We are glad to see this new series of books under way. While so many other subjects are treated in series of handy volumes, it is well that philosophy should be made popular by being made accessible to all. To condense into a readable, convenient volume the substance of each of the leading English philosophers is a very good work to have done. The method of doing this, as set forth by the editor, is the only true one,—to let each philosopher speak for himself, by giving a simple and condensed statement of his ideas. "We seek to lay before the reader," says the editor, "what each English philosopher thought and wrote about the problems with which he dealt, not what we think he ought to have written. Criticism will be suggested rather than indulged in, and these volumes will be expositions rather than reviews." A brief biography is to be given of each philosopher, a list of his works, of the books written about him, and each volume is to be complete in itself. The series is to include an Introduction to the Study of Philosophy, by Prof. H. Sidgwick; Prof. Fowler writes of Bacon and of Shaftesbury and Hutcheson; Prof. T. H. Green, of Berkeley; Miss Helen Taylor, of J. S. Mill; while Hamilton, Mansel, Bentham, Austin, Hobbes, Hartley, and James Mill, Locke, Hume, Paley, Reid, and others, are to be included. The writers are not made known, with one or two exceptions; but the series may be quite as valuable as though men of literary reputation did the work. The volume already issued, on Adam Smith, gives good promise of the faithful manner in which the whole series is likely to be treated. Mr. Farrer has already attracted attention by his interesting and valuable book on Primitive

Digitized by Google

Manners and Customs, and he seems to have made a very faithful résumé of the moral philosophy of Adam Smith in this volume. Smith is widely known for his great book on the Wealth of Nations and as the originator of political economy. He is not so well known as the author of a Theory of the Moral Sentiments. It is this last work alone which Mr. Farrer writes about in this very neatly printed volume of two hundred goodly-sized pages, which is very pleasant to read, with its clear type and fine paper. Smith's theory of morals is mainly valuable now as showing the history and gradual growth of the utilitarian ethics. His book is, however, of importance and value even now for its remarkably clear analysis and presentation of human motives and conduct. He had evidently studied human nature very closely, and his wise observations on a great variety of subjects are worthy of an attentive perusal. Lord Brougham called his book "a performance of the highest merit." Lord Jeffrey said he was "nearly the first to make deeper reasonings and more exact knowledge popular among us." While Mackintosh, in speaking about the main subject of his book, says he was "the first to draw attention to one of the most curious and important parts of human nature,—who has looked closely and steadily into the workings of sympathy." Smith accounted for morality by sympathy. In his hands, our tendency to sympathize with each other was made an all-powerful element in conduct. Put yourself in his place, was the basis of his system. It would be natural at once to ask, But why do we sympathize with each other? Though Smith does not fully develop the answer to this question, yet he had reached a practical solution of it. The foundation of sympathy is pain. We all suffer, we all enjoy; and out of these experiences we are led to sympathize with each other, to have a fellow-feeling, to desire each other's good, and to so order our conduct as to secure it. Smith had caught the idea which has since been worked out by others, and which has finally taken elaborate form in the writings of Herbert Spencer, of the utilitarian basis of morals. He was a forerunner of the intellectual theory of association and of the experience-theory of morals. His system of ethics appears constantly defective, because it lacked the foundation in heredity and the accumulative experience of the ages, which has at last been worked out for it in our own day. In fact, Smith was one of those patient thinkers and observers who laid the foundations for the scientific theory of ethics. Without his work and that of others, it is not probable Spencer would have been able to perfect his system. It is curious to note how he was feeling out toward, and dimly grasping, what has only been completely worked out in the last few years. Yet Smith showed many tendencies toward the idealistic theory, and from Hutcheson he received much help. The theory of Hobbes, that morality is what the legislators put into statute-books, he abominated and would have none of. In fact, Smith was in morals an eclectic. He tried to get the good out of all theories; and, while he condemned Epicureanism without stint, he went to Locke and all other utilitarians; yet he drew freely from all the idealists he knew. He tried to take the good in every theory, and to arrange around his central principle a system of morals which should reconcile all differences. His effort was as much a failure as all other eclectic systems have been. He had an organic principle, but he had not all the parts with which to work it out; and, when it was worked out, it totally rejected every form of morals save that based on experience. He was not a mere utilitarian by any means, but, on the foundation of sympathy, built up a careful system of conduct, that made much of duty, justice, and love. He believed in final causes in morals: he seems to have regarded sympathy as a fundamental or intuitive gift of human nature, and he accepted all the incentives and motives of religion. Farrer happily sums up his system in these words: "Man, having been intended by Nature for society, was fitted by her for that situation. Hence, she endowed him with an original desire to please, and an aversion to offend, his brethren. By teaching him to feel pleasure in their favorable and pain in their unfavorable regards, she laid, in the reward of their approbation or the punishment of their disapproval, the foundation of human ethics. In the respect which she has taught him to feel for their judgment and sentiments, she has raised in his mind a sense of duty, and girt her laws for his conduct with the sanction of obligatory morality. And so happily has she adjusted the sentiments of approbation and disapprobation, to the advantage both of the individual and of society, that it is precisely those qualities which are useful or advantageous to the individual himself, or to others, which are always accounted virtuous or the contrary." This brief summary will indicate how far short he was of grasping the idea of morals as based on experience. He recognized sympathy as based on pain and pleasure; but these last he had not discovered to be the slow accumulations of experience. He saw to what an extent morality depends on the relations and sympathies of men in society, dimly recognizing the idea of relativity; but he had not grasped the thought that sympathy is itself the creation of man's relations to the universe. In a similar way, he failed to lay hold of the idealistic theory of morals, as developed by Kant; though he often, and in many of the vital portions of his theory, more nearly resembles Kant than he does Bentham or Spencer. The real value of his book, however, is not destroyed because his theory would not now be acceptable to any school of moralists. Its wisdom, purity of thought, close knowledge of human nature, and its high ideals of conduct make it yet a volume worthy of attentive reading. Mr. Farrer gives a biographical sketch of Smith, an account of the theories previous to Smith's, as introductory to his résumé of the Theory of Moral Sentiments. He does not follow Smith's order of arrangement, but throws his matter into a more orderly and systematic form; while he takes up several subjects in separate chapters which Smith treats only incidentally, but which are important to a full understanding of his theories. At the close of the volume are chapters on Smith's relations to other theories of morals, and on the principal criticisms of his system. In reality, this volume gives the general reader in philosophy a much better idea of Smith's theories than could be had from the reading of his own book. This is an important service to perform, which we trust will be as well done for all the other English thinkers as in this case. A similar condensation of Smith's Wealth of Nations would be doubtless acceptable to many readers in political economy, who not only wish to know what such a man thought, but the nature of his influence on others, and his place in the world of science, as it has been determined by the advances of political economy since his day.

ELEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE MASSACHUSETTS HOMŒOPATHIC HOSPITAL, AND OF THE LADIES' AID ASSOCIATION.—This excellent Report gives a very vivid idea of this Hospital, which seems to have been managed with great skill and economy. An average cost of $7.00 per week for each patient is certainly very moderate, when we remember how much of care and comfort it covers.

Whatever judgment we may form of the differing schools of medicine (and far be it from us to decide where doctors so emphatically disagree), it is yet of great importance that a school which has so many adherents among the best portion of the people should have an opportunity for a thorough education of its physicians and a test of its practice which may be apparent to the public. We hope therefore that the appeal for funds for farther extension of the work will meet a liberal response.

One remark in the Report of the President should be noticed. He says, "A Lying-in Ward is greatly needed"; and, referring to the Lying-in Hospital, he adds, "It is of public importance that there should be more than one institution in the city to receive lying-in patients." It is strange that any one interested in this subject should not know that the New England Hospital has had Lying-in Wards from its foundation in 1861, at a time when there was no other provision for such cases out of the alms-house, the old Lying-in Hospital work being temporarily suspended, and a portion of its income given to the New England Hospital. This Hospital reports for the last year one hundred and ten midwifery cases, and it is now making an effort to add a second Maternity building, in order to do a still greater work.

We hope that the Homœopathic Hospital will also have its Lying-in Ward, since it is very important that the influence of homœopathy in the conditions incident to child-birth should have a chance to become known.

We would also say that this Hospital, like the College with which it is connected, is open not to men only, but that women have a fair share in all its advantages of study as well as in its management.

FOUR FEET, WINGS AND FINS. By Mrs. A. E. Anderson-Maskell. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

Children are naturally interested in animals. The infant crawls toward the house-dog or cat, and shows a genuine pleasure in touching it with his little fingers. This innate curiosity of children in respect to their "dumb relations," and disposition to fellowship them, may be made available in enlarging their acquaintance and quickening their sympathies with the animal world. Of course it is desirable that the living objects should be referred to, so far as they may be in such efforts. But this is possible only to a quite limited extent. The almost only redeeming thing in connection with the travelling menagerie or circus is what it offers in the way of this kind of knowledge. Natural History Institutes and Museums are of inestimable value for the aid they afford in this direction. But the printed and pictured page must be largely depended upon.

In the volume before us, all these resources are drawn upon to some extent. A group of eager and inquiring children are conducted by the lively and ingenious colloquial devices of an instructor, in the character of a sympathetic and entertaining nurse, through a succession of talks in-doors and excursions out-doors, that embrace the divisions of the animal kingdom indicated in the above title. The book is somewhat open to criticism, it appears to us, in view of the class of readers for whom it is designed, for its too frequent use of technical or Latin terms, and the inadequate explanation generally given of them. The information conveyed also is, as a whole, more on the surface than even the necessities of the case require. These defects are, nevertheless, largely atoned for by the wealth of finely executed illustrations in which its pages abound. Like all the books of D. Lothrop & Co., it is artistic and beautiful in its outward appearance.

THE contents of the April Wide-Awake bear to a considerable extent a happy adaptation to the month. The frontispiece, "A Joyous Little Maid," and its accompanying poem, are very suggestive of the new life and exhilarating influences of opening spring. "A Little April Fool" is no less timely. Of like character is the poem "A Bird's House," and the pretty little fancy, in a dozen poetic lines, under the title of "the Rain and the Flowers,"—of the rain, with its "tap, tap, tap," calling forth the flowers from "the great brown house where the flowerets live." St. Botolph's Bells gives a glimpse of New England winter in Puritan days. These are all finely illustrated, which, with several short sketches and continued stories, and the usual proportion of charades and puzzles, make up a rich and very enjoyable number. Babyland, issued by the same house, at the low price of fifty cents a year, is as bright and attractive this month as ever.

OUR LITTLE ONES for April rivals its elders in the promptness of its appearance as it continues to do in the beauty of its pages. Russell & Co., publishers.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE wife of Edwin Booth is dying in London.

TRANSLATIONS of Mill, Spencer, and Darwin are common in Japan, where the Origin of Species has a large sale.

THE present Pope in face bears a striking resemblance to Voltaire; and here, it may be supposed, the resemblance ends.

THE death is announced of Francis Trevelyan Buckland, best known as Frank Buckland, a popular writer on subjects of natural history.

MISS MARY F. EASTMAN addressed the Sunday "Lecture Association" of East Dennis, Mass., Sunday, March 20, speaking both morning and evening.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY, in a recent paper before the London Zoölogical Society, said he was not aware of any zoölogist who now maintains the independent creation hypothesis.

"THREE TREATISES OF PLOTINUS," one of which has never before appeared in English, have been translated from the Greek and published by Thomas M. Johnson, of Osceola, Mo.

F. A. HINCKLEY delivered the second lecture in the Free Religious course of lectures at Brockton, Mass., last Sunday evening, taking for his subject "The Constructive Work of Free Religion."

MR. RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S recent Boston discourse on Carlyle is to be published first in Scrib-

Digitized by Google

ner's Monthly, and permanently in the proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, in whose rooms it was first delivered.

It is proposed to hold a Centennial Celebration this year of the publication of Immanuel Kant's great work, the Kritik der Reinen Vernunft, or Critique of the Pure Reason. It certainly ought not to be classed among the things that can't be done.

Annie Cary says that in Pittsburg the secretary of a cremation society came to her, and wanted her to sing for the benefit of its "furnace fund," and actually had the impudence to offer as an inducement to give her free cremation whenever she should need it.

Rufus Choate believed in hard work and struggle. When some one said to him that a certain fine achievement was the result of accident, he exclaimed: "Nonsense! You might as well drop the Greek alphabet on the ground and expect to pick up the Iliad."

Kossuth, who is now seventy-nine years old, enjoys not only good health, but perfect elasticity of intellect. He has now a very pleasant villa near Turin, surrounded by a handsome garden, which he planted himself and cultivates with the greatest care. Natural science is one of his favorite studies.

The colored people of the South welcomed with great pleasure the announcement of Robert Lincoln's appointment to the place he fills in President Garfield's Cabinet. They remember his father, and what he did for their race; and they expect to find a stout friend in the son, and are not likely to be disappointed.

The vicar of a village near Gravesend, England, who is somewhat unpopular with some of his parishioners, made certain remarks in a recent sermon at which a lady smiled scornfully. The vicar walked down from his rostrum to the pew where the lady was seated, and, having given her a good shaking, returned to his place and finished his discourse.

Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, of Boston, has filed a complaint in the United States Court in New York against George Munro, the publisher, for alleged breach of copyright in publishing in the Seaside Library, without Mr. Hale's consent, his story, "The Man without a Country." The complainant states that this has injured his reputation, and sues for $5,000 damages.

According to Professor Swing, "the coming man will be temperate, chaste, merciful, just, generous, charitable, large-hearted, sweet tempered, Christian, a good neighbor and a faithful citizen." There can be no doubt that the coming man will be an ideal one as compared with the present. It is a question however whether he will be just such a one as the Professor contemplates.

Professor Huxley says of common-sense that it "is science exactly so far as it fulfils the ideal of common-sense; that is, sees facts as they are, or at any rate without the distortion of prejudice, and reasons from them in accordance with the dictates of sound judgment. And science is simply common-sense at its best; that is, rigidly accurate in observation and merciless to fallacy in logic."

Thomas Carlyle, in the last days of his life, is said to have been very awkward and ungainly. His stooped and thick-set frame was attired in rough, ill-fitting, and almost shabby clothes. His face was rugged and sombre, set in a bush of gray-white hair and beard. Beneath the heavy brows, within deep hollows, lined and worn, shone dull the bluish-gray eyes. His nose was a handsome Scotch nose, straight, fine, and bold.

The late Emperor of Russia, when a child, was well beloved by the people. A correspondent writes thus: "When in Russia in 1826, he was a handsome little boy, and used to walk the streets of St. Petersburg with a guard or two, the people following him in crowds and trying to kiss the hem of his garments. I have seen peasants run before him, and prostrate themselves on the pavement, so that he had to step one side for fear of trampling on them."

It is announced that Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull is about to capture an English husband of aristocratic connections. The paper from which we get this intelligence also states that she "for years conducted a large banking-house in New York," and was designated the "Burdett-Coutts of America," which will be news to most people. We see it also stated in an English paper that Mrs. Woodhull totally denies tha she ever had any sympathy with the free-love doctrine. She says that what appeared to this effect in her notorious weekly was during her absence from its management and in opposition to her sentiments, which to those who have any knowledge of her lectures and writings in this country will also be a surprise.

Carlyle's severest critic, and a critic of his own school, was the old parish roadman at Ecclefechan. "Been a long time in this neighborhood?" asked an American traveller on the outlook for a sight of the sage. "Been here a' ma days, sir." "Then you'll know the Carlyles?" "Weel that! A ken the whole o' them. There was, let me see," he said, leaning on his shovel and pondering, "there was Jock, he was a kind o' throughither sort o' chap, a doctor, but no a bad fellow. Jock—he's deid, mon." "And there was Thomas," said the inquirer, eagerly. "Oh, ay, of coorse, there's Tam,—a useless munstruck chap that writes books and talks havers. Tam stays mostly up in London. There's naething in Tam; but, mon, there's Jamie, owre in the New lands,—there's a chap for ye: he's the mon o' that faimily. Jamie taks mair swine into Ecclefechan market than ony ither farmer in the pairish."

FOREIGN.

A ball in aid of poor English people in Paris is to be given on the 19th of April, at the Hôtel Continental, under the patronage of Lord Lyons.

Queen Victoria has celebrated the marriage of her grandson, Prince William of Prussia, and Princess Augusta Victoria of Holstein-Augustenburg, by a state banquet at Windsor Castle.

The French Chamber has decided to take into consideration Mr. Raspail's bill relative to the secularization of the Pantheon, and restoring it to the destination given to it by the Assembly of 1791.

In the absence of a law authorizing divorce, French juries continue to be of the opinion of Alexandre Dumas, which is summed up in the words Tue la! A policeman named Koenig, whose antecedents were excellent, was recently acquitted on the charge of having attempted to kill his wife, whom he had surprised in the act of adultery in the most aggravated conditions.

We have received a very satisfactory report from the Sunday Lecture Society. It refers to an interesting experiment in Edinburgh of a Sunday science school, in which ninety-two pupils were enrolled, with an average attendance from November to July of sixty. The pupils were mostly of the artisan class, and youths who, owing to late business hours, could not avail themselves of evening classes.—Nature.

Much curiosity was felt last Sunday as to whether the government would enforce a certain circular said to exist, which forbids members of unauthorized religious congregations to wear their distinctive costumes. The government, however, remained silent; and, in all the churches of Paris, Dominicans, Capuchins, Carmelites, and Benedictines spoke from the pulpit clad in their different costumes. No incident occurred anywhere.—Parisian, March 10.

In the Chamber of Deputies at Paris, a bill repealing a decree of 1804, which prescribes that cemeteries shall have separate spots for each religion, was agreed to by three hundred and forty-eight to one hundred and twenty-six. It was opposed by Monseigneur Freppel, who denounced it as an attack on the rights of Catholicism and as contrary to Catholic doctrine. Protestants and Jews, he said, were perfectly satisfied, the only complainants being Freethinkers, whose anxiety to be buried among Catholics was a want of logic and courage. Though the cemetery was the property of the parish, so also was the church of which it was an annex; and, if the decree had not been observed in large towns, this was no reason for rescinding it as regarded Catholic villages.

A largely-attended meeting of the tenantry on the estate of the Marquis of Clanricarde, an absentee landlord, was recently held at Loughrea in order to consider his lordship's reported intention to evict all tenants who did not pay their rents. The Rev. P. Egan, who occupied the chair, said he waited some time ago upon the agent, and explained to him that in consequence of the deplorable state of the people the majority were unable to pay their rents. That official stated, in reply, that he presented a similar claim to the Marquis on behalf of another portion of tenantry, and had been rebuked for so doing, and ordered to at once serve writs. The agent was sure that, if the people declined to pay their rents, they would be certainly evicted. Several tenants addressed the meeting in resolute terms; and the following resolution was passed: "Resolved, that we pledge ourselves to pay Lord Clanricarde no rent higher than Griffith's valuation, even should he fling us on the roadside to die."

A correspondent of the Church Times writes to state that, whatever may be the practice among secularists, the positivists most certainly do make use of Thomas à Kempis in their quasi-religious exercises. He has seen "a book of this sort prepared for their own use by M. William de Constant Rebecque. Its title is Appréciation Positive de l'Imitation de Jésus Christ, ou de l'Assimilation à l'Humanité." This is very different to the original statement respecting secularists made by the Church Times. As a matter of fact, no secular society has ever so far stultified itself as to use Thomas à Kempis' devotional production; and we can quite accord with the correspondent referred to in the expression that "it seems to be a literary error of grave character for any one to take the words or thoughts of a Christian writer and use them for purposes which, were he alive, we may be quite sure would be offensive to him."—Secular Review.

True Liberty.—France is much agitated just now by the expulsions of those members of the religious bodies which have omitted or refused to submit to the government, and thus obtain the necessary authorization. Hear what Mr. Bradlaugh says respecting this matter: "As a politician, I regret these expulsions: they are impolitic. As a freethinker, I regret the expulsions still more: they are utterly opposed to the liberty we freethinkers claim. As a Republican, I can hardly find words strong enough to condemn the expulsions. I believe the Roman Catholic Church to be the persistent and unvarying foe of all progress, social, political, and religious; but my weapons against this Church are limited to the weapons which I think fair and just against myself. I deny the right by law to punish opinion. I deny the right to put penalties either on its utterance in press, on platform, or by any other fashion of teaching. I think the monastic and conventual institutions grave mischiefs in every State, but they are mischiefs to be cured by reason. Expulsion of ideas by force is impossible: the attempt defeats itself. Some persons may be expelled; but others of the same creed, acting more secretly or less honestly, are strengthened in their propaganda."—Otago Echo, New Zealand.

Suicide of a Young Lady.—On Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Bedford held an inquest at the Vestry Hall, Charing Cross, on the body of Miss Marie Victoria Alexandrina Cox, aged twenty-two, daughter of Mr. Cox, one of the sub-managers of the Polytechnic, who was found drowned in the Thames on the previous Saturday. Evidence was given showing that the deceased was well educated, very religious, and exceedingly kind to the poor, to whom she would give all her money and best clothing. She was latterly in bad health and depressed in spirits; but it was not thought that she would take her own life. On the previous Thursday afternoon, she quitted her home; and the next morning her mother received a letter, of which the following is a copy: "My dearest Mother,—I am not able longer to dwell with you while I feel that dreadful cloud ready to burst over my head; and so confident am I that I can never be a blessing to any one that I only ask you not to trouble about me. I love you all, and know you have ever meant to cure me; but only God knows my sin, for it is entirely against him I have sinned. If there were any hope, I would not do so now. May you all find that forgiveness which I cannot. Your loving daughter,—M. V. A. Cox." The jury recorded a verdict of "suicide while of unsound mind."—Weekly Despatch, February 27.

London Flower-Girl Brigade.—The Baroness Burdett-Coutts opened an exhibition of natural and artificial flowers and plants at the Holborn Town Hall. The object of the exhibition was to bring under public notice the Flower-girl Brigade, a society of flower-girls founded last year by the Baroness, who is at once its patroness and president. In the endeavor to raise the tone of the flower-selling class by diminishing as far as possible those precarious conditions of their trade which have hitherto baffled their attempts to live decently by honest industry, the founder of the brigade made arrangements for clothing the girls in a neat costume, supplying them with flowers, and inducing them, for a regular salary and a commission on their sales, to sell their stock at fixed stations, where they would be secure from insult and molestation, or to accept regular employment by taking cut flowers to the customers of the brigade. The approach of winter made it necessary that some other industry should be found for many of the girls, and it occurred to the Baroness Burdett-Coutts that the mounting and arranging of artificial flowers was a handiwork for which their early familiarity with natural flowers and their conscious observation of their growth and peculiarities of foliage specially fitted them. The exhibition is a proof of the success of the brigade in the artificial-flower making. If perfumes distilled from flowers were only freely used in the hall, the flower-show illusion would be complete. Roses, camellias, chrysanthemums, geraniums, forget-me-nots, are copied with surprising fidelity, as well as many varieties of green foliage. The combination of cleverly imitated foliage and flowers in many huge bouquets and baskets of flowers reflects no little credit on the artistic taste of the brigade. In addition to the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, there were present on Tuesday the Countess Clanwilliam, Admiral Sir H. and Lady Keppel, Lady Gordon, Lady Pollock, Sir G. Bowyer, and Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett. The Baroness, in declaring the exhibition open, stated the object of the flower-girls' mission to be the promotion of the interests of the children of honest, hardworking men and women, and earnestly recommended the public to trade.—Lloyd's Weekly.

Digitized by Google

JESTINGS.

"ARE you a materialist?" asked Jones. "I'm a building materialist," replied Fogg, who is in the lumber line.

COLORED women may not always be wise, but none of them were ever foolish enough to wear a piece of white court plaster on her chin.

THE following recipe for eloquence is given by a "down East" orator: "Get yourself chuck full of the subject, knock out the bung and let nature caper."

"PARADISE LOST" IN TRANSLATION.—We hear that a native clergyman at Madras has translated Paradise Lost into the Tamil tongue, thus changing it from Milton to Ta-Milton.—Funny Folks.

HOW THEY SAY GRACE IN GEORGIA.—A party of gentlemen having sat down to dinner, one of them, Colonel Waddell, was asked to say grace, and, bowing his head, said: "Lord, make us honest and rich." An editor, who was present, promptly responded: "Amen. Give the colonel the former and thy humble servant the latter, as thou seest we need, and do it quickly."

A TOUCHING instance of agricultural distress is briefly set forth in the following advertisement in the St. Joseph Herald: "Wanted a correspondent I am 25 years old hav one hundred and sixty 160 ackars of Kansas land worth 1500 dollars tolaberl fair looking comin chool educatoon eny lady fairly educated will oblige me by righting I will send my PhotoghaPh by return male William lemons."

A GENEROUS TRIUMPH.—"What's wrong between you and Smythe, that you don't speak?" "Haw! fact is, we were both wivals for the hand of the same young lady,—a celebwated beauty, you know!—and—well, I don't want to bwag, but I got the best of it. Poor Smythe!" "My dear fellow, a thousand congratulations!" "Thanks awf'ly! We both proposed last week, you know, and she accepted—a—him!"—Punch.

A YOUNG, smart-looking Scotch clergyman was preaching in a strange country church. Fearing that his hair was not properly parted in the middle, or perhaps that he might have a smudge on his nose, he quietly and significantly said to the beadle, there being no mirror in the vestry: "John, could you get me a glass?" John disappeared, and after a few minutes returned with something under his coat, which, to the astonishment of the clergyman, he produced in the form of a lemonade bottle, with a gill of whiskey in it, saying: "Ye maunna let on [tell] about it, minister, for I got it as a great favor; and I wadna hae got it ava if I hadna said it was for you!" It may be well to mention that among the humbler orders in Scotland "a glass" is the expression for a dram of liquor. In the foregoing anecdote, we are not told whether the minister or John consumed the gill.—Chambers' Journal.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for 1881, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

Amount acknowledged up to March 1	$2028.75
CHAS. H. PIERCE, New Bedford (10th assess.)	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, " " one year of pledge	25.00
ARTHUR M. LEE, New York	20.00
THOS. DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess.)	10.00
J. D. FROST, Providence, R.I. (10th assess.)	10.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	25.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 4 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	50.00
Miss EMMA D. IRESON, Lynn, Mass., annually for 3 years	5.00
JAMES EDDY, Providence, annually	50.00
THOMAS DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess't)	10.00
J. W. BOYD, Jelloway, Ohio, annually for 5 years	10.00
ROBERT DAVIS, Lunenburg, Mass. (annually)	10.00
J. S. JOHNSON, Almont, Mich., annually for 5 years	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

JUST READY.

A NEW VOLUME BY MR. SAVAGE.

Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind. These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN.

A COURSE OF LECTURES BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

AUTHOR'S AMERICAN EDITION. Cloth. 12mo.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.50
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c.	per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c.	" "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c.	" "
" 52	" . . .	5c.	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

THE SIX DISCOURSES
OF
Mr. Samuel B. Weston

Submitted to the Unitarian Committee of Reference in the Leicester Case, together with Mr. Southgate's Will and the Committee's decision, making a pamphlet of 67 pages, can be had at the Index Office, or by sending to H. O. Smith, Leicester, Mass.

Price, for single copy, 40 cts.; for two or more copies, 30 cts. each.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.
Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS
OF THE
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

PARK PIPER,
COUNSELLOR AT LAW,
48 Congress Street, Boston.
GEO. W. PARK. PIPER

L. PRANG & CO.'S
Easter Cards for 1881.

Of these cards, we offer this season a greater variety and of more elegant artistic taste than ever before. We call particular attention to the cards with silk fringes and tassels, and the cards on heavy gilt-edged mounts.

NEW EASTER EGG DESIGN.
Easter Dove Design.

A very rich and elegant line of

NEW BIRTHDAY CARDS,

with and without silk fringe.

L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

RADICAL DISCOURSES.

1. America's Debt to Thomas Paine.
2. False and True Prayer.
3. The Brute God of the Old Testament.
4. The Religion of To-day.
5. False Teachings of the Christian Church.
6. The Workingman's Religion.
7. The Christian Tragedy at Pocasset.
8. Free Religion; or, The Religious Demands of To-day.
9. The Teachings of Free Religion.
10. Do You Love Jesus?
11. Atonement.
12. The Bible: How shall we read it?
13. Revivals.
14. Who are Christians?
15. The Moral Life.
16. Is Liberalism Moral?
17. If a Man Die, Shall he Live Again?
18. The Resurrection of Jesus Not Proved.
19. The New Testament in the Old.
20. The Beliefs of the Unbelievers.
21. A Holy Superstition.
22. Temperance and the Bible.
23. Common-Sense on a Tour through the Bible. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

The above discourses may be had at 5 cts. each, or the entire set for one dollar, by addressing L. K. WASHBURN,
22 Sachem Street, Lynn, Mass.

FLORENCE KNITTING SILK

Suitable for Knitting Stockings, Mittens, Wristers, Edgings, and other articles. Put up on half-ounce balls in Black, White, and Colors. An illustrated book of 32 pages of rules for knitting this silk sent by mail on receipt of a 3c. stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness, and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,
Tailors and Clothiers,
6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,
23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 588.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 40.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HONORABLE age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor that is measured by number of years. But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age.—Hebrew.

THE soul is cured of its maladies by certain incantations: these incantations are beautiful reasons, from which temperance is generated in souls.—Socrates.

WHAT nation is there in which kindness, benignity, and gratitude are not recommended? What nation is there in which cruelty, arrogance, and unthankfulness are not reprobated and detested? This uniformity of opinions invincibly demonstrates that mankind were intended to form one fraternal society. —Cicero.

WHEN the idea of any pleasure strikes your imagination, make a just computation between the duration of the pleasure and that of the repentance that is likely to follow it.—Epictetus.

LET us make haste to live, since every day to a wise man is a new life; for he has done his business the day before, and so prepared himself for the next that, if it be not his last, he knows yet that it might have been so.—Seneca.

How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds makes ill deeds done.—Shakspeare.

TO HAVE religion upon authority, and not upon conviction, is like a finger-watch, to be set forward or backward, as he pleases that has it in keeping.—William Penn.

TRUE religion is the foundation of society. When that is once shaken by contempt, the whole fabric cannot be stable nor lasting.—Burke.

THE heart may be broken, and the soul remain unshaken.—Napoleon.

OUR greatest glory consists, not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.—Goldsmith.

BROADER and deeper we must write our annals,—from an ethical reformation, from an influx of the ever new, ever sanative conscience,—if we would trulier express our central and wide related nature, instead of this old chronology of selfishness and pride to which we have too long lent our eyes.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

WHEN all else fails us, and in the dread clouds of doubt even the face of God is hidden from our eyes, and the hope of immortality becomes a dream, even then there remains to the soul the belief in Duty. In the utmost desolation, we may stand firm upon that rock. We say each in the depths of our hearts, "There are actions and feelings I call good,—true, pure, loving, noble. I know not how I know them, nor who taught them to me, nor whither, for good, or evil, they may lead me now or hereafter. But this I know: that I love them,—that I desire to do those good actions and feel those holy sentiments. I will be true, pure, loving, noble, so far as in me lies such power." —Frances Power Cobbe.

LAWS are nothing, institutions are nothing, national power and greatness are nothing, save as they assist the moral purpose of God in the development of humanity.—E. H. Chapin.

JUST as the little star,
Without haste,
But without rest,
Let each the path
Of his duty trace. —Goethe.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE New Jersey Legislature has passed an excellent law, which provides the giving of a sum, not exceeding $5,000 annually, to any city, town, or township that may raise a like sum, to be applied to the education of pupils in industrial, mechanical, and agricultural pursuits; but not less than $3,000 must thus be contributed by the citizens, or otherwise, in the localities desiring to take advantage of the State appropriation.

A DENVER journal announces that the Baptist society of that enterprising city have organized a club for social intercourse and dancing, the officers of which are church members, and the president the minister's son. The class-room of the church is being fitted up with waxed floor and other adaptations for its novel uses. So the paper says; but we hardly know whether to quote it as fact or as a joke anticipatory of the First of April.

THE peaceful sect of Quakers in Indiana are engaged in a law-suit for the possession of meeting-houses. The denomination in that State has been overrun by a multitude of new members, who are more Methodists than Quakers. The new comers allow singing in their meetings, pay salaries to their preachers, have "revivals," urge people to come forward to the "anxious seats" for prayers, and proclaim a very un-Quakerish belief in book-revelation and blood-atonement. The old-fashioned Quakers have now revolted against the innovators, a split has occurred, and the law-suit is to determine which division shall retain the Society property. We hope, in this case, the old-fashioned ones will win; for the innovators, though calling themselves the party of progress, are really moving on a retrograde track.

THERE has just been an energetic controversy in Philadelphia between Rev. Dr. Batterson, pastor of one of the city churches, and Mr. Riche, President of the Central High School. Dr. Batterson, in one of his Sunday sermons, took occasion to say that he was informed on authority that, in that school, doubts are thrown upon the Mosaic record of creation, and that a professor there had said to his class, "There are many things in the Bible which are not true." Thereupon, Mr. Riche demanded the sources of his authority and the name of the offending professor, in order that the grave charge might be investigated. But Dr. Batterson did not know the name of the professor, and would not give the names of the mothers of boys in the school from whom the complaint had come to him. Two of these boys, it seems, had been so wrought upon by some remark of the professor concerning the Bible that they "had walked the streets for an hour or more, discussing this question which had so excited them, to the abandonment of the usual hour of play." This is pretty good evidence that something had been said of an unusually awakening character. But, as the minister persisted in his refusal to give names, the evidence from the boys' side could not be got at. The President, however, understood well enough from what professor the heretical remarks must have come, if from any, and confronted him with the charge. He denied it in toto; and added moreover, gratuitously, that "whenever the facts of science seemed to conflict with Scripture he has been at especial pains to show that there was actual agreement, and has particularly stated his implicit belief in the divine inspiration of every word in the Bible." A statement that evinces his discretion, we fear, more than it does his valor or his fitness to teach geology.

JOHN G. WHITTIER'S prose is as good as his poetry. In the Boston Daily Advertiser of March 29, he makes a vigorous and, as we think, entirely successful defence of the New England Quakers of the seventeenth century against the aspersions cast upon them by Dr. George E. Ellis, in a recent paper read before the Massachusetts Historical Society. Dr. Ellis, in this as in previous essays, attempts most liberally to excuse if not to justify the persecution of the Quakers by the Puritans, on the ground of the "intrusive" and "indecent" conduct of the Quakers. With the same purpose, he also criticises Mr. Whittier's recently published ballad, "The King's Missive." But Mr. Whittier is entirely equal to the occasion. His communication is one of the best pieces of controversial writing we have seen of late. Perfect in its courtesy, it is as strong as it is courteous. Calm in spirit, it is yet conclusive in argument. The persecution, he claims, "owed its origin to the settled purpose of the ministers and leading men of the colony to permit no difference of opinion on religious matters." The charge of "indecency" was only incidental to this main purpose, and "comes with ill grace from the authorities of the Massachusetts colony," who had no opportunity for making such a charge until after they had "ordered women to be stripped naked, and their bodies to be carefully examined to see if there was not the devil's mark on them as witches," and after also they had caused half-disrobed women, young and old, to be dragged through the streets tied to a cart-tail, and whipped unmercifully with the constable's lash. After such cruel outrages, two or three half-frenzied women appeared in public disrobed, professing to be called, after the manner of the Old Testament signs, thus to bear testimony against the sins of the times. "Whatever of 'indecency' there was in these cases," says Mr. Whittier, "was directly chargeable upon the atrocious persecution. At the door of the magistrates and ministers of Massachusetts must be laid the insanity of the conduct of these unfortunate women." And he justly adds: "It is remarkable proof of the purity of life among the early Friends that their enemies, while exhausting the language of abuse against them, pointed to no instances of licentiousness or immoral practice. . . . From the rise of the Society to the present time, the peace, purity, and peculiar sweetness of Quaker homes have been proverbial."

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

THE PLAINT OF IRELAND.

A Discourse delivered in Rochester, N.Y.

BY NEWTON M. MANN.

There is but one foreign country whose affairs it is in order, according to current ideas, to consider on Sunday in church. We can talk about the kingdom of Israel to our heart's content. Sins committed by the Jews, and sins committed against the Jews, are always up for denunciation, and not uncommonly the preacher gives to the services the tone of an indignation meeting, at which Pharaoh, or Jezebel, or Herod, is brought to judgment and pitilessly subjected to the rhetorical lash. A great field is here offered to show one's hatred of iniquity. Moreover there is nothing risked. These old-time sinners have no sympathizers in the congregation. One may bear down very hard upon them without the least danger of giving offence. This method also has the advantage of great simplicity. To learn what is to be known of one country or tribe concerning which the evidence is all in is a small matter in comparison to the task of acquainting one's self with contemporary nations sufficiently to consider intelligently the grave questions which are agitating them. A theological equipment seems only to involve the affairs of one country; and, for the treatment of these, the proper formulæ are laid down in the books. The politics of other peoples lacks the positive, dogmatic quality to which prophets and preachers incline, and is generally thought to lie out of their sphere. However, I propose now to speak of Ireland's troubles instead of Israel's. I venture upon the subject with some diffidence, but only for the reason that it is beset with so many and such grave difficulties.

I think, to begin with, we should be on our guard against any hasty condemnation of the English government in the matter of the Irish troubles. It is fair to suppose that the real state of the case is much better apprehended by the men in power than by us. No philanthropist in this country, probably, can enlighten the English cabinet in the least degree on the situation. They are not blood-thirsty tyrants and oppressors, but honorable men, some of them eminent lovers of humanity. Their very names debar us from thinking that they are perpetrating wrongs upon the Irish people. At any rate, of all attitudes of mind with which an American can approach this subject, that is most to be avoided which inclines to regard the Englishman as essentially a tyrant, devoid of feeling toward a subject race. He is not the same Englishman against whom our fathers rebelled, but one not less a lover of liberty than ourselves, who has made Great Britain and its colonies seats of freedom, asylums for the oppressed, centres of light and hope.

At the same time, and Englishmen themselves being judges, Ireland is in distress. Its people are among the most down-trodden and despoiled in Europe,—too helpless to utter the bitterness of their complaint. And their grievance is not easily stated. When the American colonies revolted in 1776, they clearly pointed out the person who had wronged them, and set forth to the world their charges against him. George III., he it was who had committed this and that invasion of their rights and liberties. But the Irish people do not point to the Queen, or her minister, as their oppressor. They do not name the person who is trampling them in the dust. Their oppressor is not a person, but a thing, a system, for which no living soul is directly responsible, and the abolition or modification of which is a task exceedingly difficult for a government to undertake. The tyrant of Ireland is a land system which perpetuates in these days the barbarisms of other centuries, and even intensifies them. It is an impersonal, and, for that reason, an utterly remorseless tyrant. There is no master quite so hard as a system. The lot of the chattel slave has been found desperate; but he is in the hands of a man who, though at times cruel, has a heart to feel, and will occasionally relent and be kind. The subjects of an absolute monarch are exposed to extremities of hardship and injustice: still, the despot is a person, and, if they can get to him, can be reasoned with and entreated. But a system is deaf to reasoning, implacable to tears. It goes round and round like the millstone, and grinds its victims to powder with as little concern. In his extremity, the slave may possibly save his life and secure his liberty by killing his master, or an outraged people may bring a king to the scaffold; but a grinding system is not to be put out of existence by killing its agents. Shooting the landlords in no way disposes of landlordism. All violence, short of successful revolution, only tightens the grip of the oppressive system.

Just what this land-despotism is cannot be at once understood by our people. The conditions here are different in three important respects. Our people have many and various avocations, only a minority limiting themselves to the culture of the soil. The lands here are plenty and cheap; and they are generally owned by their occupants. It requires, therefore, a little effort to realize what must result where these conditions do not exist. Ireland has a very small town population, because the country does but little in the way of commerce or manufactures. Those lines of industry it has been the policy of England to monopolize, and systematic legislation looking to the suppression of Irish trade is among the grievances which have been accumulating for the last three hundred years. In 1663, "the importation of any European article into an English colony except from England and in English ships, built and manned by Englishmen," was prohibited. In 1696, a law was passed that "no goods of any kind should be imported direct from the colonies into Ireland. In 1699, the woollen manufacture in Ireland was broken down by an act prohibiting the exportation of woollen goods.

By these and such like measures, any faculty the Irish may have had for a diversity of avocations has been repressed; and now more than half the people are engaged in agriculture, a fact which, in connection with other circumstances, proves to be a supreme misfortune. Of these three millions of farmers, very few indeed own any land; but they must all have land, as that is the only way by which they can live. Now, the whole extent of territory from which they can be supplied is restricted by nature within quite narrow limits. As many as two hundred and fifty thousand are living on farms of one acre and under. The amount of arable land is not sufficient to furnish each tenant with what we should call a farm. Moreover, it is decidedly to the advantage of the owner to let it out in small holdings, as the number of competitors for it is thereby increased, and handsomer returns are realized. A great part of the tenantry are poverty-stricken and always on the verge of starvation. The prime necessity by which it is possible for them to live at all is a little land from which to raise at least a few potatoes. The whole agricultural population, therefore, are thrown into eager competition with each other for the occupancy of the soil. By these exceptionally adverse circumstances, the people are made their own destroyers. Each man, as his family grows up, needs his neighbor's holding, and offers a little more rent to secure it, with a lessened ability to pay. Thus there is an ever-active tendency to higher rents, and at the same time lower depths of poverty among the people. A few thousand persons, mostly English noblemen, own the whole island; and it is this property interest which has long been in sharp collision with the life of the people. These landlords are no worse than ordinary men. Some of them are distinguished for their considerateness and benevolence. But capital has its own interests, and, on the whole, will seek them by its own laws, whoever holds it. A monopoly of the land, in a country where the people know nothing but tillage, puts it in the power of the monopolists to take the whole product of the soil beyond what is necessary for the narrowest maintenance of the tenants. And that this will happen, Ireland is the demonstration.

The theory is current, and seems at first incontrovertible, that a man has the right to make the most he can out of his possessions, whether they be land or merchandise; and that any legislation looking to the limitation of rent is in the nature of spoliation. Where lands are plenty, this theory is not much called in question; and its operation gives comparatively little inconvenience. But, if it is a sound principle to apply to a great world, it must apply equally well to a smaller world. Suppose, then, there were a few hundred feet more water in the ocean, so that only about thirty-three thousand square miles of land remained on all the face of the earth. Suppose that by some means a few persons held the title to all this land, so that the millions living on it must hire space of these great landlords before they can have any right to eat, drink, or sleep. Not a mouthful of food could be raised without paying them a tribute; not a house could be occupied, because the house is an appurtenance of the land. There could be no going to other countries where land is still unclaimed; for, on this supposition, there would be no such countries. On the principle of unrestricted possession of the soil, all the land having passed into the hands of a few persons, they have the rest of mankind at their mercy. The competition is all on one side. A thousand are clamoring for land, where one has land to let; and he can make his own terms. Under these circumstances, no one needs to be told that the terms will be extortionate. In such a world, the handful of land-owners would grow very rich and powerful, the millions of laborers would grow poorer and more helpless year by year, until reduced to a condition worse than slavery. This state of things would now be perfectly realized in Ireland, were it not that there are other lands to which its people can escape, and other lands from which food can be brought in exchange for manufactures. If the Irishman were able to flee his country, he would not be absolutely in the power of the landlords. But to make the journey with his family to America is usually beyond his means. If he were an artisan, able to make things which the world wants, he might acquire some independence of his masters. He could leave the farm then, and break down the rent by lessening competition. But he is no mechanic, and there is small opportunity for him to become one. The result is not exactly the same for the Irish farmer as though Ireland's thirty-three thousand five hundred square miles were all the land in the world; but it is very much the same. The unrestricted privilege of the owners to make all that they can out of their property gives them undue advantage, to the great detriment of the people. Indeed, that principle is not allowed to apply to all species of property in any country. Street-cars, omnibuses, hack-drivers, are limited by law in their charges. The State of New York does not permit the Central Railroad to make all it can out of its passengers, but fixes the rate per mile, beyond which the company must not charge. It is sufficient sanction for this law that the public interest requires it. The same principle must be held sufficient to authorize restrictions upon rent. A very forcible illustration of the fallacy of the notion that a man, under all circumstances, has the right to make the most of his own, has been given in the case of a ship at sea with a large number of passengers. The ship-master owns the whole stock of provisions on board, and in the absence of a contract might put up the price of subsistence so high that some would starve, and all be stripped of their available means. Probably nobody could be found to justify such an act. A monopoly of one of the necessities of life does not give the monopolist the right to put any price he pleases on that necessity. And especially is this to be said of land, which is something that labor cannot produce. In everything else, labor is efficient to break down a monopoly. More railroads, more telegraphs, can be built, more wheat raised, more iron can be mined. But islands and continents cannot be made by human hands. From the land monopolist there is no escape this year or next, or ever after, except by restricting his privileges.

This evil stands out in Ireland as nowhere else in the civilized world. Competition for land has been so eager, and the power of the proprietors has been so great, that the whole burden of making improvements has been thrown upon the tenants. Until recently, a tenant, when for any reason he left a farm, had no legal means of securing compensation for any improvements he may have made. And now, so long as he stays, the improvements he makes with his own hands he has to pay for over and over, as they are considered good ground for advancing the rent.

Mr. Charles Russell, an eminent lawyer and member of Parliament, has made a personal inspection of several districts, of which he makes report in his "New Views on Ireland." The impeachment of the present land system is complete. He gives the evidence of the people from their own lips. One poor widow says: "This cabin has been in the family for the last sixty years. My husband killed himself trying to improve the land. It was a bad, shaky bog when he got it. It is now as dry as the road. The landlord raised the rent three times. The last rise was in 1875, when he added 5*s.* in the pound to the rent." On the Inveragh estate of Lord Lansdowne, who is not reckoned by any means the worst of landlords, there have been in twenty-five years four advances made in rent. Of the last advance of 25 per cent. made in 1874, the agent is reported to have said: "I have done two good days' work. I have put £10,000 in Lord Lansdowne's pocket." It is to be observed that this increase in land value comes almost entirely from improvements made at the expense of the tenants themselves.

Digitized by Google

The encouragement to the poor man to do well under such circumstances is not great. The Irish tenant, as John Stuart Mill observed, is the only man so situated that he can neither benefit by his industry nor suffer by his improvidence. The workhouse will catch him, if he drops any lower: if he tries to do better and bring some thrift into his husbandry, the most obvious result will be the advancement of his rent. Mr. Justin McCarthy has this account, as he says, from good authority: "'Up in the hills, a man many years ago had a farm at a very low rent. The land was worth little or nothing of itself. He set to work with a will, and it took him years of toil to clear the land completely of stones. Being a sensible man as well as industrious, he made use of the stones to build a wall to enclose the farm. His landlord happened to die; and the heir, seeing the improvements which the poor man had made, raised the rent in the proportion of five hundred per cent. This day his neighbors outside the wall pay just the small amount he paid before he set to work and reclaimed and enclosed his land. Such,' says the writer from whom I quote this incident, 'are the rewards of industry too often reaped by the Irish farmer.' He also says, 'It is well known that in some parts of the country the farmer is afraid to wear a good coat, lest the agent or some of his minions should see him comfortable, and consequently able to pay more rent.'"

It is not pretended that this is the course which the generality of wealthy landlords take. It is enough that such a course is open, for there will always be some unprincipled enough to do the meanest things permissible. It was never urged, by those who knew about it, that the American slaveholder was generally unmerciful to his slaves. The condemnation of the system was that it permitted barbarities, which some would be found base enough to perpetrate. Mr. Courtney, a moderate liberal member of Parliament, who has given special attention to the subject, exempts the large proprietors of hereditary estates from the charge of rack-renting. But he states that others have bought up Irish lands with a view to make money out of them, and of these "the greater number wring out of their tenants promises of the utmost rents that can be suggested,—often of rents that cannot be paid. This evil, he also observes, "has its origin in the fact of the relative excess of tenants, the competition between them preventing each from protecting his position, either by stipulation before entering upon it or by declining to accede to new terms after he has assumed it."

The extreme grievance to which the Irish tenant is subject is eviction. An American farmer would think a tenancy, loaded down with such exactions, something one need not greatly mourn being deprived of. It would be no loss to him to be ejected by an extortionate landlord, for he could easily go and find another place to rent. Not so with the Irish tenant. Eviction to him means ruin, and leads—unless friends come to his help—no whither, except to the workhouse. According to Mr. Charles Russell, the English tenant cannot be summarily ejected for non-payment of rent. Under various conditions, "by the law of Ireland, which is not the law of England, the tenant would be turned out of his holding by the landlord without any notice whatever to quit; and the only means by which he could live would be taken from him without any compensation." In similar cases in England, according to the same authority, "the landlord must give a year's notice to quit, ending with the year of the tenancy." This discrimination against the Irish tenant has been vehemently condemned by many English observers, among others by Lord Dufferin, recently the much esteemed Governor-General of Canada, and who is himself owner of large estates in Ulster province. He denounces the yearly tenancy as "a tenure which, if its terms were to be literally interpreted (and its terms are literally interpreted in Ireland), no Christian man would offer, and none but a madman would accept."

It is not easy for Americans, under the very different conditions in which they live, to see all there is in the Irish case. The Irish themselves mostly despair of expounding it intelligibly to us, and find it much easier to move an audience by wholesale denunciation of oppressors and a senseless "shrieking for freedom." In this way, the ordinary citizen is made aware that somebody is hurt, and feels a measure of sympathy. But a certain comicality spreads over the whole sad business, for the reason that nobody knows who is to blame, or, if he knows, will not tell. That the Irish are in poverty and wretchedness is pretty generally understood, and a vague notion prevails that some wrong is being done them; but just what that wrong is and who it is that is doing it are questions that uncover a good deal of ignorance. The Irish themselves, even the best of them, are scarcely wiser on this point than we are. Some demon besets them,—of that they are sure; but one strikes this way and another that, and all sorts of measures are proposed to cast him out. One thing has been done which touches the source of trouble, and that is the formation of the Land League. That organization, whatever indiscretion it has committed, has at last struck home. It is an application of some of the principles of the Trades' Unions to the relation between tenants and landlords. The peasants have long enough been playing into the hands of the proprietors by competing with each other for the occupation of a patch of ground. They now have a combination by which they can establish non-intercourse with an obnoxious landlord or agent, and put him to no end of trouble. In this way, the subject has been forced upon the attention of the government. The great proprietors themselves begin to see that something must be done, and when they speak all England listens; but when the poor man cries, as he has now for many generations from the bogs of Ireland, nobody but the Lord hears him.

What the land reform will be by which the attempt is to be made to pacify Ireland remains to be seen in the near future. The three features for which reasonable men are contending are: first, fixity of tenure, the right to hold on so long as no just cause of removal exists, and only then to be ejected after due notice and by form of law; second, fair rent, which means, of course, a greatly reduced rent and free from all possibility of capricious advancement; third, free sale,—that is, the right to sell the privilege of occupancy, together with improvements that one has made, to any unobjectionable tenant, whenever one wishes to leave a holding. These are the "three F's" of which so much is said; and certainly to an American they seem to make a serious inroad upon what are called the rights of property in land. That these concessions are actually contemplated in England shows how circumstances modify men's conceptions of what the rights of property of this kind are. Here, in America, ownership of land carries with it pretty much the same privileges as ownership of stocks or merchandise. But as the population becomes dense, and the public domain comes under cultivation, it is found necessary to guard against a landed aristocracy, which, owning the soil upon which a people live, is likely to end by virtually owning the people too. Salus populi suprema lex esto, is the noble motto borne by the great seal of one of our States,—"Let the safety of the people be the supreme law." Whatever fancied rights are in the way of this must go down before the most urgent of all necessities. Ireland is giving final emphasis to the doctrine of John Stuart Mill, the clearest-headed political economist of the century,—that there is a distinction between the rights of land and of other property; that land, being limited in amount and incapable of increase, does not properly give to its possessor such unrestricted privileges as pertain to the use of other kinds of values. It is the duty of the State to curb the grasping hand which "adds field to field till there is no place left," and would wrest from the laborer all the fruits of his toil. If this action is not taken in time, it becomes every year more difficult. The tyranny of landlordism has become so entrenched in Ireland, the resulting degradation of the people is so abject, that now the problem of rectification has become one that staggers the strongest minds. Property interests are involved, which it is impossible justly to adjudicate. To crown all, a race prejudice exists, intensified by religious animosities. The situation calls for a measure of self-denial and disinterestedness which it is in vain to look for in more than exceptional individuals among any people. All the most potential circumstances are adverse to a deliverance of justice to Ireland from the English government. The exhibition which the irreconcilables have made in Parliament is another illustration of the fatality which has ever made the Irish their own worst enemies. The extravagant demands with which they fill the air give a sense of unreality to the land-reform movement, and render doubly difficult any act of equity. Still, we may hope that something will be done. The sentiment of the civilized world demands it. Even Russia, it is said, has expended a hundred millions to establish a peasant proprietary, and looks upon the land system of Ireland as a despotism too deep to be condoned. The nation which of all the nations of the Old World most cherishes personal liberty, and stands in the very van of progress, cannot afford to keep much longer this political plague-spot at her door. The dues of Christian love and service fall to those who are most needy, most despised, and withal nearest at hand. By all which most separates us from our fellow-man,—depths of poverty, ignorance, superstition,—we are the more bound to see to it that we take no advantage of him,—that, if we err at all, it be in giving him more than in strictness he has a right to claim.

For the Free Religious Index.

"GEORGE ELIOT'S MARRIAGE."

There appeared an article with the above title in the Index of January 13, signed "E. D. C." With its opening remark I can agree, that "none of the writers of the daily papers seem to have probed the subject very deeply or given any very helpful suggestions as to the true line of duty." And, doubtless, the writer will concur in the opinion that any lack of frankness in the treatment of the marriage question is fraught with nearly as much mischief to morals as the vagaries of the defiant and lawless. Are not the sapient twaddle of the press and the dainty pious scorn of the pulpit vain and bootless, to say the least?

I am afraid the article already referred to has tended little toward freeing this question from mystification, as it appears both vague and non-committal; a fact to be regretted, I think, as it is by an able hand, and appears in large type in our leading liberal journal. These are the answers the article gives to the following series of questions touching the vital aspects of this most important subject:—

(1) Is the course of Mr. and Mrs. Lewes to be approved? Yes and no. "To class a relation so formed, and carried out in good faith and legalized as soon as circumstances render it possible, with intentional lawlessness and inconstancy, seems to me confounding the distinction of right and wrong." (2) But, if their motives would bear the strictest scrutiny, was the act justifiable? Yes and no. "Charlotte Bronté," Dickens, and Miss Mulock have presented similar cases, where the statute law forbids what reason and morality might well allow." (3) Is genius to be judged by a different standard to that applied to the less gifted? Yes and no. "But we cannot consent to brand the author of Romola as a wilful sinner against truth and purity." (4) Is the marriage law unjust? Yes and no. "There are meaning and value in the marriage laws, imperfect though they be." (5) Is the existing law essential to a true marriage? Yes and no. "Does the declaration of the marriage by a magistrate or a clergyman give it sanction, or is it the true purpose to live according to God's laws, and to be faithful to pledges freely made?" (6) Are parties ever justified in violating any of the marriage laws? Yes and no. "For the sake of stability and respect for law, in a free and well-ordered government, should not good citizens sacrifice their own happiness rather than disobey the statutes when they do not violate their own consciences?"

This last quotation, the answer to question sixth, appears to me to betray the fundamental error in the argument, not only of this writer, but of most of the defenders of established institutions. Can it be that American radicalism may speak of the British Empire as "a free and well-ordered government"? The Index, I know, has been suspected of a reactionary tendency toward centralized power, but not of offering homage on bended knee to royalty. Is it not a begging of the whole question to make use of such a qualified phrase, "when the statutes do not violate their consciences"? The very complaints of reformers in both Church and State is that the latter are not "free and well-ordered": the casus belli is that the rights of conscience are "violated." Even in America, such is the case.

I have besides these additional criticisms to offer.

1. I cannot appreciate the remark that "the strangest thing of all is that all the condemnation is against Mrs. Lewes for disobeying the law which she had no part in making," etc. Now, in point of fact, when those marriage laws were enacted, had man, as man, any more voice in the matter than woman has at the present day? What had man to do with the making of England's land laws? But I presume Mr. Lewes has been made less the subject of criticism than Mrs. Lewes, because he is a comparative stranger to most people, even to those who ply the quill, notwithstanding his high rank in the literary world. Who has read The Science of Mind? Who has not read Felix Holt and Daniel Deronda? In circles where both are equally known, I rather think it is the conduct of the pair that is commented on; though the fact is patent enough that society is less lenient toward woman than man in most cases. And this is one of the proofs of the insincerity of this social gossip, in whatever dignified phrase it may clothe itself; and I am surprised that this feature is not noticed by the writer. In these days there is too much painstaking argument to overthrow objections, when the task required is that of unmasking hypocrisy.

Digitized by Google

2. There is an apparent anxiety to exonerate Mrs. Lewes, and let the burden of blame fall on Mr. Lewes, or, "If George Eliot was wrong, he was doubly so." Is not this falling into the error of discrimination, which the writer had charged upon the public? Any such distinction should always be deprecated. Let the believers in equality keep the ideal, in their reasonings at least, free from controversial bias. Equality means justice, nothing more nor less; and without it every bond, even that of love, is tyranny or myth. I suppose Mr. and Mrs. Lewes understood themselves equally well, and neither desired nor would countenance any apologetic plea in favor of one as against the other. That they should dream of aught else than a division of the responsibility is not in keeping with their characters. Let us not be so cruel as to rob them of this one true title to respect, which the world's sneers cannot touch. They were not characterless, whatever the popular verdict may be. If it be that they erred, what indications are there that they had not the support of a conscious rectitude?

3. But the following view of the writer surprises me more than any. Speaking of Mr. Lewes, "he had put himself out of the reach of divorce by a hasty or unwise confidence in his first wife." This remark would have been intelligible enough from an orthodox source. With the Church, theory and practice are totally unrelated. "Go thy way, and sin no more," has served how often as a text for a sermon, how seldom as a principle of conduct! Mr. Lewes condoned a fault in his wife, which few men ever condone. Christ would have done no less: he could have done no more. And because of this act, for which I revere Mr. Lewes more than for any feat of intellect, he must endure through life a legal disability, which amounts to a stigma, and may be a curse.

T. W. CURTIS.

[We thought it right to refer Mr. Curtis' communication to our contributor "E. D. C.," that, if there were any reply, it might appear, together with the criticism. But "E. D. C." only wishes to say, "I consider the question of the limits of divorce, and consequently of the moral judgment on George Eliot, as yet an unsettled question; and my plea was for charity and calm judgment, looking to motives as well as to actions."—ED.]

For the Free Religious Index.

THE MIDDLESEX INSTITUTE: A KIND OF CLUB TO BE IMITATED.

Of the many indications of increasing interest in scientific matters in the community, perhaps one of the most promising is to be found in the local societies and clubs, which are forming in all parts of the country. Varying much in form of organization and extent of membership, they have originated, in nearly all cases, in the efforts of two or three earnest and enthusiastic students of nature, who have succeeded in arousing the interest of enough others to start the movement; and, once started, it seldom fails to continue. These societies in no way rival those long-established organizations which "have taken all knowledge to be their province"; but the generally small number of their working members gives a personal directness to their work, which is often wanting in the larger societies. By limiting their observations to a small district, they are able to make them more complete; and often more can be learned from the thorough study of a small region than from a hasty survey of a whole country.

Among the organizations of this character in this State, the Middlesex Institute, with its head-quarters in Malden, is one of the youngest; but its prospects of growth and usefulness are excellent, and a few words on its designs and methods may not be uninteresting to the readers of the Free Religious Index. It may show work going on in a quiet way, that will ultimately give good results.

Three years ago, a few people of Malden and Medford, interested in natural studies, met and formed the Middlesex Scientific Field Club. Their meetings were held on one evening of each month, at the house of some one of the members; and during the summer there were frequent "field meetings," semi-scientific, semi-social,—picnics. Half or a whole day was spent in some locality previously agreed on, collecting flowers and ferns, which the more expert members helped the others to identify; enjoying the freshness and freedom of the woods, and becoming better acquainted with each other and with nature. When the season for collecting had gone by, short papers by some of the members were read at the evening meetings, as results of the past summer's work, or to lay plans for the next year. This was kept up during the three years: only the social, picnic elements became less prominent, while the individual studies of the members were more systematic and productive.

Increasing membership, coming from all parts of the county, and growing confidence in the permanence and usefulness of the club, caused an expansion of the original plan; and last February the old name was given up, and the society incorporated under the laws of the State, by the name of the Middlesex Institute. Rooms were secured suitable to its growing needs, and it enters them with excellent hopes and prospects. Its purpose, like that of kindred societies, is twofold: first, to awaken and encourage an interest in scientific studies in the community; second, by the investigations of its members to add something, however little, to the world's stock of knowledge. In furtherance of the former, it will provide for lectures by men of well-known scientific attainments; the lectures to be for the public, and of a character which will interest persons of general culture, not specialists alone. There will also be, during the season, exhibitions of native flowers, and such other exhibitions of interest to the public as the resources of the Institute will permit. In its second aim, its present intention is to limit itself to county work, but within these limits to do all that can be done. It is intended that its collections shall fully represent the flora, fauna, and geology of the county; that any one who can give or wishes to obtain information on these shall naturally turn to the Middlesex Institute. Its membership includes all classes and ages, and every shade of religious belief and disbelief. All meet on the common ground of interest in science, where they can work harmoniously in the common cause. There are now nearly a hundred active members, and their number is rapidly increasing. The herbarium, in new and commodious quarters, will be accessible to any student; and a library of reference will be formed, as soon as the means of the Institute will permit. Its first publication, a list of plants growing in Malden and Medford, was issued this winter. It is a preliminary to a full flora of the county which it is proposed to publish as soon as practicable. Other departments of science will receive equal attention, though botany has so far been more prominent.

The credit of originating the club is due to Mr. Henry L. Moody, of Malden, who for three years was its presiding officer. Mr. L. L. Dame, of Medford, is now President of the Institute; Mr. Geo. E. Davenport, of Medford, Corresponding Secretary; and Mr. Roscoe Frohock, of Malden, custodian. Botanists and entomologists will find familiar names among these. The Institute has no endowment; but the members are willing and earnest, and have faith in the American spirit of liberality, which seldom allows a worthy enterprise to fail from want of material support.

As I said, the increased formation of such societies is an excellent sign of interest in science; but, for one now in existence, ten could be formed without interference with each other: on the contrary, each would help the other, and the success of one is an incentive to the formation of others.

C.

DIVERSITY of worship has divided the human race into seventy-two nations. From all their dogmas, I have selected one,—Divine Love.—Persian.

For the Free Religious Index.

NOT "CHRISTIANS."

Mr. Chadwick answers the question asked by Strauss, "Are we still Christians?" He says that we are, not because we accept the distinguishing tenets of the religious system of to-day called Christian, but because the "stream of tendency" in which our lives are so profoundly implicated had its source in the devout heart of Jesus.

If the fact of the source, as here stated, be conceded, it is still a question whether the name "Christian" properly follows, inasmuch as Jesus was not, and did not claim to be, the Christ of the prophets. To speak of Jesus as the source of a certain "stream of tendency," or order of development, is to acknowledge what is claimed by the orthodox Christian,—that he was a supernatural interpolation; a new force arbitrarily projected into the orderly sequence, separating the past and the future, the starting-point and active germ of a new progression.

The great stream may be followed, from where it loses its identity in the sea, to its far distant source, so called for convenience,—that is, to the spot where it emerges, a tiny rivulet from the earth; but we know that its real source is not there. And, though we were still able to follow it even to where it is imperceptibly condensed from the pervading mists, its ultimate source would be still to seek or to despair of.

It is true that the "stream of tendency," embracing those nations which now largely monopolize the progressive force of humanity, includes Jesus, his people and his time; and his worshippers may please themselves with the fancy that he was the beginning of the stream itself. But it was at that time a stream broader than his single life, more comprehensive than his limitations, deeper than could be sounded by his philosophy,—a stream already so broad that its defining shores are lost to view, flowing so silently and smoothly that its motion engages the attention of no dull perception; but the sparkle and ebullition of the little spring which gives back its tiny flood to the great stream whence it had been drawn take the eye and ear, and it is hailed as the living source of the mighty waters.

No, this will never do. Jesus, too, was the result of foregoing conditions; and, if he had never been born, there would have been a "stream of tendency" all the same, the source of which is in that hidden country, far beyond the confines of history.

J. A. J. WILCOX.

For the Free Religious Index.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

In the very interesting correspondence which has lately appeared in the Boston Daily Advertiser in regard to Whittier's poem entitled "The King's Missive," Mr. Whittier has magnanimously refrained from a direct answer to some of the questions of his clerical critic. That answer, however, ought, I think, to be plainly stated by somebody.

Rev. George E. Ellis says (Advertiser of March 30), "Mr. Whittier, if he had pleased, might have added that the disgusting process to which the first two Quaker women were subjected [stripping naked to explore for the witch's mark] was a judicial one, by commissioned officers, universally practised all over Christendom in that superstitious age, and half a century afterwards, to detect tokens of suspected witchcraft. It simply shows what a dread was felt here of specimens of a people, a report of whom in England had preceded their arrival. Could not Mr. Whittier have told his readers in a single sentence why the Quakers were treated so ruthlessly?"

It is true that the custom then prevailed all over Christendom, of suspecting certain classes of unpopular women to be witches, and treating them as such; and the reason was that the religious teachers of Christendom taught, as their successors teach now, that the Old Testament assumption of the reality of witchcraft was inspired by God, and that the punishment of death assigned to witchcraft was God's appointment. For the disappearance of these delusions (as far as they have disappeared in Christendom), we have to thank the progress of civilization, or what Mr. Lecky calls rationalism, not at all the clergy, in their official character. They still teach Bible witchcraft as a reality.

Mr. Ellis further asks, "By what rightful claim could intruders come among them [the Puritans], alleging a divine mission, to rebuke, revile, and prophesy all manner of woes against them?"

Digitized by Google

The answer is, By the same claim which was assumed as unquestionably sound by the Puritan ministers, and which is still claimed as sound by the clergy of all the sects claiming to be "Evangelical," in regard to the Hebrew prophets of the Old Testament; whose symbolic acts, presented as the fulfilment of a divine commission, were sometimes more outrageous and disgusting than any done by the Quakers. Hosea and Ezekiel were as sincere and honest as the Quakers; but, if they were to do here what our clergy now teach that God really commanded them to do, they would not escape legal restraint and chastisement. The claim of the Quakers to a divine warrant for the rebuke of sin, and for their particular methods of rebuke, was just as valid as those of the Hebrew prophets. It is owing to an unsound distinction made by the Christian clergy that the former of these is condemned, while the latter is justified. C. K. W.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

SANSKRIT AND ITS KINDRED LITERATURES: Studies in Comparative Mythology. By Laura Elizabeth Poor. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

This book has been lying on our table several weeks, but not unopened. We have taken it up a number of times, and read such goodly portions here and there of its four hundred and fifty pages that we think we can take a fair measure of its contents. It is not a book with a fascinating style. It does not entice you to read it by the way in which things are said. But it is none the less a useful book, and one which it was quite worth while to have written and published, in the present dearth of anything easily accessible on the subject in popular literature. We have noticed in other journals a great variety of criticism of it, some condemning it as nearly worthless, others giving it most extravagant praise. We should side with neither class of critics. It is not the great book which will some day be written to become the classic history on this subject. But meantime, as "Studies" on the subject, all that it claims to be, it will be of service to many readers who have not the time or facilities for making the studies themselves. The book is on a great subject, but it has a modest purpose. The author lays no claim to be an original investigator. She works with second-hand materials. But, with her materials, she appears to have worked with conscientious fidelity.

The main object of the book is well expressed in its first paragraph; namely, "to show the unity and continuity" of the literatures of which it treats. These literatures are "not many, but one." "The same leading ideas have arisen at epochs apparently far separated from each other." With this object in view, the author gives at the outset an epitome of the results of the investigations of the sources of the Sanskrit language and literature by Professors Max Müller, W. D. Whitney, and others. From this starting-point, she follows the line of development into the literatures of Brahmanism and Buddhism, Persia, the Mythology of the Greek Poetry and Drama, the Mythology of the Latin, Keltic, and Teutonic races, the Mediæval Hymns and Ballads of Europe, and thence even to the era of Modern Poetry. This last chapter, on Modern Poetry, is necessarily scrappy, and the threads of connection with the main purpose of the book not always evident. The publishers have given the book a neat exterior.

THE KING'S MISSIVE, AND OTHER POEMS, is just issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It contains a portrait of Whittier, calm, benevolent, and serious in expression. The volume is in smooth, satin-like dark blue, with gilt garniture. It contains thirty-one poems and just one hundred pages. To read it through is like sitting down for a bit of "Auld Lang Syne" with one of our own kindred. It is the same rippling stream by which we sat in our childhood. There is the same shade and sunshine, the same serenity and stillness. "National Ethics" is the only thing that creates something like a cascade in the even little stream. The sticks and straws of Calvinism make little eddies in the peaceful water, but for the most part sunshine and birds' song prevail in this as in every volume that has come from his hand. Personal character has not lost its power to rouse him. He discourses of Webster with sad severity, and of Bayard Taylor with reverent memory. "The Lost Occasion," which contains the reference to Webster, seems the best in the collection. His prelude is an apology. He says,

"I spread a scanty board too late."

Yet the repast is far from meagre. It is not such a banquet as "Snow-Bound" and "The Tent on the Beach," but it is a very tempting and toothsome array of wholesome things. We are sure of the hygienic value of every dish.

We are not certain that any American poet equals Whittier in painting the stillness of a summer landscape. He does it in the following touches in "The King's Missive":—

"Broad in the sunshine stretched away,
With its capes and islands, the turquoise bay";

and, again,

"The topaz leaves of the walnut glowed," etc.

The most exultant poem of this collection is "St. Martin's Summer." It reveals the poet's personal delight in life more than any other; for example,—

"I lean my heart against the day
To feel its bland caressing:
I will not let it pass away
Before it leaves its blessing."

There is no doubt that this little blue book will be bought, read, and loved like its predecessors.

THE EASIEST WAY TO HOUSEKEEPING AND COOKING. Adapted to Domestic use or Study in Classes. By Helen Campbell. New York: Fords, Howard & Hurlburt. 1881.

The easiest way to housekeeping, if it be also the best way, is a most desirable thing to know; and we certainly shall find no fault with Miss Campbell for adding one more to the number of cook-books, if she helps us at all on this difficult road. The first part of the book is devoted to general directions for housekeeping, and is by far the most valuable portion. It is the clearest, simplest, and most compact presentation of important truths in regard to ventilation, drainage, and other hygienic conditions of the house, and the scientific preparation of food, that we have seen; and any housekeeper who carefully studies it and follows out the suggestions given will be able to put her housekeeping on a basis of hygienic safety, order, and comfort. Although we cannot expect anything absolutely original in such a treatise, yet the subject receives an air of fresh vigor, as if the author were talking of something she had thought out and experienced, instead of copying from other books.

We regret, however, such a remark as "it is safe to say that no class of women in the civilized world is subjected to such incessant trials of temper and such temptation to be fretful as the American housekeeper." We think it quite doubtful whether we are well acquainted with the difficulties and trials of all other classes of women; and, when we consider the many advantages which American housekeepers possess in the abundance of material things, such as fuel and food and water, and the many conveniences for doing work, so generally introduced into their homes, we think it quite likely that their trials are far less than those of the French woman, with a kitchen eight feet by ten, and her little fire of charcoal, with meat dear and fuel dearer, or the German woman with her semi-annual washings.

According to our experience, domestic servants are more intelligent and reliable than they were thirty or forty years ago, because the Irish population, on which we must mainly rely, is better educated at home and better acquainted with our customs here; and the increased intelligence of our women in scientific and practical matters, and the respect for work, are developing a far better state of feeling than the last generation generally knew.

The second part devoted to recipes contains less that is interesting, although the rules are given with clearness and precision, so that they can be easily followed. In one or two points, she does not give the best directions according to her own hygienic principles.

The directions to teachers are very suggestive, and may well help in the formation of cooking schools and classes throughout the country,—a most desirable result. Why cannot any circle of young girls who wish to learn to do well what so certainly must be done, form a class, and follow out the directions in this book experimentally, thus getting the advantage of training, even if they cannot secure a skilled teacher?

E. D. C.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

EDISON, the electrician, has just obtained his three hundred and first patent.

THE eldest daughter of Rev. Edward E. Hale sailed last week for Europe to complete her art studies.

IT is reported that Mr. Beecher's effort for a revival in his church did not revive, and has therefore been abandoned.

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL is to lecture in his unique and brilliant way at the Boston Theatre in this city, next Sunday evening.

S. B. WESTON repeated last Sunday at Florence, Mass., his discourse on "The Need of Earnestness in the Free Religious Work."

W. H. SPENCER lectured in the Free Religious course at Brockton last Sunday, Miss Mary F. Eastman in the course at Ipswich.

SOME of the newspapers of this State are printing "Gov." before T. W. Higginson, just to see how it looks. It looks very well, by the way.

MR. GLADSTONE'S young daughter, Helena, has passed her examinations at Newnham College, and returns to pursue her studies, with the object of becoming a teacher there. The idea of the daughter of a prime minister becoming a teacher quite shocks the aristocratic world; but it does not strike a Yankee as anything remarkable.

PROFESSOR W. D. WHITNEY of Yale College delivered a lecture before the Harvard Philological Society at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Mass., Wednesday evening, March 23, before a large audience. Beginning with our alphabet, he showed how it was one of the elements of civilization borrowed from the Romans, who in turn borrowed it from the Greeks. The Greeks again received their alphabet from the Phœnicians. This is proved not by the uncertain traditions of remote Grecian antiquity merely, but by the identity of the names of letters of the alphabet in both languages. It is still a matter of doubt whether the Phœnician be derived from the Egyptian hieroglyphics through the abbreviated Hieratic forms. The probable origin of the Cuneiform and Chinese characters was set forth The whole lecture was illustrated by diagrams bearing comparative tables of the various alphabets. Thus we have another confirmation of the doctrine of evolution, and this from a professor in one of the leading orthodox colleges of the country.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

HOLY LAND.

Where is the Holy land? Not where
The wrecks of vanished priesthoods lie,
Fallen fanes beneath the lonely sky,
Round which of old the battle-cry
Of warring zealots rent the air:
The Santa Terra is not there.

It rears aloft no haughty dome,
Of God the so-called special home,
Beneath which low-browed peasants kneel
And voices of castrati peal.
'Tis where the light of knowledge comes
E'en to the lowliest, humblest homes;
'Tis where the people own the soil,
The acreage on which they toil,
Gathering beneath their granges' eaves
The annual harvest's golden sheaves,
Untithed by haughty priest or lord,—
For freemen's use, enrichment stored.

It is no stricken waste of sand,
Of crumbling rocks and outworn earth,
Where wild enthusiasts had birth:
Such natals once made Holy Land.
Now, where truth's light and reason's ray
Shed cloudless, intellectual day,
Where knowledge w th anointment grand
Makes all men kings,—there's Holy Land.

B. W. BALL.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 7, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

WORTH AND WORK.

People show their worth by their work. And yet many persons of solid worth and of enduring benefit to mankind fail to accomplish the work which they have most set their hearts upon doing. It is the exception rather than the rule to form a plan of life in advance, and then by sheer mental force, by will-power, to proceed to build the external career with exactness thereby. Life is made up of too multifarious elements, and many of these elements are too hidden, and necessarily unforeseen, to admit often of such rigidity of procedure. And, even if such a course were often possible, it might not be the most desirable. As constituent elements of the mental force necessary to form such a plan are the capacities of mental perception and comprehension, grasp of circumstances, possession of large ideas, and deep convictions; and it is impossible that this kind of mental power should exist at the age of twenty-five to the same degree that it does at fifty. It is a wisdom that is only gained by experience, or by life itself.

There is, it is true, a vision that is natural to the youthful stage of life, and that has no little to do with the shaping of the early career; and these youthful visions in general are so genuine, so pure, so golden, that they are rather to be encouraged than utterly rejected. Where the development of character takes place naturally, they fall in due time into their proper place, and become restricted to their proper influence. But because they are visions, and are based therefore on ideality rather than facts, they do not take adequate account of the manifold circumstances that come in to interfere with human plans, nor of the force of old traditions and habits, nor of the effect of the wills and careers of other persons who come into practical contact with our lives; and for this reason it is that so many persons are disappointed that their lives have not fulfilled the early hopes which they cherished and the earnest purposes which they formed,—persons, too, who have kept an earnest heart and an honest endeavor, and who may seem to the world outside to have lived most usefully, and to have accomplished all that could have been expected of them. Indeed, probably there are few persons to whom this world is a place for serious work rather than for any mere self-indulgence in pleasure, who do not have times of painful misgiving as to whether they have attained anything that may be called success in life,—whether on the whole their lives have not been failures. Measuring their achievements by the standard of their hopes, comparing what they have done with what they see before them clearly needing to be done, they are prone to pass judgment on themselves as after all only unprofitable servants.

But, fortunately for all such earnest souls, their contemporaries and posterity are more lenient and often more comprehensive judges than themselves. The observers regard the work actually done, and the capacity, fidelity, consecration that have gone into the doing of it. They see not the hidden longing that has not been satisfied, or, if they see it, regard it lightly in view of the things achieved. But the workers, standing with their backs to their own past, have their eyes fixed still on the things hoped for, but not yet accomplished. And not infrequently it happens that the observer can judge better than the worker himself of the kind of work the latter is best fitted to do. Here is one, we will suppose, who bitterly laments that circumstances compel him to abandon a field of labor to which, as the mission of his life, he had zealously devoted himself body and soul. He cannot help feeling a pang of disappointment as he finds his hopes and projects in chaos at his feet. But the friends that stand nearest to him believe that he has too fine a quality of mind to be trampled in the earth and mire of such a field of conflict, and are disposed to welcome the circumstances that remove him from it as opening the way to the higher opportunity which awaits his transcendent abilities.

Thus, whatever any genuine man may do, society learns to separate his worth from his work. His work is the passing utterance, the temporary outcome and result of the man, but not the man himself,—not that which measures his power nor defines his value as a factor in society. Behind the work there is a certain weight and quality of character, certain principles of conduct, certain vital forces of mind and conscience and heart, that make themselves felt through all that he does, and abide through whatever changes of occupation, through seeming failures or successes, as a permanent and stable element of social benefit. In other words, in all true human development, character is more than any special work; being is more than any particular doing; the vital capacity to do, being the continuous and indestructible source of all activity, is of vastly greater moment than any thing actually accomplished. The latter is the closed gate of the past, the former has the boundless future open before it.

There is, in fact, no failure for such character, so long as the vital capacity to do manifests itself in any direction. There is no real failure in life except the failure that comes from inertia, indolence, self-indulgence, the seductions of appetite, the unresisted onset and sway of passion. So long as a serious purpose animates the heart, and enlightened conscience holds the helm of conduct, and honorable, upright principles permeate the daily behavior and manners, life is insured against failure, whatever uncertainties and changes adverse fortune may bring in the outward sphere. It is very much, indeed, to find a vocation that is congenial, to which the faculties will adapt themselves with little fret or friction, and the results of which will satisfy the taste as well as the conscience of the worker. But this is not absolutely necessary, nor is is always possible. There can be noble and beneficent living without it. There can be integrity and honor and good-will and purity and benevolence without it. It is a mark of the greatest characters that they can do all things easily and well, that they are at home in any vocation, and can manage its great duties or small with equal facility. The secret of it is that the greatest characters carry their power within themselves, and do not derive it from their outward calling. They rule their work, whatever it be, instead of their work ruling them; and hence their work takes on a character from their own inward worth. It may, in truth, be a positive advantage to have a vocation that does not absorb and satisfy all one's faculties; for then the individual is emancipated from too exclusive dependence on his outward vocation, and is enticed to some broader endeavor and culture. In the true relation, the outward work is always subordinate to the inner power of character; the medium, not the master; the instrument through which mental and moral principles express themselves; the plastic body which, even if it be by nature homely and rugged and offensive, may be shaped to tell honestly the purpose of the masterful shaping spirit.

IN the sixty-fourth Annual Report of the City Missionary Society of Boston (an Evangelical association) there is an interesting table of statistics, comparing the number of churches and chapels of the different denominations in Boston (and the adjacent towns now annexed to the city) in the years 1820 and 1880, and the gain per cent. between those dates in the increase of churches. The whole number of churches and chapels of all sects in 1820 was 40: in 1880 there were 218. The largest gain has been the Roman Catholic; namely, 2,800 per cent.,—chiefly, of course, as the result of emigration. Next to the Catholic come the Methodist churches, which have increased 1,300 per cent.; and next the Episcopal, increased by 633.33 per cent. The Unitarian churches show the lowest rate of increase, only 81.25 per cent. It should be added, however, that there is a large increase of a liberal element in religion which does not get counted in any such statistics, the unchurched Liberals.

IT seems that Professor Adler's lectures which we have recently published, on Materialism and the Eternal Principle of Morality, have led some of the conservative Hebrews to think that he has changed his views, and that he may possibly yet return to the Jewish fold. But this, to our mind, only indicates that these conservatives have not hitherto understood, nor taken the pains to understand, the man they were criticising. The Jewish Advance sees more clearly, for it announces its belief that "the Professor is precisely the same as he was at the beginning of his bright career, and intends to remain the same advocate of charity and benevolence to all, the same enemy to all that is superstitious and irrational in creed and belief, the same opponent to all that raises the letter of a book or books above the spirit of intelligence and humanity, the same teacher of faithful deeds and deeds of faithfulness in contradistinction of theological chimeras."

THE Harvard Register is to be discontinued with the April number. Its editor and publisher, Mr. Moses King, an undergraduate, has shown wonderful energy and ability in its management. But the graduates of the College have not given it the financial support by their subscriptions which the enterprise deserved, and he is now obliged to succumb. A part of the ground occupied by the Register is now to be covered by the Library Bulletin, which is to be enlarged for the purpose and issued as the official organ of the college. Mr. King announces that the articles which have appeared in the Register on the late Professer Benjamin Peirce, have been collected in a memorial volume, which can be obtained by application to the Register office at Cambridge.

Digitized by Google

THE Boers of South Africa have good blood in them. They are descended from the Dutch employés of the old East India Company, and from a colony of French Huguenots, who, two centuries ago, found an asylum there for that liberty of religious conviction which they could not enjoy in Europe.

OUR LIBRARY.

IX.

The Transcendentalists.

Whether we look at Transcendentalism as the eternal temple of truth, or as a frequently renewed suspension bridge of fanciful pattern and slender workmanship, which gives a speedy though rather dizzy passage over the deep and rapid river of scepticism, from the dark forests and foul swamps of superstition to the rich fields and sunny hills where Science reigns, we must all admire the choice flowers of literature which have decked the structure ever since Plato hung there his matchless dialogues.

Emerson and other poets here and in Europe have been already mentioned; but it is by no means easy to make out a complete list, for Transcendentalism has inspired almost all the poetry of the century.

And then, this philosophy can show a brilliant array of histories and biographies, like Carlyle's French Revolution, Cromwell, and Frederick II.; Lecky's Rationalism, European Morals, and Eighteenth Century; Parker's Historic Americans; Johnson's India and China; Clarke's Ten Great Religions; Mrs. Child's Progress of Religious Ideas and Isaac T. Hopper; Weiss' Theodore Parker; Sanborn's John Brown; W. H. Channing's Margaret Fuller and Dr. Channing, etc. Among these authors, the first place, of course, belongs to Carlyle, who has leavened all our literature for fifty years. Next in importance is Lecky, whose histories are a rich mine of information about the last nineteen centuries, telling us how paganism and its philosophies fell before Christianity; how persecution, asceticism, and belief in witchcraft flourished until checked by the growth of freethought; and how mental progress has been resisted by the Church, but favored by all artistic, industrial, and political activity. So clear are his views of the past that it is a pity to see his visions of the future obscured by his prejudices against the system of morality which Mill and Spencer have made the ruling one.

And the originality and energy of the Transcendentalists are further shown in their contributions to literary and artistic criticism; for instance, those of Matthew Arnold, Ruskin, Greg, Weiss, Higginson, Lowell, Lessing, and especially Carlyle, to whom we owe the introduction of readers in England and America to the great German poets and novelists who powerfully aided the development of our own literature.

And moral culture has been so much stimulated by his vigorous rebukes of shams and inconsistencies, that we can afford to pardon those tirades against philanthropic societies and those eulogiums on public-spirited despots, which have puzzled some of his admirers, but which are simply legitimate results of his extreme individualism, which led him to despise public opinion, popular government, and voluntary associations, so much that the only way he could find of exercising such control over individuals, as he saw was needed for the safety of society, was to give some one individual absolute power over all the rest. Carlyle, like Lecky, displays a hostility to utilitarianism, which does not show itself in Emerson, who loves virtue too much to stoop to quarrel about its source. And so, indeed, did Theodore Parker, whose sermons are still alive with fearless rebukes of popular sins and cheerful encouragement to high morality. Nor does any intolerance weaken Channing's appeals to self-culture and brotherly love. Miss Cobbe, however, is too ready to do battle with more scientific moralists; but we must all be grateful for her appeals to disinterested loyalty to conscience, for this should ever be revered, whether we hear in it the voice of God or the universal experience of man. Her criticisms on religious duties are peculiarly full and sound, and her pleading for kindness to animals is in the spirit of the most advanced ethics. Her last book, the lectures on the Duties of Women, is remarkable for the union of desire for rapid progress with sound common-sense, so that she would throw open every field of social and intellectual activity, while she reserves for the family duties their rightful place, as usually the most important. The highest place among the philosophic and systematic teachers of intuitive morals in this generation belongs, however, to Henry Sidgwick, whose Methods of Ethics shows such desire to appreciate the labor of utilitarians, as well as to add original work of his own, that we are even more instructed by his example than by his arguments.

Most of the English and American Transcendentalists have loved philanthropy and political liberty. Carlyle, as we have seen, did not; and Wordsworth made himself notorious as an advocate of the gallows. Even now, the St. Louis Journal of Speculative Philosophy and the Concord School are striving to promulgate a reactionary system, which has had among its legitimate results the support of hereditary monarchy and hereditary aristocracy, the preference of capital and other forms of intentionally vindictive punishment to attempts to reform the criminal, and the disparagement of women, whom Hegel himself pronounced unfit for philosophy. Indeed, the general tendency of Hegelianism is manifest in two of the most independent of its disciples, Strauss and Renan, the former favoring capital punishment in his Old Faith and New, and ridiculing peace-societies, labor-reformers, etc., as well as universal suffrage and republican institutions generally; while the French philosopher urges the incompatibility of a democracy with high culture, by picturing Prospero, after his return to Milan, as falling before a revolt which is headed by Caliban, and which Ariel assails with a new tempest and most terrific music; but all in vain, for the people are blind and deaf to all that is ethereal and transcendental. Such is the general spirit of Renan's Caliban, in which the most original fancy is that of the passing away of our divinities hitherto, the gods of flesh, before the advent of gods of steel, deified steam-engines and other machinery.

Thus, Transcendentalists have differed more widely on the most important points than is consistent with the theory that they are under infallible guidance. We might, however, expect that, if conscience has any superhuman power, this would be shown in revealing the fundamental principles of philosophy so clearly that they might be readily found by all who seek them in the revelations of the inner life. But here, too, we find a great variety of opinions. Plato, and the old philosophers generally, believed that the cardinal or axiomatic virtues are wisdom, fortitude, temperance, and justice. Few modern thinkers would leave out benevolence. Indeed, Miss Cobbe sums up our duties as benevolence, personal virtue, and piety, leaving justice out. Whewell makes five cardinal virtues, namely, benevolence, justice, truth, purity, and order. The last may seem least important to us; but it did not to Jouffroy, for he reduces all the other good qualities to this. So Dr. Samuel Clarke accepted one primary axiom, that of the necessary fitness of things; while Kant has his two great axioms, and Reid has so many that he is obliged to arrange them in classes. Emerson, on the other hand, does not appear aware of the existence of strictly defined cardinal virtues or moral axioms. The more we compare the opinions of the leading Transcendentalists, the more clearly it will be seen that there is very little certainty in their philosophy.

And their systems give still more variable results in theology. It is hard to see what right the Parkerites have to claim that they know more about the Divine Nature than the Hegelians do, or that the trinitarians among these latter are more consistent than the atheists. Indeed there are at least four distinct sects of intuitive theologians.

First, there is the strict conservatism of Hegel himself and many professors in our colleges, of the Boston Monday Lectureship, and of the Concord School of Philosophy.

Then, second, there is the liberal Christianity of Beecher, Swing, and others of the most popular of our nominally orthodox preachers, of the German Rationalists, of many of the English Broad Churchmen, and of such Unitarians as Channing, Martineau, Clarke, and Hedge. The latter's Reason in Religion and Ways of the Spirit are among the most scholarly and liberal of the productions of this school.

A more free development of Transcendentalism is pure theism, such as we find inspiring all Emerson's writings, from his Nature, published in 1836, to his Preacher, published in 1880. The most systematic exposition of this view is Theodore Parker's Discourse of Religion, one chapter of which —that entitled "The Natural-Religious View, or Spiritualism"—has a curious interest from the fact that it has been used as an indorsement by the Spiritualists, in spite of its having been published in 1842, long before the name was ever employed thus. This chapter, like all the rest of the book, is remarkable for the vigor with which religion is freed from all that is unscientific and unhealthy, as well as from all that is formal and dogmatic. The most eloquent portion is the account of Jesus, which rises at times into touching pathos. Many of Parker's sermons, especially those on Theism, Atheism, and the Popular Theology, are remarkable, not only for the severity with which he denounces the errors of Orthodoxy, but for the earnestness with which he pleads for rational faith in God, conscience, and immortality. His prayers must always hold a place beside the Imitation of Christ by Thomas à Kempis, and the Psalms of David. The writer most like him, however, is Frances Power Cobbe, who in her Broken Lights and Religious Duty, as well as in many of her essays, shows how the most tender and spiritual form of piety may also be the most independent and philanthropic. She has proved that those who have faith in personal Deity and immortality need lose nothing of the beauty and power which decked the creeds that are passing away. There are many other valuable statements of this view, for instance, Weiss' American Religion and Immortal Life, Bartol's Radical Problems, Rising Faith, and Principles and Portraits, Johnson's Worship of Jesus, and Newman's Phases of Faith. And Thoreau, though he has written no book like these, deserves a place among radical authors in view of many spirited passages, especially in the Sunday chapter of the Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers where he tells us that "there is more religion in men's science than there is science in their religion."

Digitized by Google

These writers have certainly developed Transcendentalism in greater freedom from outside pressure than have those who defended Orthodoxy or even liberal Christianity; but they cannot claim to have more of this liberty than is enjoyed by those whose intuitions reveal nothing holier than Nature and Humanity. The best-known book in this spirit is that on The Old and New Faith, by Strauss, who tells us that we have advanced so far from the ideas set forth in the Gospels and in the sacraments that we have no right to call ourselves Christians, and that we can have no religion, except what we can base on our faith in the Cosmos, while our rule of life must depend on our knowledge of our relations to this universe in which we live. Similar views may be found in Renan and in Feuerbach, though the latter's Essence of Christianity shows that he had left Hegelianism for materialism. Bradlaugh also seems to have drawn largely from Spinoza. And the last great teacher of this philosophy, Schopenhauer, says that religions, like fire-flies, shine only in the dark.

At all events, Transcendentalism has produced such a variety of theologians that there is plainly room for some system of thought which will yield more uniform results. F. M. H.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

In the March number of the Sanitarian, Dr. Nathan Allen calls attention to the well-established fact that "about one-third of all the disease and mortality that once prevailed can be prevented." It is only in the last few years that this fact has become fully known and its significance realized. As a consequence of it, more and more is being done to prevent disease; while some of the best of physicians give special attention to the diffusion of information about the laws of healthful living. He applies this thought to the treatment of insanity especially, and quotes the statement that "insanity is a disease of ignorance,—ignorance of the human organism and the laws which regulate it.' He says little is done to cure insanity, while all students of it believe much can be done to prevent it by a general diffusion of a knowledge of the laws of the human organism. He thinks far better results could be secured, if even one-tenth of what is now spent in its cure could be efficiently applied to its prevention. The same thought of the prevention of disease is brought out in a paper on tenement-house reform in New York City. It details the efforts made there in the last few years in securing good dwellings for the poor and the great success of the effort. All interested in the subject would do well to read this paper in full. Several organizations have taken up this work, one of the most efficient being a building association. Another movement is in imitation of Miss Octavia Hill's labors in London. Tenements of the worst sort are rented, repaired, cleansed, put into good condition, relet to the same persons, while a careful superintendence is given to sanitary and moral health of the inmates. As a consequence, "in a very short time, a marked change for the better is to be observed both in their morals and in their health; and those who but a few weeks before were looked upon as the dregs of society are to be found living in a decent and respectable manner."

The Indians have excited not a little attention of late from the philanthropic. In her Century of Dishonor, Mrs. Jackson has eloquently told the story of their wrongs since the foundation of the Republic, fortifying her statements by the official documents and figures. It is one that reflects no honor upon us as a great nation. A little, at least, has been done to wipe out that stain in the education of Indian youth. In the April Harper's, Helen M. Ludlow gives an account of "Indian Education at Hampton and Carlisle." In 1878, the first Indian youth were taken to Hampton; and their success there as students has been remarkable. It has shown their capacity for education in a most convincing manner. The education given them is largely industrial, such as will fit them for the life they must hereafter live. The school at Carlisle, Penn., was opened in 1879, and has nearly two hundred pupils. Miss Ludlow says a study of the young people in these two schools will show that "Indian children are, on the whole, very much like other children, some bright and some stupid, some good and some perverse, all exceedingly human." The Indians themselves take a keen interest in the education of their children, and seem to be anxious to have them educated. There appears to be a growing interest among them in the adoption of the ways of white men, and an anxious desire to settle down to a civilized life. Wide-Awake for March gives an account of "some Indian schools" in the Indian Territory, showing how zealous are these people to maintain their own schools. We are then told that in the five civilized nations of that Territory "schools are quite as numerous in proportion to the population as in the States. They are principally supported by the Indians themselves, who draw a large annuity from the United States,—the interest upon money held in trust by our government, the sale of land sold to us by the Indians." The school at Tahlequah, the capital of the Cherokee nation, has a college course, while the pupils make as good progress as in most of our own schools. These experiments at education are certainly full of promise. It seems much better to educate than to exterminate. The new policy of conciliation, fair treatment, education, and a settled life, should be carried forward as rapidly as possible. It is not to be expected the red men can be turned into white men, even by education; but much can be done for their improvement. The past should be atoned for, and its dishonor never again permitted.

The success of women physicians has been most encouraging. It is a profession they are in many ways specially qualified for, and it is one in which they may be of the greatest service to their sex. In a great number of cases, they are able to render a better service than men can give. They are better nurses, appreciate more keenly the finer phases of treatment for the sick. This fact is so much recognized now, that women are being trained for professional nursing. In connection with Bellevue Hospital in New York is a Training School for Nurses. It provides a two years' course, the instruction being given at the bedside of the patients by competent physicians and surgeons. The nurses command good wages, when their training is completed; and the demand for their services greatly exceeds the number who have prepared for the work. This is a profession for women eminently suited to them, one that will command a good compensation, because it will not be crowded; and it is one preëminently of benevolence and humanity.

G. W. C.

Another marriage is arranged in England between a lady of mature age, much wealth, acquired by brewing, and well known for her charities, and a young gentleman who is only a little above twenty years old.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

Manners and Opinion in America.

Children in America are regarded as apt to act upon their own will rather than upon the will of their parents. It did not appear to be so in any of the families which I had opportunities of observing: on the contrary, there was manifest affectionate and intelligent obedience. At the same time, it was apparent that young people were more self-acting than they are in England, where we have a somewhat unwise domestic paternalism, which encourages a costly dependence. The result is that many parents have to keep their children at a period of life when children should be prepared to keep their parents, if need be. The American habit of training their children to independence, which they interpret as meaning self-dependence, has much to be said in its favor. We have the Scriptural maxim, "Train up a child in the way it should go." Young people in England among the middle class have quite reversed this. Their reading of the text is, "Train up the parents in the way they should go that, when they are old, they shall not depart from it." Hence it is that we have so many young men whose politics are conservative conceit, who despise the principles under which their fathers were enabled to achieve prosperity, and who think their mission in this world is to live upon the earnings of their relatives, making no honest exertions on their own behalf.

The equality of classes in America has many pleasant features. Policemen are dressed without the apoplectic rigor common with us. In riding with Mr. Quincy, in one of the public carriages, or with the mayor of the city, I observed that they spoke to the driver as an acquaintance. When Mr. Wendell Phillips took me to see Cambridge, he consulted the driver as to the best route to see the university and other places of interest. Sometimes the driver stopped and suggested another route that he thought would be better, with as much ease and confidence as though he were one of the party. In nations where there is social inequality, intercourse between superior and inferior classes is marked by ceremonies of submission on the part of the lower to the higher. There are also observances of pure courtesy, which pass under the pleasant name of "deference." Deference is just, when it is voluntary; when offered as an acknowledgment of discerned worth, it is politeness; when it is yielded because it is exacted, it is servility. When all classes become socially equal, as in America, there is among the unthinking an unceremoniousness of behavior, which they suppose to be a sign of equality as showing that one man is as good as another. It is overlooked that among gentlemen who are on a perfect equality there is deference of manner toward each other. Without it, equality becomes mere familiarity. In a democratic nation, every person is a gentleman or a lady in social rights; and perpetual deference to each other is a mark of educated equality. What reticence is in speech, deference is in manners. Those who do not know when to be silent are not more offensive than they who do not know when to be still. The babbler is one with the familiar. Deference is the acknowledgment of individual superiority where it exists. Rudeness is a coarse assumption of the right to disregard the feelings and convenience of others. It is not equality, it is insolence.

