows a crop of rye invariably injures the milk for a week or two.

Experiments have shown that both cattle and hogs will grow faster on cob corn meal than on clean corn meal. The reasons are as I have given them; the corn goes further, as more of it is digested. Clear corn meal should never be fed alone, as it is apt to pack in the stomach and manifolds. We always mix corn meal with bran, half and half by weight. Our stock always fattens better on this mixture and the meat is better. A great deal of corn meal is wasted when it is fed alone, as it is not digested.

THE HENS.

The hen hasn't much of a voice, but her lay is sweet.

A poultry writer avers that for keeping up health and producing eggs nothing equals "good sound grain."

There is no positive way to tell the age of fowls. An experienced person can judge something from the general appearance, but not always correctly.

It is a habit more than hunger that makes fowls run between meals to the feed box, or to those who feed them. Feed only at certain hours as much as they can eat up clean.

It is your duty to be as humane as possible when killing poultry for market. Do not inflict the slightest cruelty on the poor fowls that are selected for slaughter. There is something ungrateful in sacrificing a hen that has done her part in filling the egg basket, and she at least deserves humane treatment when her existence is about to be ended.—N. W. Agriculturist.

They served me better than anything I had previously tried, and I have used them in attacks of that sort ever since."

Royal Baking Powder Has no Equal.

The Royal Baking Powder will make sweeter, lighter, finer-flavored and more wholesome bread, biscuit and cake than any other leavening agent. It is of higher strength, and therefore goes further in work and is more economical. All government and scientific tests go to show this. Royal Baking Powder as a leavening agent is absolutely without an equal.

RUSH MEDICAL COLLEGE, CHICAGO.

"As the result of my tests I find the Royal Baking Powder superior to all the others in every respect. It is entirely free from all adulteration and unwholesome impurity, and in baking it gives off a greater volume of leavening gas than any other powder. It is therefore not only the purest but also the strongest powder with which I am acquainted.

"WALTER S. HAINES, M. D.," Prof. of Chemistry.

CHICAGO COLLEGE OF PHARMACY.

"The Royal Baking Powder, which tests the highest in strength, is free from lime, alum, lime phosphates or other adulterations. Its superlative purity, the entire wholesomeness of its ingredients, the scientific manner in which they are combined, together with its much greater strength, make the Royal unquestionably superior to any other baking powder.

We devote a large portion of this issue of the Cynosure to the recent Anti-secrecy Convention in the New England District of the National Christian Association's field of operations. First, we present Miss Elizabeth E. Flagg's report of its proceedings, which, in connection with her usual "New England Letter," conveys a graphic picture of that remarkable gathering and its work. Then we have a double synopsis of Joseph Cook's stirring address, of which we have the promise of the full text at an early day. Then follow the addresses of Rev. A. J. Gordon and Mrs. Daniel Powers, which will be read with interest. We have, also, in hand (received too late for this issue) the addresses of Rev. T. D. Roberts, and Rev. A. R. McAyeal, a paper read by Mr. Barridge, of the State of New York, on "The Lodge in France and America," and Miss Flagg's address on "The Reforms and Reformers of New England." In each and all, there is a grand fund of entertainment and edification—a symposium of sterling anti-secrecy literature—as good as any that this age has produced, if not better than any that the world has yet enjoyed in print.

The price of this issue of the Christian Cynosure, sent to any address, is five cents.

Our numerous correspondents must have patience with us for a week or two. The New England Convention—the last and best of the annual fall gatherings—is pressing in its demands upon our columns, but the excellence of the addresses there delivered will very well compensate our readers for the concessions we are compelled to make in their behalf.

A good deal of sentimentality pervades the churches and social circles in this holiday season, relative to "giving freely" to loved friends and the poor. The principle is all right, if the gifts are useful and appropriate, rather than extravagant and ostentatious. But it is difficult to understand why these benefactions should be confined to two weeks instead of a whole year. To the cheerful and competent giver, seeing that we always have the poor with us, Christian charity towards the poor and unfortunate should be like Solomon's "merry heart" (Prov. 15:15)—"a continual feast."

The Union Signal mourns the loss of one of its associate editors, Miss Julia A. Ames—its "brightest and best." The funeral services at Miss Willard's "Rest Cottage," at Evanston, last week, were solemn and impressive, yet bright with the Christian's hope of a glorious resurrection and the life of the world to come. Her loss to earth, however, is deeply felt, by those who best knew her worth and usefulness.

The next number of the Christian Cynosure promises to be an attractive one, both in its letterpress and illustrations, embracing a portrait of Columbus, Views of the Administration Building and Machinery Hall of the Columbian Exposition, and one of Bro. I. R. B. Arnold's Floating Chapel, with descriptions of each. There will also be one or more of the excellent addresses delivered at the New England Convention, with our usual variety of departmental contributions and selections. The price, per copy, sent to any address, will be five cents.

With the present issue of the Cynosure the thrilling "Experience of a Mason," by Joseph Hopson, of the British army, is brought to a close. Not only is it a well-written narrative, bearing in every sentence the evidence of its truthfulness, but it reveals the malignancy, vituperation and murderous designs of Freemasonry towards its renouncing members. "I claim," says Edmond Ronayne, "that every Mason who lives up to his oath must of necessity violate the law, and even get so far as to assassinate a recalcitrant brother Mason.... He must kill, if called upon to do so." Mr. Hopson has made this peculiarity of Masonry very clear in the relation of his narrow escape from butchery by his angry brother Masons. But he lived to expose their secret rites, and his further revelation is in our possession.

News from France, last week, indicated a movement of considerable strength among the people to divorce the existing union between the government and the influence of the Roman church upon the public interests of the republic. In Italy, the possession of Rome by the Vatican hierarchy, or the government of the kingdom, is still an open question, and one that threatens a serious rupture between the two powers at an early day. In the meantime it is pretty broadly hinted that the Cahensly movement in favor of German Cardinals, Archbishops and other Roman church dignitaries in the United States is only slumbering, not squelched, and will come to the front again in an aggressive form. The only place where the hierarchy seems to find peace and promotion is in the United States, and that because of our apathy as a people concerning the peril of our institutions.

Some time ago "The Progressive Benefit Order," of Boston, obtained a permit from the State Auditor of Indiana to open a branch at Indianapolis. "The statement on which it was given," says a special telegram to the Inter Ocean, dated Indianapolis, December 14, "sets forth that its assets were $65,374 and its liabilities none. This was sworn to by the president and assistant secretary of the company, the oath being acknowledged by a Boston justice of the peace. After the statement had been filed and the order's admitted, Mr. Duke, chief of the insurance department, got hold of information which led him to believe that the company had filed a false statement. He wrote to Boston, and to-day received information that the order's report filed in Massachusetts shows that its assets are $33,300 (in addition, presumably, to the cash deposit required), and its liabilities $3,953,925." No one can touch pitch without defilement, and none can put money and confidence in these endowment orders without running the risk of losing both at considerable cost.

Rev. Z. S. Weaver, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Burgettstown, Pa., on Sunday week sent in his resignation, to take effect on the first of next April. Recently he has been denouncing the support of the Republican and Democratic political parties as sinful, and advocating a radical third party. He has also been earnestly combating the Sunday newspapers, and announced his intention of prosecuting the newsdealers for selling them. Finally the growing opposition to his methods of preaching reached its climax when he delivered a sermon attacking Freemasonry. Then the elders called a meeting, and Mr. Weaver was warned that he must change the style of his discourses. A private letter from him states that the community has become quite aroused by his Anti-masonic sermon, in consequence of which two members have withdrawn from the lodge, and he is receiving many warm expressions of sympathy. The good seed which he has sown is likely to result in a healthful and prolific harvest. In his present position he enjoys greater liberty of speech and action; and although he has been accused of cowardice in attacking the lodge, and is called a fanatic, he retains his manhood and independence.

A MASON'S EXPERIENCE—VII.

BY JOSEPH HOPSON, OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

[Concluded.]

The proceedings of the court were submitted to Major General Sir Theophilus Pritzler, then in command of the Mysore Division, who, in his written remarks, severely censured the conduct of the court, and declared that according to the evidence adduced in support of the prosecution he ought to have been found guilty. Sir Theophilus was a Freemason himself, yet felt bound to make a show of doing justice in the case; but, as they boasted afterwards, he in the most brotherly way sent Beswick word not to be afraid of being reduced, for if he should be reduced he would get him a better situation.

The court showed how little they cared for censure or for public opinion. They (the Masons) were strong in number at Bangalore; they supported each other, right or wrong, and gloried in their audacity. They cared not who knew them to be liars, or perjurers, and they exulted in their victory all the more for its being obtained by falsehood. A Freemason's oath overrides all his other oaths; and the truth can only be elicited from a Freemason when perjury offers no advantage to him or his fraternity. Yet, even in such a case, the genius of Freemasonry would incline him to perjury in every practicable case, as such would commend him to the infernal powers to whom he owes all devotion and allegiance.

Sergeant Hobday's trial came on in a few days after, but first there was a court of inquiry to ascertain if there were sufficient grounds for his trial by a court martial; the court having decided that there was, his trial came on. He was tried by a cantonment court martial, composed of infantry officers, not apparently partial to Masonry, but certainly disposed to favor and oblige a brother officer, rather than a Sergeant. Lieutenant Ormsby attended the trial and remained in court during the whole of the proceedings, and from the intense anxiety and impatience he manifested during the examination of the evidence for the defence. it was evident that to ascertain the truth was not his object. He interfered with the evidences in such a way as greatly to annoy the court, and, although repeatedly silenced by the president, a captain, I believe, of his own regiment, such was his desire to insure Hobday's conviction that he still persisted in interrupting the proceedings with questions of his own, and he was actually detected by the prisoner in making signs to one of the witnesses that he had brought to support the prosecution, by thrusting his tongue aside against his cheek with the view of guiding him in his evidence. The movement was noticed by Hobday, who called upon the court to take notice of it.

The charge of endeavoring to seize Lieut. Ormsby fell to the ground as might be expected, but the oath of Lieut. Ormsby and his two associates outweighed the oaths of a few non-commissioned officers; and he was consequently found guilty of being drunk on duty, and was accordingly sentenced to be reduced to the rank and pay of a gunner; but his commanding officer, Lt.-Col. Showers, who commanded the cantonment at the time, on reading the proceedings of the court cancelled the sentence. Yet the brigade major, Captain A. B. Dyce, to give a triumph to the fraternity of which he was an active member, set him down reduced, in his publication of the proceedings, and so let the order stand till compelled to alter it.

The circumstance of Gunner Duffy's appearance as a witness in Beswick's defence was so glaring an atrocity, and created such an abhorrence of the man by his comrades, that several of them came voluntarily forward to expose his villainy, notwithstanding that in doing so they exposed themselves to the displeasure of their officers (many of whom were Freemasons), and ran the risk of injuring their prospects. It was an undeniable fact that Gunner Duffy was lying drunk in a ditch bordering on the foot-parade of his troop during the whole time that my struggle with the Freemasons was going on, and that he was carried into the barracks in an insensible state, a considerable time after it was over; this, Gunner Coughlan, and others, came forward to prove.

Gunner Duffy was consequently brought to a court martial, charged with the crime of perjury; but the court he was tried by was a purely Masonic court, and he had therefore nothing to fear.

In the first place, there was no prosecutor warned to attend. And Captain Dickinson, his troop commanding officer, did not come till sent for; and, having stated the crime that the prisoner, Gunner Duffy, was charged with, he hurried away.

I was called in to give my evidence; but, strange to say, not a word of evidence would the president allow me to give except in answer to his questions, which were all framed to answer his own purpose, namely: Duffy's acquittal, and calculated to make me appear ridiculous. He rejected what he chose, and set down nothing but what was favorable to the prisoner. And when he had what he wanted he sent me out of the court, saying: "You may go; I want to have as little as possible to say to you;" in which sentiment the other members concurred. All the witnesses who could only say that they did not see Duffy near the place, and that they believed he was not there, were called in, and questioned as I had been; but none of those that could positively say where he was at the time, were allowed to give their evidence. No one saw him at or near the place; no one spoke to him; he spoke to no one; he took no part in the struggle. Yet he was so close, according to his own account, that he could see what was going on at my room door, within a verandah and in the middle of a crowd, without being seen by any one. He was accordingly found innocent of the charge, and "most honorably acquitted."

Thus did the Freemasons, with the utmost audacity, outbrave the authorities of the cantonment in defence of their most infamous institution, actually making nothing of the law and of all authority beyond the pale of their institution. And well did the contrast between the activity of the Masons, and the sober proceedings of the uninitiated, show how richly the latter deserved the name of "cowans," a name which with Masons answers to that of "coward," and implies that all who are not Freemasons are deterred from becoming such by their unmanly fears, and is with them a most opprobrious term

When I was called into court to give my evidence against Beswick, my testimony was rejected, in consequence of my breach with the Masons. They regarded my breach with them as a breach of my oath; but I do not think it such. If Masonry was what they had described it to be; that is, the holiest and best of institutions, and I had differed with them and broken my engagement, then I admit I would have been guilty of perjury; but when it was not what they described it to be, and what, on the credit of their word, I believed it to be, then the bargain was not only null and void, but I had a right to regard them as cheats, and deal with them as such; just the same as if I had bought a horse on a false character; I should not only consider the seller a cheat, but subject to prosecution for his perfidy and dishonesty. But the Freemasons, in their arrogance, wanted to override all law but their own. They would have their oaths to be considered as lawful; not only so, but more binding and inviolable than any other.

The question as to whether a Masonic oath was a lawful one, and the breaker of it a perjurer, was not urged for want of time. The president, on referring the subject to the officer commanding the cantonment, Lt.-Col. Showers, was informed that my evidence was unnecessary. At Sergeant Hobday's trial Lieut. Ormsby thought to repeat the movement, but here he was much to his chagrin overruled. The court could not be allowed to establish the precedent that an oath taken in a Masonic lodge was of equal validity with an oath taken in a court of justice, or that a Masonic lodge was equal to a court of justice in authority and respectability.

A circumstance occurred at the time of this trial worthy of remark. One of the men that came in the hope of seeing Beswick on the night of his arrest, one of those that came with Lieut. Ormsby, happened to be in attendance at the court as a witness in support of the prosecution, and in the course of conversation with others who were in like manner in attendance, he complained of the trouble so many persons had got into on this occasion. Then addressing me, he said: "You are the cause of all this; and, after all, you don't know enough to do us any harm."

THE END.

“CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.”

It does not seem possible that any sensible person who has ever known Christ can be led away by the vagaries of the delusion which is called by its dupes, "Christian Science." But we have just learned of a very estimable and intelligent Christian lady who has become a victim of this delusion. Others may be in danger of yielding to its pretentious claims. It is one of the most bare-faced swindles that were ever palmed off upon the credulous.

That our readers may know what it proposes to teach, we quote from the Christian Voice and Banner of Holiness the following explanation of it by one of its advocates, Mrs. Mary B. G. Eddy:

"Christian Science teaches that sickness only exists in the imagination. That man is never sick, but simply believes himself sick, and only needs to think he is well, and he will become so. That soul is God, or but another term for God. That material man, or, in other words, man as we see him on this earth, is a myth. That the body, together with that which animates it, or causes motion in it, is a lie and a delusion; that there is nothing in man to be saved. That there is no personal man; that man is a reflection of God, and that God has no outline; that a personal man or personal God are theological mythoplasms. That man is not both soul and body. That man finally becomes a part of God, just as a drop of water falls into the ocean; also, that there is no part of God in man. That there is never a man or woman born into this world. That this world is not real, but is a delusion or a dream, and that all matter is a delusion. That the idea that man has a life or soul separate from God is the error which Jesus came to destroy."

This new-fangled "science falsely so-called" is but an old heresy revived. It is a weak dilution of ancient pantheism, brought forward, apparently, for the purpose of making money. Keep away from it, as you would from the devil.—Free Methodist;

REFORM IN NEW ENGLAND.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NEW ENGLAND CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, AT BOSTON, DECEMBER 9TH AND 10TH, 1891.

STIRRING ADDRESSES BY CHRISTIAN ORATORS.

Our Annual Convention was held under skies that seemed to hold in their blue depths the very smile of God. It has been gloriously successful, filling our hearts with joy and gladness.

Rev. John Hood's church, in which it was held, was neat, tasteful and withal light;—I emphasize this point. It struck me, at the first moment of entering, as just the place for a little band of reformers to assemble in, whose object is to shed the light of heavenly truth on the hidden things of darkness.

After a season of prayer, an informal meeting was held, and the subject of incorporating generally discussed. The wording of the constitution, as regards the object of our Association, awakened quite a lively discussion, it being thought by Bro. S. C. Kimball that the order should be reversed; and, as the advancement of vital godliness, which is hindered if not killed wherever the lodge is powerful, is really our principal aim, that idea should come first. Bro. E. McIntyre, a seceding 16-degree Mason, testified that when he had Christ he found that his lodge affiliations dropped off. A committee was appointed, consisting of Bros. Stoddard, Kimball, Gunn and E. E. Flagg, to make what changes in the wording seemed best, and report. W. B. Stoddard was nominated to secure signatures for the constitution. The meeting then took a recess.

The meeting in the afternoon was called to order by Pres. Conant, who read the Twenty-third Psalm, with appropriate remarks, followed by prayer, and singing led by Miss Ella Carter.

Pres. Conant then referred to the object for which the convention had come together, which, he said, it seemed hardly necessary to state. We were met in the name of Him who came to destroy the works of the devil. We are living in the last days, and the enemy is bringing his hosts together. But it was a cheering fact that while denominations were inactive in reform, God was calling out of the churches a people for himself.

The pastor, Bro. Hood, then gave the address of welcome. He said that "the U. P. church settled this question long ago. We have an article in our constitution forbidding the admission of secret society members. As a church, we are not disturbed by this discussion." He referred to the time when the question of slavery split the denomination; and how, after the war was over, and slavery dead, the general body put an article against it into its constitution. He was glad to belong to a church that could heartily welcome such a convention.

Pres. Conant responded in a few appropriate words. He then named the various committees as follows:

On Resolutions: S. C. Kimball, J. M. Foster, D. C. Ferris.

On Enrollment: W. B. Stoddard, Mrs. M. B. Spaulding, F. W. Weed.

Finance: L. E. Lincoln, E. T. McIntire.

Entertainment: Mrs. A. E. Stoddard.

Mrs. H. L. Hastings then took the chair. A paper was read by the writer on "New England Reforms and Reformers," followed by another, from Mrs. Daniel Powers. She emphasized the necessity of letting on the light, and the need of Christian workers being informed on this subject, that they may keep young men out of the lodge.

Bro. Stoddard, alluding to Brother and Sister Powers, said: "It seemed as if God had sent before the cause two angels with locked hands and open hearts. He felt that what had been done in Boston for anti-secrecy was largely due to the consecrated zeal with which they had opened their pleasant home to parlor meetings, thus in a quiet but most practical way disseminating the truth among the class which most needed it."

Mrs. Hastings said that a young man came into their mission, in Chelsea, who was an Odd-fellow. He neglected his lodge to attend the meetings. They took him to task about it, using very severe language. Last night he said he was convinced it was a sin; that it was making the work of the churches null and void.

Bro. E. T. McIntire testified that a very refined and cultured man, a Christian from his boyhood, was induced to enter the Commandery of which he was a member. Being a fine elocutionist and good memorizer, he proved very useful to the lodge. He was put on all the important committees, such as providing for entertainment when they went on "pilgrimages" to Washington, Chicago and other cities. He was worth, at that time, from seventy-five to a hundred thousand dollars. But he was induced by his lodge friends to sell out a good business and go to New York. He came back, about a year ago, bankrupt, bloated, and with a cigar in his mouth, although up to the time of his joining the Commandery he had been perfectly free from liquor or tobacco.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard inquired what influence Christians, ministers, or layman, who joined the lodge, had on members?

Ans.—They are considered false witnesses. Whatever influence they had for good is destroyed by such a step. They form associations with the drunkards, saloon-keepers and licentious men.

Ques.—Do you mean to say that they have drink in the lodge?

Ans.—It is when they go on "pilgrimages," and at lodge banquets, that they are most in danger. Then liquor, if not kept in the lodge-room, is easily attainable from some place near by.

Interesting testimonies followed from Bros. Barridge, Davis, Leadbetter, and others.

Mrs. Hastings remarked that the time was coming when we should need all these testimonies.

Mrs. A. A. Rockwood referred to her mother as a woman of most intense reform convictions, and one who had more reason than some to take a decided stand, as she had a family of twelve children, six sons and six daughters. She said that "physical light is a good symbol of the spiritual. I say to my children, 'Don't have heavy draperies. Put up the curtains, so that the blessed sun may flood the room, and let it be the symbol of the light which is in Jesus.'"

Mrs. Rockwood presided at the evening session. The reading of Scripture was followed with prayer, and the singing of the hymn written by Mrs. Powers, entitled, "Reply to the oft-repeated assertion of Masons that the lodge religion is good enough for us." It was sung by Miss Carter, as a solo, to the tune, "We have an Anchor," the audience joining in the chorus.

Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason was then introduced. Her address was a most impressive lesson drawn from 2 Chron. 33: 21-25 on the sin and danger of robbing God by false worships. It is impossible for Mrs. Gleason to give a poor lecture, and on this occasion she more than met the high expectations which had been raised.

Mrs. E. Trask Hill, President of the Independent Women Voters of Boston, followed with a most able address on the Jesuits. It was brimful of startling facts which the American people ought to know. It was voted, at the close, that this, as well as the other addresses, be requested for publication.

The exercises of the convention, on the following day, began with prayer and reading of Scripture, Rev. L. C. Kimball occupying the chair. He remarked that our churches were dying with spiritual dyspepsia. They are over-fed and have too little to do.

Elder S. C. Kimball said that personal contact was needed to save souls. He told of families which he had visited in his home missionary work in New Hampshire, on whom no minister had called for years.

A brother said that he was the teller to pay out God's goodness; in fact, a whole banking institution. He believed in giving our hands, our feet, our lips, our whole bodies, up to Christ.

A business meeting then followed. It was voted that, from courtesy to the church in which the convention was held, and Christian regard to the feelings of a brother present, only the Psalms be used for the rest of our devotional meetings.

The committee then reported on the revision of the constitution in relation to the object of our Association. Their report, however, was not accepted, and a new committee was appointed. Rev. R. A. McAyeal, of Lawrence, Mass., then addressed the convention on "Why I am not a Mason." It was full of telling points, keen and logical.

The committee on the object of the Association then reported, and their revision was adopted.

It was also voted that Rev. R. A. McAyeal's address be requested for publication.

The afternoon session began, as usual, with a devotional meeting, Elder S. C. Kimball leading.

Bro. S. A. Pratt testified on tobacco. As soon as he threw it out of his mouth, he threw it out of his grocery store, with the result that the Lord had greatly increased and prospered his business.

Joseph Cook was then introduced. He said: "It is a great felicity that the exercises of this convention are interspersed with seasons of devotion. All true courage and wisdom originate in prayer." He then referred to the subject of his address, "The secret oath-bound orders which employ assassination as one of their weapons." Such societies ought to be removed from the face of the earth: There were more than twenty assassinations in the city of New Orleans under the Mafia. It has not been possible to ascertain who were the murderers, but it is on evidence that this society has again and again employed murder as a weapon. This power of life and death has distinguished the most famous of the foreign secret orders for generations. China is honey-combed with these societies, which the government is unable to put down. It has tried to exterminate them, but they hold their own, for their members are more afraid of the private law which controls these murderous associations than they are of the law of the land. Where British ships dominate the coast, their power is not felt as it is inland. The Carbonari of Sicily has been opposed by church and government, but the society has the power of life and death over its members and cannot be put down. The Nihilists of Russia have some reason for their existence. But I believe if I lived in Russia, and had to fight its tyranny, I would do it in an open and above-board way. If you are going to enter into treasonable conspiracies, at least have the courage of your convictions and do it like a man. Like these other societies, the Nihilists cannot be put down, because they hold the power of life and death over their members and execute it. If such societies come here, they must be uprooted. Wendell Phillips said that secret societies are incapable of doing any good, and may be used for a bad purpose. Foreign vessels bring over many members of these secret orders, whose terrible penalties we do not know. Does any one doubt that the oaths of the Endowment House bind to murder? More than six hundred murders are on record as done by the instigation of the Mormon church. Their oaths are distinctly disloyal. While they are allowed, the central power of Mormonism remains unbroken. Who that remembers the murder of Dr. Cronin will deny that the Clan-na-Gael has the power of life and death over its members? Does Freemasonry pretend to have this same power? Pamphlets have been put forth to show who was responsible for Morgan's murder. I have some now in my study, which try to throw discredit on the story that he was murdered for exposing Masonry; and yet the Encyclopedias say that he was. Heaven forbid that I should call the young men in the Freemason lodges murderers. I don't think a society made up of good men would inflict the death penalty on its members; but if made up of bad men, as it might be, it would not hesitate to stain its hands in blood. It has been asserted that in the Southern States the Ku-Klux grew out of Masonic lodges. I do not know about this; but we do know that it was murderous and disloyal to the last degree. In view of these facts I justify myself, at any risk of unpopularity, in giving my witness against any society which requires such oaths of its members. I did this once in Chicago, and the improved report is in Our Day. I stand by every word I said then. Up to 1880 the statutes of Vermont made all such oaths illegal. Oaths administered in secret are inimical to the peace and order of society. I have traveled in Utah, and know, from competent witnesses, what Mormon oaths are; and I believe we know practically what Freemasonry is, and the Clan-na-Gael and the Mafia. And I say, Agitate. Let those who are clear of the lodges keep clear, and those who are in the lodges assert their manhood and come out."

Bro. Baldrige then read a paper containing some startling facts, which will be published in the Cynosure.

Rev. A. A. Hoyt then addressed the meeting on "The Remedy for the Lodge Evil;" followed by W. B. Stoddard, on the question, "Ought se-ceders to expose the orders from which they have seceded?"

Bro. E. T. McIntire gave an important testimony, which will be reported later.

The Committee on Resolutions then reported. A vote of thanks to the U. P. church, for the use of their house of worship, and to the friends for their generous hospitality, as well as to the several speakers, was passed. It was also resolved: "That we disapprove of all secret societies as unnecessary for the accomplishment of any good, and as a damage to the home, and as a hindrance to the impartial enforcement of civil law, and a subtle enemy to the Gospel of Christ."

Rev. J. P. Stoddard then reported his work for the year. It was voted that his services be retained as New England agent, and steps be taken to insure him a proper support.

The following officers were chosen for the ensuing year:

President, J. A. Conant, Willimantic, Conn.
Secretary, Elizabeth E. Flagg, Wellesley, Mass.

Treasurer, L. E. Lincoln, Boston.
Vice-presidents: C. L. Baker, Kittery Point, Me.; Rev. J. Phillips, Gilford Village, N. H.; Rev. Almon Shephard, Vermont; S. A. Pratt, Worcester, Mass.; Philip Bacon, Wheatogue, Conn.; A. M. Paul, Providence, R. I.

Executive Committee: President, Secretary, and Treasurer, ex-officio; H. W. Goddard, West Sydney, Me.; Robert A. Frohock, Alton, N. H.; Rev. D. C. Ferris, West Barnstead, Vt.; Ezra T. McIntire, Boston, Mass.; C. T. Collins, Windsor, Conn.; Chas. H. Alien, East Providence, R. I.

The evening session was filled with addresses from Rev. A. J. Gordon; Rev. T. D. Roberts, Sup't. of Boston Industrial Home, and Rev. J. M. Foster, which will be all fully reported.

The whole convention was a feast of fat things. Nothing could exceed the generous, whole-hearted hospitality with which the friends were entertained, more opening their homes for this purpose than could be supplied with guests.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

ADDITIONAL FEATURES OF THE CONVENTION.

The paper read by Miss Elizabeth E. Flagg, at the first day's session, is described by the Boston Journal as "masterly," and "brimful of facts, set forth in a very interesting manner." It was voted to have the paper published in pamphlet form.

At the close of Mrs. E. Trask Hill's impressive address, on the first evening, a petition was signed by most of those in attendance, to the effect that they were in sympathy with the New England Christian Association, and averse to secret societies.

In addition to the synopsis of Joseph Cook's address, at the second day's session, sent by Miss Flagg, we present the following, which appears in the Journal's printed report:

"I believe any secret enterprise or society that uses assassination for a weapon ought to be exterminated from the face of the earth. Many people who read much do not know that even in our own land death is adopted as a punishment by some secret orders. There is legal evidence at Washington to prove that many assassinations in New Orleans are traceable directly to the Mafia. If we declare that all secret organizations using death as a measure of punishment ought to be exterminated, how many shall they be? Let us go to foreign countries. You admit that many foreign societies deal thus summarily with those who prove false to them. China is honey-combed with secret societies, and against the Triad and its power of death, even the Government is powerless at times. The British forces at Singapore could only maintain their authority against it by aid of warships in the harbor.

"The combination of ecclesiastical and political powers in Italy cannot prevail to blot out the secret clans there, because of their power of life or death. Nihilism may have some reason for its existence in a tyrannical government, but I would not be understood as excusing the Nihilists. Yet even the most tyrannical government cannot blot out a few who bind themselves together by such terrible oaths. Wendell Phillips says 'secret societies are not needed in America for any good purpose and can be used for many bad ones.' Does anyone doubt that under Brigham Young the black 'avenging angel' was used to rid the saints of the presence of many who apostatized?

"And now to come to the point of my address. Has Freemasonry ever claimed a power of life or death over members? Did it threaten the lives of seceders who should expose it? It has gone into history that Morgan was killed by the hands of those whose secrets he was about to reveal. Heaven forbid that the genial men on all sides of us who are identified with any secret organization, should be charged with such a crime; but such are the possibilities of any secret organization, and in times of war or rebellion much harm may come from these as from others in foreign history. Some even believe the Ku Klux clan of the South originated from Masonic bodies.

"In view of these facts I justify myself for appearing here and opposing secret orders. Until quite lately the State of Vermont held the Freemason's oath to be illegal. My central proposition is that all disloyal secret oaths ought to be opposed, and I deem this only moderate grounds. My closing advice is, get all the legal evidence you can as to the character of these oaths and keep your youth from joining any organization where such oaths are required."

At the evening session of the second day, Rev. A. J. Gordon addressed the meeting. Mr. Gordon said: "I speak to Christians especially. I think it the greatest peril of the age that Christians are commingling and co-operating with so many entirely secular agencies. Christianity is sufficient unto itself. It needs not to call to its aid anything of entirely secular nature. Are we not bound to give ourselves wholly to the church? I believe in the strength and in proper spheres the value of organization. We do not, however, want to unite with anything that will draw us to itself away from God. Men have been won from the church to the lodgeroom by joining a secret order. As Christians we should not allow ourselves to be, as it were, unequally yoked together with unbelievers who may induce us to go astray, instead of our leading them to the good and true.

"If ever the church was called on to stand by itself it is now. This is an age of secular Christianity. We do not want this endless organization; we want, as an old minister once put it, 'not more harness, but more horse.' It is not a question of harm to ourselves so much as it is the harmful influence of our example on others. Let us give all our strength to the church and not be linked to those whose strong wills may sway us even against our better convictions."

Following Rev. A. J. Gordon's address, Evangelist T. D. Roberts, of Davis street (Boston) mission, next told some facts—why he, having once been a Mason, was not now affiliated with them. He said he had charity toward those now in the lodge, and should expose nothing, but should warn all young men not to join any secret organization.

ADDRESS OF REV. A. J. GORDON.

I have enjoyed very much the opening exercises of this meeting, and I am especially pleased with the spirit which I see exhibited by all who have spoken; but I may say that I owe you an apology, for I do not know as much about this subject as many who have spoken at this meeting. When I was a student in college, I joined a very harmless secret society, but that is in the far past. I have come to disapprove all secret societies whatever.

Now, what I would say to-night—I would speak especially to Christians. I sometimes say, Well, if a man outside the church, having no connection with the church, proposes to do this or that, it is one thing, and I don't know as I can reach him or exercise any authority over him, but a disciple of Jesus Christ stands on quite a different plane. In the first place, leaving aside any particular question or any particular society, let us look at the general principle. It is the greatest peril of the age,—the tendency of the church to become secularized by union with all sorts of outside agencies in which it attempts to promote sociability, or to insure the success of the Gospel. And I say this because I believe that, having become indwelt, or, more strictly speaking, having become indwelt by the Holy Ghost, the church of Jesus Christ has a power which no other body has or can have. We do not depend upon enthusiasm, nor upon eloquence; nor upon learning; the whole energy of the church depends upon the fact that through the Holy Ghost that church is coupled on to Jesus Christ, and has all the power that he has. So our friend who has just spoken to-night about the indowment of the Holy Spirit, has struck the key-note. The church must not attach to herself the external agencies for making the Gospel a success. I have become, I presume, somewhat offensive in my reiteration of this truth. Let alone your amusements; let alone the secular appliances by which men often try to promote the Gospel, and if we cannot make it a success on its own ground, by faithfulness to that Divine Person who dwells in the church, let it fail.

Now, having said this, I want to add that it goes still deeper. Are we not bound, since Jesus Christ dwells in the church, to give ourselves wholly to that church? He does not give a part of himself to the church. "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I." Not a part of myself,—not some fraction of myself, but there am I, in my entirety. It is a paradox that we cannot quite understand, and yet it is true, that though there may be a thousand churches, every single body has just as much of Jesus Christ as any other,—has the whole of Jesus Christ.

Now, if he gives himself wholly to the church, which he loved, and which he purchased with his own blood, is it too much to ask that we should give ourselves also wholly to it, which means giving ourselves entirely to Christ?

The more I contemplate this matter, the more I am convinced that Christians fritter away their strength and waste their energies by a divided allegiance, and that it is our duty to be wholly engaged under the one Master, and in the one great organization that he has established.

Then, secondly, this is to my mind the greatest objection to all secret societies, that through them one becomes attached to a power greater than himself. It is exactly like gravitation. You know this attraction is in proportion to the weight of the body attracting, and if the body be very large, it attracts with great power. That is the rule in the material world.

Now, Jesus Christ gave the church, that it might constitute a bond of attraction to hold men, and blessed is the man who is so drawn by that attraction, which is nothing less than the person of Jesus Christ, that he shall be held and completely controlled by it.

I believe in the value of fellowship. It is the great word of the New Testament. "Kononia," fellowship, having in common. And you will notice in the New Testament, how often the word "one-another" occurs. It was the foundation word of the New Testament polity: "Bear one another's burdens;" "Exhort one another;" "Pray one for another;" "Confess your faults to one another." The whole life of the church of Jesus Christ consists in mutual burden-bearing and fellowship, and on that ground it is essential that we make its fellowship supreme, and allow no other fellowship to take its place.

I knew a young man who lost his life in the Alps by slipping out of the cord that attached him to his guide. And I have known many young Christians to lose their religion by simply releasing their fellowship with the church.

Now, the church of Christ furnishes the best and most sacred fellowship for the Christian. In it there is linking together of heart to heart, soul to soul, that he may be held fast to the one great center. Therefore, we do not want to be attached to any outside organization, which perhaps shall be so much stronger that it shall draw us away.

This conviction was greatly strengthened in this way. I was present in a New England city, some three years since, at an important meeting. It had been agreed that the churches should hold a day of prayer and fasting, under a sense of the deep want in the city for the outpouring of God's spirit. I had been asked to come to that city and deliver an address on an important theme. I made great preparation, feeling very deeply the solemnity and responsibility of the hour. When I reached the church, and the services had been commenced, the pastor apologized for the smallness of the attendance. He said to me: "There are, so far as I can understand, not less than twenty-five lodges in this city, and although I did not know it when this meeting was appointed, it is unfortunate that these lodges meet to-night, and therefore we have a small attendance." That was all he said; he made no other comment. But what great searchings of heart ought such a fact to create among Christians!

And not only this; I have sometimes had personal experiences on the same line. I wish to speak with the utmost tenderness and kindness towards those who may and are likely to be offended by any discussion of this question. I remember a young man in this city who came to Mr. Moody's meetings in 1876. He had been a dissipated character, and he said to me in the inquiry-room: "My only safety is in getting out of my old connections, and standing out firmly for Jesus Christ." He joined the church, and for several years gave himself absolutely to attending on its duties and services, and getting his strength from the promises of the Gospel; and he got on just as one might be expected to get on, growing in grace and in power and in joy. Well, that man to-day is far off. He has lost all his love for the church, and all his fellowship with Jesus Christ. When I have tried three or four times to hunt him up, though he never would tell me why he had separated from the church, his wife has told me again and again that he has gone back to the old attractions, and he spends most of his evenings in the lodge and among the associations it has created. The center of attraction has at last been found to be outside of Christ and he is lost to the church.

Now, when I say that, I shall be answered just as a man did answer me the other night, in anticipation of what would be said here to-night: "If a man loves the lodge more than his Saviour, he isn't worthy to be a member of the lodge." But, my dear friends, we cannot divide this heart. A man will ultimately love one thing supremely. He never will love two things equally. If I hold two drops of water on my finger tips, very soon they will touch their rims, and the smaller one will be swallowed up by the larger. So in the associations and fellowship; the strongest attraction will win, and such is the frailty of the human heart that the most unworthy object often wins the day.

Now, in the third place, I believe that there is an injunction of separation that every Christian ought to heed. "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." The unbelievers may be respectable men and good neighbors, yet I do not wish to put my neck in the same yoke with them, lest they sway me away into courses of life which I myself would not be inclined to take, and which my conscience forbids my taking. What do I mean by this? Just this: I think the Christian ought to stand right out by himself in the church of Christ. While the motto of this world is "in union there is strength," the motto of a Christian is just the opposite: "In separation is strength." Have you ever thought of that?

The first word which the prophet heard when he was ordered to build up Jerusalem, was "Separate yourselves from the people;" and they drew apart by themselves. And on that memorable occasion when Gideon was to go into battle, and he had thirty-two thousand men,—that is a magnificent army; but what did God do? The first thing he did was to cut off twenty-two thousand; then he took what was left, and cut them down to three thousand. Instead of union there was separation, and a selection of those who had real heart and courage. And I believe that is exactly the way in the church. What God wants of us is to be separate; and I believe that ten men standing together for God, have more power than a thousand men who do not believe in God. Because when you have ten men standing with God, they have all the power that he has. "All things are possible with God," and all things are possible to him that believeth.

He gets his majorities in minorities; and I was rather pleased when I came in here to-night, to see that you were such a compact little company, because I never believed at all in the greatness of numbers as a condition of success.

I remember, as young as I am, when I was a student and attending the Abolition meetings, when Phillips and Garrison and all the rest were joined together in that work, and there were not half as many as are here to-night, but they did the work; and why? Why, because they chose to stand with God, and God used them. Separation, absolute separation, that is the secret of it. Not simply where we can use God, but where God can use us.

Why, as President Lincoln admirably put it, when a great discouragement came upon the country after some important defeat, and some timid man stole up to the White House at night, and said: "Well, President Lincoln, I am discouraged, and I don't know but what we had better give it up. Don't you fear after all, that God isn't on our side?" President Lincoln answered calmly: "I don't think he is." "What!" said the man, "You don't think he is?" "No," answered President Lincoln, "no, but I think we are on God's side." God doesn't take sides in the controversies here on earth, but he asks us to take sides. It is a very different thing, you see, the way you put it; whether you stand on God's side, or expect him to stand with you, or whether in spite of opposition and dissuasion and popularity, you take your stand equally with God and fight for him.

Now, I say what I have said to you here to-night, as a Christian speaking to Christians. If there ever was a time in the history of the church when Christians were called to stand by themselves, it is now, all that love our Lord Jesus Christ banding together. We are living in an age of secularized Christianity; all sorts of organizations are springing up; and I don't know but that the impatient Presbyterian minister was right, not long since; when some one went to him with a new society, and wanted his co-operation in the enterprise, he replied: "My dear friend, I am sick of all these endless organizations, and I think that what we want is not more harness, but more horse." We have plenty of harness and machinery, and what we want is to get geared on to the power, and trust more in that and less in the machinery. So we come back to this: Faith to believe that God can do all things, if we only have a submissive will. And in these days he is showing what he can thus do: passing by great organizations, and taking some weak instrument to accomplish mighty things. It is God's glory to make his strength perfect in weakness.

So in regard to this whole question. I think it is an important one for us to talk about, and yet to speak with the greatest tenderness and consideration, for I know that not a few in our churches are in these secret societies. Many joined them in early years, with little consideration, and have no great sympathy with them now, but do not know just how to free themselves. I think they ought not to hesitate. What we ought to do is to say to young men, "I think you better not; I think you are better off outside of these organizations. Do you want help? The church is the best organization to help you. Do you want a sort of insurance so that you will be taken care of when you are sick? Well, do your duty in your little church, and I think your church will be quite as likely to help you in sickness as anybody else."

And in all these things, let us believe that the church of Jesus Christ, divinely appointed, and organized in infinite wisdom, can meet all the requirements that a Christian needs to have met. It isn't simply what is harmless to us, but what may lead us into what may be harmful to another.

It is perhaps the same question that we have to answer with reference to card-playing and theaters. Says a young Christian: "Is there any harm in playing a game of cards with my friends in my own house?" And another says: "Is there any harm in my going to the theatre when there is a respectable and clean play on the stage?" And I say: It is not what it may be in itself. But you do not want to look simply at this end, but at the other end, and you want to understand what may be connected with these things. Take some little harmless thing, and look at it in all its connections and all its relations, and when you do that, you will say as a Christian, "I don't think I better."

And so in regard to this. We better belong to the church of Jesus Christ, and put our strength there; and we better not be yoked up with those who, being stronger in will, and stronger in determination, may sway us away into paths which our feet ought not to walk in.

And let us be true to our convictions. I want to be free to serve the Lord wholly. The psalmist prayed: "Uphold me," not as we have it in our common version, "Uphold me with thy free Spirit," but "Uphold me free with thy Spirit." The pendulum is good for nothing unless it can swing. Fasten it, and its power is gone. Freedom is the power that keeps the hands moving steadily onward. Now, I believe that God has given to us, as his disciples, the gift of freedom; let us not, therefore, part with this gift, and be entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

ADDRESS OF MRS. DANIEL POWERS.

"The entrance of thy word giveth light."—Psalm 119:130.

Light is the opposite of darkness.

Light is a revealer; so Jesus Christ is a revealer, and in him is no darkness at all.

I penciled a quotation from one of Boston's most gifted divines, uttered recently in Faneuil Hall, the old "cradle of liberty." He said: "I am opposed to an institution that goes into darkness to teach anything." So are we, Doctor; and that is why we are lighting up the dark places. Again he said, "Let on the light."

These utterances sound well; just what anti-secret people like to hear; just what we expect to hear from seceders; but did they come from that source? Nay, verily; you will be surprised to know that these are the words of a Masonic clergyman, who, hoodwinked and cable-towed, once participated in the dark secrets of the order. How sad the thought that one so gifted should consent to put his "light under a bushel" in any secret lodge. If he would but accept for himself the truth he so forcibly states to others; obey his heavenly Master; come out from among them; be separate, and touch not the unclean thing; throw the light and truth on the "hidden things of dishonesty," Dr. J. W. Hamilton could honor God more than by masquerading as chaplain of the lodge, or participating in ritualism and the stereotyped forms of the Masonic burial service.

To let on the light, we labor and pray;

'Tis for this purpose we've met here to-day;

In convention assembled with zeal for the right,

Dark kingdoms must tremble at the entrance of light.

A MISSION FOR CHRIST AND HIS BRIDE.

I am only a door-keeper "in the house of the Lord," or an armor-bearer on the field of conflict, but my Captain can rely upon finding me at my post, with colors flung to the breeze, head-lights trimmed and burning, danger signal on the track, and the lamp of life high above them all, while I "point to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." Mine is the mission of one who heralds the coming flood, crying: They must be warned! They must know the danger, and then to throw out the life-line to those who have been whelmed in the angry waters.

Under special power and pressure of the Holy Spirit, we were led to open a parlor gospel mission, Sept 3, 1890, at our home, 218 Columbus avenue, for the purpose of "throwing out the life-line" to those already groping in the darkness of secretism, a long-neglected class of deluded worshippers. Generation after generation have come and gone, with scarce a word of warning from the watchmen on Zion's walls, while, like the poor Romanists, the victims of the lodge have been left to worship at false shrines, swearing allegiance to they knew not whom or what, but really to a Masonic pope and the god of this world. It is, first, a delusion, a decoy, and then an oath of obedience to the rulers, in a Christ-excluding institution of spiritual night. Away with Masonic popery, and its adoration of the god of this world, the supplanter of Christ in the worship and hearts of men.

Masonry and Romanism run in parallel lines, with just a slight shading of difference. Both are secret orders, based upon a ritualistic and false religion; both are ruled by unscriptural priests or masters who seek to be lords of the conscience and conduct of their subject; and, since "no man can serve two masters," they must be antagonistic to Christ and his Gospel, in which neither the rites of Romanism or Masonic supersede the authority of Christ or the necessity of regeneration. The initiate in Masonry often seeks refuge from the stings of an awakened conscience in the "mental reservations," and that is the deception of Romanism pure and simple.

Romish blindness is appalling;

Masonic fetters very galling;

Preachers pay this costly price,—

Part with manhood, part with Christ.

Shall we, children of the heavenly King, sit quietly by and see our brothers picked off one by one, and drawn into this terrible whirlpool of infidelity? God forbid! He calls upon each one of us to "cry aloud and spare not;" to "throw out the life-line;" to hold up the "true light," and show the people that the day of secret things is passed, and the day of house-top revelation has come. Thank God! Who is on the Lord's side in this conflict? This is the question confronting us. To answer this inquiry for ourselves, and for others who will join us, the anti-secrecy mission was started and is kept open as a beacon light on the "house-top," and consecrated to God for his service. It is furnished with a circulating library, a free-tract table, and all who are seeking to know the truth will meet a hearty welcome.

When God, in his loving mercy, through the instrumentality of Brother and Sister Stoddard, first opened my eyes to the great need of Christian work along this line, I felt that a new revelation and a new mission were given me, and I dared not close my eyes to the responsibility, but with all the fervor and energy of my entire being, I entered the fight.

I enlisted for life—

No retreat will I know;

While this evil exists,

I'll be faithful and true!

To warn men in time,

To strengthen the weak,

To throw out the life-line

And kindly words speak.

And now, beloved in the Lord, if I knew I should never meet you again on this field of conflict, and I had but one message to give, and but one moment in which to give it, I would not waste time and words in a parting farewell. The rather would I exhort you, one and all:—be courageous; be true to God and to your brother ensnared by the "net spread in secret," and whose bondage in a system of Masonic despotism or pa-

CORRESPONDENCE.

IS OURS A CHRISTIAN OR A HEATHEN GOVERNMENT?

OBERLIN, Ohio, Dec. 14, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—When we read that the king of Dahomey, on his accession to the throne, causes a miniature lake to be made and enough of his father's slaves to be decapitated to fill it with blood, and thus enable him to float his canoe on its surface, our minds are filled with horror, and we wonder that even Dahomeans, on whose hearts the law of God is truly written as on ours (Rom. 2: 14, 15), could tolerate a custom so abhorrent to all our conceptions of justice and humanity. To understand this we need to consider the two conceptions of human government, the heathen and the Christian.

The Christian idea is that every person, without respect to race, nationality, age, or sex, is the neighbor of every other person, and, as such, is bound to love him as himself; that primarily we are all citizens of the world, and common subjects to the Great Father, who is no respecter of persons, and has said that "if we have respect to persons we commit sin." The Christian idea of human government assumes that its primary object is to maintain and enforce this great law of love and thus secure the highest well-being of all of its subjects and of all other persons to whom its influence extends. It assumes that the divine law is always paramount, and that all human authority is derived from, and to be exercised in harmony with its provisions; and, hence, that no accident of nationality or race can affect any human enactment except so far as such accident may imply mental or physical weakness, and therefore demand special provision for aid and protection.

In such a government there could be no such thing as slavery. Guardianship there might be, but the holding of a fellow-man in in bondage for the benefit of his pretended owner would be morally impossible. Neither could there be a state of war; for the law of love not only forbids all aggression on the rights of others, but requires us to forgive those who wrong us, to love our enemies, and to do good to those that hate us. If it be said that this law is addressed to persons and not to governments, it remains to be shown that there is any other law to regulate the relation of States and peoples than this same law, which forbids all retaliation and revenge. It would also need to be shown that it is better to do wrong than to suffer wrong at the hands of others, which would be impossible. It would follow that under such a government there must be a subordination of private interests to the public good, and that all business found to be unfavorable to the best interests of society would be promptly suppressed. Among these illegitimate occupations would be included the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, the cultivation and sale of tobacco, etc. Such a government would recognize the rights of conscience, but would recognize no right to disobey the law of love, either in its application to individuals or to the state.

Over against this is the heathen idea of human relations, an idea often modified by the influences of humanity, but nevertheless the basic principle in all heathen governments. The heathen idea is, that the people of one tribe or nation are the natural enemies of every other nation, and that a state of warfare is a legitimate relation between such tribes or nations. To the enemies, in war, the death penalty is always due, since war is waged for the purpose of destroying their lives. If, therefore, this right to take the life of his captive enemy is waived, and he is simply reduced to slavery, such right has not been surrendered and may be resumed at any time. It was on this principle that under the old Roman law the master had the absolute right of life and death over his slave. This supposed right he had acquired either by capture or by purchase, and if he waived it for a time, he did not relinquish it. It was many centuries before laws were made that forbade the killing of slaves. It is easy to see in the light of these principles how the king of Dahomey can justify his coronation massacre, and how he should resent with indignation the interference of those outside nations who protest against what they call his cruelties.

It is not so easy to see how we, who profess to be a Christian people, could have ever held slaves, or how such a decision as that in the Dred Scott case could have ever been made by our jurists. It is not easy to see why war, caste, the liquor traffic and heathen secret societies should be tolerated, except on the supposition that we have still a heathen government, only somewhat modified by Christian principle. THE LODGE IN IOWA.

SCHALLER, Sac Co., Iowa, }
December 10, 1891. }

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—This Western country is overrun with secret societies. Men are stumbling into them in the dark; the blind are leading the blind.

Last week, two ministers in our town joined the Masonic fraternity—the Methodist Episcopal minister and the Campbellite minister. It aroused me on this question as never before. I have always been opposed to secret fraternities, but I have not said much. Culpable silence! I shall keep my mouth shut no longer. I shall speak, in public and in private, against secret fraternities.

I was given grace, a few nights ago, to testify against secret societies, even in the matter of organizing a Good Templar's lodge. Why do not the Good Templars drop that foolish copying after those lodges of darkness? When any one imitates even a great man he is sure to imitate the weakest point.

In these last few days I have had the pleasure to testify against Masonry. I emphasized its Christless religious character. I was glad to find that the Baptist minister belongs to none of them, and yet he knows very little about them. I shall put "Mah-hab-bone" into his hands soon. He is a worker, and I am going to get him aroused on this subject. No later than this morning, I was told by a non-Mason that a Mason who was asking him to join the lodge advanced this recommendation, that if a man should live up to Freemasonry his soul would be saved. I pointed out to my friend the baseless foundation of that assertion: that Masonry was a religion of works; that Masonry was a Christless religion, omitting Christ from prayer and expurgating Christ from Scripture quoted; that Masonry was suited to Jew, Gentile, Mahomedans, etc., and that it was suited to these in this way—that a man could remain a Jew, a hater and rejecter of Christ, and still be a good Mason; and so with all the others.

We must have some (anti-secrecy) literature out here. Like Elijah, I feel somewhat alone; but I am going to institute a search, and shall doubtless find some hidden ones. I want them to wake up and be instructed, and oppose the gigantic evil. Yours for reform, (Rev.) W. C. PADEN.

SATAN WORSHIP.

AVALON, Mo., December, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Satan is the arch-deceiver. His followers are possessed of his spirit and do the works of their master most thoroughly. Their name is legion; their presence is everywhere; they are always aggressive. Fortune-telling, clairvoyance, second-sight, mind-reading, sleight of hand, and hypnotism, accompanied by traditions, omens, signs, symbols, dreams, visions, premonitions, presentments, and vain imaginations, brought to bear as worship, have developed a wonderful system of false worship, with its oracles, prophets, seers and organizers. The legitimate outcroppings are spiritism, mind-healing, Teedism.

The drift is from revelation toward speculation. Not only the ignorant and illiterate are bewitched and bewildered, but able minds are beguiled and confounded by the most palpable errors. A spirit adventuress completely addles a learned judge and makes him the laughing stock of the reading world.

But why specify? All about and around us is the withering, blighting touch of Satan worship. It is deceiving, as it were, the moral and mental intelligence of the entire nation. Yea, it has crossed the threshold of many of the orthodox churches, and is leading astray both ministry and laity. The churches are losing their power, and many are being rent as with a whirlwind of God. Like the unconscious passengers drifting toward the whirlpool, they sing and shout exultingly as the boat is going to pieces and plunging over the falls of destruction. Having eyes and ears they see not, neither do they hear. Nothing but the trump of the archangel will arouse these blinded votaries. Many will go to the very gate of heaven shouting hallelujahs and asking—have not we done many wonderful works in thy name? Then the fiat will sound in their astonished ears: "I never knew you; depart from me, ye workers of iniquity. Ye put no difference between the clean and the unclean, the holy and the profane; ye walked in the counsel of the ungodly; ye stood in the way of sinners; ye sat in the seat of the scornful; ye were unequally yoked together with unbelievers; ye drank the cup of devils."

What has been forbidden can not be offered as worship to Christ. To attempt such is sacrilege and blasphemy. Every altar not to Christ is an altar to Satan. The sincerity or insincerity of the idolater does not figure in the case. Paul consented to the death of the martyrs and verily believed he did God's service.

The time draweth nigh when all whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life will worship the "beast." In fact, the vast lodge system is the agency for fulfilling the prophecy. With its altars, rites, ceremonies, and imposing ritual, no one doubts but that it is worship. Freemasonry is the ripest development of Satanism in America. The school-boy knows it is a religion. No intelligent person pretends that it is Christian, and every Bible believer knows that a religion without Christ is pagan. Yet ministers bow at its altars; church deacons are lodge deacons; professors of Christianity, with blasphemous lodge oaths and murderous death-penalties fresh on their lips, desecrate the name of Jesus. Men who talk loud and long about the saving power of the Gospel, are bound soul and body to lodge iniquity and heathenism.

Masonry is modern spiritualism in philosophy and materialism in practice. Like Teed, it points to the sun as its god. It is sun-worship. It is Teedism. It is Satanism. It mesmerizes. It deceives. It weaves a spell over its victims. It intoxicates. It bewilders. It brings awe, mystery, duplicity, and all the arts of Satan, to its help, in bringing the souls of men to idolatry and to complete subjection to the powers of darkness.

A riper civilization, a reviving Christianity, and a corrected future history, will place the sons of Sceva, the witch of Endor, the damsel of divination, Elymas the sorcerer, Demetrius and his craftsmen, Teed, every Masonic minister, spirit medium, and every Satan-worshiper, in the same category and on a common level.

Thank God, there are men and women in America who are not afraid to speak in tones of thunder against the abomination. Thousands are taking up the war-cry, and the churches will be swept of this all-pervading overshadowing evil. It may wreck half, or all of them, under one pretext or another, but out of the ruins will evolve a pure church. The door of that church will be the Christ, the way, the truth and the life. Its membership will be all who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; they know his voice and obey his words. Let all such come out of spiritual Babylon, and come together on Bible grounds, that they may be one in deed and in truth. With such an army the church of Christ will take the world, Satan will be vanquished, his altars destroyed, and righteousness fill the earth as the waters do the great deep. RAY RAND.

GOOD WORDS FOR THE CYNOSURE.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Dec. 10, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The fine lot of Christian Cynosures this day received are timely indeed. The colored M. E. Church's Annual Conference is in session in this city. I was already improving the occasion to put this truly Christian reformatory paper into the hands of the ministers and preachers, previously having a few on hand. I am now better equipped for the work. Then I must add, the colored M. E. Zion church, a much larger body, is to hold its session of conference in this city next week. I will gladly, in the name of Jesus, do what I can to put the Cynosure into the hands of every member of that conference, if you send me the papers, and tracts also; and I shall try to get subscribers, of whom I have prospect. I am lecturing some on Masonry. I preach to some congregations of colored people about every Sabbath, and am well received. I am also preaching to one white congregation, where I have realized good revival work.

The Lord speed the Christian Cynosure!

(Rev.) C. POWERS.

LITERATURE.

The Review of Reviews closes the year with a remarkable number. It is not only a review of reviews, but a compilation of reviews. Thus, in the department "Progress of the World," the situation of affairs in the new Congress, with notes on its possible action this winter, Russian politics and the Russian famine, matters in the South American republics, the statistical work undertaken by our government; and in another department no fewer than fifty highly important articles, selected from the principal magazines of this country and Europe, are "boiled down" into convenient compass for busy readers,—these show something of the scope of this number. Besides there are various maps and charts, and nearly a hundred portraits of men and women who have their part in the world's thought and work of to-day. There is a map showing the States which have adopted the Australian ballot system, brought up to the very latest date. Another shows the States which have established bureaus of labor and labor statistics. Still another shows the division of the United States into ten large districts for the purpose of the compilation of railway statistics. There is also a full-page map showing the precise location of the World's Fair buildings in Jackson Park on the Michigan lake front according to final plans just now completed. But this issue is peculiarly a woman's number. Besides the illustrated article upon the W. C. T. U., there is a brilliant character sketch of Mrs. Annie Besant, leader of theosophy. There is also an article written by Lady Meath upon some phases of women's work for their own sex in Germany and Sweden, and an article by Lady Aberdeen upon her Haddo House Association, or the Scottish Mothers' Union. Published at 13 Astor Place, New York City.

Two new serial stories will begin in the January St. Nicholas, "Two Girls and a Boy," by Lieut. Robert Howe Fletcher, the author of "Marjorie and Her Papa"; and "When I was Your Age," by Laura E. Richards. Mrs. Richards is a daughter of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and her story is a record of her own home life and that of her sisters. It will remind readers of Miss Alcott's "Little Women."

The January Century will contain an article by Gounod, the well-known French composer, on his own early life. The first paper in the illustrated series on "The Jews in New York" will appear in this number.

LODGE NOTES.

The latest fad in the East among the fraternities is the "Add One" society, the membership of which must supply another frater.

The Ohio Masonic Home, to be erected at Springfield, will have about $100,000 to commence operation on. The Home will be not only for indigent Masons, but for the families of Masous who die leaving nothing for their support.

New York has a new organization called Associated Knights (Pythians). The purpose of it is to provide a place in New York City where sojourning knights can pass leisure hours. Admission is extended to all knights in the grand jurisdiction at a cost of one dollar.

The report of the Supreme Secretary of the Endowment Rank of Knights of Pythias for the last quarter shows 1,402 new members have been added, with an endowment of $296,000,000. In the first nine months of this year 185 new sections have been organized, 4,025 members admitted, $9,000,000 insurance within a monthly average of nearly 500 members.

We are glad to note that none of our Illinois representatives in the Sovereign Grand Lodge voted for the Portland junket, which will cost the order the sum of $30,000, over and above the cost of holding the session at some central point. It costs less to hold the session at Columbus, Ohio, than at any other place, and for this reason the moguls of the order give it a wide berth. They will, we suppose, come to Chicago in 1893 without any very great amount of coaxing by the local membership.—Bloomington (Ill.) O. F. Herald.

Founded in Washington, Feb. 19, 1864, the Knights of Pythias says the Michigan Pythian, now enters the twenty-eighth year of its existence with more than 300,000 members. One year ago, 263,000 names were enrolled on the rosters of membership; within the past twelve months, this number has increased to 308,000, making an increase during the year of 45,000. No fraternal organization in the twenty-seventh year of its existence has ever attained such an increase. There are over 4,000 lodges, whose financial reports show that the order is on a sound basis.

The officers and representatives of the Sovereign Grand Lodge traveled 167,711 miles to reach St. Louis, the total mileage amounting to $17,912.82. The per diem, allowing six days to each, except Representative Goodwin, of Georgia, who only received two days' pay, was $5,320—a total of $23,232.82, a little over one thousand dollars less than for the Topeka session, and nearly $3,300 more than the session held at the home of the order, Columbus, Ohio. It is estimated that the session to be held at Portland, Oregon, next year, will cost about $20,000 more than the last.—Odd-fellows' Companion.

Since my last, "The Fraternal Congress" has come and gone. "The Knights of Honor," "The Ladies and Knights of Honor," "The Knights of Pythias," "The Maccabees," "The Home Circle," "The Fraternal Mystic Circle," "The Equitable Aid Union," "The National Union," "The Artisans' Order of Mutual Protection," "The Royal Arcanum," "The Royal Templars of Temperance," "The United Friends," "The Chosen Friends," "The Fraternal Legion," "The Legion of Honor," "The Legion of the Red Cross," "Good Fellows," "The Order of the Golden Chain," "The Order of Mutual Protection," "The Order of Heptasophs," "The Knights of the Golden Rule," "The Knights of the Golden Eagle," "The Order of Pilgrim Fathers," "The Ancient Order of Workmen," "The Woodmen of the World," and other beneficial societies have been in session. When one of these orders is known to have a membership of 231,923, and another 131,753, it will be seen that they are not to be regarded with indifference.—Washington Letter.

There is no doubting the efficacy of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup. It cures every time.

Cod-liver oil suggests consumption; which is almost unfortunate. Its best use is before you fear consumption—when you begin to get thin. Consumption is only one of the dangers of thinness.

Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver-oil makes the thin plump, and the plump are almost safe.

CALL FOR A DIRECTORS' MEETING.

The Board of Directors of the National Christian Association will meet at their office, 221 West Madison street, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., on Saturday, December 26 inst., for the transaction of the business of the Association.

GEO. R. MILTON, Chairman.
E. R. WORRELL, Secretary.

NOTHING BUT INSURANCE.

"How to increase the attendance" at regular meetings, is a serious problem, and one upon whose right solution depends not only the well-being of the council but indirectly of the order itself. This is the most serious question which confronts council officers, and causes much anxiety and thought. New members can be obtained by a little persistent work, but who can interest those members who boast of being in the order for insurance alone, and who have not enough interest in the order and its successful and economical management to attend even a portion of the meetings? Believing that this question is one of vital importance, we invite correspondence upon this subject. Brief, well-considered plans that have been tried, stirring appeals, if to the point, and in fact anything that will tend to enlightenment upon this point, will be printed in whole or in part as may seem best. Council officers and members are invited to take part in this symposium.

The above note, from the American Legion of Honor Journal, is a straw which shows the wind's direction. Thousands of persons unite with these benefit orders on the ground that they can thereby secure a cheap insurance. They say that the ritual amounts to nothing; that they do not attend the meetings; that it takes no time, etc.

But the orders are not satisfied with nothing but the money; they also want the men, and in time they will get them. And when the lodges get the men, the home circle will be lonely, the prayer-meeting abandoned.

It is strange that ministers will nurse these lodges, or at least refrain from warning their members against them, when they must know that the churches will be left to women and children unless the stampede of men into secret societies is in some way checked.

EXOTIC SECRETISM IN INDIA.

From a private letter, dated November 5, written from India by Mr. D. Hopson (son of the Freemason whose interesting experiences with his lodge-mates are now in course of publication in the Cynosure), we are permitted to make the following extracts. They will serve to show that India is heavily cursed with imported as well as native lodgery:

"It is sad to contemplate the dreadful amount of ignorance that so generally prevails, even among the well-informed, in regard to the evil and true nature of the Masonic institution. Speaking to a minister of the Church of England on the subject not long ago, he assured me he had never read, or even heard, of a work professing to give an account of the working of the craft, and had heard nothing but what was in its favor. He expressed an earnest desire to have some reliable information on the matter, and I sent him a copy of 'The Broken Seal,' 'Mah-hah-bone,' and a few others, together with a copy of the manuscript" [his father's exposition], "which seemed to deceive him; and I trust, through God's grace, they will be the means of preventing his becoming a Mason, as he appeared to be under the impression that Freemasonry was a good thing; and that a good Mason was a good Christian and so far prepared in his heart by his brethren that he might, in time, have been induced to join the lodge, as another minister of the Church of England, in an adjoining station, has done.

"There has been a run of initiations in this little place, though I make it my duty to warn all whom I come across against having anything to do with Freemasonry; and I have been the means of keeping some out of the trap, by lending them anti-secrecy books, etc., and cautioning them. The enemy seems to come in like a flood; let us pray that the Spirit of the Lord may lift up a standard against him.

"Interest seems to be awakening in this country in the Masonic question, and Anti-masonic books are comparatively scarce in India. Would that they could be scattered broadcast through the length and breadth of the land, to warn persons against this terrible evil, and to open the eyes of those who have already been duped into joining the craft."

"The field is the world," said the Saviour; and every day's development reveals to us not only how completely the enemy has sown his tares over all this fair domain, but how great is the work to be done in staying the ravages of sin by the promulgation of the Gospel.

MORE ABOUT "SPURIOUS" MASONRY.

The secrets of Masonry are no longer secrets. Masses of their rituals—Blue Lodge, Chapters, Knights Templar, Scottish Rite and Adoptive initiation and degree work, guaranteed to be correct, and extending through forty-eight "genuine" degrees of Masonry, are being distributed in all parts of the country and Canada, at less cost to each purchaser than a single degree in a legitimate Chapter.

About the first of October last, some one advertised in a Chicago daily paper to teach the forty-eight degrees of Freemasonry to those who desired such instruction.

Even the Masons themselves are helping the public to understand the details of their lodge work, by publishing a correct ritual in cipher, for the use of the brethren and to "post" them in the routine of the ceremonies and secrets of the order, especially in the Blue Lodge. It is called "Ecce Orienti," and it can be procured, with an equally correct explanation, or key, for three dollars—a dollar for each degree. In the lodge the same information would cost from $25 to one hundred dollars, and be burdened with murderous oaths that a peaceable man would like to forget and ignore—if he could.

Speaking of "spurious" Masonry: There is no reason why a company of individuals may not organize under the laws of Illinois to open private lodges, free from Grand Lodge supervision or interference, and work all the degrees according to the legitimate forms and ceremonies, receiving candidates for initiation at a great reduction from the ordinary lodge price, and confer all the degrees at a similarly cut-rate. The "regulars" might object to this competition in their business, but would it not be quite as legitimate in the one case as the other? The work would be as genuine, at all events, quite as shameful, quite as ludicrous, and quite as binding as in the lodges governed by the Supreme Grand Lodge of the Republic.

There is no reason, also, why some enterprising business man of sufficient independence to carry it to success, might not institute "The Open Lodge," on the principle of a theatre, and nightly exhibit, for a nominal sum per capita, all the ceremonies of initiation, conference of degrees, installations, etc., of the genuine lodges, chapters, encampments, etc., en costume, and with all the lodge equipments. He would meet with Masonic malevolence at every turn, but that would only tend to make his show more popular.

The truth is, the more that people learn about Masonry the greater the probability that it will be wounded, crippled, made common by exposure and its attractions and power destroyed. This is why the N. C. A. and the Cynosure are working to familiarize the public with the evils of the order and its ridiculous pretensions to goodness and truth.

A TITHE ORGANIZATION.

"The Chicago Union of Christian Stewards' League" was organized about a year ago by members of orthodox churches in this city. Its principal object is set forth in the following pledge, to which all its members must subscribe: "We covenant with the Lord, and with those who enter with us into the fellowship of this consecration, that we will devote a proportionate part of our income—not less than one-tenth—to benevolent and religious purposes."

Monthly meetings of the League are held, for special prayer, mutual helpfulness, and devising ways and means for promoting its objects and usefulness. Its work is inter-denominational, and chiefly in the hands of business men. All its funds are to be free-will offerings, and its purpose is to lend a helping hand to every pastor, to every church, and to every benevolent and Christian enterprise.

The present officers are: President, Thomas Kane; vice-presidents, Rev. E. P. Goodwin, D. D., Rev. John L. Withrow, D. D., Rev. J. M. Caldwell, D. D., Rev. O. P. Gifford; secretary, Rev. S. J. Humphrey, D. D.; treasurer, Charles E. Simmons; executive committee, William Spooner, Jesse A. Baldwin, A. B. Mead.

This organization now invites the hearty and active co-operation of all who have money to contribute and are in sympathy with its objects.

Persons desiring to aid in this way, can remit to the treasurer, Charles E. Simmons, No. 22 Fifth avenue, Chicago. Such funds will be receipted for, and will be expended under the direction of the executive committee. All other correspondence should be addressed to Rev. S. J. Humphrey, 151 Washington street, Chicago.

The character of the persons named, and the declared purposes of the organization, are eminently calculated to inspire the public with confidence in the work of the League.

THE GREAT PROHIBITION BANQUET.

The great dining hall of the Sherman House, Chicago, was crowded on Thursday evening of last week by men and women who responded to a call for a banquet in honor of the National Prohibition Committee, who paid one dollar and a half for the entertainment, and so were by no means pauper-patriots; and if brains make brilliance, it was indeed a brilliant assembly. I voted for St. John in 1884, and for Fiske in 1888; and advocated their tickets. If that makes me one, I am a Prohibitionist. I never heard a voter say that the saloon does any good. This condemns its license as political immorality; and as it is black with every crime in the calendars of our courts, to license it is crime. And as the Republican and Democratic parties license the saloon wherever and whenever they have power, they are criminal parties. I therefore attended and approved the banquet.

Dr. Herrick Johnson, first on the program, gave a somewhat metaphysical, yet, on the whole, good speech against the saloon. Ex-Gov. St. John always speaks forcibly, and his speech was popular. Miss Willard was not present. Other speeches I did not hear, as the hour was late. I agreed with Dr. Herrick Johnson, that false methods may ruin a good cause, though well-meant. And, though wishing success to the efforts of the Prohibition party, and voting for its candidates when they are opposed to the secret lodges, the Cynosure indorses the Free Press, Birmingham, Iowa, for a distinctly American party, opposed, as were the founders of the United States, to priestism, false worships, and the despotism which they breed, and universally practice.

I regretted to notice that this great banquet, though opened by a Baptist minister, had no blessing asked at the tables, and no prayer for its political discussion. I am sorry, too, that Mr. Chairman, represented as delegate to a late Saratoga convention, secret temperance orders; and, though the Masonic lodges of Chicago are solid for liquor license, while the two old parties are sporadically opposed to it; the Prohibitionists condemn the old parties, but shelter the lodges by their silence and the practice of Prohibitionists.

—The Advance suggests that a profitable topic for discussion in the Roman Catholic Conference in New York, this week, would be ways and means "to remove the disgrace of the fact that the great body of saloon-keepers of the country are of its particular 'Apostolic' fold."

—Der Christlicher Bundesbote, edited by Rev. J. U. Sommer, and published at Berne, Indiana, has placed us under obligations for a friendly notice of the Cynosure, in its issue of the 10th inst. The Bundesbote ("The true Christian's paper") is much esteemed by the worthy German brother to whom it is frequently submitted from this office, and its religious character is highly extolled.

—We are in receipt of the thirty-fourth annual report of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society to the common council of the city of Chicago, from October 31, 1890, to October 31, 1891. It embraces a very gratifying review of the work of the society during the past year, the Treasurer's report of receipts from contributors and other sources and the expenditures, for the same period; a schedule of the property owned and controlled by it; information acquired concerning the condition of the wants of the poor of Chicago, and how to aid them. The society is sustained by the gifts of many of the wealthy men of Chicago, and appears to be doing a great deal of good among the poor and unfortunate of the great city. G. C. Trusdell is General Superintendent.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Gleanings from the N. E. Convention.—The municipal elections.—Phenomenal gain in the No License vote of Boston.—Advice of some of its daily papers.

That our anti-secret conventions in New England do not draw crowded houses as yet, is neither a singular nor a deplorable fact; and when Dr. Gordon, at our last meeting, told us "he was glad to see a small company—it so reminded him of anti-slavery days," I think his remark struck a responsive chord in every bosom. It is true we are a Gideon's band, but the enemy is afraid of us. As Bro. Wm. F. Davis said: "Masons need information. Why don't they through this house? Why are not the ministers who privately express sympathy, with us to-day?" But as God made the idolatrous Canaanites tremble before Joshua, so he is now laying on the lodge worshipers (who are their spiritual descendants) a like spirit of fear and dread. And so far as they are able, they instill it into those who should be our helpers in the work.

The only subject which stirred much debate was the wording of that article in our constitution which states the object of the Association. As it stands it reads thus:

"The business and object of this Association shall be, in the name of Christ, to expose, withstand and remove secret societies, and thereby conserve morality, justice and purity, in society, state and the church of Christ."

In answer to the objection that this wording would seem to shut us out as an organization from combating other evils, Bro. E. T. McIntire brought down the house by springing to his feet with the emphatic declaration that such a fear was utterly groundless, for "when we combat the lodge we combat at the same time every evil flesh is heir to." If any one doubts Bro. McIntire's statement, let him set out to fight the lodge in his own township, and he will soon find all the worst elements in the place arrayed against him. False worship, now as in the olden times, naturally links itself with, and finds means to gratify, every licentious and depraved appetite. I cannot but feel that a Providence guided those who chose for the N. C. A. the simple name Christian, with no other word tacked on to it that would lessen the force of its grand simplicity;—nothing to hinder its spreading out from the one objective point of the lodge, to include every evil that hides under its shadow. The W. C. T. U. started out with the one thought—to combat the saloon; now there is scarcely a form of sin and error, unless it be the lodge and Romanism, that it is not antagonizing. So it must be with our N. E. Christian Association. Our very name marks us out as a distinctively evangelizing as well as reform agency. For my part, I dream of a time when, with holiness written upon our banner, we shall have our evangelists all over the country who shall stand as Elijah did for a pure religion against the soul-destroying Baal worship of the lodge;—men and women who shall belike the separating angels, in that their message shall be with power to divide the true from false believers, and to encourage the "little ones" who in persecution and reproach have "held fast the word of his patience."

Pres. Conant, who introduced Bro. McIntire, gave a description of his appearance when "duly and truly prepared" to take the lodge oath, "neither naked nor clothed, neither barefoot nor shod," with the cable-tow three times around his neck; and then added, patting him on the shoulder, "He looks better now. Hear him." And, indeed, I could wish from my heart that all Christian people in general, and every W. C. T. U. woman in particular, might have listened to that address. He began by saying that he had just been talking with a Mason who "could see nothing bad in the institution," but on questioning him he found that he was a non-attendant on the lodge, and very rusty in regard to its workings. This is exactly the place, let me inform my W. C. T. U. sisters, where nearly all "the good men who are Masons" stand to-day. Are they credible witnesses on the subject? The following is a brief abstract of Bro. McIntire's experience:

"No one loved the lodge better than I did. I went in for a good time. No one protested against the smoking and drinking and other evil things to which my lodge associations introduced me; but, on the contrary, I was surrounded by men who stood up for me in everything that was wrong. When I became a Christian I no longer loved these things. A great change had passed over me. I found I did not even care for the finest elocution or singing, or for their banquets lasting till 10, 11, or 12 o'clock at night. There would be twenty kinds of ice cream at these banquets; frozen pudding with brandy sauce; free cigars under each plate that cost 25 cents apiece; and a keg of lager beer. Members who were free from these habits would be urged to drink and smoke. After one of these banquets I would find, the next morning, that I could not eat any breakfast, and perhaps no dinner or supper. When I read in my Bible, "Ye are the temple of the living God," I felt that it was time for me, as a Christian, to get out of this. I was a life-member in the Commandery, for I had put in enough for the income to pay my quarterly dues. I lost all of this by coming out, so it could not be said of me that I came out because I could not pay my dues to the lodge. I feel sorry for the good men who are in it. The lodge is a stepping-stone to the saloon. That is where they learn to drink—in the gilded temples. Good men come in;—ministers, church-members, and perhaps they don't drink, themselves, but they condone the sin in others. They are silent about it; they don't warn us of the danger, nor tell us it is wrong. I never was called crazy or a crank till I was a Christian, and now I wish I had been crazy long before. I feel that if I was a crank for the devil once, now I am a crank for God. Christian parents will let their daughters attend lodge balls, and the devil will invite his licentious men, who have already received their training at the hands of licentious women, to dance with these girls! The lodge is controlled by men that have no Christ. They are more likely to be rumsellers than anything else. If there are Christians in the lodge they are without power or influence."

As much as Lot in Sodom, he might have added. Taken altogether, it was a wonderful testimony, and one I thanked God for hearing.

Rev. T. D. Roberts was also very clear and convincing as regards the close connection of lodge and saloon. I make no extracts from his speech, however, as it has been stenographically reported. The relation in which the lodge stands to our social purity work was also brought out more clearly than I have ever heard it before. I think, too, that there was a larger proportion of women in the audience than I have seen at either of our previous meetings, which shows their newly aroused interest.

In my hurried report of last week, I forgot to mention that H. L. Kellogg, former editor of the Cynosure, from his new home on "the western slope of the Sierras," and Mrs. E. A. Cook, of Chicago, sent words of greeting to our convention, and congratulations to Bro. Stoddard and his co-worker "on the grand achievements of the year in New England."

The following statistics, presented by the editor of the National Home Guard, our little sheet for women, may be of interest: It now lacks four months of being two years old, but during this comparatively brief period it has gone, at different times, into every State and Territory in the Union, and into nearly every town in the State of Illinois, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Massachusetts and Maine. The average circulation per month has been 2,714. The whole number sent out has been 57,000. This means over 200,000 pages of solid matter, leaving out the advertising page. In the States mentioned it has been sent to national and local officers of the W. C. T. U.; it has also been sent to the wives of all the Congregationalist ministers in the United States; the wives of all the Baptist ministers in Massachusetts and Rhode Island; the wives of all the ministers in Vermont, and a general list of holiness people throughout the country.

The convention passed the following resolution: "We disapprove of all secret societies as unnecessary for the accomplishment of any good end, as a damage to the home, as a hindrance to the impartial enforcement of civil law, and a subtle enemy to the Gospel of Christ."

Miss Ella Carter's solos were highly enjoyed. I trust this young sister, with her sweet and highly-trained voice, will yet be to our anti-secret conventions what Mrs. Alice Osborne Harris is to the W. C. T. U.

I cannot close this letter without a brief reference to yesterday's municipal elections, which, so far as Boston was concerned, "astonished the natives." There was a majority vote of only 4,323 for license, being a gain of 13,000 or more over the prohibition vote of last year. This was not the fault of the Herald and some other city papers who took great pains to advise their readers, in flaring head-lines, to vote "Yes." Everybody knows, however, what to expect of the Herald and the Globe;—their constituency being largely made up of those to whom it would be very safe to give this advice. But the aristocratic, literary Transcript, which goes into all Boston's best families, did the same thing! Ever since it made that Judas bargain by which it obtained the job of printing the proceedings of the City Council at the expense of its own independence, it has been as silent as the grave on all reform questions. But silence, it seems, was not enough. If the Transcript cannot blush for itself, some among its readers blushed for it when they saw in staring capitals on its first page: "When voting on the question, 'SHALL LICENSE BE granted for the sale of intoxicating liquors in this city?' vote thus: Yes X."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 16, 1891.

Congress is, as usual at the beginning of a new session, moving slowly in perfecting its organization, and nothing of any importance is expected from either House or Senate until after the holiday recess. The Senate has completed its re-arrangement of committees and is ready for business, but owing to the large number of Presidential appointments, made since the last Congress adjourned it is doing little aside from holding executive sessions for the confirmation of those appointments, and short open sessions for the introduction of bills, resolutions, etc. The House can do little or nothing until the Speaker announces the committees, which he will not do until just before or after the holidays. [He has since announced them.—ED.]

Among the bills introduced in the Senate are: One by Senator Peffer for the increase of the number of chaplains in the army; one by Senator Frye for the appointment of a commission to investigate and report upon the alcoholic liquor trade; one by Senator Morrill granting historical societies the privilege of using the mails free, and one by Senator Cullom for the adoption and use of a uniform standard automatic car-coupler, and regulating the operation and control of freight trains used in inter-State commerce.

Senator Morrill has been appointed a regent of the Smithsonian Institution to fill a vacancy.

Two members of the Supreme Court—Justices Brown and Lamar—are confined to their beds by the "grip."

The United States Minister to China has informed Secretary Blaine that the Chinese government will make no official exhibit at the World's Fair, although it has removed the export duty on all articles exported for exhibition thereat, in order to facilitate exhibits by Chinese merchants and others.

Mrs. Monroe, who, as an employe of the United States Bureau of Education, has been investigating the schools of Germany, especially in the line of industrial training, will deliver an illustrated lecture on the "Life of Martin Luther" here this evening.

An appeal has been received by the Senate from the Church of God, at Topeka, Kansas, asking for legislation that will result in prohibition in the District of Columbia.

The Sunday-school Union of the District of Columbia tendered a reception to the city pastors Monday evening.

Special organizations in our churches are preparing plans so that some of the good things associated with the winter holidays shall reach those who are unable, for any reason, to get them for themselves.

THE HOME.

ONWARD TO THE CONQUEST.

Hark! terrific thunders peal,
Mantled gloom enshrouds the sky;
Now the lightning's livid gleam
Heralds forth that danger's nigh.

Tramp! tramp! a battle rages;
Loud, terrific cannons roar!
Rush along, the armies shouting,
Fields all red with human gore!

Onward! onward to the conflict;
Life and Death keen weapons wield;
Hear the clashing of their sabres!
Death for Life must fly the field.

With its "secret" ally near,
Hell, enraged, disputes the ground.
Though the struggle's long, severe,
Truth shall triumph—hell confound.

Hurry up, ye sons of Right,
Don your armor! courage show!
See "that pale horse and his rider!"
Grasp your sabres! strike the blow!

Meet the Sir Knights as they come,
Feather'd, bib'd and jewel'd bright;
"One" shall make a thousand run,
"Two," ten thousand put to flight.

Haste, "fanatic!" tell the story!
Come, ye "madmen!" strike the blow!
Onward! onward! march to glory,
Though through seas of blood you go!

"Prudent" savants, seek a shelter
From the conflict and the strife
Of the great and holy warfare
'Gainst the "secret foe" of life.

Mighty men of policy
Dare not count their souls their own;
Sell, for trash, a birthright free,
Truth forsake, and die unknown.

Onward, brave men, to the conquest!
Die, if need be! never yield!
Shrink not from the task before thee;
Truth and right shall win the field.

Onward! scale the "high defenses;"
Honor God, and strike the blow;
Secret Dagon falls before you;
Onward! meet a conquered foe.

Falter not, nor play the traitor,
Else disgrace thy sons shall know.
Honor God, the Great Creator;
Onward march! to conquest go.

THE JEWISH WOMAN.

The book of Proverbs brings before us yet another phase of deepest interest. It contains the fullest appreciation of woman in her true dignity and of her position and influence in family life. It is quite true, as we shall presently show, that the obligation to train the child rested, primarily, upon the father, and that, both by the law of God, and by the ordinances of the Rabbis. But even the patriarchal story will prepare the reader to find, especially in the early upbringing of children, that constant influence of woman, which, indeed, the nature of the maternal relationship implies, provided the family-life be framed on the model of the Word of God. Lovelier pictures of this than the mother of Samuel and the pious Shunammite hostess of Elisha can scarcely be conceived. But the book of Proverbs shows us that, even in the early times of the Jewish monarchy, this characteristic of Old Testament life also appeared outside of the bounds of the Holy Land, wherever pious Israelites had their settlements. The subject is so deeply interesting, historically and religiously, and, perhaps, so new to some readers, that a slight digression may be allowed us.

Beyond the limits of the Holy Land, close by Dumah, lay the land or district of Massa (Gen. 25: 14), one of the original seats of the Ishmaelites (1 Chron. 1: 30). From Isa. 21: 11, we gather that it must have been situate beyond Seir, that is, to the southeast of Palestine, in Northern Arabia. Whether the Ishmaelites of Massa had come to the knowledge of Jehovah, the true God; whether Massa was occupied by a Jewish colony, which there established the service of the Lord; or whether, through the influence of Hebrew immigrants, such a religious change had been brought about, certain it is, that the last two chapters of the book of Proverbs introduce the royal family of Massa as deeply imbued with the spiritual religion of the Old Testament, and the queen-mother as training the heir to the throne, in the knowledge and fear of the Lord.

[There can be no question that the word rendered in the A. V. (Prov. 30: 1, and Prov. 31: 1), by "prophecy," is simply the name of a district, "Massa."]

Indeed, so much is this the case, that the instruction of the queen of Massa, and the words of her two royal sons, are inserted in the book of Proverbs as part of the inspired records of the Old Testament. According to the best criticism, Prov. 30: 1, should be thus rendered: "The words of Agur, the son of her whom Massa obeys, spake the man to God with me—God with me, and I was strong;" or, according to another reading, "Spake the man, 'I diligently searched after God, and I am become weary.'" Then, Prov. 31: embodies the words of Agur's royal brother, even the words of Lemuel, King of Massa, with which his mother taught him. If the very names of these two princes, Agur, "exile," and Lemuel, "for God," or, dedicated to God, are significant of her convictions, the teaching of that royal mother, as recorded in Prov. 31: 2-9, is worthy of a "mother in Israel." No wonder that the record of her teaching is followed by an enthusiastic description of a godly woman's worth and work (Prov. 31: 10-31), each verse beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet, like the various sections of Psa. 119, as it were to let her praises ring through every letter of speech.—Edersheim's Jewish Social Life.

HOW JOHN BUNYAN GOT OUT OF PRISON.

Bunyan was a sturdy controversialist, and was often very severe on the Quakers. But he learned that through the intercession of that sect he obtained his release from prison.

It is a somewhat noteworthy fact, now well authenticated, that Charles II. liberated Quakers and Puritans from confinement, through the personal intercession of the Quakers, among whom was Richard Carver, who was the mate of the fishing vessel which conveyed the king to France, after the famous battle of Worcester, 1651. This honest Quaker sailor, after twenty years had rolled away, appealed to the king in person in behalf of those who were in prison. When the fugitive king fled for life, this sailor conveyed him on shore. The vessel was bound for Poole, coal-laden, with two passengers, who passed for merchants running away from their creditors. The fugitive king and Lord Wilmot were landed at Fecamp, in Normandy, upon the back of a Quaker, and the vessel recrossed the channel to Poole.

When the honest sailor appeared before his majesty, the king expressed his astonishment that he had not previously sought some reward. The sailor replied that he had merely done his duty, and God had rewarded him with peace of mind.

"And now, sire, I ask nothing for myself, but that your majesty would do the same for my friends that I did for you: set the poor, pious sufferers at liberty, that you may have that peace and satisfaction that always follow good actions."