The splendid school system of the country causes a much higher average of intelligence than we have in England. I frequently heard young ladies of fifteen or eighteen years of age speak familiarly and intelligently of public questions, cite the names, recall the record, describe the capacity of public men with an accuracy of judgment which would be thought unusual in ladies in England of mature age. Where general intelligence reaches so high a level, persons of distinguished attainments are less conspicuous than they are in a nation where the majority are ignorant. Where the many know little, a person whose knowledge reaches only the standard of mediocrity has a chance of being conspicuous, and a person of ordinary attainments is eminent. But it implies a higher state of progress where the majority are well informed than where only a few are so. In America there are a million villas to a single mansion. This implies a far higher average of comfort than where there are a thousand great houses, and a million hovels.

Eccentricity in piety in America is imputed to the want of that delicacy and taste supposed to be conspicuous in democratic institutions; yet in England

Digitized by Google

Moody and Sankey exhibitions were promoted by noblemen. Thurlow Weed, a politician always spoken of now as a "venerable and great authority," has lately given the following description of American Christianity. "Clergymen do not, as formerly, dwell and linger upon the dark feature of theology. Nothing is now heard of the fate of 'infants not a span long.' The ministry of our day is a ministry of peace, charity, and good-will. This generation learns to love and serve rather than to dread and distrust our Creator and our Saviour." This is said in answer to a great American heretic, Col. R. G. Ingersoll. But the answer itself is heresy in England. The intolerance complained of in American religious life did not strike me as being at all so serious as it is sometimes represented. Intolerance in any degree is thought more of in America than elsewhere, because the general liberty of opinion is so great there. There is, however, I observed, some neat, unadulterated intolerance in many church quarters in the States; but the bluest pattern is imported, and, as a rule, does not keep its color in America. It is objected that a stranger settling anywhere in the country is asked by his neighbor what church he purposes to attend, and that there is an exacting expectation that he should go to some place. The question, however, is often put merely to test the stranger's tastes. If no place on hand suits him, things are sometimes made unpleasant to him. But this objection to non-conformity is a very different thing from what it is in England. In America there are fifty religions to one in England; and a man is fairly thought to be fastidious and "stuck up" who, amid the great variety presented to him for selection, cannot find one to his mind. They offer him so many specimens that they think it a reflection upon their ingenuity, if not one will suit the newcomer. If, however, the stranger who is thus difficult to please chooses to set up a new religion for himself, there is nothing more said. He is quite at liberty to do it; and, if he "strikes ile" in unexpected quarters, he becomes popular, as having increased the theological resources of the community. American Christians are braver-minded than English. They believe in spite of irreverent humor. They can laugh at droll aspects of the thing they like. We think ridicule kills piety. The religion of the nation does not stand upon the connection of the Church with the State, but upon conviction, which is braver. Americans have such prodigal material resources that they expect a great deal of everything. Whether it be theology or politics, they like large quantities of it. As with us, those who promise most are most popular. It is only the few who see that a little truth makes you wealthier than ten times the amount of error. But, with the bulk of mankind as they are, making great promises is a good trade alike in politics or piety. It does not much matter that nothing comes true. Many generations of men will live on expectations, as the history of great creeds shows. Those who believe in many things are much better regarded by the public than those who believe in few. Simplicity and truth seem shabbiness by the side of the profuseness of error and the opulence of delusion. Besides the thinking class (never very numerous in any country), who look for evidence of new truth or for verifications of supposed truth, there are two other classes,—those who have each a set of first principles for himself, and those—the most numerous of all—who have no principles whatever, and do not want any.

The reason why Spiritualism answers better in America than elsewhere is because anybody may put what interpretation he pleases upon any proposition advanced; and, in districts where there is no standard of common-sense or test of science established, the believer has it all his own way. Then, people who aim at nothing almost always hit it, and nobody disputes their success.

The American manner of speech is more picturesque than in England. People look at things in a more unconventional way. I had excused myself to my host Mr. Hill, at Florence, for smoking, by saying I did it to avoid pretence of perfection. "Yes," he said, "You don't want to be an angel at starting out." One thing which struck me in meeting American ladies was seeing how large a number were teeth-talkers. They used their teeth like a piano, and the pretty accents seemed to run along the rows. English women usually talk with their lips, which is enticing; but the American method has very winning ways with it.

The Irish, whose charm is perplexingness, do not suffer that quality to deteriorate in America. They submit to the Church, but rebel against secular government. They submit to ecclesiastical authority abjectly, and resist the nobler authority of reason foolishly. Having been so long oppressed and deceived, they suspect nobody so much as those who try to serve them. GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these with great freedom, and not of necessity at all. F. A. H.

THE WORLD WE LIVE IN.

THE MINERAL KINGDOM.
THE VEGETABLE KINGDOM.
THE ANIMAL KINGDOM. (Except man.)
MAN.

Study 7. The Mineral Kingdom.

Text-book, Geology, Science Primer Series.

Igneous Rocks, Continued.

Articles 176-187 inclusive.

Specimens: Lava, Pumice, Granite.

We have found Igneous Rocks to be what?
Where, then, do they come from?
Is there any evidence of great heat in the earth's interior?
How is it shown in deep mines?
What experiments have been made with the thermometer?
What would probably happen at a depth of two miles?
What at a depth of twenty-five or thirty miles?
And thirty miles is what portion of the earth's radius?
So that the earth for the most part is probably in what condition?
How do Hot Springs show the internal heat of the earth?
What are the Geysers of Iceland?
Have we Geysers in this country, and, if so, where?
From what do we get our most impressive evidence of the great heat within the earth?
How many Volcanoes are there in the world at the present time?
Where are they mostly found?
What is a dormant or extinct Volcano?
Are there many such?
What does this show about volcanic action?
What about the manifestation of the heat of the interior at the surface of the earth?
What is probable concerning Earthquakes?
If the inside of the earth is so hot, why is not the outside warmer?
The heat therefore passes away from the centre of the earth into space how?
How may this be illustrated by the cooling of a volcanic eruption?
What happens to bodies when they are heated?
What when they cool?
When the earth was vastly hotter than now, was it probably the same size as now?
What has happened as the cooling process has gone on?
And how would this contracting affect the rocks of the surface?
Is it possible to conceive of the force thus expended?
Does it result in destruction or in order and beauty?

SELECTIONS.

Time and Thought were my surveyors,
They laid their courses well:
They boiled the sea, and baked the layers
Of granite, marl, and shell.—Emerson.

The hills move lightly, and the mountains smoke,
* * * * * * * *
The rocks fall headlong, and the valleys rise.—Cowper.

The fierce flames to which the Alp owes its upheaval and the volcano its terror temper for us the metal vein and quickening spring.—Ruskin.

As water to our thirst, so is the rock, the ground, to our eyes and hands and feet.—Emerson.

For our incitement, herbs have their healing, stones their preciousness, and stars their times.—Ruskin.

Every atom poises for itself,
And for the whole.—Emerson.

Suggestions to Leader.—In connection with this study, read some good account of some of the leading Volcanoes; also the Geysers of California and Iceland. Such may be found in available shape in a little book on The Sublime in Nature, of the Illustrated Library of Wonders Series, published by Scribner & Co. Also, of course, in the Cyclopædias. The lessons of the Selections are obvious, do not fail to explain them clearly to the children.

Study 8.—The Mineral Kingdom.

Text-book, Geology, Science Primer Series.

The Crust of the Earth.

Articles 188-217 inclusive.

Specimens: The different examples of Sedimentary, Organic, and Igneous Rocks already used: namely, Conglomerate, Sandstone, Shale, Coal, Chalk, Lava, Pumice, and Granite.

We have now learned what?
What are these materials?
Into what classes have we divided them?
How and where are these different classes made?

[Let the members of the group select from the specimens, giving the proper name to each, and telling all they can about them.]

Do these rocks form simply a thin covering on the surface of the earth?
What is the solid outer part of the earth called?
In what proportion are the different kinds of rock found in the earth's crust?
Have all rocks always been in the same situations they are now in?
Can you give any examples?
What do such facts show?
What does a portion of the coast of Scotland show?

[See Figure 33, page 93.]

So that this land on which towns stand and roads are built was once what?
Can similar changes be noticed elsewhere?
Has the ocean sunk or has the land been raised?
What proof have we of that?
What can be seen in the south-east of Sweden?
The rocks of every country furnish evidence of what?
What can be seen along the coast line of England?
What does an examination of this beach show?
Why do we conclude that here the land must have sunk?
What has been taking place in the southern part of Greenland?
What do coal-pits show about the sinking of the land?

[See Figures 37 and 38, pages 103 and 105.]

What two things, then, have often happened to the earth's crust?
All of which is additional proof of what?

SELECTIONS.

Nature, only loud when she destroys,
Is silent when she fashions.—Trench.

Every power that fashions and upholds
Works silently,—all things whose life is sure
Their life is calm.—Trench.

Nature carves the coastwise mountains into caves.—Emerson.

What solid was, by transformation strange,
Grows fluid; and the fixed and rooted earth,
Tormented into billows, heaves and swells.—Cowper.

Sincerely awakened intelligence may find wealth in every falling rock and wisdom in every talking wave.—Ruskin.

Only the wise can interpret the song of the waters. Only the good can understand the history of the dry land.

Suggestions to Leader.—In using the specimens for this study, be particular not to tell the children what they are. Let them tell for themselves. In connection with the selections, talk about the silent forces of the world, and show how calm determination of character will always prove stronger than noisy and boastful living.

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

M. JULES FERRY has established a number of colleges for females in several parts of France. Some o them have already been opened.

Digitized by Google

AN EDUCATED WILL.

[From a Sermon by JOHN W. CHADWICK.]

What Abraham Lincoln said of the suppression of the great rebellion is true also of the education of the will. It is a big job,—so big that we can disdain no help that comes to us, however little it may be. Inestimable here are those friends of our virtue who make plain to us the laws that rule within the moral sphere, the intrinsic beauty of holiness, the intrinsic hatefulness of all injustice and impurity. What light a single sentence of the great masters of ethics flashes at times upon a tortuous and darkening way! Emerson is the greatest ethical teacher of the modern world among those who have made the aphorism or the essay the favorite vehicle of their thought. He abounds in sentences that startle us with the aptness of their application to our own affairs. There are warnings and encouragements on every page. But more effective than the most penetrating phrases are those literary triumphs in which the relations of character and circumstance to conduct are exhibited in the development of a personality. It is the privilege of the novelist to do this,—a privilege of which he avails himself too rarely. The characters of the novelist are generally puppets of his arbitrary will. Seldom can they say truly of their heroes and heroines as Thackeray of Esmond and the mother of Beatrix, "I didn't marry them: they married themselves." The average novelist is generally a benevolent deus ex machina, always ready to step in at the last moment and save his puppets from the legitimate effects of their inherent qualities. But in the person of George Eliot, the most gifted woman of the nineteenth century, so far, we have had,—we still have: it is only Marian Evans who is dead: George Eliot is as much alive to-day as ever,—we have a novelist who has been willing to stand off and permit the men and women of her creation to work out the legitimate effects of their characters and the circumstances in which they are placed. The result is such a contribution to our stock of ethical warnings and encouragements as has not been made by any other writer of our time. The novels of George Eliot are a series of dramatic studies of the education of the will. I am assured that by affirming this I make a hostile criticism on their artistic quality. "The artist never moralizes," cries M. Taine. "Never moralizes," echoes the neo-pagan choir. I doubt it much. But I am willing to allow that George Eliot's greatest distinction was not in art, and even that her moral fervor sometimes marred the artistic aspects of her work. But to be the greatest moral teacher and inspirer of one's time is a distinction that is vastly greater than to be the most perfect artist. And George Eliot was that: as I interpret her, not first an artist and second an ethical philosopher, but first an ethical philosopher, a teacher of morality, and second an artist; a moral teacher availing herself of the methods of art to enforce the grand and awful lessons which, so help her God, she could no otherwise than utter to an unbelieving world. I do not forget how much of thoroughly artistic work was incidental to the performance of this task. What living men and women move across her stage, speaking their own thought in their own way, never her thought in her way; what exquisite humor enlivens almost every page; and how appropriate the frame of local circumstance in which every character is set! Enough is here to satisfy the thousands who resent the novelist's assumption of the preacher's moral tone. But, while I do not mean to undervalue any of this, and do not unless I deceive myself, it is not because she was so great an artist that I most admire and honor her, but because she saw as did no other of her time the sublime significance of AN EDUCATED WILL, and set forth as did no other the dangers that beset the way to this attainment, and the methods of long-suffering, self-restraint, and self-denial by which alone it can be reached. Hardly can I conceive of any course of reading so tonic in its influence upon the moral sense and will as the novels of George Eliot. Many a Hetty Sorrel—if only the Hetty Sorrels read them—might, I have thought, be saved from Hetty's fate by her sad history. Many an Arthur Donnithorne, I am sure, interposing the good opinion of others, entirely ignorant of the ground of his self-reproach between himself and this, might be warned in time of the abyss to the edge of which—ay, and to the bottom of which—such habits of self-comfort lead. And many a Tito, I am sure, not bad as yet, but only wishing to avoid all painful and unpleasant things, has been arrested in his downward course by that wonderful depiction of the progress of Tito's character from bad to worse till there was nothing too bad for him to do. Many times already I have expressed to you my faith in the moral efficacy of the book of which Tito Melema is the central and important character. It would be impossible for me to exaggerate my sense of the moral value of this book for those who have the wit to apprehend its deep significance. But I shall never cease to regret that George Eliot did not choose for the ideas of this novel an English setting, that would have introduced it into a wider circle of sympathies and brought home its lesson to a greater multitude of men.

George Eliot's contribution to the problem of an educated will is her unique perception of the reproductive power of every action, good or bad. She has embodied this perception in a hundred apt and striking phrases. For example: "Our lives make a moral tradition of our individual selves, as the life of mankind at large makes a moral tradition for the race; and to have once acted greatly seems a reason why we should always be noble." "But Tito," she says, "was feeling the effect of an opposite tradition: he had won no memories of self-conquest and perfect faithfulness from which he could have a sense of falling." Again she says of him: "He hardly knew how the words had come to his lips. There are moments when our passions seem to speak and decide for us, and we seem to stand by and wonder: they carry in them an inspiration of crime that in one instant does the work of long premeditation." But equally an inspiration of virtue when the habitual life has been just and noble, when there is a tradition of nobleness, when there are "memories of self-conquest and perfect faithfulness" to compel us to maintain ourselves at their exalted height. The sadness of George Eliot's stories, of which we hear so much complaint, comes from the fact that her illustrations of the law of moral reproductiveness are mostly taken from the sphere of moral lapse. But the law holds equally good in the sphere of moral improvement. "Memories of self-conquest and perfect faithfulness" are as much a fate for good as the opposite memories are a fate for evil. The law of moral reproduction is discouraging to all wrong-doing, encouraging to all right-doing. If George Eliot gave us only maxims containing so much wisdom, our debt to her would be considerable. But she has done more than this, infinitely more. She has created for us characters whose development according to their own inward law illustrates, sometimes with dreadful painfulness, the law of moral reproduction, the fatality of the moral tradition.

Is this a hopeless creed? Truly there are those for whom there seems to be "no place for repentance," they have established for themselves a tradition of such utter baseness. But to know the law is to avoid the consequence. George Eliot addresses herself to men and women in whom the dread of moral deterioration is still a motive power. Having this dread, and knowing by what gradual approaches "their feet take hold on hell," men can avoid those acts of self-endearment and self-pity which lead on to ever baser things.

Ye know these things. Happy are ye if ye do them. No perception, however clear, of the laws of ethical development will serve us, if we do not bend ourselves with earnest resolution to the tasks of self-determination which these laws command. It is not by reading, it is not by thought, it is by action, action, action, that we reach the consummation of an educated will. Honor and praise to all the teachers and helpers who have painted virtue and vice in their true colors, who have appealed with signal force to our dread of self-deterioration, who have made the beauty of holiness seem so beautiful to us that we have said, "This beauty must be ours"! But, if we desire for ourselves the honor and the glory of a completely fashioned will, we must address ourselves to the arduous task of amassing for ourselves a tradition of justice and tenderness and good-will that will compel us to illustrate these qualities in each new emergency. Think not, O brave young men, O beautiful young women, that you can indulge yourselves to-day in this or that little act of selfishness or insincerity, and be just as easily able to-morrow as you are to-day to avoid a similar act. For every act of selfishness or insincerity that you commit, unselfishness and sincerity will be harder for you in the future; while, on the other hand, every unselfish action, every sincere or generous act, makes generosity, sincerity, unselfishness henceforth the more natural and unavoidable gesture of the mind.

Having such ample furtherance, aware of these tremendous aspects and responsibilities of the moral life, shall we not address ourselves with firmer courage and with more inflexible resolve to the achievement of that highest good which beckons us from far away,—the possession of an educated will, a will that naturally and easily, as flowers to seek the light, will turn itself to the performance of all just and noble things. Remembering that we are factors in the moral environment of our fellow-beings, shall we not try to make ourselves friendly to their virtue in all possible ways? Remembering what power we have in the formation of our own character, how much past deeds determine what we are, how gradual the incline that slips at length into unfathomable deeps, and what compelling force a tradition of nobleness has to keep us in the ways of truth and right, shall we not seek more earnestly than we have done to lay up for ourselves such "memories of self-conquest and perfect faithfulness" as will hold us firm and steady, whatever winds of wild temptation, whatever waves of lawless passion, may beat upon our house?

> "Oh, well for him whose will is strong!
> He suffers, but he will not suffer long;
> He suffers, but he cannot suffer wrong:
> For him nor moves the loud world's random mock,
> Nor all Calamity's hugest waves confound;
> Who seems a promontory of rock
> That, compassed round with turbulent sound,
> In middle ocean meets the surging shock,
> Tempest-buffeted, citadel-crowned.
>
> "But ill for him who, bettering not with time,
> Corrupts the strength of heaven-descended will,
> And ever weaker grows through acted crime,
> Or seeming-genial venial fault,
> Recurring and suggesting still!
> He seems as one whose footsteps halt,
> Toiling in immeasurable sand,
> And o'er a weary, sultry land,
> While far beneath a blazing vault,
> Sown in a wrinkle of the monstrous hill,
> The city sparkles like a grain of salt."

FOREIGN.

THE students of the Glasgow University, at an enthusiastic meeting lately held, resolved to raise a subscription for the purpose of presenting to the Senatus of the University a statue of Mr. Carlyle.

THE third anniversary of the coronation of Pope Leo XIII. was celebrated with great pomp in the Sistine Chapel on the 3d ult. The Russian Grand Dukes, the Princes Carlo and Oscar of Sweden, and a number of diplomatic and papal officials, were among those present.

THE Victor Hugo fête has been followed by the publication of the first part of an illustrated life of the poet. It is written by M. A. Barbou, of the Bibliothèque Ste. Geneviève, who is said to have been engaged for the last ten years in collecting the materials for it.

A MOB broke into the Protestant church at Marsala recently, and, despite the efforts of the police, carried out all the books and furniture, of which they made a bonfire in the Piazza del Duomo. Entering the cathedral, they are said to have received the solemn benediction of the archbishop and clergy. The Protestant minister, Signor Litteeri, with difficulty escaped.

THE memorial to the late Miss Adelaide Neilson is now completed, and has been placed over her grave in Brompton Cemetery. The memorial consists of a large, handsome cross of the finest white marble, the pedestal which bears it having the following words in plain letters: "In loving memory of Adelaide Neilson, died August 15, 1880. Gifted and beautiful, resting."

THE plague has broken out in Mesopotamia. At the instance of the International Sanitary Council, the Porte has ordered a double cordon to be drawn round the localities where the plague is raging, one round each village, and the second round each district. It has also been decided to burn all the infected villages. At Nedjeff there were eighteen deaths between the 28th of February and the 2d of March; and thirty persons fell victims to the plague at Djagra, during the last thirteen days of February. The extent of the mortality at Kerbela has not been exactly ascertained. Dr. Kabiades, who is an authority on the plague, has been despatched to the stricken district.

IN the Belgian Chamber, March 9, M. Nothomb, a former Minister of Justice, opposed the proposals of the Government to reduce the budget of Public Worship, and attacked the general policy of the ministry as anti-religious. The Minister of Justice replied that the charges were exaggerated; and after some discussion the proposals of the ministry for reducing the grants to the ecclesiastical seminaries, suppressing the government grants to the professors and students of these seminaries, to the salaries of the military chaplains, and the salaries of priests paying taxes as traders and of foreign priests appointed without the sanction of the Government, were adopted. Amendments moved by private members for the reduction of the bishops' salaries, and of the number of salaries paid for curates, were rejected. The whole of the estimates of the Ministry of Justice, including for Public Worship, were finally adopted.

Digitized by Google

It may console the professors of the spiritual art, who meet with many unsympathizing authorities in this country, to know that they are better appreciated in France, if we are to take the recent case of Mlle. Vinolas as a test. The lady in question was prosecuted for obtaining a number of railway bonds of considerable value from a M. Harpé, who appears to have fallen under the influence of the charmer with more than usual silliness. Mlle. Vinolas went considerably beyond the stock business, such as calling up from the vasty deep celebrated characters, such as Napoleon, Meyerbeer, and Tropmann (a curious mixture of heroes); for she persuaded the old gentleman that he had passed through no less than thirty-seven successive incarnations before he became M. Harpé, and that, in point of fact, in the thirteenth metempsychosis, which happened in 1704, he had contracted matrimony with Mlle. Vinolas herself. It is clear that, under these overpowering circumstances, the lady had a perfect right to the railway bonds or any other property upon which she could lay hands; but the executors of M. Harpé (he having gone through the last and final metempsychosis) differed from her view of the case, and went so far as to accuse her of robbery. The court, however, gave a verdict in her favor, so that Spiritualism may expect good times in Paris for the future.—Pall Mall Budget.

JESTINGS.

"Don't I make a pretty picture?" exclaimed Jones, rather ruefully, as he stepped upon the river bank after his baptism through the ice. "A picture?" replied his friend. "I should call you a silly wet."

His text was: "What dost thou here, Elijah?" He divided it into two heads. "First, my brethren," said he, "let us consider what Elijah did hear; and, secondly, what he didn't hear."—Brookline Chronicle.

Teacher: "Did I not tell you to be prepared with your history lesson? And here you are unable to repeat a word of it." Scholar: "I didn't think it was necessary, sir. I've always heard that history repeats itself."

Texas prohibits by law the opening of telegraph offices on Sunday. The Detroit Free Press expresses the hope that the good State will go a little further, and make it a misdemeanor to murder a man on Sunday.

The Philadelphia Telegraph publishes an article entitled "Noted Men of Harvard," and it don't say a word about either the pitcher, the captain of the eight, or any of the football men. Now, what sort of an article is that on "Noted Men of Harvard"?—Post.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

To the Free Religious Association, for the Continued Publication of the Free Religious Index.

Paid.

Amount acknowledged up to March 1	$2028.75
Chas. H. Pierce, New Bedford (10th assess.)	10.00
S. G. Morgan, " " one year of pledge	25.00
Arthur M. Lee, New York	20.00
Thos. Davis, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess.)	10.00
J. D. Frost, Providence, R.I. (10th assess.)	10.00
Pledges.
F. W. Christern, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. Stone, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. Morgan, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	25.00
Samuel L. Hill, Florence, annually for 4 years	100.00
John L. Whiting, Boston	50.00
M. B. Greensfelder, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
Clara M. Rotch, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	50.00
Miss Emma D. Ireson, Lynn, Mass., annually for 3 years	5.00
James Eddy, Providence, annually	50.00
Thomas Davis, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess't)	10.00
J. W. Boyd, Jelloway, Ohio, annually for 5 years	10.00
Robert Davis, Lunenburg, Mass. (annually)	10.00
J. S. Johnson, Almont, Mich., annually for 5 years	10.00

William J. Potter, Secretary F.R.A.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every new subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

METROPOLE
INSURANCE COMPANY,
OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,
No. 20 Kilby Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, Esq.,
Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.

GEORGE M. BARNARD, Esq.,
Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.

WILLIAM P. HUNT, Esq.,
President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

JUST READY.

A NEW VOLUME. BY MR. SAVAGE.

Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind.

These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN.

A COURSE OF LECTURES BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

Author's American Edition. Cloth. 12mo.
PRICE $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.50
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

THE SIX DISCOURSES
OF
Mr. Samuel B. Weston

Submitted to the Unitarian Committee of Reference in the Leicester Case, together with Mr. Southgate's Will and the Committee's decision, making a pamphlet of 67 pages, can be had at the Index Office, or by sending to H. O. Smith, Leicester, Mass.

Price, for single copy, 40 cts.; for two or more copies, 30 cts. each.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.
Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS
OF THE
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,— all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,
COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

L. PRANG & CO.'S
Easter Cards for 1881.

Of these cards, we offer this season a greater variety and of more elegant artistic taste than ever before. We call particular attention to the cards with silk fringes and tassels, and the cards on heavy gilt-edged mounts.

NEW EASTER EGG DESIGN.
Easter Dove Design.

A very rich and elegant line of

NEW BIRTHDAY CARDS,

with and without silk fringe.

L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

RADICAL DISCOURSES.

1. America's Debt to Thomas Paine.
2. False and True Prayer.
3. The Brute God of the Old Testament.
4. The Religion of To-day.
5. False Teachings of the Christian Church.
6. The Workingman's Religion.
7. The Christian Tragedy at Pocasset.
8. Free Religion; or, The Religious Demands of To-day.
9. The Teachings of Free Religion.
10. Do You Love Jesus?
11. Atonement.
12. The Bible: How shall we read it?
13. Revivals.
14. Who are Christians?
15. The Moral Life.
16. Is Liberalism Moral?
17. If a Man Die, shall he Live Again?
18. The Resurrection of Jesus Not Proved.
19. The New in the Old.
20. The Beliefs of Unbelievers.
21. A Holy Superstition.
22. Temperance in the Bible.
23. Common-Sense Views of Our Journey through the Bible. Nos. 1, 2, 3.

The above discourses may be had at 5 cts. each, or the entire set for one dollar, by addressing L. K. WASHBURN,
22 Sachem Street, Lynn, Mass.

Suitable for Knitting Stockings, Mittens, Wristers, Edgings, and other articles. Put up on half-ounce balls in Black, White, and Colors. An illustrated book of 32 pages of rules for knitting this silk sent by mail on receipt of a 3c. stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness, and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,
Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,
23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 589.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 41.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

"IS THIS one of us, or is he a stranger?" is the enumeration of the ungenerous. But to those by whom liberality is practised the whole world is but as one family.—Hindu.

WHEN heaven is about to confer a great function, it first exercises the mind with suffering and the limbs with toil, exposes the body to privations, and confounds the undertakings. In this way, it stimulates power and supplies defect. Incessant falls teach men to reform, and distresses rouse their strength. Life springs from calamity, and death from ease.—Chinese (Mencius).

PURITY is of two kinds, real and formal: the real consisteth in not bending the heart to evil; and the formal, in cleansing away what appears evil to the view.—Persian.

BE of the same mind one toward another. Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men.—New Testament (Paul).

THOU God of all, infuse light into the souls of men, whereby they may be enabled to know what is the root from whence all their evils spring, and by what means they may avoid them.—Euripides.

THE Scripture and the Faith and the Truth say Sin is naught else but that the creature turneth away from the unchangeable Good, and betaketh itself to the changeable; that is to say, that it turneth away from the Perfect to "that which is in part," imperfect, and most often to itself.—Theologia Germanica.

IT is not lawful in heaven to think three and say one, because every one in heaven speaks from thought: in heaven there is thinking speech or speaking thought.—Swedenborg.

TO WHICH religion do I belong? To none that thou might'st name. And why to none? For religion's own sake.—Schiller.

PURE truth, like pure gold, has been found unfit for circulation, because men have discovered that it is far more convenient to adulterate the truth than to refine themselves. They will not advance their minds to the standard, therefore they lower the standard to their minds.—Colton.

TRUTH is congenial to man. Moral truth is then most consummate when, like beauty, it commends itself without argument. The righteous not only does right, but loves to do right.—F. W. Newman.

EVER present, potent, vigilant in the breast of man, there is that which never became a partner in his guilt, never consented to a wrong deed, nor performed one, but holds itself above all sin, impeccable, immaculate, immutable, the deity of the heart, the conscience of the soul, the oracle and interpreter, the judge and executor of the divine law.—A. B. Alcott.

THE lives of men who have been always growing are strewed along their whole course with the things which they have learned to do without.—Phillips Brooks.

THE great religions of the world are but larger sects: they come together like the lesser sects, for works of benevolence; they share the same aspirations, and every step in the progress of each brings it nearer to all the rest. The reign of heaven on earth will not be called the Kingdom of Christ nor of Buddha: it will be called the Church of God, or the Commonwealth of Man. I do not wish to belong to a religion only, but to the religion. It must not include less than the piety of the world.—T. W. Higginson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Senate of the United States has been in session nearly six weeks, but has done very little of the business it was called together to do. It has been fixing "politics" instead. The President also has been attending to "politics" somewhat in some of his appointments to office. When will our men in office learn that they will do the very best thing for "politics," even of their own party, when they do the best thing for the country?

THE Corporation of Harvard College has invited Rev. Phillips Brooks to the place of preacher and pastor in the College, which Dr. Peabody is soon to vacate. At least, the Boston papers have been so reporting the past week, and without denial. This, if it takes place, will be a new religious departure, indeed, for the old College! When Dr. Huntington, holding the same office, became Episcopalian, he had to leave because of the change.

THE assassins of the Russian Czar have been sentenced to be hanged. It is a doom they were ready for, if discovered, and a doom which, if capital punishment be ever allowable, they deserved. We agree entirely with Mr. Wasson's protest against making the secret craft of the assassin a legitimate method of political reform. Yet we would not let even the crimes of the Nihilists, nor the frenzied extravagancies of their professed principles, blind us to the fact that they have a just cause of liberty to defend against an oppressive despotism.

MR. GLADSTONE introduced his budget into the House of Commons, as promised, on April 4, and the long-talked of Land Bill for Ireland on the 7th. In the former, he was thoroughly at home, and will apparently have no difficulty in carrying his measures of finance through Parliament. At this writing, only telegraphic reports of the Land Bill have reached us, which are not wholly clear. But the Bill, though not all the Land League has claimed, goes far in the direction of the "Three F's," or Fair Rent, Fixity of Tenure, and Free Sale. Whenever the landlord and tenant cannot agree upon a rate of rent, the local court may be appealed to for a decision as to what rent is reasonable. Tenure is fixed for fifteen years; and the sale of tenant rights is permitted under certain conditions. The Irish members met immediately after the session; and the general opinion among them is reported to have been that, if the Bill passed, Ireland would have little cause left for complaint. It is also reported that the Duke of Argyll has resigned his seat in the Cabinet on account of his dissent from some of the provisions of the Bill. Mr. Gladstone made long speeches, of two to three hours each, on the presentation of both Bills, and showed no abatement of his wonderful mental vigor or eloquence.

THE Established Scotch Church has had a mission at Blantyre, near Lake Nyassa, in Africa. For two or three years, it has been under the charge of a Rev. Duff Macdonald, who has had several assistants. But it seems that these missionaries have not been content with preaching "the gospel" to the heathen, but have taken it upon them to govern the natives; and they have done this with all the ingenuities of cruel punishment which have been devised by Christian civilization. Men have been tied to trees, stripped, and unmercifully flogged, with sixty, eighty, and ninety lashes, by whips made of knotted ropes, and then rubbed down with brine; and this for comparatively light offences. A man charged with stealing beads was thus whipped three times, in a few days, so that his flesh was cut as if with knives. He was afterward proved to be innocent. For robbery and on slight evidence of murder, men have been shot. One man charged with stealing tea was whipped with two hundred and seventy-five lashes, was then tied to iron rings in the store for the night, and died—of "heart disease," some of the missionaries say—the next morning. These facts are all reported by a commission which the Scotch Church sent out to investigate the matter. The missionaries have been recalled from their work of spreading the gospel of "peace and good-will toward men."

WE have before us a poem of twelve pages in pamphlet form, called "The Spirit of the Matterhorn." Its author is the Lord Queensberry of Scotland who a year ago, at the election in Holyrood Palace of the Scottish Representative Peers, was deprived by his fellow Peers of his seat in the House of Lords on the avowed and acknowledged ground that he had denied the existence of God and had expressed opinions antagonistic to the Christian religion. Lord Lothian said on the occasion that Lord Queensberry "held as a negation all that his brother Peers regarded as most sacred." The Poem is dedicated to these "brother Peers." Its doctrine is Positivism; but it certainly shows its author to have an earnest and reverent spirit, devoted to the good of his race. In a prose preface, he says: "I have never at any time denied the existence of God, or ventured to express a decided opinion on the matter. In private, I have always objected to give a name, such as God, to a Power which, to me, appears undefinable by man, and which I have therefore preferred to speak of as the Inscrutable. With respect to the allegation brought against me of 'holding as a negation all that my brother Peers regard as most sacred,' I leave those who may read this poem to judge for themselves whether my sentiments therein expressed do not breathe forth a great hope, and a sincere belief in all that is highest, and therefore most sacred, for the present and the future of mankind, which hope and belief cannot be among those things which my brother Peers consider negations of things sacred." One special purpose of the Poem is to proclaim the salvation of the human race for its immortality by the better education of the body.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

HYPOCRISY IN ENGLISH RELIGION.

I perhaps ought not to be surprised at the defence of Mr. Stopford Brooke which Mr. Holyoake attempts; and I should not reply to it, if he did not rashly go a step further, and say that to speak of Mr. Brooke's "mouthing the name of Jesus," and of "the long hypocrisy of his understood position," is "of the nature of an outrage." Mr. Holyoake shows how little he takes pains to be just in the matter, when he says: "What views Mr. Brooke ought to hold, in Mr. Towne's opinion, is quite another question. But there can be no question that Mr. Brooke has always held what he has professed to hold." I did not in the least raise the question of what views Mr. Brooke ought to hold. I spoke of Mr. Brooke's holding one set of views and being understood to hold another, and also using a liturgy and hymns which implied these other views, and not his real ones. Mr. Brooke has done this. Dean Stanley is doing it. Dr. Martineau has conspicuously done it. I have no occasion to say what these eminent men ought to hold; for they hold views already, as to the main central truths, in no way different from my own. They interpret and accept Christianity as I interpret and accept it. My strenuous difference with them relates to their continuing to appear to hold what they do not hold, and to their using in prayer and hymn language which honestly means Orthodoxy, and the use of which for years by a radical Christian is "a long hypocrisy."

Mr. Holyoake says that my letter "must have been written without that knowledge of English ecclesiastical facts known to most of us." I shall bring hard English facts to prove that I was wholly right and that he is entirely wrong. Happily, the highest English facts are available in support of my position that a school of eminent men of the highest character hold one set of views, and make clear that they hold them, while they stand in public profession, and in the use of prayers and hymns, and even in much which they appear to say (using old language not in its natural meaning), for another, an Orthodox, and a highly profitable set of views.

I must begin with an explanation as to hypocrisy, the nearly universal weakness of the English religious, political, and social mind. There is one radical Christian in England whose standing is above that of Stanley, Brooke, and Martineau. I mean Jowett, the Master of Baliol College, and Regius Professor of Greek, at Oxford; also the translator of Plato, and author of a commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans. Professor Jowett's work on Paul's chief Epistles is one of the rarest books in the market; but I was lucky enough on my arrival in England more than four years ago to pick up a copy sold from the library of S. P. Tregelles. If Mr. Holyoake will turn to the seventy-fourth page of the second volume of this work, he will learn something as to the sense in which a well-instructed scholar speaks of hypocrisy in connection with entire honesty of mind and heart. Professor Jowett says:—

> Hypocrisy is almost always unconscious: it draws the veil over its own evil deeds, while it condemns those of others, not intentionally, but because human nature is strangely gifted with the power of deceiving itself. It is popularly described as "pretending to be one thing, and doing, thinking, or feeling another." In fact, it is very different. Nobody really leads this sort of divided existence.

The hypocrisy which leads Professor Jowett to make this comment is that of conduct. It is easier to be drawn into hypocrisy of religious profession, easier and much less immoral. Hence what Professor Jowett says will apply with increased force to the case which I have in hand. And there is another consideration. Professor Jowett says of the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees that "it was the hypocrisy of an age and of a state of society blinder, perhaps, and more fatal in its consequences for this very reason, but less culpable in the individuals who were guilty of it." This is what I say of the hypocrisy in religion which is so universal in England. The culpability of it belongs to the established state of things in so great part that one may truly and justly say all that I said of Mr. Brooke, unreservedly affirming his high character, yet marking the laying aside of an every way profitable and no way strictly true Anglican profession and pulpit practice as allowing a long hypocrisy to cease. It is not saying that Mr. Brooke is a hypocrite in character or in moral conduct, but that without being this he has used a degree of hypocrisy in his public religious position.

The same thing is done by Professor Jowett himself. In his work on the Epistles, he went so far as to say:—

> The belief in the near approach of the coming of Christ is spoken of, or implied in, almost every book of the New Testament, in the discourses of our Lord himself, as well as in the Acts of the Apostles, in the Epistles of Paul no less than in the Book of Revelation. . . . It is a subject from which the interpreter of Scripture would gladly turn aside. For it seems as if he were compelled to say at the outset that St. Paul was mistaken, and that in support of his mistake he could appeal to the words of Christ himself. Nothing can be plainer than the meaning of those words; and yet they seem to be contradicted by the very fact that, after eighteen centuries the world is as it was. . . . Why, then, were the traces of such a belief permitted to appear in the New Testament? . . . So far as we can venture to move such a question of our Lord himself, we may observe that his teaching here, as in other places, is on a level with the modes of thought of his age. . . . The words of our Lord himself are not more in apparent contradiction with the course of experience than they are with other words which are equally attributed to him by the Evangelists.

Now is it or is it not hypocrisy, with such opinions of what Christ really was, to keep up a pulpit and university profession of Anglican Orthodoxy? I can illustrate the case a little further by citing the representation of Dr. Martineau. Mr. John Kenrick was a very distinguished scholar and a conservative Unitarian. What was behind his conservative profession, Dr. Martineau, in a most friendly eulogy, deposes as follows:—

> His Christianity, therefore, appeared to remain, in its essence, a religion of authority, depending for its weight on its credentials of miracle. . . . Yet his critical acumen, directed upon the Scriptures, led him to inevitable concessions, which, though inconsiderable when taken one by one, insensibly perforated and "honey-combed" the whole ground of that older theory. While repelling "Strauss' attack upon the evidences of revelation," he admits the coexistence of myth and history, and the need of discrimination to separate them. While vindicating the historical fidelity of the synoptical gospels, he establishes in them a scale of true and less true, not excluding the false and contradictory, and gives the highest credit to an evangelist who cannot be claimed as an eye-witness of what he relates. He contends earnestly for the genuineness of the prophecies attributed to Christ respecting the approaching end of the world and his own coming on the clouds to judge mankind, yet relinquishes their truth, and admits that they were spoken under illusion. He resolves the inspiration on the day of Pentecost into eager, fluent, even inarticulate speech, the utterance of intense emotion; and the gift of tongues at Corinth, into the outpouring of religious feeling in the Christian assembly by foreigners in their own language,—on both occasions reducing to a human phenomenon a charisma which certainly is represented as divine. Whether history colored by tradition and mixed with myths, apostles whose access of enthusiasm is construed into a descent of the spirit, and a prophet subject to mistaken visions of his own functions and the world's future, leave standing-ground for a dictatorial and oracular revelation, to be taken on trust of its credentials, appears to us more than doubtful."

Dr. Martineau proceeds to argue that we do not need such revelation, because "we carry, in our conscience, reason, and affections, a verifying power which supersedes dictation, and renders the fallibilities of an inspired soul innocuous," which is only a mystifying way of saying that it does not matter if Christ did make mistakes, because we know better than to accept them. Dr. Martineau also says that no doubt Mr. Kenrick arrived at such an understanding of "the inward spirit and personal attributes of Christ," apart from his dicta that he could "admit without a shock some inaccurate report of his words and some erroneous conceptions in his mind."

I call it very bad learning and utter failure of criticism to believe for a moment that the picture of Christ given us in the Gospels is any more than a pious fiction in all these matters which show Christ as subject to illusions, ignorant, and mistaken. But, for those who accept the picture and admit the charge it brings against Christ, to keep up an appearance of orthodox faith in the Lord Jesus, the Logos incarnate, the Saviour of the world, and other characters of this sort, is very high hypocrisy. It seems to me all the worse because I believe an honest study may readily make out that none of these characters were known while Christ was living, and that they are flagrantly contrary to his real mind and his true teaching.

A very complete proof of my assertion as to a degree of hypocrisy in English religious liberalism, both in and out of the Church, may be seen by reference to a new Prayer-Book lately prepared by Dr. Martineau, which expressly does away with the title of Lord applied to Jesus, and with the mediatorial use of his name in prayer.

Dr. Martineau's statement of reasons for the change revolutionizes worship.* In this revision of a former book of which he was one of the editors, he has made a clean sweep of "through Jesus Christ our Lord," with one or two trifling exceptions. In the General Confession, where it says, "Restore thou them that are penitent, according to thy promises declared unto mankind in Christ Jesus our Lord," he has expunged what follows the word "penitent." Instead of the acknowledgment in the Te Deum of three objects of worship, Father, Son, and Spirit, he does the best he can to make but one. His reading has been until now:—

> "Doth acknowledge thee,
> The Father of an infinite Majesty;
> Thy beloved, true, and glorified Son;
> The Holy Spirit also, the Comforter."

The new, revised reading (see the ninth service in both books, as well as elsewhere):—

> "The Father, hid in infinite light;
> Shown in the mind of thy most beloved Son;
> Felt in thy Holy Spirit, the Comforter."

This leaves something of inconsistent retention of Christ in the place of God; but it goes some way toward carrying out Dr. Martineau's confession that God only, and not Christ at all, should have the eye of Christian devotion. And now my point is that what Dr. Martineau thus confesses and makes a good effort to carry out, he has equally well known for at least twenty-five years, and could equally well have thought out and carried out any time this forty years, as his writings abundantly prove; while yet all this time, by very much of his preaching, by many of his published sermons, by the Hymn-Book of his compilation which has been so long and so generally in use, and by the earlier Prayer-Book of which he was one of the editors, he has, conspicuously, constantly, and with the gathering force of a public life now a half-century long, promoted that way which he, in his real mind, knew to be contrary to "the supreme and distinctive end of Christ's religion." I refer for the Hymn-Book to Dr. Martineau's old one. He has made a new one like his new Prayer-Book, the reasons for which are a severe indictment upon the old one; and he now puts out an orthodox hand behind and a radical hand before, and asks people to take their choice. It is a position of this sort which caused Dr. Rowland Williams to scorn Unitarianism as a half-way house to nowhere,—"conclusions leading to nowhere, which always tempt me to ask a Unitarian divine, Well, what next?" Dr. Martineau's mind and character are of the highest and finest English type; but his influence for a quarter of a century has been that of a double mind, thinking one thing and appearing to think another.

Dean Stanley has played the same double part. The Queen, her husband, and two daughters married to German princes, became thorough rationalists long ago, and to this influence Dean Stanley has been indebted. The daughters of the Queen in Germany made a favorite of Strauss in his last years, and for one of them he especially prepared a book of lectures on Voltaire. A man must be ignorant as night not to know that English religion is honey-combed with freethinking, and that the profession of the better class is largely hypocrisy. The Dr. Williams to whom I have referred was an exceptionally honest and straightforward and courageous thinker, yet he was carried into the common hypocrisy. He stoutly resented the charge of heresy, while yet he could think and say: "Christianity turns everything into spirit, so far as it has turned out true; and, if taken literally, it has turned out false. What is doubtful to me is, how far Jesus himself was above the local Judaisms of his followers; or how far God used even him as a man, suffering him to partake not only of time and place, but of all the notions which belonged to them." Dr. Williams doubts whether his second person of the Trinity may not have been an ignorant fanatic, whom the first person used.

Up to the beginning of his last vacation, Mr. Stopford Brooke stood as an orthodox preacher and used an orthodox Prayer-Book. He then gave notice that

* Mr. Towne makes lengthy and forceful quotations from Dr. Martineau's reasons, which want of space compels us to omit.—Ed.

Digitized by Google

the summer cleaning of his chapel would include a complete cleaning out of his supposed Orthodoxy. If I understand him, however, he still retains phraseology and appearances which are not in character with his real views. At least, he had gone on for some time before last summer, and for some years, to judge by his published sermons, using language and maintaining appearances which were not true then any more than they would be now. I know from the writings of the biographies of very many English and Scotch preachers, professors, and literary men, that this sort of thing is the rule. The plain facts of Mr. Brooke's case show that he has done as others do. The lesson which the facts read to Mr. Holyoake is certainly a painful one, but there is not the least chance to escape from it. But will he be candid enough to entirely withdraw his hot and rash charge of "outrage"? EDWARD C. TOWNE.

For the Free Religious Index.

MURDER AS A METHOD OF REFORM.

I was very sorry, and not a little surprised, to see in the columns of the Index, and from the pen of an editorial contributor, a recognition of assassination as a legitimate method of political reform. Worse still, Mr. Holland even goes so far as to place the murderers of the Czar on the same footing with "our Revolutionary Fathers," and with all who in open and honorable warfare have imperilled their lives for a rational and morally contained freedom. This is indeed amazing. I will not undertake to say that the taking of life by private and concealed persons is justifiable under no conceivable circumstances. Secret homicide may perhaps be condoned, when inhuman and intolerable outrage can be resisted or punished in no other way. I would not indeed like to be responsible for a positive statement to such effect; nor, supposing such a case possible, do I think that any attempt should be made to cover it in advance by a general rule. But concerted and systematized assassination as a means to bring about political and social changes is another matter altogether. It is a horrible doctrine that some portion of a people, desiring alterations in the form of government or of society, may organize murder in order to compel compliance with their wishes. Even though the alterations desired were indeed desirable, such a means were damnable. But thrice damnable it must be when the means and the end are of a piece, and murder is the road to anarchy. But, without pressing this point, let us look to their own language, or that of their brothers in belief. The German Socialists of New York address to their confederates in Russia the following beautiful exhortation: "Kill, destroy, assassinate, annihilate your aristocracy." A whole class is to be murdered. For what crime? None is named or suggested but that of being an aristocracy, of being born to a certain social station. Apropos to an assassination just committed, and committed in a manner peculiarly brutal, with reckless, hap-hazard destruction of other lives than the one aimed at, systematic murder is commended and advised as a means to change the traditional form of a national society. As in the worst days of the French Revolution, no distinctions of character are made. To be an aristocrat is to be worthy of death without trial, and by any hand which can reach the victim. And Mr. Holland wonders how he is to honor such men as Washington and Jay, while laying blame upon the sweet creatures who speak and act after that fashion? I must think him not a little bewildered.

This state of mind appears not only in the main matter, but also in examples he mentions. Charlotte Corday was no political reformer. She was engaged in no coolly concerted plan of effecting changes in the structural form of a society by murdering whole classes, irrespective of personal conduct and character. On the contrary, she was herself an aristocrat, if I remember rightly. She struck the dagger to the heart of one whom she regarded as a blood-thirsty assassin. But Marat was a political reformer. He was engaged in the same business with the Russian Nihilists,—that of serving the glorious cause of liberty by hunting down and butchering an aristocracy. Marat is Mr. Holland's proper hero. A genuine reformer, a painful apostle of liberty, painfully compelling himself to cut off the heads of the Hydra, resolved, in faithful performance of duty, to "kill, destroy, assassinate, annihilate an aristocracy." Strange that Mr. Holland should see the proper fellow of his liberty-loving friends, the Nihilists, in poor Charlotte, and not in her victim. Strange, too, that he should put Oliver Cromwell into the same list. Cromwell was an aristocrat no less than Alexander II. There were those who would have murdered him, could they have been clever enough to manage it. Mr. Holland's sympathies are due to those men, and not to a "tyrant," placed in power by an army over the heads of a parliament.

Alexander II. was an autocrat; so was Marcus Aurelius; and the like was substantially true of Charlemagne, of Alfred the Great, of the great Oliver just mentioned, and of other noble and beneficent rulers of men. History says that autocratic government is proper to certain stages of civilization and conditions of society. It is legitimate wherever it is the alternative to anarchy. Every republican will grant this, who is not a political formalist, or who does not believe that human history has been for the most part a mere devils' dance, holding to the dogma of total depravity in a form a little worse, I think, than the ordinary one. Whether it is at this date the necessary alternative to anarchy in Russia, I am unable to say. Clearly, the Nihilists are doing their best to make it such. They believe in anarchy. One of their number recently started a periodical in Boston with the title of The Anarchist. He believed in "individual autonomy," he said, and gave this out as the creed of his sect. The last I heard of him he was in jail upon a charge of wholesale swindling. Now, with a large sect in Russia secretly organized and conspiring to bring about "individual autonomy" by systematic assassination, I do not see what chance of success there would be for a more liberal form of government, were it established. However this be, I will have neither part nor lot with those who sustain the doctrine that murder, secretly concerted and systematized, is a legitimate means to effect changes, even desirable changes, in the constitution of government or of society.

Alexander II. was an autocratic ruler; and he made use of his power to strike off the bonds of slavery from more than forty millions of men. He did it against all the most powerful influences and interests of his empire, risking crown and life upon the act. He did it deliberately, compelled only by his own conviction, in time of peace, and not, as we in our comparatively small stroke of emancipation, under the urgency of a great civil war and as a means of self-preservation. It was the grandest act of voluntary equity which has ever proceeded from any government, monarchical or republican, since the world began, so far as I know. This is the man who has been murdered as an "oppressor," justly, as Mr. Holland inclines to think. But Alexander did not essentially change the form of government, not believing it wise to do so, but judging that the power which had performed that act must remain to support it. And when Nihilism got afoot, with its new gospel of anarchy and new apostleship of murder, he repressed it vigorously. I have never seen the smallest reason to doubt that he did so in honest discharge of his duty as a ruler. But, knowing the Nihilists to be a most crazy crew, I still thought that he had, perhaps, attributed to them more heinousness than they were really guilty of, and by consequence had been unduly severe. But the recent deed, and still more the responses it has awakened in this country and elsewhere, show that he knew the sort of characters with whom he had to deal. Of course there may have been, or rather must have been, individual cases of suffering not deserved. This is a necessary concomitant of murderous conspiracies. They spread over the land a dark cloud of distrust and dreadful suspicion. Murder works in the darkness, but where? Who are the innocent, who the guilty? It is always difficult, often impossible, to guess with a degree of certainty. It is the very plan of the murderers to hide among the innocent, and make the latter jointly responsible with themselves. In war, the combatants take the field openly as soldiers, a distinguishable class. Frankly confronting the danger, they draw it away from non-combatants. Thus, during the greatest military contests, the sentiments, habits, and morals of civilization may continue almost as usual, save in the immediate neighborhood of the field. During our civil war, for example, the order of society in Boston remained unbroken; and the better sentiments of men, it was thought, were rather exalted than destroyed or depressed. But suppose that in Boston five hundred men, so small a minority only, had been secretly banded together and sworn to assassinate the chief unionists and abolitionists. Suppose they had thrown out hand-bills declaring their intents, and had made murderous attempts to show their threats not idle. With some years' continuance of this, five hundred men would have done five hundred times more than the whole gigantic war actually did to heave apart the joints of society, to destroy that confidence of men in one another which is conditio sine qua non of civilized life, and to conjure up that spectre of fearful suspicion which, once abroad, corrupts in a degree the sanity even of the most steadfast minds. Now suppose such a state of things spread all over the United States, and going on for a series of years, with sons of hell all over Europe cheering the conspirators on, and crying, "Kill, destroy, assassinate, annihilate." A government fighting such devilish belligerents in the dark, belligerents whose express plan it is to skulk and hide among those who are innocent and ignorant of their purposes, how could it avoid occasional mistakes? I know not of any specific instance, however, in which the Russian Government has seized upon the wrong man. Does Mr. Holland know of any? But many think it not at all necessary to make any inquiry on that head. Enough for them that the Nihilist conspirators were punished, when detected. The Czar was therefore a tyrant; and the assassins, innocent victims and martyrs while they failed, are glorious patriots and champions of liberty, when at length they succeed.

I do not for my own part admire the political formalism which regards the democratical form of government, or any other, as alone legitimate and imperatively required always and everywhere. "Our Revolutionary Fathers" entertained no such opinion. It was foreign even to Thomas Jefferson, save perhaps for a brief period, during the delirium of presidential fever. Late in life, Jefferson wrote it deliberately down that, had he been a member of the French Convention, he would have voted not for the execution of Louis, but for his restoration to the throne. While in France, he advised Lafayette not to aim at a republic, but to keep always in view the "good model" of the British Constitution. Political formalism of the democratic stripe became diffused at a later date, Thomas Paine having been its first prophet. It is a mode of bigotry, and to me not more beautiful or rational than any other mode of the same. But when it is coupled with a readiness to hail as republican all who shriek "liberty," all communists, anarchists, advocates of "individual autonomy," or of the devil knows what, and when joined yet further with the doctrine that assassination in the service of "liberty" is lawful, then the combination becomes desperately and inhumanly bad. Are our good young men to be caught in this devil's noose? Let them beware. The word "tyrant," like the word "liberty," is capable of many and various applications. Alexander, who emancipated the Russian serfs, has been murdered as a tyrant; and President Lincoln, who proclaimed emancipation in America, was also murdered as a "tyrant." The assassination plan leaves it to every dull, hot fanatic or crew of fanatics to determine who is a tyrant, and to execute without trial. Shall we open the door to it? Will democracy sanction the murder of emperors and aristocracies? Suppose it done. Now comes communism, saying, as it already does say: "Your pretended democracy is no democracy: it allows one man to be rich while another is poor. All men are equal, and he the aristocrat who has more wealth, education, leisure, or the like, than another." The murder apostleship will serve here as well as elsewhere. Whither does this road lead? It leads, I think, to hell. And he has entered upon it, who has once set a form of government above the everlasting laws of morals.

D. A. WASSON.

For the Free Religious Index.

MR. T. W. CURTIS AND THE MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

In the essay in the Index of March 31, by Mr. T. W. Curtis, entitled the "Great Debate," there are many statements in regard to the Meadville Theological School which may give to your readers who do not take the trouble to compare them with other statements in the essay false impressions of that institution and its attitude toward free inquiry and expression. One of those statements is that when a student "frankly confessed any lack of assurance regarding the personality of God he at once incurred ill-repute."

Digitized by Google

Now, I was in the Meadville Theological School one of the three years that Mr. Curtis spent there; and to the school, during that period, I am sure this statement does not apply. One of the students, I remember, leaned strongly toward what is known as agnosticism. He would never affirm his belief in the personality of God or in conscious personal existence after death; and not only so, but he confessed his lack of assurance a great deal oftener than simple honesty or good taste demanded. He criticised severely what Matthew Arnold has called "the insane license of affirmation," in which so many indulge when speaking of these subjects. The boyish rashness with which he would sometimes intrude his lack of faith no doubt pained the professors and the more thoughtful students at times; yet I was not aware that he ever incurred any ill-repute because of his opinions, except it might have been with a small number of students, of which Mr. Curtis was one. The latter at that time was a not too tolerant conservative, and seemed at times to regard this student's unwillingness to affirm his belief in the personality of God almost as a personal offence.

In regard to Christ, the Bible, prayer, and all other subjects pertaining to religion, there was the greatest diversity of opinion among the students. By several, the most purely rationalistic views were held. No one thought of concealing his opinions, so far as I could judge; and I do not remember of hearing a single student complain that he suffered any disadvantage because of his radicalism. I feel quite sure that there was not the shadow of foundation for such a complaint.

But it does not require a very careful reading of Mr. Curtis' own words to gather hints as to the real cause of the difficulty between him and the school. In the report that he gives of a speech made by him before the faculty and students is this sentence: "I cannot feel the respect which perhaps I ought to feel for the man whose exegesis, if accepted, would make us all radicals or sceptics, yet who, when we are commanded to read from no book but the Bible, listens unmoved, without raising a finger or the winking of an eyelash." This remark, we infer, was made of, and in the presence of, Professor G. L. Cary, a man of the most transparent honesty, whom most of the students learned to love because of his fairness and his untiring devotion to their interests. And it does certainly indicate that Mr. Curtis was lacking in the respect that any student who had been in the school for three years ought to feel for so excellent a teacher and man.

For Mr. Curtis to claim that he has been a martyr to conservative bigotry will seem utterly absurd to those who know anything of the school and his connection with it. Putting together what I know by observation of his conduct in the school, what I have been told by others on whose veracity I rely, and what is revealed by his own words in such sentences as the one I have quoted, I make no hesitation in saying that it was not his opinions that prevented him from graduating, and hindered him from entering the school a second time; but rather his disrespectful, I may not say insolent, bearing toward the professors and the regulations of the school.

If the school's management was so distasteful to Mr. Curtis, would it not have been more manly in him to have quietly left, instead of enjoying its many advantages for three years, seeking entrance a second time, and then so grossly misrepresenting it as he has done? D. Rowen.

For the Free Religious Index.

THE LEICESTER CASE: A QUESTION.

Suppose that a Free Religionist were to bequeath to a Free Religious Society a fund for the support of a Free Religious preacher "so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Free Religious"; suppose that the preacher were to become a Unitarian, preaching the lordship of Jesus Christ, the necessity of believing in him as the founder of absolute and perfect religion, the necessity and consistency of wearing the name Christian, the narrowness, inconsistency, and inadequacy of Free Religion, and declaring that he was not a Free Religionist; suppose that the question, "Do the views preached by Mr. —— before said society, as its minister, meet the requirements of said will, so as to entitle said society to receive the income of the aforesaid fund for his support?" were submitted to a committee of representative Free Religionists: would the decision of such a committee be different from that which has been rendered in the Leicester case?

Suppose that the preacher should be converted to Presbyterianism and preach its doctrines, what would be the decision of a consistent committee of Free Religious men?

Suppose again that he became a Roman Catholic, and preached the infallibility and supremacy of the Pope, what would be the decision of a Free Religious committee?

Or suppose again that he became a convert to Brahminism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, or any non-Christian faith, would such a committee decide that he should be supported by a fund for the support of Free Religious preaching?

I do not write to you to provoke controversy. I simply want to know if a Free Religious preacher could become anything or do anything that would justly and legally, in the opinion of a Free Religious committee, exclude him from the benefit of a fund for Free Religion. Yours truly,

J. S. Thomson.

Gloucester, Mass., April 4, 1881.

[We cannot conceive of a "Free Religionist" (if that uncouth term must be used) making a will with the condition named. Should any one do so, it would, in our opinion, be impossible to decide any practical question arising under the will by the literal terms of such a condition. We know of no "views of God" entitled to the name "Free Religious." The phrases "Free Religion" and "Free Religionist" have come into use since the organization of the Free Religious Association, and, it is to be presumed, are to be defined by the principles of that Association. But the constitution of the Association expressly disclaims limiting membership by any test of theological opinion or belief. And, as matter of fact, there are among members of the Association various and even contradictory "views of God." But we will help our correspondent to another supposition, which was, perhaps, the one really in his mind. Suppose that a "Free Religionist" were to bequeath to a Free Religious Society a fund for the support of a Free Religious preacher, so long as he shall faithfully preach in accordance with the principles of the Free Religious Association, as given in its constitution; and then suppose that the preacher were to turn to the advocacy of any of the special denominational creeds or theological faiths which Mr. Thomson successively names, and according to the spirit and method which he describes: would a Free Religious committee decide that the preacher still had a right to the fund? We cannot answer for others; but, if we were on that committee, we should say unhesitatingly, No, for the reason that every one of these sectarian forms of faith limits liberty of thought by a certain standard of traditional authority, and conditions fellowship by a creed rather than by character,—two things which violate the paramount principles of the Free Religious Association. Our objection concerning the Leicester decision has been that, while the decision was made by a denominational and doctrinal definition of Unitarianism, the claim is also put forth that Unitarianism, nevertheless, means complete liberty of thought. We do not believe in thus trying to serve the two masters of spiritual authority and mental freedom.—Ed.]

BOOK NOTICES.

Note.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the Free Religious Index, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

British Thoughts and Thinkers: Introductory Studies, Critical, Biographical, and Philosophical. By Geo. S. Morris, A.M. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. 1880. Price $2.00.

This volume contains a course of twelve semi-popular lectures, delivered last year at the Johns Hopkins University. Its first chapter treats of the general philosophical attitude of the English mind. The second discovers anticipations of the later English philosophy in the mediæval writers, Roger Bacon, Duns Scotus, and others. The third deals with the Englishmen of the Renaissance, Spenser, Davies, and Hooker. Then successive chapters discuss the philosophical teachings of Shakespeare, Francis Bacon, Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Hamilton, Mill, and Spencer. The book is quite largely biographical; but it also gives a concise, and usually a just and accurate, account of the philosophy of the men with which it deals. The style Professor Morris has adopted is sometimes involved and pedantic; but he usually writes with clearness and easy comprehension. He has been for some years a professor in the University of Michigan; and he is known to students by his translation of Ueberweg's History of Philosophy, to which he added many valuable notes. He has in this case made a valuable volume for the general student, who may wish to know the history of English thought as embodied in the lives and writings of its greatest teachers.

Professor Morris is an idealist; and he writes of English philosophy as its opponent and critic. He adopts Schopenhauer's phrase, "The world is for me an idea." It is an idea, a thought, not a hard, concrete reality. Its value to him is not that of its material facts, but of the great thoughts and aspirations it calls forth. This conception he presents in his introductory chapter, when he says: "Intelligence is an active function, not simply a passive possession. Strictly passive, it were no longer intelligence; for then, inactive, it would not have intelligence of itself. Still, further, intelligence is only of the intelligible. Reason apprehends only what is rational. Mind, therefore, can comprehend no world which is not permeated with its own attributes: the absolutely unintelligible, irrational, being inconceivable, and hence utterly incapable of being brought into relation to mind, is for it no better than the non-existent. Mind seeks itself therefore in the universe, chiefly in forms of law, order, purpose, beauty. It must reduce its conception of the universe, given first in the form of isolated, unexplained impressions, to the order and harmony of a rational and, hence, explicable, apprehensible whole. And this search, this necessity of mind, precisely is idealism. Man seeks and finds himself only in the realization of an ideal, the Idea of Man, as perfected in truth, goodness, and love. He is, therefore, thus, and immediately, in proportion to the perfection of his manhood, a living text and lesson of Idealism."

He finds that the English, like the Romans, are marked by an almost absolute neglect of abstract speculation. He also finds in them a remarkable harmony between their inward thoughts and aspirations and their material and historical condition. To him, the record of English philosophy is not a shining one: indeed, he doubts if there has been, in England, a "properly natural philosophy at all." This philosophy, he says, is marked by an "intellectual contractedness," and by a failure to include within itself the highest elements of truth.

The chapter on the English Schoolmen is one of the most suggestive in the book. In Duns Scotus, Roger Bacon, John Scotus Erigena, and William of Occam, Professor Morris finds many anticipations of later English thought. The same type of thought, the same mental tendencies, were then present, so that, "if you consider among these schoolmen those who were strictly English, you find in them already distinct evidences of that type or direction of thought which, in the last two hundred and fifty years, has become so pronounced a characteristic of the English mind. These leading traits are found to be three, subordination of theory to practice, profession of agnosticism or scepticism respecting ultimate philosophical questions, and zealous cultivation of physical science, as a thing of palpable, demonstrative, and practical certainty and utility." This chapter is clear and strong; and it shows how characteristically English are the methods followed by the great thinkers of the nation. In treating of the Englishmen of the Renaissance, and also of Shakspeare and of Berkeley, Professor Morris is more at home than anywhere else in his book, because more in sympathy with his subject. He rejoices in that revival of Platonism in the sixteenth century which touched so deeply and effectually the thought and literature of the period. He shows how Platonic idealism quickened to life and power the poetry of that time, so that Spenser, the first of the genuinely English poets, drank all his inspiration out of that fountain. There it was, too, that the great Hooker, whose influence has been so lasting on the religious life of England, found his inspiration. Shakspeare came also under this influence; and Professor Morris devotes a chapter to showing how it affected his thought.

The chapters on Francis Bacon, Hobbes, Locke, Hume, Hamilton, and Mill, treat quite fully of the biographical, moral, and literary characteristics of these men. No very lengthy or elaborate attempt is made to present their philosophies, though their leading traits of mind, their methods and philosophical assumptions, are carefully sketched in each case. In dealing with Spencer, however, there is presented a much fuller account of his philosophy; while its defects are earnestly criticised. Over fifty pages are devoted to him. Professor Morris claims that the leading idea on which he bases his philosophy, that of evolution, "is, as such, neither philosophical nor anti-philosophical, neither religious nor anti-religious. If true, it is true for the same reason for which the conception of gravitation is a true one,—because it is agreeable to sensible fact. It is a physical conception; and the law of evolution, if correctly stated and duly established, is but an accurate statement of the observed or observable order of sensible phenomena. The conception of evolution differs from other physical conceptions only in its claim to greatest generality." Professor Morris then passes on to a criticism of Spencer's philosophical positions, repeating his theories of mind and of agnosticism. He gives a very good statement of what idealism has to say in opposition to Spencer's teachings, while some of his positions and criticisms are quite valid as evidence against Mr. Spencer.

Digitized by Google

Professor Morris has made a book which will be highly appreciated by those who cannot accept the most pronounced conclusions of English thought. It will help the general reader to a clear understanding of what that philosophy is and the practical conclusions it teaches; and it will aid the student to a just apprehension of what can be said against agnosticism and the English pyschology. It must fill a want felt by many, and which no other popular work supplies.

In the April Atlantic, Mr. Henry James adds four chapters to his "Portrait of a Lady." He paints so many other people by the way that the portrait of his heroine grows very slowly. We keep expecting to see the completed portrait; but we are put off with photographs of other people. Miss Phelps' "Friends" is far more warm and intense in color. It is difficult to imagine a more neutral character than Isabel Archer. She has floated through twenty-four chapters of this story with nun-like neutrality. Julius H. Ward, an Episcopal clergyman, writes about "The New Sunday" in a very tolerant spirit. The Modern Sunday, in his view, is for rest, for social, sanitary, and educational purposes. He adds the religious use in a supplement, and sees no occasion for changing the Apostles' Creed. Taken altogether, his argument is rather grotesque. Wm. M. Rossetti concludes his review of "The Wives of the Poets" by casting up and striking a balance. He finds that, of thirty married poets, eight were positively unhappy in marriage, fifteen were happy, and the rest doubtful. "Voltaire's School Days" by James Parton is a very agreeable paper. Richard Grant White has a bright article on "The British Philistine," and John Fiske writes learnedly of "Old Aryan Words." The poetry is by Cameron Mann, Louise Chandler Moulton, and Rose Terry Cooke. The latter's song of "Dead Love" is the best of the three.

The Popular Science Monthly for April has no less than fifteen regular articles, selected and contributed. Herbert Spencer gives the sixth of his series, under the title "Political Heads." "The Black Races of Oceanica," by Dr. Verneau, seems the best thing of the number. It is a comparison of the cranial structure and other anatomical points of the inhabitants of Borneo, Tasmania, and the South Pacific Islands. Dr. Oswald pleads for extended out-of-door life for our young people in his continued paper, and tells of expedients and occupations for securing it Professor Burns' "History of Chronology" is a valuable statistical compendium on this subject. Oliver E. Lyman has "Notes on a Doctor's Liability," which states the rigid legal requirements made upon the profession, and shows how much conscientious legislation has been applied to the prevention of quackery. Another medical man answers the question, "What is a Cold?" in the plainest manner. We are even let into the philosophy of that modern æsthetic ailment known as a "rose cold," and, better still, we are told how not to take cold. The hygienic department of the Popular Science has always been a valuable one. "The Purification of Sewer-Waters" is another most instructive paper. It is a record of French experiments in purifying the Seine. "Plantation Folk-Lore" is a page from our native negro mythology, which will be new and charming to those who did not realize that we possessed such primitive songs and legends. Some one writes of the scientific work and speculations of Lucretius, of whom Professor Tyndall has already told us something in the Belfast address; and others tell us other things which we are glad to know. The number is rich in variety.

A new monthly journal has been started in St. Louis, called the Platonist. It is edited by Thomas M. Johnson, of Osceola, Mo., for two dollars a year, and is devoted to the revival of the Platonic philosophy. Much of its space is to be given to the exposition of Plato and to the translation of the writings of his successors. There are also to be original articles in defence of idealism, while the republication of the writings of the English Platonist, Thomas Taylor, is to be made a specialty. The first number has an article on the "Mysteries," by Alexander Wilder, a translation from Plato, and an account of his life, Taylor's introduction to Plato and one of his translations, an account of the Concord School, a paper on the soul, and other articles of the same character. The editorial notes are written in anything but a philosophic spirit. The editor cannot convert the world by damning every other form of thought but his own.

Childhood's Appeal.—An extra number of this paper, which was issued as a serial during the recent State Fair for Abused Children in this city, has just appeared. It contains the opening address of Governor Long; a clear and detailed statement of the conduct of the fair, whose net results were over $13,000; the constitution of the society under whose direction the fair was held; extracts from the laws of the State concerning the protection of children; a list of nearly forty societies for the benefit of the young, and other articles of interest contributed and selected. Copies can be obtained of Frank B. Fay, Esq., General Agent and Secretary, 1 Pemberton Square, Boston.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Walt Whitman visits Boston this week. He is to read a memorial essay on Lincoln, and to have a reception by the St. Botolph Club.

A full-length portrait of ex-President Hayes is to be hung in Memorial Hall, Harvard College, by the side of the pictures of John Adams and John Quincy Adams.

Senator Mahone, remarks the Vineland Independent, still occupies the position of senatorial hornet in that dignified body. The Bourbons have found out that there is venom in his sting.

T. T. Timayenis, of New York, a native of Greece, appeals in a letter to the Boston Courier to the citizens of Boston for aid in behalf of the island of Chios. Mr. Timayenis offers to give an historic lecture on Chios in behalf of this object, if he should receive encouragement.

Mr. L. K. Washburn, we are pleased to learn, is meeting with numerous engagements to speak on Free Religion in this State. His present appointments are as follows: at Hyannis, April 10; Orange, April 24; Florence, May 1 and 8; and East Deunis and North Dennis, May 15.

B. F. Underwood will lecture at Chagrin Falls, O., April 17; Wauseon, O., April 19; Walton, Ind., April 20 and 21; Greenboro, Ind., April 23 and 24; Knightstown, Ind., April 25; Seymour, Ind., April 26. He then goes to Illinois and Iowa, to meet engagements in those States.

Prof. John Fiske and Rev. Dr. Bartol were among those present at Col. Ingersoll's lecture last Sunday evening at the Boston Theatre. Prof. Fiske was compelled to leave before the lecture was concluded to take a train for Indianapolis, Ind., where he begins a course of lectures this week.

Col. Ingersoll gave "Some of the Reasons Why" he is not a Christian to a packed audience at the Boston Theatre, last Sunday evening. The reasons seemed to be generally considered very reasonable by those present, and were listened to for two full hours with evident interest and satisfaction.

Julius S. Shailer, a prominent citizen of Roxbury, a friend of the Index and of late years a liberalist in religion, died at his residence on Roxbury Street a few days since. He was educated at Brown University, came to Roxbury in 1845, and was the first pastor of the Ruggles Street Baptist Church, occupying the pulpit for ten years. He was active in educational matters, having served on the school committee of Roxbury for twelve years.

It gives us pleasure to announce that Charles Ellis has been added to the list of names of the lecturers approved by the Free Religious Association. Mr. Ellis was formerly a Unitarian clergyman, but for several years his sympathies have been with distinctive radicalism. For the last four or five Sundays, he has spoken regularly at Revere, Mass., with much acceptance. He will be ready to answer invitations to speak anywhere in New England.

Mrs. Oswald Ottendorfer, the wife of the editor of the Staats Zeitung, has devoted the sum of $35,000 to the promotion of the German School system. The fund thus created will be known as the Herman Uhl Memorial Fund. Of this amount, the German Teachers' Seminary at Milwaukee receives $10,000, the free German school in New York city also $10,000, the German school of the Nineteenth Ward, the school of the Turners' Association, and Professor Adler's school, all in New York city, $5,000 each. The money will be invested for these institutions, and the interest paid them.

Prof. Lanman delivered the sixth and last lecture of his course on the mythology of Sanskrit Literature at Seaver Hall, Cambridge, March 29. He spoke of the deification of fire in remote antiquity characteristic of the Indo-European nations, but common to many other people also. This personification received in Sanskrit the name of "Agni." Indra, god of the middle regions and clear sky, and slayer of the demon Vritra, gradually succeeded to Varuna as deity of the space of the air. An extended account of funeral ceremonies in ancient India was given, with a translation of one of the hymns of the funeral ritual. This course of lectures has been instructive and entertaining, and they have been well attended.

Mrs. Lydia D. Parker, widow of the late Theodore Parker, died in this city last Saturday night in the sixty-seventh year of her age. Mrs. Parker had been for a considerable time in feeble health, and her decease was daily expected. The maiden name of Mrs. Parker was Cabot. Both her parents died when she was quite young, and she spent her early life in the care of an aunt at Newton, near Boston, where she became acquainted with her future husband, then a teacher in a neighboring town. She was a faithful wife to him in all the experience of his distinguished career, gentle and kind in spirit, benevolent in action, very loyal to her personal attachments, and endeared herself in various ways to the large circle of his friends and parishioners. The obsequies of Mrs. Parker occurred on Tuesday, at her late residence in Chandler Street in this city, and consisted of singing, select readings, mostly from Mr. Parker's own writings, and a brief address by Wm. J. Potter, the editor of the Index.

POETRY.

QUI LABORAT ORAT.

O only Source of all our light and life,
Whom as our truth, our strength, we see and feel,
But whom the hours of mortal moral strife
Alone aright reveal!

Mine inmost soul, before Thee inly brought,
Thy presence owns, ineffable, divine;
Chastised each rebel self-encentred thought,
My will adoreth Thine.

With eye down-dropt, if then this earthly mind
Speechless abide, or speechless e'en depart;
Nor seek to see,—for what of earthly kind
Can see Thee as thou art?

If sure-assured, 'tis but profanely bold
In thought's abstractest forms to seem to see,
It dare not dare the dread communion hold
In ways unworthy Thee.

Oh, not unowned, Thou shalt unnamed forgive,
In worldly walks the prayerless heart prepare;
And, if in work its life it seems to live,
Shalt make that work be prayer.

Nor times shall lack, when, while the work it plies,
Unsummoned powers the blinding film shall part,
And, scarce by happy tears made dim, the eyes
In recognition start.

As wills Thy will, or give or e'en forbear
The beatific, supersensual sight,
So, with Thy blessing blest, that humbler prayer
Approach Thee morn and night.

—Arthur Hugh Clough.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 14, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY AND ARTICLES OF FAITH.

The Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston held its annual society meeting on Sunday morning, April 3, at Parker Memorial Hall, in lieu of the usual form of service. In view of the fact that the Hall, at one time supposed to be sold, was to be retained for the use of the Society, and that measures, pertaining to the future welfare of the Society, would be brought up for discussion, a good deal of interest was manifested in the meeting and its results both by members and outsiders. The attendance appears to have been fair. The vote passed last December giving up the use of the Hall was rescinded, and it was resolved to continue the services. A clerk, treasurer, and standing committee of eleven were chosen for the ensuing year. As the first choice of the Society, it was recommended that a permanent minister be settled; but, if this should fail, that some one speaker should be secured, if possible, for two Sundays of each month, the remaining Sundays to be filled by special appointment as now. On all these matters there appears to have been unanimity.

But other propositions that were introduced led to lengthened discussions; and the discussions did not, as we understand, evolve so much harmony as is desirable in the Society at this time. The first of these was a recommendation, in the report of a committee previously appointed, that the Sunday service be conducted according to the customary usage of Theodore Parker. This, certainly, was a singular proposition for the freest religious society in Boston; and nobody, we are sure, more quickly than Theodore Parker himself would have negatived it, if it could have been submitted to him for judgment. And the meeting reverenced his name and example more by voting the recommendation down than it would have done by adopting it; for, so voting, it pledged itself to follow him in the freedom which he so dearly loved and fought for, rather than in the form which he regarded as of little moment.

A second proposition recommended by the committee was debated at still greater length. This was the adoption of something in the nature of a covenant, or form of obligation, or, as the reporters of the daily newspapers called it, "Articles of Faith." The form of statement proposed by the committee is as follows: "We believe in intellectual truth, discovered to man by thought in the measure of his capacity; and we pledge ourselves to seek it in reverent freedom. We believe in moral right discovered to man by experience of the effects of actions; and we pledge ourselves to constant service of that right in subordination of the lower to the higher nature in our personal lives, and in just and kindly acts toward all men. We feel within a yearning after the perfect, so far as we apprehend it; and we therefore unite to worship the best we know, that we may the better study truth and practise virtue."

We do not understand what particular occasion or reasons there may be for the adoption by the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of any such form of statement. If we are correctly informed, the original articles of incorporation, which are still in force, do not in any way limit the mental liberty of members nor test fellowship by any beliefs. Perhaps it is thought that some fresh statement will make clearer to the members what the vital significance of the Society is, and therefore interest them more in the maintenance of it. Nor have we learned aught of the reasons given at the meeting in opposition to the statement proposed. We simply know what the daily papers reported: that, after a lengthy debate, the whole matter, without decision, was referred to the standing committee.

We can readily conceive, however, that a part of the objection arose from that general feeling of revolt which every free congregation has against signing any common statement of belief, no matter how general or progressive it may be in its terms, or however acceptable it may be to the same persons individually. But, in part, we should suppose the objections must have been directed particularly against the second statement of belief; namely, "We believe in moral right discovered to man by experience of the effects of actions,"—a proposition which, whether so intended or not, seems to accept the experiential philosophy of morality as against the intuitional. We can see that it may be explained as not meant to exclude the intuitionalist; yet we think it is a statement that no strict believer in intuitive morals would make or accept without much qualification. And therefore it strikes us as being as much out of place in the platform of a liberal society as would a statement of theological belief.

We are disposed, indeed, to think that a religious society which means to keep open doors to freethought will do better to forego all attempts to unite people in any expression of belief, even the most liberal, and try rather to form a union in some common expression of purpose. We have never had occasion to frame such a statement for any society; but, since seeing the form proposed by the Twenty-eighth Congregational Committee, we have been trying our hand at it. And this is what our thought has struck out as possibly meeting the conditions of the problem where people of extreme liberality of religious views are trying to organize. "We here associate ourselves together in the pursuit and the worship of the true and the good. To seek truth in perfect freedom of thought, to apply truth to the improvement of human society,—to do good to others, to become better ourselves, and to help each other by our fraternal fellowship ever toward the best,—these are our objects in this Society; and we cordially invite all persons who have the same purpose at heart to join with us, irrespective of religious antecedents and beliefs."

We offer this not so much to be copied as to suggest our idea of what should be the aim in such a statement. We have sought simplicity; but the phraseology, doubtless, can be still further simplified, and the statement thereby made the stronger. Yet most of all should it be remembered that a society will disclose both its beliefs and its purposes more by deeds than by any form of words, however excellently framed.

RELIGION IN SCHOOLS.

There is some danger of the discussion in respect to religion in schools becoming so familiar that it may lose its interest, even for radical minds. It is, hence, quite probable that the paper by Bishop McQuade upon this subject in the April North American will not elicit the degree of attention it should receive. It is not the first time, as many of the readers of the Index are aware, this distinguished ecclesiastic has appeared before the American people as the representative of Roman Catholic hostility to our public schools. The same line of argument, in substance, was pursued by him a few years since, in this city, in what was known at the time as the Horticultural Hall course of lectures, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association. That lecture was answered by Francis E. Abbot with his characteristic vigor and logic, power of clear and strong expression, in a way which ought, it would seem, to have settled the intellectual part of the controversy for every one, not excepting the Bishop himself.

But, in the present article, he returns to the charge with all of his former zeal and assurance. It illustrates the old adage: "A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still." It is impossible to question the sincerity of Bishop McQuade. It would be a very unjust and superficial apprehension of his position, we feel sure, to suppose that it is assumed in the interest of mere ecclesiastical dominion. We do not doubt that to his view the tendencies of the modern mind are dangerous and deplorable, that to him it seems of superlative moment to the order and welfare of society that its members should be indoctrinated in a religious creed, the Roman Catholic in particular. This he indicates in a very pronounced and unqualified way, and points to what the Roman Catholic Church, under the influence of such a persuasion, has done and is doing to counteract the disaster inevitably inherent in our existing system of education, and to give effectiveness to these convictions in the future with pious exultation.

But it needs only a little critical examination of the Bishop's arguments in the light of unperverted reason and fact to see that, though somewhat specious, they are untenable and erroneous. The Bishop begins his article with a rueful allusion to the tendency to change which dominates our age. Perhaps if he had used the word "progress," and recognized change as its inevitable concomitant, it would have been a more accurate way of stating it. Outside of the Roman Catholic Church, it is not common to meet intelligent people who lament this characteristic of the time. "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." Better fifty years of the present, with its accumulated and accumulating knowledge, its increasing and expanding enlightenment, yea, with all the temporary derangements and disturbing influences thus entailed, than long, unprogressive, changeless, benighted centuries, such as some of those that have preceded, in which the Roman Catholic Church was supreme,—this is the unquestioning persuasion of the best thought of to-day. Indeed, it is the very spirit of progress, or change, if this term be preferred, that gives to this age its distinctive excellence, and the promise of the future. Of course, it is perfectly natural that a representative of Roman Catholicism should look upon change in any of its aspects with alarm, since Roman Catholicism stands, through the inevitable force and spirit of its ideas and aims, for that which is settled and stationary. But, argues Bishop McQuade, all change is not improvement. The present age discards the authority of the Church, renounces its doctrines, excludes religion from the schools. In other words, it prefers secular to ecclesiastical or even semi-ecclesiastical education; and this must necessarily be an evil. Evidently there is here a very egregious confusion of logic. It needs first to be demonstrated that Roman Catholic dogmas, or indeed any religious dogmas, offer guarantees for the welfare of society or possess the saving efficacy that is claimed.

Digitized by Google

This is a thing that cannot be proved. What is the testimony of history upon this point? What is the testimony of the present? What is the tendency of theology upon the mind? Is it not to check its intellectual freedom, suppress its originality, render morality sluggish, reduce it to a crude and selfish level? It is not necessary to discuss this here, even if there were room for it. It is obvious to all really reflecting and observing persons, whatever may be their bias in this respect. But the question is not so much one in regard to the influence of theology upon human life and citizenship, especially in this republic, as whether it—or religion, in other words, which we conclude in Bishop McQuade's mind means the same thing—should be taught in our schools. Putting aside, then, all consideration as to the merit of doctrines, the worth of religion in itself, as conceived by those who advocate the incorporation of its instruction into our school system, it becomes a question simply as to its expediency or practicability. We hold that the conditions of our society, whether happily or otherwise, render such instruction utterly impracticable. It is plain that there can be no proposition of union upon which the American people will agree in this matter. Catholics and Protestants will not agree in respect to it, to begin with. And rationalists would not agree to permanently concede to the imposition of such a union, were it possible.

In these times, when so much stress is being laid upon accuracy in the translation of the Bible, which Bible would be used? Would not the Protestant insist upon his version, and the Catholic upon his. This has already been manifest, even in the incipient stage of the controversy. Bishop McQuade tacitly admits the incompatibility of any such union. He implies that overtures to this effect have strenuously and earnestly been made to Protestants in vain, and that, in consequence of this failure, Roman Catholics have at last been driven to the alternative of providing for the religious education of their children in parochial schools. It would be interesting to know what were the terms which Roman Catholics proposed in these instances; but these the Bishop has failed to give. There are, we learn, four hundred and twenty-three thousand three hundred and eighty-three children in the United States attending these "Christian free schools." Two hundred and seventy of these schools are in the State of New York. Of the fifty-seven Catholic churches in New York city, thirty-two have such schools. "The great majority of the teachers are brothers and sisters of different religious orders." In Rochester there are eleven parishes, ten of which have these "Christian schools." These figures afford a hint of the activity and persistency of Roman Catholics in this direction. We are aware that the questions which are thus raised are very delicate ones, and the dilemma in which it involves the American citizen an exceedingly difficult one. It is far from an augury of good to see a large body of the children among us, the future citizens of this country, systematically trained in a narrowing and cramping religion, the great fundamental and distinctive principle of which is superstitious reverence for the behests and temper of an authority superior to that of all other relations and claims. At the same time, it seems a little like trespassing upon the full right of the citizen, when we refuse to him the privilege of education in accordance with his convictions.

The question is one of increasing gravity, and presses itself more and more upon the attention of the American people. It cannot be permanently put aside. It ought not to be forgotten. All the more serious does it become in view of the fact that this opposition to our school system which threatens to no small extent its dissolution proceeds not alone from Catholics, but Protestants. At the late General Episcopal Convention in New York, the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, That the bishops and clergy be most earnestly requested to bring this subject to the attention of the members of this Church, that they remind the people of their duty to support our own schools and colleges, and to make education under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal Church superior in all respects to that which is afforded in other institutions."

It behooves radicals to steadily confront all such efforts and tendencies with the demand, as the only possible and true solution, for the complete secularization of the State, thus presenting an impossible barrier to theology in the schools and its disastrous consequences.

D. H. C.

JESUS AND CHRISTIANITY.

A word in answer to Mr. Wilcox's oracular utterance on this subject in the Index of April 7. He is too dogmatic in his assertion that Jesus "did not claim to be the Christ of the prophets." I am inclined to think that Jesus applied to himself "the Servant of Jehovah," prophecies of Isaiah liii., etc. I have ample critical indorsement of this opinion, notably that of Keim and Matthew Arnold. But this, I take it, has nothing to do with our being Christians or non-Christians. To go back to the original meaning of the word "Christian" to find out who are Christians now is, to my mind, the extreme of silliness. The popular meaning of the word Christian has nothing to do with the messiahship of Jesus.

Mr. Wilcox's criticism of my phrase concerning Jesus, making him the source of the stream of tendency which I call Christianity, was anticipated in my sermon. I said, "so far as we can rightly speak of sources, where there is nowhere any absolute beginning." But certainly one man can gather up into himself the tendencies and forces of his time as other men do not, and subsequent history will be very different from what it would have been without such concentration. I take the squarest issue with Mr. Wilcox's assertion that, if Jesus had never been born, the stream of tendency would have been "all the same." To affirm this is to deny cause and effect. It is sheer fatalism. To admit that the present would be "all the same," if any factor of the past had been omitted, is (to quote Mr. Wilcox) "to acknowledge what is claimed by the orthodox Christian,—a new force arbitrarily projected into the orderly sequence, separating the past and the future." Does Mr. Wilcox imagine that the stream of intellectual tendency would have been "all the same" down through the centuries, if Shakspeare had never been born? I must imagine that it would have been vastly different. But I have never thought of Shakspeare as a supernatural person. I am entirely willing to allow the shaping force of the environment with reference to great men. But the great man is himself a factor in a new environment,—of all factors, the most important.

A word also in regard to Mr. Whipple's objection,—that Paul did more than Jesus to determine the character of Christianity. I doubt it very much. Paul saved Christianity from being merely another Jewish sect. Paul burdened Christianity with a dreadful weight of speculative theology. But, nevertheless, the genius of Paul was essentially moral. I think Mr. Whipple's mind might be disabused of any contrary notion by reading Matthew Arnold's St. Paul and Protestantism or the second chapter of J. H. Allen's Fragments of Christian History. I would recommend the last-named book to any one who thinks that the moral force of early Christianity was almost immediately evaporated in the parched and dusty air of theological discussion and ecclesiastical observance.

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

THIS week's Index will perhaps gain the title of the belligerent number. Several writers, it will be seen, have unequivocally declared belligerent rights against previous contributors. The Index is not responsible for all opinions proclaimed in its columns, but offers a free field for the battle of ideas within the limits of honorable warfare.

WE are glad to note, by a copy received from the author, that Judge C. B. Waite's "History of the Christian Religion to A.D. 200" has passed to a second edition. We gave a lengthy notice of this book in the Index for February 10.

FAST DAY has come and gone. Of course, it was observed as usual, in obedience to tradition and the Governor's proclamation, with becoming abstinence and religious solemnity.

IT is said that President McCosh, of Princeton, and President Porter, of Yale, are to be among the lecturers at the Concord School of Philosophy the coming summer.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

PROFESSOR ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, in an appreciative review of the recently published work of Mr. A. R. Wallace on Island Life, lends the weight of his authority to the belief that the great continents have been wonderfully persistent, having remained essentially in their present situations since the beginning of geologic time. The belief of most geologists has been, he thinks, and still is, that the continental and oceanic areas have not been permanent. "Tacitly or explicitly, it was assumed that just as there appeared to be no area, even in the heart of the continents, which had not been submerged beneath the waves, so there was probably no tract even of mid-ocean where a continent might not have bloomed." He illustrates the universality of this belief by a quotation from Tennyson:—

> "There rolls the deep where grew the tree.
> O earth, what changes thou hast seen!
> There where the long street roars, hath been
> The stillness of the central sea."

But this idea, he believes, "is unquestionably based upon a partial view and erroneous interpretation of the facts." The rocks, for instance, may be upraised marine sediment, but their materials were derived from the waste of neighboring dry land. Again, the sediment now removed from the continental surfaces is deposited in the shallow waters within one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles from dry land. The continental surfaces have indeed been many times submerged beneath the ocean, but the great continental ridges have never ceased to exist. Although land and sea have been continually changing places, yet the submerged land has never become truly a part of the oceanic realm, but "the waters covering it have been mere prolongations of the upper layers of the ocean, like the Mediterranean, Black, and Caspian Seas of the present day." An elevation or depression of a few hundred feet may turn wide tracts into land or into water, but makes no real change in the essential position of the grand oceanic basins or continental ridges.

Digitized by Google

MR. WALLACE applies these views of the essential persistence of continents, together with their ceaseless and wonderful surface mutations, to the study of biological evolution. "It is impossible," he says, "to exaggerate or even adequately to conceive the effect of these endless mutations on the animal world. Slowly but surely, the whole population of living things must have been driven backward and forward from east to west, or from north to south, from one side of a continent or hemisphere to the other." Animals have emigrated to other continents, and continued the struggle for existence amid new conditions. As portions of continents have been for a time isolated, special forms of life have been developed; and these subsequently have been brought into conflict with the fauna from which their ancestors were separated, and thus would be caused "fresh struggles of ever-increasing complexity," which would lead to "the development and preservation of every weapon, every habit, and every instinct which could in any way conduce to the safety and preservation of the several species." Mr. Wallace, it may be well to add, puts considerable emphasis upon past changes of climate as an important factor in the variations of animal and plant life, and suggests several new and important theories by which great climatic changes may be accounted for. Professor Geikie, moreover, calls attention to Mr. Wallace's deliberate judgment, with which he apparently agrees, that the enormous periods of time which used to be demanded as necessary to account for the changes in geological history are not required for the evolution of our present flora and fauna. Organic evolution, Mr. Wallace believes, has taken place with much greater rapidity than was once thought possible.

MR. WALLACE'S arguments in favor of continental persistence have caused considerable discussion among English geologists, by whom a contrary theory appears to have been generally held. But Professor Geikie says that they must change their opinions; for Mr. Wallace is right. Perhaps we may be pardoned therefore for feeling a little national pride in reading a communication from our geologist, Professor J. D. Dana, recently printed in Nature, in which he calls attention to the fact that for forty years he has held the opinion that the continents have always been continents; that he first discussed this theory as long ago as 1846, and has since frequently repeated the arguments in favor of it, and, as he believes, long ago demonstrated its correctness. He says that the truth of this view is written so plainly in the geology of North America that British geologists would not now be speculating upon it, if they had given fair attention to American facts. He then adds, not without a spice of cruelty, "If the truth is not taught by British rocks, it is because these represent only a narrow margin of a continent, and hence could not be expected to illustrate general continental development, hardly more than an animal's leg, however profoundly studied, the embryological laws of the species." R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

A BILL has been introduced into the British Parliament with the object of giving to women full property rights. It gives to the married woman complete personal recognition, making her practically independent of her husband as a property-holder. It provides that what "property she holds before marriage she may hold after marriage. What property she acquires after marriage will be hers. She may make contracts for which she and not her husband will be liable. Her debts contracted before marriage are not to be made her husband's debts, save in so far as she may have conferred property upon him. She will need no trustees. She may sue her husband and he may sue her, except for a tort; and either or both may give evidence as against each other. Suits between the two may be decided summarily, subject to appeal. If the husband fall ill or is disabled, and the wife have property, she may be made liable for his maintenance. She may be made liable also for the maintenance of her children. In short, the eye of the law will no longer recognize a common purse." That such a bill will become law we do not think very probable at present, but it is a great gain that justice and right should be so thoroughly recognized as to be embodied in a parliamentary bill. It is, of course, only a matter of time, and of not a very great length of time either, when such a bill or a better one will become law. It is simply inevitable that woman will be recognized as an individual, as a self-dependent soul. The woman's movement means nothing less; and, when that result is secured, every other just demand is won.

THE importance of a Board of Health is not always realized. Not a few people yet think that health is a matter of some sort of a special providence, and that it is not to be cared for. Many more believe in nostrums, while only a few as yet realize the importance of a skilled study and treatment of diseases. Even by physicians, the importance of preventive measures is not yet recognized as it ought to be. The Sanitarian describes and defends the work of the National Board of Health, and claims it has rendered an important service to the country. What it has done in the way of prevention of disease, it presents in speaking of its rescue of Memphis, its stamping out of fever in New Orleans, its quarantine inspection of the Atlantic coast, its reports on adulteration of foods and drugs, and its investigations of diphtheria. This work is declared to be such that "the expenditures of the board have yielded more substantial benefit to the well-being of the people of the United States than tenfold the amount of its expenditures under any other appropriation of the government." Such a board should be established in every State; and it may render incalculable benefits to the people, if the right men do its work. Indeed, the Hon. John Eaton, the Commissioner of Education, claims there should be such a board in every city, county, and town. G. W. C.

THE American minister, the Hon. James Russell Lowell, attended a large meeting at Worcester, England, March 16, in celebration of the opening of the free library. He said that, when he saw that day a crocus forcing its way up through the hard soil of a gravel walk toward the light, he thought he could not conceive a happier illustration of self-culture. The great spur to culture of any kind was the difficulties through which the soul worked to the light. A library was the university of those who could have no other. It brought men into stimulating contact with superior minds. It admitted them to the good company of all time. As examples of self-culture, the speaker referred to two presidents of the United States, Mr. Lincoln and General Garfield. The advantage of a library was that it offered to every man the opportunity of what was called liberal culture.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, March 11, 1881.

To the advance of positivism, ultramontanism ascribes the cause of the failure of the Mardi-Gras procession and the carnival festivities in Paris, this year. Several chariots, with gayly caparisoned horses and African and Asiatic drivers, passed around Avenue de l'Opéra and the central boulevards, but they were advertisements for leading bazars, similar to those seen in our Fourth of July processions, and were far more solemn and dignified. Masked and fancy-dress balls were given by syndicate and other organizations, which were limited to certain circles; but nothing like a public celebration took place, the great working masses paying as little attention to carnival festivities as to fasting. Balls are to be given by artistic and other social circles every Thursday and Sunday during Lent; and, as far as my observation goes, the majority of Catholics are "dispensed" from fasting, or pay no attention to it. The meat-stalls at the great markets seem better patronized than usual; and not a single Parisian, not even nuns and priests, look as though they were keeping a forty days' fast.

Ultramontanism sings, "Mardi-Gras ne l'en va pas," and mourns because this heathen Saturnalia will not be coaxed to abide in Paris in the evening of the nineteenth century. It sighs because the graceful costumes invented by French art are discarded even in the capital, and speaks of Mardi-Gras as an old rock lashed by the waves, which will not remain long standing. It says: "Give us back the gayety of our youth in the carnival season, give us the laughing, jocund crowd who followed the Mardi-Gras. Oh, give us the charming festivals of the good old times, and do not, O positivism, cause us to say, 'Mardi-Gras, requiescat in pace.'" This mourning is a reminder of the sorrows of the ancient slave-owners, who sigh because the negroes no longer sing their plantation melodies, and cease to keep their Christmas merry-makings. It teaches that, with the growth of true republicanism, the French nation is laying aside many time-honored frivolities, innocent though they may have been, and taking up in their place general education, good government, the study of the greatest good to the greatest number, and of liberty without license. The good fruits of rationalistic progress are apparent in France in many things besides the decay of carnival revelry. Freethought has broken the shackles of many superstitions, and like the sunlight is dispelling mental darkness far more than is generally believed. Though the number of liberal thinkers is small in comparison to the population, their influence is mighty, since they are the representatives of national culture, advanced thought, intelligence, progress, and are writers of ability.

The extinction of pauperism is a question which is beginning to receive the attention of social scientists. Nowhere in the world is there greater necessity for its study than here, where so much indiscriminate charity exists, which, like the mistletoe on the oak, will exhaust the nation's life, if left to increase, or rather to be petted and fostered, as it is and has been. It is simply assuming the proportions of a stupendous social vice; for pauperism flourishes as a profession, which was pursued by ancestral generations, and will be followed by generations to come. The movement for its eradication is regarded by many as Utopian, and does not receive the encouragement it deserves. The teachings of the prevailing theology are against it, since the Catholic Church distinctly recognizes pauperism as a social necessity, which prevents the industrious, self-maintaining portion of the community from becoming hard-hearted. Men, women, and children cultivate all manner of disgusting deformities, standing at street corners, market houses, and churches, soliciting alms. It is a shame to enlightened Paris that these wretches are not placed in infirmaries, and made to earn their living as far as is possible, and otherwise cared for at the public expense. Healthy, young and middle-aged blind persons could be taught to do many useful things; while the vicious and depraved, if they could not be reformed, would have less power to corrupt public morals.

A horrible manifestation of the mania for notoriety took place here some weeks since. A young boy of fifteen, whose name should never be written, became influenced by reading the life of the young murderer Pomeroy and similar criminals to follow their example, expecting to achieve fame as the most cruel child murderer of the world. Meeting a little boy of six years of age, returning from school, he decoyed him into his room in the garret of an old building in one of the localities where the poor are forced to hive. The mother of the child is a seamstress and the father a shoemaker, and the necessity of daily toil prevented either from conveying their child to and from school, as is the custom; but older children of the neighborhood had taken good care of him, and on the day of his death left him at the door of his home. By the promise of a watch and some pictures, the boy murderer coaxed him into his room, and, after locking the door, butchered the child in a manner positively too brutal and ferocious for description. After arranging the corpse so that the first aspect thereof would produce the greatest possible horror, he gave himself up to the authorities. At first, his story was not believed; but, upon going to his room, it was found too true. When questioned as to whether he bore ill-will toward his innocent victim, he answered, "None whatever," and said he wished to become famous as a child murderer, and the little innocent was the kind of a child he desired to kill. He asked that the artists of the illustrated criminal papers might photograph the room, wished to know if his photograph would be placed in the windows of print-shops, said he was willing to suffer the penalty of the law, since he had become famous. The depraved youth seems to have been living alone, and is believed to be the fruit of one of those temporary unions between parents which are so common in France. He has some scholastic culture, but is utterly devoid of the moral faculties, largely by nature, but wholly ruined by reading criminal literature. The depravity which results from the dissemination of vicious and criminal literature among the young is incalculable. The friends of morality find themselves hedged about with the utmost difficulties in its suppression, and say, bad as is this species of literature in Paris, that of New York, imported hither, is infinitely worse.

Digitized by Google

The celebration of the eightieth birthday of Victor Hugo on the 27th of February was a joyous event for Paris, and a most kindly and deserved tribute of respect from his countrymen to the aged author and humanitarian. All the musical, artistic, literary, artisan, and so-called workingmen's organizations of Paris, and many from the provinces, gathered under the shadows of l'Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile at noon, bearing appropriate banners, wreaths of bay and laurel interspersed with golden foliage, and the most beautiful floral treasures imagination can conceive, and with music marched up Avenue d'Eylau, passing by the residence of the author of Les Misérables, and pausing for a momentary greeting of him whom they honored. The old man, with uncovered head, sat in the recess of a window, with his two little grandchildren, one on each side. What a triumph for him, and the principles he has advocated for more than threescore years, that he has lived to see his utmost hopes realized, and to enjoy the spontaneous outpouring of a nation's gratitude and appreciation! The great civic gathering massed under l'Arc de Triomphe, the monument built in commemoration of all the victories France has won through fire and sword and ruin and bloodshed, presented a truly glorious picture of peaceful, prosperous, modern France. The Genius of War, sculptured in bas-relief on the façade overlooking the Tuileries, seemed as much out of place as the figure of Napoleon, in the toga of Cæsar, receiving tribute from conquered cities, and that of Victory, blowing a trumpet above him. The residence of Victor Hugo was literally covered with flowers, many birthday odes were written to him by the poets of France, and during the entire day he received calls from friends. At a matinée given by the best musical and dramatic talent of the capital at Palais de Trocadéro, some of his poems were sung to the music of Beethoven, and recitations were given from his prose writings. The net receipts of the matinée were $5,000, which were given to the charity fund.

As I write, Paris is in the midst of a great public calamity by the entire destruction by fire of "Les Grands Magasins de Printemps," the square of palatial stores on Boulevard Haussmann, which American visitors in this city will well remember, as they, with the "Grands Magasins de Louvre," were the most extensive establishments of the kind here, and probably in Europe. A drop of alcohol from a lamp ignited some drapery, and the middle story was soon in flames. Many of the employés slept in the mansard roofs of the buildings; and, as the fire broke out about daybreak, it was with the utmost difficulty that they escaped with their lives, losing their wardrobes and furniture. Some four thousand persons are thrown out of employment by the calamity. Aside from the large number of clerks employed in the buildings, makers of artificial flowers, of dresses, mantles, and laces, of damask and tapestry, who were regularly employed by the management, find occupation gone for the present. Everything known in the line of wearing apparel for women and children, and furniture, tapestries, and laces, were sold in these establishments; and a large amount of goods for the summer trade had been received a few days ago, and the loss is immense. It is to be hoped that no more inefficient fire department exists in the world than here. The firemen are brave to a fault, and imperil their lives to save life and property without hesitation. But the fault seems to lie in their miserable fire-engines, which always are out of order, and the hose burst just when most needed to do duty. Their little portable engines are mere toys, throwing small streams of water which effect nothing; and thus it is that when fires break out it is found very difficult to extinguish them, although the buildings are all stone, and the only wood employed is around the windows and doors. Two firemen lost their lives, and thirty-five were wounded. It is so strange that American fire-engines cannot find introduction here. Their superiority is admitted, and still the idea prevails that, while suited to the United States, they would not be available in Paris; and thus, by an unreasonable prejudice, they are not given a trial, and great and needless destruction of life and property is the result.

ROSA L. SEGUR.

LESSONS ON The Origin and Growth of Christianity.

XVII.

THE FUTURE LIFE.

"God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."—MATT. xxii., 31, 32; compare Mark xii., 26, 27; Luke xx., 37, 38.

1. Origin of the Belief in a Future Life.

Some of the lowest races of SAVAGES have no belief in a life after death, nor in the existence of a soul distinct from the material body. These doctrines were of gradual growth among primitive peoples. They did not arise until man's affectional nature, developing under the greater continuity of relationship established in the primitive family life, gave rise to the desire for the continuance and perpetuity of this relationship; and until his speculative faculties were sufficiently developed to enable him to reason concerning the curious phenomena of sleep, dreams, catalepsy, and trance.

The origin of the belief in continued conscious existence after death is based, therefore, 1st, upon the AFFECTIONAL NATURE OF MAN as distinguished from the brute creation; and, 2d, upon the observation of the phenomena of dreams, catalepsy, and trance, for which the theory of a SOUL, separable from the body, offered an intelligible explanation.

NOTE A.—In fainting, catalepsy, and trance, a condition of apparent death is succeeded by a renewal of life, which naturally suggested the existence of a soul or second self, separable from the body. In dreams, this other self seemed to be active and conscious, while the body was silent and the senses inert. By some savage tribes, this soul is identified with the shade or shadow, which is seen to accompany man during his waking hours.

NOTE B.—The formation of the doctrine of a life after death resulted thus from the incipient scientific tendency of the human mind. The general prevalence of this belief among diverse and unrelated races, proves that it was the product of natural growth, and not, as some have supposed, the invention of priests or tyrannical rulers.

Talk about the METHOD OF SCIENCE: what does this word mean? How does SCIENCE grow? The SCIENTIFIC USE OF THE IMAGINATION: how does it help to advance knowledge? The difference between KNOWLEDGE and FAITH: define and exemplify. Can there be a RATIONAL FAITH, which is not yet knowledge?

2. Growth of the Doctrine of a Future Life.

The earliest form of the belief in continued existence, appears in the expectation common among primitive races that the bodies of the dead will sometime be reanimated, as after fainting or trance. Later, the soul was believed to be lying torpid, in a cavernous abode under the earth; or to be still conscious, wandering about, to torment the living, unless appeased by suitable rites and offerings.

Subsequently, the doctrine of a RESURRECTION of the physical body, and the renewal of its life upon the earth, free from pain, disease, and death, was evolved naturally from these more primitive beliefs.

Later developments of the belief in future existence have spiritualized it, giving rise to the conception of a spiritual body, developed naturally during life, with and within the material body, from which it is separable at death. Subsequently, it is believed to inhabit a spiritual universe, as real and tangible to its perceptions as is our physical world to our bodily senses.

3. The Hebrew Doctrine of Existence after Death.

The earliest HEBREW records contain no evidence of a belief in conscious future existence. The PENTATEUCH and older PROPHETS do not mention the life after death, nor the doctrine of the resurrection. The souls of the dead were supposed to be laid away in SHEOL, a cavernous abode under the earth, in a torpid or unconscious state; whence they might sometimes be recalled by the miraculous interposition or permission of the DEITY, as was SAMUEL by the "Woman of ENDOR." (I. Sam. xxviii.)

The conceptions of a future conscious existence and bodily resurrection were derived from PERSIA and BABYLONIA, during and subsequent to the Captivity. They are first clearly presented in the Book of Daniel. (Chapter xii.; written about 165 B.C.) At the time of JESUS, these beliefs prevailed among the masses of the people, though the conservative SADDUCEES rejected them as innovations, and clung to the ancient HEBREW doctrines.

4. The Teaching of Jesus.

JESUS explicitly affirmed the reality of a life after death, and taught that the physical body would be raised, arguing against the opposing beliefs of the SADDUCEES. (Mark xii., 18–27; Matt. xxii., 23–33; Luke xx., 27–38.) Toward the end of his life, he appears to have believed fully in his own MESSIANIC mission, and to have taught that he himself was appointed to separate the RIGHTEOUS from the unrighteous after the resurrection. He would subsequently reign over the former in "life eternal" in the HEAVENLY KINGDOM, while the latter would "go away into everlasting punishment." (Matt. xxv., 31–46; Mark ix., 43–48; xiii., 26, 27; compare Mark iii., 29; x., 28–30; Matt. xviii., 1–10; xix., 29; Luke xviii., 29, 30.)

JESUS here simply accepted the current beliefs of his time, with little modification except what followed naturally from the belief in his own MESSIANIC mission. He nowhere definitely describes the conditions or occupations of the future life; but he identifies the dwelling-place of the righteous with the KINGDOM OF GOD, which was to be established on the earth. He makes RIGHTEOUSNESS, and not church-membership or dogmatic belief, the condition of salvation.

NOTE A.—"ETERNAL, EVERLASTING": The GREEK word (αἰώνιος), which is thus rendered, means literally "age-long," and does not necessarily indicate time without end. Hence UNIVERSALISTS and believers in the final happiness of all, have claimed that an erroneous meaning was conveyed by this translation.

The same word, however, is used to describe the duration of future happiness as well as misery. The doctrine of eternal punishment was prevalent among the PHARISAIC JEWS of this period. (See JOSEPHUS.) It is more rational to believe, therefore, that it was adopted and taught by JESUS.

AS RATIONAL BELIEVERS, however, we need not accept it, unless it commends itself to our own best judgment. Does it appear just or reasonable to you? Is it consistent with the conception of an infinitely wise, powerful, and benevo- lent GOD, or with the beneficent purpose and tendency manifested in the UNIVERSE?

Digitized by Google

NOTE B.—Talk about IMMORTALITY: Is the fact of conscious existence after death scientifically demonstrable? What do you know of the claims of the SWEDENBORGIANS and SPIRITUALISTS? What do scientific investigators like CROOKES, WALLACE, HARE, ZOELLNER, and BUTLEROFF say of alleged spiritual phenomena? Can there be any possible demonstration of a future life, save through the proper authentication of such phenomena, under scientific investigation?

May this belief be rationally held without such a demonstration? If yes, then on what grounds? Tracing the order of its evolution, we find that the conception of a future life has grown clearer, more rational, more spiritual, more universal, from age to age, with the growing intelligence of man. Is it reasonable to suppose that a conception thus developed corresponds with no actual reality?

(Read to the class EDWIN ARNOLD'S poem, "After death in Arabia.")

Are the arguments against the truth of this doctrine rational and conclusive? Is the conception of life after death consistent with known facts and the philosophy of EVOLUTION? Can it be scientifically disproved? What do you know of the POSITIVIST doctrine of "Corporate Immortality"?

(Read GEORGE ELIOT'S beautiful poem, "Oh, may I join the choir invisible.")

General Questions.

1. Did the most primitive races believe in a future life? 2. How did this belief originate? 3. Was it an invention or a natural growth? 4. How did fainting, catalepsy, trance, and dreams help to suggest this belief? 5. Describe briefly the development of this belief? 6. What was the ancient HEBREW conception of man's condition after death? 7. Whence did the JEWS derive the doctrine of conscious immortality? 8. Did they ever universally accept it? 9. What did JESUS teach about the future life? 10. Did he believe in the resurrection of the body? 11. In eternal punishment? 12. Did he describe the occupations of the future life? 13. Where did he locate the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN?

To the Teacher.

Read what you can of ALGER'S History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. Also EMERSON'S essay on Immortality, and sermons in CHADWICK'S Faith of Reason, and SAVAGE'S Religion of Evolution.

The alleged facts and the philosophy of SPIRITUALISM are best described in WALLACE'S pamphlet, ZOELLNER'S Transcendental Physics, and the works of ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS. The opposite belief is ably supported in the works of BUECHNER, HAECKEL, and the Positivist school of writers. Read also the discussion in "A Modern Symposium," originally published in the "NINETEENTH CENTURY."

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

An Alleged Miracle.

ELLEN MCQUILLIAN ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN RAISED FROM THE DEAD BY FATHER MALONEY.

We publish below one of the most extraordinary statements that ever came to this office. A letter requesting the publication of the alleged miracle says:

The undersigned being cognizant of the facts, respectfully solicit you to find space in the columns of the Despatch for the information of your readers for the following statement made by us, and which we cordially invite you or any of your readers to investigate. We were eye-witnesses of the whole of this marvellous and stupendous miracle; and we can substantiate the same by affidavit, if required.

TERRENCE MCQUILLIAN.	BRIDGET MCQUILLIAN.
PATRICK MOORE.	MARY MOORE.
MICHAEL MOORE.	WILLIAM CUMMINS.
BRIDGET CUSICK.	THOMAS MCQUILLIAN.
ANNE MCQUILLIAN.	THOMAS MOORE.

BRIDGET MAHER.

SUMMIT, Feb. 7, 1881.

The Miracle.

On Sunday morning, Jan. 9, 1881, Miss Ellen McQuillian, a young woman twenty years of age, and possessed of rare qualities, and residing with her parents and seven brothers and four sisters, instantly became very ill. Next morning, her father, thinking that she was on the verge of death, went to Father Maloney, and entreated him to come to the house and prepare his daughter for death. He went to see her, and desired the father to go at once to Greene for Father Hesse, as he alone had charge of the district. On the same evening, Father Hesse came (Monday 10), but had to wait for a considerable time before she came to her senses. He then quickly gave her the sacraments, but scarcely had he finished when she fell back again, quite unconscious. In this state, she remained during day and night until the 14th. Her family and friends sent for Dr. Barton, of Waterford. As soon as he arrived, he carefully examined the patient, and pronounced the disease to be congestion of the brain. On Sunday, the 16th, she was instantly struck from head to foot with paralysis, and then she became altogether in a most helpless condition. Her natural fair color became very dark, her lips became pink and closely compressed, her eyes became much larger and more glassy, staring wide open without the least item of sight in them, and remained immovable. Her eyelashes became as blue as indigo, and lost completely all their power and functions. The whole body down to her very toes became motionless and as cold as a corpse. Around the wrist of the left arm was a black circle, and from there to the tips of the fingers was as black as ink and as cold as ice, without the least particle of life in them. The fingers were firmly clutched around the thumb, and so tightly compressed or squeezed together that they appeared to be welded together and form one solid body without the least animation. Several attempts were made by constant rubbing, bathing, chafing with oil, but all to no purpose; for it was impossible to open or separate them, or cause any circulation whatever in them. They could not be separated, unless they were torn asunder; and then it was the opinion of every one who saw them that, if they were forced, they would be sure to break in pieces like rotten branches. In this deplorable condition lay the prostrate form of this young lady. All the day and night and the next day, the 17th, they watched her closely; and not the least ray of life or hope was visible, and sometimes they thought that she was dead. Seeing that all hopes were gone, the broken-hearted father, as a last resource, went to Father Maloney, and besought him to come to the house and read an office for her. The priest at once consented. He had not seen her before since Monday, the 10th, which was eight days previous. At once, he ordered a lighted candle, and, opening his book, commenced to read. He continued so for about five minutes, then went over to the bedside. Every eye in the house was fixed on the priest. Suddenly, as if by divine inspiration, he raised his hands and eyes toward heaven, and fervently implored and besought the Eternal Son of the living God and his Blessed Mother to hear his humble prayer. He continued praying in that attitude for about three minutes, and then, raising his right hand, he made the sign of the cross three times over that prostrate, lifeless form, and at that very instant she resumed her natural color. The paralysis totally left her whole body; her eyes and eyelids resumed their natural course, and the sight returned to them; her full and entire senses returned; the disease altogether quitted the head and brain; the withered, dead hand and fingers were once more restored to life, and became as sound, as fresh, and as natural as ever they were. She that very instant sat up in her bed; and in less than two minutes afterward she walked into the next room, unaided by any one, and then called for something to eat. The priest himself, as well as the rest, was so thunderstruck at what he saw that he shook like an aspen-leaf and turned the color of death, then at once took up his hat, and in a very low voice said, "Be careful and say nothing of this to any one," and then left the house. Each and every one of us are prepared to make an affidavit that this stupendous miracle was performed before our eyes instantaneously and in the middle of daylight, about four o'clock on Monday evening, Jan. 17, 1881; and from that moment to this Ellen McQuillian never enjoyed better health or spirits, and no trace whatever of that fearful complication of diseases is to be found in her whole body.

There was no legerdemain, or slight of hand, or priestcraft, as some may say, or call it, in connection with this. There was nothing said or done in private, no conspiracy formed to gull any one, no intricacy whatever about the matter, but all in an instant the prayer of that priest was heard; and as true as the light shines, or God is eternal and everlasting, so sure is it that this miracle was performed before our eyes, and is now well known by all denominations in this district.

The following names are given as belonging to persons who were present and cognizant of Miss McQuillian's dying condition: Rev. Father Hesse, of Greene; Dr. Barton, of Waterford; Mr. and Mrs. John Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. Cummins, Mrs. Meagher, Mrs. Lynch, Miss Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. Madden, Mrs. James Cummins, Mr. and Mrs. Moore, Mary McQuillian, and thirty others.—Erie Despatch.

Another Alleged Miracle.

And now when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath, Joseph of Arimathea, an honorable counsellor, who also waited for the kingdom of God, came and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus. And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead; and, calling the centurion, he asked him whether he had been any while dead. And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joseph. And he bought fine linen, and took him down, and wrapped him in the linen, and laid him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre. And Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses beheld where he was laid.

And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him. And very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun. And they said among themselves, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" And when they looked, they saw that the stone was rolled away; for it was very great. And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. And he saith unto them, "Be not affrighted. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him. But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you." And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; for they trembled and were amazed: neither said they anything to any man: for they were afraid.

Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. And she went and told them that had been with him, as they mourned and wept. And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not. After that, he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country. And they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed they them. Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them who had seen him after he was risen.—New Testament.

FOREIGN.

A NUMBER of working men were on the 15th of March expelled from Berlin by virtue of the Socialist law.

A NEW review devoted to Semitic inscriptions is about to appear in Paris under the direction of M. Ernest Renan.

THE death is announced of J. Paul Cobbett, the third and last surviving son of William Cobbett, the eminent English reformer. Mr. Cobbett was in his seventy-seventh year.

SEVENTY doctors and surgeons engaged in hospital work in Paris have addressed a note to M. Quentin, the Director of Public Charities, protesting against the decision of the Council of Surveillance replacing the sisters of charity by ordinary nurses.

THE Science and Art Schools of Oldham (England), erected at a cost of £10,000 by Messrs. Platt, was opened on the 15th ult. An address appropriate to the occasion was delivered by Lord Derby. The Mayor of Oldham participated in the exercises.

THE hired transports "Egypt" and "Roman" have sailed from England to carry reinforcements to South Africa. The "Egypt" took out eight hundred men from Malta; and the "Roman" carried about four hundred men, with a large quantity of stores. The "Persian Monarch" was to follow the next week with cavalry and artillery.

THE Italian Chamber has been discussing a bill for granting a sum of £2,000,000 for improvements in the city of Rome. Signor Crispi, in supporting the measure, said that until now Italy had appeared to have only a provisional seat in Rome. Everything should now be done that was necessary to render the city worthy of the position of the definitive capital of the kingdom.

Digitized by Google

THE spirit of rowdyism which has been aroused by the processions of the Salvation Army at Poole, England, has reached such a pitch that the Mayor has issued a proclamation for their protection. This morning a laborer named Short was sentenced to a month's imprisonment, with hard labor, for disturbing the public service of the army, and to another month, without hard labor, for knocking down the captain.

ANOTHER shock of earthquake occurred at Casamicciola, Italy, on Tuesday night, March 15, which destroyed some already damaged houses, and brought others to the ground. The shock was felt in most parts of the island. At Serra Fontana, it was accompanied by rumbling noises; and great quantities of vapor issued from Fumaroli, near the establishment of Piesco. The terrified population ran out of their houses, and could not be persuaded to return. It has been ascertained that one hundred and fourteen lives have been lost by the earthquake reported last week, two hundred and eighty-nine houses destroyed, and two hundred and sixty families rendered houseless. The damage to property is estimated at £36,000.

IT is stated that the Berlin police have discovered a new secret organization of Socialists, similar to that of the Russian Nihilists, and extending over the whole of Germany. The Dresden correspondent of the Standard states that in Leipzig a minor state of siege was proclaimed about a fortnight ago, in consequence of Social Democrats having been harbored of late in that city. New police regulations of a very stringent character were issued. Every stranger must be reported to the police by the landlord of the inn or hotel where he alights, no matter how late at night he may arrive; and any stranger staying more than three days must obtain a special pass from the police, under a penalty of fifteen marks or proportionate imprisonment. A passport is in fact, the telegram says, advisable for every foreigner visiting Leipzig, Dresden, or any other part of Saxony at the present time. Preliminary legal proceedings have been instituted by the Imperial Court of Justice at Augsburg against Richard Dave, who was arrested on the 8th ult., in consequence of being found in possession of papers of a compromising character. He is described as an emissary from London of the Social Democrat, Herr Most, and is charged with participation in a treasonable conspiracy and inciting to regicide.—Pall Mall Budget.

MR. BRADLAUGH IN COURT.—Clarke v. Bradlaugh. These were cross-demurrers, heard on Monday, in the action to recover penalties from Mr. Bradlaugh for sitting and voting in the House of Commons without taking the oath. A lengthened argument took place relative to the Acts of 1866 and 1869 regulating the administration of oaths and affirmations. The plaintiff contended that in all cases affirmations and declarations were based on the belief in the existence of a Supreme Being and future rewards and punishments. Mr. Bradlaugh, however, contended that the question of religious belief did not enter into the consideration of the question. The scope of the Amended Oaths Act was to admit such persons to take the oath who had no religious belief. Religious belief was in no way introduced into the Acts of 1866 and 1869 as the basis on which the oath was to be administered. At the conclusion of the arguments, the judge took time to consider his judgment. (Before Mr. Justice Grove and Mr. Justice Lindley.) The Alleged Libel on Mr. Bradlaugh. The Queen (in the Prosecution of Charles Bradlaugh) v. Edgecome. This case came before the court on Tuesday upon a demurrer to pleas of justification in a prosecution for libel. The alleged libel imputed that Mr. Bradlaugh, on a public occasion, said: "If there is a God, let him strike me dead within the next five minutes; and, amid the breathless silence of the auditory, the atheist taking out his watch, and abiding the five minutes." The pleas objected to stated several places and occasions when Mr. Bradlaugh had used these words, and gloried in this scepticism. The learned judges, after argument, were of opinion that the pleas did not point out the occasions with reasonable particularity, and were embarrassing and unfair to the prosecutor. They, therefore, allowed the demurrer, with costs, but gave liberty to the defendant to amend.—Weekly Despatch, March 13.

JESTINGS.

"I WONDER, uncle," said a little girl, "if men will ever yet live to be five hundred or one thousand years old?" "No, my child," responded the old man: "that was tried once, and the race got so bad the world had to be drowned."

THE female plaintiff in a Western divorce suit was asked, upon taking the stand and prior to being sworn, if she believed in a future life. "I used to," she answered; "but, since I was married, I've had all the nonsense taken out of me."

"JOB, my dear," said his wife, wreathed in smiles, "I wish you had been at church this morning. Mr. Goodwill was very interesting; and when he prayed for the absent ones"— "Well, that accounts for it then. I haven't caught such a string of fish for a year as I did this morning."

"AND what have you to be thankful for?" said Mrs. X. to Mrs. Y., as they came out of church together, at the close of a long and prosy sermon upon thankfulness by "one of our exchanges." "I'm thankful that he isn't our minister," said Mrs. Y.; and she hastened home to cold viands which the length of sermon had served up.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

Amount acknowledged up to March 1	$2028.75
CHAS. H. PIERCE, New Bedford (10th assess.)	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, " " one year of pledge	25.00
ARTHUR M. LEE, New York	20.00
THOS. DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess.)	10.00
J. D. FROST, Providence, R.I. (10th assess.)	10.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., one year of pledge	10.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	25.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 4 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	50.00
Miss EMMA D. IRESON, Lynn, Mass., annually for 3 years	5.00
JAMES EDDY, Providence, annually	50.00
THOMAS DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess't)	10.00
J. W. BOYD, Jelloway, Ohio, annually for 5 years	10.00
ROBERT DAVIS, Lunenburg, Mass. (annually)	10.00
J. S. JOHNSON, Almont, Mich., annually for 5 years	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

METROPOLE
INSURANCE COMPANY,
OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,
No. 20 Kilby Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, ESQ.,
Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.

GEORGE M. BARNARD, ESQ.,
Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.

WILLIAM P. HUNT, ESQ.,
President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

JUST READY.

A NEW VOLUME BY MR. SAVAGE.

Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind.

These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.50
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c.	per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c.	" "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c.	" "
" 52	" . . .	5c.	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

THE SIX DISCOURSES

OF

Mr. Samuel B. Weston

Submitted to the Unitarian Committee of Reference in the Leicester Case, together with Mr. Southgate's Will and the Committee's decision, making a pamphlet of 67 pages, can be had at the Index Office, or by sending to H. O. Smith, Leicester, Mass.

Price, for single copy, 40 cts.; for two or more copies, 30 cts. each.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. PIPER

L. PRANG & CO.'S

Easter Cards for 1881.

Of these cards, we offer this season a greater variety and of more elegant artistic taste than ever before. We call particular attention to the cards with silk fringes and tassels, and the cards on heavy gilt-edged mounts.

NEW EASTER EGG DESIGN.

Easter Dove Design.

A very rich and elegant line of

NEW BIRTHDAY CARDS,

with and without silk fringe.

L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

RADICAL DISCOURSES.

1. America's Debt to Thomas Paine.
2. False and True Prayer.
3. The Brute God of the Old Testament.
4. The Religion of To-day
5. False Teachings of the Christian Church.
6. The Workingman's Religion.
7. The Christian Tragedy at Pocasset.
8. Free Religion; or, The Religious Demands of To-day.
9. The Teachings of Free Religion.
10. Do You Love Jesus?
11. Atonement.
12. The Bible: How shall we read it?
13. Revivals.
14. Who are Christians?
15. The Moral Life.
16. Is Liberalism Moral?
17. If a Man Die, Shall he Live Again?
18. The Resurrection of Jesus Not Proved.
19. The New Testament in the Old.
20. The Beliefs of the Unbelievers.
21. A Holy Superstition.
22. Temperance and the Bible.
23. Common-Sense on a Tour through the Bible. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

The above discourses may be had at 5 cts. each, or the entire set for one dollar, by addressing L. K. WASHBURN,
22 Sachem Street, Lynn, Mass.

Suitable for Knitting Stockings, Mittens, Wristers, Edgings, and other articles. Put up on half-ounce balls in Black, White, and Colors. An illustrated book of 32 pages of rules for knitting this silk sent by mail on receipt of a 3c. stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness, and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 590.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 42.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

ARISE, ye men! praise the best purity; destroy the evil spirits. Long sleep, O man, becomes thee not. Turn yourselves not away from the three best things, good thought, good word, good work; turn yourselves away from the three evil things, evil thought, word, and work.—Zoroaster.

WHAT the superior man seeks is in himself, what the ignoble man seeks is in others. Virtue is like the polar star, which keeps its place, and all stars turn toward it. The substance of the Odes is in this: "Have no depraved thoughts." When one discerns no evil in his own mind, what room for anxiety or fear?—Confucius.

PEOPLE who are under the dominion of anger or appetite or any other passion, or of treacherous wickedness, are in every respect slaves; and those who live in accordance with law are free. But the unerring law is right reason,—not an ordinance made by this or that mortal, a corruptible and perishable law, a lifeless law written on lifeless parchment or engraved on lifeless columns, but one imperishable, and stamped by immortal nature on the immortal mind.—Philo Judæus.

OUT of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: these are the things which defile a man.—Jesus.

THE first and highest purity or impurity is that which is formed in the soul. For what stain can you find in the soul, unless it be something which renders it impure in its operations? Now, the operations of the soul are its pursuits and avoidances, its desires, aversions, preparations, intentions, assents. What, then, is that which renders it defiled and impure in these operations? Nothing else than its perverse judgments. So that the impurity of the soul consists in wicked principles, and its purification in forming right principles; and that is pure which has right principles, for that alone is unmixed and undefiled in its operations.—Epictetus.

THE more a man becomes addicted to sensual pleasures, the more completely is he a slave. People may call him happy, but he pays his liberty for his delights, and sells himself for what he buys.—Seneca.

HE who reigns within himself, and rules passions, desires, and fears, is more than a king.—Milton.

IT is not the eye that sees the beauty of the heavens, nor the ear that hears the sweetness of music or the glad tidings of a prosperous accident, but the soul, that perceives all the relishes of sensuous and intellectual perfections; and the more noble and excellent the soul is, the greater and more savory are its perceptions.—Jeremy Taylor.

TO KNOW a thing, what we call knowing, a man must first love the thing, sympathize with it: that is to be virtuously related to it. If he have not the justice to put down his own selfishness at every turn, the courage to stand by the dangerous true at every turn, how shall he know? His virtues, all of them, will lie recorded in his knowledge. Nature, with her truth, remains to the bad, to the selfish and the pusillanimous, forever a sealed book: what such can know of nature is mean, superficial, small, for the uses of the day merely.—Carlyle.

I VENTURE to suggest that the most developed man is he who has the least reason for not simply obeying his impulses, or that perfect impulses mark the perfect man.—James Hinton.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IT is said that sixty per cent. of the students at Harvard College are of the Trinitarian faith, while only twenty-two and a half per cent. are Unitarians.

THE estimated Jewish population of this country is 230,257. There are 278 congregations, with membership of 12,546, representing synagogue property amounting to $4,788,700, and other property, institutions, etc., at $1,860,030. The synagogue schools are attended by 12,886 children.

IT is reported that there are a good many disappointed because they cannot procure admission to the representation of the Greek play at Harvard, next month, concerning which so much has been said and is expected. The students, with an eye to the paying investment offered, appear to have bought up all the tickets. Does not this go to refute the charge that our colleges unfit young men for business and practical pursuits?

A "FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY" has been formed in Rantoul, Ill. Its constitution sent to us on a printed slip tells us all we know about it. It provides for liberty of thought and discussion; and we trust also for practical humanitarian work. One section of its constitution says: "The fundamental idea upon which this society is based is that salvation, for this world and all possible worlds, is conditioned by conduct, and not by belief." This, certainly, if not permitted to remain a dead letter, means a good deal of honest work.

THE Concord School of Philosophy is to have a rival. It is announced that in Orange County in the vicinity of New York, in the midst of fine natural scenery, an "encampment of Christian Philosophy" is to be established the coming summer. Chancellor Crosby of the University of New York, President Porter of Yale, President Bascom of the University of Wisconsin, Professor Winchell of Michigan University, and Principal Dawson of Montreal, are named as lecturers. This new movement may relieve the Concord School of a part of its evident, but unnatural burden hitherto,—that of specially defending Christianity.

A NEW YORK Tribune correspondent, who has been talking with a "Mississippi politician," says there is good prospect of an independent political movement in that State, and that the platform of the new party is to be a sentence taken from General Hancock's letter, accepting the nomination for the presidency: "It is only by a full vote, free ballot, and fair count that the people can rule in fact, as required by the theory of our government." So, perhaps, there will be a political formula of "three F.'s," as a rallying-cry for reform in the South as well as in Ireland. It is to be hoped that to this platform will be added the plank of honest payment of public debts. It is not an auspicious sign if political independency in the South is to be tainted with "repudiation."

LORD BEACONSFIELD is dead. His career has been a long, unique, and brilliant one. In 1826, when only twenty-one years old, he was lifted to celebrity by the publication of his first book, Vivian Grey; and from that time until a year ago, when the Conservative party being defeated in the elections he resigned the premiership of the English government, his life has been a most busy and versatile one, of mingled literature and politics. That he has been successful in making for himself, against many obstacles, a name and place in English annals, cannot be denied. But whether his influence on English politics has been of the highest quality may well be questioned. Lord Beaconsfield—known until a few years ago only as Disraeli—was born a Jew; but his father practically left the Jewish Church, and the son when a youth was baptized into the Church of England.

THE anti-Jewish movement in Germany seems to have been comparatively quiet of late. But, in the mean time, a petition has been circulating for signatures, the aim of which is to impose restrictions on the immigration of Jews into Germany, and to exclude them from certain spheres of activity altogether. The petition has been signed by two hundred and fifty-five thousand names, including not a few noblemen, retired generals, and officials. On the 13th instant, it was presented to Prince Bismarck. But the next day a cabled despatch said that "the objects of the petition are hopeless, in view of the utterances of the government that it does not intend to permit the existing laws affecting the Jews to be repealed or altered. Prince Bismarck has also told the Bundesrath that anti-Jewish agitation is against his wishes. The crown prince, Frederick William, if not the Emperor also, has still less sympathy with the movement."

WHATEVER Colonel Ingersoll's enemies may say of him, they cannot say that he tries to conceal his opinions or is afraid to tell what he thinks. A reporter of the New Haven Union, in the unobtrusive and modest way peculiar to reporters, has been endeavoring to draw the Colonel out as to his views of the Rev. Mr. Lansing, of Meriden, who recently denounced the famous unbeliever with such severity as to cause the opera house there to be closed against him. The Colonel gave in his usual frank and definite way his estimate of Mr. Lansing and the clergy in general, which is not, we regret, what can be considered flattering, as these excerpts show. "I cannot conceive," says he, "that a free-thinker has anything to fear from the pulpit except misrepresentation. . . . There is but one safe course for ministers," according to his view: "they must assert, they must declare, they must swear to it, but they must not try to reason." Of Mr. Wilcox who refused the opera house, he expressed himself as follows: "I hear that he is a good man. He probably got a little scared, and began to think about the Day of Judgment. He could not help it, and I cannot help laughing at him."

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

Letter from a Liberal to an Orthodox Mother.

My Dear M.,—Nothing was further from my purpose than not answering your letter: only I have taken the full month to revolve its presentation in order to give due weight to its arguments,—not to be guided by my feelings alone in replying,—and to have time so to set forth and frame my answer as to convince you that to my changed beliefs and views I give my most serious and hearty assent. Your reasoning is very close and good, your illustrations admirable, and your arguments unanswerable, provided I could admit the premises. But right here, at the very outset, the difference begins: you make the Bible and your way of understanding it, Christ and your notion of his life and death, the groundwork of all religious life, and say, Without these for a foundation, no one "can easily be a Christian soul," by which I suppose you mean a religious soul.

I truly believe that one can be imbued with a fuller, richer, nobler, religious life, who is steered clear, from the first, of the low views of God involved in a belief in the fall of man, who never gets a hint of the "plan of salvation" that "total depravity" necessitates, who has no conception of an "angry God" conciliated, satiated by the death on the cross.

Your idea seems to be that, while you could for yourself refuse to believe all this (if you wanted to, I suppose you mean, which strikes me as a queer way of putting it; for either it is true to you or it is not: if it be true, you must believe it, whether you want to or not; if it be not true, how can you accept it for yourself in any sense?) or in other and your own exact words, while "you could take Unitarianism for" yourself, you "would not risk your children in it."

Now, while I can easily see that children and grown people may and must conceive of spiritual truth differently, I am wholly unable to see how that which is a lie to a grown-up person can ever be in any sense a truth, or ought ever to be represented as truth, to a child. I don't profess to be very much of a Unitarian; but, between my belief now and that which I learned from my mother and the church I joined, the gap is wider than that which separates mind and matter, the distance greater than that which divides earth and heaven. I could no more teach my children as I was taught, and say, "They will grow out of it in due time," than I could feed them with poison and hope that exercise and growing strength would expel the enemy.

You say, "Because I take a different view from my childish one, I would not sweep the childish and immature one away, any more than after reaching the top of Bunker Hill Monument, and enjoying the view, I would destroy the narrow, dark, and difficult stairway by which I reached that height." Very good; but suppose that having reached the top of the monument and having encountered in the dark way thither, on the narrow stairs, stones, loose boards, etc., would not your motherly instinct prompt you to say, "When the children go up, I must lift them over these stones, and keep their feet from stumbling over the loose boards that hindered me"? And, if you should learn that the ascent had been repaired and improved, you would not say, "It is unnatural that children should reach such a height without much toil, and the steps were meant by God to be laborious, I will have them go up as I did."

You complain that we are in danger of forgetting in this age the need children have of "a religious primer"—"bare statements, assertions"—as "stepping-stones hard and narrow," and you say "we forget the need the young have of a religious schoolhouse."

We may forget this, but Nature does not; and she takes care, if we give our children any religious training whatever, that this shall be the normal development,—first that which is natural, then that which is spiritual. And so our most glorious and winged truths will doubtless be to them bare and naked. What then? Shall we deliberately teach falsehood, because they will comprehend it more easily?

While I very much object to giving my children the kind of "bare assertions and statements" that any of the orthodox creeds offer, do not take it for granted that I do not mean to teach them any religious truth. Because I do not mean to plant your seed, I am not going on the plan of planting nothing, leaving the ground to weeds, as the man did who objected to prejudicing his children's minds in favor of any religious views whatever. And I know, too, that, to my children, the seed I sow will not be more than a seed or perhaps a dry unsightly root, but from it I believe will eventually spring a fairer blossom and a finer fruit than that which comes from the seed of Orthodox views of the Bible and of God, from Westminster Catechisms or the Thirty-nine Articles.

Take notice that I say the Orthodox views of the Bible and of God, but do not commit the error of thinking that, because I no longer look at the Bible and at God as I once did, I throw away the Bible, and claim to have had a nobler vision than that can give, or, because I cannot conceive of God as I was taught to do, I no longer believe in God at all. On the contrary, I still think the Bible contains the secret of all that is possible to humanity of highest nobleness and worth; nor do I believe we shall ever outgrow its teachings or attain unto the fulness of the measure therein laid down for us. But, when you say, "Decisions based upon its teachings are never wrong," I do not agree with you; and I do think that the sooner this way of looking at the Bible is done away with, the better it will be for the Bible and for humanity.

"I believe in God the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth," as heartily and as devoutly as you do. I also believe further in the words of your Prayer-Book, that "there is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, the maker and preserver of all things both visible and invisible." This God and Father I mean to teach my children to love, reverence, and obey in all that we can know of his character, his acts, and his laws. But when the articles of your belief go on to define this God as "a unity of three persons, of one substance, power, and eternity," and say that this God came into the womb of a virgin, "so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice not only for original guilt, but also for the actual sins of men," of all this I can only say, "I do not believe a word"; neither do I believe there is any good ground for supposing this doctrine is based upon the teaching of the Bible. Even if it could be made out that all this is in the Bible, I should only say, So much the worse for the Bible: this could not make it one whit less nonsense than it is, or one whit more worthy of belief.

Take now your Prayer-Book, and read the third article of your faith. It runs as follows: "As Christ died for us and was buried, so also is it to be believed that he went down into hell." The recent apostle of liberal Orthodoxy, Joseph Cook, defines hell as a state "of permanent, free, dissimilarity of feeling with God." You will no doubt agree with me that this definition is a vast improvement on Jonathan Edwards' burning pit of material fire, with the divine wrath holding us above it, "much as one holds a spider over the fire." But apply this modern orthodox definition of hell to the clause in your creed, and what sense does it make?

If it means anything that you like, or that is going to help you to repent, or to teach your children to repent, keep it and say it over. But, if not, why, it is only mummery unworthy of a religion of the nineteenth century to perpetuate.

I can hardly understand you, when you say, "If I had only young children, your views would arrest me." You seem to regard my views as especially destitute of the very elements the youngest need, and say they may be very well for me, even you could be content with them for yourself or for a person of mature years. Your grown sons, then, I should think, would be less injured by them than the younger. If I am not mistaken, your son C. is twenty-two years old. Where will you draw the line? When is it going to be safe to "risk" him with these views, harmless to mature persons, pernicious to young ones?

It is not with me a question as to whether such and such views of God and the Bible are going to help me most with the management of my children or not. If they are true to my deepest convictions, reached after anxious thought and study, I am bound to accept them, and to try to live up to them, whether they make my work with my children hard or light. However this may be, I am sure that God's truth cannot injure the youngest child, and that it will be just as good for them all the way along to manhood and womanhood as it is for the wisest man, who, in God's truth, is and must ever be a learner and a child.

I do not think we can any of us safely "stay out of school" yet, because I do not believe that divine truth was all signed, sealed, and delivered to the saints in the books that make up the Christian Bible.

You would not send your children to be taught astronomy, chemistry, physiology, or any other science, by a teacher who pursued the methods or taught the beliefs of a hundred years ago, because, in this century, all the physical sciences have taken long steps forward; and the gains they have made, you, as a wise woman, naturally hasten to avail yourself of.

Why should we think that in theology, the highest science, the centuries can make no gains? When we must learn by such slow methods of patient research, going often back upon our path and retracing our steps, the ways of the Most High in the realm of matter and physics, shall we believe that we can know once for all his dealings with the souls of men? Because the mind of infancy fails to grasp spiritual truth, shall it therefore have old-fashioned methods and out-grown theories as "stepping-stones, hard and narrow"? True, as you say, "the conceptions of children are material"; and, although I have never educated a son to manhood, I am not surprised to know that one comes late to apprehend "disembodied truth." I myself came late enough to this point, a great deal later than there had been any need of, I truly believe, if the simple truths that form the essentials of a religious life had not been so overlaid and wrapped in the cumbrous body of Calvinistic doctrine.

You ask, "Where are we to look for teachings of the Divine but in the New Testament, where seek a primer of spiritual science to recommend to our children other than there?"

I would show children that the divine teachings are in all the world of nature, in all the lessons of history, in all good books. I am more inclined to ask, "Where shall we not look for teachings of the Divine?" They lie about us everywhere.

I believe the New Testament is the best primer of spiritual science we have; and so its all-important and essential truths I would teach earnestly and constantly.

You go on to say, "Would I teach the miracles to children?" and answer, "Yes, for I truly believe God intended children and beginners generally to begin that way." On the other hand, I should answer, "No, I would not." I do not think God ever intended children should believe in the literal truth of what is not true. When my H. says, "Did Jesus, do you suppose, really bring that boy to life, if he was quite dead?" I say most unhesitatingly to him, "No, of course not, not God himself could do that." Then I explain to him that God never contradicts or contravenes his own law; and, when once the mechanism of our bodies ceases to act, so that the soul leaves the body, no power in heaven or earth can bring it again to reanimate the lifeless clay. Of course, he says next (for you know well that the end of questions never comes to a boy), "What did they say so for then?" I tell him just what I believe, and it perplexes or worries him no more than it does me. "Why, you must remember that this story grew up many, many years after Jesus was dead and buried. May be it was founded on something that Jesus really did, some good cure he wrought; for he was always helping somebody. Perhaps some widow's son was thought dead, and Jesus might have seemed by his aid to bring back to life the spark that burned so low the poor mother felt as if it had gone out altogether. It shows you how much the people loved Jesus, that long after he had left the earth he was remembered so tenderly, and exalted by the simple folks of those far-off, early times into a God."

Of course, all this lies in his mind, in the misty, twilight region where, for children, so much must lie. But he will never wake up to say, "My mother taught me for gospel truth what, after all, is only a legend or fairy story." Children have their time to believe in fairies, in Santa Claus, in witches perhaps; but, now that the world of grown-up people no longer believes in such exceptional beings, why prolong, beyond the first question, the irrational faith?

When my little girl says, "Mamma, isn't there any Santa Claus?" I put her off, perhaps, foolishly fearing to disturb a pleasing illusion of innocent ignorance; but, if she persists, I can only say, "No, my little girl, it is the fathers and mothers who love the little ones,—they bring you the Christmas gifts." I am rebuked for my lack of faith in childhood's abundant happiness, when, a day or two afterward, I hear her priding herself that she knows more about Santa Claus than one of her playmates who is foolish enough to stick to him. Miracles are the fairy stories of Christianity; and, as such, they are tender, sweet, and beautiful. I do not wish to drop them; but I would not have my children taught to look at them as props to an outgrown theology. Christianity as a system of belief, embodied in the creeds of Evangelical religion, has had its day, is dying out, and will, I believe, be as surely outgrown and cast-off as the pagan systems.

Digitized by Google

But the glorious truths Christ taught and lived are imperishable, and will as surely abide in the heart and life of humanity as God himself. The work Christianity has done for us is great. With its life began a wave of tremendous power, which lifted the race to loftier heights than it had ever before attained. The Christian Church, however, has all along tended to become a caste. This tendency, checked by Luther's Reformation, seems culminating. You know, as well as I do, that it is no longer the sweet and holy body in which alone the mighty spirit of truth and justice and righteousness pulsates and wakes to noblest life. Its corruptions strike at the very life of its own essential truths, and it contains the elements of its own destruction. Let it go. Nevertheless shall justice, truth, and right, love toward God and man, eternally survive in our race.

I want to ask you, M., if all the bad young men you have known, to compare with your sons, belong to liberal families? And do you not honestly think you might find in Orthodox circles an equal number of "failures," even in your sense of the word?

You have told me enough, as I remember it, of your next-door neighbor, to lead me to feel that the trouble there is not wholly of a doctrinal nature. I doubt if Mrs. —— would have had the success you have had, if she held your views of the Bible. I have never supposed you considered your deceased mother-in-law a model for training of children. Yet who was more devoted to Jesus than she, or more full of church enthusiasm? I think you told me that your sister, herself the wife of a Presbyterian minister, living in a circle of pure Orthodoxy where heresy can have no influence, finds few mothers absorbed in the kind of anxiety she feels or imbued with the lofty aims she holds for her children. What is the trouble here?

Now, I know "failures" enough in the children of Unitarian families of my acquaintance. I am bound to say that I can count an equal number of just as thorough "failures" among my Orthodox friends; and you know that the circle of my friends who are Orthodox is not small, for I come of a large and wholly Orthodox family, myself, perhaps, the only heretic. I make no doubt that your wise presentation of Bible truth has helped you immensely with your boys; but I am equally sure that it is not the whole secret of your success. Old ways confer certain advantages, as I admitted in my former letter. The old shoe is easier than the new: we cannot even change our worn-out clothing without some loss of at-home-ness and ease. Shall we, therefore, go slipshod on, and never change?

But I fully realize that there are advantages about my new faith that lead me to say, "I can never go back," not for my own sake alone, but a thousand times more do I say it for my children's sake. Of these, I should not have spoken to you, had not your letter been written with a kindness and frankness that delighted me, and that made it easy for me to reply at such length. Bear with me while I ask you to contrast your doctrine of sin and its remission with my own, expressed so much better by another than I can give it that I quote it. My husband says, "Until we learn that each man must bear to the utmost the penalty of his own sin, we can have only a barbaric morality"; and here is my creed upon the question of sin and its consequences, which is not quoted from my husband:—

The laws of God hold all nature in their iron grasp, and are written ineffaceably upon us without and within. To each line of transgression there is its own inherent penalty. It is that, always that, and not something else. Each law works surely and unerringly to its own end. If you expose your flesh to the fire, it burns; if to the cold, it freezes. If you give the reins loose to bodily lust and appetite, each injured function will exact its own penalty and after its own kind. If you lower your moral standard and stoop to a studied dishonesty in trade, it may or may not be discovered for years, but meanwhile in you, yes, in you, if not in an unhappy and reproaching conscience, then all the more in the whole slow deadening of the noblest elements of your nature, the moral law of God written on your being is working itself out to your bitter cost.... There is a law in man, by which all impiety is followed with its hurt to the soul. No man mocks at life's holy things without wounding the best and holiest in him. No man sins and wrongs another without wounding the holiest and best in him. And so it is through the whole range of God's manifold laws. If I am doomed to bear stripes, you could, to be sure, bear them in my place. If I am to be fined, your money could discharge my fine. If I am sentenced to prison, you, in disguise, might go for me. But, if I have lived loosely, your health and purity of body cannot take from me my disease. If I have stolen, your honesty cannot bear in my stead the shame and self-reproach. If I have killed, your innocence of crime cannot take from the secret burden that I must carry to my grave and into the world beyond, until, though I can never undo what has been done, by penitence and all divinest endeavors I redeem my life to life's holiest and noblest ends.

And just here must every man, as it seems to me, see the impossibility, in the very nature of things, of any substitution or transference of punishment and penalty under the divine laws. In human laws, such substitution is conceivable, is possible; though its adoption would soon be the overthrow of all social order. But, in those hidden and silent and far-reaching and everlasting laws of God in which our lives are held, the thing is not even conceivable.

Can you find anything in this to touch with breath of moral or spiritual bane your grown or your youngest sons? You must either believe it or not. If you believe it, it calls for the rejection of your "plan of redemption"; and we slight or reject truth at our peril. If you do not believe it, pray tell me why not.

But this must be my conclusion; and I promise you not to write so much again. I have written at the close of several busy days and subject to much interruption; but I have been deeply interested, and last night I could scarcely sleep from having to go over and over with you various trains of thought and argument.

I will only stop to say that I have not wanted ruthlessly to disturb your faith or wound your feelings. We have known each other too long and too well not to bear to hear each other's views at length.

Ever yours,

L.

For the Free Religious Index.

HOW TO MAKE SUNDAY USEFUL.

The judicious action of our Legislature has just defeated a new attempt of the Orthodox clergy of Boston to fortify their doctrine of Sunday Sabbatism by additional laws against the movement of railroad trains on Sunday. As this attempt, and others in the same interest of ecclesiastical domination, will of course be repeated hereafter, and as perpetual vigilance is the price of liberty, it may be well to point out here the method mainly relied on by these reverend gentlemen for enforcing Sabbatical restrictions.

The Rev. Julius H. Seelye, President of Amherst College, is also a prominent and active member of that society (I forget its name) which proposes to amend the United States Constitution by incorporating with it a formal acknowledgment of "the Lord Jesus Christ" as the rightful ruler of this nation, of the Bible as his word, so inspired as to be absolutely free from error, and of a Sunday Sabbath as specially appointed by him for religious observance. Upon the point last mentioned, there is a noteworthy article by President Seelye in the November number of the Princeton Review. In it, he first rehearses the grounds of natural expediency which make a remission of ordinary labor and traffic desirable, at least as often as one day in seven,—a conviction, be it noted, in which the people whom he calls heterodox heartily coincide,—and then sets forth the moral obligation of practically observing those dictates of natural expedience. But, having done this, he frankly declares that these considerations alone cannot be expected to induce the community to observe Sunday as a Sabbath in church fashion; that is to say, first by churchgoing, and then by systematic abstinence from recreation. These two ends, so vital in the clerical eye, he admits, cannot be secured, unless the community believe that God enjoins them; and thereupon he proceeds to represent that God, in the Bible, has enjoined them. In this representation, however, he grossly misinterprets both the law and the gospel, both the Old Testament and the New, both Jesus and Paul; and it is only by misrepresentation like this that even an appearance of Biblical support can be found for the doctrine in question.

An Orthodox newspaper of large circulation and wide influence has told us that "the Puritan Sabbath is not threatened, not going, but gone." The clergy, however, will make desperate efforts to recover it, in view of the hold upon the people thus afforded them. Ministers are men, and the need of dutiful attendance by the people on their ministrations is as great to them as of clients to a lawyer or of customers to a shopkeeper. Finding that a popular conviction that church-going is a duty is indispensable to the continuance of their influence, they first manufacture the duty, and then manufacture a Scriptural warrant for it; and their systematic use of these misrepresentations has so befogged the minds of their people that not one church member in ten understands the teaching of either Hebrew or Christian scripture in regard to Sabbatical observance. Not one in ten of them understands that the Old Testament specifies Saturday as the obligatory time for the weekly Sabbath, or that the New Testament, leaving the observance of that day optional to each individual, neither enjoins nor recommends the observance of any other day.

In contrast with these attempts to limit freedom of conscience and freedom of conscientious action, it is interesting to note the advance of intelligence outside the Church, and the movements in accordance with it, on both sides of the Atlantic. I have before me No. XVIII., Vol. V., of the Sunday Review, a handsome pamphlet of sixty-four pages, published quarterly by the "London Sunday Society," whose object is "to obtain the opening of Museums, Art Galleries, Libraries, and Gardens on Sundays." This society, among whose officers are not only many members of the nobility and names distinguished in literature, but also clergymen and ladies, has from time to time caused to be opened in London eleven separate art exhibitions, to all of which admission has had to be by ticket, in consequence of the large number of people wishing to visit them. The January number of the Sunday Review, announcing the opening on Sundays of still another gallery of oil paintings, gave notice that, on the reassembling of Parliament, the Sunday Society would press its claims upon both houses of the legislature by bringing forward the following resolution:—

That, inasmuch as all opposition to the action of Her Majesty's Government in opening on Sundays the national museums and galleries in the suburban districts of London and in Dublin has entirely ceased, owing to the good results which have followed such opening, this House is of opinion that the time has now arrived for extending this action to all institutions of a like character, it having been most conclusively shown that large numbers of the people rejoice in every opportunity that is afforded them of spending Sunday intelligently, and with due regard for its preservation as a day of rest and cessation from ordinary work and amusement.

This resolution is signed by the Earl of Dunraven, President, and Mark H. Judge, Honorary Secretary, of the Sunday Society.

There is also in London the "Sunday Lecture Society," which began, in the autumn of 1880, a course of twenty-four lectures, to be delivered in St. George's Hall at 4 P.M. on Sundays. These lectures have been given by competent writers, on various subjects of public interest, scientific, philosophical, theological, historical, and political; and a large number of them were printed after delivery.

"The Sunday Evening Association" has also been formed in London, which "aims at bringing together on a common platform all those who are willing to cooperate on a liberal religious basis, outside all questions of theology, for the practical object of promoting and arranging on Sunday evenings meetings of an instructive, entertaining, and social character." Music, readings, and exhibitions of pictures and other interesting objects will be the prominent attractions of these evenings, which will be free to the public.

There is also a "Glasgow Sunday Society," for the same purposes as the London one above mentioned. Not only eminent citizens of Glasgow, but clergymen, took active part in its opening meeting last October; and a large number of ladies showed their interest in the movement by attending.

These movements abroad certainly ought to stimulate us to greater activity here in Boston in utilizing the leisure of Sunday, by devising cheap and salutary methods of recreation for the vast numbers who need it. The Sunday Review ought to have a place in our public reading-rooms. Trübner & Co. are the London publishers.

C. K. W.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

ROBERT OWEN.

In making our way in great reformatory ideas, and emancipating ourselves from the shackles of superstition, we must not forget those who bore the burden and heat of the day. In 1835, I received from Robert Owen, directed by the trembling hand of eighty-seven years, a copy of his last public address to the people. It was given in London, May 14, 1835, on the occasion of his birthday, when he was met by a large and most enthusiastic audience. His fine apostolic appearance, benignant countenance, excellent health, and unimpaired mental vigor presented an aspect at once interesting and impressive. His sense of hearing and of eyesight alone had felt the touch of time, and to these he feelingly alluded in opening his address.

Robert Owen was born in 1770, two years before Charles Fourier. Minds of character do not come singly, but are twin-born in groups and pairs. Thus do they find helpers in their work. Jeremy Bentham, also, Fourier, and Owen, all stamped by the same progressive ideas, came together; and each strenuously presented opinions of government, new comparatively then, but largely advocated in our day. They believed in a social and political equality of the sexes. John Neal was for several years domesticated with Jeremy Bentham, and on his return from England to his native place, Portland, Me., in his brilliant conversation and public speeches, advocated the same doctrine, and gave it its first impulse in this country.

This address of Robert Owen is written in that terse, straightforward style sure to rivet attention and fix ideas in the mind. He had lost none of his early faith in the better development of man, better social relations, better legislation, and the final ameliorationof human conditions. He inveighs boldly against the venality and imbecility of rulers, and the ignorance and inertness of the governed, and the superstitions that bar the way to progress.

It is well known that the religious opinions of Robert Owen became somewhat modified the last years of his life, and the sect known as Spiritists have claimed him as one of their number. Judging from his own exposition of his faith, he would rather belong to the kind of Pantheism which Wordsworth has done so much to infuse into the popular mind through his poetry. Robert Dale Owen was a true Spiritist, I believe. I make the following extract in which Robert Owen sums up his religious belief:—

In conclusion, I have explained that all things throughout the universe are composed of elements eternally existing, uncaused, uncreated, and possessing inherent, unchanging qualities,—qualities which, in the aggregate, form the brain or supreme mind of the universe; that these divine elements, with their separate and united qualities, are called Nature, and their qualities laws of Nature; that the aggregate compound of these divine qualities are the Godhead or supreme mind of the universe, possessing all power to create and control these quali ies by uniting, disuniting, and reuniting them; that the evident object of the supreme mind of Nature in the creation is to produce the greatest amount of happiness throughout the universe with the least evil or pain and suffering that the unchanging laws of the original elements will admit, and ultimately the harmony of the universe; that all that is valuable in what is called religion, morals, duties, etc., is for man to do good to man, and to show mercy and kindness to all that have life; that it is not God who creates evil, but it is the inherent laws of Nature, in their progress to attain great permanent good, which make partial and temporary evil necessary.

In this his last statement of ideas, his legacy to a world he is about to leave, we have the subtile conclusions of a mind that has lost none of its power, nor the hopes of a beneficent and aspiring manhood. His words, like those of Theodore Parker, have much of the prophet about them, and that fine enthusiasm out of which is evolved the best theories for the elevation of our humanity.

The following is his tribute and appeal to the people of our country:—

Little do the population of the United States yet imagine that they have a much greater step to achieve than they have yet effected before they can make themselves permanently the most advanced and powerful empire on the globe. They must introduce the rational system for forming a superior character for each of their citizens from birth, with new conditions for creating and distributing wealth. If they have now sufficient wisdom to "go ahead" of other nations in these respects, they will make it the obvious interest of all other populations to be annexed as additional independent States to the States already united.

ELIZABETH OAKES SMITH.

PATCHOGUE, L.I.

THE VALUE OF THE WHOLE BIBLE.

Mr. Editor:—

After reading your editorial in the issue of the Free Religious Index of March 31, it is impossible not to take exception, with my pen, to some of the statements therein. You will, I trust, excuse this expression of a contrary opinion.

The "figures" you have given in regard to Bible-making do indeed "furnish food for reflection"; and does not the fact you state, that "more than a million copies of the Bible are printed in the English language every year, and that it has been translated into two hundred and twenty-six different languages and dialects," prove there must be an enormous demand for these books? It is evident they are not, like some material commodities, a drug in the market; neither is it likely that Bibles would be bought at such a rate, were your opinion widely received, that "the portions of the Bible, taking Old and New Testaments together, which are of real value for moral or spiritual use, are not more than one-hundredth part of the whole."

From a business view, taking your nominal estimate of "one dollar per copy," think you that the buyers would be content to pay ninety-nine cents for waste paper, for the sake of getting their fractional one-hundredth part of spiritual value?

In connection, you say, "Those people who read the Bible because they believe it given by special inspiration from God, if they read with true spiritual discernment and for spiritual profit, read only a comparatively small part of it." I do not know the extent of the personal experience from which, it is naturally supposed, you draw your deductions; but, I venture to affirm, it is a narrow one. It has not been my own, in a varied experience East, West, South-east, South-west. On the contrary, it is, year by year, more and more a matter of pleasure to learn, as I do learn, of the study and investigation of the Scriptures, alike of its embodied history, prophecy, gospel, and revelation. It also appears from history that the Inspired Word was highly appreciated three hundred years ago, when books, and ability to read them, were not as common as in our day. Luther's complete translation of the Old and New Testaments came out in 1534, and was sold for forty successive years, at the average rate of two thousand five hundred copies per year, by one bookseller alone,—proof of its worth and appreciation.

You speak of selecting out those "portions" which constitute "the small part,"—the fractional one-hundredth, I suppose,—"to be printed in a volume by themselves," and say "we should (then) have all that is requisite for general circulation." The Book of Psalms we do have by itself, and the New Testament, perhaps the Book of Proverbs for hand or pocket use; but who is to define these "portions" you so confidently speak of, and cast away the rest? After the acceptance of the Sacred Writings by the Christian nations of the world for eighteen hundred years, who will now venture to rise up and cast out, as unnecessary, any of the truths therein contained?

You imply that this is a "superstitious belief," but ours is not an age of "superstition," but of increasing enlightenment; and the millions of intelligent readers of the Scriptures, everywhere scattered over the earth, bear witness to the fact. Neither is it with such, as you unqualifiedly state, "an idol, a fetich,"—such a statement is not worth controverting; but, when you say, "It is time that the highest civilization of the world should have advanced beyond the idea that it is necessary for the salvation of mankind to reprint, by the million copies every year, every book, chapter, and verse of King James' Bible," I may be pardoned for quoting for your benefit one bit out of that same despised Book, which is not destitute of present application: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." (I. Cor. ii., 14.)

* * *

[Of course there is a "demand" for the Bible. But it is not to be admitted that it is wholly a natural demand. It is largely an artificial demand created by the superstitious beliefs about the Bible. Nor yet does the entire million of Bibles printed each year find a "market," according to a business view. Large numbers are printed by the Bible societies to give away. That many thousands of excellent people are still reading the Bible through by chapter and verse as a religious duty is only additional proof of the enormous waste of mental and moral power caused by the superstitious regard for the book. We must be permitted to say that the people who thus read the whole of the Bible for religious or moral profit do not read with "true spiritual discernment"; and, if our correspondent does not agree to this, we can only reply by the gentle reminder (the old-fashioned last resort of Evangelical argument) with which her own communication closes. See I. Cor. ii., 14.—ED.]

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

GASPARD DE COLIGNY. The Failure of the French Reformation. With a portrait. By Walter Besant, M.A. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

If it be true, as very certainly it is, that great lives and achievements do not belong to any single age, but are common to all history, there should be as abundant resources for The New Plutarch here offered as there were for the old one. The above volume is the second of the series of issues by the Messrs. Putnams under this title. It is designed to present at brief intervals a succession of attractive and tasteful biographies, at the low price of $1.00 per volume, of the most conspicuous or memorable representatives of remarkable periods of history. The volume before us gives a succinct and graphic sketch of the rise of Protestantism in France, from the first glimmerings of its dawn in the preaching of Lefèvere, the precursor of Luther and Farel, and like signs of the breaking day, until it ultimately went out in the persecutions of the Huguenots and the blackness of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The failure of the Protestant reformation in France, the author considers to be chiefly due to the fact that its great scholars and divines held aloof from it, while in England the case was wholly opposite. Amid the corruption, intrigue, bigotry, and hopelessness of the latter portion of this clouded and troubled time, no one shone forth with so commanding virtue or lofty singleness of purpose as the brave Marquis de Chatillon, Admiral of France. He was the brain and heart of the Protestant cause during his lifetime. In him centred all the hope and faith of its confessors, and with his death whatsoever union or strength there was in their movement seemed irrecoverably broken and dissipated. But Coligny was not only a religious leader and reformer of high-minded, self-denying, and inflexible devotion, a stern moralist and an accomplished and courtly gentleman, but also a brave soldier and the projector of some of the more humane and advanced ideas in connection with modern warfare. He had especial power as a military organizer. Indeed, he is credited with being "the first general in modern times who perceived the enormous advantage of having a disciplined instead of a disorderly infantry." The army hospital, surgical service, and ambulance corps owe their origin to him. Furthermore, unlike military commanders of his time or since, as a rule, we are told, he "studied economy of expenditure, and—a thing which he alone of all the captains in his time looked after—took precaution to protect the poor, so that none should be robbed or despoiled." Sad indeed was it that France could not have had a true appreciation of this great and noble man, the greatest and best of his time, if not in all her annals, who had in him such possibilities of grand service to her, which then she so much needed. But, unhappily, intolerance, conspiracy, and crime under the leadership of the house of Lorraine, the queen-mother of the boy-king Charles, the Pope and his allies, were in the ascendency, and determined to crush out the incorruptible heretic and his party. There seemed one sure way of accomplishing this beyond all peradventure,—by the dagger. "It was Guise who arranged the details, and reported on Saturday evening that all was ready. Every good Catholic was to be known by a strip of white linen round his arm and a white cross in his hat.... The great bell of St. Germain l'Auxerrois began to toll. It was two o'clock in the morning. And then the streets of the sleeping city, quiet in the warm air of an August night, became suddenly filled with armed men, crying, 'For God and the King.'... Coligny was awake. His minister Merlin was praying with him. A valet rushed into the room. 'Sir,' he cried, 'the house is broken open, and there are no means of resistance.' 'I have long been prepared to die,' answered the Admiral. 'Save your lives, if you can: you cannot save mine. I commend my soul to the mercy of God.' . . . The first who entered was one Besme, a servant of the Duke's. 'Are you the Admiral?' he asked. 'I am,' replied Coligny. Then, looking in the face of his assassin, he said calmly, 'Young man, you ought to consider my age and my infirmity. But you will not make my life shorter,' meaning that he was already by reason of his wounds at the point of death. Besme plunged the sword into his breast, and gave him a second blow upon the head. The other soldiers who had crowded into the room despatched him with daggers. 'Besme, Besme,' cried the Duke of Guise from below, 'is it done?' 'It is done, my Lord,' answered the servant. . . . The Admiral was dead, and everywhere those who were the enemies of Protestantism and the enemies of France rejoiced." O Religion, how many crimes have been committed in thy name!

Digitized by Google

BELIEF IN GOD: An Examination of some Fundamental Theistic Problems. By M. J. Savage. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street.

The eight chapters of this little volume are eight Sunday morning discourses at the Church of the Unity, Boston. This is the congregation to which, as is well known, the author preaches a very live and practical gospel. The subjects of this particular series of sermons are as follows: "Origin and Development of the Idea of God"; "Does God exist?" "Can we know God?" "Is God Conscious, Personal, and Good?" "Why does not God reveal himself?" "Shall we worship God?" "Shall we pray to God?" "The Glory and the Shame of Atheism." To these is added an address on "The Intellectual Basis of Faith," by W. H. Savage, brother of M. J. The larger congregation to which these utterances now go will be warmly interested in them, as a frank and manly attempt, inside the recognized Unitarian Pulpit, to deal with the questions concerned in a thoroughly natural way. Mr. Savage says in his preface, what of course all who know him or of him would expect him to say, that the scientific method in its broadest sense is the only one by which truth is to be attained, and, therefore, that he has attempted to avoid all assumption. We think the candid reader will admit that he has succeeded better than most of us do in this respect. After an education which has filled us with prejudices, it is no small undertaking to cast them all aside. No one succeeds absolutely in so doing, but few approximate success. A sentence or two from the closing discourse, "The Glory and the Shame of Atheism," will show the naturalness and breadth of Mr. Savage's treatment of the whole subject. For example, he says, "In the nature of things, so far as the thought of man is concerned, God can be only an ideal; and he may be nothing more than an idol. If only a traditional image,—whether in the mind or out of it,—an idol; if framed of all fresh, living, and advancing thought, still only an ideal,"—which seems to us a very fine philosophical statement of the exact truth. The atheist, he affirms, is simply the man who rejects the popular ideal, which, when men do not understand that it is only an ideal, becomes to them an idol. Find any man, he says, that marks an epoch of religious advance, and you stand face to face with such an atheist. And what could be better than this? "Real atheism is weakness and despair, a lone battle against the nature of things. Theism is a recognition of the laws and forces of the world, and a conscious union with them in working out some worthy destiny. This is life and strength and eternal hope." The discourse entitled "Shall we pray to Him?" is the one of this series perhaps most likely to excite criticism both among conservatives and radicals. We understand the author to say in substance that prayer is a longing for something unattained, it is "the soul's sincere desire." Speaking of public prayer, he says: "The ideal prayer is simply a sympathetic voicing of the common aspirations and the common needs. This seems entirely consistent with the definition of God already quoted as an ideal in the thought of man. And yet owing to the fault of our language or to a lack of clearness either in the author's expression, or our understanding, of his meaning, we are not sure that he "sticks" to this view. The title "Shall we pray to Him?" and the reference to those who make prayer simply an expression of soul-longing for the ideal, we confess, leave us in doubt. Concerning this latter point, he says of the many who reject prayer in the popular sense, "If they are in the pulpit, they have dropped it from their public service, or, in place of it, they have substituted a sort of monologue addressed to nobody,—unless to the audience,—or an apostrophe to the universe in general, with no idea that anybody hears, or that anything is to come of it." Now, it seems to us that if, so far as the thought of man is concerned, God is an ideal, and if prayer is simply a longing of the human soul for the true, the beautiful, the good, then prayer to God is simply the longing, the feeling after the ideal truth, beauty, goodness, which is precisely what this "monologue addressed to nobody" is intended to express. So far as the use of the masculine pronoun is concerned, in view of the difficulties of our language, it is perhaps hardly fair to criticise it; and yet we believe the idea of a male God and everything which strengthens it has worked infinite mischief in the world, and is really held untenable in many cases where words would indicate the contrary. This book, wherever read, will be an inspiration to healthy thought and practical righteousness; and what higher commendation could it ask or need than that?

THE IRISH LAND QUESTION. By Henry George. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

This is a vigorous discussion of the principles involved in the present conflict between Ireland and England. The author claims that he treats not merely of a local question, but of one involving the great problem of the distribution of wealth the world over. It can only be settled, in his opinion, by measures of universal application, and upon the basis of an acknowledgment of equal rights to land. In and through this contest, we shall come nearer "the full freedom of each, bounded only by the equal freedom of every other; the equal right of each to the use and enjoyment of all natural opportunities, to all the essentials of happy, healthful, human life; and that sympathy which links together those who struggle in a noble cause, that would help as well as be helped, that, in seeking the good of all, would find the highest good of each."

IN a recently received number of the Revue de Belgique, we find a lengthy and appreciative paper upon "Theodore Parker: a Prophet of Modern Times," by Count Goblet d'Alviella. The article is based upon a new Life of Parker, just issued in the French language by Henri Testard. The main facts seem to have been carefully presented. We even find affectionate allusion to the little West Roxbury Society, and the full story of the ambitious boy who worked his way through Harvard in the leisure hours of country school-teaching. The quarrel with the Unitarian Association, in the progress of which some men in that grave body proposed to disband and reorganize in order to get rid of the obnoxious Parker, is also delineated. Even the dying words of the heroic worker to Frances Power Cobbe, "There are two Theodore Parkers now. One is dying here in Italy, the other I have planted in America," are given in graceful French. Count d'Alviella differs (and with justice) from M. Testard in attributing the philosophic leading of Parker to Kant instead of to Locke. It is hard to see how a careful author could have made such a mistake. Parker's theology was Kant's philosophy glorified and embodied. No one who has read both could mistake the identity. Count d'Alviella also acknowledges his indebtedness to Rev. O. B. Frothingham's "History of New England Transcendentalism" for a completer knowledge of his subject.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW for April contains Judge Tourgee's article on the "Civil Service," in which he objects to the present idea of Civil Service Reform, as likely to create an aristocracy of office-holders; a notable article by Bishop McQuaid on "Religion in Schools," in which he claims, among other things, that "no nation, not Christian in belief and morals, can flourish in our civilization, that knowledge does not lessen vice, that we forgot American traditions when religion was driven out of the schools, and that since the State has no religion, and cannot teach morals on the authority of divine truth, its incapacity to educate is beyond doubt,"—conclusions quite provocative of discussion, if we cannot subscribe to them all. The other essays are: "The Thing that Might be," by Mark Pattison; "The Ownership of Railroad Property," by George Ticknor Curtis; "The Historic Genesis of Protestantism," by John Fiske; "The Telegraph Monopoly," by William M. Springer; and "Henry Wadsworth Longfellow," by Anthony Trollope.

THE Art Amateur for April contains the usual variety of matter, especially interesting to all who are of the race whose generic title is borne by the magazine. The Boston letter contains a critical description of the principal works in the collection from the Demidoff sale, lately added to the Art Museum's treasures. The works of the Scotch landscape painter, Robert W. Macbeth, are described at length with illustrations. The several departments of "Ceramics," "Industrial Art," "Art Needlework," and "Decoration and Furniture" are profusely illustrated with engravings of a practical rather than artistic value.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE leader of the classes at Vassar College is a Japanese girl.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI, late prime minister of England, died at five o'clock, on Tuesday morning of this week.

F. A. HINCKLEY, of Providence, occupied the place of Professor Adler at Chickering Hall, New York, last Sunday.

THE memory of the late Dr. Le Moyne, the founder of the Pennsylvania crematory, is to be perpetuated by a monument.

IT is announced that some of the papers of Theodore Parker that were withheld from publication by his widow will now be given to the public.

THE highest salaries paid to New York city clergymen are $15,000 to Dr. John Hall and $12,000 each to Dr. Dix of Trinity Church and Dr. Potter of Grace Church. It is strange, but our Free Religious lecturers do not earn half of either of these sums.

MRS. ARNOLD, the wife of the author of The Light of Asia and grandniece of Dr. Channing, is an architect of distinction. She is superintending the making in London of the memorial window to be placed by the Channing family in the Channing Memorial Church at Newport.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS was almost mobbed, fifty years ago, in Vergennes, Vt., for attempting to disseminate abolition sentiments. Now, the county in which that town is located has a colored sheriff. The town itself has a French mayor and a young woman as town clerk.

MISS FANNY PARNELL, the sister of the Irish agitator, is to visit Boston as the guest of the Ladies' Land League. She will have a public reception in Music Hall on the evening of Sunday, the 8th of May. Addresses are to be given by Hon. P. A. Collins, J. Boyle O'Reilly, and others.

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE, a well-known friend and patron of the Index, whose purse always opens to the call of distress, generously contributes $100 to the suffering people of Chios. It would gratify Mr. Fiske if his gift might be the beginning of an Index fund in response to this touching appeal. We shall be pleased to act upon this suggestion, and pledge ourselves to the proper application of any donations received for this purpose.

GRENVILLE STANLEY HALL, Ph.D., who has been appointed Lecturer on Pedagogy and Philosophy at Harvard University, and began his lectures last month, fitted for college at Easthampton, graduated from Williams in 1867, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1869. From 1872 to 1876, he was Professor at Antioch College, Ohio, and afterward was instructor in English at Harvard for one year, taking the degree of Ph.D. here in 1878. Since that time, he has been in Europe, studying at Berlin, Leipzig, Dresden, Bremen, and elsewhere in Germany, as well as in Italy, France, and England.

BE TRUE.

Thou must be true thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
Ano her's soul wouldst reach:
It needs the overflow of heart
To give the lips full speech.

Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famine feed;
Speak truly, and each word of thine
Shall be a fruitful seed;
Live truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed.

HORATIUS BONAR.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 21, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

BOSTON art-lovers can see a life-size portrait in oils of the famous Norwegian poet and novelist, Björnson, now in this country, at the rooms of his artist countrywoman, Fraülein Hanstein, No. 36 Studio Building.

THE communication which holds the place of our long essay this week was a veritable letter from one mother to another.

A LAW THAT NEEDS REFORM.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has just given another decision under the Sunday Laws of the State, disclosing to the citizens of the State the fact that the old law forbidding travelling on what the statutes call "the Lord's Day" is still in force. The case on which this latest decision was rendered was a suit brought by Mr. Theodore P. Beecher against the Fitchburg Railroad Company, to recover damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff while travelling on the road of the company one Sunday in August of 1876.

Mr. Beecher had missed a connection which would have brought him to Boston on the evening of Saturday, and was obliged in consequence to stop over Sunday at some town on the way or take a freight train that would reach Boston Sunday noon. He chose the latter. The train he was on came into collision with another train a few miles west of Fitchburg on Sunday morning, and Mr. Beecher was injured. If it had been any other day, he doubtless would have been compensated for damages without the delay of a law-suit. But, it being Sunday, the eagle eye of the corporation saw a chance to escape paying anything to their maltreated passenger. But Mr. Beecher thought he had a case against the corporation on the ground that his journey was one of "necessity or charity,"—the only occasions the law allows as valid for travelling on Sunday,—and hence he brought the suit. He showed that his only object in going to Boston at the time was to meet and care for a sick sister who was to arrive from Minnesota,—this and the incidental business of getting his mails and some funds were the only things he had to attend to there. On this plea, the case was taken to court and given to a jury. The jury thought the plea valid, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff. The defending corporation, however, entered exceptions against the decision, and took the case to the full bench of the Supreme Court. The court has now sustained the exceptions, averring in its decision that "there was no evidence which would justify a jury in finding that the plaintiff was travelling from necessity or charity, within the meaning of the statute."

Another legal feature of the case was that, if Mr. Beecher had met with his accident a few months later, he might have recovered damages. The Legislature of Massachusetts in the session of 1877 added a new provision to the section of the Sunday law which forbids travelling on that day except from necessity or charity, this new provision expressly preventing "common carriers" of passengers from setting up a defence against an action for personal damages on the ground that the person injured was travelling on Sunday in violation of law. But, of course, the courts both decided that this amendment was not retrospective in operation, however strongly it might indicate what equity required in the case.

Nor did this amendment at all change the statute. It only ameliorated some of the previous harsh results of the statute in certain cases. It simply said that where two parties were equally violating this law, and in the act one of the parties suffered at the hands of the other, the party actually responsible for the injury shall not escape legal responsibility by pleading that the other party was a law-breaker. But the statute with regard to travelling on Sunday remained precisely as before, all travelling on that day except from necessity or charity being declared illegal. Nor was the equitable principle which dictated the amendment of 1877 extended, as in consistency it ought to have been, to other modes of injury than those sustained at the hands of "common carriers." It is not many months since the same Supreme Court decided that a plaintiff who had brought suit against a town to recover damages for personal injuries received because of defect in a town highway could not recover, because, though the defect was proved and the severe injury was proved, the plaintiff was travelling on the highway on Sunday, and was not travelling from necessity or charity. If the accident had occurred at the same place from the same cause on any other day, the town would have had to compensate the man for the injury; but, since it happened on Sunday, the town escaped the proper retribution for its own criminal negligence. If the Sunday law be a just and proper law, one that ought to be on the statute-book at all, then what the State should have done in this case was to arrest and punish the man, as the law provides, for taking a walk of recreation on that day, and also to have let the law take its course in mulcting the town for keeping a dangerous highway. That the plaintiff was violating one law should not have absolved the town from any of its liabilities for violating another law. According to the principles of the decision in this case, both the man and the town went free from the penalty attached to the laws which they really violated, while the man suffered in consequence, not of his own violation of law, but of the town's violation of law. This, surely, is not the attainment of that social equity and order which it is the aim of law in a civilized State to reach.

The present session of the Massachusetts Legislature has made a slight amendment in the Sunday law, so as to legalize the running of express trains from points out of the State through to their destination. But this is only to adopt as law what had already become a custom; and probably the State would not have done this, had it not been driven to it on account of its ownership in the Hoosac tunnel: it was put to the dilemma of either violating its own statute-book or changing the statute-book so as to compete for business with rival roads. The Legislature would have done well, if it had gone still further in the insertion of custom into the statute-book.

The whole antiquated Sunday law needs a thorough revision. The law as it stands is a legal and moral disgrace to the State. It is a legal disgrace, because it is so far behind the recognized and accorded demands of society to-day that it is constantly violated by all classes of citizens; and also because the courts, when compelled to act upon it, must needs give judgment in violation of the plain principles of justice, equity, and even of charity. It is a moral disgrace, because it directly seduces people to do mean and dishonorable things. The Fitchburg Railroad Company would have compensated Mr. Beecher without any quibbling, if he had been injured on Saturday. They were just as much responsible for the same kind of injury on Sunday. He would not have been thus injured, if he had not made the journey; and he could not have made the journey, if they had not enabled him to do it by running their train. He would not have violated the Sunday law but for their violating it. And then, after he had committed himself to their train and been injured, for them to turn round and tell him he was a Sunday-law breaker, and could not therefore be compensated for the harm they had done him, is the very essence of meanness. Fair-minded, honorable men would not be led to such dishonorable subterfuges, were it not for the debasing opportunity offered by the Sunday laws. Nor would honorable selectmen of towns seek to escape from compensating for an injury proved to be the result of a neglected road under their charge, because the injury happened on the last hour of Sunday rather than the first hour of Monday, were it not for the enticement offered to such iniquitous meanness by the traditional sanctity of the Sunday statutes. It may be added that these laws are equally a religious disgrace,—for the reason that they stand in the name of religion, and yet are constantly violated, directly or indirectly, by all classes of religious people. Legislators who are afraid to amend them, judges whose business it is to interpret and enforce them, executive officers who have to administer them, professors of religion who claim them to be the law of God, are all implicated in the practical violation of them. They are an anachronism which the civilization of the age is slowly reducing to proper adjustment; but, so long as they stand, they are able to produce in law practical injustice, in morals trickery and meanness, in religion hypocrisy.

IN MEMORIAM.

Lydia D. Parker, Aged 67, April 9, 1881.

The death of Mrs. Parker seems to sever the last personal link which bound us to the great man whose life and whose name are inseparably bound up with hers. We can no longer make a pilgrimage to his home, and see again the familiar objects which brought his image always so freshly before us: henceforth they are alike enshrined in our memories and our hearts.

Mrs. Parker's own rare qualities of heart and soul would have made her beloved in any station in life, but her tender delicacy and timid conscientiousness would probably have kept her from any position which would have brought her into general notice but for her union with one so widely known and revered.

Digitized by Google

Lydia Cabot was one of his early pupils; and we can well imagine how her purity, docility, and sweetness won his regard in that relation. He loved to dwell upon the happy days of courtship, and to describe the walk out to Watertown to see her, after the day's study at Cambridge was over. "Very short miles they were," he said once, as he thought how swiftly his heart o'erleaped the distance. She was early adopted by an aunt who brought her up very carefully, and to whom as well as to her own parents she rendered the loving service of a daughter through all the infirmities of old age. With this aunt the young couple lived during Mr. Parker's ministry at West Roxbury, and she came with them to the new home in Boston. Mrs. Parker was faithful to all the ordinary duties of domestic life, and made her home a centre of hospitality to all Mr. Parker's friends. Her careful economy was shown when she first went to Europe with Mr. Parker, when it was said that during a year's absence she bought for herself nothing but a bonnet and a pair of gloves. Without possessing the intellectual powers of her husband, she had much of that fine intuitive perception which comes from perfect truth and purity. He often spoke of her fine perception of character. "I think I have some knowledge of human nature," he said; "but my feeling of character compared to hers is like the clumsy hoof of an ox to the delicate sense of the human fingers."

Her extreme conscientiousness made her timid in action, but there was a rare courage in her perfect truth and in the unshaken faith with which she stood by her husband's side through all his trials. Her truthfulness was so perfect that it did not admit of a doubt; and it gave a beautiful transparency of character, which was mirrored in her face. Yet she never made the truth a ground for being harsh or rude. She was most gentle and careful of others' feelings. At a Bible Class meeting, the common moral problem was discussed, "Is it ever right to depart from the exact truth?" Mr. Parker asked the opinion of each of the class in turn, when she only said, "You know what I think," which we did without any doubt. We might dwell long on these traits of one so "tender and true"; but it seems hopeless to paint a portrait where the lines are so delicate and subtile. A beautiful sweet strain of love and purity blends always with the deeper, stronger music of Theodore Parker's life; and it makes that perfect harmony which was so rich and satisfactory.

It was a great grief to Mrs. Parker never to have known the blessing of motherhood, for which she seemed so especially fitted; but, during her husband's life, she gave a mother's love and care to an orphan relative, and, after his death, she found great happiness in adopting a young girl in whose development she took the greatest interest and pleasure.

So farewell, rare, sweet spirit. It is not hard to think of thee in an angelic company and reunited to the dearly loved who have gone before. May the fragrance of thy life here long linger in our hearts!

E. D. C.

ALEXANDER II.

Mr. Wasson is kind enough to warn me, in terms apparently intended for some orthodox newspaper, that I have entered upon the road to hell in saying that I can neither praise nor blame the Nihilists, and that I appeal to the future to show whether they have really served liberty. It seems to me that good results did follow from the assassination of the Emperor Paul, as well as from that of Caligula, Commodus, and Domitian, the death of the last making way for Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, Marcus Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius. Of course, people who can defend their rights legally have no excuse for resorting to violence; but I cannot see how the subjects of a despot who is supported by such an army, such a police, and such a peasantry as the Russian, can resist oppression except by assassination. As for the extravagance of the Nihilists, this only shows that they have been under a ruler who should not be compared with Abraham Lincoln or Marcus Aurelius, as is done by Mr. Wasson.

Rulers famous for humanity should not be compared to a tyrant who had fifty thousand men, women, and children transported to Siberia, executed, and tortured to death in the last four years. I am asked for specific instances in which the Russian Government has seized upon the wrong man. I do not wish to make out a long list of horrors, but will merely mention that as long ago as 1861 three hundred students were imprisoned at St. Petersburg for protesting against a change of university regulations, and that on Sept. 23, 1876, a young girl, named Alexandra Boutouska, was condemned to four years of hard labor, on an unproved charge of having circulated prohibited books.

F. M. Holland.

THE INSOLENCE OF IGNORANCE.

The Canadian Spectator, published at Montreal and edited by a Rev. Mr. Bray,—who has been replying to the writer's recent lectures in that city,—contains an article on "George Eliot, the Novelist." Of the works of this great author, so justly renowned for her genius and the purity of the lessons she inculcates, this article says that "the whole bent of her supposed moral teachings leads to the idea that virtue can be obtained in, and by means of, a previous career of vice." Of Felix Holt, it says, "Its aim, if it has any, is plainly to pander to the lower plane of our being, by picturing to us our own baser passions in a palatable or, at least, excusable form." Another of the great author's works is represented as full of "weak-minded vanity." Her genius is that "of the ragpicker which turns over the refuse of human character and forms its selections into a tissue of conclusions apparently white and pure, yet capable of conveying any kind of evil impression." Her works will be "as evanescent as the state of society which rendered their production possible, and their temporary fame a thing for which the nineteenth century does not yet blush. That it will learn to blush for the fame it has accorded George Eliot, the Novelist, is beyond doubt."

And the above is given apparently as a serious literary judgment.

B. F. U.

SCIENCE NOTE.

Professor Graham Bell's wonderful invention, the photophone, and the experiments made by him and Mr. Tainter with regard to the sound-giving properties of selenium and other substances when subjected to the influence of intermittent beams of light, have already proved to be the germ of numerous investigations and practical suggestions, and of some important discoveries. It has already been suggested, for instance, that selenium be used for the automatic registry of star transits, and for photometric purposes, to improve the existing scale of star magnitudes, and to watch any variations therein. Again, Mr. Mercadier, of Paris, has published the results of some very careful researches made by him regarding the nature of radiophony, as he proposes to call the new subject. The last of Mr. Mercadier's results is that "radiophonic effects appear to be produced principally by radiations of great wave-length, or those commonly regarded as calorific." This conclusion agrees with numerous experiments made by Professor Tyndall, who has been experimenting upon the production of sounds by the action of an intermittent beam of radiant heat upon gaseous matter. We regret that we cannot give a full account of Professor Tyndall's deeply interesting experiments. He succeeded in obtaining sounds from numerous different gases and vapors. He used at first a Siemen's lamp and silvered mirrors, then a lime light with mirrors, then a common candle-flame with mirrors, then a candle without the aid of mirrors, then a red-hot coal, then a red-hot poker, and finally a poker of a temperature below that of boiling water. With even this last, he procured musical tones from his flasks of gas and vapor. He found that gases emit sounds in direct proportion to their ability to absorb radiant heat. Practically, he proposes already to turn his experiments to account in the detection of marsh-gas in mines. And, lastly, we may mention the fact that Professors Ayrton and Perry are now constructing an apparatus for "seeing by electricity." They propose to transmit, electrically, pictures even of moving objects, by the use of selenium and beams of light.

R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

During the year 1880, fifteen thousand children under five years of age died in New York city. Some years as high as thirty per cent. of the children born there die the first year, and ten per cent. during the second. This rate of mortality will not hold so high throughout the country; but it is so great as to be alarming, if we were accustomed to give any heed to such matters. The Scientific American mentions the present discussion of the mortality among hogs, and says if it were so great as among children the newspapers would be full of discussions of causes and means of prevention. "The terrible and needless loss of life among children," it says, "is not confined to our cities. The mortality is excessive throughout the country. The ignorance of people with regard to the proper care and feeding of children is simply appalling; and the indifference commonly manifested with respect to the spread of infectious diseases among children, especially in rural districts, is not unfrequently murderous. A man living in a healthy country will take no discredit to himself,—will rather think himself a proper subject for sympathetic commiseration,—when he confesses that he has buried five out of six children or eight out of ten. If he were to have no better 'luck' with his colts and calves, his neighbors would probably organize, for the benefit of his stock, a local society for the prevention of cruelty to animals."

A meeting has recently been held in Boston in behalf of the education of Indians at Hampton and Carlisle. A considerable sum of money was raised to carry on that work, and a new interest was awakened in the subject. Among those who spoke was Gen. Miles, who said of the work to be done that it may "be classified under three heads: first, education; second, the encouragement of industrial habits; and, third, the application of that knowledge to their social and domestic life. The principal reason for their education is to enable us to communicate with them and them with us. It is impossible to do it with interpreters intelligibly. Great evils have resulted from the want of direct communication between us and them. Remove that barrier, and you open to them the light of the civilized world. Next teach them industrial habits; teach them to live as white people, because they know nothing about it now. It is a mystery to them. And this can be done. It has been tried, and it has succeeded. To-day there are between five and six hundred Indians on the banks of the Yellowstone many of whom, four years ago, had never taken the hand of a white man. They were as wild as any Indian on this continent, but for three years they have sustained themselves by their own industry; and it is not unusual to see warriors who were engaged in the Custer massacre holding a plough, or driving a team and earning their own living." A very interesting account was given by Gen. Armstrong of the first attempt at Hampton to educate Indian boys. He said: "The Hampton work for the Indians is not based upon theory, but upon fact. Those seventeen Indian boys, the pick of the worst-fighting Indians of the plains, were very much changed. They came to Hampton because they begged to remain East to get an education, and because there was no other place where they could go and get that kind of training and civilization they needed. After a few months' training, eleven of them were admitted to the Christian church connected with the school, and three or four to the Episcopal church in the adjoining village. Most of them returned to their homes; four died; two went back to the blackest barbarism; the rest, except two who remained at Carlisle, are at home, exerting a good influence, industrious, and proving themselves to be worthy men. That is more than half: that is a promising result for a first trial. There are henceforth to be a hundred Indians at Hampton and three hundred at Carlisle; and, if this can be kept up for a few years, there will be a radical change in the condition of the tribes. The results reached are that the Indians can in two years and a half acquire our language, and in three years the basis of intelligent ideas of life. Those who remain at Hampton or Carlisle three years will go back fitted to enter into the grooves of Indian life, and to raise those around them up to themselves. The Indians have keen memories; their intelligence is remarkable; they are not heathen in any sense of the word. At first, it was difficult to get their girls to educate: now, Hampton is flooded with applications for their admission. They easily fall into our ways; they have respect for our higher ideas of living; they have strong moral characters. Their weak side is the physical: the educated Indian has died. Our death-rate has been serious, but in all cases death has been caused by disease contracted before they came to us. What can they do? They cannot do much at first: it takes about two years for an Indian to get to work ten hours a day. They work slowly, but they work very nicely; and they are learning to work, in spite of the race prejudice that brands the man who works like a squaw." These facts, thus presented by two men who know whereof they speak, we consider full of promise. They show a better public sentiment in regard to the Indians, and give indication that better methods will be employed in dealing with them in the future. The government seems to be taking a new interest in the subject. Besides the schools at Hampton and Carlisle, there is one at Forest Grove, Or., where elementary English branches, agriculture, mechanical trades, and housework are taught. An experiment is also now being tried in North Carolina, where thirty-six young Cherokees are being educated in country boarding-schools.

Digitized by Google

In a letter to a gentleman in Taunton, Robert Treat Paine, who is at the head of the Boston public charities, suggests some things that may be done for the help of the pauper class. We like his suggestions, because they apply quite as well to a village or town as to a large city. The principle of efficient charity is always the same. The special methods of the Associated Charities cannot be carried out except in large cities, but the work of genuine help can be done anywhere. Mr. Paine says that "pauperism is a disease which does not cure itself." It will not die out. It is contagious, and spreads rapidly. It is epidemic, and gets into low, unhealthy sections of cities, poisons the neighborhood and the air of all life that is near it. When the spirit and habits of pauperism have grown fixed, especially where a second or third generation of paupers have grown up, full of all the instincts of pauper and vicious life, all remedy seems well-nigh impossible. Any efficient remedy in any place, large or small, consists in a positive and persistent refusal to aid those who can labor, total suppression of giving at the door, sympathetic encouragement of those willing to help themselves, providing them with labor, and care for all who cannot care for themselves. This plan, followed up thoroughly by all the citizens of any locality, will finally effect a remedy; but the effort must be persistent and rigid. Sentimental charity must be as positively suppressed as possible, as being in itself one of the worst causes of the evil. Church charity is usually pernicious, because sentimental. The personal, friendly care for the poor can be carried into operation anywhere and without any organization. Mr. Paine points out what may be done, and his suggestions are worthy the most careful consideration of all who have to deal with the pauper class:—

I. Health.—1. A sick person can often be put in the way of cure. 2. Surgical treatment will often restore a man to work.

II. Home.—3. Aid a poor family to move out of damp cellars into sunny corners; 4. Out of dens of disease into healthier quarters; 5. Out of abodes of vice into purer streets; 6. Perhaps from city into country,—on to a farm; 7. Perhaps out West.

III. Work.—8. Aid a man to find or advise him where to seek it. 9. Aid a woman to find or advise her where to seek it. 10. Especially do this for the boys and girls when old enough to work. 11. Perhaps see that the girl or the mother goes to service. 12. Aid a mother with only one child to find a place for service in the country. 13. Aid a widow with children to support them by finding other children to take in and board. 14. A multitude of ways of aiding persons to find work can be found by long experience.

IV. Skill.—15. Aid to a woman to learn how to sew; 16. Or to be a laundress; 17. Or to scrub and clean paint; 18. Or to learn to be a hair-dresser; 19. Or a corn-doctor.

V. Setting up in Trade.—20. Even in a small way, it is easily done. This is very helpful.

VI. Economy.—21. Often much good can be done by showing a family how to economize and live on what they have; thus, by moving them from a $10 into a $4 tenement.

VII. Temperance.—22. The power of a visitor over persons prone to intemperance is often unexpected and grand.

VIII. Cheer.—23. In a multitude of cases, families are broken down with discouragement, and need only the cheer and inspiration of a friend to rise up and walk.

IX. Thrift.—24. A wise visitor can often be of vast use by teaching thrift; and, when earnings begin, making the family save and start a savings-bank book,—which is often a turning-point in life.

X. Children.—25. No words can tell the value of a true friend to a family of young children among our needy poor, teaching them neatness, virtue, and self-respect, and training them into good citizens and good men and women. Save the children.

G. W. C.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

Co-operative Emigration.

"The German and Irish millions, like the negro, have a great deal of guano in their destiny. They are ferried over the Atlantic and carted over America, to ditch and to drudge, to make corn cheap, and then to lie down prematurely to make a spot of green grass on the prairie." Let us hope this is a history of the past only. A more melancholy out-look for emigrants than these words of Emerson is scarcely conceivable. Yet the same may be said of the fate of the majority of pioneers of all nations hitherto, who have gone out to found their fortunes in new countries. Yet co-operative arrangements are possible which would diminish "guano" in the destiny of adventure, and delay the appearance of the "spot of green" on the prairie until it suited the emigrant that it should appear.

As these chapters may be read abroad, I conclude them with some passages from the report I made to the London Co-operative Guild at Exeter Hall early in 1880, shortly after my return from America. As application came for as many as four thousand copies of that statement for the use of working men in one district, after the sale of the Co-operative News, which alone contained it, was exhausted, it will clearly serve many readers if the chief statements are included here. Mr. Walter Morrison presided on the occasion. The Guild, which owes its existence to the genius and devotion of Mr. Hodgson Pratt, is the most generous department of co-operation, because its object is to extend the knowledge of that new principle of industry which introduces equity into all relations of labor, gives to workmen certainty of moderate competence, and affords capital advantages of which it need not be ashamed.