King Charles thereupon pardoned four hundred and seventy-one Quakers, and many independents and Baptists—among them John Bunyan. Ever after Bunyan was a friend to the Quakers.—Christian Witness.

A MOTHER'S WARNING.

In the New York Evening Post of Nov. 5th is a letter of a mother of two boys, containing a warning to men, especially men of position and influence, not to smoke in the presence of boys, as their example incites the boys to copy it. She was led to write the letter by a bitter experience. One of her boys, 16 years old, a good boy, in a good business position for one of his years, grew feeble and sickly from no cause that she could discover. After awhile she took him to a noted physician, who, after examining him carefully, said: "Ah, madam, it's the old story—a tobacco heart. These cases are coming before me every day. Incited by the example of those about them and tempted by the universal smoking that goes on, boys begin to indulge in pipes and cigarettes before the organs are strong enough to resist the powerful effect which tobacco produces upon the great chain of nerves. You see the result. Alcohol and cigarettes are ruining the youths of our country. A weakened action of the heart, diminished vitality and frequently paralysis, must inevitably follow this early indulgence."

In the hope of inducing good men to see the evil of a smoking example, she put her boy's case with the physician's explanation of it into the public print. I pass it along, that ministers, temperance workers, Sunday-school teachers and all teachers, may use it to help smokers to see the evil of smoking in the presence of boys.

The same day I read this, I read the following in the Christian Leader, which it copied from the Advance:

"I have read with a good deal of interest what Dr. Weaver, the professor of athletics at Yale College, says about the effect of tobacco upon the minds and bodies of the students in that institution. He says that the smokers are inferior in lung power, in bodily weight and in height to those who do not smoke. When he wants hard work done, either bodily or mental, he does not go to the smokers for it. Of those who within a given time have received junior appointments, only five per cent were smokers, and few smokers have received appointments of any kind. He reports also that seventy per cent of the senior class do not smoke; that the leading athletes do not smoke; and that not a single candidate for the rowing match was a smoker. So it would seem that smoking for young men and boys is going out of fashion, for which we are heartily glad.

"This brings to mind a little incident told me a few days ago. Harry A. was a large, stout, healthy, fine-looking boy of sixteen, whose great ambition it was to be as large as his father, who was a six-footer, and wide in proportion; and he seemed in a fair way to realize his ambition, for he was growing fast and strong. One day a gentleman, a friend, met Harry puffing away at a cigar with all his might.

"Why, Harry!" he said, "I didn't know you smoked."

"Oh, yes! What's the harm?" was the reply.

"Well, let me tell you one harm it will do. It will stunt your growth. You will never make such a man as your father is if you keep on."

"I'll risk it," was the laughing rejoinder, as they went their separate ways.

"That was four years ago. Harry kept on with his smoking. He is twenty now, and is a short, pale, spindling youth, with digestion out of order, frequent headaches, nervous and irritable, and with not the slightest hope in the world of ever competing with his father in either bodily or mental size. His physician says it all comes from smoking, yet he will not give up his beloved cigars, preferring to go through life half the man he might be, rather than to give up a debilitating and offensive habit."—Selected.

SOME GIRLS' WAYS.

It was Saturday morning in a big farmhouse kitchen; Nell was bending over the sink picking a chicken, with a decided scowl on her face; Hattie was kneading the bread, with an expression of grim determination suitable for a soldier scaling his enemies' breastworks; and Susan was shelling peas, her pretty face spoiled by the settled discontent about the mouth. The girls were not talking—they never talked while they worked—but they often spoke sharply and unkindly. Work was to them a separate state of existence in which the Christian graces played no part.

"Did I leave my whip in here?" asked a hesitating voice at the open door, and a boy in a big straw hat appeared behind the voice.

"No," snapped Nell; "but's a wonder you did not, for you are always leaving something around for us to tread on."

"It has fallen down under your chair, Susan," he said, coming in to pick it up.

"Ned, you are always bothering somebody," fretted Susan, while she arose with ungraciousness in every movement.

"Father called me to come quick and catch the chicken, and I stood it in the corner," replied Ned, roughly, and gladly made his escape.

That same morning in a neighboring farmhouse kitchen, Lucy was kneading the bread as deftly as Hattie, but at the same time planned with Helen and Grace how to earn money for their mission boxes; Grace had a funny story to tell while she washed the dishes, and Helen told them of a meadow lark she saw while picking the strawberries that she was now hulling for the strawberry shortcake for dessert.

Sam came in with an armful of wood and threw it noisily on the wood-box, twitched Grace's curls, made believe to dive his hands in Lucy's pan of flour, snatched the largest strawberry from Helen's dish, and pranced out whistling a Sunday-school hymn.

The girls smoothed out the little smile that Sam's antics always brought to their faces, and began to sing his hymn; being echoed by Fannie, who was sweeping the front stairs.

Which family do you belong to, girls?—Advocate and Guardian.

BE TRUE.

Be true to your parents. You are under obligations higher and greater than you can possibly think. You must honor these obligations with the utmost fidelity, with expressions of respect and loyal obedience.

Be true to yourself. You owe duties to yourself of the highest order. We do not mean that you are to consider selfishly your own interests regardless of the rights of others. But you must make yourself the noblest man or the noblest woman that you are capable of.

Be true to your Sabbath-school and church. Here is the field in which your life-work is to be cast. Do not speak with disparagement of your church or Sabbath-school, of your minister, superintendent or teacher. If your church or school is smaller, or your house of worship less elegant than somebody's else, remember that God has use for the smaller as well as for the larger things, for the sparrow or humming bird, as well as for the eagle, for the insect as well as for the elephant, for the little brook as well as for the great river, for the child as well as for the full-grown man. Your church and school have their mission in the world. Be true to them and help them to perform the mission best.

Be true to your God. Every commandment given by him is pure and holy. To obey them if for your best welfare, in this world and in the next. Thorough loyalty to truth, to right, to all that is pure and elevating, is the sure road to a noble character and life.—Selected.

WOMAN'S NOBLE WORK.

The Missionary Review for December gives tables of statistics of thirty-four Woman's Foreign Missionary Societies in America and Europe. It is interesting to notice the relative position of Friends in this work. Woman's work amongst Friends began in Western Yearly Meeting in 1881, and the last society to organize was New York in 1885. The union of these societies was consummated in 1889, and was the last of the thirty-four to enter the field. The reports show that in 1890 this union had 226 auxiliaries, and an income of $23,164. Comparison shows that of the thirty-four societies Friends are the twenty-second as to number of auxiliaries and the eighteenth as to income. Taking into account the lateness of time in starting and the smallness of numbers as a church, Friends would stand near the head of the list. The total number of woman's auxiliaries is 32,994 and their incomes $1,785,000. The Review also gives statistics of thirty-six missionary societies in Great Britain and on the continent. The home receipts of these are $5,852,549, and the native contributions $796,315. Friends in England contribute $62,835; in a list of thirty-six societies they are the nineteenth as to amount contributed.

NO USE FOR WINE.

"And so ye have taken the teetotal pledge, have ye?" said an Irishman to his fellow workman.

"Indade I have, and I'm not ashamed of it, either," was the reply of the bold teetotaler.

"But did not Paul tell Timothy to take a little wine for his stomach's sake?" queried the dram-drinker.

"So he did," rejoined the cold water drinker, "but my name is not Timothy, and there is nothing the matter with my stomach."—Selected.

The ungodly league of the church and the saloon must be broken or the church will be destroyed and the nation with it.

WHEN THOSE WE LOVE ARE DEAD.

When those we love are dead—
Though they have faithful been, and kind and true—
They cannot hear our words of tardy praise,
Nor see the flowers remorseful passion lays O'er their still hearts; no whisper trembles through
The silence of the dead.

When those we love are dead,
We spare no pains to honor their estate;
We deck them out in garments soft and fine,
And sheer and snowy lace, and satin-line
Their beds; our love we show too late
When those we love are dead.

When those we love are dead,
Their faults are all forgot and put aside;
Their little frailties we forgive, and say,
If they could walk beside us one more day,
And be to us as if they had not died,
Such tears we might not shed.

If they again were here,
How we would tell them of our love so true,
And help them bear their burdens day by day,
And often fair and fragrant flowers would lay
In weary fingers; ah, so much we'd do
To make their path less drear!

If friends are with us yet,
Let us more patient be, and kind and sweet;
With words of cheer, and gifts, and thoughtful ways,
Make glad and beautiful their passing days,
So that, when marble stands at head and feet,
Grief be not all regret.

TEMPERANCE.

CHURCH AND PROHIBITION.

Under all forms of license, the people have every facility to get drunk, and the young every temptation to drink. License is practically "free rum." Prohibition, unenforced, could be no worse. But it properly defines the business and keeps our hands clear of the price of blood.—N. Y. Christian Advocate, 1883.

To sell rum for a livelihood seems bad enough, but for a whole community to share the great responsibility and guilt of such a traffic for a beggarly $10, seems a worse bargain than that of Eve or Judas.—Horace Greeley.

Let the church become united and earnest for the destruction of the liquor traffic, and it will cease to exist.—Rev. Peter Thompson, of England, at the Ecumenical Methodist Conference.

Resolved, That this Synod endorses the past action of the General Assembly and of this Synod, and desires to discountenance and protest against all systems of license of the traffic in intoxicating drinks and to emphasize the need of and our demand for the entire prohibition of the business.—Synod of Pennsylvania.

There are many men in Christian pulpits to-day who are so eminently conservative that they have never been known to open their mouths in condemnation of any of the great social vices and evils of the day. Such men as these are a positive detriment to the church, a stumbling-block in the way of Christian progress.—Christian at Work.

There is no evading the fact that the church is responsible for the saloon so long as a majority of its members vote to legalize the saloon; and the church members or the minister who votes for license or taxation is responsible for the consequences of license or taxation, and what more can the most disreputable barkeeper be?—Wayne County (Va.) Herald.

The charge that the church of Christ allows her members to continue in corrupt political relations, and to sanction by their votes an evil against which religion and humanity are arrayed, is true.—Christian Statesman.

A crowd of Christian men will gather to hear the tariff discussed, a corporal's guard to consider the duty of united action against rum. If such a state of things among the men of this country professing the religion of Christ does not constitute an effective "bulwark" for the liquor traffic, then I must be confused about the meaning of the words.—John M. Greene, in National Baptist.

Resolved, That we emphatically declare ourselves in favor of that political party, of whatever name or title, that will incorporate in the party platform the principle of prohibition of the liquor traffic, and that we will not cast our votes for any man, however solemn his pledges to aid the cause of temperance, who will permit himself to be a candidate for office in a party whose platform favors the liquor interests by license or other methods of regulation, but that here and now we solemnly record our votes for prohibition pure and simple.—Holston Conference, M. E. C.

"COMPENSATION."

One of the petty arguments urged by the liquor men to-day against the prohibition of their business is that no compensation will be allowed them in the advent of laws totally stopping the manufacture and sale of liquors as a beverage.

I would also add to that the fallacy of these liquorites in demanding pay for those articles in trade, which they themselves have added without any bearing or special relation to their legal privilege of selling, such as fine mirrors, elaborate marble-top bars, cut glass bottles and wine glasses, and a host of other fine fascinating articles used in their business. To the thoughtful mind it is preposterous and simply shallow reasoning to concur with these "legalized wreckers" in saying that surely these men ought to be compensated when prohibitory laws are enacted.

Hon. John B. Finch once said, "Prohibition is the result of the wrongful act of the liquor trade, and the liquor interest cannot demand compensation for something compelled by its own wrongful act."

It is the liquor fraternity upon which all blame rests.

In the United States the Supreme Court has decided that the simple right to make or sell intoxicants is not inherent in citizenship.

Ought not this decision and others similar to it be ample notice to every brewer, distiller, and saloon-keeper everywhere?

But the great cry of compensation issues forth, and to our astonishment thousands think it right to compensate these criers.

A license is granted for one year upon the payment of a license fee ranging from $50 to $1,000.

Now suppose these licenses are not renewed, is that any reason why I should cry "pay for vested interests!" I fail to see it.

For instance—I lease a property of Mr. A. for one year. Now when that year is up, is my landlord under any obligation to lease it to me for another year? None whatever. And suppose I had spent $500 or $1,000 on the premises in fixing up and beautifying that property, have I any rightful claim for compensation? The fact that the liquor men expend millions in fixing up and beautifying breweries, distilleries, saloons and hotels, is no logical or reasonable argument for compensation.

The liquor men have nothing to ask for, and the great bustle and noise they make about compensation is drowned in its own inconsistency.

Let us reverse the picture for a moment. What about compensating the mothers and children of poverty, the wives of drunkards, the hundreds of thousands of families whose very resources have been mercilessly drained by this hydra-headed dragon—the rum traffic?

In 1888 in the English Parliament there was a bill introduced providing for compensation of liquor men when a renewal of their licenses was refused. A great indignation meeting was held against the measure. Immense parade, 70,000 in line.

Coal-wagons, filled with poor little hatless and shoeless, dirty waifs, made such by rum, were in the procession.

On one banner was this motto:—"Who shall compensate these?"

On another banner were these words: "Let the grog-seller go to his father, the devil, for compensation." So say I. The men who have grown immensely rich from the degradation and misery of their poor victims demand compensation when they know that nothing in this world could compel any government to do so. After sucking the very life-blood out of the supporters and protectors of our nations, women and children, these rum fiends would with satanic insolence demand pay.

The government ought to make it very hard for the liquor men, and they ought to be exceedingly happy to be let off so easily.—Rev. Mr. Campbell, in the Gospel Banner.

pal intolerance, fashioned from the superstitions and pagan rites of ages, degrades the manhood, darkens the understanding and tarnishes the purity of its victims, while proffering the boon of admission to "the Grand Lodge above," as a reward for Masonic faithfulness, or by the intercession of a priest guarantee a sure passport to heaven.

My highest ambition for this life or for that which shall be hereafter, is that in my accounting day the Judge of all the earth may say of me: "She hath done what she could."

Let us, with "faith in God," and a courage born of that faith, believe that although the struggle may be fierce, the ultimate victory is sure, through our Lord Jesus Christ, whose we are and whom we serve.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The Branch.—v. 1. The prophet does not say "the stem of David," but goes back instead to the humble shepherd's family from which David came;—perhaps to emphasize the lowliness of Christ's human origin. The lesson, however, has reference not to his first but his second coming. Zechariah alludes to Christ under the same image. This Branch is represented as growing from the stump of a tree which had been cut down. The Jews, for almost two thousand years, have had no government of their own, yet have been divinely kept alive as a people, and out of them is to come the divine Ruler whose sway shall be worldwide. We have seen the first part of the prediction fulfilled in Christ's first coming, and perhaps some of us will live to see the latter part fulfilled in his second coming in glory.

2. Christ as Ruler and Judge.—vs. 2-5. "The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him." "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," was the text of the sermon which Jesus preached at Nazareth. His followers are commanded to be "filled with the Spirit." Let us note its characteristics as manifested in our Saviour. "Of wisdom and understanding." The two words may be considered synonymous, save that the one is used in a general, the other in a particular, sense. Christ is not only an all-wise Saviour as regards his work for sinners, but he can understand our special trials and besetting weaknesses. He "can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and as the Great Physician he can adapt himself to each individual case. The Spirit is here represented as sevenfold in its workings. We are told in Revelation of "the seven Spirits of God," thus carrying out the same figure of completeness, seven being a perfect number. "Of counsel and might." The faculty to plan and to execute united. "Of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord." This means knowledge of the Father's will and perfect obedience thereto. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge; that is, until we have the humble, loving fear which makes us seek to do God's will so far as we know it, we shall never attain to any true knowledge of that will. "And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord." Literally "quick-scented in the fear of the Lord." On the exact meaning of the expression as here used commentators differ; some think it means a quick sagacity to discern the slightest germ of spiritual life in the heart of the sinner, even when it seems to lay dormant. Others think it has a more personal reference, and means a keen delight in the things of God—a quick intuitive comprehension of the deepest spiritual secrets, such as "the angels desire to look into and are not able." It may mean both. "And he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes," etc. He will not, like man, "look on the outward appearance." It is human to judge by externals, but if we have Christ's spirit in us we shall go deeper. Great professions of piety, unaccompanied by a genuine change of heart, will not deceive us, for we shall not judge by mere human standards. "With righteousness shall he judge the poor." It is the poor whose rights are so constantly trampled on that need a righteous judge; one who cannot be biased in his decisions by any outside influence. The spirit of a false religion is always the exact opposite of this. It is notorious that the apostate Church of Rome loves gifts, and accepts the persons of the rich and great by granting to them indulgences which she refuses to others. The lodge anti-Christ is a constant perverter of justice, so that in our courts of law where Masonry rules, the poor have literally "no helper." However righteous their cause, a single Mason on the jury can make the case go against them. "Reprove with equity," etc. Will decide righteously in favor of the meek;—they on whom he has pronounced a special beatitude. (Math. 5: 5.) "And he shall smite the earth," etc. By "the earth" is meant the sinners who have rejected his reign. From this and parallel passages (see 2 Thess. 2: 8,) we are led to conclude that the world will become very wicked before his second coming. The liquor traffic and every business which lives by the vices or weakness of humanity will then get its death-blow, and "the man of sin," the head of Masonry and all false religions everywhere will be destroyed. These are the times of the Gentiles, as the former dispensation, prior to his first coming, was the times of the Jews. The terrible judgments which befell Jerusalem are a type of the great tribulation which is to usher in Christ's personal reign upon the earth. "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins," etc. All his acts will be right, all his words faithful. He will not say one thing and do another, like the kings of this world, but his character will be divinely consistent throughout.

3. The effects of his reign.—vs. 6-10. The animal world is out of harmony with us because we are out of harmony with God. Savage and noxious animals will disappear from the earth when this new type of regenerated humanity comes on to the scene, as the cave-bear and other fierce carnivora became extinct with the advent of civilized man; while those which remain will become tame and harmless. It may also refer to the universal reign of peace, when the savage tribes of heathen lands will lose all their ferocious instincts and "the nations shall learn war no more."

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—Some of the effects of church members going to law with each other before unbelievers, is being realized by the Mount Tabor Baptist church, near Lebanon, Ind. A proposition for greater liberality in receiving members into the church caused a split and a lawsuit for possession of the church property. They have already expended in litigation three times the value of the property, and both parties declare their intention to carry the contest to the Supreme Court, if beaten in the lower court.

—The ground for the first building of the new University was broken Nov. 25, and work has been vigorously pushed ever since. There were no public exercises. The workmen gathered, the word was given, and the work begun. The plow entered the ground near the corner of Ellis avenue and the Midway Plaisance, where the group of dormitories which will be known as Divinity Hall will stand. This hall will be a group of three dormitories divided by fire walls, and composed of a central building five stories high and two wings each four stories high, the group having a front of two hundred and seventy feet and being capable of accommodating about two hundred students. The first lecture hall was begun at the same time. The foundation walls of the dormitory group are now finished and those of the lecture-hall are begun and are likely to be completed before December ends. More than a hundred workmen are employed on the buildings and the walls will rise rapidly.—Standard.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—Rev. J. D. McCord, of the First church, Chicago, whose heart has long been in the evangelistic work, will enter this special work the first of the year. Churches will be fortunate that secure his aid.

—The Minnesota Congregational Association has just had published a pamphlet on the growth, scope and work of Congregationalism in that State, and will place a copy in each of the 10,000 families of the 302 Congregational churches of the State.

—Congregationalism on Long Island has just observed its centennial.

—The American Board of Missions of the Congregational church has put up $1,000,000 as its goal in annual receipts for foreign missions. It hopes to reach this mark by constant advances and as the missionary impulses grow stronger in the Congregational churches.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

—The general statistics of the Evangelical Association, which have just been published, show 26 conferences, 2,062 churches, and 150,234 members. There are 1,227 itinerant preachers and 619 local preachers, 2,535 Sunday-schools, with 177,639 scholars. The collections for the missionary society were $134,443. These statistics show an increase over last year of 19 churches, nearly 2,000 church members, and over 1,000 Sabbath-school scholars. Of the conferences three are in foreign lands, Germany, Switzerland, and Japan.

JEWS.

—The Bureau of American Republics has been informed that the work of installing the Jewish emigrants sent to the Argentine Republic by the munificence of Baron Hirsch, is being actively carried on. The Maurice colony, in which the Hebrews are being established, has 200 families comfortably settled, and engaged in the cultivation of the soil. One thousand additional families are reported to be on their way from Europe, and it is proposed to bring them hereafter at the rate of 1,000 families per month.

LUTHERAN.

—The new Synod of the Northwest, formed recently, has petitioned the General Council to put a traveling secretary into the field.

—A wealthy German of Milwaukee, Wis., has offered to give to the Wisconsin Synod a property of 4 or 5 acres, worth $12,000, if the synod will put on the same a $30,000 building. This can be done, as they can get from their old property alone $18,000.

—The Norwegian Lutheran population at La Crosse, Wis., is constantly increasing. In addition to the original church of Pastor Frick, a third church was only a month or so ago dedicated.

—It is reported that 20,000 Lutherans have left the Baltic provinces of Russia to escape religious persecution.

—Census Bulletin No. 11 credits the Lutheran church with an attendance of 141,388 pupils in her parochial schools. Of these 13,716 are in the North Atlantic States, 1,271 in the South Atlantic, 122,463 in the North Central, 3,316 in the South Central and 622 in the Western. Wisconsin leads all the States with 26,394, followed by Illinois with 24,203 and Minnesota with 18,305.

—The early establishment of an English Lutheran Theological Seminary in Chicago, which is now assured, will give to this city seven institutions of that kind—Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Protestant Episcopal, and two Lutheran, one of the Council and the other of the General Synod, the latter German.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The Methodists have appropriated $60,000 for the conversion of Lutherans in Scandinavia to Methodism. The Methodist Bishops also appropriated $7,000 for Christian work in Wales. A Methodist speaker said, "It is more difficult to convert Welsh Presbyterians to Methodism than any other protestant people." But is it fair for the Methodists to proselyte members of other evangelical churches?

—Mrs. J. T. Gracey's report before the annual meeting of the general executive committee of the woman's foreign missionary society has been published in pamphlet form. From it we learn that there are 4,436 auxiliaries and 122,422 members, and that the contributions for the year aggregated $263,660.69—an advance over last year of $43,330.73.

—A significant part of the temperance forces in British Methodism are at present unorganized. Connectional adult temperance societies are, however, increasing. Six years ago there were only 308, with a membership of 24,450. Now they have increased to 772, with a membership of 51,545.

—Last year, taking British Methodism as a whole, 23,290 "lapsed Methodists" were returned as having "ceased;" the previous year the number was even larger, amounting to 24,747. Special effort is to be made to reclaim many of these.

—The Methodists have fixed their high-water mark at $1,250,000 for home and foreign missions, and they will reach it.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—The two Presbyteries in the city of Philadelphia, the Philadelphia and Philadelphia Central, have been consolidated by action of the Synod of Pennsylvania. The formal union was accomplished on Tuesday evening, December 8th. The united body consists of 140 ministers, 73 churches, 364 elders, 30,000 communicants, and 35,395 Sunday-school members, making it the largest presbytery in the church.

—The Presbyterian church has proposed $1,000,000 for foreign missions as its aim. It is creeping up slowly to that point, having contributed over $900,000 last year.

—The committee appointed by the different branches of the Presbyterian church of the land to consider the subject of the federation of the Christian churches met in New York last week.

Pie and Progress.

Historians who write of people and things omit to notice a point that is very interesting, and that is, what the people eat. They tell us all about wars and laws, but what kept them alive while the laws and wars were made they do not say. There are some things that have been staple articles of diet throughout the centuries; one of them is the pie. Primitively, it was a rather coarse dish. It supplied the place of the hash of modern days, being made a receptacle for left over supplies. But the great central idea was there, and resulted in the evolution and final triumph of the pie. For two hundred years slow progress was made until the Pilgrims landed on America's shores and engrafted the pie habit there. Since then the spirit of progress which characterizes everything American has helped on the pie. Maligned and traduced—the butt of the paragrapher's alleged joke—the object of the boarder's sarcasm—the target for the traveler's malediction—pie serenely holds on its succulent way. Now and then, according to the slurs of its enemies, it provokes bad dreams and bile, and it is considered the correct thing to sneer at the pie just as we do at marriage and mother-in-law. But people have gone on getting married just the same. Mothers-in-law are still at the front and so is the pie. The genius of the housewife, the chemist and the baker has kept at work, and the pie of the present is something that the true American takes an honest delight in, and the palate of the foreigner longs to taste more of.

The invention of condensed mince meat marked a new era in the history of pie.

Delicious mince pie in twenty minutes is not wholly a figure of speech but an accomplished fact by the use of Dougherty's New England Condensed Mince Meat. It is packed in paper boxes enough for two large pies, and its quality and convenience commend its use to every housewife.

HOME AND HEALTH.

OBSTINACY OF OLD HOUSEKEEPERS.

"I am always on the watch to learn and adopt new methods in doing any part of my work, if they are better than my ways," an old housekeeper said, swabbing a greasy mop stick over her pie plates preparatory to covering them with crust; but, if so, why had that woman of forty years never learned to dust her baking plates with flour and not smear them with grease that repeated baking and burning into porous crockery will give the best pie that was ever made an abominable flavor?

And why were her roller towels hanging with ripped hems on each side of their seam, unless she had first hemmed their ends, then overcast together the two widths, instead of first joining with strong stitches and a deep seam the raveling ends of the three-yard length of crash, and then felling its raw edges?

And why were there specks and a rich film of mould on the pickles she brought from the cellar, unless she had failed to learn that bits of horse-radish root strewn over the vinegar in her pickle jars would surely prevent the gathering of mould?

And why were the necks of her children's nighties, and tires, and shirts stretched out till they sagged and hung so low about the little necks, that not only throats but chests and collar-bones were left bare, unless she had finished such easily-stretched edges with binding cut on the bias? Why had not the experience and observations of so many years taught her that straightway-cut bands and bindings would keep such little garments from sagging away from the neck?

And why did she persist, year in and year out, in stirring the morning's skimming of cream with that to be churned the same day, obstinately refusing to believe that such cream only adds bulk to the buttermilk and not to the butter?

And why had she never learned that the crumbling of her cheese was due to her neglecting to scald to blood heat their curds just before chopping them for the press? And that she needlessly sacrificed many hours' scraping to cleanliness dried on, and burnt on pudding-dishes and cream-toast kettles by ignoring the idea of first greasing such utensils before cooking in them the sloppy, adhesive ingredients of porridge and pudding, if she had indeed all these years been always alert, and willing to adopt the best way of doing her work?—Clarisa Potter, in Daughters of America.

BREATHE CORRECTLY.

"I should like to make a call that would reach every woman in the country," writes Mrs. Henrietta Russell. "Lift up your chest! Lift the chest, keeping the shoulders down until it is on a line with the toes, and thus throw the tension on the center of the body, where it should be, leaving the heart and lungs to have free play. Close the lips, draw the air in through the nostrils until the pressure against the ribs is intolerable. Hold the tension firmly, steadily, as long as you can, then gradually let the breath out through the lips. Try this breathing, inspiration, retention and expiration at night, when the body is free; in the morning when you dress. This lesson in correct breathing, when thoroughly learned, is a certain cure for nervousness and shyness, and gives command and freedom of motion, and sense of power to the most self-conscious and hesitating natures."

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

To restore polish to old furniture take one-fifth kerosene to four-fifths linseed oil; boil for one hour; apply with soft brush or cloth.

Old pots and kettles that have become stained or have an odor may be immersed in cold suds and boil, when they will come out as good as new.

To clean marble mix a little whiting with a strong solution of washing soda and a little dissolved soap. Lay the mixture on the marble with a brush and let it remain for half an hour, then wash it off, using a scrubbing brush and flannel with a little alcohol to polish the marble.

Tablecloths break first in the middle, where two folds cross. It is sometimes expedient to transfer to such a place a center cut from an old napkin and to darn the edges without turning. Such a patch cannot be noticed if it is neatly done, and it is worth while saving a good cloth.

To remove ink stains from carpets, put a thick cloth under the place to prevent the dust from getting through, then pour plenty of cold, new milk on the place; sop it gently up with a clean soft cloth as it becomes full of ink; repeat this with fresh milk till the stain entirely disappears. It will do even after the stain is dry, but it will take more milk and longer time. It has been found efficacious even with the most delicate Berlin work.—Selected.

Dyspepsia

Makes the lives of many people miserable, causing distress after eating, sour stomach, sick headache, heartburn, loss of appetite, a faint, "all gone" feeling, bad taste, coated tongue, and irregularity of the bowels. Dyspepsia does not get well of itself. It requires careful attention, and a remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which acts gently, yet efficiently. It tones the stomach, regulates the digestion, creates a good appetite, banishes headache, and refreshes the mind.

Distress After Eating

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. After eating I would have a faint or tired all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. My trouble was aggravated by my business, painting. Last spring I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, which did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced."

The book is purely documentary, a whole library of startling information, a regular arsenal of facts and evidences, an all-round exposition of an active, aggressive and wide-spread movement, every item a text and every chapter the outline for a powerful sermon, speech or lecture. Influential journals, whole churches and strong organizations are interested in its successful career and extended circulation. It embraces the opinion of more than 100 well-known papers, as found before the public, and men and women high in church and state are thrown on the witness stand. The attitude and expression alone of such an array of powerful newspapers, eminent statesmen, learned divines, and noted reformers as are introduced to the reader would herald any publication and insure a wide hearing on any national question. The book will contain some 200 pages close print, more matter than many works of twice or thrice the size with larger type, pictures and wide margins. FARM NOTES.

MANURING BOTTOM LANDS.

The bottom of a hill in the valley is undoubtedly richer in vegetable matter than the sides, unless the latter have been recently and heavily manured. But it is a fallacy to draw manure at any season on a side hill with the notion that it will wash down. We have tried that repeatedly, and the manure never fertilized much, if any, below the line where it was drawn. Undoubtedly rains washed over the land and the manure on the soil below; but the valuable properties of the manure were deposited where it lay, while the deodorized water passed on below. It is doubtless to this necessity for water saturated with manure to sink that running streams and large bodies of water owe their power to cleanse themselves. The nitrates are heavier and sink to the bottom. Hence the mud from ponds and running streams becomes such valuable manure in many cases. It contains most of the fertilizing elements that the water above it has contained.—American Cultivator.

WHIPPING BALKY HORSES.

Notwithstanding the fact that the press continually admonishes whom it may concern that it does no good to whip and pound a balking horse, almost every driver of one does it to-day. It is probably the greatest piece of horse folly in existence. It is not a remnant of barbarism, but it is continual barbarity and brings out what original and acquired sin there is in man. The brain of a horse can retain but one idea at a time. If the idea is to sulk, whipping only intensifies it. A change of that idea is the only successful method of management. This may be accomplished in scores of ways, a few of which will be named. Tie a handkerchief about his eyes, tie his tail tightly to the bellyband or backband, fasten a stick in his mouth, tie a cord tightly about the leg, uncheck and pet him awhile; clasp his nostrils and shut his wind off until he wants to go; unhitch him from the vehicle and then hitch up again, or almost any way to get his mind on something else. Whipping or scolding always does harm. The treatment should ever be gentle. There are more balky drivers than horses.—National Stockman.

GINSENG AND ITS CULTIVATION.

A subscriber writes for information about ginseng:

Ginseng is largely exported from the United States to China where it is highly esteemed for its supposed medicinal virtues, being there regarded as a remedy for all diseases, but particularly for exhaustion of body and mind.

Medical men in both America and Europe, consider that there is but little real medicinal worth in the root, though it is still used to some extent in home remedies in this country.

Ginseng "loves moisture and the depths of forests, and nestles in recesses where the sun never penetrates."

The exports from the United States are nearly 500,000 pounds per annum.

Many attempts have been made to cultivate ginseng in America, but with little success till recently, though it is indigenous in a large part of the cooler regions of the United States. In Georgia and Alabama it is found in the mountains and thence northward to Canada, and west to the Rocky Mountains.

It appears to thrive best in loamy soils, such as are found in oak forests at the North. Shade seems also to be essential, for when the plants are exposed to the direct rays of the sun they soon die out, and for this reason open field or garden cultivation of the plants has rarely or never been attended with success. Raising ginseng can be made profitable where a man has suitable land in a forest or grove. The cost of preparing the ground need not be very much, and requires but little labor for its cultivation. At the end of the third season, the roots will have reached a marketable size and may then be dug, and the same ground worked over and re-stocked with seed.

September is the month usually selected for digging the roots, as at that time the berries are fully ripe, and the Housekeepers Should Remember.

The great success of the Royal Baking Powder is due to the extreme care exercised by its manufacturers to make it entirely pure, uniform in quality, and of the highest leavening power. All the scientific knowledge, care and skill, attained by twenty-five years' practical experience, are contributed toward this end, and no preparation can be made with a greater accuracy, precision and exactness.

Every article used is absolutely pure. Chemists are employed to test the strength of each ingredient, so that its exact effect in combination with its co-ingredients is definitely known. Nothing is trusted to chance, and no person is employed in the preparation of the materials used, or the manufacture of the powder, who is not an expert in his particular branch of the business.

As a consequence, the Royal Baking Powder is of the highest grade of excellence, always pure, wholesome and uniform in quality. Each box is exactly like every other, and will retain its power, and produce the same and the highest leavening effect in any climate, at any time.

The Government Chemists, after having analyzed all the principal brands in the market, in their reports placed the Royal Baking Powder at the head of the list for strength, purity and wholesomeness; and thousands of tests all over the country have further demonstrated the fact that its qualities are, in every respect, unrivaled.

Rev. J. M. Foster, writing from Boston, says: "The 21st of December has been celebrated in New England, as 'Forefathers' Day,' from time immemorial. The addresses at the Congregational Club's banquet, at Music Hall, last night, were of a high order. They told us that 'the thirty kings who governed Europe when the Mayflower was launched have been forgotten, but the leaders of the Puritans are our canonized saints. The Pilgrims lived and directed the course of history, because they had high principles, and they believed in and practiced them.' Forefathers' Day marks the birth of a nation, and gives a key to a new and nobler age. The leading address was made by Rev. Robert R. Meredith, D. D., of Brooklyn, N. Y." We shall try to make a liberal extract from it in the next issue of this paper—"words that need emphasizing to-day."

With this number the Christian Cynosure ends its issues for the year; but we hope that the work which it has accomplished has not been in vain, and that its influence during the past twelve months may be felt for years to come, for the benefit of the race and for the glory of God. None of us can boast as one whose warfare has ended in victory, for the battle between truth and error still rages; but with an unfaltering trust in the God of battles, we expect to overcome the hosts of evil in and out of the lodges. Fervent, persistent prayer and earnest labor—working and voting as we pray—will win the prize. Let us, therefore, continue to labor and to pray, assured of final victory.

Elder J. L. Barlow, of Richmond, Ill., whose heart is in the anti-secrecy warfare, and who has been for years an active participant in the work of the N. C. A. as its president and director, favored the Cynosure office with a friendly call last week. His many friends will regret that his health is by no means as strong as they could desire.

Among the staunch advocates of separation between the church and the lodge, the anti-secrecy cause has none more faithful than the conservative United Brethren church. "From the very earliest period of our history," says the U. B. Gospel Messenger, "the Brethren have taken a decided stand against these societies, and we are glad to be able to report that we are in no measure annoyed by them." At a time when these societies "are sapping the very life out of many of the churches in various parts of the land—lodges well patronized, and churches struggling for a mere existence," we may remember with gratitude those organizations who are not captivated by the glare and tinsel of this modern devil-worship.

A new United Presbyterian church was recently organized on the South Side in this city, with a membership of 37, which has since increased to 41. The congregation meets regularly for worship in Douglas Hall, on Thirty-fifth street, between Indiana and Prairie avenues, on Sundays, at 11 A. M., and 7:30 P. M. A Sunday-school and Wednesday evening prayer-meeting have also been established. Rev. W. M. Howie, of 3709 Prairie avenue, is the pastor in charge, and quite hopeful of building up a prosperous church. Mr. Howie is an opponent of the lodge system.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

As a memorial of the year just closing, and of that upon which we enter to-morrow, several new features have been introduced into this number of the Cynosure. Great interest is everywhere centering in Chicago as the city where the World's Fair in commemoration of the discovery of America is to be held, and this universal interest naturally creates a corresponding curiosity to see and hear of what is being done to make the Exposition a success. At the present time the work at the fair grounds is progressing favorably, and from all quarters come encouraging intelligence—sufficient, already, to insure the greatest and best of all the many world's fairs that have yet been held. On this page we present as perfect a likeness of Christopher Columbus as it is possible to obtain in a newspaper illustration. On page 3 will be found an artistic view of the great Machinery Hall that will fill an important position in the Exposition, and on page 5 is another, of the Administration or Government Buildings, with its imposing front and handsome surroundings. Page 11 introduces the Christian reader to another scene, also full of interest the Floating Chapel used by Bro. I. R. B. Arnold in his mission work upon the Southern rivers of the Union—from which the Gospel is dispensed in its purity to thousands of individuals to whom church services on shore are not readily accessible. These extraordinary attractions, with our usual interesting letter-press departments, will, we trust, find favor in the sight of all our readers.

The year closes with an unusually large volume of holiday trade. General business is ordinarily light at this season, but at many points it is reported larger than in previous years. The prosperity of the entire Union is, on the whole, fairly sustained. For all which we have abundant reason to be thankful to the "Father of lights, from whom cometh every good and perfect gift."

Catholicism is pitting itself triumphantly against Methodism in Austria. A Vienna dispatch of the 16th says: The magistracy of the city at the instance of the public prosecutor issued a decree commanding the closing of the Methodist church here. They also prohibited pastor Roesch from preaching anywhere in the city, on the ground that his "Methodistic denunciation of the mass as 'blasphemous fable and dangerous conceit,' is an insult against the Catholic religion, which is recognized by the State." This is the same recognition which the Catholics are seeking to obtain in the United States, and which will produce a result here in harmony with that recorded in Austria.

A correspondent of the Christian Conservator, writing from the Nehalem Valley, Oregon, says: "Our church has suffered, in common with the church throughout the land, from the blighting influence of liberalism, which has allied itself with the Farmers' Alliance and the Evangelical Association, to crush the old line United Brethren." Probably Satan and his mortal and immortal adherents have never laughed so heartily since the fall of Adam as they did when the minority U. B. church seceded on the anti-secrecy question. It was a big victory for the rest of the church.

The police of St. Petersburg has sent notice to all the saloon-keepers in the neighborhood of factories that they will be heavily fined if they continue selling spirituous drinks to laborers on trust or beguile the laborers to drink in any other way.

THE LAND OF PALESTINE AND THE JEWS.

BY H. H. HINMAN.

One of the most remarkable of the signs of the times is the restoration of the latter rains in the Land of Syria—thus preparing the way for the re-habitation of that region which has for ages been in comparative desolation. For centuries it was parched with drought, but within the last thirty years there has been a steady increase of rainfall. For the last eight years, says a recent writer, it has averaged twenty-six inches per year, but during the last year it has reached forty-eight inches, and on Mount Lebanon over sixty inches.

With this increase of fertility has come an increase of population that has been altogether unprecedented. The persecution of the Jews, not only in Russia, but in Germany and Austria, has compelled them to seek new homes; and this, together with religious impulse, has led large numbers of them to seek them in the land of their fathers. But not only have they come from Russia and Germany, but great numbers of Spanish-speaking Jews, from the Barbary States to which they were driven, together with the Moors, are now flocking to the father-land. So, also, there are many from Yemen, in Arabia, where, from their long residence, they have a dark brown complexion, and are quite unlike their German and Russian brethren. The number of Jews in Jerusalem, in 1840, was said to be only three hundred; nor did they increase very much until within the last few years. There are now in that city about forty thousand. They constitute a majority of the inhabitants. Their wealth and social influence is steadily increasing, while that of the Moslems as steadily diminishes. Outside of the old walls, Jerusalem is becoming a fine city, and its beautiful streets and residences are nearly all Jewish. Besides this city, into which modern civilization, with its means of production, has forced itself, and has come to stay, there is the railroad from Jaffa now nearly completed. Other railroads and improvements are projected, and are rapidly pushed forward.

There are nine agricultural colonies which are fairly successful, and a very large Jewish population in all of the smaller towns and cities of the land. All these things seem to be in fulfillment of prophecy, which just as clearly predicts the conversion of the Jews as it does their return to their own land.

The Christian world has not been indifferent to these passing events. No portion of the non-Christian world has received so much attention. Nearly 400 missionaries are laboring among the Jews, and about $490,000 are annually spent in Jewish missions.

These, though meagre in their results, have not been altogether in vain. There are a few Jewish Christians in all the large cities of Europe and America, and in Jerusalem. Perhaps the most important of these Jewish-Christian movements is in Southern Russia, where a learned Jew has undertaken to convert his people and establish a Jewish-Christian church with a Seventh-day Sabbath and circumcision, but which shall not be binding as conditions of membership. Nor should we forget that the Jews of Europe, though often oppressed, are making rapid advancement, both in wealth and education.

The number of Jewish college professors in France, Germany, Italy and Austria, is out of all proportion to their relative number as a people. So, also, they have a much larger share of the legal and medical professions, while as students their relative number is still greater. In one university in Hungary, out of 3,100 students the Jews have 1,072, though they are but four per cent of the population.

The conclusions that seem deducible from the above facts are:

1. That the Jewish people, now numbering about 6,500,000, a larger aggregate than at any former period in their history, have been providentially preserved and kept separate for some specific object, and that they are acquiring wealth and education to fit them for an important influence in the destinies of the world.

2. That the Land of Palestine, including nearly all of Syria, seems likely to be speedily occupied by them, and under better climatic influences, as well as better agricultural management, to be restored to more than its prismatic beauty and productiveness. Turkish rule will have to be essentially modified, or, what is more probable, altogether cease.

3. There is great reason to hope that the abundant prophecies of the conversion of the Jews are to have a speedy fulfillment; that "there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, who shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob" (Rom. 11:26), and that the Jews are to be among the instruments for the evangelization of the world.

Oberlin, O.

We affirm that the Christian community in this country, except where restrictive and prohibitory laws are in operation and honestly sustained by the majority of its citizens, is in the shameful alliance with the liquor traffic, not only making its existence possible, but giving it legitimacy and respectability such as no other business struggles to obtain, or would obtain if it were necessary to struggle for the right to exist.—Methodist Review.

STRONG LANGUAGE.

At the recent quarterly meeting of the M. E. church in Schuyler's Lake, the presiding elder, the Rev. Mr. Cridenwise, commended the members for their successful efforts in raising the pastor's salary, which of late has sometimes been sensibly deficient, but said that Schuyler's Lake, the lodge end of the charge, which consists of three churches, was somewhat short in its accounts.

He also said that the church district, in recent years, had been remiss in contributions for missionary work; that a coming visit of the bishop at Norwich was to be signalized by a renewed effort to increase contributions, and that eight of the best workers were to be sent to arouse the people. He then followed with a long and earnest appeal for funds to extend Christianity among the heathen.

He claimed that the greatest blessings they possessed were due to the Christian home, and exhorted them to liberality to secure the same for all. A fashionable church in the city of New York only raised five hundred dollars for missionary purposes, but that noble Scotchman's (Hall's) church had contributed two hundred thousand dollars for Christian work without advertising the fact to the world. His congregation had thrown twelve thousand dollars into the box on a single occasion. It was more blessed to give than receive, and this was verified by personal and other experience. Christians gave and forgot, and he himself had done this, but the recipient sometimes remembered, long years afterwards, and gladdened him with their thanks.

"What," he asked, "is the matter of this charge? There is something wrong! The minutes of the conference shows that something is wrong, in the opinion of all right-minded persons! It is a shame! It is a shame!! It is a shame!!! that this great charge, extending across the country, and embracing six or eight (eighteen or twenty) square miles, has only contributed twenty-eight dollars this year; and the pastor and his family have given five of this. There are seventy members; and one hundred and twelve pupils in the Sabbath-school, but the contributions will not average the miserable pittance of fifty cents per member!" He hoped, next year, that instead of twenty or twenty-five names on the list it would be increased manifold.

There is a noticeable uniformity between this complaint of church lukewarmness and others published in the papers of this vicinity. Others may decide whether it has its origin in the growing prosperity of the lodge, on the principle that the light arm of the balance must rise. Are the churches gradually succumbing to the dry-rot of lodgery? "In the opinion of all right-minded people they are." People and capital are attracted by popularity, and this at present is centered in the lodge and far from the church. *

A DENUNCIATION OF MASONRY.

In these so-called respectable, charitable(?) secret societies, lurks the serpentine form of the devil, misleading and destroying many of the truest and best men in this country. I was once a Mason, and had taken those wretched oaths, under threats of murderous tortures, and death, if I failed to obey them; and in the presence of feigned dead bodies and open coffins. But, thank God; yes, praise the Lord, that my eyes have been opened, and the spell and charm of this superstitious thralldom has been broken, and I have forever renounced my allegiance, or any obligation, thereto. Across from my window, as I write, I can see a beautiful monument. It marks the spot where a wealthy, popular, fine looking young man was shot down a few years ago, and killed instantly. The man who did it was a prominent Mason. I verily believe that he would not have done it if he had not been a Mason. About six years ago I began to see the horrors and dangers there were in these oath-bound secret societies, protecting their members in everything they did, including robbery and murder. I went to an influential Mason, telling him of my intentions to drop out quietly and have nothing more to do with Masonry, and he said: "You had better not do that. You may some day need its protection. You may get into some kind of trouble; you may kill somebody." This only made me stronger, and I said to him, Well I had rather fix it so that I would have no protection, if I killed anybody willfully, and I would not be so apt to do it. I am willing to trust God for my protection. When I think about it, I am ashamed that I ever belonged to any society where I could not take with me my dear wife and precious mother, who are now in heaven. God grant that any whose eyes may fall on these lines may be led to take warning and break the chains that this mystery of iniquity binds them with, and live above the curses and bewitchments of these Christless church and soul-destroying secret societies. Oh, thoughtful man, how can you be connected with any organization, or society, that eliminates from its rituals, prayers, books and works the name of Jesus, ignoring the only name that will open heaven's pearly gates, if they are ever opened for you at all?—J. E. Shaw, in the Firebrand.

BETTER TO BE ABEL THAN CAIN.

An important and somewhat suggestive decision was made recently in one of the Indiana courts. Some two years ago the United Brethren divided in a conference held in York, Pa., on the question as to whether secret orders should be permitted in that body. A difference both of opinion and of practice had for several years existed in the church on this subject and the division came on the question of dropping the prohibition of these societies from the standards of the body. The liberals had the majority, the law was changed, and the minority withdrew. The lawsuit was with regard to the church property. Among other things the U. B. publishing house at Dayton, O., worth $250,000, was at stake. The legal decision went against the minority and they lost all.

There are some useful lessons to be drawn from this bit of history. One of them is that those who are patient with public arguments against the faith of the church by those who have engaged to maintain it, and who do not take action when the law of the church is not enforced, need not be surprised that a spirit of contempt for the law, called liberalism, will grow rapidly. Then when liberals gain the majority, the other side may submit or get out. The liberals will not put the minority out; there is no necessity to do that. Non-enforcement of the law is their strength, and to disregard the conscience of the minority is their victory. Then when such minority goes into a civil court on such a question as the exclusion of secret orders from the church, what chance have they? The world is against them. The daily papers have them in derision. The judge on the bench and the jury in the box are in all probability more or less involved in the very evil which this minority is trying to resist. Some of their judges are already bound by oath to sustain what the church testified against. The so-called bigotry of such a testimony will rule the plaintiffs out of court. The minority of the United Brethren church who hold the old principles, the principles that up to the time of their withdrawal were on their statute-book, go out with nothing of all the hard-earned money they have put into the church. But a minority who will stand out on that question in the face of the flood of orders that overflow this land, have something better than buildings and bonds. They must be rich in faith.—Christian Nation.

DON'T OPEN THE FAIR ON THE SABBATH.

Whatever may happen, the Chicago ministers cannot be accused of a want of effort to prevent the opening of the coming Fair on Sunday. With the exception of the "liberal" men who always take the worldly side of every question, they have stood manfully for the day which has been such a blessing to the American people. Their views on the subject were well represented by the address of Dr. Herrick Johnson—who has been a most able advocate of Sunday closing—at the Trinity Methodist church mass meeting on Sunday evening.

"There are ten reasons," he said, "which I desire to present on this subject. First—Throwing open the gates would be contrary to precedent. The Crystal Palace World's Fair in New York, which was not much of a fair but was pretty good for New York, was closed Sunday. The Centennial gates were closed Sunday. The American Department in the Paris Exposition was closed. Second—The opened gates would be against the usages and traditions of our national life. We want church and state kept separate, but we are a Christian nation. Third—It is against the conscience of church members who share in the government. There are desire, passion, lust, greed, avarice, but very little conscience among those favoring the open gates Sunday. Fourth—It would be a national humiliation to put our Sabbath in the back yard and put on exhibition as one of our products that mongrel thing, the European Sunday. Let us show our own goods, a Sabbath that does not enforce yet protects religion. Fifth—It would be a fearful menace to social order. There would be 100,000 strangers dumped in our city every Saturday night or Sunday morning from neighboring cities. They would be composed largely of the scums. Sixth—It would set a precedent which would thrust into the Sabbath the hawking of all kinds of wares. County and State fairs, places of amusement, would rush into the Sabbath day; and why building. The first story is in the Doric order, of heavy proportions. The second story, with its lofty colonnade, is in the Ionic order. Externally, the design is divided into three principal stages. The first stage consists of the four pavilions, corresponding in height with the buildings grouped about, which are 65 feet high. The second stage is of the same height, and is a continuation of the central rotunda, which is 175 feet square. The third stage is the base of the great dome, 40 feet high and octagonal in form, and the dome itself rising in graceful lines, richly ornamented with heavily molded ribs and sculptured panels, and having a large glass skylight.

MACHINERY HALL.

The main Machinery building measures 850 by 500 feet. It is spanned by three arched trusses, and the interior will present the appearance of three railroad train houses, side by side, surrounded on all the four sides by a 50-foot gallery. The trusses are to be built separately, and so that they can be taken down and sold for use as railroad train houses; and it is hoped to have iron the first story permits passage around the building under cover; and as in all the other buildings, the fronts will be formed of "staff," colored to an ivory tone. The ceilings of the porticoes will be emphasized with strong color.

A colonnade with a cafe at either end forms the connecting link between Machinery and Agricultural halls, and in the center of this colonnade is an archway leading to the exhibits. From this portico there will be a view nearly a mile in length down the lagoon, and an obelisk and fountain placed in the lagoon between the two buildings, Agriculture and Machinery, will form a fitting southern point to this vista.

The machinery annex will be placed in the rear of the Administration building and in the loop formed by the railroad tracks. It will be entered by tunnels or subways, as well as by bridges, from Machinery hall and the buildings for Administration, Mines and Transportation. It is to be a very large but very simple building. While in the main Machinery building a railroad train house is the type, in the annex a mill or foundry will be considered the model for construction. It is all to be built of wood in the most simple and economical manner. Its shape, however, is pe-not manufacturers? Seventh—It would take the down grade for labor for which Europe is just now taking the up grade. Eighth—It would force all employes of the Fair and railroads to work Sundays. Ninth—It would be the forging of another strong link in the chain which will soon turn the laborer over, bound hand and foot, to toil 365 days a year. Labor has not asked for open gates. Tenth—It would be selling the Lord's day for a few pieces of silver. The right of liberty must be circumscribed so as to make room for the exercises of the liberty of others."

ADMINISTRATION BUILDING.

This building is the gem of all the architectural jewels of the Exposition. Constructed of material to last but two years, it will cost $650,000. Although it covers a space but 250 feet square, yet it is one of the noblest achievements of modern architecture. It will occupy the most commanding position on the Exposition grounds. The building consists of four pavilions, 84 feet square, one at each of the four angles of the square of the plan, and connected by a great central dome, 120 feet in diameter and 260 feet high. In the center of each facade is a recess, 93 feet wide, within which is a grand entrance to the trusses instead of cheaper ones, which may, however, be necessary. In each of these three long naves there is to be an elevated traveling crane, running from end to end of the building. These will be useful in moving machinery, and when the Exposition opens platforms will be placed on them, and visitors will view from these the entire exhibition, at a great saving of tramping.

Shafting for power will be carried on the same posts which support these traveling bridges. Steam power will be used throughout this main building, and this steam will be supplied from a main power house adjoining the south side of the building. The exterior toward the stock exhibit and the railroad is to be of the plainest description. On the two sides adjoining the grand court the exterior will, however, be rich and palatial. All the buildings on this grand plaza are designed with a view to making an effective background for displays of every kind, and in order to conform to the general richness of the court, are enriched with colonnades and other architectural features.

The design follows classical models throughout, the detail being borrowed from the renaissance of Seville and other Spanish towns as being appropriate to a Columbian celebration. As in all the other buildings on the court, an arcade on culiar. It is to be annular in form, the outer diameter being 800 feet and the inner diameter 400 feet. The building will have a nave 100 feet wide, with a 50-foot-wide lean-to in one story on the inside, and a 50-foot-wide lean-to on the outside. Within the inner circle will be a park in which visitors fatigued by the hum of machinery may rest. The annular form chiefly commends itself because a circuit electrical railway can run continuously around the entire main nave, and passengers in it can thus see the entire exhibit without leaving the cars; and machinery can be easily moved by this means. The power will be transmitted by shafting crossing the building at each bay, with a motor at each shaft. The electrical power will be used in the annex, and the steam power in the main Machinery building.

Attached to this great annex will be the power house, convenient to the tracks for coal supply, etc., containing an immense display of boilers, while in the adjoining portion of the annex building will be established the enormous plant of engines and dynamos. This will probably be the largest and most interesting display of electrical power ever made. It is possible that gas will be used instead of coal for fuel beneath the boilers, and in that case a building will be prepared for making this gas.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Troublous times for the endowment orders—A new line of action in temperance work—The women voters of Boston and their president.

These are "troublous times" for the endowment orders. Judge Allen, of the Supreme Court, has recently muzzled the "Golden Lion," so it may no longer go about seeking whom it may devour; the "Royal Ark" has proved herself a most unseaworthy craft; and the "Golden Fleece" has indeed "fleeced" its unfortunate victims to an extent without parallel in classic story and must swell the list; and so it goes on, ad infinitum. The secretary and treasurer of the R. A. have been arraigned and fined—the one four hundred dollars, the other for two hundred. Judge Sherman, in passing the sentence, regretted that the law did not allow him to send them to prison, for the fact that they were educated men who understood fully the wrong they were doing made them worse than ordinary criminals. Powers, the secretary, who received the heaviest sentence, "laughed cynically" during these remarks, as if they were a good joke. And why shouldn't he? He, and men like him, have managed to clap a stopper on their consciences—if indeed they were ever troubled with one—and why should they care for a paltry fine? The evidence brought out in court showed that the affair was a close corporation, composed of a few men who promptly voted themselves salaries, of which the lowest reached the modest sum of $7,500, and the highest $10,000 per annum. Even this did not include large amounts voted each other for special services, while at the outset, out of the $5 fee paid by the applicant, the agent who secured him got $3, and, later on, the whole. A term in jail might have some terrors for such men, but what is a mere fine which leaves them their liberty intact and in full possession of their ill-gotten riches? It is like mulcting a rumseller fifty or a hundred dollars while he is raking in his thousands. Dr. F. W. Whitney, president of the Mystic Shrine and Golden Circle, now under arrest in Boston, whose income for months was over $100 a day, through assessments and buying up of lapsed certificates, is another illustration of the manner in which poor laboring people, and especially servant girls and young working women, have been preyed on by these vampires in human form. For it is to this class, and not to shrewd, clear-headed business men who would have seen the fallacy of their pretensions at a glance, that these concerns addressed themselves. There is always a large industrial class in every community whose intelligence is keen enough in certain ways, but who are as ignorant as children of business methods. These are the ones whose interests every legislator should feel himself solemnly bound to protect, even though they ought in the abstract to have enough sense to protect themselves. The fact remains that they never had, and never will have, until the millennium comes.

I was interested the other day in a woman's plan for the removal of the drink evil, given in the columns of our stalwart prohibition daily, the Traveller. She proposes that it should be done by the agency of the churches; that they should prepare and enforce "a unified system of questions, and a solemn compact which shall bind prospective and existing memberships to abstinence from spirituous and intoxicating beverages, and to unabating example, influence, and work" for temperance. The idea of this white ribboner is worth considering; and it occurs to me that a new department in the W. C. T. U., which shall have for its special work the urging of such action on all Christian churches, would be as much in order as some of its other departments; as that, for instance, of bringing the work of the Union before conventions and other influential bodies. The Protestant Church of America is certainly the most "influential body" of Christians on the globe, and who shall say how much might be accomplished by taking up this line of direct appeal? Of course, I am aware that it would cause a great flutter in some of the doves of our American Zion, but that is all the more reason for trying the experiment. It is precisely the line on which we are doing our anti-secret work—trying to convince the churches of the sin and error of receiving as members those who have been sworn on lodge altars in the name of another god. I commend her idea to all temperance workers who believe that in God's original plan a pure church was intended to be the world's one great reforming agency.

"Nearly 900 Nobles of the Mystic Shrine assembled in New Haven, Monday,"—so says a newspaper item—"to hold their annual meeting and indulge in their annual festivities." No one who heard Bro. McIntire's clear and decided testimony on this point, at our Convention, can fail to have an idea of the general character of said "festivities." How many sorrowing wives and mothers would understand, could they be present at such scenes, the subtle, secret, deadly influence that is making of their loved ones drunkards and debauchees.

If women were not patriotic to their very souls, they would never turn out to vote at all, under the vexatious complications and discouraging obstacles which the present law puts in their way. I am glad that Carleton Coffin is drawing attention to this matter. Think of abolishing the poll-tax for men while demanding that all women who wish to vote for school committees "shall in writing over their own signatures request the assessors to assess them for a poll-tax!" If this one-sided requirement could be made general, I wonder how many ballots it would lose to the Democratic party through the illiteracy, and to the Republican party through the laziness, of their respective voters! The best possible evidence, to my mind, that women want the suffrage is the fact that so many are willing to exercise their very limited political rights under so much injustice and difficulty.

Any one, by dropping into room 9, Tremont Temple, the editorial office of the Woman's Voice, can have some idea of the kind of stuff the Independent Women Voters are made of, from their president downwards. There she sits at her desk,

"The very pulse of the machine," an energetic, bright-faced woman, still in her prime, and therefore not too old to forbid the hope that she may take her place under the gilded dome some day when Massachusetts gets to be as progressive as New Zealand—Mrs. Eliza Trask Hill, the worthy daughter of a noble sire, Rev. George Trask, of anti-tobacco fame. In these small but busy headquarters, one may study at ease the type of woman which the public school question is evolving; intelligent, self-reliant and God-reliant. I remember happening in there two years ago, about voting time, and wondering, as they thronged about her desk with their earnest talk and eager questioning, like bees around their queen, how many editors masculine would have been as little disturbed thereby. Women have had a different training in these matters from men. Think of Mrs. Stowe writing her famous book amid interruptions that would have driven poor Carlyle mad! The coming woman is already here. Who could attend the late W. C. T. U. convention and not realize it? Logical, eloquent, witty, pathetic, but always womanly, she stands with her feet on the Rock of Ages, and her face uplifted to catch the first rays of the new dawn.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 23, 1891.

Congress adjourned to-day to meet on the 5th of January. Short sessions of both Senate and House were held, but the only important business transacted was the announcement of the standing committees by the Speaker of the House. A feeling of sadness existed in the Senate owing to the entirely unexpected death of Senator Plumb, of Kansas, on Sunday. Senator Plumb was a general favorite, largely on account of the sterling integrity he has at all times displayed during the fifteen years he has been a member of the Senate.

During the past few days a number of petitions have been received here, to be presented to Congress, asking that the $5,000,000 loan which the managers of the World's Fair will ask from Congress shall be made conditional on the exhibition being closed on the Sabbath-day. It is always well to confront facts, whether they agree with one's own opinions or not; therefore I deem it fitting to say that unless there shall be much greater pressure brought to bear upon Congress than there is at present any indication of, there will be no action taken to prevent opening of the Exposition on Sunday. As prominent a representative of the dominant party in the House of Representatives as Mr. Springer, of Illinois, has already put himself on record as favoring the opening of the Exposition on Sunday. It will require work and a great deal of it to overcome the influence of such men.

What think you of a donation party composed of more than thirty thousand persons, where the donations are from a single potato to a barrel of flour, and from a pair of socks to a complete suit of clothes? Washington had that sort of a party to-day, and the donors were the pupils in our public schools, which are closed for the holidays. It was a sight well worth seeing to visit the various school-houses when the donations were piled up previous to being turned over to the Associated Charities and the police to be distributed among the poor. It was an object lesson in practical charity that the youngest pupil will always remember.

The United Christian Commission, which was organized one year ago for the purpose of promoting the intellectual, moral and religious welfare of the army and navy by suggesting needful national legislation and administration, the securing of well-qualified chaplains, encouraging Sabbath observance, promoting temperance, multiplying libraries, reading-rooms and gymnasiums, and endeavoring to arouse the sentiment of the nation to a sense of its obligations to this class of citizens, held its first annual meeting here yesterday. The general plan of the society will closely follow that of the Christian Commission which did so much good during the late civil war. The following officers were elected: President, Rev. Dr. J. T. Smith; vice-president, Rev. Dr. S. M. Newman; general secretary, Rev. Dr. George Elliott; secretary, representing the army, Chaplain Nave, Fort Niobrara, Nebraska; secretary representing the navy, Chaplain Clark; treasurer, Rev. Dr. W. E. Parson. The fact was brought out that the navy is much better supplied with libraries than the army, although a marked improvement has been noted since the government agreed to furnish army posts with a limited number of books on requisition. R. B. Poole, librarian of the Y. M. C. A. of New York made an interesting statement of what that organization is doing towards furnishing the army and navy with reading matter. It regularly distributes 800 weekly papers, printed in all parts of this country and Europe, to various army posts, and, since 1873, when this work was begun, 600,000 papers and magazines have been sent. The prevalence of gambling in the army was discussed, and several methods suggested of lessening the evil, which the chaplains considered the worst they had to contend with.

The coinage of the trade dollar bullion into standard silver dollars authorized by the last Congress was completed yesterday, and until there is some new congressional legislation on the subject there will be no more silver dollars coined, as the silver purchased by the Treasury Department under the present law is stored in the vaults in bars.

A movement has been started here to raise a subscription for the starving, famine-stricken Russians, and it is probable that a public meeting will be held for that purpose. *

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 17, 1891.

When I arrived in Cincinnati, I made my way up Walnut Hills, and stopped near Lane Seminary, where I remained while in the city. The Hills do not look at all as they did in 1833, when I was a student here. The steep, rough knobs and narrow valleys are now covered with the residences and structures of a great city, with as many inhabitants as all Cincinnati contained at that time.

But Lane has not advanced in proportion to the growth of the city. They disposed of the land which the Kempers donated to the institution too early, while the value of it was small. And now other troubles are arising; and Prof. Evans, who sympathizes with Prof. Briggs, of Union, in his wild Biblical criticism, is about to return to his native Wales. I looked into the seminary library, which is quite large, and found some of our Reform books there, and the Christian Cynosure in the reading-room.

Dec. 3 I took an old-fashioned steamboat ride of two or three hours up the Ohio river to Clermontville. But the academy there appeared to be little more than private property, owned and sustained by Prof. Parker, with no public library. The same thing was true of Belmont military school, at College Hill, a few miles out, near Mount Healthy. And I was surprised to find Cincinnati University teaching classes made up mainly of young ladies, and having no general library.

During the visit to the city, I was very much gratified to learn the present location of the Zion Baptist church, where I taught a Sabbath-school in 1833, assisted by Bro. Butts, my classmate. It was then in the southwest suburb of Cincinnati, commonly called "the swamp," in the midst of the waifs from slavery, who were the poorest and most ignorant and squalid class to be found in the city. The Sunday-school was not very successful, as the scholars could not read. So, in 1834, during the summer vacation at Lane, I started a day-school, in the basement of Zion church, where I gathered nearly fifty scholars. After spending a few weeks in gathering the pupils, and organizing the classes, I gave it in charge to John W. Alvord and engaged in teaching twenty-five or thirty additional children in the eastern part of the city. This was the beginning of schools for the freedmen in Cincinnati, and perhaps in the country.

When we returned to the seminary, three young ladies came, as missionaries, from the East and took the schools. The Tappans and Greens and other anti-slavery men assisted for a time in the expenses, until at length the school-board of the city put these schools on the list, along with the other common schools. And they are still in existence, although not in just the same locality. When the railroads came, they took possession of the swamp, for the Union railroad system; and the great Union depot stands not far from where Zion church stood in 1834. I found this church, with a much enlarged and improved meeting-house, eight or nine square miles away, near Court street and Central avenue. And there is the school—not in the basement, but in a neat three-story brick building of its own! But Cincinnati has made another advance, in spite of American race prejudice; for by an order of the school board, made two years ago, the children are admitted to the schools of the wards in which they reside, without respect to nationality or color.

So far as race prejudice goes, Cincinnati might occupy a place on the soil of Old England; or, within the bounds of the German Empire.

S. F. PORTER.

TO THE FRIENDS OF REFORM IN WISCONSIN.

MENOMONIE, Wis., Dec. 19, 1891.

DEAR BROTHERS:—This is to say that I heartily appreciate the honor conferred on me at our late convention, in appointing me to the State agency. Circumstances seem to be against my leaving home to engage in the work at present. But I wish to assure all concerned that we intend to keep the reform flag unfurled, and have reason to know that our efforts are not in vain in the Lord.

May the Lord provide some good man, strong in mind and vigorous in body, to take hold of this work. I trust to hold myself in readiness, if the way shall be plainly open for me to go. To this end may I have your prayers. W. W. AMES.

THE WASHINGTON AGENT IN NEW ENGLAND.

BOSTON, Dec. 17, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The following appeared in the Brocton Enterprise, regarding one of the defunct "get-rich-fast" secret societies: "The officers of the Golden Lion got pretty fair pay for the work of looking after certificate holders. The president got $8,000 a year, six other officers got $7,500 each, and the secretary got $10,000. The members got assessed."

A gentleman of wealth in this city told me that he had never been called upon to assist poor people as this year. Many of his tenants had put money into these bottomless bags, hoping thereby to realize great profits; and now that the lodges had collapsed, they were unable to meet their obligations.

Elder Wm. A. Burch, pastor of the Advent church, New Bedford, Mass., according to the Morning News, preached a sermon at the funeral ing; but I am glad to report he is recovering.

It seemed as if half of the people's names were Johnson, Nelson, Anderson or some "son". On inquiring the reason, I was told they had the custom in Sweden of calling the father by the first name. The boy was designated by the word "son" being added to the first name of the father. For instance, the child of John Andrews, would be called Jobns-son, or Johnson. It was thought this custom was not followed much now.

The election just held here shows a great advance on the temperance question. Four cities near Boston that were license last year, have voted "No license" this. In Boston the liquor men carried by only a little over 4,000 majority. Last year they had over 15,000 majority. Mayor Mathews was re-elected on the Democratic ticket, with a large plurality.

I go to Lynn, where I am advertised to speak this evening. Owing somewhat, doubtless, to the fact that the holidays are at hand, collections have been light of late. Mine have not met necessary expenses. Depression in work and trade in localities where I have been has probably affected the contribution-box.

Let us remember, friends, while securing presents for loved ones, that God requires us to use all we have for his glory. Gospel truth is needed in all directions in these perilous times. Shall we not do what we can to send it to those who need?

W. B. STODDARD.

WORLD'S FAIR ADMINISTRATION BUILDING.

of a deceased G. A. R. man, in which he used the following language: "He came from the war a victim of intemperance, which was only fought off with ill-success." He declared rum the curse of the G. A. R. and the rising generation. Today, he said, he took the opportunity to talk, because seldom G. A. R. men attended church, and he thought they, of all others, needed temperance talk. We would like to shake hands with this pastor.

A prominent Odd-fellow, who, while dancing at their annual ball, here, fell dead, was buried with great display, and consigned to their "grand lodge."

I was introduced to a gray-haired deacon of one of the churches in Brocton. On learning my mission, he said he was a member of the Knights of Pythias and had never seen anything wrong in that lodge. I asked if they did not have dances. He replied that they did. May God pity the aged deacon who cannot see anything wrong in an organization which has promiscuous midnight dances! Were I a member of his church I could not do my duty without bringing him forward as a subject for discipline, should he not repent and forsake his folly.

I have spoken four times to fair-sized audiences, since last writing. At North Easton I was entertained by Rev. Mr. Johnson, pastor of the church in which I spoke. Bro. Johnson, with six others, will read the Cynosure there hereafter.

Rev. Mr. Holmblad, pastor of the Swedish Congregational church, at Quincy, gave his pulpit into my care on Sabbath, while he assisted Rev. Nelson Campello. Much kindness was shown your agent. I shall hope, before returning home, to comply with the request of these friends for another lecture. Twenty copies of the Cynosure will go to new subscribers in Quincy. This town has the honor of being the only one that has furnished two presidents for the United States. A small army of men are employed in quarrying granite, which is shipped to all parts of the world for monumental and other purposes.

My second visit for work to Campello was pleasant, but brief. I spoke to two hundred or more, who gathered in the Lutheran church there last evening. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Norlin, reads our paper with pleasure. He has been quite sick, and was unable to attend the service last even-

Argentine (S. A.) is a hopelessly bankrupt republic. With a population of about 5,000,000, it has a national debt of $480,000,000; a provincial debt of $142,000,000; a currency debt of $60,000,000; a railroad debt of $80,000,000; and a kind of "sub-treasury" scheme debt of about $100,000,000—a per capita of about $172 for each man, woman and child. The Europeans who carry the bulk of this indebtedness may as well "charge it up" to profit and loss.

CORRESPONDENCE

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE EDUCATION.

CHICAGO, December 20, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The Catholic Review prints nearly two columns of "Catholic Objections to the Present Free-School System"—a reiteration of arguments that have grown stale by their repetition, and freighted with fallacy. It claims that the free-school law "imposes a tax on ten millions of Catholics who derive no benefit from the schools." The trouble with this statement is that it is true only when Catholics refuse to send their children to these schools. The children of the other thirty or forty millions of Americans, if studious and law-abiding, come through the public schools with an education fitting them for the highest offices in their respective States and for honorable positions in the best business houses of the country.

If the Catholics refuse to send their children to the free schools, where they are as carefully educated as other children, it is no reason why they should not pay the ordinary school-tax as readily as do other property owners who are not above giving their off-spring a common-school education. The grades of learning in these schools are acknowledged to be higher, more practical, and of more real utility than those of sectarian parochial schools, in which the religious training is often detrimental to the present and future welfare of the pupils. Better by far to make the common school strictly a place for secular education, only, and leave the religious teaching to the parents, the church and the Sunday-school.

That the majority of the people should rule in educational as in other institutions in the United States, is strictly constitutional, and the Catholics are not yet in the majority—thank God! When they are, it will be time for the rest of us to emigrate. Give us the free schools, open to all classes and denominations, where the language taught and commonly used is English, where dogmatic theology shall never be introduced, where emulation in study shall be encouraged, and where every child shall have the fullest opportunity for developing his capacity for learning. Give them competent teachers, free from affiliations with iron-clad creeds and secret oaths, who shall make the advancement of their pupils always their first care, and have a parent's interest in the social as well as the educational success of those whom they teach. In this way they can make the parochial school unnecessary, by exposing its incompetency when brought into competition with free, public education nurtured by States, cities and villages, instead of sectarian churches. Yours for the truth,

C. BELTON.

THE CHURCH IN A LODGE-RIDDEN STATE.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Dec. 10, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I well recollect the political times of Masonry and Anti-masonry in Western New York, having been raised and educated in the town of Starkey, Yates county, thirty or forty miles from Canandaigua, where Capt. Wm. Morgan was lodged in jail, and from which he was kidnapped. In my boyhood's days I heard my father and Uncle Philo Millard (now living at Woodhull, N. Y.) tell the story of the Morgan affair and comment on it. Not only politics was divided on Masonry, but churches were greatly excited over the matter. Many of the Baptist associations of New York State passed resolutions condemning Masonry, and at the same time withdrew fellowship from adhering Masons, which resulted in the churches being rid of them; but I was told, a year ago, while on a visit there, that those resolutions had been repealed years since, or had become dead-letters, to make way for temperance secret orders; and thus Masonry is as well or better represented now by the Baptists in that section as it was in Morgan times.

If ever there was a reformation needed among the churches it is now; the line between the church and world is nearly obliterated, so that were it not for the church roll, one would not know who were the members. I know no church in this lodge-ridden city that will dare attack the secret lodge or its devotees. I am doing all I can, by distributing anti-secret tracts and literature, and denouncing Masonry, as opportunity offers. I have written several articles that have appeared in the Baptist Gleaner, of Fulton, Ky., and I am certain of the fact that some good has been accomplished, and I trust more will be. I sent away ten copies of the Cynosure of Nov. 21 to friends—one of them to a violent Mason, who returned it to me, possibly without reading it, but I think not.

I hope the college agent will visit this State, while he is making the round. God bless those noble warriors who have buckled on the whole armor of his truth, and are making such an able defense against Satan's secret kingdom. Much love for them, and the Cynosure, whose weekly visits are looked for anxiously as the weeks go swiftly by. Yours for the defense of truth,
A. J. MILLARD.

AGITATION OF ANTI-SECRECY AND SABBATH DESECRATION.

CHESLEY, Ont., December 16, 1891.

We were somewhat disappointed in the December meeting of the Presbyterian Council. We had expected to hear the secret society question thoroughly and warmly discussed, but the interest was not so great as at the former meeting. At the very beginning, the discussion was turned to the insurance features of the fraternal organizations, and scarcely any other feature was more than touched, until Dr. Parsons took the floor to make the closing speech. He pointed out that it was not the insurance features, but the secrecy obligations to which he objected; that Christians were not true to their vows at the communion table, when they gave their time and money and interest to secret organizations which they pledged themselves to give to the church. If societies were doing good work, and, as some claimed, are auxiliaries to the church, why not do the work openly and banish all secrecy? The oath of secrecy was liable to corruption, and the methods of these organizations did not tend to promote Christian life. He had been sorry to see ministers openly approving of secret societies, for, by his oath taken in the sacramental cup, the Christian devoted himself and all he has to Christ and his church upon earth. He did not know of any minister who was a member of any secret society who would not have been a more useful, efficient minister of Christ if it were not for his connection with such a society. He urged that all Christians should be faithful to Christ, and refuse to enter into obligations hurtful to their Christian life and influence.

Although the doctor's paper read in November was not so powerful a bomb as many of our anti-secret lecturers would have thrown, it has nevertheless caused no small stir in the camp. In fact, all Canada has felt the shock. Correspondents deluged the papers with letters; the society papers flew to arms in defence of their respective orders, and many pulpits discussed the question pro and con. As truth has nothing to lose, but everything to gain, the outcome can only be beneficial. It seems to have strengthened Dr. Parsons himself, since he now takes a bolder, more advanced stand than at the first. Though he may not be able yet to go as far as some of us, he has truly joined our ranks, and we hope he has "enlisted for the war."

The city of Toronto is now face to face with the Sunday street-car question. Hitherto the cars have not been allowed to run on the Sabbath. Last winter, as a sort of concession to those demanding a Sunday car-service, the city council passed a resolution that if at any time a petition signed by 5,000 rate-payers should be submitted to the council, asking that the question of Sunday street-cars be submitted to a vote of the people, the question should be submitted in due course. Recently such a petition has been put in circulation, and as it has already been signed by 7,000, in all likelihood the people will vote upon the question on the fourth of January. In the meantime, the whole city is in a ferment. Not only is the question vigorously discussed in the pulpit, in ministerial associations—everywhere, but an organized effort is being made to prevent its submission to the people at all. Even should it come to a popular vote, there is no doubt but that the Queen City of Canada will for years to come retain the honor of being the best Sabbath-keeping city in the world. S. H. McNEEL.

HOW TO USE THE CYNOSURE.

LAMARTINE, Clarion Co., Pa., Dec. 7, '91.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I have been thinking for some time back that we, the subscribers of the Cynosure, could advance the anti-secret cause by sending our paper to some good and reliable friend of the cause as soon as we have read it, as it only costs one cent to do so, and by so doing we may add many subscribers to the paper. By so doing you may save hard feeling, as we well know. Nineteen out of twenty times you will, as it were, stir up a hornet's nest, as they have sworn so many horrible oaths, and many feel horribly bad and guilty; so the less you talk with them on the subject the better they will like you.

Now what plan to send the Cynosure, after we have read it, can we adopt to get it to the most intelligent class of Christian people? My plan is, Take the minutes of your church that you belong to, let it be Methodist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, German Reformed, Baptist, or such other Christian denominations as you know, when they have their annual synods, classes, conferences, or presbyteries. All the above denominations send a delegate to represent their people; and you know that we always try and send our most intelligent, deep thinking, and reliable men with our pastors. Now be sure to send your Cynosure to one of the above delegates, and especially to those that you know have taken sides on the right side—men that are not afraid to talk, and men that have the Spirit of God within them; so you will know that you will get anti-secret in the right men.

I have been practicing the above plan for some time back. Farther, not to involve your preacher, have it understood with your nearest or some far-off preacher to inform you if he has any lodge men in his congregation. Let him write to you, and you can drop your Cynosure in that member's hands by mail. That will save your pastor from having any trouble with that kind of self-professed Christians. I just now sent a Cynosure on that kind of an errand.

If the above plan is worth anything to our Christian cause, you are at liberty to publish it. If you have a good neighbor that you know to be a Mason or Odd-fellow, who pins his religion on lodgeism, just send the publisher a few dimes for sample copies of the Cynosure; or if you send a paper, as above mentioned, always mark those pieces you intend for him, so he may not overlook the part intended. May the Lord be with us all, and direct our minds, our thoughts, and hearts.

PHILIP KRIBS.

LITERATURE.

Scribner's Magazine for January, commencing its eleventh semi-annual volume, is decidedly a work of interest, either for the casual reader, or for preservation in the library. The leading American contribution is that relating to some unpublished correspondence of Washington Allston, the favorite painter of the past generation, illustrated with a full-page portrait and reproductions of the artist's drawings. The first installment of a series of papers, by Wm. F. Apthorp, introduces the reader, with the graphic aid of pen and pencil, to two charming public resorts of the Parisians—the Comedie-Francaise and the Odeon. Frederick Smyth, Recorder of the City of New York, treats thoughtfully the modern relations of crime and the law, a paper that should engage the attention of statesmen, the judiciary, and philanthropists. E. H. and E. W. Blasfield contribute a day's experiences with Egyptian donkey-boys—a pleasant description of adventures in Northern Africa, finely illustrated. Of a similar class is Bokhara Revisited, also illustrated, by Henry Lansdell, D.D., an interesting reflex of life and scenery in Tartary. Bayreuth Revisited, by H. E. Krebbel, is another entertaining sketch of foreign travel. A striking article, touching American illustration of to-day, the first of a series, with illustrations of work by native artists, will attract attention. The Wrecker, by Robert Louis Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne, with a full-page illustration, is continued. Other papers and authors are as follows: A Song, by Duncan C. Scott; A Ballade of Dawn, by Hugh McCulloch, Jr.; At Noon, by G. Santayana; Armistice, by Ellen Burroughs; The Lamp in the Pool, by Graham R. Tomson; The Dean of Bourges, by Barrett Wendell; The Doctor's Relatives, by Karl Erickson; and editorials. Published by Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York City. Price, 25 cents.

The January issue of the Missionary Review of the World is strong in all its departments as the exponent of Christian work in foreign lands. Rev. A. T. Pierson, the editor, now supplying Spurgeon's pulpit in London, finds time to contribute a new installment of "The Miracles of Missions," and a characteristic letter from his new field of labor. "Christian Missions and the Highest Use of Wealth" form the subject of a thoughtful study by Merrill Edward Gates, LL.D. Rev. Robert W. McAll, D.D., contributes an interesting account of "The Gospel Afloat," in boats on rivers, etc., with a map and illustrations. Rev. Geo. W. Northrup, D.D., LL. D., points out some "Hindrances to the Work of Foreign Missions." Rev. John Rutherford reviews "Apostolic Missions and their Results." Geo. Smith, LL. D., sketches, with a fine portrait, the career of Narayan Sheshadri, D.D., the Brahman Apostle of the Out-Caste Mangs, and Rev. C. C. Starbuck serves up a number of "Extracts and Translations from Foreign Periodicals," which cannot fail to find interested readers. The most readable article in the International Department is Rev. J. T. Gracey's sketch of the "Chinese Blue Books," showing the systematic and underhanded methods of warfare used against the Christian missions. Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D.D., treats of "Harmony and Proportion in Missions." Editorial notes on current topics and miscellaneous missionary news and comment also aid in making up an excellent and general repertory of useful facts and figures. Funk & Wagnalls, New York.

The December number of Vick's Magazine, illustrated and in its new dress, is very attractive. Besides the usual timely suggestions for florists and horticulturists, considerable space, embellished with suitable engravings, is given to matters pertaining to the coming Columbian Exposition. "Woman's Work in the World's Fair" presents portraits of Mrs. Potter Palmer and Mrs. Mary E. Trautman. There are also views in Washington Park, Chicago—"The Sun-Dial" and a charming flower scene in the same beautiful resort. The frontispiece is a "Brilliant" poppy—a magnificent specimen—and other floral illustrations; a few Christmas articles, illustrated, and much else of interest. Published at Rochester, N. Y.; 50 cents per annum.

The December issue of the American Garden, in its new dress and improved circumstances, appeals to the good taste and careful perusal of its readers by its artistic and professional characteristics. OBITUARY.

Elizabeth Stillson Langley, mother of Mrs. S. C. Kimball, was born in New Market, N. H., February 2, 1810, and died in the same town November 4, 1891.

A mother in Israel has gone home, leaving to her descendants the most precious of legacies,—the memory of a saintly life prolonged beyond the ordinary limits, and devoted to God's service from the first dawn of her early womanhood. She was 17 at the time of her conversion, having a remarkably clear and definite religious experience. As she was naturally of a doubting, fearing turn of mind, she always looked upon this as a special manifestation of God's mercy. The doctrine of the atonement was very dear to her, and a favorite expression of hers in vocal prayer, when asking for particular blessings, was:—"Not for any worth or worthiness of our own, but for Jesus' sake." In these days of departure from the faith, it is well to note how unwaveringly she stood by this central truth of the Gospel. She became a member of the Free Baptist church in New Market at its organization, and continued a member till her death. She had the spirit of self-sacrifice in a marked degree, giving $10 to the church when all she had in the world did not amount to $50, and being thereby greatly blessed. In company with another young woman, she found lamps and oil for the church, and even did the sexton's work. These self-denying efforts bore fruit. Souls were saved, and the present F. B. church at New Market was formed. In private, personal work for the unsaved, which she felt as a burden laid upon her soul, she was unremitting. In later years, when the infirmities of age had diminished her activity, she regretted that she had not more frequently borne public testimony, but rejoiced that she attended religious meetings when she could. She was "given to hospitality," and at quarterly meetings, and all similar occasions, her table was always surrounded with welcome guests. She was a warm friend of the anti-secret cause, and as her home was with her daughter, the wife of Elder S. C. Kimball, her heartfelt welcome of the many reform workers who have been entertained under their roof will be remembered as long as life shall last by at least one of the number, who loved her and had the high honor of being beloved by her:—the writer of this humble tribute to her memory. Her religious experience continued bright to her dying day, when she testified by signs to her daughter—being unable to speak—that "Jesus was with her."

How earnestly she strove

they know best who were nearest to her. Tenderly our sympathy goes out to the home which has been bereft of her presence, only that the Home above may seem to their human hearts more homelike since she has passed before to wait their coming. E. E. FLAGG.

ARE SECRET SOCIETIES ANTI-CHRISTIAN?

The Baptist ministers of Boston are just now wrought up over the question which heads this article. The order of Masonry was the body immediately attacked, but the general proposition laid down by a majority of the clergy was that all secret societies are essentially opposed to Christianity. This is no new thing. It comes around about so often, and amounts to nothing except to show the clergy to be capable of jealousy, like ordinary laymen.

It is true that the secret society does not lay claim to be a Christian body, but it is as essentially Christian in its teachings as many a Christian church, and, in its way, perhaps does nearly as much toward the amelioration of the condition of the human race.

But this is not the question. We are ready to admit that the church is a powerful auxiliary for good,—the most powerful, if you will; but it does not therefore follow that there may not be other instrumentalities. There are thousands of men whom the church could never reach, but who are elevated morally as well as intellectually by the lodge, and there are ways for aiding our fellow man which the lodge alone can supply, which certainly the church never has been able to provide.

But we do not care to enter at length upon a matter which is or should be self-evident to every one. The church has enough to do if it is faithful to its individual trust. It hasn't the time to waste finding fault with an entirely different organization if it hopes to do its own work thoroughly. The ministry does not raise itself in public opinion by this bitter spirit of jealousy that crops out every now and then, and every time it attacks the secret society the secret society is getting an advertisement which brings in new members.

The motto "Live and let live," is one which these Baptist ministers may well take to heart; but the secret society will live whether they say yea or nay.—Knights of Honor Reporter.

The chief officer of the Knights of Honor is, we believe, a "Supreme Dictator." At least we find in the copy of the Reporter from which we quote mention of such an officer. We also see the titles "Grand Dictator" and "Past Dictator." The report of benefactions declares that over $34,000,000 have been paid to beneficiaries, but no mention is made of the aggregate sum which members have paid to secure this amount. Of course, mutual insurance is all right. Equally, of course, no honest mutual insurance company needs to be secret; and equally, of course, no mutual insurance society needs "dictators," "grand dictators," or "supreme dictators."

We wish, in this connection, however, to say that the business of the church is to declare the law of God as applied to the ways of men. If it were a mutual admiration society, it might dodge the adverse criticism which results from the performance of duty. As it is, these lodges, with their lordly titles, their ribbons, and badges, and buttons, their interference with courts, and their mockery of God, are enemies of Christ, the church, and the souls of men. The church has in silence looked on too long. It has seen its young men bribed away from the prayer circle and the communion, and made no effective protest. We hope that this guilty silence is ending.

THE CONSCIENCE-SEARING LODGE.