What I represented on that occasion was that it is by no act or inspiration of ours that our countrymen do emigrate. When emigration is a choice of those who have means, it is creditable to the enterprise of the nation; when it is a necessity of the poor, it is a disgrace to a community which does not know how to take care of its own people. To the needy, the friendless, and the ignorant, emigration is a terror: it is a forlorn adventure on untried existence. Few can conceive the misery of the long, isolated journey from homeland. With little means and less knowledge, the poor wanderer is often stripped of his slender store on the way, and never reaches his destination. Then he becomes an unwelcome addition to the workmen of large cities, who resent his intrusion, as by his desperate competition for employment he brings down wages, and helps to create the very same condition of things from which he has fled. Tossed about the unknown eddies of thronged labor markets, he soon sinks. Unless local, reluctant charity—reluctant because already overburdened—picks him up, his end is more deplorable than it would have been had he remained at home. This cry comes back to us from every great city. I heard it myself in New York, in Philadelphia, in Fall River, in Cincinnati and Chicago. The great centres of industry are as candles, which lure the helpless, light-pursed moths of labor to perish in their flames. Then how fares it with those whose means do hold out, and who do reach the prairies? I speak still of the poor emigrant. What knows the tailor, the shoemaker, the mechanic, the weaver, the jeweller, the clerk from the desk, or the assistant from behind the counter, of the agricultural life they have adventured upon? They know nothing of the soil, nor seasons, nor currents, nor climate. They do not know the crops when they see them, nor know how to cook the unfamiliar produce when they have raised it. They do not foresee the malaria which may leap from the newly turned soil, nor the ague that hides in the evening air. Far away it may be from human habitation, the wandering quack is the only physician of the solitary settler, the wandering Indian his only and often dubious visitor. His road to the nearest market is through pathless woods and unfathomed creeks. Over that trackless way, he must drag his produce, if he has any to sell; or carry his provisions, if he has money to buy any. He begins life anew, as though he were the first man turned out of Eden to seek subsistence in an untrodden land. He encounters isolation, dreariness, privation, and often despair, under which many sink; while those who hardily succeed generally become animalized in the determined struggle. The ordinary emigrant from England passes from the brightness, convenience, and abounding society of cities to the silence of the forest and the companionship of unknown creatures who beset or crawl in his path. His new destiny is to fight the sullen and fruitful wilderness, which accords him plenty if he conquers it, or gives him but a grave if he fails. It is of the nature of a merciful thing to mitigate the bitterness of this experience. Co-operation can smooth the path of this form of enterprise. It can collect families to go out together. It can procure them right information. It can provide a conductor on their passage out, and convey them to colony land, where houses are erected and provisions provided until crops can be raised; and it can supply a practical director until the settlers learn to take care of themselves. Co-operation can take the peril and uncertainty out of friendless adventure, and lend the charm of comfort and security to manly and industrial enterprise. So great are the unforeseen opportunities of free countries and cheap lands that even isolated emigrants—able to incur hardships with spirit and strength—continually succeed and attain to absolute opulence; but even they own that struggles which were avoidable, had organized emigration been available to them, have left savage or selfish marks upon their character, which it is the interest of society to prevent, if it be possible, in the future.

Digitized by Google

Articles published by General Mussey in the Sovereign Bulletin of Washington, on "Organized Colonization," are wise and comprehensive. The plan devised in New York by the Co-operative Colony Aid Association has for its object: to purchase land in a salubrious spot adjacent to a city, to arrange a park in the centre of the colony, erect a school-house for the education of the children, and a co-operative store to supply the provisions of the settlers; put up tenements for them to enter upon, and apportion farmholdings necessary for their subsistence; and so soon as the produce of an emigrant's labor has repaid all outlay on his account, to convey to him absolute possession of his allotted estate. In the mean time, a travelling agent may conduct groups of emigrants from the land where they embark to the colony, where a resident director will advise them in their employment until each colonist becomes the owner of his apportioned estate. The organizers of the colony intend to keep their aid clear alike from charity or profit. A return of a moderate interest upon the capital used, until it is repaid, is all they seek. The object of co-operation is to encourage self-help, and to assist it without patronage. Whether aims so sensible, so moderate, and so free from Utopianism as these can be carried out, remains to be seen.

It soon appeared to me that there was a Babel of land agents, and no authoritative voice among them. No emigrant settling out here, no emigrant arriving there, could tell to whom to listen or where to settle. Many agents were entirely honest, but few persons ordinarily accessible knew which was which. Choice of land was as much a lottery in New York as London. There was no standard by which to compare any man's statements; and no one knew all the thirty-seven States and Territories of America, or what Province to choose in the Dominion of Canada. No person, unless he was a very old man, could prudently advise an emigrant to go anywhere, since only such an adviser might hope to be dead before the emigrant wrote home to say that he had been sent to quite the wrong place. It seemed to me that a Government Book was wanted, setting forth the estimated quantities of land open to enterprise in every State to be had by purchase or gift, conditions of tenure, process of acquisition, arable quality, climate, sanitary peculiarities of the State, conditions of health as to exposure, diet, and clothing, markets for labor, and commodities near, facilities of transport of produce, and the purchasing power of money: this information would enable an emigrant to go out with his eyes open. Land agents may honestly be ignorant of many things; a government can be informed on all. Besides, a government can be trusted. It will, as a rule, neither lie nor exaggerate; and its summary of the facts of all States with which it is connected will enable any one to test generally the representations made by interested individuals.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

THE name of Vassar is to be even more indissolubly associated with that of Poughkeepsie, N.Y. The two brothers, Matthew and John Gay Vassar, are to put up a building for the literary and scientific societies of the town, which are to be united. A lot has been selected. The building will contain a museum, auditorium, and small laboratory.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

Underwood in Montreal.

Our city has been agitated in no slight degree during the last week by the presence of Mr. Underwood among us. He delivered four lectures, covering a large area of freethought territory, to numerically fair and exceedingly appreciative audiences.

Exactly one year previous, Ingersoll came upon us, and stormed the Orthodox stronghold with all the violence and vehemence that characterize his mode of attack. His was the first public assault of Christian theology that had ever startled the sleepy saints of this centre of Popery and Protestantism; and the immediate effect was twofold,—hilarious amusement to freethinkers, and consternation, anger, and pious curses among sound believers. It was a thunderblast that smote with merciless power the venerable creeds of all the sects, and marked, as with a red-hot brand, an epoch in the history of mental freedom in this Province.

Mr. Underwood came with a calmer countenance and a cooler utterance. The Colonel touched and convulsed our risibility,—taxed our sides more than our heads. Underwood appealed to our reason, caring but little for rhetorical display or ornate warmth of statement. The eloquence of the former was more immediately felt, the reasoning of the latter will be more widely remembered.

The change that has taken place here in public sentiment within the last twelve months is remarkable. Ingersoll found it difficult to obtain a hall for his lectures, and strenuous efforts were made by the clergy and others to choke him off. In the city council chamber, a prominent alderman gravely appealed to the Mayor for authority to arrest the "blasphemer" and prevent him from speaking. His zeal was not supported. To the credit of Montreal, let it be remembered that this bigoted attempt at suppression of free discussion was generally condemned, and some few of the clergymen denounced it from their pulpits. It is a notable fact that this same civic magnate, who aspired to be mayor at a recent election, was ignominiously defeated by a by no means popular French Canadian; and your correspondent has reason to know that he lost more votes than he ever dreamed of from his remembered attempt to muzzle Ingersoll. It was considered by many who were not "Infidels" that an enemy to freedom of speech was not a desirable person to be invested with the responsibility of chief magistrate of a great city like Montreal.

At the close of his course of lectures, Mr. Underwood gave a distinct challenge to the clergy to meet him in debate, if any felt so inclined; but no one was fool enough to risk his Orthodox brains in such an encounter. The advantage secured to liberal principles by Mr. Underwood's visit is exceedingly gratifying. The posters, handbills, letters, advertisements, and notices in the papers, announcing the lectures, and the public reports and private discussions that followed, aggregate an amount of seed-thought that cannot fail to yield, in due time, a golden harvest.

Two of the leading city papers, the Star and Herald, gave brief reports of the lectures; and, though these reports were but fragmentary sketches of the arguments advanced, their significance is gratifying, inasmuch as they mark the first venture in this Province to record the reasoning, in a fair and respectful manner, of an advocate of the broadest freethought opinions.

There are hundreds, if not thousands, of rationalists in this city, who are silent but thoughtful sympathizers in every advance made along the line of Liberalism. To this class, the Ingersolls and Underwoods of your country are always welcome, and it is pleasing to observe the change of countenance, suddenly suffused with a glow of sunny happiness, exhibited by these timid thinkers, when a champion of their inmost thoughts and clearest convictions appears upon the stage. I think it safe to affirm that half the Protestant population of our city are largely sceptical; but they are afraid to admit it even to themselves, much less to each other. They palter with their conscience and their reason, vaguely imagining that they can be rationalists and good Christians at the same time. Such is the inscrutable cast of mind in a people undergoing a transition from old and venerable beliefs to a new order of thought. In the mean time, it is wise and well to exercise patience, courtesy, and the utmost forbearance each to all. Yours truly,

CANADIAN.

LETTER FROM LAWRENCE, KANSAS.

The General Conference of Unitarians recently voted an appropriation of eight hundred dollars to the Unitarians of Lawrence, to enable them to secure the services of the Rev. C. G. Howland, for many years pastor of the Unitarian society in Kalamazoo, Mich. Mr. Howland will begin his work in Lawrence in April.

Unitarians have a very proper appreciation of the importance of establishing their churches in university towns. The University of Kansas is located in Lawrence, and has already nearly five hundred students.

The old stone Unitarian church, built a quarter of a century ago with Boston money, is still used. Its first pastor was Rev. Mr. Nute. Rev. John S. Brown, of Brook Farm Association, did faithful service in the old church for several years. Mr. Brown is still living in Lawrence, and, though feeble in body, is intellectually vigorous, full of the spirit of Western (new) Unitarianism, with lively, kindly interest in all the new young life of the times, and hopeful, quite to enthusiasm, of the power of rational religion to perform great service in the world.

After numerous alternations of disuse and occupancy, in accordance with the varying fortunes of liberal religion in Lawrence, the old stone church, the theatre of so many stirring scenes during those strange times when the powers of darkness fought for Kansas soil, was finally rescued from dust and silence by a little company of radicals. Three or four in number, impelled by the current of that stream of tendency toward the concentration of force, began a little Sunday-school,—a very little one indeed. But the earnest few had come to stay; and so the project lived and grew, and still it grows under the excellent superintendence of Miss S. A. Brown, daughter of Rev. John S. Brown. I wish the Index readers, and all inquirers about liberal Sunday-school work, might know of all the methods we have worked at for a time, and then gone on to others, more and more satisfactory. At present, we have for part of our work the study of the Index lesson papers, on the "Origin and Growth of Christianity." Our Sunday-school enterprise led to an adult Sunday service, Rev. Mr. Brown preaching as long as his strength would permit. Mrs. Annie Diggs then took up the work, and lately Miss S. A. Brown has been reading Mr. Savage's Talks about Jesus. This work was begun about three years ago, and was soon taken under the supervision of the Ladies' Liberal Club. The expenses have been met partly by voluntary contribution and partly by "dime" literary entertainments.

Rev. Jenk. Ll. Jones, editor of Unity, has visited and preached for us several times during the last three years. Mr. Jones came in December last, in response to an invitation to deliver a lecture in the State University course. During this visit, Mr. Jones spoke in the Unitarian church to large and interested audiences. A business meeting was held, which was participated in by radicals of various types; and a State Unitarian Association was organized, with a view to stretching out a network of organization all over the State. The platform adopted was sans creed, except as it stands committed by its name, "Unitarian." It declares only for "freedom, fellowship, and character in religion"; and any person may become a member who desires to "do good in it or get good out of it." For the furtherance of this and numerous other good enterprises, Rev. Mr. Howland is to be with us.

On Sunday, March 20, in a business meeting after the church service, the book used by the old Unitarian society of twenty years ago was produced; and, in order that this new society might become an organized body, the book containing the old constitution was circulated for signatures. The preamble to the constitution reads, "The undersigned in the fear of God," "for the enjoyment of Christian privileges," etc. Naturally enough, a Free Religionist could not step back upon such a platform. The following Sunday, Mrs. Annie Diggs addressed the society concerning its new departure, criticising the "preamble" from a Free Religious stand-point. There will be an amendment proposed, more in accordance with the spirit and need of the present time.

Certain it is that there is an immense field of usefulness and large opportunity for a rational religious movement in the State of Kansas, as indeed in all the West; but nothing short of genuine radicalism will prove adequate. Will Unitarianism expand to meet the emergency? Yours fraternally,

RADICAL.

Digitized by Google

AN APPENDIX.

I think Mr. Chadwick is right in saying (Index, April 14) that Paul burdened the stream of tendency which proceeded from Jesus with a dreadful weight of speculative theology. As I understand the doctrine of all the chief Christian sects, these additions of Paul are what they recognize and insist upon as the very essence of Christianity. They can hardly do otherwise, since their theory of Scripture requires them to accept all that Paul said as an accurate representation of the teaching of Jesus. Holding, with Mr. Chadwick, that the doctrine of Paul was in some respects unlike, and inferior to that of Jesus, I wish to find language which shall fairly express the distinction.

C. K. W.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these with great freedom, and not of necessity at all.

F. A. H.

THE WORLD WE LIVE IN.

The Mineral Kingdom.
The Vegetable Kingdom.
The Animal Kingdom. (Except man.)
Man.

Study 9. The Mineral Kingdom.

Text-book, Geology, Science Primer Series.

The Crust of the Earth, Continued.

Articles 218-242 inclusive.

Specimens: The different examples of Sedimentary, Organic, and Igneous Rocks already used, as in Study 8.

In the process by which the earth's crust has been pushed up and let down, what else must have happened?

Is the crust of the earth made of regular layers, like the coats of an onion?

Why not?

Was the raised beach about which we have learned a continuous one?

[See Figure 33, Page 93.]

What would happen between the land raised and the land not raised?

How may this be illustrated by a number of sheets of cloth or paper laid upon a table?

[Illustrate as in Figure 40, Page 110.]

Where, then, strata are pushed up or let down more in one place than in another without being broken, what results?

What shows that this kind of movement has frequently taken place in different parts of the globe?

What may be seen in many quarries?

[See Figures 38 and 39, Page 109.]

What would have happened to the cloths on the table, if we had squeezed them from either end?

[See Figure 40, Page 110.]

Has a similar movement taken place with the earth's crust?

[See Figure 41, Page 111.]

Is it easy to conceive of the force which it must have required to accomplish this?

Must there have been a point beyond which the rocks would have broken rather than bent?

What would have happened then?

What does Figure 42, Page 112, show?

What do we mean by "The Eternal Hills"?

What do the rocks tell about the birth of mountains?

Of what do most mountain-chains consist?

What are frequently found in these rocks?

Which indicates what?

What has the cooling of the earth had to do with the formation of mountains?

What will a map of the world show of principal lines of elevation?

[Illustrate with map showing mountains of the world.]

Are all mountains of the same age?

How is that known?

Are all parts of one mountain always the same age?

How is that known?

[See Figures 44 and 45, Page 116.]

How is it possible to decide which are the oldest and which the youngest mountains of the earth?

How does the crumbling down of the earth's surface affect mountains?

What has sometimes happened to table-lands?

[See Figure 46, Page 119.]

Are the same forces of Nature constantly at work?

What are some of them, and what are they doing?

Selections.

Without mountains, the air could not be purified nor the flowing of the rivers sustained.—Ruskin.

Nature's heart
Beats strong amid the hills.—Milnes.

Not a ray is dimmed, not an atom worn:
Nature's oldest force is as good as new.—Emerson.

The ragged cliff
Has thousand faces in a thousand hours.—Emerson.

The storms have beaten upon the boulder for ages where it now stands, and the hand of time has broken many a fragment, and piled them at its base, as if to number the centuries of its age. But who shall number the centuries that have rolled away since it paused there in its course, or measure the time of its journey?—Tenney.

Anything which elevates the mind is sublime. Greatness of matter, space, power, virtue, or beauty, are all sublime.—Ruskin.

Suggestions to Leader.—Secure a map of the world showing clearly the great mountain ranges. Practise the experiments in Figure 40 before trying them in the Group. If you have, or can obtain, any really impressive pictures of mountain scenery, they can be introduced in this Study to good advantage.

Study 10.—The Mineral Kingdom.

Text-book, Geology, Science Primer Series.

Conclusion.

Articles 243-258 inclusive.

Up to this time, we have been studying about what?

And these belong to what kingdom?

Have we found that Rocks have a history to tell us?

What history is it?

Is this the only history of the earth?

Is it the oldest history of the earth?

Has it carried us back to the beginning of things?

How old should you think the earth must be from what we have studied?

Is the story each rock has told us a complete one by itself?

How are we to get the fullest possible history?

Have we seen any signs of Vegetable and Animal life?

Where and how?

Have we learned all we can about Rocks?

However far we should go, should we find still new chapters in our history?

Would these probably confirm the lessons we have already learned?

What do we mean by Law?

What have these studies shown us about law in the world of Nature?

What is meant by Unity in Variety?

What do we mean by Beauty?

What have these studies shown us about beauty in the world of Nature?

What have they shown us about the value of little things?

What have they shown us of the great forces at work in Nature?

Which are the more powerful, the noisy or the silent forces?

Those which seem to act quickly or those which act slowly?

What have we learned about the relations of rocks to each other?

Does this suggest that everything in Nature may be related to every other thing?

Is this what is meant by Universal Relation?

What is meant by having a sense of anything?

Have our studies given us a sense of this Universal Relation in the Mineral Kingdom?

Selections.

Nature is loved by what is best in us.—Emerson.

Every moment instructs, and every object; for wisdom is infused into every form.—Emerson.

Come forth into the light of things,
Let Nature be your teacher.—Wordsworth.

How the magnificent temple of Nature
Exalts and enlarges the human soul.—German.

It seems as if the day was not wholly profane, in which we have given heed to some natural object —Emerson.

O world!
What pictures and what harmonies are thine.
—Emerson.

Suggestions to Leader.—Remember that the series of Studies, of which the foregoing form a part, is based upon the idea of Religion as the sense of Universal Relation. It is to this central thought they are all intended to lead up. A few of the questions in this Study are not answered in the text-book, but any one who has pursued the course intelligently will readily answer them.

Note.—This Study closes the first of the four sections into which we divided our general subject. The four together are designed to cover a year's work. The publication of the series is for the present suspended, in order to make way for other specimen ventures.

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

FOREIGN.

It is reported that Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, who is prosecuting the British Museum archæological researches at Nineveh and Babylon, has discovered an ancient Babylonian city, a short distance from Bagdad, on the renowned ancient canal called Nahr-Malka, or Flumen Regium.

The prize given annually by the representatives of Cambridge University in Parliament for an English essay upon some subject connected with British history or literature has been awarded to James Kenneth Stephen, scholar of King's College. The subject was "Bolingbroke as a Political Thinker."

In a paper read by Dr. Beddoe before the Bristol Naturalists' Society, he mentioned as a curious fact, supported by trustworthy statistics from various parts of England, the gradual diminution of the dimensions of the human head in this country in the last quarter of a century, the average shrinking being one-seventh of an inch.

The Athenæum states that the collection of antiquities excavated in Cyprus by Major di Cesnola, and comprising jewelry, cylinders, glass, ivories, gold and silver coins, terra-cotta statuettes and toys, and many other relics,—a gathering known as the Lawrence-Cesnola Collection,—has been offered on loan to the authorities at South Kensington.

The Madrid correspondent of the Daily News states that judicial proceedings, which had been instituted under the previous ministry against several Protestants in the provinces, have been abandoned by order of the present cabinet. A pastor who had been sentenced to several months' imprisonment for holding prayer-meetings in Catalonia has been pardoned. The same correspondent states that on Sunday a free-trade meeting was held in the Opera House, attended by two thousand persons, and was "quite a success." —Pall Mall Budget, March 18.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has sanctioned the following special form of prayer, for use in the diocese of Canterbury at this time: "O Almighty God, King of all kings and Governor of all things, whose power no creature is able to resist, to whom it belongeth justly to punish sinners, and to be merciful to them that truly repent,—keep, we beseech Thee, our soldiers who have now gone forth to war, that they, being armed with Thy defence, may be preserved evermore from all perils, to glorify Thee, who art the only Giver of all victory; through the merits of Thy only Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

The Spanish ministers recently considered the protest of the Catholic Union, and the note addressed by the Papal Nuncio to the government, protesting against the provisions of the ministerial circular on public education. The ministers, a Madrid telegram says, "were unanimously of opinion that the circular referred to was contrary neither to the Constitution nor to the Concordat. It was decided that the protest should be placed in the archives of the State." The Roman correspondent of the Standard says it is believed that the Spanish ministry, despite its courteous words, intends to effect a real separation of the Church from the State. A royal decree conferring on the infant Princess Mercedes, heiress to the crown of Spain, the title of Princess of the Austrias, till lately borne by King Alfonso's eldest sister, the Infanta Isabella, has been promulgated.

Digitized by Google

THE death of the Countess Hatzfeldt revives the memory of the most sensational, if not the most striking, figure of modern German politics. It was as the champion of the Countess Hatzfeldt, whether n the capacity of an advocate or in the more questionable character of a purloiner, that Ferdinand Lassalle first became known to the German public. His attachment to the Countess led to some of the most romantic incidents of his erratic career; and after his death she became the recognized, if not the active, head of a certain section of his followers. The split between the main body of Lassalle's adherents under Schweitzer and the so-called "female line" under Fritz Mende is one of the most curious incidents in the history of German Socialism, and strikingly illustrates the personal character of the early movement. It was not till the rivalry of the International Socialists under Liebknecht and Bebel had given a new impulse and a deeper meaning to the Socialist doctrines that the "female line" sank into insignificance, and the bulk of Lassalle's followers coalesced with the Internationalists to form the present Socialist party.—Pall Mall Budget.

MR. W. JOLLY, Inspector of Schools at Inverness, writes as follows concerning the case of John Duncan, the Scotch weaver and botanist, who is now left destitute in his eighty-seventh year: "The old man is a striking example in humble life of pure scientific enthusiasm which did not come into being until middle age. John Duncan always loved flowers, but it was not till his fortieth year that he began their scientific study. All his after-life, though passed amid poverty and heavy sorrow, was devoted to botany. In order to extend his knowledge, he took harvest work in all parts of the country, from Banff to the Border, bringing home specimens to complete his herbarium, and to tend as mementos of his wanderings. Unlike many enthusiasts, John Duncan never let the flowers still the music of his shuttle: he was ever hard-working and thrifty, but lost his toilsome gains many years ago through family affliction. He carried on his trade till his eighty-sixth year; but, age and its weary attendants stopping his loom, he has had to fall on the parish. He now lives, widowed, simple-minded, independent, pious, and happy, but a pauper,—to brighten whose remaining years his friends are now making an appeal for subscriptions."

JESTINGS.

THERMOMETERS reform late in life. They never become "temperate" until nearly 60.

AT the end of Lent in the Arctic regions, they have a regular north Easter.—Boston Courier.

"WHY are you so precise in your statement? Are you afraid of telling an untruth?" asked an attorney of a witness in a police court. "No, sir," was the prompt reply.

AN exuberant youth hails a supposed acquaintance with, "Hello, Joe!" but, finding his mistake, adds: "Oh, excuse me, I thought you were another man!" Laconic stranger answers, "I am."

THE Marquis of Celinaux was so exceedingly cautious in everything that he wrote at the end of his will: "It is my last wish that I may not be buried alive, . . . as far as this may be possible."

MATERFAMILIAS (finding the new nurse deep in a sensation novel): "Surely, nurse, you can't nurse baby and read at the same time!" Nurse: "Oh, lor', yes, 'm. She doesn't disturb my reading a bit, 'm."

AS IT COMES.—Young lady: "Well, Peggy, how have you weathered through the long winter?" Peggy: "Ay, deary, whiles better, whiles worse. Better when ye keep sending me things, worse when ye don't.—Fun.

A GALVESTON widow is about to marry her fifth husband. Her pastor rebuked her for contemplating matrimony so soon again. "Well, I just want you to understand, if the Lord keeps on taking them, I will too," was the spirited reply.

THE Biblical Recorder affirms that "the Baptists of Missouri Ar⍾ ⌐UsT A⍾O⊐ iN ⊢h⌐s ⌐⌐X." We hope it does not mean to intimate that they are—(hic). —Independent. Not at all. Not at all. The Recorder intends to intimate that the Baptists of Missouri are not Baptists,—that they have got into the wrong font, as it were.—Chicago Alliance.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

Amount acknowledged up to March 1	$2028.75
CHAS. H. PIERCE, New Bedford (10th assess.)	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, " " one year of pledge	25.00
ARTHUR M. LEE, New York	20.00
THOS. DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess.)	10.00
J. D. FROST, Providence, R.I. (10th assess.)	10.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., one year of pledge	10.00
A. B. CHACE, Valley Falls, R.I.	7.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	25.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 4 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	50.00
Miss EMMA D. IRESON, Lynn, Mass., annually for 3 years	5.00
JAMES EDDY, Providence, annually	50.00
THOMAS DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess't)	10.00
J. W. BOYD, Jelloway, Ohio, annually for 5 years	10.00
ROBERT DAVIS, Lunenburg, Mass. (annually)	10.00
J. S. JOHNSON, Almont, Mich., annually for 5 years	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN.

A COURSE OF LECTURES BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

AUTHOR'S AMERICAN EDITION. Cloth. 12mo.
PRICE $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston.

JUST READY.

A NEW VOLUME BY MR. SAVAGE.

Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind.

These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION,
3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.50
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

Cornell University Library

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 "	. . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51 "	. . .	6c. " "
" 52 "	. . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

THE SIX DISCOURSES

OF

Mr. Samuel B. Weston

Submitted to the Unitarian Committee of Reference in the Leicester Case, together with Mr. Southgate's Will and the Committee's decision, making a pamphlet of 67 pages, can be had at the Index Office, or by sending to H. O. Smith, Leicester, Mass.

Price, for single copy, 40 cts.; for two or more copies, 30 cts. each.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.
F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,— all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

L. PRANG & CO.'S

Easter Cards for 1881.

Of these cards, we offer this season a greater variety and of more elegant artistic taste than ever before. We call particular attention to the cards with silk fringes and tassels, and the cards on heavy gilt-edged mounts.

NEW EASTER EGG DESIGN.

Easter Dove Design.

A very rich and elegant line of

NEW BIRTHDAY CARDS,

with and without silk fringe.

L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the

REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

As made by the most eminent scholars of England and America. Half the price of Corresponding English Edition. Large type, linen super-calendered paper, elegant binding. A separate "Comprehensive History of the Bible and its Translations," including a full account of the New Revision, given to subscribers. Best chance for agents ever offered. Send stamp for particulars at once.

The Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

RADICAL DISCOURSES.

1. America's Debt to Thomas Paine.
2. False and True Prayer.
3. The Brute God of the Old Testament.
4. The Religion of To-day.
5. False Teachings of the Christian Church.
6. The Workingman's Religion.
7. The Christian Tragedy at Pocasset.
8. Free Religion; or, The Religious Demands of To-day.
9. The Teachings of Free Religion.
10. Do You Love Jesus?
11. Atonement.
12. The Bible: How shall we read it?
13. Revivals.
14. Who are Christians?
15. The Moral Life.
16. Is Liberalism Moral?
17. If a Man Die, Shall he Live Again?
18. The Resurrection of Jesus Not Proved.
19. The New Testament in the Old.
20. The Beliefs of the Unbelievers.
21. A Holy Superstition.
22. Temperance and the Bible.
23. Common-Sense on a Tour through the Bible. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

The above discourses may be had at 5 cts. each, or the entire set for one dollar, by addressing L. K. WASHBURN,
22 Sachem Street, Lynn, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli } SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 591.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 43.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THROUGH zeal, knowledge is gotten; through lack of zeal, knowledge is lost: let a man who knows this double path of gain and loss thus place himself that knowledge may grow.—Buddha.

IF I have done any deed worthy of remembrance, that deed will be my monument. If not, no monument can preserve my memory.—Agesilaus.

I AM well skilled both to obey myself
And rule myself, well weighing all events
By virtue's standard.—Euripides.

HE whose knowledge surpasses his good deeds may be compared to a tree with many branches and a scanty root. Every wind shakes and uproots it.—Rabbi Eliezar.

YE shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit.—Jesus.

SOME are so very studious of learning what was done by the ancients that they know not how to live with the moderns.—William Penn.

WHERE the heart goes before, like a lamp, and illumines the pathway, many things are made clear that else lie hidden in darkness.—H. W. Longfellow.

SO FAR from science being irreligious, as many think, it is the neglect of science that is irreligious,—it is the refusal to study the surrounding creation that is irreligious. . . . Devotion to science is a tacit worship, a tacit recognition of worth in the things studied, and by implication in their cause. It is not a mere lip-homage, but a homage expressed in actions; not a mere professed respect, but a respect proved by the sacrifice of time, thought, and labor.—Herbert Spencer.

TRUE science and true religion are twin-sisters, and the separation of either from the other is sure to prove the death of both. Science prospers exactly in proportion as it is religious; and religion flourishes in exact proportion to the scientific depth and firmness of its basis. The great deeds of philosophers have been less the fruit of their intellect than of the direction of that intellect by an eminently religious tone of mind. Truth has yielded itself to their patience, their love, their single-heartedness, and their self-denial, rather than to their logical acumen.—Huxley.

TO RESTRICT human expectation to that which is ascertainable by reason must have the effect of concentrating attention on humanity and intensifying interest in human exertions. In solidarity, we find the encouragement to public endeavor; and we sum up private duty in Honor, which is respecting the Truth; in Morality, which is acting the Truth; and in Love, which is serving the Truth.—George Jacob Holyoake.

WE pursue the same,—progressive improvement, association, transformation of the corrupted medium in which we are now living, overthrow of all idolatries, shams, lies, and conventialities. We want man to be, not the poor, passive, cowardly, phantasmagoric unreality of the actual time, thinking in one way and acting in another, bending to power which he hates and despises, carrying empty popish or thirty-nine article formulas on his brow and none within, but a fragment of the living truth, a real individual being linked to collective humanity, the bold seeker of things to come; the gentle, mild, loving, yet firm, uncompromising, inexorable apostle of all that is just and heroic,—the priest, the poet, and the prophet.—Mazzini.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE office of preacher in Harvard College offered to Phillips Brooks has been declined by him. Trinity Church of Boston is thereby much relieved in mind; and, if the truth were to be told, we incline to think a good many Unitarians are also. The latter were trying to make the best of it; but, in their secret hearts, a good many were thinking the appointment a step backward for the College, and bad for Unitarianism.

RABBI COHN, of San Francisco, said to a reporter recently, who interviewed him with regard to the growth of scepticism in that city: "The first revelation from God was reason. The great public error is this: that religion sprang into the world like Minerva, and any change that is made or suggested is considered a step to disrespect. Religion grows and develops, and must. Religion is progressive; and, if it is not progressive, it will tumble and fall and be set aside. Religion is like a plant, that, as it stands and grows, is ever bending toward the sunlight. Science should be the sunlight of all religion; that is, the facts of science, not its fancies. '

THE Presbyterian complains that "another Episcopalian has just been appointed chaplain in the United States Navy"; that, during the last eight years, of eight vacant chaplaincies which have occurred in the Navy, all but one have been filled in the same way, by Episcopalians; and that "for eighteen years not a single appointment has been made from any branch of the Presbyterian Church." We agree with the Presbyterian that this does look like sectarian partiality on the part of the government. We suspect that the cause of it is that to conduct a religious service by the Episcopalian fashion is easier than any other, and, considering the mental calibre of the majority of those who apply for naval chaplaincies, probably safer also for those who have to hear. We would suggest, as a way out of the difficulty, the abolition of the naval chaplaincies altogether as a government office. The Presbyterian complains that the views of its own sect are not regarded in making so many Episcopalian appointments. So a large and respectable class of citizens may complain, on equally good grounds, that their views are disregarded, when the government officially recognizes, by the appointment of chaplains, any forms of sectarian doctrine.

MRS. THEODORE PARKER, by her will, gave to the city of Boston most of the books which she had reserved from Mr. Parker's library, according to the provisions of his will. All of his library, it will be remembered, except such books as Mrs. Parker should wish to retain, he gave to the Boston Public Library, to be there kept for public use in a section by themselves; and the greater part of his books were transferred to the city soon after his death. Now, Mrs. Parker has directed her executors to add the balance, excepting a few given to personal friends as keepsakes. She also bequeaths to the Public Library Mr. Parker's study table and desk, the marble bust of him by Story, and crayon portraits both of him and of herself by Cheney, and requests that these all be kept near the books. She has given to Franklin B. Sanborn all of Mr. Parker's manuscripts, sermons, and lectures, all copyrights on his published books that were in her possession, all of his note-books, journals, letters, and diaries, and literary property generally, to do with as he, Mr. Sanborn, shall see fit. Mr. Sanborn was one of the executors of Mr. Parker's will, and Mr. Parker probably expected him to be his literary executor. The household articles especially associated with Mr. Parker's daily life and studies are distributed among near friends, and the residue of the property is divided among relatives and persons intimately connected with the family.

"SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE" for April, in a notice of Anthony Comstock's recently published book, Frauds Exposed, makes a charge against religious Liberalism which contains elements of truth, and yet is also very unfair. Speaking of the United States postal laws for preventing the use of the mails for criminal traffic, it says, "Liberals are the only professed and open defenders of dirt, as it is represented by the men who are interested in pushing impure literature through the mails." The National Liberal League, it is true, has become the "open defender" of the right of the class of persons mentioned to use the mails for their vile traffic, unhindered by any law, and has thereby brought disgrace upon the liberal cause. For this action, the League should not be spared any blows from the aroused conscience of the country. But not all "Liberals," as the writer in Scribner would imply, are implicated in this action. He ought to know that there have been on two occasions important secessions from the League on account of its position on this very question; and also that, though the Liberal League has attracted by its mode of action considerable public attention, it has by no means represented or included all the Liberalism of the country. A large section of the Liberals of the country never joined the League; and very many of these never felt themselves called upon to define their position publicly against this special action of the League on the postal laws, more than they would have felt it essential to define their position against the crime of stealing, if the League had declared in favor of highway robbery. Others, who had been members of the League or who were specially interested in its objects, did protest and fight with all their mental and moral energy against the League's new position. Notably, the Index and the Religio-Philosophical Journal took this attitude; and, though the immediate occasions for discussion of the question have passed by, the attitude has not been abandoned.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

"SCIENCE AND SPIRITUALISM."

BY WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

"In forming a judgment, lay your hearts void of fore-taken opinions."—Sir Philip Sidney.

"To believe is dangerous, to be unbelieving is equally so. The truth, therefore, should be diligently sought after, lest that a foolish opinion should lead you to pronounce an unsound judgment."—Phædrus.

"The true safeguard against scientific scepticism and credulity alike must be found in a stern resolve to seek the very truth, regardless of all prejudgments and prepossessions, without asking what consequences may come of it, and in a firm purpose to pursue it by the only process through which scientific truth can be attained,—evidence collected with care, examined with caution, and accumulated with diligence until it amounts to proof."—Sergeant E. W. Cox.

The editorial, under the above caption, in the Free Religious Index of November 4, contained one of the fairest presentations which I have seen of the difficulties under which careful, thoughtful scholars labor in endeavoring to arrive at a solution of the problems underlying the "spiritual" phenomena of the day. Undoubtedly there is much in some of the current phases of Spiritualism to repel the average man of science and the honest, candid seeker after truth in the realms of cultured philosophical analysis and criticism. So I can scarcely blame those who, repelled by the false, repugnant, and even (in some cases) disgusting features of the Spiritualistic movement, as at present conducted, ignore the whole, and decline to undertake the task of unravelling the mystery in which the problem lies enshrouded.

On the other hand, it is significant that, if I mistake not, no instance is known of a person of scientific or philosophic attainments who, after a careful and searching examination of the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism, did not avow his belief—not to say knowledge—of the actuality of the phenomena, in most cases the investigators becoming converts to the "spiritual" theory of their origin. In some cases, like that of Mr. Crookes, no definite statement is made as to their producing cause; though some of Mr. Crookes' latest utterances thereupon can scarcely be explained, save upon the basis of his belief in their spiritual origin; while in some few other cases, like those of Capt. R. F. Burton and H. G. Atkinson, their non-spiritual origin is plainly affirmed. It will be observed, though, that, in cases of the latter description, those so affirming are usually materialistic or agnostic in their habits of thought,—are dogmatic deniers of the existence of spirit, or of the possibility of our having any knowledge of it, if existent.

Spiritual Phenomena Classified.

The existence of certain peculiar phenomena is conceded by the Index. The questions, then, to be considered are, How are the phenomena produced, and what do they establish or tend to establish concerning the spiritual status of man in this life and in the so-called spirit-world? To determine these questions requires very careful scientific investigation and analysis. The great mistake made alike by nearly all Spiritualists and by most sceptics is that of lumping all the different phases of physical phenomena into one class, and assigning them all to one producing power. A large majority of the Spiritualists assert and believe that all, or nearly all, such phenomena are the direct work of disembodied human spirits; and the great body of sceptics deem them all produced by purely material causes, non-spiritual potencies. The truly scientific Spiritualist, rigidly scrutinizing each class of phenomena, relegates those of each kind to their appropriate causes.

Spiritual and psychical phenomena naturally range themselves under three classes: (1) those due to fraud and imposition (just now quite a large proportion); (2) those due to the action of peculiar powers and forces resident in the human organism, indicative of its possession of a supra-material nature, of faculties transcending those of the ordinary physical man, senses superior to those of ordinary sight, hearing, etc., as manifest in the phenomena of mesmerism, somnambulism, clairvoyance, clairaudience, psychometry, mind-reading, automatic writing, double consciousness, answering sealed letters, the trance (in general), the "double" or apparitions of the living, unconscious cerebration, and similar abnormal mental states,—also, in my judgment, in many (not all) cases of physical manifestation, as in rapping, table-tipping, planchette-writing, slate-writing, movements of ponderable bodies, and even so-called materializations of parts or the whole of the human body, all more or less accompanied by intelligence, an intelligence seeming to be an emanation from the minds of the medium and of those present during the occurrence of the phenomena, and usually vague, unreliable, shadowy, misty, conflicting in its expressions and modes of operation; and (3) those due to the direct action of unfleshed intelligences, mostly similar in character to those of the second class, though differing in degree. The phenomena of the second class occur in the presence of, or through the agency of, persons who may be called sensitives, or psychics; those in the third class, through mediums, strictly so termed. A sensitive, or psychic, may be called an undeveloped or semi-developed medium, subject to the influences of the minds of those with whom he comes in contact or of his own mind, thus preventing his successful control by a foreign spirit for the impartation of truth to mankind or other good purpose. A medium is one in whom the influences of his own mentality may be placed in more or less subjection to those of a foreign intelligence, those also of surrounding minds being kept in abeyance. These and these only are true mediums; and rarely is it that such true mediumship is exhibited. A medium worthy of the name—not merely a sensitive or psychic—is rarely to be found. Sensitives abound, through whom phenomena occur of a mixed character,—partly spiritual in origin, but mostly of the earth, earthy.

Of this character are the host of trance-speakers and so-called test-mediums from whom continually flow streams of nonsense and balderdash, purporting to come from the good and great of earth's famed dead, to the disgust of all sensible people, Spiritualists or otherwise. Most of these sensitives are honestly deceived: they fail to realize the nature of their peculiar mental states as the source of the extraordinary power at times exhibited through them. Sometimes, also, we receive, through this class of "mediums," genuine evidences of direct spirit action; for psychics are susceptible to the influences of "spirits" as well as of those still "in the body." Genuine, unmixed spiritual manifestations are rare in comparison with those merely psychic, those due to the action of what Sergeant Cox and Mr. Crookes call psychic force. Psychic force satisfactorily accounts for many of the so-called spiritual phenomena, and for years I have been convinced that it is really the producing cause thereof; but there is a residuum of facts indicative of a higher force and a higher power being at work, using psychic force as its instrument of communication and action. Sergeant Cox, it is known, at first attributed the whole of the phenomena to psychic force per se; but, after a more searching investigation into the facts and phenomena, he modified his opinion, and a short time before his death expressed the conviction that a part of the higher phenomena were undoubtedly due to the influence of spiritual beings once resident on earth; and to this conclusion, in my judgment, every honest, patient, unprejudiced, and thorough investigator of the phenomena must arrive.

The Defects of Spiritualism.

The Index speaks truly in saying that Spiritualism "has had its root and sustenance largely in man's emotional nature, much more largely in this than in any cool, deliberative, investigating activity of reason"; that "we do not find very often among Spiritualists those who seem thoroughly competent to investigate, in a purely scientific spirit, the foundations of their faith"; that "credulity has certainly been a marked characteristic of Spiritualists as a body"; that "so prevalent have fraud and delusion become in connection with Spiritualistic phenomena that the greatest difficulty, at the outset of any investigation, is to get at the exact facts"; and that "Spiritualism, as a practical religious faith, seems to us to have somewhat of the same evil that attached to the old Calvinistic theology,—an excess of 'other-worldliness.'" All these conclusions are certainly true; but the facts warranting them are due largely to the character of the people to whom the phenomena present themselves, and in whose minds they have to be intelligently digested. What a small portion of the inhabitants of even the most enlightened nations of the earth are trained to anything like a scientific scrutiny of phenomenal occurrences! What do the masses know of rigid philosophical analysis in the domain either of mental or physical phenomena? Owing to the unscientific, unphilosophic, emotional, and sympathetic natures of the bulk of our people, it is inevitable, in the present status of the earth, that misconstructions, erroneous conclusions, false logic, shallow reasoning, etc., should be largely the outcome of the present imperfect mode of communication between the material and spiritual universes. Spiritualism has always been crucified in the house of its friends: it has been almost overwhelmed in the circling flood of credulity, superstition, folly, and fanaticism; and at present, in addition to all these, it is nearly engulfed in the whirling maelstrom of fraud and knavery. No matter how much Spiritualists of a certain class may try to cover up these glaring defects and deny their actualities, bolster up fraud and folly by impugning the veracity and honesty of those anxious to purge Spiritualism of its present load of villany and absurdity, the fact of their existence remains a self-evident truth, patent to every impartial, candid, unprejudiced mind.

The conclusions and the line of conduct of this class of believers do not, however, constitute the entirety of Spiritualism: if it did, the sooner the whole movement was overthrown, root and branch, the better for mankind. Besides these, there are some, let us be thankful, who have not bowed the knee to the Baal of unreason and stultiloquy,—it may be "a remnant, weak and small,"—who endeavor to exercise careful discrimination in judging of all purported "spiritual manifestations," and who desire to apply the "scientific method" in this as in all other departments of human inquiry and research. Applying this test, we find much in Spiritualism that will not bear the searching light of critical investigation, and so must be cast aside as undemonstrative of the basic fact of spirit communion. What in Spiritualism will not endure the test of the most rigid scrutiny and analytical examination must fall; and the sooner it falls, the better. But, after eliminating all explainable on other grounds, there still remains "a winnowed residuum" of facts, giving, in my judgment, conclusive evidence of the impact of the spiritual world upon the material.

The Experiences of Andrew Jackson Davis.

The peculiar life-experience of Andrew Jackson Davis furnishes very substantial grounds for positing the existence of the spirit-world and its influence in the affairs of earth, and has never been explained,—nay, I am convinced, is inexplicable, upon a purely materialistic basis. Theodore Parker said, in substance, that the mode of production of Mr. Davis's works was the great miracle of the nineteenth century.

Materialization.

The manifestation of parts of the human body, and in some cases of the entire body, in seemingly material form,—said forms talking, walking, laughing, singing, etc., not belonging to any persons resident on earth, and claiming themselves to be inhabitants of the spirit-world, appearing and disappearing instantaneously, materialization and dematerialization as it is called,—furnishes "proof palpable" of the existence of unseen intelligences in nature, with such command over material forces and atoms as to manufacture temporary bodies for themselves, capable of dissolution at pleasure. The possibility of such occurrences I know from my own individual experience. I know that such phenomena have taken place in my presence. Probably nine-tenths, or it may be ninety-nine hundredths, of all so-called materializations are fraudulent, full proofs of which in various cases I have had also from my own experience,—just as I know there are cases, "few and far between" it may be, where genuine "materialization" occurs.

Slate-writing.

Then there are cases of writing being produced on double slates sealed together, without even the contact of the medium, being held by other parties several feet distant from him; said writing purporting to come from relatives or friends of the investigators, and sometimes written in the handwriting of the party whose name is attached to it. Within the last few weeks, I have witnessed in San Francisco the production of writing on slates twenty-five or thirty times, both with and without pencil, written certainly by no material hand, such being an absolute impossibility, all jugglery or fraud being out of the question; and, moreover, names of various relatives of mine were thus written, with their relationship correctly indicated, and circumstances connected with themselves and myself mentioned in strict accordance with the facts. Mental questions were also answered by the slate-writing, appropriately addressed to the relatives purported to be communicating. Here was manifest an unseen power capable of writing on a slate in situations where no material hand could possibly use the pencil, coupled with an intelligence cognizant of facts in my life and that of my relatives, their names, etc. These facts, names, etc., are entirely unknown to the San Franciscans, as I am comparatively a stranger here; and I purposely never refer to them, so that no clew may be obtained by any of the mediums here or elsewhere by which their communications may be shaped. I think that some cases of slate-writing may be accounted for as being the production of psychic force; but in others, where marks of identity appear, as in fac-simile chirography, names and facts not present in the mind of the sitter, etc., the more reasonable conclusion is that back of the psychic force is an unseen individuality, a resident of the spiritual sphere, wielding the weird potencies of the psychic force as instruments of communication with the material world.

Digitized by Google

Twelve Messages from John Quincy Adams.

In 1859 was published a book entitled Twelve Messages from the Spirit of John Quincy Adams, to his friend Josiah Brigham, through Joseph D. Stiles, Medium. This book is unique in spiritual literature, and embodies, to my mind, conclusive proofs of the identity of the intelligence producing it, the internal and external evidences both being weighty in that regard.

External: The book was written in Quincy, Mass., Mr. Adams' former residence, in the house of an old friend of Mr. Adams, Mr. Brigham; through the hand of a mechanic (whose penmanship differed much from that of Mr. Adams), and in the handwriting of Mr. Adams in his latter days, feeble and tremulous. Manuscript covering over four hundred octavo printed pages was written, all in the peculiar handwriting of John Quincy Adams previous to his so-called death. One of the twelve messages was devoted to George Washington, to which, at the close of the work, Washington writes several pages of reply, and in the earthly handwriting of George Washington. Mr. Adams pays a warm tribute to his mother's virtues and excellency of character in the course of his Messages; and Mrs. Abigail Adams (his mother) also submits a few pages in rejoinder, this being written in her earthly handwriting. At the termination of the volume, a few lines indorsing the general truth of the contents of Mr. Adams' Messages, is signed by over five hundred and forty different spirits, each signature being in his or her own peculiar earthly handwriting. Some of these attestants are persons of extended reputation; while others are those who filled the private walks of life, including evidently many relatives of the Adams and Brigham families, and, I think, many former residents of Quincy. The medium affirmed that he felt a new influence while his hand was controlled to write each signature. A comparison made by me of the signatures of the public characters, as given in this book, with their signatures as found in literature and public documents, shows that in no case is the spirit signature an exact fac-simile of the ante-mortem signature, but bears a strong resemblance thereto, just what under the circumstances would naturally be the case, supposing the medium to have been really influenced by the persons whose names were being written by him, the same peculiarities of style, etc., being indicated with some variation.

The internal evidence consists of the nature of the contents of the volume. The ideas correspond with those J. Q. Adams would be likely to convey, expressed as they were under difficulties and through another and an inferior mentality. It is a universal law of mediumship that all language or ideas coming from a spirit have to be projected through the mind of the medium, and will be colored or distorted more or less by the action of that mind. Hence, necessarily, this book is not fully equal to what Mr. Adams would produce at first hand. The wonder is, rather, that he should have succeeded so well; for the language is uniformly good, devoid of obscurity or rhapsody, vagueness or idealism, such as are found in so much of the so-called spiritual literature. The work is plain and practical, full of sturdy common-sense: albeit, it has too much of the devotional element in it to be palatable in all respects to the more radical thinkers of the Spiritual and Free Religious schools; but such, we know, was a marked characteristic of Mr. Adams' long and useful earth-life. Very striking exemplifications are given also of nearly all of Mr. Adams' other distinctive traits of character, in addition to that of religious devotion. His indomitable firmness, his large conscientiousness, his broad philanthropy, his reverence for the good and true, his detestation of slavery, his love of approbation for his own good qualities, his well-developed self-reliance and self-esteem, his filial devotion to his mother; his life-long reverence for the Bible, still clinging to him despite the convictions of his erroneous conception of the book, arrived at through his experience in the spirit-clime; his great veneration for Jesus and his life-work, his great love for his venerated Quincy pastor (to whom he devotes one entire "message"); his emotion, and sympathetic, yet partial matter-of-fact turn of mind, in contradistinction to the more philosophic and abstract tendencies of his father,—all these, and many other characteristics familiar to those acquainted with Mr. Adams' mental organization and habits of thought, are reflected in the contents of this work. The soul of John Quincy Adams permeates the entire production,—of course not in the full radiance of the enfranchised and glorified spirit, owing to the imperfection of the channel of expression, but the spirit author has no cause to be ashamed of the sentiments, ideas, and even language therein given to the world in his name. In this respect, it is in marked contrast to most of the so-called messages and communications purporting to emanate from the good and great in the better country, which are usually remarkable only for their lack of coherency of expression and their paucity of ideas. Ofttimes, however, when definite and tangible ideas are embodied therein, they are found to be signally demonstrative of the lack of knowledge of the brain from which they issue, being antagonistic alike to the inductions of established science, the deductions of rational philosophy, and the dictates of enlightened common-sense. Mr. Adams' Messages are however of a different character, and, under the circumstances, measurably worthy of their asserted source.

Mrs. Maria M. King's Principles of Nature.

Another and still more remarkable work, as regards its contents, has taken its place in spiritual literature, in which, so far as internal evidence is concerned, greater proof is offered of a supra-mundane or supra-material origin than is contained in Mr. Adams' work. I refer to the Principles of Nature, written inspirationally by Mrs. Maria M. King, the first volume of which was published in 1866, the two remaining volumes, revised and abridged from the original manuscripts written over ten years ago, being published about a year ago. These volumes purport to be a revelation (with no claim to infallibility, but simply addressed to the individual reason) of the laws governing the evolution and substantial being of the material and spiritual universe, from atoms to the Divine Mind, given inspirationally from a wise inhabitant of the spirit-country, the knowledge therein contained being derived from a careful study and observation, in the light of the higher life, under the tuition of still more advanced minds in the spirit-realm, of the principles regnant in universal nature, as manifested in their concomitant phenomena; and I have no hesitation in saying that the subject-matter is worthy of its asserted source. It evinces the author to be a profoundly scientific and philosophic mind, seemingly as thoroughly conversant with the mystic arcana of nature, underlying the processes of development of matter, spirit, and mind, as we are with our A B C's,—a mind fully acquainted with the sciences of earth in their varied ramifications, but in addition thereto with laws and principles of nature of which science as yet has little or no conception. Every page of this work, almost, teems with new ideas expositive of as yet unknown laws, new principles in evolutionary unfoldment, which, when understood, throw floods of light upon many of the problems now engaging the attention of the great masters in science and philosophy.

It is often asserted that spiritual revelation has never given any new scientific truth to the world; but this book disproves the assertion. The first volume, published in 1866, contains many statements of laws and facts in nature, unknown to the scientific world at the time of its publication, but which have since been discovered to be true, either certainly or probably, by recent scientific research. Spiritual revelation has, in this instance, outstripped or forestalled scientific research in various particulars, one example of which I will mention in illustration. When Mrs. King's first volume was published, it was generally held by astronomers that the corona, or ring of light, surrounding the moon during total eclipses of the sun, was not a solar appendage, but was either a lunar or terrestrial phenomenon. The theory that it was a portion of the sun's outlying atmosphere was almost, if not quite, universally scouted; and it was not till the eclipse of 1869—over three years after the publication of Mrs. King's volume, and five years after it was written in manuscript—that evidence was obtained that negatived the idea that the corona had its origin in the earth's atmosphere, and that held by other scientists, that it was simply a lunarian phenomenon. Evidence was at that time obtained, indicating the coronal phenomena to originate in the solar envelope. Even then, their solar origin was strongly opposed by eminent astronomers, including Mr. Lockyer; and not till confirmatory evidence of their solar nature was received during the eclipse of 1870, did the astronomical world accept the truth of the solar hypothesis. At that time, however, though the corona had been demonstrated to constitute a part of the sun's atmosphere, so to speak, no one supposed the zodiacal light—long an unexplained phenomenon—to have any connection with the corona; but, a few years later, some astronomers began to put forward the hypothesis that possibly the zodiacal light was an extension of the corona. This, however, did not receive any very general acceptance till after the eclipse of 1879, at which time evidence of its truth was received. So that at present, though it can hardly be said to have gained universal acceptance, the fact of the zodiacal light being an extension of the corona is generally held by astronomers.

Turning to pages 252, 253, of the first volume of Mrs. King's work, we find an explanation of the corona and zodiacal light, from which it appears that the former is a solar envelope, and the latter its extension or continuation into rarer strata of nebulous matter. Mrs. King's invisible teacher made known the true nature of the corona, in opposition to scientific speculation, three to five years before it was arrived at scientifically, and that of the zodiacal light nearly fifteen years prior to its scientific deduction. Again, in a few sentences, this first volume indicates the true nature of the composition of the Milky Way, and our sun's relation thereto; while recent discoveries concerning the constitution of the bodies composing our Galaxy bring to light facts just such as must exist if the statements of Mrs. King thereupon are correct. So, in various cases, instances might be cited of discoveries of the past fifteen years, confirmatory of the truth of the principles and laws of nature's action laid down in this volume; while nothing has been discovered positively disproving any of its statements, though a wide discrepancy exists between some of its statements and the prevalent views of scientists generally.

This remarkable work never emanated from Mrs. King's own unassisted mind. It treats learnedly of many things of which, prior to the receipt of information thereupon from her teacher and guide, she was destitute of knowledge. Her knowledge of scientific data is but meagre, while that of her work is encyclopedic. To my knowledge, she, of herself, is incapable of writing such a work. Consequent upon an acquaintance with her for a term of years, I know her capacity, intellectually and scientifically. She is an unassuming, honest, conscientious woman, retiring and domestic in her inclinations, who, being taken hold of by a power and a mentality far superior to her own, has been led into broader fields of thought and wisdom than, probably, was ever before vouchsafed to an inhabitant of earth. The so-called revelations of Moses, Jesus, Zoroaster, Sakya-Muni, and the other inspired sages and moralists of antiquity, pale into insignificance before the grandeur and comprehensiveness of this latter-day revelation. As the nineteenth century exceeds the first in intellectuality and spirituality, so do its revelations exceed those of the first.

If there be no impinging of the spiritual upon the material, let me ask: (1) whence the source of the clairvoyant knowledge expressed in A. J. Davis' writings, what the secret of his mysterious psychological experiences, and what the source of his spiritual experiences, visions of supernal intelligences, conversations with spirits, etc.? (2) whence derived the forms or parts of forms manifesting human intelligence, and belonging to no person resident in a material body on earth, at times appearing and disappearing at will, under circumstances probative of their non-mundane origin? (3) whence comes the writing, without physical contact, on clean, sealed slates, including at times fac-similes of the earthly penmanship of persons formerly dwelling on earth? (4) whence the power by which a carpenter writes a large volume in the handwriting of John Quincy Adams, with Mr. Adams' marked mental characteristics permeating the entire work? (5) whence the power by which this carpenter wrote several pages in the handwriting of George Washington? (6) whence the power by which he wrote several pages in Abigail Adams' handwriting? (7) whence the power enabling him to write the distinctive signatures of over five hundred persons, very few of which he had ever seen? (8) whence the power of Mrs. King to write intelligently upon scientific subjects of which she has no knowledge? (9) whence her power to treat profoundly and comprehensively of nature's forces in the myriad fields of being, producing a work which it is doubtful if any mind of earth, unassisted by higher powers, could give birth to? and (10) whence her power to express scientific truths unknown to the savans of earth, often in opposition to the views of the combined scientific world, but afterwards discovered to be true?

Digitized by Google

These facts indicate that matter, as we understand it, does not comprise the all of existence,—that above the sensuous forces and qualities of matter there rise into view higher realms of substance, in which more etherealized and sublimated potencies have sway, said existences and said potencies not being far removed into some distant region of space, but to some extent interblended and commingled with the so-called material realm of earth. While it is true that the spiritual phenomena do belong to "the mysterious region of the relations between matter and mind," it is equally true that their province extends further than this. Even now, they "throw important light on the questions of the human soul's entity as distinct from its physical organism and of personal continuance after death." Scientifically analyzed, there is already enough in the confused jumble of fraud, psychic phenomena, and direct spirit revelation to furnish conclusive proof of the existence of the individual soul after physical death, and its continued progress in wisdom and virtue as the endless ages roll. This much is certain, despite the absurdities and follies, the immoralities and superstitions, incident to the undeveloped condition of our planet, with which Spiritualism has been loaded since its birth thirty-three years ago. It requires the most careful sifting to arrive at the bottom facts; it needs the wisest discrimination to separate the few grains of soul-nourishing truth from the mountains of chaff in which they lie hidden. But, as time advances and the world progresses, as the scientific method of comparison and investigation becomes more and more dominant, so will the ultimate truths in Spiritualism be conserved, the remainder being swallowed up in the maelstrom of mental oblivion engulfing analogous errors of former systems of thought, theologic and scientific.

For the Free Religious Index.

INNUENDO AS A METHOD OF ARGUMENT.

I have just finished reading Mr. D. A. Wasson's article in the Index of April 14, on "Murder as a Method of Reform," in which he condemns in violent language the Nihilists' summary treatment of the Czar. Upon that subject, it is not my intention here to take issue with Mr. Wasson. In the course of events, some very imposing facts occasionally present themselves to the world's gaze, which have to be accepted without a word and about the righteousness of which it is puerile to argue. Such a fact the execution of Alexander II. seems to me to be. Consider its causes, if you will; consider its consequences, if you will; but pray don't preach about it. No more than a whirlwind or an earthquake is it to be condemned or praised.

So I have nothing to say of "Murder as a Method of Reform." My subject is "Innuendo as a Method of Argument," suggested by the following incidental remarks of Mr. Wasson, containing a fling which he ought to regret, and probably does:—

> History says that autocratic government is proper to certain stages of civilization and conditions of society. It is legitimate wherever it is the alternative to anarchy. . . . Whether it is at this date the necessary alternative to anarchy in Russia, I am unable to say. Clearly, the Nihilists are doing their best to make it such. They believe in anarchy. One of their number recently started a periodical in Boston with the title of The Anarchist. He believed in "individual autonomy," he said, and gave this out as the creed of his sect. The last I heard of him he was in jail upon a charge of wholesale swindling. Now, with a large sect in Russia secretly organized and conspiring to bring about "individual autonomy" by systematic assassination, I do not see what chance of success there would be for a more liberal form of government, were it established.

I shall not stop to ask Mr. Wasson why, before putting the foregoing words before the public, he did not take the pains to find out and state that the editor of The Anarchist has been tried for the offence charged against him; that the judge, on hearing the evidence, ordered the jury to return a verdict of "not guilty" on the second count of the indictment, and allowed the case to go to the jury on the first count only, to save the youthful assistant district-attorney from the ignominy of having his case summarily thrown out of court; that the jury, to some of whom the prisoner had been privately pointed out by the government officers as "one of those dreadful Nihilists who wish to overturn everything," returned a verdict of "guilty" on the first count; that the judge set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence, and ordered a new trial, saying that his had been the only error in giving the case to the jury at all; and that the government thereupon dropped the case, and discharged the prisoner. I say I will not stop to ask Mr. Wasson this; for it is not of injustice to an individual that I complain, but of injustice to a cause. Concerning this man's guilt there is ample room for two opinions. For myself, I am still in some doubt. Waive that. By stating the above facts, Mr. Wasson would have neither added to nor taken from the strength or weakness of his argument. Admitting the man's guilt, then what justifies Mr. Wasson's innuendo? His words either mean that the Anarchists, as a class, are swindlers, or else in this connection they mean nothing at all. Now, I am not of those who disconnect creed and deed. Accurately gauge for me the morality, as a class, of the persons united on a certain belief; show me, further, that no special circumstances enter in to account for their greater immorality as compared with those who hold counter-opinions: I shall not be slow to draw the inference. But, as regards the Anarchists, their lives tell the other way. I will not cite facts. Every student knows them. I will cite one authority. In a recent number of the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Frederic Harrison declares substantially—I do not recall his exact words—that the Nihilists of Russia are uncommonly prolific in examples of the highest moral heroism and most intense religious devotion. And yet Mr. Wasson singles out one individual possibly guilty of a crime that, at most, is ranked at the more insignificant end of the calendar, and practically asks that all his fellows in thought and belief be condemned with him. Was there ever a religious creed, a political faith, a social philosophy that could not be demolished by such a process? Or, rather, was there ever one that could be so demolished? I repeat, Mr. Wasson probably regrets his words.

One thing more. Mr. Wasson's concern about "our good young men" in danger of the "devil's noose" is truly touching. Doubtless, they will give due heed to his warning. But has it occurred to him that the cause which attracts our good young men is just a little more likely to be right than those which attract our bad young men? If not, would it not be well for him to reconsider his warning in the light of this probability?

But everything may be forgiven to Mr. Wasson's glorious closing words: "He has entered on the road to hell who has once set a form of government above the everlasting laws of morals." Splendid! as Colonel Ingersoll sometimes exclaims. First-class anarchistic doctrine, that! For what is anarchy? Ask Pierre Larousse, whose encyclopædia is even a higher standard than the Britannica itself. "L'anarchisme est un système politique d'après lequel la Société pourrait se gouverner sans gouvernement établi,"—"Anarchy is a political system by which Society would be able to govern itself without an established government"; that is, without setting "a form of government above the everlasting laws of morals." You oppose anarchy, Mr. Wasson. By your own words, then, it is for you, not for our good young men, that the pit is yawning. It opens before your very feet. Take your own warning: save yourself while you may. For, while I do indeed believe that its good young men are the most precious element of a nation's manhood, I am equally sure that this nation holds, at least, one good old man whom it can ill afford to lose in the flames that burn forever.

BENJ. R. TUCKER.

BOSTON, April 15, 1881.

For the Free Religious Index.

ANOTHER WORD ON THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

I will ask but an inch or two of space for another word upon a subject of so little importance as that of names.

Mr. Chadwick expresses his disapproval of my few words in nonconcurrence with his sermon on the Christian Name. In the first place, I was "oracular." Yes, I confess and justify. The few lines which I had time hurriedly to write gave no opportunity for citation or argument. I sought rather to define my position than to defend it.

Then Mr. Chadwick says: "I take the squarest issue with Mr. Wilcox's assertion that, if Jesus had never been born, the stream of tendency would have been 'all the same.' To affirm this is to deny cause and effect. It is sheer fatalism," etc. Yes, I too should take the squarest issue with such a statement as that, by whomsoever made. Mr. Chadwick reads me exactly wrong. I had no thought of making the assertion which properly seems to him so foolish. My words were, "If Jesus had never been born, there would have been a stream of tendency all the same," not "the stream of tendency would have been all the same."

I make no question that every life bears its part, grand or infinitesimal, in shaping the order of progress; but the degree of influence exerted in any given case is a fair subject for difference of opinion. My protest was against the assumption that to Jesus, as the incarnate spirit of progress, we are indebted wholly, or in greater part, for the civilization which we are, and of which we are. To credit any one man with such potentiality amounts to personal deification; and from that idea this stream of tendency is drifting us further and further away.

J. A. J. WILCOX.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE PAST IN THE PRESENT. WHAT IS CIVILIZATION? By Arthur Mitchell, M.D., LL.D. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1881.

The principal object of this handsome book is to advise some of our modern theorists concerning human origins and race development to hasten slowly. To this end, the writer makes it plain that many things which are commonly thought of as belonging altogether to the past belong also to the present; that, almost side by side, highly improved methods of manufacture and domestic life exist with the most primitive; and it is further contended that a primitive method of industry is by no means inconsistent with a high order of intelligence. The bearing of these considerations upon our modern studies of human origins and race development will be at once apparent. But it may be seriously doubted whether those archæologists and anthropologists who have done most to shape our modern theories stand much in need of Dr. Mitchell's caveat. To hasten slowly is the habit of their minds. Mr. Darwin has been the keenest critic of his own opinions, anticipating every valid objection that has so far been brought against them. Dr. Mitchell's considerations are pertinent; they are set forth in an interesting manner, simple and homely; many of his facts concerning methods of life still current in certain parts of Scotland are surprising, and humiliating to our boast of civilization: but the value of his book is for the average reader, not for the scientific anthropologists. It will enable the former to appreciate the conditions under which the latter are obliged to labor, and to prize their results more nearly at their true value.

The second part of Dr. Mitchell's book is an attempt to answer the question, What is civilization? He is quite certain that it is not a product of natural selection. On the contrary, it is "nothing more than a complicated outcome of a war waged with Nature by man in society, to prevent her from putting into execution in his case her law of natural selection." That civilization is proportioned to society and coöperation, this is the gist of Dr. Mitchell's theory; but incidentally his argument contains much interesting matter.

Digitized by Google

This part of his book is especially valuable as a corrective for a too easy-going optimism, valuble concerning progress, but inappreciative of the possibilities of degeneration that inhere in modern civilization as they have inhered in every earlier form. An appendix of nearly one hundred pages adds much to the value of the book, especially as it contains some admirable quotations from Messrs. Wallace and Spencer. The volume is enriched with one hundred and forty-eight admirable wood-cuts of the various objects referred to in the text; and they are illustrations in the best sense of the word, windows lighting up the argument, and not blinds darkening it, as so-called illustrations are not infrequently.

HOW WE FED THE BABY TO MAKE HER HEALTHY AND HAPPY. With Health Hints. By C. E. Page, M.D. 144 pages. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents. New York: Fowler & Wells, 753 Broadway.

This little book attempts to answer a most important question, since we all began as infants, and all subsequent health doubtless depends largely upon the right start given us in infancy. The most important thought in the book is that most of the ailments commonly supposed to be inseparable from the period of infancy may be prevented by judicious diet. The greatest stress is laid upon the danger of feeding the child too frequently; and the warning is very opportune at this time, when there is a tendency in the medical profession to encourage the frequent taking of food and a generous diet. This author may err in the opposite direction, and we certainly could not indorse all his recommendations; but it will do no harm to consider his theories well, and to experiment upon them carefully.

PLOUGHED UNDER. The Story of an Indian Chief. Told by himself. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert.

Happily, the Indian is at last eliciting in a larger degree, it would seem, than ever before the interest he is entitled to. There appears to be something like the show at least of a desire to protect him from the outrages he so long has suffered, and render his condition a little more favorable for progress and civilization. One of the first steps toward this end, the sine qua non of all his possible achievement, is to secure for him the right of a citizen.

This is the objective point upon which the friends of the Indian should concentrate the principal stress of their efforts in his behalf. This is the chief purpose of the book before us. It is particularly set forth in the introduction by Inshta Theamba (Bright Eyes) with much force and earnestness. It is very clearly made evident in Ploughed Under how uniformly and totally lacking in such a recognition has been our mode of dealing with the Indian, both in fact and spirit, and what evil results in consequence have perpetually ensued.

This is the significance of its title. But, while the obvious aim of the book has this intent, it possesses but little of the character of a discussion or argument. What it partakes of this occurs in the natural course of the simple thread of its story of the experience, wild haunts and ways, of Indian life.

That it is in these particulars more idealistic than the opposite is pretty sure to be the common impression of those who read it. Nevertheless, with all due allowance for this,—and considerable allowance will need to be made for its high-flown style and exaggerated sentiment,—it is in a notable degree unique, and calculated to awaken sympathies in the right direction.

THE MODERN REVIEW for April, 1881.—In the first article, Professor Carpenter continues his review of Cheyne's Isaiah. Unable to reconcile the manner of the last part of Isaiah with the first, Mr. Cheyne resorts to the miserable make-shift of supposing that the last part was written when Isaiah was an old man. Professor Carpenter effectually disposes of this nonsense, and is generally instructive in regard to the great unknown prophet of the captivity. "The Obligations of Doctrinal Subscription" are further discussed with the usual result: a bad case for the advocates of such subscription; an easy victory for their opponents. The most striking article of the number is one upon the "Morality of the Medical Profession," in which the physician figures as a secular professor, frequently abusing his opportunities for confidential intercourse with women and giving to young men advice that makes a little sharper the natural incline to immorality. If this article does not draw fire, we shall be much mistaken. We hope and trust that its application is much less pointed here than in England. There are able and interesting articles on the Reformation Era, Monastic Reminiscences, and the Reasonableness of Evolution. George Eliot and Thomas Carlyle are discussed in a paper by George Sarson, M.A., without any particular illumination. A large batch of book-notices concludes the number. Many of these are excellent.

REVUE DE BELGIQUE.—The number for March 15, in noticing the centennial anniversary of Lessing's death, one month previous, shows how his Freethinker, his Jew, and his Nathan "represent the philosophy of liberty, and form a trilogy of human brotherhood." Other articles of interest give a review of Gevaert's elaborate work on ancient music, an account of some recent progress toward popular government in Prussia, a description of Cambridge University, England, and the conclusion of a narrative of travels in the United States last winter by one of the editors, who seems to have been particularly impressed by the agricultural and mineral resources of Northern Alabama and the advantages of emigration thither. There is also a chapter of a story which is all we find that may be called French, except the language in this able organ of Belgian freethought.

IN the Catholic World for April, Rev. George M. Searle discusses the subject of miracles under the title "Dr. Tyng's Sermon on 'The Mountain Movers.'" The writer claims that miracles furnish "conclusive evidence of the divine sanctions of the Catholic Church," and intimates that Dr. Tyng will come to see this, if he follows, "conscientiously and rationally," the road he has already started upon. An article on "Heathendom and Revelation" calls attention to the similarity between Christianity and the ancient religions, in regard to both doctrines and practice. A writer on "Thomas Carlyle" credits him with being a great master of language and a good translator, and says, "Of all that he has written, only his few translations from the German, with an essay or two, will survive." "'Young Ireland' and the Ireland of To-day" is the subject of a spirited article, showing up the present grievances of Ireland under English rule.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

CARL SCHURZ has quietly settled down to the editorial work of his paper, the Westliche Post in St. Louis.

MADAME TARNOWSKI, a Russian lady, has just been unanimously elected an active member of the Society of Physicians in charge of the lunatic asylums of her native country.

WENDELL PHILLIPS and Gov. Long have been exchanging some sharp words through the columns of the Boston Advertiser the past week. The point of difference between them was in regard to the legality of the execution of a murderer. The Governor commutes the sentence for two months.

W. F. T. SHANKS, a journalist of New York, recovers $2,500 from the American News Company for circulating the notorious paper known as Truth, which he alleged contained a libel on him. Truth is an excellent word at the head of a paper, but those who have thus given it special prominence in that city have some way been distinguished for the opposite of its significance.

ANDREW D. WHITE, Minister to Berlin, is ready to come home, it is said, and resume the presidency of Cornell University. It is rumored that Whitelaw Reid, who is about to be married and go abroad, would be willing to succeed him. Contrary report states John Hays, who is to edit the Tribune during Mr. Reid's absence, will retire from that position at the expiration of six months, and the former editor succeed to the chair he is to leave at least for the present.

MR. JAMES PARTON'S Life of Voltaire will be published early in May by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. of this city. The work is in two volumes octavo, of about six hundred and forty pages each, and is illustrated by two finely executed portraits, a view of Voltaire's house at Ferney, of the Calas house at Toulouse, and a fac-simile of one of Voltaire's letters. In an appendix to one of the volumes will be placed two curious catalogues, one of all the publications of Voltaire himself, numbering two hundred and sixty, and the other of all the works concerning him, now including nearly five hundred titles. From the latter list, it will be seen that he has figured as a character in thirty or forty comedies, vaudevilles, burlesques, and serious dramas.

JAMES T. FIELDS, very widely known as a retired publisher, bookseller, author, and lecturer, died suddenly from an attack of heart disease, at his residence in this city, last Sunday evening. To all outward appearance, Mr. Fields' life was an exceptionally happy and prosperous one. He came to this city when a boy from Portsmouth, N.H., his birthplace, having previously shown much aptitude for learning in the schools of that town, where he attained the elements of an education. He found employment in the bookstore of Ticknor & Reed, in which firm he subsequently became a partner, and began his very successful career alike as an author and a publisher. Mr. Fields was distinguished in private life for his social character, vivacious and genial intercourse, which won him rare popularity among all who came in contact with him through business or other relations. He was twice married, and, though without children, most happy in his domestic life. His wife survives him.

C. D. B. MILLS is actively engaged in lecturing in the West. In a note received from him the first of this month, he says: "I am to meet friends in Milwaukee for a conversational lecture on Monday evening, April 4; to give a public lecture in Racine, Wis., on Tuesday, April 5; and I speak twice in Omaha—namely, Saturday 9, and Sunday 10. Then I shall hasten to Colorado, if I can get over the railroad." The Council Bluffs Daily Nonpareil contains this allusion to a lecture upon "Supply and Demand in Nature" by Mr. Mills on the 12th inst., in that city: "The lecture was eminently encyclopedic. There are but few men before the public that can betray in an hour so much deep research, careful thinking, and well assimilated information on every subject. But few men can impart their stores of information in tones more clear or pleasant, or can more readily form so many clear, concise, felicitous sentences, or draw from such a resource of apt quotation and pertinent illustration, or so enwrap an audience with his theme. The lecture, a masterpiece of its kind, was a rare treat. The spacious hall was well filled, but we could not but wish that instead of two hundred listening ears there were two thousand or more of our citizens. Mr. Mills lectures in Omaha on Friday night, and then proceeds to Colorado."

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

SONG OF THE TRUTHSEEKER.

Of all the swaying powers,
Truth will not play thee wrong:
The wondrous charm is ours,
If faith be deep and strong.
O marvelled height of power!
O guide I cannot shun!
Thou'rt gentle as a flower,
Thou'rt mighty as a sun.

The garland woven for us
Truth holds for him who yearns;
The crown suspended o'er us
Is but for him who earns.
To whom is wisdom given?
To whom the light befell?
A martyred few have striven
Till many felt the spell.

The pride of honest striving
Doth glow the sage's face;
The priest doth seek the thriving,
The seer doth seek the grace.
O life of autumns weary!
O life of countless springs!
The truth doth soar undreary,
The false hath never wings.

In storm and scorn and battle,
In woe and hate and pain,
Above false praise and prattle,
Above all priestly stain,
Up in the glow of morning,
Up in the evening's gray,
Thou, winged one, with thy warning,
Thou steal'st my soul away.

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 28, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF SPIRITUALISM.

We are more than willing to print in the columns of the Index Mr. Coleman's essay on "Science and Spiritualism." We welcome his statement. Though unable to accept his conclusions, we have been glad to read so lucid and calm an argument in behalf of the spiritualistic theory. Mr. Coleman greatly strengthens his reasoning by his very moderation. In spirit and intent, he uses only the scientific method of inquiry. He makes a very large deduction, to begin with, from the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism as being more or less tainted with fraud or with delusion or as explainable by "psychic force," a power not necessarily implying any other intelligence than that embodied in human organisms here on earth. But he claims that, after the most careful sifting of the phenomena, there still remains a "winnowed residuum of facts" not otherwise explainable than by the impact of super-mundane intelligences upon man's earthly organism. And he gives a list of facts which, in his judgment, require for explanation this theory of spirit influence. One may question whether such a conclusion is rigidly drawn from the premises, or whether the alleged "residuum of facts" might not be still further sifted by the stern demands of scientific observation or logically by the principles which Mr. Coleman himself has frankly and clearly stated; but, however this may be, one can but admit and admire the evident purpose of Mr. Coleman to keep strictly within the limits of science, and to receive nothing not capable of scientific authentication.

It is not our intention at this time to attempt to traverse in order Mr. Coleman's statement of cases which he thinks prove the hypothesis of spirit communication. There are two questions, however, which appear to us to apply with more or less force to them all. First, admitting that all possible chances for fraud have been eliminated, is it not possible that honest self-delusion, which Mr. Coleman affirms to prevail largely in spiritual phenomena, extends also into these cases? Second, is it not possible that the psychic force, which, it is admitted, can now explain a very large part of the phenomena without the necessity of spirit influence, will also, when better understood, explain the other part in the same way? Sergeant Cox, Mr. Coleman, and other fair-minded investigators have decided these questions in the negative. But in matters of such grave moment, involving a belief of such tremendous import, questions must not be prematurely closed. The evidence is not all in. Scientific men, in fact, are almost just beginning to turn their attention to this strange power named psychic force. For our part, we do not see why most, if not all, of Mr. Coleman's "residuum of facts" may not be accounted for either under the known experience of self-delusion or as caused by the singular, if not abnormal, process of cerebration peculiar to the psychic temperament. Yet we would not dogmatically affirm this to be so. We only affirm that the question to us is too vast a one to be closed on the present condition of the evidence.

Spiritualism has been greatly hindered hitherto in getting its case into the court of science by the large amount of mercenary fraud connected with it. Latterly, also, many of its leaders have seemed to us to have assumed an attitude savoring too much of the old theological arrogance toward those who cannot pronounce the spiritualistic shibboleth. Then, too, moral discredit has been brought upon the movement, in spite of the many morally excellent people that are believers in the spiritualistic theory, by the assaults, theoretical and practical, which have been made on the marriage institution by a large and active section of Spiritualists. But in the last year new interest, outside of spiritualistic believers, has been awakened with regard to the phenomena and their cause. If this interest can be met and seconded by an increasing class of fair-minded and pure-minded and genuinely liberal believers, such as Mr. Coleman represents, who are not so much concerned to maintain the ism of their faith as to discover truth and promote righteousness, the two parties may be of mutual service in lifting Spiritualism to new vantage-ground for benefiting humanity.

SOMETIMES people put into their wills their best selves and sometimes their meanest selves. Carlyle seems to have put into his will his tenderest and humblest self. The whole of the document is interesting reading. But the part in which he bequeaths certain books to Harvard College has a special value, as showing that he did not in reality think quite so badly of America as he was apt to talk. This is the way in which he makes this bequest: "Having with good reason, ever since my first appearance in literature, a variety of kind feelings, obligations, and regards toward New England, and indeed, long before that, a hearty goodwill, real and steady, which still continues to America at large, and recognizing with gratitude how much of friendliness, of actually credible human love, I have had from that country, and what immensity of worth and capability I believe, and partly know, to be lodged, especially in the silent classes there, I have now, after due consultation as to the feasibilities, the excusabilities of it, decided to fulfil a fond notion that has been hovering in my mind these many years; and I do, therefore, hereby bequeath the books (whatever of them I could not borrow, but had to buy and gather, that is, in general whatever of them are still here) which I used in writing on Cromwell and Friedrich, and which shall be accurately searched for, and parted from my other books, to the President and Fellows of Harvard College, City of Cambridge, State of Massachusetts, as a poor testimony of my respect for that Alma Mater of so many of my transatlantic friends, and a token of the feelings above indicated toward the great country of which Harvard is the chief school,—in which sense I have reason to be confident that the Harvard authorities will please to accept this, my little bequest, and deal with it, and order and use it, as to their own good judgment and kind fidelity shall seem fittest. A certain symbolical value the bequest may have, but of intrinsic value as a collection of old books it can pretend to very little. If there should be doubt as to any books coming within the category of this bequest, my dear brother John, if left behind me, as I always trust and hope, who already knows about this Harvard matter, and who possesses a catalogue or list drawn up by me of which the counterpart is in possession of the Harvard authorities, will see it for me in all points accurately done. In regard to this and to all else in these final directions of mine, I wish him to be regarded as my second self, my surviving self."

THE Boston Transcript for Wednesday, April 13, calls attention to Joseph Cook's statement in a public lecture at Dumfries, Scotland, that "Robert Burns was in conviction, whatever he may have been in portions of his practice, tolerably loyal to your Scottish Evangelical confession," and shows how utterly false such a claim is, in view not only of the poet's bitter satires on the illiberal ministers and their views, especially Trinitarianism, but his writing to a friend,—"If there be any truth in the orthodox faith of these churches, I am damned past redemption, and, what is worse, damned to all eternity."

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

THE Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston on the 26th and 27th of May, beginning with the usual business meeting on Thursday evening, the 26th. Full particulars will be given soon.

SUNDAY LECTURES IN CINCINNATI.

The Unity Club of Cincinnati has given, during the last two winters, a very impressive lesson of the use that may be made of Sunday, aside from its religious observance. We say aside from its religious observance, because it is very clear that there is a vast number of persons in every community in this country, and especially in the great cities, who have no intention of passing it in the religious way.

It may or may not be a cause for regret that such is the case, but the fact nevertheless remains the same. The Unity Club of Cincinnati, with becoming wisdom and good practical sense, has frankly and bravely conceded this, and prepared to make the best of it. It has accordingly instituted in the city just mentioned courses of "Sunday Afternoon Lectures for the People." They have been designed "to stimulate intelligent interest in scientific, literary, and social questions, and to promote a nobler use of Sunday." The place chosen for these lectures has been Pike's Opera House, a well-known, commodious, and attractive resort of Cincinnati; and the audiences have been large and attractive. A small price of admission has been charged, but fifteen cents for a single ticket or for the course one dollar.

The speakers the past winter have included the following distinguished persons: Archibald Forbes, the London war correspondent, Prof. T. Sterry Hunt, Mrs. Mary Livermore, Prof. E. S. Morse, Miss Mary F. Eastman, Hon. Carl Schurz, and others of like rank as lecturers. A friend, who has been actively engaged in this enterprise, in a private letter to us, speaks of it as follows:—

Digitized by Google

The Sunday afternoon lectures are of great interest and profit to our city. The audiences this year average fifteen hundred, and a more attentive and responsive hearing one rarely gets. Though many stand all through the lectures, rarely indeed does one leave the house before it is ended, though the speakers frequently occupy an hour and a half or more. A crowd of two hundred or more people gather about the door half an hour before they are opened, anxious for the best seats. Many are young men, perhaps one-third or more of the audience. I saw three darkeys, "black as Erebus," taking notes at Mr. Towle's lecture last Sunday. It is a singular audience, the most prominent people intellectually and socially sitting side by side with the mechanic or the house-servant. It is a great leveller, too, in the religious world. Our religious papers denounced or regretted the course, and some ministers even attacked it from their pulpits; but their own people came for curiosity, and some better reason perhaps.

Mrs. Livermore was a great star. She also preached in my church to an overflowing house, and converted many to woman in the pulpit, and charmed everybody.

It shows that the decadence of the lyceum system is largely owing to the bad faith and bad management of its managers. The causes of our success are:—

1st. An excellent list of speakers, with dignified topics of human interest. We try hard to keep up the tone of our course by excluding charlatans or mere amusement-mongers.

2d. The low cost of admission.

3d. The favorable hour at which the lectures are held.

4th. A genial management. The profits are given to charity. We are not narrow in our selection of speakers, neither radically nor conservatively.

A SUGGESTED BASIS OF UNION.

Will you allow me to try my hand also at suggesting a suitable statement for the organization of liberal societies?

Agreeing substantially with your criticisms in the Index of April 14, upon the proposed "Articles of Faith" in the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston, I thoroughly concur with your opinion that it is "better to forego all attempts to unite people in any expression of belief, even the most liberal, and try rather to form a union in some common expression of purpose." With this object in view, the society of which I am at present minister recently adopted the following: "We whose names are hereto subscribed associate ourselves for the advancement of truth and justice and love." This is not in any dogmatic sense an "article of faith," but is strictly the expression of a purpose, and has been entitled therefore a "Bond of Union." It has been signed by Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, Materialists liberal Episcopalians, and liberal Orthodox,—by representatives, in fact, of all the classes who can with any consistency be termed Free Religious. That the statement combines simplicity and brevity, I think none will dispute. Moreover, the phrase "The advancement of truth and justice and love" seems to me to sum up all the objects in pursuit of which all the members of a liberal society can consistently unite. There is nothing in theology or philosophy or science, nothing in schemes for social improvement or benevolent work, nothing in sincere aspiration, which may not be here included. At the same time, the phraseology is practically definite and discriminating; for it seems to mark off sharply a liberal society, thus organized, from any ordinary religious church or sect. No sect seeks to advance truth, its dogmas being assumed to contain already a perfect expression thereof.

Some verbal basis of agreement seems to be necessary in the organization of liberal societies, and I present the above as a possible help to those seeking one. R. C.

OUR LIBRARY.

X.

The Positivists.

By Positivists, I mean not only Comte and his followers, but all who have learned from Bacon and Locke to seek for knowledge through observation and experience only, to ascribe all physical phenomena to physical causes, to believe in the order of nature, and to be satisfied with simply relative knowledge without attempting to comprehend the absolute. Here, however, I shall speak only of such Positivists as have not become evolutionists; those that have being reserved for the next two articles.

None of the early Positivists has had more influence on the most recent thought than Comte, who will be always famous for the great discovery that there are three historical stages of thought. The earliest is the theological, in which every event is ascribed to some supernatural person, and in which people believe in signs, omens, and miracles. After this comes the metaphysical stage, that of belief in the reign of imaginary though impersonal powers, like those taken for granted in most systems of philosophy and also in astrology and alchemy, fanciful forms assumed in this stage by the sciences which in the next one became astronomy and chemistry. Then, highest of all is the positive stage, in which all events are referred to natural forces working by invariable laws and with powers which may be known scientifically. All mental activity tends toward this ultimate stage, beyond which we cannot go, evolutionism itself being really only an extension of the earlier form of positivism. And not only has Comte thus shown the law of progress and highest state of knowledge, but he has also done great service by arranging the sciences in a natural order peculiarly favorable for study, as it is that of progress from the simple to the complex. This series, each member of which requires the knowledge of its predecessors, is as follows: Mathematics, Astronomy, Physics, Chemistry, Biology, and Sociology. The arrangement has been severely criticised by Herbert Spencer; but Mill and Lewes defend it, and it is at least a great step toward the true system. Another prominent doctrine of Comte—namely, that the highest object of religious feeling and moral effort is mankind—has won wide acceptance among people who do not observe any of the peculiar ceremonies enjoined in the Positivist Catechism, or admit the authority over thought which the first High-priest of Humanity claimed for himself and his successors. No one can deny Comte's great merit not only as a moralist but as an historian, whatever may be thought of his later speculations, which have been sharply criticised by J. S. Mill, who has, however, done full justice to his real services to thought. Excellent abridgments of his Positive Philosophy have been made by Harriet Martineau and G. H. Lewes. The former, whose Autobiography is especially valuable on account of the frankness with which she puts aside all theological questions as insoluble, held an independent though essentially Positivist position; but the latter, like John Fiske, is among those Comtists who became evolutionists, while others, like Harrison, Littré, and Congreve, have done their best work on the foundation which their master laid.

The most influential of English Positivists, however, is John Stuart Mill, who always criticised Comte freely, but who assisted him in spreading his views, as he did Herbert Spencer also, knowing that differences in opinion are necessary to the progress of thought. His boldest work is the Three Essays on Religion. In the first of these, he shows that there is too much sin and misery in Nature for us to have a right to believe that we ought to follow her, or that she is the work of a being who is omnipotent as well as beneficent. Then he urges in the second essay that religion is not so necessary as is often supposed for either virtue or happiness, morality being in reality largely the result of public opinion, of which religion is only one out of many forms of expression, while one of the most joyous of nations, that of the ancient Greeks, had but little faith in immortality. One of the most powerful passages of this essay is that in which he proves, that faith in a God who sends most of his creatures to hell promotes not only wretchedness, but vice.

The third essay is less positive in tone, and favors belief in the divine existence and beneficence, though not omnipotence, the probability of immortality, and the ideal goodness of Jesus. Some utterances of his views about religion will be found in his Autobiography; but this is of value mainly as telling the process of education which developed his great intellect, and the circumstances under which he produced his precious books. Of these, the most elaborate is the System of Logic, in which, as well as in the Examination of Hamilton, he sets forth with unrivalled power the essential principles not only of his own philosophy, but of all sound reasoning. Peculiarly valuable for the support given to Free Trade, Civil Service Reform, Minority Representation, Female Suffrage, and other measures likely to become prominent in American politics, are the Considerations on Representative Government and the Principles of Political Economy. To the latter work, important contributions were made by the lady who afterward became Mrs. Mill, and who had great influence on two more popular works than any yet mentioned; namely, those on Liberty and on the Subjection of Women. These are valuable contributions to the cause of progress, though, as pointed out by Fitz-James Stephen in his Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, they often fall short of the high morality which Mill himself has stated in several of his Dissertations and Discussions, and especially in the essay, separately printed, on Utilitarianism.

This system distinguishes actions as right or wrong, according to their tendencies to increase or diminish the happiness of all parties concerned, and is based on two facts; first, that men are substantially agreed in enforcing those great precepts of justice, love, self-control, and self-culture, which have been found essential to the general happiness; and, second, that, independent of this pressure of authority, individuals are impelled to obey these precepts by sympathy with others, and also by the knowledge that the highest happiness of each can only be realized in the happiness of all. Its essentially disinterested character has been fully shown by Mill; while among its leading expositors, under various modifications, have been his father, James Mill, the Austins, Bentham, Paley, Locke, Hume, Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, Seneca, and Aristotle, besides such recent advocates as Bain, Fiske, and Herbert Spencer. From these authors, we must learn the one thing most needed for the future welfare of freethought; namely, the establishment of morality on a firm, practical foundation, independent of theology or metaphysics. Thus, the power of Positivism is in the utilitarian moralists.

None of the literary productions of this movement have done more for its popularity than its histories, for instance those by Hume, Gibbon, James Mill, Comte, Harriet Martineau, Lewes, Buckle, Taine, Leslie Stephen, and Morley, whose biographies of Voltaire and Rousseau have a scope that is really historical.

And I cannot pass by Leslie Stephen without calling attention to his essays on Freethinking and Plain Speaking. The whole book is remarkable for originality of thought and vigor of style. The first and last chapters prove that, since the safety of society rests on our confidence in each other's veracity, people have no right to require that whoever rejects their opinions should keep his disbelief to himself. And so he who by silent conformity permits himself to be considered as a believer in creeds which he does not hold is really endangering social peace and prosperity, as well as checking mental progress and violating one of the highest principles of morality. We cannot be told too often or too plainly that: "The system which is really most calculated to make men happy is that which forces them to live in a bracing atmosphere, which fits them to look facts in the face and to suppress vain repinings by strenuous action instead of luxurious dreaming. And hence, too, the time is come for speaking plainly. If you would wait to speak the truth until you can replace the old decaying formula by a completely elaborated system, you must wait forever; for the system can never be elaborated until its leading principles have been boldly enunciated. . . . If we had always waited to clear away shams till we were certain that our action would produce absolutely unmixed benefits, we should still be worshipping Mumbo Jumbo."

Digitized by Google

And Leslie Stephen has a high place in literary criticism, as have also Mill, Taine, and Swinburne, whose writings, like George Eliot's, show that Positivism does not hinder the appreciation of beauty. Walt Whitman, however, has mingled the vigor and clearness characteristic of this school of thought with a coarseness which is all his own.

Taine we must not leave without mentioning that his Intelligence, like Jevons' Principles of Science, adds to Mill's System of Logic all that is needed to make it a complete statement of all that can be known positively. The materialists, indeed, claim to go further than this; but I need only say of them here that their most widely circulated books, besides those of Büchner, who is an evolutionist, are Feuerbach's Essence of Christianity and Ingersoll's Oration on the Gods.

The glory of Positivism is in the work which has been done for popular enlightenment, political and religious liberty, and social reform by Franklin, Jefferson, Paine, Montesquieu, Voltaire, Diderot, D'Holbach, Madame Roland, Madame de Staël, Bentham, William Godwin, Mary Woolstonecraft, Fanny Wright, George Combe, Robert and William Chambers, Alexander and Wilhelm von Humboldt, Comte, Mill, Harriet Martineau, Robert Owen, Bradlaugh, Holyoake, and many like them. Holyoake deserves special notice as the founder of Secularism, a movement whose adherents are so numerous and well organized that Bradlaugh has said that he needed only three days to have any placard he wished posted up in every large town in England and Scotland. This statement was made ten years ago in the debate between Bradlaugh and Holyoake as to whether Secularism is necessarily Atheism. However Secularists may differ on this question, they all believe in the obligation of attacking all barriers to freedom of htought and speech, in the adequacy of utilitarianism as the law of duty, and in the sufficiency not only of secular reason—that is, of thought set free from priestly control and directed wholly toward the present life—for human guidance, but of material means for social progress. Our readers need only a reference to what Ingersoll, Underwood, and other earnest workers are doing to spread similar views in America. And we can be sure that we have much to gain in virtue, wisdom, and happiness from learning to cultivate our intellect so that it can control our feelings, to guide ourselves by scientific principles instead of outgrown theologies or visionary philosophies, to live for the best part of this world which we know and have about us, and not for a future one which we do not know and may never reach, and finally to consecrate all the strength and zeal, hitherto wasted on fighting over doctrinal and metaphysical fancies, to friendly labor for the substantial welfare of our race.

F. M. H.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Prevention of Pauperism.

THE old proverb that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" has long since been recognized as peculiarly applicable to pauperism; i.e., dependent poverty. For this, all measures of direct relief—poor-farms, soup-houses, street-alms, giving at the doors, and the like—have been found, at best, only partial and temporary alleviations. While often, and, in the case of some of these methods, always, aggravation and increase of poverty are the results. So prevalent and pressing has this condition been in all countries as to be considered by many normal and irremediable. In Christendom, this view has been strengthened by the false interpretation put upon the words of Jesus, "The poor ye have with you alway." By the perversion of this simple statement of an existing fact into a prophetic declaration for the future, poverty is pronounced a perpetual necessity. Its continuance is accepted, on this unquestioned authority, as inevitable. So the Church can only enjoin, as for the most part it contents itself with doing, the extension of such relief as may be rendered feasible by the various charitable agencies which it invokes or adopts. Even here, it falls short of and misapplies the teaching of its own oracle, the New Testament. For charity, in the mind and according to the speech of Paul and Jesus, was no mere alms-giving; but a very deep interest in man, sympathizing with his sufferings and sorrowing over his sins. It may be that Christianity so emphasizes the tender sentiments of pity, compassion, and benevolence as to give them undue prominence. Still, the emphasis is well put: first, as a protest against the selfish hardness of men; and, second, as the preparation for a wiser and larger method of human service. Between the tyranny of selfishness and the triumph of justice lies the rule of love. Christianity, in inaugurating that rule, makes way for the justice which Social Science is yet to establish. Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, the well-known philanthropist, has been recently quoted as saying that she had given away thousands of dollars in attempted relief of human suffering, which experience had taught her was worse than wasted. But the wiser methods toward which she would turn could have been reached only by this experience. Nor can they be vigorously maintained but by that interested sympathy for humanity, which, first directed toward simple relief and its imperfect results, shall now be turned to methods of prevention with better promise.

In the ideal state, which Social Science projects in its vision of the future,—when children shall be wisely conceived and worthily born and bred, when intelligence shall be wedded to strength and right joined to might, when land shall be more extensively divided among the people, and the people be more widely scattered over the land, when capital and labor shall work together in harmony, and make equitable distribution of their jointly produced results,—then shall there be neither the extreme of untold wealth on the one side nor of unmeasured poverty on the other. Then shall pauperism, save possibly in rare accidental and exceptional cases, no longer exist. But we cannot leap into this state: we can only reach it by long plodding and weary effort:—

> "Heaven is not gained at a single bound;
> But we build the ladder by which we rise
> From the lowly earth to the lof y skies;
> And we climb to its summit round by round."

The "Kingdom" as Jesus termed it, the "New Republic" as modern speech would phrase it, the reconstructed social state, founded on justice, knit together in mutual coöperation, is to come only by many and slow stages. He who is engaged in the study and proclamation of the fundamental principles on which such society shall be based, and by which it shall be actuated, is doing the true preventive and constructive work, warding off the ill, building up the good; while every attempt to open individual opportunity, to inspire personal self-reliance, to promote mutual helpfulness, is a step, however small, toward such result.

From this point of view, the reports which reach us from time to time, of certain organizations for the benefit of the poor, derive a special interest. Such is the "Industrial Aid Society for the Prevention of Pauperism," located in this city (formerly known by the latter half of its title alone), and which has issued its Forty-fifth Annual Report. The principal object of this society is not alms-giving, but to bring together the unemployed and those who will employ them. Between two and three thousand cases have been thus served during the past year. It has interested itself, through committees, public meetings, and other special efforts in the matter of industrial education,—the training of young men and women to skilled labor in all departments, shop, factory, mill; in making clothing, weaving silk and lace, in laundry, cooking, and general housework. It announces that, through the beneficence of a lady of this city, a large building has been secured for instruction in some of these latter branches; also, that it is understood that the Liversedge School for training in agricultural pursuits and forest culture will soon be organized. It expresses the hope that the establishment of technical schools on a large scale for boys, by the city, for which an act was passed in 1872, and which has been repeatedly discussed and partly accomplished, may be effected the present year.

Such, too, is the Children's Aid Society, of New York, whose Twenty-eighth Yearly Report lies before us. This society labors for the very young, the uncared-for waifs and estrays of the great metropolis. With its twenty-one Industrial Schools, in which the rudiments of a common English education as well as machine and hand sewing and various domestic branches are taught to an average daily attendance of more than thirty-five hundred; its six Lodging Houses, affording food, shelter, and teaching, during the year, to thirteen thousand boys and girls; its Sick Children's Mission and its Summer Home, relieving and refreshing their thousands,—it is certainly doing much to alleviate and elevate the condition of its subjects. But its chief and most notable work consists in furnishing homes to the homeless. These it has provided for more than thirty-seven hundred during the year, scattering them through twenty-seven States, mostly, however, in New York and the West. The number thus provided during its entire existence reaches nearly sixty thousand. It is not claimed, of course, that the whole of these have justified, by their subsequent career, the efforts thus made for them. But a very considerable proportion of them have been unquestionably transferred from the dependent and dangerous to the reliant and useful classes.

The latter society has been both preceded and followed by those of similar name and purpose in many of the large cities, from Boston to San Francisco. While in town and country are to be found not a few institutions, varying in title and method, but, according to their ability, doing practically the same work. Both the organizations above named are representative of numerous others laboring for kindred results. The effect of their labors may not be largely perceptible in the mass of needy and dependent humanity; but, for the individual acted on, it is certainly an elevation into self-reliant usefulness. So far, therefore, these attempts are steps toward the solution of the problem whose final and complete reduction shall be reached only in the far future, and through the steady annunciation of fundamental principles, and the persistent application of the radical measures which those principles require.

F. H.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 10, 1881.

There is a small band of temperance men in this State who have advocated their cause with some energy and power for years. Rev. John Harmon, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, is one of the most persistent agitators, and has lectured in behalf of temperance in different parts of the State. There have been two attempts during the past ten years to establish a newspaper devoted to temperance in New Orleans, and both failed. A full prohibition State ticket was put in the field at a late election, and for it a few votes were counted in this city, a less number than were actually polled. These ballots, it is asserted, were scattered. Yet the friends of temperance are not discouraged. Every day chronicles new victims to the dram-shop, men of fine abilities utterly ruined, prison doors shutting them off from the world, and evil legislation attesting the subtle influence of whiskey in the administration of civil affairs. To their credit, be it said that both branches of the Methodist Episcopal Church in this State have this year resolved to agitate for prohibition, and request additional legislation at the next session of the Legislature. The prohibition tide that seems to be sweeping over the country ebbs and flows here. The press considers it worth while to notice, in the interest of a large class of patrons, the assaults upon the liquor trade. Here is a specimen from the New Orleans daily:—

Digitized by Google

General Neal Dow is reported to have personally entered complaints against seventeen places in Portland, Me., on Tuesday of last week, where he claimed to have reason to suppose liquor was sold. If the redoubtable Dow is the philanthropist he pretends to be, he should visit at least seventeen places in Plaquemines Parish, State of Louisiana, and make restitution to the owners thereof of pianos [a description of property he had a great penchant for] and other articles of household furniture he predaciously seized while his head-quarters, during the late war, were at Fort St. Phillip. He is one of the kind of thrifty warriors that strained at a glass of whiskey and swallowed a whole houseful of "rebel" furniture.

Of course, this will provoke a smile among General Dow's friends away up in Maine; but here it will operate to lessen the sympathy of the community, who have never learned to appreciate Union warriors, with his temperance work. Of the truth of the matter, I quote from a letter from General Dow:—

I never seized anything of that sort, but only some things necessary for hospital use and for the troops under my command, as authorized and required by general orders to do, and for which arrangements were always ready to be made for payment, which was also provided for by general orders. That unauthorized depredations in every military department were sometimes committed was no doubt true; but I always did everything in my power in my command to prevent them.

A direct temperance movement will command more respect than Sunday-closing ordinances, with their indirect and questionable effects.

As in Louisiana, so in Arkansas, Mississippi, and Texas, the friends of prohibition are at work; and their recent defeats by close votes in the Legislatures will awaken renewed zeal for a continuous campaign. E. B.

LECTURES AT REVERE.

The people of Revere have been entertained and instructed by a course of twelve lectures, six under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, and six under the Free Religious Society of Revere. Our old friend and associate, Mr. L. K. Washburn, commenced the course, and favored us with one of his best efforts. The other five lecturers from the Association were Mr. C. D. B. Mills, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Mr. Wm. H. Spencer, Mr. G. W. Cook, and F. A. Hinckley. All of them were listened to with marked attention, and their essays were well received. Mr. S. B. Weston delivered two lectures, "Need of Earnestness" and "Origin and Use of Sunday." Although a young man, his essays displayed thought and study, and gave convincing proof that he will be a rising man. The last four lectures were delivered by Mr. Charles Ellis. The subjects were "Faith and Scepticism," "Dead Theology and Live Religion," "The Reign of Law," and "Human Progress a Necessity." Mr. Ellis is a man of thought, learning, and ability. The folly, superstition, and bigotry of the different religious beliefs as derived from the Bible, also the Bible account of the creation of the world and all therein, including the creation of man and woman, their temptation by the devil and the subsequent redemption of man by vicarious atonement, are handled by him in a masterly manner. I advise all to hear Mr. Ellis, who desire to hear those subjects treated in an intelligent, bold, outspoken manner, with occasionally a little sarcasm, which often illustrates such matters more forcibly than can be done in any other way. J. S.

REVERE, April 13, 1881.

REV. S. F. GREEN, rector of St. John's, Miles Platting (England), and one of the defendants in the recent suit instituted by the Church Association for breaches of the rubric, has been arrested for contempt of court, and lodged in Lancaster gaol. The rectory is occupied by bailiffs, and Mr. Green's family have left.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

Emigrant Education.

From Washington, I received four hundred and seventy-five valuable maps of seventeen of the chief States of America. These, with other documents given me by the Canadian Government, together with numerous letters and schemes received from correspondents, I have transferred to the Guild for the use of co-operative, secular, and working-men's societies and clubs. Mr. Alsager Hay Hill, editor of the Labor News, 15 Russell Street, Covent Garden, London, has knowledge and means of advising emigrants. His disinterested service of working people is widely known. Many letters which I have received from land agents are marked by candor and circumstance of statement, are full of interest and valuable information; and confidence may manifestly be placed in the writers. Any colony aid committee need not seek to supersede nor conflict with already well-organized arrangements which individual agencies may have established. Many States in Australia, as also in Canada and America, have authorized agents, official and responsible, for the sale of State lands. All an English committee require to do is to devise a plan of co-operative emigration, and carry it out as an example and model to others. By communication with individuals and official agents, they might be induced to add co-operative features, facilities, and securities to their plans. It is no object nor necessity of an English society to conduct the business of the world themselves, but to induce and by example encourage all concerned in trade, commerce, and emigration, to conduct it, as far as possible, upon co-operative lines. Thus, a knowledge of associative principles may be carried, as it were, upon the wings of the wind to the four corners of the world, and made enduring in men's minds by the sense of timely, profitable, and disinterested service.

I care for emigration exactly as I care for co-operation,—as the cause of the poor, not of the rich. I am not for that emigration which takes away the well-paid workman from a good employer. But I am for the emigration of all those who cannot find a well-spread table for their families here. And it is the interest of all of us that emigration should be in the future co-operative, as it will diminish the competition which will arise otherwise among isolated settlers, and it will develop social life, where it is most needed. Englishmen and English ideas are welcome in America and Canada; and it is to the interest of this country that freedom, civilization, and social life should be strengthened by the solidity of English thought. Besides, it must be obvious to all who are familiar with public affairs that the world has changed. Industrial society has reached a new stage. New forces, new conditions, and new opportunities now exist. Europe is crowded. Crowns, feudalism, privilege, partial laws, and devouring armaments deprive the common people of subsistence or condemn them to perpetual precariousness. Here, in England, we have surplus workers. Abroad there are unoccupied acres, where a hundred millions of families may dwell in opulence and ownership. Here the government offers to workmen only the lot of the soldier or the fate of the pauper. The sole deliverance is that of wedding the people to the prairies. The new cry of progress is dispersion. If workmen are wise, they will train no more children for mine or mill. Mechanics only minister to luxury they can, as a rule, never taste. Children should be trained for the field. Their eyes should be taught to look abroad. They should be familiarized with the literature of adventure, and fed with the inspiration of distant enterprise. No education is of any value to them which does not include that of the farm and soil and crops and climates. The steamship will carry them to lands of independence in ten days. I for one say to mechanics, Beg no more for employment, higgle and supplicate no more for hopeless increase of wages,—go away. The farmer does not want you, the manufacturer does not want you, the tradesman does not want you, the poor-law guardians do not want you,—go away. You have nothing to gain by violence, you ought not to seek anything from pity. Learn from the negro of the South, if you cannot learn from your own pride,—go away. Wait not around the shopkeeper's till for the dole of workhouse rates. Hang no more round the doors of the Poor-law Union,—go away. Be no recruits in the hateful wars of empire. Shed not your blood in carrying desolation and death among nations as honest and more unfortunate than yourselves. No terror or toil of the wilderness can equal the peril and shame of this,—go away. Let those who will "rectify frontiers," your duty is to "rectify the frontier" of poverty and dependence. Let those who have just employers honor them and continue in their service. Let all who can command adequate subsistence here remain and increase the honest renown and prosperity of their native land. But let the poor save a little capital at co-operative stores, and join the great fortunes of those nations where freedom and equality dwell, and where wealth awaits all who have fortitude, common-sense, courage, and industry. To all who by generous care of others endow emigrants with co-operative knowledge, and create for them co-operative facilities,—to them will belong the praise of advancing progress without conflict, of saving labor and capital from the ultimate strife of blood, and of insuring the prosperity of every honest interest, beyond the dreams of statesmanship.

May I inform your many readers who seek back numbers of the Co-operative News, which cannot be supplied, that these chapters, printed by the Co-operative Printing Society of Manchester, will shortly be published in a volume, by Messrs. T. H. Roberts & Co., of 42 Essex Street, Temple, London, with a double-page illustration of the Author being interviewed by Frank Leslie. Also there will be immediately published a handsome and complete edition at one dollar and fifty cents (6*s.* 3*d.*) by the great publishing firm, Messrs. Belford, Clarke & Co., of Chicago and Toronto, revised by my friend James Charlton, of Chicago. The following are the terms of the American preface to the volume:—

"The part of this book entitled 'Among the Americans' was written for the Manchester Co-operative News, for reasons stated in the previous preface. Messrs. Belford, Clarke & Co. do me the honor to reprint these chapters, together with the article I contributed to the Nineteenth Century, entitled 'A Stranger in America'; and they have generously and voluntarily agreed to give me a fair share of the profits that may accrue therefrom. As they are pleased to think the papers will interest the American people, among whom I spent happy months, I should feel indebted to them, had no advantage come to me thereby. I will not conceal that their honorable offer does increase my satisfaction; and I have to acknowledge that the New York Tribune and the Index of Boston, which have published passages from these chapters, have treated me in the same handsome manner."

John Bull, in his solid, bovine way, does make steady progress after his kind. But his dietary, consisting of precedents, is not very stimulating; and he takes a long time in chewing the cud of progress. Like the oxen of Cuyp, he stands meditating over the hedge of his verdant little island, looking as though he was going to think; but he is so long about it that the spectator never feels sure that he does it. If anybody in England proposes to do a new thing, everybody exclaims, like Lord Melbourne: "Can you not let it alone? If you do it, everybody will do it." But everybody does not do it. England is a country where nothing leads to anything, and anything leads to nothing.

Three centuries ago, the Reformation broke out, when it was predicted that everybody would come to have ideas of his own. A few new creeds flew into the air and alighted upon ledges in the old rocks of opinion, where they have nestled with unadventurous content; and the groves of thought have seldom since been enlivened by new brightness of plumage or cheered by varieties of song. The republican equality and the republican freedom of America, with their infinite incentives and fertility of aspirations, were to me as a land of new colors and new notes, where the minds of the people, like keyless watches, wind themselves up and always keep going. I should have been glad to live there for years, so as to write about it. As it is, I content myself with relating a few of the things which I noticed.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

THE eminent Jewish scholar, Dr. Jules Oppert, whose investigations have done so much to elucidate the history of the Ancient Assyrian race, which had many points of contact with his own, has, says the Jewish Chronicle, just been elected by the French Academy to one of the forty chairs of that assembly. The vacancy which is thus filled was created by the death of M. Mariette, the Egyptologist.

Digitized by Google

LESSONS
ON
The Origin and Growth of Christianity.

XVIII.

THE METHOD OF JESUS.

"The people were astonished at his doctrine; for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes."—MATT. vii., 28, 29.

1. His Ethical Appeals.

In the GOLDEN RULE (Matt. vii., 12) and the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (Matt. v., vi., vii.), the ethical teaching of JESUS finds its highest illustration. PERFECTION IN PRACTICAL RIGHTEOUSNESS is made the end and object of life. (Matt. v., 48.) To forgive injuries and return good for evil is set forth as the duty of all men (Matt. v., 43–47); and the divine example is held up, that all may understand and follow it. Happiness and misery are declared to depend upon the character and actions of men; and the teachers of religion are to be judged by their practical works rather than their professions. (Matt. vii., 15–20.)

The aphorisms of JESUS are direct, simple, and easily understood. They are enforced with a felicity in illustration, a gentle persuasiveness, and "sweet reasonableness," which are in strong contrast with the dry, metaphysical reasonings of the philosophers. He avoided the hair-splitting logic and appeal to traditional technicalities, peculiar to the professional JEWISH teachers: "he taught as one having authority, and not as the Scribes." Doubtless, an impressive personal presence and an abounding sincerity—manifesting itself always in his ethical appeals, gave them additional weight with his hearers.

NOTE A.—"SWEET REASONABLENESS": (See MATTHEW ARNOLD'S Essays.) Does this seem inconsistent with his stern and caustic denunciation of the SCRIBES and PHARISEES? Yet do we not find both these characteristics combined in other strong natures?—e.g., in noted reformers like LUTHER, THEODORE PARKER, and WM. LLOYD GARRISON, whom some one styled "the most Christ-like man in AMERICA."

NOTE B.—PROF. F. W. NEWMAN and other writers have called attention to the fact that the ethical appeals of JESUS are almost always enforced by promises of reward to the obedient and threats of punishment to the disobedient. (See Matt. v., 3–12, 20, 22, 30, 44, 45; vi., 4, 6, 15, 18; Mark ix., 41; x., 29, 30; Luke x., 28; xiii., 23–30, etc.) Even the GOLDEN RULE and the command to love one's neighbor "as one's self" are alleged to be based on self-interest. These writers claim that the highest moral appeals would entirely discard self-interest as a motive for action.

ALTRUISM and EGOISM: What do these words mean? Is the highest morality wholly altruistic? How may extreme altruism defeat its own end, the desire to benefit others? Does not a proper care of self, of one's health, life, and ability to labor, lie at the foundation of all our usefulness? Yet is there not great danger that selfishness will become an end instead of a means? Is not the complete self-sacrifice of JESUS, culminating in his martyrdom, the source of much of the reverence in which he is now held? "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." Can you tell something about the early CHRISTIAN martyrs? Have other religions, too, had their martyrs? What do you know of the history of SERVETUS, GIORDANO BRUNO, and JOHN BROWN?

NOTE C.—THE TRUE FOUNDATION OF MORALS: Is it the Ten Commandments or the teachings of JESUS, the "Thus saith the LORD" of any alleged written or spoken REVELATION? Or is not MORALITY founded rather in the accumulated experience of the race? CONSCIENCE: Does it tell you what is right or wrong? If not, what is its office? Why do people differ as to what is right?

INTUITIONALISM or UTILITARIANISM: Which of these theories of the origin of moral ideas do you accept? What do you know of the TRANSCENDENTAL PHILOSOPHY, and the QUAKER doctrine of the "Inner Light"? How has the moral sentiment developed among men? Do animals possess any sense of right and wrong? How does the philosophy of EVOLUTION modify and correct the Intuitional and Utilitarian theories? (See HERBERT SPENCER'S "Data of Ethics.")

2. Non-Resistance.

JESUS taught the doctrine of meekness and submission under persecution, and absolute non-resistance of the external evils of society and government. (Matt. v., 4, 9, 38–42.) He discountenanced all physical conflict with the foreign oppressors of the JEWS, and submitted without forcible opposition to arrest, imprisonment, and death, at the hands of his enemies.

This teaching and example of JESUS cannot, however, be correctly understood, except as it stands related to his belief in the speedy coming of the MESSIANIC KINGDOM. During the brief period preceding that anticipated event, he thought it better to endure patiently, and suffer persecution, rather than foment insurrection and resist his persecutors with physical force.

NOTE.—NON-RESISTANCE: What CHRISTIAN sects profess this doctrine and regard it as a universal obligation? What do the FRIENDS or QUAKERS believe concerning non-resistance and the taking of oaths? Why have the vast majority of CHRISTIANS practically ignored this teaching of JESUS? How did the GARRISONIAN ABOLITIONISTS propose to destroy slavery? Why was not their method practicable and successful? (Read to the class WHITTIER'S "Hymn for the Celebration of Emancipation.")

3. Education.

JESUS nowhere recommends EDUCATION, or the systematic training of the MIND. His doctrine of the virtue of improvidence, and the impiety of "taking thought for the morrow," are inconsistent with a recognition of the necessity for mental culture and literary and scientific attainments. This defect in his system, however, should also be referred to the influence of his erroneous belief in the speedy coming of the KINGDOM OF GOD, in which it was thought that man would receive all necessary knowledge spontaneously, and without intellectual effort. Had he not believed that this great change was soon to take place, his teaching in many particulars might have been essentially different.

NOTE.—Show how the limitations of these erroneous beliefs upon the thought and teaching of JESUS operated, after he was deified and regarded as the teacher of infallible truth, to discourage FREEDOM OF THOUGHT and the pursuit of classical, philosophical, and scientific studies. How was this influence felt during the early and middle ages of the CHRISTIAN Church? How does it affect the CATHOLIC Church to-day? What is the "Index Expurgatorius"? How did the FRIENDS or QUAKERS formerly regard education? Are they now outgrowing this early belief? What is your ideal of a COMPLETE MANHOOD?

4. The Forgiveness of Sins.

The doctrine of the divine forgiveness and remission of sins is a natural accompaniment of the arbitrary system of morality, based upon alleged revealed commandments of DEITY. This doctrine was generally accepted by the JEWS, before the time of JESUS. (See Ex. xxxii., 32; Ps. lxxviii., 38; xcix., 8; ciii., 3; Jer. xxxi., 34; Isa. xxxiii., 34; Dan. ix., 9, etc.)

JESUS apparently adopted this current JEWISH belief, and taught, in addition, that the power of forgiving sins was committed by the FATHER to the MESSIAH, or "SON OF MAN." (Mark iii., 29; Matt. xii., 31, 32; ix., 2, 6, etc.) He also declared it necessary to forgive others, before the HEAVENLY FATHER'S forgiveness could be obtained. (Matt. vi., 12, 14, 15; Luke vi., 37; xvii., 3, 4.) According to the third Gospel, while suffering the agonies of crucifixion he prayed that his enemies might be forgiven.—(Luke xxiii., 34.)

NOTE.—REMISSION OF SINS; ATONEMENT: The idea of divine forgiveness was understood to include a remission of the penalty of sin. In a correct theory of MORALS, and in fact, however, the penalty is seen to be inseparable from the act. Sin is the violation of the MORAL LAW, and its punishment follows as certainly as the penalty for violating a law of Nature. Is there any escape from this effect, save through ceasing to do evil? Even then will not the influence of past misdeeds still remain? But may not a HIGHER MANHOOD finally result from the conflict with evil, and the exercise of manly virtue in overcoming it, thus justifying the universal order of Nature?

THE ATONEMENT: How did this doctrine grow out of older JEWISH beliefs? Is it consistent with a rational view of morals? What has been the effect of this doctrine on the lives of CHRISTIAN believers?

General Questions.

1. What was the substance of JESUS' ethical teaching? 2. What did he declare to be the end and object of life? 3. How was this end to be attained? 4. Are promises of reward and threats of punishment consistent with the highest moral appeals? 5. What was JESUS' doctrine of non-resistance? 6. How can we correctly understand this doctrine? 7. How did he regard education and intellectual culture? 8. Why did he attach no importance to study and mental discipline? 9. What was the JEWISH doctrine of the forgiveness of sins? 10. How did JESUS regard this current belief? 11. What did he teach concerning the forgiveness of others? 12. What is meant by the "remission of sins"?

To the Teacher.

Concerning the basis of Morals, read HERBERT SPENCER'S Data of Ethics, Rev. M. J. SAVAGE'S Morals of Evolution, JOHN STUART MILLS'S "Utilitarianism," the introduction to LECKY'S European Morals, Professor EVERETT'S discourse on The New Morality, Rev. JOHN WHITE CHADWICK'S sermon "Concerning Morals," in The Faith of Reason, and Sections 67–73 of the chapter entitled "What is our Rule of Life?" in STRAUSS' The Old Faith and the New. Read also O. B. FROTHINGHAM'S Cradle of the Christ, and MATTHEW ARNOLD'S Literature and Dogma, and God and the Bible

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

FOREIGN.

DR. SPARK, the Leeds organist, has received threatening letters to the effect that harm will come to him for playing the Russian Hymn at the last Town Hall concert.

THE members of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution have unanimously agreed to fill the vacancy in the presidentship caused by Mr. Carlyle's death by the election of Mr. Gladstone.

THE Earl of Dunraven has come to a satisfactory settlement with his tenants as to the rents on his estate. A complete revaluation is to take place, one arbitrator to be appointed by the tenants and another by the landlord, with power to the arbitrators to call in an umpire in case of a difference.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, M.P., presided at the annual gathering of the Inter-Collegiate Debating Society at University College, London. The subject before the meeting was woman suffrage. A number of ladies joined in the discussion, and one of them opposed the demand of other members of her sex for political rights. A motion declaring that the extension of the political rights now enjoyed by men to women was not desirable was affirmed by a majority.

AN exciting scene occurred during mass lately in the Parsonstown, Ireland, Roman Catholic Chapel. The officiating priest was referring to the doings of the Land League and other local occurrences, when an officer in command of the troops from Birr garrison stood up, and in loud tones ordered his men to withdraw. Indescribable confusion followed, women fainted, and a general rush was made for the doors. The soldiers obeyed their commander, and were marched off to the barracks, followed by an immense crowd, hooting and groaning.

ON Saturday, the current issue of the Freiheit, the organ of the Social Democrats in London, appeared with a wide red border round the front page. The first article is headed, in large capitals, "At Last!" and begins thus: "Triumph! Triumph! The word of the poet has been fulfilled. One of the most abominable tyrants of Europe, who has long been appointed for destruction, and who, knowing this, had in his wild vengeance doomed untold heroes and heroines of the Russian people to death or imprisonment,—the Emperor of Russia is no more." A similar strain of fierce exultation runs through the remainder of the paper. A paragraph in the same journal, referring to the Mansion House outrage, speaks of the package of gunpowder as having been placed there by an unknown hand, the word "unknown" being significantly placed between inverted commas.—Weekly Despatch, March 27.

M. GAMBETTA presided on Sunday at the general meeting of the Union of Commerce, one of the largest philanthropic societies in France. The meeting was held at the Trocadéro, and more than eight thousand persons were present. M. Gambetta advocated a system of life insurance by the State, and added: "You know that I am not a partisan of chimeras. I have been, and shall always be, opposed to those unhealthy and impracticable theories that would bring everybody down to the same level, and that are always fraught with perils to the working classes. But that is not the reason why I should not approve of the solution of the great social problems that may be realized by the State; for the State is the real collectivity,—the State is everybody, it is the country,—that is why the State is above the dangers of dictatorship. Universal suffrage shelters it from all perilous adventures." There ought not, he said, to be a duel between labor and capital. Those two forces ought to be united, and work together for the development and prosperity of France. The speech was rapturously applauded throughout, and on leaving the hall the President of the Chamber was cheered outside by a large crowd, who followed his carriage, crying, "Vive Gambetta!" —Pall Mall Budget, March 25.

Digitized by Google

SOCIALISTS IN LONDON.—On Tuesday night there was a general meeting of delegates from various democratic associations at the Socialist Democratic Club, Soho. The meeting was called for the purpose of considering the best means of promulgating the views of the society, and also for obtaining funds for the defence of Herr Most at his forthcoming examination. It was arranged to hold an open-air meeting at Peckham on Sunday afternoon next at three o'clock, under the auspices of the general committee; and it was also resolved to issue an appeal to the Socialists of all nationalities for support, in the form of the following circular: "Freiheit Defence Committee office, 6 Rose Street, Soho. On Monday, March 29, the plant, documents, and funds of the Freiheit company were seized by the police, and Herr Most, the editor of the Freiheit, was arrested. The workmen, who are also shareholders, upon protesting against the seizure, were forcibly ejected from the premises. Without entering into the question as to whether the article for publishing which Herr Most is prosecuted is defensible or not, we wish to point out that, although Royalist and Imperialist refugees who have found shelter in England have incited to bloodshed in order to regain their power, their right of asylum has never been attacked by the government. In defending Herr Most, we defend the right of asylum; and being, moreover, morally certain that this arbitrary and illegal seizure and arrest have been undertaken at the instigation of a foreign power, we appeal to all friends of freedom to assist us in resisting this attempt to Russianize English institutions. All communications will be considered as confidential, unless permission is given to treat them otherwise." A telegram has been received from the labor section of the Socialists in New York, calling on the English section to "resist this shameful tyranny. Assistance is already secured, and money would be sent through the International Bank."—Lloyd's Weekly, April 10.

JESTINGS.

A POOR darkey was in despair at the immorality of the world. He said: "Moses cut all de commandments wid a chisel in stone; but he broke 'em all before he got down de hill. Den, when he cut a new set, de chillun of Isr'l broke 'em all agin."

THE story is told that some one once asked the late Dr. S. H. Cox, whose wit was irrepressible, how it happened that out of his large family half had left the Presbyterian Church. "Oh!" he replied, "it is a case of the virgins of Scripture,—five were wise and five were Episcopalians."

AMANTIUM IRÆ.—Angry Wife of his Bosom: "I wish I was dead and cremated, and my ashes put in an urn on your dressing-table, and then perhaps you'd be s-s-sorry." Facetious Monster (a member, we regret to say, of the stock-exchange): "My dear, that wouldn't end the family jars: it would only begin them."

A MUSCULAR and energetic negro revivalist is at work in Little Rock. "I sees a good many ole tuffs in dis house," he said, in one of his meetings, "an' I wants 'em to come up to de mourner's bench right now. Dey's got ter come. De Lord doan say I wish you would do anything, but says you's got to do it. Firmness is religion. De rock of ages is made outen flint. Mr. Johnson," said the preacher, addressing a sinner, "come up an' put yer head on dis bench. I'se played kyards wid yer, but you's got ter reform. Come on, I tells you. Is yer comin?" "No, I isn't," said Mr. Johnson. "Den I'll fetch yer. You'se been standin' off de preachers long 'nough." The preacher left the pulpit, advanced to where Mr. Johnson was standing, and caught him by the collar. The two men began struggling, and confusion prevailed; but Mr. Johnson was dragged to the bench.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

Amount acknowledged up to March 1	$2028.75
CHAS. H. PIERCE, New Bedford (10th assess.)	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, " " one year of pledge	25.00
ARTHUR M. LEE, New York	20.00
THOS. DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess.	10.00
J. D. FROST, Providence, R.I. (10th assess.)	10.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., one year of pledge	10.00
A. B. CHACE, Valley Falls, R.I.	7.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	25.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 4 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50 00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, annually for 4 years	50.00
Miss EMMA D. IRESON, Lynn, Mass., annually for 3 years	5.00
JAMES EDDY, Providence, annually	50.00
THOMAS DAVIS, Indianapolis, Ind. (10th assess't)	10.00
J. W. BOYD, Jelloway, Ohio, annually for 5 years	10.00
ROBERT DAVIS, Lunenburg, Mass (annually)	10.00
J. S. JOHNSON, Almont, Mich., annually for 5 years	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

METROPOLE
INSURANCE COMPANY,
OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,
No. 20 Kilby Street,
BOSTON, MASS.
JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, ESQ.,
Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.

GEORGE M. BARNARD, ESQ.,
Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.

WILLIAM P. HUNT, ESQ.,
President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

JUST READY.
A NEW VOLUME BY MR. SAVAGE.
Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind.

These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.50
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

Gleanings in the Field of Art.

By EDNAH D. CHENEY.

CLOTH. $2.50.

"A fine æsthetic taste, combined with a deep and feeling appreciation of the motives that create and the impulses that guide all efforts, ultimately, to the true, the beautiful, and the good, has given to the public in this new volume a book in which charitable criticism, liberal and comprehensive thought, and wise suggestions predominate."—Banner of Light.

"The novices will find this book an excellent guide to the rich fields of artistic love; and the well-read, travelled artist will be delighted as he revives a thousand pleasant memories and catches fresh glimpses of old pictures from new points of view."—Cincinnati Journal and Messenger.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers,
41 Franklin Street, Boston.

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES.....10c.
SKULLS.....10
GHOSTS.....10
HELL.....10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD.10
GODS.....10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT.....10
HUMAN RIGHTS.....10
HEREAFTER.....10
TOM PAINE.....10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at $3 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages. It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.
F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss.—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK.

Cornell UnivLib 21870 F

INDE

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the

REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

As made by the most eminent scholars of England and America. Half the price of Corresponding English Edition. Large type, linen super-calendered paper, elegant binding. A separate "Comprehensive History of the Bible and its Translations," including a full account of the New Revision, given to subscribers.

Best chance for agents ever offered. Send stamp for particulars at once.

The Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

RADICAL DISCOURSES.

1. America's Debt to Thomas Paine.
2. False and True Prayer.
3. The Brute God of the Old Testament.
4. The Religion of To-day.
5. False Teachings of the Christian Church.
6. The Workingman's Religion.
7. The Christian Tragedy at Pocasset.
8. Free Religion; or, The Religious Demands of To-day.
9. The Teachings of Free Religion.
10. Do You Love Jesus?
11. Atonement.
12. The Bible: How shall we read it?
13. Revivals.
14. Who are Christians?
15. The Moral Life.
16. Is Liberalism Moral?
17. If a Man Die, Shall he Live Again?
18. The Resurrection of Jesus Not Proved.
19. The New Testament in the Old.
20. The Beliefs of the Unbelievers.
21. A Holy Superstition.
22. Temperance and the Bible.
23. Common-Sense on a Tour through the Bible. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

The above discourses may be had at 5 cts. each, or the entire set for one dollar, by addressing L. K. WASHBURN,
22 Sachem Street, Lynn, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli } SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,
23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 593.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 45.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE divine word is made for those who love and for those who hate it: it gives life to the righteous and it gives death to the unjust.—Ancient Egyptian.

THERE are treasures laid up in the heart,—treasures of charity, piety, temperance, and soberness. These treasures a man takes with him beyond death, when he leaves this world.—Buddhist.

FATHER of the gods, give us all good, whether we ask it of thee or not; and avert from us all evil, though we do not pray thee to do so. And, O all ye gods, grant me to be beautiful in soul. May all that I possess of outward things be in harmony with those within. Teach me to think wisdom the only riches, and give me only so much wealth as a good and holy man could manage and enjoy.—Socrates.

WISDOM is glorious, and never fadeth away; yea, she is easily seen of them that love her, and found of such as seek her. . . . And love is the keeping of her laws; and the giving heed unto her laws is the assurance of incorruption; and incorruption maketh us near unto God.—Apocryphal Old Testament.

THE kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. . . . Let us, therefore, follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another.—New Testament.

ON parent knees, a naked, new-born child,
Weeping thou sat'st, while all around thee smiled:
So live that, sinking in thy long last sleep,
Thou then may'st smile, while all around thee weep.
—Arabic.

MAN is degraded, low, an outcast, open to the cruel shafts of sarcasm, his bleeding heart fair mark for jest and scoffing. Poor is his virtue; a fair pretence, pierced through by gaping wounds, betraying the rotten selfishness beneath. So let it be. Yet stay, O scorner, till the true man be seen. Crushed beneath his enemy, striving vainly with a foe that is himself, bearing death unknown within, and seeking helplessly the secret of his misery everywhere but there, speak not rash words of him. Let death have reverence. Rather, let life that strives with death and overcomes, the kindling powers that shall know no quenching, the battling light and darkness, the war of heaven with hell, receive the homage of an awful joy.—James Hinton.

TO SHED upon men an intellectual light, to elevate them by force of thought, is the noblest of all missions. Honor to the idealists, whether philosophers or poets. They have improved us by mingling with our daily pursuits great and transcendent conceptions. They have thrown around our sensual life the grandeur of a better, and drawn us up from contacts with the temporal and the selfish to communion with beauty and truth and goodness. They do a great part of the work that is done. There must be ideas before action. The whole natural world is but the embodiment of ideas. The spade in the laborer's hand, the ploughshare in the furrow, was once an idea. Once the steamship was only an airy, bodiless thing, sailing through seas of thought in Fulton's mind. The idealist dies; but his conception lives in physical agencies that change the face of nature, in moral movements that bless and advance humanity.—E. H. Chapin.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IT is to be hoped that Dr. Hammond, before he settles down from his mesmeric experiments to a scientific theory, will find a better word for it than "sygziznoscism."

THE full text of Mr. Gladstone's Land Bill for Ireland has now reached this side of the Atlantic; but the substance of it appears to have been correctly cabled, as stated in our columns April 14. The bill is very long and elaborately prepared.

THE Free Lance, a very sensible and well-printed paper published in Brownsville, Pa., says that "the gist of all philosophy lies in taking things as they come, and making the most of them. What is, is; and it is one's own fault if he does not make it equally true that what is, is best."

THE citizens of New York are still discussing their dirty streets, but haven't found out yet how to clean them. Meantime, sickness has extensively prevailed as the natural retribution of the sanitary laws that have been transgressed. Professor Adler has been one of the victims of the poisoned atmosphere, but at last accounts was out again. The retribution strikes the innocent and the guilty alike to make the great atonement for violated law.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD and Mr. W. H. Burr have been engaged in a lengthy debate in the Seymour Times, Indiana, on the authorship of the Letters of Junius. Mr. Burr, with a good deal of ingenuity, has attempted to maintain the very improbable thesis that Thomas Paine was the real "Junius." This Mr. Underwood has denied, and, having the better side of the question, also seems to us to have got the better of the argument. In his last letter, Mr. Underwood brings an array of living literary authorities against the hypothesis that Paine was "Junius," and generally agreeing with the now almost conceded judgment that Sir Philip Francis was the man who started the literary conundrum of the century.

THE Harvard Register is to die in glory. Its last number will appear in May, and will be triple the size of the ordinary numbers. Into it will be crowded most of the matter and illustrations that have been accumulated for several successive issues. It will have biographical sketches with portraits of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Prof. Francis Bowen, Rev. Dr. Edward A. Washburn, and Secretary of War, Robert Todd Lincoln: also historical and descriptive sketches, accompanied by views, of Massachusetts Hall, Dane Hall, the Law School, Phillips Andover Academy, "Elmwood" (the home of Lowell), the Old Burial Ground between the First Parish and Christ Churches, and Matthews Hall; and, besides a large variety of university news and graduate items, an exceptionally good collection of articles by such writers as Prof. Ezra Abbot, Prof. J. D. Whitney, Dr. A. P. Peabody, Dr. George E. Ellis, Prof. N. S. Shaler, Prof. George L. Goodale, Prof. John Trowbridge, Dr. George Z. Gray, Prof. Grenville Stanley Hall, John Fiske, Arthur Gilman, and others of like distinction. The number will have not less than one hundred pages, and will be sold at fifty cents a copy.

IT is announced, apparently on good authority, that Mr. F. B. Sanborn, to whom Mrs. Theodore Parker bequeathed all Mr. Parker's manuscripts and the copyrights of his printed volumes, will soon have published a new and complete edition of Theodore Parker's works, to which may be added a volume of sermons and lectures not heretofore given to the public; also that Mr. Sanborn has already nearly prepared a biography of Parker, which will soon be in print. Both of these announcements will be welcomed by many people. A complete edition of Parker's works has been a long-standing want. And when it comes, we believe that the sale of it will dispel the impression that has got considerable prevalence that Parker is outgrown. There are some men who are never outgrown, and Theodore Parker is one of them. Though some of his theological opinions are already obsolete, his attitude for human rights is a perennial example. In spite, too, of Mr. Weiss's and Mr. Frothingham's biographies of him, there is room for another, one in cheaper form and more adapted to the plain people who used to be such eager readers and hearers of Parker himself. We hope that Mr. Sanborn's Life may aim to supply this need.

THE Religious Evolutionist is the name of a new monthly magazine of twenty-eight moderate sized pages, "devoted to a scientific and practical religion," and published in Topeka, Kansas. Its editor and publisher is S. W. Davis. Its tone is intellectually manly and morally healthful. It defines religion as "the special endeavor to attain perfection and happiness"; in other words, as "the soul's aspiration to righteousness, which is the aggregate of those actions that culminate in perfection and absolute happiness." Of its aim, it says, "Though the Evolutionist will be unsparingly iconoclastic, it will not be wholly so, nor will it be chiefly so; but its leading feature will be the dissemination of religious doctrines based upon scientific principles, which, when carried into practice seven days in the week, will constitute a new religion, worthy of supplanting not only the Oriental and ancient religions, but also the modern systems, including both Catholic and Protestant Christianity." We welcome it to the side of the Free Religious Index in the following resolve, though there will be no money in it: "For no consideration will the Evolutionist be defaced by objectionable advertisements of any kind. This excludes from its pages advertisements of alcoholic drinks, tobacco, quack medicines, obscene 'specialists,' and lotteries whether in saloons or church fairs." The price of the Evolutionist is $1.00 a year.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

THE ASCENT OF LIFE.

A Discourse delivered at New Bedford, Oct. 17, 1880.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

I have recently spoken of Divine Power as manifested in and through human power, or man as his own providence and savior. But behind this theme lies the question of the original nexus, or mode not so much of communication as of vital junction, between what we call the human and what we call the divine. How has Divine Power become human power? This is a question that at first sight seems too metaphysical to promise anything profitable for pulpit treatment. And yet it is a question which the old systems of theology have lifted, in their way, into a place of such chief and central interest that the new and liberal faith can hardly pass it by unnoticed. It is a theme, too, in spite of its unpromising aspect, which has a practical side; which touches human life at many points of immediate interest, and unfolds into numerous applications to daily conduct. It may be said, indeed, that all true thought, sooner or later, is practical.

The theme, to be sure, seems an audacious one. But then the very possession of the faculty of thought begets audacity. Science, even though it be cabled to the bed-rock of facts, is audacious. That great mathematician, who has just been carried to his honored grave in Cambridge, Professor Benjamin Peirce, was the most audacious of men in his domain, so much so that the honorable Edward Everett was once so greatly alarmed for the honor of American science by a certain announced discovery of his in the Academy of Sciences that he (Mr. Everett), who presided on the occasion, expressed his hope that the announcement would not be made public, since the alleged discovery was too improbable for belief. "Yes," replied the mathematician, "but it would be still more strange if there were an error in my calculations." Yet it was an audacious confidence which time fully vindicated. So, on this theme, the audacity, if any there be, of the new faith, is not that of the old theological a priori speculations, which soared wholly away from the earth into the skies, and professed to return with something like a phrenological chart of the mind and purpose of the Infinite God; but it is that bold courage which keeps along the roadway of science, confiding in the human faculties that have the power to make the journey and in the purport of the facts discovered along the wayside.

On this question of the original communication of Divine Power to mankind, or to the finite universe in general, the old theologies, of course, have all brought into requisition their theories of supernaturalism. The myth of creation in the first chapters of Genesis is as good an illustration of them as any that can be found. The creating power is represented as a great artificer, a supreme master-builder, who says, Let this and that be shaped thus and so, and it is done at his command. So the earth and the heavens come forth by a certain definite series of outward mechanical actions, and then the laws of their being for continuing them in existence are impressed upon them by external commandment. Man is brought into being in the same way. First, his body is created out of the dust of the earth, as a sculptor fashions a statue out of clay; but it is a dead body precisely as is the sculptor's statue of clay. And then the Almighty breathes into its nostrils, as a human sculptor cannot, "the breath of life," and this statue of dust becomes "a living soul." And to such extreme literalness has this old mythical account of creation been carried and is still carried that within the present year a lecture has been delivered in this city, on the problem of creation, by a clergyman, who said that Adam and Eve were doubtless created in the full maturity of their powers, probably of about the age of thirty years.

Now, the central idea in all these theological theories and the one reason for which I name them is that life descends by supernatural process into the finite, into man with the rest of the finite material world, from a supreme original creator or giver. And this idea of the supernatural descent of life has pervaded these theologies throughout, determining not only their doctrinal theories, but their ecclesiastical and devotional practices. The old Greek oracles were delivered by priestesses who were believed to be ecstatically possessed and illuminated by a spirit not their own, but descending from the abode of the gods. The ancient hermits and saints, both heathen and Christian, believed that, if they could starve and otherwise abuse their bodies to a sufficient degree of tenuity, the Holy Ghost would descend to enter and dwell and rule within them. On the day of Pentecost, according to the New Testament story, the primitive disciples of Jesus, as they were gathered in one place, heard suddenly a sound, as of a rushing mighty wind, from heaven, and immediately they felt themselves filled with this spirit from above, and spoke, not as their own reason or feelings dictated, but as this foreign spirit gave them utterance, even though they spoke in tongues unintelligible to their hearers. In the trance of the revival meeting, "the slaying-power," as it is termed, slays and removes the human spirit, the actual possessor of the body hitherto, and lets in the spirit of the Lord. Mr. Moody and his Christian brethren, in his Northfield conference the other day, waited and groaned and sobbed for hours on their knees, and even prostrate on their faces, that they might receive the "enduement from on high." So all through religious history, and especially in Christian history, we find this idea extensively prevailing,—that man's true life is to descend upon him supernaturally, and is in no wise to be looked for in the native energy and growth of his natural faculties. As the true life, the life of soul and thought and conscience, is believed to have descended into man originally from the heavens, but to have been lost by man's disobedience, so the restoration of the true life must be looked for, it is alleged, in the same way. We see, then, at once that the subject is not by any means purely metaphysical, but opens speedily upon the most momentous practical questions. Does the "enduement from on high," as Mr. Moody, in his quaint, obsolete style calls it, come by strong, healthy, stalwart men crouching for hours of a summer morning on their knees or grovelling on their faces, sobbing themselves into some effeminacy of hysterical emotion; or does it come by these same men honestly and energetically putting their natural faculties, in the heat and labor of the day, to the solid tasks of life?

Against this central idea of the old theologies, that life originally came, and that the true life still comes, into man by supernatural descent, I would put the counter-doctrine that the genuine human life has always come and still comes by natural ascent. As there was no supernatural descent of life at the beginning, so there was no unnatural fall; and so, again, no requisition for a supernatural restoration. But the great process of life, so far as we can trace it, has always been by ascent. Instead of a fall, with its calamitous consequences, the human race has slowly climbed from the rude animal beginnings where primeval investigation first finds it to the heights of intelligence and culture and moral power it now occupies. There have been falls, but no "fall"; individual failures enough, with their inevitable temporary evil consequences; even lapses of nations, here and there, in the great historic movement of the race. But, after every such retrograde, there has come out of the native vigor at the heart of the race itself a reactionary force that has lifted the grand movement of the whole to the upward grade again, and held it firmly on the track of progress.

But whence this "native vigor at the heart of the race"? This is a question that takes us at once to the heart of the subject. Proceeding backward by the path which science has now trodden for us, not merely through the periods of human history, but back of human history through the primeval ages when this earth and things upon it were getting ready for man, we reach a time when existence appears in its simplest elements,—an amorphous mass of plastic matter, a mere "fire-mist" it has sometimes been named, in motion as if by an inward impulse of its own. Whence this elemental seed-material of things science gives us no clew. That it could have sprung from nothing the very nature of our minds forbids us to believe. That it should have existed from a beginningless eternity, or should have been willed into existence by a previously eternally existing being of pure mentality without any material form of manifestation,—these are alternative propositions, either of which we may accept according to some individual tendency of imagination, but neither of which science helps us as yet one step toward accepting. For my own part, I do not profess to go behind this point to the positive acceptance of either alternative, although I know by the laws of thought that one of them, or something corresponding to it, must be true. But I am content to stop where science leaves me. At that point, I find ample germical capacity for all that has unfolded both as divine and human, and as mind and matter, in the whole after universe. For at that point, in that shapeless, chaotic mass, with its inward moving energy, I find the two elements that everywhere appear as constituent parts of the universe, mind and matter. In the shapeless mass itself, I find the seed-germ of all the organic material world; and in the inward energy, already at that far-off primeval point beginning to shape the shapeless mass into some kind of form and meaning, I find the seed-germ of all organizing power, of all natural law, of all mental energy and thought. In other words, I find at that very beginning of things, to which science takes us, the element of intelligence present. In that inward energy which is already at its shaping tasks, and which I soon see to be shaping to a purpose and which ere long discloses in the purpose a moral aim,—in that inward energy I find the creative spirit and all the warrant my logic requires for the name of Deity. But even thus early, when we study the very first manifestations of existence, we find the creative spirit and power involved in the very nature of things,—already there in the things, and not descending from any external sphere upon them after they have come into existence; there as the very sustaining and directing energy of them. And from that point on, as we trace, by the pathway which science lights for us, the great process through the æons and the centuries of the world's unfoldment, we note the natural ascent of this life power into finer and more complicated organic forms, into successive genera and species, through all the realms of vegetable and animal existence, until the process culminates in the being of man. Into whatever mystery it opens backward from that point, we may from that point clearly trace the creative power onward and upward, though mysteries may still attend its operations, within the realm of natural phenomena and law, and to results ever more and more fraught with intelligent and moral meanings.

In this process of world-evolution there are three marked stages where the process appears temporarily to culminate in a form of existence that remains itself stable, though from it the movement ascends again to some richer form. First is the stage of unconscious, organic, but lifeless Law,—the stage of earths and minerals and gases, of moving and interacting and combining atoms,—the stage of physical forces and affinities, of heat propulsions and retractions. At this stage, the primitive inward energy has become a mighty instrumentality, with the most stupendous results. The foundations of worlds and systems of worlds are laid. Suns and planets are taking their places in the galaxies of space. Gases are concentrating to fluids and fluids into solids, and solids again are being ground into dust for the coming soil for the coming life. But as yet there is no life. It is the age of bare Law.

But somewhere in the line, when the conditions are ripe for it, life appears. Taking our earth as an illustration, the sun reaches down the warm fingers of its rays and coaxes from the dust which has been spread over the cooled rocks a new species of organic existence,—namely, vital and growing things; existences in which Law has become vital force assimilating and absorbing foreign aliment to individual uses, and determining the resulting growth to a certain definite form in each case. This is the stage of Vitality,—a long and varied stage, with many subdivisions, including the two great subdivisions of vegetable and brute animal life.

After a long series of ages, the conditions ripened for a new stage in the upward process, when vitality rises into Personality, and man appears. It may be difficult to tell just when and where he appears, so nicely and closely graded are the stages of life anterior to him. And, when he first appears, the new characteristic that makes him man, that of personality, is weak; and he is still largely under the control of the mere physical and vital forces that rule in the orders of existence below him. But, when man clearly appears, then it becomes evident that a new force is on the stage of existence,—a being in whom blind Law has blossomed into conscious intelligence, and Vitality has risen to be not merely a process of physical, but of moral and mental life. A person is a being in whom physical law and vitality are subordinated to moral intelligence.

Digitized by Google

Now, these three conspicuously marked stages in the process of evolution include the whole cycle of existences or things known to man. Law, Vitality, Personality,—they mark the gradual ascent of the life power. And nowhere in the line does science permit us to look for the descent of any life-giving or force-giving power from without. After once leaving that first point of departure to which science takes us, all is included in the channel of sequences which flow from that primal inward energy that we found at that point. To this steady, onward flow of creative and productive energy there is no "without." It carries the universe in its bosom, or rather it is itself the unfolding, growing universe. Law, Vitality, and Personality are the trinity of science. They denote the stages in the ascending manifestations of the creative energy as it produces the world, both of matter and mind.

Science does not, I say, permit us to look for any supernatural descent of life into this process of world evolution. Yet science does not explain, nor profess to explain, all the secrets of the procedure. Just as there was an unexplained mystery at that first point of departure, beyond which science could not take us,—namely, the unanswered question, Whence the germinal matter with its inward energy in which the evolution process starts?—so, all through the process, an element of mystery, an unsolved and apparently insoluble problem, remains. Science may fathom and interpret all the varying and orderly manifestations and metamorphoses in the process; but what is the secret of the sustaining and vitalizing energy that comes down from that primal point of departure, science has no means of knowing, and cannot know until she can go behind the veil that there hangs before her searching eyes, to conceive one of two equally unfathomable things,—a beginningless world of matter and of material force or a beginningless being of pure mind. What is Law itself, the great word of science? It is simply the registered sequences in the action of this primal energy; but the source of the energy is unexplained. What is Vitality? Scientists are specially at work on that question to-day, and some of them are very confident that the principle of Vitality is to be resolved into a phase of the law of chemical and physical attractions. But that only pushes the curtain of the mystery one stage further back, but does not lift it. What is Personality? Have we explained it when we say that it is the substratum of individual, mental, and moral consciousness? Or that it is that peculiar principle which organizes finite consciousness into separate existences, making John to be John and not James? But whence the "substratum" or the "peculiar principle" with the function of organizing? The mystery is still there, after all our definitions. And it must needs be there. It is no new mystery, nothing supernatural that has come into the evolution process on the way; but it is the old mystery that inhered in the germinal material with which the process began, and that necessarily inheres in the whole process, because the process itself is originated and sustained by that inward energy which was part and parcel of the primal germinal substance. Law, Vitality, Personality, are only steps, stages, in the continuous ascent of this beginningless and ceaseless power.

As man is the natural culmination of these stages and of the whole process involved in them, so he includes them by inheritance in his being. He has his existence under the three, Law, Vitality, Personality. Under the principle of Law, he shares existence with the stones at his feet and with planets and suns in the sky. Under the principle of Vitality, he has kindred in the flowers of his garden and the trees of the forest, as well as in the animals that accept his protection or flee from his violence, or from which, in turn, he flees. But in Personality, the higher stage of this same on-reaching and ascending power, he achieves a supremacy which puts him in a measure above the forces of both unconscious Law and blind Vitality. In him the intelligent aim of the Law, which has guided it from the beginning, becomes self-conscious, the primal energy rises into will power; and Vitality becomes not merely a physical principle or function, but more, a moral and mental activity. And man, therefore, has his true being as he preserves the proper gradation and proportion between these three forms in which his existence is manifested,—as Law is absorbed into Vitality and Vitality into Personality; in other words, as the inward vital energy, which in him has become will power, is kept at the helm of all his activities, but itself is directed by reason toward beneficent ends.

Not all human beings really possess this high quality of Personality. None of us, perhaps, possess it to the degree that we might. We allow passion and appetite, sordid aims, and self-indulgent pleasures to obscure the demands of reason and to interfere with the claims of beneficence; and, just to the extent that we allow this, we are drawn down under the dominion of the lower functions of life. Some human beings there are who seem to have lost all power of personality, who have no rational will nor effective moral choice left, who have hence sunk down as victims to the mere physical and vital laws that sway the brute creation or rule in the world of unconscious matter. They have become animals or things, not men.

Very practical, therefore, is this doctrine in its conclusion. Moral intelligence, made effective in conduct, is the culmination of the primal force of the universe, and is the essence of human personality. It is thus that Divine Power becomes human power. "Virtue," says an old philosopher, "in its grandest aspect, is neither more nor less than following reason"; and reason, in its essence, is that divine energy which nourishes the world. "All things wait upon it for life, and it refuses none." "Lay hold on the great form of reason [this immortal energy], and the whole world will go to you. It will go to you, and suffer no injury; and its rest and praise will be glorious."

One thought further. We have seen that in each of the stages in the evolution process there has been an element of mystery which science does not fathom. And yet science accepts the fact of each stage in the process, even with the mystery. And so science, on its own ground, will not attempt to deny that beyond the Personality that is here associated with the material organism of brain and nerve-cells, our human life may open and rise, even though the mode may be a mystery, into another stage of being above at present our earthly ken,—into a stage of being grander even than Personality, yet retaining all that is good in it, and fraught even more than it with divine energy; into a form of being to which we cannot attach the name or thought of death. Who will venture to deny the possibility of such further ascent of life? who to affirm that the great life process has reached its final culmination in man's earthly personality? Not certainly science, in view of its own discoveries of the improbable and the wonderful in the past process. It behooves us, then, to be both very modest and very expectant, and so meantime to conduct our lives as to be ready for the best which thought or hope can entertain.

For the Free Religious Index.

RUSSIAN NIHILISM: WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

I always read anything from the able pen of Mr. Wasson with respect, and usually with thought stimulated and information increased. But, while I sympathize with him in his protest against "Murder as a Method of Reform," I cannot agree with him in his estimate of the character and purposes of the late Czar of Russia, nor view with anything but indignation the association of his name with that of our martyred President, Abraham Lincoln.

It is, perhaps, natural that Americans should remember that Russia was our friend during the late civil war, and that they should associate the so-called "emancipation" of the serfs with the abolition of slavery in this country. But facts prove that the abolition of serfdom was little more than a change of masters; the substitution of the utterly merciless thraldom and tyranny of the government itself for the more merciful personal masters. Men are sometimes kind and lenient in their treatment of inferiors, but corporations have notoriously no souls; and this the poor serf has found out to his satisfaction. Fastened to the soil where he is born, and from which he cannot remove without the passport of the Czar; compelled to purchase his allotment of land, in the choice of which he has no option; unable in many a vast majority of cases to produce enough from the soil to support himself and leave a surplus for his assessed annual payment, which is mercilessly exacted by the government; bound not only for the individual obligation thus forced upon him, but also assessed for all delinquencies in payment occurring in his own village community; in default of payment, having his house seized and held by government official and troops, who are absolute masters, with all that the term implies, of himself, wife, daughters, and all his household goods during their occupancy,—he has indeed learned that "the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel."

The assertion that the late Czar abolished serfdom "deliberately, compelled only by his own conviction," shows a lack of correct information, which is most unusual in the writings of Mr. Wasson. Does he not know that there was an agitation for emancipation in Russia as determined and able as that of Garrison and his co-laborers in America, long before any movement on the part of the Czar? Does he not know that there was another agitation for constitutional government, originating not with the lower classes, but with the intelligent, the noble, the students and literary classes in Russia? The emancipation, so called, of the serfs, was the old trick of the despot to resist the assault of the intelligent upon the throne, by making friends with the ignorant masses. Mr. Wasson is not so careless a student of history that he will not recall similar instances in the history of Rome, and other autocratic governments of the past. The trick often meets with temporary success, until the plebeians have time to find that the change has brought them no millennial era of prosperity; has perhaps, as in this instance, added to their terrible load of oppression and tyranny. It is too shallow to blind the eyes of any thoughtful and intelligent American citizen.

Let us look at another side of this question. Let us judge Alexander II. by what he has actually done. During his reign, more than one hundred and twenty thousand people have been transported to Siberia. Their sufferings in transportation, compelled as they are to walk, with bleeding feet, often falling and dying by the way; their sufferings in the mines after their arrival,—these things are too well known to need repetition. Often they are seized at dead of night, and hurried away without trial, without permitting their family and friends to know their destination or the charge upon which they are arrested. Sometimes there is no shadow of reason for the arrest, save that the eye of some lecherous official has fallen upon the beauty of some beloved wife or daughter, who is thus left without protector, at the mercy of those from whom all mercy has been crushed by the villanous system of which they are the representatives. This is no imaginary sketch. The evidence is accessible to all who will take the pains to examine it. Russia to-day has an army of a million of men. How is this army recruited? At dead of night, a village is surrounded by troops. Every house is entered and occupied by a guard. If resistance is offered, the doors are broken in. All the male members of apparently suitable age are seized and marched off to army head-quarters. Here they pass examination, and the desired number of recruits are retained. The others are black-mailed out of all their captors can extort, in payment for the privilege of returning to their homes. If this is not "tyranny" of the vilest sort, what is it?

The ignorant peasantry are kept in this condition of bondage simply through their ignorance. They are not permitted to know that any different condition of affairs exists anywhere on earth than that which they see around them. In the catechism taught them by their priests, the Czar is addressed as "our God on earth," and his "worship" is commanded on penalty of eternal torture in the future life. To disobey his commands or the mandates of his minions is declared to be impiety against God.

"History says that autocratic government is proper to certain stages of civilization and conditions of society," says Mr. Wasson. I am not aware that History says anything about the propriety of these things. History simply reports the facts. The modern philosophy of evolution declares that these facts are characteristic of certain stages in the growth of the social organism. But does that justify them to-day in Russia? No more than it justified slavery in America. The philosophy of evolution indeed asserts that man has ascended from the brute; but it does not therefore declare him to have been anything more than a brute while his animal stage of development prevailed. Nor does the application of this principle to the case in hand make the Czar of Russia anything less than a tyrant.

If Russia is not ready for anything but tyrants and tyranny, so it must be; but let us call things by their right names, and not rank Alexander II. with Abraham Lincoln. It remains to be seen whether Russia is not prepared for something better; but Mr. Wasson's policy would appear to be that of the careful mother who forbade her son to go into the water until he had learned how to swim!

Digitized by Google

For my own part, the so-called Nihilistic movement, with all its faults, appears to be the most hopeful indication of vitality and civilizing power which Russia has ever manifested. If some of its advocates are, as Mr. Wasson calls them, "devilish belligerents," it is because of the devilish system which has produced them. That this movement includes only a few hundred desperadoes and assassins will, I think, be sufficiently demonstrated to be untrue, to satisfy even such apologists of the autocracy as Mr. Wasson and Hon. E. W. Stoughton. No! We are witnessing the beginning of a great revolution. It may be delayed for a time; but it will ultimately range Russia in line with the other constitutional governments, and make her a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." There may be delay; but this will be the end, or I am no prophet.

Yours for human rights, LEWIS G. JANES.

NEW YORK, April 15, 1881.

For the Free Religious Index.

A QUESTION AND A WORD

To the Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church.

We have just passed through Easter season; and, with churches which honestly believe in the bodily resurrection of Jesus, we join in celebrating the season. We called our festival a spring festival, but there was no spring. Those on the outside say that our celebration of the day shows plainly that the Church is gaining a foothold inside our very courts. Our choirs sang—what? The glories of spring, gave thanks for the new life all about us? No; but "Christ has risen." Now, in private, we may put what meaning we please on the words. The real meaning, and the one rightly understood by the people and the Church, is that Jesus eighteen hundred and fifty years ago came forth from the tomb.

Now, we younger men believe the whole thing a myth. We do not accept either Dr. Clarke's spiritualistic resurrection or Dr. Furness' trance death. The story of Jesus' resurrection is one made out of whole cloth. Is it right that we should by our action countenance this delusion, that we should longer through fear bend to a custom which gives continuous life to a falsehood? If Easter comes late enough to make a spring festival of it, well and good, make it so, but drop the hymns, the anthems, the Bible readings which speak of the bodily resurrection of Jesus, indeed that have any reference to the story, and let them, instead, be such as speak of the new life, the new hopes, the bright present, the brighter future. It is time that we lived our professions. The majority of us acknowledge no Lord Jesus Christ: we only know the man Jesus. Is it not time we said this and lived this? Can we not among ourselves appoint a festival for spring, say the first Sunday in May? an autumn festival, etc., and let the Church cling to its errors? This is the question. The word is, Let us remember we are responsible to God, and not to men.

CREDENS.

For the Free Religious Index.

FREE THINKERS WHO LACK FAITH IN THEIR PRINCIPLES.

In talking with a young physician a few days ago, I found that he was a total disbeliever in all forms of religion. He had no idea of any kind of life beyond death, and was confident that the faith of the past would soon disappear from the civilized world. He was not willing that his belief on this subject should be known, as it would not be popular, and also because he thought the spread of infidelity could have only a bad effect on public morality.

Now there are thousands of disbelievers all over the country who think in the same way on this subject. They have no faith in the philosophy of doubt; and, while they are thorough freethinkers themselves, they have no inclination to share their disbelief with others. They think it better that the world should cling to the old faith, though false, than that scepticism should prevail. How large this class of doubters is there is no means of knowing, but a little investigation will convince any one that all the dissemblers are not in the churches, and that all Liberals are not in the leagues. But few Liberals have yet any abiding faith in their belief, and there is not half so much need of converting more persons to the doctrine of Liberalism as of establishing those already convinced in the faith of the new gospel. Let the Liberals of the United States but have the courage of their convictions, and they will become a power that cannot now be estimated.

H. CLAY NEVILLE.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

IS DARWIN RIGHT? OR, THE ORIGIN OF MAN. By William Denton.

This little volume, the author informs us, contains the substance of lectures he has given the past few years, and is "written for the general reading public." The style is clear, forcible, and graceful; and the diagrams and descriptions given are well adapted to the purpose of the author. The aim of the book is to show that all species, including man, have come into existence by evolution, in accordance with natural law, under the direction of "all-seeing, all-knowing spirit," "a spiritual intelligence that presides over every organic being and rules its destiny." The author assumes that there are two entities, matter and spirit; that spirit "permeates" matter, and moulds it into forms of use and beauty; that "every atom of every organized being is a perfect spiritual type, constantly seeking perfect expression in material form." The author is equally opposed to the doctrine of miraculous creation and to the theory of evolution that ignores spirit and intelligent direction and purpose in the development of organic forms.

The facts and arguments adduced in support of evolution are those with which the "Vestiges of Creation," and the works of Darwin, Wallace, Huxley, Haeckel, and other original investigators, have familiarized intelligent readers, and the force and conclusiveness of which are now admitted even by the more advanced theologians. Mr. Denton, although he accepts the main principles of Darwinism—variation, heredity, natural selection, etc.—as important factors in evolution, thinks the theory of Darwinism is defective in claiming too much in some respects and too little in others. He tells us that his "investigations in mesmerism, spiritualism, and psychometry," showed him "the defectiveness of the theories advanced by Darwin, Huxley, and others of the natural selection school." Darwin is criticised because (as is alleged) "he thinks the Creator breathed originally into a few forms; and he is criticised too because he "ignores the spiritual side of the universe." "I do not believe," says our author, "that it [natural selection] has been as effectual in its operation as Darwin and the Darwinians suppose; but, that it has assisted in producing our present forms of animal and vegetable life, there can be no doubt. It is the gardener that trims the tree of life, lops off the imperfect branches, and destroys the sprouts that might divert its energies; but it is not the creator that gave life and form to the tree, and sent through its veins the invigorating sap." Of course, neither Darwin nor any other evolutionist believes natural selection, however much it has contributed to variety of form, "gave life" to forms. The author does not always do full justice to the points he opposes, while some of his objections seem to have no solid foundation.

Mr. Denton thinks experiments, the results of which were published in 1862, together with those of Bastian, demonstrate spontaneous generation. He quotes the Types of Mankind and other works to show that the different races had a diversity of origin. The antiquity of the race is dwelt on at some length, and clearly proven.

Mr. Denton thinks "phrenology, as taught by Dr. J. R. Buchanan, is as much a true science as geology taught by Sir Charles Lyell, and can be much more readily demonstrated." This science, he thinks, demonstrates man's spiritual origin and nature. Clairvoyance, he says, proves a "spiritual eye," which he thinks cannot be explained by natural selection.

"The existence of the spirit of man after death is now scientifically demonstrated," Mr. Denton writes; "but no man will claim that natural selection is the cause of that existence."

The objection that if man came from the brute he will perish like the brute is met thus: "Here is a green apple: we take out its undeveloped seeds, and plant them; but they die, and are resolved into dust. Here is a ripe apple: we take out the seed, and bury them. They do not die: sending rootlets downward and shoot upward, they grow into perfect trees." This illustration might be used to show, were it needed, that man can reproduce his kind at forty, but not at five years of age; but it is as irrelevant, as far-fetched, as some of Joseph Cook's illustrations, when used to show how an immortal being can be evolved out of mortal creatures.

Although this volume by Mr. Denton is a mixture of science and speculation, of fact and fancy, it shows an earnest spirit, and is quite a readable work. It will contribute to the acceptance of the theory of evolution, especially among those of spiritualistic views. Readers who have rejected the theory of an Intelligent Being "who presides over every organism, and rules its destiny," are not likely to experience a change of views on this subject by a perusal of this work.

LA SCIENCE SANS DIEU. Conférences par le Père Didon de l'Ordre de Saint Dominique.

We have read this book with great interest, not only for its rare literary merit,—for it has all the brilliancy and clearness of style which distinguishes the best French writers,—but still more as giving an inside view of the present position and aims of the Catholic French clergy. These lectures are addressed to the young students of theology, who are expected to become the leaders in the Church and to protect it in the future against the dangers that threaten it. These dangers are clearly set forth. Père Didon evidently considers the present condition of France as unsatisfactory, politically and morally as well as theologically. He has no word of congratulation on the establishment of the republic or the formation of public schools. He foresees their power to overthrow the dominion of the Church; and he paints a dark picture of the reign of scepticism and unbelief. He thinks the nineteenth century has opened all questions and solved none. He accuses the State of tyranny in education, in stamping the child with its own image and leaving the father of the child (he never includes the mother) no authority. This is the same specious plea which is employed here to divide and weaken the schools.

But the skilful lecturer does not oppose the false doctrines which he deems so destructive with authority alone. He sees and the Church sees the importance of meeting thinkers on the ground of reason: and he shows a general acquaintance with all the great discoveries of modern science, and often expresses their grand generalizations with great eloquence and beauty.

Up to a certain point, he argues with great fairness and logical truth. His criticisms of positivism, of materialism, of atheism, etc., are just. He shows that they do not account for the spiritual facts, even if they seem to explain the material ones, and that the experiences of the soul and the dictates of the moral law are facts as real as the attractions of electricity or the unions of chemistry. But, when he has thus forcibly and eloquently argued the negative side, he makes one leap to the positive statement. On the one side is negation, contradiction, entire inability to satisfy the demands of the whole human being, on the other the Church with its doctrines satisfies completely.

Margaret Fuller used to say the old French writers invented their facts. Père Didon does not trouble himself in the least with any facts which make against his statements. He declares the utter ruin of all human societies which are not governed by the Catholic Church, but does not see Spain, the most Catholic country in Europe, now the lowest in progress and welfare. He says of the Italy which has dethroned the Pope, "Providence seems to be dumb there"; but he does not tell us what Providence said of Italy, under the Popes, in the long ages of oppression and corruption.

Nor does he trust to reason, even supported by assertion, to move his hearers: he calls to his aid their strongest and most dangerous prejudices, and, appealing to their love of country, reminds them that these false and pernicious doctrines come from Germany, the enemy of France. At every step, you see that his goal is fixed, and that, while inculcating freedom of thought, he is winding slight but strong chains of prejudice and passion and old traditional feeling about his hearers, so that he can carry them whithersoever he will. His argument for the existence of a God and for our knowledge and love of him is full of force and beauty, and will give fresh confidence to those whose hearts are filled with this faith and who believe in the transcendental philosophy which justifies it; and so vivid are his pictures of religious life and its joys that we can almost see the answering glow of enthusiasm on the faces of the young neophytes whom he addresses, who are longing for fuller faith in the mission they have chosen, and are carried away by his representations of the glorious battle they are called upon to fight.

Digitized by Google

We think he could not so address his pupils, if both he and they were not really and enthusiastically believers in the faith he represents. There is the educated traditionary skill of the defender of a faith which does not to him admit of question. He does not underrate his opponents, but studies their tactics carefully. But he argues not as one who seeks the truth ready to accept it, whatever he finds it to be, but as one whose conclusions are settled before he begins to inquire, and who will reject everything which he cannot use in defence of his faith. Eloquent and able as this book is, it was like coming into daylight and open air to hear, after reading it, Dr. Hedge's admirable statement of the noble independence of Kant, which, as Mrs. Howe said, gave to every student such a glorious sense of freedom.

But this book shows us that the impulse to the study of science and philosophy given by the new Pope is strengthening the present power of the Catholic Church; and we must be armed with the same weapons of intellectual as well as moral power to wage an equal warfare with it.

By the Tiber. By the author of Signor Monaldini's Niece. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881.

Those who have read Signor Monaldini's Niece with satisfaction and delight are hereby warned that nothing equally satisfactory and delightful is in store for them in Miss Tinker's By the Tiber. There is good work here; there are some passages of remarkable power; but the book, as a whole, is far from being a success. There is no single character in the book at all comparable with Signor Monaldini's niece, a creation of remarkable ideal loveliness. The book lacks unity. Here are two parallel streams, and they have no vital relation to each other. One is a stream of sensuous, passionate intrigue. The other is a stream of American life in Rome, especially Miss Valeria Ellsworth's, who, because her window overlooks a garden where the Countess Belvidere carries on her vicious loves, is incarcerated in an insane asylum. Miss Tinker has evidently drawn to some extent upon her personal experience for pigment for her picture of Miss Ellsworth. Miss Ellsworth is even made the author of a novel in the "No Name Series." The story of her incarceration is well told, but not without concrete details that are needlessly sickening. The strongest passage in the book is the flight of Bruno, the murderer. Miss Tinker is a devout Roman Catholic, but her novel is by no means flattering to her co-religionists. A passage put into the mouth of a cardinal in good faith is about the choicest bit of superstition we have seen for many a day. The cardinal is speaking to his niece: "What can I say to you, Adela? Only this morning you invited the Lord to enter your heart. [By attending mass.] You forced him to come, and he could not refuse without performing a miracle. He has placed himself helpless in our hands in the Eucharist,—as helpless as he was when an infant upon earth, more helpless, since he has no longer a Mary and a Joseph to protect him. The helplessness of the infant Jesus was pitiful: the helplessness of our Lord in the Divine Sacrament is terrible!" One is very grateful for the light of Rosa Baudini's face upon the closing pages of the book. But for her, By the Tiber would be a novel without a heroine, such an "old girl" as Valeria having about her nothing heroical, for all her frequent indulgence in heroics.

The Tsar's Window. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881.

This is another novel in the "No Name Series"; and, if it is not one of the strongest of the series, it is certainly one of the most pleasant. It gets its title from the saying of Peter the Great,—"I wish a window looking out into Europe." And so he built St. Petersburg, the scene of our story, which a pretty comedy of errors set in the climatic and the social atmosphere of a Russian winter. The attempt to weave experiences of foreign travel and residence into the texture of a novel has frequently been made of late, but seldom with success. The foreign travel and residence have generally had the appearance of being lugged in. It is not so here. But an exceedingly vivid impression is given of a Russian winter, its pleasures indoors and out. All this, however, is subordinate to the story, a love-story pure and simple, turning out happily, as love-stories seldom do in these degenerate days. Dorris, the heroine, is

> "A creature not too bright or good
> For human nature's daily food."

She is exceedingly life-like. The author is clearly of the opinion that the affairs of love may have a homely and even a comical side, and he indulges us in several examples. Take it for all in all, this is a book to be grateful for. It will give the busiest man a few hours of rest and pure enjoyment.

Young Folks' History of France. By Charlotte M. Yonge. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

This volume and others of its series very convincingly illustrate that history may be made as interesting as a story. Much is due, no doubt, in this instance to the fact that the author possesses in a notable degree the renown and gift of the story-writer. Miss Yonge keeps her pen straight to the mark before her. She judiciously makes no attempt to follow the minor events and incidents of history, and thereby avoids the dryness which it would otherwise assume for youthful minds. But, while this method is pursued, the more prominent persons and events of each period are graphically described, and the leading characteristics of the time thrown into distinct relief. Much credit is due Messrs. Lothrop & Co. for this excellent series of juvenile books. They are well calculated to counteract the pernicious influence of that flood of the baser sort of literature which is continually poured upon society, prepared for youthful readers. The special merit of these volumes is that, while they provide fascinating entertainment and romantic interest, they also supply solid instruction. It is impossible for any young person to read them without obtaining important help to a comprehension of the order of past events and human development, and acquiring a decided fondness and taste for history.

In the May Atlantic, Henry James speaks his mind very freely with regard to Carlyle, and probably voices an estimate of him plainly shared by others. According to these "Recollections," the great man loved much better to jeer at men than to help them, and never even dreamed of putting his own shoulder to the wheel, because of his infinite disgust and despair of all humanitarian effort. It is the most readable article in the number. Henry James, Jr., continues his "Portrait of a Lady," and brings us into mortal terror lest she shall marry the tepid-blooded widower who is hungrily eyeing her fortune. We are cut off in an exasperating uncertainty by the last chapter. Miss Phelps' "Friends" makes imperceptible progress. We begin to weary of the cowardly love-making of this thirty-seven-year-old hero. Whittier gives a sunny poem called "Rabbi Ishmael." A new contributor, E. H. House, writes of "The Martyrdom of an Empire" in a way which shows that meek little Japan is being ground to powder under the diplomatic heel of mighty England. If this is the case, our international ethics insist that we see to it that the two countries secure fair play. English diplomacy is made responsible for Japanese poverty. Let us look at the facts. W. H. Page's "Study of an Old Southern Borough" seems a somewhat highly colored picture; and Richard Grant White's "Correspondence with an English Critic" has the merit of brightness, like all he says, but seems to prolong a needless wrangle about the use of words. We cannot feel excited as to whether one says railroad or railway, cream-jug or cream-pitcher. The magazine has also a long and complete account of the works of the French novelist and dramatist, Eugene Scribe.

The Scientific News published in New York every month has very good fare. For April, we find illustrations of the great steam yacht "Livadia," built in England for the Emperor of Russia; also interesting photographic records of spots on the sun. In addition, it has cuts of the experiments on Lake Geneva for finding the velocity of sound in water, as well as some other good things.

From the Russell Publishing Co., we have received the May number of Our Little Ones, which we commend to the lovers of the beautiful in juvenile literature.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Rev. L. K. Washburn speaks at Florence next Sunday and the following.

B. F. Underwood, who was in Boston, on a flying visit home, not many days since, is now in the West, as busy as ever. He is to pass a portion of May in Kansas, where he has engagements to lecture as follows: at Muscotah, May 7, 8, and 9; Wetmore, May 10, 11, and 12; Netawaka, May 13, 14, and 15.

A Monument to Carlyle.—Mr. Carlyle's friends, it is reported, wish to put the little house in Scotland, in which he was born, in repair, and keep it as a monument,—making it, perhaps, into a library for the use of the country people about.

Edward A. Freeman, the English historian, who has been acquiring a rapid and solid reputation as one of the best writers in his sphere of literature during the last fifteen years, will visit us next autumn, and bring his note-book with him.

Rev. John Jasper, the colored preacher of Richmond, Va., whose views in respect to the motion of the sun are at variance with our modern ones, finds there is money in them. He is in demand as a lecturer, and has paid from this source a debt of $800 on his church.

Rev. E. A. Lawrence, of Poughkeepsie, is giving a course of seven sermons to children on "Sweet Peas"; namely, Patience, Perseverance, Punctuality, Politeness, Pluck, Patriotism, and Principle. It is evident that this divine is disposed to throw his influence on the side of the vegetarians. Would it not be well to extend the course, and add to the above sermons on pumpkins, potatoes, and peppers?

Rev. Emory J. Haynes has received the indorsement of his church, the Washington Avenue Baptist of Brooklyn, by a vote of 500 to 0 in response to a "statement" by two deacons, who, among other things, charged the pastor with calling upon poor people instead of studying Baptistic doctrines. Is there not cause to fear the above church has acted in this case without due consideration? It is certainly a serious charge, and ought not to be passed over lightly, for a Baptist pastor to give more time to calling upon poor people than to studying Baptist doctrines.

F. E. Abbot, late editor of the Index, recently spent a vacation week with his family, who still reside at Cambridge, and, though compelled to fill up the brief interim with some special literary work, found time to call at the Index office and on a few friends. It is pleasant to record that his health has greatly improved during the last few months, and that the earnestness in behalf of the ideas and principles to which he so bravely and persistently gave ten years of the best of his life has lost none of its fervor amid the influences of New York or in the retirement of his present pursuits.

The only satisfactory likeness of George Eliot which exists is a crayon of the head, drawn in 1867 by Mr. Frederick Burton, and is now being etched by M. Rajon, not for publication, but for a few personal friends of the deceased writer. Mr. Cross, however, that the public may possess a true likeness of his wife, has given permission to the proprietors of Scribner's Monthly to reproduce the etching in an early number of their magazine. All other portraits, except one by Mr. Laurence, which it is not proposed to engrave, were taken without George Eliot's consent, and are not merely not authorized, but strongly condemned by Mr. Cross.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

DEFEAT.

Our ships at sea! They touch the sunset lands,
And isles of fringing palm, and rare delights,
Nor deign to press the unknown, sullen strands
Where voiceless days and nights

Swing through slow years uncounted, hour by hour.
What eye of sense hath known such argosies?
What mortal hand hath held such splendid dower?
What king such royalties?

Yet, ah! the moorings home, when sails droop low,
And the dark wave hath swept the secret hold
Of pearl and treasure! when our eyes forego
The wealth our dreaming told!

H. T. C.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MAY 6, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Business session, for election of officers, hearing of reports, etc., Thursday, May 26, at 7.45 P.M., in the Parker Memorial Hall, corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets. The methods of the Association looking to a more effective organization, as developed the past year and as may be further proposed, it is hoped may induce an interesting and profitable discussion at this opening session.

Convention, Friday, May 27, in the same Hall, with sessions at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. The question for the morning session is to be, "The Dangers to Morality from the Downfall of the Old Theology; or, The Probabilities of a Moral Interregnum," to be introduced (it is hoped) by Prof. Felix Adler. The afternoon topic will be, "Will Free Religion Organize?" to be opened with an essay by Frederick A. Hinckley. Other particulars as to speakers will be given hereafter.

On Friday evening there is to be a social festival, using both the upper and lower halls of the Parker Memorial Building. A programme of special interest is to be presented, with the usual opportunity for refreshments, conversation, and, not least, pecuniary subscriptions for the work of the Association. WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

HENRY WARD BEECHER announced on Easter Sunday that his revival services had accomplished their main purpose, the drawing of the members of his church closer together, and would now be laid aside.

AN ECCLESIASTICAL WAVE.

There are obvious analogies between the world of matter and that of mind. In both may be discerned the principle of action and reaction. The ebb and flow of the tides are reflected in the course of man's intellectual progress. There are certain signs of the times that are particularly suggestive of this at present. It has long been the exultant assurance and boast of the rationalism of our day that ecclesiasticism is falling into dissolution, that its dogmas are losing their hold upon the minds of men, and its spirit, which has ever been the spirit of assumption and usurpation, is melting away in the onward sweep of freethought and scientific development. There is no doubt good ground for this persuasion. There are, beyond question, forces and influences now steadily and surely at work more fatal to the Christian system than any it has ever encountered. At the same time there is cause to suspect that rationalists overestimate the effect of these tendencies, and miscalculate the inherent strength of the Church, the reserved force which it possesses and is capable of putting forth to meet the emergency. There are certainly indications apparent at present that tend to lead to this conclusion. There are unmistakable signs that the Church just now, even amid the scepticism and unbelief which it is acknowledged on all hands prevails, is increasing its energy and outward dominion at least, and taking to itself a new lease of power.

This is manifest in various ways. It is especially so in the greater emphasis and more general observance, of late years, of so-called holy days and seasons. These growing encroachments upon the liberal intelligence and spirit of the age have been so stealthy and gradual that they have elicited far less attention than it might have been supposed they would. It is doubtful, for example, whether Easter has ever been celebrated in this country with so lavish an expenditure or so imposing a display, or participated in to so large an extent by all denominations and people, both in the Church and out of it, as was the one which has just passed.

There is abundant testimony to this effect from different quarters. The following from a New York correspondent of the Boston Advertiser will serve as a specimen of such:—

I know of nothing in this city more remarkable in its way than the habit which the citizens generally have adopted of falling in with observances which were, in past times, confined to the members of the Anglican and Roman churches. This Passion or Holy Week is as clearly recognized as an exceptional one as if it were so made by law. On Good Friday, the stock, produce, and cotton exchanges were closed, besides a number of stores. The week is always considered a dull one in amusements, and the attendance of churches is exceptionally large. Among the "special musical programmes" for Easter, which are paraded in what some people think a highly objectionable manner, I notice a number from churches whose creed takes no cognizance whatever of any such festival, and in which, only a few years ago, one would have been quite likely to hear its observance inveighed against. The situation of "Old Trinity" makes it natural that its Good Friday congregation should be largely made up from Wall Street, as is generally the case. This year, for the first time in the history of this ancient parish, the service of the "Passion" was had, beginning after the regular morning prayer, and lasting between two and three hours. The Rev. Mr. Hall of the Church of the Advent, Boston, conducted it; and the numbers present were very large.

Mrs. Mary Clemmer in writing from Washington to the Independent speaks in similar terms of the observance in that city. That it may be seen the above extract is more than the glowing language of unrestrained imagination, we subjoin a passage or two from the communication last mentioned, even at the risk of extending this article beyond its proper limits:—

Good Friday set its seal of holy silence on the turbulent capital. Even the strife in the Senate Chamber ebbed out, and the Senate adjourned from Thursday till noon Monday. Unwonted silence pervaded the entire city. To be sure, business went on as usual; but gay visiting turnouts were nowhere visible. "Society" in its endless round paused. All the bells were hushed. For twenty-four hours, no bells rang for noon or night. The crape-hung altars of all the Catholic and Episcopal churches told of the world's bereavement. Their seats were crowded with penitential worshippers from early morning till night. . . . The church interiors were altars of gloom. . . . One thing may be certainly named: the seal of impression set by the vast spiritual fact of the week on the thought and soul of the capital. St. Patrick's Day, George Washington's Birthday, are loudly "celebrated" every year. Is it not high time that the day in which the God-man gave up the ghost for the sake of the human race should be held in holy keeping by every one, of every sect, who claims the name of Christian? . . . Many who personally would fain have rushed on with affairs respected precedent and example, and said: "It is Good Friday. We will wait."

Similar reports from other sections and cities might be added to these, going to show that instead of the Church receding as certainly as we are disposed to think, it is in some respects advancing and expanding its borders with a force and rapidity quite inconsistent with the growth of enlightenment and freethought which are in so large a degree the characteristic of the age. But not only is this evinced in the greater stress which the celebration of Easter and Christmas are acquiring but also (as has been intimated) in things of a correspondent character.

Within the last ten or dozen years, Good Friday has become in some of the States a legal holiday; and within a period of the same length of time, here in Massachusetts, the custom has grown up to adjourn the schools upon that day,—a custom unknown before, and strongly significant of the ecclesiastical movement in progress to which we refer. The last conventions of the Episcopalian and Presbyterian denominations, especially the former, show that they are to all outward appearance in a very flourishing condition. The area of their influence is expanding, their churches are multiplying, their colleges, schools, institutions, and activities of various sorts are generally well endowed and comparatively vigorous, their clergy never commanded larger salaries.

It is not very long ago, indeed so recently that we can hardly realize the opposite is now the case, that Harvard University was regarded as the great educational representative of New England heresy, as in fact as well as in spirit a Unitarian institution; but this no longer holds true. By a count just made of the students, it appears that Unitarians are considerably in the minority in comparison with the whole body of students, and with the Episcopalian portion in particular, and that the University itself is not so distinctly Unitarian as formerly. This is illustrated in the overtures to Rev. Phillips Brooks to become the University preacher, and the feeble opposition it produced,—a project which, with all due allowance for his reputation as a Broad Churchman, would have told immensely in committing that institution to ecclesiasticism and in invigorating the Episcopal Church in New England and in the country at large. Scylla may be escaped, but it is not sure that Charybdis can be avoided; since there are quite probable rumors afloat that the position may yet be tendered to some prominent Orthodox divine, in which case it is safe to augur that the offer, tempting and attractive alike to religious zeal and persoual pride, if judiciously made, will be likely to meet with acceptance.

Digitized by Google

For this state of things, Unitarianism itself is largely accountable. Its proverbial indefiniteness, lack of self-assertion, intellectual timidity, and spirit of accommodation in dealing with Orthodoxy, and effort to keep in good fellowship with it, —in a word, its disposition to foster sentimentality rather than to take its place in the front of religious progress,—has naturally given to the more pronounced and aggressive sects an advantage, and prepared the way for that superseding of Unitarianism by them which is witnessed. The labors which have of late years been expended upon the Bible, and the influence of the new revision which is about to appear, conspire to draw increased attention to that book, and, in spite of all that may be gained for its better appreciation and truer interpretation, can hardly fail to redound to the benefit of Orthodoxy and the development of the ecclesiastical spirit. The Concord School of Philosophy and Joseph Cook should be included in the same class of agencies. The single influence of each has been, and is likely to be, to hold the mind to the positions of the old theological systems, to confuse and mystify rather than aid the search for truth through the unfolding of really rational or scientific principles. The Christian School of Philosophy, so called, about to be established in the vicinity of New York, might also be mentioned in this connection.

The transitions from one religious faith to another are always periods of hypocrisy and alarm. Both of these characteristics are manifest at the present time. We see them in the tendency of the sects to fall in with those appeals to the senses, such as music and ceremony, like the late Easter celebration, that are found to captivate the more sentimental and less thoughtful masses of society. We see them in the disposition to gravitate toward that which is accounted respectable, in the alarm which takes possession of a large class of minds at such a time in consequence of the bad repute of the new thought, and in the warnings they are accustomed to hear of the danger attending the loss of the old. Of course, the tendencies we have described must be superficial in their influence. But their effect is to prolong the sway of ecclesiasticism. They show that the battle for liberal ideas is not yet over, that the advanced thinker and the true philosopher have yet a hard fight before them, one that will demand all the resources, courage, and fidelity which they can summon to win the victory. A victory, nevertheless, though longer deferred than we are wont to anticipate, we do not doubt shall come at last, and bring clearer vision, higher truth, and nobler life to the world. D. H. C.

COMSTOCK'S "FRAUDS EXPOSED."

Mr. Anthony Comstock has published a large and handsomely printed volume, detailing his work as an exposer and prosecutor of the various crimes against the public committed through the United States mails. Its full title is: "Frauds Exposed; or, How the People are Deceived and Robbed, and Youth Corrupted. Being a Full Exposure of various Schemes operated through the Mails, and Unearthed by the Author in a Seven Years' Service as a Special Agent of the Post Office Department and Secretary and Chief Agent of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. By Anthony Comstock. New York: J. Howard Brown, Sole Agent for the Subscription Publications of the American News Company, No. 21 Park Place." It contains thirty-two chapters, devoted to "Bogus Bankers and Brokers," "Who was Lawrence & Co.?" "Bankers and Brokers Continued," "Marginal and Syndicate Operators," "The Leeches," "Bogus Mining Companies," "The Bogus Lotteries," "Havana and New Brunswick Lotteries," "Watch and Jewelry Swindlers," "The Lottery Prize Fraud," "The Bogus Jewelry Distribution Frauds," "The Sawdust Swindlers," "Banking Houses," "The Lottery Parasite," "Sundry Frauds," "Sewing Machines and Guns," "The Wonderful Calvin and his Divining Rod," "The Clinton Medical and Surgical Institute," "The Quack," "The Lotteries," "The Louisiana State Lotteries," "Laws concerning Lotteries and Gaming," "The Fight against Obscene Literature," "Obscene Publications," "Infidelity Wedded to Obscenity," "The Syracuse Congress," "The National Defence Association," "Another Impostor Unearthed," "Official List of Frauds," "How the Laws are Enforced," "Insinuation versus Reputation," and "Insinuation versus Reputation Continued."

Mr. Comstock says, near the opening of the first chapter: "All the more important swindling schemes of the time, which are intended to reach the mass of the people, depend upon two mighty agencies of our present civilization, the Newspaper and the United States Mail. By means of these two instruments for good or evil, it is possible to reach every household in the land. The advertising sheet and the postal service are the recognized mediums of legitimate business. Through them, millions of dollars annually change hands. To them, therefore, the rogue naturally turns."

This is undeniable by any honest man; and it proves the right, nay, the positive duty, of the national government to provide every possible protection of the people against the commission of crimes which are only rendered possible by means of the instrumentalities which itself offers to every one, and which, from the nature of the case, are beyond the reach of the State and municipal governments. The attempts made by "free-lovers" to break down the existing laws for this purpose, on the flimsy pretence that they are "unconstitutional," have brought great discredit upon American Liberalism, inasmuch as these attempts have been ostensibly made in its name, yet without any adequate rebuke or protest from the Liberals as a whole. Naturally enough, therefore, Mr. Comstock, who is a vehement Christian, says in his preface: "No part of this book can be of greater interest than those chapters that expose the Liberal Fraud, and the infamous conspiracies entered into by the Liberals to repeal the laws against obscene literature. I regret it becomes necessary to refer to some of these creatures. But when a body of men write to advance a cause which promises a morality better than that offered by the Word of God, a system of government better than the grand institutions of Free America, a religion purer and nobler than that of our Lord Jesus Christ, a hereafter more glorious than the eternal heavens, it is well for the public to know their true character."

Accordingly, one hundred and twenty-six pages of the book are devoted to the story of the "liberal" crusade against the postal laws during the past five years, especially as it relates to the Liberal Leagues. Mr. Comstock, who falls into one or two mistakes in telling this story (chief of which is his construction of the resolutions passed at the Centennial Congress of Liberals in 1876), evidently tries to be fair and accurate throughout. He draws a just distinction between the Liberals who favored and those who opposed the cry for "repeal," and — to his great credit — takes pains to do justice to the motives of the latter class. This is very explicitly done on page 393, and elsewhere. But he makes a scathing exposure, by name, of the record of those who were most prominent as "repealers." It is a melancholy enough exhibit for all who believe that Liberalism must win the moral confidence of the whole community, if it is ever to compete successfully with superstition, or be felt as a positive power in the moulding of legislation. Notwithstanding the too great heat of style in which the book is written, which will to some extent defeat its own objects, I cannot withhold the expression of my own respect for the fundamentally sound, upright, and honest motives which actuate Mr. Comstock, or omit to commend his book to the careful study of all who know that Liberalism must yet make a new record on this subject if it is to be at last a great blessing or felt power in American history.

F. E. Abbot.

MRS. KING'S PRINCIPLES OF NATURE.

This book professes to be a revelation "from a wise inhabitant of the spirit country," according to Mr. Coleman, who says in last week's Index:—

> The first volume, published in 1866, contains many statements of laws and facts in nature unknown to the scientific world at the time of its publication, but which have since been discovered to be true, either certainly or probably, by recent scientific research. Spiritual revelation has, in this instance, outstripped or forestalled scientific research in various particulars, one example of which I will mention in illustration. When Mrs. King's first volume was published, it was generally held by astronomers that the corona, or ring of light, surrounding the moon during total eclipses of the sun was not a solar appendage, but was either a lunar or terrestrial phenomenon. Not till 1870 did the astronomical world accept the truth of the solar hypothesis.

Now, one has only to turn to the Encyclopædia Britannica article on Astronomy, published in 1854, or Appleton's New American Cyclopedia article on the Sun, published in 1863, to find that, long before Mrs. King's first volume appeared, astronomers did generally consider the corona a solar appendage. Valuable evidence to that effect was obtained during the eclipse of 1861.

Among other instances of Mrs. King's "power to express scientific truths unknown to the savans of earth" is said to be her considering the zodiacal light an extension of the corona. Now, the latter was thought by Mrs. King "to constitute a part of the sun's atmosphere"; and Kepler asserted about 1600, and Mairan more fully in 1731, as is stated in the cyclopedias, that this light is part of the solar atmosphere also. So it was no evidence of superhuman knowledge or supernatural aid that Mrs. King, finding it generally believed that the corona and the zodiacal light were both solar appendages, came to the conclusion that they were connected together. This is generally admitted to be the fact, but it is now known that neither the corona nor the zodiacal light is in the solar atmosphere, though both are appendages of the sun. F. M. H.

Dr. Schaff, one of the members of the commission for the revision of the Bible, says: "The changes are so many that scarcely a verse in the New Testament remains unaltered. In many instances, however, the alterations concern punctuation and minor words. Of course, any alterations will arouse criticism; but I think that we can hold our own, and we are prepared to do battle for what we have done and sanctioned. We have worked between two fires,—the radicals wanting far more sweeping changes than we would sanction, and the other party rolling their eyes in horror when a comma was transposed or a small letter replaced by a capital. The controversy will probably go on for a few years. At the end of five years, at the latest, I expect to see the new version accepted by all but the most narrow-minded person."

Digitized by Google

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

SOCIAL science is as yet very much a matter of speculation. It has need of facts. The American Social Science Association has begun, in one special direction, the accumulation of data on which legitimate conclusions may be based. Its department of education is sending out circulars for the registration of all psychological facts in the development of a child from the age of two to twenty. Each circular is to cover a period of two years, the first one being as follows: "(Give the baby's full name.) Name and occupation of the father? Place and time of father's birth? Place and time of mother's birth? Place and time of baby's birth? Baby's weight at birth? at three months? at six months? at one year? Is the baby strong and healthy, or otherwise? At what age did the baby exhibit consciousness, and in what manner? At what age did the baby smile? At what age did the baby recognize its mother? At what age did the baby notice its hand? At what age did the baby follow a light with its eyes? At what age did the baby hold up its head? At what age did the baby sit alone on the floor? At what age did the baby creep? At what age did the baby stand by a chair? At what age did the baby stand alone? At what age did the baby walk alone? At what age did the baby hold a plaything when put in its hand? At what age did the baby reach out and take a plaything? At what age did the baby appear to be right or left handed? At what age did the baby notice pain, as the prick of a pin? At what age did the baby show a like or dislike in taste? At what age did the baby appear sensible to sound? At what age did the baby notice the light of a window or turn toward it? At what age did the baby fear the heat from the stove or grate? At what age did the baby speak, and what did it say? How many words could it say at one year? at eighteen months? at two years? Will the mother have the kindness to carefully answer as many as possible of these questions, and return this circular, before July 15, 1881, to Mrs. Emily Talbot, Secretary of the Education Department of the American Social Science Association, 66 Marlborough Street, Boston, Mass."

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON, of New York, has spent a great deal of time and money in philanthropic enterprises. Of the results, she says: "I have tried to make my gifts reach those only who are in need and deserving, but how difficult I find it! After years of experience, I find, as a rule, that the clean and would-be industrious are pushed one side, and often die unknown and in want; while others whose presence pollutes the air, breeds crime and misery, push themselves forward, and with many cunning devices gain that sympathy and protection which they in no way deserve." Probably every person who has tried earnestly to help the poor has had the same experience. It is truly a discouraging result, that should nerve all such workers as Mrs. Thompson to more careful efforts for the aid of those who are deserving. It shows also how foolish many of our charitable methods have been, and the folly of giving aid to any persons or institutions whose real needs have not been carefully studied into by competent persons. Concerning the causes of pauperism, Mrs. Thompson pertinently says: "The destitution and suffering about us are something frightful; and the chief cause of this, I am convinced, is the use of alcohol. I am told there are fifteen thousand places in this city where it is sold. Think of the vast sum that is required to support them! And, when we know they are chiefly supported by the laboring classes, it seems to me that the noblest and grandest act of charity that this great city and State could perform would be to pass such laws as must put a stop to its sale. I have prepared and published at different times statistics and other matter upon this subject, and sent them broadcast, with what result of good I cannot tell."

THE New York State Charities Aid Association has one branch of its work devoted to the collecting and distribution of reading matter in the various penal and charitable institutions of the State. It has a fund, given by one lady, devoted to this purpose; and it is regarded as one of the best and most helpful charities in which the Association is engaged. Reading matter is sent to one hundred and thirty-five institutions. In one year, seventeen thousand books and magazines have been collected and one hundred and twenty-five thousand newspapers. In what way does the modern spirit, the humanitarian spirit, better express itself, and give hint of what it is, than in such a charity as this!

A RECENT discussion of the subject of compulsory education in Philadelphia has brought out some significant facts. Among these is the statement that there are twenty-one thousand children in that city who do not attend school. In an address made by the author of the Fool's Errand was this statement: "Forty-five out of every one hundred voters in sixteen States cannot read their ballots; twenty-four and three-quarters out of one hundred white men in them cannot read and write; and in two States an actual majority are thus ignorant." When we consider the amount of pauperism, crime, and political inefficiency which results from this ignorance, we are startled into a recognition of its gigantic character. Is compulsory education the only remedy? It would seem so, or, at least, that it is as much of a remedy as can be applied. On this aspect of the subject, Judge Tourgee says: "As a mere police preventive against pauperage, government should insist that every citizen know at least the three 'R's.' He who has learned his alphabet has got a long way from barbarism; when he can cipher, he has made another long stride; and, when he can write his name to a bond, he has secured the right to come into court at the trial of a writ and defend himself as a free man. If you enact compulsory education, you must enforce it. Some parents need the services of their children; but shall these suffer, or all the children or parents of the country suffer? Ignorance will ruin the whole country, and so we say, 'If you will not give your children intellectual liberty, we will take away your physical liberty.'"

AT a recent meeting of the Minnesota State Board of Health, several clergymen were called in for consultation as to what could be done through the Church for the promotion of hygienic and sanitary reform. This meeting is but another indication of how great the growing interest in these subjects, and of the extent to which it is being recognized on every hand, that the material conditions of life are of vital importance. Among other things said, "Bishop Ireland suggested that clergymen would do well to explain to their flocks the importance of the rules of hygiene and their duty to study and observe them. They should see that the rules of hygiene are duly observed within buildings under their own control, churches, and school-houses. In their visits to their parishioners, especially the poor, they ought to call their attention to this subject of hygiene, and notice whatever defects may be observable in and around their dwellings. They should be first among those who labor by the formation of boards of health and other sanitary organizations to improve the public health." Yet this is only one intelligent man where there are hundreds of ignorant ones. This subject still needs discussion and a constant diffusion of information. The poor ventilation of most churches is a sure hint of how little religion yet heeds the great laws of physical well-being.

G. W. C.

ORGANIZATION AMONG LIBERAL RELIGIONISTS.

Portion of an Address delivered before the Unitarian Society, on Sunday, March 27, in Lawrence, Kan.

BY MRS. ANNIE L. DIGGS.