The condition of thousands in our secret lodges is very exactly described by Prof. Austin Phelps, in his excellent little book on prayer, "The Still Hour." He writes:

"Even a doubtful principle of life, harbored in the heart, is perilous to the peacefulness of devotion. May not many of us find the cause of our joylessness in prayer in the fact that we are living upon some unsettled principles of conduct? We are assuming the rectitude of courses of life with which we are not ourselves honestly satisfied. I apprehend that there is very much of suspense of conscience among Christians upon subjects of practical life, on which there is no suspense of action. Is there not a pretty large cloud-land covered by the usages of Christian society? And may not some of us find there the sin which infects our devotions with nauseous incense?"

No man joins a secret society with the full approval of his conscience. Whether he be pagan or Christian, there are always some principles of action which he must put in the bag behind his back, when he puts the supposed advantages of such a society into the bag before him. God has put bars before every lodge door. He who gets in must clamber over them. They are such as these:

1. Individual freedom. The lodge oath puts a cord around a neck that has been free, and every member of the order has hold of the other end. No wonder William H. Seward could say with such tremendous emphasis, in his speech in the United States Senate, that he would pray God to paralyze hand and knee before that hand should be placed between the hands of other men, or that knee be bent before them in a secret lodge.

2. A candid, open, ingenuous nature. The powerful German tribe which gained mastery over Gaul at the breaking up of the Roman Empire were distinguished for their independence, scorn of a lie, love of freedom and of a noble spirit. They gave themselves and their country the proud name "Frank," the free. The Saracen hordes that soon swept over southeastern Europe met and feared them, and learned to call all Europeans by their name, and do so to this day. The man who swears or pledges himself into a secret lodge wrongs that frank-hearted, undisguised nobility of character which God has given and all men admire.

3. Family ties. The lodge, so far as it can, puts aside the caresses of wife and children, and puts a pledge to strangers in their place. The man who joins it sins against the dearest and holiest human relations. He gives to those who have no right to it that confidence which belongs to his family.

4. Civil ties. The magistrate is the minister of God (Rom. 13: 4, 6). No man can be guiltless and interpose another oath and another allegiance between his conscience and his duty to the state as an upright citizen.

5. The example of Christ. "In secret have I said nothing."

6. The Word of God. The whole teaching of Scripture is against the secret society system. That word is light (John 1: 4, 9 and often). There is no darkness, or hiding, or concealment about it.

These principles are of wide, and some of them of universal, application to the race. No man can violate them and be honest with himself and God. He who joins a secret order harbors those principles of disingenuousness and complicity with wicked and unworthy men which are more than doubtful. He has a parley with the devil before he accepts them. While living in such relations, his conscience in suspense while his doubtful acts continue, no man can walk in true fellowship with God in Christ. He is grieving the Spirit of God. He must expect his prayers to be hindered. If he continues in this state of uncertainty, he should fear lest the light that is in him become darkness, and he be condemned as a backslider.

SECRET LODGES AND THE SALVATION ARMY.

Both of these institutions lay claim to the promotion of practical philanthropy. Let us briefly examine their respective pretensions in the direction of benevolence.

Secret societies rest their claim to public approval on their professed beneficence. They arraign the church for its neglect of the temporal wants of men, and parade their vast memberships, wealth and so-called charities as proofs that they are needful, if not essential, to human well-being. They, however, always keep in the background the fact that all persons are excluded from their membership who are in any sense the objects of benevolence—those on whom aid is bestowed. To these it is simply given that as much may be received in return, and only a small proportion of the funds paid in is disbursed for the relief of the suffering.

Not so with the Salvation Army. Its primary object is to rescue the perishing. It seeks out the poorest, the lowest, the weakest, and most miserable of mankind, and it does so without money and without price. It regards, primarily, the souls of men as of more importance than their bodies, but it does, by no means, neglect the latter.

One of the grandest works of philanthropy, in modern times, is that undertaken by Mr. Booth and his associates in his work of rescuing "England's submerged tenth." That a home should have been provided in the heart of London for the vast hordes of the indigent, and that a large tract of land in the vicinity should have been purchased, buildings erected, and provision made for the employment and comfortable maintenance of all who are willing to accept the rewards of industry, is most wonderful. Indeed, the whole scheme, as outlined in "Darkest England, and the Way Out," including the plan of colonization, seems in a fair way to be accomplished. The first annual report of his work has just been issued. The expenditures have amounted to about $500,000, $170,000 going to the farm colony, and $140,000 to the food depots and shelters. The receipts from these institutions have been $130,000. The match factory, set up as an escape from the "sweating shops," has more than paid expenses. There were 2,500,000 meals and 347,209 nights' lodgings supplied to the homeless. Slum work cost $13,557.81, less $2,753.10 donated by sympathetic "slummers." The workshops show a deficit of £1,140, in spite of the fact that some of the branches show a profit. The report says that the results have been abundantly satisfactory, and that never before was so much poverty relieved with so small an outlay. The most wonderful thing is, that so much has been done in so short a time and amidst such abounding obstacles.

The absolute falsity of all the schemes of philanthropy that are based on selfishness is seen by the contrast. The secret lodge system has not a single element of that moral grandeur that marks this department of Christian enterprise.

FREEMASONRY AT EVANSTON.

For a town that claims so much for its religious influence, sobriety and intelligence, Evanston, Ill., is perhaps as badly lodge-ridden as many other places of less pretension and greater population. The Evanston Press of December 19, a weekly newspaper of twenty columns, devotes three of them to "fraternal" or secret society news, under appropriate heads, and furnishes some very peculiar information, which may interest Cynosure readers.

First, we have a call for a stated conclave of "Evanston Commandery, No. 58 K. T.," at which "a full attendance is courteously urged by Eminent Commander Iott," which invitation was no doubt quite as courteously accepted by the "Sir" Knights.

"Evanston Chapter No. 144 R. A. M."—initials that always have a weird appearance, and a suggestive sound when pronounced all together—offers some facts and figures concerning itself that possess considerable significance. They are found in the address of "Most Excellent High Priest A. N. Gage" at the annual conclave of the Chapter. When he announces the health of the membership during the year he does it in these knightly terms: "It has pleased the Supreme Most Excellent Grand High Priest to take none of our members from us by death, so far as we have received any information, and the golden blessing of health has been bestowed upon most of our companions by His infinite goodness." Some of our readers may not be aware that this caputular "Supreme Most Excellent Grand High Priest" of the Chapter is the "Great Architect of the Universe" mentioned in Blue Lodge rituals.

The work of the Chapter, as detailed by M. E. H. P. A. N. Gage, is hardly as satisfactory as it might have been had the members been more active and zealous. At least, so it seems to a plain citizen outside of the order. "The volume of work," he says, "has been exceedingly small, six candidates having been exalted. There are only four years in our history when the work has been lighter, i. e., in 1877, 1879, 1881 and 1882, while in the year immediately preceding this, upwards of thirty Masons received the Royal Arch degree." Is the work of the N. C. A., this year, to be charged with this remarkable declension in the Chapter? And heads: "There have been five companions elected to membership and four have taken dimits." That is, the Chapter has gained one member in the whole twelve months. It is very sad.

"The character of the work," he also says, "has been in harmony with the sublime principles it portrays; frivolity, rudeness or indignities have not marred the beauties of the degrees." In other words, the "rough and rugged road" of the Royal Arch has been made smooth, and nobody has tumbled down cellar while skirmishing around, at the end of a rope, in search of the mysterious chest they call the "ark." It is a mercy.

The attendance at the Chapter during the year has been contemptibly slim: "Twenty-two convocations, with an average attendance of only about 18½ members—ranging between 35 and 11 at a sitting. Tell it not in Gath!

The M. E. H. P. further says: "The finances of the Chapter are in good condition," but the receipts and expenditures show a loss during the year. They had on hand, at the beginning of the year, $1,319.01. The total receipts were $606.50; the aggregate expenditures and liabilities, same time, were $696.12, which reduces last year's balance on hand to $1,229.39. The showing is not encouraging.

In all these expenditures, there does not appear to have been one solitary cent charged up to charity.

During the year the officers of the Chapter visited neighboring chapters to the number of six.

On the whole, it was not a very good year for "exalting" Royal Arch Masons.

Evanston also glories in "Northwestern Council No. 3 Royal League," with "Archons" and "Vice Archons," and "an active corps" of other officers, who are hustling this winter to make it "the banner council of Evanston."

Finally, Evanston has two Blue Lodges of F. and A. M.—"Evans" and "A. O. Fay," which seem to be doing as well as could be expected in a town so given up to lodge worship—and a Methodist university town at that.

MASONRY AND THE ANCIENT MYSTERIES.

"Mystery" was written (Rev. 17: 5) on the forehead of the scarlet woman, and it is written over the door of every Masonic lodge in the world. It is a part and parcel of the stock in trade of both diabolical institutions.

Edmond Ronayne, an intelligent high Mason, informs us that the mysteries of Freemasonry, especially those evolved in the "sublime" degree of Master Mason, are identical with those of ancient Egypt—the story of Osiris and Isis; and he has proved his position beyond a peradventure in his "Master's Carpet," making it so plain that any intelligent reader must immediately confess the close connection of the order with the ancient traditions.

Now comes A. T. C. Pierson, another Past Grand Master, Past Grand High Priest, etc., etc., and a 33-degree Mason to boot, who says, in substance, that the ancient mysteries were imitations of Masonry! Of course he cannot prove it; and in this respect Bro. Ronayne has rather the advantage, and probably all the truth, on his side. That is, on the modern side; for the ancient mysteries are now extinct, except as they are retained in the Master's lodge.

Among these ancient mysteries perpetuated in Masonic work, is that significant symbol, "the point within a circle," the emblem of the obscene Phallic worship, which is fully described in "Mackey's Lexicon of Freemasonry" and in Ronayne's "Master's Carpet." The lodge representation is a smooth, upright, circular pillar, having a single strip of moulding encircling it, near the base. Its signification will be found in either of the above Masonic authorities, and should be read in connection with the legend of Osiris and Isis.

All these mysteries are abominations in the sight of God and opposed to Christ and his kingdom. Christians who affiliate with them are only his "professors," but not his true followers.

—Manufacturing houses at Dixon, Ill., positively refuse to hire workmen who are connected with the Knights of Labor. They are tired of the officious meddling of the lodge in their business.

—Can a Christian church harbor secret lodge members? A friend replies with 1 Cor. 5: 13: "Put away from among yourselves that wicked person;" if that can't be done, he suggests the command in 2 Cor. 6: 14: "Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers," etc.; and either of these passages, both emanating from the best authority, require the separation of the church and lodge. See Rev. 18: 4, for the consequences of maintaining an unholy union of this kind. "A worldly-minded church," adds our friend, "will not prepare the hearts of our children for Christ. You put too many lumps of ice among hot coals, and the latter will not long melt the ice, but the ice will put out the fire." This comparison is very apt.

—The Cynosure workers, as they believe will also all the numerous friends of Rev. J. P. Stoddard and his family, unite in tendering their hearty congratulations upon the marriage of Miss Catherine L. Stoddard to Mr. Wilbur S. Orvis, of Ohio, which occurred at the home of the bride's parents, 218 Columbus Ave., Boston, Mass., on Tuesday evening, December 24, 1891. The happy couple will be "at home" at 232 West Second Ave., Columbus, Ohio, after January 15, 1892.

—The Swedish Lutherans are rejoicing in the final liquidation of the heavy debt of $75,000 which has hung about the necks of the managers of Bethany College, at Lindsborg, Kans., for a number of years like a mill stone. This brilliant success was achieved chiefly through the agency of the indomitable Swenson, pastor of the Lindsborg church, and recently elected president of the college. This money was raised by the Swedish people of Kansas, few, if any, subscriptions exceeding $50. Bethany College was founded in 1881, and is admitted to be one of the best in the Southwest, and is quite well patronized by the denomination. Rev. J. Telleen, the financial secretary, is in close touch with the principles of the N. C. A., which is a fair indication of the deserving character of the college.

—We learn that there is much complaint in the San Joaquin valley, California, this year, because of poor prices for their raisins, the principal fruit crop. From three to five cents a pound is eagerly taken, but even at so low a rate there is no market. And why? A friend writes that there is a cause for this in the greed and dishonorable dealing of many packers. Last year they sent off boxes marked "London Layers," but filled with poor trash. This year fifty car-loads of raisins, it is reported, have been rejected. Some faithful ministers are beginning to tell the people plainly that they do not read their Bibles enough. There they would learn, "Be sure your sin will find you out;" and "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye also to them likewise."

—Major E. T. Scott is one of the lecturers upon the list of the "Woman's Lecture Bureau," connected with the National W. C. T. U., and having an office in the same building on La Salle street in this city. He is from the East, and is a lecturer of considerable experience and ability. A California correspondent who lately heard him during his recent season on the Pacific Coast writes us that he began the first of a series of lectures with a misleading and commendatory notice of the temperance legislation, so-called, of the Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Labor and United Workmen, accompanied by a direct approval of one or two of these lodges. He spoke as if he were a member of some or all of these orders. Our correspondent believes, and we agree, that not only are these orders not promoting temperance, but if their whole work and influence is fairly reviewed, they will be found great allies of the saloons. Such a lecturer should not be attached to the W. C. T. U.

—It is currently reported that several human bodies, after immersion for some forty years in the waters of the pool of Echoshacht, near Hermannstadt, Germany, have been brought to the surface perfectly preserved from decay. This is a remarkable confirmation of the case of Captain Wm. Morgan's body. After some months' immersion, held by Masonic weights at the bottom of Niagara river, it was finally found in a good state of preservation at the mouth of Oak Orchard Creek, a little east of the point where the Niagara empties into Lake Ontario. How came it there? It was well enough known that Morgan was sunk in the Niagara near its mouth; his body was found where the currents would naturally carry it. It was known, too, that weights were attached to the body and would keep it at the bottom. Therefore the river was dragged by his friends, when these facts came to be known by them some months after September, 1826. The body was not found by the process, but nothing is more probable than that the dragging process released the body, and the currents bore it to Oak Orchard Creek. The weights and submersion explain the preserved state of the body; the dragging and the currents, the transfer to the place where it was found.

—Thanksgiving Day was sadly disgraced by the foot-ball contest between the students of Princeton and Yale colleges. Nearly 40,000 persons, "including many of the best society people" of New York, in which city the match was played, were present, as well as numerous students of those and other colleges, who were there as spectators, to encourage their favorites with college "yells" and other noisy demonstrations. At night "the same college students thronged the theatres, saloons and noted concert-halls. At the better class of theatres the performance had to stop until the noise of the students could be subdued. At the concert-halls, after the interchange of remarks between the students and the women upon the stage became too boisterous, the lights were turned out and the police called in. At the Hoffman house a general bar-room fight between the students was stopped by the intervention of some members of the foot-ball teams who were present. But here, too, the lights had to be turned out and the room cleared. The foot-ball match had ended in a great debauch." So runs the newspaper report, which adds: "A similar scene was enacted after the match between the same colleges last year." "Physical training," as practiced at our principal colleges, has been for years gradually promoting mental and moral deterioration in the students, and, consequently, in the character of the institutions where these lawless demonstrations are permitted. A few more such displays of brutal force and rowdiness will set Christian men and women to asking, "Where shall we educate our boys?" and the answer will not be favorable to those colleges which have a gambling record. With the lotteries, let such "halls of learning" find their proper level in public opinion.

—The daily press prints a dispatch stating that Mr. William Lloyd Garrison has published an open letter to the President and Faculty of Harvard College, in which he says: "The secret society known as the D. K. E. (Delta Kappa Epsilon) has long been a source of scandal and of private indignation. Aside from the witless penalties attending the initiation of members a cruelty has been superadded, akin to the barbarism of the Feejee Islanders or the practices of degraded Indian tribes. As a culmination of the ceremonies, and as an indication of pluck and endurance, the victim's arm is bared for branding. In the case which has just come under my observation six deep and savage burns, from the shoulder to the elbow, were inflicted with a lighted cigar. Life-long scars and disfigurement are bad enough, but the shock to the system, already reduced in vitality by previous physical exactions, is severe and dangerous. In comparison with a cigar, a branding iron would be merciful, but it seems necessary to add to the danger of the burn that of blood poisoning. Outside the precincts of the university such mutilation would call for the quick interference of the law, even though weak and foolish subjects yielded their consent, and it deserves to be an indictable offence. In common with other societies which flourish in your sight, a bar providing intoxicating liquors is here maintained, contrary to law and decent morals. Only last year many of our respected citizens had the mortification of seeing their sons arraigned in open court and fined for this offence. I ask with solicitude whether such proceedings are beyond your control? If you are powerless to protect the charges confided to your care in the respects just mentioned, there yet remains to parents the alternative of invoking the interposition of the courts. If you have the power or the influence to abate these evils the responsibility resting upon your shoulders is a heavy one. If you have not, with whom does the accountability lie?" Taken in connection with the Yale and Princeton debauch, above printed, the American college seems sadly in need of a revolution in its methods.

THE HOME.

AN INVALID'S SABBATH.

The following touching verses were written by an invalid lady, now dead, and printed in the New York Voice:

The blessed First-day of God's week is come;
A solemn hush pervades the earth and air;
Within the shady precincts of "my home"
I rest, this bright June day, so sweetly fair.

All nature now is peacefully at rest
Upon the bosom of this holy day;
The sun's bright rays with gold the foliage crest,—
Cloud shadows sweep o'er grass and new-mown hay—

A Sunday silence broke but by the cooing
Of timid doves perched on the eaves above;
Of rapturous merry songs of birds a-wooning,
In strains of happy, gay, melodious love.

A subtle languor holds me calm and still
Upon my couch within the darkened room,
While summer zephyrs fan me from the hill
And bear to listless sense a faint perfume.

Beyond the window's drapery of lace
The green and silver poplar leaves are stirred
By ling'ring breeze, whose breath leaves slighter trace
Of sudden hurried flight of startled bird.

The sonorous church bells ring their chimes in vain
To call me to the service of God's dwelling;
His will doth bind me to a bed of pain,
And in my chastened heart sad thoughts are swelling

Though barred from going to his sacred place,
With pomp of pictured glass and pillard stone,
His glorious works, shown in all Nature's face,
Proclaim our earth the pathway to his throne.

So here in awe and heart-felt adoration,
The prayer of humble faith and hope and love
Ascends like incense to the Mercy-station,
Where smiles our pitying Lord in courts above.

In him we seek our souls' serene repose
Amid the tumults of this earthly strife;
In him we find—long ere existence close—
The only way, the Truth, the real life.

O Father! teach me perfect resignation;
Give strength to bear the burden thou hast laid
In love, on one who ever would be patient,
And, 'mid life's fears, with thee, be not afraid!

SAY IT TO HIS FACE.

Sometimes it does people good to be brought face to face with persons whom they have slandered and abused. It is astonishing to see how soon under such circumstances their impudence evaporates. The author of "Studies in Russia" tells a story of a young poet in the time of Alexander II., the liberator of the serfs, and victim of the Nihilist assassins. This young man had written a most scurrilous poem, in which he had described and libeled not only the Empress, but all the grand dukes and duchesses. Some one, the censor of the press, went and told the Emperor.

"The man had better be sent off to Siberia at once," he said. "It is not a case for delay."

"Oh, no," said the Empress; "wait a little; but tell the man I want to see him at 6 o'clock to-morrow evening."

When the poor man was told this he felt as if his last hour had come, and that the Emperor must intend himself to pronounce a sentence of eternal exile. He went to the palace, and was shown through all the grand state rooms, one after another, without seeing any one, till at last he arrived at a small commonplace room at the end of them all, where there was a single table with a lamp upon it, and here he saw the Empress, the Emperor, and all the grand dukes and duchesses whom he had mentioned in his poem.

"How do you do, sir?" said the Emperor. "I hear you have written a most beautiful poem, and I have sent for you that you may read it aloud to us yourself; and I have invited all the grand dukes and duchesses to come, that they may have the pleasure of hearing you."

Then the poor man prostrated himself at the Emperor's feet.

"Send me to Siberia, sir," he said; "force me to become a soldier; only do not compel me to read that poem."

"Oh, sir, you are cruel to refuse me the pleasure, but you will not be so ungallant as to refuse the Empress the pleasure of hearing your verses, and she will ask you herself."

And the Empress asked him.

When he had finished she said, "I do not think he will write any more verses about us. He need not go to Siberia just yet."

We may be sure that one such lesson was enough to last this young man. It would be well if some other people were obliged to say what they have said in dark corners, face to face with the men whom they have slandered and maligned. But it is the art of the slanderer to set a house afire and then run away in the smoke, or, like cuttle fish, to blacken the water around him so that nobody can see where he is or what he is doing. A good hater may be respected, but deliver us from the men who betray with a kiss, and whose words are softer than oil while war is in their hearts.—The Common People.

"WANTED—A STRONG BOY."

So read a sign in a store window, as we passed by the other morning. At noon it was gone, presumably because the boy had come. The placard, however, had done more than accomplish its direct object. It set us to thinking. "Wanted—a strong boy;"—in how many places that legend might be truthfully displayed! The world wants boys that are strong, first of all, in body. A stomach fed chiefly on cake and peanuts, and a nervous system undermined by the deadly cigarette, make a poor basis for stout, fleet limbs and sturdy arms. Other things being equal, a merchant or lawyer wants a boy who can pull a strong oar, make his home-run on the ball-field, and keep his wind in a half-mile run. Other things being equal—what other things? Certain ones that are the real measures of strength, whether in boys or men. Has he grit? Can he stick to a thing? Is he quick to take in a situation, ready in an emergency, bright-witted, where others blunder? Is he equal to responsibility? Can he be left with a given task with the certainty that he can be literally left with it, and his employer find it fully done in due season, without a second of intervening anxiety or oversight? These are some of the elements of strength that make up the model "strong boy" who is so universally wanted to-day.

But is this all? We think not. If we were gauging the real power of a boy for such a position as has been described, we should wish to know something more than the size of his biceps and the tenacity of his grip on a given bit of work. We should want to know about the strength of his love for that father and mother who have sacrificed so much for his advancement. We should look for some indication of a tie binding him to the house of God as a regular, thoughtful attendant. We should inquire as to the connecting links in his life between his daily conduct and the Word of God. Has he come into an earnest, loyal relation to Jesus Christ, as his Saviour and Master? Is he "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might?"

Yes, there is a great demand for strong boys. Satan wants them, than he may rob them of their present and prospective vigor. Christ wants them, that through their youthful robustness the weak places in his army may be reinforced. The church of to-day, as well as commercial corporations, may well hang out the sign in unmistakable characters, and keep it displayed, "Wanted—strong boys!"—Golden Rule.

A TOUCHING INCIDENT.

There are often wells of thought and feeling in childhood, of whose depths parents little dream. We are so accustomed to think of our children's tastes, desires and will as being reflections of our own, that we too often forget to study their individuality, and treat them as sentient beings. With such reflections I listened to the relation of the following touching incident:

A little girl of this city, about ten years of age, was visiting her aunt in the country. They were discussing a certain book, and the aunt remarked: "Your birthday is near; perhaps your mamma will buy it for you for a birthday present."

A tinge of sadness rested on the sweet young face as she quickly answered:

"She could give me something else I would rather have, something I would rather have than anything else in the world!"

"Well, I'm sure," said her aunt, "your mamma will get it for you, if it does not cost too much."

"It will not cost money," replied the child; "it will not cost anything."

But she could not then be persuaded to tell what it was. After a long time the shrinking little spirit said:

"Auntie, I will tell you part; it is something she gave me before little brother came. It is just not to do something for that one day; now don't you know?"

That discerning aunt drew the little one to her and asked:

"Is it that mamma should not scold you on your birthday?"

A trembling "Yes," and long the dear head rested in silence on the bosom of that loving, patient aunt.

May the reading of this little story do other mothers good as the writing of it has done me good. That mother is a precious woman. I know she loves her little daughter as tenderly as I do mine. She just didn't think how each impatient word was wearing a sore in that sensitive little heart. She didn't think she was robbing her child's future of the sweet memories of a beautiful childhood. She didn't think how she was cramping the powers of a lonely spirit that needed a continual sunshine for their development. Mothers, pause and reflect!—Selected.

THE CHEERFUL VOICE.

The comfort and happiness of home and home intercourse depend very much on the kindly and affectionate training of the voice. Trouble and care come; but let them not creep into our voices. Let only our kindly and happier feelings be vocal in our homes. Let them be so, if for no other reason, for the little children's sake. These sensitive little beings are exceedingly susceptible to the tones. They hear so much that we have forgotten to hear; for as we advance in years, our lives become more interior. We are abstracted from outward scenes and sounds. We think, reflect; we begin gradually to deal with the past as we have formerly vividly lived in the present. Our ears grow dull to external sounds; they are turned inward, and listen chiefly to the echoes of the past voices.

We catch no more the merry laughter of children. We hear no more the note of the morning bird. The brook that used to prattle so gaily to us rushes by unheeded; we have forgotten to hear such things. But little children, remember, sensitively hear them all. Mark how, at every sound, the young child starts and listens! And thus, with equal sensitiveness, does it catch the tones of the human voice. How were it possible that the sharp and hasty word, the fretful and complaining tone, should now startle and pain, even depress the sensitive little being, whose harp of life is so newly and delicately strung, vibrating ever to the gentle breeze, and ever thrilling, sensitive to the tones of such voices as sweep across it? Let us, then, be kind and cheerful in our homes.—Exchange.

ONE SECRET OF GROWTH.

A New England church, organized three years ago, has never passed a communion without receiving additions to its membership, which has increased from fifty to nearly two hundred. The secret of this growth was made evident at a recent meeting of the standing committee. Five had been examined for admission to the church and were being considered. A deacon said of one: "When she joined my Sabbath-school class last winter she seemed unwilling to talk on personal religion. But her interest has been growing; our conversations have been frequent, and now she rejoices in her faith in Christ and in this opportunity to confess him before men."

Then another member of the committee spoke of two others, husband and wife: "Jimmy and I have worked together over a year now, and we have had many talks on religion. I am sure he is a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. I have been to his house and went over the covenant with him clause by clause, explaining each. I am sure he realizes the importance of the step he is taking." Then another deacon said of the other two: "They have been in my Sabbath-school class. I found they were members of another church, but could not receive letters of dismissal because they had not fulfilled certain obligations to their church. I have counseled with them; have seen their correspondence; know that they have made good what was lacking to that other church, and advise their hearty reception."

The church has grown steadily because its officers have been constant and faithful in their efforts to win others to Christ, and the church members having caught their spirit, have followed their example.

We are apt to think of the additions to a church as a test of a pastor's faithfulness and efficiency. They may be to some extent, but they also indicate the quality of the church membership. Pastors and evangelists often receive credit for the work done by other Christians, and also sometimes are blamed for the indifference and inaction of those about them. If all standing committees were like the one mentioned, the average additions to our churches would be nearer sixteen than six.—Congregationalist.

I. R. B. ARNOLD'S FLOATING CHAPEL.

Our readers, especially those who have contributed toward its construction, will be interested in the picture of I. R. B. Arnold's floating chapel, presented in this issue. It is thirty feet wide and one hundred and ten feet long. The Chapel Room is 30x80 feet; leaving 30 feet at one end which is divided into living rooms; two stories.

Bro. Arnold went down the Mississippi river three years ago through Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana with a small boat, furnished by the American Missionary Society, carrying a large tent. He landed at some points where the nearest church was twenty-five miles away. It was during this trip that he saw the necessity for some plan whereby the masses of people who never attend church might be reached with Gospel truth. It is said that twenty-five counties in Kentucky are without a church building. There are many places along our rivers equally destitute.

The floating chapel has many advantages over a tent. The room is always dry and warm. As soon as it is landed and the gang plank thrown out it is ready for use, without the labor of handling four tons of baggage.

From Vicksburg, Miss., at the close of his Southern tour, Bro. Arnold had his little boat with tent and fixtures towed 1,600 miles to Pittsburg, Pa., arriving in time to work a month in the amendment campaign in 1889.

He made known his need of a floating chapel for the river work, and $600, donated by friends, enabled him to let the contract. The balance, $1,400 more, he paid from his own funds. The chapel is out of debt and is in constant service. Hundreds of people are sometimes turned away unable to get in. Large audiences of all classes of people attend, and the work accomplished is very gratifying.

Mr. Arnold not only makes his work self-sustaining, but is now re-donating the $600 to the tract work among the Freedmen.

Tons of religious and temperance papers are distributed, reaching thousands of homes where religious literature would not otherwise go.

Those who have good literature to spare for the River Mission, may send in barrels or boxes, freight prepaid, to I. R. B. Arnold's Floating Chapel, Rockport, Ind.

ALWAYS TRUE.

This story of Rev. Lyman Beecher, father of Henry Ward Beecher, was told originally by his son. The elder Beecher had been preaching one Sunday at Litchfield, and as he got into the carriage to go home he remarked that he had never preached such a poor sermon before. "Why, father," said Henry, "I never heard you preach louder." "That's it," responded the old man: "when I have nothing to say I always holler."

ARITHMETIC AND DRESSES.

Teacher: "If your mother had twenty-five yards of stuff and made a dress requiring but eighteen, how much would she have left?"

Little Girl: "Mamma can't make her own dresses. She has tried often, and they are always either too—"

Teacher: "Suppose she sent it to a dressmaker, how much would the dressmaker send back?"

Little Girl: "Depends on which dressmaker she sends it to. Some wouldn't send back any."

Teacher (impatiently): "Suppose she sent it to an honest one?"

Little Girl: "Some of the honestest ones cut things to waste so that there is never any left, no matter how much you send 'em."—Good News.

The Rev. Sam Jones says: "I understand that by actual mathematics it has been shown that we (the Americans) send to the heathen countries 13,000 barrels of whisky to one missionary. The devil doesn't care how many missionaries you send, if you send that amount of whisky along with them."

Certain gin and brandy recently imported and now remaining in the custody of the Collector of Customs at Bangor, Me., are not to be sold there as unclaimed merchandise, but will be sold in some other State, as the Department does not desire to interfere with the State prohibitory law.

TEMPERANCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S DAUGHTER.

Out in the street, with naked feet,
I saw the drunkard's little daughter;
Her tattered shawl was thin and small;
She little knew, for no one taught her.

Heart-broken child, she seldom smiled;
Hope promised her no brighter morrow;
Or, if its light flashed on her night,
Then up came darker clouds of sorrow.

She softly said: "We have no bread;
No wood to keep the fire a-burning."
The child was ill; the winds were chill;
Her thin, cold blood to ice was turning.

But men well fed and warmly clad,
And ladies robed in richest fashion,
Passed on the side where no one cried
To them for pity or compassion.

That long night fled, and then the light
Of rosy day in beauty shining,
Set dome and spire and roof on fire;
And shone on one beyond repining.

Asleep—alone—as cold as stone,
Where no dear parent ever sought her,
In winding-sheet of snow and sleet,
Was found the drunkard's lifeless daughter.

HIGH LICENSE.

That the liquor men are wonderfully worked up to-day as to what the outcome of all the prohibition agitation will be, needs scarcely one iota of proof.

As the brewer, distiller, and saloon-keeper stand entrenched behind millions of money and 3,000,000 voters, they audaciously tell us that high license is the grand temperance measure, and the only successful way of dealing with alcoholic abuses.

It is a well-known fact that high license as advocated is simply a conciliatory measure. It seeks to quiet the uprising sentiment in favor of legal enactments for the complete annihilation of the rum traffic, and at the same time court the liquor men and protect them in their attempt to establish permanently the infernal business of drunkard making.

Peter Iler, of Nebraska, one of the leading distillers in the rum fraternity, has emphatically declared that "high license has not hurt our business, but on the contrary has been a great benefit to it. It acts as a bar to prohibition." Here we score the testimony of one who knows.

And still we have hundreds of thousands of good (high-license) temperance and prohibition voters who pray, sing, and speak for legal prohibition all the year round, and when they come to vote they are too blind to know or even obey the divine injunction, "He that doeth righteousness (right) is righteous."

The liquorites are to-day upholding this measure of high license simply because it is the only thing they can stand upon. The deceptive measure is endorsed by liquor venders and rumsellers everywhere. Glaring (mis)statements are made to decoy honest prohibitionists.

Statistics prove beyond question that high license is by no means a diminisher of consumed liquors.

The law has been tried in the United States and as a good temperance measure has proven to be the biggest failure imaginable. In the city of Reading, Pa., the high license law figures are as follows:

Year	Total arrests.	No. of arrests for drunkenness.
1883 Low license	1,141	257
1886 " "	1,194	575
1888 High " "	1,346	355

The St. Louis Times speaks of the high license of that city:

"High license is a ridiculous failure in every respect, that it has increased the revenue of the city from dram-drinking and drunkenness. It has not decreased the number of dram-shops, it has not improved the character of the saloonist, it has not made the business more respectable, it has not decreased intemperance."

The Chicago Daily News says, "We have had high license in Illinois for five years, and, while it is a success as a revenue measure, it is an undisguised failure as a temperance measure. It in no way checks the consumption of liquors as a beverage, nor does it in the least degree lessen the evils and crimes from such use."

The Central N. Y. Times remarked that "high license has been tried here for years, and has proved an absolute failure so far as reducing the traffic in intoxicants and preventing the spread of intemperance and its consequent misery are concerned."

We might continue to cite figures all over the country proving that high license is a farce and catch-penny device to silence the great wave of temperance and prohibition sentiment that is sweeping on to victory.

We oppose high license because of the foregoing facts, and would recommend that honest temperance reformers everywhere would only examine the workings of high-license laws and be fully convinced that the only righteous measure is to totally suppress the manufacture and sale as an intoxicating beverage.

It is true that the saloons diminished to nearly one-half in Pennsylvania just previous to the amendment campaign of 1889, but it was the prohibition feature that did it; and if prohibition with the license feature can reduce the saloons to one-half, methinks that prohibition without the license feature can close up the remaining one-half. But the amount of liquor consumed and number of arrests for drunkenness was just the same.

Let us explode the fallacious arguments of high-license advocates and cut so close that they shall fall never to rise under the weight of their own inconsistencies.

Let us work and vote for the everlasting prohibition of this curse of curses, and may God's blessing richly rest upon all efforts to secure this glorious consummation.—Rev. F. Campbell, in the Gospel Banner.

One of the best moves the devil can make is to persuade a big-headed man to trust in his own strength. There isn't a drunkard on earth to-day who didn't formerly believe he could drink or let it alone.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The city of God.—vs. 1-4. In ancient times a city was a place of refuge in case of war; and human wisdom exhausted all its skill and ingenuity to make the walls and fortifications impregnable to assault. This song is intended to show how secure and blessed is the state of them who trust God. Like the walls of a defenced city, his watchful care circles them on every hand. This figure is similar to that of "the tower" and "fortress" so frequently used by David in the Psalms. The walls and bulwarks are not composed of any earthly material which can be undermined, or battered down, or "blown up;" or which will succumb to the surer, if slower, assaults of time. To the righteous the gates of this city are ever open. "Who keepeth the truth." In the margin it is plural, "truths." The nation or the individual is not righteous that keeps one or a few, but ignores the rest. Truth, though many-sided, is a perfect whole. Can our nation claim this refuge, while she reaps an unrighteous revenue from the liquor traffic? Can a Sabbath-breaking people, or one given to the false worship of the lodge, appropriate this glorious promise? So of the individual. He only "shall be kept in perfect peace" whose "thought" or "imagination" is "stayed on God." Let us think what occupies our thoughts most, so that we may know whether we can have this almighty refuge when the waves of trouble run highest. Is self their centre? or do all our feelings, our hopes and desires; all that makes up the sum of our conscious being, turn to God as the great attracting force of our lives? If so, we may expect to be "kept in perfect peace." But the promise is not to the double-minded Christian, who tries to serve God and the world at the same time. To him, unless his spiritual life has been completely smothered, is denied even the false peace enjoyed by the worldling. "Thou wilt keep him." If our refuge was anything less than the immutable Jehovah, our peace could not be perfect; and, on the other hand, "stayed on thee," means a great deal more than a mere wavering, uncertain hold on God. A general trust in Providence, while better than nothing, is not enough to keep us in "perfect peace." To be unmoved when the storms of trial come, we must breathe the atmosphere of faith continually; and, in tempest or sunshine, in joy or grief, be anchored to the Rock of Ages, which is the literal translation of the words "everlasting strength." This is one of the very few passages in which our common English version retains the Jehovah of the original. Its use here is very emphatic, expressing, by the union of the two words (Lord and Jehovah), in the highest degree, his unchanging love and power.

2. The lofty city fallen.—vs. 5, 6. Babylon is here meant, figurative of the mystic Babylon of Revelation, and of all the strongholds of evil. This, like the city of God, to which the first part of our lesson introduced us, is a refuge; but it is a refuge of lies, in strong contrast to that city into which none can enter save they who keep the truth. We have seen how impregnable is the defence that God provides for his saints, but the entrenchments of falsehood and crime shall be leveled to the dust. We have here a promise of the final downfall of the Babylon of the liquor traffic and all systems of legalized iniquity which prey upon the poor and needy. This "lofty city" may well typify the secret empire; the vast, world-wide power of Masonry. Ancient Babylon boasted her impregnable walls, her immense wealth, her great men. So does the lodge Babylon to-day; but the time is coming when her downfall will be as complete. Every reform has looked impossible at its beginning, and none more so than the anti-secret reform. But here we have the plain, clear promise of Scripture,—that every thing which antagonizes truth and right, and is the opposite, the false counterfeit of the holy city, the church of the living God, shall come to naught.

3. The way of the just.—vs. 7-10. "Dost weigh." The literal meaning is, to make level, or plain. They who seek to know God's will shall have no difficulty in understanding it. They may see only a step ahead, but that step is always clear, so that the way-faring man, though a fool, need not err therein. "In the way of thy judgments." Some translate it: "The path of the Just One is perfectly even." God is perfectly consistent in his character and in his dealings. This quality of consistency is what the world looks for in the Christian, and so often fails to find; yet it is what we must strive for if we would be holy as He is holy. We must not let our practice contradict our creed; and, while we profess to have our citizenship in heaven, be conformed to the world. The sense of this and the following verse seems to be that the overthrow of Babylon followed on prayer. So we must pray mightily if we would prevail against the Babylons of to-day. The righteous see God's hand in their prosperity; the wicked see only luck, chance, or their own shrewdness. Such are blind to his providence, even when most graciously manifest, and can only be taught by judgments.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—At Boston, the Bowdoin Square Baptist Tabernacle and the two houses in the rear are to be torn down, and a new building is to be erected suitable for the growing religious work of the church. Rev. M. R. Deming, the pastor, is to go into the field at once to raise $100,000. The new building is to be eight stories high. It will embrace a large auditorium, and all needful other rooms for the great philanthropic and religious work of the church.

—Boston is to have a Baptist home for the aged and orphan children. The incorporation was recently made on the basis of a gift made by Deacon George W. Chipman. The gift includes the fine estate in Cambridge, worth $25,000, where for a few years Mr. Chipman has had his residence. The large house now standing will be fitted up for aged women. On the vacant lots will be built, as the proceeds will permit, a home for aged men and an orphanage. The estate is finely located.

—Boston sends Rev. O. P. Gifford to Chicago, and demands in exchange Rev. E. D. Burr, who becomes pastor of the Ruggles Street Baptist church in that city.

—Thursday evening there was a happy gathering at the Immanuel church to welcome Rev. O. P. Gifford. In advance of the general social, the large and beautiful audience-room was used for a formal reception. Mr. B. F. Jacobs presided and introduced Dr. Rowlands, Dr. Delano, Rev. H. H. Barbour, and Dr. Lawrence, who spoke pleasant words of welcome and congratulation. The coming of Mr. Gifford to Chicago is one of the crowning events of the year.

—The First Baptist church of Denver, Col., has just baptized its twelfth Chinaman.

CHRISTIAN.

—The report of the Foreign Society shows that 976 churches and 1,511 Sunday-schools contributed to the support of its work during the year 1890, 1891. This is an increase over last year of 189 churches and 170 Sunday-schools. The contributions from all sources amount to $59,365.76. Aside from bequests this is an increase over last year of $7,256.29.

JEWS.

—It is estimated that there are 500,000 Jews in the United States, and 40,000 in the city of Chicago. The Hebrew Christian Mission in that city was organized in 1889. Wm. E. Blackstone, of Oak Park, Ill., is the superintendent.

—It is estimated that there are 6,400,000 Jews. Protestant churches have 377 missionaries among them. This gives a missionary to every 16,976 Israelites—a larger number in proportion than among the heathen.

—Baron Hirsch, the Hebrew philanthropist, worth from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000, made largely in a railway contract with Turkey, is pouring out his wealth in providing for those of his race in Russia who through persecution are being expelled from their homes.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—For the recognition of an order of evangelists by the general conference the reason is three-fold: First, the biblical foundation for such a class of workers; second, the church's necessity for it; third, the reasonableness and naturalness of demanding such a class.

—Mr. Samuel G. Swearingen, of Illinois, has donated, through Dr. Hartzell, $10,000 to the work of the Freedmen's Aid and Southern Education Society. Five thousand of it goes toward the Rust University building at Holly Springs, Miss., and five thousand toward the new building of Samuel Huston College, at Austin Texas.

—The Methodists have just completed 25 years of successful work in the South, through their Freedmen's Aid and Southern Education Society. They have spent $2,939,785.29. The Society has 41 institutions many of these have large and unusually fine buildings), and employs 330 teachers. Its property is valued at $1,800,800. The Society works among both white and colored people.

—The Epworth League of the M. E. church South, is less than a year old, and has a membership of 50,000.

—At Clay Center, Kan., during the past four weeks more than eighty have professed conversion, most of whom have joined the church.

—The Fowler Methodist church, at the corner of Millard avenue and Twenty-third street, this city, was dedicated Sunday, Dec. 20. The auditorium seats 600 persons. The stained glass windows are especially handsome, and the interior decorations in the best of taste.

—The eighteenth anniversary of the founding of the Reformed Episcopal church in this country occurred December 2. The movement was started in New York on December 2, 1873. Colonel Benjamin Aycrigg, of Passaic, N. J., presided at the inauguration meeting held in Association Hall and made the formal declaration of the organization of the church. At the meeting there were present 7 clergymen and 19 communicant laymen. To-day the church has 116 clergymen, 10,000 communicants, 112 parishes, 12,906 Sunday-school teachers and pupils, and property valued at $1,954,712.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—According to the Independent, there are ninety-seven Presbyteries that have approved the report of the revision committee of the General Assembly, nineteen have disapproved, twenty-six expressed a desire for a new creed, and sixty-five for further revision.

—Dr. Van Dyck, of the Presbyterian Mission at Beirut, has just finished his fifty years in that field. The golden anniversary was suitably observed.

—Spencer Trask, of Brooklyn, gives to Princeton $10,000, the interest upon which is to be used in securing at Princeton the presence of men distinguished in art and letters. Sir Edwin Arnold will inaugurate the series of lectures.

—Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, is troubled with "higher criticism." One of the faculty, Prof. Evans, has accepted a call to Bala, Wales, the avowed reason that there he will be able to teach "liberal theology." Seventeen students of Lane Seminary have publicly declared their repudiation of the distinctly negative Biblical criticism charged upon two of the professors in that institution. This makes the inevitable implication that the remaining eleven students take the other side and go with the new departure.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Cincinnati congregation was made one of the beneficiaries under the will of the late Wm. Gibson of that city, to the amount of $5,000, to be used in supporting a pastor. Cedarville College receives $25,000. The Foreign Mission, Church Extension, and Education Boards, and the Theological Seminary each received $5,000. A large amount was given to other religious and charitable organizations.

—At a late meeting of the session of the First Congregation of Philadelphia, it was resolved that only unfermented wine should be used in the sacrament of the Supper hereafter.

—The Pittsburgh congregation still holds together nobly. This earnest people are hoping ere long to build a commodious and beautiful house of worship in some suitable neighborhood, and then, with God's blessing upon them in a good pastor, they feel confident that they shall have gladness by the measure of the years of their grief.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—Cardinal Gibbons has given ecclesiastical consent to the scheme of holding a great Catholic congress during the World's Fair at Chicago, in 1893. It is to consist of ten delegates from each diocese, and one additional delegate for each 25,000 of Catholic population; also a representative of each Catholic university, academy, and college of young men.

—In Berlin during the last year there were 195,790 Protestant children in the public schools, but only 13,011 Catholics, while the Jewish numbered 12,176 and the Dissenters 739.

—There are 2,713 German priests in the Roman Catholic church in our United States at present. More than 1,900 came to this country already in holy orders or as students; the rest were born in this country. The archdiocese of Cologne furnished 730 priests, while all Austria did not send more than 126. Little Switzerland sent 119.

—Roman Catholics are to hold in New York early next month, under priestly auspices, a Convention of the Apostolate of the Press, to be composed of the laity, both men and women, from all parts of the United States and Canada, "who believe that the printing press offers to apostolic zeal golden opportunities for the conversion of our fellow country-men as well as for elevating the moral and spiritual condition of Catholics themselves." A wide range of topics is suggested, on how to get the truth into the secular press, the uses of fiction, how to interest children for the truth, how to "reach infidels, agnostics and old-fashioned Protestants," reading circles, soldiers and sailors, the colored people, and so on.

The Columbia Daily Calendar.

An old friend in a new dress, and an article that has come to be one of the indispensables of an editor's desk, comes to hand in the Columbia Daily Calendar for 1892. The Calendar is in the form of a pad containing 367 leaves, each 5 1/2 x 2 3/4 inches; and each slip bears a short paragraph pertaining to cycling or some kindred subject, and at the bottom of each leaf is a blank for memoranda. The stand is an entirely new departure, being made of sheet metal finished in ivory black, and is very compact. This is the seventh issue of this now well-known Calendar, yet all the matter is fresh and new.

Take water and a little Pearline, and you have the best preparation in the world for washing and cleaning. It will do everything except harm. Use it on your clothes, your dishes, your paint, and your person. Try it on something that you think is too delicate or too difficult. It will silence your doubts in the one case, and save your strength in the other.

Send it Back. Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, do the honest thing—send it back.

HOME AND HEALTH.

CATARRH, COLDS, ETC.

Catarrh in the head is a troublesome and dangerous complaint difficult to cure. The symptoms are various. This complaint lays the foundation of almost every form of disease to which man is subject. Catarrh is caused by a cold left to cure itself. A neglected cold has dug many a grave. A neglected cold often causes catarrh, rheumatism, bronchitis, consumption, etc. When the pores are mostly closed and a chilly sensation is running all over the body, nature is unable to perform its work properly. Under these circumstances one has to resort to such means as will cause the blood to react, sending it to the surface. This causes a genial warmth and removes the difficulty. Thus, the necessity in case of a cold is to resort to such appliances as will produce as soon as possible a natural warmth of the body—the hot bath, or the vapor bath, or a hot drink on retiring at night—the object being to produce perspiration which will leave the body in its natural state as to the degree of heat. In this condition nature will always regulate itself. The secret of good health is to keep the feet warm, the head cool and the bowels open. Constipation can be cured better by hot water injections than by the use of drugs. One or two quarts of hot water used with a fountain syringe once a week will work wonders. Try it. It will cure dyspepsia, chills and fever, headache, etc. Always guard against extremes of heat and cold.

A change of climate will often cure catarrh and rheumatism. For this I recommend Southern California and Central Florida. Catarrh in the head often produces diseases that prove fatal. Therefore take every precaution, make every effort, resort to every means that is within your reach to cure this most dangerous complaint. These are remedies which will give relief and will sometimes cure catarrh. There are at least two forms of catarrh—the acute and the chronic. I will give two remedies:

No. 1 is for the acute form: Take pure olive oil—insert into the nostrils one teaspoonful at a time by the use of half-drachm vial. Throw the head backward so as to cause the oil to drop into the throat, and then immediately throw the head forward and downward, so that the oil will pass upward into the head. To be repeated once a day.

Remedy No. 2 for the chronic form: Take one tablespoonful salt and a little pure Castile soap to one quart of water. Shake, and snuff up the nose, thoroughly, once a day. Do not use too much soap to begin with; but more can be used as one can bear it. I should recommend the olive oil in most cases. Always cleanse the nasal passage with warm water, and use the same as a gargle every morning, thoroughly cleansing those parts once a day. In case of catarrhal sore throat use the olive oil on the outside as well, or any good ointment, rubbing it well in. Common sore throat can be cured in twenty-four hours by dissolving five cents' worth of chlorate of potash in one pint of water and gargling with it every four hours.—Dr. J. E. Clark, in New York Witness.

PALPITATION OF THE HEART.

Many years ago we were called to treat a case of palpitation of the heart which had continued many days. It was quickly cured by wetting a towel in cold water and laying it over the afflicted organ. Since then we have always recommended this simple remedy with excellent results. We now find the same method indorsed by a noted French physician. Dr. Gingeot recommends as a valuable remedy for palpitation—one that has proved serviceable to him—the application of cold over the heart. The simplest plan of all is to apply a wet sponge in the morning before dressing.

COLD FOOD.

Eat all cold food slowly. Digestion will not begin till the temperature of the food has been raised by the heat of the stomach to ninety-eight degrees. Hence the more heat that can be imparted to it by slow mastication the better. The precipitation of a large quantity of cold in the stomach by fast eating may, and often does, cause discomfort and indigestion, and every occasion of this kind results in a measurable injury to the digestive functions. Ice water drunk with cold food of course increases the mischief. Hot drinks—hot water, weak tea, coffee, chocolate, etc.,—will, on the contrary, help to prevent it. But eat slowly, any way.—Hall's Journal of Health.

FARM NOTES.

[Pickings from the "Farm, Field and Stockman."]

AGRICULTURAL.

Have no tools "lying about loose."

Look after the storage houses and cellars.

Open a ditch from the end of dead furrows so no water can stand in them.

If the cracks and leaks are still un-stopped in the sheds, pen or barns, stop them.

See that the house is comfortable, but don't use fresh horse manure for hanking.

If you have an ice-house get it ready for filling. If you have none, why not build one?

Help organize a Farmers' Reading Circle if there is none in your vicinity, and then attend its meetings regularly.

Use the long evenings for reading and study. Miss no lecture on any rural topic. Encourage helpful entertainments in the school-house. Be social, be helpful.

It will pay you to visit the school occasionally. The children will enjoy it. If the teacher is a good one it will encourage her; if she is a poor one you ought to know it.

Have the boys and girls attend school regularly, even if it inconveniences you some—help them in their studies. It will encourage them and may cause you to "hush up a bit."

Are your parsnips frozen in solid? If not, dig some of them and bury in sand or soil where they will not freeze. They will sell well before the other fellow can get his dug in the spring.

If the house is comfortable, make it pleasant with a cheery voice, happy face and helpful hand. See that there are some good hooks and papers to help the children and other members of the household to think home is the best place on earth.

Farmers or gardeners interested in the study of entomology and the destruction of insects, will find the hooks and bulletins published by the Division of Entomology in the United States Department of Agriculture, of value to them. These may be had by those who wish them free of charge by addressing C. V. Riley, Entomologist, Washington, D. C.

HORTICULTURAL.

See that no water stands about the grapevines or on the strawberry beds.

Bring your hyacinths from the cellar when you wish them to bloom.

Many a neglected corner would support a thrifty Concord or Brighton if given the chance.

Entomology, geology, botany, and chemistry are some of the studies of the horticulturist.

If a heavy fall of damp snow lodges on evergreens or other trees, it will be well to shake it off before freezing.

Mr. W. C. Barry attributes the rapid growth and sudden death of certain rose bushes to the free use of nitrate of soda.

See that the plows are well cleaned, beams painted, shares sharp—then all unpainted iron or steel parts smeared with tallow.

Nothing makes a better protection for beds of perennials than forest leaves; a little dirt sprinkled over them will hold in place.

LIVE STOCK NOTES.

Care well for all young stock, to assure future profits.

Both humanity and self-interest should induce farmers to be merciful and liberal in caring for their stock.

Fattening animals, especially swine, should be pushed, as they gain flesh much faster now than during the colder weather of mid-winter.

Notwithstanding statements to the contrary, no export duty is levied on horses or other animals sent from this country to foreign countries.

Horses just over their heavy fall work

Stop that cough! Else the bronchial tubes will be enlarged and the delicate tissues of the lungs exposed to injury. No other medicine is so speedily operative in throat and lung troubles as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. A few doses have been known to break up an obstinate and distressing cough. Sufferers from asthma, bronchitis, croup, consumption, sore throat, and whooping cough find a sure relief in the use of this preparation. Stone, Hurt's store, Va., writes: "I have found, in my family, that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral was always a certain cure for colds and coughs."

"Five years ago I had a constant cough, night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, and had been given up by my physicians. I began to take Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and was completely cured."—Anga A. Lewis, Ricard, N. Y. *

need and are entitled to generous treatment, including good grooming and hlan- keting whenever necessary.

If one wishes to breed the modern type of sheep he must be particular in his selection. He should keep only his best ewes for breeders, and buy no culls—better to buy fewer and pay more money and start right. Many make a mistake in not using good enough stock rams. Next to selection come the proper care and feed. Some claim we must raise clover hay to be good shepherds. It is a natural food for sheep, and they will do well on it with a small grain ration and pure water. Watch the lambs carefully and keep them growing all the time. Do not allow a setback on account of the lack of the right kind of food. Procure it for them and you will mature them without trouble into model sheep.

Boston, December 9 and 10, 1891.

REFORMS AND REFORMERS OF NEW ENGLAND.

ADDRESS BY ELIZABETH E. FLAGG, WELLESLEY, MASS.

My subject is one that goes back for its starting point nearly three centuries;—back to the day when a little company of weary voyagers met in the crowded cabin of the May Flower, and formed themselves into a body politic "by mutual agreement in the name of God." They covenanted to live together in peace and harmony, "with equal rights to all, and obedient to just laws made for the common good." This constitution, which was both civil and religious, was New England's Magna Charta; but the majority of its signers by another spring were sleeping in their nameless graves, leveled smooth that the Indians might not count them to see how few the numbers left. These men, these women—for New England had her foremothers as well as her forefathers—who landed on Plymouth Rock in 1620 were her first reformers, as well as her first martyrs. They were the forlorn hope of a new era. Under the name of freedom and equal rights, the reform which they came to these bleak shores to establish has grown from its mustard-seed beginning to be a great tree, and the birds of the air lodge in the branches of it;—birds of ill omen some of them—anarchist and saloonist and Jesuitist, and Clan-na-gael, and all their political allies of every stripe and hue. And this is the reason we meet here to-day;—because we see that if New England is ever again to wear her old-time crown of glory, she must come back to the principles of her first reformers; because "new occasions teach new duties," and we find that another reform is now demanded,—one that shall come like a whirlwind and sweep our American tree of liberty clean of all these devouring parasites.

It has been often thrown up against the Puritans—who, it must be remembered, were different in many respects from the Pilgrims, although this distinction is usually ignored or forgotten—that they were intolerant, denying to others that liberty of conscience which they claimed for themselves. But just as meteors are thrown off by the sun as he travels through space, so the pathway of the old Puritan settlers of New England is luminous with "many a bright far-seeing soul," thrown off by the white heat of that stern faith which would brook no compromise with what it deemed to be error, but at whose fires—let us not forget it—men like Roger Williams kindled the light which shot so far ahead of their race and age. This young Salem minister, condemned and banished for holding opinions that are articles in everybody's creed to-day, went forth like Abraham of old, not knowing whither he went, to found in the untrodden wilderness the State of Rhode Island—the first community in the world to incorporate into its civil polity the idea that every man should be free in his religious convictions. He deserves prominent mention among New England's first reformers for another fact;—he was the first man to stand up publicly for the rights of the Indians. One of the chief reasons which led to his banishment was the excitement stirred up by his declaring that the grants of land made to the colonists by the Crown were not valid until the natives had been justly recompensed. But the world moves. John Eliot, thirty years later, found a great change in public sentiment, and to him is due the first legislative act ever passed on their behalf. Two centuries rolled away, and a New England woman, Helen Hunt Jackson, her soul throbbing with sympathy for an oppressed race, "did what she could," and wrote that wonderful book, "Romona." And let me say, in passing, that the number of New England women—headed by Mrs. Stowe, with her "Uncle Tom's Cabin," that thrilled the world's heart as no other book written by a woman's hand ever did, or perhaps ever will again—who turned their backs on fashion and public opinion, and threw themselves with open-eyed devotion at the feet of ideal Truth, is a list to be proud of. Not a nation on the globe—nay! not all of them put together—can show the like. Says the author of "Woman's Work in America:" "The strong Hebraic element in the spiritual life of New England women, in particular, tended to withdraw them from the service of pure Art." "My natural inclinations," wrote Lydia Maria Childs, "drew me much more strongly towards literature and the arts than towards reform, and the weight of conscience was needed to turn the scale."

Ah! that word conscience! That was the keystone in the arch of New England's moral greatness; that was the magnet which drew her brave, sweet, womanly daughters to the front in every battle for the Right. They could not stay safe and quiet in the rear, even when public opinion said it was the only proper place for them. And that is just what we want to-day—to give back to New England her old-time glory: a revival of conscience. Oh, it isn't "the decline of her shipping interests" that ails New England to-day; it is the decline of her men and women. It isn't because the grass is growing in the streets of her old sea-port towns, and her trade is going to younger rivals; it is because she has let policy, and expediency, and the love of Mammon grow over her conscience:—that Puritan conscience of olden times that, whatever the temptations brought to bear upon it, always pointed to duty as straight as the magnetic needle points to the North Star.

History has not preserved the names of many of these early reformers, and the mosses long ago covered their headstones if they had any; but there was never lacking, all along the first two centuries after the Pilgrims landed, noble souls who witnessed for temperance when everybody—ministers and all—drank their daily glass, witnessed against slavery when nobody dreamed that it was wrong to take the unrequited labor of one's fellow-man; and advocated the rights of the Indian at a time when public opinion did not allow him any rights. The reformers of those days had to stand alone, with no organization at their backs. The Holy Spirit was their only Teacher, and the Bible, with them, had to take the place of the press and the lecture platform on which we of the present day depend so largely. They were delivered from the temptation which besets us in these days of many organizations with all their intricate machinery, of trusting too much to the arm of flesh and relying too little on God. Oh, that we might all feel pressing upon us the one mighty need of the hour;—not to work less but to pray more!

The number of reforms which the first half of this nineteenth century saw initiated is legion; and of all, without an exception, New England has been the mother. The Anti-masonic excitement consequent on the murder of Morgan may be called a reform, and a very sweeping one, when every Masonic lodge went down under the popular indignation, and many State Legislatures passed laws forbidding extra-judicial oaths,—which, in the case of Vermont at least, have never been taken from her statute book. But there was no basis of strong religious conviction in the minds of the people at large. In the shallow soil of mere politics it failed to take deep root, and when the burning sun of the anti-slavery agitation arose, it was scorched and withered away. Anti-slavery has also been credited with being the Moses' rod that swallowed up the early Washingtonian movement, though Dr. Jewett tells us it was really throttled by the secret temperance orders, which created division in its ranks, and drew off the members from their legitimate work of reform and set them to learning grips and passwords.

The list of New England's anti-slavery reformers can scarcely be numbered. Wendell Phillips, Garrison, Sumner, Wilson, Whittier, Lowell, Channing, the Beechers, the Chapmans;—these are not a hundredth part of the names in that glorious galaxy. And shall we forget—though fame takes little note of them—the wives of Wendell Phillips and James Russell Lowell, who first converted their husbands to the anti-slavery cause when it was most unpopular, and inspired the peerless orations of the one, and the "Biglow Papers" of the other.

Woman Suffrage sprang up almost coincident with the anti-slavery reform, but the first woman in the colonies to advocate the doctrine called at a later day Woman's Rights, was Mrs. Anne Hutchinson, the contemporary of Roger Williams. Though her chief offence seems to have been that she had opinions of her own on the political and religious questions of the day and gave them free expression, she, too, was tried, condemned and banished. I have before alluded to the old charge that the Puritans were intolerant. But don't let us be too hard on them, for fear that in so doing we shall condemn ourselves. How long is it since Prudence Crandall was arrested and imprisoned in the State of Connecticut for the crime of teaching colored children to read? Only about sixty. How long since Lloyd Garrison was dragged through the streets of Boston for advocating the rights of the slave? Scarce half a century. How long since a howling mob took possession of Music Hall, and threatened the lives of men who had peaceably gathered there to tell what they knew about Masonry? Scarcely more than a decade. I will grant that the old Puritans were somewhat slow to take up with new doctrines. Many of their descendants are nearly as slow. At a certain religious convention held not twenty years ago—I could tell where, and mention some of the leading ecclesiastical lights who were present, but I forbear to call any names—a modest, shrinking Presbyterian minister's wife got up and timidly asked, not if she might have a vote in their councils—oh, no! if she might express an opinion on the subject under deliberation? Nothing of the kind, but only—if she might be allowed to ask a question. And that whole reverend body—I heard the story from her own lips—debated and wrangled for half an hour over the momentous problem, and then broke up, leaving the matter undecided. I repeat it: don't let us be too hard on these old Puritans. I know it is fashionable in some quarters to sneer at and deery them; but it always hurts me when I hear it. I feel as if I wanted to stand up for them, though I know they don't need my championship or anybody's else. They were grand men; and we are not so far ahead of them that we can afford to slur their memories.

It is a remarkable fact—and yet I am not sure it is remarkable either—that the first Woman Suffragists, Lucy Stone, Abby Kelley Foster, and others were anti-slavery lecturers as well. It is also to be noted that whenever one comes across an Abolitionist of the old days, one is sure to find not only a Woman Suffragist, but a Prohibitionist; and not only a Prohibitionist but a thoroughgoing Anti-mason. They were all-around-reformers that New England bred in those days. What other lesson can we draw from it, save that the true policy in reform is to educate on all lines? I believe the most harmful as well as the most stupid of fallacies is the one that I have heard so frequently when pressing the importance of the anti-secret work: "The saloon is a much greater evil than the lodge, and we can't have more than one war on our hands at once. Let us fight that first." Now I always distrust the man or woman, however great their seeming zeal for temperance, who makes me such an answer as that. I do not care what the particular evil may be to which his or her attention is called. I believe that more often than anyway it is an excuse to cover indolence or cowardice. I have invariably found that those who have the real reform instinct—conscience let me say, for I like that word better—will be out-and-out for reform on all lines just as were the old New England Abolitionists of blessed memory.

That was the period of New England's glory; and as one after another has dropped away to "join the hosts invisible," and none came forward to take their places, it has begun to be almost a common remark that "we have no longer any great men." Is it true? Shall they who wreathed her brow with undying laurels, so that to-day you and I thank God we are New England born, have no successors?

"Mother earth! are the heroes dead?

Do they thrill the soul of the years no more?

Are the gleaming snows and the poppies red

All that are left of the brave of yore?

Are there none to fight as Theseus fought,

Far in the young world's sunny dawn,

Or to teach as the gray-haired Nestor taught?

Mother earth, are the heroes gone?"

"Gone? In a grander form they rise;

Dead? We may clasp their hands in ours,

And catch the gleam of their clearer eyes,

And breathe their brows with immortal flowers.

Wherever a noble deed is done

'Tis the pulse of a hero's heart is stirred;

Wherever the right has a triumph won,

There are the heroes' voices heard."

If the era of great men is really over—though I don't believe it—perhaps—and this is the thought that came to me two or three weeks ago in Tremont Temple, amid the gleam of white ribbons, and voices tuned to all sweet domestic harmonies speaking so eloquently for "God and home and every land"—perhaps it is because we have got into the era of the great women!

We have all heard—I am sure I have ever since I can remember—of the "superfluous women" of New England; 60,000 right here in Massachusetts. But when I see so many of our youth and young men smoking cigarettes, with no literary taste beyond the Sunday newspaper, and their lives vacant of any noble purpose or grand aim; and when, on the other hand, I see these bright young women in Wellesley, studying science, literature and art—women who will some day be writers, preachers, doctors, journalists, specialists in a hundred different lines—I wonder where they will find their mates. It seems to me, judging from the present outlook, that we are going to have a great many superfluous men one of these days.

The great uprising in Boston, December 11, 1888, demonstrated what the patriotic women of our country can do under sufficient incentive. I will not take up the time by repeating a story which is probably familiar to all present. Suffice it to say that Boston's municipal government was then controlled by two powers, Rome and the saloon. The Jesuit's unseen hand was felt everywhere; but he went one step too far. These women believed, as their platform for 1891 says: "That the public schools are the corner-stone of our American Republic;" and when he laid his hand on them, when he deposed the teacher and banished the text-book that dared to tell the truth about the Romish system of Indulgences—then they woke up. The women of Boston rallied at the polls in a pouring rain, 21,000 strong, and won the day; and it has passed into history. Think under what odds they did it! If they could be granted to-day full municipal suffrage, I believe they would make of rum-cursed Boston the cleanest, safest, purest city on earth. Great and good men may labor in the fires of opposition until they are weary, and achieve no lasting result, while their natural helpers are refused the ballot; and women, on the other hand, along with the franchise must have a Christian manhood to stand by her, or her work will fail to be permanent. But when the lodges take the men, and the churches take the women, how are they ever going to clasp hands across the abyss of political corruption? How can there be any lasting breakwater raised against the tide of intemperance and impurity that the dragon is casting out of his mouth? It is only when we have the two eras united—man's era and woman's era—that the sickening tide will be staunched, and we shall see the first gleam of the Millennium.

New England has always had her anti-secret men and women, but our history as an organization is yet to write,

"Behind us holy martyrs Uplift the palm and crown."

And, standing as we do in the latter days of this dying century, heir to all the glorious inheritance they have left us, shall we not take to our hearts the lesson of their lives? These early reformers built on the Rock Christ Jesus. If they had built, instead, on the shifting sands of the lodge religion, you and I would not be standing where we are to-day. I do not know exactly where we should have been standing, but I think we can ascertain, approximately at least, where another generation may be if the lodge ever comes to rule New England. We have an object-lesson on our very borders. Mrs. Emerson, one of our home missionaries, states that in the capital city of Mexico her husband was told by one of its most influential citizens in reply to a question he asked, "There are two leading religions in Mexico. One is Roman Catholic, the other is Freemasonry."

They found, on investigation, that this was true. The men were in the Masouic lodge, the women thronged the churches; and everywhere was the trail of the serpent—the hidden hand of the Jesuit.

Oh, let us wake in time, as we value our country, as we love her free institutions! Let us present on all sides an embattled front to the foe, for we may be sure that the point we fail to guard is the one where the enemy is lying in wait. And the victory shall be ours in the name of Him who was the Captain and Leader of New England's first reformers—Jesus Christ, the ever blessed King of kings and Lord of lords.

WHY I AM NOT A MASON.

ADDRESS BY REV. R. A. M'AYEAL, LAWRENCE, MASS.

I have been importuned to become a Mason, a number of times, by respectable men, both in the West, and also since coming to Massachusetts. The motives held out were personal popularity and pecuniary profit. But as I never go into any movement with my eyes shut, and also view every project from a Christian standpoint, it was concluded to investigate the character and workings of the institution, so that I might act intelligently in regard to the matter. I obtained a copy of Morgan's revelations, and also a book entitled "Light on Masonry," written by Elder Bernard, a Baptist minister of Albany, and also "Steams on Masonry," written also by a Baptist minister. This was in 1856. These men had been Masons, evidently honest men, and had been led to reveal the secrets and workings of the institution because they were convinced that the whole thing was not only a sham, but wrong and mischievous. I then purchased several books published by Masons, and fully endorsed by the highest Masonic authorities, and carefully compared them with the other books, as far as their symbolic illustrations and teachings were revealed, and found them to correspond exactly.

Some time after that I was in the city of Detroit, stopping at the house of a Scotchman who was a high Mason. In looking through his book-case, one day, I discovered a genuine Masonic book containing, as my memory serves me now, the entire first seven degrees. Of course I took it to my room and examined it carefully. The full evidence was now before me, and I knew to a certainty that the revelations I had read were truthful, and that my knowledge of Masonry was sufficiently extensive and accurate to enable me to form a correct estimate in the case. I had a number of fast friends among Masons where I resided. To these men I talked frankly on the subject. A number of them confessed to me, sub rosa, that my knowledge of Masoury was correct, and that my exposure of the secrets in some sermons I preached on the subject was without a single substantial mistake. I had another evidence that I knew correctly the secrets of Masonry. After preaching on the subject in 1858—the Masons coming out in full force to hear what I had to say—I was warned by a reliable party, who had overheard a conversation among some Masons, to look out for my personal safety. It seems that they took me for a renegade Mason, and of course a "perjured scoundrel"—and to be dealt with according to my oath. I was conscious, as I walked the street and met certain parties, that there was something ominous in the air, but practically paid no attention to it. Some time afterwards a leading Mason, who, by the way, was my sincere friend, told an elder of my church that there "had been an arrangement made to put a certain man out of the way, but that it had been finally abandoned."

Since that time the anti-Masonic movement has become wide-spread; many revelations have been made and published; many have seceded; lecturers have gone abroad; the lodge degrees have been worked out in public, and the whole mystery explained to the light of day; so that any one who desires to know, may know all about it, without going into the lodge. My advice is, to any one who is determined to join the lodge, to purchase one or more of the revelations now for sale, and then he will know what to expect, and be ready for the ordeals through which he is to pass.

He will know how to personate "Hiram Abiff"—to be knocked over and killed by the "setting-maul;" how to fall back gracefully; be carried away in a canvas sheet; be buried due east and west under a lot of rubbish; hunted for, and at last discovered, and raised by the grip of the "lion's paw" on the "five points of fellowship." He will know, also, how in the Royal Arch degree he is to be let down, by a rope, into a deep vault, in the dark, to find the "ark of the covenant," and will be on his guard to see that the rope and pulleys are all right, and that he does not meet the fate of a Methodist preacher, who recently, on account of the pulleys giving way, fell into the vault and was killed.

In short, he will know all about the initiating ceremonies in each degree, and be prepared for what is coming. "To be forewarned is to be forearmed." The men who have revealed all the mysteries of this institution are real benefactors, both to those who conclude not to enter the lodge, as well as to those who decide to enter, since they (these latter) will be booked up, and know how to "play the fool" gracefully, and to exhibit calmness and courage amid both the ludicrous and dangerous incidents in their journey through darkness up to light (?).

Some of the considerations that decided me not to yield to importunities to become a Mason are as follows:

1. It seemed to me unmanly to seek popularity and promotion or financial aid at the hauds, or through the wire-pulling, of a secret conclave, over and beyond my real worth, or what I deserved, or what I would reach out in the open field of the world where competition is fair, and where a man always gets just what he deserves.

The field of operations for God and humanity, for honest and manly endeavor, is the wide world, and no man ought to want to climb higher, or get more than is honestly his due.

Besides, this self-seeking in this manner never wins in the long run. I have known ministers of the gospel persuaded to join the lodge in order to get favors, and, as they thought, to increase their usefulness. It always proves to be a mistake. Intelligent and honorable Masons think less of a minister of the gospel whom they have helped to initiate. He loses his influence over them for good. They know that such mummery is unbecoming in an ambassador of heaven.

A leading Mason once said to me: "We have more respect for and confidence in you than we have for Rev. Mr. —," a Methodist minister who had recently joined the lodge; "we know where you stand, and we respect honesty and candor."

In 1862 a regiment of infantry was made up at the place where I then resided. I applied for the chaplaincy. A Methodist minister, and a Mason, also applied. The Colonel, a neighbor of mine, was a Mason, and all the captains but two were Masons or Odd-fellows. The other applicant, as I was informed afterwards, went around among the officers, giving them the grip and asking their votes. I remained at home. When the election came off I was chosen, because, as afterwards informed, they had confidence in my straightforward honesty. A minister of the gospel who, by submitting to the ridiculous and humiliating farce of initiation, neither naked nor clothed, blindfolded, a rope around his body, led around the lodge-room like a whipped spaniel, put down on one knee and repeating a cut-throat oath, and then, on public occasions, wearing a white apron over his stomach, expects in this sublimely ridiculous manner to increase his influence, is, it seems to me, one of the worst-duped men in all Christendom.

2. Another reason that influenced me was that it is a sin to take an oath under such circumstance,—and especially a Masonic oath. I take it to be a correct statement that no man has the right to administer an oath but a legally constituted officer of the State or the church, and that an oath should be taken only in cases where the interests of the State or the church, or of parties under the jurisdiction of the State or the church, are involved. This is certainly true where the State and the church are legally constituted, and where they have jurisdiction in the matters in hand. A mere voluntary society has no authority whatever to exact an oath from any one. An appeal to God constitutes the essence of an oath. It is an act of worship, and should be administered and taken in a reverent and solemn manner. To take an oath under the jurisdiction of a mere voluntary society is solemn trifling and profanity. And then to swear concerning matters of which one is at the time ignorant, and to keep secret matters to be made known subsequently, which the law of God and the law of the State might make it duty to reveal, and, moreover, to imprecate the death-penalty on self, if ever self should reveal the secrets yet to be made known, and all this on one's knees, with eyes blindfolded, and with hands laid on the Bible, square and compass, constitutes a hodge-podge of surrender of manhood, binding on the conscience profanity, surrender of moral freedom, and unconscionable trifling that would tax the ingenuity of even Satan himself to invent. Whilst speaking of profaning the ordinance of the oath, let me call attention to the profanation of the solemn ordinance of prayer.

Take, as an instance, the prayer at the raising of the pretended "Hiram Abiff," after he had been killed and buried and lain in the grave fourteen days. During the time they are hunting for the grave the expression is frequently used, "O Lord, my God, O Lord, my God." Then, just before the Master Mason grips the hand of the dead "Hiram" to raise him, all kneel and the Master prays: "Thou, O God, knowest our down-sitting and our uprising, and understandest our thoughts afar off," etc., etc. "Ameu;" and they all respond: "So mote it be." Thus a solemn prayer is made to God in the midst of this ridiculous farce—this playing the fool before high heaven; and this often by professed Christians and ministers of the gospel, mixed up with skeptics, profane swearers and saloon politicians. Sometimes it occurs that the "Worshipful Master" is an ungodly man, and yet he leads in prayer on this very important occasion.

3. Another objection, in my mind, was the teaching of falsehood in regard to the age of speculative Masonry. They teach, for instance, that Solomon was a Master Mason, and the rank and file believe it. The story, of course, is as false as it is silly. Intelligent Masons know better, but yet it is still taught in all the lodges. I have spoken to a number of Masons in regard to this point—one just recently, a church deacon—and they all, without exception, have taken the story for granted. Mackey—a standard Masonic author—states that speculative Masonry had its origin in the city of London in 1717. Solomon lived long before that time.

Prof. T. S. Parvin, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Iowa, a man thoroughly read in Masonic lore, in an address before the Grand Lodge, at Keokuk, Iowa, a few years ago, took the Masouic orators severely to task for their grandiloquence over the great antiquity of the "ancient and honorable" institution. He says: "Solomon was no Masou. With all his wisdom, he knew no more of the mysteries of Freemasonry than did the beautiful Queen of Sheba, who came from afar to adore his wisdom." "Nor is there any evidence, however faint, to prove that either of the St. Johns were Masons, beyond the wish that it were so."

The great mass of Masons, however, are still taught and believe that Solomon was a Master Mason; that Masonry existed in Tyre, and that Hiram, King of Tyre, sent over workmen who were Masons, amongst whom was "Hiram Abiff," a Master Mason and skilled architect, who laid out the designs on his trestle-board, and who was murdered because he would not make known the Master Mason's secret; was carried off and buried; his grave sought for and found, and that he was resurrected by Solomon, by the grip of the lion's paw. All this medley of a little truth and a great deal of error is taught in the lodge, and believed by thousands of unsuspecting and honest men.

4. I mention but one more consideration that kept me out of the lodge, viz.: The fact that a false and fatal religion is taught in the lodge; a religion that leads men to hope for a place in the "Grand Lodge above," upon the ground simply of living Masonic lives. This appears in all their lectures, and pre-eminently in their burial service. They are taught to revere the "Grand Architect of the Universe," by whatever name he may be known in the various nations where the institution exists. In Christian nations he is called God; but Masonic theology knows nothing of the Saviour who came to redeem lost sinners, nor of the Holy Spirit who has come to regenerate the dead souls of men. Nothing of the distinctive features of the religion of Christ is known in the lodge as such, nor can be admitted in the lodge, and hence there is no vitality, nor can there be, in its religion. "He that hath not the Son hath not the Father." "He that denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father."

The religion of the lodge is a practical denial of the Christian religion. It teaches that man can be saved without Christ, and hence it deceives many to their eternal ruin.

Many who want some kind of religion become satisfied with the lodge religion, and they live and die with the belief that they have all the religion a man needs. This is the worst feature of the whole system. A false religion is worse than no religion at all. It becomes a "refuge of lies." It acts as an opiate upon the conscience, putting it to sleep, to be awakened only by the awful realities of the judgment bar.

Men who live and die expecting, upon the ground of lodge religion and morality, to reach the "Grand Lodge above" will find, when too late, that such an institution never had an existence, and that beyond this sphere the only place of happiness and rest is the heaven that God has prepared, into which none can enter but those who have been born again and been washed and made clean and white in the "blood of the Lamb."

My advice to every young man is—never join the lodge. Stand on your own feet. Exemplify your God-given freedom and manhood. Go out into the world and to the work of life untrammelled by any sworn fidelity to whatever organization outside of those God has instituted. Keep yourself free to act as duty calls. Walk with God. Keep within the lines he has marked out. In short, BE A MAN.

ADDRESS OF T. D. ROBERTS, ESQ.,

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE DAVIS STREET INDUSTRIAL HOME, BOSTON, MASS.

My dear friends, I have left a revival of religion to come here to-night, and I can assure you it was a great cross for me, and if I hadn't given my word and promise to good Brother Stoddard that I would be here, I am rather inclined to think that I should still be laboring with sinners in a distant city. I am very glad that I didn't leave that revival of religion to go to a lodge. But I was laboring in another State about a year ago, where there was a mighty outpouring of God's Spirit, and I was informed a certain doctor of divinity, who was a member of a lodge, had no scruples about leaving that meeting and going to his lodge, and leaving us to take care of the souls, or the souls to take care of themselves.

I cannot talk to you as eloquently as the president of our Home, Dr. Gordon, has done, but I can tell you the facts, and I tell you facts are stubborn things; and I know something about these things, for I have been there. Twenty years ago, I think it was, I united with the first secret organization I ever joined, the Knights of Pythias. About that time God came into my soul, and searched me as though it were with a lighted candle, and I found there was something in my life that wasn't altogether what I wished it might be.

However, I united with the church; but I think I joined the lodge before I united with the church. I had not united with the lodge before I determined to become a Christian man. Had I known then what I now know in reference to the internal workings of the lodge, I can say with all frankness, and with all charity for those who differ from me, that I do not think I should ever have become a member of any secret organization. Had I knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus at that time, I think that would have been the greatest motive not to have any connection with anything secular or which is subordinate to what I consider the highest principle in life, namely, the teachings of Jesus Christ; for I feel now what I did not know then, and that is, that the fellowship that it is my privilege to have in communion with the Holy Ghost, directly with the throne of heaven, is all any Christian needs to give him comfort and happiness in this world.

It is a pretty hard thing, my friends, for a man to ride two ways at the same time; two horses when they are going in opposite directions. I was at one time a professional horse jockey. I used to ride two horses at once, but they were going in the same direction.

I remember, too, once, when I was in England, my father tried by every means, and my mother too, to persuade me to become a useful man in the way of some profession or trade. They put me down to learn ship-building with my brothers, who had been there, and learned that business, and I shall never forget how, during the recess between morning and evening work, some of us boys used to go down and get on to the masts of a ship that were lying in the water, and I would get on two of them, one foot on one and the other on the second one, and the current would come running down in the little channel that was made to pull up the boats, and it would separate these masts, and finally they got so far apart that I couldn't get back again, and there was only one alternative,—down I went into the water.

Now, dear friends, I think that is exactly the way with us. We get one foot as it were, (I mean those that are in the lodges) we get one foot in the lodge and one in the church, and just as the doctor has said to-night, just as sure as we do that, I believe the time will come when they will get so far away, from the interests of the church that they will feel as I did on that mast; viz., that they are divided in their interest, as my feet were on those two masts. I believe that is the way with a good many men; they are disgusted, not being good lodge members; and not being good church members, they are indifferent and cold, to both institutions, just as cold as I was in that cold water.

Dear friends, I want to come right down to solid facts, and I want to say that I speak with a great deal of charity for those who differ from me. I have the courage of my convictions to say what I believe, but I believe that every man has a right to his own opinion, if that opinion is based on the principle of truth. I am willing to take odds with any man on a principle of truth, if we have some standard by which we are to be measured. He is not to measure himself by himself, nor I by myself, but we must have a standard; so, on that principle, I am ready to talk with any man.

I have been a Mason, but I am not now; and I am going to tell you why I am not. First, because we can find everything that is necessary for us in the church; not only in the way of prestige, but financially and socially, which will meet our every need.

What do some men join the lodge for? In the first place, a great many go into these secret organizations with a selfish spirit. I will ask any who may hear my words, if they are connected with these lodges, to ask themselves the question, if it isn't true that primarily, at the very bottom of their motive, they do not find selfishness? They go there to be entertained; irrespective of their duties to their homes or church; they go there for social purposes; this may be right, provided the society is Christian, and I think it is true that a great many men go with a still lower motive. They will have some pecuniary motive. They feel that if they go into such an organization as the Knights of Pythias, or the Odd-fellows, or Masons, it will be good for them in a business point of view. If there is a Mason here, I want to ask you, my dear friend, candidly, if that isn't sometimes the very motive with a great many who have joined these secret organizations? I do not say all, but there are men who do it. They say this is a good thing—it pays. This is selfishness with them. And again I believe, as I say, that a great many go into it for the prestige they get out of it; for the endorsements the lodge will give them. And that is what, dear friends, my conscience forbade me to do; I could not endorse a man simply because he was a Mason, when I knew he was an unprincipled scamp. But the lodge members have the benefit of a little prestige that they would not have in another way.

These are things that perhaps you have thought of before, which seem to be the motive for joining secret organizations. When a man comes into a church, he ought to come with a different spirit; really with an unselfish spirit. If he comes into the church and goes out into the world with that spirit in him, he certainly has the Spirit of his Master, who so unmindful of his own interests forgot his noonday meal to talk with the woman at the well. That is the spirit that we ought to have, and that is not the spirit of the lodge, because the lodge looks after itself first; and that is one of the reasons why I believe the church to be supreme in point of principle over the lodge.

I have talked quite a little while on this point, probably longer than I ought to. The second reason why I am not belonging to secret organizations, is that as a Christian man, it seems to me when I take into consideration the amount of money which is spent in these lodges, if it could be used for Christ, speaking from the standpoint of a Christian, I would show you that in a year the gospel should be given to the masses who are ignorant of it, and thousands would be converted. If the money spent for the regalia of the officers, and for the sumptuous suppers, and all these things, was put into the service of Jesus Christ, for the upbuilding of his kingdom, you would find that hundreds of thousands would now be in the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and would be praying that his kingdom might come, and his will might be done, who are now ignorant for want of means to send the Gospel to them. O that the money which is lacking to send missionaries into the dark parts of Africa was forthcoming, instead of being spent by lodge members in entertaining themselves, while souls are perishing for whom Christ died.

I take probably a little different ground from some on this matter, in saying that we ought to have the money that is expended in that way to carry forward the cause of Christ on the earth. Well, we have got to meet this objection, because I have had it said to me: "Mr. Roberts, don't you believe anything that is for the good of humanity, and for the upraising of society, whether it is done in the name of the church, or in the name of the Masonic lodge, or the Odd-fellow's lodge, or the Knights of Pythias lodge, or whatever it may be, will be approved of God himself, because it is the teaching of the life of Jesus Christ who went about doing good?" I said: Certainly, "a cup of cold water given in the name of Christ," has its reward, only you must be sure you give it in the name of Christ, and not in the name of your lodge. "Well, isn't it given in his name from that standpoint?" No, my friend, I don't think it is. I believe a good many men in the lodge to-day, give money to pay their dues, and to bury their fellow men, and to support the widow, they do it because they are obliged to do it under the oath which they have taken, and in that way it becomes an obligation. They do not do it in the spirit that Christ taught, "freely ye have received, freely give;" they do not do it in that way.

I am speaking very plainly of course, but I do it with the utmost charity toward others. Some say, isn't a man to have liberty to do as he pleases? Well, that is a pretty broad question. Liberty without restraint, is not true liberty. If I was to go there and put my hands on all the keys of that organ and play those pedals, and blow the wind into those reeds, I should have a great sound there, in which there was no harmony; that shows there is a good deal of liberty there; but if I restrain some of those keys, and hold in check one sharp, so that that flat might predominate, in order to bring out harmony, don't you see that it would be the restraint that would harmonize the whole thing. And so, dear friends, we have to restrain our wills in the same way, and not think we can do just as we please, as Christian men.

A man in Doctor Gordon's church, to strike right home, told me the other day: "Look here, this whole thing is all nonsense. The lodge is a good thing; there are many good men in it, and you ought to have nothing to say; you ought not to interfere; we ought to have liberty of conscience to do as we please." There are undoubtedly a good many men in the lodge who ought to be out. Why are they not out? They haven't the courage of their convictions. I believe that we ought to have the courage of our convictions.

We are not to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers. One of the hardest things of my life was to say to my wife before I married her, "now I am a Christian, and you are not, and I want you to be a Christian before I go to the altar with you." And she said: "Has it come to that, that I am to be compelled? Don't you love me enough to make me your wife without that?" And I said: "Yes, I love you, but I believe I shall love you very much more when you become a Christian." And that is the stand I always take, and when we look things square in the face, the way is always plain. I did it because I believed it to be right, and for the good of the cause of Jesus Christ, with which I had become identified. It was a hard thing to say, but I bless God that I saw the day when that dear young woman became a Christian; and I can truly say to-night that I also thank God that I am free and separated from anything by which my conscience shall be accused in any way whatever in reference to secret organizations.

Paul said: "If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no meat," and we can draw a lesson in the third place, from that. There is the standard: Because of the influence I may have on others who may look at me as a Christian and a preacher, and when I talk with a young man, and he speaks to me about going into one of these organizations, I say don't do it: you are better off out of it.

Coming back on my experience as a jockey; you know it is a hard thing, when you are coming around a track, with hundreds of dollars on your horse, and straining every nerve, you are not looking at your own horse, but at the other man's by the side of you. Going over those jumps in the steeple chase, you are watching each man to see that he goes over fair, and doesn't skip any of them, and doesn't cheat, and to see that he doesn't run into you. You try it in driving out on the street; you see a carriage coming towards you, you are not looking at your horse, you are looking at the other man's, to see how he is going. That is one of the reasons why I came out of the lodge; simply because of the influence I might have on those who are younger than I, and are coming up in this world. I am looking on them just as much as I am looking on myself. I don't think simply of myself, as of the good I might receive by not being with them, but I am thinking of these young men. Oh, my young friends, you that are here to-night,—I don't know whether you are in sympathy with this movement, or whether it is by curiosity, you have come in this meeting to see and hear what was going on, but I want to say to you that if you have become acquainted with a lodge, all that you could find in any Grand Master that you ever sat under, if you will become acquainted with Jesus Christ, you will find Him more than any Grand Master possibly can be to you. If you are willing to put on the harness and go to work, and do all that is necessary for you to do, you will not have time to do anything in the way of carrying out anything that is obligatory on the part of yourself as a member of any secret organization.