After speaking of the different sections of Liberalism, and of the importance of their working together, Mrs. Diggs said: In consideration of the situation which I have tried to outline, the questions present themselves: Upon what basis shall this rational religion organize? And what should be its method of work, that it may become in the largest measure helpful and successful? Upon these two questions, "Free Religion" and "Unitarianism" (largely though not universally) differ. Agreed they are that conduct is more important than creed; that the practice of the moralities, and not the mere profession, is the thing essential. Agreed they are that reason must be sole judge and referee in matters of religion. But the reason of the "Free Religionist" and the reason of the Unitarian have pronounced differently upon certain points of belief. Chiefest among the differences is the controversy concerning the relationship and obligation to Christianity, to Jesus, and to the Christian name.

Free Religion disclaims all right or obligation to use the Christian name. It assigns to Jesus of Nazareth a high place among good and great men, the reformers and benefactors of mankind, but would not reiterate any statement of his Lordship over all. Neither would Free Religious people distinguish or make comparisons between Jesus and other great men by calling themselves his disciples. A sense of justice will not permit this superlative exaltation and practical deification of him.

Free Religion has a scholarly and generous appreciation of the Bible, but would not use it in the Sunday service, so as nearly or quite to exclude the use of other helpful lesson-books.

Free Religion would deal first and foremost with the many-sided problem of this present human existence, not with indifference to the great unknown future or the Great Unknowable Soul of the universe, and not with irreverence (that grown-up impoliteness which marks the unculture of immaturity) toward the stepping-stones of the past.

Free Religion would preserve all the spirit of worship, all the gratitude, all the beauty, and the joy of life, avoiding all meaningless forms and all outgrown methods of expression. It would make the bettering of the conditions of this life, the education and development of all the capabilities of the human soul, its aim, and its endeavor.

Of Unitarianism, I must say that there are Unitarians and—Unitarians. The characterization which is true of a part is not true of the whole. There are many individual Unitarians who would indorse the above definition of Free Religion as a definition of their own views. And many more declare that Unitarianism prescribes no boundaries, and asks no profession of "discipleship," that the utmost freedom of opinion and the latest dictum of reason is made welcome within their ranks. But while the fact still remains that the authoritative voice of their Year Books and the voices of their national and local conferences repeatedly affirm their attitude of "Christian discipleship," and declare them to be a body of believers upon the "Christian foundation," and "within the Christian Church," and while they refer supremely to the word and life of Jesus Christ, surely there can be no consistency in the claim that they are a body organized upon a basis of sufficient breadth and scope to serve those who cannot accept their affirmations, and who are thus excluded by reason of a conscientious adherence to a matter of belief alone. So long as preambles or constitutions declare, state, or infer certain matters of belief, what else is it than making membership a committal to those beliefs, and thus as a matter of fact making belief a condition of membership, and excluding—though not by any vote or voice of a society—all who deem it important to obey first the voice of reason,—the voice of God in their own souls.

Digitized by Google

It is scarcely the most generous or the wisest thing to sit in judgment and pronounce the barrier insignificant, to say that this or that need not be an obstacle, to speak of over-sensitive consciences, to wonder if the same amount of conscience is manifest in the other affairs of life; to say that if Christianity be rightly interpreted, and the character of Jesus be rightly understood, there need be no objection to the profession of "discipleship." Ah, but who should be the judge? From whose stand-point would you have your aspirant for fellowship see it all, his own or yours?

While I believe the above to be a fair and faithful statement concerning the Unitarian Church as a body, I have an additional word to say of the new, the growing Unitarianism,—the active, pushing rationalism in the Unitarian body, which is making mighty efforts, and working with determination to compel Unitarianism to mean, and to be, more than it has ever meant, said, or been before; in short, to refuse to allow Unitarianism to stop growing; to insist and reiterate the insistence, until the facts in the case shall have grown to correspond, that Unitarianism shall be the leading, the chiefest, the all-comprehensive, all-embracing philosophy of life,—the religion of the world. You all know that I refer to that which may, and I think should be, designated as the new Unitarianism, so vigorously promulgated by the Rev. Jenkin Ll. Jones and his co-workers in the West. Considering the situation, both outside and inside the denomination, we may estimate the magnitude of their undertaking. Yet one must admire the courage and the hopefulness, and feel the sympathetic thrill of the clarion call to action. And one must tingle with the desire to give aid and comfort, strength and support, to the heroes in the front.

This is not the time to consider whether or not this work could be better done in another way. The one great need of "Liberalism," especially in the West, is leadership, headship, the incarnation of ideas; in a word, organization.

We come now to a reasking of the question, Upon what basis should Liberals organize?

Let us consider, as a case in point, our own situation and the recent organization of the Unitarian Society in Lawrence. And I shall speak all the more freely, since I know that you, my friends, and ladies of the "Liberal Club," will bear me witness that the chief aim of all my work and talk with you has been toward unity of thought and purpose, concert of action, and that order and strength which would grow out of organization; and in no instance have I used the opportunities which you gave me to argue for views of my own which were antagonistic to yours. I have preferred rather to emphasize the importance of providing, first of all, for the life and permanency of our endeavor. So, now, I call attention to the fact that your new organization is built upon a sectarian platform. It contains, indirectly expressed, it is true, a belief condition, which excludes all dissenters, no matter how much soever they may need "fellowship" or exemplify good character.

Just here let me disclaim the making of a mere personal plea, because the platform which declares that "we in the fear of God associate ourselves for the enjoyment of Christian privileges" is one upon which I cannot stand. I am not in any immediate and pressing need of a church to join. Life will not be an entire failure to me personally, if I am never to belong to a church. I could cuddle down by "my ain fireside," and not take to calling the world a cheat and a vain show, or gratifying an overwhelming desire to become a nun. I speak to a larger point and purpose than the small personal pronoun I.

"But," says one, "this is making so much of so little, the objection is so slight." Of little moment, is it? It is so large that a question no larger has just disturbed and agitated national Unitarianism, has called out letters from Rev. E. E. Hale and other prominent Unitarians, and has just taken away from the Unitarian society in Leicester, Mass., a pastor, worthy and beloved by his people. It is the same old vexatious question which separated Mr. F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, W. J. Potter, and others from Unitarianism, and which created the necessity for the Free Religious Association.

"But this question of ours is only away out here in Kansas, in a little obscure church. Besides, none of the parties who enter into the society object to the Christian name." There is only one dissenting voice. My friends, for whose benefit and to meet whose necessities are you engaging in this work? Just your own? Are you the only sick who need a physician?

Do you think that the adequate religion of our time and of the time to come, the religion capable of doing the work for all these classes which we have been considering, can be based upon any premises which exclude (on account of belief) even one person in a community or one person in the world? Is the question asked, "Must Rationalism come down to the narrowness of crude Liberalism, or fit itself to the 'smart' Atheism of college students?" By no manner of means; come not down at all. There is small danger, in this world of toil and perplexity, that you will work or think on too high a plane. Only remove all barriers. See to it that you keep awake and abreast with the thought, the culture, and the spirit of the time, so that you may really be capable of leading and assisting the rising generation. The church which is organized to-day should not be for to-day alone. It should have a platform upon which Atheist, Christian, Jew, Buddhist, Mohammedan, or disciple of Confucius, could stand, the only condition being the desire for improvement, for an upward tendency of life; in short, such a platform as that of our State Unitarian Association, which declares only for "freedom, fellowship, and character in religion," and welcomes all who "desire to do good in it or get good out of it."

There is little time this morning for an answer to the question, What shall be the plan of work? Briefly, we must say it must depend largely upon the need and demand of each individual society,—whatever work of benevolence will ameliorate the condition of its suffering poor, whatever course of study will advance the intelligence and extend the information of its members. The subjects now discussed by "Social Science" should come up in Sunday work; for the Rational Church should be a world's free school, its ministers a competent corps of teachers, and religion a grand philosophy of life. I believe it is safe to say that much of that which has been considered a necessary part of the Sunday church service will not be long or largely practised by the Rational Church of the near future. The singing of hymns much more fit for use in orthodox churches, the constant use of the Bible to the exclusion of other divinely inspired books, the attempt to audibly address the Deity, are chiefest among them.

For a time there will be fear lest with these shall depart the beauty of spirituality, the inspiration of aspiration, and the gratitude cultivated by prayer. Ah, my friends, I do not think the great fountain will be stinted. The ways and means are not limited nor meagre.

Finally, as to our work here. We are about to enter upon a new era; and I say we, because I think you must know that, even though all may not be which I could wish, I still welcome and will hopefully work for the next best thing at hand. And if there is still one who would ask, "Why raise the ghost of this much-vexed question of the Christian name just at this time, when there seems to be most need of harmony and unanimity of feeling,—why cavil and criticise and risk being esteemed a fault-finder?" the temptation is great to keep silence, and take it easy. One individual is such an infinitesimal mite in the great ocean of things. But the pressure of one's own estimate of the import of a situation is what should determine his action. If this Lawrence Society were organizing only for a year and a day, if there were not the vast outlying surroundings and responsibilities, if Unitarianism were not still struggling with itself, if it were now ready to do the needful work, the complexion of our case would be different. As it stands and until Unitarianism shall as a matter of actual fact be,—and the word shall stand for all that "Free Religion" now is,—until then it will be important to look after all weak points. As the case yet stands, I believe that "Rational Religion" is the most fitting name for the highest and best. But if, by reason of greater activity, the men who are determined to make Unitarianism synonymous with, or rather to absorb, rationalism, can succeed, why, then, so let it be. If Unity and Company can bring the mountain to Mahomet, why, let us have a great christening, and give the brave young prophet of Unitarianism leave to inscribe its name on the clear, bright summit of the mountain of Rationalism,—but not until the danger is surely past of any form of crystallization, not until the Free Religious Association shall have finished the perfect work which it began with the spur of criticism, and which quickened into life the neo-Unitarianism of to-day.

Who ever sees it thus must stand loyally by the grand company of "Free Religionists" until the possibilities and aspirations of Unitarianism shall have become actual realities. Then, Unitarianism and "Free Religion" may join hands, and the hearts that have so long beat as one in the common desire to make the world better and happier may cleave wholly to each other; and I do not much care which acts the part of husband in this holy marriage, so that he be faithful and deserve that his loving wife be thenceforth called by his name. Then may these twain, who have grown in beauty side by side, go on together until they fill with joy the one great home of all mankind.

WORK OF THE COSMIAN SOCIETY, FLORENCE.

Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, for the Year ending April 4, 1881.

The recent outbreak of persecution against the Jews, in Germany, gives a new and startling proof of the need of such organizations as this free society; for no true Cosmian can be a persecutor. The Cosmian idea teaches the brotherhood of the human race, and by making no distinction on account of doctrinal belief, or sex, or color, or nationality, tends to break down those walls which bigotry and selfishness have built up, to divide mankind into warring sectaries and factions, drenching the earth with blood, and making as the poet says,—

> "Enemies of nations, who had else
> Like kindred drops been mingled into one."

This society extends the hospitality of its platform alike to Jew and Gentile, to Catholic and Protestant, to Orthodox and Heterodox. In giving the right hand of fellowship, the society asks for character, not creed; demanding from and extending to its opponents freedom of thought and speech with the privilege of mutual kindly criticism.

[The report here gives a list of speakers who have occupied the platform of the society during the year, and their subjects; also subjects of readings by members of the society in the absence of speakers.—Ed.]

The Sunday forenoon exercises, so long maintained by this society, though bearing the name of Sunday-school, are radically unlike those of the church institution of that name. Our school provides for the needs of childhood, youth, and manhood; and all these classes are well represented in its membership and attendance. It aims to cultivate the literary, the scientific, the artistic, the musical, the dramatic, the social, and the religious elements. It teaches reason in religion, encourages freedom in thought and speech, and makes truth the sole authority. It aims to strip religion of superstitious gloom, and make her ways ways of pleasantness, and all her paths peace. The school-room contains, among other things, a melodeon, a piano, a cabinet of minerals, a fine library, including an encyclopædia and other books of reference. Its walls are adorned with the portraits of such men as Bryant, Longfellow, Whittier, Burleigh, Weld, and Channing. While the Bible is read and consulted in the school, it is not set up as the sole authority. The folly of making any book the only standard of truth is well illustrated by the fact that a body of believers in the divine authority of the Scriptures have for some years been engaged in revising and altering the "divinely inspired" word, so that some one is now asking, "When the new Bible will go into effect?" The school has been well managed during the past year, with the usual happy results, under the faithful supervision of Miss E. C. Elder, and the benevolent labors of an efficient corps of teachers. For the details of the year's work in this useful department, the society is referred to the report of the superintendent.

During the past year, seven new names have been added to our list of members. The expenses of the society are defrayed by voluntary contributions; and the seats in our hall, on Sundays, have always been free. By the generous contributions of our members and friends, the treasurer is again enabled to report the expenses of the past year all provided for, and the society free of debt. This organization admits the self-evident right of woman suffrage; and women have always voted and held offices in this society, on the same terms as men. While we admit that, at each and every election, each woman has honestly put but one vote into our ballot-box, we are obliged to charge them with stuffing our contribution-box. Of this latter act, we find that the ladies of the Industrial Union have, during the past year, been guilty to the extent of three hundred and eighty-two dollars and thirty-eight cents. Your committee leave it to the society to determine what penalty should be inflicted. To the musicians and all others who have given their personal efforts to make our meetings pleasant and successful, your committee, in behalf of the society, tender their grateful acknowledgments.

Digitized by Google

Your committee have had intimations of a general desire of the members of the society for another resident speaker. This matter should be considered and acted upon, either at this meeting or at a special meeting to be early called for the purpose; and it is to be hoped that the members will soon be able to unite in calling the right man or woman for the place,—one who will interpret and defend the liberal movement which this society has so long and so earnestly labored to promote. Your committee, individually, will be glad to coöperate with the other members, in calling and settling, if practicable, the person whom the majority may select and indicate by their votes for the office of resident speaker. It is perhaps unnecessary to remind the members that no resident speaker that they may call will be able to agree in sentiment or practice with the views and ways of every member. He or she will speak for himself or herself alone. The great principle of our platform calls upon us to sink individual differences of thought in a sea of charity so deep and broad that no eye can see the inequalities of its tranquil surface.

Another thing that we must bear in mind is that neither Church nor State will recognize our resident speaker as a minister, unless he or she has been licensed to preach by some church organization. While the State kindly permits our resident speaker to consign us to the grave, it will not allow him to unite us in marriage. It happens just now, however, that there is, locally, some compensation for this anomaly. Our resident speaker, we conclude, could act as an officer of the Forbes library, which clergymen cannot. And here we are obliged to differ with our esteemed and very liberal friend, the Unitarian minister in Northampton, when he says that the discrimination in Judge Forbes' will, against ministers, would shut out such a man from the management of the library as the late Charles C. Burleigh. We submit that, as the law does not recognize our resident speakers as ministers, the courts will be obliged to decide that they are competent to act in the management of the Forbes library. When Mr. Burleigh was our resident speaker, application was made to the legislature to authorize persons in his position to solemnize marriages. The request was refused. A similar request by the Free Religious Society of Providence has been recently denied by the legislature of Rhode Island.

In reviewing the doings of the past year, we find cheering tokens of the progress of liberal ideas in this region. The good old conservative town of Northampton has come to the conclusion that "it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath," and so has voted to open its public library on Sundays, thus adding another to the many ameliorating influences of the first day of the week. The town has also elected a woman, for the term of three years, as one of the school committee. This new and accomplished member of the school board has long been a useful and honored member of this society. The town has also, in its corporate capacity, voted to petition the legislature to give to women the right to hold town offices, and to vote in town affairs, on the same terms as men.

In addition to these signs of progress, we discover all around us many other proofs of the growth of a more tolerant and liberal spirit. These cheering results, we must believe, are in no small degree due to the influence of the Free Congregational Society of Florence. All the signs of the times beckon us onward. Marching under the Cosmian flag of freedom, emblazoned with the legend, "Truth for Authority, not Authority for Truth," we shall continually discover new fields of usefulness, and win new conquests in the realms of matter and of mind. Let us open our eyes to see, our ears to hear, and our hands to do the things which make for the peace, enlightenment, and moral elevation of mankind, without distinction of creed, or sex, or color, or nationality.

Respectfully submitted,

SETH HUNT,
A. T. LILLY,
JOSEPH MARSH, } Executive Committee.

FLORENCE, April 4, 1881.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Sunday School Lessons on "Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion."

I.

Introduction.

Said a friend: "How comical for a Free Religious Society to have a Sunday-school! What has it to teach?" The annexing of the word "free" seems to nullify in some minds any conception of religion. But, as the benefit of the Sunday-school is refused theoretically to no other branch of religion, why should it be to a Free Religious Association? It has been also said that the word "free" prevents organization. Then too much stress is laid upon the first word, so that the sound of the second is lost. Religion is the substantive, and is the primal object of regard, the adjective qualifying, but not obliterating it. Every form of religion needs its schools as training-places for the young, and Free Religion therefore has its definite part to enact in juvenile education. If any faith is worth believing, it is worth living for and living up unto its heights.

"But Free Religion has nothing to teach," is interposed. "It is too definitely indefinite." To which it can be eagerly replied, that, if Free Religion has nothing else to teach than definite indefiniteness, it will perform one of the greatest services now needed in showing the limitations of belief. Many denominations teach everything about religion under the form of verified fact or accepted mystery. The child is equipped with a formula that needs no change on earth, and presumably none in heaven. Some sects and many individuals are learning that self-respect and truth alike demand non-affirmation and non-denial in many phases of religion. The nobility and calmness and patience implied in the word "agnostic" is beginning to be recognized. It is not that one denies, but that one dares to say one does not yet know, cannot yet affirm. Neither negation nor affirmation is often the attitude of reverence.

If merely as a counterpoise to the authority, submission, and contradiction involved in some catechisms, should Free Religion plant its Sunday-schools, to show that religion is compatible with freedom of the human mind. The injurious influence of church authority cannot be too strongly presented. It cramps the understanding, begets weakness of mind and will, and cultivates a reverence born of ignorance rather than of a humble endeavor to comprehend. Take, for example, three statements in "The Trinity Church Catechism," compiled under the direction of Dr. Morgan Dix. "Faith is a gift of God, whereby the soul, being enlightened, takes God at his word." "Faith accepts without doubting all that God has revealed." "A mystery is a definite truth revealed by God, and passing man's understanding." It seems childish to even pause and ask how we are sure that is a truth which we do not yet understand, or how do we know that God has said it. Surely, if such ignorance on our part is inculcated as worthy of belief, and on the other hand Free Religion is assaulted as atheistic or irreligious, it is a duty to loudly declare what are its underlying and abiding principles, and to use Sunday-schools as one means of imbuing the young with such principles as the highest form of truth yet attained.

Therefore should a Free Religious Society maintain a Sunday-school. That granted, the question recurs, Is there enough material of thought for it? If we have enough for the guidance of our own life, we have enough to lend to our children. In one respect, a Free Religious Sunday-school may be considered as less hampered than any other; because, as the name of "Free Religion" is comparatively new, one would hardly look for old methods of propagation, and consequently a Free Religious Sunday-school might admit more variety in its methods of instruction than Sunday-schools generally can or do. When teachers regard every subject as tinged with divine light and capable of leading to a Pantheistic or a Theistic trust, varied subjects become the tools of Sunday instruction, as already physical science, mental philosophy, and political economy are taught. To the present writer, it seems wiser to give the one short hour chiefly to religious and moral instruction; but a large number of persons are attracted to Free Religion as a reaction from the hampered and conventional forms in which they have been educated, and therefore enjoy this variety. The underlying strata of all knowledge, however, can always be shown in the relation of the finite to the infinite.

After stating, in as eloquent, true, and generalizing terms as one can, that the purpose of a Sunday-school is the elevation of religious character, are we not forced also to assert that the purpose of each school is to make its views distinct from others' views, not in any spirit of antagonism or dogmatism, but from loyalty to one's own apprehension of truth,—as, for instance, what is specially involved in Free Religion over and above other attitudes of mind? Most of such teaching will be largely composed of some phases of Unitarian thought; but the emphases will be laid differently, and "Free Religionists" themselves have placed their emphasis on Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion. Others may and do say that those words are also their motto, but no others have emblazoned them on their printed pages and made them so all-essential. Free Religion cares for these words as Unitarians, Episcopalians, Baptists, care for their denominational names. Yet as all extension of knowledge makes one care less and less for definite forms of religion, which are not capable of expansion, so does one care less for conventionalized words.

Could not, however, these words be made the basis of distinct varied teaching, to which could be added illustrative rational instruction concerning Judaism, Christianity, and other historical religions? There are few, if any, accredited text-books for a Free Religious Sunday-school; nor perhaps can there be, if individualism is more valued than organization. As the very result of the working of freedom is to induce one to accept nothing on authority, it is doubtful whether any text-book could be produced which would be satisfactory to more than one person, the writer, and perhaps not even to him; yet the schools would gain in coherence and strength, if there could be some common stress of emphasis. This is most difficult indeed, for at the very outset occurs the definition of God, and of religion, for the child will ask of both. The argument from design, though still more conclusive to some minds than any other, is overpowered, with many, by the argument from consciousness. How puzzled is the little child over such terms, true and beautiful to the older mind, as that "A sense of God is the relation of the individual to the universal," or "the sense of universal relation," or "that religion is the feeling of something unrealized and to be realized, and which we are impelled to realize"! Theists, Pantheists, and Agnostics can all meet in the daily practice of Free Religion, while only the Agnostics can be said to have not yet asserted their position of knowledge. This question of who and what is God cannot be blinked at by teacher, parent, minister, or text-book; for it is the underlying principle of belief and the earliest problem. But teacher, parent, and minister can each say, with more or less limitation and definition, what each himself thinks; and any text-book which goes forth as the organ or instrumentality of Free Religion should also try to state approximately the most general belief, even if it is not the individual opinion.

The second question that logically arises is the relationship of the creature to the creative power, and then of man to his fellow-men. God, our relationship to Him and to humanity, are principles and facts which the little child must dimly apprehend, but which not even mature life can fully comprehend. Upon these could follow separate lessons on morality, as part of character-building, or upon the familiar and reverential lessons of science, as have so well been lately given in the Index by Mr. Hinckley; after which there could come years of study devoted to the investigation of the Bible and of increasing love for it, unfettered by any literary or theological criteria other than what would be applied to any book, and which would necessarily involve a careful consideration of the extent of our obligations to Jesus and of his position as teacher. For such study there are three or four most excellent books based on the latest results of thorough scholarship, which are well known, as The Bible for Learners, Stanley's History of the Jewish Church, Knappert's Religion of Israel and The Growth of the Hebrew Religion. And such study would naturally culminate in the consideration of other religions or comparative theology. In such a course of instruction, it is often wise to interpose, for the sake of variety, separate short courses from three to eight or nine Sundays in length. Such a course, taking up distinctive words as containing emphases of thought, would induce the child to measure rightly, and perhaps to value still more highly, such forms of thought. As there are no distinctively separate lessons on the words "Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion," and as they are grand and inspiring words, that directly and indirectly have been made the basis of most human action, it may be well to examine them in their separate relations as affording material for Free Religious Sunday-school instruction. Therefore, I shall try to outline in three lessons a series of suggestions for the teacher, which her own skill and fidelity will enable her to elaborate unto perfection. KATE GANNETT WELLS.

Digitized by Google

FOREIGN.

A SECOND edition of George Eliot's translation of Feuerbach's Essence of Christianity is announced by Messrs. Trübner. The same publishers are about to bring out a Social History of the Races of Mankind, by Mr. A. Featherman, to be completed in about ten volumes.

THE Library of the University of Heidelberg has lately recovered three important Greek manuscripts, which had been lost for a period of upward of two hundred and fifty years. They had been lent, it seems, about 1620, to a professor at Wittenberg, and were not returned, but forgotten.

SIAM.—A Presbyterian missionary writes, in the Foreign Missionary, that, although there are many heathen temples in Siam, they are most of them going to decay; and he adds that there are only one-fourth as many Buddhist priests in Bangkok, the capital, as there were thirty years ago. And this missionary expresses the opinion that Siam would ere this have become a Christian land but for the fearfully wicked example of business men who have come there from Christian countries.

LEO XIII., replying to an address presented by the gold-workers against the profanation of saints' days by business and labor, laments that, Rome having been torn from the legitimate rule of the Pontiff, he is placed in the impossibility of remedying the evil and revindicating the honor of God, and says that they speak foolish and lying words who assert that the non-observance of saints' days discourages idleness and tends toward the increasing prosperity and wealth of the people.

THE Bradlaugh case has at last taken a turn that was hardly anticipated. There has been no doubt a good deal of foolishness on both sides. A few days since, Mr. Bradlaugh offered to take the oath in the House of Commons, but was prevented by an opposing resolution, which resulted in a vote of 208 to 175, amid great cheering from the Conservatives. Sir Stafford Northcote, the mover of the resolution, and others supported it, John Bright, Gladstone, and representatives of the Liberal party opposed. Mr. Bradlaugh refused to retire from the bar, and was removed at the request of the speaker, by the sergeant-at-arms. In addition to Mr. Bradlaugh's case with Parliament, he has also of late been indicted for blasphemy, and subjected to a fine in consequence. Mr. Bradlaugh, having inquired of the Court of Appeals whether this involves his disfranchisement, has received an affirmative answer. This decision will make it necessary to hold another election for the seat which he holds as representative from Northampton.

HOW THE FRENCH WORKMAN LIVES.—The French laborer probably gets more for his wages than any other. His food is cheaper and more nourishing. His bouillon is the liquid essence of beef at a penny per bowl. His bread at the restaurant is thrown in without any charge, and is the best bread in the world. His hot coffee and milk is peddled about the streets in the morning at a sou per cup. It is coffee, not slops. His half-bottle of claret is thrown in at a meal costing twelve cents. For a few cents, he may enjoy an evening's amusement at one of the minor theatres, with his coffee free. Sixpence pays for a nicely cushioned seat at a theatre; no gallery gods, no peanuts, pipe-smoke, drunkenness, yelling, or howling. The Jardin des Plantes, the vast galleries and museums of the Louvre, Hôtel Cluny, palace of the Luxembourg and Versailles, are free for him to enter. Art and science hold out to him their choicest treasures at small cost, or no cost at all. French economy and frugality do not mean that constant retrenchment and self-denial which would deprive life of everything which makes it worth living for. Economy in France, more than in any other country, means a utilization of what America throws away; but it does not mean a pinching process of reducing life to a barren existence of work and bread and water.—Scientific News.

JESTINGS.

YOUNG lady, examining some bridal veils: "Can you really recommend this one?" Over-zealous shopman: "Oh, yes, miss! It may be used several times."

THE words of Mr. Joshua Billings are pointed: "Thar iz advice enuff now laying around loose to run three just such worlds as this. What we are suffering most for iz sum good examples."

OUT in Leadville, when one is introduced to a stranger, the polite thing is to ask, "What was your name before you came here?" The next question, according to the rules of etiquette, is, "How did you manage to escape?"

PIERRE VERNON, in a recent article on "The Age of Adulteration," relates that a wine-merchant, giving death-bed injunctions to his son, said, "Always bear in mind that wine may be made with anything, even [with a melancholy smile] grape juice."

A CERTAIN Methodist house of worship had been struck by lightning and nearly destroyed. At a meeting called to consider plans for rebuilding, a colored brother commented thus: "If the Lord sees fit to burn down his own houses, we needn't be in a hurry to build no more for him."

The Legend of Thomas Didymus,

THE JEWISH SCEPTIC.

By James Freeman Clarke.

CLOTH, $1.75.

"The cultured and thoughtful will read it as a fresh and original contribution to an ever-absorbing subject; as a most picturesque and truthful picture of Jesus' environment; as a realistic transcript of the divers opinions his prophecies elicited from all sorts of men, and as the latest and most carefully weighed opinions of one of the most prominent and scholarly thinkers of the day. James Freeman Clarke belongs to that brave and noble band of New England writers, of whom Theodore Parker was the leader, who have done so much for the freedom of thought in our country."*—Art Interchange.

"The book is in one sense another life of Christ, containing a record of his teachings and the principal events of his ministry. The scenes are presented with all the local coloring that attended them, many of them being rarely beautiful. This is especially noticeable in the descriptions which Thomas gives of some of the miracles."—Commercial Bulletin.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

JUST READY.

A NEW VOLUME BY MR. SAVAGE.

Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind.

These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

Gleanings in the Field of Art.

By EDNAH D. CHENEY.

CLOTH. $2.50.

"A fine æsthetic taste, combined with a deep and feeling appreciation of the motives that create and the impulses that guide all efforts, ultimately, to the true, the beautiful, and the good, has given to the public in this new volume a book in which charitable criticism, liberal and comprehensive thought, and wise suggestions predominate."—Banner of Light.

"The novices will find this book an excellent guide to the rich fields of artistic love; and the well-read, travelled artist will be delighted as he revives a thousand pleasant memories and catches fresh glimpses of old pictures from new points of view."—Cincinnati Journal and Messenger.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers,
41 Franklin Street, Boston.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages. It restores lost energy, all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia, prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
E. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

UNMOUNTED PHOTOGRAPHS

Of ANCIENT and MODERN WORKS of ART, embracing reproductions of famous original paintings, sculpture, architectural subjects, etc. Price, cabinet size, $1.50 per dozen. Send stamp for catalogue of 1,600 subjects. JOHN P. SOULE, publisher, 338 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the

REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

As made by the most eminent scholars of England and America. Half the price of Corresponding English Edition. Large type, linen super-calendered paper, elegant binding. A separate "Comprehensive History of the Bible and its Translations," including a full account of the New Revision, given to subscribers.

Best chance for agents ever offered. Send stamp for particulars at once.

The Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES	10c.
SKULLS	10
GHOSTS	10
HELL	10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD	10
GODS	10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT	10
HUMAN RIGHTS	10
HEREAFTER	10
TOM PAINE	10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at $3 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,
23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—No. 594.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—No. 46.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

Selections from E. H. Chapin, D.D.

IF Napoleon, pointing to the tall and mystic pyramids, could say to his army, "Lo! fifty centuries look down upon your deeds," young men of America, of you it may be said that fifty unborn generations abide the issue of your works.

WHEN truth comes, it must speak by its own authority. There is no outside evidence greater than it. There is nothing that can more convince of its truthfulness than the truth itself.

IF we give to this life of ours only a material interpretation,—such an interpretation as thousands practically do give,—then the entire mechanism of things is an inexplicable monotony.

A PEEVISH sensitiveness to the sayings and doings of others indicates real poverty of soul or miserable timidity, or else a spirit which is mastered by the body, and lies at the mercy of diseased and jangling nerves.

WE only attain the true idea of marriage when we consider it as a spiritual union,—a union of immortal affections, of undying faculties, of an imperishable destiny.

HOME is the seminary of all other institutions. There are the roots of all public prosperity, the foundations of the State, the germs of the Church. There is all that in the child makes the future man, all that in the man makes the good citizen.

I DO not know a more dreadful thing than at a time of trouble going out and calling in God as a stranger.

THE public sense is in advance of private practice.

INDUCTION is simply confidence in the integrity of nature.

LET every man be free to act from his own conscience; but let him remember that other people have consciences too, and let not his liberty be so expansive that in its indulgence it jars and crashes against the liberty of others.

IS THERE anything so wretched as to look at a man of fine abilities doing nothing?

IN this world, the disposition to do things is of more consequence than the mere power.

NO GREAT truth bursts upon man without having its hemisphere of darkness and sorrow.

CLOTHES, rank, social position, are rags and nonsense compared with the essential quality and quantity of man's being. It is life, the degrees of life, that makes the essential difference between men. Is not this the reward of all effort for truth and goodness, that we thus acquire new life? The more acquaintance man gets with facts, the more he lives: he forms a vascular connection with them, and they become parts of him. He lives the past: he is Plato and Newton, Shakspeare and Channing; his mind sweeps the wide orbits of Saturn and Neptune, and the splendor of the Pleiades glitter in his thoughts. And the more he sympathizes with excellence, the more he goes out of self; the more he loves, the broader and the deeper is his own personality, until his life fills the compass of the world and he is quickened by the very heart of God.

THE reason why men act in masses as they would not act in units is that they are not chivalric enough to stand by their own souls.

THIS is not only the oldest, but the best time. It contains the best life and fruition of all the past.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE need of Civil Service reform in the administration of our national government was never more emphatically demonstrated than it has been in the last two months. The happy prospects with which General Garfield's Presidency began seem likely to be dissipated in a quarrel over the distribution of offices in order to satisfy different factions of the Republican party.

THE Christian Statesman of Philadelphia, with reference to the majority vote in the British House of Commons against Bradlaugh, rejoices at the action, and says: "An avowed atheist is utterly and inherently incompetent to hold office in a Christian nation. The relations which government sustains to God and his law and his providence are such that those who deny the being of God cannot lawfully or wisely be intrusted with its sacred functions." This shows clearly what would very quickly be done in this country, if the Christian-amendment-to-the-Constitution party, of which the Statesman is the organ, should get the power.

IN Burmah, some of the Buddhists interpret the evidences of advancing civilization among them as signs of the approaching advent of a new Buddha. An intelligent Burman in a railroad car being asked, "What signs of a Buddha do you see?" replied: "I see change in all things. Five years ago, we were all afraid when we saw these iron wires on the tops of the telegraph posts, but now we see scores of birds sitting up there. Two years ago, I was afraid of this great fire wagon, and walked half a day rather than venture this ride of an hour. Now, I never think about fear, but sometimes sleep all of the way. Everything is so changed that I think a new Buddha will come to us."

THE Catholic Review, New York, takes every possible occasion to persuade its readers that good Catholics ought to make their church influence felt more forcibly on the daily press. Last winter, it urged the withdrawing of all Catholic patronage from the Herald, because of its opposition to the election of Mayor Grace. In a recent issue, it says: "There are in this city about five hundred thousand Catholics. They read and support the daily papers as liberally as do Protestants. These papers are filled with Protestant and anti-Catholic news. They have little or nothing about Catholic matters; and, when they treat of them, they usually fall into some grievous errors. It is time there should be a change. Catholics should make their patronage and influence felt in this matter. Is it the fault of Catholics or of the press?"

WE find the following in the Philadelphia Sunday-school Times: "The English Sunday Society, which is composed largely of freethinkers, is, one would think, hardly likely to prove an ally in the effort to maintain Sabbath observance. Yet they have quite recently issued a manifesto, protesting against the employment of workmen on Sunday in public works by the corporation of London, 'on the ground,' in the words of their protest, 'that it would endanger the preservation of Sunday as a day of leisure, when the mass of the population are able to avail themselves of the elevating influences of religion, science, literature, and art.'" Our orthodox friends will perhaps, by and by, learn that "freethinkers" who would rescue Sunday from bondage to superstition and bigotry are sincere in the purpose to put the day to the highest uses of moral and mental culture. There are enough days already devoted to the importunate demands of the body.

PROFESSOR W. C. RUSSEL, of Cornell University, so the New York Tribune reports, who has been acting President of the University during President White's absence in Europe, has been asked, and quite peremptorily, by the Executive Committee of the Trustees, to hand in his resignation. The committee have made public no reasons for this action; but it is said that their reasons are that Professor Russel has been too arbitrary and dogmatic in his office as President, and too free in the expression of his liberal religious views in his class-room as Professor of History. Since President White is soon to come home to take his office again, the first of these reasons would not seem to be a very valid one, even if Professor Russel were guilty of the faults alleged. Nor can we believe that Professor Russel, from our knowledge of him, would fail to respect the religious rights of others in his lecture-room. We fear that bigotry on the part of the committee is at the root of this matter, and shall watch with interest the farther development of the case.

THERE is a censorship of the public press that is perfectly proper even in a free country, and is much needed,—the censorship exercised by the moral judgment of the community; and the newspaper that does not respect this judgment should be made to feel the weight of it. The newspapers that under the plea of "enterprise" publish the details of scandalous stories and the sickening revelations often made on the witness-stand at law-trials should be shown unmistakably that they cannot enter respectable society. We say Amen to the following from the Boston Herald: "There is a growing feeling in every healthy community against the journals that make it their special object to minister to perverted taste by seeking out and serving up in a seductive form disgusting scandals and licentious revelations. There is good reason to believe that the clean newspaper is more highly prized to-day than it was four or five years ago. It is also safe to predict that as people in all ranks of life, who wish to protect their own at least from contamination, become more conscious of the pernicious influence of a certain class of journals, called 'enterprising' because they are ambitious to serve up dirty scandals, they will be careful to see that the journals they permit to be read in the family circle are of the class that never forget the proprieties of life."

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

THE FUNCTION OF ISSUING NOTES:

Considered with Reference to the National Banks.

BY EMILY J. LEONARD.

That the people of the United States have never had a better currency than they now possess is universally admitted. The undoubted security of the notes of the Government and of the National Banks, their acceptability throughout the country, and their convertibility into coin, so strongly recommend our present paper issues that certainly no prudent person would desire any change which involved a sacrifice of these qualities.

There is, however, one other essential to a sound and secure currency, which is frequently overlooked. We refer to steadiness in the purchasing power of the currency itself. This is determined by the relation of the quantity of money to the transactions effected by its means. It was a consideration of the importance of this quality that made Daniel Webster an advocate of a National Bank, "instituted with more regard to its function of regulating the currency than to its function of discount." J. R. MacCulloch had this also in mind, when, in his notes to Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, he spoke so forcibly of the dangers to be apprehended, "so long as any individual or set of individuals may usurp the royal prerogative, and issue money without let or hindrance."

Of the able writers who have given attention to this subject, probably no one has left on record more important testimony than that far-seeing statesman and wise financier, Lord Overstone, whose large experience, close and careful observation, great caution, and rare powers of reasoning give peculiar value to his words, and have won for him the reputation of being the greatest financier England has produced. In his "Remarks upon the Management of the Circulation," etc., he thus speaks of a very common error: "Security for the ultimate solvency of those who issue paper money is confounded with, and conceived to be the same thing as, security for the due regulation of the amount of that paper money,—a fallacy very prevalent, and from which the most erroneous views arise. Insolvency on the part of the issuer affects the specific holders* of the notes of that issuer; . . . but improper fluctuations in the amount of the paper issues affect the whole country in common. They disturb, to a greater or less extent, the steadiness of prices and the regular movements of trade; they tend to derange the equilibrium of exchange with other countries; and, if not subjected to timely control, they may endanger the whole basis of the monetary system of the country in which they occur. The former evil is local and particular, the latter is general, affecting the whole country and every individual in it. A system, therefore, which affords protection against the former evil, but contains no definite provision against the latter evil, must still be considered as defective in the most essential point."

Whenever Lord Overstone (either as Samuel Jones Loyd, the leading partner in the eminent banking-house of Jones, Loyd & Co., of Manchester and Liverpool, or, later, after his elevation to the peerage) was called upon to give evidence before Parliamentary Committees on the currency, as he was in 1833, 1840, 1848, and 1857, he always gave emphatic testimony to the inconvenience and difficulty that must arise from any multiplication of the issuers of paper money, and expressed his opinion that, on general principles, one bank alone of issue for the country would be the best system. No one can read his published writings without being impressed by the cogency with which he argues the importance of separating the function of issuing notes from that of a bank of discount and deposit. The issue of notes he regarded as the creation of money, and he thought the profit of such issues properly belonged to the government. Hence, he would have this function intrusted to one issuing body, connected with which should be a member of the government; and this body should have full power of control over the issues, and be made exclusively responsible for their amount. This issuing body, however, should have no connection with any bank of discount and deposit, because the interests of a private corporation might (and often would) require a course of conduct directly at variance with the best interests of the country; and the latter interests should alone be considered by an issuer of the currency. The well-known separation of the departments of issue and banking in the Bank of England, by "Peel's Act of 1844," on the renewal of the bank charter in that year, was made in conformity with the recommendations of Lord Overstone, and was probably regarded by him as a preliminary step toward a total separation of banking from issue.

In 1848, four years after the separation, when asked (by a committee of the House of Lords) his opinion as to the wisdom of taking the issue of notes altogether out of the hands of the Bank of England (leaving to the Bank, however, its functions as banker of the State), he said he thought such a course would tend to a more wholesome state of feeling in the public mind; and he added, "I think the more the management of the circulation is separated from the banking business, not only in reality, but in appearance, the more beneficial it will be to the public interest."

The fundamental error of the system of issue by our present National Banks is this (and it is a fault identical in kind, though not in degree, with that so repeatedly pointed out by Lord Overstone to various Parliamentary Committees on the Currency): that our two thousand and more National Banks have each and all the power of suddenly increasing or diminishing, by the extension or the retirement of their notes, the amount of money in the country. Though this power may not be so great as existed under the previous State bank system, nor so liable to abuse as that, its evils are sufficiently serious and threatening, as the disturbance in the New York money market, caused by the sudden retiring of a large amount of bank circulation, recently evinced,* to lead us to consider whether the right to issue money can safely be continued to the National Banks.

Without entering upon the question whether or not the duty of the banks to protect their own interests justified their action in this regard, the evil effects on the business of the country which their course produced leaves no doubt that the power to effect such results should not be intrusted to banks nor to any body of men. The total amount by which the banks could have been affected by the passage of the proposed Refunding Bill was but as a mere drop in a bucket, compared with the losses entailed on the business community by the consequences resulting from their action.

It is true that this derangement of business was speedily righted; but, happening at other times and under other circumstances, it might have entailed consequences most disastrous. The possibility of any such results from the operation of our National Banking Law is a sufficient reason for changing it. It was the possibility of banks making such sudden withdrawals of their notes, and producing thereby falling prices, business failures, panics, and a virtual change in all money contracts, which, as much as "the improper and dangerous power of creating money beyond the amount which ought to exist," constituted, in the mind of Lord Overstone, a formidable, if not a fatal, objection to the union of the function of issue with that of banking. He considered that governmental control, either direct or indirect, must be exercised over all the paper issues of the country; and that, if the control were indirect, it would of course be slow, and would be uncertain in its extent, and, in effecting it, there must be an additional and unnecessary pressure upon the community; but that this would not arise, if the control was immediately on the issues themselves. Hence, he inferred that a more direct control was more advantageous to the public interests and more safe for the object in view than an indirect control. He was convinced, as well from an examination of the returns furnished by the Bank of England as from reasoning based upon general principles, that the mismanagement of the currency was generally very closely connected with the union of the functions of banking and issue. The same fact holds true in the United States, if we except the expansions and contractions of the currency made by the Treasury Department.

To the common objection to the existence of only one issuing body, that it would be a "monopoly," and that "monopolies are mischievous," no reply can be more pertinent than that of Lord Overstone. He says: "In the majority of cases, monopolies are, no doubt, injurious to the public interests: and the notoriety of the fact renders it easy to excite against them an indiscriminate feeling of hostility. For the purposes, however, of enlightened and beneficial legislation, it is necessary to distinguish those cases to which the principles of free competition are applicable from those in which exclusive privileges, accompanied by undivided responsibility, are necessary for the public protection. Such cases, though comparatively limited in number, exist; and, when they occur, they are not usually of a trifling or unimportant character. The power of creating money, like the royal prerogative of coining, are cases in point: and, if we subject them to the principle of free competition, instead of managing them by an exclusive power subjected to undivided responsibility, the injury to the public interest may be incalculably great." Again, in his testimony before a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1840, he said: "The principle on which competition depends appears to me to be this: that its tendency, in all ordinary cases, is to secure to the public the advantage of the greatest quantity of the article and of the best quality at the cheapest price, and that all miscalculations with respect to supply that are made by producers fall in their inconvenient consequences upon the producers, and not upon the public. Now, with regard to paper money, . . . it is not the greatest quantity at the cheapest price which we require, but it is a strict regulation of the quantity by reference to a certain standard: and, again, any miscalculations in the proportion of the actual supply to that which ought to be supplied fall principally and most extensively on the community at large." Again, he says, "To intrust the issuing of the paper money of the country to the principle of competition is to intrust it to that which must mismanage the paper money, and must inflict very serious consequences upon the public interest."

Admitting the importance of a due regulation of the paper issues, the question immediately presents itself, How can a currency be so issued as to keep fluctuations in amount and hence in value within proper limits?

As a perfect money would at all times bear the same relation to the exchanges to be effected by its means, and as a vast and continually fluctuating volume of credit is based upon the money of the country, and in this credit transactions of immense number and amount are daily settled, and as the amount of these exchanges is continually varying, it is easy to see that even if a money were possible which would not vary in amount, or which increased only in correspondence with the increase of population, such a money would be far from being perfect,—that, in fact, a perfect money is, in the nature of things, impossible.

By the general consent of commercial peoples, however, the precious metals have been taken as money, because, though not a perfect one, no other has seemed to combine so many desirable qualities. The slowness with which additions are made to their total amount is such that, with a few exceptions, their variations in value from this cause have been comparatively small. When countries adopt paper instead of the precious metals, or in conjunction with them, they must, if they would keep their currency at a par with that of countries using coin, limit their paper money to an amount which will make their total money volume not greater than it would be, under the operation of prices throughout the world, if their currency were wholly of coin.

As variations in the quantity of money in any country, cæteris paribus, change the prices of commodities therein, and in effect alter the terms of every contract solvable in money, justice requires that changes in the volume of money should not be left to the varying interests of banks or of individuals, but to the operation alone of the natural laws which govern the distribution of the precious metals.

To secure this end, an automatic or self-regulating system must be adopted, which will leave no dis-

*This, of course, does not apply to notes issued by our National Banks, if we consider the banks as the issuers.

*The total amount of circulation surrendered (chiefly in apprehension of the passage of the Refunding Bill) by the banks in the various States, from February 19 to March 5 inclusive, was $18,819,585. Of this, $5,108,450 was by banks in the State of New York. The amount of money withdrawn from the banks of New York City on the 23d and 24th of February last was sufficient to raise the market rate of interest there on those days to over one per cent. per day.

The New York dailies for March 15 state that on the 14th the National Metropolitan Bank of New York deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency $1,000,000 in coupon bonds, for the increase of its circulation. These facts sufficiently attest the existing possibility of abuse of so serious a trust as that of issuing notes.

Digitized by Google

cretionary power with the issuers of paper money. The present currency system of England is such a system so far as it relates to the Bank of England, though not quite so as to the other banks of issue.

Under the act of 1844, the Bank of England is now permitted to issue £15,000,000 of notes on the security of the public debt. For all notes issued beyond this sum, an equal amount of coin or bullion must be deposited in the Issue Department of the Bank. The private bankers who had theretofore been in the habit of issuing notes were allowed to continue such issues, on their own credit, to an amount equal to their average issues for twelve weeks preceding the seventeenth day of April, 1844. No other bankers were permitted to issue, and none of the issuing bankers who should become insolvent, or for any other cause should cease to issue notes, could subsequently resume their issue; but the Bank of England could, on being authorized by an order in council, issue additional notes on securities, to the extent of two-thirds of the lapsed issues of the country banks. The law aimed to gradually effect a discontinuance of all issues except those from the Issue Department of the Bank of England.

To apply the same principle in the United States, it would be necessary to prohibit new issues by the banks, and to retire those now authorized as fast as may be done consistently with existing rights.

The present volume of legal-tender notes might be retained (though their legal-tender quality is not essential to the successful working of this plan); and, as bank-notes are retired by their issuers, treasury notes might be issued in their stead, provided that, for all the paper money (whether legal tender or otherwise and including bank-notes) issued beyond a safe limit to be fixed by law, coin should be held as a special fund for their redemption.

The limit of these "uncovered" notes (i.e., notes against which coin is not held for their redemption) should be less than the amount of paper money which would be at all times in circulation when freely convertible into coin on demand of the holder. What amount would be so maintained can only be determined by experience; and our experience since the resumption of coin payments on Jan. 1, 1879, covers too short a period to give safe answer to this question. We now maintain a convertible paper money circulation of nearly $700,000,000. Our experience prior to the suspension of 1861, after making due allowance for increase of population and business, does not warrant the belief that we can permanently keep this amount in circulation on a convertible basis. It would, however, seem quite safe to assume that $500,000,000 could be so maintained. If this limit were deemed too high, a lower one might be tentatively assumed.

So long as any part of the paper money is supplied by the banks, their fair proportion of the burden of maintaining specie payments should be borne by them; but should all the paper money be furnished by the government, as contemplated in the plan proposed, then of all such money issued beyond $500,000,000 (or whatever limit should be fixed by law), notes should only be issued for coin, the coin being held as a special fund for the redemption of the notes.

If the limit of uncovered notes be fixed low enough, it would inevitably follow that a suspension of coin payments would be impossible, and that all fluctuations in the quantity of money in the country would be in the coin part of it, and would therefore be due only to the natural or trade causes which determine the distribution of the precious metals.

The principle involved in the plan here proposed is that known to economists as the "currency principle." It was that advocated by Lord Overstone, Sir Robert Peel, and many other eminent statesmen and economists. The English Bank Charter Act of 1844, and the supplementary acts of 1845 (the latter applying only to Scotland and Ireland), aimed to embody this principle, so far as could be done consistently with the then conceded rights of banks and bankers. The experience of twenty-seven years has well vindicated its wisdom. It is not claimed to be perfect; for the flow of the precious metals from natural or trade causes often works grievous harm, but, in the opinion of the writer, no better has yet been proposed.

Our National Bank system has been exposed to unreasoning denunciation on the one hand, and partisan defence on the other. The wild vagaries of the so-called Greenback Party, especially in its earlier days, have so prejudiced the public mind that a fair consideration of the subject herein treated can hardly be expected at this time. It is because of these prejudices, and in hope of a more impartial hearing, that frequent reference has here been made to the writings of Lord Overstone, not only on account of the value of so able and conservative an authority, but also because the practical application of the principles he advocated, so far as they could then be applied, in the currency system of England, has demonstrated their worth. The adoption of the plan herein proposed would be their full realization.

For the Free Religious Index.

DR. STANLEY HALL ON THE RELIGIOUS SITUATION IN GERMANY AND AMERICA.*

It has been already found out in Boston that Mr. Stanley Hall is a man of ideas, and that what he writes is to be read. Very much in his little book on Aspects of German Culture we had already read. The papers on the Muscular Perception of Space and on Laura Bridgman are reprinted from Mind, and the Note on Hegel and the article on the Perception of Color had also previously appeared; and these four papers are in themselves the most valuable in the book, all very careful psychological studies, none of them save the paper on Hegel's Followers and Critics having any immediate connection with the general aim of the volume. But they were written, says Dr. Hall, "from stand-points and with reference to questions so essentially German that it is hoped that their republication under the title of this volume is not without sufficient justification"; and, at any rate, we are glad to have them preserved in book form. Indeed, not much of the rest of the book is new. Almost everything has appeared in the shape of letters to the Nation. The closing article, "First Impressions on Returning from Germany," is new; and the pretty severe criticisms which it contains upon many things American, things which are certainly open to very much criticism, will probably awaken more popular discussion than anything else in the book.

There is something in the book to interest almost everybody; and there is very much to interest the student of religion,—the articles upon the present condition of Religious Opinion in Germany, upon the Passion Play, Recent Pessimistic Theories, the Jewish Question, Spiritualism in Germany, and much besides. Dr. Hall has very much to say about Pessimism, chiefly in the article upon Hartmann's Ethics and that entitled "Democritus and Heraclitus"; and what he says is very wholesome. He is not one of those who are inclined to look at the world and men through rose-colored spectacles: he is a very sharp and unsparing critic of men and things; but he believes the pessimistic theory of the ultimate principle and purpose of the world, mischievous and paralyzing as it certainly is, to be also altogether unphilosophical and unwarranted, the product of disordered and unhealthy thought. "Herr von Hartmann should at least not forget," he says, "when he tells the world that it is miserable in spite of fancied happiness, that it will be apt, before accepting his pessimistic gospel, to ask most searchingly if the unhappiness he fancies is or should be universal is not really his own." Upon the ethical question, Mr. Hall speaks emphatically, as follows: "Man is the prey of circumstances in proportion as he is ignorant of them; and the so-called new ethics, which, in this age of deepening consciousness and widening knowledge, makes him the creature instead of the controller of his surroundings, is the apotheosis of a self-ignorance, now fortunately becoming as impossible as it is always and everywhere unphilosophical."

The present religious situation in Germany is not very encouraging, according to Dr. Hall. The more liberally-minded men are alienated from the Church, the right sort of young men for the pulpits are not to be found, and the fear of liberalism has caused the conservative lines to be drawn in many respects closer than for many decades. "This," says Dr. Hall, "is the oft-instanced orthodox reaction in Germany. While losing its hold upon the community, and rejecting the best elements of faith, and making it impossible for men of deep thought and earnest purpose to enter or gain influence in its ranks, and breaking with modern progress, the Church has unquestionably become better disciplined within, and more assured and confident in its utterances." Dr. Hall seems to see the greatest hope for the future in a certain Broad Church movement which is beginning on the part of young men who are convinced of the truth of the extreme Tübingen and scientific methods, yet see a profound psychological meaning under the old church dogmas, and enter the Church and use its creeds and rites and machinery, interpreting everything in a way of their own. "Whether this movement have life enough in it to bring it to any successful practical issue," says Dr. Hall, "remains to be seen; but it is in this spirit and direction that the greatest religious reforms have been wrought out." We are sorry to find one so thoughtful and earnest as Dr. Hall certainly is, one moreover so especially interested in religious movements, saying this. It is not in this direction that the greatest religious reforms have been wrought. Put new wine into new bottles, Jesus said; and history has proved over and over again that it is men of the type of Paul and Luther and Milton and Emerson, not Gamaliel and Erasmus and Falkland and Maurice, who have joined themselves to the deepest and most central current. This same Broad Churchism accompanies Dr. Hall into his discussion of American religious affairs. "My strictures," he says, in his sharp criticism of the American Church, "are made from within, and not from without, the Christian Church,"—an expression in itself liable to mislead, so unhappy and restricted is the significance which the term "Christian Church" has come to have in these days, and since Dr. Hall himself heartily accepts the main results of the Tübingen criticism, Baur and Strauss and Zeller. "The substance of the Christian faith is not merely left intact by this criticism," he says, "but is greatly brightened and purified," from which it appears that his conception of the substance of the Christian faith is very different from that current "within the Christian Church," in the popular sense of that term.

He declares that the preaching in our churches is adapted chiefly to men of low grades of intelligence, and that little is done to make the Church "attractive or even comfortable to men of good taste and culture and of profound religious nature." "Since Theodore Parker," he says, "our Church has had no criticism of generally acknowledged power and competency"; and the Church's hostility to the scientific method and to the clear results of science, and especially of historical criticism, encourages the wildest vagaries and the most corrupting superstitions. "The Rev. Joseph Cook's postulate of tangible laboratory proofs of immortality, and his intimation that the materialization of hands and the transition of a conch-shell through the wooden bottom of a chair made the fingers that wrote upon Belshazzar's walls, and Jesus' passage through closed doors, seem more real to him, furnish a conspicuous illustration of this." This teaching of Mr. Cook was received without protest, almost without excitement, by New England Orthodoxy; and this shows how insidiously the fundamental principles of Spiritualism are mastering the Church. Modern Spiritualism, the influence of which he believes to be steadily increasing, Dr. Hall pronounces "the refined quintessence of the superstition of ages, so vast that in comparison with them the historic period is but a day. If there have been centuries of civilization and enlightenment, it is because this darkness has here and there lifted for a space."

How would Dr. Hall bring about a better state of things, how get the superstition out and get a scientific theology in? He seems to have no method, unless his good word for the young Germans who, believing Baur and Zeller, go into the Church and interpret the creeds in a "Pickwickian sense," may be taken as an indication of his method. Referring especially to the situation in America, he says, "We are unable to see any valid reason why good and cultivated men should withdraw from the Church because they are dissatisfied with its leaders, which would not also excuse them for turning their back upon politics because it is now controlled by bad men." But to form a new party is not to turn the back upon politics, and new party organizations become constantly necessary as old ones become corrupt or effete. We cannot think that Dr. Hall would advise a man to stick to any political party, whether right or wrong; and to withdraw from the Church, from any Church, is not to turn the back upon religion. And new Churches become constantly necessary, as old ones become corrupt or effete; so Christ's apostles found it, so Luther and Calvin found it, so the Puritans, so Channing. But if what Dr. Hall really means is that he cannot Aspects of German Culture. By Granville Stanley Hall, Ph.D., Harvard University Lecturer on Contemporary German Philosophers and on Pedagogy. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co.

Digitized by Google

see any reason why a man should not withdraw from a Church, because he does not believe the creed which he has to subscribe in order to membership, which would not also compel him to renounce citizenship, because there are laws on the statute-books which he does not approve, he loses sight of a most important distinction, the only thing of importance in the whole matter. We are members of the State by birth and necessity: men are members of a church or any particular society by accident and choice. But the main point is that the political reformer does not have to declare his approval of the unjust law which he wants to do away with, whereas the Broad Churchman has to subscribe and recite the creed which he preaches against in the pulpit. Only by keeping silent about Baur and Zeller and Parker, or by pretending not to believe them, could clergymen of Dr. Hall's way of thinking get licensed for orthodox pulpits; and surely Dr. Hall would not say that a clergyman has at any time any moral right to retain a position, the prescribed conditions of which he could not satisfy as a fresh candidate. And really there is no difference here between the duties of clergy and laymen. Stopford Brooke came to disbelieve in everlasting damnation, in the infallibility of the Bible, in miracles and sundry other things. Would Dr. Hall say that he should have kept quiet and gone on reading the creeds that declare faith in these, while lifting his people out of faith in them by his preaching? Stopford Brooke said to his people: "If you agree with the liberal clergy and they are compelled to leave the Church, your place is also no longer in the Church. Truth should be as dear to you as it is to your ministers. The liberal clergy ought to feel that they have the support of liberally-minded men in their effort to keep the Church open and on a level with the knowledge of the day." Can this be questioned?

"In New England, at least," says Dr. Hall, "Orthodoxy might almost be claimed as an element of patriotism." This is a remarkable statement, especially from a New Englander whose "Orthodoxy," as we have shown sufficiently and as this little book shows completely, is of the most remarkable sort. It would be lamentable, if it were true of any part of the country. Of New England, of all parts of the country, it is most conspicuously untrue. New England has been especially the home of enlightened religious philosophy in America; and the intimation that Orthodoxy has anything to do with patriotism, when it is remembered what Sumner and Andrew and Garrison and Parker and Channing were, what Lowell and Longfellow and Emerson and Higginson and Whittier and Phillips are, is unfortunate and melancholy enough.

We believe that it is merely a weariness of religious discussion and an unreadiness to cope with the vast problems which the religious situation now present which lead Dr. Hall to assume the attitude which he does in this book toward bold and pronounced religious reform. "The political problems to which this nation has devoted its best energies are," he urges, "new and vast enough in themselves, without complication with the still vaster problems of belief. . . . The terms of the religious problem are too vast for our present culture; and we believe it is the wisest instincts of the best men which incline us to delay the opening of it prematurely, lest other important results already secured should be imperilled in the sudden heat and light." But this is the plea which a timid conservatism has urged forever against every good thing under the sun; and there is absolutely nothing in our present situation which makes the plea especially in order now. . On the contrary, everything calls upon us in America to-day to think and act courageously and definitely in matters of religion, and especially to avoid everything which has the smack of fear of numbers or of the established, or any sort of air of capitulation to the consensus of the incompetent. Our politics, our religion, our academical, social, and literary life, all are suffering most from the corrupting, nerveless policy of "letting well enough alone." There is almost no country in the world, which claims to be free and enlightened, where in society, in the university, and in the magazine, so little freedom of expression upon matters of religion is tolerated or asserted as in America. We want men who shall understand for a time that the soles of their boots furnish them quite sufficient ground for all necessary organization, and shall speak out the truth without trimming or postscript, ringingly, defiantly when there is need of it, without considering stupid cousins and aunts, Mrs. Grundy, or "the church around the corner."

But this last is not meant for Dr. Hall, whose book shows him to be not much lacking either in definiteness or courage. We look for much excellent work from him in the religious field, and are indebted to him for the many wholesome things which this little book of his contains, and which show him to be a liberal, progressive, and earnest thinker. E. D. M.

For the Free Religious Index.

PROGRESS AND POVERTY.

In a notice of Mr. George's book on Progress and Poverty, in the Index of October 14, I attempted to show that the remedy he suggests for the evils of a monopoly of the soil, incident to private ownership, is wholly inadequate to their removal. But I did not suggest any better or other method whereby the injustice, necessarily growing out of such monopoly, might be mitigated; nor have I seen, in the many notices of the book which have appeared in the press, any hint of any other way by which the landless can come by their natural rights in the soil.

Mr. George's book has, I am told, gone through several editions here, and has been republished in England and in Germany. Such a wide-spread demand for a book so radical, so revolutionary in its tendencies, indicates not only an equally wide-spread dissatisfaction with existing land tenures, but an expectation, more or less definite, that by some political revolution, more or less distant, the landless may come into possession of some share of the land or of the benefits it can confer. A consummation devoutly to be wished; but, as to how it is to be consummated, there doesn't seem to be any special concern.

Mr. George declares that as the exclusive possession of land was originally conferred by royal grants where there was no right, other than might, to make such grants, there would be no injustice in confiscating the lands in the interests of the whole people. He sees, however, the impracticability, if not the injustice, of such confiscation; and, whether he recognizes it or not, it is evident that any community, sufficiently alert and intelligent to accomplish such a change, must recognize the fact that present owners of lands have generally paid the market value for them with money or other property which was indisputably theirs, and refrain from attempting to right one wrong by committing another and greater.

Nor does the abolition of slavery without compensation, which he cites as parallel, justify his position; for there was the personality of the slave, a very important factor in the problem, and the controlling consideration with those who denounced slavery. Nor was slavery abolished because of the absence of a good title in the owner.

Mr. George's plan of imposing all taxes upon land, however good it may be as a transition measure, would fail of his great purpose of restoring to every one his right to a share in the natural provision for his subsistence. It would indeed relieve the landless from the burden of direct taxation, but the burden would reappear in increased rents. Besides, the uncertainty as to the amount of taxes, from year to year, would prevent improvements, and result in that most wasteful of all cultures, skinning the soil.

There seems to be no way in which the desired restitution of natural right in the soil can be accomplished, short of complete control by the State; or by communities in some form of organization, an extension of the right of eminent domain into absolute ownership.

Now, it is evident that the State cannot acquire possession of the land by paying for it, in money, anything like its present nominal value; nor could it safely give its obligations, payable at a future day, if those obligations are to bear a rate of interest to be paid annually, anything like the present rate, even if it be but three per cent.,—for it is well known that even three per cent. is more than the average net income from the soil. Whenever and however the State may become sole owner of the land, it must be when interest on the obligations given for it shall be less than the rents it can get from it, else there would be no fund from which the obligations could ultimately be paid. This looks like a long road, and the landless may think it a hard one, to travel. But the case is not so hopeless. The rate of interest has declined in civilized countries more than one-third, nearer one-half perhaps, within the last half-century; and the causes which have produced the decline, the production of wealth beyond consumption, are operating with steadily increasing force, creating capital faster than it can be used with profit, or faster than there is demand for it. With greater intelligence and thrift among producers, the time may not be far distant when they will require but little capital, besides their own savings, for many of the producing arts; when capital will have to be satisfied with little, if any, more than a reasonable guarantee for the risk of loss. Indeed, a safe custody of the accumulations of wealth may be a desideratum; and those who possess it may be glad of a certainty of having it, when required for use. In such case, the obligations of the State would be at once the safest and the most convenient, and would be current and sought for, even if they bore no interest or merely a nominal interest. Lands could then be taken and paid for with such obligations. The question at once arises, What shall the State do with the lands? That they should not be distributed among the people is evident enough; for, upon the advent of new members of a community, there would have to be a redivision, and nothing but confusion would ensue. Some method must be devised whereby the land should be administered in such a way as would secure its most profitable use, the largest and most desirable product. This may be done by renting, from time to time, under free competition to the highest bidder, in such portions and for such periods as experience may prove most certain to secure the desired results.

I suggest this plan, not as the one most likely to be adopted, but to answer the objection so persistently made; namely, that it would be impossible, for the reason already made, to secure to every one an interest in that which is absolutely necessary to his existence. When the time comes, the way will be found. The proceeds of the rentals suggested would be applied first to the maintenance of all public interests, such as government, justice, education, highways, and other institutions of general necessity in lieu of all taxes; and the remainder could be distributed among all the people in some equitable apportionment as to ages.

It may be urged that without absolute ownership there would not be sufficient inducement to make permanent and substantial improvements. The answer is that some of the best buildings in New York are upon leased ground, belonging to the Sailors' Snug Harbor or to Trinity Church; provision being made in the leases, in some cases, that, if at the expiration of the lease the lessee does not renew his lease, he shall be paid an appraised value for his improvements.

I am anxious only to show that the thing can be done, having faith that, when the time comes to do it, as it will come, there will be found a way, through or over all obstacles, to do it. R. H. M.

For the Free Religious Index.

"BASIS OF UNION."

It appears from sundry indications seen of late that Free Religion, Liberalism, is seeking a thrall's collar, by which it shall proclaim itself to the world as the property of some imaginary word, creed, or thought. Proof positive only of lack of confidence in the power of truth is it all! Does the sun apologize for shining or the grass for growing, or tabulate specific formulae by which they shall shine and grow before they have the pluck, so to speak, to do either? Nay! More need is there none that the truth should attempt the poor apology of some little sect for its right to circulate as free and far and untrammelled as the radiance of the sun. "We associate or unite ourselves for the practice of truth, of justice, of love,"—simple and all that as it is,—is but an indication of lack of purpose. If, by the grace of God or otherwise, our minds are in stage of development competent to receive and understand and convey the truth in regard to the universe, of which we are a part, and our relation to it (for this, in fine, is what has always been meant by each and every creed or promise of fealty to truth, justice, love, and what not, in all this world past and present); if our lives are at all fit to practise justice and love toward our fellow-mortals,—then it will follow, as with the fatality of shadow to substance in the light, that our existence shall BE truth, justice, and love.

What, then, do we want for Basis of Union?

Before the answer is offered, take a retrospective glance with me, if you will. Never yet came new truth, pulsing heart-deep through the head of the human world, that first stopped to fix by association, society, church, or otherwise, the time, place, and manner of its coming. It dashes into view a fiery Mazeppa from the empyrean of thought, its prophet bound to it for martyrdom of some sort, and glory too. By its light, men and women gather and stand and stay, held by the power of its attraction. They kindle to action under the influence of its direct radiance, and do and do until the power dies. Beyond that, they remain by force of association, and still continue to do, more and more feebly, until at length that force, too, is dissipated, and then settles back the whole into history and on toward oblivion.

Digitized by Google

What the truth wants is not a "Basis of Union," Preamble, Ground of Fellowship, or other creed, by permission and under ægis of which it shall appear; but it wants and must indeed have a head, a heart, a mind, a soul of which it can take possession, and through and by which it can act and speak.

This somewhat bewildered Free Religion and Liberalism itself furnishes a most memorable illustration of this truth. Years ago, not so many but that some good gray heads can recall the time, there rose from out the mediocrity of existing unions, churches, and the like, a man, a soul, unto whom came visions of the eternal, unwritten gospel of the universe; and, as he gave it utterance, churches with their Urim and Thummim of beliefs and memberships turned upon him at first with frown, then with scowl, then with growl; next they turned their backs upon him; then they ostracized him with curses deep and long; next they prayed God to put hooks into his jaws that he might thereby be dragged down to hell, while these same self-righteous saints, who considered themselves the divinely appointed keepers of all truth for all time, seated themselves by anticipation, private-boxed in the Heavenly Academy of Music, where they might delight in the horrors upon the infernal stage that were to show forth the glory and love of their heavenly Father. To that brave soul in which the new truth was uttering itself, and to whom concern for basis of union was far away, there came ten or so men who had seen and felt the power of this new evangelist; and they did—what? Formulated a basis of union? No. They Resolved,—That Theodore Parker shall be heard in Boston.

That was all. Was that enough, or did that fail? Answer, O world of to-day, from thy many lands where, in all languages that breathe the highest intelligence, liberty, and excellence of thy peoples, this same Theodore Parker is a power of truth, justice, and love that fell not into the grave as it closed over the prophet's worn frame, but which grows and grows with the passing years to higher and grander power of helpfulness to the whole world of man!

If now those who resolved that that man should be heard, or their successors, stop to debate and move and amend and palter over the manner in which they shall declare the new truth of the world a quarter of a century after the death of their leader, they only prove, as aforesaid, that their inspiration has gone, and they but linger vaguely under the force of association. They and all those who aim to put upon the spontaneity of truth a formula by which it shall be compounded, labelled, and doled out for specific cure of ills, proclaim their *mis*conception of the true meaning and true action of the prophetic soul in these times and in all times.

All that is needed now, here and elsewhere, everywhere, in fact, as basis of union for the moving of the world of man, is that one or a dozen men and women with the power of wealth in their hands, wealth of gold, or wealth of bread and butter, the locusts and wild honey of earlier times, shall similarly say and do.

Resolved,—That the truth shall have a hearing in Boston or elsewhere.

What is needed of formulae will come after in good time and way. When it arrives, it will be found to be, not a prescription for the intellectual, but for the social life. That is to say, all organization of Free Religion, to be successful, must be made upon the primal fact of the social nature of mankind, leaving the mind entirely free. If "an outsider" might be allowed to suggest to the institution, whose recent discussion in open meeting of the conditions of preaching and membership was the occasion of the articles in the Index, my word would be as follows:—

Resolved,—That, in the spirit of Theodore Parker, who made it a living power, the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society shall give the Truth of TO-DAY a hearing in Boston.

Upon that broad basis, the world can stand and work, and will, just in proportion to the power of the messenger to bring and present the living truth to a waiting world. And a similar

Resolved,—That the truth of To-day shall be heard in . . . upon the lips of earnest men and women anywhere, will wake their community to life and action.

"From the death of the old
The new proceeds;
And the life of Truth
From the rot of creeds."

Respectfully, CHARLES ELLIS.

April 28.

QUESTIONS ADDRESSED TO MR. JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

DEAR SIR:—

1. Are we, against our reason, tendency, faith, and will, "still Christians"?

2. Was Jesus still a Jew, because he was born of Jewish parents and had some of the humanitarian tendencies of his ancestry, after he followed his own reason, tendency, faith, and will, and opposed the Jewish creed?

3. Are the tendencies of Moses, Confucius, Buddha, Jesus, or Mohammed, superior to those of all good and well-developed men, and do either one of those persons count more than one in the scale of humanity?

4. Are the claims of superiority for any one of the historical forms of religion or sects and for their tendencies, in keeping with republican principles and favorable to the maintenance and propagation of liberty?

5. Is it not vanity, selfishness, speculation, and a false claim, rather than modesty, charity, fairness, and truth, when we stamp modesty, love, charity, patience, civilization, and good tendencies generally, with the name Christian?

6. Will our learned brother favor us with answers hereto; and, instead of his efforts to wrap Francis E. Abbot and others of like belief in the threadbare folds of his Christianity, give us a reply to "The Impeachment of Christianity" by Francis E. Abbot?

Yours sincerely, CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N.H., April 18, 1881.

FOREIGN.

THE following death-notice appears in the Fife (Scotland) Herald: "At Crossgate, Cupar, on the 9th inst., James Burns (long a severe sufferer from chronic rheumatism and a skilful draught-player)."

THE centenary of George Stephenson's birth is to be celebrated June 9, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. At the same time, steps will be taken to erect a building for the College of Physical Science, to be called the Stephenson College for the University of Durham.

THE famous anti-Jewish petition has been sent to Prince Bismarck. It consists of twenty-six volumes, comprising fourteen thousand sheets, with two hundred and fifty-five thousand signatures. Among the memorialists are a considerable number of the higher classes, noblemen, retired generals, and officials.

THE St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Morning Post states that the Russian Government intends to demand of England the extradition of Hartmann, who is accused of having made the attempt to blow up the carriage in which the late Czar was travelling on the railway from St. Petersburg to Moscow.

SUNDAY EXHIBITIONS.—Two art exhibitions were opened under the auspices of the Sunday Society on Easter Sunday, one at Whitechapel and the other in New Bond Street. That at the East End consisted of a loan collection of paintings, etc., organized by the Rev. S. A. Barnett, to which the Council on Education contributed largely from the National Collection at South Kensington. More than twenty-five hundred persons visited the exhibition during the day, it being open from 2 till 9 P.M. The West End exhibition was the first exhibition of the new Society of Painter-Etchers at the Hanover Gallery; and this was visited by about five hundred and seventy-eight members of the Sunday Society between the hours of 4 and 6.30 P.M.—Lloyd's Weekly, April 24.

THE conviction and sentence of Mrs. Fletcher for obtaining money on false pretences from a weak and credulous victim, whom she and her husband, together with another accomplice, had no difficulty in fleecing, has afforded the Times a text on which to hang another plea for increasing the protection by which the law shields the fools from the knaves. There is too much of this nowadays. Mrs. Fletcher robbed Mrs. Hart-Davies; and Mrs. Fletcher having, with inexplicable rashness, ventured within the grasp of the law, has been duly laid by the heels to meditate in jail for the space of twelve calendar months. The law was broken, and the law has been put in force. But to argue that, because a sharper resorted to Spiritualism to plunder her victim, penal laws should be enacted against Spiritualism, is almost as absurd as to make the conviction of a professor of the three-card trick a plea for prohibiting the sale of playing cards. —Pall Mall Budget, April 10.

WHATEVER explanation may be given of the cause of the diminished Liberal majority in Northampton, the fact remains that Mr. Bradlaugh is once more elected to the House of Commons by that constituency. His reëlection brings the oath question once more to the front. Mr. Bradlaugh, speaking at Manchester last Sunday, explained the course which he has determined to adopt. As the second reading of the Land Bill will be taken on the 25th inst., he will not attempt to take his seat till Tuesday, the 26th. He will go to the table; and, although he will withdraw while his right to take his seat is being discussed, he will not leave the table except on that ground, unless he is committed to jail. He said: "My duty is clear. The law has declared you cannot affirm: the law has declared you must swear. I shall swear." After he has taken his seat, he will take the first opportunity to bring in a bill to substitute affirmation for oath. Mr. Bradlaugh says that he hopes "in this great battle I shall quit myself as better men have done before." If he intends to quit himself like the men to whom he refers, he should imitate their example, and refuse to take the oath. His refusal to comply with what he regards as a degrading formality and an unreal mockery would do more to abolish the oath than the bill which he may introduce, but which in the present state of public business cannot be passed.—Pall Mall Budget, April 25.

POETRY.

THE COVENANT OF THE BOERS,

Of the Transvaal Republic, at Wonderfontein, in March, 1879, almost exactly paraphrased.

BY CAPT. C. W. HALL.

In the presence of God Almighty,
Who searcheth the hearts of men,
From our homes by the Transvaal desert
We have journeyed to meet again.
Free burghers, we ask his mercy,
And trust in his boundless grace,
And bind our-elves and our children
Before his awful face.
We join in a sacred compact,
By solemn oaths made sure,
While the rule of the tyrant hireling
In our borders shall endure.

When our fathers to exile journeyed
From the shores of the southern sea,
From the victor's hateful presence,
They fled to the desert free.
Forty long seasons of sorrow,
Warfare and famine and fears,
Have passed since, like Israel's wanderings,
Began their long journey in tears.
Thrice with labor and peril they builded
A State in the wilderness;
Thrice hath the treacherous foeman
Invaded, deceived, and oppressed.

Like robbers in midnight darkness,
They have made of our land a prey;
They have lowered our humble banner,
And taken our laws away.
Such outrage we may not suffer,
Such bondage we cannot brook:
From the power and fear of the tyrant,
To Almighty God we look.
In freedom and peace, our children
Shall hold the land of their sires:
By our father's wrongs we swear it,
By their graves and our homestead fires.

Therefore, as true men and brothers,
We give each other the hand,
Solemnly sworn to be faithful,
Banded together we stand:
E'en to the death-pang together,
We strive till our land is free,
So truly help us, Almighty,
For our trust is only in thee.
Deathless as fame and freedom,
Grand as their rifles' ring,
Shall live the tale of their meeting,
And their oath by the Wonder-Spring.

—Chicago Express.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MAY 12, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

On the 1st of July, 1880, the Free Religious Association assumed the publication of the Free Religious Index. This responsibility was undertaken without the funds necessary for the enterprise, but in the trust that the appeal for means, sent out a few weeks previous, would bring a sufficient response to insure the publication for at least a year. That trust has been justified. Somewhat more than $2,100 has been received; and this sum, in addition to the regular receipts from the Index, will be nearly or quite sufficient to insure the publication till July. In this year of experiment there has been, moreover, an increase in the subscription list of the paper,—an increase sufficiently encouraging to justify the continuance of the Index under the auspices of the Association.

But the Index is not financially self-sustaining; nor without an unprecedented sudden increase in its subscription list is it likely to become so at a very early day on its present business basis. In a careful consideration of ways and means for continuing the publication, the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association have resolved to make an effort to raise at once the sum of $10,000; and the undersigned have been appointed a committee to carry this resolution into effect. This sum, if raised, would certainly insure the continuance of the paper on its present financial basis for a number of years; but it is believed by some of our most competent advisers that in the course of two or three years, by a judicious use of this sum, under energetic management the paper may be made pecuniarily self-supporting.

The committee, a few months ago, privately invited a conference of a few friends of the Index in Boston, at which this and other plans were freely discussed. The plan above proposed was met by most cordial and encouraging approval, not only in words, but in substantial deeds for carrying it into effect. Among the sixteen persons present, subscriptions were made to the amount of $2,300. This has since been increased by the addition of other names to $4,145. And to this it is proposed to add the legacy of $1,000 left by Mrs. Lydia Maria Child unconditionally to the Free Religious Association for the spread of its principles. Her expressed interest in the Index has led the committee to believe that this disposition of her bequest would fully meet her approval. Putting Mrs. Child's bequest at the head of the list, we have already $5,145 pledged, and most of it paid into the treasury.

With this auspicious beginning, it should not be a difficult task to raise the balance from the friends of the Free Religious Association and of the Index throughout the country. But, in order to do it, there must be a considerable number of responses in large sums, corresponding to some of those already on the list. Will not those of our friends who have large means measure the extent of their obligation thereby? But let not those of smaller means feel excluded from the opportunity. If all who believe in the Index do what they can, the fund will be raised; and we hope it may be raised speedily.

Pledges or cash subscriptions may be sent to the "FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION," 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston; but all checks or money-orders should be made payable to the order of John C. Haynes, Treasurer.

(Signed) R. P. HALLOWELL, JOHN C. HAYNES, HANNAH E. STEVENSON, EDNAH D. CHENEY, WM. J. POTTER, } Committee.

Subscriptions to Special Index Fund.

Lydia Maria Child's Legacy, devoted to this object by vote of Executive Committee of Free Religious Association	$1,000.00
Mrs. Sarah S. Russell	500 00
Mrs. E. N. Hallowell	100.00
Miss Hannah E. Stevenson	100.00
John L. Whiting	200.00
Cornelius Wellington	100.00
Mrs. Charles Fairchild	120.00
Miss Emma D. Ireson	100.00
Miss Julia A. Ireson	100.00
Miss Kate C. Ireson	200.00
Miss Helen M. Ireson	100.00
Mrs. Benjamin Ireson	100.00
Miss Matilda Goddard	100.00
Mrs. Anna D. Hallowell	100.00
John C. Haynes	500.00
Charles Nash	500.00
Mrs. Charles P. Curtis	25.00
John M. Forbes	500.00
Henry L. Higginson	200.00
Matthew Luce	100.00
E. R. Knapp	100.00
Henry S. Russell	100.00
J. Malcolm Forbes	100.00
Henry W. Wellington	100.00
	$5,145.00

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Business session, for election of officers, hearing of reports, etc., Thursday, May 26, at 7.45 P.M., in the Parker Memorial Hall, corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets. The methods of the Association looking to a more effective organization, as developed the past year and as may be further proposed, it is hoped may induce an interesting and profitable discussion at this opening session.

Convention, Friday, May 27, in the same Hall, with sessions at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. The question for the morning session is to be, "The Dangers to Morality from the Downfall of the Old Theology; or, The Probabilities of a Moral Interregnum," to be introduced (it is hoped) by Prof. Felix Adler. The afternoon topic will be, "Will Free Religion Organize?" to be opened with an essay by Frederick A. Hinckley. Other particulars as to speakers will be given hereafter.

On Friday evening there is to be a social festival, using both the upper and lower halls of the Parker Memorial Building. A programme of special interest is to be presented, with the usual opportunity for refreshments, conversation, and, not least, pecuniary subscriptions for the work of the Association. WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y.

HARVARD COLLEGE AND ITS CHAPLAIN.

In connection with the invitation extended to Rev. Phillips Brooks to become the preacher at Harvard College, a canvass appears to have been made of the denominational connection of the students in the several University departments located at Cambridge (excepting the theological); and, as the result, a paragraph like the following has been going the rounds of the press:—

UNITARIANISM seems to be losing ground at Harvard, judging by a recent canvass of the religious preferences of the students of the College, Law and Scientific Schools. Of 1,009 students, 288 or 28.8 per cent. are Episcopalian, 225 or 22.5 per cent. Unitarian, 176 Orthodox Congregationalists, 97 non-sectarians, 43 Baptists, 34 Catholics, 30 Presbyterians, 27 Agnostics, 17 Universalists, 16 Methodists, etc.

The facts here brought to light seem to have been a surprise to very many people. But they can be no surprise to those who have been most acquainted with the internal affairs of the College. The only particularly noticeable fact in these statistics is that the Episcopalians now head the list in a denominational classification of the students, whereas in former years the Unitarians were probably at the head. We say probably, because without statistics we do not think it quite safe to say that they certainly were. A popular impression has prevailed that, because the College has been chiefly under the control of Unitarians, the large majority of its students have been Unitarians. But this has not been the case. Twenty-seven years ago, the undergraduate class we knew most about counted ninety-one members. Considerably less than half of these were Unitarians. And, in the Law and Scientific Schools, the proportion of Unitarians was much less than in the undergraduate departments. The statistics just published indicate not that the Unitarian students have absolutely decreased (they have doubtless increased), but that they have fallen off relatively to the increase of students of other denominations; and this is a fact entirely in harmony with the denominational statistics of the Unitarians in comparison with other sects in the city of Boston or the State of Massachusetts or in the country generally. The College has grown immensely, especially in the last ten years. It has become much more national in the character of its patronage. And, this being the case, a smaller proportion of its students than formerly are included within the comparatively small denomination of Unitarians.

This fact, of course, is very gratifying to the College authorities; and the Unitarians, so far as they control the college, even if they had sectarian ends in view in their administration, might look upon the new condition of things with the utmost complacency. The New York Independent, therefore, has clearly lost its head when it says, commenting on the above statistics, "The Unitarians have lost Harvard College." We apprehend that the authorities at Amherst would not think that that college was lost to the Orthodox, so long as they had the control of things, even if they should find their class-rooms next year more than half-filled with students from Unitarian, Episcopalian, Baptist, Catholic, and other denominations. Rather, we should suppose, would they regard it as a great good fortune, a genuine providential opportunity, to have so much excellent material for theological conversion put into their hands. The Unitarian authorities at Harvard—and no denominational change has occurred in the Corporation—have never professed to administer the College in the special interests of any sect. Their profession is to conduct the institution on those broad scientific principles of study which do not admit of any sectarian bias or manipulation. And it must be very gratifying to them to discover that there are so many people in the various denominations who are not afraid of a college so managed.

Digitized by Google

Yet we can well understand that the Harvard authorities should be somewhat embarrassed in this effort at maintaining an unsectarian university, by the traditional and established office of a college preacher. How get a preacher without recognizing some one of the sects? The method adopted at Cornell University, of having preachers in succession from various denominations, might, it is true, be used; but this would not secure a resident pastor or college chaplain for daily service, and hence would not answer the conditions of the endowment by which the office of college preacher at Cambridge was established. The embarrassment of filling this office evidently increases as the number of students not Unitarian increases. We have heard the statement made as one of the reasons for calling Phillips Brooks to the office that, the Episcopalians now having a plurality of the students, it was but right to give them the preacher,—a reason which would have more weight. if the Episcopalian students were required to attend the services at the college chapel, which they are not; nor are other students, whose parents desire them to attend elsewhere. It is now stated also that the Episcopalians have asked leave to build a chapel of their own on the college grounds. This is probably desired not for Sunday preaching, but for the convenience of those Episcopal students who wish to attend daily prayers according to the Prayer-Book, and who are excused from the college chapel to go elsewhere. The number has become so large that the request that their convenience be regarded is not without good reason, provided the college authorities undertake to make any official provision in religious matters for the students. But, if the Episcopalians' request for a chapel on the college grounds be granted, why should not the Orthodox Congregationalists, who are high on the statistical list, be allowed one, too? And the Baptists and Presbyterians and Catholics and Methodists, not wishing to be outdone in zeal, might soon ask to be permitted to put up their chapels; and, ere long, we might have the college campus thickly and beautifully dotted with little chapels of all the varieties of Christian faith,—a delightful standing commentary on the unity of the Christian religion under the influences of unsectarian education! (And, possibly, room enough might be found, too, in one corner for a joss-house for the Chinese professor and his converts.) Evidently, to grant the Episcopalians' request would only open a road to new embarrassments. And yet how deny it, with good logic, so long as the College has a chapel of its own there on the grounds, with a preacher of the Unitarian denomination in it?

The truth is that, in a college which is professedly conducted on strictly unsectarian principles, and using only scientific methods, an official college preacher or chaplain, at least in the present state of religious science, is an anomaly; and the true solution of the difficulty is the abolition of the office. The religious interests of the students need not suffer, were this to be done. There are plenty of churches in Cambridge for them to attend, and plenty of ministers there ready to consider any portion of them a part of their respective parishes. But until this, the true, solution is adopted, the next best thing is to fill the office, as now, from that sect which is the least sectarian in motive and action, and will therefore derive least sectarian benefit from the administration of the office.

Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Mr. M. J. Savage are to be among the speakers at the Free Religious Annual Meeting.

HAS MR. EMERSON CHANGED HIS VIEWS?

[The report which Rev. Joseph Cook did most to put into circulation, representing that Ralph Waldo Emerson had become more orthodox in his religious beliefs, is generally supposed to have rested on Mr. Alcott's authority. Mr. Emerson's son a year ago really disposed of the matter, saying in a letter that was published that there was no change in this respect in his father's views. But Mr. Alcott has now written a letter showing how little foundation such a report has when traced to him. A friend sends us the following extract from this letter, which we are permitted to give to the public.—Ed.]

. . . Nor may I venture to write authoritatively in the matter concerning which you ask information, the supposed change in Mr. Emerson's religious views. All I am authorized to say is that I know of no change other than that which follows upon mature reflection, and often modifies traditional teachings. I have always regarded my friend as a theist; and, if at any time other than a Christian theist, it was undetected by me. That he has never formulated his creed may leave him undenominational and individual, as he doubtless prefers to be left by the different religious sects. . . . Respectfully,

A. Bronson Alcott.

Burlington, Iowa, March 19, 1881.

"AN ECCLESIASTICAL WAVE."

My dear Index:—

I do not like the concession you make under the above caption; for I most earnestly believe it is not true. The wider prevalence of these festivals is obvious; but the necessary significance of this is only religious, not ecclesiastical. Nay, it is more human than either.

As you must be aware, neither Christmas nor Easter nor Good Friday is of ecclesiastical or even Christian origin. All of them—to say nothing of many others—run back into a dateless antiquity. They are undoubtedly religious in their meaning; for they sprang out of man's thought concerning his relation to the universe. The birth of the sun, the resurrection of the year, the mourning for the apparent death that precedes resurrection,—these are poetic and religious ways of looking at the yearly recurrence of eternal relations between man and the universe. The Puritans made the same mistake that you are in danger of repeating. That is, they said, "These things are ecclesiastical and popish: we will away with them!" But they would not away, for they are human. Because the Church adopted and baptized them does not make them ecclesiastical. The revival seems to me rather a reassertion of eternal human sympathies, hopes, and aspirations that for a time had been repressed. In some form, they have made themselves felt in all religions. They are, then, rather a part of the universal religious nature of man than an appendage of any one ecclesiasticism.

I do not see then why they indicate any retrograde movement of freethought. The latter seems to me growing wondrously in all directions and under all forms. And to concede that a purely human movement, older than any Orthodoxy, is an indication of the growth of Orthodoxy, is to give opponents an advantage that does not belong to them. It is also to overlook the deeper meaning of the facts. M. J. Savage.

The friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

DIFFERENT CONCLUSIONS.

Mr. Savage dissents, in the present number of the Index, from our view of certain tendencies of the time, which we considered last week in these columns. These tendencies, he admits, are manifest, but thinks they are "only religious, not ecclesiastical,—nay, more human than either."

We shall not attempt a close distinction between what may be properly defined religious and what ecclesiastical, since these terms, in popular use at least, run into each other, and what Mr. Savage would define religious we might prefer to call ecclesiastical, and even what he would call human we might regard religious. Our conception of ecclesiasticism, however, in brief, we may say is that historic system of authority which, in the name of Christianity, through the agency of established forms and appointments, and the conservation of dogma, myths, and traditions, tends to dominate the human mind and impede the free development of rational intelligence.

Now, it matters little what we call the growing observance of Church days and festivals we witness: the simple question is, Does it promote ecclesiasticism? That such is the effect seems clear to us. The history of the past shows that the incorporation into a religious system of a more truly religious or humane element than is possessed by others does not necessarily weaken such a system, but often most effectually insures its stability and permanence. It does not shorten, but prolong the duration of its life. Examples of this might be pointed out among the ancient as well as Christian sects. Neither painting, sculpture, music, poetry, nor philosophy, is of itself ecclesiastical or religious; but the Church has put each and all of these under tribute, and compelled them to become subservient to the exaltation of its glory and the spread of its dominion.

The Church has not forgotten the tactics which she has always found so effective. Mr. Savage seems to imply that, because a considerable portion of the associations of the Christian festivals was derived from the pagan ones, their observance is not necessarily ecclesiastical nor Christian. But here we should answer again: It is not a question of origin, but of their present significance. It is true the Church appropriated these associations, as it has appropriated, and still appropriates, much that does not belong to it, because it had a use for them. Under its influence, they acquired a new meaning, one which for many centuries has become so established in the Christian mind that it has entirely outgrown all sense of their ever possessing any other. The same is true of the proposed transference to these Christian celebrations of the significance of the ancient ones.

The simple fact is that, although the ancient ones were more intimately associated with nature, they were so mixed up with mythological and absurd conceptions of its operations as to be scarcely more rational than the superstitions of the Christian commemorations.

It matters little, therefore, we maintain, what are the ideas which Mr. Savage holds of Easter, nor how he observes it. The simple meaning which it conveys and emphasizes to people in every Christian community is that eighteen hundred and eighty-one years ago, in a certain tract of the world known as Judea, a person arose to life again three days after he was dead and buried, and subsequently ascended into the skies, thereby assuring the immortality of the human race.

Now, we do not see how it is possible for Mr. Savage or any liberal preacher to participate in the celebration just mentioned, or any similar Church celebration (in a religious way), without becoming implicated in the support of this ecclesiastical conception. For, whatever may be the turn of the sermon, the music and other accompaniments are pretty sure to be almost wholly in this direction.

Digitized by Google

The charge that our opposition to these observances is the same as the Puritan antipathy to them loses its force, when it is remembered that it was not a matter of credibility as to the events celebrated that caused the Puritan's revulsion, but simply his aversion to every variety of Romish ceremonials. The increasing power and spread of ecclesiasticism to which we have referred, toward which liberal Christians, Unitarians, Universalists, and even Spiritualists, are lending a hand, as was seen in the late Easter celebration, is to be deplored by rationalists, because it means the strengthening of orthodoxy, and with it the whole usurping system of historic Christianity. It is true that it is mainly among people who read and think but little, or to little purpose; but unfortunately there are a great many of such people in this country.

Carlyle's famous saying in respect to his countrymen is not so very far out of the way, if it is applied to either his or ours in respect to religious matters. Nevertheless, it is just such allies as these that become the strongest supporters of the Church. The growth of ecclesiasticism hence means a powerful increase of its adherents. It means so much more money for its propaganda of Bible tracts and missionary societies, so many more bequests for its colleges and theological schools and for its various characteristic institutions and activities, thus enhancing its prestige and influence and rendering the competition between it and freethought all the more protracted and difficult. But let it not be understood that we despair of the ultimate triumph of freethought, even though there should be visible for a time a religious retrogression. History is full of such lapses. Progress is not a straight and even line, but a zigzag course. Fifteen years ago or thereabouts, one of the most eminent and sagacious Unitarian divines in this country predicted the ecclesiastical wave we have indicated, as the result of the growing liberalism of the time. Is it any more strange that there should be such avatism in social and religious life than in the transformation of the animal species? D. H. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE Associated Charities Society of Boston have recently issued an important "Bulletin" on the subject of "Savings by the Poor," as follows:—

"The poor, in general, are those who gain their living by labor with no accumulated capital." The Commissioner of Savings Banks for the State of New York has put the above statement on record from a full experience. Judged by this standard, a large proportion of our American people must be classed among the poor. Keeping the above statement strictly in mind, we pray our committees, agents, and visitors during the summer season to use their influence in behalf of the dependent poor.

"Some of those who earn readily in summer spend as readily" (so write our Newport friends); "and, if you ask the grocers and provision-dealers of the city, they will tell you that the families of workingmen are apt to buy only the high-priced articles, and show less judgment in buying than their well-to-do neighbors. So, when winter comes, they begin to feel the pinch, and to consider what 'the city' or private charity (so called) will do for them. We are frequently told by benevolent persons that the fact of such or such a person being out of work constitutes a just claim for the relief of alms; and, even to ourselves, it has sometimes seemed hard to say, 'You should have thought of this in time, and have laid by money when you were earning money last summer.' It is a fact—we call attention to it, for we can prove it—that a man earning steady wages from April till November can, with thrift and good management, support a family all the year round. He picks up work at odd times in winter. His wife helps with sewing or washing during some part of the year; and the children, as they get to be twelve or fourteen years of age, become a help, and not a hindrance. It is within our knowledge that families with exactly these resources have bought their houses, and slowly paid for them. If it can be done once, it can be done always, provided good health, the poor man's capital, is maintained.

"It is to bring the people by degrees to this view of their lives that we started last summer a Saving Society. The result in money may not be great, but we believe that the first principles of thrift have been taught. The people find that the few coppers or quarters which they laid by so easily now bring them the ton of coal or barrel of flour; and we confidently believe that another year, with increased effort on our part, the results will go far beyond those of this year. The total amount of savings paid in since we began in June last is $690.19. This money has been collected from house to house by four ladies, who, with unwearying patience, have gathered up the little harvest chiefly in quarters and ten-cent pieces, sometimes going two or three times for one ten-cent piece. We wish that we had space to tell you the story of these savings. We must content ourselves with stating three or four facts which have been instructive to us, and may be useful to others.

"1st. Savings must be collected from house to house, or they will not be obtained at all. 2d. They must be collected weekly on appointed days, or the money which is ready for the collector to-day will be gone to-morrow. 3d. It is the poorest persons, and those who received the fewest alms last winter, who have saved the most. They have felt the results of improvidence, and say, 'We don't mean to be caught that way again.' Eighteen of such persons have laid by more than they received in relief last winter. 4th. It is those who obtained alms from various sources, needing them not more, but, in many instances, less than others, who have saved the least or not at all. It is proper to say that this Savings Society is not restricted in any way, and persons who have never asked or needed relief have joined it. It is solely a business matter. We collect their savings on the agreement that they shall have them back after December 1, in fuel or groceries. The advantage which they gain over and above the fact of being induced to save at all is that we supply the best articles at the lowest cost, which we can do by buying coal by the quantity at summer prices, and flour in somewhat the same way. This is, practically, an interest on their money."

We do not suggest the foundation of new banks or associations to this end; but we beg for the personal and careful oversight of our friends to the poor to advise them as to the best methods of saving, that when the "rainy days" return they shall not be found in as bad condition as last year. We would recommend to the attention of persons interested in this subject the new plan for saving of Mr. Fawcett, Postmaster-General of Great Britain, which has proved immediately successful; also investigation of the Fuel Saving Association of Philadelphia and of our own Savings Banks and coöperative stores.

"How far the visitors can raise people by degrees above the degrading need of charitable relief to be energetic, self-reliant, provident, and industrious, will depend upon the height of their own hope, the patience of their own labor, the moral courage which will teach them to prefer being helpful to being popular, and finally to the temper and spirit of their own homes and lives. For say what we may, if our well-to-do classes become extravagant, improvident, and showy they will be aped by those less fortunate, even though as surely they be despised. If we desire to be the leaders of our poor into the ways of happy prosperity, we must order our homes in exactly the same spirit as theirs must be ordered, in simplicity, industry, and providence."

ANOTHER "Bulletin" treats the subject of Education in connection with Pauperism and Crime:—

Criminals err either from some innate defect or weakness, or from the force of education and surroundings. The many thousand neglected children come broadly under this latter head. They are born into degraded companionship, bred only to depravity, heirs of sin and suffering, swelling by an irresistible law the ranks of pauperism and crime, unless rescued by some force from without. This class should be the first whom a State should care for and educate.

"In New York City, schools and lodging-houses were established twenty years ago for such children by the Children's Aid Society, which has now twenty-one day and thirteen night schools. The large decrease in the number of annual commitments of vagrant and thieving adults and of juvenile delinquents, notwithstanding the increase in population, is claimed as the result of their system. Mr. Charles L. Brace of that society stated before our assembly last winter that only three out of every thousand children trained in these schools became paupers and criminals, although they are the children of paupers and criminals. The system is semi-industrial.

"In Boston, this class is covered by compulsory education law; but as such children must always be dealt with by special methods, they are sent to a Home School provided for them."