Now one word more, and with that I will close. Time is too short, dear friends, for me to waste in a lodge room. All the time that I have, is not too much to be spent in the service of Jesus Christ, in trying to save souls, and as a Christian I feel that no man ought to depend on a lodge, that when he is dead, the lodge is going to take care of his widow and his fatherless children. He ought to have faith in God almighty, that when he is relieved from this earth, the Father that has cared for him will care for his children and his widow. "Put not your confidence in princes," etc. We sometimes distrust God, and do not have confidence in him, from the very fact that we depend on these things into which we go for pecuniary help and financial aid in times of distress. I believe that if we seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, that all these things will be added unto us, for God knows we need them, and that is my reason, dear friends, on this question, why I to-night am free from these things.

Again, I am not here to explain, or violate my obligations that I may have taken in a lodge room, as I told Brother Stoddard I should not, but I am here to warn rather than to expose,—to warn everybody from going into these things, because, as I have said in my remarks, they can find more in the Church of Christ than they can in any lodge.

But after the lodge is closed do all the men go home? They do not: Some go, but all do not go home. Where do they go? I want you to answer me this question. Look for a moment at any of these lodges, and in a rural district especially, as well as the cities, you will find that just as near as a liquor saloon can get planted to one of these lodges, it is sure to be there, because they know that they will thrive. The two lodges, one where I was made a Mason, the other a Knight of Pythias, had each a saloon under them, and when the members came down stairs, after the lodge was closed, those men used to go in there. That used to strike my conscience every time. It was often a struggle for me to resist the temptation, when they would ask me to have a glass, and if it hadn't been for the grace of God, I should have gone, and I should not have been here to-night; I don't know where I should have been.

Dear friends, don't let us "do evil that good may come." I don't believe we can get any good that way. It puts me in mind of the two parrots. One man said he had a terribly wicked parrot, who used to blaspheme all the time; he said to another man, "Now you have a pious parrot, if you will let me take your pious parrot for a time, he will convert mine." But the trouble was, that when they tried that plan, the pious parrot didn't convert the other, but the wicked one converted him, and the pious parrot that prayed swore like a trooper.

That is a very simple illustration, but true. I tell you, dear friends, that nine times out of ten, if you are not careful, when you think you are going to do good, and you can pray like a saint, when you get into some society you may swear when you come out instead of praying.

I was not helped nearer to Christ Jesus by anything I saw in Masonry. There are some things in Masonry which I think are sublime, and there are some things that are ridiculous,—the sublime and the ridiculous blended,—but dear friends, I wish I might say something here to-night to convince you as young people, that in Jesus Christ we find all that is necessary, and more than all, and we have not time to enter these secular things that only distract and weaken our power as workers in the great kingdom of Jesus Christ.

THE LODGE IN FRANCE AND AMERICA.

BY MR. BARRIDGE, OF NEW YORK.

Illuminism, a secret society, now known as Freemasonry, was started about the middle of the last century, with its Grand Lodge in Paris, by Voltaire, whose motto was, "Curse the wretch!" (meaning Christ). It was his boast that he would show the world that one man could overthrow what it took twelve men to establish. Such lodges multiplied rapidly throughout Europe, formed by men of like belief.

The members of these lodges were selected in the universities of learning and elsewhere; influential men furnished them with interesting reading, in which their tenets would be artfully introduced; such were called novitiates. If the effort was successful in overcoming all belief in religion, he would be initiated into the lodge, and a new name would be given him in the lodge—perhaps some Roman or Grecian name. He would know none above him in the higher degrees, only by their titles; any questions he might ask, when written and sent to those above him, would receive an answer; and, if likely to be of use, he might be advanced to higher degrees.

In 1792 the leaders in Germany were discovered and banished.

The Bibles were burned in the streets of Paris.

The tenth day was made a holiday in place of the Sabbath, or seventh day; laws were framed in the lodge, and then passed (a mere form) by the government. The arrests were planned in the lodge, and made in the night; those whose doors were marked would be brought to the executioner's block in the morning. Here the ax was first used, but when many were brought the guillotine was invented. La Fayette was imprisoned for a time.

Napoleon and his marshals were among the initiates in these lodges, and found friends in their campaigns. From Robinson's History of Illuminism, published in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1798, we learn there were three divisions of Illuminees in Ireland; in one of these divisions there were 150,000 men enrolled with the Illuminatio, but there called United Irishmen, who were ready to help Napoleon with his fleet and army, when they landed in Ireland, to invade England; but a storm overtook and scattered the fleet on the way, and they returned to France.

It is estimated that more than 20,000,000 lives were destroyed during the French Revolution, and the male population was so reduced that a premium was given for every illegitimate male child born in France.

There was great rejoicing at Valley Forge, in 1778, at Washington's headquarters, when La Fayette and the news of a treaty of alliance and help from France arrived. But the Illuminees came too, and started lodges in this country; and when Washington was President, the Grand Lodge L'Orient, of Paris, sent Citizen Genet to the lodges of this country. He landed at Charlestown, visited the lodge there and at Portsmouth, and so on to Philadelphia, where, in the absence of Washington, he fitted out a vessel to cruise against the English shipping, inaugurating a serious difficulty between this country and England, and afterward promoting what was known as the whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania, which Washington quelled at an expense of $15,000,000, as Edward Payson has it in his history. It was but natural that Washington should warn his countrymen, in his Farewell Address, to beware of combinations of men to overthrow our government. But affairs changed in France, and Genet was wanted there to be tried. Washington permitted him to remain in this country. A Genet, a grandson of Citizen Genet, was convicted in New York City, in the Tweed "ring" affair, by the jury, but escaped from the officer who had him in charge. Since then he has returned to New York City, but has not been punished.

Edward Payson claimed that there were seventeen known Illuminees' lodges in 1802 in this country.

After the murder of Morgan, in 1826, every Masons' lodge was closed in Western New York for years. It was said by many that Presidents Harrison and Taylor were "removed" from their offices because they were anti-Masons, and attempted to perform their duties faithfully.

After the election of Lincoln and his inauguration, there was a circular sent to the Grand Masters of the lodges of the different States and Past Grand Masters, signed by Albert Pike, Grand Master of the Southern division, and many of the Grand Masters of the different States, North and South, asking them to meet in Louisville, Kentucky, October 16, 1861, and settle the rebellion. The Grand Master of the State of New York opposed the meeting, and published a pamphlet of twenty or more pages, giving the names of those who had signed the call, and stating that when he was made Grand Master of the State, Albert Pike, in his address, had told him it should not interfere with his duties as a citizen; he had convened his lodge and corresponded with other Grand Lodges and Secretary Seward, but had received no answer from Seward.

There were seventeen fires started in New York City hotels in one night; yellow fever clothing was sent there, and the lower Croton reservoir was closed for fear of poison. Our soldiers, when taken prisoners, if they could give the signs and grip, fared well, and were treated as brothers; others suffered the pangs of hunger, and the offer of our government to send them provisions was rejected. Secret meetings became frequent in the North until the attempt, or plan, to liberate the rebel officers who were prisoners on Kelly's Island, in Lake Erie, and the prisoners in Chicago, was frustrated, and the success of the Union army at Gettysburgh gave the promise of the final victory.

At the triennial meetings of Masons they have military drills in different styles of tactics, which are often hotly contested; and prizes are given to those who excel in each style of drill. The Grand Army of the Republic, the Odd-fellows and the Jesuits, it is claimed, have their military leaders drilled. The farmers have their Grange, then the County, State and National Grange, with one chief or master. So each of the trades and professions, as well as the students in many of our institutions of learning, are largely initiated into secret societies. Many of these meet on Saturday evenings and have their refreshments, and often their wine, and are thus unfitted for the duties of the Sabbath; and habits, principles and associates are formed that ruin them for life, while from the ranks of these lower orders, who are so trained, the recruits are often selected for the older societies.

So this contest that was started by Voltaire against the Bible and the Christian religion is increasing. Christ said, "In secret have I said nothing." He is the light of the world, and our only hope for peace in time and eternity.

We are watching with interest his followers in this great contest of secretists with his kingdom. In Christ there is neither male nor female; all are one in him, and woman is now coming to the front in this and all reforms. Give to her the divine right of equality in church and state, and trusting in our Heavenly Father and his Holy Word, we may safely leave the results with him.

The issue of the Wesleyan Methodist, for December 23, published at Syracuse, N. Y., contained quite a full and satisfactory report of the recent Ohio State Anti-secrecy Convention. The fruits of that convention cannot yet be enumerated, but they evidently will be no discredit to its deliberations.

"The Evils of the Lodge System," printed on another page of this issue, although it appeared as a leading editorial in the Christian Conservator, of Dayton, Ohio, is really the address delivered by the editor of that paper, Rev. William Dillon, in the Ohio State Anti-secrecy Convention, at New Concord, last month. It will be read with interest.

The Washington agent, in his letter, printed elsewhere to-day, announces the design of anti-secrecy reformers in New York to hold a convention (D. V.) at an early date. As yet the details are not announced, but will probably appear in next week's issue. The time for such an interchange of views upon this reform in the Empire State seems favorable, and promises to be beneficial in promoting the cause in that important field.

It is worthy of remark that the wife of President Harrison recently gave "an elegant state luncheon to thirty-five ladies"—see our Washington letter—at which the usual serving of wine was omitted. Her example will not only receive approbation from all temperance people, but it has already begun to bring forth a commendable following among her associates at the capital. Her opportunity for discountenancing the use of intoxicants at the White House is very great.

Kate Field's Washington says: "My Eagle does not want a third party. He says if you Republicans and Democrats behaved yourselves there wouldn't be a third party. It is because you are so greedy and stupid and unfair that you force your victims into discontent. Discontent, when armed with votes, is a formidable opponent, right or wrong; and if you do not mend your ways, both of you will have black eyes before you know it. Black eyes artificially administered do not become either your complexion or your dignity." The Eagle is about right. The third party is simply a necessity born of the exigencies of the times. If either of the other two parties named will drop the saloon, the third party will unite with it, and insure it victory.

The recent annual conference of the United Brethren, at Neosho, Kansas, thus gave expression to its sentiments on secret societies: "Resolved, That we are more than ever convinced that the principles of oath-bound secrecy are incompatible with the teachings of God's Word, and are of heathenish and idolatrous origin, and are in no way, as such, to be tolerated by us; but while we ignore such principles we sympathize with those who are deluded and bound by its fetters; therefore we are in strict keeping and heart-sympathy with our restrictive rule, and will put forth every effort under God to hasten the day when all men professing godliness may come out from among the world and be a separate people, and be the worshipers of God, and him only."

France has a population of about 40,000,000, not 1,000,000 of whom are Protestants, and is described by a contemporary as "a nation of harlots and Sodomites." Marriage is said to have largely given way to concubinage, and for every 10,000 marriages, in 1890, says Jules Simons, there were 5,457 divorces granted. The national religion is Roman Catholic, but it is inadequate to convert the masses to even a decent morality, much less to the religion of Jesus Christ. There is a nominal restraint of men's evil passions in the Roman church, but the payment of money to the priesthood will purchase an "indulgence," permitting the commission of the most heinous offences against God and man with perfect impunity. A religion of that character is positively as bad as barbarism; and the present position of France indicates its influence upon any nation that allows it to gain the ascendancy within it.

The year 1892 opens upon us with much for which to be thankful; and while the world is still suffering from the primal curse, and sin abounds, it is with gratitude and praise that we are able to say that grace much more abounds. The past year has been fruitful in stirring events. Satan and wicked men have raged violently, and every device of the evil one to overcome the truth and draw unsuspecting souls into the toils of eternal death has been exercised, too frequently, with fatal success. But, with Garfield, we can yet say, "God rules, and the nation still lives." It is too soon to hear cheering reports of fresh work performed in the Reform field; but the true-hearted lovers of the Lord, judging from the victories of 1891, have very much to encourage them in the prospect of the new year. It is a good time to plan and resolve upon the work to be done, and then, with all earnestness, sincerity and divine help, go forth to do it.

"The Cynosure's last false charge is that 'Freemasonry promotes assassination.' Freemasonry's only penalties are, reprimand, suspension and expulsion. It never takes life, nor sheds blood."—Voice of Masonry. The N. C. A. has printed numerous authentic accounts of Masonic murders, the evidence of which has never been disproved, and as long as the institution exists the list of these atrocities will lengthen. To those of our readers who desire to know just how Masonry punishes its seceding members and other enemies, we cordially commend the careful perusal of a little book, entitled, "Masonic Outrages," complied by Rev. H. H. Hinman, and published at this office—price, 20 cents. Its 69 pages are a complete refutation of the impudent assertions made by the Voice of Masonry and quoted at the beginning of this paragraph. Every day's experience in this office serves to confirm the fact that Masonry is an institution that cannot exist unless it resorts to misrepresentation and brutality. And no matter how often it is convicted of subterfuge, it always comes up smiling, with fresh asseverations of its innocence and goodness.

ANNIVERSARY THOUGHTS.

BY REV. B. F. WORRELL.

"I have been young, but now am old,"
And step aside for younger men
Who are more active, wise and bold
Than I at three score years and ten.

Yes, I am old, but will not lie
About my age, as many do;
Nor will I for a moment try
To show the record is untrue.

Relentless Time, with scythe and glass,
I ask not to reverse his flight,
For we at best are as the grass—
Fresh in the morn, withered at night.

For ten and three-score weary years
(How brief they seem, and yet how long),
I've sojourned in this vale of tears,
Where Right is giving place to Wrong.

My thoughts I turn from days gone by
To ten and sixty years to come,
And read the signs in earth and sky,
Suggesting what may then be done.

Will Charity and Truth hold sway,
And Whites and Blacks be brothers all;
None to oppress, and none to say:
"Go at my nod—come at my call!"

Will hammer, ax and adze be heard
From early dawn to dewy eve;
And none to speak a mystic word
Compelling men their work to leave!

Will all the churches then be filled
With sinners from the lanes and streets,
And janitors, discreet and skilled,
Give Dives and his wife back seats!

Will slums, saloons and brothels, too,
Be closed all night, and through the day,
With nothing more for them to do
Because the saints vote as they pray!

Will a protective tariff then
Stay fixed to meet the people's mind;
Or will the coming Congressmen
Free trade a better method find!

Will purse-proud millionaires, as now,
Combine the markets to control,
And at the shrine of Mammon vow
They'll have their price for grain and coal!

Perhaps the lawless Man of Sin,
As Pope or Czar, will be revealed.
And perilous times be ushered in—
Effects of causes long concealed.

Or, will the Coming One be King,
And reign supreme from shore to shore;
Millennial blessings with him bring
And sin and want be known no more!

POISON.

BY MRS. L. C. ANDREWS.

Where? On the counter of every death-dealing saloon-keeper. On the bar of every liquor-selling hotel. On the shelf of every habitual drinker. In the stomach and system of every victim to drunkenness. In the grave of every buried drunkard. It is estimated—and let this estimation be repeated again and again, until it shall enter the ears and lodge in the hearts of the unconcerned millions—it is estimated that drunk eness sends one hundred thousand souls yearly to eternal judgment.

Poisoned, spirit and body! Who has got to answer for this sweeping, heaven-daring murder? Tremble, ye that are guilty. Has the drunkard? Yes. Has the liquor-vender? Yes. Has the town or city that licenses the sale of this horrible poison? Yes. Is the state or government responsible? Yes. It is poison, and let it be treated as such. Remember, one hundred thousand yearly go down to drunkards' graves. What poisoned morals they have set in motion; what baleful influence they leave behind them. Where are their sons and daughters? What influence will they have on morals and government, unless saved by the blessed influence of Jesus, who alone is the "Light of the world;" who alone can save from sin and sorrow? He who is an abiding, faithful friend to all that put their trust in him.

God's all-seeing eye rests upon every vender of ardent spirits, upon every one that votes for licensing the hell-born traffic, upon every one who is unmoved and cares not for the misery, lawlessness and wretchedness this virulent foe to humanity is producing. Let professing Christians tell of what Jesus has done for them and remain uncaring for this awful havoc of purity, happiness and life, here and hereafter, this blight upon everything that is lovely and sacred. It is mockery, heaven-daring mockery. God, who is a merciful God to repenting sinners, is also a God of judgment. His all-seeing eye has penetrated the secrets of all the ages, and woe to him who victimizes his fellow-beings. Let the nation shrink with shame when the heathen hurl back into the face of so-called Christian America, "We want neither your religion nor your whiskey." Oh, that they could only know that the religion of our blessed Jesus has nothing to do with the fiery plague, only to oppose it. As a Christian government we are under obligation to God to make laws that shall agree with the teaching of his Word. Good government emanates from the bosom of God. God warns, and God reproves nations as well as individuals; and let man warn his brother man—not only by lectures, letters and speeches; but may "Poison" be inscribed upon every bottle of liquor that will make man drunk. God knows it is a poison, both to life and morals—a poison whose effects will last through the endless ages of eternity.

DANIEL'S VISION OF TIME.—I.

BY B. EISENTRAUT.

During the Jewish captivity of seventy years in Babylon, the prophet Daniel interpreted the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, about 603 years B. C., of the four kingdoms of the world. Near fifty years after, he recorded his own vision of time in the seventh chapter. The Roman Empire is again referred to in Dan. 7: 7, in saying: "After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces; and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts before it; and it had ten horns."

The three beasts, or kingdoms, preceding the fourth being spoken of in your issue of Dec. 3, are therefore here omitted.

The Roman Empire extended, in the beginning of the Christian era, to the river Euphrates on the east, to the sandy deserts of Arabia and Africa on the south; the Atlantic ocean was its western boundary, and the rivers Rhine and Danube its northern limit. The Mohammedans reduced the Roman authority in many provinces of the east and south in the seventh and eighth centuries. The prophet spoke of no foreign enemy in his predictions of this fourth kingdom, but illustrated its own dissensions and weakness in breaking in pieces and stamping the residue with its feet.

The papacy of Rome had gained sufficient influence and strength from about A. D. 500, on until 800, to rise above the power of the legal emperor at Constantinople, to execute and gratify their earthly ambition in causing a division of the empire. Pope Leo III. caused it to break in pieces. All former laws of obedience between the popes of Rome and the emperors were rejected, their authority trodden under foot. The account of the great change is noticed thus in James Bryce's history of the holy Roman Empire as recorded by an ancient writer: "And because the name of emperor had now ceased among the Greeks, and their empire was possessed by a woman, it then seemed both to Leo the pope himself, and to all the holy fathers, who were present in the self-same council, as well as to the rest of the Christian people, that they ought to take to be emperor Charles, King of the Franks, who held Rome herself, where the Cæsars had always been wont to sit, and all the other regions which he ruled through Italy and Gaul and Germany; and inasmuch as God had given all these lands into his hand, it seemed right that, with the help of God and at the prayer of the whole Christian people, he should have the name of Emperor also; whose petition King Charles willed not to refuse, but, submitting himself with all humility to God, and at the prayer of the priests and of the whole Christian people, on the day of the nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ he took on himself the name of Emperor, being consecrated by the lord pope Leo."

Earthly rulers, described as being as strong as iron, became mixed with the pottery of Rome, the clay. (Dan. 2: 41.) The prophet Daniel speaks of this falling in pieces three times in this chapter, before the "ten horns" are mentioned. This western kingdom, or empire, branched out into ten different nationalities, and was ruled as a united confederacy, in A. D. 1500.

Dan. 7: 8: "I considered the horns, and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots; and behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things."

We find, in Dan. 7: 24, that these ten horns represented ten kings. The prophet gave a graphic account of this form of government, showing that one of the ten kings acted as chief ruler, in saying three horns, or kingdoms, were plucked up under one of these horns. This occurred under Charles V., who, as king of Spain, was chosen as emperor in A. D. 1519, holding this office until 1556. The Reformation sprung up during this man's reign, causing England, Scotland and Denmark to shake off the papal yoke of Rome, and consequently their connection with the Roman Empire.

This man had the opportunity to see and hear the Gospel preached, not only at Worms, in 1521, when Luther appeared before him, but also at Augsburg, in 1530, where other representatives and defenders of the Bible stood before him. He sat as a divine judge over Luther in 1521, and over the doctrine of Protestantism in 1530. Daniel justly described him, in saying: "in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things." He condemned the Bible and the doctrine of Martin Luther.

Dan. 7: 10: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened."

The prophet's language appears as a panoramic scene over the world's history, with its many centuries of time of the Christian era. The thrones of this fourth kingdom received a piercing wound in the days of the Reformation, when three kingdoms seceded. The power and authority of this anti-Christian kingdom had to be abolished in order to prepare a freer pathway for Gospel missionaries in this century. Bible societies began to form near 1806, when the Roman Empire came to its end.

The dial-plate of time was to prepare the way for the message of the kingdom, as Christ said, Matthew 24: 14: "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." The power of the Holy Spirit was to flow as a fiery stream from his ministering servants before the books were to be opened for judgment.

Dan. 7: 11: "I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake, I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." I have shown the harmony of history with the prophecy of the horns; the little horn which had eyes and spake great things arrayed itself against the law of God and the Bible. Charles V. endeavored to perpetuate the papal throne. Daniel saw the earthly thrones cast down. He passes on further down the stream of time, and says: "I beheld even till the beast was slain." St. John saw the beast with seven heads and ten horns. He also describes Rome as the seat of the beast, as the seat of the woman—the Roman Catholic church, with its seven mountains (Rev. 17: 9.), the seven-hill city of Rome.

Dan. 7: 12: "As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away; yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time." The intervening period, in which we now live, after the fall of the empire of 1806 and the day of judgment is wonderfully described in this prophecy, showing positively that the emperors would first be removed, but the lives of the beasts (the papacy) were to be prolonged for a season and time. This has literally been fulfilled now, for 85 years past. Condemnation is to be its final doom; it is to be given to the burning flame.

The prophet passes on now to the scene of judgment itself in saying: "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; and all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not pass away."

This is not to be a universal salvation, as is preached by many of this age; Daniel said (verse 18), "But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even for ever and ever."

SHALL OUR NATION BE HEATHEN OR CHRISTIAN?

In an address before the professors and students of Luther Academy, at Wahoo, Nebraska, Friday evening, Dec. 11th, Rev. M. A. Gault disputed our claim to be a Christian government. After showing that our national and State constitutions, political platforms, and Thanksgiving proclamations ignored Christ, and that our national Sabbath desecration and legalized liquor traffic were in defiance of his law, he said: "Our government, like that of ancient Israel, is now honeycombed with forms of false religions. What brought ruin upon that nation was the fact that upon so many hill-tops were erected heathen altars to false gods. In nearly every town and city in our land we have established and chartered such heathen altars, not on hill-tops and in groves, but in halls in upper stories of buildings. These secret lodges are false religions, as dishonoring to God as were the altars of Baal. Their great influence is antagonistic to the church of Christ. The churches aim to make Christ the center of their service, and prayers, and work. These lodges exclude his name from their ritual, and even from their prayers. The churches welcome all to their services, and bind their members to give the widest publicity to their doctrines and creed. But the lodges meet in halls with blinded windows and tyled doors, and obligate their members, by horrid oaths and death penalties, to ever conceal and never reveal what is done inside. They exclude from their membership those afflicted with consumption or other chronic diseases, and all who are unable to pay their dues. They also exclude women, except from side-arrangements they call Eastern Star and Rebekah degrees. In the churches no such selfish distinctions are recognized, but all are regarded as one in Christ. How they differ in regard to their treatment of enemies: The churches teach us to love our enemies, do good to them that hate us, and pray for them that spitefully use us. But the lodges boycott, vilify, and even assassinate their enemies. These lodges far outnumber the churches. In the city of New York alone, there are said to be 2,000 of these secret lodges. They lead young men away from the church, and absorb their time, money and interest that should be devoted to the church. Their sworn favoritism is becoming a source of jealousy and alarm, and is rapidly destroying the harmony and mutual confidence that constitutes the cement of our social structure. Their system is in defiance of law, both ecclesiastical and civil. Thomas Smith Webb, one of their highest authorities, says of the Masonic covenant: 'No law of the land can affect it; no anathema of the church weaken it. It is irrevocable.' Robert Morris, another of their highest authorities, says: 'Right or wrong, his very existence as a Mason hangs upon obedience to the powers immediately set above him. Failure in this must infallibly bring down expulsion, which, as a Masonic death, ends all.'

'The Grand Lodge Report of the State of Missouri says of Masonry: 'It proclaims and practices, not that the will of the masses is wise and good, and as such to be obeyed,—not that the majority shall govern. Not only do we know no North, no South, no East and no West, but we know no government save our own. To every government save that of Masonry, and to each and all alike, we are foreigners. We are a nation of men only, bound to each other by Masonic ties as citizens of the world, and that world the world of Masonry—brethren to each other all the world over, foreigners to all the world beside. For ourselves, we deny as Masons that any civil government on earth has the right to divide or curtail Masonic jurisdiction when once established.'

'Thus these lodges, by their own confession, are a wicked conspiracy against the state as well as the church. By their trial by jury is transformed into an engine of fraud and despotism. And experience is teaching us that it is impossible to secure the enforcement of law where the judges who are to execute it, the sheriffs who are to select the juries, and the mayor and aldermen who are to select and control the police, and the police themselves, are elected from the ranks of those who are members of secret societies, sworn and pledged to obey each others signs, grips and pass-words.'

THE EVILS OF THE SECRET LODGE SYSTEM.

The first fruit of the fall led man to hide himself. His discovered nakedness led him to invest himself with an apron—an incomplete covering.

The lodge must be viewed as a system. Intrinsically, some of the orders are worse than others; but adopting the same plan they all fall under the ban of the Bible and good morals. The lot of swine into which Christ sent the devils, expelled from men, varied. Some were older, black and ferocious; others were young, white and mild, but every one had a devil. What are the exceptionable features in the secret lodge system? I answer:

1. The mode of operating. The secret mode of operating is condemned by the Word of God as wrong. Jesus says: "He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God." "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds be reproved."

Here Jesus mentions no act, he only names two modes taken: the one giving evidence of doing truth, the other of doing evil. He that wishes to deceive, steal, or operate any wrong work, takes the plan of darkness. The saloon paints its windows and screens its doors, the thief or burglar chooses the cover of night, the assassin prefers darkness. A fisherman said he always aimed to keep out of sight while his baited barbed hook deceived the fish. To this it is objected by the lodge advocate that families have their secrets. We answer, not properly secrets, but matters that are private. It is known to all that every cleanly person changes his garments at regular intervals, yet it is a matter of privacy, not publicity. But suppose a family should swear a servant at their threshold not to reveal anything he should see in the family, binding himself under no less a penalty than having his throat cut across, his tongue torn out and buried beneath the rough sands of the sea, would it not frighten him away? Do secret orders have secrets for decency's sake? If not, the analogy does not hold, and their objection is groundless. If so, they acknowledge the indecency of their secret work.

2. The orders set up a false religion, the competitor and counterfeit of the true. It is counted wrong to counterfeit money. The government lays heavy penalties on counterfeiters to deter from it. But how displeasing it must be to God to see men simulate religion. After all God's outlay of love and sacrifice to give men the true religion, how sinful to invent a man-originated system and hold it forth as sufficient to save men in heaven. This they do, proposing man's salvation without any true principle, doctrine, or practice of the Christian system. They do not as Freemasons acknowledge the Bible. The twenty-first landmark of Masonry says: "The twenty-first landmark consists of the book of the law, for by this is not meant necessarily the Old and New Testament Scriptures, but that volume which in any country, by the religion of the country, is supposed to report the revealed will of the Grand Architect of the universe. In a Christian country, this may consist of the Old and New Testament Scriptures; in a Jewish country, the Old Testament alone would be sufficient; and among Mohammedan Masons, the Koran might be substituted." (Mackey's Masonic Jurisprudence.) This is an unalterable landmark, and by it Masons have no more regard for the Bible than they have for the Koran, and it is only an accident of our country that the Bible is found in lodges here. If Mohammedanism prevailed, the Koran would be their sacred book in their lodge. The compass and square is always present in every country, but the Bible is not; therefore the compass and square is Masonically put ahead of the Bible. The Freemasons do not recognize the moral law. They say: "Every Mason is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law;" but Mackey explains what he means by the moral law: "The moral law is not to be confined to the decalogue, but rather the Lex natura, or law of nature." The orders do not recognize Jesus Christ, but refuse and reject this corner-stone from their building, the Scriptures they quote and the prayers they offer. Steinbrenner, in his history of the Chapter, page 44, says: "We cannot admit the name of the so-called Messiah to appear in any of our Scriptural quotations or ceremonies." In all the Masonic monitors Christ's name is expunged from the Scripture quoted. We refer the reader to Webb's Monitor, Sickels', Morris', Mores', Davis', and others. Seven Masonic monitors, published by the fraternity themselves, we examined at one time, and all of them strike out that most excellent name known in earth from passages quoted from 2 Thessalonians third chapter and sixth verse. The Mirror and Keystone in one of its issues said that it would destroy harmony, the basis of Masonry, to allow Christ's name used in prayer in the lodge. What should be the opinion of the Christian as to the orders that cannot allow Christ's name used in the lodge? Dare they enter or affiliate with them? In the State of Illinois, a Methodist preacher was assured that Odd-fellowship was religious, and had its devotional prayers; but having become a member, he observed that no prayer was used. He inquired of the Noble Grand, who was a Disciple minister, why they had no prayer. He told him that the reason was that it was not agreeable with their laws to pray in Christ's name, and he did not like to pray without using his name, and therefore omitted prayer. The Methodist preacher asked the lodge if that was the nature of Odd-fellows' laws, and a discussion arose on it, which was settled by the conclusion that Christ's name could not be used in prayer in the lodge. The Methodist preacher bid them a final good-by, and left the lodge forever. This is an example every Christian Odd-fellow should imitate. The orders do not recognize the God of the Bible. The Masons and Odd-fellows, and secret societies in general, reject the Son Jesus Christ; and God's Word says: "Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father." The Masons have the picture of the rising son, with the words Jehovah Yah Baal, to represent their deity. They are willing to take any kind of bible, and any god that is popular with the people of any country to be their Masonic god. They have no principles of their own. These orders indorse much evil. The Mason pledges himself to keep secret every crime in the catalogue but murder and treason, in the Master's degree; and these two heinous crimes against life and government he agrees to conceal in the Royal Arch degree. There also he agrees to help a companion Royal Arch Mason out of any difficulty, if in his power, whether right or wrong. He assumes Satan's counterfeit, for God's law of love. The true is distinguished from the false by its universality, while the false is so limited as to deprive it of virtue. Christ's law requires love to all nations, tongues and tribes of earth; to an enemy, a persecutor, to those who curse us, and despitefully use us. On it there is neither limit nor restrictions. The devil's law of love says, I will love you if you get into my clique. Through the Grangers it says, I will sell you coal oil cheaply if you can give me a sign. By the Odd-fellow it says, I will not cheat a brother, nor allow it done by others, if in my power to prevent it. Which allows them to cheat all outside their lodge. The Freemason says, I will not cheat a brother of this degree to the amount of one cent, I knowing him to be such. What if he does not know him to be such? or what if he is not of that degree? Then go for him and gouge him. The G. A. R. says, "I will never wrong a soldier nor his family, nor suffer others to wrong them, if it is in my power to prevent it." What if not a soldier but a civilian? Then he is free to defraud him. These limitations, which run through all the secret orders, show them to be the devil's law of love, which Christ declares is thankless and devoid of virtue. Yet with all these defects and want of religious principles these orders set it up as a religion, which transfers them by death from the lodge below to the Grand Lodge above. The Freemason who throws the accacia, or sprig of evergreen, into the dead Mason's grave, is taught by Masonic authority to say that "accacia means innocence or freedom from sin," because "a Mason by living up to all the precepts and obligations of Masonry is thereby free from sin." The Masonic and Odd-fellow authorities are careful to say that the chief thing is not charity with them; but J. J. Shepherd said in an address in Boston before Lincoln Lodge: "The object and design of our order is, the permanent union of good men for the promotion of their moral and eternal well-being." These lodges find that the people weary of their works as a matter of charity, for of that they have not an iota; that they do not realize on it as a beneficiary society, because they do not pay back half of what is put in their treasury. So they tell their members that eternal good is the object, because no one comes back to report whether he realized on his investment. No good cause needs a secret society to operate it, and a bad cause should not have it. Secret societies pervert justice, set up a system of partiality, administer horrible oaths, with death penalties, take wrong obligations, strike the name of Jesus from Scripture, leave it out of prayer, set up a Christless system of religion founded on works, and their works are evil; they cut across the natural relations of life and set up artificial relations founded on sinful partiality and respect of persons. Let those who are in them come out from them and be separate, and let those who are out stay out.—Rev. Wm. Dillon, in the Christian Conservator.

BEVERAGES OF THE "MYSTIC SHRINE."

There is quite a kick among some of the boys about the late banquet at the Mystic Shriners. As the story goes, there were two kinds of wine ordered—"Mumm's Extra Dry" for the select few and "Cook's Imperial" for the crowd of assembled guests. Some one got onto the scheme, and Bill Michie, who had the providing in charge, was called up, and they had a mock trial. The fun of it was that Michie pleaded guilty and said that Melish told him to. The cat was out of the bag, and there has been no end of "kicking" about it.—From an Ohio paper.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The grip in New England.—A Masonic mystery.—Garrison's open letter on the D. K. E.—President Eliot's strange position.—A testimony from J. H. Neesima.

A while ago a distinguished scientist told us that the earth was moving towards the glacial period, though he rather took the edge off this alarming statement by the further information that we had already entered it and were five hundred years on the way! And now another equally eminent authority tells us just the contrary; that it is really another period of tropical warmth towards which our little planet has its face turned. Which is the nonscientific mind going to believe? Most of us will incline to the latter as the pleasanter theory, though we can hardly be expected to feel a very lively interest in the climate of our earth twenty thousand years from now. But the question whether we are at the present time passing through local climatic changes which effect health and longevity is one of some immediate interest, as, according to the doctors, the unseasonable weather now prevailing presents the most favorable conditions for the grip microbe, which (they say) it only needs a spell of cold, clear winter weather to kill. It is a fact that the old-time "sleighting season" seems to have disappeared from a large area of New England, and the prospects are that a future generation, if it wants to enjoy such delights, must employ artificial means, like Louis XIV., who had the drive-ways to his newly finished palace of Versailles covered several inches deep with salt for the accommodation of a royal sleighing party, the profligate woman who then governed him, and through him France, having decided that all which was needed to fill up the sum of its attractions was a sleighride in June!

Boston is having the grip severely, and reports of its ravages come from all our New England towns and villages. The drugs with which many people will persist in dosing themselves are no doubt responsible for many of the cases of insanity from this cause. In old times—and the custom has by no means quite died out—a dose of whisky was considered to be of marvelous virtue for breaking up an attack of influenza; but Dr. Durgin, chairman of the city's Board of Health, tells all these deluded mortals that "it is just like adding shavings to fire," and that "good food properly cooked is the best preventive." Dr. Durgin's view is that taken by all doctors of any note in their profession, and shows how temperance and medical science are beginning to clasp hands once more after their long divorce. It will be remembered that the epidemic first started among the starving peasants of Asiatic-Russia. Asia, with her ill-fed millions, has always been a kind of Pandora's box, from which have been emptied most of the plagues that have desolated humanity.

I have before mentioned the Boston Political class, composed entirely of ladies, who meet on alternate Wednesday afternoons in the Church of the Disciples and discuss knotty points of government and constitutional law. At a recent meeting the question came up why Almy should have been tried after confessing his guilt, and Gov. Andrews' refusal to sign the death-warrant of Green after he had been found guilty of the murder of young Converse of Malden, and sentenced by the judges of the Supreme Court, was cited in answer. Gov. Andrews, it will be remembered, based his refusal on a legal technicality;—the fact that there had been no trial, as Green had waived his right to one by pleading guilty. But these good ladies will have to add to their political studies a knowledge of the beauties of Freemasonry;—that system that swears a man to help a lodge brother out of any difficulty, and which, in this case, without any doubt was the cause which kept Gov. Andrews from exercising his executive prerogative, before they can have a full understanding of many such mysterious points. Gov. Andrews was a Mason; so was Green. The next governor that came in happened to owe no allegiance to any oath-bound organization, and promptly ordered Green's execution. Why did the father of young Converse, the boy he so brutally shot down, take himself temporarily out of the way when a petition was in circulation to remit the death-penalty in the case of his son's murderer? Because he was himself a Mason and his Masonic vow would have required him to sign it.

In connection with this subject, the commotion stirred up by William Lloyd Garrison's letter to President Eliot regarding the barbarous practices employed in initiating candidates into the D. K. E. society deserves more than a passing mention. Nothing has occurred of late to so draw public attention to these undesirable adjuncts of college life as his sharp arraignment, the text of which is as follows:

"The secret society known as the D. K. E. has long been a source of scandal and of private indignation. Aside from the witless penalties attending the initiation of members, a cruelty has been superadded, akin to the barbarism of the Feejee Islands. In the case which has just come under my observation, six deep and savage burns, from the shoulder to the elbow, were inflicted with a lighted cigar. Life-long scars and disfigurement are bad enough, but the shock to systems already reduced in vitality by previous physical exertions is severe and dangerous. In comparison with a cigar, a branding iron would be merciful, but it seems necessary to add to the danger of the burn that of blood-poisoning.

"In common with other societies which flourish in your sight, a bar providing intoxicating liquors is here maintained, contrary to law and decent morals. Only last year many of our respected citizens had the mortification of seeing their sons arraigned in open court and fined for this offence.

"I ask with solicitude whether such proceedings are beyond your control."

Astonishing as it may seem, Pres. Eliot is reported as saying that they are beyond his control;—a disgraceful confession, if true. He has said, if the newspapers report him correctly, that no official notice will be taken of the letter; that the D. K. E. society has been in existence for a long time, and the custom of branding candidates for initiation on the arm with a cigar has been in vogue for twenty years past. "It is entirely voluntary. We cannot prevent it." It nearly takes away one's breath to think of the head of an institution like Harvard arguing in this fashion. Must age secure immunity for a bad custom? "It is voluntary." So are the sacrifices to Juggernaut, and the terrible hook-swinging of the Hindoo devotee. Are we to understand that Pres. Eliot would deny the right of a government to put down such atrocities because the acts were voluntary on the part of the deluded victims. "We cannot prevent it." Why does he not say in plain terms that he lacks the courage to strike at the roots of this evil and banish secret societies from the college, or else that he does not want to do it? Pres. Eliot's extreme conservatism has led him into some strange positions for one of the country's foremost leaders in education. In his zeal for the election of Cleveland, six years ago, he advocated the pernicious theory that the private character of a political candidate had nothing to do with his public life; while his vote has always been cast in favor of license. It scarcely needs to be added that he is also a firm and consistent opposer of Woman Suffrage and co-education. The lawlessness of Harvard students is proverbial, but with a president and faculty so wanting in backbone, what is to be expected? It is only a few months since the public had an inside view of Harvard's secret club-rooms through the revelations of the Cambridge police courts, which fined twenty-five of the students $65 each for keeping illicit bars under the cover of their Greek letter societies. And a white-ribboner has recently called my attention to a paragraph in the Life and Letters of Joseph Hardy Neesima, the converted Japanese, which details his experience when on a visit to Yale College: "Some careless fellows thought I was a society man and invited me to D. K. E. society hall. The room used for the literary purpose is very well furnished. I saw there many glasses and wine-bottles on the stairs. So I am glad to find out what secret meant."

I believe that Garrison's letter is one of those Providential "eye-openers" which are coming so fast and from so many different quarters that it would seem as if the blindest might come in time to see the light, unless so effectually hoodwinked that they are in the condition of certain people of Holy Writ: "Hear ye indeed, but understand not, and see ye indeed, but perceive not."

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

The late Prof. Dr. L. Bischoff, of Munich, was one of the leading physiologists in Europe to defend the hypothesis of the mental inferiority of women over against men, chiefly on the ground of the facts he claimed to have observed that the average weight of a man's brain is 1,350 grains (gramm), but of woman's only 1,250. After his death the post mortem elicited the interesting fact that his own brain weighed only 1,245 grains.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 30, 1891.

Washington had the pleasure, this week, of welcoming the learned members of five national organizations, which promise to play no small parts in the future history of our country, although, in the main, their present efforts are only towards the gathering and preservation of historic material.

The first of these—the Modern Language Association of America—met Monday evening in the lecture-room of the Columbian University. The late James Russell Lowell was president of this association, which has for its members some of the best-known literateurs of America. Prof. T. W. Hunt, of Princeton College, who presided over the meetings, read a very interesting paper yesterday on James Russell Lowell as a prose writer.

Tuesday evening, at the same place, the National Historical Association, organized at Saratoga, N. Y., in September, 1884, for the promotion of interest in historical subjects, held the first meeting of its eighth annual session. This association now has 622 members, of whom 104 are life-members. The meeting was opened with an address by Hon. William Wirt Henry, president, followed by three papers on Southern History, by Francis N. Thorpe, of the University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Jeffrey R. Brackett, of Baltimore, and Lyon G. Tyler, president of William and Mary College, Virginia. On the program for the session are the following papers: "The United States and the Slave Trade," by N. E. B. Du Bois, of Harvard; "Lotteries in American History," by A. R. Spofford, Librarian of Congress; "Parliamentary Government in Canada," by J. G. Bourfinot; "Phenomena of Universal Suffrage," by Prof. William A. Dunning, of New York, and "The United States and International Arbitrations," by Prof. John Bassett Moore, of Columbia College, New York. Owing to the many prevalent rumors of the intention of this country to declare war upon Chili, the last-named paper is very timely, and the fact that Prof. Moore, its author, has but recently resigned the office of Assistant Secretary of State, gives it a status and a significance that it could not otherwise have.

The American Forestry Association is holding its tenth annual session here. This afternoon it held a public meeting, at which President Adams, of Cornell University, delivered an address on the needs of forestry education in the United States. The officers of this association are: William Alvord, of California, president; Dr. Henry M. Fisher, of Pennsylvania, treasurer; Dr. N. H. Eggleston, of the Agricultural Department, recording secretary; E. A. Bowers, of Washington, corresponding secretary, and a vice-president for each State in the Union.

The American Society of Church History began its fourth annual meeting Tuesday evening. To-day it has held two sessions, and to-night its members will attend a reception tendered by Rev. T. S. Hamlin, of the Church of the Covenant.

The American Folk-Lore Society, which has for its object the gathering of the folk-lore of all American races, is also in session here. Prof. Otis T. Mason, of the Smithsonian Institution, is president of this society.

President Harrison gave a special reception to-day at 1 o'clock to the members of all these societies and their families, which was attended by the most of them.

Mrs. Harrison gave an elegant state luncheon to thirty-five ladies yesterday, and by her action in not serving wines she has earned the gratitude of all the temperance people, set a good example for society entertainers to follow, and demonstrated that a successful entertainment may be given without wine. It is hoped the example will bear good fruit on New Year's Day, and that no lady will offer her callers wine or other intoxicating liquors. At least two ladies who attended Mrs. Harrison's luncheon have announced that no wines or liquors will be allowed upon their refreshment tables on that day.

An adjourned meeting of the United Christian Commission was held yesterday, to receive the report of the Committee on Resolutions. The committee reported in favor of a Chaplain for every army post occupied by two or more companies, the erection of library buildings, the creation of libraries, a change of the barracks so that not more than four men shall be required to live and sleep in one room, the expulsion of all alcoholic drinks from military reservations, the creation in all denominations of a board whose recommendation shall be necessary to secure an appointment of chaplain in the army or navy, in order to prevent the appointment of unworthy persons, and urging the abatement of gambling. After adopting the report the Commission adjourned.

REFORM NEWS.

PROGRESS OF THE CAUSE IN IOWA.

BLANCHARD, Iowa, Dec. 22, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—For several years the Blanchard, Iowa, W. C. T. U. met at the home of Grandma Pruella Baker, because of her feeble health and her deep interest in reform work. She spent her childhood in Monroe Co., N. Y., her parents' home being on the Ridge road, near Brockport. She relates that, one summer afternoon in 1826, she and her sister, now Mrs. Delilah Merrill, of Farmington, Ill., saw the carriage pass their home carrying Capt. Wm. Morgan to his death in the Niagara River. She remembers distinctly that it was a sultry afternoon, and their curiosity was excited by seeing the carriage, with its doors all closed, driven rapidly along the road. The excitement which soon followed the abduction left no doubt in their minds as to the identity of the carriage.

Grandma Leuty and Grandma Adams, formerly of College Springs, and Mrs. James Bullock all reside now in Blanchard. Their husbands, who went home to glory several years ago, are still well remembered as the most devoted friends of the anti-secrecy reform, and their homes were often resting-places for anti-secret lecturers. Let these bereaved widows have a place in the prayers of all friends of the cause.

I addressed six audiences, recently, at Wahoo, Nebraska; two in the Covenanter church, two in the M. E. church, one in the Congregational church and one in Luther Academy of the Swedish Lutheran church. Prof. S. M. Hill, at the head of this promising young institution, numbering about seventy students, is deeply interested in the anti-secret reform. He desires to have the Masonic degrees worked before the students, and requested me to put him in correspondence with some of the degree workers. Will the Cynosure editors please comply with this request? The Covenanter church at Wahoo will co-operate in this work. Dr. H. P. McClurkin has recently resigned as pastor of this congregation, and has gone over to the United Presbyterians, but all the congregation are standing by the old Blue banner except one family. They have an elegant church, located opposite the court house. A Covenanter minister, Rev. James Wallace, made the dedication prayer when the corner-stone of the court house was laid, in 1874. It was laid with Covenanter instead of Masonic ceremonies, and with a copy of the Christian Statesman and a copy of the Covenanter sealed up in the corner-stone, this congregation being the only one then in Wahoo. We presume it is the only court house in this country whose corner-stone was laid with Covenanter ceremonies. Like all Nebraska county seats, Wahoo is now a stronghold of secret orders; but there are two churches free from their infection, and they will welcome any of the N. C. A. reformers.

COLLEGES OF SOUTHERN OHIO.

OBERLIN, Ohio, Dec. 30, '91.

I went, Dec. 7, to Oxford, Ohio, and visited Miami University, which is an old and flourishing institution, and has a large library. I consulted Prof. Merrill, who is librarian, and he, very cordially, agreed to receive our reform books.

From Oxford I went to Dayton, where I tarried a few days, and looked into the library of the Union Biblical Seminary. I found four or five anti-secrecy volumes already there. This is a United Brethren institution, and Dr. Drury, who is librarian, intimated that secretism is no more than a side-issuc in the differences in their church; and not of such central importance as has been represented. He said they would receive our reform literature with pleasure.

One day, while at Dayton, I went over to Germantown to visit Twin Valley College. But I found it to be comparatively a private enterprise, with no suitable place to deposit our books. Prof. Brown, who is an Odd-fellow, is at the head of this college; and he made many apologies for the followers of secretism.

At Xenia, I found the United Presbyterian Theological Seminary in full operation; and it appears to be well-manned, with a large number of students in attendance. The institution seems to be in full accord with the National Christian Association, and I made arrangements with Prof. Ross to donate some reform volumes to their library. The next day I walked three or four miles out to Wilberforce College, as there is no railroad there. They have excellent buildings, and about 200 students; and a good number of them are advanced scholars. This is the only Freedmen's College, I think, in Ohio. I counted seventeen volumes of the Carpenter library on their shelves, in good condition. After hearing some recitations, and taking dinner with Pres. Mitchell, he took me in his buggy back to Xenia.

Antioch College is located at Yellow Springs, Greene Co., O., and is, I think, one of the earlier institutions of learning in the State. When I arrived there, Pres. D. A. Long was sick in bed; but the assistant librarian received me kindly and invited me to dinner. Afterward I saw Prof. Amos R. Wells, and arranged to send some of our anti-secrecy volumes to their library. They have J. Q. Adams on Freemasonry already.

At Wilmington, Clinton Co., there is a college sustained by the-orthodox Friends, who are quite numerous in the town. The president, J. B. Unthank, seemed to be quite favorable to our reform work; and I arranged to send seven or eight volumes of anti-secrecy literature for their library.

From Wilmington I went to Columbus, where there are two large universities. Far out on the north side of the city is the State University, with plenty of room on the campus for the military drill, which was in operation when I arrived. The State seems to give the institution a liberal support, and the attendance is large; but the leprosy of Freemasonry appeared to me to pervade the whole management. The University of Michigan, and that of Iowa, were ready to receive literature on all sides of all questions which interested the citizens of their State. But not so the University of Ohio. The librarian, Dr. Derby, said that he was a Mason, and must consult a committee, etc., etc.

Capital University is far out on the east side of the city, and is an Evangelical Lutheran institution. It is thoroughly in sympathy with all Gospel reforms, and I soon arranged to place some anti-secrecy volumes in the library there.

Yours, S. F. PORTER.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PEACE ON EARTH MEANS PEACE.

OBERLIN, O., Dec. 30, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Oberlin, like the rest of the Christian world, drifts towards ritualism, the observance of holidays, and especially of Christmas. Happily, the extravagances and dissipations that are practiced in some places do not prevail here. It would be still better if the Puritanic example of entirely ignoring this heathen festival which, most manifestly, was not the birthday of our Lord, were strictly adhered to.

The current influence, in nearly all our Protestant denominations, is towards Rome. With but few exceptions, an esthetic formalism is taking the place of practical piety, and the church of Laodicea has become the type of Protestant Christianity.

But what I wished particularly to mention was some thoughts suggested by Dr. Brand's sermon, on the 26th, in the First Church. His subject was "International Peace." It was an able, instructive discourse, and contained but little to which I could not subscribe. He held that Christ came to bring peace on earth and good will to men, and that the final effect of the Gospel will be to secure this result. He said that the motives, the passions, and the whole spirit of war, are forbidden by the Gospel, and that just so far as the nations come to be pervaded by true Christian principles, they will seek for and maintain peace. The Gospel of Christ is the only efficient remedy for war. There are, and always have been, an abundance of prudential considerations why nations should abstain from war. The present "armed peace" of Europe, which is really no peace, grows out of mutual fear, and is liable at any time to break out in a dreadful conflagration. Christ alone can secure peace.

So far, none could dissent. But the one dead fly that spoiled this sweet pot of ointment was the statement that war was sometimes unavoidable, and therefore lawful, and that Christians might sometimes engage in it. In other words, the example and teachings of Christ (though he did not say it) admit of exceptions, and that we may sometimes resist evil and resort to retaliation and revenge. For, he held, since human selfishness may be combined against us, and use force for our subjugation, we, too, may appeal to force and adopt all the methods and incidents of war for our protection.

Precisely the same arguments can be made for secret societies and for dissimulation and overreaching in trade. In either case it is a resort to selfish methods, to resist selfish encroachment. The difference is, that in war there is not only a resort to hypocrisy and fraud, but also to violence and murder. It is, alike in all cases, an effort to overcome evil with evil, and to do evil that good may come. The trades-unions say that "human society is at war with us. They seek to secure our labor for the smallest possible compensation; we, therefore, conspire to get the largest possible pay, and to drive out all laborers who will not unite with us."

Secret societies are organized for defensive war, but when it suits them they become aggressive against the unoffending. In all cases they appeal to motives and principles that are forbidden by the Gospel of Christ. But if this be true of secret societies, much more is it true of all wars, whether offensive or defensive.

The truth is, that if the example of Christ is worthy of our imitation, it ought always to be followed. If his teachings and commands are valid, they ought to be obeyed and admit of no exceptions. If we are to love our enemies, to bless them that curse us, and do good to them that spitefully use us, we are not to wage war against them and kill them. If we are not to be "overcome of evil but to overcome evil with good," then we can resist our enemies only by Christian influences. By so doing we shall heap coals of fire on their heads. If the end does not justify means that would be otherwise unrighteous, then the hypocrisy, the lying, the violence and murder that are inseparable from even defensive war, are forbidden. If it be wrong for a Christian to commit the keeping of his conscience to his fellow-man, then it is wrong to take the oath of a soldier to implicitly obey his commanding officer, and hence wrong to engage in war. To deliberately and for a purpose seek to kill those that are as honest and unoffending as ourselves is surely wrong, and this is what all men do who engage in war. Think of Christians, who are taught of God to "love one another with pure hearts fervently," deliberately shooting each other to death! But this is what all men do who engage in war, whether offensive or defensive. In the late War of the Rebellion, both parties claimed that they fought in self-defense, and both admitted that they fought against some that were good Christians. If Christians ever expect that all wars shall cease, they must set the example of abstaining from war. The disciples of the Prince of Peace should never depart from his example and teachings. So only will come "peace on earth and good will towards men."

POLITICAL ANTI-SECRECY.

AVALON, Mo., December 29, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Another year is ushering in. It promises in many ways to be an important one in the history of this reform. In the absence of the American party, political anti-secretists must blaze out a new line of action. That they can march under the banner of lodge-ridden Prohibition, and maintain their self-respect as professed anti-secretists, is no longer debatable. So far as the lodge is concerned, they had as well act with the Republican or Democratic parties. Prohibition is very desirable, and all our American voters are prohibitionists; but lodge-ridden prohibition is a roaring farce—so conceded by all true anti-lodge voters.

My "American Handbook and Citizens' Manual," now printing, and that will be out in a few weeks, will place this matter clearly before the reading public. Sending proofs so far, reading by my books and documents, returning same and electrotyping, is taking longer than was expected, but it is moving steadily, and the vast value of the book will overbalance the slight delay in its appearance. The Cynosure will be heard on this phase of the discussion, and its ringing utterances will be respected and heeded by its thousands of readers and supporters. An effort will be made to place this forthcoming print in the hands of leading temperance workers and Prohibitionists.

For years we have been plying the more prominent with literature. Other American workers have been doing the same. The most noticeable results are observable as to the W. C. T. U. And we would suggest that those who can should keep pouring the facts and documents upon the press and leaders until they are brought to a realization of the true relation and vast importance of the lodge as the bulwark and defender of the liquor business. The State officers, reporters, and speakers, as well as the National W. C. T. U. workers, should receive special attention during the coming year.

The late election has not been sanguinary for the Prohibition party. Its leadership refuse to even consider the lodge, except to condone and approve. It has taken the rebel Alliance and the heathen Grange and the Knights of Labor, as well as the various "temperance lodges," to its bosom, and the Voice has become their champion and mouthpiece, in its effort to supplant the People's party as their leader. Let all true, sincere anti-secretists look well to their record in the coming political contest. Would it not be well to establish a general political headquarters? We do not mean to raise money and "purchase a building." There is no time for that now. But if all who are tired of playing second to lodge-ridden Prohibition will rally, a general intelligence office can be opened for this special line of work, a plan of campaign mapped out and systematic political agitation carried on. In the absence of the American party, we do not propose to pause or lose sight of our plain duty as citizens. As the way opens up we shall move forward, and we shall do all in our power to open up the way and push political anti-secrecy.

DR. THOMAS' IDEAS OF MASONRY.

DELAWARE, Iowa, Dec. 27, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—At the raising of the cornerstone of the new Masonic Temple, H. W. Thomas said: "That the Masonic fraternity had been in the world a long time is not doubted, but how long is not certainly known." The fundamental principles of Freemasonry was first manifested when the serpent deceived Eve in the garden of Eden. It was the principles of Masonry that caused Cain to slay his brother Abel. It was the spirit of Freemasonry that caused the overthrow of the old world by the deluge. It was the spirit of Freemasonry that was manifested in building the Tower of Babel. It was a spirit that was so vain and proud that it brought confusion upon themselves; and for languages the tower stood as a memento of their ignorance and superstitious folly.

The spirit of Freemasonry has caused the downfall of every kingdom, empire and republic from the creation of the world until the present time, and it threatens to cause the overthrow of this republic of the United States of America. It is the principle of wrong, and has existed in one form or another ever since the devil became a fallen angel. That it has existed in its present state two hundred years is more than they can prove. It has its great mysteries, because there is no truth in a lie. Their present writings can be traced to certain men, and those men are liars. Back of their writings it is all a vacancy, and this vacancy is what Freemasons call mysteries.

"The secret of its deathless life," or the power that is in it, has existed since the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them was delivered unto Satan, and will exist until the last enemy, death, is destroyed by the Lord Jesus Christ. The speaker misnamed it, and should have called it the "lifeless death," because a Freemason, as long as he remains in bondage to this deadly power, cannot receive eternal life. Its "abiding power" lies in this, that "the world loveth its own." Sin fellowships with sin. Kindred spirits harmonize. It is Satan's masterpiece of deception, and he concentrates his powers in this one thing and its tributaries to deceive, if possible, the very elect. He says: "Each one of the millions in Masonry was free to go as he was free to come, but scarcely one ever went." A Mason may take a demit from his lodge, but he is not a free man, by any means. The obligations of the secret power are still upon him, and he dare not expose the obligations and machinations of the order without coming under the penalty of death. So he still remains a slave to this hell-born power, unless he comes out from among them and yields himself a servant to our Lord Jesus. Then he is again free. "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

Hear the blasphemy of this orator: "May this temple stand for the glory of God." How degraded and fallen a man must become to make such a petition—to pray that the works of the devil may stand for the glory of God. If God is to be glorified in any way by that temple, it will be in its utter destruction and the overthrow of the Masonic power, which will surely come to pass, for the Lord shall consume this son of perdition with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy him with the brightness of his coming. Then shall these great Masonic leaders and followers call on the mountains and rocks to hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and they shall be driven away, in everlasting shame and contempt, into a lake of fire and brimstone; and the smoke of their torment will ascend for ever and ever. But the true and faithful followers of Jesus Christ, who have courageously borne the burden of the Cross, and firmly upheld the blood-stained banner of King Jesus, shall enter the pearly gates of the new Jerusalem, the City of God, and be forever at rest in our home in heaven. E. L. MEADER.

LITERATURE.

Our Day for December closes the fourth year of the publication of this sterling magazine. As usual, its contents appeal to the intellect and better nature of the reader. Willard on the National and International Temperance Outlook; James Russell Lowell as Reformer and Poet, by F. H. Underwood; Doubts Concerning Modern Apparitions, by A. Taylor Inness; Boston Monday Lectures—Fruitful Faith as Held by Reformers in the Church; and St. Augustine, Luther, Calvin, Edwards, Wesley—by Joseph Cook. The Book Reviews include Rev. Questions to Specialists apply to the International Methodist Conference at Washington, by Dr. J. W. Hamilton. The editorials embrace: The German Emperor as a Temperance Reformer; Famine and Political Discontent in Russia; Baron Hirsch's Plan for Jewish Colonization; Educational Progress in England; Immigration into the United States; Smokers and Non-Smokers in American Colleges; Importation of Reindeer into Alaska. As these are topics of vital importance, they will find interested readers everywhere. Of this periodical, the editor says: "Our Day congratulates itself and its readers on its excellent prospects for 1892. It has secured the vigorous aid of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association of Chicago in its business department. The editorial control and the proprietorship will remain unchanged." The principal features of the new year are: Portraits of Reformers, occasionally; an Educational Department, in charge of ex-President Geo. F. Magoun, D.D., LL. D.; the defence of distinctively American educational and political institutions against ultramontanism will be conducted by Rev. James B. Dunn, D.D., Secretary of the celebrated Boston Committee of One Hundred. President Rankin, of Howard University, will have charge of the department of Afro-American progress; Rev. Dr. R. G. McNiece will write on Mormonism; Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, on Missions; Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, on Sabbath Reform and Church Work; Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, on Scientific Temperance in Public Schools, and the editorial department is also to be strengthened. Price, per number, 25 cents. Published at 161 La Salle street, Chicago.

The Cosmopolitan for January is equal to any of its former issues in all the elements that enter into the make-up of the modern popular magazine, both in quality and variety, and certainly in its profusion and grace of illustrations. W. E. Curtis contributes an interesting paper on the various Columbus portraits extant, finely reproduced by the engravers' skill. The more important contributions are: Aluminium—the Metal of the Future, by Joseph W. Richards; In Camp with Stanley, by A. I. M. Jephson; Old New York, by Jas. Grant Wilson; The Kansas Railroad Commission, by Albert R. Greene; Old Time Magazines, by Frank H. T. Bellew; The Special Correspondents at Washington, by T. C. Crawford. Lighter articles are as follows: The Salon (Paris), by M. Riccardo Nobili; A Daughter of the South, by Mrs. Burton Harrison; Humpty Dumpty (comical), by Adam Bede; What Say Ye, Women, to This? by Will J. Lampton; Fencers and Fencing in Paris, by Chas. DeKay; with poems by Geo. MacDonald, Archibald Lampman, Ella Wheeler Wilcox; and Current Events (Murat Halstead), Social Problems (Edward E. Hale), and About Beautiful Books (Brander Matthews). Published in New York. Price 25 cents.

The contents of the Arena for January are as follows: A full-page and striking portrait of the eccentric poet, Walt Whitman, illustrating a life-sketch by D. G. Watts; Human Progress, Past and Future, by Alfred Russel Wallace, D. C. L.; Mohammedan Marriage and Life, by Prof. A. N. Jannaris, Ph. D.; Psychical Research—Premonitions, by Richard Hodgson, LL. D.; Louisiana and the Levees, by ex-Gov. Lionel A. Sheldon; The Hill Banking System, by G. W. Weippiert; The Universality of Law, by Henry Wood; A World-wide Republic, by E. P. Powell; What is Buddhism? by Charles Schroder; The Ten Commandments and the Gentiles, by W. A. Colcord; The Music of the Soul (poem), by Edw'd P. Sheldon; The Divorce Movement Toward the Dakotas, by James Realf, Jr.; A Spoil of Office, by Hamlin Garland, a serial story of the modern West; The Dawning Day, by B. O. Flower, and Book Notices. We particularly commend to every thoughtful reader the article on the Hill Banking System, which presents the best solution of our financial problem yet offered to the American public. Published in Boston—$5 per annum.

The Watchword is a handsome monthly published in Boston at only $1.00 per year. Every Cynosure reader will want it when they know that Dr. A. J. Gordon, whose portrait was lately published in these columns, is the editor. It is "devoted strictly to the word and work of the Gospel," unsectarian, deeply spiritual, eminently practical. We have seen nothing lately in periodical literature so excellent as the articles of the editor on the nature and work of the Holy Spirit. Every number of late has been worth the price of the volume. The brief notes on the Sunday-school lessons will be found of more help to the prayerful teacher than whole volumes of exposition which lack spiritual fervor and insight. Many other articles, on the second coming of Christ and the signs of that day, which the Word points out and the church begins feebly to apprehend, will be read by the earnest believer with great enjoyment and profit. It is with satisfaction that we commend this magazine to our readers. P. O. address, Box 5,326, Boston, Mass., or Watchword Pub. Co.

St Nicholas for January, is as funny, as erudite, as brilliant as ever, giving promise of a happy new year for all its juvenile readers. (And very few older readers are able to resist its enchantments.) The serials of The Admiral's Caravan and Tom Paulding are continued, and two new ones—Two Girls and a Boy, by Robert H. Fletcher, and When I was Your Age, by Laura E. Richards—are begun. Mother Goose in Silhouette, a series of pictures, with an introductory letter from Joseph Jefferson, had an interesting origin. The frontispiece—full page—is grand, artistic and beautiful—"The Little Maid of Spain," with whom all good little boys must inevitably be charmed. Besides these specialties, there are stories, sketches, verses and pictures in bewildering variety and interest. It is a great number. Published by the Century Company, 33 East 17th street, New York.

The Ladies' Home Journal for January maintains its position as the cheapest and most exhaustive of the American magazines devoted to the literary, domestic and social characteristics and advancement of the softer sex. The list of contributors is large and embraces many names already familiar and some new ones. Robert J. Burdette opens a fresh department as a "regular" attache of the magazine, entitled "From a New Inkstand," from which he preaches some wholesome sermons in brief, in his peculiar vein. The older departments are also replete with attractions for the home circle, especially the daughters of every well-regulated household. Sold at news-stands. Price 10 cents per number.

—In a revival meeting at Asbury church, Owosso, Mich., seventy-six professed conversion, thirty-three have united with the church on probation, and seven have been received by letter. J. J. Smith is pastor.

LODGE NOTES.

The United Ancient Order of Druids numbers about 20,000 members in the United States—about 3,000 in Illinois.—Mystic Tie.

Two thousand eight hundred and forty-three brethren were suspended for non-payment of dues in New York during the past Masonic year. This large cut-off and increase of the army of unaffiliates could be remedied by requiring the payment of dues quarterly, in advance.—Masonic Chronicle.

At the recent annual convention of State Insurance Commissioners from twenty States, it was resolved that "assessment endowment associations are founded upon a delusive and dangerous assumption full of peril to the people and certain to bring early and irrevocable disaster." That information has cost hundreds of deluded victims bitter experiences.

There seems to be something magnetic in the name Legion of Honor. There are no less than four orders having that title in the country, all of them successful and paying everything they promise: American Legion of Honor, with 63,000 members; Legion of Honor, St. Louis, with 4,000 members; Iowa Legion of Honor, 5,700 members; and Northwestern Legion of Honor, able to pay full benefits, but whose exact membership we are not familiar with.—Amer. Legion of Honor Journal.

John Wesley, the great Methodist reformer, was a Mason. He was initiated into the secrets of the order on Oct. 30th, 1738.—Masonic Chronicle. This is what Mr. Wesley said in 1773: "I went to Ballymena and read a strange tract that professes to discover 'the inmost recesses of Freemasonry,' said to be 'translated from the French original lately published at Berlin.' I incline to think it is a genuine account. Only if it be, I wonder the author is suffered to live. If it be, what an amazing banter upon all mankind is Freemasonry."—N. Y. Christian Advocate, February, 1884.

"What are the four largest fraternal societies, the membership and financial standing of each?" is much easier asked than answered. The best information is as follows: Masons (December 1890)—in the United States and Canada, 660,172; in the world, about 1,250,000; cannot estimate assets. Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society—795,000 adults, 95,000 juveniles, total 890,000 members; total funds (December 31, 1890), $22,114,335. I. O. O. F. (January, 1891)—About 708,473 members; estimated funds, over $35,000,000. Manchester Unity Odd-fellows, 650,000 members; about $40,000,000 funds. G. A. R. (June 30, 1890)—458,230 members; cannot give funds. Knights of Pythias—300,000 members; cannot give funds. A. O. U. W. (January 31, 1891)—251,476 members. All the funds above quoted are estimated, it being impossible to arrive at anything like a correct amount. It would take days and days to figure and average the funds to obtain a total sum.—Exchange.

The National Fraternal Congress, composed of fifty representatives from thirty death benefit paying fraternal orders, each having a membership of two thousand or more, convened in fifth annual session at Willard's Washington, D. C., not long ago. The orders represented were Ancient Order United Workmen, Knights of Honor, Royal Arcanum, American Legion of Honor, Knights and Ladies of Honor, Chosen Friends, National Union, Knights of Macabees, United Friends Royal Templars of Temperance, Equitable Aid Union, Improved Order of Heptasophs, Home Circle, Fraternal Mystic Circle, Knights Golden Rule, Fraternal Legion, Golden Chain, Order Mutual Protection, Royal Society Good Fellows, Northern Mutual Relief, Endowment Rank Knights of Pythias, Pilgrim Fathers, Legion of Red Cross, Iowa Legion of Honor, Artisans' Order Mutual Protection, Protected Home Circle, Knights of Golden Eagle, Woodmen of World, Independent Foresters of Canada, and Knights of St. John and Malta. "SPURIOUS" MASONRY, AGAIN.

The Right Worshipful Grand Lodge of Iowa has also legislated, by severe enactments, against a class of Masons in open rebellion to her authority—a class who, I am sorry to say, place a higher value upon a false system of so-called higher degrees than they do upon Ancient Craft Masonry, upon which all systems bearing the Masonic name are founded.

This passage occurs in the address of "Sir" James A. Guest, Grand Commander of the Knights Templar of Iowa, to the Grand Commandery of that State, in July, 1891. In the November issue of the Chicago Voice of Masonry, the statement is made that Grand Commander Guest, on the occasion referred to in the foregoing extract, "sustained the Grand Lodge in its legislation against Cerneauism." The legislation to which it alludes is that mentioned in the passage above printed.

We care nothing about the quarrel of "legitimate" Ancient Craft Masonry with "Cerneauism," the latter of which is evidently no worse or better than the former in principle and practice; but we are surprised to find a Modern Knight Templar denouncing a system which conferred its degrees upon so "great and grand" a Freemason as Governor DeWitt Clinton. Here is our authority on this point:

Findel's "History of Freemasonry" (page 599) has this significant passage: "The celebrated statesman, De Witt Clinton, born March 2, 1769, and died February 11, 1828, was chosen, in 1814, Grand Master of the newly-founded Grand Encampment of New York in the Supreme Council of the 33d degree established by J. Cerneau in New York, in 1807."

"I will merely remark," says Jabez D. Hammond, in his "Political History of New York," (Vol. 2, page 239) "that Gov. Clinton was, in 1826"—the year of the Morgan murder by Masons in that State—"High Priest of the General Grand Chapter of the United States, which was the highest Mason station in the United States;" and he was a Cerneau Mason, loved, honored and obeyed throughout the Morgan excitement by the loyal Masons of the State.

The question therefore naturally arises, what, after sixty-five years, has caused this animosity of "Ancient Craft Masonry" against "Cerneauism," and who is capable of distinguishing which of them is "legitimate" and which is "spurious?"

As we intimated before, we have no preference for either; but "consistency is a jewel."

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

The Annual Report of Postmaster General Wanamaker is deemed a most able document, not only as regards the service his department has rendered to the country during the year ending June 30, 1891, but for the multiplicity of improvements in our postal system which he suggests and proposes to the government.

Among these is the division of the whole country into postal districts, with careful supervision by counties; the use not only of the postal telegraph, at ten cents a telegram, but also of the postal telephone, at three cents a message, to inform farmers quickly of weather and market reports and arrivals of freight; introduction of pneumatic tubes to transport packages from the main office in each large city to branch offices and suburban towns; the establishment of postal savings banks for small sums, at one-half a cent a day interest on each dollar, with non-negotiable certificates, redeemable at any postoffice; the use of automatic electric stampers; the furnishing of letter boxes (for receiving and mailing) for every door; the extension of free carrier delivery to cities of five thousand people; also of carrier delivery, on the present plan, to country districts, as the experiments show that it more than pays for itself in increased business, rural free delivery at forty-six experimental offices for seven months having paid a net profit of $850.50.

His argument for governmental control of telegraphs and telephones in the service of postal affairs is practically unanswerable: "Sixty-four millions of people," says Mr. Wanamaker, "are taxing themselves to-day to the amount of $70,000,000 annually to maintain the postoffice plant, and are denied the right to vitalize this magnificent machinery with the mightiest force which science has given to render that machinery most effective."

The pneumatic-tube delivery of mail matter throughout the country, however, seems to be the most far-reaching and important of his suggestions. It is to be regretted that he should not have confined his language to the prevailing tongue and his mathematics to ordinary terms and figures, instead of adopting the French metric system and its French phrases to express his ideas. "America for Americans," Mr. Postmaster-General, and American language for American documents.

But this innovation is not so embarrassing as to disturb the worthiness of his suggestions. Nothing better suits the average American citizen than the annihilation of time and distance by the invention of suitable devices. Let us have the pneumatic system, by all means.

MASONIC CHRISTIANITY.

Chicago has almost everything that can be named under the sun. Among its inhabitants are to be found the holy and devoted followers of the meek and lowly Jesus and all classes of mortals in the scale of morality down to the Sodomite, but the meanest and most despicable character to be found there is the fellow who poses as a Christian cynosure. He is never without the delirium tremens, always intoxicated with the eloquence of his own pleadings against those who are casting out devils by other means than those pictured to him by his lurid imagination.—The American Tyler, Detroit, Mich., December 3, 1891.

A correspondent of this paper, living in Detroit, has given us the following description of the man who wrote the foregoing, which we publish so that our readers may understand why he hates the Cynosure: "The editor, John H. Brownell, is a local preacher of the Methodist Episcopal denomination. Unlike all other Masonic publications (as far as I know), the Tyler is engaged in the attempt to trinitarianize the American Masonic creed. For this he has incurred considerable opposition; likewise, for his out-spoken opposition to those principles of the Roman Catholic denomination which unfit its adherents to make obedient Masons."

We don't know which is the most difficult job that he has undertaken—to Christianize Freemasonry or to Masonize Romanism. In the meantime the Cynosure proposes to combat both systems as false worships, degrading to humanity and ruinous to souls.

A VERY UNHOLY ALLIANCE.

The ninth declaration in the platform adopted by the California State Prohibition Convention, held at San Francisco, reads:

"That we recognize a common bond of sympathy between the Prohibition party of California and the Farmers' Alliance, an organization recently formed by the Grangers and Knights of Labor, and inasmuch as the Farmers' Alliance has come out squarely for prohibition, we extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and invite them to make common cause with us in the coming campaign."

This is what William H. Seward said in relation to these entangling alliances:

"Before I would place my hand between the hands of other men in a secret lodge, order, class, or council, and, bending on my knee before them, enter into combination with them for any object, personal or political, good or bad, I would pray to God that that hand and that knee might be paralyzed, and that I might become an object of pity and even the mockery of my fellow-men."

Is prohibition so dear that men should sacrifice liberty of conscience and freedom of action, by uniting with Christless and tyrannical secret orders to obtain it?

WHEATON COLLEGE.

President Blanchard, in presenting the claims of this esteemed institution to various churches and congregations, in the interest of Christian education, presents for their consideration the following facts and figures, which we heartily commend to every reader of the Cynosure, very many of whom are able to confirm the truth and importance of his statements.

1. The college is close to Chicago, the heart of the great Interior.
2. It is distinctively a Christian school.
3. It is not a University, nor an Academy, nor a Technical school, but an American College.

4. It is a school for men and women.
5. It is economically managed, and is out of debt.

6. Its students are workers. The use of tobacco, intoxicating liquors, attendance on secret societies and other hindrances to the culture of mind and heart, are forbidden.

7. Forty per cent of its male graduates have entered the Gospel ministry.

8. It has now fifteen professors and instructors, and about two hundred pupils in all its departments—College, Preparatory, Music and Art.

9. It has a course of study in the English Bible, extending through the three years of preparation and four years of College.

10. It is not an experiment, having done good work for church and state for over thirty years.

These are not the only reasons why all Christian parents and guardians should be interested in this school, but they are certainly sufficient to command respectful consideration in its behalf.

All Christians, individuals, or churches, can aid in this enterprise by their prayers, by placing their children within its influence, and by contributions to its endowment, its current expenses, or its building funds.

Not only the rich should care for the colleges of our land. Every patriot, every lover of our race, and, above all, every Christian, is interested in those institutions whose object is to increase the number of cultured men and women. All whose hearts are stirred to aid in the perpetuation of this worthy school are invited to forward their offerings to Prof. H. A. Fischer, Treasurer, Wheaton, Du Page Co., Ill., by whom they will be thankfully acknowledged.

WASHINGTON AS A MASON.

"On the 28th of April, 1788, he (Washington) was appointed Master of Alexandria Lodge No. 39, by the Grand Master, Edmund Randolph, Governor of Virginia, and remained an active member of that lodge until his death, December 14, 1799."—Masonic paper.

Voluminous evidence, documentary and epistolary, on this subject and within our reach, is thus summed up:

1. That in 1768, General Washington had ceased regular attendance at the lodge. This is proved by his letter to Mr. Snyder.

2. That so far back as about the year 1780, he had become convinced, at least, of the inutility of Freemasonry, and called it "child's play." This is established by his reply to Governor Trumbull.

3. That on the 25th of September, 1798, (one year and four months before his death,) his opinions on the subject of Freemasonry remained unchanged from what they were thirty years before when he was only thirty-six years old. This is established by his letter to Mr. Snyder.

4. That up to February, 1781, as appears by the records of King David's Lodge, and up to the 25th of September, 1798, as appears by his letter to Mr. Snyder, he had not been "Grand Master of North America, nor even Master of any particular lodge."

5. That in 1781, as appears by the same record of King David's Lodge, it was not agreeable to him to be addressed even as a private Mason.

6. That all the letters said to be written by Washington to lodges are spurious. This is rendered nearly certain: First, by the non-production of the originals. Second, by the absence of copies among the records of his letters. Third, by their want of dates. Fourth, by the fact that his intimate friend and biographer, Chief Justice Marshall (himself a Mason in his youth,) says in his letter now printed, that he never heard Washington utter a syllable on the subject—a matter nearly impossible, if Washington had for years been engaged in writing laudatory letters to the Grand Lodges of South Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

—Our correspondents speak for themselves—not for the Cynosure. Whenever their communications harmonize with the principles advocated by us, so far we endorse them; otherwise we do not. This position is necessary for self-protection—the interests of the paper demand it.

—In reproducing liberal quotations from Miss Flagg's recent address on "New England Reformers and Reformers," the Union Signal, of this city, says: "Miss Elizabeth E. Flagg, of Wellesley, lately delivered an address before the Anti-Secrecy Convention, Boston, so rich in historic reminiscences as well as in nuggets-of-gold thoughts for the present, that we know our readers will thank us for making these quotations."

—The new edition of F. B. Mills' catalogue of garden and flower seeds, plants, etc., for the spring of 1892 is now ready for distribution. It offers an immense variety of these goods, raised upon his extensive grounds at Rose Hill, Onondaga county, N. Y., and of guaranteed excellence. Some extraordinary inducements are offered to his patrons, which are given in detail in the catalogue. The latter is sent on application to the above address.

—The decision of the World's Fair managers to admit liquor-selling within the grounds of the Exposition is neither creditable to them nor the undertaking which they represent. The petitioner for the closing of the Fair on Sundays have also, as yet, received but little encouragement from the same source, and the final issue, while yet doubtful, is not hopeful for the advocates of the Christian Sabbath. God may, however, overrule the evil dispositions of men and shut the gates of this gigantic cosmopolitan enterprise on his appointed day of rest.

—The movement among the American Lutherans to establish the English language as the standard in their churches and parochial schools is receiving much favorable comment from the denominational press. Some facts touching this subject will be found in our Religious News columns. One writer says: "The sooner Lutheranism turns to English, the more rapidly will the English become rich in devotional and instructive Lutheran literature. If the German is held fast to too long, the riches will soon be in a sealed and inaccessible casket, and the English will remain poverty-stricken." Another argument is that the language of every country should be exclusively used by all churches. It is entitled to that much reverence.

—Freemasonry systematically collects large sums of money from its victims under doubtful pretenses. Leading the uninitiated to believe that its secrets are of the utmost importance and value to those who know them, it requires the advance payment of sums ranging from $25 to $200 for initiation into its lodges, chapters and commanderies, or for "exaltation" to its so-called "higher degrees." The same secrets, in authenticated official rituals of Blue Lodge, Chapter, Templar, Scotch Rite, Eastern Star and Adoptive Masonry, can be obtained at this office (covering forty-eight genuine degrees) for $3.00. And the purchaser avoids the necessity of taking all those horrible, murderous oaths to which every man who joins the Freemasons is obliged to subscribe, and which he can break only at the peril of his life.

—A new effect is attributed to the abundant farm crops of 1890, of which in former years no one ever dreamed. On this subject we are enlightened by the St. Paul (Minn.) Dispatch, which says: "It is predicted by those in a position to know that the lodges in the country towns will probably have the largest proportionate increase on account of the good crops which have put the farmers throughout the State in a position where they can well afford to take in the benefits of the fraternities. (The members are congratulating themselves on this, for the farmers have the reputation of making excellent fraternity men, never missing a meeting when there is a possibility of attending.) A matter of ten miles or so to travel is no obstacle in the way of his being present." The Dispatch adds that "the better to accommodate the farmers, most of the I. O. O. F. lodges in the country towns have changed their meeting night to Friday, which enables the farmer-member to do his trading during the day and remain to lodge in the evening." What a persistent soul-killer the lodge has become!

—As a matter of news, it may interest some of our Cynosure readers to learn that an important decision was rendered last week in the Esher-Dubs Evangelical church litigation, by the circuit court at Freeport, Ill. The suit, which it is said involved property valued at more than thirty millions of dollars, was brought by the Esher branch of the church, to eject ministers of the other side from churches in Rock Grove, Stephenson county; Brookville, Ogle county, and Fair Haven, Carroll county. The judge decided against them at every point raised and declared their actions to be those of seceders. The State conferences held in the Sheffield Avenue church, Chicago, in 1890 and at the Noble church, 1891, were declared regular, according to ecclesiastical and legal laws, and all appointments there made were valid. Bishop Esher was declared a rebel in going from those conferences and establishing rival conferences. The matter of the legality of the general conferences held at Indianapolis and Pittsburg was decided in favor of the Dubs faction, and facts were brought out to show that the latter had been properly called and conducted.

—"In the Californian Illustrated Magazine is an expose of the secrets of the Chinese highbinders by Rev. F. J. Masters, superintendent of the Methodist Chinese mission in San Francisco. The paper is of especial interest, as it shows the relation between the highbinder war now going on in San Francisco and the trouble in China. The expose is the first ever made, and was taken from a secret book kept by these thugs and murderers. The importance of this to the Chinese may be imagined, when it is known that it may be compared to a divulging of the secrets of Freemasonry, supposing that the latter was for an unworthy object." The innocence of the North-western Christian Advocate, from which the foregoing was clipped, in intimating that the object of Freemasonry is not unworthy, and that the divulging of its secrets has not been accomplished, sounds strangely to those who have been for years earnestly laboring to expose correctly both the unworthiness of the order, the murderous obligations which it imposes on its victims, and publishing its cherished "secrets" broadcast throughout the world. And this is just what the N. C. A. has done for years, and is now doing. So far as the exposition of the "highbinders'" secrets is concerned, we believe it is the first step in the suppression of this great national evil.

—Indiana is rich in educational institutions, especially those of the higher grades, and these form the basis of a valuable report submitted to the Government Bureau of Education by James Albert Woodburn, Professor of American History in the Indiana University, formerly Fellow in History at Johns Hopkins University. This interesting document comprises the Bureau's Circular of Information, No. 1, 1891, and the tenth number of the Government's Contributions to American Educational History, edited by Herbert B. Adams. The work is quite voluminous, generously illustrated by engravings, and covers a large amount of gratifying intelligence, in detail, relating to the status and working of the various colleges and universities of the State, together with a history of the educational system of the Northwest as established by the Federal Government and of the State, from the earliest dates. The institutions to which particular attention is directed are: Indiana Seminary, now the State College and University; the Indiana State Normal School; Purdue University; Rose Polytechnic Institute; De Pauw University, (Methodist); Wabash College, (Presbyterian); Butler University, (Christian); Franklin College, (Baptist); Hanover College, (Presbyterian); Earlham College, (Friends), and Notre Dame, (Jesuit); together with the independent Normal schools—Valparaiso, Central and Southern; manual training schools, etc. The report can be obtained from the Interior Department, Washington.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—College Agent Rev. S. F. Porter is laid up, sick, at Oberlin, Ohio.

—The Western agent, Bro. C. F. Hawley, is at present at home in Wheaton, Ill., suffering from a severe attack of the grippe.

—Friends of General Armstrong will regret to learn that he has been for several weeks disabled by a severe stroke of paralysis. At last accounts, however, he was reported as improving, with strong hopes of recovery.

—The New England agent, Rev. J. P. Stoddard, is making his Monday evening parlor services, in behalf of the anti-secrecy reform in Boston, a great success. The interest is excellently maintained, the attendance is good, and those who have been habitually present express a conviction that they have received wonderful light, through these meetings, concerning the hidden works of darkness, and see more clearly than ever the necessity for deep and thorough work against the evils of the lodge system.

—Mrs. L. E. Markham, wife of Rev. L. E. Markham, formerly of Wheaton, Ill., died recently at her home in Kirwin, Kansas, mourned by a large circle of friends, whose sympathy is extended to her afflicted family.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard returned to Washington, from New England, last week. This week he is operating in the State of New York, working in behalf of the proposed State Convention of anti-secrecy reformers, of which more anon.

that dear, good man, Franklin W. Capwell, or the State in which he labored so faithfully for the right, but my heart grows warm with gratitude to God that he gave to the world such a man.

He was truly "instant in season and out of season, always abounding in the work of the Lord." Since we laid away his cold tenement of clay in the little Lynden churchyard, two years ago, there has been but one convention of our reform in the Empire State. We are confident that the State which has produced so many noble reformers will not fall behind her sister States in the present conflict. It is now purposed to gather during the coming month, to devise ways and means for the furtherance of our cause there. In the next issue of our paper I hope to be able to report time and place of such a convention.

I have spoken several times since last reporting. In a Congregational church at Lynn, Mass., I addressed a goodly number. Had not the night been stormy, more would have doubtless been present.

At Worcester and Quinsigamond I spoke to full houses. Our Swedish friends there made me very welcome and expressed sympathy in a material way. The pastor of the M. E. church in which I spoke told of an interesting experience which kept him from uniting with the lodge. When a young man he was employed in a drug-store in Galesburg, Ill. Mr. Lamphear, since Judge Lamphear, was proprietor. He was also a Mason. One night he came in with some Masonic friends at a late hour, and after partaking of "refreshments" took his departure. A little book was found upon the counter, which proved to be Masonic. The clerk sat up nearly all night reading what opened his eyes on the lodge question. It was of special interest, as it contained many notes written by the Judge.

Very early in the morning the Judge appeared in search of the book. As editor of a Swedish paper in Chicago, Ill., the preacher has borne a faithful testimony against this evil. He was of course familiar with our work, and opened the way for me to address his people.

Pastor Young, of the Lutheran church, Quincy, was so active that I found it difficult to find him. He arranged for me to speak in the hall where his people worship. I took a cold, perhaps "la grippe," but what was my loss was the people's gain, as father opened the under tiers, and showed the people the process of lodge degradation. Pastor Young had heard father speak when at the Seminary in Rock Island, Ill. He will try and arrange for further lectures when the people are not so much interested in other things.

The Monday evening lectures have been attended with more than usual interest since the convention. Two adhering Masons, some ex-Masons, at least two college students, and a number of ladies were among those attending on the evenings I was present. Discussions arose which could not fail to profit any one desiring the facts. Remember, friends in Boston and vicinity, these lectures are given each Monday evening at 7:45 o'clock, in the parlor of suite 1, Hotel Howland, 218 Columbus Ave. Go when you can, and take any friends needing light on this subject.