Only those brought face to face with the neglected children of Boston can know how small a proportion of our need is covered by what is called the "Home School" and the compulsory law. It is also a "compulsory law" of our State that children attending the public schools should be vaccinated; but a physician in one of our largest towns out of Boston reported a few weeks ago that after examination he found sixty per cent. of the children in attendance at the schools of that district had never been vaccinated.

This is but an illustration of the serious labor, the personal supervision, to be required at the hands of the visitors of the Associated Charities. The children of our poor must be educated out of pauperism. They must be taught to do the work which the country requires, growing up with an ennobling sense of self-dependence, and partnership in the business of the world. This question is a simple one, self-evident to men and women who are trying to uplift the fallen with their arms. With the growth of this experience of our visitors, we are beginning to live; for, as Thomas Carlyle has said, "A man lives by believing something, not by debating and arguing about many things."

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, April 13, 1881.

The warlike attitude of France toward Tunis is at this time one of the chief topics of discussion in this capital. It is claimed that subjects of France have been murdered and robbed by the Kroumirs, bands of roving robbers and pirates of Tunis; that the Bey of Tunis refuses to give up the robbers or bring them to justice, and, unless he gives satisfaction to France for the murder and robbery of her subjects, war will be declared against him, and fifteen thousand troops have been ordered to North Africa. The Italian embassy at Tunis are accused of fomenting ill-feeling between the governments of France and Tunis, and of having promised aid to the latter in the event of a Franco-Tunisian war. Germany, it is said, favors the Tunisians, while the interests of England are leagued with France. Thus there is a possibility of an international European war, even before the Turco-Grecian difficulties are adjusted. The latest journals of Paris contain more peaceable editorials, and the war clouds may be dispersed; but where immense armies are under constant drill, and ever ready for their professional business of war, it is difficult to prophesy how threats and rumors of wars may terminate among nations whose interests are antagonistic.

The interest in Russian politics does not subside with the burial of Alexander II. and the accession of his successor to the throne. All the subjects of Russia residing here have taken the oath of allegiance to Alexander III. in the Greek and Hebrew Churches; and the good and evil qualities of the rulers of the house of Romanoff are freely discussed, pro and con, by the retroactionist and progressive press. The morganatic widow of Alexander II. has no faith in the protestations of the new Czar to respect her rights as his stepmother, and remains in Venice with her three children, the youngest of whom is but a few months old. She fears, if she returns to Russia, she will be immured in a convent and separated from her children. A few days before the assassination of the late Czar, her agent placed in the Bank of Berlin 1,000,000 rubles, aside from which her estate is valued at 150,000,000 rubles; and, when one reflects that this enormous sum is the result of the taxation of the toiling masses of Russia, it alone is enough to give cause for the discontent of her people. The police have ceased making arrests here upon suspicion of Nihilistic proclivities; and it is just as safe to appear scholarly and student-looking as it was when Alexander II. was living, as far as regards arrest for alleged Nihilist sympathies. A pamphlet recently published in Geneva is being much read, and eliciting discussion. Its title is Le Tyrannicide en Russe, et l'Action de l'Europe Occidentale. Its author is Professor Dragomanoff, formerly of the University of Kiel; and the work is a history of Nihilism in Russia and its causes.

Digitized by Google

The lamentable massacre of the greater portion of the mission Flatters by desert brigands, four days' journey south of Assum, in the Sahara, has caused much grief among the geographers and savants of this city, where that mission was organized. Colonel Flatters, who commanded the expedition, was a man of great intrepidity of character, and well fitted as leader to the dauntless surveying party which were sent to report upon the most feasible route for a trans-Saharian railway. The expedition consisted of sixty-three men, and was surprised by a band of Touaregs, and Captain Flatters and thirty-two men were killed. A message of the disaster had been conveyed to the Khalif of Ouargla, and four hundred men sent to the rescue of the remainder of the expedition; but fears are entertained that the aid will be too tardy to save their lives.

Place Louvre, near the Tuileries, the scene of the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew or, as the Germans term it, "the bloody marriage," will be adorned with a marble statue of Admiral Coligny, the brave, honest, old radical of his age, who forgot the first law of nature, self-preservation, and fell with his followers, a martyr to religious persecution. The statue will be placed in front of the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, a spot rendered memorable as a field of blood upon that sanguinary night, when Protestant France lost so many of her brave, heroic men through treachery, superstition, and bigotry. The order for the Coligny monument has been awarded to the sculptor Franc. It speaks well for modern France to honor the memory of her brave who perished for conscience' sake, and the marble form of Admiral Coligny upon the precincts where Catherine de Médicis planned and executed the horrors of St. Bartholomew is an index of the sentiment of the age against persecution and bigotry. That portion of Avenue d'Eylau, rendered memorable on the 27th of February last by the Hugo ovation, will hereafter bear the name of Avenue Victor Hugo. The humanitarian thus honored has been quite ill recently; and though his friends are somewhat alarmed, fearing the attack may prove fatal at his advanced age, it is hoped that his vigorous constitution will surmount disease, and that he may be spared for a time longer to the people who so greatly honor and respect him.

The annual fine-arts exhibition, known as the "Salon of 1881," occurs next month at the Palais d'Industrie. It is sad to reflect upon the great amount of human disappointment and sorrow these exhibitions annually cause. France has ten thousand artists who are classed as professional, and many who do excellent work, after having received diplomas, who do not rank as professional. But only twenty-five hundred works of art, including those of sculpture, architecture, and painting, will be admitted to the Salon this year, and, in the choice, the older artists known to fame stand the best opportunity; and it is said much meritorious work from unknown artists is often refused, which when afterward submitted to public criticism becomes popular and sells well. Then the art syndicate, who decide which works shall and shall not be hung, say, "Public taste is faulty," and the public says, "We buy such paintings as we admire, and the value we put upon them is the real one." And thus the art battle goes on, year after year; and often artists achieve fame whose works were refused by the Salon and approved by the vox populi.

The International Monetary Conference is dubbed by French journals a Platonic Congress, whose delegates will arrive at conclusions without the least ill-feeling. The delegates from the United States are expected this week. The Salle des Conférences of the Palais Quai d'Orsony is designated as the place of meeting. Madame Maria Deraismes, president of the "Société du Sort des Femmes," last week presented a petition to the Senate, praying that women engaged in commerce may be permitted to possess and enjoy the same rights as men. When more than one-half the mercantile interests of France are conducted by women, it seems incredible that the laws afford them less protection than men; yet such is the fact. The society over which Madame Deraismes presides is a very wealthy and aristocratic one, and is not working to give suffrage to the women of France, but simply to ameliorate the unequal and unjust conditions from which women suffer. The presentation of the petition to the Senate, which has never occupied itself in any manner with the advancement of the movement for the enfranchisement of women, was uncourteous, to say the least, toward the Chambers, or Lower House, many of whose members are ardent advocates of equal rights for women, and have been pioneers in every reform tending toward their elevation legally and politically.

Dr. Lentz, the celebrated Austrian traveller and African explorer, was tendered a fine reception at the Sorbonne last week. The Doctor gave a very instructive and graphic account of his explorations in the Tombouton regions. He also made an extended survey of the Sahara through its length and breadth, and pronounces the idea of converting the desert into an inland sea an impossibility, because he finds the Sahara after careful measurement to be two hundred and fifty metres, or about eight hundred and twelve feet higher than the level of the ocean.

An historical heroine died last week in the Batignolles quarter of Paris. Mademoiselle Corinne Verly was an acknowledged beauty during the era of the Reign of Terror, and was chosen as a model for the Goddess of Reason in processions, and by painters and sculptors. Nearly a century ago, she was the possessor of a competence, and surrounded by a large circle of admiring friends. But one by one the latter died, and she was left as one alone and forgotten by succeeding generations. Her worldly means became less and less; and she died in her ninety-ninth year, having earned a meagre subsistence during her last years of life as a rag-picker.

Prince Pierre Bonaparte, one of the candidates for the imperial crown, died at Versailles last Sunday; and the prospects of a successor to the house of Napoleon are lessened by one claimant. There are enough relatives of the modern Tamerlane left in France who are willing to accept the imperial throne; but their adherents are so divided that their chances are not worth a centime, even if the enemies of the Republic under retroactionist influence should again cause its temporary overthrow, of which there is at present no prospect whatever; for France is very prosperous, and her people are learning lessons in self-government which will hardly again make it possible for monarchy or imperialism to prevail. Still, her neighbors are very jealous of her ability to govern herself, her progress toward universal freedom, and, above all, her wealth-creating faculty. There are fears, and grave ones too, that Italy desires to possess herself of the French provinces of Tunis, and that Germany, jealous of the power and prosperity of France, is silently extending aid to push Italy into a war with her, in order to cripple her prestige and overthrow her present form of government, by making it unpopular to her people. The freedom-loving influence of France is felt throughout Europe, and there is no question but that a republican form of government will not be tolerated here, if the monarchical powers can ever through the force of circumstances prevent it.

ROSA L. SEGUR.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

FAITH AND FREEDOM. By Stopford Brooke. With a Preface by Edwin D. Mead. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1881. Price $1.50.

Doubtless, all the readers of the Index have heard of Stopford Brooke as one of the ablest and most liberal of the Broad Church party in the Church of England. His Primer of English Literature and his Theology in the English Poets have introduced him to many readers as an eloquent, clear, and tasteful writer. Several volumes of his sermons have been printed, from which this volume is made up. All that is new in it is his letter and sermon of last autumn, on the occasion of his withdrawal from the English Church, and the interesting introduction by Mr. Mead. It is well known that Brooke severed his connection with the Church because he had become too liberal for it; that he continued still to preach in Bedford Chapel, where he had been since 1876; that a part of his congregation left him, but was more than replaced by others; and that he then joined the Unitarians. Some of these sermons were preached several years ago, and are pretty orthodox in tone. Others are remarkably liberal. In all of them, much is made of Christ, more than by most Unitarians. One cannot read many of these sermons before finding that they are no ordinary pulpit effusions. They are marked by great literary perfection of style, a rare poetical spirit, great simplicity and sincerity, and an earnest religious spirit. Their theology is that of the school of Maurice, and is founded upon the teachings of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Arnold. It is Transcendentalism, as interpreted within the limits of the Church. The very ideas of Emerson, almost in his words and spirit, appear in some of these sermons. This is especially true of that on "The Individual Soul and God." Witness this sentence: "Truth is never discovered: it is seen, and then revealed." All truth comes to us by revelation, he says; but he says this just as Mr. Emerson would say it. Revelation is by intuition, and all truth is known in this way. When truth is received, "all the intellect can do is to apply it, not to prove it." Here, also, appear the other doctrines of Transcendentalism,—that there is but one Being in the whole universe, that individuality is the highest human possession, that the best in the mind transcends the senses and understanding. Any one who reads these sermons attentively, and especially that on "Salt without Savor," preached in explanation of his abandonment of the Church, will see that it is his Transcendentalism which has made Mr. Brooke a dissenter. He has learned to prize the spirit within more than the authority of the Church. He finds religion in the soul, and then he finds its authority and revelation. All who have laid emphasis on this thought have gone out of the Church. It took Emerson out, and it made Parker a great heretic. "I felt," says Mr. Brooke, "that the theory of the Church was not only inadequate, but contradictory. The theory of the Church excludes from its fold all who do not agree with it, all who will not either confess its creeds, or acknowledge the supremacy of the Bible as infallible, or bend to its spiritual decrees. And the Church is not alone in this. Almost all sects that differ from it have also their exclusive confessions, and many are more exclusive than the Church itself." Mr. Mead writes with enthusiasm of his subject, and pronounces Brooke the greatest of living preachers in the English language. Perhaps this is not too great praise; for there is a poetical fervor, a large intellectual apprehension, and a perfect literary taste in these sermons, very rarely found. They are also very plain, on the level of most church-going people, and are strong and manly. They are not sentimental, but strongly intellectual; yet they are intellectual with a sympathy so wide, a heart-power so earnest, and a spirituality so full of the truest aspiration that they are good and wholesome reading. Whoever would know what a vigorous and keen mind can say on religious topics can find no better answer than in this volume. Every reader, however much he may differ from the theology of these sermons, will find constant occasion for praise and admiration.

ALONE TO THE ALONE. Prayers for Theists, by several contributors. Edited, with a Preface, by Frances Power Cobbe. London: Williams & Norgate. 1881. For sale in Boston by Geo. H. Ellis. Price $1.50.

This is the third edition of a work which has been for several years before the public. For the theist, who rejects all that is historical in religion, but who yet retains a devout faith in God, immortality, and the divine law of the conscience,—the faith of Theodore Parker,—this volume will have a great interest. Much of the language and spirit of the Bible, and of the most earnest faith of the Church in all ages, is retained in these prayers. They are characterized on every page by the peculiar tone of thought of the Transcendentalists. Indeed, the book is an outgrowth of that religious faith, and is an attempt to meet the wants of that class of minds. Yet many others would be likely to find what is suggestive here, perhaps what would be helpful. The person who has ceased to believe in prayer in any form whatever would not be likely to get much good out of a volume that has in it a great deal of the highest spirit of worship. Miss Cobbe's essay of over thirty pages is a very earnest and believing defence of prayer. All who have read her books or those of Theodore Parker know what she says on the subject, how zealous she is in urging upon theists the value and the importance of prayer, and how necessary she regards it in living a truly moral life. This book, as in the case of Miss Cobbe's other volumes, has a great interest as an attempt to retain all the faith and devoutness of Christianity without any of its creeds or history. She is a "Free Religionist" who lays a decided emphasis on the religious. This may be seen in the last paragraph of her essay in this volume, where she says: "If religion is still to be to mankind in the future what it has been in the past, it must still be a religion of prayer. Nothing is changed in human nature, because it has outgrown some of the errors of the past. The spiritual experience of the saintly souls of old was true and real experience, even when their intellectual creeds were full of mistakes. By the gate through which they entered the paradise of love and peace, even by that same narrow portal of prayer, must we pass into it. No present or future discoveries in science will ever transmute the moral dross in human nature into the pure gold of virtue. No spectrum analysis of the light of the nebulæ will enable us to find God. If we are to be made holy, we must ask the Holy One to sanctify us. If we are to know the infinite joy of divine love, we must seek it in divine communion."

Digitized by Google

THE North American Review for May brings its usual collection of able and eminently practical essays. David Dudley Field contributes an essay on "Centralization in the Federal Government," in which he seeks to demonstrate that our civil polity is rapidly advancing in the direction of centralization. How much of this tendency is really an evil, and how much of it is what Mr. Sumner called the centralism of liberty and the imperialism of equal rights, is a disputed question. Mr. Field's argument will be read with interest by all who appreciate the importance of the discussion. Dr. Schaff, of the American Committee on the Revision of the Bible, has a chapter on the Old Version and the New, setting forth the rules which governed the Committee in their work, and comparing the New Revision with the King James Version. Mr. Justice Strong has an article on "The Needs of the United States Supreme Court." George Q. Cannon, M.C., defends Utah and its people. The noted ship-builder, John Roach, answers the question, Shall Americans build Ships? Congressman Cox treats of the Life-Saving Service, Désiré Charnay of The Ruins of Central America, and the closing, quite significant, and interesting chapter on What Morality have we Left? is signed by "A New-Light Moralist," who confesses himself a recent graduate of an Orthodox College. He says Herbert Spencer's ethics will be the final ethics, but he wants an ethics for the time now passing, and closes by inserting, as he says, an advertisement for a New Morality.

LESSONS
ON
The Origin and Growth of Christianity.

XIX.

MIRACLES.

"The Pharisees began to question with him, seeking of him a sign from heaven, tempting him. And he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek after a sign? Verily, I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation."—MARK viii., 11, 12.

1. Origin of the Belief in Miracles.

All the processes of NATURE are orderly. The earth revolves, the seasons come and go, the sun shines, storms arise, trees put forth their foliage, flowers spring up and blossom, animals and men are born and die, in accordance with certain uniform conditions which we term the LAWS OF NATURE. As far as we know, there is no deviation from this order anywhere in the universe. The discovery, explanation, and intelligent application of these LAWS constitute what is known as SCIENCE. The progress of scientific attainments keeps pace with the growth of intelligence in the world. SCIENCE, therefore, may be termed the exponent of modern CIVILIZATION.

To the child, however, everything extraordinary in NATURE appears wonderful and mysterious. He has no conception of this universal reign of LAW. Primitive and ignorant races of men are, in this respect, like children. They regard every-day events as matters of course, without wonder. Extraordinary or uncommon events they deem exhibitions of supernatural power; in other words, MIRACLES. A miracle, then, is an alleged event contrary to the known laws of NATURE. In the popular view, ordinary events are supposed to take place without the immediate presence or activity of Deity; while miracles are produced by the direct will and agency of GOD.

NOTE.—THE CREDIBILITY OF MIRACLES: Can a LAW OF NATURE ever be broken? Yet is it right to assume familiarity with all natural laws, and therefore deny all alleged remarkable phenomena? May there not be physical and psychological laws with which we are yet unacquainted, and corresponding remarkable phenomena? If the LAWS OF NATURE are simply GOD'S orderly method of working, is not the conception of the universality of law more religious than the belief in miracles? Would not an actual miracle be a reflection upon the omniscience or foresight of DEITY?

2. The Jewish Conception of the Miraculous.

The JEWS, at and prior to the time of JESUS, were an unscientific and uncritical people. DR. LIGHTFOOT, an eminent ENGLISH scholar, says they were "given over beyond measure to beliefs in all sorts of delusions, exorcisms, amulets, charms, and dreams. They were ready to believe everything strange, wild, and unnatural." RENAN declares that "miracles were considered at that time the indispensable mark of the Divine, and the sign of the prophetic calling." (Life of Jesus, p. 230.) Doubtless, JESUS and his disciples shared to some degree in this universal belief in the miraculous.

The OLD TESTAMENT contains many miraculous relations. The legends of ELIJAH and ELISHA are full of them. (See I. Kings xvii., 10–16, 17–23; xviii., 21–39; II. Kings ii., 11; iv., 1–7, 32–37; v., 9–14, etc.) It was believed that the coming MESSIAH would perform many miracles. (John vii., 31; IV. Esdras xiii., 50.)

3. The Growth of Miraculous Legends.

It appears to be a universal rule that miraculous legends become more marvellous and more numerous as time separates the historical events about which they cluster further and further from the period of their relation. There are many illustrations of this tendency in the BIBLE records. In the writings of the Eighth Century PROPHETS (Isaiah I., Amos, Hosea, Zechariah I., and Micah,) there is hardly a trace of the miraculous, while the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, written long after the events which they describe, contain many marvellous stories. Another excellent example of this tendency is presented in the Apocryphal books of the Maccabees. The first and oldest is an historical narrative, almost entirely free from miracles. In the later books, more and more of the marvellous is apparent as the time of their writers recedes from the period described.

The Epistles of PAUL, the earliest writings in the NEW TESTAMENT, contain very little of the miraculous, though PAUL was not free from the current belief in "signs and wonders." (I. Cor. xii., 9, 10; xiv., xv.) MARK, the oldest Gospel, records fewer miracles than either of the others; while the Fourth and latest Gospel contains miraculous stories which are unknown to the Synoptical writers. (John ii., 1–12; iv., 7–30, 46–54; v., 1–16; ix., 1–12; xi., 1–46.)

4. The Alleged Miracles of Jesus.

Our lesson's text would appear to indicate that JESUS himself did not sympathize fully with the prevalent Jewish thirst for the marvellous, or deem that his teaching required the support of that questionable sort of evidence. PAUL also, whose writings contain no mention of the miracles of JESUS, protests against the excess of this current superstition. (I. Cor. i., 22, 23.)

The miraculous stories not found in the TRIPLE TRADITION may be set aside, therefore, as improbable and unsustained by trustworthy evidence. The accounts of the descent of the HOLY SPIRIT at the baptism of JESUS, and the legendary story of the Temptation, have been treated in Lesson VII. The story of the Resurrection will be considered hereafter.

There remain four classes of alleged miracles related in the oldest Gospel, and in the TRIPLE TRADITION.

I. CASTING OUT DEVILS. (Mark i., 21–28; compare Luke iv., 31–37; Mark i., 32–34; compare Matt viii., 16, 17; Luke iv., 40, 41; Mark iii., 19–30; compare Matt. xii., 22–27; Luke xi., 14, 15, 17–23; Mark v., 1–21; compare Matt. viii., 28–34; Luke viii., 26–40; Mark ix., 14–29; compare Matt. xvii., 14–21; Luke ix., 37–43.) No intelligent person now believes in the possibility of "possession" by evil spirits. The actual phenomena indicated by this expression were doubtless due to some form of mental disease or insanity. The consideration of this class of alleged miracles may therefore be transferred to the next division of our subject.

II. HEALING DISEASES. Besides the healing of "demoniacs," several other instances of "miraculous" cure are mentioned in the TRIPLE TRADITION. (Mark i., 29–31; compare Matt. viii., 14, 15; Luke iv., 38, 39; Mark i., 40–45; compare Matt. viii., 2–4; Luke v., 12–16; Mark ii., 1–12; compare Matt. ix., 2–8, Luke v., 17–26; Mark v., 22–43; compare Matt. ix., 18–26; Luke viii., 41–56; Mark x., 46–54; compare Matt. xx., 29–34; Luke xviii., 35–43.) It is not necessary to consider these stories entirely fabulous. The influence of a trusted physician or nurse over an invalid is very great, often, doubtless, more potent than medicine in relieving certain nervous disorders. The subtle but entirely natural power known as hypnotism, or "animal magnetism," may account for some of these alleged cures. Belief in the curative efficacy of religious rites and priestly manipulations is common among all ignorant peoples; resting, doubtless, on such wholly natural and non-miraculous facts, exaggerated by the imagination.

III. WALKING ON THE WATER, AND STILLING THE TEMPEST. (Mark iv., 36–41; compare Matt. viii., 23–27; Luke viii., 22–25; Mark vi., 47–56; compare Matt. xiv., 24–36; John vi., 15–21.) These stories probably originated in parables, based, possibly, upon some allegorical saying of JESUS, and intended to illustrate the truth that man can overcome the extremest obstacles and difficulties as long as he is sustained by the courage which constant faith bestows; but with the commencement of fear or distrust his failure is insured. GOETHE assigns to these stories a place of high honor among legends that excel in beauty and depth of meaning.

IV. THE MIRACULOUS FEEDING OF THE MULTITUDE. (Mark vi., 35–44; compare Matt. xiv., 15–20; Luke ix., 12–17; John vi., 5–14; Mark viii., 1–9; Matt. xv., 32–38.) These stories may have originated in some illustration of JESUS, similar to the parable of the Leaven. Their true significance is indicated by the beatitude, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." Doubtless, the growth of these legends into their present literal form was stimulated by the OLD TESTAMENT stories of ELIJAH and ELISHA. (I. Kings xvii., 8–16; II. Kings iv., 42–44.) The Gospel writers apparently desired to represent JESUS as equal or superior in power to the older prophets and heroes of ISRAEL.

NOTE A.—In the account of the cure of the daughter of JAIRUS (Mark v, 37–42; Matt. ix., 23–26; Luke viii., 51–55, commonly quoted as a restoration from death, we have the distinct assertion of JESUS to the contrary,—"the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth." (Mark v., 39; Matt. ix., 24; Luke viii., 52.) This is the only instance of alleged restoration to life in the TRIPLE TRADITION. It is afterward expanded into the story of the raising of the widow's son (Luke vii., 11–17), and still later into the account of the resurrection of LAZARUS after he had been dead four days (John xi., 1–46).

NOTE B.—PROTESTANT Christians who profess belief in the BIBLE miracles commonly assume that "the age of miracles is past." The Fourth Gospel, however, which they recognize as authoritative, makes JESUS declare, "He that believeth on me . . . GREATER WORKS than these shall he do; because I go to my Father." The CATHOLIC CHURCH more consistently claims to possess still the power of working miracles.

Digitized by Google

What do you know of the alleged miracles of LOURDES and KNOCK and the "Passionist" Fathers of HOBOKEN? How do you regard the evidence on which these alleged facts claim credence? How are these occurrences and the alleged "Spiritual" manifestations attested by ZOELLNER, HARE, and others to be explained? (Tell the class about DR. HAMMOND'S recent experiment upon a believing CATHOLIC patient with the "holy water" of LOURDES and "aqua Crotonis," the former producing no effect, its nature not being suspected, while the latter effected a "cure," being falsely represented as water from LOURDES.)

NOTE C.—JESUS AND THE MIRACULOUS: From our previous study, are we not now prepared to say that the identity of JESUS as an historical personage in no way depends upon the truth of the NEW TESTAMENT miracles? Is not the evidence to his existence and teaching even strengthened by the omission of the miraculous element in the Gospels?

Is not the true SCIENTIFIC attitude toward alleged remarkable phenomena one of neither a priori denial nor acceptance, but willingness to weigh all evidence fairly; demanding, however, if the alleged phenomena are extraordinary, or in apparent contradiction with the known order of NATURE, that the proof shall be correspondingly stronger than that which we would require for an ordinary occurrence? Judged by this test, must we not reject the miraculous or supernatural element in the Gospel history?

General Questions.

1. What is meant by a "LAW OF NATURE"? 2. How would you define a miracle? 3. How did the idea of "miracles" originate? 4. How did the Jews of the time of JESUS regard miracles? 5. What miracles are recorded in the OLD TESTAMENT? 6. How do miraculous legends grow? 7. What examples of the growth of such stories do we find in the BIBLE? 8. Besides the stories of the descent of the HOLY SPIRIT, the Temptation and the Resurrection, what four classes of Miracles are found in the TRIPLE TRADITION? 9. What is meant by "casting out devils"? 10. How may the stories of miraculous cure be explained? 11. How do you regard the legends of JESUS' "walking on the water" and "stilling the tempest"? 12. How would you explain the stories of the "loaves and fishes"?

To the Teacher.

For helps, read LECKY'S Rationalism in Europe; Professor JOHN FISKE'S Myths and Myth-makers; the chapters on "The Source of Jesus' Strength" and "The Jewish Thirst for the Marvellous," in the Bible for Learners, Vol. III.; the lecture on "The Miraculous" in Savage's Talks about Jesus; and the chapter on "Miracles" in Renan's Life of Jesus. Read also the accounts of recent experiments in "hypnotism" by Drs. BROWN-SEQUARD, HAMMOND, BEARD, and others; and two recent biographies of JESUS, "Rabbi JESHUA," written by an English Rationalist; and The Legend of Thomas Didymus, by JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

GENERAL BRADY'S star is under a cloud.

REV. JOSEPH COOK sends home word that he will remain another season abroad. We shall try to be resigned.

REV. C. H. EATON, of the Palmer (Mass.) Universalist Church, is to be successor of the late Dr. Chapin, of New York.

DR. HOWARD CROSBY says a cyclone of indignation has been raging against him ever since he lectured in Boston on temperance.

MEMORIAL services of an imposing character were held at the tomb of Abraham Lincoln, Springfield, on the sixteenth anniversary of his martyrdom.

BANCROFT, the historian, is over eighty years of age. He attributes his vigor and health to the fact that he eats lightly, sleeps considerably, and walks several miles daily in the open air.

WILLIAM DENTON says, "I am satisfied that a very large proportion of the so-called materializing mediums are juggling knaves, Spiritualists only in name, and for the purpose of robbing their dupes." He ought to know.

REV. HENRY NORMAN, a young and very promising liberal preacher of England, but at present a student of Harvard University, has spoken to the society of the Parker Memorial the last two Sundays with unusual acceptance.

MR. EMERSON is said, by the Boston correspondent of the Providence Press, to have not exactly approved Walt Whitman's action in printing in a second work the Concord sage's praise of Leaves of Grass. The correspondent adds, "When Whitman was told of this disrelish, he made this noble remark, 'I used it because I thought it was the chart of an Emperor.'"

JESTINGS.

"THE best feed for pigs," said Uncle Silas, "is Indian meal and saw-dust; and the less saw-dust the better."

ALL IN THE DAY'S WORK.—Paul: "Mightn't I have a donkey, papa?" Papa (the new vicar): "I'm afraid not, my boy! There would be nobody to look after it, you know!" "Oh, the curate could do that!"

A FATHER asked his son what vocation he thought he would prefer when he reached man's estate. The youth hesitated a few moments, and then said: "Well, pop, you know I always was of a roving disposition, and could never settle down anywhere long. I should like to join a circus company or become a Methodist minister."

THE applications for positions as enumerators to take the census of the Indian tribes are not very numerous. While a man is taking the census of the Indian, the Indian may retaliate by taking the scalp of the enumerator, and the price of a new head of hair would take all the profit off his job. And then a man couldn't write in a whole day any more than a dozen such names as Hukinokihugemsmuggerpankiwanki. —Norristown Herald.

The Legend of Thomas Didymus,

THE JEWISH SCEPTIC.

By James Freeman Clarke.

CLOTH, $1.75.

"The cultured and thoughtful will read it as a fresh and original contribution to an ever-absorbing subject; as a most picturesque and truthful picture of Jesus' environment; as a realistic transcript of the divers opinions his prophecies elicited from all sorts of men, and as the latest and most carefully weighed opinions of one of the most prominent and scholarly thinkers of the day. James Freeman Clarke belongs to that brave and noble band of New England writers, of whom Theodore Parker was the leader, who have done so much for the freedom of thought in our country."*—Art Interchange.

"The book is in one sense another life of Christ, containing a record of his teachings and the principal events of his ministry. The scenes are presented with all the local coloring that attended them, many of them being rarely beautiful. This is especially noticeable in the descriptions which Thomas gives of some of the miracles."—Commercial Bulletin.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

METROPOLE

INSURANCE COMPANY,

OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,

No. 20 Kilby Street,

BOSTON, MASS.

JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, ESQ.,
Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.

GEORGE M. BARNARD, ESQ.,
Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.

WILLIAM P. HUNT, ESQ.,
President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

Gleanings in the Field of Art.

By EDNAH D. CHENEY.

CLOTH. $2.50.

"A fine æsthetic taste, combined with a deep and feeling appreciation of the motives that create and the impulses that guide all efforts, ultimately, to the true, the beautiful, and the good, has given to the public in this new volume a book in which charitable criticism, liberal and comprehensive thought, and wise suggestions predominate."—Banner of Light.

"The novices will find this book an excellent guide to the rich fields of artistic love; and the well-read, travelled artist will be delighted as he revives a thousand pleasant memories and catches fresh glimpses of old pictures from new points of view."—Cincinnati Journal and Messenger.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers,
41 Franklin Street, Boston.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

Vitalized Phos-phites.

Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 300,000 packages It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease, worry, or overwork.

For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
664 and 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

CLARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

[illegible] Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. CLARK. GEO. F. PIPER

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

UNMOUNTED PHOTOGRAPHS

Of ANCIENT and MODERN WORKS of ART, embracing reproductions of famous original paintings, sculpture, architectural subjects, etc. Price, cabinet size, $1.50 per dozen. Send stamp for catalogue of 1,600 subjects. JOHN P. SOULE, publisher, 338 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the

REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

As made by the most eminent scholars of England and America. Half the price of Corresponding English Edition. Large type, linen super-calendered paper, elegant binding. A separate "Comprehensive History of the Bible and its Translations," including a full account of the New Revision, given to subscribers. Best chance for agents ever offered. Send stamp for particulars at once.

The Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES.....10c
SKULLS.....10
GHOSTS.....10
HELL.....10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD.10
GODS.....10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT.....10
HUMAN RIGHTS.....10
HEREAFTER.....10
TOM PAINE.....10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at 25 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli } SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 595.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 47.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

BY falsehood, sacrifices become vain; by pride, devotions. By proclaiming a gift, its fruit perishes. Let no man having committed sins perform penance, under pretext of devotion, disguising his crime under fictitious religion: such impostors, though Brahmans, are despised.—Hindu.

ANANDA, one of the earliest disciples of Buddha, sitting once beside a well, asked a drink of water from a Chandâla woman, who was drawing from the well. She answered, "How dost thou ask water of me, an outcast who may not touch thee without offence?" Ananda answered: "My sister, I ask not of thy caste. I ask thee water to drink." And Buddha received her among his disciples.—Buddhism.

AT the beginning of the world, God instituted this just retribution,—measure for measure; and, if all the laws of nature should be reversed, this law would stand for ever.—Hebrew.

THE soul of the true devotee shall come to a meeting with his own good deeds in the form of a damsel most beautiful and pure, who shall say unto him: "O youth, I am thy good deeds. Since when by thee it was seen that there was any one causing oppression and violence, and acquiring wealth by crime, thou didst keep back from creatures their own affliction and injury; and by thee the good man was cared for, and charity was bestowed on both the neighbor and the stranger; and thy wealth was acquired by honesty; and when thou sawest the practice of injustice, the taking of bribes, the bearing of false witness therefor, then thou hast abstained, and thy word was true and just,—lo, I am this of thee, the good thoughts and good words and good deeds that were thought and spoken and done by thee."—Persian.

IT is not fasting, nor solitude, nor monastic life, that will procure you eternal life, but only doing good. Forget not the poor, nourish them. Be fathers to orphans. Be judges in the cause of widows, and do not let the powerful oppress the weak. Put to death neither innocent nor guilty. Do not fear the lot of the impious. Desert not the sick. Abhor lying, drunkenness, and debauchery. Endeavor constantly to obtain knowledge.—Russian (12th century).

TRUTH and Love are two,—the most powerful things in the world; and, when they both go together, they cannot easily be withstood. The golden beams of truth and the silken cords of love, twisted together, will draw men on with a sweet violence, whether they will or no.—Ralph Cudworth.

IT were better to be of no church than to be bitter for any.—William Penn.

THE color of our whole life is generally such as the three or four first years in which we are our own masters make it.—Cowper.

MOST men gamble with Fortune and gain all and lose all, as her wheel rolls. But do thou leave as unlawful these winnings, and deal with Cause and Effect, the chancellors of God. In the Will, work and acquire, and thou hast chained the wheel of chance, and shalt always drag her after thee. A political victory, a rise of rents, the recovery of your sick, or the return of your absent friend, or some other quite external event, raises your spirits and you think good days are preparing for you. Do not believe it. It can never be so. Nothing can bring you peace but yourself. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AS USUALLY happens after great personages die, a discussion has arisen in England about the religion of Lord Beaconsfield. Sir Nathaniel Rothschild, one of his executors, is said to have evidence that he returned to the Hebrew faith of his fathers. The English Church, however, certainly has the honor, if honor it be, of having baptized and buried him; and this is as much title as many Christians have to their religious name. As to religious faith, he evidently had not enough to quarrel over.

HOW TO prevent frauds at the polls is a question of the very first importance in all our elections. Mr. S. T. Bacon, of this city, claims that he has discovered an effectual way of doing this. It is by the use of a simple and ingenious ballot-box which he has invented for the purpose. It has been warmly approved by the press, and the most eminent of our public men; and, if all it professes to be, the general adoption of it throughout the country would be of great service in securing the purity of the ballot.

OVER one hundred thousand emigrants have landed at Castle Garden, New York, in the last four months. They are now coming at the rate of twenty thousand weekly. Large numbers, too, are arriving every week in Boston. The Germans and Irish are most numerous; but there are also many Swedes and Norwegians, and not a few Swiss and Italians. As a rule, they are an unusually good class of emigrants,— farmers, with families and money, who already have their farming location selected in the West, and go at once to their destination.

A SIGNIFICANT fact connected with the proceedings of the recent Unitarian Conference at St. Louis should not escape record. Thirty ministers were in attendance; and, according to the published programme, there were at least twelve distinct meetings held. But, notwithstanding so many ministers and meetings, not once was any voice lifted up in prayer save that of W. C. Gannett, of St. Paul, a man who is not supposed to possess a sufficient flavoring of Christian piety to allow of the insertion of his name in the Unitarian Year-Book.

MR. THEODORE STANTON, son of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, though married three times the other day in Paris, managed to keep all three of the ceremonies outside of the pale of Orthodoxy. The first ceremony was performed by the mayor at his office, this civil marriage being required of every body by French law. The second occurred at the bride's house, and was conducted by M. Louis Leblois of Strasbourg, a freethinker, whose work on The Bibles of Humanity was noticed in the Index of Dec. 18, 1879. The third ceremony took place at the American Legation, in the presence of Gen. Noyes, and was also performed by M. Leblois.

SENATOR CONKLING is credited with a rare faculty for posing, but it is doubtful whether his latest display in that line will win him the applause he may have anticipated. Neither the President nor the Senator's part in this performance has been quite as admirable as it might have been. The imbroglio in which the government at Washington has of late been involved, in respect to matters pertaining to the civil service, shows very forcibly the demoralizing influence of the machine in politics, and the need of the adoption of those higher principles in the administration of the affairs of the nation for which some of the most disinterested and thoughtful of our citizens are earnestly contending.

IT would seem as though the appearance of Col. Ingersoll anywhere, with one of his lectures, is getting to be the adopted signal for the clergy then and there to make a general assault upon him. Of course, he has little cause to complain, were he disposed to, since his bearing toward the profession is rather provoking to say the least, and he is accustomed to give as hard hits as he receives. Indeed, if the Colonel had not a certain amount of these matters to adjust whenever he addresses an audience, we fear his lectures might lose a good deal of their pungency, and his reputation wane among his admirers. His late lecture in New York was effective in getting a number of the biggest of the metropolitan pulpit guns levelled at him the following Sunday. The New York Sun devoted a full column to summaries of these discourses, which for vituperation, extravagance, and lame and impotent conclusions outdid all that could be charged to the relentless iconoclast in these particulars.

THE question has been in the West from time to time entertained, whether the liberal Unitarians and the reformed, or liberal, Jews might not coalesce into one body. To this proposition, Rabbi Hirsch, of Chicago, himself a leader of the liberal wing of the Jews, says, No, for three reasons: (1) the gulf that divides the two religious bodies is impassable, Unitarians believing in Christ, while the Jews cling with pride to the history of God's dealing with their fathers; (2) the union, if brought about, would not be beneficial, Unitarians having a mission in the Christian Church, reformed Judaism in the synagogue; (3) the two religions could neither work together nor understand each other. "Let the Unitarian," says the Rabbi, "hold fast to his own peculiarities, the Jew studiously foster what is specifically his own. Let us not seek a premature union, but rather cultivate friendly neighborly relations. Let each be prompted by the desire to be faithful to his own mission, and in the end we will advance the truest interests of humanity." This strikes us as sound reasoning, so long as the Jew remains a "Jew," and the Unitarian a Unitarian "Christian." They can only coalesce in a vital union, when they come out of their respective enclosures upon the common ground of Free Religion.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

ENGLISH SECULARISM.

BY GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

I. Right and Duty of Freethought.

As the Index seems not afraid of contrariety of opinion, and as some of its readers may not have a direct knowledge of the kind of secular thought expressed in England, and even officially maintained by secularist organization, they may be interested that this communication relate thereunto. Having been since my youth a visitor in Leicester and advocate of social and secular principles, and it having come to pass that a very beautiful hall has been built there, exceeding in its perfect taste and architectural beauty any hall hitherto built in this country, for the use mainly of working people, I was asked to deliver the opening address. Afterwards Mrs. Besant, Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., and Mrs. Law delivered bright and forcible speeches. In front of the hall have been placed busts of Jesus, Socrates, Paine, Owen, and Voltaire. If we seem not to recognize Jesus, the clergy complain of our want of discernment; but, since we have accorded him a place of honor, they complain more. They are difficult to please. I said in my speech that we advocate two things:—

1. The right and duty of freethought;
2. A religion of certitude.

First, we teach freethought as a right, and also as a duty, because thought is that which makes the difference between the wise man and the fool. If we did not think, we should all be fools. If thought were not free, there could be no improvement, and therefore no progress. Men would walk about in skins and never comb their hair. The sea would be shipless, and the land without a town. All creeds would be superstition, all books monotonous, and all pictures one copy of one subject. The mind of man would die, if it were not for thought; and, were thought suppressed, God would reign over a world of idiots. It is therefore an outrage upon God to limit thought. All the marvels of the universe minister to the mind of man. Every human being of every race, every flower of every clime, everything that lives on the earth or in the sea or in the air,—all are new in their seasons, and none in the evening are, in all things, what they were in the morning. Thus, ceaseless change offers hourly to our eyes new creation of life and of character. Thus, Nature feeds thought day and night with a million hands. Those, therefore, who justify freethought, who teach it and defend it, show, if I may speak in theological phrase, far more piety than they who defame and frustrate it. A new creed, if it be the product of new light and the expression of new truth, is but a new form of obedience to conscience and to fact. One creed for all men is the dream of despotism in religion, and condemns Deity to monotony of worship and insipidity of praise.

Freethought, therefore, is clearly a "right," because it alone prevents a man being without sense; and freethought is a duty, because it is a man's duty not to be a fool. If a man does not think himself, he is an intellectual pauper, living upon the truth acquired by others, and making no contribution himself in return. He has no ideas but such as he obtains by "outdoor relief," and he goes about the world with a charity mind. The habit of thought is the beginning of independence.

Thinking is our only self-protection against ignorance, which exposes us to destruction by others, and against error, which makes us destroy ourselves. By the publicity of thought, which alone gives it public power, we mean the expression of "Reasoned Truth." We do not regard speech as a waste-pipe of opinion, which shall flood the platform or the press with the refuse of superstition or the crudities of ignorance, impatience, passion, or spite. We regard public speech as a spring of principles, bright, clear, and pure, tributary to the great stream of public truth. We maintain freethought, not for ourselves alone, but for all men. If its exercise be our duty, it is also theirs. The more thinkers there are in the world, the more truth there is in the world.

The duty of thinking brings the right to equal opportunities of acquiring and expressing ideas. If these are denied, thought is stopped; and we are but as the priests, unless we maintain this liberty for all men. Freethought rules by proof, not by authority. It has a generous patience with the understanding until evidence incites the assent. Progress can only walk in the footsteps of conviction. Assent without conviction is tyranny. To assent against conviction is servility, submission, and cowardice. Coercion in thought is not progress, but the discipline of priestcraft, and reduces to ignominious pulp the backbone of the mind.

This is what we mean by secular freethought. It has not been much taught by freethinkers hitherto. Most of them have had enough to do to get the "right" of thinking, to pay much attention to the "duty" of it. I know of nothing more arduous than the profession of the principle of freethought. The duty of the thinker is to think to the best of his capacity. He is a mere noisy impostor who does not mean this.

It is no mean undertaking to teach freethought as an education in argument, in patience, in consideration to others, and as an education in the discovery and service of truth. Limited thought, such as theologians permit, is but as the yellow flames we see now in the street. Freethought is the electric, ever-accumulating light of the human mind, which makes dull all other light, and shines far and wide, with a clear effulgence heretofore unknown. Three hundred years before Christ, Plato taught that not to think means that the mind is barren, and is unimpregnated with sense, and never brings forth the fruit of truth. Save his own understanding, man hath no star. Therefore, to kindle thought, to teach the duty of using it, is to spread light in the dark by-ways of life, whereby humble men may see the truth before them. We care nothing for those who say that doubt is wicked or that thought is sin. Those who condemn it have committed the sin themselves; for, if they are not thinkers, they speak without thought, and are not worth listening to. Thought is a necessity: it is a duty; and, if God be truth, it is a higher form of duty than any priesthood has ever taught.

II. Certitude in Religion.

Second, the truth which Secularism sees is the need of a Religion of Certitude. By religion, I mean the simple creed of deed and duty, by which a man seeks his own welfare in his own way, with an honest and fair regard to the welfare and ways of others. "Deed" is doing what is right as soon as you see the right thing to do. "Duty" is doing the right, because it is just to others, and because we must set the example of doing right to others, or we have no claim that others shall do right to us. By "certitude" is meant the employment of material means, because we can better calculate them, and because they are less likely to evade us or betray us than any other means available to us.

Orthodox religions are pale in the face now. They still keep the word of material promise to the ear, and break it to the heart; and the people know it, and the clergy know that they know it. The poor need material aid, and prayer is the way not to get it; while science, more provident than faith, has brought the people generous gifts, and inspired them with material expectations. It is not necessary for us to decry spiritual aspirations in their own place: we only say they are no substitute for material endeavor. In these thinking and practical days, what men demand is a religion of daily life which shall stand on a business footing. The Churches administer a system of foreign affairs. Their concern is with another world. Theology is all "abroad." Secularism is the "home rule" of this world. Morality is the business of this life; but the Churches conduct it in a very loose way, quite inconsistent with sound commercial principles. For instance, a firm giving cheques on a bank in some distant country—a country not to be found in any gazetteer of ascertained places, nor laid down in any chart, and from which no persons who ever set out in search of it were ever known to return—would do very little business among prudent men. Yet this is precisely the nature of the transactions engaged in by the Orthodox firms who undertake to conduct for mankind the business of this life.

On the other hand, Secularism proposes to transact the business of humanity on what I may call purely mercantile principles. It engages only in that class of transactions the issue of which can be tested by the experience of this life. Its cheques, if I may so speak, are drawn upon duty, good sense, and material effort, and are to be cashed from proceeds arising in our midst, under our own eyes, subject to the observation of our fellows. Nature is the banker who pays all notes held by those who observe its laws. To use the words of Macbeth, it is here, "on this bank and shoal of time" upon which we are cast, that Nature pays its cheques, and not elsewhere: it is done now, and not in an unknown world, in some unknown time, and in an entirely unknown way. By lack of judgment or sense, the secularist may transact bad business, but he gives reasonable security. His "surety" is experience. His "references" are to the facts of the present time. He puts all who have dealings with him on their guard. Secularism tells men that they must look out for themselves, think for themselves, act for themselves, within the limits of neither injuring nor harming others. We do not profess to be infallible; but, so far as we know, we act on honest principles. We seek to put progress on that business footing which is not incompatible with good faith, self-respect, and sound expectation.

Secularism dwells in a land of its own: it dwells in the land of certitude. Science and Utilitarian Morality are kings in that country, and rule there by right of conquest over error and superstition. In the kingdom of Thought there is no conquest over men, but over foolishness only. Outside the world of Science and Morality lies the great Debatable Ground of the Existence of Deity and a Future State. The ruler of the Debatable Ground is named Probability, and his two ministers are Curiosity and Speculation. Over that mighty plain, which is as wide as the universe and as old as time, no voice of the gods has ever been heard, and no footstep of theirs has been traced. Philosophers have explored the field, with telescopes of a longer range than the eyes of a thousand saints, and have beheld nothing save the silent and distant horizon; and priests have denounced them for not seeing what was invisible. Sectaries have clamored and the most ignorant have howled—as the most ignorant always do—that there was something there, because they wanted to see it. All the while, the white mystery is still unpenetrated in this life; and we must die to find the mystery out. But a Future being undisclosed is no proof that there is no Future. Those who reason through their desires will believe there is: those who reason through their understanding may yet hope that there is. In the mean time, we all stand before the portals of the untrodden world in equal unknowingness, where priestly pretension is simply insolence, and foreboding of harm there wanton conjecture. Of this we may rest sure: that, if future state there be, those will have the best title to enter who have tried to make the present state creditable to its Giver. If faith can be piety, work is more so. If, therefore, we can bring new beauty out of common life, is not that piety? If we can change blank stupidity into intelligent admiration of any work of nature, is not that piety? If our towns and streets shall be made to give gladness and cheerfulness to all who walk therein, is not that piety? If the prayer of innocence ascend to heaven through a pure atmosphere, instead of through the noisome and polluted air of uncleanness, common in the purlieus of towns, is not that piety? Can we conceive of a religious person being ignorant and dirty? If, therefore, we send to heaven clean, intelligent, bright-minded saints, is not that piety? It is no bad religion, as religions go, to believe in the good God of Knowledge and Cleanliness and Cheerfulness and Beauty, and offer at his altar the daily sacrifice of intelligent sincerity and material service; to stand up for the truth as we conceive it; to believe what we maintain, and maintain it because we believe it, and maintain it by our gifts rather than by our prayers. We leave to others their way of faith and worship. We ask leave to take our own. Carlyle has told us that only two men are to be honored, and no third: the mechanic and the thinker, he who works with honest hands, making the world habitable; and he who works with his brain, making thought artistic and true. "All the rest," he adds with noble scorn, "are chaff, which the wind may blow whither it listeth." Heaven is for the useful alone. Mere belief is the easiest, the poorest, the shabbiest device by which conscientious impostors ever attempted to scale the walls of Paradise, whose gates are open only to those who have worked for the world.

In the happy days before Orthodoxy came with its cruel face, its ghastly crucifixion, and trembling creed, there were smiles in heaven and domesticity surrounded the eternal throne. Nobody thinks now of the desolation of mind which came into the world with Christianity and its one isolated, lonely God. At that time, every man had his deity whom he could comprehend and trust. The youth and maiden preferred their prayer to the voluptuous goddess of love. The soldier went into battle appealing to the god of war. The adventurous sailor trusted his ship to the god of the ocean. The artist had the god of beauty to direct his hand. Humble men by the fireside had the god of the household to guard them. But when all these gods were dethroned, and only one put in their places, men said: "How can our prayers be attended to now? When one God has to see to everything, our turn will never come." After perceiving this, I thought it unfair myself to pray for anything. It seemed that men ought to leave it to Him to do what he could when he had time. Then what poverty it made in divinity, when there came to be only one Being in the skies! How few realize the conception of the awful solitude of God! No friend, no associate, no companion, no counsellor to consult, no equal to praise his acts (as only a compeer could), no one to share or mitigate the sleepless superintendence of infinite worlds! Yet the people who teach this theological desolation are they who tell us that the cheerful truths of nature have no consolation for those who walk amid mystery and marvels, which are never disenchanted to us by second-hand explanations. We invent no conditions for Deity, placing him in melancholy isolation. We think that we show more real reverence than they who accompany their professions of extreme humbleness with the conceit of their own infallibility. We make bold to own:—

Digitized by Google

"What suits the gods above
Only the gods can know,
What the people want is sense
How best to live below."

We are approaching an age of thrift and self-respect, when men will not live by charity, which means sufferance or servility. So much of Christianity, therefore, as consists of a scheme of guilt and gifts can no longer allure men who have acquired independent spirit. A scheme of confession and supplication—confession of depravity which somebody else committed a long time ago, and supplications for aid or help which honest men should provide for themselves—belongs to a bygone age of social degradation, the age of kings and serfs. It may be true, but it is out of date. The nobler sort of priests admit this. That American deacon who, when the minister said that the church had a debt which it could not meet, and that a prayer-meeting must be held to ask for the money, cried out, "Hold on, sir, what is the amount wanted?" and, on being told it was a hundred dollars, answered, "Send the bill to me: we will not trouble the Lord for that,"—that deacon showed more real reverence than is contained in all the Prayer-Book. That is the new religion of self-help. Endowed with intelligence, with power of industry, and having the boundless treasures of nature given to us, it is contemptible to expect God always to have his hands in his pockets! When a powerful friend has put you in a good house, pays the rent for you, and stocks it with perpetual provisions and garments, it is too bad to stop him every morning at his door to get a small loan. It is a poor, shabby sort of piety which does not, at least, treat God as a gentleman. Secularism does do this. It is the only religion which does not propose to give Heaven trouble. At length, science has sown seeds of secular thought, which slowly, indeed, but surely, are taking root, and the sap of superstition is being dried up. Theological gardeners lop off decaying branches, and trim and tend the old tree anew; but nothing saves it. Its leaves become fewer and its fruit more tasteless year by year.

Any one wishing to know what ideas we care for may soon satisfy himself. He has not far to go. They are set in the sight of all men. We will imitate, as best we may, the insurgency of Jesus, which has awakened heroism in so many millions of minds,—that insurgency by which he proclaimed the new truth of his time, in spite of Scribes or Pharisees or Jew or Gentile or doctors learned in the law. Socrates, whom Plato called the "Examining God," sought truth by questioning, by which means he discovered it, if it existed, or made plain the ignorance commonly mistaken for it. Him we will follow, as far as such ability as we may possess may enable us. Thomas Paine, who first based popular politics on principles, who tested theology by common-sense, and who, in the camp or in prison, suffered no unstudied sentence to escape his pen, is no unworthy examplar to follow. Robert Owen, who taught that crime and virtue were mainly fostered by material conditions, and that by a discerning coöperative policy it was possible to create a state of society "in which it should be impossible that men should be depraved or poor,"—Owen was a teacher whose great lessons will never be disregarded by us. Voltaire, who, when superstition, like a dragon, terrified the strong and devoured the weak, assailed it when other men fled before it, and pierced it mortally by the arrows of his mighty wit,—Voltaire will hold an everlasting place in the grateful memories of men. We may put the statement of our own case in the very words employed by him in his unrivalled dialogue between Bashaw Tuctan and Karpos the gardener. Bashaw Tuctan remarks: "You are a reasoner, I see, and have your principles of action." Karpos answers: "Yes, such as they are. They are but few, but they serve me; and perhaps, if I had more, they would only puzzle me." The Bashaw then says: "I should much like to know your principles." Whereupon Karpos replies: "They are to be a good husband, a good father, a good neighbor, and a good gardener. I go no farther; and I hope, for the rest, that God will take everything in good part and have mercy on me."

We go no farther than Karpos. We believe that intelligent, well-intended usefulness is piety, whose creed is service and whose altar is everywhere. Well-informed and well-performed duty, having for its object the good of others in this life, we take to be a form of religion which has the merit of not imposing upon Heaven the pain of care, nor of vexing the ears of the gods with cries. Thrown into this universe, subject to the influences of its infinite diversity of marvels, of life, and of experience, with every man differing from every other man in mind and knowledge, there must be a million ways to paradise, and we take the one that seems to us the straightest. God is no niggard, who has only one entrance into the celestial park, and that for the use of his private friends, the priests, to enter, and the people kept outside. God is not afraid of being Boycotted, and plenteous gateways are ever open and unguarded round the eternal mansions. I think we may say this, and take no more liberty with God's name than preachers take every day in sermon and in prayer. They talk with a familiarity as though they knew everything. We may therefore presume to conjecture a few things. We mean no irreverence. All men are but as bubbles, amazed and unknowing, borne on the broad, unfathomable, silent sea of time. Many of us here have nearly ended any work in our power to advance. The shadows of the grave are coming into our sight. Most of those with whom we began the battle for new truth are no longer upon the field. Those whose companionship was pride, whose agreement was encouragement, whose praise was reward, have fallen one by one; and the shout of success, which once brought a flush to the face, is now with some of us a lonely but gladsome memory. We rejoice to believe that there will come after us those who, with wider knowledge and greater power, will teach those secular principles which conduce to "purity of character and energy of hand."

For the Free Religious Index.

BIBLES.

The interest taken in the Bible will soon be nearly an antiquarian interest, such as is taken in Herodotus and Homer. It will be studied by students of primitive human nature, who are anxious to know the mental, moral, and social condition of people who lived in the East twenty, thirty, and forty centuries ago. It is of no current interest. Who believes in a personal devil, the demoniacal theory of disease or witchcraft now? Who believes that, instead of being a law of nature, death is the penalty of sin, of a sin committed by a so-called first man and woman? Who believes that the entire human race sprang from a primitive couple made out of whole cloth as it were, in the Mesopotamian region of Asia? Who believes that the Ten Commandments were specially and supernaturally revealed to mankind on a mountain of Western Asia, when they are the obvious dictates of ordinary human intelligence legislating for the simplest form of society? If the Israelites required such a revelation, they must have been barbarously stupid. Who believes any more in the translation of Enoch or Elijah to heaven in a fiery chariot than he does in the translation of Romulus, the founder of Rome, which is recorded by the historian Livy? There is no ancient event recorded in the Bible which was of so much importance to Europe and European civilization as was the defeat of the gigantic expedition of Xerxes for the subjugation of Greece and Europe, which is so graphically narrated by Herodotus. Had Xerxes succeeded in Orientalizing Europe, we should be to-day on the low plane of the semi-barbarous people of Asia. It was a narrow escape. What have we to do with the Lord of Hosts and the God of Jacob, who was a mere tribal deity? King David was a lyric poet of a high order, but that is no reason why his poetry should be read as a Sunday exercise by hosts of ultra-respectable people of our day, who would regard David as a barbarian, if they could see him as he lived, fought, reigned, sinned, and sung. Magnificent as the Book of Job is, what modern reader does not prefer Goethe's Faust to it?

The Western nations have for ages been taught to read and revere the Bible. Hence, they do not realize, but they soon will, how out of all relation to our current, rational, industrial, scientific, literary, democratic civilization it is. At one time, sermons formed the staple, so to speak, of English literature, as any large old library bears witness to this day, with its voluminous divines, whose works are bound in that substantial manner which indicates that it was supposed that they were to be prized and read forever. The mere thought of being obliged to read such obsolete, antiquated stuff, in these days, is suggestive of apoplexy and mental suffocation. Who cares for the doctrines, which are elaborately defended or confuted in the once standard works of which we are speaking? Controversial divinity is of no interest to the generations now on the stage. It is not this or that doctrine or article of faith, but theology en masse, which is now called in question. Some of the old English divines were beyond a doubt men of great intellectual power, such as Chillingworth, Taylor, etc.; but, so far as the world of to-day is concerned, they wasted their power on topics which no longer interest readers and students. Gibbon, in his masterly account of the rise and spread of Mohammedanism, characterizes the Koran, which is the Mohammedan Bible, as an endless, incoherent rhapsody of fable and precept and declamation, which seldom excites a sentiment or an idea, which sometimes crawl in the dust, and is sometimes lost in the clouds.

This is a fair description of all the Bibles of the various religions, of large sections even of the Hebrew Scriptures. And any reader whose vision is no longer overspread by a film of superstitious and inherited reverence for the Scriptures aforesaid will acknowledge that it is so. For the various Bibles are a primitive sort of literature, and are all offsprings of the Oriental mind, which is not rational at all, but emotional, fanatical, ejaculatory, incoherent, in fact a most distorting intellectual medium, incapable of an exact scientific knowledge. These Bibles, then, are of no direct interest to the enlightened mind of to-day. They are simply interesting as indicating the mental mood of sundry prominent races who flourished before and in the dawnlight of history. These Bibles were the only books of the races to which they belong, for ages. Their sentences were supposed to be magic formulas. Like meteoric stones, they were supposed to have fallen from heaven, and not to have been the products of human brains. One or two centuries ago; the Hebrew Bible was regarded here in New England as the Koran is still regarded throughout the vast domain of Islamism. It was conned diligently and committed to memory. It was the book, the only book. What was the result? There was no mental activity except in the direction of theology, and the production of dull, stupid sermons. The New England mind was Hebraized through and through, and benightmared fanaticism and bigotry reigned, and reason and common-sense were impotent. The Bible, with its Witch of Endor and its injunction to destroy witches, caused the execution of men and women here on this soil, in one instance of a most noble and high-souled lady, who was offered her life if she would acknowledge that she was guilty of witchcraft. She refused to countenance the abominable Biblical superstition by such a confession, and perished, a victim of Hebraism and the Bible. Let us say that there is no woman celebrated in the Bible, from Genesis to the Apocalypse, worthy to be compared for nobility of soul with this ancient New England heroine and martyr.

The magnifying mist of remoteness in space and time, as well as a blind, unreasoning reverence, used to make Bible times and Bible men and things loom large. But the process of disenchantment and deholyizing the men and things aforesaid is going bravely on. Biblical critics, such as the Hollander Kuenen and the Bishop of Natal, to say nothing of a Chicago lawyer who has got his eyes partially open and is opening the eyes of his compatriots with his book, are undeceiving and enlightening "the average man." Cheap tours through Egypt and the Holy Land are bringing increasing multitudes face to face with the disillusionizing realities of the Scriptural countries of Western Asia and Africa. Thus are people enabled to appreciate the striking difference between the Oriental and Western or European and American mind, and thus will the Western mind be disenthralled from its long bondage to an irrational Orientalism.

Digitized by Google

B. W. B.

For the Free Religious Index.

MR. ROWEN ANSWERED.

In the Index of April 14, Mr. D. Rowen, a representative graduate of Meadville Theological School, in his notice of my essay entitled "The Great Debate," furnishes not a bad specimen of pulpit dialectics. Not having wrestled with any of my main propositions, in his attack on a supposed vulnerable point, he meets facts with opinions, testimony with hearsay, and, while assuming to know the exact ground on which others stand, gives no sign or token of his own.

With an almost fierce yet tacit persistency, Mr. Rowen puts forth the claim that the Meadville Theological School has a Free Religious foundation. But he evades answering the question directly. Why not meet it squarely with a yes or no? I say, No, it has not. Shutting from sight all other evidence, its endowments settle that question. But there have been "bulls" issued within the last twelve months with these announcements: "The object of the school is limited to preparing young men for the Christian ministry." That seems plain enough, but this is perhaps plainer: "The prime aim of the school is to make good and consecrated ministers of the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." I do not deny that "a diversity of opinions" exists among the students; but I wish to know how it comes about, and what under the circumstances are its effects on character? This nondescript something called liberal Christianity I see professed and patronized by persons who can swallow larger mouthfuls of Agnosticism and Orthodoxy, blended or separate, than suit my palate. Whatever religion is, it is no equivoque; and that is the key to my course of action, in school and out.

"I make no hesitation in saying that it was not his opinions that prevented Mr. Curtis from graduating, but rather his disrespectful, I may not say insolent, bearing toward the professors and regulations of the school," are the words of this brave defender of the faith.

"Disrespectful" and "insolent" may be but refined substitutes for the anathemas of a ruder age, or a more robust faith. "The true cause of the difficulty between the school and Mr. Curtis" he discovers in the following extract from the speech in the essay: "I cannot feel the respect which perhaps I ought to feel for the man whose exegesis, if accepted, would make us all radicals or sceptics, yet who, when we are commanded to read from no book but the Bible, listens unmoved without the raising of a finger or the winking of an eyelash." He rightly infers "this remark was made of and in the presence of Professor George L. Cary," whom he proceeds to eulogize as "a man of transparent honesty," etc., and then in the next sentence applies to me the epithets already quoted. But Mr. Rowen should be aware that facts have a potent share in the settlement of questions, even those that trench on the theological domain, and that it will never do to fling dust in people's eyes by the bestowal of lavish encomiums on one hand and reckless abuse on the other. Let the testimony he gives of his idol stand; but it does not answer the following questions:—

(1) Would not the Professor's exegesis, if accepted, make radicals or sceptics of us all? (2) Did he not say to his class that the Bible was an unfit book to be read before a promiscuous audience, and also teach that the fundamental verities of religion in our preaching should be based on Scripture? (3) Did he not second and uphold a system of rules that flew in the face of his own teaching? (4) Was not this silent passivity and these contradictory utterances characteristic, if not of the man, of the professor? I may be reminded that Francis E. Abbot once sat in the professor's chair in this school; but that does not daunt me, nor prove nor disprove anything. That was before the new faith had articulated itself in his consciousness. Professor Cary is as radical as the founder of the Index, but lacking, I should say, in that philosophical habit of mind and contagious enthusiasm, whose absence renders all criticism, especially the Biblical, negative and destructive. And yet the professor could say of Robert Ingersoll that "he was going over the country displaying his ignorance." There may be more of Bible lore in the craniums of theological professors, but there is in one of the great "Infidel's" lectures a thousand times more of the old Hebrew spirit and of that wisdom born of the light. It is not to one, but a corps of professors, to which my "remark" in reality applied, and even more to that spirit of compromise and equivocation which stamps its seal on institutions, and bears regnant sway in denominations and over our age.

Free Religion has its eulogists and expounders everywhere, but where are its consistent, unflinching advocates? When I sent a copy of the "Platform of Principles," after leaving school, to Mr Rowen, he wrote me of it as being "a strong and excellent one," but thought it would be strengthened if it had in it a recognition of Christianity; for "he did not believe any religious movement could succeed in this country but Christianity." Certainly not, if the principle of self-sacrifice is to be an idealized creation, godlike in the Christ of eighteen centuries ago, but "rash," "foolish," "insolent" in the man of today. If Christianity finds no recognition in that platform, so much the worse for Christianity.

Let us summarize: (1) Has not the school a creed to which students on entering subscribe? (2) Is not "a belief in the divine origin of Christianity" meant distinctly to imply a belief in God and immortality, the Messiahship of Jesus, and the exclusive claims of the Bible, if no more? (3) Is it not utterly absurd and immoral in the extreme to suppose students are allowed to give whatever meaning they please to the words of that creed? (4) But is not this creed which is published annually in a conspicuous place in the Catalogue, and by other official means declared to be in force, tacitly ignored or inwardly contemned in whole and in part by students? (5) If the preceding questions receive an affirmative answer, does not ill-repute fall on students and professors alike? (6) And lastly, if in the place of the words School and Students in these interrogatories, be substituted Unitarianism and Unitarians, will not the same answers hold good?

T. W. Curtis.

Columbus, Pa., May 2, 1881.

For the Free Religious Index.

MISUSE OF WORDS.

To the Index of April 28, Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker contributes an excellent protest against "Innuendo as a Method of Argument." While I give cordial assent to much that he says, I wish to take exception to a kind of argument in which Mr. Tucker, perhaps inadvertently, indulges,—a kind of argument as exasperating and as blameworthy as it is common. I refer to the misrepresentation of words; to the use, without explanation, of common words in an uncommon sense, in a sense entirely different from that in which they are understood by the great majority of people.

Praising, but none too highly, Mr. Wasson's words, "He has entered on the road to hell who has once set a form of government above the everlasting laws of morals," Mr. Tucker says, "First-class anarchistic doctrine, that! For what is anarchy? Ask Pierre Larousse, whose encyclopædia is even a higher standard than the Britannica itself. 'L'anarchisme est un système politique d'après lequel la société pourrait se gouverner sans gouvernement établi,'—'Anarchy is a political system by which society would be able to govern itself without an established government.'" As commentary, I submit the following: L'anarchisme is not the French equivalent for anarchy. The French word for anarchy is l'anarchie, and it means exactly what its English representative does. L'anarchisme is a rare word in French: it will not be found in the Dictionnaire de l'Académie Française nor in Litrè, and when found it does not mean anarchy. In Poitevin's Nouveau Dictionnaire, it is given: "Anarchisme,—Système des Anarchistes." It is in short the name applied by a certain school of social reformers to their theory of society. No one has a right to use such a special name as the equivalent of our anarchy. The tendency is to induce a belief either that Larousse holds anarchy to be the harmless, though somewhat unintelligible, thing set forth in the above definition, or that our English anarchy denotes a desirable state of society. In either case, the tendency is wrong, the belief is false. What anarchy means, and has long meant, every intelligent person knows. What Larousse understands by l'anarchie any one may see by looking into his encyclopædia, where over a column is devoted to the name and the thing. I insert a few extracts:—

Anarchie,—Etat d'un peuple qui n'a plus de chef, plus d'authorité à laquelle il obéisse; où le pouvoir gouvernement est entravé ou suspendu.... L'anarchie est caractérisée par la division d'une société en fractions hostiles les unes aux autres, et par l'instabilité des pouvoirs publics, conséquence de cette division.... Dans l'ordre économique, l'anarchie, en diminuant, en détruisant la sécurité, tue le crédit, tarit les sources du travail, arrête la formation des capitaux; dans l'ordre moral, elle obscurcit les notions du bien et du mal, du juste et du injuste, et trouble plus ou moins profondément la conscience publique. (Anarchy,—Condition of a people which has no longer leader or authority which it obeys; where the governing power is impeded or suspended.... Anarchy is characterized by the division of society into hostile factions, and by the instability of public power in consequence of this division.... Considered economically, anarchy, by diminishing and destroying security, kills credit, exhausts the sources of labor, arrests the formation of capital; morally, it obscures the ideas of good and evil, of justice and injustice, and disorders more or less deeply the public conscience.)

Such a society hardly rests on "the everlasting laws of morals," even though it pays small regard to forms of government! The following also invites attention:

M. Proudhon a donné le nom, paradoxal en apparence, d'un "l'an-archie" à une théorie sociale qui repose sur l'idée de contrat, substituée à celle d'authorité. Il faut bien comprendre que l'an-archie Proudhonienne n'a rien de commun avec celle dont nous avons parlé plus haut. (M. Proudhon has given the name, paradoxical in appearance, of "an-archy" to a social theory which rests on the idea of contract, substituted for that of authority. It must be well understood that Proudhonian an-archy has nothing in common with that of which we have spoken above.)

There follows a brief sketch of M. Proudhon's system, with which I have here nothing to do.

It is not the object of this article to attack Mr. Tucker's social theories. I wish simply to protest against the abuse of words in argument, to protest against the usurpation by which thinkers who differ in aught from the majority seize on the words which belong to the majority, saddle them with peculiar meanings, and then use them in argument without warning or explanation. New systems should have new names. Anarchisme is not anarchy; and to use one for the other breeds confusion of thought, which may be sometimes useful but is always unworthy of an honorable cause, and will in the end return to plague its producers. If Mr. Tucker wants a word for anarchisme, an-archy is ready to his hand. That is bad enough, but better than the undivided word. Its strange look puts people on their guard, and the explanation of it is already widely known; or better yet it might be to appropriate the rare word anarchism to this special use.

Wm. H. Tillinghast.

Cambridge, Mass., May 2, 1881.

BOOK NOTICES.

Note.— It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the Free Religious Index, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

Chinese Immigration. By Geo. F. Seward. New York: Charles Scribner & Sons.

This book, by a late minister of the United States in China, gives the author's views upon the social and economical aspects of his subject. It discusses them with that calm confidence which leaves no doubt of the author's conviction that his positions are correct. It is promised that he will hereafter discuss the political and commercial issues involved, if the course of events shall appear to make it desirable. On account of the close relationship of the political with the social and of the commercial with the economical aspects of this matter, most persons interested will perhaps regret that the deferred issues were not discussed in this work, so as to present the whole subject at one view. It is shown that the number of Chinese in this country has been greatly overstated, and that the actual number is only about one hundred thousand at the present time. The argument against the supposed danger of an overwhelming immigration of Mongolians is very clear and forcible, and must tend to relieve the fears of those who are without knowledge.

Digitized by Google

The author also exhibits the great material advantages of Chinese labor in California, in building railroads, reclaiming swamp-lands, developing agriculture, fruit culture, and various kinds of manufacturing, besides its general use in domestic service, wherein it is claimed to be the best and almost the only labor obtainable. The current objections against the nature of Chinese labor and its competition with the labor of other races are fully considered, and claimed to be largely founded in prejudice; and our space will only permit us to say that the author's answers to these objections seem to be sound.

This book will contribute much to a better understanding of the several problems arising from the presence of the Chinese in large numbers on the Pacific slope; but we cannot avoid the feeling that its discussion of the social aspects of these problems is not satisfactory, in view of the alarming facts admitted to exist in those places where the number of Chinese is considerable. There is a grave political and social problem presented to the mind, when we contemplate the results of having within our civilization a large class of persons of foreign birth who do not assimilate with the community, but reside among us for temporary advantage, who do not make permanent homes for themselves or their posterity, and who, while here, do not join in the social or participate in the civil customs of our society. This is no reason for denying them justice or kind treatment, but is good ground for the statesman to examine carefully the probabilities of the growth or disappearance of this foreign community, and its effect upon the native race. For a solution of this problem, we shall await the author's statement upon the political and commercial aspects of his subject.

FARM HOMES INDOORS AND OUTDOORS. By E. H. Leland. New York: Orange Judd Co. 1881.

We wish this book could be put into the hands of every farmer's wife and daughter. In expressing this wish, we do not desire to convey an impression that the book is a remarkable production, or free from defects of style and method, or without some regretable deficiencies. But we judge the book by its purpose, and by the consistency and diligence with which the purpose has been carried out. No one who has travelled much in the farming portions of our country, East or West, can have failed to observe the unnecessary rudeness of the homes in which our farmers' families often live, the unkempt character of all their surroundings, and the complete absence of any evidences of taste, or even very primitive ideas of comfort, in their interiors. That something better than "grubbing" can be evolved from daily living many farmers do not understand; that refinement and enjoyment "pay" is often an incomprehensible proposition; and that without a French artiste the wretchedness of much farm cooking might be essentially modified does not seem to be a practical suggestion. Farm Homes is an honest attempt to inspire farmers' wives and daughters with an idea of something better than the routine drudgery and bareness of much of the life they are now living, and to give them the elementary instruction necessary to enable them to make their houses or rooms more beautiful and healthful, their methods of living more wholesome, and their food more palatable and digestible. It aims, in short, to sow both in and around farm homes some seeds of "sweetness and light," and thus to make the lives of their inmates better worth the living.

From the choice of a site for a farm-house and the discussion of plans for building to receipts for whitewash; from directions for a kitchen garden to receipts for cooking onions; from the raising of flowers and suggestions of economical methods of painting and papering to talks about equally economical methods of taking a daily bath and managing to dress comfortably,—the book contains a great deal of "practical" information and common-sense hints. If, occasionally, the suggestions are just a little bit romantic, nevertheless they always indicate something far better than most farmers' families now possess, and which is yet easily within their reach. The book nowhere wanders from its purpose, which is to show clearly that an attainable but perhaps unsuspected wealth of satisfaction and enjoyment is within reach of the inmate of the poorest farm-house.

It may not be amiss for us to say here that Mrs. Leland is an old acquaintance of readers of the Index, being the author of some very pretty poems which have appeared in its columns under the signature of "Mignonette."

THE International Review for May has timely and valuable articles on noted events and persons. Mr. W. Fraser Rae's sketch of "George Eliot" will be read by all with interest. The article on "The Last Trial of Russian Nihilists" reads strangely in the light of recent events in that unhappy land. To contrast Madame Ragozin's assurance that the movement of the Nihilists is simply due to "a passing misunderstanding" between the beloved Emperor and his loyal subjects with the fact of the late assassination and its results is to remind us of many historical instances of "misunderstanding" of the significance of great revolutions. When will nations learn that outward disturbances are but suggestive symptoms of internal disorder, and only curable by removal of the causes of evil? The article on "Recent Changes in Japan," written by a native of that country, K. Mitsukuri, is valuable not only as a concise historical picture of the change from feudalism to a limited monarchy, shading rapidly into a representative government, but is of deep practical interest in its arraignment of the European powers for unjust treatment of this nobly progressive State. It makes a philanthropist's blood boil with indignation to read of the cruel and brutal actions of great nations toward a kingdom whose giant strides toward a better civilization should make the stronger powers her loving protectors, not her oppressors. We are glad that America's skirts are partially cleared of these wrongs by Mr. Mitsukuri; but it may be a question soon pressing upon our statesmen whether or no we can prevent any of the outrages of other nations upon Japan.

THE first article in the May number of the Catholic World is a review of the life and writings of George H. Miles, an American Catholic poet who died in 1870. In his poem on "Aladdin's Palace," which is said to be "one of the best things of the kind in American literature," he takes the ground that the one thing America needs to make it complete is "respect for authority." An article on "Irish Settlements in Illinois" calls attention to the very highly cultivated farms owned and worked by Irishmen along the Illinois and Michigan Canal. These farms were settled by the Irish canal laborers from 1830 to 1850. A writer upon "The Greek Monasteries of Mount Athos" says that no women are ever allowed upon the mountain, and at one time even boys with "smooth faces" were excluded. It is also stated that in most of the libraries on the Holy Mountain "the latest books to be found are often of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries." These libraries, however, are said to contain some very valuable ancient manuscripts.

THE Popular Science Monthly for May presents a varied array of subjects, all of their usual excellence. Dr. F. L. Oswald continues interesting and valuable articles on "Physical Education," which we hope may be eventually gathered into a volume. C. T. Fish has an illustrated article on "The Mineral Springs of Saratoga," Prof. Tyndall one on "The Action of Radiant Heat on Gaseous Matters," W. M. Williams writes on "Another World Down Here," Prof. Cohn on "Eyes and School Books," F. H. Koehler on "Color Blindness," H. J. Johnson on the "Origin and Structure of Volcanic Cones," to which is added the usual editorial and other miscellany.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A BUST of Carlyle is to go into the Poet's Corner in Westminster Abbey.

S. B. WESTON was the speaker at Cosmian Hall, Florence, last Sunday.

JOHN ALBEE has just returned from a pleasant lecture trip in the West.

CHARLES ELLIS addressed the Liberal Society lately formed at Rockland, Mass., last Sunday.

REV. DR. C. A. BARTOL delivers the alumni address at Bowdoin College Commencement this year.

REV. L. K. WASHBURN, of Lynn, Mass., will occupy the desk of the Parker Memorial Society next Sunday.

IT is reported that the Marquis of Lorne, Governor-General of Canada, will soon resign and return to England.

GEO. CHAINEY and family have gone to housekeeping at 41 Fort Avenue, Roxbury, where he desires henceforth to be addressed.

MR. DARWIN has a new book nearly ready on "The Formation of Vegetable Mould through the Action of Worms, with Observations on their Habits."

FORTY-FOUR Mormon missionaries are on their way to Wales, on a proselyting expedition. They will work in the mining and iron districts of Wales.

PROF. LEWIS SWIFT, of Rochester, N.Y., has discovered a bright comet in the constellation of Andromeda, thereby winning a $200 prize offered by H. H. Warner.

MR. CARLYLE'S friends, it is reported, wish to put the little house in Scotland, in which he was born, in repair, and keep it as a monument, making it, perhaps, into a library for the use of the country people about.

MRS. HENRIETTA ADLER, the wife of Rev. Dr. Samuel Adler, of New York, and the mother of Professor Felix Adler, died at her late residence in that city on Tuesday of last week, in the sixty-sixth year of her age, after a brief illness.

COL. C. A. B. SHEPARD, of the firm of Lee & Shepard, gave Mr. D. R. Locke (Rev. Petroleum Nasby) a very pleasant send-off to Europe, at Parker's in this city, last week, with a dinner and a choice company of the "literary fellers."

BELVA A. LOCKWOOD, the Washington female lawyer, has applied for the Brazilian mission in a letter of considerable length to the President. It will very naturally be asked, if the appointment be granted, whether this is woman's mission.

M. D. CONWAY writes from London to the Cincinnati Commercial: "I have just received from a friend in Manchester between thirty and forty unpublished letters written by Carlyle, which will appear before long. They represent nearly every phase of his life from early youth to manhood. In one of them, he talks of going to live in America."

MISS FANNY PARNELL, the sister of the famous agitator, has been the latest distinguished guest of Boston. A few days earlier, the recipients of its attention were a party of the English noblemen and gentry; but the young Irishwoman that followed created much the greater sensation. Her address at the Music Hall drew forth a great audience; and Mayor Prince and the city officials paid her the compliment of an excursion down the harbor, and acted as the escorts of the occasion.

W. M. SALTER, of Boston, who has gone through a college and divinity school preparation for the ministry, but is looking forward to a broader and freer humanitarian work than the conditions of any of the Christian sects afford, delivered an interesting and exceedingly thoughtful discourse at the Parker Memorial last Sunday. Mr. Salter at present supplies the pulpit of the Unitarian Society at Wayland, Mass., the home of the late Lydia Maria Child, whose friendship and interest he shared.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

MIRACLE.

It comes! It thrills! And lo! the jubilant earth
Swings in the pulse of æther, like a thought
New dancing in the blood; and, swift unsealed,
Her veined juices burst from mouldy dark,
And climb to roses, as a kingly joy,
Loud knocking at the crimson gates of life,
Sends couriers fleet along the purple paths,
To flame in brilliant livery on the cheek.
Faint violet breaths and languor-freighted airs
Sweep o'er the thousand-fibred harp of being,
And subtly sway to rapture or to tears!
Light laces of the willow mutely wave,
Soft shaken by the hands invisible,
That stir the mounting sap, and shape its course.
Arbutus blooms its roseate day, and dies;
And close-ranked lilies shake from cups of pearl
Their nectar back to the bestowing air.
Like drops of gold upon the waiting grass,
Come buttercups for happy children's hands,
Who pluck, and question not. Enough for them
That the rich revel of the year returns!

FLORENCE, MASS. H. T. C.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MAY 19, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Business session, for election of officers, hearing of reports, etc., Thursday, May 26, at 7.45 P.M., in the Parker Memorial Hall, corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets. The methods of the Association looking to a more effective organization, as developed the past year and as may be further proposed, it is hoped may induce an interesting and profitable discussion at this opening session.

Convention, Friday, May 27, in the same Hall, with sessions at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. The question for the morning session is to be, "The Dangers to Morality from the Downfall of the Old Theology; or, The Probabilities of a Moral Interregnum," to be introduced by Prof. Felix Adler. Mr. Adler entitles his address, "The Teachers of Ethics as the Successors of the Clergy." Other speakers will be Mr. M. J. Savage, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Mr. George Chainey. The afternoon topic will be, "Will Free Religion Organize?" to be opened with an essay by Frederick A. Hinckley. Speeches by Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, Mrs. Anna L. Diggs and Charles Ellis.

On Friday evening there is to be a social festival, using both the upper and lower halls of the Parker Memorial Building. A programme of special interest is to be presented, with the usual opportunity for refreshments, conversation, and, not least, pecuniary subscriptions for the work of the Association. WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y.

THE New York Churchman of last week contained an extended article, under the caption of "Agnostic Testimony," upon a recent editorial in the Index upon the growth of ecclesiasticism in this country. It appeared to find a good deal of comfort in it. But, then, we find comfort also in some things which the Churchman does not in present tendencies. And thus an equilibrium of thought and feeling is attained. Be kind enough to put this down, Mr. Churchman (if you please), as an optimistic view of the matter.

THE APPROACHING ANNUAL MEETING.

Next week brings to Boston another anniversary season, and with it the regular Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association. Of the arrangements for the Convention, the details are given in the special notice in preceding column. That the programme promises a meeting of unusual interest, we think the friends of the Association will agree.

The subjects to be presented are of particular interest at this time. That proposed for the morning session on Friday brings up, in fact, what is to very many thinking people the most vital question in philosophy now demanding consideration, the Foundations of Morality. It is a question, as stated, which is not merely theoretical, but immediately practical. The subject is to be introduced by Dr. Felix Adler, the President of the Association, with a discourse which he entitles "The Teachers of Ethics as the Successors of the Clergy,"—a form of statement changed verbally from that given in our Convention notice the preceding two weeks, yet recognizing nevertheless the same essential fact,—that morality as taught hitherto has been generally implicated with theological creeds, and that these creeds are fast becoming untenable. In this state of things, the question that presses upon the serious attention of many thoughtful persons is, Is not practical morality imperilled by the downfall of the old theological basis on which it has been believed to rest? Or, in other words, is society likely to suffer from what Professor Goldwin Smith has called a Moral Interregnum? This is a class of subjects on which Dr. Adler is specially at home. People in Boston and vicinity have so few opportunities for hearing him that they would gladly welcome his voice on any topic; but on this question they are sure of hearing something of special value in clearing up perplexities and anxieties on a question of present commanding prominence and interest. The speakers who are to follow Mr. Adler are: Mr. M. J. Savage, admitted to be the most radical preacher in Boston and one who has also made a special study of ethics in the light of modern scientific theories; Mr. George Chainey, the eloquent lecturer who is now drawing such large audiences on Sundays to Paine Memorial Hall; and Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, so well known on the platforms of the anti-slavery and the woman-suffrage platforms, but not often heard of late years by any Boston audience. These will each develop some special point of the theme. Mrs. Stanton will speak particularly of the pernicious influence, on the moral and political condition of woman, of the old prevailing conception of Deity as masculine.

The topic for the afternoon of the same day, "Will Free Religion organize?" is one which, if not so generally attractive, has a peculiar interest and importance to all members and friends of the Association. An attempt has been made in selecting speakers for this question to secure those who have facts rather than theories to present; those who have had opportunities for observing the field of Free Religion, who have been practical workers in the field, and can report from their own knowledge concerning the conditions and phases of liberal religious thought and tendency. Mr. F. A. Hinckley, who is to open the question with an essay, has been for two years the resident speaker of the Free Religious Society in Providence, and has certainly won for that Society increasing recognition and influence in the community, as well as drawn its members together in more mutually helpful work. What has been done there he thinks may be done in other places. He believes most earnestly that Free Religion has a mission, which can only be accomplished by energetic and systematic labors in its behalf. We must not, however, anticipate Mr. Hinckley's essay. Indeed, we cannot say how he is to answer the question. "Will Free Religion organize?" is not the same question as "Ought Free Religion to organize?" We can only say that those who go to hear him will hear the views of one of the most ardent believers and workers in the Free Religious movement. The other speakers on this question—Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, and Mrs. Anna L. Diggs—have all had experience in different kinds of liberal work, know of both the hopes and the hindrances, and will add variety and breadth to the discussion. Mrs. Diggs comes from Kansas, is represented as an attractive speaker, and is specially interested in the work of liberal religious organization in the West.

But not only does the meeting promise to be one of exceptional interest, but it is likely to be an important meeting. The Free Religious Association the past year has been entering on a somewhat more active policy in the dissemination of its principles. On the first of last July, in accordance with a vote passed at the last annual meeting, it assumed the publication of the Index. It has made an experimental beginning of a Lecture Bureau Agency, by which courses of lectures have been held in several places in the interest of liberal religious ideas. It has also attempted, in an experimental, tentative way, to supply to some extent the want that is felt in the Sunday-schools of the most radical religious societies for text-books or lesson-papers. The Report of the Executive Committee will doubtless bring these matters up for judgment at the business session of the annual meeting, on Thursday evening. There is, it need not be concealed, a difference of opinion in the Association with regard to the importance or desirableness of some parts of this new activity. There are some who think that the Association should make a more energetic push in methods of propagandism, and especially in encouraging and aiding local organizations. There are others who are content with the methods hitherto mainly used, and think them more consonant with the aim nd spirit of the Association. It were well if there could be a full, free, and frank discussion of this question at the meeting Thursday evening. That meeting has been habitually too much neglected. It might be made the most vital and useful of the whole series, if the members, the real living constituency of the Association, would make it a duty to attend it, and there by voice and vote make known to the Executive Committee what they would have that committee do or abstain from doing. Very possibly, too, by such a genuine conference of many judgments, the difference of opinion above alluded to might disappear, and some medium ground for more active effort be discovered, which should unite the convictions of all. In this spirit let us rally, friends, to make this annual meeting of the Free Religious Association as productive in good as any one that has been held since that memorable meeting in Horticultural Hall, fourteen years ago, when the Association was organized.

A HEBREW COLLEGE has been opened at Cincinnati. The building for it was dedicated on Sunday, April 24, a large number of distinguished rabbis from different parts of the country being present. The college is specially intended for the instruction of young Hebrews in the theology and literature of their religion. Hitherto there has been no school in this country where a rabbi could be thoroughly educated for his office. This college is expected to obviate the necessity of sending young men abroad to be fitted for rabbinical duties.

Digitized by Google

ANTI-RELIGIONISTS.

It is so often urged that it is impossible for one to possess moral worth or happiness without religious faith that it is rather interesting to note occasionally who and what they are who get along without it.

There are to be met, here and there, persons who hold not only that all religious beliefs are incredible, but also that it is better for people to be rid of even the last vestige of them. They put them all in the category of "superstitions." Sometimes, persons of these extreme views are found in the ranks of great scholars and thinkers, or among those less eminent of this class; although their doubts and disbeliefs may be little known outside of the private circle. Again, they are more notable for crudeness of thought, extravagant speech, and a cynical disposition. There are still others who can hardly be included in either of these classes. They are persons who have sustained, it may be, a somewhat isolated relation to the general sweep of the life and thought of the age; who have spent many years in pioneer and out-of-the-way places, where they have been chiefly conversant with religion of the more irrational type; and, though of but little education or reading beyond a few favorite authors, and bearing the stigma of "infidel," have succeeded in winning the confidence and esteem of the community through their acknowledged mental force, shrewd sense, and sterling qualities.

We have before us a letter from a Western town, written by an old gentleman of eighty-two years of age, which may serve as an illustration of the class last indicated. Thus it reads:—

I was born in Cheshire, Mass., but subsequently moved to Cummington in that State, where I was married. I was for twenty-five years a deacon of the Congregational Church, but at the call of Garrison, Phillips, Burleigh, Pillsbury, and others, and the voice of conscience, left its pro-slavery associations to join the despised abolitionists. Since that time, I have had nothing to do with churches, though I feel friendly to all inside and out, and hope to depart in peace with all men and women. . . . But the sketch of my life and idea of myself will not be complete, unless I tell you something of my religious views, or rather of what I believe and what I do not believe. I do not believe that the Christian religion, as it has been taught by the Church, has been as productive of good as evil. I do not believe that Jesus Christ was very God or the son of God in any other sense than every person is a son or daughter. I do not believe in the inspiration of the Hebrew or Christian Bible, or that it is the word of God, but believe it was written by men according to their belief. I do not believe in a personal God or a personal devil. My religion is a religion of life, not profession; my Bible, knowledge, not a book; my creed, reason, not faith; my church, humanity, not sectarianism; my teacher, investigation, not priestcraft; my heaven, a harmonious condition of mind, not a place to go to when I die. I have not stopped to enlarge or explain, but have thrown out a few hints of what I think on the subject referred to. Ingersoll, speaking of my native State of Massachusetts, says, "Civilization is a plant that thrives best in the snow." Massachusetts is the best place on earth to grow men. I am afraid you will not enjoy my creed; but old creeds are crumbling away, and the rising generation will have a better God, if it has any, than this. My wife Pamelia and I are old-fashioned sort of people, and live in an old-fashioned way. She is busy, as I write, knitting a pair of stockings with silk all the way from Boston. We are spending a green old age. We live alone. My wife is housekeeper. I do the chores for house and barn. We keep a horse, and come and go as we please.

The letter from which the above extracts were made came into our hands through Col. A. D. Hatch, of New Bedford, from whom we gathered some interesting details in respect to its author, a relative of the Colonel (by marriage) and the father of Mr. E. M. Brown of Elmwood, Ill. (an old Index subscriber and active representative of the radical cause), where father and son, and other members of this Massachusetts stock transplanted to the Western prairie, have grown up and flourish. If correctly informed, the estimation in which they are held among the people of that section goes to show that, even with all that may be claimed for it, the absence of religious faith, or what is regarded as such, does not imply the absence of all the virtues.

D. H. C.

THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

The most remarkable feature of the Western Unitarian Conference, recently in session at St. Louis, was the opening sermon by the Rev. Brooke Herford, of Chicago. Its significance will justify the following report, very much condensed, from notes taken during the delivery:—

Text: "Strengthen the things which remain." The present is a period of theological transition. So much uncertainty exists regarding old faiths that many persons are in doubt concerning even those things which seem to remain. Is everything gone? Two hundred years ago, Calvinism was apparently unshakable. Then came Arianism. Then came Priestley and Channing. Then came Theodore Parker. But that which remained after Parker's criticisms is now called in question by physical science and the agnostic philosophy. Parker's intuitionalism is gone, and even the foundations of morality seem uncertain. But there is no cause for fear, nothing to be despondent about. Scepticism is honest. However a man may doubt, I do not want him to be an outsider, even if he have doubts about the propriety of calling himself a Christian. Let us seek the truth. It is useless to play fast and loose with freethought. Let us have the truth, even if it bring men where I think it is not. But everything is not gone. Conscience, morality, religion, will remain. Our duty is to cherish whatever seems left, remembering that religious faith does not go by quantity, but by quality. A man who had been reading Arnold's Light of Asia told me that he was thinking of renouncing Christianity and becoming a Buddhist. Well, let a man cherish Buddhism, if he can believe in that. Better a good Buddhist than a shifting Christian. But, if Christianity be given up, God will probably remain, even if he remain only as the ultimate mystery, the unknowable. But let us go to the extreme of scepticism. Let us suppose that one does not even believe in God, what remains? Man remains; and man may become the Archimedean fulcrum, the starting-point from which to reach out to whatever else is in the universe. A belief in human life alone may be enough. The noblest revelations of religion are in man. If scepticism drive to this extreme, make the best of what remains. But do not cherish your scepticism in solitude. The isolated doubter is apt to become sour or bitter. Draw together in some form of association, so as to sweeten life with faith and love and charity.

Perhaps we should here apologize to Mr. Herford for presenting the above disjointed sentences and phrases as a fair report of his sermon; but, as matter of fact, the sermon was altogether devoid of any pretence of literary excellence. These expressions were really used, in the same order and very nearly in the same form as we have given them; and they represent the "gist" of the discourse.

The attitude of the sermonizer was peculiar throughout. He did not appear to rejoice in the progress of freethought, although believing firmly in the necessity of its exercise. He seemed to regret the theological idols in which he had once had faith, but which he now clearly perceived to be falling or at least trembling all around him. But, in spite of this regret (which may have been in part a mere suspicion of the present writer), there was a manly and courageous acceptance of the facts of the present situation, and a determination to "fight it out on that line," whatever the consequences. Mr. Herford longed apparently for the mountain to come to Mohammed; but, if convinced that it would not come, he would say so frankly and bravely take up his own march for the mountain. If Eastern Unitarians, who are nominally of the same school of theological thinking with Mr. Herford would but take the same courageous position, there could be no farther controversy between them and the advocates of Free Religion. We cordially welcome Brooke Herford to the platform of absolute freethought upon which he has thus firmly stepped.

And there was no word from any of the ministers present (with the exception of a brief sentence of Dr. Eliot) sounded in harmony with any other key than that furnished in the opening sermon. There appeared to be throughout the proceedings a consciousness of the fact that all present were freed from the dominion of the obnoxious "preamble" of the National Conference. There was no attempt to harmonize the new and the old. The lordship or mastership of Christ was not once referred to. The cant phrases which are still current in nearly every public meeting of Eastern Unitarians were mostly excluded from the St. Louis Conference; and the few which managed to creep in gave only the feeblest possible wail, and were quickly silenced by a sense of their own discord.

There were no very important affairs before the Conference, although a great deal of detailed business was transacted; but its enthusiasm and earnestness and breadth of spirit may render it hereafter memorable among Unitarian gatherings.

R. C.

NOTES FROM THE WEST.

I feel myself almost a stranger to the Index, as I have not seen a copy of it since I left home more than a month since, and know little of what is going on in the world it represents.

The flood in the Missouri River, great this year beyond precedent and very destructive, detained me for several days in Council Bluffs, Iowa. While there, I made the acquaintance of Rev. Mr. Andrew, who is busily engaged in gathering a congregation in that intensely Orthodox and also indifferent and rather sluggish town. He is earnest, alert, and wise, stands broadly on the ground of universal religion; and we may well wish him abundant success in his worthy enterprise. I was glad to see that he seems to be winning his way to recognition and merited support.

Both at the Bluffs and at Omaha, I lectured; and in both towns the attendance was good. Of course, on both sides the river, the people were much preoccupied with the flood; many dwellings, especially upon the Council Bluffs side, being inundated, and a multitude of houseless and suffering people having to be provided for. At Omaha, Rev. W. E. Copeland is pastor of the Unitarian Society. He also is a man of the "broad-gauge," and is doing, I doubt not, an excellent work. Certainly, he seems thoroughly alive to all the questions of the time, is deeply interested in the labor and the social problems of to-day, and is seeking everywhere to diffuse enlightenment and awaken earnest, fruitful thought upon them. The influence of such a minister cannot but be wholesome and benign; for such questions press, not only in Europe, but in America as well, and we need the wisdom of the best minds for their solution.

I have never met anywhere an audience that interested me more than the class of men I have chanced to find and speak to in Omaha,—artisans largely, mechanics who are engaged for most part in the shops of the Union Pacific Railroad. They are wide-awake and thoughtful men, emancipated generally from the old dogmatic religion, and, having eyes, see. They prize knowledge at its worth, and are eager for the best results that the opening advances of our time can give. There is no higher delight than in meeting and addressing such minds. Facts like these, the quickening and strong growth of men on their plane and world of experience, are to me prophetic. They speak of the enlightenment and deliverance that are to come to the toiling multitudes of mankind. The anvil and the work-bench, the hammer and the plane, are beginning to think; and the great religious reformation we seek, carrying with it as it will all other reforms, is commencing here.

Digitized by Google

All along the route, as you approach Sidney and Cheyenne, are visible witnesses of the unprecedented severity of the winter, in the multitudes of cattle and sheep that lie dead on the plains. I easily saw, I think, several hundreds of beeves scattered and decaying over the prairie, from my car window, in the space of a few miles. The sight told a sad tale of exposure and suffering.

This region is new, and largely uncultivated probably in all ways, certainly religiously. The churches in this little city (only a village would it be in New England or New York) are represented in some three of the leading denominations, aside from the Catholic; but the membership is small, and the attendance very light. There is a large church ungathered. I suppose here an overwhelming majority never go inside the walls of any religious structure. Nearly all the stores and shops of the town are open all of the earlier half of Sunday, some of them throughout the day; and this seems odd to one accustomed to the Sabbath observance that obtains in the East. People have renounced the old dogmas, at least have left them behind; but they have, as a general thing, come into no near or vital relation to affirmative truth. They are as sheep without a shepherd. Do I deem wrongly that they need, and many of them would welcome, the living voice? I converse with persons, both men and women, finding them not seldom of superior grade of intelligence, and far more advanced in general knowledge and in religious thought than the preachers whom they occasionally, though quite seldom, go to hear. And, of the regular attendants and members, how many inly believe what they habitually listen to and pay for? The spirit of the age has penetrated powerfully here, and the work of disintegration in religious belief is going on deeply in the churches. There is a clear and felt incongruity in numberless instances between the inner belief and the outer practice. The Churches have thus become the nursery of marked unveracity and hypocrisy. A state of things more strange and abnormal, I think, never existed than obtains all over the religious world today, certainly the Protestant portion of it. Can it last for long? I trow not.

Col. Ingersoll's writings I see on the book-shelves, and he has a goodly number of readers here as everywhere through the land. An excellent work this prophet of renunciation and honesty is doing in way of stirring people to thought and preparing the road for the Messiahs of broad and universal religion to come. The keen shafts of his wit penetrate armor that would be impervious to all other weapons.