On my return to this far-famed and growing city, I had the pleasure of the company of my brother-in-law, Mr. W. S. Orvis and bride. After the usual call on the President, and a visitation of the various institutions of public interest, the happy couple took their departure for their new home. As both are Christians and reformers, we predict for them a bright future.

I expect (D. V.) to start Monday for New York State. W. B. STODDARD.

THE HOME.

SOME DAY.

Some day all doubt and mystery
Will be made clear;
The threatened clouds which now we see
Will disappear.

Some day, what seems a punishment,
Or loss, or pain,
Will prove to be God's blessing sent
For very gain.

Some day our weary feet will rest
In sweet content,
And we will know how we are blest
By what was sent;

And looking back, with clearer eyes,
O'er life's short span,
Will see with wondering, glad surprise
God's perfect plan;

And knowing that the way we went
Was God's own way,
Will understand his wise intent
Some day,—some day.

FAMILY PRAYERS.

There is one mark of a household in which God is known and loved which is too often wanting in our day; I mean the practice of family prayer. Depend upon it, the worth of practice of that kind can only be measured by its effects during a long period of time; and family prayers, though occupying only a few minutes, do make a great difference in any household at the end of the year. How, indeed, can it be otherwise, when each morning, perhaps each evening too, all the members of the family—the old and the young, the parents and the children, and master and the servants—meet on a footing of perfect equality before the Eternal, in whose presence each is as nothing, yet to whom each is so infinitely dear that he has redeemed by his blood each and all of them? How must not the bad spirits that are the enemies of pure and bright family life flee away—the spirit of envy and pride and untruthfulness and sloth, and the whole tribe of evil thoughts—and make way for his presence in the hearts of old and young alike, who, as he brings us, one by one, nearer to the true end of our existence, so does he alone make us to be of "one mind in a house" here, within the narrow presence of each home circle, and hereafter in that countless family of all nations and tongues, which shall dwell with him, the universal Parent of eternity.—Canon Liddon.

WHAT SELF-DENIAL DID.

Rev. C. H. Woolston, pastor of the East Church, Philadelphia, makes the following interesting statement through the National Baptist:

Self-denial or entertainment? This was the question that the East Church asked a few days ago, when the raising of $1,000 on the church debt confronted them. Custom said, bazar, variety performance, oyster supper, necktie sociable or basket party, etc. Afterward the tidal wave of worldliness and contention, which a year of hardest spiritual effort could not stay. But then we were poor—not a rich man among us—no bank account, no surplus, no stocks, no dividends, no fat salaries, no big contracts. To all of these my people were total strangers; hard work, small wages, and constant struggle to make ends meet, making the program of their lives. The raising of $1,000 seemed utterly impossible. But in that church of God's poor dwelt a mighty faith. A new and better way was sought and prayed about; and so a week of self-denial was proposed, and by the entire membership accepted, as God's way to secure the $1,000. An envelope was given each member and friend of the church, and all the people were asked to deny themselves, for one week, of something habitually enjoyed and to give the money thus saved. Little cards were given to the children and they were encouraged to collect fifty cents each.

Thus 600 people, young and old, started on "the week of self-denial." As this was to be a substitute for a church fair, a week of meetings was arranged, and services were held nightly, at which addresses by various pastors were made, on the duty and blessings of self-denial. These meetings were attended by 2,000 people. Fervent prayers were offered and a deep spiritual feeling pervaded the meetings. Souls were converted and God's name was truly honored. Coming to such meetings nightly was to our souls a blessed substitute for the late hours of hard work, and the questionable dissipations of a church fair. On the Sunday before Thanksgiving "Self-denial week" was to end, and the result to be given to God as a Thanksgiving offering. What a day that was! It was beautiful to watch the people bringing the results of their sacrifices. The little children brought their Christmas money and gave it gladly; young men and young girls had walked all the week to and from their places of labor, and gone without their lunch at noon, and with faces like the sun-rise gave the result of this saving. The old overcoats will be made to last another winter; the parlor stove is to have no fire in it until the price of a ton of coal is saved; tobacco was abandoned, and old clothes were cleaned and made over. It was wonderful to hear them all tell how the Lord had blessed them in their self-denial. When the offering was completed the $1,000 and more was made up. A happier people never assembled in a Thanksgiving service. Now that it is all over, a precious memory, a deeply spiritual church, a score of happy converts waiting baptism, are left. We commend this new and better way, as a method which God has thus largely blessed to one of the poorest of our city churches.

"MAKE A GOOD JOB OF ME."

In the War Cry there is a picture of a man kneeling at a table, and praying, "Lord, make a good job of me." The words are rough enough, but the meaning is, in many respects, admirable. The poor man feels that he is a failure, and that he needs new making. His feeling is that none but the Lord can accomplish the necessary renewal. His fear is lest he should not have the full work wrought upon him, and that his conversion should not be thorough and complete. He has no need to fear that the Lord would not operate effectively, for the great Worker never leaves his work half done. Still, the very fear of being but partly sanctified, shows his earnestness and his desire to be truly and fully converted from the error of his ways.

There are some professors who have need to offer a similar petition, for, as yet, they are no great credit to their religion. Lifeless, questionable religion is poor stuff.—Selected.

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S RULES OF LIFE.

1. Act at all times as in the presence of God, and make it the great object in all things to please him. In order to do this, seek first of all to gain clear views of his will, and with regard to all things to be perfectly conformed to it. In doing this, cherish no thoughts, indulge no feelings, speak no words and do no actions but what you really think, after all the light you can gain, will most honor God, most benefit yourselves and others, and give you the greatest joy when they come to be exhibited before the assembled universe at the judgment day.

2. Begin and end each day by a season of communion with God, and by a solemn and hearty commitment of yourself and all your interests, temporal and eternal, to his guidance, care and disposal. Daily read, with deep attention and fervent prayer, a portion of the Word of God, for the purpose of understanding, believing and obeying it. Never express or indulge the least degree of unkindness towards any human being, and give no needless pain to any one of the human race, or even of the animal creation. Make it your object to promote the greatest happiness on the whole, upon all of whom you may have influence, both of the present and all future generations. Regard the hand of God in all the dispensations of his providence, and in whatsoever state he places you, therewith be content. Envy none who are above you, and despise none who are below you; but possess and manifest the utmost good will towards all men. Never speak of any or feel towards them in a manner that you ought not to wish them, under similar circumstances, to speak or feel with regard to you.

3. Let all statements and narrations be an exact exhibition of the real truth. Act for God, for the universe, and for eternity; and in such a manner as is adapted to promote the highest good forever. In order to do this, look habitually to Jesus Christ; let your whole soul be imbued with his spirit and manifest it in all your actions. Look to the Holy Ghost as the author of all good in man; seek habitually his teaching, his illuminating and purifying influences, that he may dwell in you as his temple, and take full possession of all your powers and talents for himself. Earnestly desire that he would take of the things of Christ and more and more show them unto you; and carefully avoid everything which tends to hinder you from becoming perfectly like him. Make it as your meat and drink to do the will of God, and perseveringly have respect to all his commandments. Feel and acknowledge that all the good that you ever have received, that you now receive, or ever will receive, is of grace through Jesus Christ; trust in him for all which you need, both for this life and the life to come; rely on his merits, imitate his example, and in view of every blessing give him and the Father and the Holy Ghost all the glory.—Andrew Edgar's Circular.

ONE GOOD HUSBAND.

When Theodore Parker was married he entered in his journal on his wedding day the following resolutions:

First—Never, except for the best reasons, to oppose my wife's will.

Second—To discharge all duties for her sake freely.

Third—Never to scold.

Fourth—Never to look cross at her.

Fifth—Never to worry her with commands.

Sixth—To promote her piety.

Seventh—To bear her burdens.

Eighth—To overlook her foibles.

Ninth—To save, cherish, and forever defend her.

Tenth—To remember her always in my prayers. Thus, God willing, we shall be blessed.—Household.

"EQUALITY OF THE SEXES."

One day it was raining hard when Mrs. Lease boarded a street-car. The car was crowded, and all the men on the seats sat closer back and evinced a determination to keep a position of sedentary comfort. Mrs. Lease cast her eye down the car, and, at the same time, a man in the corner started to rise.

"Don't," said the man next to him, grasping his arm; "that's Mrs. Lease. Don't you know her? She believes in equality of both sexes. Woman suffrage, you know."

The stooped man smiled and got up.

"Come," said the speaker, still more importunate, "you're not going to get up, are you? If she thinks she's equal to a man, let her stand. Give her a dose of her own medicine."

But Mrs. Lease had taken the man's seat, greatly to the discomfiture of the other, who wanted to see her stand.

Next day he met the stranger on the street.

"Hello," he said, "you're the man that gave up your seat to Mrs. Lease. You missed a good chance to take her down a little. There wasn't another man in the car that would have given way. Wasn't impolite, you know. Just a little joke. What made you get up? Did she hypnotize you?"

"See here," said the man addressed, "I guess you don't know me."

"Can't say that I do. Who are you?"

"I'm Mr. Lease."—Worcester (Mass.) Light.

KIND WORDS.

Kind words do not cost much. They never blister the tongue or lips. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much.

1. They help one's own good nature and good will. Soft words soften our own soul. Angry words are the fuel to the flame of wrath, and make it blaze the more fiercely.

2. Kind words make other people good natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and sarcastic words irritate them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful.

There is such a rush of all other kinds of words, in our days, that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and hasty words, and spiteful words, and silly words, and boisterous words, and warlike words.

Kind words also produce their own image on men's souls. And a beautiful image it is. They soothe, and quiet, and comfort the hearer. They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings.—Exchange.

A WORD FOR THE MOTHER.

Send the children to bed with a kiss and a smile;
Sweet childhood will tarry at best but a while;
And soon they will pass from the portals of home,
The wilderness ways of their life-work to roam.

Yes, tuck them in bed with a gentle "good-night!"
The mantle of shadows is veiling the light;
And maybe—God knows—on this sweet little face
May fall deeper shadows in life's weary race.

Yes, say it: "God bless my dear children, I pray!"
It may be the last you will say it for aye!
The night may be long ere you see them again;
The motherless children may call you in vain!

Drop sweet benediction on each little head,
And fold them in prayer as they nestle in bed;
A guard of bright angels around them invite;
The spirit may slip from the mooring to-night.

MAKING HIM THANKFUL.

When the family came home from service on Thanksgiving morning, they heard Ponto howling dismally from the attic. "However could the dog have got up there?" asked grandma, as she looked up and saw his piteous black face at the window. "I didn't know the attic door had been opened this morning."

"Oh, yes," said little Annie, innocently, "I opened it. I put him there on purpose."

"You did, child! What for?"

"Well, you see," replied Annie, with all the gravity given by nine years of wisdom, "I tried to think of some way to make Thanksgiving different to him from other days. We might give him turkey, but how would he know it wasn't Christmas turkey instead? So I thought I'd shut him up in the dark, where he hates to be, and when he was let out, he'd be thankful enough for Thanksgiving Day."

Her plan was absolutely successful. Once down stairs, having again the run of the house, Ponto frisked and yelped as if he had a great and special cause for thanksgiving, and needed no governor's proclamation to teach him the uses of the day.—Selected.

"THE FIRM'S BUSTED."

A little boy applied to Gen. Clinton B. Fisk for capital to go into business. Amount wanted—75c. Business—boot blacking. Station—near Fulton Ferry, New York. Profits to be divided at the end of six months. The arrangement was made, and the firm began business. On Monday morning, however, the "working partner" came into the General's office wearing a very lugubrious countenance.

"What's the matter?" asked the General.

"Oh," said the boy, "it's all up."

"All up!" said the General, "what do you mean?"

"Oh," replied the urchin, "the firm's busted."

"How is that?" was the inquiry.

"Well," said the boy, "I had $4.92 on hand; but yesterday a man came into our Sunday-school, and said we must give all our money to the Missionary Society, and I put it all in—couldn't help it—an' it's all up with us."

We have no doubt that the firm immediately "resumed" business again—but it is the first partnership we have ever heard of that has been "busted" in that way.—Selected.

TEMPERANCE.

BLOOD AND RUM.

The rector of the church at the corner of 15th and Chestnut Sts., in this city, recently preached a sermon that was interesting at least. He began by saying that the Scripture for the day made a temperance sermon necessary; and in further apology for taking up the subject he said that he had not preached on the subject since 1866, when this same Scripture fell on the Lord's Day. He congratulated himself and his hearers that it would not so fall again until 1899, and therefore he would not until then be required to take up the subject. He hastened to allay the fears of his audience by assuring them that he should not treat the subject in the usual threadbare fashion, with denunciation of liquor dealers and friends of license laws. He declared that prohibition preachers who condemned fellow pastors for favoring license, did more harm than those who advocated drinking. Whereupon he proceeded to advocate drinking—at home—as a sovereign remedy for all the evils of intemperance. He advised against drinking in saloons and clubs. Locality, not alcoholity, he treated as the cause of all the trouble. Apparently he has never read of wife-beaters who got their courage up by home drinking, and of drunkards who have testified that the wine they took at their fathers' tables caused them to be drunkards.

He made one exception as to home drinking. No man should drink rum even at home who had "intemperance in his blood." He should have known that if a man has no intemperance in his blood, drinking will soon put it not only into his blood, but into the blood of his sons and his sons' sons, even though, as Dr. Richardson tells us, he may never be drunk in his life. The story of rum and blood is the saddest of human history, and the only way to save the blood is to banish the rum.—Christian Statesman, Philadelphia.

THE MONOPOLY OF THE SALOON.

One person out of every 258 has the privilege of going into this business and reaping its enormous profits. He alone has the permission of the law. The other 257 are debarred from the business, and an attempt on their part to sell liquor will be followed with legal penalties. Before a man can enter into this business, in any State of the Union, with few exceptions, he must secure the permission of certain men. He may have all the capital necessary, all the facilities required by trade, all the knowledge essential. He may proffer the amount of the license fee in good cash. But nothing will avail if those few men say, no, he shall not have a license. A few years ago the Excise Board of New York City decided that the number of licenses should not be increased, and no new ones should be issued except as the old ones expired. This meant that out of every 160 persons then in New York City, 159 were absolutely debarred from going into the business.

We protest, in the name of equal rights and privileges! If there is any one thing that should be indisputable in America it is that all men have an equal chance before the law. The doctrine is carried out in most lines of business. Any man in America has an equal chance with every other man to engage in the grocery business, the hardware business, the dry goods business, the tobacco business, or any other line of business. It is necessary in certain cases, as in the drug business and the tobacco business, to comply with certain conditions, but these conditions are the same for all men, and, when complied with, all men have the same privileges. This at least is the attitude of the law. Other monopolies exist, it is true; but in the case of the liquor traffic, as in no other case, the monopoly is created by law, and all competition with the privileged class is forbidden by legal penalties. The entire license system stands out to-day as the supreme and unique instance of monopolistic legislation. In its very essence it is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution. It is not, we repeat, a granting of privileges to those who comply with certain conditions. If the law said that whoever pays a certain price for his license or fulfills certain other conditions shall have the privilege of selling liquors, it would still be a vicious law, a bargaining away of the peace and morals of the community; but it would be at least technically free from the objection we are urging. But now two men, John Roe and John Doe, may go together to the Excise Commissioners, fulfill the same conditions in applying for a license, be men of equally good character, and one may receive the privilege, while the other is denied it and has no redress.

What is this law that comes to one man and says you may have this privilege of making $5,000 a year, and says to 257 others, "Stand off; don't you dare to enter into this business; let it alone or the prison will be your resting place?" The whole scheme is an illustration of superb insolence. It is a travesty on the doctrine of equal rights. Applied to any other business beneath the sun, it would call out execration and invite revolt. Of all the monopolies ever created this is the greatest, the most atrocious in its defiance of every fundamental principle of a republican form of government, and it has been the most appalling in its political results.

It stands supreme as a violation of the law of equal rights, as of the laws of morality. The license system must go. If the business of drunkard-making is to be legalized, let us at least give all men an equal chance to secure the blood-money that the business brings.—The Voice.

GLADSTONE'S HOPES.

"I must speak a word of congratulation and hope in regard to the temperance question. Although the Parliamentary proceedings on the subject in 1890 were negative and not affirmative, although they appeared to consist substantially only in the rejection of a bad plan and not in the adoption of a good one, yet they had this effect—they dispose for all time of the monstrous and enormous claims for the compensation of publicans which the present government acknowledged. If upon the foundation bill which the government introduced it had been possible to make these claims they would have proved an impenetrable fort against every attempt to deal effectually with the drink traffic. There were some positive results also. In various parts of the country new life and a more equitable spirit had been infused into licensing boards. Those approaching my period of life may not witness it, but many of you will see a thorough and effective reform of the laws connected with the traffic in alcohol, with an acknowledgment of the right of local populations to settle the question, whether within their borders public houses shall exist."—Selected.

The monster petition that decorated Faneuil Hall during the World and National Convention of the W. C. T. U., was signed in forty different languages, 250,000 of which were brought from England by Lady Henry Somerset.

A mission visitor of one of the London churches thus describes her visit to a gin palace: "Without, in the narrow, dirty street, misery and squalor on every side; but within, all bright and gay. A throng of men and women crowded the bars, many of them scarcely more than children in years, but old in sin; and on looking around and lower, even upon the floor, were to be seen as many as thirty or forty little children, many of them babies. I at first thought they were asleep, and pitied their neglected condition; but this feeling was quickly changed to horror when I was assured that they were all drunk—dead drunk, stupidly drunk—and that some of them had never been sober, having actually been born saturated with the accursed stuff and fed on it ever since, the result being visible in their old, pinched faces, and miserable, half-starved bodies, with nothing of babyhood about them."

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The woe of the drunkard.—vs. 1-4. We are here given a vivid picture of a luxurious, sensual nation, glorying in what should have been its shame. Isaiah, in his stern denunciations of the prevailing wickedness, is never afraid to mention specific sins, and in this respect he is a worthy model for the preachers of our own land and age. Certain passages in the Bible have been twisted to a seeming endorsement of the use of spirituous drink; but, rightly interpreted, its whole tenor is against such indulgence. It is now generally acknowledged that there are two kinds of wine mentioned by the sacred writers. Rev. S. F. Porter says: "There are two words that signify wine in general, Tayin in Hebrew, and Oinos in Greek." These two words, according to the same authority, are gratified by adjectives which show to what class they belong; whether to the sweet, unfermented wine, or to the "strong drink" against which men are warned. The one is alcoholic and "a mocker;" the other non-alcoholic, "cheering God and man." The pure, unfermented juice of the grape was drunk in the patriarchal ages, even by royalty itself (see Gen. 11: 11); but man has "sought out many inventions," and among them is the art of making God's choicest gifts into poison. The same serpent that hid in the wine-cup in Solomon's day hides there still; and his description of the alcoholic poison is as accurate now as then. For God has not only prohibited such beverages, but so described them in his holy Word that all may take warning. To quote again from Rev. S. F. Porter's valuable little tract on "Bible Temperance:" "It is when it is inflamed (red) 'when it giveth its color in the cup,' 'when it moveth itself aright' (has the bead), 'look not upon it! pass it by! utterly reject it! for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.'" They crowned themselves in their drunken revels; but their crowns should be trodden under foot, and "the glorious beauty" of Samaria would be as "the hasty fruit before the summer," greedily devoured by the pitiless Assyrian, "the mighty and strong one," whose coming should be "as a destroying tempest." It is noticeable that the great Assyrian empire itself fell, through this very vice of drunkenness. No other so eats into a nation's very heart unless it be the sin of false worships, with which it is closely connected. Wine-drinking was always a concomitant of the secret rites borrowed from heathenism, which all through the days of the kings had more or less of a foothold among the Jews. The "woe" against the drunkards includes also every nation which by its laws and customs makes it easy for its citizens to become drunkards. And if a grievous woe was pronounced on a people who had none of the scientific light of modern days on this subject, shall the nation escape which licenses so terrible an evil for purposes of paltry revenue?

2. A saved remnant.—vs. 5, 6. Instead of the drunkard's fading garland, the Lord himself should be "for a crown of glory" and "diadem of beauty" to the faithful remnant under good King Hezekiah. Their judges would be inspired with the spirit of justice, and their soldiers with strength and courage from the same divine source. Thus we see that a God-fearing ruler may avert or delay a threatened judgment. For a brief period the nation felt a rekindling of the old fires. His patriotic and pious spirit infected all ranks, and wrought a temporary salvation for his people.

3. The sin of Judah.—vs. 7, 8. Judah's hour of doom was only delayed. Her people, too, had "erred through strong drink;" and, worst of all, her priests and prophets had fallen no less deeply under the curse. Even the temple and public places were filled with the evidence of their debaucheries. Their wine-fuddled brains "erred in vision;" they could not rightly discern God's truth, nor be his mouth-piece to the people.

"They stumbled in judgment;" they could not give clear and just decisions in the cases brought before them. The influence of drink customs, and especially of any national legalizing of the vice, is always demoralizing. There is no doubt but that if our law-makers would do right on the liquor question, they would be more competent to deal in a just and statesmanlike way with other great national problems.

4. The mockers rebuked.—vs. 9-13. Drinking destroys the moral sense. It takes away all reverence. So these drunkards of olden times made Isaiah the butt of their ribald mockery. "Whom shall he teach knowledge?" They were weary of his stale repetitions, "line upon line, precept upon precept." When a young man begins to drink he always has an idea that he can stop when he will. He fancies that he is strong enough and wise enough to let it alone, as soon as he sees himself to be in danger, and the talk of the temperance reformers he considers as all foolish babble. So temperance books and papers must necessarily be "line upon line." We may have read so many times the same facts and arguments that the repetition has grown monotonous; but let us remember that if we don't need them, others may, and pass them along. God speaks first in mercy, then in judgment. They would not hear his Word through Isaiah; they were like people to-day who want smart, eloquent, popular preachers. They would have to hear him through the stammering lips and strange tongue of a foreign foe. The rebellious nation, like the incorrigible sinner, must be punished, and for both "the wages of sin is death."

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The annual report of Immanuel church, Chicago, shows a balance in the treasury of $540.87, and all bills paid. During the year seventy-five have been received, of whom fifty-three were baptized. The net gain during the year was six. Reports indicated that the various branches of church work were efficiently carried on. Under the lead of the new pastor, Rev. O. P. Gifford, the church is moving on to new triumphs.

—The Second church, Chicago, reports additions by baptism 108; letter 80; experience 6; restoration 16; total 210. The diminutions by letter and otherwise were 240. Present membership 1,355. Mr. O. W. Barrett, secretary of the trustees, reported $20,339.09 cash received and $18,890.59 paid out. Dr. Lawrence and the members have reason to rejoice over the great prosperity of the year.

—The Clarendon Street Baptist church, Boston, Mass., under the pastorate of Dr. A. J. Gordon, supports seven missionaries in India, Africa and Burmah. It also employs six home evangelists and carries on a mission training school.

—Two families in Louisville, Ky., have promised to build a new hall for the Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, when the sum of $100,000 is added to the endowment. About $80,000 have been secured. The seminary has a large attendance of students this year.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

—There are now over 18,000 local societies, with a membership of 1,100,000. Thirty Evangelical denominations are represented. The Presbyterians lead all others, the Congregationalists are second, the Baptists third, the Methodists fourth and the Christians (Disciples) fifth. The first four denominations have over two thousand societies each, the Presbyterian having 4,500.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—Rev. A. H. Ball, D.D., of the First church, Elgin, has resigned. Dr. Ball has done a great work at Elgin, and has long filled an important place in Elgin Association and the work of the State.

—The Madison Congregational church, the largest in Wisconsin, Rev. E. G. Updike, pastor, has tried with great success the experiment of dispensing with its choir and depending on congregational singing, led by a precentor.

—Wisconsin has a woman as pastor of a Congregational church at Birnamwood, Mrs. M. R. Elliott. This church has just elected two deaconesses.

—With a view to strengthening weak country churches, fifty of the "prominent" English Congregational pastors have volunteered to give each four Sabbaths a year to preaching in such churches. It would mean new life and greatly augmented influence for the feeble churches in rural neighborhoods in other churches if ministers who are held in honor would more generally minister to them.

—The Emporia church is a great loser in the death of Senator Plumb. He was not a member of the church, but he was a warm friend and a liberal supporter. He was a firm believer in the Christian faith, and believed in churches and loved to see them prosper. He was constantly appealed to, to help struggling churches, and no church ever appealed in vain. Churches all over Kansas have received help from him.

—A new church of sixteen members has recently been organized at Oak Lawn, a promising suburb of Chicago. A suitable site has been secured, and the necessary amount has very nearly been pledged for a building. Work will begin immediately if the weather permits. Edgar H. Libby of Ewing Street church supplies them with preaching, giving an afternoon service every second Sunday.

—At Hampden, Ohio, Dec. 28, occurred the death of the Rev. William Potter at the age of 95. "Father" Potter, as he was familiarly known, was the eldest Congregational minister in the world. His ministerial age was 71 years 9 months and 12 days, as shown both by foreign and American statistics.

LUTHERAN.

—The western secretary of church extension expresses the situation of Lutheranism in the West very tersely in the use of the following: "Beyond question the greatest Lutheran work in America remains to be done, and that in the English language; and the General Synod, while ready to assist all, is the pioneer and strength of English Lutheranism. It is the only general Lutheran body with well organized, efficient boards of home missions and church extension, without whose timely and liberal aid it is almost impossible to found Lutheran churches in the English language. In hundreds of towns there are found a few of each Lutheran nationality, Germans, Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Icelanders, Finns, 'Pennsylvania Dutch,' and so forth, but not enough of either for a church in their language. They are all forced to learn English more rapidly than if they lived in settlements. The only way all these people can be saved to the Lutheran church of their fathers is to plant in such towns an English Lutheran church. The secretary figures it out that they have about 1,500 pastors, 2,250 congregations and 245,000 communicants who speak the English language. Two synods are wholly German, the Wartburg, and the German Synod of Nebraska. The German Synod of California, whose admission was refused at Lebanon, owing to some informalities, will soon be received. The New York and New Jersey Synod is about one-half German. The Maryland and other synods have a number of German pastors. A German theological seminary is maintained in Chicago, but with a small attendance.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—Bishop Joseph P. Thompson, of the African Methodist Episcopal church, and his wife recently observed their fiftieth wedding anniversary at the home in Newburg, N. Y. Bishop Thompson was born in slavery in Winchester, Va., in 1818. He ran away at sixteen, and after many hairbreadth escapes, settled in Williamsburg, Pa., where he learned to be a blacksmith. He became a preacher in 1841 and bishop in 1876.

MORAVIANS.

—The Moravians are desirous of establishing a third mission station in Alaska, and are calling for volunteer missionaries.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—Rev. Dr. S. J. McPherson, of Chicago, at the instance of a number of associates prominent in religious circles, will correspond with individuals and societies in the various denominations with a view of having a conference of delegates from all parts of the country to arrange for a religious exhibit at the World's Fair.

—There have been until recently two Presbyterian presbyteries in Philadelphia—Philadelphia and Philadelphia Central. By direction of the Synod of Pennsylvania their consolidation was effected Dec. 8. There are 140 ministers in the United Presbytery, and 30,000 communicants.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Scotch Presbyterian church on West Fourteenth street, New York City, has decided to remain where it is and aim to become a "people's church." Its congregation has moved up-town, thus making it like so many other churches, a down-town church without a congregation.

—The statistics of the General Synod of the R. P. church show 20 ministers 4031 communicants, an increase of 241. Total contributions $42,314, more than half of this from Philadelphia; $35 in all for National Reform.

—Prof. Charteris, of the chair of Biblical criticism in the University of Edinburgh, has been unanimously recommended for the moderatorship of the next session of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

HOME AND HEALTH.

IN KITCHEN AND ELSEWHERE.

Cloths dipped in hot potato water and applied to rheumatic joints will ease the pain.

Spirits of camphor frequently snuffed and tasted will cure a cold in the head, if taken at the beginning.

Peach leaves pounded to a pulp and applied to a bruise or wound from a rusty nail will give immediate relief.

The juice of pineapple is a valuable aid in diphtheria, cleaning the throat and preventing the formation of "white patches."

Brick dust applied with a piece of raw potato instead of a cloth will clean knives and make rust and stain disappear very quickly.

Hot water taken freely half an hour before bedtime is helpful in the case of constipation, and has a most soothing effect upon the stomach.

For pneumonia take a dozen raw onions, chop fine and then cook ten minutes with an equal quantity of rye flour and vinegar enough to make a paste; apply hot as poultices.

If you wish to write in silver, mix one ounce of the finest pewter, or block tin, and two ounces of quicksilver together until both become fluid. Then grind it with gum water and write with it.

A little oatmeal, a good soap, a lemon and a bottle of rosewater and glycerine, into which has been dropped a pinch of borax, will do wonders for even distressingly red hands, and will aid those that are soft and white in keeping their beauty through the winter.

For a lip salve dissolve a lump of white sugar in a teaspoonful of rosewater. Let it stand at the back of the stove to simmer slowly. Add two tablespoonfuls of nice olive oil, and a piece of spermaceti the size of a walnut. Add a mere drop of cochineal coloring matter to turn it pink. When the whole is melted to an ointment turn it into a little round porcelain box kept for the purpose. It should be small enough to hold only a few tablespoonfuls.

A gentleman recently died at Warburton, England, under circumstances that indicated poisoning from arsenic contained in a carpet of a bright crimson color. A London analyst has also reported a case in which a lady had purchased from a well known West End establishment several yards of a light flimsy printed material of the kind so much employed for curtains and other household decoration. While working at this material, both the lady and her maid began to suffer from symptoms of arsenical poisoning. The substance was found by the analyst to contain very large quantities of arsenic.

A little dissolved alum is very effective in clearing impure water. If thrown into a tub of soapsuds, the soap, curdled and accompanied by the dirty particles, will sink to the bottom, leaving the water above clear and pure. In times of scarcity of water this may be used again for washing clothes.—Arthur's Home Journal.

THE HOME DRESS.

Louise Alcott was a dress-reformer long before it became popular, if indeed it be popular. The Boston Transcript relates that a stylishly-dressed young friend calling on her, Miss Alcott said, in reference to her dress: "It's all very well now, when in the vicious pride of your youth you've nothing to do but prance about and amuse yourself; but when the duties and tests of wifehood and maternity come upon you, where will you be, with your health sacrificed to your pride?"

USES OF BAKING SODA.

For bathing—Add a little to the water. Good for insect stings—Moisten a pinch of soda with water, and apply to the wound.

For Erysipelas—Apply a plaster of baking-soda moistened with water spread on a soft cloth. It will kill it.

For sore throat—Hold a small quantity

SCROFULA

Is that impurity of the blood which produces unsightly lumps or swellings in the neck; which causes running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or "humors;" which, fastening upon the lungs, causes consumption and death. It is the most ancient of all diseases, and very few persons are entirely free from it.

How Can It Be CURED

By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the remarkable cures it has accomplished, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. If you suffer from scrofula, try Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"Every spring my wife and children have been troubled with scrofula, my little boy, three years old, being a terrible sufferer. Last spring he was one mass of sores from head to feet. We all took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and all have been cured of the scrofula. My little boy is entirely free from sores, and all four of my children look bright and healthy." W. B. FARM NOTES.

THE HORSE BLANKET.

As to blanketing horses in cold weather, Mr. J. W. Newton, of Vermont, says that he does not think it necessary in a warm stable except that a horse looks sleeker when covered. But in cool or cold weather a horse needs protection when standing out-of-doors, especially if sweating or if a cold wind is blowing; and when drawing manure or doing similar work, where the horse has to stand most of the time, it is best to keep a blanket on him all the time, unless the distance from the manure pile to the field is considerable. As to the horse's head, it is like a man's face, and does not need covering, unless the weather is very cold and windy. The feet and legs of animals, like deer, moose, etc., need only the protection of the hair, though they stand on the snow all the time in winter. Mr. Newton adds that he does not remember having ever heard of a horse's feet freezing, though he has often seen horses shiver in a cold wind, so he thinks a covering of the legs unnecessary; but in a cold stable it is best to keep the horse blanketed.

MAKING COMPOST.

Now is the time to make this true fertilizer. Everything the cow and pig can't eat must be thrown on the manure pile, to be covered with the cleaning of the cattle and horse stalls every morning. Disposing of refuse in this manner is an easy operation, an economical process, a money-saving plan, and doubles itself next season when put where plant roots can get at it. A man might as well throw away his pennies, his crusts, his table waste, his spare moments, all his good resolutions, as to waste his refuse in garden or farm. What good is it to make money with one hand and waste it with the other? The difference between a sensible man and a foolish one is often shown by the money allowed to leak out of the purse.—Germantown Telegraph.

RANDOM THOUGHTS.

Our German neighbor has sound ideas with regard to farming, and is not one of the kind that are continually sending forth the wailing cry of "farming don't pay."

Only about three or four years ago he purchased a badly run-down farm; one of the kind that is found in New England, where the owner is left to cultivate as best he can in his old age.

With the strength and determination of youth he entered upon the work of reclaiming the old farm, which, with its numerous acres, was able to carry but little stock. There was but little manure to start with, "but," said he, "I will plow up my ground and plant corn; I will plant it a long ways apart, and so I will get the ground cultivated with my little manure and I will get a fair crop. Then I will get some fodder and can keep more stock, make more manure, and next year I can do better by it, and by and by I will get my fields so that they will cut bog-grass."

He plowed old pasture fields that had not been plowed for years and cropped to rye, and secured a good crop. When he went to market he would bring home a load of manure, and in this way increase the supply of his plant food. He has more than doubled the number of his animals, and can even now cut much more hay than when he took the place. He is a farmer that understands his business, and gets at the bottom of ways and means that lead to success. It is a pleasure to notice the direction of labor of one when guided by intelligence, and to mark the degree of his success.

USE GOOD BAGS.

It is false economy for farmers, or anybody else indeed, to use weak and leaky bags, when strong and whole ones may be cheaply obtained. A recent writer well says that to throw away the bags received free with bran from the elevators and mills were better than to retain them for hauling more grain and feed. Sleazy and leaky they are hardly fit to hold the first shipment, and unless constantly mended afterward, will allow a heavy waste of all grain put into them.

DON'T DELAY TO

Stop that cough! Else the bronchial tubes will be enlarged and the delicate tissues of the lungs exposed to injury. No other medicine is so speedily operative in throat and lung troubles as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. A few doses have been known to break up an obstinate and distressing cough. Sufferers from asthma, bronchitis, croup, consumption, sore throat, and whooping cough find a sure relief in the use of this preparation. It soothes the inflamed membrane, promotes expectoration, and induces repose. Don't be without it in the house. Sallie E. Stone, Hurt's store, Va., writes: "I have found, in my family, that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral was always a certain cure for colds and coughs."

"Five years ago I had a constant cough, night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, and had been given up by my physicians. I began to take Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and was completely cured."—Anga A. Lewis, Ricard, N. Y. *

For potatoes they will barely do. Mills and shippers will usually give five to ten cents each for them, and it is all they are worth. It is cheaper to keep whole bags. For lining horse blankets or making sheets for horses, either to hasten the removal of the old coat or to keep off flies, they are excellent.

The popularity of Salvation Oil is not astonishing when we hear of its many cures.

Our readers will find in the letter of the Washington agent, on page 5, reference to the approaching convention in New York.

A large space is devoted, in this issue, to the address of Rev. J. M. Foster, of Boston, before the New England Anti-secrecy Convention, a few weeks ago. It is an exhaustive study of the evils of the secret lodge system of the age and its dangerous relations to the state. The document will bear a careful perusal.

Reform workers should not neglect to agitate the question of closing the gates of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. The advocates of this movement in behalf of the Christian Sabbath are a minority, it is true, and the exercise of energy in this direction needs to be persistent and prayerful. You who work for the preservation of the Lord's day as due to his honor should base your arguments upon President Blanchard's ground—the divine commandment—rather than concede too much to human policy in the settlement of this question which so nearly concerns the welfare of the nation and the enterprise of which it is the direct patron. The divine authority for the Sabbath must be maintained. Call it the "Puritanic" Sabbath, or what you will, it is of God's own appointment, and its infraction entails guilt.

A remarkable story comes from the Pacific Coast, showing that slavery of a peculiar character exists among the Japanese residents in Seattle, as well as in British Columbia. One of these went to Yokohama, several months ago, purchased three native women for $90 each, and returned with two of them to Seattle, leaving the third (ostensibly his wife) at San Francisco. All three of the women were subsequently united in a house in Seattle as slaves to their purchaser. Since then this man has been arrested, and the Japanese Consul has requested the aid of the Ministerial Association of Seattle in breaking up this system of slavery. The Christianized Japanese in Seattle say that all their countrymen who come to the United States as laborers are held in subjection by a powerful secret society which, playing on their superstitions, compels them to pay the tribute. About 150 Japanese women in Seattle have been sold outright by their parents and brought over here by their purchasers. This seems to be a kind of business in which a lawless secret society would find real enjoyment.

The question of jurisdiction, involving the location of a county-seat in Southwestern Kansas, forcible interference with court proceedings, conflicts of armed men, the killing of a sheriff's officer and of several other persons, last week, with the arrest of many members of the Farmers' Alliance for participation in the riotous proceedings, marks another era in the progress of that State towards civilization. Even "the dark and bloody ground" of Kentucky must yield the palm for frequent and terrible scenes of commotion and bloodshed to "bleeding Kansas," which, nearly ever since it became an organized section of the Union, has also been cursed with these unhalloved outbreaks. The lesson which this latest emence teaches is, that the American people are nowhere in one section more than another lifted above the realm of passion, and willing to always submit to the authority of law. There was even less excuse for the Kansas feud than for those among the mountain people of Kentucky and West Virginia, since those of the latter States sinned against far less of light and of Christian influences. What we need most to learn is the lesson taught in Romans 13: 1-7—"Let every soul be subject to the higher powers."

A bill introduced into the United States Senate by Senator Kyle, of South Dakota, provides for a constitutional amendment, giving to Congress the power to pass a uniform law on the subject of marriage and divorce. Perhaps no department of sociology has received more attention, and scarcely any reform is of more pressing importance. Of late years, in many of our States, and those, too, that rank high in their educational and religious advantages, the proportion of divorces to marriages has become alarmingly great, New England being conspicuous in this respect. So great is the diversity in the laws of the different States in reference to divorce that it is possible, by a change of residence, to commit almost any crime against the marriage relation and escape all punishment. It seems a long way around to seek a remedy for these evils in an amendment to the Federal Constitution and a national law; but perhaps this is the only thorough cure for this plague-spot in our social fabric. If properly framed, it would forever abolish polygamy and make it safe to admit Utah as a State. It would also put an end to an immense amount of litigation, discourage attempts to destroy the most important social relation of life on the merest pretexts, and so render marriage vows irrevocable except on scriptural terms.

Judge McGloin, writing in the January Forum, says: "The income and outgo of the lottery per annum are as follows:

Face value of tickets, 12 drawings.....	$28,000,000
Total of prizes, 12 drawings.....	14,767,200

Remainder representing gross profits.....	$13,232,800
---	--------------

It is doubtless true that all tickets issued are not sold, but this does not affect the dishonesty of the general rate. So the unsold tickets are placed in the wheel with the sold, and the company is the beneficiary of the winnings upon them. . . . In other words, this company takes a trifle less than 47 per cent for itself, a trifle more than 53 per cent for the limited band of winners. This is as near to an appropriation of one-half as these men dared to venture. The daily drawings, the scheme which fleeces the miserably poor, are cast in a still more dishonest mould. These facts, and the still more important one, that the United States government has set its seal upon all lotteries as systematic swindles, ought to have the effect, if anything can, of reducing them to their legitimate place among the thimble-rig, three-card monte and sweat-board confidence games to which public opinion is so generally opposed. But the fool-killer can still find plenty of subjects for his powers.

TO MR. AND MRS. DANIEL POWERS,

ON THE FORMER'S SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY.

BY ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

"Two angels with locked hands and open hearts."
—Rev. J. P. Stoddard.

'Tis written in a book of legends old,
The monk Anselmo, having prayed to see
An angel's face, was in a vision told,
"Thy prayer is granted."

Low he knelt in awe,
Hark'ning the trail of robes invisible,
And tread of white, swift feet no stains assoil,
And lightning rush of wings. He only saw
A brother praising God as at his toll
He meekly wrought; and while Anselmo still Tarried upon his knees this answer fell
In accents awful, sweet: "My angel see
In every one who gladly serveth Me!"

And so, dear friends, this humble wreath of song
I lay upon your brows uncrowned as yet;
And if the waiting time be short or long
Before the crowning come, what matters it
To you whose home is as a temple shrine
For praise continuous, and whose lives run o'er
With loving service for the Christ divine
Like precious myrrh? so that the dullest soul
May smell upon your garments odors blest,
And catch the heavenly harmonies that roll
Athwart your footsteps slanting toward the West,
O angels of the open heart and door!

Wellesley, Mass.

THE STATE AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

ADDRESS BY REV. J. M. FOSTER, OF BOSTON, IN THE CONVENTION HELD IN THE U. P. CHURCH,
BOSTON, DEC. 10, 1891.

Byron divided all men into two classes—the dupers and the duped. Secret, oath-bound fraternities are to-day duping men by the millions. It is time to lift the mask and expose their iniquity. Let us turn on the light.

Our subject leads us to inquire, What is the nature and province of the state? I answer:

1. The state is not a voluntary association. A man may join a voluntary association or not, just as he elects. But has he this option in civil society? He is born into the state, and is by nature subject to its laws. The corporation and the nation differ as greatly as the natural and the artificial. The corporation is the creature of the state, is responsible to the state, and appeal can always be had from it to the state. But the state is the creature of God, accountable to none but him for the use it makes of the great powers with which he has invested it.

2. It is not a social compact. The atheist Hobbes of Malmsbury originated this idea. Denying the existence of any fixed standard of right, and consequently that there could be any such thing as virtue or vice, this speculative philosopher resolved all law into one,—the will of the legislature. Gerrit Smith said: "The government has nothing to do with anything that does not pertain to the breaking of the leg or the taking of the pocket-book." Wm. Lloyd Garrison said: "The government is simply a watch-dog at our door, to keep out the robber and murderer." Thomas Jefferson said: "As only those who have personally accepted the compact are bound by it, or parties to it, it should be submitted to the people for endorsement every thirty years." These are the sentiments of the advocates of the social compact theory. You see into what dangerous positions it leads.

"It is something monstrous," said Dr. Arnold of Rugby, "that the ultimate powers in human life should be destitute of the sense of right and wrong;" and that comes only from a sense of responsibility to God. "The moral character of government seems to follow necessarily from its sovereign power. This is the simple ground of what I shall venture to call the moral theory of its objects; for as in each individual man there is a higher object than the preservation of his body and goods, so, if he be subject in the last resort to a power incapable of appreciating this higher object, his social and political relations, instead of being the perfection of his being, must be its corruption. The voice of law can only agree accidentally with that of his conscience; and yet on this voice of law his life and death are to depend; for its sovereignty over him must be, by the nature of the case, absolute."

It is God's moral ordinance. It is that settled order of things that is manifestly in harmony with the divine will, an integral part of God's moral government of the universe, having its necessity in the very constitution of our nature; "man is a social being."—Aristotle. And its authority is God's Word; "the powers that be are ordained of God;"—that is, it is clothed with authority and powers which transcend all human institutions, and thus becomes the heaven-ordained and heaven-commissioned agent representing the divine authority among men.

I. The being of the state is from God. The Creator has established divine institutions among men for specific purposes. The Sabbath is a divine institution. It is the arrangement, appointment and contrivance of heaven for man. It is too far-reaching in its benefits for man to have originated, or even to have thought of. It has its necessity in the very nature of man, and its authority in God's Word: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." The family is a divine institution. Marriage is an ordinance of God. It is God's appointed method of restraining vice, fostering virtue, multiplying the human race, and developing the better sentiments of the human heart. It has its necessity in the very constitution of our nature, and its authority in God's Word: "They twain shall be one flesh." The church is a divine institution. "It is the kingdom of God" among men. Its organization is from God. "Upon this Rock I will build my church." Its authority is from God: "I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Its constitution is from God: "Unto them were committed the oracles of God." Its laws are from God: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I command you." Its commission is from God: "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Its duties, as God's witness for the truth, against all contrary evils, have been announced: "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord."

The state is another divine institution. It has its necessity in the constitution of our nature, and its authority in God's Word: "There is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God." Civil government is not a human afterthought, but a divine forethought. It was created by our heavenly Father for the good of his people.

II. The powers of the state come from God. The state wields tremendous powers. It has the power to levy tax, to institute a tariff, and to regulate that mighty factor in our commercial affairs—the currency. It has power to organize schools, to enter the homes, take the children, place them in the schools and educate them, without asking the leave of the parents. It has the power to draw out all the physical, mental, and moral forces of the nation in self-defense, just as a sword is drawn from its sheath, as the late War of the Rebellion testifies. It has the power to crush that system of human slavery by which 4,000,000 of God's children were held in bondage, and proclaim liberty through all the land to all the inhabitants thereof, as Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation attests. It has power to stamp out all secret oath-bound organizations that insidiously subvert public justice and endanger the life and property of the citizen. The government found it necessary to assail the "Knights of the Golden Circle" during the war, for they were plotting to destroy it. It became necessary to throttle the Molly Maguire and Ku-Klux Clans as a means of self-protection. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that any one who has taken the Endowment House oaths of the Mormon hierarchy should not be naturalized, and if he has been naturalized, should be disfranchised. Let it be proclaimed in trumpet tones, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that the highest tribunal in our land has decreed that the secret oaths of that religious fraternity disqualify those taking them from becoming citizens; or, if citizens, for exercising the privileges of citizenship.

The murder of Dr. Cronin in Chicago led to the trial of the order of Clan-na-Gael. Their horrid oaths were exposed, just as the wicked oaths of the Endowment House in Salt Lake City were brought to light in the trial over the Idaho test-oaths disfranchising Mormons. The courts have decided that these disloyal oaths disqualify those taking them for citizenship.

The secret order of Mafia came over to us from Italy. They showed their true character in the murder of Chief of Police Hennessey, of New Orleans. That assassination was a crime which demanded retribution. Eleven members of the order were put on trial. Through fear of the order the jury acquitted them. A mob attacked the prison that very night and summarily dispatched these guilty wretches. That massacre cannot be justified. It is mob-law, and that is a danger and a symptom of a greater evil behind it. When justice breaks over its legal bounds, no one is safe, and the insidious disease of anarchy is back of it. But a secret oath-bound gang of ruffians and brigands cannot be tolerated here. That massacre was the hand-writing on the walls of the secret dens of the Mafia.

The Jesuits are an oath-bound society. They have sworn absolute allegiance to the Pope. The Encyclopedia Britannica says that "Jesuitism," as a secret oath-bound body, is "a naked sword, with its hilt at Rome, and its point every where." That sword is being brandished over the public schools of this city. The Boston Committee of One Hundred declared, in a printed manifesto, that it was their conviction that the disloyal oaths of the Jesuits should disqualify the takers for citizenship. These disloyal oaths caused them to be expelled from Germany and Italy, and to be driven from the South American Republics. And it will be necessary to disfranchise them in our own land.

The murder of Morgan by the Freemasons caused forty-five out of every fifty of the members to leave the order. In their indignation they exposed the oaths by which the lodge bound its members. This gave rise to the law which was passed by the Vermont Legislature in 1833. "A person who administers to another an oath or affirmation, or obligation in the nature of an oath, which is not required or authorized by law, or a person who voluntarily suffers such oath or obligation to be administered to him, or voluntarily takes the same, shall be fined not more than $100 and not less than $50; but this section shall not prohibit an oath or affidavit for the purpose of establishing claim, petition or application by an individual or corporation administered without intentional secrecy by a person authorized to administer oaths, or an oath or affidavit for the verification of commercial papers or documents relating to property, or which may be required by a public officer or tribunal of the United States, or of any State, or any other country, nor abridge the authority of a magistrate."

In 1839 the Legislature increased the penalty to $200. Massachusetts and New Hampshire adopted the Vermont law. Daniel Webster, the great lawyer and statesman, said: "All secret associations, the members of which take upon themselves extraordinary obligations to one another and are bound together by secret oaths, are natural sources of jealousy and just alarm to others, and especially unfavorable to harmony and mutual confidence among men living together under public institutions; and are dangerous to the general cause of civil liberty and justice. Under the influence of this conviction I heartily approve the law lately enacted in the State of which I am a citizen, for abolishing all such oaths and obligations."

Let the Vermont law be adopted by the remaining forty-one States of the Union. Let Congress crystalize it in a national law. That will drive secret, oath-bound societies beyond our borders. They are a standing menace to the Republic. Out of 13,000,000 voters, 2,000,000 belong to secret orders. They hold the balance of power in every closely contested election. This government does not want its policy dictated from the dark recesses of the lodge. We must throttle the serpent, or it will crush us.

The state has the power of life and death. This does not reside in the individual. No one has the right to take away his own life; that were suicide. He has not the right to employ another to take his life for him. No association has the right to execute the criminal, whether it be bank, railroad, Mafia, Clan-na-Gael, Masonic lodge, or Endowment House. It is murder. No number of men have the right to take the life of a guilty man—it is mob-law. Sixty-three millions have not the right to execute the criminal. It is mob-law on a large scale. And yet the state is every day exercising a power which does not reside in the individual or the mass. Where does it get this power? The only answer is, "Power comes from Almighty God." As the Saviour said to Pilate: "Thou couldst have no power over me at all except it were given to thee from above." In the Eighty-second Psalm rulers are called "gods" because they represent God on earth. In the 13th chapter of Romans rulers are called "God's ministers." They are clothed with authority from him, and administer his law. Civil government is the arm of Jehovah administering the affairs of his government among the nations.

III. The laws of the state come from God. The phrase of Hooker is too sublime even to become trite: "Law has its seat in the bosom of the Father, and its voice is the harmony of the world." Two thoughts filled the mind of Kant with ever increasing admiration and delight: "The starry heavens above us, God's law within us." Cicero long ago declared that "those who fail to recognize the will of God as the basis of all law, lay the foundation of government tanquam in aquis, as it were in the waters." Minos the law-giver of Crete, claimed to be the son of Jupiter, and to have received his laws from his reputed father. Lycurgus, the Spartan law-giver, claimed as authority for his laws the oracle at Delphi, Apollo. Numa claimed as authority for his laws the nymph Egeria. These facts indicate that there is an ineradicable conviction in the human soul that laws will not bind the conscience unless they come from God. As Blackstone said: "Any law that contravenes the law of God is no law at all."

The state is the divinely appointed keeper of both tables of the decalogue. The majesty of this law has been committed to the state. Here is the basis of moral legislation. The Ten Commandments are both a civil and a spiritual rule of life. In the second sense they belong to the church. The church determines all matters of faith. But in the first sense they belong to the state.

Take the second commandment. With the principle of idolatry the state has nothing to do. That belongs to the church. A man may believe in idolatry if he choose, and formulate his belief in a creed if he desire, and the state may not interfere. But the open and public practice of idolatry should be authoritatively and judicially suppressed. Josiah was commended of God because he went through Judea and cut down the groves and brake the images in pieces, and burned them in the fire. It was an act of public reformation, pleasing in God's sight. And Job said: "If I were guilty of idolatry it were an iniquity to be punished by the judges." Freemasonry is a system of idolatry. Ex-President J. Blanchard, D.D., of Wheaton, Ill., asked this question in a convention at Washington, D. C.: "What is the connection between the heathen altars of worship introduced by Solomon's wives into Israel and the altars of the Masonic lodge?" The reading of the question sent a thrill through the assembly similar to an electric shock passed through the human body. That question struck at the core of this evil. If Freemasonry is anything, it is a religion. It is not Christian, for it excludes Christ from the lodge. Its god is not the Christ of Calvary, but the god of heathendom. Their altar is not erected to Christ but to Belial. They sacrifice not to God, but they sacrifice to devils. These Masonic temples, like the joss-houses of the Chinamen of California, are houses of devil-worship. The state, as the representative of the true God, should have these houses swept and garnished at once, and the altars and idols found in them burned to ashes.

Take the third commandment. The state punishes blasphemy and profanity. The horrid oaths administered in the lodges are sufficient to bring down the wrath of an offended God, and the state, as the shield of his honor, should purge out the evil that causeth the curse.

Take the fourth commandment. The Sabbath is both civil and religious. The church tells us how the Sabbath is to be observed. The state prohibits public Sabbath desecration. Nehemiah made an end of public work in Jerusalem on the Sabbath, and threatened the Tyrian merchants with arrest and punishment if they brought their wares any more on Sabbath for traffic. Our government should prohibit the United States mail service and inter-State commerce on Sabbath. The Sunday newspaper and excursion trains should be outlawed. But we all know that the Sabbath is the chief day for parades and picnics by the lodges. One hundred cases could be cited where the Masonic fraternity and the brewery have combined in the grove to trample under foot the Sabbath. If it is wrong for a team to play base-ball on Sabbath, it is wrong for the fraternity to spend the day in drunken revelry. If the state should prohibit the first, the second should not escape.

Take the fifth commandment. The state must guard the home against Mormon polygamy, free love, and speedy and easy divorce. As goes the home, the nation goes. Corrupt the home, the nation is polluted; keep the home pure, and you preserve the nation. But the lodge is the greatest foe of the home. Think of a Mason "in all the paraphernalia of a gorgeous uniform costing $75," and his wife at home wearing a $1.50 calico dress! Think of a man staying away from his home night after night from 12 to 1 o'clock. Monday night at the Masonic Lodge; Tuesday night at the Knights of Pythias; Wednesday night at the Odd-fellows, etc.! Think of his wife asking him, "If I were to stay from you this late every night, how long would you live with me?" and he replies, with arms folded, head thrown back and eye glittering: "Just about five minutes." The lodge robs the home of the time and money of the husband and father. They call them benevolent orders. And yet it costs from $10 to $125 to get in. And for every $2,000,000 distributed, they spend $3,000,000. That is, it takes $3 to disburse $2. What missionary society would be tolerated in such a use of funds! A missionary society that spends more than $5,000 in disbursing $100,000 is extravagant.

Take the sixth commandment. We are all agreed that the saloon is a murderous institution and should be crushed. In Iowa the saloon took the life of the noble Haddock, a Methodist minister. In Mississippi the son of an aged Baptist minister, the chivalrous editor of a temperance journal, was shot down like an animal, because he dared speak the truth respecting the saloon. The saloon sends 60,000 American citizens to a drunkard's grave every year. The saloon should be prohibited by law as a murderer. The lodge is a murderous institution, and should be destroyed. It murdered Morgan in 1826. In the words of John Quincy Adams, "hundreds were proved to have been accessories to the Morgan murder-crimes before and after the fact." It murdered Forgic in 1854. It ordered two members to cut the throat of a third member who had divulged some of their secrets; and the cold-blooded assassins performed their satanic task. If all the murders the lodge has committed were known, the outraged justice of humanity would demand that it be burned with unquenchable fire. Delenda est Carthago.

Take the eighth commandment. The saloon is a wholesale robber. It costs our nation, directly and indirectly, at least, $1,500,000,000 annually. This money is given to make paupers, and bring our people to squalor and vice. The lodge squanders funds that should be devoted to the home and the public good. Dr. Carradine, in his sermon, says: "I know a church member who gives $30 a year to his fraternity, and nothing to his church. Another gives $120 annually to his societies, and one-fourth of this sum to his church. Still another has given, lately, over $500 to his fraternities, and not one-tenth of that sum to his church." We heard a great deal about the octopus of the Louisiana lottery absorbing the resources of the country, and its execution was demanded. But the lodge is draining our nation's treasuries in a way the Louisiana lottery could not, and to an enormous extent. Why not destroy it?

Take the ninth commandment. Dr. Fairchild said: "A neighbor of mine was employed as a spy in the service of the army of the Potomac. He fell into the hands of the enemy, and was condemned according to the laws of war, but was saved from execution by the power of the mystic relationship, which proved more potent than rebel hatred or fealty to a supposed legitimate government." Of course, the young man is earnest in his admiration of the secret order and its beautiful charities; but can that force be trusted in society which is mightier than the behests of justice and country? In Scott's "Partisan Life with Col. Moseby," we are told that Moseby, in retaliation for the execution of two of his men as outlaws by Gen. Custer, had cast lots upon his prisoners and selected seven for death. These were marched off to a distant point for execution by a squad of his men detailed for this purpose. On the way they were met by Capt. Mountjoy, one of Moseby's officers, bringing in another company of Union prisoners. The chivalrous outlaw was a Mason and still recognized the obligations of his order. He discovered two Masons among the doomed men, and on his own authority substituted for them two of his own prisoners, and thus demonstrated the power of the mystic tie. These two rescued men may be loud in their praises of the mysterious relationship, but what have the friends of those two victims to say? During the last year of the war there came to my house in Ohio, from a remote town in Texas, a young lady, a relative of my family, who had passed from the extreme of rebellion to the extreme of loyalty, across the fiery line of war, without obstruction and without question. Her father and brother were with Forrest's rebel cavalry. Driven from her home in Vicksburg by the war, she had buried her mother and sister among strangers, and with her little brother, five years old, she had undertaken the perilous and apparently impossible journey. At Monroe, in Louisiana, she, as the daughter of a Mason, was admitted to the degree devised for Masons' wives and daughters (called "woodshed Masonry"). The Masons then placed her on a cotton boat, and she went safely down the Washita and Red rivers, and up the Mississippi, passing Natchez, Vicksburg and Memphis, without inquiry as to her destination or purpose. It was a kindly service, benevolent in intention and successful in execution; and one could scarcely find it in his heart to question the means by which it was accomplished. But we are compelled to ask, what is the limit of that mysterious power which bridged the chasm of war, and brought Texas and Oberlin into communication with each other? If men were angels, we might trust them with such power.

Three men were at Washington, with a friend, in the early stages of the war, when our forces occupied Fortress Monroe, Norfolk and Hampton, and a few other points about the mouth of the James river, face to face with the rebel forces. He was anxious to visit these points, but it was difficult to obtain the necessary permission. He and his friends at length decided to go aboard the steamer leaving for Fortress Monroe, hoping that some way might open for the realization of their wishes. They were informed, when they went aboard, that without an official permit they would not be allowed to go on shore. During the passage, our friend observed a military officer walking the deck, and often referred to as high in authority. He thought he recognized his countenance as one that he had seen at a Masonic festival some years before. He put himself in his way and gave him the grand hailing sign of the Royal Arch Mason. He received a response and thus made the acquaintance of Gen. ——. In reply to the inquiry of the general, what service he could render him, he stated the wish of himself and his friends, who were not Masons, but for whose loyalty he could vouch. They received from the general a pass to all the points they desired to visit. Is the Masonic bond stronger than that of a soldier's duty as he stands guardian of the nation's highest interests?

Who does not know that justice is perverted in our courts by this mystic tie? After a certain degree the Mason is sworn to defend his companion in any crime, "treason and murder not excepted." What need we any further witness?

Take the tenth commandment. After the he-gira which followed the Morgan murder, the lodge went South and grew up there. The Southern Confederacy was conceived and brought forth in the lodge. We charge the crime of secession upon the Masonic fraternity. The North went down and crushed the Rebellion, and they brought back the lodge with them. It will yet be necessary for the American people to crush the viper of secretism. An officer of a grand lodge in Missouri, in 1867, said: "Not only do we know no North, no South, no East, no West, but we know no government save our own. To every government save that of Masonry, and to each and all alike, we are foreigners. We are a nation of men bound to each other only by Masonic ties, as citizens of the world, and that world the world of Masonry; brethren to each other all the world over; foreigners to all the world besides." That is treason. Mackey's Lexicon of Freemasonry, 1866, says, page 39: "The Master is supreme in the lodge. Such a thing as an appeal from the Master to the lodge is unknown in Masonry. The power of the Master is absolute." Page 103: "The government of the Grand Lodges is completely despotic: its edicts must be respected and obeyed without examination by its subordinate lodges." The English people could behead their king, and Americans impeach their President; but the tyrant of the lodge cannot be appealed from. "Should the Grand Lodge decree wrongfully or contrary to the ancient constitutions, there is no redress for its subordinates." "The Master is supreme arbiter in all questions of order. For no misdemeanor, however great, can he be tried by his lodge, for as no one has a right to preside there in his presence except himself, it would be absurd to suppose he could sit as judge in his own case." If there is any such a thing as dangerous combinations, the lodge is one. Since the war, the traitor guerilla, General Pike, "Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Grand Council and Inspector General of the thirty-third and last degree of Masonry," declared, in his official address, in Charleston, S. C., that "every Mason who fought on the side of the government in the slavery war had earned the condemnation and contempt of the world of Masonry." We charge them with treason in theory and practice.

Take the first commandment. From the birth of Masonry at the Apple-tree Tavern, Covent Garden, London, June 24, 1717, Masonry has claimed to be a religion. Mackey speaks of a Mason as "free from sin by living up to the rules of the order." (Lex., p. 16.) Again (page 34), "Masonry consists in a knowledge of the great truths, that there is one God, and that the soul is immortal." (Page 40): "The white apron is by its symbolic purity to aid us to that purity of life and conduct which will enable us to present ourselves before the Grand Master of the Universe unstained with sin." Town says: "Masonry is the perfection and arrangement of those holy principles by which the soul is fitted for a meet temple of God in a world of immortality." The Grand Sire of the Odd-fellows, in consecrating their cemetery near Chicago, in 1868, said: "Our Grand Master will take all who are buried in this ground to himself in the day when he makes up his jewels." The lodge proclaims itself a religion by baptizing infants. But they worship not our Lord Christ, the one living and true God, but "the god of this world," the god of the pagan, Mohammedan, Jew and the devil, "who also believes."

Take the seventh commandment. We charge the lodge with being the mother of harlots. Secrecy is her tap-root. Macoy's Manual, page 18, says: "The virtue indispensably requisite in Masons is secrecy. This is the guard of their confidence and the security of their trust. So great a stress is to be laid upon it, that it is to be enforced under the strongest obligations." On pain of having "their throat cut from ear to ear," they are sworn to "conceal and never reveal" the secrets of the lodge, good or bad. On this account the lodge rooms, above a certain degree, are made drinking saloons, in which men who move in the highest social circles get beastly drunk. On this account they can invade widows' houses, and virgins too, and lead their victims astray.

The lodge is a public robber, and should be arrested and placed behind the bars of prohibition. It is a Sabbath-breaker, and the law should lay hands upon it. It is a blasphemer, and should be punished. It is an idolater, and should be suppressed. It is a traitor to the truth, and should be visited with the pains and penalties of perjury. It is a covetous extortioner, and guilty of treason against good government, and should be proscribed. It is guilty of dethroning the God of all government and should be disinherited. It is a corrupting, murderous system, and should be tried and executed. It breaks and tramples under foot every precept of the decalogue, and should be driven from our borders into the deep sea of oblivion.

The lodge made the assassination of Lincoln a possibility. The lodge saved the neck of Jefferson Davis. Let Americans take warning.

WORDS THAT SHOULD BE EMPHASIZED.

The following address was delivered at Music Hall, Boston, December 21, 1891, when the Congregational Club celebrated "Forefathers' Day," by Rev. Robert R. Meredith, D.D., of Brooklyn, N. Y.:

"What is the grand characteristic of the Pilgrims and the Puritans? What is it that accounts for all that they were able to do and did do? They were no wiser than tens of thousands of men around them in their day; they were no braver; they had no more endurance than others.

They were plain, every day, average kind of men. What was it that enabled them to do what they accomplished? It may be a commonplace thing to say, but I have come from New York to Boston to say it to-night. It was their religion that enabled these men to accomplish what they did. [Applause.] Loyalty to God and a profound faith in his providence and his sovereignty in the affairs of men was the foundation of their life; was its inspiration and its strength. It was not intellectual; it was spiritual. Their consciences were enlightened by the spirit and the truth of God, and they were loyal to him. And that made these commonplace men, so it will make any commonplace men, men of grand achievements.

"The Puritan movement was the result of a reaction. Since then there has been another reaction, not, perhaps, so violent, but gradual. The pendulum has swung past the centre in the other direction. We lay the flattering unction to our souls that we have just laid aside the excrescences in the lives of these men, their expressive tendencies, their strict legalism and those things that in them were mistakes, and that we have held on to all that was really vital and powerful in their work. I do not believe that is true. I believe that there is needed in this country to-day another reaction, a movement back toward Puritanism [applause], a swinging of the pendulum toward the centre. These were religious men. They had a theology which they could and did believe, and that will make even a puny man strong. These men had a stalwart type of piety. They carried their religion into business, and there were no banks wrecked. [Applause.] They said, 'religion is business, and business is religion.' [Applause] They took their religion into their politics. If there ever were politics under the sun of heaven that needed to get religion, ours are the politics. [Laughter and applause.] To-day, if a minister lifts his voice on any question that borders remotely on any issue between the parties, the press of the party offended will come down upon him with the sternest reproof—"No politics in the pulpit!" If the pendulum should swing back to its centre, the ministers of the Congregational churches would say: 'Every question of morals belongs to the discussions of my pulpit, and if they become involved in your politics I will discuss them all the same, and if your politics are injured so much the worse for your politics.' That is Puritanism, and that is what we want to-day.

"The religion of the Puritans made them thoughtful, sincere, outspoken men. In this we need a reaction. We are silent in the face of great wrongs. Their religion made them useable by God.

"Vicious measures prevail in our cities to-day, because of the vast number of men who will not take the trouble to vote. [Applause.] Do we not need enough of the Puritan spirit to make us pass a law that will disfranchise a man that will not take the trouble to exercise his right as a citizen? [Applause.] These men are of a variety of classes. Some of them are dudes, English dudes born in America [laughter], who turn up their trousers on Beacon street because it is muddy in Piccadilly. [Laughter.] The Puritans used to burn witches. I wonder what they would have done with a dude. I think they would have broiled him and served him on toast. [Laughter.]

"Then the Puritans guarded admission into the colonies. It needs to be impressed upon the American people. I am not a party to the cry of 'America for Americans,' because I am an Irishman myself. Such a cry would have given the Indians the best of the argument, and the Puritans would have been hustled back on to the Mayflower. [Laughter.] No, it won't be time for 150 years more to talk about America for Americans. But we will demand a certificate of character. [Applause.] We will not open our doors to the pauper and criminal populations of Europe to pour in upon us. [Applause.] We will say to them: 'Keep your criminals and paupers at home.' But to every man, sober, steady and industrious, we will say: 'Welcome to these shores to labor for a living and to amass wealth if it is in you.' But we won't stand on the dock at Castle Garden, and beckon to Old Erin and say, 'Come over and govern us.' [Laughter and applause.] We will say to every man that comes here: 'My friend, the red in our flag mingles with and is modified by the white and the blue and the stars [applause]; and if you do not like the mixture and want the pure red, find a country for yourself and wave your flag there.' [Applause.]

"I will tell you a political party that will win: A party with Puritan stalwartness; a party made up of men with enlightened consciences and loyal to them, who shall meet together and make a platform and say in that platform: 'This ballot shall be guarded; it is a sacred trust; the man who does not exercise the trust shall be punished; no man coming to these shores shall be admitted to the discharge of this duty and the enjoyment of this privilege until he has acquired a fitness for the same; and every ballot shall be freely cast and fairly counted from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.' [Applause.] And for a second plank in that platform this: 'The public school system of this country shall be held forever inviolate under the protection of the strong right arm of the State. There shall be no division of its funds for any purpose whatever. [Applause.] There shall be one law concerning it for all people, and the Bible shall rest on its desk and be read in every session of the school.'" [Great applause.]

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Comic papers in the public library.—"High art" falsely so called.—An astonishing record.—The Harvard matter.

The Boston Public Library has passed a sentence of exclusion against Puck and Judge, and other papers of like tenor, on the ground that they are not educational, nor sufficiently valuable to warrant the money expended on them. I will confess to not a little sympathy with the directors. A purely comic paper always contains much that a refined nature shrinks from, and which an unrefined nature is no better for reading. A sad lack of reverence characterizes the purely comic paper of to-day. Nothing is too sacred for its flippant jesting, and it too often takes for the subjects of its jokes things that should not be thought of without a blush—or a sigh. American wit seems to run to the rollicking and grotesque, though we have produced at least one first-class humorist in Oliver Wendell Holmes. But when shall we produce another with humor at once so delicate and so caustic?—as for instance that displayed in those two or three pages in "Over the Tea-cups," where he pays his respect to the Knights of Labor? It is true that a clever political cartoon has its uses, but even here I am inclined to think the real educational value is very slight. However, if these satires had the smallest effect in changing bad legislation, or in stirring up the consciences of our lawmakers, it would be a great point scored in favor of the comic paper. But I think it will be found that the cases are exceedingly few where the victim of the cleverest cartoon, the keenest and justest caricature, has felt himself impelled in consequence to turn over a new leaf, and exchange a career of political corruption for one of high-minded integrity. Because the caricaturists of Paris took occasion, on account of his peculiar facial outline, to draw Louis XVIII. in the shape of a huge pear, the poor "citizen king" went nearly beside himself, to the great pleasure, no doubt, of the unscrupulous French wits; but our American public men are thicker-skinned, and those whose political records can be most justly impeached are the ones from whose obtuse consciousness such things glance off like the bullets from an alligator's hide.

The experiment of opening the Public Library on Sunday is to be tested in South Boston. It sounds very well when the advocates of Sabbath opening say that it takes men off the street, and gives them a place in which to spend their Sundays, that would otherwise be passed in more questionable resorts; but the fact is that this class does not frequent reading rooms on Sundays, or any other day, so that the result will be only a still further letting down of the bars which hedge in our New England Sabbath.

The "elevation of the masses" and "high art" are the fashionable shibboleths of to-day. They are convenient masks for a great deal to pose under which is neither "elevating," nor art, in its true sense. The other day, in company with a friend, I was looking over a collection of particularly fine engravings from some of the most famous European schools. Among them, however, were a few of that objectionable class against the admittance of which into the city's public gallery, the ladies of Philadelphia recently made such a noble protest; and it occurred to me as a strange and noticeable thing, that the painters who delight in this kind of art, never seem capable of that most divine triumph of the artist's pencil,—the drawing of a really beautiful woman's face. As license is not liberty, so any picture which outrages our moral sense can in no wise claim shelter under the mantle of legitimate art; and the sooner this is a recognized canon among all who claim to be connoisseurs, the better. It is time "the high looks" of those people who assume that because we do not like the nude in art, we therefore do not know a good picture when we see it, were taken down.

The deluded victims of the endowment orders have much reason to "chew the cud of bitter reflection," in view of the recent revelations regarding the managers of the various endowment orders which have lately come to grief. The officers of the "Golden Grail" report for traveling expenses, in six months, $125,000; but the Progressive Benefit Order beats even this astonishing record, for it reports $129,119 expended during the same time. Beside this, the officers of the Royal Ark were modest, as during this period they took only about $37,000. The supreme officers of the Friendly Aid Society were paid salaries at the rate of $45,000 a year, and bought spans of horses and carriages for their use, charging all to "traveling expenses." The petty thief who steals a few dollars is promptly jailed; but enlightened Massachusetts, it seems, has one law for him, and another law, or rather no law, for these scoundrels; but, as the Springfield Republican justly observes, "the State of Massachusetts is morally responsible for every dollar thus filched from the fool-members of these orders." The question now is, "What will be Gov. Russell's policy in regard to them?" He has it in his power to greatly help or give them their death-blow; and he is said to have committed himself before his election to the former line of action, and at least received the votes of the long and short term orders in the last campaign, on the supposition that he was more friendly to them than the Republican candidate. If Gov. Russell made any such promise he showed himself very unfit for the high honor that has twice been conferred upon him, but more so if he keeps them. Either way, it is not a dignified or pleasant predicament.

The Harvard matter still continues to occupy public attention. One of the overseers of Harvard, Henry W. Putnam, has written a strong letter to the Transcript, rebuking President Eliot's do-nothing policy, and thanking Mr. Garrison for the blow he has struck against that policy, to which he attributes "the steady increase for the two decades of his administration of the scandal and demoralization attending the development of this secret club." He adds: "All but the most incorrigible set would be grateful to the professor who should—as Prof. Chaplin offered to do—break up the club once for all and clear the atmosphere around Harvard Square.” A consummation most devoutly to be wished by every one who has the best good at heart of this great educational center. ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

NEW YORK LETTER.

NEW YORK, January 9, 1892.

Rev. Dr. Talmage rounded out his sixth decade January 7th. Though now a sexagenarian, he shows no decadence in physical vigor, but continues his remunerative work as lecturer all over the land and writer for periodicals, in addition to preaching. A Brooklyn daily says, “The Tabernacle pastor is to-day Brooklyn’s bright, particular pulpit star. In season and out of season, whether the weather is fine or stormy, the same crowds go to hear him. He is to-day the best-known and the most widely advertised clergyman in the United States, if not in the world. His sermons encircle the globe. It is estimated that between eleven and twelve million people read them every week.”

Rev. J. W. Dawson, a London editor, adds tartly, that this popularity is an effect without a cause, for he is “the best paid minister, for the least brain-power, in the States.”

It is the boast of the Romish church that it never changes. The rightfulness of the Inquisition is the same now as ever, only power is lacking to enforce its behests. The new work by Grattan Guinness, which gives an account of his recent visit to Mexico, has photographs of some of the hundreds of skeletons found in the Inquisition wall at Pueblo. One can see the remains of a number of these murdered Christians preserved to-day in the museum of Toluca, and in that of the City of Mexico. It would be well for some of our politicians who are so servile in yielding to the audacious demands of Rome, and doing all they can to aid her in gaining control of this country, to put these two facts together: the merciless cruelty of the past, and the boasted infallibility and unchangeableness of this ancient hierarchy.

The scandalous doings of Harvard students, so graphically recorded by a recent New England letter, in these columns, put the president and college authorities in a humiliating posture of helplessness, according to their own statements. Their relation to these criminals is like that of mother to Mary, in the old song:

“Baby sat in the window seat,
Mary pushed her into the street.
Baby’s brains were dashed out in the ‘airy,’ Mother held up her forefinger at Mary.”

This is not pathos, but bathos. It nevertheless pictures the ludicrous insensibility to moral distinctions and punitive measures shown by some people. A shake of the finger is (with them) ample punishment for crime.

A clergyman came up rather timidly to me, a few weeks since, and with bated breath asked, in an undertone: “Are you a Mason?” When assured that I had always felt the strongest repugnance towards the system, and had refused overtures of a flattering nature to connect myself with it, he extended his hand warmly, saying: “I have done you wrong in my heart, thinking that you were, and so did not respond to the cordiality you have ever shown to me.” Begging forgiveness, he went his way with a cheerful and satisfied air. Ever since, he has seemed another man. We do often err through lack of frankness. Not that it is always needful to speak one’s mind where questions of this sort are involved, yet there are times when silence is sin. On the other hand, where one feels that he has a right to ask a question like the above, it is better to do so than to entertain suspicion and prejudice.

I do not attend theatres, or read theatrical criticisms, but the other day a headline attracted my attention—the name of Mrs. Scott Siddons, whose histrionic ability had been enjoyed by me many years ago on the lyceum platform. The critic said that her attempt to personate a female adventuress was not a success, for she herself is a pure, good woman. This failure is her highest praise. On the other hand, the stage critic of the Boston Traveller praises the success of an actress of whose private character the world knows too much already, when she personates “an abandoned woman, fascinating in the sensuality of her wiles to win a lover, and vindictive against any that prevent the gratification of her lustful purposes.” It takes a lewd woman to do this. Mrs. Scott Siddons rises in the thought of all good people as she shows awkwardness in such discreditable business. No wonder her critic questions her wisdom in returning to the stage. Why, we may also ask, should the Traveller, under its new, religious management, continue to editorially advertise the theatre, which Beecher, in his wisest prime, pronounced “a poisonous mushroom, an institution which has come down through thousands of years with perpetual dishonor upon it?” OCCASIONAL.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 6, 1892.

The re-assembling of Congress after the holiday recess, on Tuesday, was, as usual, largely attended. The crowds in the galleries expected to have heard the Chilean correspondence and President Harrison’s message relating thereto, but they were not sent in; and, if semi-official statements can be accepted as true, all danger of any trouble with Chili has passed, owing to the new administration of that country having instructed its minister here, Senor Monti, to present a full apology to this government for the attack made in the streets of Valparaiso upon the American sailors from the U. S. S. Baltimore. This will be a very happy ending of what has lately looked like a very serious matter.

Vice-President Morton presided over the opening session of the Senate; among the petitions presented were a number asking that the $5,000,000 loan to the Columbian Exposition be made only on condition that the exposition shall be closed on the Sabbath day. Memorials were also presented asking for the speedy completion of the Nicaragua ship canal; for the free delivery of all mail-matter; for liberal appropriations for the improvement of water-ways, and for the ratification of the Brussels treaty to suppress the African slave trade. This treaty, which it will be remembered the Senate failed to act upon at the last session, has been the subject of much controversy in this country. Its principal object—the suppression of the African slave trade—everybody favors; but unfortunately for that object, so far as this treaty affects it, there are other clauses in the treaty that do not meet the approval of some of the Senators, who think that more harm than good will come from its ratification.

President Harrison sent a message to the Senate calling attention to the famine prevailing in some of the provinces of Russia, and recommending that some action be at once taken to show the sympathy of the United States. Senator Washburn introduced a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ any vessel in the navy suitable for the purpose, or to charter a private vessel to convey food to the starving Russians. The resolution was adopted by the Senate, and in the House Representative Blount, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, asked that immediate consideration be given it; but Representative Kilgore objected, and it went over temporarily. It will, of course, be adopted.

Owing to the continued illness of Speaker Crisp, the House was called to order by the clerk, and its first business was the election of a speaker pro tempore. Representative McMillin, of Tennessee, was chosen without opposition, and he will continue to preside over the House until Mr. Crisp entirely recovers, which his physician thinks will be in about two weeks. This being the first “bill” day of the session in the House, a large number of bills, on almost every conceivable subject, were introduced.

The colored Young Men’s Christian Association, which was organized last summer, held dedicatory services in the building they have purchased last Sunday. Rev. Dr. Rankin, president of Howard University, preached a strong sermon, his subject being “One stronger than the strong man armed.” The building purchased by the new association is in a section of the city where Christianizing influences are needed, and it was until recently one of the most notorious disreputable houses in Washington. There is a great career before this association, as its members can do work among the members of its race that it would be impossible for their white brothers to do, however willing they might be to try.

President Harrison has filled the vacancies on the board of Interstate Commerce by nominating J. W. McDill, of Iowa, to succeed T. M. Cooley, resigned; W. M. Lindsey, of Kentucky, to succeed W. L. Bragg, deceased; and W. R. Morrison, of Illinois, to succeed himself, his first term having just expired. He has also nominated Andrew P. McCormick, of Texas, to be judge of the fifth circuit of the new U. S. Court. *

REFORM NEWS.

THE WASHINGTON AGENT IN NEW YORK.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Jan., 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Bidding dear ones at home good-bye, I started on Monday for the Empire State. Several stops were made in Pennsylvania. An hour’s visit was had at the home of Bro. Gable, Stewartstown. Bro. G. was anxious for further work. I am always sure of a welcome at Bro. John White’s, in Steelton. This brother is one of the few who refused to join a secret society patronized by a majority of those employed in the steel works. He was told by a lodge-man that if he refused to join this society, he would lose his position. The lodge has gone; many who joined it have gone; much time and money needed for poor men’s homes are gone, but he remained, happy in the consciousness of having stood for the right. Some of the Lord’s money in his care was appropriated to our work, as it has been before. At Wilkes Barre, Factoryville, and Dalton, Pa., I met friends.

On reaching this city I found a welcome, as usual, at the home of Bro. Woodruff. There is much to encourage the holding of our State Convention here.

I hope to be able to report what may be done in time for the State President to send a call to the next Cynosure.

Reform work is uphill business, but the hill reaches toward heaven. Let us climb, friends, till God shall say, “It is enough—come up higher.” W. B. STODDARD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A LABORER IN THE SUNNY SOUTH.

LACON, Ala., Jan. 2, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I endeavored to make the best possible use of the Christian Cynosures and tracts sent to me, distributing them among the many colored preachers in and about Birmingham, and lecturing and preaching against the anti-Christ of our times. My last effort in that line was a short address, which, by the vote of the conference, I had the privilege of making before the Colored M. E. Zion church, at its late annual session in Birmingham.

But I have sometimes thought, of late, that my work is almost done, though it has been but little. For several months failing health has warned me that I cannot hope to do increasing lecture work, as I had fondly desired. I seem now, and have for the last few weeks, to be on the invalid list.

But my soul is animated as I read the dear Cynosure from week to week, and learn that the important principles which it advocates are so gloriously permeating the moral sense of our country. I have thanked God that he has just the man for Boston withal. And wonders is the Lord working against the dark powers and to redeem his church.

During the intervening years, we have often had in fond remembrance the moral heroes and earnest Christian men whom we met in Carpenter Hall at the lecturers’ and seceders’ convention, to which we came from Missouri. My wife, now 71 years of age, talks with delight of the unfoldings of truth we there witnessed—of the precious sacramental season enjoyed on the Sabbath, with the venerable J. Blanchard, in that “upper chamber” at No. 221 West Madison street, the evident presence of the divine Master making it good to be there.

Then, in our minds, we go over to our genial home provided by Rev. J. P. Stoddard—and a more hallowed spot we do not remember ever to have found than was that for the little time he tarried and talked and prayed with us. My wife says that his prayer brought the Holy Spirit upon us. Then the association we renewed and so richly enjoyed with that venerable and well-tried reformer, O. Sholes, and his notable Christian wife, whose generous hospitality had been shown to me and my little family, years before that convention, when, adrift on an Illinois prairie, we were strangers and needy; then they "took us in." We would also gladly mention the more than generous hospitality which we found in the home of Ezra A. Cook. I expect it will meet them at the judgment; may they have great reward here as well. Then, too, Bro. H. H. and myself held an exhortation meeting on the hay-market square, on West Randolph street, with quite a company that had gathered to listen—some with much interest and some beer—men with evident aversion to our cause. But how we did pity the poor man who drew near and listened carefully, and at the close came up voluntarily, giving us his hand and saying: "Oh, sir, I know what you say is true, but what can I do? I am a confirmed drunkard." We endeavored to lead him to Christ as his only hope.

Will some of my old friends who may see these lines comfort me in my lingering sickness by writing to me at Lacon, Ala.?

Ever praying for the success of the principles so ably advocated in the Christian Cynosure, etc.
C. POWERS.

A FRIENDLY LETTER.

DE KALB, Iowa, Jan., 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I did not have the pleasure of attending the Iowa C. A. convention. The distance and expense were too great for me. I hope to be able to attend the annual meeting next fall, and to send a good report.

Much of the farm products in this part of Iowa was destroyed by hail, and we are obliged to buy grain shipped to us. We have been favored by Providence with a mild winter up to January, and hope it may continue pleasant, if it is God's will. I am doing my best not to let the Cynosure subscription run behind. I send one renewal and one subscription now. If I can get any more the subscription list will gain a little here, even in these hard times. Reform papers do not have as rapid growth as is desirable. I suppose it is because reformers don't go down hill. Dead fish can float with the current; but it is live ones only that can swim up stream.

We are glad to learn of the progress of reform in Boston. I often think of Bro. Stoddard. He lectured, several years ago, in Mt. Ayr, Iowa, and I would like to see him again.

May God bless Dr. J. Blanchard. The reformers seem to be with each other in spirit, though they be miles apart.

May God bless the dear friends of the Cynosure and all everywhere who are making a Christian effort to be "workers together with him" in the uprooting of every plant which is not of our heavenly Father's planting. Jesus says: "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." He "came to destroy the works of the devil," and he certainly wants us to be workers together with him; but the cross seems to be the most heavy in the work against secretism. The lodge is not of God's planting. It is the enemy of God and man. We need much grace, and courage not to slight the cross. Christian heroism is in as much demand now as ever before.
CYRUS SMITH.

A SUGGESTION.

WAUKEGAN, Ill., Jan. 4, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—There are some things in secret societies—especially in Freemasonry—hard to be understood. The "good men" argument still passes at from seventy-five to ninety-eight cents on a dollar. And the statement about the dramatic penalty to the oath is considered a "middle-aged" story, if not a story of the middle ages.

[A glance at "Two Masonic Murders," 8th page of this issue, will settle this romance.—EDITOR.]

There are a few specific remedies which would be a powerful curative to this moral weakness. One is the following:

When about one year ago the Rev. G——, of Boston, attacked the Rev. James P. Stoddard, he proceeded in that minister's meeting to say: "When I took the Master Mason's oath, and swore to have my throat cut across"—and went on at length to give the language of the oath, his speech went into the Associated Press dispatches, and was printed in many cities where the night editors were not clearly aware of the importance of the suppression of the rather sensational intelligence. I saw it at considerable length in the Syracuse (N. Y.) Journal. This was to the public an eye-opener, so far as it went. I do not think the statement was reprinted by any paper friendly to the reform, giving that particular feature of the case. A few hundred thousand leaflets containing the reverend gentleman's words, with "From the Boston Globe," of a given date, would tell. For that would not be what some wise "anti" had said, but the language of a lodge defender.

A second excellent remedy for this sore on the body politic, is the late language of Joseph Cook, Esq., as quoted by the Boston Daily Journal, on the topic of the "Death Penalty in Socialistic Societies." If it were issued in tract form, with the authority of Joseph Cook at one end, and the Boston Daily Journal at the other, it would have a powerful influence for good.

L. N. STRATTON.

THE LUTHERANS AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

WHEATON, Ill., December, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Enclosed is a translation of those parts of an article in the Lutheraner which will most clearly show the position of the Lutheran church, not only with reference to the Farmers' Alliance, but all secret orders. Yours, very truly,

PROF. W. H. FISCHER.

N. F. A. AND I. U.

One and another of our readers may ask what these letters mean. They form the abbreviated name of a secret society: "The National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union." The same exists only since October, 1889, and is the result of combining the National Farmers' Alliance and Co-operative Union and the National Agricultural Wheel.

According to the constitution, a necessary officer of such an association is a "chaplain." The duties of this officer are, as stated in Art I., Sec. 7: "To take charge of the religious services of the Alliance, and upon the death of a member to officiate at the religious ceremonies."

According to Art I., Sec. 2, part of the duties of the president is this: "To open the session according to the provisions of the ritual to direct the ideas and workings of the secret rites."

Let us glance at the "ritual." The copy which is before us was printed this year at Washington. In this book the course of procedure in these lodges is prescribed. Special care is observed to exclude the uninitiated by the use of a pass-word. Furthermore, it directs, "if possible that the middle of the room should be occupied by a stand, which is to serve as an altar, and on which there should be a Bible. The prescribed formalities for opening the session are those of a secret and religious society. When the time for opening has arrived the president is to say:

"The hour for opening this——— has come. Should there be any here who are not members in good standing, let them withdraw. Brother Warden, close the door, and allow no one to enter during the opening ceremonies."

If new candidates are to be admitted, the ritual provides explicit directions how to proceed. It is not our purpose to print the long, and in part silly, formula. The oath to be imposed on the candidate is the following:

"I promise and solemnly vow, in the presence of almighty God and these witnesses, that I will never reveal," etc., etc.

The president then says: "May God help you to keep and observe this vow. My brother! those about you have all made this vow and are keeping it inviolate. Your usefulness as a member of this order will depend on the faithfulness with which you observe it. We form a secret brotherhood," etc.

Finally, after listening to all this speechifying, in which the question is never asked whether the initiate is a Christian or not, he is once more brought before the president to receive the words, grips and signs, etc.

The chaplain, when installed, is to be addressed as follows: "Brother ——, you are now to be installed as chaplain of this ——. The mere mention of the name of your office suggests the position of a mediator between this brotherhood and the Dispenser of all blessings. The mantle has fallen on you. May it be your constant endeavor to adorn its dignity and transmit it unsoiled to your successor; and, when the work of life is ended, to obtain the praise: 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!'"

Finally, the ritual contains a formula to be used at the burial of a member of the order. It directs that when the officiating minister is through with his part of the ceremonies the "brothers" are to approach the coffin and repeat passages of Scripture like Psalm 125: 1, etc.; after which the chaplain is to speak a prayer.

So we have here another secret society, whose members, before they know what passes in the lodge, bind themselves by oath, even after they have ceased to be members, to observe inviolable silence about all secrets of the order. We have, furthermore, a religious society, having a "chaplain," who is to officiate at "divine services" of the Alliance, where prayer is to be offered for the "brothers," that is, for those who, according to the constitution, "believe in the existence of a Supreme being," who may therefore be Christian, Jew, or pagan; a society which a Christian who knows what he is doing, can evidently not join with a good conscience and without denying his Saviour and his Gospel.

Here, too, we must once more sound the warning voice; we must beg and admonish all members of our congregations, for Christ's sake, to keep their distance from such associations; or, if any should have been drawn in, speedily to come out and pray God to forgive what they have done in ignorance.

LITERATURE.

The January Century is pleasant reading, authors and articles alike vying to excel in the character of their respective contributions. The leading engravings, in point of merit, include the full-page portrait of Charles Francois Gounod, accompanying his own account of his experiences in Italy and Germany; illustrations of Jewish life in New York, the letter-press by Richard Wheatley; copies of paintings by Andrea del Sarto, in the Italian Old Masters of W. J. Stillman, and a portrait and army scenes in Custer's last battle with the Indians. This entire paper is replete with interest. The Naulahka, by Kipling and Balesier, and Characteristics, by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, are continued. Other articles and writers are as follows; The Jewish Question is discussed by "Josephus," in a calm, dispassionate manner. The Alligator Hunters of Louisiana (illustrated), by Andrews Wilkinson; Witchcraft, by J. M. Buckley; Bentley's System (illustrated), by Viola Roseboro; The Discontent of the Farmer, by J. R. Dodge; A Battle in Crackerdom (illustrated), by Harry S. Edwards, and several poems, are each, in their way, worthy of careful attention. All the usual editorial departments are well filled with current lines of thought. Published by the Century Co., 33 East 17th street, New York; $4.00 per annum.

A unique experiment will be tried in the February issue of the Ladies' Home Journal. The entire number has been contributed in prose, fiction and verse by the daughters of famous parentage, as a proof that genius is often hereditary. The work of thirty of these "daughters" will be represented. These will comprise the daughters of Thackeray, Hawthorne, Dickens, James Fennimore Cooper, Horace Greeley, Mr. Gladstone, President Harrison, William Dean Howells, Senator Ingalls, Dean Bradley of Westminster, Julia Ward Howe, General Sherman, Jefferson Davis and nearly a score of others. Each article, poem or story printed in this number has been especially written for it, and the whole promises to be a successful result of an idea never before attempted in a magazine.

The American Spectator is a 32-page monthly magazine, published by the Arena Publishing Co. of Boston, and seems principally to be a side-issue of its larger literary brother—the Arena. The contents of the January number are strictures upon our inaccurate census; foreigners in New England; the Cosmic Sphere of Woman, by Prof. J. Rodes Buchanan; Centuries of Dishonor—Mrs. M. A. Livermore's argument for Woman Suffrage—from the Arena, and a poem by Virginia F. Boyle—Sunset on the Mississippi. The editor, B. A. Flower, is also the editor of the Arena. Price 10 cents.

LODGE NOTES.

The B. P. O. E. (Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; or, as they facetiously call themselves, The Best People on Earth) have their own ideas of a "good time" whenever they "pass from labor to refreshments," or, in other words, "hold a special stag(gering) session." The stories they tell, the songs they sing, the toasts they drink, and the jokes they crack, on these occasions, are described as "funny," and would not, we fear, look well in print. The following is a partial report of one of these interesting reunions. We copy it from the Mystic Tie: "Funny stories were indulged in by Messrs. Woodward, Buck Leeds, L. F. Gery, Ed. Curtis and others. L. F. Gery gave an interesting dialect story of a Negro borrowing and returning a nickel; then gave an interesting imitation of a steamboat. Prof. Joseph Hooper, our well-known friend about town, astonished his friends by revelations of his proficiency in the art of legerdemain and his manipulation of the cards. Many other specialties attractive and varied served to quickly pass away the evening. Cigars, beer, lemonade, sandwiches, etc., went quickly the way of all things earthly."

ORIGIN OF THE "MYSTIC SHRINE."

A dispatch from Philadelphia gives the following account of the origin and rise of the "Mystic Shrine," a secret order that is near akin to Freemasonry, and now numbers many thousands of members. Very few of these, even, until recently, (says the writer) were "aware that a branch was started as a joke many years ago, the perpetrator of the joke being the late Wm. J. Florence, the noted actor. The joke did not originate with Florence, but rather with Dr. Walter Flemming, of New York, a well-known prince of good fellows, and a high degree Mason, but it was Florence who engineered the affair to a successful conclusion. An idea of the success of the hoax can be had from the fact that the Lulu Temple of this city is one of the branches of the parent organization. There are temples nearly as great as the Lulu in nearly every large city, not only in this country, but in Great Britain, and all owe their existence to the love of a joke had by Billy Florence, Dr. Flemming and the rest of that pioneer band in the organization of the Mystic Shrine. One night early in 1870 a small party of Masons were gathered at the house of Dr. Flemming, in New York. The conversation turned upon the organization of different societies, and Dr. Flemming proposed that those present form an adjunct of some kind or other to the Masonic order. All hands took a hearty interest in the affair from the start, and it was not long before the matter had assumed a practical shape. Just about that time the Khedive of Egypt was creating a great furore in Paris.

"He was the guest of Emperor Napoleon, and the splendor of their entertainments was the talk of the civilized world. Actor Florence was in Paris at that time; and in a long letter to his friend, Dr. Flemming, described an imaginary meeting at which Napoleon, the Khedive and Actor Florence took part. In winding up his letter Mr. Florence declared that the Khedive was almost good enough to belong to the Masons.

"Immediately it occurred to Dr. Flemming and his friends that it would be a good idea to spread the report broadcast that the Khedive had met Billy Florence, the well-known actor, in Paris, and had become so favorably impressed with the witty American that he had conferred upon him the degree of the Mystic Shrine, to which only members of the uniform rank could aspire. He had also, according to report, empowered Mr. Florence to come back to America, establish lodges of the Mystic Shrine and confer the degree. This report surprised Actor Florence very much when he returned to his own country, but he readily fell into the scheme, and in this manner the Mystic Shrine was organized. About five years later Dr. Daniel E. Hughes, now resident physician in charge of the Philadelphia Hospital, went on a visit to his friend, Dr. Flemming, in New

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1892.

MORE MASONIC MURDERS.

TWO MEN BRUTALLY ASSASSINATED BY FREEMASONS.

"The Cynosure never rests in falsifying Freemasonry. Its last false charge is that 'Freemasonry promotes assassination.' Freemasonry's only penalties are, reprimand, suspension and expulsion. It never takes life, nor sheds blood."—Voice of Masonry (Chicago), for January.

"I claim that every Mason who lives up to his oath must of necessity violate the law, and even get so far as to assassinate a recalcitrant brother Mason. There is no variation nor shadow of turning with the Masonic oath. Every Mason is rigidly sworn under the most awful death-penalties that the very ingenuity of cruelty could invent. He is sworn 'to have his throat cut and his tongue torn out'—'to have his left breast torn up and his heart plucked out'—'to have his body severed in two, his bowels taken from thence and burned to ashes.' Can anything be more horrible than all this human butchery which every Mason swears to have inflicted on his body for the disclosure of the silly nonsense which comprises the different Masonic degrees?"—Edmond Ronayne, ex-Mason.

Masonry has for years branded the Cynosure and the N. C. A. as liars and hypocrites for repeating the charge, time and again, made by ex-Past Master Edmond Ronayne, in the foregoing extract from his recent letter printed in this paper. Beside it we print, also, the rejoinder of the Voice of Masonry to that letter. Let the two passages stand together as the epitome of the dogma of the lodge and the voluntary expression of a Freemason who had the courage to leave the lodge and expose its iniquity when he became thoroughly convinced that the institution is a fraud and a humbug.

A few weeks ago we received a document from a neighboring State, giving the principal details of a most atrocious double assassination committed by Freemasons upon a brother Mason and the un-Masonic youth who witnessed the first murder.

The statement made to us in relation to this horrible crime came from a reasonably authentic source; but before we concluded to print it, we required the affidavits of creditable witnesses to its truth. These affidavits have now been secured, and we have no hesitation in giving it to the public as trustworthy evidence that

"MASONRY PROMOTES ASSASSINATION."

In a year prior to 1881—so runs the history of this awful crime—there was in a certain hotel, at the end of the hall-way upstairs, among the other bed-rooms, a small one, similar to those about it, except that this had no window in it. It had previously been used mainly as a club-room for gambling; and as that business is largely a work of darkness, it needed no light. There was, however, a bed in it, and, when needed, was occupied as a sleeping room.

On a certain day, at the time above indicated, a tall, fine-looking stranger registered at the hotel, as from New York. He was assigned, on the book, to the room we have described.

Near the other end of the hall was a room near the head of another stairway, occupied by a traveler who was to be called about 2 o'clock in the morning, to take a night train. The night-clerk, being familiar with the premises, did not take a light with him when he went to call this man. The stairway up which he went was near the end of the hall where this traveler slept; and the clerk, in the darkness, saw that the door of the room to which the New York guest had been assigned was open halfway or more. Inside of that room he saw a light and the landlord of the hotel and two other men holding fast another man with his breast over a chair. Under this man's head had been placed a bed-vessel. One of the three men lifted up the head of the one on the chair and cut his throat with a knife. The blood from this wound flowed into the bed-vessel and ran over its sides. At the same time they held their victim so tightly that he struggled but little. As soon as he was quiet they placed the knife in one of his hands, and left him lying over, or across, the chair. They then came out, closed the door, and descended by the stairway opposite to that where the night-clerk stood.

The young man was greatly horrified by the scene which he had witnessed, and resolved then and there to quit the hotel. Accordingly, after a few days, he asked the landlord for a settlement, as he wished to leave. The landlord objected to his going away, saying that he could not spare him. But the clerk persisted in having a settlement and leaving the house. Said the landlord, "If you leave I will not pay you." To this, as they stood together alone, the clerk rejoined: "You know that _____ was murdered in the little dark bedroom. I saw it all while I stood at the opposite end of the hall in the dark. I had gone up the other stairs to call a traveler, and you know who was there—and so do I; and if you don't pay me, I'll tell on you and the rest." At this the landlord was silent and turned pale. A moment afterwards he said: "Well, I suppose I can pay you; but you must keep your mouth shut." The clerk was then paid, and immediately engaged with another employer in that neighborhood.

The body of the murdered man, on the morning after the assassination, was found as it had been left, by the chambermaid while going her rounds. The community was horrified by the crime, as soon as it was made public. An inquest was called, and the coroner's jury returned a verdict: "Came to his death by a knife in his own hands." When the effects of the murdered man were examined, in his trunk were found undoubted evidences of his having been a Freemason of high degree. The local Freemasons were very indignant (apparently) that one of their fraternity, a stranger, should have come to such an untimely end. If it was a murder, as many deemed it, it was evident that the man's throat had been cut, with two heavy gashes extending from ear to ear—one across from each side. To have made these gashes himself, the alleged "suicide" would have had to change the knife from one hand to the other during the operation, which, owing to the effective manner in which the first wound was made, rendering him powerless, was practically an impossibility. The coroner's jury were all Freemasons; hence their peculiar verdict.

A plain coffin was procured for the burial of the body, and at "low-12"—midnight—a dray came up to the hotel, on which the remains were carted off to the cemetery, with a few attendants. The burial took place in a retired spot, the grave being under a fence and very shallow, with the head to the south. A few days later (it is alleged) there came a package of $600 addressed to the murdered man, in care of the landlord.

The night-clerk was about twenty-two years of age. Some time after the murder at the hotel (as he stated to affiants on his death-bed), he was in the same hotel, one day, on the occasion of a city election, or some other local event, and was induced to drink a glass of beer—the first and only one that he had taken there since his settlement with the landlord. A few minutes afterwards he became terribly ill. Returning to his place of business, as best he could, he grew worse, vomiting and suffering intense pain in his stomach. He said that he was sure, as soon as he had drunk the beer, that he had been poisoned. Subsequently he was taken to his father's house, where he related his experiences. Medical aid was summoned, and in the excitement of the event, none appeared more anxious to relieve the sufferer than the landlord by whom he had formerly been employed in the hotel. But all attempts to restore him to health proved futile. He gradually failed, and after lingering for about six weeks he died.

It was during this last illness, while his mind was yet unimpaired, that he related the story of the murder at the hotel and its attendant incidents; and those who heard it are our sworn informants.

A short time after the death of the night clerk, his brother also died, as it appeared, from the effects of slow but sure poisoning.

"Masonry promotes assassination." We insist upon it that this is true. Scarcely a seceding Mason has failed to make this statement, and the evidence now rapidly accumulating in this direction fully maintains this position.

The Masonic government is despotic over every member of the fraternity, and holds the issues of life and death over all who have taken its murderous obligations.

How long will the American people—the law-abiding, honest citizens, untrammelled by lodge-oaths—suffer this unholy and secret institution to exist among them?

DIVIDED HEARTS.

A contributor to the Christian Standard, of Cincinnati, writes about "Churches vs. Lodges," and the article is very good—in spots. In the course of his article he makes these statements: "There is a spirit of anti-Christ in the lodges. . . It is a fatal mistake to depend upon lodge doctrine and practice for salvation. . . Much of the irreverence now prevalent in churches is but a contagion from the lodge-room through hybrid members. . . Church members who belong to one or more lodges, as a rule, are not devotional—rare not active in Sunday-school. . . do not read their Bibles, etc. The social feature of the lodge is a powerful factor for pulling down the throne of Christ in the heart and robbing the church of its needed revenue."

In another place he rebukes lodgery for its zeal in its own cause, and justly claims that injury is thus done to the churches; on this account he counsels the lodge-members to be more considerate and to act in harmony with the churches, so that the latter may be able to co-operate with them in the relief of distress. This is doubtful advice; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness?—and where the lodge and the church go hand-in-hand about works of charity, the church will always be the sufferer, losing spirituality, and godly influence, and gaining nothing but confusion. When the lodge comes into the church pulpit, Christianity takes a back seat—so greatly does the influence of the lodge fill the edifice.

What is the lodge? Simply an organization of human authority, founded by Satan; yet it is too true that many church preachers and professing Christians belong to the lodge and exercise a good deal of Jeroboam-like liberality, indorsing the lodge, or whatever will bring money into the church and popularity to the pastor. Thus is formed a mutual admiration league between the lodge and the church. Then the question of heart piety becomes secondary in such an atmosphere, and the Laodicean church is reproduced, fit only to be spewed out of the Saviour's mouth for its lukewarmness in his cause. In such a condition its members are seemingly indifferent whether they seek the Masonic "grand lodge above," or find rest in Abraham's bosom. Such appears to be the practical result of mixed faith in both Baal and the Lord. Such a union will end in despair, for God will not accept a divided heart. Those who say, "The lodge is a good enough church for me," certainly have no part in the glorious church of the first born.

THE U. B. CHURCH AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

To settle all disputes as to the relation of each of the parties that now profess to be "The United Brethren in Christ," we wish to call attention to the following facts:

1. That from 1841 to 1889 this denomination, which had been one of the most useful and aggressive in the United States, had an article in its constitution which declared that "there shall be no connection with secret societies;" and that, up to 1889, no member of any secret society was a member of that denomination, except in violation of denominational law.

2. That in 1889, a party in the denomination, a majority in point of numbers, did adopt a new constitution, with a new clause on secret societies, under which constitution they enacted a new law. By this law, which is vague and wholly indefinite in its terms, Freemasons, Odd-fellows, and other secretists, have been received without question into the denomination which calls itself "The United Brethren Church," and which have been as anxious since then to stifle all discussion of the secrecy question as they formerly were to promote it.

3. That at the General Conference at York, Pa., held in 1889, a minority of that body, desiring to adhere to the constitution of 1841, and especially to maintain their rule against all secret societies, and holding, moreover, that the constitution had not been legally changed, affirmed that they were "The United Brethren Church," and proceeded to elect officers. They have since maintained their old rule on secret societies with great strictness, and insisted that the majority, with their new constitution, were simply seceders.

4. Without undertaking to decide this question, which is still before the legal courts in several States, we wish to say that we regard the departure of any portion of this denomination from their former just testimony against the secret lodge system as a secession from Christian principles at which Satan might rejoice, and all good people mourn.

BOSTON ITEMS.

The "Boston Almanac" for 1892 gives the following suggestive figures. There are in that city: 177 Evangelical churches; 81 Roman Catholic, Unitarian, Jewish, etc., congregations, and 853 secret societies.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard has a wide field to cultivate at the "Hub." We are glad to learn that his weekly parlor meetings at 218 Columbus ave. are growing in interest. Sixty-four of these meetings have already been held in that one parlor, and at present the program embraces a series of six talks on the origin and principles of Masonry, by its own accredited authors.

Mr. Stoddard was recently encouraged to persevere in this interesting branch of his work by the remark of a sister who has been present at every one of these parlor meetings. Speaking of a talk on the previous evening, she said: "It was the best I ever heard, and I begin to think there is no bottom to this awful abyss of iniquity" (the lodge system). To a critical Masonic friend who was present, Mr. S. had occasion to say that the object of these meetings is not to quibble over little technicalities, but to study the system at the feet of its most renowned teachers; and that while they were glad of his company and his aid in making topical researches, the discussion of unimportant questions could not be tolerated. We cite this as showing the spirit of Mr. S.'s work.

He has also recently interested some of the Christian workers and theological students at Newton, has engaged to give them one talk, and hopes to give six or more in that city. Relative to the success of his labors in this direction, a brother writes: "I am a seceding Odd-fellow, etc. Having withdrawn for conscience' sake, I would like to support with my influence and testimony any concerted effort being made against the great evil of secret societies." And so the good work goes on.

At the New England Convention it was unanimously voted that Rev. J. P. Stoddard be continued as the Secretary of the N. C. A. for that district, and that an effort be made to raise his salary to $1,200 for the current year. Thereupon four friends of the cause promptly subscribed $450.00 for this purpose. Our friends in New England should see that the whole amount is pledged; for they have the assurance that it will be faithfully earned, and it is morally certain that whatever he receives will be conscientiously expended in the furtherance of his work.

MORE "NEW THEOLOGY."

Plymouth church, Brooklyn, in calling Dr. Lyman Abbott to its pulpit, after the death of Henry Ward Beecher, seems to have measured his merits as an intellectual giant and a religious instructor; but it has been evident all along that Dr. Abbott can never fill the place in the pulpit or the affections of his congregation occupied by Mr. Beecher. Moreover, it is latterly quite noticeable that his theology is decidedly shaky, diverging widely from the teachings of the Congregational church, and tending toward mongrel orthodoxy, which is no more a safe or distinctive religion than that of the American Indian in his natural communings.

It is but a few days since Dr. Abbott read a paper on "The New Orthodoxy" before the Unitarian Club of Boston, in which he stated that he had long abandoned the doctrine of endless sin and endless punishment, and that he did not believe in an infallible Bible. It goes without saying that he does not believe in an infallible Bible, since he does not accept Christ's words as recorded in Mark 3: 29 (Revision): "Whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin."

Rev. Dr. Peabody, the noted Unitarian preacher, who was present, remarked that he was in close sympathy with Dr. Abbott, point for point.

Rev. Dr. Addison P. Foster, commenting on Dr. Abbott's paper, in the Advance, makes this pointed remark: "It has been said of Christian science that it is neither Christian nor scientific. In the same way it may be said of 'the new orthodoxy,' as expounded by Dr. Lyman Abbott, that it is neither new nor orthodox."

Dr. Abbott, besides performing pastoral work, is also editing the Christian Union, in New York; and as we learn that he is very anxious to increase the circulation of his paper in Congregational families, perhaps it would be well for them to understand the sort of doctrine to which they would be subjected under his teachings.

T. D. ROBERTS.

Among the speakers at the recent New England Anti-secrecy Convention was T. D. Roberts, of Boston, an active Christian worker and business man, who has achieved an enviable reputation for his zeal and influence in the city mission work. He is also known in Chicago by his visit here some time ago, when he addressed the Young Men's Christian Association.

METHODISM AND MASONRY.

Q.—Can the Methodist Episcopal church be a holiness church while she admits Freemasonry, or is in any way in sympathy with it?

A.—We never knew that the Methodist Episcopal church admitted Freemasonry, or was in any way in sympathy with it. Some of the ministers and members are Freemasons, and others may be in sympathy with Freemasonry.—Christian (Holiness) Standard.

It is claimed, and it seems to be an underestimate, that one-fifth of all the Methodist Episcopal ministers in the United States are Freemasons; and it is notorious that a large proportion of the congregations of that denomination in this country are honey-combed with Freemasonry. In 1876 the subject was brought before the General Conference of the church for consideration, but that body refused to take action upon it. The church is apparently too much in sympathy with this form of lodge-worship.

—A pleasing memorial service was held, a few weeks ago, in the First Congregational church at Washington, D. C., but conducted by Howard University. Among the interesting exercises was a touching and exhaustive address by Dr. Cheever, of Worcester, Mass., upon the life and labors of his lamented brother, Dr. Geo. B. Cheever, a bust of whom he presented to the University. The memory of Dr. Cheever may be classed with those of men whom the Bible calls "blessed."

—At Turner, DuPage county, last week, on Monday, the discussion in the ministers' meeting as to why so few male members of the church attend its services, occupied considerable attention. Rev. D. W. Wise, pastor of the College church of Wheaton, told them that men who gave their time and money to the lodge find in it not only "sick-benefits" but much social pleasure—more pleasure than in accompanying their wives and daughters to the church. Hence the church services are mainly attended by the women, and the lodges become the habitual resort of the men. This is a nugget of truth in a nut-shell.

—Pope Leo XIII. declares that the Masonic order, especially the Masons of Italy, are "animated by the spirit of Satan, whose instrument they are; that Masons are consumed, like their inspirer, with a mortal and implacable hatred against Jesus Christ and his work, and do their utmost to overthrow or enchain it; and that they are to blame for nearly all the indignities and abuse heaped upon him by the Italian government." This is probably all true; but he omits the strongest objection of the pope to the Masons—their refusal to confess their sins to his ordained priests. When they concede this favor to the Roman Pontiff he will probably forgive them all the rest of their offences, and grant them "indulgences" to cut the throats, tear out the tongues, pluck out the hearts, sever the bodies, and burn the bowels of all seceding Masons with perfect impunity. "The oath makes the Mason," and every Master Mason has sworn to do all these things to his recalcitrant brothers.

—The convention of the Farmers' Alliance at St. Paul, Minn., last week, was largely engineered by Ignatius Donnelly, and a platform was adopted which, as the St. Paul Dispatch facetiously reports it, "embraced everything from a demand that the capital be removed to Kandiyohi to a declaration that the bad condition of wagon roads throughout the country was the result of favoritism and class legislation." This declaration of principles is quite characteristic of the Alliance. The most important subject was the question of uniting with the Industrial Union, and a motion to combine the two was uproariously adopted. The result of the convention is felt in the concession of both elements in the Alliance that in view of the platform adopted, a fusion on a national State or legislative ticket with either of the old parties is entirely out of the question. So it proposes to remain an independent party, the most pestiferous political organization that has flourished since the suppression of the Ku Klux Klan—as the events of the past week in Kansas sufficiently indicate.

—The Presbyterian ministers in the Pittsburgh and Allegheny districts of Pennsylvania, last week, held "a query meeting," from which reporters were excluded. Rev. F. R. Farren acted as "query master," and addresses on the questions asked were made by Revs. R. S. Holmes, D. S. Kennedy, S. B. McClelland and J. S. Weaver. Among the queries, it was asked: "Whether the Protestant or the Catholic church is gaining greater headway in this country?" The discussion was quite animated. Catholicism was pronounced a menace to our form of government, and is to be considered as threatening and dangerous. In view of the fact that quite recently the public schools of St. Louis have passed under the control of Romish teachers, and the grasping hand of the Catholic church is seeking to capture the public schools in all other cities, the expression at the Pittsburgh meeting is none too strong. Catholicism is surely gaining an influence in our American institutions that should arouse the pride and patriotism of every Protestant to resist its encroachments.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—James Matthews, in remitting a donation for the N. C. A., writes: "I rejoice in the growing influence of our work."

—Henry O. Sibley, Librarian of the Syracuse (N. Y.) University, writes that the files of the Christian Cynosure sent to that institution are bound and preserved in its library.

—Henry L. Kellogg, formerly of the Cynosure, recently read an interesting paper on "Whittier's Eighty-four Years" before the Library Association of Auburn, Cal., which we find in the Placer Argus. It is a graceful tribute to the venerable poet.

—Intelligence reached us last week that our venerable friend and brother, Rev. George Thompson, of Oberlin, Ohio, was seriously ill. It was very unwelcome news. Bro. Thompson stands in the front rank of reformers and martyrs in the anti-slavery cause, in the temperance work, and in the warfare against the secret lodges, and as a sincere and earnest follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. We hope for his early recovery, although his great age does not afford room for much encouragement.

—Ex-Pres. J. Blanchard attended a recent meeting of the Fox River (Congregational) Club at Elgin, Ill., and bore faithful testimony in opposition to the lodge iniquity. At the next meeting of the club, President Hard says, if possible, the subject of anti-secrecy will be placed on the program, and the question opened for general discussion. It is hoped that the Rev. Mr. Green (Freemason), of De Kalb, where he is pastor of the Congregational church, will on that occasion present a paper on this topic.

THE HOME.

"OUR MISSION."

If we cannot plant our cottage
Mid an Eden's blooming bowers,
Whiling life's delightful summer
Gaily 'mid unfailing flowers,
We with holy love can labor,
Tilling Zion's fertile lands;
We can consecrate to duty
Willing hearts and ready hands.

If we cannot win a title,
To enwreath our humble name;
If we boast not birth nor beauty,
Wealth nor wisdom, might nor fame,
We can still be kindly hearted,
Acting well our lowly part;
And though men may be ungrateful,
God will prize the humble heart.

If we cannot mount the heavens,
Where no cloud its shadow flings,
Ranging through the bright Elysian,
Soaring on angelic wings,
We with pilgrim-step can journey
Onward, pressing day by day,
Looking for our Leader's footprints
All along the toilsome way.

If we cannot read the future,
Whether weal or woe betide;
If within the veil of darkness
Mercy from our vision hide,
We can understand our mission,
What is here to do or bear;
We can love and help each other,
And the cross with Jesus share.

Let us then be ever doing;
Day declineth, night is near;
Short the time of toil and suffering,
Jesus numbers every tear.
See, the pearly gates are opening,
Lo, the splendor from above;
List to loved ones yonder singing,
Welcome to the land of love.

A PRAYER-ANSWERING GOD.

I remember a day during one winter which stands out like a boulder in my life.

The weather was unusually cold, our salary had not been regularly paid, and it did not meet our needs when it was. My husband was away traveling from one district to another most of the time.

Our boys were well, but my little Ruth was ailing, and at best none of us was decently clothed. I patched and re-patched, with spirits sinking to the lowest ebb. The water gave out in the well, and the wind blew through the cracks of the floor.

The people in the parish were kind and generous, but the settlement was new, and each family was struggling for itself. Little by little, at the time when I needed most, my faith began to waver. Early in life I was taught to take God at his word, and I thought my lesson was well learned. I had lived upon the promises in dark times, until I knew, as David did, who was "my fortress and deliverer." Now a daily prayer for forgiveness was all that I could offer.

My husband's overcoat was hardly thick enough for October, and he was obliged to ride miles to attend some meetings or funerals. Many a time our breakfast was Indian cake and a cup of tea without any sugar. Christmas was coming; the children always expected their presents. I remember the ice was thick and smooth, and the boys were each craving a pair of skates. Ruth, in some unaccountable way, had taken a fancy that the dolls that I made were no longer suitable; she wanted a large, nice one, and insisted on praying for it. I knew it was impossible; but oh, how I wanted to give each child its present! It seemed as if God had deserted us. But I did not tell my husband all this. He worked so earnestly and heartily, I supposed him to be as hopeful as ever. I kept the sitting-room cheery with an open fire, and tried to serve our scanty meals as invitingly as I could.

The morning before Christmas, James was called to see a sick man. I put up a piece of bread for his lunch—it was the best I could do—wrapped a plaid shawl around his neck, and then tried to whisper a promise, as I often had, but the words died away on my lips. I let him go without it. This was a dark, hopeless day. I coaxed the children to bed early, for I could not bear their talk. When Ruth went I listened to her prayer; she asked for the last time most explicitly for her doll and for skates for her brothers. Her bright face looked so lovingly when she whispered to me: "You know I think they'll be here early to-morrow morning—early, mamma," that I could move heaven and earth to save her from disappointment.

I sat down alone, and gave way to the bitterest tears.

Before long James returned, chilled and exhausted. He drew off his boots; the thin stockings slipped off with them, and his feet were red with cold. I wouldn't treat a dog that way, let alone a faithful servant. Then as I glanced up and noticed the hard lines in his face, and the look of despair, it flashed across me. James had let go, too! I brought him a cup of tea, feeling sick and dizzy at that thought. He took my hand, and we sat for an hour without a word. I wanted to die and meet God, and tell him his promise wasn't true—my soul was so full of rebellious despair. There came a sound of bells, a quick stop and a loud knock at the door. James sprang up to open it. There stood Deacon Pike.

"A box came for you by express just before dark. I brought it around just as soon as I could get away; reckoned it might be for Christmas; at any rate, I thought they shall have it to-night. Here is a turkey my wife asked me to fetch along, and these other things I believe belong to you."

There was a basket of potatoes and a bag of flour. Talking all the time, he hurried in the box, and then with a hearty "good night" rode away. Still without speaking, James found a chisel and opened the box. I drew out at first a thick red blanket, and we saw that beneath was full of clothing. It seemed at that moment as if Christ fastened upon me a look of reproach. James sat down and covered his face with his hands.

"I can't touch them," he exclaimed. "I haven't been true just when God was trying me to see if I could hold out. Do you think I could not see how you were suffering, and I had no word of comfort to offer. I know now how to preach the awfulness of turning away from God."

"James," I said, clinging to him, "don't take it to heart like this. I've been to blame; I ought to have helped you. We will ask him together to forgive us."

"Wait a moment, dear, I cannot talk now," then he went into another room.

I knelt down, and my heart broke; in an instant all the darkness, all the stubbornness rolled away. Jesus came and stood before me, but now with the loving word, "Daughter!" Sweet promises of tenderness and joy flooded my soul; I was so lost in praise and gratitude that I forgot everything else. I don't know how long it was before James came back, but I knew that he, too, had found peace.

"Now, dear wife," said he, "let us thank God together." And then he poured out words of praise, Bible words, for nothing else could express our thanksgiving. It was eleven o'clock, the fire was low, and there was the great box, and nothing touched but the warm blanket we needed so much. We piled on some fresh logs, lighted two candles, and began to examine our treasures. We drew out an overcoat. I made James try it on; just the right size, and I danced awhile around him, for all my light-heartedness had returned. Then there was a cloak, and he insisted on seeing me in it. My spirits always infected him, and we both laughed like foolish children. There was a warm suit of clothes, also, and three pairs of warm woolen hose. There was a dress for me, and yards of flannel; a pair of Arctic overshoes for each of us, and in mine was a slip of paper—I have it now, and I mean to hand it down to my children. It was Jacob's blessing to Asher: "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, and as thy days, so shall thy strength be." In the gloves, evidently for James, the same dear hand had written: "I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not, I will help thee."

It was a wonderful box, and packed with thoughtful care. There was a suit of clothes for each of the boys, and a little red gown for Ruth. There were mittens, scarfs and hoods; down in the center, a box—we opened it, and there was a great wax doll! I burst into tears again, and James wept with me for joy. It was too much, and then we both exclaimed again, for close behind it came two pairs of skates. There were books for us to read; some of them I had wished to see; stories for the children to read, aprons and underclothing, knots of ribbon, a gay little tidy, a lovely photograph, needles, buttons and thread, actually a muff, and an envelope containing a ten-dollar gold piece! We cried over everything we took up. It was past midnight, and we were faint and exhausted even with happiness.

I made a cup of tea, cut a fresh loaf of bread, and James boiled some eggs. We drew up the table before the fire—how we enjoyed our supper!—and then we sat talking over all our life, and how sure a help God had always proved.

You should have seen the children the next morning. The boys raised a shout at the sight of their skates. Ruth caught up her doll and hugged it tightly without a word; then she went into her room and knelt by her bed; when she came back she whispered to me: "I knew it would be here, mamma, but I wanted to thank God, just the same, you know."

"Look here, wife," see the difference!"

We went to the window, and there were the boys out of the house already, and skating on the crust with all their might.

My husband and I both tried to return thanks to the church in the East which sent us the box, and have tried to return thanks unto God every day since.

Hard times have come again and again, but we have trusted in him, dreading nothing so much as a doubt of his protecting care. Over and over again we have proved that they who seek the Lord shall not want any good thing.—A Minister's Wife on the Frontier, in Woman's Home Missions.

A REAL HERO.

Not long ago, on board an English steamer, a ragged little boy, aged nine years, was discovered on the fourth day of the voyage out from Liverpool to New York, and carried before the first mate, whose duty it was to deal with such cases. When questioned as to his object in being stowed away, and who brought him on board, the boy, who had a beautiful sunny face, and eyes that looked like mirrors of truth, replied that his stepfather did it because he could not afford to keep him, or pay his passage out to Halifax where he had an aunt who was well off, and to whose house he was going. The mate did not believe the story, in spite of the winning face and truthful accents of the boy. He had seen too much of stowaways to be easily deceived by them, he said; and it was his firm conviction that the boy had been brought on board and provided with food by the sailors. Day by day he was questioned and re-questioned, but always with the same result. He did not know a sailor on board, and his stepfather alone had secreted him and given him the food which he ate.

At last the mate, wearied with the boy's persistence in the same story, seized him one day by the collar and dragged him to the fore, and said to him that unless he told the truth in ten minutes from that time, he would hang him from the yardarm. He then made him sit down under it on deck. All around him were the passengers and sailors of the mid-day watch, and in front of him stood the inexorable mate, with his chronometer in his hand, and the other officers of the ship at his side. It was the finest sight, said our informant, that he ever beheld—to see the pale, proud, sorrowful face of that noble boy, his head erect, his beautiful eyes bright through the tears that suffused them. When eight minutes had fled, the mate told him he had but two minutes to live, and advised him to save his life. But he replied with the utmost simplicity and sincerity by asking the mate if he might pray. The mate said nothing, but nodded his head and turned as pale as a ghost, and shook with trembling like a reed with the wind. And there, all eyes turned on him, the brave and noble little fellow, this poor waif whom society owned not, and whom his stepfather could not care for, knelt on the ship's deck and prayed. Our young friend was a true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ; and there, with clasped hands and eyes upturned to heaven, he asked the Lord Jesus to take him to himself and forgive the mate. Our informant adds that there then occurred a scene as of Pentecost. Sobs broke from strong, hard hearts, as the mate sprung forward to the boy and clasped him to his bosom and kissed him and blessed him, and told him how sincerely he now believed his story, and how glad he was that he had been brave enough to face death and be willing to sacrifice his life for the truth of his word.—Watchword.

THAT PIPE.

At a meeting in London the writer noticed sitting near the platform a man with an unusually wretched countenance. His hair looked uncombed and his general untidiness was rendered all the more striking by a bright red necktie which he wore. All through the address he sat looking straight in front of him and seemed like one stupefied. On speaking to him at the close of the meeting, he gave a grunt, and then the writer was told that he was a hopeless case.

Immediately I thanked God that nothing was impossible with him, and so leaving the man with an invitation to another meeting the following Sunday evening, I went home to pray. Sure enough, the next week he was there, but there was a restlessness about him which encouraged me to believe that the deeps were breaking up. At the close of the meeting, when seeking souls were being invited to come to Jesus, this man rose and made the following declaration:—

"Look here," he said, "forty years ago I gave my heart to God, and then he wanted to cleanse me and fill me with his Holy Spirit; but I loved my pipe and my 'baccy, and I wouldn't give in. So I tried to smoke away the strivings of the Spirit, and I tell you just what it is: Satan has stupefied me so that I only just found out I've been serving him these last thirty-nine years. But I smashed my pipe to-day, and I ain't going to be a walking chimney any more. I'll let God have his way to-night. It's that pipe that's been keeping me out of peace." He got deliverance that night.

JACK'S NEW YEAR GIANT.

The holidays were ended. The visit to grand-ma's was over, and the New Year party broken up. Even the story-books had been read through, and now, on this bright, cold second of January, there was nothing for Jack to do but to collect his scattered books, put them in his school-bag and trot back to school.

"Oh, ho!" sighed Jack; "it feels very dull to go back to school. I wish I was Jack the Giant-killer, and had nothing to do but climb a bean-stalk."

But when he glanced slyly at the dining-room window, on his way out of the door, there was no sign of a bean-stalk, though he had dropped a whole handful of beans out there on purpose.

"Well, boys, a happy New Year!" said Miss Lucy, as the boys chattered noisily in the school-room, and "Happy New Year!" echoed all the fresh young voices.

After a sober little talk about the old year that was gone and the New Year that was coming, Miss Lucy said: "There is one job I've laid out for you this year, boys, and that is to kill a giant."

Jack started. Had Miss Lucy heard him talking to himself a little while ago?

"I won't tell you the giant's name now," said the teacher, "but I will let you know if I see him around."

As I told you, Jack didn't feel a bit like going to school, and he missed his spelling, and got his sums wrong, and blotted his copy-book, until Miss Lucy had to give him several ugly marks on his report.

"Ah, Jackie," she said, "that giant has met you in the way and got the best of you."

"Is it Giant Laziness, Miss Lucy?" asked one of the older boys.

"That's his name, Frank, and here is the sword to kill him with," and Miss Lucy wrote across the blackboard, "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."—Exchange.

TEMPERANCE ARITHMETIC.

1. There are 115,000 saloons in the United States, and 64,000 public schools. How many more saloons than schools? If I am correctly informed, there are 51,000 more saloons than schools.

2. The people of the United States pay $80,000,000 yearly for the support of the public schools, and $1,485,000,000 for the support of the saloons, or $1,405,000,000 more than the schools.

3. The value of the food products of our country, for a single year, is about $600,000,000. The cost of alcoholic drinks is about $1,485,000,000. How much more does the liquor cost than the food and clothing? I answer, $885,000,000.

4. The 3,000 saloons of San Francisco take in daily an average of $10 each. That is $30,000 daily.

5. There are about 600,000 drunkards in the United States. How many cities of 40,000 inhabitants each would these drunkards make?

6. In the city of Oakland, the Athens of California, there are 200 saloons. If every saloonist sells 40 drams a day, how many drams are drunk daily? Answer.—About 8,000.

7. If a family spends 15 cents a day for beer, how much is expended in four weeks, and how many loaves of bread, at 10 cents a loaf, could be bought for the same money?

8. A smoker spends 29 cents a day for cigars; will you calculate how many dollars he will spend in one-half year, and how many pairs of shoes, at $2.00 per pair, he could purchase with this wasted money?—Jno. Knisley, in Gospel Messenger.

ACTION OF ALCOHOL IN THE STOMACH.

Certain elements contained in food are digested in the stomach; they consist usually of the albuminous kind. Eggs, meat, some vegetables and milk contain albumen, and this element is taken hold of by the digestive liquor secreted by the glands of the stomach. This liquor is called gastric juice, and its most important chemical agent is pepsin. Pepsin is so largely contained in the mucous lining of the healthy stomach that it is recovered from the stomachs of animals and manufactured into the medicine known as pepsin, which is so extensively used as an aid to weak digestion. There also takes place in the stomach during digestion a movement of the food, which is rolled about and broken up into a semi-liquid state; in this form it passes from the stomach by absorption through its walls and also by an opening into the bowels, where other ingredients of the food, such as fats, oils, starches, and cheese particles are further digested. Natural digestion of food, so far as the stomach is concerned, is performed in a period of time varying from one to four or five hours, depending upon the character of the food and the condition in which it is received. If the food has been well cut and ground to a pulp by the teeth, stomach digestion is accomplished much quicker, and consequently its nutritive influence is the sooner accomplished. This is why soups, milk and liquid foods are always given to invalids and those suffering from hunger, or from weak digestion. In the normal healthy stomach digestion proceeds with regular order and no discomfort is experienced.

Now in what particular does alcohol affect this stomach digestion? I have discovered, which only goes to prove the vast amount of scientific investigation, that if a teaspoonful of alcoholic liquor is taken into the empty stomach, instantly an irritation is set up and gastric juice is secreted quite freely. If this be followed by food of a proper character, normal digestion may follow. If, however, a larger quantity of alcoholic liquor be taken—say an ordinary bar-room glass of whisky, the effect will be to throw the membranous lining into a more active state of irritation, and considerable weeping of gastric juice will follow, just as tears follow irritation of the eye. But the action of the strong alcoholic liquor on the gastric juice will be peculiar: it will separate the pepsin from it and destroy its power as a digestive agent. If, immediately after this larger drink of alcoholic liquor is taken, food be received, its normal digestion will be delayed for just the length of time it takes the stomach to rid itself of the alcohol, so that normal digestive gastric juice may be again secreted. This time may be a half hour, or hours, depending upon the quantity of alcohol drunk before food is taken, or with food during the meal. I have tried this experiment several times; by taking my ordinary dinner without a drop of alcoholic liquor, my natural feelings would indicate that the food was fully digested and passed on out of the stomach in ordinary time, say one to four or five hours, according to the kind and condition of the food. On the other hand, I have taken a good-sized drink of whisky before dinner, and drank whisky, or brandy, or the less powerful liquors called wines, with the dinner, and only in such quantity as would be considered decent and permissible at the table of the most refined person. In a period varying from one to three hours after the dinner, I have taken an emetic and brought to light once more almost all the solid food I had swallowed, which showed very slight digestive change. I have seen two dogs feed on exactly the same food; to one was given a moderate quantity of whisky, while the other was allowed to pursue the digestion of his dinner normally. At the end of four hours both dogs were killed. In the whiskied stomach was found the food, with but very slight change, while the other dog exhibited an empty stomach.

Conclusion—Alcoholic liquors delay digestion in the stomach, first by coagulating albuminous substances, rendering them difficult of digestion; and, second, by destroying the active principle of the gastric juice, pepsin, and paralyzing nervous and muscular vitality.—Alcoholism, Its Cause and Cure.

THE CORNER GROG-SHOP.

In the Arena for September, Rev. C. D. Martyn, discussing universal suffrage, says: "It is often said that, judged by its power to govern great cities, universal suffrage is a failure. This is true. The failure, however, is due to local causes. It does not come from the inherent incapacity of the masses, but is the spawn of accidental and removable evils. Chief among these is the corner grog-shop. It is the blazing light-house of hell. Here it is that morals and manners are debauched. It is over the counter that what an old poet calls 'liquid damnation' is dealt out. If the quid nuncs, instead of railing at universal suffrage, would combine to help shut that door, republicanism would speedily lose its reproach. The constituency of the grog-seller is the ready-made tool of the demagogue. A true democracy can only exist on the basis of sobriety. A drunken pauper cannot be trusted with the dearest rights and most vital possessions of freemen. Better the merciless tyranny of the Czar, or the military despotism of the Kaiser, far better the class rule of England, than the staggering, hiccoughing, bedeviled government of the groggery." Strong language that. But is it too strong?

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Hezekiah's prayer.—vs. 14-21. We come now to a remarkable instance of prevailing prayer, which it is well for us to study if we would ourselves learn the secret. Hezekiah was in sore trouble, his capital threatened by the Assyrian king, a boastful, arrogant, cruel conqueror, who insultingly repeats the long list of his victories over the surrounding nations, and blasphemously tells Hezekiah not to be deceived by God's promise to deliver Jerusalem from a like fate. Hezekiah took the letter from the hands of the messengers and calmly read it, but instead of calling his wise men together to discuss the situation, he "counseled not with flesh and blood," but made the Lord his confidant. We notice (1.) "He went up into the house of the Lord." What better place than God's house can we have to take our troubles to? (2.) "He spread it before the Lord." Many of us miss that comfort in prayer which we might have if we would confide more in the Lord. It is specific prayer which prevails, because this is the kind which is mightily in earnest. When we are asking for anything from an earthly benefactor, we do not make our requests general, but we ask for something in particular. Have you a friend that you want saved, or blessed in any special way? Then call that friend by name. Have you any special trouble or perplexity for which you want particular grace or guidance? Tell the Lord all the circumstances as you would an earthly friend. The very act of doing so is a wonderful stimulus to faith as well as a relief to overburdened hearts. (3.) Hezekiah calls the Lord by his scriptural titles: "The Lord of Hosts," mighty to save; "the God of Israel," ever faithful to his covenant promise. False systems of religion, like Freemasonry, Spiritualism, Theosophy, and kindred forms of error, use man-invented titles. The names which God gives himself are always full of meaning, deep, tender and gracious. When we can realize those meanings in all their height and depth; when, for instance, we can say "Our heavenly Father," taking in by the grasp of faith all that such a title must include, then we are in a condition for prevailing prayer. "That dwellest between the cherubims." In Old Testament times such an allusion was nearly equivalent to the Christian's formula: "We ask in the name of Jesus." It was addressing God in the only way by which he could be approached,—through the mercy-seat above, which was his visible presence, between the shadowing cherubim. Prevailing prayer must be made in the way of God's appointing. Christless prayers can never be prevailing prayers. He may hear the prayer of a heathen who has never heard of Christ, because he sees in his heart the germ of a faith that only needs knowledge in order to accept him. But this does not apply in the case of those whose leaving out of the Redeemer's name, as in lodge prayers, is a willful rejection. Hezekiah lays the whole situation before the Lord. He calmly faces its darkest features. There is no use of making light of a desperate case. The Sennacherib of the liquor traffic is to-day ruling the nations, slaying their strong men, and casting down all merely human expedients for its overthrow as easily as the Assyrian king destroyed the tutelary deities of the surrounding nations conquered by his victorious armies. Satan is strong. No human being, simply as a human being, can cope with him. To the intelligence of an archangel he adds all the dark wiles and malign craft of a fallen spirit. How foolish, then, to deceive ourselves with the idea that there is an innate divineness and nobility in the human soul strong enough to conquer a foe so terrible! Far better to confess our weakness and throw ourselves, as did Hezekiah, on One almighty to save. Paradoxical as it may seem, a reform will often make less actual progress when it is popular than when it was weak and despised. The reason is easy to see. The leaders lose their hold on God and rely on the arm of flesh; and they have to be taught a hard lesson through some unlooked for defeat. Many a moral Bull Run is due to this cause.

2. The mighty deliverance.—vs. 33-38. It could hardly have occurred to Hezekiah that the Lord would save Jerusalem without a single effort on his part; without the loss of a man or the expenditure of a single farthing out of the treasury. But this was only consistent with his promise given to the saints of a later age, to give them abundantly above all that they ask or even think. "For my own sake." When we pray sincerely, "Deliver us from evil," God's honor is pledged to do it. He will defend his church from every foe, and this is one of our greatest encouragements in the unequal warfare against prevailing sins. The melting away of Sennacherib's army in one night may well symbolize the swift and awful destruction of all who seek to harm the Bride of Christ, the church of the living God. They shall prosper that love Zion, but they that fight against her shall be consumed.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

—The following is a comparison of its issues in the three periods of twenty-five years each: In the first period of twenty-five years, the issues were 2,798,366; in the second period of twenty-five years, the issues were 18,987,210; in the third period of twenty-five years, the issues were 32,448,136. The great economy with which the work has been conducted is very apparent. For every eighteen cents received from gifts and legacies, a copy of the Scriptures has been put in circulation.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

—England reports almost two hundred societies of Christian Endeavor.

—A Society of Christian Endeavor has been organized at Sheridan Tunnel, Col., called the "timber-line society." At an altitude of 12,200 feet above the sea level, that society flings its banner to the breeze.

—There are now in the United States over 18,000 local societies of Christian Endeavor, with a total membership of 1,100,000. Thirty Evangelical denominations are represented. The Presbyterians lead all others, the Congregationalists are second, the Baptists third, the Methodists fourth, and the Christians (Disciples) fifth. The first four denominations have over two thousand societies each, the Presbyterian having 4,500.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—At Union Park church, Chicago, on Jan. 3, 96 were received to membership, 73 on confession, 39 of whom were baptized. Dr. Noble gave them for the year's text, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

—Rev. J. D. McCord, who has just completed his engagement of one year as Dr. Goodwin's assistant pastor at the First church, Chicago, now enters evangelistic work. During the year he has given special attention to the mission work of the church, been superintendent of the Sunday-school, held afternoon classes for the children and organized a Boys' Brigade. During the pastor's absence in Europe he took charge of the Sunday evening services and the prayer-meetings.

—The Mayflower church, a branch of the Leavitt Street, Chicago, was organized Jan. 3 with thirty-one members. Rev. F. G. Wilcox, the assistant pastor at Leavitt Street, is pastor. The new church has a $5,000 organ.

—The Congregational News (Chicago) says: "The receipts from all sources for foreign missions in this district of the interior for the past year have risen from $88,000 to $118,000, a gain of 34 per cent; and the number of contributing churches has advanced from 1,028 to 1,176, an increase of 14 per cent."

—The Northwestern Association of Wisconsin, at its meeting at Eau Claire, provided for fellowship meetings among its churches. Illinois can recommend the plan. Southeastern Iowa has also been trying it, to the great blessing of the churches.

—During the past 27 years the Secretary of the American Board of Foreign Missions has reported an average annual increase in donations to the board, per church member, from 18 cents to 66 cents, and the annual receipts from $7,718 to $118,000.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

—The general statistics of this body, which has just been published, shows 26 conferences, 2,062 churches, and 150,234 members. There are 1,227 itinerant preachers and 619 local preachers, 2,535 Sunday-schools, with 177,639 scholars. The collections for the missionary society were $134,443. These statistics show an increase over last year of 19 churches, nearly 2,000 church members, and over 1,000 Sunday-school scholars. Of the conferences three are in foreign lands, Germany, Switzerland and Japan.

LUTHERAN.

—The United Norwegian church has 6 pastors, 7 congregations and 3 missions in Chicago. Five congregations and 3 missions are the result of nine months' labors by Revs. Ellestad and Kildahl, and the students Lockrem and Halbo.

—A summary of the Lutheran church in this country shows, for 1890, 5,028 pastors, 8,388 congregations, 1,187,854 communicants. The Ohio Synod is credited with 361 pastors, 498 congregations and 66,675 communicants. The grand total last year was 4,819 pastors, 8,183 congregations, 1,153,212 communicants. The rate of increase has not been quite as great the past twelve months as it has been for some years previous, but the statistics this year do not seem to be quite as complete as they have been heretofore. Forty-four Lutheran pastors died during the year.

MENNONITES.

—According to the census of 1890, the twelve Mennonite bodies in the United States number 550 organizations, owning 406 churches with 129,340 seats valued at $643,800, and 41,541 communicant members. The Conservative Dunkards have 720 organizations, 854 meeting-houses, 61,101 communicants. The Progressive Dunkards, "The Brethren," have 128 organizations and 8,089 communicants. The African M. church has 4,124 churches and 452,725 communicants. The Church of God (Weinbrenner) has 338 churches and 22,511 members. The number of the members of the Harmony Society at Economy, Pa., is given as 250. The Shakers, who are found in 7 States, have 15 organizations, with 1,728 adult members.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The death is announced of Pres. John R. Eads of Ashland collegiate institute, Kentucky, one of the historic "loyal eighteen," who withdrew from the Church South at the close of the war and entered the ministry of the Northern church. He served in Missouri and Denver, Col., and after a term of three years in Ashland, Ky., took charge of the institute, which he was managing successfully at the time of his death, on Christmas morning.

MISSIONARY.

—The death of Bishop Crowther of the Church Missionary Society, Niger Mission, West Africa, takes away a noble man and a faithful worker from a most important and needy field. Born of heathen parents, in the wilds of West Africa, he was, in his childhood, kidnapped, sold to slave traders and shipped, for sale, to America. He was rescued by a British cruiser, taken to Sierra Leone, educated at Fourah Bay College, and sent back as a missionary to his native land, near the banks of the Niger. There he found his mother, from whom he had been so long separated. Afterwards he was called to England, where he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Oxford, and became the first native bishop of the Church of England for Africa. He has labored there many years with eminent success, translating the Bible into the Yousaba language. He secured the respect and confidence of the leading chiefs, both Mohammedan and heathen, and was often their medium of communication with the British Government. Though not always, of late years, in perfect accord with the views and methods of the home authorities of the missionary society, yet he was an eminently able and good man, a blessing to Africa and to the world.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—At a late meeting the Cairo Presbytery adopted this resolution: "That we overture the Synod of Illinois at its next meeting to take such action as will pledge the Presbyterian church in Illinois to have no part in the Columbian Exposition of 1893 if the doors are open on the Lord's Day, and to invite the co-operation of all the Christian denominations in the State in the same or similar action."

OBITUARY.

"Gathered as a shock of corn fully ripe in his season."

Adolphus F. Bliss, born in Rehoboth, Mass., Aug. 30, 1806, died Dec. 14, 1891, in the 86th year of his age. He began and ended his earthly pilgrimage on the farm occupied by his ancestors for 248 years, and in the house erected by his father in the first year of this century. He was the last of a family of fourteen children, and, never having married, he left no lineal descendant to take his place in the long line of honored names.

His general occupation was a tiller of the soil; but being a man of fair education, he was employed a portion of the time to teach a school in the town for fourteen years. He publicly professed faith in Christ as his personal Saviour, and united with the Congregationalist church in Rehoboth in 1856, where he still retained a name and a place, although he had attended church but seldom for several years. He avoided all secret societies and quietly gave his voice and influence against them, and enrolled his name with those who contributed to erect a monument to Capt. Wm. Morgan. The infirmities of age rendered him partially dependent upon the care of others for several years prior to his death, and these kindly ministrations were rendered by his nephew and family, Zephaniah Graves, who with him occupied the old homestead, doing what they could to make life's evening-time light and joyous.

A goodly company of neighbors and friends gathered to pay their respects to the memory of the departed, to sympathize with the bereaved relatives, and to bury the dead out of their sight. His body rests with the ashes of generations gone before, in the old churchyard, awaiting, we trust, the call of the blessed dead who die in the Lord, to his part in the first resurrection, forever beyond the power of the "second death."

Mr. Moody's Great Investment.

On March 5, 1874, over 17 years ago, Dwight L. Moody, the great evangelist, purchased the block of land now block 19 in Harvey for $1,600. This property still remains in the family, having been transferred to his son by him last spring (May 11, 1891). Seven blocks in that immediate neighborhood were sold week before last at an average price of over $22,000 per block. Mr. Moody's block is unusually well located, is on the main sewer and within one block of the Academy Addition and less than a block and a half from the Academy itself. It is probably worth $25,000. This represents a profit of nearly 72 per cent per annum on the original investment for 17 years in succession.

The above item is taken from the Harvey Citizen of Jan. 1, 1892.

HOME AND HEALTH.

VALUABLE SUGGESTIONS.

An oyster is the best bait for a rat trap.
Salt added to cooked fruit, especially in pies, increases the flavor.
To polish tin, rub it with old newspaper crushed up in the hand.
Nothing takes the soreness from bruises and sprains as quickly as alcohol.
Old, loose kid gloves, worn when ironing, will save many callous places on one's hands.
Never iron black cotton stockings, as the heat fades them rapidly. Dry them in the shade.
See that the lamp wicks are turned down after trimming, else the lamps will be covered with oil.
If raised dough is kept several days upon the ice, the last baking will be much better than the first.
If the water in which onions are boiled is changed once or twice, the vegetable is much more healthful.
When a granite iron kettle becomes old and dull brighten it by boiling a small quantity of borax therein.
A pinch of salt added to a glass of milk makes it not only more palatable to many, but more easily digested.
Circles of felting, pinked or scalloped, are invaluable to put between choice china plates when piled in the closet.
A chimney with a ground-glass edge at the top is less likely to break, as the ground-glass edge allows more room for expansion.
If one's hands perspire easily when doing delicate work, they should be bathed in a few drops of cologne from time to time.
Strips of cotton cloth, an inch wide, wet, and placed around pies, will keep the juice in. Remove when first taken from the oven.
To iron napkins: Iron perfectly dry before folding; iron only on one side, to preserve the polish, and with the selvage, to bring out the pattern.
About once a fortnight put a teaspoonful of soda in your coffee and tea pots, add a little water and let boil until sweet and clean. Wash and rinse.
Doughnuts and cookies, as well as crackers, can be freshened by heating them thoroughly in a moderate oven, after which they should be cooled in a dry place before serving.—Good House-keeping.
When acid is dropped on an article of wearing apparel, pour ammonia immediately upon the spot to neutralize the effect of the acid; then apply chloroform and the original color will, in almost every case, return.

If gloves are much stained on the outside by smoke soak them in tolerably hot water in which a little washing soda has been dissolved. Then put a teaspoonful of ammonia into a pan of lukewarm water and with a hard brush scrub the gloves until the smoke stains disappear. Rinse in clean cold water. They will come out as white as if new.

To loosen a tight ring when the finger has become swelled, begin at the end of the nail and wrap a strong thread, having a needle attached to it, close about the finger until it reaches the ring. Pass the needle under the ring and pushing the thread against the ring, slowly unwind the thread. If too much swollen to admit the passage of the needle under the ring, touch the ring with mercury on opposite sides; a sharp blow of a hammer will then cause it to drop in halves from the finger.

OVER-EATING.

When more food is taken into the stomach than can be appropriated for the purpose of growth, repair, and functional activity, all the organs of digestion, assimilation, and excretion are overtaxed to dispose of this superfluity. Additional labor is put upon the kidneys, lungs and other excretory organs, to eliminate unused material which has served no end in the human economy. And this strain long continued leads to an impairment of vigor, and not unfrequently to chronic disorders which puzzle the best of physicians to overcome. It is, therefore, a waste of energy to over-eat. But how many persons are tempted to gratify the palate long after the demands of hunger have been satisfied! It is from this class that a large percentage of invalids is recruited.—Selected.

CARE FOR MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Neither a piano nor an organ should be left open at night, or habitually when not in use. The changes of temperature are very hurtful to the tone of any instrument, and especially the gathering of dampness, which not only interferes with the tone and quality of the strings and reeds, but is very likely to seriously affect the works. Pianos, in particular, should be kept in as even a temperature as possible, since they are much affected by alterations of heat and cold, dryness and moisture; if thus exposed, they require very frequent tuning, and are not satisfactory in action or tune. Care is also equally desirable in regard to other stringed instruments—the violin family, banjos, guitars, and the like. In all of these the strings are much affected by exposure to dampness and great changes of temperature. All fine instruments should be habitually kept in cases lined with baize or flannel.—Selected.

FARM NOTES.

FARMERS' PROGRESSIVE READING COURSE.

Joshua Crawford, Galion, Ohio, announces that a reading course for farmers, their wives, sons and daughters has been devised. It makes a specialty of plant food, the anatomy of animals, food and care of the same, and of agricultural chemistry. Farmers are awaking to the fact that their vocation requires scholarship equal to that of any other. They have business with the domestic animals, the soil, the sunshine, the atmosphere, the clouds, the forests, rivers, hills, valleys, mountains, and all the inhabitants thereof. The course is divided into four parts, as follows; First, department of agriculture; second, political science; third, natural science; fourth, domestic science. To these is added a miscellaneous department of specialties, such as shorthand, history, literature, etc.

Each of the above departments has four divisions, and each division will be treated in a volume of from 250 to 350 pages each year. Each book is divided into twenty-six chapters—one for each week of the fall and winter months.

The books for the first year are: First, "Soil and Crops;" second, "The Creation and Distribution of Wealth;" third, "The World of Matter;" fourth, "The Art of Preparing Healthful Food." To these the Ohio Committee has added "Black Beauty," an entertaining autobiography of a horse, telling of his hopes and fears, likes and dislikes, and the kind of treatment he most admires. This book should be read by every man who owns or has the care of this princely animal.

The leading agricultural journals of the country will publish each week a list of questions and answers on the various subjects as they are introduced in the reading.

Further information can be obtained by writing to Mr. Crawford.

"STANDARD" FARMING.

There is a somewhat prevalent erroneous idea that fruit may be grown to best advantage upon shallow soils. So largely has this obtained that many fruit growers have selected such from preference, even when they had the choice of soils that were rich and deep. This idea probably originated from the fact that such soils have, as a rule, the best natural drainage, and it is known that good drainage is an essential to successful fruit culture. Experience, however, has amply shown that rich mellow soils, made deep by thorough cultivation and good drainage, are much superior to soils that are shallow but naturally well drained, for this purpose. If your choice is restricted to a shallow soil, then do your best to overcome this drawback by plowing as deeply as possible and manuring heavily.

Small fruits are almost always profitable when well managed. Failure comes from mismanagement and improper selection of stock. One imprudent step in fruit culture is to plant too largely of kinds untried in the soil, locality and climate in which you propose growing them. If they prove worthless, there is a serious loss, both in time and in money. Some fail because they buy cheap and inferior plants. It pays to get the best, and therefore the purchase should always be made from some known reliable dealer. But the most general failure comes from poor soil and poor cultivation. Many who begin to grow small fruits, especially strawberries, have some doubt as to their becoming ultimately a profitable crop, and so they use poor land and give slack attention, thinking then that if the crop fails they won't lose much anyway. Generally, when planted in this manner, and with the planter in this frame of mind, they do fail, and it is not to be wondered at. If you are going into this work at all, do it right. Give the best ground you have; the best manure; plant the best you know how; give the most thorough cultivation. Then the chances are largely in favor of your winning, but otherwise they will be against you.

FOR THE

"AMERICAN HANDBOOK AND CITIZEN'S MANUAL."

The book is purely documentary, a whole library of startling information, a regular arsenal of facts and evidences, an all-round exposition of an active, aggressive and wide-spread movement, every item a text and every chapter the outline for a powerful sermon, speech or lecture. Influential journals, whole churches and strong organizations are interested in its successful career and extended circulation. It embraces the opinion of more than 100 well-known papers, as found before the public, and men and women high in church and state are thrown on the witness stand. The attitude and expression alone of such an array of powerful newspapers, eminent statesmen, learned divines, and noted reformers as are introduced to the reader would berald any publication and insure a wide bearing on any national question. The book will contain some 200 pages close print, more matter than many works of twice or thrice the size with larger type, pictures and wide margins. Price 40 cents, paper cover, postpaid; 35 cents by the dozen; and 25 cents by the hundred. Address orders to M. N. Butler, Avalon, Missouri.

profitable. They are hardy, good and regular bearers, and the fruit sells well, being in demand for cooking, and for jellies, preserves, etc.

We seem to be gradually learning how to treat our horses humanely. We have already instanced the progress of the warfare upon the check rein. Now the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has determined to put a stop to the practice of docking horses' tails, and has offered a reward of one hundred dollars for information leading to the conviction of any person guilty of it. The practice is needlessly cruel, especially in summer and in fly time.

Smut is one of the most prevalent causes of failure of the oat crop. The germs of the disease exist in the seed. Recent experiments indicate that the spores may be destroyed by plunging the seed in water that is heated to 126 to 133 degrees. This is such a simple, cheap and easily applied remedy that there is little excuse for not availing one's self of it. By observing the caution to use this preventive you may escape the loss of your entire crop.—Christian Standard.

Royal Baking Powder,

Strongest, Purest, Most Economical.

Certain baking powder makers are publishing falsified extracts from the Government reports, with pretended analyses and certificates, wherein an attempt is made to compare their baking powders with the "Royal," or making bogus tests from house to house, their obvious purpose being to counteract the recent exposures of the inferiority of their own goods arising from their impurity, low strength, and lack of keeping qualities as shown by the Government chemists and others.

As to whether any of these baking powders are equal to the "Royal," the official tests clearly determine. When samples of various baking powders were purchased from the grocers, and analyzed by the United States Government Chemists and the Chemists of State and City Boards of Health, the reports revealed the fact that the "Royal" contained from 28 per cent. to 60 per cent. more leavening strength than any other cream of tartar baking powder and also that it was more perfectly made, of purer ingredients, and altogether wholesome.

As these powders are sold to consumers at the same price, by the use of the Royal Baking Powder there is an average saving of over one third, besides the advantage of assured purity and wholesomeness of food, and of bread, biscuit and cake made perfectly light, sweet, and palatable—advantages not to be had in the use of the low grade, cheaply made baking powders that contain lime, alum, and other impurities.

Mrs. Gleason's address, in this issue, is good reading.

The Lutheran congregation at Prospect, Ohio, says the Lutheran Standard, was threatened with destruction because in the unsettled state of things the subject of secretism was forced upon her. Not only did the congregation without a dissenting vote decide against secretism, but it has lived and prospered through the year. This is the first year in the history of the congregation for many years in which the deacons could report that the pastor's salary was entirely covered by subscriptions. All honor to the Prospect congregation.

The death of Cardinal Manning in London, last week, removes one of the very few prominent prelates of the Romish church of whom it can be truthfully said that he was more noble than the hierarchy to which he belonged. At least, judg-

ANTI-SECRET NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION.

The New York Anti-Secret Christian Association, auxiliary to the N. C. A., will hold a two day's State Convention at BINGHAMTON, BROOME COUNTY, ON TUESDAY AND WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2 AND 3. The first session will be held in the Hall of the Women's Christian Temperance Union at 2 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, February 2.

There ought to be a very full attendance of the friends of the Anti-Secrecy Reform, especially from New York and Pennsylvania, and every effort should be made to insure, by fervent prayer and earnest personal effort, the greatest possible success of this convention.

It is expected that among other speakers, men led of God in our work, a prominent divine from New York, Rev. B. Winget, of Cortland, N. Y., and Rev. J. P. Stoddard, the New England Agent, will be present and address the convention, at which all religious denominations favorable to the cause are requested to send delegates.

Bro. W. B. Stoddard, who is working in behalf of this convention, and striving to make it a great success, furnishes the following memoranda in regard to the entertainment of those who attend:

"Tickets for six meals can be had at the W. C. T. U. Coffee House for one dollar. Furnished rooms, very convenient, are offered for twenty-five cents a night. Two can occupy one room. There is a disposition shown on the part of friends to furnish entertainment for those from a distance. Perhaps all wants can be met in this manner, but no one need pay more than $1.25. If those wishing to attend will write to me at Binghamton, I will do what I can to arrange for their entertainment."

Further particulars may be expected in the next issue of the Cynosure.

ing from the estimation in which he was held alike by Protestants and Papists, his intellectual attainments, his benevolence, and other personal characteristics, gained for him an eminence which even his church dignities appear to have been unable to enhance. The man was greater than the office to which he had been exalted.

A lady correspondent in Utah, writing of Mormon policy, informs us: "I pray that secrecy may be done away. It is a far more gigantic power to contend with than was slavery; but God rules. . . . A Mormon 'apostle' told me a few days ago, that 'polygamy was done away with—for the present.' It is present policy. I think that President Harrison's suggestions are timely. Utah Mormons want Statehood badly; but it is (with them) Christianlike to deceive Gentiles. They never patronize Gentiles. Mormonism is a great power—but the Lord rules. Any confidence in them—except that they are acting from policy—is premature." This suggestion is not new, but ominous of the alleged effort to found a State with a Mormon constitution conferring more civil 'liberty' than the framers of the Federal Constitution ever designed.

The national committee of the Prohibition party has issued a formal call for a National Convention to meet at St. Louis, Mo., June 29, 1892, to nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to transact any other business that may come within its scope. The basis of representation has been fixed as follows: Each State is entitled to four delegates-at-large. Each State is also entitled to twice as many delegates as the number of congressmen which the State is authorized to elect in 1892 under the new apportionment. Each State may send one additional delegate for every 1,000 votes, or a major fraction thereof, cast for Fiske and Brooks in 1888. Each Territory is entitled to two delegates, and the District of Columbia, also, to two delegates. The convention will assemble in Music Hall, St. Louis.

The United Presbyterian (Pittsburgh, Pa.), in one of its most recent issues, says: "At the present time a Presbyterian congregation in an adjoining town is agitated by the earnest preaching of the pastor against these societies. At first, it seemed as though the pastor would be compelled to withdraw. But the great body of the congregation, we understand, has rallied to his support, and the pastor will be sustained. It is the Masonic order that has been giving the trouble. This society and those close akin to it are the ones which most frequently antagonize the church if it presume to criticize them." This item probably refers to the case of Rev. Z. S. Weaver, of Burgettstown, Pa., who preached against the evils of secret societies in the Presbyterian church of which he was pastor, was warned by his elders to desist, and resigned his charge, his resignation to become effective next April. Every lover of the anti-secrecy reform will rejoice to learn that his congregation has so strongly rallied for his defence.

TO MRS. H. E. M. FOOTE.

(Rev. C. C. Foote died at Detroit, Mich., May 3, 1891.)

BY S. E. ADAMS.

So long you walked the way with one,
Sad is it now to walk alone!—
Remember, rest when work is done,
Is sweet to souls a-weary grown.

Below, a conflict for the right
That will not cease while wrong is done;—
Above, the saints who fought the fight
Rest in the peace of victory won.

Worn with the stings and ills of life,
Its want, its woe, its carking care,
Its restless, never-ending strife,
Its sin, its sorrow, its despair;—

Still longing, with a great desire,
To hear and heed the Master's call:
The snow of age had quenched the fire
Of effort till the flame was small.

Be glad his time had come to change
From earthly storm to heavenly calm,
In garments of delight to range
By waters still, in vales of balm.

Be glad that he went on before,—
Far brighter now will be the way;
Be glad that death set wide the door
That leads from darkness into day.

ROBBING GOD BY FALSE WORSHIPS.

ADDRESS BY MRS. M. E. A. GLEASON IN THE NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION, DEC. 9TH, 10TH, 1891.

2 Chronicles 28: 21-25.

God is not pleased with his people when they multiply unto themselves gods, or lend themselves to false worship of any kind. Many are to-day taking away a portion of the time, money and talents that should be given solely to God, and giving it to false gods. What we especially wish to consider, to-night, is the system of false worship carried on in secret societies. Ahaz allowed himself to be blinded by the sins he had already committed; he already feared a just God and in his need of help he called upon anything he could see; he sacrificed unto and worshiped something seemingly rich and powerful; so, to-day, men are blinded by sin; they are in desperate need of help in many ways; help materially and spiritually; but naturally they seek material help first, as did Ahaz. Men need help in their trade or business; men need help when seeking for fame or personal aggrandizement; and in their great desire for any help that will take them out of themselves, that will give them what they are striving and longing for—like Ahaz—they cast themselves upon the mercies of something in this world, something tangible to the senses, and they imagine they have seen the benefits of secret organizations to others (as Ahaz had seen the help which one heathen king had given another); so men, in seeking for pleasure, fame, some fancied protection in one way or another, instead of appealing to the source of all power, from whom all good gifts come, a very present help in trouble; instead of seeking first the kingdom of God, that all the things that our heavenly Father knoweth we have need of shall be added unto us; men, in their blindness, lend themselves to a false worship, take their portion out of the house of the Lord, and give it unto other gods.

The question may arise here: How can we say, Take their portion out of the house of the Lord, when many who profess to serve God are members of secret organizations, which I have called false worship? As I shall prove, the religion of the true God and the system of false religion of the lodges are thoroughly opposed to each other. How can a member of the church of Christ be faithful to the true God and assist in the worship of false gods? That it is a worship we can but admit, after reading the following article from a text-book of Masonic Jurisprudence, by Albert Mackey, one of the highest authorities upon the laws of Freemasonry: "The ceremony of consecrating religious edifices to the sacred purposes for which they are intended, by mystic rites, has been transmitted to us from the remotest antiquity. 'History,' says Dudley, 'both ancient and modern, tells us that extraordinary rites, called rites of consecration or dedication, have been performed by people of all ages and nations, on the occasion of the first application of altars, or temples, or places, to religious uses. Thus Moses consecrated the tabernacle, Solomon the first temple, and the returned exiles from Babylon the second. Among the pagans, ceremonies of the most magnificent nature were often used in setting apart their gorgeous temples to the purposes of worship. A Masonic lodge is, in imitation of these ancient examples, consecrated with mystic ceremonies to the sacred purposes for which it had been constructed. By this act it is set apart for a holy object, the cultivation of the great tenets of a Mason's profession, and becomes, or should become, in the mind of the conscientious Mason, invested with a peculiar reverence as a place where, as he passes over its threshold, he should feel the application of the command given to Moses, 'Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. On this occasion a box is to be used as the symbol of the lodge. It is placed in the center of the room, and is a representation of the ark of the covenant, which was deposited in the Holy of Holies of the ancient temple.'" Here follows the ceremony of consecration, which I have not time to give you; but what blasphemy is this—participated in by many who profess to follow Christ, the Holy One, in a place where he is ignored—in an exhortation given, which is from the 3rd chapter of 2 Thessalonians, 6th verse: "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly," etc.,—with the phrase containing the name of Jesus left out. If Christians were more familiar with the Scriptures, they would more readily notice many of the omissions and perversions from the Bible which now Freemasons will tell you they never thought of. (Use the name of Jesus in any lodge local!) Our God is a jealous God, not willing to divide the allegiance with another,—even a Masonic lodge.

Some Freemason present may say that is all nonsense: "Why, we can not join a lodge unless we believe in God." Yes; well, which god do you believe in? We read here, not from any expose of Freemasonry, but in an article from the Scottish Freemason, entitled "The Universality of Masonry and the Belief in God." Thus far we have only considered the extension of Masonry from its material point of view, and as regards its connection more particularly with the Anglo-Saxon race. Let us now look at it in another light.

Masonry is not confined to Christians, Catholic or Protestant; it belongs to the Mohammedan, the Parsee, the Hindoo, the followers of Confucius, the red Indian of America, the native of Africa and the islanders of the South Sea.

What, then, is the common bond that unites these various races, creeds and sects in one universal order? What is the groundwork on which the whole theory of the craft is built up? The bulwark, the raison d'être, the first and greatest landmark of the order, is the belief in God the Creator, the "Great Architect of the Universe." To Mohammedans, Allah is all supreme. The mild and gentle Parsee does not worship the sacred fire as a god, but as a proof of the presence of God. The peaceful Buddhist does not worship Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva as the supreme God, but as the representatives of the principal attributes of the Godhead. The disciples of Confucius worship God through their prophet, Confucius; the red Indian worships as his supreme being, the "Good Spirit." So, then, with these many to choose from, which god must a man believe in, in order to be made a Freemason?—and how many converts to Christ may be obtained by his professed followers in the lodge, where we are told: "Dogmatical discussions are rigidly excluded from our lodges, so that the brethren of various sects and creeds be not wounded in their religious feeling?" Which god is a Christian minister worshiping while visiting a Masonic lodge in China, where Confucius is placed upon the altar, where the mutilated Bible is placed in this country? This article further tells us: "If we excluded the idea of and worship of the Great Architect, we should no longer have the Buddhists, Parsees, and Mohammedans working with us."

Must believe in God, you say: Read with me another article from this book, published by Freemasons: "But though, in ancient times, Masons were charged in every country to be of the religion of that country or nation, whatever it was, yet it is now thought more expedient only to oblige them to respect that religion in which all men agree—leaving their particular opinions to themselves." Now which god are you worshiping in your lodge, and to whom is the grand Masonic temple dedicated, or the temple dedicated a few years ago in New Hampshire, when thousands of dollars were expended in improvements (a large proportion being given by professing Christians), and after the usual ceremonies were performed in the most impressive manner, there followed a banquet and ball as part of the worship to— which god? What a farce was that a few years ago, when the Grand Orient of France adopted, by a sweeping majority, the basis of Freemasonry as "Absolute liberty of conscience and human unity;" such an outspoken declaration of "no God" would not work in this country, where so many Christians fellowship with those that are not Christians in the lodge. So we read in an article written by an eminent Freemason: "Two things are perfectly clear; namely, that the Freemasonry of the United States is somewhat different from that of the Grand Orient of France;" and that, "while here the institution is essentially philanthropic in its nature and aim, it has also, thus far, been identified with a belief in God. Shall we continue to insist upon this belief as essential to our fellowship? For the present, we answer, yes. We also know, full well, the drift and tendency of modern thought and feeling, which, among the scientific and cultivated classes, is away from God, and towards—no one can yet tell clearly what, but in some toward the 'Infinite All' of Goethe and Emerson; in others, to the 'grand Etre' or 'Divine Humanity' of Comte, and in not a few a feeling after the 'Unknown' of Herbert Spencer. And the time may possibly come when the numbers of such, and of such who are really good men and true, shall be so great that it will be the course of wisdom to rest our glorious and beneficent fraternity upon purely human foundations and sanctions, and where nothing will be asked or demanded save loyalty to truth, and love and good-will to man; and when, upon these broad, firm and everlasting principles, the Freemasons, not only of the United States but of the world, will be united as one. That time is not yet; nor is Freemasonry in the United States as yet prepared for it."

But what difference is there between the declaration of absolute liberty of conscience and the privilege to believe in any god, to close the doors and unite in "close harmony, bound to one another by strong bonds of fraternal love, and in all things holding no thought of self where thought of others could be for their good?"

That Freemasonry claims to be a religion—the religion above every other religion—we can believe from the following: "Freemasonry, however, in its essential nature, is not confined to Christendom, or to dwellers in Christian lands. Its aim is as universal as its principles are broad and beneficent. The aim of Freemasonry is to unite, not the dwellers in Christendom only, but for the inhabitants of all the earth, in the blessed bonds of brotherly love and peace. Jew and Gentile, Christian and un-Christian, Greek and barbarian, it would unite as one. What, then, is the relation to those people who have a religion different from our own, who have Scriptures other than ours, such as Buddhists, the disciples of Confucius or the Mohammedans? The relation of Freemasonry to such as these is very simple and natural. It insists upon the acceptance of its general and universally beneficent principles, and leaves them, in their various lodges and organizations, to use whatever symbols they please. The Buddhist may use the Dharma, the Brahmin the Vedas, the Parsee the Zendavesta, the Mohammedan the Koran, and-so-forth; each in a similar way to which the Christian uses the Bible, viz., finding therein, and enforcing therefrom, those sublime principles of our order that raises it above every sect and above every individual form of religion, and make it possible for it to harmoniously and blessedly include all true men of every land and creed, who respect moral obligations, love man and seek to do good."

That Freemasonry seeks to usurp the prerogative of Christ, we may infer from this utterance: "It is an attempt to realize an era of universal brotherhood, peace and good-will;" and: "The order is steadily increasing in numbers and influence, and ever nearing that much-hoped-for, and long-prayed-for day when its sublime and humane principles shall unite all good men in the bonds of brotherly love and peace." Please notice, all good men, for nowhere have I read that they are willing to take bad men (that is, those whose vile deeds are known to the world), and make them better. "No man can be made a Freemason, unless he be believed to be a man of good moral character and comparatively blameless life."

We see, then, that a man needs only to believe in something higher than himself to become a partaker of this religion—the religion—"because its principles are so much better fitted to the needs of humanity than any other;" this religion for man alone—for we are assured repeatedly by the best Masonic authority: "For the law, which declares that no woman can be admitted, is universal and controls every lodge on the face of the globe." "It is an unquestionable landmark of the order: and the very first prerequisite to initiation, that the candidate shall be a man." This, of course, prohibits the initiation of a woman. "This landmark arises from the peculiar nature of our speculative science as connected with an operative art. Speculative Masonry is but the application of operative Masonry to moral and intellectual purposes. Our predecessors wrought, according to the traditions of our order, at the construction of a material temple, while we are engaged in the erection of a spiritual edifice—the temple of the mind. They employed their implements for merely mechanical purposes; we use them symbolically, with a more exalted design. Thus it is that in all our emblems, our language and our rites, there is a beautiful exemplification and application of the rules of operative Masonry to a spiritual purpose. And as it is evident that King Solomon employed in the construction of his temple only hale and hearty men and cunning workmen, so our lodges, in imitation of that great exemplar, demand, as an indispensable requisite to initiation into our mysteries, that the candidate shall be a man, capable of performing such work as the Master shall assign him. This is, therefore, the origin of the landmark which prohibits the initiation of females."

In the initiatory ceremonies of Adoptive Freemasonry, or Female Freemasonry, it is said to the candidates: "To you are given all the advantages of the society: its shield of protection, its hand of relief, and its voice of sympathy, while we do not require of you any of the labor or expense of sustaining it." (It is husband's money.) "The only Masonic privilege denied to you is that of visiting the lodge, and this would be of no advantage to you, even if it were possible to grant it; but it would awaken the voice of scandal against you from a censorious world, and thus produce far more pain to your kind and amiable hearts than it could possibly afford you pleasure." (Why different from other secret societies, which include women?)

And we are told of the remarkable privileges which will accrue to the dear female relatives of Freemasons, and the wonderful forbearance which will be exercised towards these same female relatives by members of Masonic lodges. We read that a candidate is required to take the following oath: "Furthermore do I promise and swear that I will not violate the chastity of a Master Mason's wife, mother, sister or daughter, I knowing them to be such, nor suffer it to be done if in my power to prevent it." Most marvelous oath, sisters; but where do we stand if we are so peculiarly unfortunate as to have no near male relative a member of a Masonic lodge? A clergyman (also an affiliated Master Mason) was asked: "In what light he looked upon this oath and some others." He replied: "Well, Freemasonry is a very ancient institution, and of course there are many things in it (as there are in the church) that we do not like." "Well, then, why do you not change them for the better?" No answer was given, and none was needed; for we had, in Mackey, read: "Landmarks can never be changed. No. Nothing can be subtracted from them; nothing can be added to them; not the slightest modification can be made in them," etc.

But it is not our desire to-night to speak of the woman-side of the question or of the temperance-side. These will be made subjects for future consideration. Only I was compelled to smile at the satisfaction displayed by some white-ribbon women, a few years ago, as a Masonic clergyman informed them that in his lodge they had pledged themselves to abstain from alcoholic drinks at their banquets; and at the same time their Master of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts was Samuel Lawrence (the rum-distiller). This reminds me of a man who had taken the oath of total abstinence for himself, and then, on election day, voted for men who drank, believed in drinking, and who would work for the best interests of the liquor traffic! Sisters, be not deceived. Ye can not be unequally yoked together with unbelievers, and be true to the God we profess to serve. This word unequally has a peculiar significance to me; for we know that whenever or wherever a Christian unites in close fellowship with an unbeliever of any name, the unbeliever always has the greater advantage; and sooner or later, the Christian weakens and gradually becomes faithless to his solemn covenant with God; taking away a portion out of the house of the Lord, and, like Ahaz, "shut up the doors of the house of the Lord," as we find our churches are closed to an honest, free discussion of this religion, this usurper of our Christ. We are told: "Keep such discussion out of the church; this is no place for it." Beloved, we have been told just this in regard to every reform movement for ages; but rest assured that this question, and every other question supposed to interfere with the coming of Christ's kingdom, must and will be settled by his church before he come. It is the mission of the church to reprove the unfruitful works of darkness as it is the light of the world.

Alas for him that hath a divided allegiance; he will find that the other gods will prove his ruin, as they were the ruin of Ahaz and all Israel.

When, in that last day, he shall stand before the Judge of all the earth, the false gods will not, cannot plead for him; he will understand then the utter worthlessness of the gods which smote him;—and yet even here we are met by the utterance of a devotee to Freemasonry (a minister of the church of England), Dr. Oliver: "Even the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth, also, and the works that are therein shall be burnt up; but Masonry, pure and uncontaminated, without earthly abominations, shall triumph over the general and universal dissolution, and shall cement the hosts of heaven in a holy union and communion to all eternity."

Brothers and sisters, shall we continue to cry peace, peace, when there is no peace—in the face of such utterances as we have heard from Freemasons here to-night? We are told: "You will make enemies if you meddle with any of these societies, so many of our church members are members of lodges; you will get along much better if you let these things alone." If this be so, shall we hold our peace when we remember the Master said: "If ye are followers of me, ye shall have persecution." As Ahaz made high places in every several city of Judah, to burn incense unto other gods, so we find the number of lodges far outnumbering our churches; and as then he provoked to anger the Lord God of his fathers, even now we believe the anger of God is provoked upon every system of false worship, and his followers are in duty bound to meet this evil with his truth to preach more faithfully our Christ, the name above every name; to remember that by the word of our testimony we are to overcome that evil one. "The time to do right is now." We may wait until this reform becomes popular, if we will, but what shall we answer by-and-bye, when we realize that through our negligence many a young man may be joined to his idols, from which it is so hard to break away? We may say: "God never called me to this work." How do you know? I heard a pastor say, a few weeks ago, "It is well to preach upon all the truths of the Bible." There are many of our friends to-day who do not wish to listen to anything said or done in regard to this work; so we have many who do not wish to help in this or that branch of work, but, simply determining to have nothing to do with it, will never exonerate us from our responsibility. It will pay us to at least investigate carefully any institution which refuses to be scrutinized by the church of Christ. "We can at least try the spirits and see whether they are of God."

Mrs. Gleason, in the course of her address, read the following extracts in proof of her statements:

Regarding the admission of women to secret societies:

Donaldson's Odd-fellow's Text Book (p. 217) has the following: "The simple truth is this: Woman is not entitled to and seeks not a place among us . . . They could not with propriety in conformity with the usages of the world take part in our private assemblages without exposing themselves to the censoriousness of the age." "This in plain English is an admission that a pure woman could not enter an Odd-fellow's lodge without injury to her purity and reputation. But think of an assembly of men from which Christ and woman are both shut out, and then tell us, Christian mother, is that a safe place for your son which excludes you and that Saviour in whose holy name you first taught him to pray? Christian wife, is that fit company for your husband that is not fit company for you?"

Concerning unholy alliances:

"God's Word prohibits the believer from forming alliances with the ungodly in society. Whenever the Christian surrenders himself to the society of the unbelieving world, his heart will be led away from God. This is especially true of thousands of Christian men who have deliberately yoked themselves up with unbelievers in all manner of secret societies. This course of false alliance is doing more mischief to individual Christian men by turning their hearts away from God and his service, and to the church by depleting and robbing her of her male membership, than any other one enemy of Christ. There never was a time when the cry, 'Come out from among them and be ye separate, saith the Lord,' was more needed than now."—George F. Pentecost.

DANIEL'S VISION OF TIME.—II.

BY B. EISENTRAUT.

The description the prophet Daniel received in his vision, or dream, of the fourth beast, or Roman Empire, in the fore part of the seventh chapter, seemed only to arouse the prophet to gain further knowledge of the same. Hence we read, in Dan. 7: 19: "Then would I know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron and his nails of brass, which devoured, brake in pieces and stamped the residue with his feet."

In comparing the prophet's words, which were spoken nearly 555 years B. C., with the historian James Bryce, the author of the "Holy Roman Empire," a book published in A. D. 1880, we find this harmony of its government. The latter said: "That ostentation of humility which the subtle policy of Augustus had conceived, and the jealous hypocrisy of Tiberius maintained, was gradually dropped by their successors, till despotism became at last recognized in principle as the government of the Roman Empire. . . . Earlier rulers had disguised their supremacy by making a slavish senate the instrument of their more cruel or arbitrary acts. As time went on, even this veil was withdrawn; and in the age of Septimus Severus, the Emperor stood forth to the whole Roman world as the single centre and source of power and political action."

This narrative of the historian transpired within the first two centuries of the Christian era; but gives a fair example of the ages which followed. The prophet said further, Dan. 7: 20: "And of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell, even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth speaking great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows."

The prophecies in this chapter, as well as in the second chapter, are directed to the continuation of the Roman Empire after its falling in pieces, as it occurred in A. D. 800 through the papal power of Rome, forming a confederation of ten nations before the birth of Martin Luther.

Dan. 2: 41 illustrates the great change of this empire as standing in a two-fold form as part iron and part clay; the papacy, or the miry clay, seeking protection under temporal rulers; the emperors represented as iron. Charles the Great, whom the Pope Leo III. had crowned in Rome, found no religious contentions in the new empire in A. D. 800; but another emperor, Charles the Fifth, had either to decide in favor of the Reformers or against them during his reign from 1519 until 1556. The Reformation caused three nations to break loose from the papal throne; namely, England, Scotland and Denmark. Charles V. had brighter prospects before him than his predecessors; he was more stout than his fellows in temporal appearances, in being the natural heir of America after its discovery by Columbus. Daniel predicted the position this man would take in dealing with Reformers, in saying (verses 21 and 22): "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom."

In applying, now, historical facts to this prophecy, I feel justified in saying that the judgment Charles V. had given in relation to the use of the Bible in Worms (1521), and in Augsburg (1530), against Protestants has been reversed in the course of time and events. Protestants have gained the power to stand now above such dictations and judgments; they feel in duty bound to give and preach the Gospel to every kindred, tongue and nation upon the globe. Prophecy illustrates that those who were oppressed, were to prosper until they themselves could practice the liberties which were first denied under the authority of this Roman power.

Verses 23 and 24, thus he said: "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall arise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings."

The table of time begins with the prosperous period of the Roman emperors, from Christ's time on until the year A. D. 800. It broke then in two divisions, and out of the Western ten kings arose. The second emperor, Charles V., assumed different obligations, responsibilities and judgment than the first, or Charles the Great, in their relationship with the papacy of Rome. Three kings were forced to retire from the tyranny of Rome and the empire through the Reformation.

Verse 25: "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and shall think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." This man who had eyes to see the piety and devotion of Martin Luther and his zeal for the Gospel in 1521, and the defenders of divine truth in Augsburg in 1530, forbid the use of the Gospel, prohibited the buying or the selling of the same. He condemned the confession of the Protestants which they had drawn up in writing in the latter city and read before him June 25, 1530. He prevailed against them; they were given into his hand, as emperor of the fourth kingdom, which he represented for a time, times and the dividing of time.

The Jews were in captivity for a time of seventy years. It was during the Babylonian captivity that the prophet explained first the king's dream of the great image, representing the four great kingdoms of the world. The latter kingdom, with its ten horns, or ten kingdoms, was to be found guilty of keeping God's people in bondage. In taking the number of seventy years as the proper key of time, we find this period as a direct reproof and condemnation against the Roman Catholic church.

Protestant confession, as given A. D. 1530, 6 m.
A time for 70 years, times 140, $\frac{1}{2}$ time 35, 245,

End with the month of June A. D. 1775, 6 m.

George Washington was chosen as chief commander for religious liberty in the month of June, 1775, at the second session of Congress of the Colonists in North America.

The signal of the end of the Roman Empire is given by the prophet in connection with the expiration of time, times and a half. It ended August 6, 1806, with the resignation of Francis II. of Austria. Napoleon's wars had undermined the ancient foundation of the empire. We read (Dan. 7: 26): "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end."

Verses 27 and 28: "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart."

The kingdom which hindered the spread of the Gospel was to be removed before the day of judgment. The greatness of Christ's kingdom was to be proclaimed under the whole heaven, through those which took the Bible for their only guide and counsel within the intervening time, whom Daniel saw as the Son of man coming with the clouds of heaven, when the books were to be opened. (Dan. 7: 13.) All signals of prophecy in the Old or the New Testament give positive proof that we are living in years of greater importance than humanity may imagine, bordering on the verge of judgment itself.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Reform work.—E. D. Winslow and his career.—The D. E. K. at Harvard.—Another chapter in the history of the endowment orders.—Gov. Russell's message.—The Bible and reform.

After a decade of years spent in reform work and more or less intimate contact with reform workers, I have come to the conclusion that it is a very delightful life to live,—so much so, in fact, that one can afford, merely for the pleasure it gives, to put up with short rations now and then. The professional litterateur writes for a capricious public. The rage to-day, his books may be shelved to-morrow, and a new favorite take his place. But Truth, like her divine Author, is ever the same. "Eternally young and fair," she smiles no more sweetly on her knights who do battle for her in the first flush of their youth and strength, than when grayhaired and tottering, they ride into the lists to break a last lance in her defence.

Take the biography of any writer from Sir Walter Scott downwards, whose aim was simply to amuse people and make money, and you find an undertone of sadness and ennui running through it. The common mind may not perceive this minor strain, but they who have felt it themselves know that divine unrest. "The demand of the times is for specialists in literature as in everything else," says somebody whose name I have forgotten; but the loudest demand is for the moral specialist—the writer with a purpose, whether his chosen vehicle be the poem or the story—or the editorial thrown off from the journalist's teeming brain to-day, to light the kitchen fire to-morrow. Genius always wants a ballast. By itself it is full of eccentricities and foibles, if not something worse, as the lives of men of genius sadly testify, and an earnest, lofty purpose sacredly adhered to is the only thing that will supply this necessary moral weight. In these times, when even Fashion and Pleasure cannot shut their ears altogether to the world's cry of pain as it ascends to heaven from her tortured millions, the victims of human vice and greed, than which even famine and pestilence are more merciful, blessed is the writer, be his talent one or ten, who heeds the call and refuses to "fiddle while Rome is burning."

Whatever may have been the sins of Asa Potter, president of the insolvent Maverick Bank, E. D. Winslow, living a life of self-exile for his crimes in Buenos Ayres, is not the man to cast them at him, as he does in the columns of the Buenos Ayres Herald, which he is now editing in that far-off country. His name has no pleasant savor, though the public hears it but little nowadays. He wrote "Rev." before it, and only the evening before his flight from America, made a most moving address full of wise Christian counsel to the Sunday-school at Auburndale, where he then resided. I remember very well the sensation made by the disclosure of his double life, and still more double dealings, fifteen years ago. But while his connection with the church was freely commented upon in the papers at the time, I do not remember that the trifling fact of his being a Mason was ever mentioned. The lodge is always ready to claim a Washington or a Garfield, but when it comes to a Benedict Arnold or an E. D. Winslow, they are very silent. If a church member or a Sunday school superintendent be proved a rogue, let it be known; but if he is a Mason or a K. of L. or an I. O. O. F., why suppress a fact that is quite as important to the public?

President Eliot has heard some unflattering truths expressed lately, regarding the way in which his system of non-interference with the D. E. K.—or "Dickey Club," in college slang—is viewed by intelligent people generally, and he will have a chance to hear them yet more plainly stated when the Harvard overseers meet to-morrow, for some of them are much stirred up over the matter, and do not relish the idea of letting a few fast young men with no brains and plenty of money, the more's the pity!—besmirch Harvard's fair fame as recklessly as they daubed over the statue of her venerable founder, two years ago.

Another curious chapter in the history of the endowment orders came out in yesterday's papers. It seems that the officers of the Rising Sun negotiated to buy the Fraternal Circle for $50,000 from five young men of Somerville, Mass., who held the offices, respectively, of "supreme president," "supreme vice-president," "supreme secretary," "supreme treasurer," and "supreme instructor." All these "supremes" are now under arrest, the $50,000 which they refused to pay back, being wanted by the receiver appointed to wind up the affairs of the Rising Sun, but who found nothing in the treasury with which to do it, as the officers of this latter order, after buying out the Fraternal Circle in the manner above stated, and pocketing $30,000 more, fled to Mexico. They are a fair specimen of the kind of men that have been trusted by hardworking people with their little savings, while the Legislature has done absolutely nothing to protect them from these harpies; nor is the subject even alluded to by Gov. Russell in his inaugural message,—a document which is able so far as it goes, but whose limitations are very noticeable, not to say painful. It is all taken up with recommendations which have to do with the mere machinery of government, while he lets entirely alone all those vital questions which pertain to its life, and which is more than any mere political system, as the body is more than raiment. Lucy Stone scores a good point, where she says that the Governor "congratulates" the men on the abolishment of the poll-tax, "but has not a word to say in regard to removing the restrictions on 500,000 women in this State who have no vote." He had better have kept his congratulations to himself for very shame's sake, while he ignores that glaring injustice which makes every woman who wishes to exercise her very limited suffrage right pay a poll-tax the same as before. But Pat and Mickey, though they own only their bare hands, can vote, among other things, for governor,—a fact of which that gentleman was probably not oblivious when he tendered them his "congratulations."

Does the Congregationalist really mean to say that it is a hard task to select four temperance lessons a year, one for each quarter, without repeating them? In writing the Band of Hope lessons for the Cynosure, some years ago, I was continually astonished by their number and variety. Yet it is not long since a minister who was an indefatigable Bible student remarked to me, "that it must be a very difficult task to bring out reform points in using the International Lessons." As if the Bible was not a reform book from cover to cover! Of course some parts of Scripture are better than others for this purpose; yet the passages are few indeed that do not supply some practical lesson for our daily life; that do not utter some warning against the evils which lay in wait for the unwary. The Scriptures, widely as they are read and studied to-day, have been in many minds strangely divorced from their real object. They are not intended as a metaphysical debating ground, but to be "a lamp to our feet." What is a lamp for but to show us the hidden things of darkness, against which we should stumble and fall without its guiding rays? It is time we had a new race of commentators who will not spend their strength and learning on questions to no profit, but will show it to be, as Paul affirms, "profitable" not only for "doctrine," but "for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." Reformers have always found the Bible a very practical book; and if the Congregationalist will only become anti-secret and prohibition it will soon change its mind on the difficulty of finding appropriate lessons within its covers either against the saloon or the lodge.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 13, 1892.

The United States Senate has ratified the Brussels treaty for the repression of the African slave trade and for other purposes, but it attached a very important proviso to the ratification, in the shape of a resolution informing the other sixteen powers that signed, and have since ratified the treaty, "that the United States of America, having neither possessions nor protectorates in Africa, hereby disclaims any intention in ratifying this treaty to indicate any interest whatsoever in the possessions and protectorates established or claimed on that continent by the other powers, or any approval of wisdom, expediency, or lawfulness thereof, and does not join in any expressions in the said general act which might be construed as such a declaration or acknowledgment." In short, the United States only binds itself to support those clauses of the treaty aimed at the suppression of the slave trade, and the prohibition of the importation of spirituous liquors into certain portions of the Congo Free State.

It is usually a very difficult matter to arouse the moral sense of a large body of men like Congress or a State legislature. It is not opposition to moral reform that makes this so, but that deadly indifference, which is far more to be feared than open opposition. For a long period of years that most deserving class, the inventors, have asked for legislation to prevent unscrupulous and dishonest persons from willfully infringing their patents, and it now looks as though something would be done by Congress, as a large number of members, including the chairman of the House committee on patents, have expressed themselves in favor of a bill making it a criminal offense to knowingly infringe a patent.

The closing text of those given out by the Evangelical Alliance for the week of prayer which ended last Sunday was: "And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Matt. 28: 20. Therefrom Rev. Dr. Bartlett preached a powerful and eloquent sermon to a large congregation, in which he urged home to his hearers the meaning of those memorable words uttered by Jesus Christ at the close of his earthly career.

The first regular Sunday afternoon meeting of the colored Y. M. C. A. was addressed by Prof. W. B. Tunnell, of Howard University, who took as the title of his talk: "Looked, listened, lusted, lost," which, he said, contained the history of every temptation from the beginning of the world. First, the tempted sees, then comes the overmastering inclination to act, then the act followed by the fall. He exhorted his hearers to look only at things which are beautiful and elevating, and which have a tendency to make them purer and better men.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, whose good work is known wherever the prayers of good Christians ascend for the continued success of that noble organization, the Woman's Christian Temperance Association, of which she is an honored member, is in Washington. Her discourses on "True Nobility" and "The Battle of Life" drew large and attentive audiences.

The rumor that Chili was about to apologize to the United States has not been verified, and fears are now entertained that it had no substantial foundation. The situation is now regarded in Washington as very grave, and unless the government of Chili shall take some immediate steps towards satisfying the demands made by the United States government, it is feared that Congress will shortly declare war against that country. The feeling in Congress is daily growing more bitter against Chili. That this is an unfortunate state of affairs is true, but like other disagreeable things it has to be faced, and friends of peace can only hope that a just Providence may see fit to avert the great calamity of a war.

Another big batch of petitions in favor of Congress loaning the World's Fair $5,000,000 only on condition that the Exposition be closed on Sundays, has been presented to the Senat. Constant dripping of water wears away a stone; so, if these petitions keep pouring into Congress, that body may consider it judicious to hearken to the voice of those who believe in observing the fourth commandment, on account of their number and influence, if not because of their own personal beliefs.

LONGEVITY OF ABSTAINERS AND DRINKERS.

Mr. Nelson, the most distinguished of English life insurance actuaries, after long and careful investigations and comparisons, ascertains by actual experience the following astounding facts:

Between the ages of fifteen and twenty, where 10 total abstainers die, 18 moderate drinkers die.

Between the ages of twenty-five and thirty, where 10 total abstainers die, 31 moderate drinkers die.

Between the ages of thirty and forty, where 10 total abstainers die, 40 moderate drinkers die.

Or, expressing the fact in another form, he says:

A total abstainer 20 years old has the chance of living 44 years longer, or until 64 years old.

A moderate drinker has the chance of living 15½ years, or until 35 years old.

A total abstainer 30 years old has the chance of living 36½ years longer.

A moderate drinker 30 years old has the chance of living 13½ years longer, or until 43½ years old.

A total abstainer 40 years old has the chance of living 28½ years longer, or until 68½ years old.

A moderate drinker 40 years old has a chance of living 11½ years longer, or until 51½ years old.

—Selected.

As we go to press, the situation of our national affairs with Chili indicates war at an early day between the two countries. The South American is haughty, not to say implacable, and the United States, feeling itself aggrieved, is calmly awaiting Chili's ultimatum.

REFORM NEWS.

THE WASHINGTON AGENT IN NEW YORK.

OUAQUAGA, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have just reached this town, where I find two secret societies and one church. The lodges have more than twice the membership of the church. Our friend, Burton Doolittle, will try and arrange for me to lecture. On Friday last I went to Cortland, N. Y., and met Bro. Winget, pastor of the Free Methodist church there. His reception was most cordial. Bro. and Sister W. expect to attend the convention. He will address us.

Going to Peruville with Charlie Piercc, we were met at the train by his father, a class-leader in the Wesleyan church at that place. Bro. Curtis is pastor. His wife being sick with the "grippe," he very cheerfully placed his church at my disposal. I spoke twice on Sabbath to attentive audiences. Bro. Moe subscribed for the Cynosure, and Sister Moe said she thought the Lord sent me to speak to them. These friends, with some others, hope to attend the convention. I trust Sister Curtis may be well enough so Bro. Curtis can be with us.

It was my privilege to meet Bro. Wm. Slosson, of Chenango Bridge, on Monday. He is nearly 92 years of age, and an old-line Morgan Antimason. Some time since having some honey to sell, he put out the sign, "Masonry, Odd-fellowship and honey for sale." Bro. Niles, son-in-law of Bro. S., is arranging for me to lecture at the Bridge next Wednesday evening. We expect him with quite a delegation at the convention.

Returning to Binghamton, I definitely engaged the W. C. T. U. Hall for the days and evenings of Feb. 2 and 3. This time seemed the best we could select, taking all things into consideration. We should gather as early as 2 o'clock in the afternoon of Feb. 2. The call of the State President will doubtless appear with this. Friends in Binghamton seem much encouraged with the outlook.

Taking "the flyer" on the D. and H. R. R., the first stop made was Nineveh. Seeing an honest-appearing farmer, I inquired if he could direct me to where a Free Methodist man by the name of Poole lived. He gave the desired information, and asked me some questions. I inquired if he believed in secret societies, and he replied: "I used to be a Mason, but ain't any more." He gave me his name, took some tracts, and said he would try and attend the convention. Brother Poole used to be a "hard case," belonging to the Masons and the devil generally, but when converted he was made a new man in Christ. We all prayed at family worship. Bro. and Sister Poole talked with the Lord as though they were on good terms. They seemed to really enjoy it. They expect to be at the convention. Bro. Birdsall is not well; he may get to the convention.

After a long uphill walk, I was conveyed to Mrs. M. I. Hurlbert's by her son. This sister is 82 years of age. In anti-slavery days, she and her husband, who went to his reward some years ago, helped many escaping slaves. She was rejoiced to see your agent, and gave a contribution to aid in sending the Cynosure to the South. Bro. Bristol, who keeps a store in Harpersville, kept me over night and brought me on my journey this morning. He had some of the Lord's money laid by in store, two dollars of which he gave to aid in meeting our expenses. He expects to attend the convention at least part of the time. I have taken a little cold, but if the Lord gives me health and strength, I expect to speak here. I shall go on to Windsor for Sabbath work. I am confident that friends there will try and be with us at the convention.

On my return to Binghamton, early in the week, I hope to hear from friends written to, so that a program can be printed for general circulation. Remember, dear friends, the time is short. Shall we not stir ourselves to make this the grandest convention held for years? If each friend in the State, and those in Pennsylvania near by, will feel that they have a personal responsibility in holding up the banner of the King Eternal, as it is being pulled down by the lodge and other infidel societies; if we will go to God in earnest, prevailing prayer, our thoughts will be established, and those will attend this gathering whom God wants to have present. I have faith to believe it is to be a success. Our thoughts are to be led by minds led of God. Men who are consecrated are to address us. The question remains with you who have this cause at heart. Shall there not be a general coming up to the help of the Lord against the mighty?

The matter of entertainment has not yet been thoroughly canvassed. Tickets for six meals can be had at the W. C. T. U. Coffee House for $1.00. Furnished rooms, very convenient, are offered for 25 cents a night. Two can occupy a room. There is a disposition shown on the part of friends to furnish entertainment for those from a distance. Perhaps all wants can be met in this line, but no one need pay more than $1.25. If those wishing to attend will write, addressing me at Binghamton, I will do what I can to arrange for their entertainment. W. B. STODDARD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HE UNDERSTOOD MASONRY.

EGLINTON, Ont., December, 1891.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I sent Mr. F. the only notice the papers took of the best speech made at the Presbyterian Council in Toronto on the first Monday evening of December. Another paper (the Mail) gave a short notice of all the speeches, except this one, which was made by a man from the country, who would not give his name, and in which he "went for" the Masons with a good deal of spirit.

He said that Masonry was the father of all the other secret societies, with the exception of the Jesuits; that Masonry is a religion, and he gave six reasons why it is one; the last was, because "it is of divine origin," giving Mackey as his authority.

Next he informed us that Mackey said that the Bacchanalian and Eleusinian Mysteries were the highest type of Masonry. Then he went on, quoting from Masonic authors, showing what the religion of Masonry is. He said that it is so broad that the Buddhist, the Parsee and the worshiper of deity of every form may and do harmoniously combine in their moral work. He said he could not understand how a minister of the Gospel could stand up in a pulpit and defend such a religion; for, he said, the Mysteries were those which St. Paul alluded to and called devil-worship; and he was surprised how any one, in this age of Bibles, can plead for such things.

Then he went on, telling them that Masonry is identical with paganism; that it came from the East, and is the same as paganism. Masons have an emblem of deity suspended in their lodges; three degrees of Masonry are all the soul requires; and if a man can get to the third degree by profane swearing, that is all that he needs.

He also told them that "acacia" signifies a Mason who, living up to the precepts of Masonry, is free from sin; and if members of the order would be Masons they must waive private judgment. Then he went on to say what a man is who has yielded his judgment to another. Every minister who joins the Masons has to conform to all the laws and edicts of the lodge, no matter what they are; and he added that their master, whom they style their dear Worthy Grand Master, is a pagan god. This potentate is not an individual, but a principle.

Then he went on, describing Hiram Abiff, and said that the people in old times celebrated the death and resurrection of their gods, and Masons now do the same. If all were Masons and denying Christ, the Lord would send the Fenians, or some other curse, and drive us out of our fair land; for Masons cut off all hope of salvation by rejecting Christ. On the whole, he thought we are no better than the Israelites, nor as good; and they were driven out of Canaan for the same kind of worship.

I was sorry that Mr. F. was not present, to give them a good "dressing;" but they would not publish anything that he might say. What we want in Toronto is a paper to publish the truth.

ROBERT JONES.

IS GODLINESS PROFITABLE?

CHICAGO, January 11, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Although all economic values cannot be measured in dollars, yet it is sometimes well to take account of the cash value of Christian character, both individual and national. In a recent publication, entitled "Scriptural Politics; or, The Way of National Salvation," by Thos. M. C. Birmingham, Altus, Ark., the writer dwells on the economic value of true Christianity. He introduces some startling facts, among which is this, that the wages of unskilled labor in every country will be in accordance with the religion of that country. Thus, in heathen Africa, and among our pagan Indian tribes, there is no such thing as wages.

In such heathen countries as China, Japan and India, which include about half the people of the world, the wages of laboring men is from 10 to 12 cents per day. In Persia, Syria and Turkey, Mohammedan lands, the wages are about 20 cents per day. Next come those countries that are under the influence of the Greek Church, Greece and Russia. We find here that the wages are about 25 cents per day. In papal lands, a fair average is 37 cents per day, though in France and Belgium, it is somewhat greater. In all Protestant lands it is greater.

Beginning with Prussia, where Rationalism has eliminated much of the vital power of the Gospel, with 40 cents, it is 45 in Holland, 52 in Denmark, 62 in Scotland, 65 in England, 80 in Canada, and about $1.00 in the United States. Thus, taking the wages of idolatrous countries as a unit, it is double that amount in Mohammedan lands, more than three times that amount in Roman Catholic countries, and six times in Protestant countries. Nor can this diversity of wages be accounted for on any other hypothesis.

China and Japan have great varieties of soil and climate, yet the wages remain the same. Belgium is much more densely populated than Spain and Mexico, yet wages are greater. Greece and Russia differ widely in climate, but the wages are alike.

A people can never rise above their religion, nor can there be any permanent development of true civilization, except through the Gospel of Christ. No trades-union can permanently help wages.

Nor has the sanitary value of Christianity been less conspicuous. The same author points out the influence of the Gospel on population of the Protestant world. England has doubled her population in the last 53 years. The Netherlands, without any immigration and with much emigration, has doubled her people in 57 years; Prussia in 62 years; Sweden in 64, and Scotland and Denmark in 69 years; while Roman Catholic France requires 161 years; Spain 197; Italy 111; Austria 127, and Portugal 138 years, to make a similar increase. In other words, Protestant nations increase twice as fast as Roman Catholic nations.

But if we turn to Mohammedan and pagan lands, we find the diversity still greater. Morocco, Tunis, Egypt, Persia, Turkey and China, increase very slowly.

Similar statistics will show that the average duration of life is greater in Christian than in pagan lands, and that with the advance of Christian knowledge, health and longevity increase.

In this relation we see, incidentally, the evil of polygamy. Mohammedan lands, where it prevails, increase very slowly, and both health and longevity are impaired. Jacob, with his four wives, had but thirteen children, not equal to the average for each mother in Christian lands; and yet this was an exceptionably good family for that age of the world. The children of Israel did not increase at all during their forty years in the wilderness, and very little during the 400 years of the Judges. The Mormons made a great mistake when they thought to build up their Territory by plural marriages. Though in the old dispensation it was endured, the blessing of God never rested upon it, but, rather, his curse.

HOW THE COLORED PEOPLE ARE ROBBED.

HELENA, Texas, January, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The colored people of Texas, in common with those of their brethren throughout the South, have suffered—nay, indeed, are suffering—a great deal at the hands of whites; but all of it is as nothing to what they are suffering at the hands of their own hypocritical and deceitful secret society leaders. I send you herewith the dying wail of one of the numerous Masonic fungi which, like leprous scabs, have afflicted the colored people from one end of this State to the other. Listen!

“HEARNE, Texas, Nov. 30, 1891.—To the Supreme Grand Officers, Subordinate Lodges and Chambers, and Members, of the S. S. of C. (Seven Stars of Consolidation): This comes to say, that owing to the many disadvantages that the Grand Lodge has had to labor under this year, and there not being money enough to defray the expenses of Grand Lodge officers to the Grand Convention, I have this day, by virtue of authority in me invested as Supreme Grand Chief, deferred the Supreme Grand Convention until March, the second Tuesday (8th), 1892. During this interval you will send in your assessments and annual tax whenever you are requested to do so by the Supreme Grand Financial Secretary. It is grievous for me to make this statement, but it is true; we have not got the money to travel on. Remember that the Convention is deferred until March the 8th, 1892. Take notice and govern yourselves accordingly. Yours in W. L. & T., Wm. Massey, S. G. C.; J. N. Gillett, S. G. F. Sec. Attested: H. H. Thompson, S. G. R. S.”

That is always the way of it. There are a half-dozen or more wolfish grand leeches to be maintained in ease and fatness at the expense of the unsophisticated masses, and that is the way their money goes. What wonder is it, then, that these vampires should cry for the blood of all and any who dare speak about the wastefulness and uselessness of secret societies in general? These things are as rat-holes, into which the silly pour milk. In a public lecture same time ago, I spoke of them as such, and the following week one of the gang scribbled in a public print: “Though Gray may yet underrate such men as Douglass, Langston, Bruce and Hill, and speak of our ‘regulation secret society as rat-holes,’ the result will always be the same. There is more danger to Gray in his own utterances than to the people and institutions he attacks.”

What did he mean? Nothing, only that the true and tried secretists would make me or my business answer for my attacks upon their maneuvers. Surely they cannot go on deceiving the masses to the end of time.

Thousands of hard-working colored people all over this State bit at this deceitful “Seven Stars of Consolidation” bait; but now it is beginning to be hard for the wolves to find sheep to fleece. And if the people begin to exercise a little common sense, the grand leeches will have to hunt for new fields.

HENRY CLAY GRAY.

CONTEST AND CONQUEST.

DELAWARE, Iowa, Dec. 27, 1891.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I was in a large passenger depot in an Eastern town, at the close of the Southern war, and, looking in at the door of a large waiting room, there I saw a banquet spread, that was captivating almost beyond description. I thought it had been prepared for some great men of the land. I wandered out of the depot, and very soon a passenger train came in, loaded with soldiers direct from the battle-field. I followed them into the depot. There they were met by men who led them to the wash-room; from the wash-room they were escorted to the banquet-hall, and made to sit down to the feast. The first ladies of the place were their waiters. When I first saw them, they were black with powder-smoke; their hair was tangled; some had blood upon them; others had scars and wounds, and outwardly they looked hard. But all this was laid aside when they entered the banquet-room. The dirt had disappeared. Their wounds, scars and bruises were now an honor to them. They had received them while defending their country.

So it will be with us. We must expect wounds, bruises and scars; but when we come to the gates of heaven, Jesus will welcome us: “Come, ye blessed of my Father, enter ye into the joy of your Lord.” We must be strong, and of good courage, yielding not one point to the enemy, but boldly battle against the beast and his image, having the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. It will not be long before the Lord will destroy this mighty power, and then we can lay our armor down and sweetly rest. Amen.

ON PUBLIC HERESY TRIALS.

ALEXANDER, Iowa, Jan. 2, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—If you approve of the enclosed article, I will thank you to publish it in the Cynosure. It was sent to the Standard (Chicago), but was not published. Yours for the truth's sake,

JOHN BROWN.

REPLY TO EDITORIAL REMARKS IN THE “STANDARD” AGAINST PUBLIC HERESY TRIALS.

EDITOR STANDARD:—Dear Sir.—You think “Heresy trials ought not to be spread over the land by sound of trumpet;” but if the heresy has been spread over the land by the heretic himself, ought not the vindication of the Gospel and the church to be as public as the scandal? Nothing can be more absurd than an attempt to keep private what has already been made public. The apostles were so far from concealing the errors of the first churches, that they have published them in the New Testament, not only for that age, but for all succeeding ages. Let the infidel make the most of them; he cannot charge the apostles with being one-sided. “Truth cometh to the light”—error skulks in the dark. I am less alarmed at the publicity of a heresy trial, than at the secret operation of heresy itself, working like leaven in the churches, gradually and imperceptibly, until the whole mass is brought under its influence. “It is horrible,” says Mr. Spurgeon, in a communication to me—“it is horrible to see Christians slipping down into sheer infidelity by slow, but sure degrees.”

You think cases of heresy among Baptists are “few and far between,” and that “when a man finds himself out of harmony with the denomination upon fundamental matters he withdraws;” but I am not so clear about that. Did the Unitarians among the General Baptists in England withdraw? Were not the Trinitarians rather driven out from among them, which led to the formation of the “New Connection?” Did the heretics in the “Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland,” on account of whom Mr. Spurgeon resigned his connection with that body—did they withdraw? Have they not rather maintained their position in the Union at Mr. Spurgeon's expense? Did the judaizing teachers in the churches of Galatia withdraw? No, indeed! they remained and corrupted the church to such an extent that Paul declares, they had received “another gospel, which was not another,” but a perversion of the Gospel of Christ, Gal. 1: 6, 7. Heretics in every denomination are the last to withdraw, and “when they find themselves out of harmony with the denomination upon fundamental matters,” they, by “good words and fair speeches,”—by “oppositions of science falsely so-called”—by “cunning craftiness, according to a method of deceit”—endeavor to bring the denomination into harmony with themselves; and, alas! they too often succeed.

In America, the Regular Baptists are a unit on the question of baptism,—and I believe they are right; but I am not sure that they are unanimous on the inspiration and infallibility of the Holy Scriptures, either in the original languages or in their original delivery by the sacred writers. I lately read in a Baptist newspaper, that, at a meeting of Baptist ministers in Chicago, an excellent paper was read by a certain minister, (I forget his name,) on the writings of Paul, and that, when he had finished, a “prominent minister” said, “Paul's writings were, no doubt, valuable; but he had done much harm as a dogmatist;” and that at the same meeting another “prominent minister” said: “The church should shove aside much of Paul's writings, and he was to blame for much of the controversy now agitating the churches.” If this report be true, it ought to humble us; and if it be false, it ought to be contradicted. May you and I be “set for the defence of the Gospel!” Yours fraternally,

JOHN BROWN, A. M.,
Baptist Minister.

LITERATURE.

CHEAP MONEY EXPERIMENTS IN PAST AND PRESENT TIMES. Reprinted with Slight Revision from “Topics of the Time in the Century Magazine,” March, 1891, to January, 1892. Published by the Century Company, New York. Price, 10 cents.

This pamphlet aims to establish the following points: (1.) No government can create money out of anything it may choose to call money. (2.) All classes, both rich and poor, employer and employed, are far better off with a sound and stable currency than with any amount or variety of cheap money. (3.) No part of the financial business of the world can be benefited or injured by changes in the monetary standard of value, without a corresponding benefit or injury to all other of its parts. (4.) Whatever tends to disturb credit demoralizes all classes of business, and injures all, both rich and poor. (5.) In all cases where the financial world is disturbed by changes, or threats of changes, in the monetary standard, it is the poor who suffer, and the rich who receive the benefit, if any accrues.

These principles are enforced and illustrated by the history of the “English Land Bank Scheme” of 1693-96, which closely resembled the present sub-treasury loan; the “Rhode Island Paper Bank,” which was greenbackism pushed to its legitimate results; the “John Law Scheme,” or the “Mississippi Bubble;” the “Michigan Wild-cat Banks;” the “Mississippi Crop-Moving Currency,” which cost the people not less than $61,000,000 of repudiated obligations; and the “Argentine Cheap Money Paradise,” which has made a nation bankrupt, and brought great financial injury to the entire commercial world. None of these carefully devised schemes made the world better off. They were hindrances to national and individual progress, scarcely less disastrous than war, pestilence and famine.

The pamphlet deserves careful reading.

The American Garden, having absorbed Popular Gardening, and thus, in a manner, become “two single gentlemen rolled into one,” in its January number assumes the conglomerate but graceful title of American Gardening. It still retains its place as “a journal devoted to flowers, fruits, vegetables, the lawn, indoor plants, marketing, etc.,” with the superior illustrations and typography of its previous issues. Leading articles comprise Rational Garden Walks; Taste and Tact in Arranging Home and Other Grounds, continued; Economic Plants of Japan, continued; Ruthless Felling of Our Forests; The Olive in California; Clay in Horticulture; Fruit Notes from Various Sources; Some Flowers and Vegetables in the Editors' Gardens; Tuberous Begonias, Again; Notes on Some American Wild-flowers; Success in Small Specialties, and numerous other specialties interesting to professional and amateur cultivators. IN BRIEF.

THE NEW YORK CATHEDRAL.

The final plans for the new Protestant Episcopal Cathedral in New York have been adopted, those of Messrs. Heins and Lafarge being accepted with some modifications. The Cathedral will face west, and its entrance will be almost on a level with the street. The external length will be 520 feet, the width across the front 190 feet, and across the transepts 290 feet. The spire will be 425 feet high. The nave will be 180 feet long and the chancel vaults 115 feet high. It is expected that it will require ten years to build it, but that when it is finished it will be one of the finest edifices in the country.

THE DISMAL SWAMP.

George Washington surveyed the Dismal Swamp of Virginia in 1763. He reported that the great swamp was "neither a plain nor a hollow, but a hillside." Recent surveys prove that he was right. A member of the National Geological Survey has recently said: "It is a very decided water-shed, the level rising five and a half feet in seven miles." A more extraordinary statement is made on less scientific authority, that the water of the swamp is the purest in the world. Will Dismal Swamp water become a famous cure for all manner of ailments? The accuracy of George Washington as a surveyor is far better established than the more modern theory that health, as well as deer and bears, runs wild in the Dismal Swamp.

THE LAKE OF LILIES

Twelve miles north of Norwich, Conn., is one of the most wonderful lily ponds in all America. It is a lake one mile in diameter, so closely grown with lilies that during blossoming time it is hard to get a glimpse of the water. When the wind is strong and the lilies are open, the perfume of them is perceptible a quarter of a mile from the brink of the pond. So thick are the lilies and in such tangled masses that it is almost impossible to propel a boat in the pond, and the lily gatherers have to wade for them in the hip rubber boots. Not only are the lilies extraordinarily plentiful, but the blossoms are more regal, perfect, lustrous and of deeper hue than in other ponds. —Boston Herald.

TO KEEP SHIPS AFLOAT.

The announcement of a most valuable invention has recently been made at the antipodes. It is no less than one to prevent a ship from sinking after having been in collision. A Sydney (N. S. W.) contemporary gives an account of an experiment with it. A hole, fourteen inches wide and four feet deep, was cut in the side of a cutter, and prior to the test this was protected by a sliding panel. On the panel being withdrawn, "the Holmes collision apron" was immediately swung over the side of the cutter, and in a few seconds the inrush of water was stopped. The apron is made of heavy canvas, and is ribbed with pieces of hard wood, which add materially to its strength. When not in use the apron can be rolled up in a very small space, and in case of accident it may be thrown overboard without being uncoiled. The uncoiling is in that case accomplished by the suction of the water as soon as the canvas gets beneath the surface, and it then adheres with great strength to the side of the vessel where the rent has been made. The success of the invention appears, from the description given, to have been complete.

WHAT D'YE CALL IT?

We recently passed a beautiful little lake in Webster, Mass., called "Chargogagoggmanchaggagaggungamaugg." Be sure that you pronounce this right, and then never criticize Turkish or Russian names on account of their length. The meaning of this innocent word is "boundary line." We don't need to go out of New England to get something of a variety of words and dialect. In the world to come we anticipate that the people will all speak one language. —Christian Witness.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1892.

SECRETISM CURSING OUR NATION.

All history shows that in the government of the Lord Jesus sin is made its own punishment. The familiar facts as to drinking and drunkenness, the worship of Venus and venereal poison, are only marked manifestations of a universal law. "God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." "They have sown the wind; they shall reap the whirlwind."

What is true of individuals in this regard is more true of nations, because these can only in this world receive their measure of retribution. Our nation, by the crime of slaveholding, which it fostered and exalted to the control of its government, built up a colossal system that in due times scourged it with war, drank the life-blood of its choicest sons, and brought us to the verge of ruin. The drink evil has only attained its tremendous power because licensed and sanctioned by the administrators of government; and, like the fabled serpent which the farmer put in his bosom, it is now striking its fangs into the national vitals. "The curse causeless shall not come."

This nation's sin in the matter of secretism is rather negative than positive; is not in formally sustaining but in passively allowing its stealthy usurpations of power. There are no constitutional enactments in its favor, and no legislative statutes establishing or sanctioning it; but the secret lodges, like other organizations, have chartered and corporate rights, and are protected as legal organisms. Yet there are constant governmental recognitions of the secret orders in the prominence given them in the laying of cornerstones and public ceremonies, and their inscriptions and insignia appear everywhere, while the nation assents, without a whisper of disapproval except from a few anti-secretists who are thought to have neither rhyme nor reason in their fanatical opposition.

Through this silence and the cunning craft of secretism, it has now come to pass that a large proportion of the men honored with official stations are Past Grand Worthy office-holders of one or more fraternities. Worse than all, ministers and prominent lights of the various churches where our citizens most do congregate, and from whom the national religion, or rather irreligion, receives its shape and substance, are men who wear the bib and tucker and give the grips and signs of the orders of darkness. From these men no faithful warnings and rebukes are heard against national sins, "murder and treason excepted," and some of them excuse or vindicate almost every crime in the calendar. By such secret connivance and oaths "ever to conceal and never to reveal," the prophet's words are as true of us as of Israel: "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land. By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood. Therefore shall the land mourn, and everyone that dwelleth therein shall languish."

But God is now bringing the curse upon this secret wickedness. If secrecy is a good thing, and a sure passport to the "Grand Lodge above" and to the right hand of the "Grand Architect of the Universe," then the more of it the better; and one secret order will be as good as another, and a little better, if it can be more secret. For this reason secret orders have multiplied like the frogs of Egypt, have come up into the chambers and kneading-troughs of our kings, and are practically numberless. As they are so good for ministers and Christian churches, they are more necessary and equally saving for thieves and gamblers, traitors and murderers.

Hence the Church of the Latter-Day Saints proves its claim and reads its title clear to this pre-eminent dignity by building on the cornerstone of secrecy, and by dark lanterns hung in the hidden chambers of its imagery. The Church of Rome, dominated by the secret Society of Jesus, has a secret political society, Tammany Hall, that has absolute control of New York City; has recently, by fraud, seized control of the State, and, through its whiskey-governor-senator, aspires to the Presidency of the United States. The "White Man's party" in the South, with the benediction of lodge ministers, through Ku Klux and other secret combinations, has converted a miserable minority into an overwhelming majority. Freemasons and secret temperance orders have large influence in shaping the action of national, state, and local prohibition organizations. Northern workmen, guided by Nihilistic teachers who don every guise to gain their murderous ends, are organized into secret unions, and every trade, race and class are cajoled into voluntary membership in these guilds, or are forced into them under penalty of exclusion from employment and social ostracism. Employers also have their unions.

The result is that the selfish ends of secrecy are defeated by itself. As all of the trade are in the brotherhood, no one gets a special advantage in return for his initiation fees and monthly dues. As each is linked in society with many classes, he must enter every class-order, or be ostracised by them, and his fees and assessments are impoverishing. As a member of different fraternities, each meets counter forces and is pressed by opposing influences, or torn in pieces by hostile bands of friends. And as the criss-cross lines of competing orders, and the crafty purposes of the leaders develop into antagonism, the rank and file feel the beauty of their boasted "liberty, equality and fraternity," and curse the day that they faced the east and saw the light. The selfish few reap rich spoils, but the masses of lower degree are robbed and spoiled.

The victims of "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" in their disappointment begin to prey upon society, and as Nihilists, swear eternal hostility to property, government and social order. Our country to-day is honeycombed by this spew of the secret orders, which, with nearly or quite a million of members, is worming itself into other organizations and manipulating every circle for the accomplishment of its plans of hellish cruelty. The fearful prevalence of crimes, the almost universal failure of justice in government, the bitter strifes and jealousies that divide political parties, and the epidemic quarrels among the fraternities, are the fruits and evidence of these facts. The trades and every line of business constantly suffer paralysis from this concealed clot in the social life-blood; the cities of the land are becoming a fretting leprosy and burning cancer in the vitals of society; the West envies the East; the South vexes the North; Democrats curse Republicans; Republicans denounce Prohibitionists; Prohibitionists revile Christians who refuse to be led by their secret methods; no man trusts his brother; and our beloved nation is heaving and groaning under the effects of secret volcanic fires, the day of whose outbreak only our King Jesus can control. "Who is on the Lord's side?" "Oh, my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united." Let us "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness."

THOSE MASONIC MURDERS.

Does any reader of the Cynosure doubt the truth that Masons condemn their own recalcitrant "brothers," and then, themselves, execute the sentence of the lodge? Last week, in relating the murder of a Mason of high degree in a village tavern, the impression conveyed by the narrative was, that the murder was committed by Masons. Such is the evidence presented.

Having shown, by Edmond Ronayne and other seceding Masons, time and again, that the Masonic oaths in the Blue Lodge degrees are murderous in the extreme, and that every Mason must consent to be killed if he breaks his obligation, the question arises (we quote from Ronayne): "Who is to perform all this infamous butchery of the seceding Mason? When a lodge condemns a man to death, who is to be the assassin? Who was it that assassinated Captain Morgan in western New York, in 1826? Did the Masonic fraternity hire out that work of death or was it performed by Masons selected for the purpose? Every Mason is sworn under pain of death to keep it a solemn secret that he ever took such oaths; hence it is not at all probable that Masonry is going to hire outsiders to do its awful work of butchery; and so poor Captain Morgan met his death at the hands of his brother Masons, just as Dr. Cronin, here in Chicago, a couple of years ago, met his death at the hands of some of the members of Camp 20. I repeat it: Every Mason is sworn under the most terrible and inhuman of death-penalties, and he can no more evade or avoid being the executioner of those death-penalties than he can publicly reveal the stupid blasphemy and the lying farce of the Masonic degrees. He must kill, if called upon to do so. This is the conclusion, and the only conclusion, to be drawn from the Masonic oath; and I hereby challenge any reputable Mason in Chicago, or throughout the country, to deny this charge."

SECRECY IN POLITICS.

The rapid growth of the secret orders of "Knights of Reciprocity" and "Continental League," leads the Daily News of this city to remark that this fact indicates "how one secret society for political action begets another, and so on." The News has more to say, and very sensibly, upon this subject. But before quoting further from its article, it will perhaps be advisable to observe the warning which Joseph Cook has given us against the evil influence of these oath-bound secret alliances:

"Secret oaths are natural sources of jealousy and just alarm to society at large; are especially unfavorable to harmony and mutual confidence among men living together under popular institutions; are dangerous to the general cause of civil liberty and just government; are forbidden in some portions of our republic by the civil law, and ought to be in all portions."

"The chief point for Americans to consider," says the News, "is whether they do right to even tacitly encourage such methods in politics. Every political organization in America with secrecy as its basis is an exotic. Americans love daylight methods in politics as in business and the social affairs of life."

"Secret, oath-bound political organizations are weak copies of societies that flourish best under tyrannical governments. We do not need them in America. They are distinctly antagonistic to the boasted freedom of our institutions."

"Political organizations in this country command popular support in proportion as they are free from hole-and-corner methods. If a certain line of policy is worth advocating it is most likely to attract intelligent American voters when it is fearlessly espoused in public."

"The great political battles of our nation will be fought in the open field, and no cabals of politicians, with oaths, passwords and grips, can reverse necessary and natural conditions."

Coming from such a source, these words should have due weight with every honest citizen.

CHINESE AND AMERICAN SECRET SOCIETIES

It is well known to the readers of the Cynosure that the present revolutionary movement in China, together with the destruction of property and the murder of missionaries, is the work of secret societies, and that the great problem before the Chinese government is how to suppress or control these organizations. Their existence, it is thought, has been too long overlooked; and, having a semi-religious basis, many of them, it is believed, form a most serious obstacle to continued peace and prosperity.

Quite recently a similar and scarcely less intricate problem is presented to the people of California, and especially of San Francisco. In an able article by Rev. F. A. Masters, in the California Illustrated Magazine, there is a statement of the ritual and workings of the Chu Kung Tong society, commonly known as the "Highbinders," and of their practical influence in the promotion of crime, the defeat of the law, and the general corruption of morals.

These societies, like Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, etc., are organized, ostensibly, for benevolent and patriotic purposes. The Chu Kung Tong was professedly founded by five Buddhist priests, who were men of remarkable piety, and had suffered much persecution. They all take high-sounding names. One society, that has for its object the importation of prostitutes, is known as "The Chamber of Far-reaching Virtue." Another, that traffics in women, is called, "The Chamber of a Tranquil Conscience." Another is, "The Hall of a Victorious Union." Another is, "The Hall of Maintained Justice;" and one, which draws support from houses of ill-fame, is known as "The Flowery Mountain Arbor Booth."

Another is "The Guide for the Protection of Virtue." "These are," says the writer, "the bands of criminals who have defied our laws, terrorized our fellow-countrymen, and laid half of Chinatown under tribute. Their victims have calmly submitted to their rapacious demands, knowing that resistance was in vain. . . . With a bulldog at his throat, a man cannot say or do much. . . . Some of these societies being incorporated as benevolent associations, are assumed to be what they profess. . . . Suppose they are proceeded against by regular legal process, against whom is the action to be brought?—who are the responsible heads?—who can identify the officers?—who would undertake to get behind their guarded doors and report the proceedings of their meetings? It is certain that no white man could do this without being detected. It is equally certain that no Chinaman could be found with sufficient courage to run the gauntlet of armed men and the certainty of being cut to pieces, if discovered."

The writer adds: "Twenty or more societies have organized a reign of terror in San Francisco, that has become insufferable. Many respectable Chinese have become enforced members. Despairing of seeing the societies suppressed by law, they have found it safer to make terms of peace. Assassinations and acts of violence are occurring with a frequency that startles even California." It was found that the most feasible plan for their suppression was to have the police visit their lodges and destroy their paraphernalia; but this proved only a temporary expedient. They were soon doing business again at the old stand.

We remark on the above statement, that while Christianity has a mollifying and restraining power on all men and institutions that have grown up under its influence; and while, for this reason, the secret societies of America are not so openly and offensively pernicious as the Chinese organizations, or even as the Mafia and Clan-na-Gael, yet they have very much in common with them.

First, they have all the same family likeness, and all are essentially heathenish. Aside from their being all based on secrecy, these Chinese societies resemble both Freemasonry and the Ancient Mysteries from which it was patterned. The ceremonies of initiation are (a) a period of terror and humiliation, (b) a symbolic new birth, (c) instruction in secret signs, (d) a religious worship, and (e) an oath of secrecy under penalty of death. Like Freemasonry and the Mysteries of India, the Chu Kung Tong recognizes the Triad, which, in India, is Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, or the sun at its rising, meridian and setting; and Masonry, which has its Worshipful Master, its Senior Warden, and Junior Warden, who signify the same things. If not identical, they have all, at least, the family likeness.

Secondly, we see that secret lodges, whatever may have been the purpose of their institution, and whatever may be their professions, are likely, because they are largely removed from the scrutiny of public observation, to come under evil influences, and to be used for evil objects. This is true of secret societies which have had their origin in Christian as well as heathen lands.

Third, we see the tendency in all secret orders to put on high-sounding and misleading titles. Freemasonry has not, as its name would indicate, anything to do with the builders' art. The Knights of the Golden Circle was alike misleading with that of the Mollie Maguires, who took their name from a benevolent Christian woman.

Fourth, they are alike in being practical conspiracies against all who are not members of their associations. They may be, and generally are, quite careful to prevent public condemnation; but Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, and the trades unions, do practically conspire against all those who do not consent to their so-called rights.

Fifth, that in Chicago, just as truly as in Chinatown, the lodges ought to be either open to public and official inspection, or be put down by legal authority. If they are not now, they are at least liable to become dangerous to civil authority. Some of the secret trades unions have done more to interfere with the rights, and lay tribute on their fellow workmen (to say nothing of quite a number of murders), than all the societies in Chinatown.

In conclusion, we would call attention to the remedy for secret societies pointed out by the writer in the above-named magazine. He says: "In Singapore, after long years of struggle with secret societies of that colony, the British government has enacted legislation that deals with them very effectively. We are informed that a specially appointed official, who understands the Chinese language, ferrets out the criminals, and they are immediately deported. The attention of our local grand juries should be directed to this monstrous iniquity in our midst, and if our present laws are inadequate, for heaven's sake, let us have laws that will reach them, and courts that will punish them as they deserve."

It is probable that if secret societies were suppressed, the Chinese and a good many other problems would be solved. We hold, with Daniel Webster, that "they ought to be prohibited by law."

CAN SATAN CAST OUT SATAN?

One of the most common of the pleas for Masonry is, that it serves as a barrier to Romanism. It is true that the Roman church opposes Freemasonry, though there are many members of that denomination who are Freemasons; but it is not true that Masonry opposes Romanism. It professes not to interfere with any man's religion, and it welcomes to its membership, alike, all Catholics, Protestants, Jews and Mohammedans. They all "meet upon the level, and part upon the square."

But, supposing it were true that Freemasonry does oppose Romanism, it would constitute no good reason why we should consent to it. We cannot indorse one evil for the sake of opposing another. Many will doubt which is the greater evil of the two. As consistent Protestants, we have no right to consent to either. But would we, in any case, have a right to expect Masonry to successfully oppose Romanism? Admitting the antagonism, if both are wrong, they will not naturally cast out each other. Satan does not cast out Satan: "Else how should his kingdom stand?"

"The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." The only remedy for moral evil is in the power of the Gospel of Christ. The remedy for a false system of religion is not another false system, but true religion. So far from Freemasonry doing anything to assist the spread of Romanism, it tends, rather, to promote it. It leads men to neglect the religion of Christ, to find their social enjoyment in the fellowship of the lodge, rather than in the society of the saints, and to the breaking down of all the real barriers to the spread of a false faith.

IN THE NAME OF JESUS.

"Whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ."—Col. 3: 17. All needful and appropriate things can be done in his name. Jesus was a carpenter, and doubtless did work, and conducted business as other righteous men have done. He did it "as unto the Lord, and not as unto men." In his name we may be good citizens, kind neighbors, good parents, faithful children and diligent business men.

But there are some things that are much practiced, that we cannot "do in the name of the Lord Jesus." Men do not use wine or other strong drink in the name of the Lord. They never ask his blessing on it. They never smoke, or chew tobacco, "to the glory of God." They never, for a moment, suppose that the blessed Lord would defile his lips with such an abomination. They never go to the theatre in his name, nor to the dance, nor to the card-table, nor to the billiard saloon, nor anywhere else where the mere love of pleasure is the great and sole consideration.

We wished, however, to say especially, that no one can go to a Masonic lodge in the name of the Lord Jesus; for Masonry admits to its fellowship men of all religions—Christians, Jews, Mohammedans and Pagans—and provides for them a religious worship from which "the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" is carefully excluded. In the Chapter degrees his name is stricken from the Scripture passages quoted in the ritual. It is true that all who enter the lodge are said to be "received in the name of the Lord," but this "Lord" may be Baal, or Mammon, or any other idol. It surely is not "the Lord Jesus." This name is nowhere recognized in either Blue or Chapter Masonry. Why should Christians, who revere that name—that name by whom all men must be saved—ever be found in those unhalloved resorts?

—The New York State Anti-secrecy Convention will be held at Binghamton, February 2 and 3, in the W. C. T. U. Hall. The Rev. B. Winget, Free Methodist pastor at Cortland, N. Y., will make an address. Rev. Mr. Clark, District Chairman of the Free Methodist Conference, promises a rousing exhortation at their quarterly meeting, soon to be held. The Wesleyan church at Peruville, Tompkins Co., promises a delegation. The prospect for a successful convention is on the whole very bright.

—By the death of Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale, the eldest son of the Prince of Wales, and the recent heir-presumptive to the throne of Great Britain, that kingdom is again plunged into profound grief. The young man was remarkable principally for his position in the royal family, but public interest in his death is increased by the announcement a few weeks ago, of his engagement to Mary, Princess of Teck. At that time the prospects of the young couple were very promising, and they received hearty congratulations upon their approaching union. The family, especially his mother and the Queen, as well as his betrothed, are deeply afflicted by his loss, and as much entitled to the sympathy of all who know them as the most obscure of our fellow-beings. Humanity and Christianity are under obligations to ignore the subtle distinctions of society, and to mourn with those who mourn, and to rejoice with those whose hearts are filled with joy.

—While the year is still young, our religious contemporary, the Union Signal, enters upon a new era that promises many days of usefulness to come, and a wider, stronger influence in its work as the organ of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Mary Allen West, upon whom most of the onerous office management has rested for many months, goes for a six months' vacation to the West, for rest, and Miss Frances E. Willard and Lady Henry Somerset assume control of the editorial department, in which their zeal and talent will find genial employment. Miss Willard has the reputation of being an irrepressible advocate of temperance and white-ribbon reforms, and needs no introduction to the public, or special commendation, to increase her influence and popularity. Lady Somerset comes from England with the aroma of a legion of benevolent deeds clinging to her, and so much in love with Chicago, that her prestige in her native land bids fair to be overshadowed, ere long, by the brilliancy of her operations in her new field of labor. The paper has our best wishes for its success.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Our good friend and able worker in the cause of reform, Rev. J. B. Galloway, pastor of the United Presbyterian church at Vernon, Wis., has received a unanimous call to the pastorate at Arlington, Columbia county, in that State. We have not learned that the call has been accepted.

—A letter from Rev. Thos. M. Chalmers, of Excelsior Springs, Mo., says. "My health begins to improve a little, and I want to do something for the Cynosure and the cause which it represents. . . . May the great work go on under the cherishing and chastening of our peerless King!" His heart is in this work, and his Cynosure friends wish him success.

—Now that Albert Victor, the eldest son of the Prince of Wales, and the next in succession to the throne after his father, is dead, his brother, Prince George, becomes the heir-presumptive. At the age of 26, he is now a commander in the British navy, to which rank he has attained by study and industry in active service. Among his companions he is quite popular; and is probably as "proper" a young man as one in his circumstances is expected to be, seeing that kingship comes by succession rather than superior merit.

THE HOME.

FLOWERS THAT NEVER WITHER.

There are flowers that never wither,
There are skies that never fade;
There are trees that cast forever
Cooling bowers of leafy shade.
There are silver wavelets flowing
With a lulling sound of rest,
Where the west wind, softly blowing,
Fans the far lands of the blest.

Thitherward our steps are tending,
Oft through dim, oppressive fears,
More of grief than pleasure blending
In the darkening woof of years.
Often would our footsteps weary
Sink upon the winding way,
But that, when all looks most dreary,
O'er us beams a cheering ray.

Thus the Father who hath made us
Tenants of this world of care,
Knoweth how to kindly aid us
With the burdens we must bear;
Knoweth how to cause the Spirit
Hopefully to raise its eyes
Toward the home it doth inherit
Far beyond the azure skies.

There's a voice that whispers lowly
Down within this heart of mine,
Where emotions the most holy Ever make their sacred shrine;
And it tells a thrilling story
Of the great Redeemer's love,
And the all-bewildering glory
Of the better land above.

Oh, this life with all its sorrows,
Hasteth onward to a close!
In a few more brief to-morrows
Will have ended all our woes.
Then o'er death the part immortal
Shall sublimely rise and soar
O'er the star-resplendent portal,
There to dwell forever more.

A WOMANLY WOMAN.

A picture rises before me as I write. A nook in the White Mountains. Two roving students, in flannel suits, with knapsacks on their shoulders, march at dusk up the front walk of a farmhouse which has allured them by its tidy homeliness. A woman who sat with a two-year-old baby on the doorstep springs to her feet, steps over the threshold, and, with baby on one arm and the knob of the half-shut door in the other hand, confronts the intruders "with level-fronting eyebrow, as one who quells the lions."

"Could you accommodate us, madam, with supper and lodging?"

"No; be you peddlars?"

"No, ma'am; we are pedestrians."

Soon convinced that she was dealing with honest and harmless college boys, she opened the door wide, saying, "Well, come in, and we'll do the best we can for you." We put our knapsacks in a corner, and sat down luxuriously on a great, old-fashioned settle, seven feet long, and with a deep, soft cushion, of no particular color, spread over its whole length. She slipped the baby into the lap of a ten-year-old-girl, who made a pretty picture, as she tended the little one with shy, yet fond mother-care, picking up with endless patience the dropped playthings, and turning dove-like eyes from watching it to steal glances at the strangers. I think her dress must have been a very plain calico, but it did not seem to matter. What the mother wore I have no recollection, only that there was a tidy, wholesome, homelike look about her, wherever she moved. She stepped to the shining stove and touched it, and it answered with sparkle and crackle and joyous roar and gleaming light through every crevice, that all seemed somehow to say "welcome."

Sauces and relishes came from somewhere, in the intervals of cooking, and everything she did to the table made us more hungry to sit down to it. What there was to eat I forget, but it was a royal supper. A sixteen-year-old daughter came home from an uncle's at the crossroads, with neat walking dress and smoothly braided hair, and told us of school, and studies, and people. In the next room, when we passed through the open door, we found a sweet, still, old lady, in a true grandmother's easy chair, cushioned over seat and back and arms. Baby went cooing back to mamma. We learned that the father had died in its earliest days, and two sturdy boys were doing the out-door work of the little farm. When the early bed-time came, our hostess showed us a room under the low roof, with white curtains at the little windows.

When we heard in the morning the murmur of the little brook that had sung us to sleep at night, the house was already astir. Breakfast was well under way in the fresh morning air that streamed through the open door and window; baby, with clean face and frock, smiling to meet us; all the family coming and going on willing errands, and gathering with loving, cheery faces at table; and, before we left, the guiding spirit of all found time to slip off, and get "mother" up into her easy chair, with white cap about her placid face, and restful confidence in her daughter's love and care. She seemed like the ideal woman of the Proverbs. "She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms." But it was womanly strength. There was a surplus of tender, protecting power that could not only care for her own, but take even us wandering students into her motherly heart.

We went away feeling that it was not such an overwhelming disadvantage to live far from college, and that there could be abundant happiness among people that could not conjugate the verb "to be." How could "aught but death part" a man—who was a man—from such a wife. Might there not be more prospect for happiness, even for a young man of this generation, with such a wife, than with some "sweet girl-graduate with golden hair," who could not cook two eggs without scalding her fingers and spoiling the eggs? One of these said to me the other day, with a sweet smile, as she put a dish of toast on the table, "You musn't scold if it isn't just right, for I never did any before." We did not scold, but take now the mild revenge of saying that there was not one slice that was not toasted too much or too little. She was a very nice, lovely girl, but couldn't she have been just as nice and lovely if her toast had been more so?—James C. Fernald in "The New Womanhood," D. Lothrop & Co.

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

It is doubtful if anything other than the recurrence of a birthday anniversary (the eighty-fourth) to the venerable John G. Whittier, would have led another octogenarian poet, even Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, to climb the stairs of a Boston newspaper office to lay down the tribute of his verse. Be that as it may, though time has robbed Whittier of his vigor, it cannot rob him of the love with which he is regarded the country over. He and "the Autocrat" are alone left us of that wonderful group that sang for us years ago—of which Bryant, Longfellow and Lowell were the others. Perhaps it will not be going too far to say that Whittier's plummet line has gone deeper than have the others, in that he has ministered to the religious feeling as none of the others have. And assuredly a more radiant, trustful faith than that of our Quaker poet it would be hard to find; we should certainly seek for it in vain in any of the verses of to-day. Hear our sweet singer:

All as God wills, who wisely heeds
To give or to withhold,
And knoweth more of all my needs
Than all my prayers have told.

Enough that blessings undeserved
Have marked my every track;
That whereso'er my feet have swerved
His chastening turned me back.

That all the jarring notes of life
Seem blending in a psalm,
And all the angels of its strife
Glow rounding in the calm.

And so the shadows fall apart,
And so the west winds play,
And all the windows of my heart
I open to the day.

The man who can not only write such lines, but whose every heart-beat is rhythmic to them, may well look upon death as a

Covered way that opens unto light, and in the flow of undoubted faith and feeling may well sing—

I know not where his islands lift
Their fringed palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care.

The faith that can produce such verse is the witness of its own genuineness, and not only has nothing to fear, but may well look forth with eager and expectant eyes to discern the land that is not very far off.—Christian at Work.

ELEPHANTS IN BATTLE.

Alexander was one of the first of the famous kings of history to tell of fighting against an elephant host. His invading army had reached the river Hydaspes, and as the warriors looked across they beheld the opposing army of King Porus, who had not only chariots and an enormous army, but "the huge creatures called elephants." These great animals, which stood on the farther river bank shrieking and trumpeting, filled the soldiers of Alexander with terror and dismay.

The two armies watched each other for several days; then Alexander succeeded in crossing the river, and the two forces drew up in line of battle. The Indian king placed his elephants in the front rank, one hundred feet apart, thinking in this way so to frighten the horses of the foe that the entire army would be put to flight. Between the elephants were foot-soldiers, and at the ends of the line were large elephants bearing strong towers filled with armed men. King Porus himself was borne upon an elephant of unusual height, probably as large as the famous "Jumbo."

When King Alexander, who was a very brave and valiant man, saw the orderly foe, he said: "At last I have met with a danger worthy of the greatness of my soul." Evidently he had due respect for the elephant soldiers that opposed him.

Alexander moved his forces to the attack, and poured in a shower of arrows and spears. The elephants stood like a stone wall, trampling the foot-soldiers beneath their heavy feet, seizing them in their trunks and delivering them to the soldiers upon their backs, or tossing them high in air. The elephants were evidently the main hope of King Porus, and, perceiving this, Alexander directed men, armed with scythes and knives, to attack them. These warriors chopped at the elephants' feet and tender trunks, until in terror the great creatures turned and began a stampede that was disastrous to the foot-soldiers of their own side, for they trampled upon them and in their flight mowed them down like grain. Alexander followed close after the elephants upon his wounded charger; and finally the battle was lost to Porus because of the elephants themselves. King Porus, being wounded during the hurried retreat, desired to alight. The driver ordered his elephant to kneel, whereupon all the elephants, having been accustomed to obey in concert, did the same, and the soldiers of Alexander fell upon them and gained a complete victory.

It is said that elephants which survived this famous battle were revered for years by the Indians and honored much as are the veterans of our wars. In an ancient book, the "Life of Apollonius of Tyana," he is said to have seen in a town of India an elephant which the people held in the greatest respect as having been owned by King Porus. It was perfumed with sweet essences and decked with garlands, while upon its tusks were rings of gold, inscribed with these words: "Alexander, son of Jupiter, dedicates Ajax to the Sun." The elephant Ajax, according to Apollonius, was the old war elephant of Porus in his battle with Alexander, and had survived and lived in honorable idleness for three hundred and fifty years.

While Alexander defeated the elephant corps of Porus, he saw they were good fighters, and created the office of elephantarch, or Chief of Elephants; and afterward visiting monarchs found him surrounded by the largest elephants magnificently harnessed.—Charles Frederick Holder, in January St. Nicholas.

MAN'S BEST FRIEND.

A man's best friend is a wife of good sense and good heart, whom he loves and who loves him. In woman there is at once a subtle delicacy of tact and a plain soundness of judgment which are rarely combined to an equal degree in man. A woman, if she is really your friend, will have a sensitive regard for your character, honor, repute. She will seldom counsel you to do a shabby thing, for a woman always desires to be proud of you. At the same time her constitutional timidity makes her more cautious than your male friends. She, therefore, seldom counsels you to do an imprudent thing. Rely, then, on her wisdom and faithfulness, and scorn the thought of proving unfaithful to the tenderness which, should occasion demand, would impel her willingly to die for you, as when the brutal Emperor Claudius commanded the death of her husband, the wife, Arria, stabbing herself, handed him the dagger, with the immortal words: "Pætus, it does not hurt."—Buhoer Lytton.

COURTESY AT HOME.

Why is it so many people keep all their fine manners for the outer world, and have none left for home? Why do mothers train their little ones, in every way but by example, to be always courteous, and then wonder that they are sometimes rude? If you fail to say as surely as to his elders "Thank you," "I beg your pardon," or, "If you please," to a child, so certainly will that ready little wit take on the conviction that politeness is not for everyday use nor for home consumption.

No husband has a right to read his wife's letters, in justice to the friends who wrote them and the woman who reads. No wife has a right to pour her husband's coffee with her bang entwined in last night's curl-papers. No parent has a right to give away a child's playthings without that child's consent.

I have never forgotten an incident of my childhood. I was away from home for a few days, and on my return the younger ones fell on me at once. Letters had come from two absent brothers, they said, and addressed to me; so to all their entreaties to open them our mother had said no one could do that but myself, and they thrust the envelopes into my hand. Could a daily lecture have taught the precept in so sure a manner as that practice?

Why should we show our love by our impoliteness? I remember once, when my sister and I were taking our departure after calling upon two other sisters, we jostled one another at the door. Upon our mingled apologies one of the girls broke in with a laugh. "Do you do that to each other?" she cried, "I should never think of begging Lily's pardon." Yet they were well-mannered young persons, too—truly gentlewomen in their relations to the world.—Good Housekeeping.

A BOY'S RELIGION.

If a boy is a lover of the Lord Jesus Christ, though he can't lead a prayer meeting, or be a church officer, or a preacher, he can be a godly boy, in a boy's way and a boy's place. He need not cease to be a boy because he is a Christian. He ought to run, jump, climb, and yell like a real boy. But in it all he ought to be free from vulgarity and profanity. He ought to eschew tobacco in every form and have a horror for intoxicating drinks. He ought to be peaceable, gentle, merciful, generous. He ought to take the part of small boys against large ones. He ought to discourage fighting. He ought to refuse to be a party to mischief, to persecution or deceit. And, above all things, he ought now and then to show his colors. He need not always be interrupting a game to say he is a Christian, but he ought not to be ashamed to say that he refuses to do something because he fears God or is a Christian. He ought to take no part in the ridicule of sacred things, but meet the ridicule of others with a bold statement that for things of God he feels the deepest reverence.—Selected

TO TALK TO DEAF PEOPLE.

As old age and the infirmities of life come upon us, we lose the elasticity of early life, and the senses begin to be less and less acute, and the mental faculties are not so quick in their operations as they once were. The fluids of the body begin to thicken, and the vital forces are becoming more and more sluggish in performing their respective functions.

Now, when addressing persons who are a little dull of hearing, the correct manner of speaking is to speak every word distinctly. When a speaker fails to let the sound of his words come out of his mouth, many persons who are not deaf cannot understand what is said. When a person speaks every word clearly and lets the sound come out of his mouth, I can understand all he says. But, when he clips some words and rattles them off all attached together, I cannot catch the idea. It is not necessary to elevate the voice to an unnatural tone. Let every word come out distinctly. Then speak another and another word. Many educated people are shocking talkers, as they lip and mouth and chew every word all out of form and significance.—Anonymous.

NOBODY KNOWS BUT MOTHER.

Nobody knows of the work it makes
To keep the home together;
Nobody knows of the steps it takes,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody listens to childish woes,
Which kisses only smother;
Nobody's pained by naughty blows,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the sleepless care,
Bestowed on baby brother;
Nobody knows of the tender prayer
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the lessons taught,
Of loving one another:
Nobody knows of the patience sought,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of anxious fears,
Lest darlings may not weather
The storm of life in after-years,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody kneels at the throne above,
To thank the Heavenly Father,
For that sweetest gift—a mother's love;
Nobody can—but mother.

TEMPERANCE.

NO MORE SALOONS WANTED.

William Winters, of Hannibal, Mo., wrote to the postmaster at Baker City, Ore., asking "What show is there for another saloon in Baker City?" The postmaster handed the letter, for a reply, to Mr. D. W. C. Nelson, the leading real estate dealer at Baker City, who wrote as follows:

"BAKER CITY, Ore., Jan. 6, 1892.

"Mr. William Winters, Hannibal, Mo.:

"DEAR SIR:—Yours of 1st inst. to the postmaster here was handed me this morning to answer; and, in reply will say, in the first place we have all the saloon fraternity here that can hold forth. We have a nice little city but for the saloons, and if all of them were at the bottom of the sea, we would be better off. We are now agitating the subject of starting a free reading room for the young and old, to keep them from the saloons. There are plenty of chances here for a man of small means to go into some legitimate business, where he will not be an eyesore to decent people. I enclose you some reading matter, which I trust will be of benefit to you.

"Truly yours, (Signed) D. W. C. NELSON."

A HOSPITAL SKETCH.

"Nurse, go to private room 28; you will find a new patient there that needs prompt care." The words were spoken by the hospital superintendent, but the nurse, always so prompt to obey, hesitated.

"I said room 28," he continued, as he noticed her hesitation.

"Didn't I see you leading a drunken man through the hall a moment ago?" she asked.

"Yes; he is the one I wish you to care for. You will find him rather boozy, but he will do you no harm. He is a sick man, and needs care."

The nurse hastened to the room, to find the man in bed with face carefully concealed. Hearing the soft footsteps, he uncovered his face and gazed long and earnestly at the gentle, patient face of the nurse. He was a middle-aged gentleman, with handsome, scholarly face, and while traces of the drink-curse were written upon it, it had not yet obliterated the manly beauty depicted there. "Are you a sister?" he faltered.

"No."

"Oh, I am so sorry," he continued, while the tears coursed down his cheeks. "I want somebody to care for me, and a Sister of Charity is always kind."

"I am your nurse, and will take care of you."

"May I call you sister?"

"Yes, if you wish it."

The man gave a loud cry and covered his face again.

"What's that? Kill it, oh, kill it, before it destroys me!"

The nurse brushed the imaginary something from the bed and laid a quiet, restraining hand upon him.

"Do you know, sister, I must have something more to drink! I will die before midnight unless I do have it."

"Our physician will see to your need."

"But you will stay here with me, sister?"

"Yes, until I am obliged to go."

After a time the man fell into a troubled sleep, and the nurse left him to care for other patients. In the course of an hour she returned, and found him awake and conscious of his surroundings.

"I thought you would never come, sister," he said; "get me pen and ink, quick; I must write to my brother; I am breaking his heart." And the man burst into uncontrollable weeping. "My wife, my poor wife," he continued. "No, not here, not here! I would not have her find me thus."

"Where is she?"

"At the seashore. I was to have met her there to-day; but I went to the club, and I drank champagne, and I drank champagne, and I drank champagne, till it set me mad and I lost all reason."

"Have you been drinking long?"

"It is twenty years since I first began. Then a glass satisfied me; now it takes barrels to quench my thirst."

"It would have been better had you never touched it."

"I feel it! I know it! but, oh, God, what shall I do? I have betrayed the confidence of my wife so often. My boys—was there ever such degradation—have witnessed and blushed at my shame."

"Give it up, my brother. Do not despair, it is not yet too late. Though your sins be as scarlet, God can still reclaim you. The foe is a monstrous one, but God is mightier than your foe."

The gentleman, for he was unmistakably one, buried his face and sobbed aloud. Through the open door from the children's ward came a wailing cry. "Oh, God, what shall I do? That sounds like my baby boy! Don't let him come in here!"

"It is only one of the sick ward children."

"Is that all? It is not my little Albert, then? But get me the pen and ink. I must write to my brother; nobody knows where I am."

The nurse drew a small table to the side of the bed. He screamed in terror as she handed him the pen. "What's that? Oh, I thought it was some living thing about to destroy me. Sister, don't leave me while I write."

At this instant the door opened wide, and a scholarly gentleman in middle life entered the room.

"Brother," cried the sick man.

"Oh, my poor brother," was the answer; and the nurse silently left; the scene was one too sacred for stranger eyes to witness. Returning to administer to the sick man an hour later, she found the two brothers with hands closely locked, gazing at each other in unmistakable anguish. "To-morrow I will come to you," said the sick man. "Let me come for you," said the brother, as he tenderly bade him good-by.

"That," said the sick man, turning to the nurse, "is the noblest of brothers, and I am breaking his heart. O God, if I could only reform!"

"By his grace you can. It is the wandering sheep whom the shepherd of the fold seeks and reclaims. Even the dying thief on the cross was pardoned and received into glory."

The nurse had in her pocket a little leaflet, "Christ, the cure for drunkards." She placed it in his hand. "Thank you," he said.

On the following morning she met him as he was about to go. "Let me thank you for the interest you have taken in me," he said; and added, "May I keep that leaflet? It describes my case exactly."

"Keep it," she answered, "and may the Lord direct your steps."

This is a true sketch, full of pathos which words fail to convey. Such scenes are, alas, too common, and the heart would often utterly despair but for the divine words, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance."—Sallie V. DuBois, in Christian Intelligencer.

BIBLE LESSON.

STUDIES IN THE GREATER PROPHETS.

LESSON V.—First Quarter, 1892.—January 31.

SUBJECT.—The Suffering Saviour.—Isaiah 53: 1-12.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.—Isaiah 53: 6.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

DAILY READINGS.—M.—Isa. 53. T.—Luke 23: 13-25. W.—Matt. 26: 36-46. T.—1 Peter—2: 19-25. F.—Phil. 2: 1-11. S.—Matt. 27: 26-38. S.—2 Cor. 5: 14-21.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The unrecognized Saviour.—vs. 1-3. "Who hath believed our report?" No other prophet has so fully unfolded the glories of Christ's future reign, and none so minutely described the suffering Messiah, as the one whose words we are now studying. He calls him the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father; yet boldly turns the reverse side of the picture and shows him suffering every conceivable grief and ignominy, down to a shameful death among malefactors. It is a singular fact that to this day the 53d chapter of Isaiah is never read in Jewish synagogues; and the writer once heard a converted Jew state that when a boy his father objected to his reading this portion of Scripture. The fulfillment of the prophecy is too complete to be explained otherwise than on the hypothesis that "Jesus is the Christ," and until the Jews are ready to admit this, such passages will continue to be tabooed. They will not believe Isaiah's report now any more than when first delivered. Horseley thinks that the repentant Jews who should believe on him at the final restoration are here personated, which makes the imagery very clear, as well as fine and poetic. "As a tender plant," expresses the humility of his birth and early surroundings, as in Dan 4: 11, the power and glory of Nebuchadnezzar is imaged by an immense tree "whose top reached unto heaven." Silently, and "without observation," this tender plant grew out of the old decayed royal line of David; but "from a dry ground," watered no longer by special manifestations of God's miraculous power, as in the ancient days when he led forth his covenant people out of Egypt. When Christ appeared there had been no prophet for four hundred years. "Without form or comeliness." This whole passage seems to prove that Christ had none of that physical beauty which painters give him. Pentecost says, in his "Bible Studies," that before Christianity was made a state religion, the tradition of Christ's face was of a very plain and unattractive man. And yet "he is fairer than the children of men" in that spiritual beauty which only they can see who have become new creatures in him.

2. His vicarious sufferings.—vs. 4-9. The doctrine of the atonement is here set forth in the plainest language. He hath borne our griefs," etc., is followed by the sum of these assertions condensed in one grand climax: "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all," because "all we, like sheep, have gone astray." A vivid idea of our lost condition is needful before we can have any just appreciation of the sacrifice made to redeem us. The religious teaching which assumes any natural goodness in man will as a matter of course reject the great doctrine of the atonement, for if by any possible process we can save ourselves, what need of a Redeemer? The whole reading seems to prove that Christ is not a Saviour from sin merely, but that in every grief and affliction, bodily or mental, we can call upon him and find him "mighty to save." "For by his stripes we are healed." His whole life is here condensed as only the pen of inspiration could do it. His lowly origin, his life of sorrow spent in continual contact with suffering—for this is the literal meaning of the phrase "acquainted with grief;"—this violent and shameful death, the circumstance of his burial,—all are recorded as clearly as if this "Gospel in miniture" had been written after the events happened, instead of more than seven centuries before. Can we read these touching words and not say with Frances Havergal:

"Take myself, and I will be, Ever, only, ALL for thee."

3. The ever-living Saviour.—vs. 10-12. Though "cut off" in the spring-time of his manhood, we have here the promise of his resurrection. While it is not prophesied in exact words that he shall rise again, this is, of course, the obvious meaning; for unless he rose from the grave which Isaiah prophesies shall receive him, how can he "prolong his days," or "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied?" Let us think for a moment what the word "satisfied" must mean in such a connection; far more than we in our present human state can realize. The full meaning of the word—and when applied to him who is one with God we can use it only in its absolute and unlimited sense—is that the results of his redeeming work, as they unfold through the centuries, will leave even the infinite heart of Christ nothing to more desire. He will feel perfectly compensated for all he has passed through; for leaving his Father's throne in glory and suffering the cruel death of the cross. "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many." This means the knowledge of God as revealed by Christ; the truth which cleanses and purifies, and makes the soul fit for heaven. "He shall divide the spoil with the strong." God shall give him "a name above every name;" he shall be King of kings and Lord of lords. Though the Gospel will have its chief triumphs among the poor and lowly, yet in the latter days it is prophesied of the church that the kings of the earth "shall bring their glory and honor into it." This may refer to kings in the realm of mind as well as literal rulers. Philosophy and literature and art will lay all their treasures at Christ's feet. Are we doing all we can to gladden his heart by helping to hasten this glorious and blessed consummation?

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The Winter Missionary Conference, under the auspices of the American Baptist Missionary Union, will be held in the First Church, Des Moines, Ia., Feb. 2, 3 and 4. Rev. Dr. Mabie will preside.

—Rev. P. S. Moxom, of the First Church, Boston, greatly surprised his people on Sunday morning at the close of his sermon by presenting his resignation. He neglected to give his reasons for this act.

—The English Baptist Union, recently in session, resolved that to properly celebrate the centenary next year they would send out 100 additional missionaries.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—The West Side church of Salt Lake City, Utah, claims to be the first in the world to organize in 1892. Three months ago, Rev. H. M. Burr was appointed to work in this part of the city. With the exception of three persons there was no known quantity for Congregationalism there. People began to flow towards them in the most natural way, without any outside pressure, and without coming as a result of any former Congregational missionary work. Most of those who came were Christians. Two had been converted since the meetings were begun.

—At the annual meeting of the Evanston, Ill., church, Dr. N. H. Whittlesey, pastor, the total membership was reported as 433; additions, during the year, sixty-two, thirty-four on confession, making a net gain of forty-five. The benevolent contributions amounted to $5,680.

—The Elgin Association fellowship meetings, after the service in Riley, were suspended for the holidays, Week of Prayer and special services, until Jan. 28, when they will be resumed. Pastors Pearce, Wright, Lloyd and evangelist Wyckoff were present at the Riley meeting.

—January 31st, the Sunday following the last Thursday in the month, now universally recognized as the day of prayer for colleges, has very fittingly been suggested as the special Sabbath of the year for the churches to remember the American College and Education Society with their annual offerings.

—The directors of the London Missionary Society have decided to appeal to the Congregational churches and friends of the society everywhere to observe a week of prayer and self-denial on behalf of the society's work, from Feb. 21 to 28 next. It is believed that the result will be to greatly increase interest in the work, to bring forth offers of service, and to raise a substantial sum to meet the additional cost of what is known as the forward movement. The society proposes to send at least one hundred new missionaries into the field within the next four years.

EPISCOPALIAN.

—An exchange is authority for the statement that there are now 1,200 priests of the Church of England who hear confessions in private.

—It is announced that there is to be a large cathedral built in Washington. The ground has been secured. It covers fourteen and one-half acres of land, just north of the city limits, is estimated as worth $200,000, and is a donation from Francis G. Newlands and H. P. Wagonman.

FRIENDS.

—A movement is on foot among prominent members to change the name of this denomination to "Friends Church." "By thus calling ourselves," says the editor of the Christian Worker, "we put ourselves clearly in name, as we are in fact, in the list of those organizations representing Christ on earth. Other bodies of Christians will respect us more, will understand us more easily, and we shall not be open to the charge of not being, of not even claiming to be, a regularly organized church. It is not a question of putting on a 'great' name, but of simply assuming our proper name."

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—Bishop Haygood of the Church South, at the recent session of North Georgia conference, called for volunteers for the Pacific slope. Nine young men responded, and the party left for the West from Atlanta, Ga., on New Year's morning. While in Georgia the bishop raised $4,000 to pay traveling and other expenses.

—At the urgent request of the superintendent of Chicago missions and Dr. W. H. Burns of the Chicago district, Rev. N. W. Devenau, who formerly had charge of French missions of Central Illinois conference, and who, for a year and a half, has been in evangelistic work, has been appointed to take charge of French missions in Chicago, left vacant by the death of Rev. L. N. Beaudry.

—The Japan Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church lately held its annual meeting in Tokio, and adopted several memorials to be presented to the next General Conference of the Methodist church of this country, which will be held next year. Among other things, the Japan Conference asks for the appointment of a bishop to reside in Japan or China, and the establishment of a branch of the Methodist Book Concern in Tokio.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—There seems to be a growing disposition to abandon the International Series of Sunday-school Lessons. Many churches have given it up for the Harper Bible Studies, or for some other following essentially the same plan.

—Protestantism is said to be increasing rapidly in Russia.

—The Universalist church in Glasgow is the only regularly organized church in Great Britain that has a woman for its fully-accredited pastor.

—Baron Hirsch, the millionaire philanthropist, has purchased 3,001 square leagues, over 9,000 square miles of land, in the northern part of the Argentine Republic for his Jewish colonization project. This makes him the largest individual land owner in the world.

—The disturbances that have for some time existed between the authorities at Eastbourne, London, and the Salvation Army resulted in a riot on January 7th, when a mob attacked a band of the Army while holding service in the streets. Many persons were severely hurt.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—The will of Mrs. R. L. Stuart, of Philadelphia, who recently died at the age of 81 years, after giving bequests to several cousins and near friends, most of whom are to receive $25,000 each, and liberal bequests to Rev. Drs. John Hall and James McCosh and their families, gave the remainder to charity. Besides legacies to the principal Presbyterian national societies, some twenty hospitals, dispensaries and schools are made beneficiaries. In all it is supposed there will be about $5,000,000 distributed. Both her husband and his brother were noble givers in their lifetime, and Mrs. Stuart realized the stewardship of wealth by princely donations for Princeton, missions and other objects.

—The Herald and Presbyterian is authority for the statement that we are threatened with a new religious journal which is to defend Dr. Briggs and his position. Prominent Presbyterian ministers of Cleveland are at the head of it.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

—A letter from Rev. J. M. Foster, of the Second Congregation, Boston, says: "Permit me to say that after purging the roll of the Second R. P. church of this place, we find an available force of about eighty members. Our audiences are just as large as they were before or since the death of the late pastor. A unity of sentiment and feeling prevails which makes the outlook very encouraging."

UNITED BRETHREN.

—Ten new churches on Toledo District, Iowa Conference, have been built or are in process of erection this year; also, four parsonages.

—As the result of a most excellent revival held during the fall, conducted by Rev. W. A. Whitlock, in Wayne Co., Iowa, six miles from Corydon, a good society was organized and a church building erected.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

—We would like to boast of the missionary zeal of the United Presbyterian church, but when we turn to the statistics and learn that only 196 of our 863 congregations at home contributed to all the funds, and that 50 contribute nothing to any of the funds, our boasting is "excluded."—Pittsburgh United Presbyterian.

WESLEYAN METHODIST.

—A religious census of the students of Ohio Wesleyan University shows that there are, in all courses, 680 professing Christians and 209 non-Christians. The largest percentage of Christians is found in the music, commercial and normal departments, and the smallest in the freshman and junior preparatory classes.

HOME AND HEALTH.

WATER IN AN OVEN.

A small pan of water placed in the oven and filled as often as it becomes dry, is a great help. It prevents the bread and cake from burning, even with a full oven and a very hot fire, saves nearly one-half the labor in watching and turning the loaves, and prevents a thick, hard crust. It is usually filled with water from the tea-kettle; but if the oven seems too hot, throw out the hot water, fill with cold and put back. Use a pan ten inches long, one inch wide, and one inch deep. It is made by folding the tin at the ends and pounding lightly until the folds are so close that the pan is water-tight. A pan made with solder will not do, for with the best of care it will sometimes become dry, and the solder melt and run out. This pan slips in beside a pan of bread, next the fire box, and takes very little room. Always have a holder to handle it with, and handle carefully when pouring in water after it has become dry, or a bad scald will result.

LEFT-HANDED COOKING UTENSILS.

"Evidently a man made that frying-pan, and that stew-pan, and this wide-mouthed basin," growled the cook. "To have put their mouths on the wrong side, as if all womenkind was left-handed! You see it is most natural for any one to turn out foods from small vessels with the left hand, leaving the right one free to scrape out what still may adhere to the bottom and sides. Then there's that small oil-stove with the handle so put on that upon setting it down the isinglass is turned from you, and the stove has to be completely turned around in order for you to see the state of the flame when once lighted. Such things are very annoying, when unnecessary. Anybody who cooks, and knows how utensils must be handled, would see at once that the skillets and pans small enough to be held by the left hand when being emptied of food, ought to have the mouths on the opposite side from that where most makers put them. I wish they would rise and explain."—The Housewife.

FRESH AIR IN WINTER.

Why is fresh air, the very breath of our nostrils, treated by nine-tenths of us as an enemy, throughout the winter? It is as essential to health and life in one season as in another, and yet, from November until May, seven-eighths of us do our best to barricade our dwellings against it. It is impossible to prevent so close a besieger from gaining the advantage now and then, but we do what we can to make our castles impregnable to the outer air. We fortify our doors and windows with contrivances of all kinds to exclude it, and when, through some oversight, it gains admission, we exhaust the intruder with overheated stoves and furnaces. If we cannot altogether keep it out, we can, at least, poison it when it gets in.

A few hundred of us, congregated in an unventilated room, can soon deprive the air it contains of its vital principle; and were it not that this sleepless enemy outside occasionally makes a plunge into the apartment when a newcomer steps in to assist in the poisoning operation, the coroners would never have a moment they could call their own. As it is, the opponents of fresh air keep them pretty busy.

The occupants of tenement houses, by dint of stopping up crevices with rags and shutting down the dampers of their cracked stoves, so as to prevent the egress of the coal gas from their dormitories, provide the malignant typhus with all the comforts of a home, and contrive to put a large amount of fees into the pockets of the coroners during the inclement months. Self-suffocation is quite an "institution" in this community.

Diphtheria, lung fever and catarrh are often attributed to draughts of cold air, but they are more frequently caused by stagnant hot air deprived of its oxygen. If we "take cold" in consequence of stepping out of a room heated to a tropical temperature, into an atmosphere below the freezing point, the primary cause of the difficulty is the over-heated, sealed-up room, not the healthful open air.

If we were more in the habit of warming our blood in winter with brisk exercise "under the canopy," and less inclined to coddle ourselves in all but hermetically-sealed rooms warmed with hot-air furnaces, we should be a healthier people than we are. The winds of heaven are hygiene. They should be permitted to circulate freely through every dwelling at least once a day. Warm carbonic-acid gas is not good for the lungs, but cool oxygen is. FARM NOTES.

CARE OF MILCH COWS IN WINTER.

The rapid increase of winter dairying has made many changes in dairy practice. In the first place the man whose dairy produces winter milk may as well dismiss from his mind at once the idea of "luck" entering into his business. Success depends upon systematic, calculating method from September to the July following. The cows should not calve too early. As near Oct. 1 as possible is best. The cow that calves four weeks before this date is too long in milk before the winter sets in, and has usually dropped off from her best flow, and gives less in the winter because of it.

As soon as a cow drops her calf and establishes her milk flow, extra feeding should commence. This must not be overdone, so as to force her at the start, and prevent her to respond with an increase of milk, to increased food, when she commences her stable life later in the season. I would not allow the calf to suck more than once or twice, preferring to milk the cow regularly from the start. This plan I consider preferable to allowing the calf to suck for several days, and then have the cow mourn for her offspring, as she will after it has established itself in her affections by sucking. The cow should be fed liberally, but not principally with grain. Succulent foods like good, mature corn fodder, clover, and the like, are best. Feed grain sparingly at the start, and later on rely upon it to hold up the milk yield and sustain it. Keep the grain for the reserve force.

Begin to stable early. Do not try to make the cow used to cold so as to stand it better, but protect her against it. Cold, frost, and chilling rains and winds are not promoters of milk flow, but each and all are antagonistic to it. When the nights begin to get frosty stable the milkers and keep them warm, and on chilly, rainy days it is better to keep them in, too, and feed them inside the stable. By the first of December at the latest, and earlier if the weather is wintry, begin the winter stabling and feeding, and get the cows on uniform rations, prepared to keep them in for ninety days if need be.

Have all the feed and rations handy. A cow wants to eat with regularity, and not wait for the owner to hitch up and draw in a load of fodder from a distant field. Milk at regular hours, and feed as regularly, and as soon as done milking. Do not get into the habit of hiring your cows to give milk. Reverse the plan, and reward them for their milk with a generous feeding. Then they can take time to eat, ruminate, digest, and assimilate their food between milkings. Give the main part of the food at two meals. The plan of feeding little and often is objectionable, but a light feed of hay at noon, if silage is fed, is of advantage. Grain should be fed with the rougher food; then it is not only well masticated but better mixed and prepared for digestion.

Make the cow comfortable in her stall. Give her room and freedom of motion. Use bedding freely, and use absorbents liberally in the gutters, so that all the fluids will be taken up and slop prevented. Use land plaster to absorb ammonia, and next to it road dust is valuable. If one insists on exercise for the milkers they may be turned out in the middle of the day and driven about the yard a few times to be sure that they take it. Cows in milk are very forgetful in this respect. Only turn out on sunny, warm days, and not to exceed two hours. Have water in the stable as well as in the yard. An iron tank with cover in the stable, fed from the well, will give water of about fifty degrees, which is warm enough for the cows. Have the stable warm, light, dry, fairly ventilated, and cleaned out twice per day. Have the mangers and boxes kept sweet and clean by washing them occasionally with hot water. Be a gentleman among your cows; they appreciate politeness, and in return will make winter dairying pay.—John Gould, in American Agriculturist

At night, from baby's crib, are distracting to parents who are at a loss for a medicine equal to the emergency. Not so with those who have Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in the house. A dose of this medicine affords certain and speedy relief. To cure colds, coughs, sore throat, asthma, bronchitis, hoarseness, and the various disorders of the breathing apparatus, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has no equal. It soothes the inflamed tissue, expectoration, and induces repose. Cap. U. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children were subject."

"I use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my practice, and pronounce it to be unequalled as a remedy for colds and coughs."—J. G. Gordon, M. D., Carroll Co., Virginia.

Established Facts:

That the ROYAL BAKING POWDER is the oldest and purest baking powder, and the greatest in leavening strength.

That it is free from every injurious substance.

That it makes lighter, sweeter, more nutritious and healthful food than any other.

The Royal Baking Powder Company refines its own cream of tartar in its own mammoth refinery, and thus insures its unvarying quality.

There is used in the manufacture of the Royal Baking Powder more than half of all the cream of tartar consumed in the United States for all purposes. This is required and must be chemically pure, and chemically pure cream of tartar could not be obtained in the markets of this country or Europe, which necessitated the building of special works, and the employment of special processes.

All other baking powders, when analyzed, show traces of lime and sulphuric acid, which arise from the impurities of the materials bought in the market, which their manufacturers use.

This is why the Royal Baking Powder is the only absolutely pure baking powder made.

The only secrets of Freemasonry that are not now printed and within reach of every seeker after truth, are those which relate to the machinations of lodge men against those who oppose them, and for the persecution or murder of their recalcitrant brethren in the lodge. And when they talk about the excellence of the Masonic institution and the great amount of good that it accomplishes, they should be reminded that it is no better, as a whole, than the villainies which it is pledged to commit.

A large union meeting of Presbyterians convened in the Third church on Sunday evening last, to consider the recent decision of the Columbian Exposition directory permitting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the fair grounds. Addresses were made by Rev. W. T. Meloy and others, and, by a rising vote, the congregation adopted a series of pungent resolutions denouncing the action of the management. The churches should all be equally unanimous in deprecating so vile a traffic, which will tend to turn the Exposition into a huge beer and whisky garden.

The bill introduced in the United States Senate to admit Utah to Statehood provides that the constitution shall secure to the citizens perfect toleration of religious sentiment. As the Mormon element largely predominates in Utah, and is quite extensively governed by secret councils of the Mormon church, there is danger that with all this religious freedom accorded it, polygamy and other Mormon abominations will be promoted when its power is established under such a constitution. Arizona, which is also seeking admittance into the Union on similar terms, is said to be quite as intensely Mormon as Utah. Perhaps it would be better to keep both Territories "on probation" a while longer. Senator Teller is the father of the Utah bill.

The Inter-State Railway Commission was established by the United States government for the purpose of settling hundreds of technical disputes relating to the rates and disposition of freight that are constantly arising between individuals or corporations and managers of railways. The law was designed for a good purpose, and ably drawn; but the work of the commission, always arduous, not to say vexatious, has recently been crippled by a decision of the United States Supreme Court, which virtually declares that the prosecution must prove its case by its own witnesses, and that it cannot bring out evidence by direct examination of the persons prosecuted. This decision will prevent a large number of suits against railroads and individuals from being brought to trial with any hope of sustaining the charges made. As we understand it, the commission was created to relieve the pressure of these suits in the United States courts, but if there is no law to compel railroad managers to testify against themselves, its utility is destroyed.

THE SABBATH DRAWETH ON.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Brothers, rise! No longer tarry;
Crush each error and each wrong;
He will all your burdens carry,
Let your hearts be brave and strong!
In the west the shadows hover
In the pathway of the sun;
Oh! the day is almost over,
And the "Sabbath draweth on."

Brothers, wake! for we are going
To that land of endless day,
Where the streams of life are flowing,
And the shining waters play.
We shall soon beside life's fountains
Lay our burdens, one by one,
When our sun sets on life's mountains
And the "Sabbath draweth on."

Soul of light and King of glory,
We have raised thy banner high;
Isles afar have heard the story,
That thy kingdom draweth nigh
Years are passing, time is flying,
And our work is almost done;
When is past all pain and sighing,
Heavenly Sabbath, then draw on.

"ENGLISH AND AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM."

BY C. A. S. TEMPLE.

Under the above heading, the New York Semi-Weekly Tribune publishes an article which must cause the face of every lover of the truth of God to blush and his ears to tingle for very shame! Such words, in this land—and this era—of Bibles and Bible knowledge, are a dishonor to any intelligent mind; but such especially as those there quoted from professed ministers of God, are humiliating indeed!

After paying his compliments to the sermon by Rev. Dr. Goodwin, before the late International Congregational Council in London, as one "so intensely Calvinistic in its tone as to amaze even the most conservative of English Congregationalists," and referring, with only too evident satisfaction, to the now overwhelming prevalence of Liberalism, in all so-called evangelical circles there, he quotes from a Rev. Dr. Condor, "a distinguished Congregationalist."

Says Dr. Condor: "We have lost orthodoxy, but we have gained Christ. The old theology . . . expired because an atmosphere had been created in which it could not breathe!"

In this statement, he evidently means that "old theology" which has produced, and which alone could produce—a Paul, a Luther, a Calvin, a Bunyan, a Baxter, a Whitefield, a Wesley, a Robinson, a Robert Hall, a Spurgeon, and, in this country, a Jonathan Edwards, a Payson, a Lyman Beecher, a Nettleton, a Finney, a Moody, and a host of others "of like precious faith," on both sides of the sea; men "of whom the world is not worthy"—whose faith and zeal and success in ANTI-SECRET NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION.

THE OFFICIAL CALL OF THE NEW YORK ANTI-SECRET CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, AUXILIARY TO THE NATIONAL CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

To all Friends of the Anti-secrecy Cause in New York State, Greeting:

DEAR FRIENDS:—The providence of God indicates that we should again meet in convention. The Washington agent has been at work in our State for a time, and reports progress.

The W. C. T. U. Hall in the city of Binghamton has been selected as the place, and the 2nd and 3rd days of February as the time of our gathering.

The following ministers are among those expected to address us: J. P. Stoddard, Boston, Mass.; O. M. Owen, Binghamton; S. G. Shaw, Walton, N. Y.; B. Winget, Cortland, N. Y.; N. Callender, Montdale, Pa.; S. R. Wallace, Syracuse, N. Y.; G. L. Paine, Varick, N. Y.

The objects of the Convention are to elect officers, discuss the relation of the secret lodge system to the church, family and state, and attend to such business as the interests of Christ's kingdom, as opposed to the Secret Empire, may seem to require.

All persons in the State in sympathy are invited. All churches are requested to send delegates. We trust friends in Pennsylvania, near, will meet with us.

The Convention will open with a consecration meeting, Tuesday, Feb. 2, at 2 o'clock, P. M., followed by the Address of Welcome and the Response. Will not all the friends try to attend the first session?

Partial arrangements have been made for entertainment. Those expecting to attend should write to W. B. Stoddard, Binghamton, N. Y.

A. R. DODD, President.

There ought to be a very full attendance of the friends of the Anti-Secrecy Reform, especially from New York and Pennsylvania, and every effort should be made to insure, by fervent prayer and earnest personal effort, the greatest possible success of this convention.

Bro. W. B. Stoddard, who is working in behalf of this convention, and striving to make it a great success, furnishes the following memoranda in regard to the entertainment of those who attend:

"Tickets for six meals can be had at the W. C. T. U. Coffee House for one dollar. Furnished rooms, very convenient, are offered for twenty-five cents a night. Two can occupy one room. There is a disposition shown on the part of friends to furnish entertainment for those from a distance. Perhaps all wants can be met in this manner, but no one need pay more than $1.25. If those wishing to attend will write to me at Binghamton, I will do what I can to arrange for their entertainment."

their ministry has rarely been equaled, and, since the day of Pentecost, has never been excelled!

"AN ATMOSPHERE IN WHICH IT COULD NOT BREATHE." With the thorns and thistles and tares of the "Advanced Theology," its "Higher Criticism," its abounding liberalism and general skepticism—it has "choked the Word," and is leaving the church—spiritually, and to a fearful extent—a barren waste. That "old theology," which made those worthies, just named, what they were—and a host like them, too—which has set in motion all those great agencies which are now sending the light of the Gospel into all the dark places of the earth, and which has already led into "the kingdom" "a great multitude which no man can number"—that theology, as we are now flippantly and even boastfully assured, has been strangled; and that, too, in the house of its friends! But we are piously reminded that thereby "we have gained Christ!" As if Christ were to be "gained" by a contemptuous rejection of any part of his teachings!

When he was about to leave the world, he charged his disciples—"Go ye, disciple all nations, . . . teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you." "To observe all things." Of course, "to accept, believe and practice, and retain all things"—"Whatsoever." Nothing to be omitted; nothing to be set aside.

How idle, then, how presumptuous the idea, that Christ can be "gained" by casting off and repudiating any portion of his truth, which he, his inspired prophets and apostles, and all their true and faithful successors, have ever taught, and the "fruits" of which have, in all ages, attested, and do still attest and prove the divine approval of both that theology itself and its faithful and intelligent dissemination. Christ assures us, as an indispensable condition on which he can be "gained"—John 11: 23: "If a man love me, he will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him." Thus he will "gain Christ." See, too, John 15: 7:—"If my words abide in you."

He has made no exceptions, nor authorized any discretion on our part, as to what of his "words" may or may not be retained.

His requirement is imperative. It is without limitation, and of universal application—simply, "My words."

Besides, Christ has said with equal emphasis and solemnity—"He that is ashamed of me and my words . . . of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels." Mar. 9: 36. If such be the case, how can any church "gain Christ" by stamping out, or strangling, or "losing" any part of his "doctrine," any part of his "truth?" Time will show, as the Word of God does now, that such churches are making a sad, a fatal mistake.

The Tribune quotes from "Professor Simon, another distinguished English Congregationalist," who states the case more specifically. He says: "Scarcely is a passing reference now made to divine sovereignty; the divine decrees and predestination have been exorcised; election has been metamorphosed."

"Exorcised." From what? By what authority? When we open the Bible, we find every one of those great truths there, just where and just as the Holy Spirit put them there.

DIVINE SOVEREIGNTY. In Eph. 1: 11, Paul speaks of God as "Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." There is surely a statement of unlimited, universal "divine sovereignty," and that, too, by God himself, and in terms which cannot be misunderstood. In Rom. 9: 15, 17, 18, Isa. 45: 1-7, and Dan. 4: 35, we find the same great truth clearly and explicitly repeated. In fact, it underlies and characterizes the whole system of divine revelation.

DIVINE DECREES, PREDESTINATION, ELECTION; all these are so intimately connected that the one generally, but not always, implies the others.

Decrees. Eph. 1: 11. "According to the purpose of Him who worketh." Acts. 2: 23: "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." Rom. 8: 28: "Who are the called, according to his purpose." What can "the counsel," "the determinate counsel," of God be, if not his "decrees?" What "his purpose?"

Predestination and election. John 10: 16: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this flock."

"Other sheep I have." Here is a solemn and most positive declaration that he had chosen "a seed to serve him" from among those who had not yet heard his voice, nor even heard of him; untold millions of whom were not then born. "Chosen—in him," but not yet called. Yet "He had them." How? Simply and only, by election. By predestination, too; for he adds—them also I must bring. . . and there shall be one flock, one Shepherd." If those words do not declare both election and predestination, then language itself is a mockery and a sham.

But the great apostle of the Gentiles has a word upon this very subject, although with no ostensible reference to those words of the Master; yet in Gal. 1: 11, 12, he assures us that he received his message "by revelation of Jesus Christ."

In Eph. 1: 34, he says of the whole body of believers: "God" . . . "hath chosen us, in him"—Christ—"before the foundation of the world"—ver. 5—"having predestinated us unto the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ," ver 11, "being predestinated, according to the purpose of him who worketh."—Rom. 8: 29. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate, to be conformed to the image of his Son."

Such were the teachings of Christ—"by revelation"—through his great apostle; teachings in which he most emphatically, most imperatively asserts, that all his regenerated and redeemed people were "chosen in him"—Christ—"predestinated unto the adoption of children," "before the foundation of the world."

These great truths may have been banished from the creeds of the Congregational and other churches in England, as they have been from those of many churches here, but they cannot be driven from the Book of God. They are an inseparable portion of that Word which, Ps. 117: 87, "is settled in heaven," and which, therefore, "shall stand forever." Isa. 40: 8, 1 Peter 1: 25.

How astonishing that any man, claiming to be a minister of God, can boast, and that openly, before the world, that those great truths, so solemnly, so emphatically proclaimed by Christ and his inspired prophet and apostle, "have been exorcised!" "Exorcised!" As if he would stamp upon that Holy Book itself! As if certain truths, though taught upon the pages of that Book, and so by God himself—are to be regarded, and treated as so many evil spirits, emanations from the bottomless pit! How will he and his confederates face those "exorcised," "metamorphosed" truths, in the day of judgment?

Hear the word of the Judge himself upon this point. Rev. 22: 17: "If any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the Book of Life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this Book." Deut. 12: 32. "Thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it."

"IN DEALING WITH MAN:"

Says the learned professor, "In dealing with man, our starting point has been less and less distinctly the fall, inherited depravity, guilt and moral inability; instead, we dwell on his filial relation to God, either by nature, or in Christ; on the good that is found, even in the worst." . . . Thus it seems that in their "progressive" method there is "less and less" of the method of Christ; less and less account made of man's condition as a lost sinner; less and less of the fearful truth that every "natural"—that is unregenerate—"man" is condemned already, under sentence—unless he turn and repent—of everlasting banishment, from God and heaven. Mar. 16: 16.

Instead of thus beginning where Christ begins—see John 3: 3-36—he says: "We dwell on man's filial relation to God, either by nature, or in Christ." A specious, but delusive method, which always robs God, and which must inevitably receive and—spiritually—destroy all who accept and follow it.

Christ's first words to Nicodemus were: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Why? Because, until "born again," he is under condemnation, and "the wrath of God abideth on him." John 3: 3, 5, 18, 36. Paul meets that "advanced" sophistry of our English Congregationalist, directly and squarely. In Eph. 2: 3, he assumes that all such are, "by nature, children of wrath." In Rom. 9: 8, he says that "they who are the children of the flesh. . . are not the children of God." Where, then, is "their filial relation to God, by nature?" But in

Eph. 2: 11, 12, he states the case, if possible, more explicitly. He tells the Ephesian Christians that when they were "children of the flesh," "they were without Christ" . . . "and without God in the world." He tells the Christians in Galatia, Gal. 3: 26, that they are "children of God," not "by nature," but "by faith in Christ Jesus." Thus both Christ and his inspired apostle assure us that until a man is "born again," "born of the Spirit"—Jno. 3: 5—he has no true "filial relation to God." All this talk, therefore, about man's sustaining any such relation, is the merest idle words.

"On the question of man's future destiny," says the professor, we are, in the main, divided between Universalism, the Larger Hope, and various phases of "noncommittalism." Thus, in those churches, those speciously disguised forms of infidelity are already cordially welcomed and adopted, while some fundamental truths of Divine Revelation are spurned, trampled upon, "choked" and cast out!

Such, everywhere, is the character, and such the fruit of the "New" or "Advanced" theology, sometimes called "The New Orthodoxy." No revivals of pure and undefiled religion—as always with "the old theology"—ever follow in its wake. It leads no wanderer out of the mazes of infidelity, or of any form of skepticism or unbelief. It converts no sinner "from the error of his way." It does not and cannot lead him, in penitence and faith, to the Cross of Christ; nor does it point him to "the blood of the everlasting covenant," as the sinner's only but sure redemption and hope.

On the contrary, it tramples upon the Book of God, by making it the sport of that stilted, pompous usurper, the "Higher Criticism," and thus defies its "Holy and Reverend" Author, to his very face!

Thus, too, it deceives the unthinking and the unwary, and flatters and confirms the skeptic and the unbeliever.

Of course, therefore, its whole tendency must be, and is, to "drown men in destruction and perdition."

DANIEL'S VISION OF TIME.—III.

BY B. EISENTRAUT.

The eighth chapter of Daniel, with its prophetic language, created a great sensation in many Christian families of the United States in the years A. D. 1843 and 1844. It was supposed by Rev. Wm. Miller and others to contain the hidden key and limitation of time itself, as pointing explicitly to the second coming of Christ. In order to defend divine prophecy with historical events, I deem it essential to give some comparisons.

Daniel saw the Babylonian dynasty overthrown through the Medes and Persians, the latter, or younger, kingdom gaining the ascendancy over the older, the Medes. This was accomplished through Cyrus. Dan. 8: 3, 4 reads: "Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great."

Daniel saw the rise of the Grecian kingdom, called in Dan. 7: 6 the third beast, describing the great warrior, Alexander the Great, saying (verses 5 and 6): "And as I was considering, behold, an he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran into him in the fury of his power."

The battle of Arbela, 331 years B. C., ended the Median and Persian kingdom. The he-goat of the West, Alexander, became the monarch of the earth. After his death, 323 years B. C., the Grecian kingdom fell into four divisions, as Daniel foretold, verse 8. "Therefore the he-goat waxed very great; and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it, came up four notable ones towards the four winds of heaven."

Daniel was informed that out of this division one ruler would arise which would cause great distress and lamentation in the pleasant land, the land of Palestine, which Daniel loved as his native home with all other Jews in captivity. The prophecy in the seventh chapter and second showed that a fourth kingdom was to follow the Grecian Empire, but the prophet gave no illustration of the Roman Empire in this eighth chapter; giving himself positive proof that the events referred to in verses following were to be fulfilled before the birth of Christ. Daniel was made to understand that a cruel ruler of this Grecian reign would take away the daily sacrifice of the Jews, stating, also, 385 years before it transpired, how long the interruption would continue in the holy city of Jerusalem, as is given in plain language, to-wit: verses 9-12: "And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven: and it cast some of the host of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of the sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practiced and prospered."

The prophet was made to understand that the sanctuary of the Jews, the very temple in Jerusalem, would be cast down, by reason of the transgression, or disobedience, of his own people and the sacrifice of morning and evening would cease for a certain time. Dan. 8: 13 and 14: "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days: then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

The German version, as well as the new version, illustrates this to be reckoned by mornings and evenings.

The last verse was seemingly detached from its divine relationship by the prophetic calculators of prophecy and taken as meaning so many prophetic years, namely, 2,300. Ezra's mission from Babylon to Jerusalem was taken as the starting point, or 457 years B. C., and 1843 added of the Christian era to complete the number.

According to 1 Maccabees in the Apocrypha, Antiochus Epiphanes, the ruler of Syria, took Jerusalem 158 years B. C. and interrupted the sacrifice for three years and ten days. These are the words: 1 Mac. 1: 54 and 55: "Now the fiftieth day of the month of Casleu, in the hundred forty and fifth year, they set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar, and builded idol altars throughout the cities of Juda on every side: And burnt incense at the doors of their houses, and in the streets."

The Mosaic law was cast down and trodden under foot by this ruler, as is stated in the next verse, to-wit: "And when they had rent in pieces the books of the law which they found, they burnt them with fire."

The end of these times and the change are given in 1 Maccabees 4: 52 and 53 as follows: "Now, on the five and twentieth day of the ninth month, which is called the month of Casleu, in the hundred forty and eighth year, they rose up betimes of the morning, and offered sacrifices according to the law upon the new altar of burnt offerings which they had made." In reckoning this intervening time of 3 years and 10 days with the common usage of 365 days for a year, we have in all 1,105 days.

Jewish sacrifice of morning and evening, in all.....	2,210
The priest gave one extra for each month.....	36
Also seven days for passover in first month.....	21
Ten days the seventh month in all.....	30
The 15th day of seventh month, as first fruits.....	3
	2,300

This same ruler made this confession before he died a few years after, as he was aiming to return from Persia into Syria, saying: "But now I remember the evils that I did at Jerusalem, and that I took all the vessels of gold and silver that were therein, and sent to destroy the inhabitants of Judca without a cause; I perceive, therefore, that for this cause these troubles came upon me, and behold, I perish through great grief in a strange land." His flesh fell away, and worms rose up out of his body.

The latter part of the eleventh and the twelfth of Daniel point to an antitype doing similar abominable deeds in the Christian dispensation, as this one had done under the Grecian Empire unto the Jews.

The following verses of Dan. 8: 20 and 21 give fuller explanations of the vision, in saying: "The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king." The prophecy ends with these words (verse 26): "And the vision of the evening and morning which was told is true; but shut thou up the vision, for it belongeth to many days to come."

These simple comparisons of prophecy and history show conclusively that the computation of the 2,300 years, causing such an alarm in 1843, was of mere human fabrication, without any shadow of any divine indication. The fourth beast, or the Roman Empire, was never referred to in this chapter.

PROHIBITION AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

What are the existing facts in the situation? In some States, like Iowa, secret societies do not rule in Prohibition party counsels. In other States, like New York, they do largely dictate and govern party action. In some of the States the question is largely ignored. In no State is either side of the question made conspicuous before the public. The anti-secret forces are not strong enough in faith and numbers to make any boast over their enemies, and, as a rule, being followers of Christ, they do not boast very much of anything but his Cross. The secret society forces are never given to striking a blow until the proper time comes to make the blow effective. That time is hardly come as yet. The lodge devil manages to get his fame heralded in due time, and in nearly every place, but he seldom does this in any but secret methods. There is nowhere an open rupture between the lodge men and anti-lodge men in the Prohibition party.

So much for a surface glance at what is. If we go deeper into the situation we may find that which will point the outlook. In taking this deeper look we need to remember a few facts: First, then, nearly all of the pronounced anti-secret men are Prohibitionists. The fact of a keen insight into moral issues, and a live conscience with convictions deep and strong, which characterize most of the anti-lodge men, make them easy converts to this great temperance reform. They have formed habits of thought and action which make of them aggressive men.

A second fact which we may not overlook is that comparatively few lodge men are Prohibitionists. Lodge training is not along the line of reform. Two conclusions may be urged as following in logical line with these facts: First, Prohibition as a political measure for the suppression of the drink-traffic and drunkenness, is in direct line with anti-secret work. The two antis are twins,—anti-lodge and anti-rum. Second, Prohibition is directly out of line with the thought and work of lodge men as lodge men. If they are Prohibitionists, they are such in spite of the lodge, rather than because of the lodge. We cannot, then, force back the question, Why are a few lodge men making themselves so conspicuous in Prohibition party affairs? It is a law of human thought and activity that moral reforms cling together, and the opposing evils cling together. Why, then, do we find a number of men who most cordially embrace and support a moral wrong, leaving the rank and file of their boon companions, and taking up their stand with an entirely different set of men? There are doubtless two reasons for this. Many men are better than the orders to which they belong; therefore they stand over on the side of Prohibition. But this does not account for all the men who thus stand; neither does it account for the tireless activity of these secret society men to govern the Prohibition party. Bring all the charity you have into the analysis of this subject, and you will find an element that you must call bad, in spite of your desire to call it good. What is this element? There is good evidence for believing that the king of the secret empire sees a grand opportunity to harness another good cause into line with his dark and deadly doings, and to accomplish his purpose sends out his emissaries into the camp of Prohibition, clothed in the garb of the friends of the cause, but for the design, not of helping on the cause of Prohibition, but to capture the situation for the lodge. This action is illustrated by a case which occurred some years ago. It was on this wise: A very capable man was managing the Republican campaign in a certain county in New York, and he determined to win success. In that county were a few Prohibitionists. They called a convention to nominate a set of candidates for county officers. With the Prohibition vote the Republican party could succeed; without it there was no hope. Political tricks and lies no longer seemed to hold a few brave men, and some new measure must be employed. The new measure was to induce a sufficient number of temperance Republicans to go to the convention and vote down the nominations. They came, and clothed in most pronounced Prohibition sentiment they quietly captured the convention, and adjourned it without anything more than a great deal of talking being done. On the same errand, and on the same principle, we believe the secret society men are active in the Prohibition party counsels.

That we may not appear to offer an idle tale, let us bring forth some of the evidence upon which we base our claim. In a certain child's picture-book is a picture of an old cat and kittens. The mother cat is represented as saying, "Hush! Hush! I smell a rat." We can smell the evil in the very air. In the Prohibition State Convention held in this city, Syracuse, when W. Martin Jones was nominated for Governor, one of the nominating speeches set him forth as a member of a temperance lodge, and therefore likely to draw votes from that order. The biographical sketch of Mr. Jones, offered as a document by which men were to be induced to vote for him, contained not only the fact of his connection with the temperance order, but other lodges also. In the State of New York many of the speakers put forward by the State committee are lodge men. The names of the most prominent men in the party, when appearing in connection with the lodge, are preceded or followed by numerous letters indicating their cabalistic relationships. Lodge men declare privately, We ought, and must, capture the present uprising of public sentiment on temperance, not for the overthrow of the awful curse, but for the upbuilding and strengthening of the lodge. Let any one name a good cause which lodge men have not made an effort to capture, and in so doing they have greatly hindered its real progress.

The secularization of the Prohibition party is largely due to the presence of lodge men in the party. In the convention above referred to, when the Committee on Resolutions made their report, they reported a plank in the platform in which acknowledgment was made of God as the Author of all authority in government. A delegate from Cortland county arose at the proper time and offered an amendment, that there be added to this acknowledgment of God the words, "and Jesus Christ as King of kings." Objection was made to the amendment by prominent lodge men. One of them arose and said in substance: If you insert those words you drive from our ranks all the Hebrews. There is in this State an eminent Jew who desires to address his brethren in the interests of our party. Insert those words and you drive him from our party. The same speaker urged the folly of the amendment by saying all orthodox people understand the use of the word God to include the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Now, if this statement is true, and the Prohibition party is Christian, why would not the use of the word God drive away the Hebrew also?

This amendment was voted down, and the heavy vote against it came from the secret society element of the convention. There were not a few hisses at the amendment, and those who supported it. These came mostly from lodge men. And so at the call of lodge men a Jew is preferred to Christ.

The outlook is not as encouraging as we could wish, because the inlook reveals the stealthy hand of the lodge dropping poison into the food of Prohibitionists. The New York Voice has given vastly more space for two years to lodge news and applause, than to church news and the applause of Christ. Prohibitionists everywhere need to arm themselves against all that is anti-Christ. Our first, and every subsequent ballot, was cast as an out-and-out Prohibition vote, but we cannot avoid a pang of grief when we see the good cause for which men dare to live and die being throttled by secret lodges.—The Bible Standard, Syracuse, N. Y.

SECRETISM IN CHICAGO.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

One of the strangest features of the life in this city and the United States in general, is the existence of large numbers of secret societies, there being no less than 6,000 societies of various kinds, most of them having secret aims and methods, some of them of the most diabolical kind, and utterly unfit to write concerning. Many of these secret societies are armed associations of men who are regularly drilled, and who might be of much danger to the body politic.

ARMED AND DRILLED.

These armed men comprise specially Roman Catholics, Atheists and Anarchists, some of whom would take a sincere pleasure in cutting the writer's throat if they could do it without danger to their own. The abominable order of Freemasons has a most powerful hold here, and everywhere that we have been in this country, and we feel certain that there is a secret understanding between its leaders and Rome, despite the appearances against it, and we speak from a special knowledge.

It seemed very strange to our eyes to see these plumed knights of the commanderies going in procession through the streets with drawn swords and in military array. Much of it doubtless is the mere love of childish display and desire for titles of some kind which characterizes the so-called democratic people, but there is a more serious side to it, and that will be seen some day in this country.

THE M. E. CHURCH AND FREEMASONRY.

The largest of all Protestant churches in this country is the Methodist Episcopal, and we know that it is controlled by Freemasonry in many of the States. Proofs are in our possession, and facts beyond dispute. So far as we can judge, there are probably over 5,000 secret societies in Chicago at this moment, while there only 317 churches of all denominations, only 200 of which are Protestant and evangelical.

OZONE AS A CONSUMPTION CURE.

Experiments on a large scale for the cure of consumptives by the inhalation of ozone are about to be made at St. Raphael, a point on the Mediterranean coast where the air is supposed to be peculiarly well adapted to a satisfactory trial of the treatment. Ozone has long been known as a potent agent for the cure of phthisis, but great difficulty was experienced in getting it pure, a condition absolutely essential. About three years ago two French physicians, Drs. Labbe and Oudin, perfected a process by which the genuine ozone was produced, and wonderful results have been achieved, it is said, by the inhalation of this subtle agent by patients in the Parisian hospitals. A vast sanitarium is now to be established at St. Raphael, and a good deal is likely to be heard of the ozone cure before long.—London Letter.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

English shoddy.—A plea for a new renaissance.—Temperance at the State House.—Other matters.—The Socialist vote in Massachusetts.—An anti-Protestant secret society.

Americans are often accused in that indiscriminate and wholesale way which came in with Mrs. Trollope, and will not go out, I fear, until the race of Trollopes is extinct—of worshipping titles. But in America—and perhaps New England especially—titled visitors are looked upon as curiosities, and, unless otherwise distinguished either by his character or achievements, even a royal duke need not feel especially flattered because people turn out to stare at him. Any public show would attract just such a crowd, and for the same reason. A friend told me, the other day, how a certain English lady belonging to the peerage was invited to dine with an American family of much wealth and high social position, but whose name as well as that of their guest must be kept out of print. The latter arrived late, but failed to make the ghost of an apology for the inconvenience she had caused by her delay. Worse still, when seated at the table she ordered about the waiters and acted as if she was in her own ancestral castle, where her mortified hostess probably wished her;—especially when "milady," having finished her dinner, departed in as abrupt and unceremonious a fashion as she came, hardly waiting long enough for a word of leave-taking with the family who had put themselves to so much trouble and expense to entertain her. Surely, none of the rich American snobs who disgrace us abroad would have been guilty of more unpardonable rudeness. The moral of the above tale is obvious. There are enough shoddy Britons who wear coronets to keep the shoddy Americans with more dollars than good-bred from feeling lonesome.

I noticed, last week, the death of a lady over 101 years old, who was a native of Litchfield county, Conn. Centenarians are growing so common that it was more her name—Mrs. Thankful Spaulding—than the number of her years which attracted my attention. I wish there could be a renaissance of those lovely, old-fashioned names, Thankful, and Prudence, and Hope, and Delight, that have been crowded out by our modern Ediths, and Ethels, and Mays. Such names are as rare to-day as antique China, and as sweet as the old-fashioned pinks that used to grow in our grandmothers' gardens, and which nobody sees now;—I refer, primarily, to the pinks, but secondarily to the gardens, too. Who that ever saw one has not longed to tread again those narrow walks where sweet-william, and cocks-comb, and London pride, and Jack-in-the-pulpit hobnobbed with stately tiger-lilies, and spreading lilacs and syringas; tended by some fair Patience, or Charity, or Faith, or whatever the virtue she was named for, with that refined, spirituelle beauty of face and form that always betokens a blossom out of the genuine New England stock. In the prevailing mania for everything that is old, why not revive some of the old-fashioned names?

But these are thoughts that savor too much of summer afternoons and "raspberries for tea," to be appropriate just now in view of this snow-covered landscape, and the probability that to-morrow morning the mercury will have dropped to zero. Let us turn to other and more practical matters.

The Massachusetts Legislature may well make up their minds at the outset, that they are not going to have an easy time this winter, as petitions without number are already beginning to pour in upon them,—of course on all sorts of subjects; but in numbers, as well as importance, temperance takes the lead; though the petition that woman suffrage be extended to include the license question, and that those vexatious restrictions which now hamper women-voters be taken off, can hardly be placed second. Several have been already presented, but they are only the advance guards of what will follow. Closer and closer the cordon is being drawn around the death-dealing dramshop. Many towns will vote for "no license," because they are surrounded by no-license communities; and to do otherwise would be to invite hither all the roughs for miles around and convert the midnight quiet of their streets into pandemonium. The instinct of self-preservation will work marvels. How many are prohibitionists when the matter concerns their own township, and for license when it concerns the State at large! I do not know whether "the meanest man" has yet been discovered, but the one who does not want the saloon at his own door, and yet will vote to plant it at his neighbor's, is certainly a very near relation.

In spite of President Eliot's reported assertion that no notice will be taken of Mr. Garrison's Open Letter, he has found that the Board of Overseers of the university hold a different opinion. At their recent meeting they discussed the matter for nearly three hours, and as a consequence, the most objectionable features of initiation into the "Dickey Club" will have to cease. But do these astute gentlemen really think that while they allow the tap-root of all the evil—the college secret society—to exist, they can prevent these scandals and abuses? Those students who desire to emulate the tattooed cannibals of New Zealand; indulge in private wine suppers, or otherwise gratify their refined instincts, will not, I imagine, be greatly troubled by this decision of Harvard's overseers.

The Fulton debating society—I don't know much about it, but it is a young men's literary association—has been debating the question whether women ought to vote, and decided it in the negative. Whether these young men ought not themselves to be disfranchised on the ground of imbecility, might be a good subject for some young woman's debating society.

The dividing line between socialism, nationalism, and anarchism is rather faint in the minds of people who have never given much thought to these various political theories. Massachusetts had two tickets in the field for governor, one "nationalist" and one "socialist," with a total of 3,201 votes, of which the former received the largest number—1,772. The nationalists comprise many deep and earnest thinkers, both in the rank and file, and their ideas are bound to spread. The socialists comprise the foreign element, mostly, who believe more or less in the gospel of dynamite. The one has noted clergymen and cultured men for leaders, and is continually laboring to perfect its theories and give them practical shape; the other is content with a few crude notions imported from the anarchist centers of Europe, and gravitates naturally to lodge methods and demagogue leadership. Their 1,429 votes are, as the Springfield Republican says, "quite a leaven, if it can be called a leaven. A leaven lifts up, indeed, and so does dynamite, but which of the two socialism is, remains to be proved."

Patrick Ford and his new anti-American secret society forms the subject of a lengthy leader in one of our anti-Romanist exchanges. It is a kind of chameleon, being known at the West as the Knights of Reciprocity, and at the East as the Continental League. All members are bound by oath not to reveal the secrets of the organization, which is, primarily, opposition to the secret Protestant orders. And why not? If patriotic Americans choose to use organized secrecy as a method, there is no law to hinder Romanists from doing the same—and let me add, with a much better chance of success. Before the Knights of Reciprocity turn out another Clan-na-Gael, the government would do well to heed Joseph Cook's warning, and prohibit both Romanists and Protestants from forming these secret oath-bound combinations. ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 20, 1892.

Congress is growing very war-like in its attitude towards Chili, in spite of the efforts of those members who believe that peace should be the uniform policy of the United States, to argue against making war upon Chili. Among the last is Representative Morse, whose active work in behalf of temperance and religion has made him many friends in Washington. He says: "I believe that a war with Chili would be cruel and barbarous, and against the arbitration policy of the nineteenth century. We undoubtedly have a case against Chili, but we can afford to let it stand to her debt upon our books, and bide our time for settlement by arbitration or otherwise. Chili is poor, and has been rent by civil war, and but recently emerged from a war with Peru, and the country is bankrupt and impoverished. The populace are ignorant, and their only idea of the military power of the United States has been obtained from a few wooden war ships that have represented us in that section. In the words of a great soldier, 'Let us have peace' and bide our time for reparation and justice." Senators Kyle and Peffer are also peace advocates.

The National League for the Protection of American Institutions, which has branches in all of the States and Territories, was organized for the purpose of bringing about a legal separation between church and state, and in accordance with that end has had introduced in Senate and House a bill providing for a Constitutional amendment prohibiting the enactment by any State of any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or to use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation, or to authorize either to be used for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society or undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

Senator Platt has re-introduced the old bill, which has been before several Congresses, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor in the District of Columbia. To offset this the liquor men have had a bill introduced in both House and Senate repealing so much of the law prohibiting the sale of liquor within one mile of the grounds of the Soldiers' Home, as affects the territory within the city limits, and they boast that they have power enough to have it passed. If this bill is passed, a number of bar-rooms of the worst character will be re-opened in the extreme northern end of the city, which were closed by the Soldiers' Home law. The temperance people from everywhere and the property owners in the section affected will work hard to prevent the passage of the liquor dealers' bill, and temperance people elsewhere can render them great aid by writing to their Senators and Representatives, requesting them to oppose the bill.

It may be that the idea of a union of all the Christian denominations in one great universal church will never be realized, but he must be unobservant indeed who does not see the constant increase of brotherly feeling between members of different denominations. A striking evidence of the existence of that feeling has just been given to the people of Washington. Last Saturday afternoon the beautiful Church of the Covenant, better known locally as "the President's Church," one of the handsomest, and one of the newest, of our large churches, was damaged by fire to the extent of about $20,000, although the main building was not irreparably injured. As soon as it was known that the fire had occurred, Rev. Dr. Stakely, pastor of the First Baptist church, waited upon Rev. Dr. Hamlin, pastor of the Church of the Covenant, and invited him and his congregation to share his church with its regular congregation until the damaged church could be put in condition again. Both ministers took part in the services both morning and evening, last Sunday, and both congregations crowded the spacious church to its doors, although it has the largest seating capacity of any Protestant church in the city. When Dr. Stakely, in the name of his Baptist congregation, made this generous offer to their Presbyterian brethren, he did not know how long it might be necessary for them to take advantage of it, which made it all the more generous. Fortunately, the regular services can be resumed in the Church of the Covenant next Sunday, although its interior is considerably disfigured by smoke.

The twenty-fourth annual convention of the American Woman Suffrage Association has been in session here this week.

A war on Sunday newspapers recently began at Pittsburgh, Pa., and was prosecuted with so much vigor that two of the city newsdealers were arrested under the auspices of the Law and Order League for selling this class of journals. Both were convicted of infractions of the Sunday law, but they were permitted to appeal for a new trial before a higher court. Previous decisions by the State Supreme Court have fully sustained the operations of the Sunday law, and these will hardly prove exceptional cases.

REFORM NEWS.

THE WASHINGTON AGENT IN NEW YORK.

CHENANGO BRIDGE, N. Y., Jan. 20, '92.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I lectured in the M. E. church at Ouaquaga, as I expected at last writing. A goodly number gathered and listened attentively, though the house was quite cold. The principal lodge there seems to be "the Red Men." This is composed of white men who have no better sense than to try and act like Indians. No argument is needed to keep people with good sense out of such a thing.

My visit to Windsor was very opportune. The Presbyterians had their church so injured by fire as to unfit it for use. The F. M. and M. E. pastors made me welcome. In the morning we had a blessed season waiting on the Lord with the Free Methodist friends. The pastor, Bro. L. D. Southworth, rejoiced to know of the convention at Binghamton. He expects to be present, with many members. We shall expect two or three loads from Windsor.

Rev. Mr. Kilpatrick, the M. E. pastor, when asked if he had given any thought to the secrecy question, replied, "Yes, a good deal." I inquired what conclusion he had come to regarding it. He said, "I never joined one, and never shall." He very kindly gave me his pulpit for the evening service, and exhorted his Masonic members to come and hear me. The church was well-filled with attentive listeners. An orthodox Methodist collection was taken at the close. Three buttons were contributed, doubtless by some thoughtful friend.

The Masonic lodge in Windsor is not thought to be in a flourishing condition. The last election of officers has been commented upon by many.

I learned, from one who has been there, some sad facts: The remains of a prominent Mason were kept four days, that a parade could be had with them on Sabbath. The services of a brass band were secured for the occasion. Some, wearing the white apron, were so intoxicated they stopped beside the fence while the procession went on to the cemetery.

Frequently the tobacco smoke is so dense in the room where the lodge is in session that it is difficult to see the officers. The last banquet was given at the hotel, kept by a Mason, a Mr. Quick. As he is also a liquor-seller, he would naturally lead in the quick road to destruction.

I was told that the Masonic minister of this place refused to attend; but what need the rest care as long as he straggles along in their public parades at funerals?

A man prominent in the Masonic lodge at Binghamton recently committed suicide. A special train was run on Sabbath that members of Windsor and other lodges might parade over his remains. A young man with whom I talked spoke of this minister as a Mason, and remarked, "it could not be very bad or he would not stay there." What do Masons care for ministers' protests as long as they can use them as stool pigeons to catch new subjects for their banquets?

JAN. 21. On train for Walton, N. Y.—I spoke last evening to a goodly number who gathered in a hall at Chenango Bridge. Several expressed their intention to attend the convention. Two subscribed by the Cynosure. As the time draws near for the convention, the interest increases. Four thousand bills, advertising it, have been printed. I mailed over one thousand in small packages to friends near Binghamton. Will not all those receiving them see that they are circulated, as far as they can? Local newspapers will often give notice, if requested. Let us each stand at our post, do what we can, and come to the convention expecting a rich blessing.

Yours for Christ and reform,

W. B. STODDARD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SHALL WE HAVE WAR WITH CHILI?

BARABOO, Wis., Jan. 20, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The daily press is burdened with indications and prophecies of war. It is said that President Harrison will shortly send a message to Congress, stating our grievances and showing reasons why we should demand redress. War preparations have been commenced in earnest. The navy is being gotten ready; coast defences are looked after, and an account is being taken of our available fighting force. In short, war is in the air, and may break out at any time. Is there no occasion? Ought not the dignity of the nation and the rights of her citizens to be protected? Consider the provocation. Some seamen from one of our American vessels were on shore at a Chilian port, and (as has not been disproved) were engaged in no unlawful act. They were set upon by a mob. Some were killed, and others maltreated. The Chilian government has, up to date, made no apology, and undertaken no redress. Ought they not to be punished and humiliated?

Let us consider. The Chilian people have recently passed through the throes of revolution. They have not gotten over the intoxication of their success. They verily thought, though perhaps without reason, that we were partial to their oppressor. They have done to us very much the same that we as a nation have done to the people and government of Italy. Some of her subjects were charged with crime. They were tried and legally (not to say justly) acquitted. A mob set on them and hung eleven persons. Italy demanded redress. Our government disclaims responsibility. Not long ago a mob on our Western frontier set upon and killed about 150 unoffending Chinese. The most populous nation of the world felt that she was wronged, but did not make war. Suppose we declare war. The result will be that far more lives will be lost by disease and violence than the entire number of seamen that were assailed. There will be immense expense incurred, and, worse than all, a vast demoralization, such as war always begets; a putting back of the cause of temperance, and a checking of all the influences and blessings of Christianity. This will be the result, not only for ourselves, but also to the people of Chili, and, perhaps, other nations. And what will be gained? Not one life will be restored, and the Chilian people will surely not think more justly or kindly of us than before. Is there no alternative but war? Let us consider. But a few months ago the representatives of all the governments of both North and South America (except Canada) met in our national capital, and agreed that all international differences should be settled by arbitration. We were the leading nation in that movement, and surely ought not to be the first to depart from it. As the stronger nation, we are the party that ought to propose and urge the submission of our differences to an impartial tribunal. There is no reason to suppose that the Chilian people would prefer war to this method of settlement.

But suppose our proposal was rejected—what then? We could send our protest to all the civilized nations of the earth. We could bring the moral condemnation of the world to bear on them—a punishment more severe than any that we could inflict, and which would lead them sooner than any other course to lead to a reconsideration of their course. Should this fail, we have the remedy of non-intercourse, i. e., doing just what a dignified Christian man would do to one who had insulted and abused him—let him severely alone. "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." (Rom. 12: 18.) None can doubt that, in spirit at least, this admonition is addressed to nations as well as to persons. The great apostle of Christianity gives it as the wise and effective way of overcoming our enemies—yea, of heaping coals of fire on their heads. How sad, indeed, if we shall set the example of making war on a weak and distracted republic that has simply misunderstood us.

MASONRY COMPLETELY UNMASKED.

CHICAGO, Jan. 14, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Your readers are doubtless aware that the notorious Prince of Wales is a Freemason. Carter Harrison also passed over the "rough and rugged road," on his way to the Grand Council, to be finally dumped into a dark hole, there to grope for a cigar box, which he was solemnly informed was "the Ark of the Covenant, long lost, and now found." How exceedingly dignified "Our Carter" must have looked while groping his way through the Royal Arch degree, and swearing to assist a companion Royal Arch Mason, whether right or wrong. Even our accidental Mayor, Hempstead Washburne, I am credibly informed, has been recently thumped and knocked about by the ruffianly knuckles of Jubela, Jubelo, and Jubelum, and raised to the sublimely ridiculous degree of Master Mason. Such men as these, together with such preachers as are vile enough to join hands with the rabble of the lodge and take the blood-curdling oaths of the Masonic degrees, are generally pointed at by Masons as a proof that Freemasonry cannot be bad, or illegal, or murderous. But, in spite of all that can be said in that direction, the fact still remains that every Mason, irrespective of condition or social standing, is sworn under such oaths as would shame a savage, and bound under such penalties of death as would strike dumb with astonishment even the vilest wretch among the dago Mafia of New Orleans.

The oaths and death-penalties of Freemasonry are not only outrageous, but they are simply inexpressible in their horribleness. Cutting the throat, tearing out the tongue, tearing the left breast open and plucking out the heart, cutting the body in two, taking out the bowels and burning them to ashes, are among the first and mildest forms of imprecation which every Freemason is sworn under as he passes through each successive degree; and yet the editor of the Voice of Masonry has the brazen audacity to assert that "the only penalties known to Masonry are reprimand, suspension, or expulsion."

The first penalty known to Masonry is to have the throat cut. The second penalty known to Masonry is to have the left breast torn open; and the third penalty known to Masonry is to have the body cut in two; and when the editor of the Voice of Masonry asserts anything to the contrary, he simply states what is absolutely false, knowing it to be false. The Danites of Mormonism were bound by their oath to shed blood on behalf of their religion, and Freemasons are bound by their oath to shed blood on behalf of Masonry. There is no getting over or around this fact; it is undeniable, and can be established beyond any question or controversy.

But Freemasons are also sworn to conceal everything relating to their outlandish tom-foolery, and hence they don't hesitate to lie; and (in fact) they must lie, in order to conceal the truth and in defense of the odious character of a system of fraud, the greatest and the most gigantic that is known to modern history. I have sworn on oath, before a legal tribunal in this city, where I have been Worshipful Master of one of the most popular lodges, that everything contained in my Hand-Book is absolutely true—oaths and death-penalties included; and it may be reasonably accepted as certain, that if what I have sworn to be not true, the Masons who hate me so cordially would have had me in Joliet for perjury long ago. And now I challenge any reputable Mason in Chicago to declare under oath that what I say concerning the Masonic death-penalties is not true. The editor of the Voice of Masonry knows very well that everything I say concerning the oaths and death-penalties of Masonry is true in every particular, but in keeping his Masonic oath he must willfully lie in order to "conceal" the nefarious character of that villainous compound.

I glory in the fact that I have broken through all the bounds and barriers of the Masonic oaths, and I dare and defy Freemasons and their horrible penalties of death. Masonry is a foe to true liberty and to the proper administration of justice, and ought to be suppressed by law. Its tyranny is, at least, equal to anything to be found under the crowned heads of Europe. It is a system of falsehood, from beginning to end, and preys upon the community through fraud. Yet, strange to say, those who call themselves Christian ministers are the main supporters of this monstrous iniquity. E. RONAYNE

NOTES FROM A KANSAS PASTOR'S STUDY.

DOUGLAS, Kan., Jan., 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The gripe is a great calamity to church work when it comes. Congregations are thinned out, and the prayer-meeting circle almost or quite broken up. Revival efforts have to be abandoned, and everybody must take care of the physical man. Somehow it does not injure political efforts, or theatrical performances, as much. This suggests the query whether it may not be complicated with a spiritual gripe, which is indeed sometimes present without any physical disease. Its approach is very subtle, and often its deadly work is done before the victim perceives its presence.

Now and then we see articles bewailing the persistent practice of writing a certain word "Xmas." To me it seems quite appropriate. X is the unknown quantity. Such is Christmas. It has, of course, nothing to do with Christ, for he was not born at that season of the year. Dr. Edersheim tries to persuade himself that Christmas is an evolution of the Jewish Feast of the Dedication, but the evidence seems to be that Dr. Huntington was right when he called it the Saturnalia. Xmas is a good name for it.

Dec. 24 last, occurred the Feast of the Dedication in the Jewish calendar. It is a memorial of some of the most heroic deeds of history. Antiochus Epiphanes had set up the worship of Jupiter in the temple. The sacrifice of that pagan deity had been offered on the great altar of burnt offering. But Judas Maccabeus and his comrades rallied, drove out the minions of Antiochus, and on the 25th of Kisleu, B. C. 164, rebuilt the great altar, and began anew the worship of Jehovah. Their heroic deeds saved Judaism to the world, and thus put it in position to produce the Christ. All honor to Judas Maccabeus and his compatriots.

My window fronts on one of the leading roads to Oklahoma. Nearly every day, for months, the "prairie schooners" have been passing, many toward the south and a few toward the north. They are of quite varied appearance; some old and battered, some new and carefully covered with oilcloth. Some are now provided with stoves, the smoke ascending as the vehicle moves on its way to the supposed promised land. Sometimes the wagons move in groups, and sometimes a lone one passes. The occupants are as varied as the vehicles. Some have "left their country for their country's good," and some leave vacancies behind not easily filled. Some are going really to build up new and valuable homes, and others are the old nomads who fulfill the exaggerated prophecy of the left-handed genius of Buchanan when he vetoed the homestead bill.

I have been reading a book called Romans Dissected. It was intended for a burlesque on the so-called "higher criticism," but the author found that some of his thunder was stolen by Dutch critics who put forward something of the same analysis and division of the book among different authors, in earnest. The question suggests itself, in the higher criticism where does earnest leave off and burlesque begin? Or is it all burlesque? Mr. McRealsam succeeds in making quite a plausible case in favor of four authors for the book of Romans, with, of course, a Redactor on whom can be loaded all the things that militate against the theory, just as is done by the subjective school of criticism in the case of Genesis. It is a refreshing book to read.

OUR INFLUENCE.

OLEAN, N. Y., January, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I read the following in the Christian Advocate (New York) of January 7:

"Whether a Christian gentleman can be an active member of a club, and at the same time be true to his home and his church, is a serious question. Leaving out of the account the consideration that the drinking and the games are encouraged and indorsed by him, and that his example may lead others into a snare, even if he should himself escape unharmed, there remains the fact that his club-life and home-life may conflict."

My mind immediately rested upon the condition of Christian men in the churches who have passed on and up to the 33d degree of the shocking-oath-bound, death-penalties-inflicting anti-Christ Masonic club—for what else is it, with its mock ceremonies and pretentious morality formulated into religious rites, clasping in its embraces the inspired Jesus Christ Word, which, with its Author, it necessarily rejects?

We naturally inquire, How can these false lights escape "the damnation of hell," as Jesus said of just such characters in his day, who decoy the unwary from the paths of rectitude?

Many, by their example, have led others into a snare from which they have never been extricated, and for which they shall give an account in the great day of final assize. The churches are infested with this "fretting leprosy." What shall the end be? (Rev.) WOODRUFF POST.

LITERATURE.

The current number of the Review of Reviews is important to all intelligent Americans for its article by Mr. Stead, on the Czar and his great frozen empire. It is claimed that Mr. Stead is the only English-speaking journalist who ever had the honor of interviewing the Czar. He therefore writes with peculiar zest; and having as exceptional a knowledge of Russian affairs in one direction as George Kennan has in another, he makes plain to every intelligent reader much that the strong feeling, perhaps prejudice, and contradictory statements of the latter have thrown into confusion in the American mind, respecting the real power of the Czar. He is an autocrat and despot, but, Mr. Stead declares, impotent as Edison or De Lesseps before a Rhone glacier. The article contains a number of portraits, and a fine map showing the famine districts, and another showing the so-called "Jewish Pale," the district within which the Jews are permitted to live. Another timely article is Two Champions of the Children, which describes Elbridge Gerry and his work, as the head of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and gives a lucid account of the great work which has been accomplished in London and England for the prevention of cruelty to British children under the leadership of the indefatigable and devoted Benjamin Waugh. A fine portrait and brief but cordial note introduces us to another leader in social reform, Rev. Oscar C. McCulloch, of Indianapolis, who died Dec. 10 last. The list of portraits is as full and valuable as ever, and the reader of this magazine has all he needs to know from the whole magazine world.

The January number of Our Day comes to us from its new home, the office of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, 161 La Salle street, Chicago, but retaining its previous editorial corps, which gives assurance that the magazine will not deteriorate by its removal, but, if possible, improve with age. It opens with a full-page photograph portrait of James Russell Lowell, "representing him at the meridian of his powers." Rev. Will C. Wood contributes a paper of timely importance and interest—"National Precedents for Sunday Closing of the World's Fair;" Prof. D. W. Simon discloses "Inadequate Theological Education in England;" Mrs. Julia Ward Howe presents "Woman Suffrage as a Weapon in Vital Reforms." Joseph Cook's "Boston Hymn" is "God's Light and Lightning," and his Monday Lecture treats of "Sunday Closing of the Columbian World's Fair" and "Lord's Day Lawlessness as a National Example," two topics discussed in his usually strong and convincing manner. The Book Notices, Vital Points of Expert Opinion, Questions to Specialists, and Editorial Notes, always interesting in their variety and adaptation to current thought, will be read with pleasure. Of the monthlies pledged to the cause of vital reforms, Our Day may be classed as among the most trustworthy exponents of truth and justice. Yearly subscription, $2.50; 25 cents a number.

The Missionary Review of the World for February devotes a large portion of its space to a most timely consideration of the work in China. In the department of Literature of Missions are two articles, the first by the Rev. John R. Hykes, of Kiukiang, on "The Importance of Winning China for Christ;" the other, by Rev. John Ross, of Moukden, North China, on "How the Gospel Spreads in China;" both of which present a most hopeful view for the future of missionary enterprise there. The Monthly Concert of Missions is also devoted chiefly to China, reviewing the causes and significance of the present troubles there. The various departments of the magazine as usual cover the broad field and present an excellent summary of mission work in all parts of the globe. Published by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York: $2 per year; 25 cents for single numbers. In clubs of ten, $1.50

"The Hand-Book of the United Presbyterian," a neat pocket pamphlet, issued from the office of the United Presbyterian (journal), Pittsburgh, Pa., is a timely and very useful publication. A large portion of its space is filled with analyses of the International Sabbath-school Lessons for 1892, arranged by Rev. Wm. J. Reid, D. D., containing the gist of each in a very concise and convenient form: Uniform Prayer Meeting Topics for the current year, prepared by the Permanent Committee on Narrative and State of Religion; Denominational Statistics; List of Boards of the Church; the Church Calendar; Appropriations for 1891-92; To Whom to Remit Money for the Boards, and Religious Statistics of the United States, make up the remainder of the pamphlet. Pittsburgh: Published by H. J. Murdoch & Co.

Vick's Floral Guide for 1892 is an annual of which many elegant issues have preceded it, and but few of which have excelled it in typography and illustration, or in the variety and attractiveness of its floral and horticultural features. The colored plates are especially fine, representing (1) the roadway across the head of the lakelet at the Vick seed farm, with choice carnation "settings;" A trio of "New French Cannas"—the Gen'l Boulanger, Chevalier Besson, and the Star of 1891; the Charmer Pea and Select Danvers Yellow Globe Onion, with a rural scene; the American Wonder Potatoe and Golden Nugget Corn, and the "Brilliant" Poppy. The other illustrative engravings are also finely executed. Ten cents sent to James Vick's Sons, Rochester, N. Y., will purchase one of these handsome and instructive "Guides."

Vick's Illustrated Magazine for January has a holiday element pervading it, which adds interest to its contents; among which may be named: Evening Hours at Home; Jerry's New Year's Call, by Carl Foster; Preparing for the Season of Flowers and Fruits; Raising Plants from Seeds, and a generous assortment of miscellaneous notes for gardeners and others—all excellent in their way. The principal engraving is The Christmas Rose, a hardy plant, but little cultivated in this country. It derives its name from the fact that it flowers about the 25th of December. In other words, it is the Black Hellebore, a native of Europe, now being introduced into this climate. The other illustrations are numerous and descriptive, and the entire number is quite acceptable in all departments. Rochester, N. Y.: Vick Publishing Co.

OBITUARY.

A MODERN BEZALEEL HAS DIED.

Mr. Edward Nichols died in Dunkirk, N. Y., on Thursday morning, January 7, 1892; and a clean and forcible writer says: "The sad event has cast a gloom over the whole city."

He was born in Middlebury, Vermont, September 13, 1850; and so was past forty-one years old. His father, George M. Nichols, a man of marked enterprise and superior parts, went South before the war, and accumulated a handsome property in Shreveport, La., without becoming a slaveholder, as almost all men who moved South were then accustomed to do at that time, ministers of the Gospel included; for there, amid slavery, the bottom of public morals had fallen out. And "if the foundations are destroyed, what can the righteous do?"

Mr. Nichols, Sr., was an upright man; and though his early Methodist training faded as good seed among the thorns of the world, when the slavery war throttled his career as a Northern non-slaveholder and crippled his business and his life (for he died young), he asked the writer of this sketch: "Can you tell me what it is to experience religion?" His heart was turning to the religion of his fathers.

The readers of the Cynosure doubtless know Mrs. Maria Bent Nichols, the wife of the above, and the mother of Edward, now just deceased, who survives her husband and her son. She is the youngest sister of Mrs. Mary A. Blanchard and the grand-daughter of "Mother Avery," a remarkable woman, who was a niece of Samuel Adams, "the father of the American Revolution," whose Puritan blood has marked his descendants as fearless followers of God and friends of humanity. This is pre-eminently true of Mr. Adams' female descendants. When the Boston ladies turned out to spin on Boston Common, to teach the patriots that they could live without British manufactures, Grandmother Avery, then a girl, took the first prize for spinning, and her clear, calm power has marked her descendants, so that they still give her name to their children.

Mr. Nichols was blessed in the choice of the mother of Edward for his wife. She went to Shreveport with her husband, among slaveholders, but not of them; and true to his promise as her lover, he gave her a beautiful home for her children at Tarrytown, on the banks of the Hudson river, where she now lives with her children, keeping her ancestral piety and integrity, amid churches weakened by worldliness, and corrupted by the lodge.

Such were Mr. Edward Nichols' ancestry; and we do not wonder that his death "caused a shock" to the city, and that "men spake of the death of this noble man with a feeling of deepest sorrow and regret."

We could wish the Dunkirk paper had given us his religious character, of which the writer says not one word. Pres. Charles A. Blanchard, his cousin, tells us that they met, in their young manhood, and that Edward expressed his belief in Christ in a tone of regret that the stream of his business was leaving him little time for religious thought. We know that the band-dogs and minions of the lodge crouch and fawn, and flatter such men, to draw them under the power of its sorcery. But the Dunkirk writer curtly tells us: "Mr. Nichols was a member of no fraternity." He stood by his mother's principles against the lodge, as his father had done against slavery.

But not all Christians are like the ancient prophets and apostles, or like the modern Gladstone. We read of Bezaleel (Genesis 35: 30, 31), that he "was filled with the Spirit of God," "to work in gold, in silver, and in brass," which the cause of God then needed.

Let us take from the Dunkirk paper the facts in the life of this modern Bezaleel, whose skill and labor have been given to the science of metallurgy and of perfecting the iron-work of Christian civilization, from the ore to the furnace-blast in the factory, the thundering locomotive, and even the concrete sidewalk which leads to the depot. Everything which lifts a Christian State above pagan countries is a bugle-blast for the Christian religion.

This is Mr. Nichols' record:

At the age of thirteen he was sent to a military academy. At sixteen he entered the Rensselaer Polytechnic School at Troy, N. Y., to study metals; and in his senior year he was appointed Professor of Chemistry. Had he been sent to Middlebury College he might have preached Christ. In 1875, he traveled extensively in Europe, among mining and metals, and learned to read several languages. At Philadelphia, in 1876, he was Secretary of Mining Engineers in the Centennial Exposition, in which capacity he received foreign engineers and wrote reports for foreign and home journals. In 1877-79, he traveled largely amid furnaces, joined a large company, and was sent to conduct iron-works in Georgia. Soon afterwards he operated locomotive works at Philadelphia and Troy.

While in Georgia he was appointed State Geologist, and gave good satisfaction to the authorities.

In 1884, he was married to Miss Jessie Brooks, of Dunkirk, where, in 1885, he became president of an asphalt paving company, with his office in Cincinnati. In 1887, he was elected president of the Brooks Locomotive Works in Dunkirk; in 1888, he organized an engineering company, and was elected to the city council of Dunkirk; and took other public employments, amid which, in life's greenness and vigor, he died, as above recorded. His ruling passion manifested itself even in his death, which resulted from a visit to a fire, one night, in his locomotive works; and the pall upon his coffin covered the city with mourning.

MASONRY AND THEOSOPHY.

What is the relation, the harmony—what the points of union and sympathy between these two systems? The question is agitating English Freemasons since the new religion of Buddhistic spiritualism has gained such a following in England. Some who fail to understand the origin and philosophy of either are hostile to this latest introduction of Oriental faith; but others, better informed, call for a fair consideration of the doctrines of the Theosophists, confident that they will be accepted as a fortunate aid in promoting the religious philosophy of the lodge.

Madame Blavatsky, the founder of Theosophy, herself recognized the affinity of Masonry, as expounded by its ablest exponents, like Albert Pike. In her first great book, "Isis Unveiled," she refers to Freemasonry at length, and with marked favor, recognizing and accepting its origin as cognate with her own system. This book is published in this country in two large volumes (two, I believe), by Bouton of New York, but is too expensive to be often found. Its title is sufficiently suggestive to a student of Masonry.

Col. Olcott, who has for years been recognized as one of the ablest lieutenants of Madame Blavatsky, a venerable and central light in her company, was among the first authorities appealed to by the press of New York for an opinion respecting the discovery of Masonic emblems by Licut. Gorringer under the Egyptian obelisk when transferring it to Central Park, New York. His opinion was given, as I remember, both as a Mason of high degree and a disciple of Oriental mysticism, and was so quoted in the Cynosure of that day.

It is a very direct proof, however, that the Blavatsky system is little understood, when we remember that a representative theosophist gathering in Chicago, some two years ago, drew quite as little attention as would an anti-secret convention. William T. Stead, of Pall Mall Gazette fame, and founder of the Review of Reviews, in a sketch in that magazine (July, '91) says that this new system makes it possible for the most cultivated and skeptical men to believe ardently that the invisible world about us contains intelligences vastly superior to our own in knowledge of the truth, and, what is more, that "it is possible for man to enter into communion with these hidden and silent ones and to be taught of them the Divine Mysteries of Time and of Eternity." "She made them believe it, and founded what was to all intents and purposes a church upon that faith."

Again he says:

"It brought back to the scientific and skeptical world the great conception of the greatest religions, the existence of sublime beings, immeasurably superior to the pigmy race of men, who stand, as it were, midway between the Infinite and ourselves. Of the immense but invisible hierarchy by which our forefathers spanned the fathomless abyss between God and man, hardly even the memory now remains. In her strange, weird fashion, Madame Blavatsky resuscitated this ancient faith. Her great doctrine of the Mahatmas, of the existence of a brotherhood of sublime sages, the vicegerents of the Infinite, did something to repeople the void which modern skepticism has depopulated."

Mr. Stead betrays the weakness of a hero-worshiper in his sketch of Madame Blavatsky, as he has at other times in his brief biographies; and we may seriously question the course of his magazine in giving so much attention to the leaders and theories of this new religion.

A. P. Sinnett, the biographer of Madame Blavatsky, for years her intimate friend and disciple and most distinguished of her converts, and the literary exponent of esoteric Buddhism, writes in the Review that the new doctrine teaches "that there are people in existence whose knowledge and power transcends that of ordinary mortals; that they correspond in the present day to the initiated hierophants of ancient religious systems; that some touch with the superior wisdom they possessed was to be got at through the study of Indian sacred literature; and that Western communities, in-so-far as they had begun to investigate abnormal, super-physical phenomena by means of the practices resorted to by 'spiritualists,' were altogether on the wrong track."

Hence Madame Blavatsky strenuously opposed modern spiritism as tending to degrade and bring obloquy upon her doctrine. At the same time, she could but be favorable to Freemasonry, since it came out of the same mysterious region of pagan faith. Albert Pike was equally interested with her in Hindu philosophy, and spent years of his life in the translation of the Vedas; while his funeral (for which a Christian church was given up) was celebrated at midnight with such gruesome and fantastic rites as might well celebrate the translation to the company of spectral Mahatmas. The power of the lodge, with the Prince of Wales in England as Grand Master, and various would-be lordlings, bearing titles of royalty in our own democratic America, gave Madame the assurance of influential patronage.

It would prolong this writing beyond measure to speak of the character of Madame Blavatsky and of her successor, Mrs. Anne Besant. It is enough to say that the "new" doctrine simply proves that there is nothing new under the sun.

The prophet Daniel was troubled for three weeks by a "Mahatma," called the "Prince of Persia;" and the "principalities and powers," between whom and us Mr. Stead says, with singular forgetfulness, there is a great gulf fixed, are yet, the Holy Spirit assures us by Paul, so near that we "wrestle" with them. It may fairly be questioned whether Macbeth's witches were not of the same class as the Mahatmas of Thibet. One thing is certain, the Blavatsky "brotherhood of sublime sages" have never helped mankind, through her, to any supernatural revelations or works that differ from the ordinary manifestations of witchcraft or spiritualism, except in quality or degree.

THE NEW YORK ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

On the first page of this issue will be found the official call for this convention at Binghamton, February 2 and 3. It is very desirable that it should be widely advertised, fully attended and pronounced in its proceedings.

Below we print extracts from letters received from active and prominent anti-secrecy reformers, which indicate the spirit and design of the convention:

From A. R. Dodd, A. M., Principal of the Houghton (N. Y.) Seminary and Business School, and President of the State Anti-Secret Christian Association:

"Your letter found me very sick with la grippe, and passing through the deep waters of affliction, for our little baby boy Charlie died with pneumonia, Jan. 11th. . . . My wife is still sick in bed, under the doctor's care. I am just able to sit up and write a letter. . . . I don't know as it will be possible for me to be present at your meetings in body, but I shall be with you in spirit. . . . I hope the convention will be a decided success. Yours in the bonds of the Gospel,

"A. R. DODD."

From the venerable and well-known anti-secrecy reformer, Nathan Callendar, Montdale, Penn.:

"DEAR BROTHER: . . . I would say that I will do all in my reach to help the Binghamton meetings. I will come, if God permits, and bring some along by church appointment, if I can. The only doubt in my mind is founded on the state of my health; I am subject to neuralgia. Should I pledge myself to come and give an address, it would turn on my condition at the time. I am most happy in the fact of a convention in Binghamton—the parlor city. Parlor meetings in New York as well as in New England! Amen. Hope to see that dear veteran of the anti-secrecy campaign—J. P. Stoddard. Time has marked him—I see by his picture in a late Cynosure. We have worked some together in Scranton, Carbondale, and in other places. God bless the general agent! . . . Yours in the Lord Christ,

"NATHAN CALLENDAR."

From Rev. S. G. Shaw, pastor of the Covenant church at Walton, N. Y.:

"I feel somewhat complimented in being chosen by you out of all our ministers in New York to represent the Covenant church; but probably the fact that Walton is a neighbor city to Binghamton has had something to do with the selection. I have not yet, of my own choice, refused to speak for the truth when duty called. I am opposed to secretism, and am not ashamed to say so anywhere. I shall be glad to do what I can for you. You may then look for me. Not having had much experience along this line of work, I do not feel that I could do justice to any particular line of discussion. It will be safer for me, on the start, to deal rather with the general question. I should put my subject in some such words as these: 'Why the Covenanters Oppose the Lodge.' If this will suit, put it so in the program; or, if you can word it better, do so. I am yours very sincerely,

S. G. SHAW."

From Rev. S. R. Wallace, of Syracuse, N. Y.:
"The Lord willing, I will be with you at the convention in Binghamton, February 2 and 3. . . . I will be glad to do anything I can to help the convention, for these (secret) societies, great and small, are a great evil. Yours in Christ,

"THE SECRET ORDER OF JUSTICE."

The present county seat war first developed in Kansas an organized conspiracy to kill Judge Botkin, Attorney Pitzer, Sheriff Dunn and several other persons in the southwest, and then revealed an oath-bound murder society, known as the "Secret Order of Justice," with a death-penalty for disobeying its mandates. Sheriff Dunn, it is now confidently asserted, was slain by order of this murderous cabal, which also contrived the plot against Judge Botkin. Parties in Topeka are believed to be in active co-operation with this society.

Three men (so the printed accounts of this conspiracy assert), who resided in widely-separated localities, have furnished information concerning the conspirators, and their forecasts have always been correct, proving that they have never made guesses.

While they are not ready at this time to reveal the full enormity of this criminal organization, they have learned enough of its workings to show that three separate oaths bind the members to obey the orders of the inner council without question, even though they may be commanded to take the life of their dearest relatives.

In the counties of Haskell, Grant, Stevens and Seward there are sixty-five members, all of whose names have been secured by Judge Botkin.

These men are taken only from the Alliance, and even then the utmost care is used in selecting proper material. The meetings are held only at Springfield and at Woodsdale, where the three degrees are taken.

The first degree binds the members to stand by each other in public and in private, and to defend each other at the risk of life, if necessary. The applicant is pledged, under penalty of having his residence burned and his stock and crops destroyed, never to reveal aught that may come to his knowledge concerning the actions of any member.

When taking the second degree he swears to join any member or members in the protection of their rights and in resenting any personal affront or injury. If he fails in responding when called upon or reveals any contemplated action on the part of a fellow member, his life may be declared forfeited by the council to which he belongs.

It will be noticed that in these two degrees there is no provision for enforcing the penalty. Every member is expected to take all three degrees. In the final degree he places himself at the disposal of the inner council in life and death. He swears to faithfully execute any orders issued him by that council. He is given to understand that the power of this "secret order of justice" will be directed against the enemies of one or all of the organization. He further swears that when ordered to "destroy" any member proving traitorous, or even suspected of being such, that he will unhesitatingly obey such mandate.

When called out by the inner council or by one member thereof, he swears to obey, holding himself in readiness at all times to join any party for the extermination of common enemies. Failing in any part of his obligations, he places his life at the disposal of his comrades.

It has been learned that a meeting of this organization was held in a deserted hotel at Springfield, the night before the Dunn murder, at which forty-one men were present.

There are no rituals or written work. The oaths are administered by one of three men who are now definitely located.

A figure cipher is used in transmitting orders which is somewhat similar to the cipher used in a letter unearthed about a month since at Meriden, signed by the State Secretary of the City zen's Alliance. It is more intricate, but the similarity is marked.

Judge Botkin now has the following cipher message:

"ZELL, Kansas, Lov 41, 891—Dear Sir: C, 5, 21, 9, 15, 16, 23, 4, 16, 5, O'Connor; 1, 2, 8, 9, 15, 2, 5, 7, 8, 2. Brennan, 3, 4, 7, 8, B. 3, 5, 8. Botkin, C, 2, 5, 7, 8. Sam Dunn, 2, 17, 5, 19, 21, 13, 5, 9, 7, 6, 14, 16, 3, 9, 17, 8. Pettyjohn, D, 5, 3, 17, 12, 21, 18, 15, 9, 14, 7, 8, 11, W, 8. Steele, 9, 16, 12, 18, 19, 7, C. M. Davis, 9, 2, 4, 13, 21, 15, 18, 9, 9, 11, 14, 21, 26, 23, 8, 5, 13. Jones, 9, 13, 16, 18, 15, 7, 14, 2, 5, 8, 23, 25, 23, 8, 5, 14, 14, 12.

This information comes from one of three men who joined the society, who has been spirited away to a place of safety.

The other two men, by their testimony, it is anticipated, will be enabled to strengthen the evidence they already have as soon as the proper time comes, and within a week or so, it is expected, the plans of the prosecutor will be so fully matured that arrests may begin, when all the details will be given.

NATIONAL PROBLEMS.

Each of the great nations of Christians finds itself confronted by one or more intricate problems, the solution of which by human effort seems impossible. We indicate a few of them:

In England, the Irish question, Disestablishment, the liquor traffic. Russia is confronted by her starving, discontented millions; while in all Europe and America the labor question is immediate and pressing.

With us, the national problems are the caste question—How shall we secure to the Negro the rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution? How shall we stop the using and traffic in intoxicating drinks? What can be done to secure a suppression of our increasing crime, and a better enforcement of law? And, last, but not least, What shall be done with the vast net-work of secret societies that confront us at every point, and do so much to depress Christianity and promote human selfishness? This, too, is a world-wide question. Just now, China, as well as ourselves, is deeply concerned in its solution.

Whatever helps we may have in the way of legislation and political action, the remedy—the only effective hope—is in the Gospel of Christ and its specific application to existing evils. There is no other remedy. All appeals to violence, to secret combinations, or to any other form of selfishness, will be, at best, but a temporary expedient, that is liable to always re-act in some other form of iniquity. We cannot overcome evil with evil. Christ alone can destroy the works of the devil.

MOTES AND BEAMS.

A writer in late numbers of the Religious Telescope considers the subject of amusements, showing the great impropriety of Christians engaging in dancing, card-playing, theatre-going, etc.

We heartily sympathize with the writer and the medium of his communications in his testimony against these forms of folly and worldliness. We believe their prevalence is one of the signs of the times when "men shall be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, having the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof."

But while we should regard such a testimony in most of other religious papers as both appropriate and consistent, it strikes us strangely as found in the Telescope. For many years, and until within a recent period, that paper held, and proved, that Freemasonry was an exceedingly gross and terrible form of iniquity, and that for an enlightened Christian to be connected with it was a sin, compared with which dancing and theatre-going are but harmless pastimes.

Now it welcomes Masons to church membership and the pulpit, resists all consideration of the secrecy question, and allows its office to be run by a secret trades-union. Nor has this change come because of any new light as to the character of Freemasonry. It is simply to conform to a perverted public opinion. It has not been done ignorantly, but with a full understanding of its gross inconsistency. Truly, if the management was blind, it should have no sin; but now it says, we see; therefore, its sin remaineth. If this is a fair and charitable statement, will the Telescope tell us? We desire no controversy; but we do desire that those who know the truth shall not be ashamed to declare the whole counsel of God.

MURDER, OR BLASPHEMY—WHICH?

The Voice of Masonry denies the charge that "Masonry promotes assassination," and says that its only penalties are "reprimand, suspension, and expulsion; it never takes life." The editor will not deny that the oaths of Masonry are correctly given by Edmond Ronayne and others. They have been repeatedly proved in courts of justice. Many witnesses stand ready to testify that every Freemason has sworn under a death-penalty, and has called God to witness his oath.

Now, every such Mason either means what he says, or he does not. If he means what he says, he means murder. If the penalty is ever to be executed on its violator, some one must execute it, and such executioner would be, both legally and morally, a murderer. Revealing the secrets of Masonry is not a crime against the state, and no one has a right to inflict death, except "by due process of law." To do this is murder. But suppose he does not mean what he says, and the oath is merely a form of words, meant only to terrorize? Why, then it is simply blasphemy. It is calling God to witness what is not true—what is not meant to be true. It is taking the name of God in vain. It is more than lying—it is a false oath. Each Mason is foresworn.

Now, which horn of the dilemma will the editor take? We will be fair with him. He may choose between being a sincere murderer, or a lying blasphemer.

IS PIETY BECOMING EXTINCT?

We notice two of the most recent methods of raising money for church purposes. The first was at Durand, Mich., for the benefit of a Lutheran church, where "in a row stood six of the prettiest girls in the congregation, blushing and giggling, each bearing upon her bosom a placard, on which were the words, 'You may kiss me for 25 cents.' It was fifteen minutes before the device began to work, but when it did the silver quarters fairly showered into the aprons of the young ladies' circle. Old men and young eagerly rushed to the front to exchange coins for kisses." The other case occurred in a Congregational church at Marine, Ill., and is reported in the Chicago Congregational News as church news: "One of the most interesting and amusing features of the evening was 'Mrs. Jarley's Wax Figure Show,' including over twenty specimens of the leading characters of ancient and modern times, impersonated by home talent." "The remainder of the program, consisting of recitations, dialogues and a pantomime, was rendered in a very pleasing manner. The proceeds will go to the church." "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Eccl. 11: 9.

REV. DR. CARRADINE ON "CHURCH ENTERTAINMENTS."

Rev. Dr. B. Carradine, of St. Louis, has written a little book on the subject of church entertainments, in which he embodies twenty specific objections to this species of money-making devices. Dr. Carradine is a fearless reformer, and, withal, as sound in his arguments as he is forcible in his methods when combating social and public evils. Many have written, and ably, upon this subject of church entertainments as derogatory to the interests of Christianity, but none, we may venture to say, has presented more numerous or more cogent reasons why festive reunions in the house of God, or for its pecuniary benefit, should forever be abolished.

His objections may be thus briefly named: 1. Church entertainments precipitate into the church the most agitating and disturbing of all things—money-making. 2. They are a perversion and desecration of the house of God. 3. They are a misconception of the mission of the church. 4. There is no warrant for, or example of, them in Scripture. 5. They neutralize and defeat God's plaus and labors in behalf of the spiritual life of his people. 6. They create the impression in the world that the great aim and struggle of the church is for money. 7. They are an open humiliation of Jesus Christ, by placing his cause, or church, as a mendicant at the feet of the world. 8. They produce utter physical exhaustion and demoralization upon the congregation. 9. They are productive of the most unhappy differences and dissensions in the congregation. 10. They operate as a screen, or cloak, for the covetousness and avarice of many church members. 11. They shift the responsibility of church support from the congregation to outsiders, and hence are a dodge or avoidance of a gracious and imperative duty. 12. They commit the sin of a blemished offering. 13. They re-commit the sin of Ananias and Sapphira by imperfect offerings. 14. They involve the churches in the grossest inconsistency and contradiction. 15. They are purely worldly in character. 16. Their educational tendencies are evil. 17. They entail financial loss upon the church. 18. They entail spiritual loss upon the church by destroying the lines and distinctions which God has drawn between the church and the world. 19. They rob the pulpit of its force, and the church of its rebuking power. 20. The final objection to church entertainments is grounded on the fact of the general testimony against it—in the Scripture, the religious press, and church conferences, synods, etc.; which by their antagonism have branded these entertainments with ridicule and deserved censure. With such material for a foundation, Dr. Carradine has produced an exhaustive and eminently instructive treatise. It is published by A. W. Hall, Syracuse, N. Y.

—Miss Willard and the W. C. T. U. have placed themselves squarely on the record for arbitration in the threatened war with Chili, by addressing a special request to President Harrison to that effect. This movement indicates a Christian spirit, and, if possible, the outcome should preserve unbroken peace between the two nations. But the Chilians are disposed to be stubborn, rather seeking hostilities than conciliation, and their offense was clearly an international crime, devoid of justification. Hitherto the United States has received honor for the security which she throws around even the humblest of her citizens when exposed to insults and abuse in foreign lands; and certainly her soldiers and sailors are entitled to similar protection in all countries with which we are at peace. War is not only a very harsh remedy in cases of aggression, but also very expensive and unprofitable. Therefore, let us arbitrate, if we can, without forfeiting our blood-bought constitutional rights. If arbitration fails, there is no alternative but war.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Rev. F. M. Evans, the great lodge apostle and orator, delivered a series of lectures at Keota, Iowa, last week, on "The Glories of Odd-fellowship."

—The Free Methodist church mourns the recent death of one of its oldest and most active members, D. W. Abrams, of Michigan—a man "greatly beloved."

—Rev. S. F. Porter, the College Agent, is still detained at Oberlin, Ohio, by ill health. He, however, continues to improve, but wisely prefers not to take the field again until he becomes stronger.

—Rev. Wm. Fenton, after a sojourn in Chicago of several days, which he passed in visiting some prominent city pastors and obtaining their views concerning secret societies, returned to St. Paul last week. After a brief rest he will be ready to enter upon active work again.

—The rather sudden death of Rev. Richard W. Hawkins, of Oleau, N. Y., is announced. Some years ago he was a bright light in the Free Methodist church, and after his withdrawal from that denomination, his light continued to shine. Not only was he a pious preacher, but a thoughtful, logical writer for the press. Latterly his articles have appeared in the Wesleyan Methodist, and he had once published a notable treatise on "Redemption." We believe that he also left in manuscript, unfinished, an elaborate work on Modern Spiritualism and its evils. At his death he was General Missionary Superintendent of the Wesleyan Methodist church. There is abundant reason to hope that his rest is glorious.

THE HOME.

GOD'S HOLY WORD.

Impress, dear Lord, day unto day
Upon our minds thy holy Word;
So may its truths take root and stay
That we to deeper faith be stirred,
And o'er hearts thy love distill,
Till self be lost in thy sweet will!

Dear Master, help us as we read
To gather from thy pages sweet
The strength for purer word and deed,