In Denver, they are much exercised at present about their water supply. It is found that the fluid which they drink from the pipes is charged with impurities and poisonous matters. One source of this taint, it is said, is the carcasses of the many cattle that lie along the plains contiguous to the rivers or creeks that furnish the city. The Daily News of Denver has lately affirmed that a thousand cattle lie dead in the vicinity of one of those streams alone. A condition of things so grievous and unendurable will probably soon be remedied. The most stolid can feel the considerations that press for reform here.

The sanitation of cities, the providing of pure water and good sewerage, the repressing of the poisons that come up in the form of sewer-gas, emanations from vaults, cesspools, putrid garbage, etc., are awakening, as they well may, increased attention both in the Old World and the New. I read that in Chicago, of the 10,462 deaths that occurred in that city during the last year, 3,903—37.4 per cent.—resulted from filth and were preventable. Upon no theme at this hour do the people need instruction so much as in those lessons that shall teach them how to live. The multitudes, as Huxley well says, "are perishing through lack of knowledge." Our civilization in respect to the recognition and observance of sanitary laws, has not passed beyond barbarism. Tyndall says of religion in the future, "Its main concern may possibly be to purify, elevate, and brighten the life that now is, instead of treating it as the more or less dismal vestibule of a life that is to come."

Especially will this be the case, as the relation so close and intimate—yes, vitally indissoluble—of physical to spiritual, of seen to unseen and eternal, is more and more clearly recognized and reverently held in honor. C. D. B. M.

IDAHO SPRINGS, COL., May 8.

WE have received several communications in reply to Mr. Wasson's article on the Nihilists and the Assassination of the Czar. But having printed Mr. Holland's brief rejoinder and two other replies, which chance to have been the first received, we think we have done all that fair and free discussion demands on that side of the question at present. It is proper also to state that Mr. Wasson has been confined for the last two or three weeks to a dark room, having undergone an operation on his eyes for the prevention of rapidly growing blindness, and hence has been and is, of course, entirely unable to answer his critics, even if disposed to do so. His critics, we are sure, will join with us in the expression of deep sympathy with him in his affliction and of ardent hope that the painful critical remedy may be wholly successful in averting the dire calamity that has threatened him.

FRANCE has obtained a foothold in Tunis, from which it will not be easy to dislodge her. It would have been more to her honor if she had gained it with less duplicity. But the other great European Powers, though professing to be amazed and shocked, cannot with consistency complain if they have been hoodwinked by French diplomacy. They are all addicted to the same game, when it is to their advantage. In making a treaty with the Bey of Tunis,—a treaty carried by an army to his palace door, by which the Bey and his government come under the Protectorate of France,—the French Government has only followed the footsteps of England in regard to Cyprus. The fashion of doing the thing was a little different, but the secret underhandedness of the action was the same.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

JUDGE TOURGEE is reported to have said that it took him fifteen years to write A Fool's Errand. It was, in other words, for that period, we suppose, in process of incubation.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Woman Suffrage in Italy.

To the Editor of the Free Religious Index:

MY DEAR SIR,—Mlle. Anna Maria Mozzoni, the author of the following remarkable speech delivered before the great Universal Suffrage Convention, held at Rome on the 11th and 12th of February, may be considered to be at the head of the Woman Movement in Italy. She is the president of the Milan Society for the Promotion of Women's Interests (Lega promotrice degli interessi femminili), which sent her as its delegate to the Convention; and she gives all her thought and time to the advancement of the woman movement in her native country. There are two points of especial interest in this speech. That Mlle. Mozzoni succeeded in carrying her resolution in favor of woman suffrage (found at the end of the speech) shows an astonishing progress in the woman's rights cause in Italy. It is difficult for even the most conservative American to imagine the hostility and I may say almost absolute apathy of public opinion on the Continent in regard to the amelioration of the lamentable condition of women. To speak of her education provokes a sneer; to suggest that she be given a fair chance to support herself is ridiculed even by Gambetta, as was the case last January in the French Chamber of Deputies; and to hint at her participation in the suffrage is laughed at as the rave of an idiot. The action, therefore, of this convention of Italian radicals is an important sign of the progress of woman's rights on the Continent. The second observation that I would make is that the speech itself and the delivery of it raise it far above ordinary harangues. As regards the style and substance of the speech, the reader himself may judge. In respect to Mlle. Mozzoni's oratorical powers, I may say that they are extraordinary. I had the pleasure of hearing her speak at the opening session of the International Woman's Rights Congress held at Paris in 1878, and I am not at all surprised that she carried the great Roman Convention with her in spite of opposition and prejudice. Excuse this long preface.

Yours very truly, THEODORE STANTON.

PARIS, March 2, 1881.

The Speech.

Two years ago, the scattered groups of the Italian Democracy united in a single body in order to vanquish the combined forces of the past and to break down the barriers which hold captive our national life and conscience. Many Italian women then believed that, by a logical sequence of ideas, the creative principles of the future would confer liberty on women. They therefore continued to support the aims of the league, supposing that, while working for its success, while aiding in the amelioration of all classes, they, too, were included in its programme of liberty; for, they reasoned, if we do our duty toward men and yet suffer them to ignore our own rights, we are acting the part of slaves.

To-day, the Democratic League comes here in this solemn assembly to claim the full enjoyment of national sovereignty by means of universal suffrage; and the Italian women of the league founded to defend woman's interests—a young but already vigorous association—have sent me to you to remind you of the intimate connection between your interests and ours, to recall to you the alliance, the contract already made by the two leagues, to lay before you our ideas on the question of suffrage, and to consider what may be done for our common good.

Those who have sent me to you think that the present agitation will have no influence or effect, unless it plants itself on the only true and immutable foundation. The right to vote must not be looked upon stoically as only a sovereign right. It is philosophically simply a human right. It is the right which every person has of self-protection. By its means, he is not forced to submit to representation imposed upon him by the choice of others, he does not obey an authority about the establishment of which he has not been consulted, he does not accept laws in the making of which he has had no voice nor act. It is the right which belongs to everybody to be considered and treated as a person, and not as a brute or thing. Now, human right is the only incontestable and universal right, because it is not affected by the deviations and judgments of established opinions, because it is not the result of different and variable conceptions created by historic vicissitudes,—conceptions which, on account of their very origin, have an authority limited by time and place. Human right is not artificially derived from laws extrinsic to civil societies: it springs spontaneously and eternally from the human mind. Hence, it is that Montaigne could say that women would be only doing right in not submitting to the laws and in not obeying any government, because they have no part in either the one or the other, but have always been forced to accept the good or the bad such as you understood it, and to see their interests placed in the hands of those who have never been assured of their confidence. For women live at your sides and in your homes, not as beings with a conscience and mind of their own, not as citizens of the town and the nation, but rather in the condition of domestic animals, in a state of subjection more or less galling according to the degree of kindliness resulting from your individual dignity and politeness.

Digitized by Google

Perhaps there are some among you who think that, because woman has silently submitted to this treatment, therefore she is not dissatisfied with it, and that, consequently, woman until now has considered that she was represented by man bound to her by ties of blood and affection. You had some ground, gentlemen, for this belief, up to the moment when the Declaration of the Rights of Man was promulgated. Since then, however, you gravely err, if you continue to think that you are our proxies and representatives. Such a course, in effect, would be separating from human right civil and political rights which result therefrom and by means of which it is developed and applied. For human right is unique: it means the right which everybody has to be considered a person. It is the same for everybody, and finds expression in everybody by the exercise of the functions belonging to personality, which are the primordial attributes of personality.

Now, women, like you, have interests to defend in the family, in the city, in the State; like you, they have intelligence to comprehend these interests, the desire to perfect and strengthen them; like you, they are capable of making a choice; they are, equally as much as you, persons. Democrats, cite me, from your books, from your principles, from your philosophers, a single proof which establishes and demonstrates the truth of the hypothesis of a diminution of personality in woman. Deduce evidence which authorizes the assertion that the constituent elements of woman produce a diminution of personality, as, for instance, unconsciousness of right, rejection of right, a lack of moral power to do right, alienation, mental weakness. Prove to us that we are not capable of exercising human right, that the condition of perpetual tutelage is more in accord with our natural state. Oh, no, gentlemen, you cannot say so, you do not possess in your party any such argument. To find one, you are forced to turn to that past against which this very movement is directed,—to that past which contradicts your principles, and which even denies your own citizenship. Tell me how you will be able to call yourselves victorious, how you will be able to claim universal suffrage for Italy, when the five hundred thousand of to-day shall have become the two millions of to-morrow;* on what principle, if not on human right, will you be able to rest your demand for the extension of the suffrage, the nation containing twenty-two millions of people, half of whom are excluded from all representation, however indirect it may be? Has a people come together in solemn convention to discuss a temporary amendment, a trifling measure of expediency? To secure these mediocre advantages, are not the assemblies which you already have sufficient,—assemblies which are the expression of partial interests, the guardians of special institutions, connected, in addition, with those departments of government sprung from traditional formulas and rites which together constitute the mechanism of a public administration? What will be the significance of this meeting, if it do not proclaim a philosophic affirmation, a radical assertion, complete and eternal, of human right? When a people comes together to make a solemn protest, it gives expression to such protest by condemning a principle in order to affirm a grander one. It forms an epoch in history, it gives birth to a new era.

Democrats, Proletaries, do not ask to be citizens. There were citizens at Sparta and at Rome, there were citizens at Athens and Jerusalem; and yet there were, on every hand, slaves, serfs, animals in human form. The idea of citizen is a narrow one, limited in history, left in the rear by modern morality and philosophy. The citizen presupposes the non-citizen, just as suzerainty implies at the same time subjection. Receive your inspiration from nature, which creates individuals only; demand to be men, and remember at the same time that humanity is neither constituted nor continued nor represented by you alone. The differences between the two terms which constitute humanity, in respect to the formation of the social pact, render it impossible for one of the two terms to represent the other in this pact without establishing an exclusive predominance of its own interests. Is not the truth of this seen on every hand? In the legal family, man has thought of himself alone; in the dynasty, he has invented the Salic law; in the State, he has considered only the masculine; in marriage, he absorbs our very name and nationality; in the legalization of prostitution, he has had care only for his own welfare; in a word, in his relations with us he has always taken the lion's share. For a century already, woman in all civilized lands has protested against this state of things. She asserts her right to vote, because she is a free and complete person; a means, like man, as regards the continuance of the race; an end in herself, as much as man, in the activity of the conscience. Woman asserts her right because, in every-day life, in national life, she has many and varied relations and interests to protect and impose. Henceforth, she wishes to be a party to the social contract, because she knows that in society she is a necessary and constitutive element, because she there performs both an active and passive part. She desires to vote, because, conscious of her right, she would enjoy it, because she wishes to be free in the choice of her representatives, because the past and the present have taught her, by cruel and oft-repeated lessons, that the absent always is and must always be forgotten and sacrificed.

Some here may perhaps think that woman's voice has been raised unseasonably within these walls, that it has detracted from the majesty and the dignity of this grand manifestation of the people, so deeply rooted is the theory of privilege in those who rise up eager to combat it, when they feel the yoke about their own necks. If there be those here who think thus, let them be calm and quiet. If it is no new thing in history to see the disinherited claim their rights; it is new and glorious in men to know how to listen to the prayers of the disinherited, whoever they may be, and to treat them fairly; and it is with supreme pride that I recognize in the Italian Democracy this noble virtue. The first in Europe, it has raised itself above a prejudice as old as the world.

Let Democracy be convinced that it shall have gained the final victory, when it accepts all the consequences of the principles which are at once its force and its prestige. Then, only, will it be able to proclaim the defeat of the past; then it will have put a period to the era of violence and privilege, sealed the history of theocracies, dynasties, hostility between classes, and definitively inaugurated the history of humanity. In proclaiming universal suffrage for yourselves alone, you enlarge privilege; in proclaiming it with us, you destroy privilege; alone, you obtain an advantage; with us, you gain a decisive victory; in demanding the vote for you, you better the present; in demanding it for us, you establish the future; in proclaiming the citizen and the sovereign, you confirm the Helot and the subject; in proclaiming the human being, you affirm equality. Without us, you are a party; with us, you are the family, you are the nation, you are humanity.

*Mlle. Mozzoni refers to the proposition of the present Italian ministry to enlarge the suffrage, but not to render it universal.

The Resolution.

This Convention, recognizing in the right to vote a human right, believing that humanity is constituted and represented by man and by woman, considering that it is impossible to resolve the social question if the condition of exclusion, minority, and absence in which half of humanity is held is not brought to an end,—in accord with these principles and in consideration of justice, which is dear to all, recognizes, affirms, and proclaims, as well for woman as for man, the full right to vote.

This resolution was carried by a large majority.

THE first man was duped; the first woman deceived her husband; and the first child turned out a murderer. Such were the originals of humanity, according to the Scriptures; and yet people affect to be surprised that the world is no better than it is.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

ON

"Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion."

BY KATE GANNETT WELLS.

II.

Freedom.

[NOTE.—The following lessons are not intended as question and answer for teacher and scholar, but simply as a basis for conversation, in which the teacher would expand or condense, deepen, or simplify the meanings here implied, according to the requirements of a class. Each lesson could thus occupy one or several Sundays.]

Freedom.—How many kinds are there? Four, ecclesiastical and political (that of the Church and the State), intellectual and moral (that of the individual). Give instances from history, of struggles to obtain each, e.g.: 1. The burning of Servetus, story of the Albigenses, the Puritans, and the Quakers; 2. The rise of the American Republic, contests of the Greeks and Spartans; 3. The insistence of Galileo that the earth moved round the sun; 4. Widow-burning among the Hindus, prohibition of theatres and dancing.

NOTE.—Let the children become aroused by the teacher's statements into an enthusiastic though indefinite appreciation of freedom. Ask each child to bring on the following Sunday some motto, poem, or maxim concerning Freedom.

To whom is freedom important? To one's self, the Church and the State, and the demands of the three often conflict. Only one's very best self can ever be the judge between them. (But now we will leave aside freedom of the State to think about freedom merely in relation to ourselves and the Church.)

Has the history of the Church been one of freedom? No: there has been and still is a constant struggle to obtain free individual expression,—e.g., Protestantism against Catholicism, Methodism against Episcopacy, the Free Religious Association against too prescribed dogma in even liberal churches.

NOTE.—The child will then feel that there is an historic continuity in the enlarging demands of freedom upon the Church.

What events and persons may we call the six prophets of freedom? 1. The printing-press; 2. The invention of steam as applied to railroads and navigation; 3. Luther; 4. Lessing; 5. Channing; 6. Parker.

NOTE.—Ask the scholars to show why in each case.

What are the steps of thought that lead to freedom? 1. CREDULITY, exemplified by fetichism and the little child's ready acceptance of the marvellous; 2. INQUIRY, exemplified by the constant reaction of scientific discovery upon church authority, and by the older child's "what for and why." 3. FAITH, exemplified by the Mystics, and by the Catholic and High Church dogma of mystery; 4. REASON, exemplified by the reverential attitude of many scientists, by Unitarianism and Free Religion.

Why is freedom needed by the individual or the Church? Because history shows that it has always been a factor of progress; and our consciousness, that it is a desire of the human soul and mind: it is both a need of the intuition and of aggregated experiences.

NOTE.—Make the children work this out for themselves from their own lives: how, having had their own way once, they wanted it again; and, because they felt free to exert themselves, they wanted to make the most they could of the exertion (e.g., success in gymnastic feats). Just so with grown-up people and races: opportunity for power often creates ability. Therefore, the individual wants it, because without it he will become narrow in mind and heart: the Church needs it, because without it, as an underlying principle, no growth is possible.

State another use of freedom for the individual. It enables one to rely upon one's self, to form his own opinions, to be independent, if need be, of others' sympathy and approval, to be courageous in action, to befriend the weak, to take the unpopular (if true) side.

What is the child's notion of freedom? Having his own way, making other people mind him, riding the bycycle as long as the boy pleases, or having as many new dresses as the girl wants, or reading whatever books and choosing whatever companions each likes.

Are not children who have their own way slaves to themselves? Which is harder to mind,—your parents, or to mind all the hundred whims and fancies that boys and girls have? Are you contented when you have got your own way? Don't you always want something else? Is a fussy, particular child a free child? Is not he a terror and a bother to every one? Don't you know children who have only one way of doing things, who must always sit in their own chair, have a special place at table, have their hair brushed just to suit them? "Can't a fellow do as he pleases with his own head?" said a boy whose hair was all on end. Unless such children can have all they want and just as they want, they make some households their servants and they are the slaves of themselves. This is tyranny of one's self.

Digitized by Google

Is having one's own way, then, necessary to happiness or activity? No; for our obligations to others often force us to do what we do not like, because of a greater good to be accomplished by temporarily yielding our will. Circumstances like sickness, poverty, and little ability, constantly restrain us in action; but, if our thought is clear to ourselves and fair to others, we can grow deeper, bigger, and more peaceful in our inward life, and, therefore, more effective in what little activity we can exercise. The inward state shines through outward limitations.

Then having one's own way is not freedom? No: it is not. To know this is to make a useful and grand discovery, and each one has to make it as he grows older.

Cannot a child even think as he pleases? Cannot every one? Every one can and every grown-up person ought to, if he knows why and what he thinks. A child must learn to think, and in learning must ask the reason why of things a great many times; must not think because he knows a little or is quite smart that he can understand any and everything. He can think very positively that it is wrong to lie and steal, even if older people do it; but, in matters of opinion, he must learn to wait before he is sure he is right.

Is clear thought then necessary to freedom? Yes; because, without it, it might seem freedom to accept one's own caprices as necessities or to follow the extravagant and foolish half-thoughts of others.

What is freedom for the grown-up man or woman? It is having power in one's self to choose only the right; i.e., one is bound by no prejudices or evil habits to choose the wrong.

What is freedom for the Church? It is recognition of the differences and likenesses of people. Because of the differences in thought, it has no fixed creed which every one must sign; because of the likenesses, it has a common meeting-place where a good life and the need of human sympathy are recognized as necessities and as helps in working together, especially for others' spiritual welfare and for one's own.

Is more stress, then, laid upon freedom in thought than in action? Yes: because, as we are all connected together, none can ever be wholly free to do just as he pleases; but he can think as he chooses, a right long denied and often still denied, while in action the value of deed over creed is constantly felt.

What is necessary, then, for freedom?
Knowledge how to choose.

NOTE.—Point out the difference between good and bad habits: the first are safe-guards, enlarging opportunities for usefulness; the latter, iron chains, making one a slave to fresh evils.

How will knowledge come? By cultivating a spirit of inquiry and of reverence. The two must go together. Keep one's eyes open. Understand all you see. Children see, but don't stop to understand, so get wrong notions.

Then freedom cannot come all at once? No, never: the more one knows, the freer is one and the more bound also to choose only the right, as with the extension of knowledge comes also the necessity for right choice.

What is, after all, of most importance for the individual? "Perception of the best," to have power, self-control, will, to be free by acting or not acting as moral principle shall dictate, and to think this or that, as wisdom shall approve. In other words, freedom for the individual is an acquisition, an acquired habit of the mind.

If we have freedom in both mind and act, how should we use it? In action, with great tenderness toward others; in thought, with reverence for the unseen, and with deference for others' faiths,—which brings us to the meaning of the second grand word, Fellowship. Has not freedom a deep and continuous meaning from its historical memories through Church and State down into our own lives?

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

FOREIGN.

THE Trappists of Verrey (Moselle) have taken a ninety-nine years' lease of the Isle of Herm, off Guernsey, and are already installed there.

IT is proposed to erect a church in the town of Blantyre as a memorial to Dr. Livingstone. Blantyre is the birthplace of the great explorer.

ORDERS have been given by the Hellenic Minister of War for the young men of Greek nationality, at present studying at Geneva, to return home in order to join the army.

DISGRACEFUL anti-Jewish riots have occurred in Russia. At Elizabethgrad, two hundred Jews were injured; and there was a large destruction of property, including the synagogue.

THE English Mansion House fund for the relief of the sufferers by the earthquake at Chios amounts to about £12,000, of which nearly all has been already remitted to the relief of the sufferers.

THE proposal to hold an International Socialist Congress at Zürich is, it is stated, giving rise to considerable dissatisfaction, and a memorial has been prepared at Zürich, requesting the Federal Council to prohibit the holding of the Congress.

AT an examination of the scholars in the English public school at Nicosia, the High Commissioner of Cyprus expressed his great satisfaction at the rapid progress they had made in so short a time, and remarked that the pupils displayed a very marked aptitude for learning the English language.—Malta Times.

SHAKSPEARE'S birthday was very generally celebrated by banquets and other observances this year in England. At Stratford-on-Avon, two of Shakspeare's plays were performed, "Much Ado about Nothing" in the afternoon and "Twelfth Night" in the evening. Both performances were attended by crowded audiences.

ABOLITION OF FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—By the new Army and Discipline Regulation Act, which has just been printed, flogging is abolished for a year. The new law will take effect from the 30th inst. in the United Kingdom, in the Channel Islands, and Isle of Man; elsewhere in Europe inclusive of Malta, also in the West Indies and America, on July 31, next; and elsewhere, whether within or without her Majesty's dominions, on December 31.—Lloyd's Weekly, May 1.

THE Czas of Cracow announces that the Nihilists had laid a plot to abduct the son of the reigning Czar, the heir apparent to the Russian throne, but that owing to an indiscretion the plot failed. The intention was to hold the prince as hostage for three weeks, and only to surrender him then on condition of a constitution being framed. Should no such concession have been promised, the prince would have been condemned to death by decree of the Nihilist committee, and his head would have been sent to his parents.

LORD BEACONSFIELD has left a very small amount of money. Hughenden was purchased for him by a friend; and he paid this friend interest on the purchase-money, so that it was only his nominally. When Mrs. Brydges Willyams left him £40,000, most of this was absorbed by the payment of debts. He had bought and furnished his house in Curzon Street with the money paid to him for Endymion. Considering the opportunities that he had to enrich himself, had he so pleased, the comparative poverty in which he died is as honorable to him as it was to Pitt.

A GREAT number of "roughs" followed the procession of the Salvation Army in London on a recent Sunday. This was due to the appearance of the leading officers in uniform, part of which is a rifleman's shako inscribed "Blood and Fire," the collar of the coat being embroidered with the letter "S," symbolizing salvation, or saved. The mob who accompanied the army numbered nearly a thousand, and, it is stated, "joined uproariously in the hymn, 'The devil and me we can't agree,' at the same time hustling and assaulting respectable people in the street." The various meeting-places were, as the "army" halted, immediately filled; and "howls, shrieks, and prayers were strangely intermingled."

M. EMILE DE GIRARDIN died on Wednesday, April 28. He was born in Switzerland in 1802, and published his first literary production, Emile, in 1827. In 1834 he obtained a seat in the Chambers of Deputies, and in 1836 he established La Presse, which afterwards became so celebrated throughout Europe. He took an active part in the Revolution of 1848, and left France after the coup d'état of December, 1851, but afterwards returned and resumed the publication of his paper. He afterwards sold La Presse, and subsequently at various times established or became connected with a number of newspapers, the best known of which were La Liberté and La France. He was also the author of a large number of political pamphlets, and had written one or two pieces for the stage.

MR. BRADLAUGH has not only done good work by forcing the bigots to acknowledge the real grounds of their opposition. He has also rendered a public service by inducing the Government to take up his cause. No fault can be found with Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright, both of them as devout in religion as they are zealous in politics, for wishing that Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed to take his seat without the angry debates and other disturbance of public business which are now inevitable. But the Government will take higher ground by passing the bill which is to be brought forward as soon as possible. That bill is certain to meet with fierce opposition, and will yield the Tory obstructives a fine opportunity of delaying business; but a great many Liberals who voted with the Tories, or abstained from voting, will have no excuse for refusing to support it, and therefore it is sure to pass. At that prospect, we may rejoice.—Weekly Despatch, May 1.

ABBOTSFORD TO LET.—Among the pleasant homes and haunts which are advertised as "to be let" just now is Abbotsford, the favorite residence of Sir Walter Scott, on the banks of the Tweed. It has been so often and so fully described, both by the "Wizard of the North," who built it, and by other hands, that we will only mention that the poet's library, study, hall, and armory stand very much in the same state as when their first owner—and the creator of the house—was alive; and that the gardens and grounds are exceedingly beautiful, with terraces and broad gravel walks, along which Sir Walter used to stride up and down in meditative mood, accompanied by his favorite deerhound. His great-grandchild in the female line,—for his male descendants are extinct,—the present owner of the estate, married a Maxwell, a son of the noble house of Herries; and Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell-Scott, as they now style themselves, offer to let the house, furnished, for six months, or else either for one or for three years. With it is to be had a mile or two of fishing in the Tweed and shooting over about two thousand acres.—Land.

JESTINGS.

SOLOMON was the first man who wanted to part the heir in the middle.

"I THINK the goose has the advantage of you," said a landlady to an inexpert boarder, who was carving. "Guess it has, mum, in age," was the withering retort.

THERE is no better bon-mot in literature than the reply of a girl who heard her father criticised severely across a dinner-table. The careless critic paused a moment to say, "I hope he is no relative of yours, Miss L——," and quick as thought she replied, with the utmost nonchalance, "Only a connection of my mother's by marriage."

A NEW ENGLAND pastor called upon one of his deacons, with whom he was at variance, and, with an air of great solemnity, said: "Brother, it is a shame that this quarrel of ours should bring scandal upon the church. I have prayed earnestly for guidance in the matter, and have come to the conclusion that you must give in, for I cannot."

"MA," said a Cass Avenue urchin with dirt-covered knuckles and a pocket full of marbles, "is it wicked to play marbles for keeps?" "Yes, my son; and you must never do it." "Is it wicked when you lose all the time?" "Yes, just the same." "Is it wicked if you win all the time, and play with a boy who says his mother says if she had your feet she'd never go out except after dark?" "I—I—go and wash your hands and get ready for supper!" was the sharp reply, and the lad continued to play for keeps.—Detroit Free Press.

Digitized by Google

THE way they start a railway train in Germany is thus described: When all is ready, a bell rings. Then another bell rings. Then the engine whistles, or, rather, she toot-toot-toots generally. Then the conductor tells the station-master that all is ready. Then the station-master looks placidly around and says, "So?" Then the conductor shouts, "Fertig?" interrogatively. Then the station-master shouts, "Fertig!" positively. Then the conductor blows a horn; the engine whistles; the bell rings; the other bell rings; the station-master says, "So?" the passengers swear in various tongues; and the train starts. That is, unless a belated fat man comes. Then they do it all over again.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

On the 1st of July, 1880, the Free Religious Association assumed the publication of the Free Religious Index. This responsibility was undertaken without the funds necessary for the enterprise, but in the trust that the appeal for means, sent out a few weeks previous, would bring a sufficient response to insure the publication for at least a year. That trust has been justified. Somewhat more than $2,100 has been received; and this sum, in addition to the regular receipts from the Index, will be nearly or quite sufficient to insure the publication till July. In this year of experiment there has been, moreover, an increase in the subscription list of the paper,—an increase sufficiently encouraging to justify the continuance of the Index under the auspices of the Association.

But the Index is not financially self-sustaining; nor without an unprecedented sudden increase in its subscription list is it likely to become so at a very early day on its present business basis. In a careful consideration of ways and means for continuing the publication, the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association have resolved to make an effort to raise at once the sum of $10,000; and the undersigned have been appointed a committee to carry this resolution into effect. This sum, if raised, would certainly insure the continuance of the paper on its present financial basis for a number of years; but it is believed by some of our most competent advisers that in the course of two or three years, by a judicious use of this sum, under energetic management the paper may be made pecuniarily self-supporting.

The committee, a few months ago, privately invited a conference of a few friends of the Index in Boston, at which this and other plans were freely discussed. The plan above proposed was met by most cordial and encouraging approval, not only in words, but in substantial deeds for carrying it into effect. Among the sixteen persons present, subscriptions were made to the amount of $2,300. This has since been increased by the addition of other names to $4,145. And to this it is proposed to add the legacy of $1,000 left by Mrs. Lydia Maria Child unconditionally to the Free Religious Association for the spread of its principles. Her expressed interest in the Index has led the committee to believe that this disposition of her bequest would fully meet her approval. Putting Mrs. Child's bequest at the head of the list, we have already $5,145 pledged, and most of it paid into the treasury.

With this auspicious beginning, it should not be a difficult task to raise the balance from the friends of the Free Religious Association and of the Index throughout the country. But, in order to do it, there must be a considerable number of responses in large sums, corresponding to some of those already on the list. Will not those of our friends who have large means measure the extent of their obligation thereby? But let not those of smaller means feel excluded from the opportunity. If all who believe in the Index do what they can, the fund will be raised; and we hope it may be raised speedily.

Pledges or cash subscriptions may be sent to the "FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION," 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston; but all checks or money-orders should be made payable to the order of John C. Haynes, Treasurer.

(Signed) R. P. HALLOWELL, JOHN C. HAYNES, HANNAH E. STEVENSON, EDNAH D. CHENEY, WM. J. POTTER, } Committee.

Subscriptions to Special Index Fund.

Lydia Maria Child's Legacy, devoted to this object by vote of Executive Committee of Free Religious Association	$1,000.00
Mrs. Sarah S. Russell	500.00
Mrs. E. N. Hallowell	100.00
Miss Hannah E. Stevenson	100.00
John L. Whiting	200.00
Cornelius Wellington	100.00
Mrs. Charles Fairchild	120.00
Miss Emma D. Ireson	100.00
Miss Julia A. Ireson	100.00
Miss Kate C. Ireson	200.00
Miss Helen M. Ireson	100.00
Mrs. Benjamin Ireson	100.00
Miss Matilda Goddard	100.00
Mrs. Anna D. Hallowell	100.00
John C. Haynes	100.00
Charles Nash	500.00
Mrs. Charles P. Curtis	25.00
John M. Forbes	500.00
Henry L. Higginson	200.00
Matthew Luce	100.00
E. R. Knapp	100.00
Henry S. Russell	100.00
J. Malcolm Forbes	100.00
Henry W. Wellington	100.00
	$5,145.00

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

HIGGINSON'S WORKS.

"Mr. Higginson's own style is, after Hawthorne's, the best which America has yet produced. He possesses simplicity, directness, and grace. His stories are pleasant, his pictures of children and his talk about them are almost pathetic in their tenderness; but in his descriptions of nature he is without a rival."

Army Life in a Black Regiment $1.50
Atlantic Essays 1.50
Oldport Days. With 10 Heliotype Illustrations .. 2.00
Malbone. An Oldport Romance 1.50
Outdoor Papers 1.50
Short Studies of American Authors. "Little Classic" size ..... 75c.
Young Folks' Book of American Explorers. Illustrated 1.50
Young Folks' History of the United States. Illustrated 1.50

"Mr. Higginson was well qualified to write such works. He has long been occupied with studies in American History; and he is a genial, painstaking, accurate, and picturesque writer, with a conception of the work he had to do."—Springfield Republican.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, seve[illegible]-which have attracted so great atte[illegible]n now be furnished by the Free Reli[illegible]ociation.

No. 1.—Truths for the [illegible] by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fi[illegible]nations" and "Modern Principles." [illegible]ecially has received great comm[illegible] from most distinguished men fo[illegible]gical clearness of its statements. [illegible]ion. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2—Fear of the Living God, by J. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

UNMOUNTED PHOTOGRAPHS

Of ANCIENT and MODERN WORKS of ART, embracing reproductions of fa[illegible]us original paintings, sculpture, architectural subjects, etc. Price, cabinet size, $1.50 per dozen. Send stamp for catalogue of 1,600 subjects. JOHN P. SOULE, publisher, 338 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the

REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

As made by the most eminent scholars of England and America. Half the price of Corresponding English Edition. Large type, linen super-calendered paper, elegant binding. A separate "Comprehensive History of the Bible and its Translations," including a full account of the New Revision, given to subscribers. Best chance for agents ever offered. Send stamp for particulars at once.

The Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES	10c
SKULLS	10
GHOSTS	10
HELL	10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD	10
GODS	10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT	10
HUMAN RIGHTS	10
HEREAFTER	10
TOM PAINE	10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at $3 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli } SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✣ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 596.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 48.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, MAY 26, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

NOR Aught nor Naught existed: yon bright sky
Was not, nor heaven's broad woof outstretched above.
What covered all? what sheltered? what concealed?
Was it the water's fathomless abyss?
There was not death, yet was there naught immortal;
There was no confine betwixt day and night;
The only One breathed breathless by itself,
Other than It there nothing since has been.
Darkness there was, and all at first was veiled
In gloom profound, an ocean without light.
The germ that still lay covered in the husk
Burst forth, one nature, from the fervent heat.
Then first came love upon it, the new spring
Of mind,—yea, poets in their hearts discerned,
Pondering, this bond between created things
And uncreated. Comes this spark from earth
Piercing and all-pervading, or from heaven?
Then seeds were sown, and mighty powers arose,
Nature below, and power and will above.
Who knows the secret? who proclaimed it here,
Whence, whence this manifold creation sprang?
The gods themselves came later into being.
Who knows from whence this great creation sprang?
He from whom all this great creation came,
Whether his will created or was mute,
The Most High Seer that is in highest heaven,
He knows it, or perchance even He knows not.

—Ancient Vedic Hymn.

GREATEST of the gods, God with many names, God ever-ruling and ruling all things!
Zeus, origin of nature, governing the universe by law,
All hail! . . . . .
Thou rulest in the common reason which goes through all,
And appears in all things, great and small,
Which, filling all nature, is king of all existences.
Nor without thee, O Deity, does anything happen in the world,
From the ethereal pole to the great ocean,
Except only the evil prepared by the senseless wicked.
But thou also art able to bring to order that which is chaotic,
Giving form to that which is formless, and making the discordant friendly;
So reducing all variety to unity, and even making good out of evil.
Thus through all nature is one great law,
Which only the wicked seek to disobey,
Poor fools! who long for happiness,
But will not see nor hear the divine commands.

—Cleanthes (Grecian).

IN its sublime research, philosophy
May measure out the ocean deep, may count
The sands or the sun's rays; but, God! for thee
There is no weight nor measure: none can mount
Up to thy mysteries. Reason's brightest spark,
Though kindled by thy light, in vain would try
To trace thy counsels, infinite and dark;
And thought is lost ere thought can soar so high,
Even like past moments in eternity.
What are ten thousand worlds compared to thee?
And what am I, then? Heaven's unnumbered host,
Though multiplied by myriads, and arrayed
In all the glory of sublimest thought,
Is but an atom in the balance, weighed Against thy greatness; is a cipher brought Against infinity! Oh, what am I, then? Nought!
Nought! Yet the effluence of thy light divine,
Pervading worlds, hath reached my bosom too;
Yes! in my spirit doth thy spirit shine,
As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew.
Nought! Yet I live, and on hope's pinions fly
Eager toward thy presence; for in thee
I live and breathe and dwell; aspiring high,
Even to the throne of thy divinity.
I am, O God! and surely thou must be!

—Derzhavin (Russian).

CURRENT TOPICS.

A PORTION of the Brahmo Somaj in India are constantly approaching nearer to Christian beliefs and usages, though not taking the Christian name. They have now adopted the "communion service." But their native temperance principles rebel against the wine, and hence they have adopted the, to them, more natural elements of rice and water for celebrating the rite. We commend this amendment to Christian churches.

AMONG the violent utterances in the New York pulpits against Colonel Ingersoll's recent lecture in that city, none exceeded the Methodist Rev. Dr. Newman's harangue. He exclaimed, with more passion than logic: "Governments punish treason, and such a thing as that Sunday evening lecture was treason to God and to humanity. It is war upon private virtue and public morality. It voices the sentiments of those who would abolish your Sabbath, burn your Bible, destroy your churches, exile your pastors, cut the marriage tie, and throw wide open the portals of hell. The laws of the land should prevent such assemblages, and prohibit such utterances." When it comes to that, the law of the land may be invoked to prevent such slanderous and incendiary utterances as these of Dr. Newman.

A RECENT decision of the United States Supreme Court shows the progress of events since the same court gave judgment in the Dred Scott case. A colored man, convicted of a capital crime in Delaware, was sentenced to death by the State court. His counsel moved that the sentence be set aside and a new trial be granted, on the ground that colored men had been improperly and illegally excluded from the jury. This motion was denied by the State court. Then, by a writ of error, the case was taken from the State courts to the Supreme Court of the United States. The latter court has now decided that the judgment of the State courts was invalid, that colored men had been illegally excluded from the panels of jurors, and that the case should be remanded back to the Delaware tribunals, to be tried according to the new laws passed since the war, forbidding that any citizen should be excluded from a jury "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

THE Christian Union closes a notice of Mr. M. J. Savage's book on Belief in God thus: "It is to be said that these discourses are never dull. They are bright, racy, and aptly illustrated to suit their purpose. It is difficult to see how any congregation can find enough in them to satisfy the hunger of their spiritual natures; but nobody is left in doubt as to what Mr. Savage thinks of the great truths which have fed and fired the souls of such men as Livingstone and Alexander Duff, or of the Church from which he went out because he was not of it." With reference to the difficulty of any congregation finding enough in such discourses to satisfy spiritual hunger, the reply may be made that it is a constantly recurring perplexity to many persons of liberal religious views, when they go to orthodox churches, how it is possible that a congregation can be satisfied, intellectually or spiritually, with the viands there provided. There are evidently differences even of religious appetite. A correspondent in another column tells enthusiastically how this same book has satisfied him.

WE have given from time to time foreign paragraphs with regard to the Fletchers, the professional Spiritualistic mediums, who have been arrested and condemned under English law for obtaining property under false pretences. Some of the Spiritualist journals are disposed to stand by these proved frauds as martyrs. The Religio-Philosophical Journal, however, is very outspoken in their condemnation, and adds, so as to prevent any mistake of its position: "Despicable as were the acts of the Fletchers, they are far surpassed by the shamefaced course of some of our contemporaries in endeavoring to screen these adventurers from public condemnation and righteous punishment. We reluctantly give much space to the lamentable case this week, but we do not propose to see without protest the great majority of English-speaking Spiritualists misrepresented by Spiritualist papers whose course is only explicable by one of three words,— Venality, Credulity, Idiocy. When it becomes necessary for the Journal to cater to the prejudices of fanatics, fools, or frauds, by espousing the cause of such an unprincipled creature as Susan Willis Fletcher, in order to live, we shall close up business and turn to some occupation compatible with self-respect and decency."

SOME visitors in attendance at the St. Louis Unitarian Conference were inspecting a mission chapel, which is supported by the Church of the Messiah, and is under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Bowser, a recent graduate of the Cambridge Divinity School. One of the number pointed to a large motto over the pulpit, a relic of the Easter exercises, expressing the dogma, "Christ, the Lord, is risen to-day," and said: "This chapel taught on Easter Sunday that Jesus rose physically from the dead. The minister of another Unitarian society, the services of which I attended on that day, stated with emphasis that Jesus did not rise from the dead. Mr. Forbush, of Detroit, I infer from a brief newspaper report, doubted or denied the resurrection of Jesus. Mr. Jones, the Western Secretary of the Unitarians, in an editorial in Unity, positively denies that Jesus arose. Mr. Barrows, in the Christian Register, neither denies nor affirms, but in his Easter editorial candidly skips the main point, and leaves his readers in ignorance of what he believes. And the Free Religious Index, many of whose writers and readers are Unitarians, copies a New Testament account of the resurrection, under the heading, 'Refuge of Superstition.' No wonder that the Orthodox Church is puzzled whenever it tries to answer the question, What do Unitarians believe?"

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

FACTS ABOUT HEGEL.

BY FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND.

The journal of Speculative Philosophy and the Concord School are making Hegel's system so prominent in America, that it is interesting to see how it has fared in Europe, and especially in Germany where it is best understood.

The Revue Philosophique for last February, in an account of the German universities, says that Hegelianism is now defended there only by a few old men, none of whom make it the principal subject of their teachings. A recent volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica states that "Hegelianism has now ceased to exist as an isolated system in Germany. In England, . . . few, if any, profess to hold the system in its integrity. Professor Vera, of Naples, is, perhaps, its most enthusiastic admirer on the continent." Another standard authority, La Nouvelle Biographie Générale, said in 1861 that even then this theory had lost its disciples and belonged only to history. Hase's Church History represents it as almost discarded in Prussia as early as 1855, and unable to sustain itself after the rulers withdrew their patronage. Seelye's translation of Schwegler's History of Philosophy declares that Hegel's theories have been completely rejected by the scientific world, and that his authority was almost wholly destroyed within thirty years of his death, which took place in 1831. The Nation was not far out of the way, last October, in saying that not a single Hegelian has lectured in Germany since the death of Rosenkranz, June 15, 1879, nor the Revue des Deux Mondes in exclaiming (Feb. 15, 1861): "There are no more Hegelians. The bubble burst long ago!" And Foucher de Careil says: "Deep night has suddenly followed a most brilliant day. The statue of the great man is forever broken. The altar of the god is overthrown, and its fragments are scattered abroad."

How certain it is that America will follow Germany in rejecting Hegel, as she has done in admiring him, will be seen by looking at the causes of his fall.

In the first place, his own disciples admit that he has said and done what must make him more and more unpopular everywhere, and most so in the United States. He was German by birth and a professor at Jena, when the battle was fought there in which Napoleon subdued Germany. The day before this national misfortune, Hegel wrote to a friend:—

"I saw the emperor ride through the city, this world-soul, this extraordinary man, whom it is impossible not to admire. As I did earlier, now everybody wishes the French success, which cannot fail them."

During the great rising of Germany for national independence, when Fichte won such glory, Hegel kept on the side of the French. Rosenkranz, from whose life of his master I am translating, admits that Hegel's admiration of Napoleon made him unpatriotic. He was then principal of the high school at Nuremberg. His pupils formed a society for writing essays in German on their own subjects, which they also intended to discuss; but Hegel suspected that politics would be introduced, so he advised the boys to drop their society and read Homer with him instead. The Homer class was formed accordingly, but kept up without interest; and the patriotic society went on surreptitiously in the tavern.

All this devotion to Napoleon did not hinder Hegel's becoming enthusiastic for hereditary monarchy and hereditary nobility, as soon as Fortune brought these institutions to the top of her wheel. In 1815, he publicly took part with the despotic king of Würtemberg, who was in a quarrel with his people about their constitution. He went to Prussia just in time to join the reactionists in repressing liberty; and we read that he found himself so comfortable there that he ceased to care for a constitutional government, and came to seek the salvation of the nation in an absolute monarchy, without representation of the people, liberty of the press, annual statements of finances, or other publicity. Might as might became his idol, and his politics grew ever more conservative. The people seemed to him an uncertain mob of atoms; and he thought it wrong for the legislature to control the levy of taxes, so as to restrict the head of the government. Election of representatives he considered as only the chance work of folly, and democratic tendencies he opposed. Not quite without reason did all those who looked forward to a future for Prussia turn away from Hegel, as a man whose politics were too narrow and too dependent. Indeed, he was so keenly criticised in the Halle Literary Gazette, for his attacks on leading liberals, that he had to ask protection from the ministry, who offered to suppress the sheet. The abolition of the rotten-boroughs in England he publicly lamented, as likely to make parliament too strong and the crown too weak, and so bring divers calamities, which have not come. Indeed, this reform, together with the revolution which established the constitutional monarchy of Louis Philippe instead of the despotism of Charles X., shocked Hegel so much as to have apparently hastened his death. (Hegel's Leben, pp. 130, 229, 251, 335–337, 413–418, etc.)

Stirling, who like Rosenkranz is a devoted Hegelian, admits that his master did himself vast injustice in playing into the hands of the aristocratic reaction, and exclaims, "Hegel, the stanch bull-dog of Prussian pig-headedness and pride, that honored his inferior blood when it employed his talent, this is a position of all possible the most preposterous and pitiable!" So speaks the Secret of Hegel (vol. ii., p. 492), which work also tells us (vol. i., p. 275) how its hero "was exhibiting the most fervid zeal for Schelling, and demonstrating with an air of perfect conviction the advance which Schelling's position constituted, . . . at the very moment he had in his desk the first sketch of his own system," of which, according to Rosenkranz, he then stated the foundation, and for which he undoubtedly expected a speedy victory over that of his early friend and benefactor. "It lay in the nature of the Hegelian iron then," adds Stirling, "to kick out of sight the ladders of his rise, to provide for self." Such iron I call base metal.

Hegel's favorite system of government, according to Rosenkranz, was that of despotic power resting on differences in rank, and at least three classes in society seemed to him permanently necessary. Theoretically, he admired a constitutional monarchy; but the supreme power was to be held by the monarch, and the power of the prince form the pervading unity. Among his plainest utterances are these: "Only in case of simple, uncorrupted ethical principles, and in states of small territorial extent, can a democracy exist and flourish. The state must be independent of the will of the individual." Hegelians admit that this is inconsistent with our American principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. This fact, as well as the dislike shown by Hegel to the freedom of the press, in his Philosophie des Rechts section 319, where he would have attacks on the prince and his officials punished as crimes, is particularly important, because as the ablest advocate in America of Hegelianism, Professor Harris, justly says, "The depth of a system of thought has an infallible test in the manner it disposes of institutions." Among other fruits by which we may judge Hegel's tree are his defence of the death penalty, and his declarations that punishment should not be directed toward reforming the criminal, but toward taking vengeance on him in behalf of the state, that the husband should be the head of the family, that the sphere of woman is piety, that women are not made for the higher branches of learning, for philosophy, or for high art, that men are to women what animals are to plants, that female rule brings danger to the state, and that the development of girls should be unconscious, through life not study. Hegel knew history so well that he would not have ignored the success of Hypatia, Queen Elizabeth, and many other women, if he had not been driven to it by his philosophy. No result of this system, however, gives us a better test of its real nature than Hegel's declaration: "In general, religion and the state are one and the same. They are in and for themselves identical. The nation that has a wrong idea of God has also a wrong state, wrong government, wrong laws." Shortly before his death, he publicly denounced, as an accursed error, the idea that a state could be firmly founded except on the right belief, his meaning of which may be judged from his defending the doctrine of the Trinity with peculiar zeal, calling justification by faith alone the Magna Charta, and praising the union between Lutherans and Calvinists, 1822, as the ultimate expression of his country's religious development.

Farther proof of the incompetency of Hegel's system to guide us to truth may be found in his rejection of the plainest facts in science.

He actually devotes a dozen pages of his Encyclopædia to defending a wholly fanciful view, which, as he acknowledges, was even then universally condemned as too childish for mention by any chemist, or indeed any educated man. He does his best to revive the obsolete doctrine of the four elements, earth, air, water, and fire, which was taught by Empedocles two thousand years before, and had been refuted again and again in the intervening centuries. Two of the actual elements, sulphur and mercury, had been known for a thousand years; and the number had recently become so great that Hegel finds himself unable to bring them into any order. The facts are too stubborn even for him; so he goes off into fancies, such as that air is passive light and potential fire. This last error he defends for the reason that heat, great enough to inflame tinder, is produced by compressing air; but so it is by rubbing two sticks together or striking a match. He has no more right to call air potential fire than he has to call dry sticks or lucifer matches so. He also imagines that water is the essence of comets, while fire is a form of the lunar principle,—a curious fancy, in view of the fact that moonlight is singularly destitute of heat. His representation of fire and water, as the elements of opposition, receives great light from the flame into which potassium bursts on being dropped into water. Earth he calls the element of individuality, though everybody knows that it is only a compound. So also are air and water; but Hegel will not admit this, and spends several pages more in arguing against the fact, even then well known, that water is composed of hydrogen and oxygen, and in maintaining that rain is caused by the transformation of air into water.

Astronomy he treated as recklessly as chemistry. Scarcely had he brought his system into shape, when he wrote his essay on Planetary Orbits, where he declared, on the authority of Plato and Pythagoras, that astronomers had no right to expect to find any planet, where they had been looking for one, between Mars and Jupiter. This essay Hegel delivered publicly in August, 1801, without making any mention of the fact that Ceres had been discovered seven months before, as he could easily have learned if he had cared enough about the truth to make inquiries. More than two hundred of these asteroids, which were not dreamt of in his philosophy, have been found already. About equal in scientific value to Hegel's planetary theory is his assertion that "thought must deny itself such nebulous and sensuous conceptions as the origin of the more highly developed organizations from the lower." Some say that Darwin's asteroid has not yet been found, but no one has any right to say that its existence is inconceivable.

Farther characteristic of Hegel is his summarily rejecting the discovery that lightning is electricity, made by Franklin in 1752, and his devoting twenty-five pages of his Encyclopædia to arguing against the well-known fact that light is composed of seven colors, and avowing his own preference for a theory of Goethe's which is still held by Hegelians, but which has now been before the world for seventy years without making a single convert among men of science. And Hegel disparages Newton's discovery of gravitation in comparison with Kepler's laws, so that Whewell thinks it strange that any one in the present age should hold such language, and declares that Hegel's mind must have been in the same state in which Kepler's was, and that all the ideas which made the advance to Newton possible must lie outside of the Hegelian philosophy.

In other words, his science, like his theology and politics, was two hundred years behind the times. In fact, his aims may be said to have been not so much to teach science as to unteach it. Nothing is so prominent in his system as the desire to substitute logic for scientific methods.

"Logic is the universal truth," he tells us, "not a special study beside other matters and other realities, but the essence of all these other facts together." "This conception of logic as the self-developing system of thought, pure and entire, is the distinctive achievement of Hegel. He would realize and systematize the identification of logic with the actual. If thought is what is, all is reducible to thought, and logic is the name of the whole. The logical forms are the living spirit of the actual, and that only of the actual is true which, by virtue of these forms, is through them and in them true."

(Wallace, Logic of Hegel, and Stirling, Secret of Hegel.)

The last passage is literally translated from the

Digitized by Google

Encyclopædia, and the meaning is that we have no right to accept anything as a fact which cannot be deduced logically from Hegel's first principle. Logic is his master-key for unlocking all Nature's cabinets and treasure-chambers. Unfortunately, this all-discovering logic follows a peculiarly difficult method, that of triads or trichotomies, the union of two contrary or contradictory ideas as a basis for a higher truth, or progress through thesis and antithesis. This method Hamilton considers illogical, and it does not seem to have led either its author or his followers to any scientific discoveries. Hegel's own performances have been mentioned; and the list of more than seventy Hegelians in Ueberweg's History of Philosophy does not contain a single chemist, astronomer, botanist, geologist, though there are several of note among Schelling's disciples. There is no Hegelianroad to science. Valuable as logic is to keep us from reasoning falsely about what we know by other means, no logical method is likely to be accepted as the only avenue for the discovery of truth. Most Transcendentalists will prefer the guidance of intuition and conscience to that of Hegel's trichotomies. And people who are not Transcendentalists have learned too much through observation and experience to resort to logic, except as a guide in using results acquired already independently. A writer already cited says justly that the central doctrine of Hegelianism — namely, that knowledge is possible through pure thought alone—is proved to be false by the history of the inductive sciences.

This theory, that all knowledge is to be logically evolved from first principles, is the necessary result of Hegel's view of the universe as the logical development of infinite thought, and of the Finite as the coming into existence of the Infinite. "The world is the appearance in which the Absolute eternally expresses itself," says Hegel, whose views are further stated thus: "The natural world proceeds from the idea. Thought is the basis of all existence. The secret of the universe is thought. The reality of everything is thought, unconscious and objective thought perhaps; and the reality of the universe is this ever-unfolding thought." (See Encyclopædia Britannica, Secret of Hegel, and article in Christian Examiner by C. C. Everett.)

This reduction of the universe to a train of thought is now generally rejected by the disciples of Kant, who see that there is more reality in the world than is allowed for by Hegelianism. Scientific men and practical people generally have to make much more distinction than this between mind and matter. No man of business, or of science either, is likely to follow Hegel's advice, and try to "raise himself to such abstract universality as would render it indifferent to him, whether he be or be not in finite life."

"To be or not to be, that is the question."

Success in life depends so much on clear sight of the difference between what is and what is not, and on firm confidence in the reality of the external world, that Hegelianism is too unpractical to win abiding favor, and least of all in such a country as this.

But we have still to look at Hegel's theory of the Infinite. This, he says, is Thought so free from matter or finite existence that "Being, pure Being, is pure indefiniteness and vacancy. There is nothing to be perceived in it. Just as little is anything to be thought in it; or it is equally only this void thought. Being, the indefinite Immediate, is in fact Nothing, and neither more nor less than Nothing. Pure Being and pure Nothing is therefore the same."

Thus, Hegel founds his philosophy on a definition of Infinity, or the Absolute, as mere Thought, which may equally well be called being or nothing. This proposition has been called atheistical and nihilistic; and Hamilton objects that Hegel, in starting with it, violates that law of logic which forbids us to take for granted what we ought to prove. Moreover, the wisest philosophers and theologians of all ages have acknowledged that the Absolute, the Infinite, the Divine, is incomprehensible. Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out; there is no searching of his understanding. The saint may worship what he cannot comprehend, the philosopher may reason from the known toward the unknown, and so reach approximate conceptions about this awful mystery, but there is nothing saintly or philosophic in a man's pretending that he comprehends the Infinite so completely and knows so much more about God than any one else has ever done, that he can start with his original and infallible views of the Absolute as the basis of a new system which will explain everything.

Of this system, the essence seems to be that pure thought, wherein existence is the same as nonentity, is the first principle, out of which all the universe is developed, and from which all knowledge is to be logically deduced. It is, however, by no means easy to describe Hegelianism, which in fact is famous for its obscurity. Hegel himself is the Robert Browning of metaphysicians; Professsor C. C. Everett considers him absolutely untranslatable; to Goethe and Schiller, he was a shut book; and even Jean Paul, whose readers need a special dictionary, calls him a vampire. Hamilton declares that, though he has known several Hegelians of distinguished talents, he never met one who could answer three questions without being driven to confess that he did not as yet fully comprehend his master's doctrine, though he believed it to be all true. The story that Hegel, not long before his death, complained that "only one man understands me — and he does not," is told not only by Hamilton, but by Stirling, who is plainly of opinion that no one but himself has found out his master's secret meaning, and who gives us: "A short but luminous formula for Hegel, perhaps as good as any that can be devised:—

> The Substantive is What is,
> But the Adjective is the Substantive;
> Therefore, the Adjective is What is,
> Or the Whole is Adjective-Substantive."

Not only the Secret of Hegel, but the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, talks familiarly of thingness and talification, of self-sublation and diremption, and of such thrilling truths as that, "There-being is a There-beent."

Part of this obscurity seems due to a fundamental vagueness, whose existence is proved by the fact that Hegelians differ widely among themselves. Some, especially the Americans, have been retrogressive like their master, but among his most famous disciples are Strauss and Renan, who wrote the two great Lives of Jesus; Baur of Tübingen, Bruno Bauer, boldest of Biblical critics; Ruge, the revolutionist, said to have been the one pupil who almost understood Hegel; Proudhon, whose name is linked to the doctrine that property is robbery; and Feuerbach, the confident advocate of atheism, which he deduced from the Hegelian notion that the Absolute is identical with Nothing, a proposition which is said to have given much aid and comfort to the Russian Nihilists. Not that Hegelianism is necessarily either atheistic and revolutionary or else orthodox and reactionary: it is not necessarily anything but unscientific. Otherwise, it is whatever any disciple chooses to make it, and as well fitted as scholasticism was to furnish premises for any conclusion one may wish to advocate. It is like the Mormon prophet's compass, which, he says, worked whither he desired it to. Such a philosophy is a guide of life, resembling those stolid Swiss who stand ready to lead the traveller up among the glaciers of the Jungfrau, the Virgin Mountain, or down into the dens of the harpies near its base.

Thus, Hegelianism may be described as an attempt to prop up antiquated beliefs, wrapped in difficult phrases, by an intricate logic which is based on an arbitrary definition of the Incomprehensible, and which is ready to be used as a weapon by any atheist, socialist, or revolutionist. Hegel's own hostility to scientific truth, as well as to liberal ideas generally, is so uniform and violent, the liability of the system to be turned any way its employers please so notorious, the obscurity of its advocates so repulsive, its claim to comprehend the Infinite so presumptuous, and its reduction of the universe to a train of thought so opposed to the habits of mind needful for practical efficiency, that we cannot wonder at its failure in Europe. What better fate can be expected here, where thought is so free, life so practical, and science so prized? Some people, of course, will cling to Hegelianism, not only as an intellectual gymnasium, but as a fortress to shelter them from new ideas. Rationalism, however, has already used Hegel's bastions and cannons with tremendous effect in Germany, and may yet do so in America. Science needs no such arms. She has won such favor through her many useful discoveries and inventions and her healthy influence on modern thought that no metaphysician can attack her, except to his own destruction. Even Hegel's Encyclopædia can fare no better in the end than did the pope's bull against the comet.

For the Free Religious Index.

A FRAGMENT OF THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

It is safe to assume, as the religious sentiment is coincident with mental development, so that the two are completely interwoven, that that sentiment will partake of the same general law of progress that characterizes all the operations of nature. Many ancient religious forms have gradually perished, as new and higher ones have been superinduced upon the old. Despite, however, this passing away, there still remains the fact that one unbroken chain of development connects the past with the present, thus relating the highest form of religious thought to-day with the lowest and most primitive. In other words there is a conservation of energy in religious phenomena as well as in physical. That which really constitutes the essential features of one form of religion reappears with increased energy and power in another and higher form.

For the phrase "conservation of energy" simply means the indestructibility of motion or life and a corresponding transformation into other forms. In this change, whether it be from one condition to another and higher one or from one species to another and higher one, this gathering up or relating process never ceases. For it is not only religion which signifies to go back, to rebind, to relate, to re-express, but that word is explanatory of the whole process of life. "Just as every larger concept is formed by the combination of smaller ones and presupposes them," so, in like manner, the larger concept of a new religious system is formed by the combination of pre-existing and smaller religious concepts, and presupposes and includes them.

In the Religion of the Future there can be nothing absolutely new; for that would be in opposition to the laws of nature, which always evolves the new from out the old, with all the essential qualities and potentialities of the latter disclosed and made manifest. The great need of the age is a rational, scientific statement of the cardinal or essential truths of religion, so that they will reappear with added force and power upon the earth. As the science of geometry is based upon certain axioms or self-evident truths, so religion, in order to be accepted as the greatest of all sciences, the science of man's relation to Deity, must have a similar basis.

That the time has come for such a restatement, for such a reformation of religious thought, that the essential truths which inhere in all religious systems shall be combined and re-expressed, is evident. For old forms of thought are perishing, and the life or the spirit of religion itself is suffering by the death of the form in which that religion has heretofore expressed itself. To-day, throughout the civilized world, we behold religious belief being swept away from its moorings, tossed hither and thither upon the restless sea of thought.

Yet infidelity has its source in the great heart of humanity, and is the necessary corrective of the stagnation of lifeless forms and unmeaning ceremonies. The advancing intellect of man is demanding positive knowledge as the ground of positive belief. "For if," said Charles Kingsley, "in any age, or country, the God who seems to be revealed by nature seems also different from the God who is revealed by the then popular religion, then that God and the religion which tells of that God will gradually cease to be believed in. For the demands of reason must and ought to be satisfied." It is absolutely necessary for the greater advancement of the race that a foundation of thought should be established, upon which the mind may build the stately edifice of truth.

The elements for such an expression of thought are here, even at our hands. All that is necessary is the power to grasp and master and convert these elements into a definite system. But even as the material universe, in all its wondrous beauty, was slowly resolved out of unseen elements into its present composite form, so to-day the airy fabric of thought is capable of being resolved into a definite, homogeneous statement, which shall be inclusive of all particulars. For thought, as well as material life, ever tends to crystallize itself into a definite thing of beauty. Out of the chaotic elements of doubt and unbelief, out of calm investigation and fiery infidelity, the unseen process of crystallization, or condensation and conservation, is rapidly going on, to finally ultimate itself into a rounded, symmetrical form of truth. Through scientific investigation, we know that nothing is lost; that, in the wise economy of Nature, change, conservation, and transformation are the agencies by which she carries on her marvellous work: endless combinations of that which already exists, in order to create or form anew endless forms of life or thought.

Digitized by Google

So, in "the Religion of the Future," which is already beginning to crystallize itself into a definite form, all the elements of that religion already exist, needing but the Energizing Power of creative life to shape it into a living, active system. IMOGENE C. FALES.

For the Free Religious Index.

"BELIEF IN GOD."

I have just finished reading that delightful little volume of sermons, by the Rev. M. J. Savage, bearing the title Belief in God, and hasten to bid the author and his recent venture a hearty good-speed. I am one of those benevolently constituted individuals who, when, foraging for mental pabulum, they come across a specially appetizing tidbit, cannot resist the impulse to invite their neighbors to enjoy it with them. Such a morsel I regard the volume before me.

In these days of wishy-washy pulpit platitudes and nauseating clerical twaddle, it is refreshing to see a minister who has opinions, with the manliness to avow and the ability to maintain them. Such a one is Mr. Savage. During the seven or eight years he has occupied Unity Pulpit, he has done a large amount of excellent work in the cause of Rational Religion; but in this last piece he has surpassed himself. It is gratifying to observe in an author whose works one admires that his latest is his best effort. This is especially the case where the author is still comparatively young. That this last work of Mr. Savage will be rated as his masterpiece, to date, will hardly be questioned. It is encouraging, too, that it contains internal evidence of pinions capable of yet higher flights, and whispers a prophecy of yet grander achievements.

While it is undoubtedly true, nay, absolutely certain, that man's loftiest conceptions of God must fall immeasurably short of the reality, and convey at best but a vague and imperfect idea of his incomparable wisdom and power, yet it is a pleasure to see this incomprehensible and august being outlined in forms of supremest beauty, and his majestic attributes described in terms which, while they inspire reverence and admiration, do not excite our fears. Such an image Mr. Savage has admirably succeeded in portraying. However short it may fall of being a perfect picture, however faulty or even delusive the conception, it is nevertheless an ideal calculated to excite the finest emotions and inspire the grandest conceptions of the Infinite.

That this noble contribution to the religious literature of the day will make a far-reaching and lasting impression, there can be no doubt. The fact is, Mr. Savage has a marvellous faculty of fixing the images of his own mind upon others; and the secret of this power lies in the fact that he appeals to the understanding, and enforces his views with a fertility of illustration and a felicity of expression at once unique and peculiarly his own. He already occupies a front place in the ranks of polemical debaters, and this his last work will add largely to his reputation.

It is probable, however, that he will not claim for himself, nor his friends for him, that it contains much that is entirely original; but it may be fairly conceded that it embodies the best thought of the day upon the grandest theme with which the mind of man can wrestle, and that it is expressed with a terseness, a clearness, and a beauty of diction rarely excelled. Indeed, on the same plane of thought, I do not recall a work that I think its equal.

Heeding your injunction to correspondents, to be brief, I will not burden your columns with an extended notice of the volume under consideration. Let it suffice to say that I heartily commend its careful perusal to those of your readers who have not already enjoyed that felicity. It is a book that will be read by mothers who are mourning the loss of dear children, by husbands who have laid in the grave the fond partner of their lives, by children bereft of beloved and loving parents, in short by all who have felt the blight of earthly hopes or the chill hand of affliction in any form, and will be found to contain much that will be comforting to their lacerated hearts. He, also, who is harassed with doubts as to the why of the things which perplex his soul, will here get insight, and find much that was dark as night made clear as brightest day. Even those unfortunate victims of a false theology, who are still drifting upon the shoreless sea of metaphysical subtilties, environed with fog and beset by storms, may, if they will give ear to the voice of this pilot, escape from their thraldom, and find safe anchorage in the snug harbor of rational religion.

Doubtless, many will dissent from my estimate of Mr. Savage's book, and possibly few will accord to it the same measure of value. Still, I do not allow myself to doubt that it will be generally accepted by rationalists as a grand conception, and as logical an exposition of the problem involved as can be made under existing conditions. Of course, it will be adversely criticised by the advocates of supernaturalism and foes of reason, but their shafts will fall harmless to the earth. Those, on the other hand, who have cut adrift from ancient moorings, and are sailing on the placid waters of modern thought, will hail it as a revelation. The only farther word I have to say regarding it is that I read it not merely with pleasure, but rapture; and, as I closed its covers, my involuntary exclamation was, NEARER, MY GOD, TO THEE! D. C.

WOBURN, MASS.

For the Free Religious Index.

POLITICAL vs. INTELLECTUAL FREEDOM.

Walt Whitman calls the United States "a vast and varied community, prosperous and fat with wealth of money and products and business ventures, which constitute it a more and more expanded and well-appointed body and perhaps brain, with little or no soul." Walt thinks he can behold, looming dimly over mountains of lard, pork, hams, beef, wheat, tobacco, cotton, Indian corn, Nevada silver, petroleum, etc., the democratic poet-laureate of the future, modestly declining himself to be regarded as such, although he has sung or said things which will cause him to be quoted and remembered long after the lavendered literary exquisites of the period, who now turn up their dainty noses at him, are forgotten. Meantime, although we have political freedom enough and to spare, the mass of our people are still innocent of any idea that there is any truth outside of their creeds and Bible. It is a tedious process in a country so immersed in bread-and-butter and pork-and-lard considerations to induce people to use the franchises of intellectual freemen and rational beings. They can hardly find time to exercise their political franchises. We have institutions of learning which ought to have been universities in fact as well as in name long ago, but they are not. The professors in these institutions must be first of all conformists. Intellectual qualifications are secondary considerations. Orthodox parsons are, in a majority of cases, at the head of our colleges. Americans like Messrs. Fiske and Abbot, who in Europe would be occupying chairs in the principal universities, are not available as professors in our so-called universities, forsooth, because of their intellectual virility and independence. Our large political liberty is counterbalanced by a contemptible mental servility and conformity. A Scotch-Irish Presbyterian, McCosh, is imported to teach American youths metaphysics and logic, highly seasoned with the Scotch variety of Calvinism. They order these things better in Germany, and indeed in every other European country, England included, but not Scotland which has even less intellectual freedom than this country. One of the speakers at the recent Schurz dinner in this city, Dr. E. B. de Gersdorff, alluded, not without pride, to the fact that "the seats of learning in Germany have ever been the hearths and nurseries of intellectual liberty. The proud distinction of German universities," he said, "has been academic liberty,—a liberty superior to political freedom, a higher, a philosophical, and critical liberty of the mind and conscience, a liberty in teaching and learning, uncontrolled by despotism, untrammelled by church interference or protection, uncontaminated by any schemes for gain." This was a well-administered slap at his adopted country by Dr. de Gersdorff and it was merited. And this reminds one of an eloquent passage in Castelar, descriptive of the German university professors of the early part of this century. He says: "At the blows of their implacable logic, superstition falls with a noise more tumultuous than that of revolutions. Hernan Cortes, with all his adventurous genius and all his epic valor and Spanish faith, never attacked the idols of conquered Mexico as the German philosopher and professor has attacked with scientific formulas the God of his fellow-citizens. All our outbreaks in the public streets, our barrack insurrections, all our revolutionary movements which gave out such thunder of electricity, never contained the essence nor the quantities of revolution contained in those apparently obscure and idealistic discourses, foreign to reality, pronounced by the German doctor, seated behind the lofty desk, as on a vague and remote cloud. To them, to those German masters of philosophy, we owe that theory of right before which the ideas of Rousseau appear conservative and reactionary. To them, we owe that theory of progress by whose impulse all institutions, even those most trusted for their celestial origin, and those most destined to eternity by the public powers, have fallen in the idealistic movement of human ideas, and have submitted to the law of universal transformation which condemns all resistance to liberty to sure defeat, and reaction to inevitable death. The universe and God, the soul and the body, nature and the spirit, have been called to the tribunal of their philosophy; kings and popes, the castes of priests and warriors, to the tribunal of their history. No tribune ever directed such imprecations against the pride of tyrants as they against the authority of the monarchy and the Church. No revolution ever freed society of monsters with the power which they have employed to free the conscience from sophisms." B. W. B.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.— It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

EARLY SPRING IN MASSACHUSETTS. From the Journal of Henry D. Thoreau, author of A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, Walden, etc. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1881.

The public owes this delicious piece of literary nature to Thoreau's friend, Mr. H. G. O. Blake, of Worcester, to whom Thoreau's Journal was bequeathed by his sister, the last surviving member of the Thoreau family. It was a happy thought in Mr. Blake to group together the entries in the Journal under the same month-dates for a series of years, and so present a picture of reviving nature as Thoreau actually saw it each returning year. For this is the simple plan of the book. The year-dates begin as early as 1838, and the latest is 1860. (Thoreau died in May, 1862.) The greater part of the selections, however, are between 1850 and 1860. The earliest month-date is Feb. 24, and the latest April 11. According to the popular impression of a Massachusetts spring, there may be considerable scepticism whether there is much spring to observe between these dates. Many persons are too dull of sense to see any spring at all until the brown meadows are visibly changed to green and the foliage is quite palpable on the trees. But Thoreau's eyes and ears—nay, all his five senses—were so alert to nature's operations, and he lived constantly in such close intimacy and sympathy with her, that he was wont to detect the slightest changes in her moods, and noted the sure harbingers of the yearly reawakening life long before anything was apparent to common observers. He not only saw and heard the coming spring, but he smelt and tasted it in a different quality in the air, and literally felt it in the first starting of life in the tree-buds, although no change was visible to the eye.

Yet the book is interesting not only for this close and accurate observation of nature,—perhaps not even chiefly for this,—but also because it is a record of thoughts. Thoreau was an original and quaint thinker as well as observer. Fond as he was of nature and delighting to live in this close relationship with her, after all, the problems that most absorbed him were problems of humanity. He did not care for nature and did not study her as the strictly scientific man does,—he made no professions of being scientific,—but he was specially interested in nature because of its relations to thought and to human life. The traditional formalism and conventionalities of society he could not tolerate, and fled from them to live almost a hermit with nature. And yet he did this always with the hope of finding thereby a more natural and genuine mode of human life,—more favoring opportunity for the ripening of mental faculty, more simple, sincere, and morally wholesome conditions of society. He writes in gleeful humor concerning a circular he had received from the Secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Science for certain personal statistics, among which was the question to what branch of science he was most devoted. He says, "Now, though I could state to a select few that department of human inquiry which engages me, and should rejoice at an opportunity so to do, I felt that it would be to make myself the laughing-stock of the scientific community to describe to them that branch of science which specially interests me, inasmuch as they do not believe in a science which deals with the higher law." He adds, "The fact is, I am a mystic, a transcendentalist, and a natural philosopher to boot." He then rather laments that he had not put himself down as a "transcendentalist," as the shortest way of telling them that they could not understand the kind of scientific man he was.

Digitized by Google

We had marked several passages for quotation; but limited space forbids the printing, and compels us to close our imperfect notice. We will only add the remark that, though about the early spring, the book will have its charm for its circle of readers all the year. It will be a good book to take on one's summer vacation, whether to seashore or among the hills.

CHRISTIAN CONCEPTION AND EXPERIENCE. By Rev. William J. Gill, A.M., author of Evolution and Progress, Analytical Processes, or the Primary Principle of Philosophy. New York: The Authors Publishing Company. 1877.

This is a work of two hundred and thirty-eight pages, written by a very able Methodist divine, whose work on Evolution and Progress, we understand, was noticed by Herbert Spencer. The object of the latter book was philosophical. The object of the book under review is strictly religious and theological. The author claims that the book contains substantially the arguments he used in a series of talks with a very thoughtful, sceptical friend of his, whom he finally converted. It is divided into two parts. The first part contains eighteen chapters under the general title of "the Conception, or a Supernatural Ideal"; and the first six chapters, upon the necessity, worth, culture, influence, and authority of ideals, are by far the most interesting and important chapters in the whole book. These chapters lead up to the thought that our highest ideal or conception must be followed as though it were absolutely true. He then assumes that the Christian conception is the highest possible conception, and claims that we ought to accept and follow it as the absolute truth.

The second part of the book contains eight chapters, under the general title of "The Supernatural Experience." These chapters attempt to prove that Christian experience verifies the truth of the Christian supernatural ideal. The book is thoroughly orthodox in its conclusions. The author attempts to reach these conclusions by a simple process of reasoning, but only does so by helping himself, whenever necessary, to the most gratuitous assumptions.

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE. By William Rounseville Alger. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1881.

Could the young student meet a friendly Senior who had just passed through Harvard or Oxford or Heidelberg, how eagerly would he ask him of what he had learned there, and of the purposes and methods which had helped him to gain his tripos or secure his degree. Mr. Alger has done this service for the young beginner in the great school of life. While he has nowhere spoken of himself, yet any one who knows his long and varied life, in which many and differing experiences have helped to enrich his stores of thought and character, must see how truly this book is the fruit of many years of thought, and how, in the language of universal experience, he has told many a secret of his own struggles and discipline. The flowing ease of his style, whose redundancy sometimes masks the depths of his thought, still makes his didactic matter pleasant reading; and the instruction is enlivened with many a brilliant illustration, drawn either from his knowledge of classic lore or from his observation of humble life. The lessons taught in his school are not novel ones,—we have all been more or less familiar with them,—but they are never too fully learned; and, although the truths are old, it is a great good to have them repeated in new and attractive form.

He has condensed the results of the wisdom and experience of many years into twelve golden rules, which would be well committed to memory, or, as we used to say, learned by heart, by every one who wishes to graduate with honor from the school of life.

1st. Have a definite object, and keep it distinctly in view.

2d. Make no skips. As far as you go, master every step thoroughly.

3d. Beware of errors.

4th. Nurse your slimmest gifts with greatest care.

5th. Reach beyond all word smattering, and grasp substantial truth.

6th. Rest not in negations, but pass to positive good.

Without giving all these rules, we must lay greater stress on one whose importance is often overlooked, but whose faithful observance would, we believe, double the amount of good mental work accomplished by any one in his lifetime. It is this:—

Keep your working power at its maximum.

He enlarges upon this, showing how truly the law applies to the mental machinery as to all other, that the best results are obtained by having a force at command beyond the immediate needs.

Line upon line, precept upon precept, are still needed to enforce the simplest truths. There is a fresh audience in every generation, and the grammar and spelling-lesson must be taught over and over again. Thanks to Mr. Alger for giving us the lessons of life so wisely, so temperately, and so sweetly.

GYPSIES; or, Why we went gypsying in the Sierras? By Dio Lewis. Boston: Eastern Book Company.

The author of this book is well known as an earnest advocate of physical education and a writer upon hygienic subjects. He believes more in natural tonics both for body and mind than in resort to the pharmacopic or artificial restoratives. It was with such an object in view that the adventures and experiences were entered upon which are recounted in the present volume with so lively and engaging interest. Instead of the ordinary mode of travel and sight-seeing, Dr. Lewis and his companions chose to cross the continent and pass some two or three summers among the mountains of California, after the manner of "gypsies," pitching their tents from point to point, according to their progress and inclinations. It is a thoroughly wide-awake book from beginning to end. Its descriptions of characters and scenes are graphic and racy, while the reflections and judgments induced, and particularly in relation to some of the questions which agitate the Pacific coast, evince shrewd and rare good sense. The book will be a charm to all persons of near or imperfect eyesight on account of its large type. It is full of spirited illustrations, and, though the covers may be a little gay for some tastes, is put in strong and durable binding.

Education for May and June contains the following list of articles, each one having value to the educator: "National Aid to Education," by Hon. F. W. Patterson, in which the need of universal intelligence among American voters is clearly set forth, and a strong plea made for national aid to those States not able or willing to establish schools in sufficient number, and of sufficiently high grade of excellence, to meet the demand of the ignorant masses of population. "Educational Principles of the Kindergarten," by Miss E. Shirriff, of London, is a comprehensive and clear discrimination between true and false use of the Froebel materials and plays, which may be of good service to parents who desire the genuine kindergarten method for their children. "The Collegiate Education of Girls," by Professor Maria Mitchell, is trenchant, strong, eminently practical in its statements and suggestions. "Graphic Science" by S. Edward Warren, "Common-sense in Classics" by Dr. E. R. Humphreys, and "Teaching English" by President A. B. Stark, are more technical, but useful articles even for those not committed to the methods advanced. George Hicks writes from Jamaica Islands an article on "The Public School System," indignantly refuting Richard Grant White's sweeping strictures upon our schools and their work. John Tetlow contributes a careful statement and comparison of the conditions of "The Eastern Colleges for Women." An historic sketch of the "Boston Latin School," and a biographical one of Rev. James Maning, enliven the number. Dr. F. L. Pickard, President of the University of Iowa, discusses the "Relation of Public Schools to Morality and Religion." He places a high value on the silent influence of the high-minded teacher, would have the teacher exercise supervision over the child's reading and choice of associates, and on the vexed question of the Bible in public schools claims that the teacher should be free to use the book "as a potent means of increasing moral influences." He thinks "requirement of its use hardly in consonance with its spirit, and prohibition of it in the highest degree illiberal and sectarian." Probably, almost all radicals in religion, although not like himself "firm believers in the authority of the sacred Scriptures," will agree with President Pickard in objecting to prohibition of Bible-reading in our public schools, provided such reading is in the line of general literary or moral instruction, and not separated from all other school exercises and made a devotional service.

The editorial pages are varied and excellent for the most part. We should, however, demur at the suggestion that the "Educational Problems involved in Socialism" were metaphysical and abstract. They seem to us very practical, and the clew to their solution is to be found in the historical development of the idea of liberty.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. HUGHES, the venerable mother of Thomas Hughes, has been so pleased with all she has heard of her son's Tennessee colony that she has determined to come and visit it. She will arrive in this country in May, and be conveyed from Philadelphia to Rugby with her furniture, pictures, and books in a special train running in easy stages. Mrs. Hughes is over eighty-three years old.

IN the parlor of Mrs. Sargent, where the Boston Radical Club have so long met, the front windows are curtained with tapestry which passed through the French Revolution of 1789, the brass chimney-set used to belong to a Roman palace, the furniture is covered with an antique embroidery of Æsop's fables, there is a large gilt-framed throne-chair from the palace of Louis Philippe, a bust of Wendell Phillips, a harp, and the walls are covered with engravings from the paintings of Lebrun.—Woman's Journal.

GEORGE H. BOKER tells this story about Edgar A. Poe: "One day, I was sitting at a bookseller's, who also published a serial, when Poe came in. If shabby, he was generally genteel, and had the inherent look of a man of the world, out of place and ostracised, yet with a compensating pride in his sense of finer intellect. After some little while, he said to the publisher, 'Lend me ten dollars.' 'I can't do it' (he was already in debt to his friend a hundred or two). 'Lend me five then,' said Poe. 'I can't do it, Poe. I have made up my mind not to lend any more.' 'Well,' said Poe, 'will you give me ten dollars for a poem?' 'Yes, I will be glad to do that.' Poe sat down, and, almost without hesitation, wrote a sonnet, exquisite in its wording, tender in its feeling. He handed it over to the publisher, who paid the money."

PROF. G. STANLEY HALL, of Cambridge, spoke as follows at the Norfolk County School Teachers' Convention last week, in regard to kindergarten and primary methods of education: He dwelt at length upon the necessity of using such methods of imparting instructions as could be readily understood by the youngest pupil. The sense of touch should be educated before the others, and then the senses of sight and hearing. He said that the child should be considered as a young plant, and should be kept out of doors as much as possible, be allowed to play in the dirt and be as happy as possible. He enlarged upon the objective methods of teaching, advocating the use of picture-blocks, etc. The American system of kindergarten schools was strongly criticised, and a comparison made between our method and the German method.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

AGNOSTICISM.

We hope, aspire, and dream, but only know
The current life we now are living here,
So sweet to most they ask no higher sphere.
Art, science, freedom, peace, can make to glow,
Like fabled heaven, this world, which long ago
Was deemed a place of harsh probation drear;
Only a vestibule where, pale with fear,
Men should salvation seek by penance grim.
Foully this glorious world the saints belied:
'Tis one of the innumerous orbs that swim
Through cosmic space on gravitation's tide;
With beauty as a garment clothed, it spins
About the sun, buoyant, in orbit wide,
Nor rays one beam the less because of human sins.

B. W. B.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MAY 26, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Business session, for election of officers, hearing of reports, etc., Thursday, May 26, at 7.45 P.M., in the Parker Memorial Hall, corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets. The methods of the Association looking to a more effective organization, as developed the past year and as may be further proposed, it is hoped may induce an interesting and profitable discussion at this opening session.

Convention, Friday, May 27, in the same Hall, with sessions at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M. The question for the morning session is to be, "The Dangers to Morality from the Downfall of the Old Theology; or, The Probabilities of a Moral Interregnum," to be introduced by Prof. Felix Adler. Mr. Adler entitles his address, "The Teachers of Ethics as the Successors of the Clergy." Other speakers will be Mr. M. J. Savage, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Mr. George Chainey. The afternoon topic will be, "Will Free Religion Organize?" to be opened with an essay by Frederick A. Hinckley. Speeches by Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, Mrs. Anna L. Diggs and Charles Ellis.

On Friday evening there is to be a social festival, using both the upper and lower halls of the Parker Memorial Building. A programme of special interest is to be presented, with the usual opportunity for refreshments, conversation, and, not least, pecuniary subscriptions for the work of the Association. WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y.

PROFESSOR PARK, of Andover, who, it has been supposed, could tell something about the "unpublished manuscript" of Dr. Jonathan Edwards, if he chose to, has broken silence. He says he "never heard of it till June, 1880," and that he does not believe there is any such manuscript as has been described in existence, and that "there is indubitable proof that no such manuscript was ever written by Edwards."

THE NEW NEW-TESTAMENT.

True to promise, the revised version of the New Testament appeared on the 20th instant simultaneously in this country and in England, and is already largely in the hands of the people. A cable despatch from London on the 21st stated that two million copies had already been sold there. Over half a million of copies had been sent to a few book-selling firms as trusted agents in this country before the appointed day, and the sales exhausted the whole supply in a day or two. These editions—for there are several varieties of form and type—have all been printed under the most careful supervision at Oxford and Cambridge, in England, on the University presses. The market will soon be flooded with other editions, for there is no copyright; but these are the only ones that the revising committee guarantee as correct, and efforts will be made to supply the demand with these authorized editions as far as possible. Quite curiously, the Bible Publication Societies cannot publish the new version until they amend their constitutions, which bind them to print only the King James translation.

Rationalistic thinkers who regard the Christian Bible as they do the books of other religions—that is, as a book of human origin and to be judged like other books by human reason—cannot, of course, manifest such eager interest in this new version of the New Testament as do those Christian believers who look upon the Bible as a special message from God. People of radical religious views are not accustomed to go to the Bible to find authority for their beliefs, nor to look into its pages for any infallible standard of moral practice. Therefore, whether a text in it shall read this way or that is to them of comparatively little moment, except as, in the case of other classics like Shakspere or Plato, they may always prefer the most accurate reading.

But to Evangelical believers, who hold that the New Testament is a gospel supernaturally revealed from heaven, and that it is, moreover, a revelation necessary for human salvation, it would seem that it should be of the utmost importance to have the revelation in the most correct form. To them, it is a matter of the most serious import how a text shall read; and even a slight change in the rendering of a sentence derives vast moment from the fact of its being believed to be a change in a communication sent from the Supreme Ruler of the universe. And yet not all Christian believers are inclined to accept kindly the amended version. One of the Boston daily papers of orthodox proclivities says editorially: "The old New Testament is good enough for us, and we do not believe there are living men capable of improving upon it. The worst of the Bible's enemies are men who think they can make it better, and who tinker it accordingly." Considering the resources of Biblical study that have been accumulating since the King James version was made, this spleeny dictum is certainly not very complimentary to the Biblical scholarship of our time. But such criticism is absurd. There is no intelligent doubt, whatever demerits on other points the revised version may have, that it is a much more correct transcript of the original message than any previous version has given. Yet the new version is doomed to meet a good deal of this unreasoning and superstitious opposition. Even the London Athenæum a few months ago, when it was first reported that there would be changes in the "Lord's Prayer" from that form familiar to all English-speaking people for three centuries, said: "A greater calamity than such a change as rumor declares to be imminent, it would be difficult at the present moment to imagine." That is, though the Bible is the Word of God, it would be a greater calamity to the people now to have the Word exact than to go on repeating something which they have been taught from childhood to believe to be his Word, but is not! To such mere fetichism has Bible worship become. After all, it is not God's thought, even according to their own theory of its revelation, that these Bible devotees want, but certain forms of words and letters and sounds that they have learned to associate with his name. What a pitiful mockery of genuine religious reverence is this! But the majority of the orthodox world, we believe, will not stand toward the amended New Testament in this mood. We incline to think the new version will find its way, in spite of such resistance, into popular circulation.

And we think one of the certain effects of this acceptance of the revised version will be the increase of more rational views about the Bible. A book that can be amended cannot be infallible. Yet thousands of readers of the King James version have read it in the firm belief that they were reading an infallible book. They will now begin to see that that belief, at least, was a mistake. But, since no claim is made that the new revising committee have been inspired, and their process of working with the instrumentalities of human scholarship is even frankly described, have these readers an infallible book now? Have all mistakes been corrected? And these "manuscripts" that are talked about,—on what authority do they rest? And so, the question of infallibility having once been started among readers who never raised it before, it may not rest until it reach the question of original authorship, and the popular theories of the Bible be reconstructed on a more rational basis. From this point of view, therefore, the revised New Testament has a special interest for Liberals. That the revision, on points where any doctrinal change is involved, favors liberal Christian rather than orthodox interpretation is also apparent. But this is a matter of much less moment than setting the Bible-reader's wits to work on the question whether the Bible he is reading is an infallible book. Let that question once fairly get started among the plain-thinking people of Christendom in the nineteenth century, and the twentieth century will answer it by placing the Bible on the library shelves alongside of other historical religious books, classified as one of the human literatures of the world's religions.

ROSCOE CONKLING.

It often happens that a single act of a person's life reveals as effectually his ruling motives as a volume of biography. We need not look far for illustrations of this at present. Ex-Senator Conkling's recent sensational antic will answer for one; and the very damaging and foolish letter of Gen. Grant that since has followed, for another.

Of Mr. Conkling, the people of the country, irrespective of party, have long entertained pretty uniform and well-settled opinions, which the disclosure just made of his mental and moral characteristics will only serve to emphasize and render more pronounced. For upward of a score of years, he has been one of the most conspicuous public men of the country. His career has been a singularly prosperous one. Born in 1828, he has but barely turned his fiftieth year, and may hence be regarded as in the very prime of his powers. The greater portion of his life has been passed in official positions. Beginning, in comparative youth, as Mayor of Utica, then as District Attorney, later as Member of Congress, and for the last fourteen years a United States Senator, and party leader of foremost ability and influence, he has mounted in succession from one gradation to another of political eminence in the country, until it has seemed almost possible at times he yet might reach its very highest. The contemplation of a career of such successes possesses a peculiar fascination, and naturally carries with it the assurance that it must necessarily be associated with as commanding merit and virtue. But much depends upon the conditions and means through which men mount to power,—whether they are those employed and devised for general and public ends or to promote private interest and personal aggrandizement. With all allowance for the charm and captivation of splendid successes, there is a wonderful contrast in the moral worth and claims upon our admiration of such lives as Beaconsfield and Gladstone, between the Napoleons First and Third on the one hand and Washington and Lincoln on the other.

Digitized by Google

There have been all along Roscoe Conkling's course of advancing distinction very impressive signs of his lack of the first essentials of greatness. It has been more and more apparent that he was deficient in those moral elements of character which alone afford a sure guarantee for the worthy use of place and power or render their possessor truly admirable. There has hence been a decline of confidence and trust in him, in the ratio of his growing prominence and influence, which has tended to make the higher prizes that he might else have attained more and more hopeless and elusive. There is no one that questions Roscoe Conkling's brilliant intellectual gifts or skill as a political tactician and party leader. But these are comparatively cheap. There is much more than these needed for genuine and efficient statesmanship, and genuine and efficient statesmanship is now and always what the country most needs in its public men. There are plenty of people of brilliant intellectual gifts. But, unfortunately, brilliant intellectual gifts are frequently associated with absence of heart and conscience. It is always much easier to find a brilliant person than one of high integrity, sound wisdom, and discretion.

Of party chieftainship and political tactics, too, the country has had, and is likely to have for some time to come, quite enough. It has certainly had ample of the quality which Mr. Conkling is disposed to furnish. It is high time for him to step down and out, if he have nothing better to contribute to the councils of the nation; and that this is all that may be hoped or expected from him, even should he resume the place he has so precipitately vacated, is attested by his antecedents. There is no one who more directly represents what is known as the machine in politics or is more responsible for the evils and abuses which it engenders.

The great object of Mr. Conkling's worship is success. The end toward which he aspires and concentrates all his energies is power,—power for Roscoe Conkling and power for the party to which he belongs. Party is first and country afterward. A true Macchiavelian disciple, he believes in the freest use of all the artifices of craft, duplicity, and tergiversation that can promote his aims.

The patronage of the politician, in common with the view of his class, is of more consideration than the interest of the public service,—pliant and obedient tools in his manipulations, more than manhood, honor, and integrity wrought into the politician system, and exalting the dignity, stability, and character of the nation. It is thus, granting all that is to be put to his credit for his identification with the great party which may relatively be designated the party of freedom, not too much to say that the influence of Roscoe Conkling upon American politics has constantly tended to lower the tone rather than to ennoble and exalt it. The political ideas and principles which he represents belong to an order of such as are happily passing away, and are unworthy of the nobler ideals and better apprehensions of political duties and of the administration of government which are in process of evolution among us. The Empire State can do no more sensible thing, more honorable to itself and the country in the present contingency, than to consign the two Dromios who have come home to it for temporary retirement to a permanent one, and return to their seats those who shall at least possess better tempers and manners, and more fitly represent what statesmanship should be here in America in this nineteenth century.

It has been said by Goldwin Smith, if we would suppress demagogism in this country, we must suppress the demagogue. Would not this do for a beginning in this direction? It would also present us an example of what the great poet describes as "that vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself, and falls on t'other side." D. H. C.

ANSWERS TO CERTAIN QUESTIONS

Addressed to Mr. John White Chadwick by Mr. Carl H. Horsch.

1. Are we, against our reason, tendency, faith, and will, "still Christians"?

Answer: Objectively, Yes, if we have been factors in the sum of Christian civilization. A position of traditional antagonism to Christianity, such as the Jews have occupied, might constitute a valid exception. Subjectively, the man whose "reason, tendency, and faith, and will" are anti-Christian is not a Christian, if he defines Christianity correctly to himself, as probably he does not. For example, to make Romanism typical Christianity is much the same as making Cupid's Yokes identical with Mr. Abbot's gospel of purity.

2. Was Jesus still a Jew, because he was born of Jewish parents and had some of the humanitarian tendencies of his ancestry, after he followed his own reason, tendency, faith, and will, and opposed the Jewish creed?

Answer: Jesus never conceived himself to be anything but a Jew religiously, and was not. It was the intense nationality of Judaism that prevented its opening out into a universal faith; and it was this that made a new religion with a new name essential.

3. Are the tendencies of Moses, Confucius, Buddha, Jesus, or Mohammed superior to those of all good and well-developed men, and do either one of those persons count more than one in the scale of humanity.

Answer: This question is in two parts. Answer to the first part: The parts cannot be greater than the whole. "Moses, Confucius, etc.," are included in "all good men." "Do either one of these count more than one in the scale of humanity?" Answer, Does Shakspeare count for more than Tupper? Does he not count for more than forty million Tuppers? But this does not mean that anything is true or beautiful because Shakspeare said it. No more is anything true or beautiful because Jesus said it. Perhaps I do not understand what Mr. Horsch means by "counting one." If a bruiser of the "Bloody Sixth" had been in Lincoln's place, would the course of events have been precisely what it was from 1861 to 1865? In faculty and influence, All men are created unequal.

4. Are the claims of superiority for any one of the historical forms of religion or sects and for their tendencies in keeping with republican principles and favorable to the maintenance and propagation of liberty?

Answer: Such "claims" are not necessary to the preference of a traditional name. But does Mr. Horsch believe that all historical forms of religion are exactly equal? If not, he must allow superiority to one or another. If "republican principles" cannot bear to have the truth allowed, so much the worse for "republican principles."

5. Is it not vanity, selfishness, speculation, and a false claim, rather than modesty, charity, fairness, and truth, when we stamp modesty, love, charity, patience, civilization, and good tendencies generally, with the name Christian?

Answer: Not unless we are unwilling to have these virtues stamped with the names Buddhist, Mohammedan, etc. I do not know whose ox is gored by this particular bull of Mr. Horsch's. I am sure that mine is not.

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

BROOKLYN, May 16, 1881.

EUROPEAN EVOLUTION.

Oh, the lazy luxury and restful ease of this European life! Surely, if the United States must be admitted to be the best place in the world for bread-winners, Europe remains as ever the terrestrial paradise of artists, scholars, philosophers, and the "well-to-do" classes. To "make money" in the New World and spend it in the Old may not be a patriotic ambition, but it is certainly fast becoming the habit of our wealthiest Americans. One is astonished at the constantly lengthening list of annual visitors or permanent residents of all the more attractive cities upon the Continent, who "hail" from the United States. They have actually driven the ubiquitous English in despair from some of their former favorite haunts, such as Geneva, for example. The familiar nasal twang is encountered in the most out-of-the-way corners, and at the most unexpected times and seasons. "Daisy Miller" has grown so familiar to European eyes as to be accepted now without a shrug of the shoulders; and the Bennetts and Lorillards, the Vanderbilts and Astors, are as well known on this side the Atlantic as in the United States. In fact, far more Americans make it a point to see Europe than to favor the Pacific Coast with a visit, and few indeed are those who having the choice between California and Italy do not choose the latter.

Nor is this selection altogether to be deprecated, although it has latterly become the habit to speak of transatlantic sojourners as "unpatriotic." Educated Americans enjoy a peculiarly enviable position abroad, where the absence of any fixed rank or "caste" among them enables each one to be accepted on his or her own individual merits in the very highest grades of society. And, to realize what a boon this is, one must have experienced it. Culture in Europe usually takes precedence of wealth, and mere money is voted vulgar in the best society. The domestic and social life of the masses of the people in either Great Britain, France, Germany, or Italy, realizes far more of innocent, healthful enjoyment than is generally found in the United States, where the concentration of all our energies is devoted almost exclusively to "making a fortune," while in Europe the vast majority would aim merely at maintaining the position they were born into. It is little wonder that most scholarly Americans, who have lived long enough across the water, enter into and enjoy the easy, comfortable habit of Europeans,—of making their lives pay as they go along, instead of waiting for a doubtful dividend at a remoter period. American family life is unmistakably dull, monotonous, and wearisome. Especially is this true in the country. The individual members of a New England farmer's family, for instance, seldom seem to feel under any obligation to interest or amuse the others, unless there are neighbors or visitors present. A sadder life and a more dismal prospect than lies before the wives of most of our isolated Western "prairie" farmers it is very difficult to imagine. But the Europeans of every class cultivate a different form of existence, multiplying holidays and occasions of general festivity, and thus diversifying their otherwise tedious lives. Americans also work harder when they do work than Europeans, and frequently thus wear out their lives ere middle age. Merchants, journalists, lawyers, clergymen, and physicians frequently prolong their hours of labor far into the night; and, while the "unskilled" laborers of the United States are growling at the idea of ten hours' work for double the wages paid in Europe, the "professional" classes, so called, average sometimes nearer sixteen hours than ten.

Digitized by Google

The Catholic religion is, no doubt, doomed to ultimately fade out in the light of nineteenth century civilization, but it promises, at least, to outlive the lukewarm Protestantism of the period; and it is certainly far better adapted to the manners and habits of the European people, and appeals far more strongly to the imagination and devotional natures of the lower classes than the colder, more formal creeds, which restrict the use of churches to the seventh day, and deny to the hard-working peasants the opportunity of indulging their moods at pleasure. As Catholicism relaxes its grasp upon the minds of the rising generation, Protestantism makes no corresponding progress. On the contrary, it is the Rationalists, Positivists, Secularists, and Materialists who are the gainers. In the advance from Rome to Reason, it is not essential to linger long in the twilight of "Evangelical" Christianity. Strauss and Büchner, Renan and Victor Hugo, John Stuart Mill, George Eliot, and Herbert Spencer now point the way to the thronging masses of the Old World; and, for weal or woe, the walls of "revealed religion" are now so far demolished, and exhibiting so many gaps, as to offer no practical impediment. Even the English clergy are infected to such an extent as would scarcely be believed.

We are evidently entering upon the innermost circles of the maelstrom of Freethought, and the closing years of the present century are big with fate. Nihilism, Socialism, and Communism are no longer discussed as mere possibilities of the future: it is coming to be seen more and more clearly that, whatever is to be their outcome, they are destined to have their day! The Prince of Wales says he never expects to reign in England, and adds that he does not much care to. This, at least, is the accepted on dit at the clubs. France is trembling between reaction and the re-establishment of the Commune, and Gambetta is trying to gain a breathing space by distracting the attention of the French people toward a grand scheme of African colonization. German Republicans only await the daily expected death of the Emperor William, Von Moltke, and Bismarck, who must soon follow Disraeli "over to the great majority." The Russian Empire is really in its death agony. For every Nihilist hung or shot there spring up a hundred eager to avenge his fate. The Spanish and Italian kings are trembling in their shoes, and ready to abdicate whenever a majority of their far from loyal subjects can decide with what form of government they will replace them. Everywhere there is visible expectancy, profound discontent with the established order of things, and utter scepticism as to its much longer continuance.

But this applies only to the powers delegated by the masses to their rulers, or claimed by the latter. The results of the ingrained habits of centuries are not so easily eradicated: the characters and customs, the tastes and aspirations of mankind remain very much the same. Law and order will somehow be maintained. The family will remain the unit of all civilized societies. Competition of individuals, however disastrous in particular cases, will be recognized as indispensable to the perpetual progress and improvement of the human race. The economical and business-like administration of the several governments will someway be achieved. Instead of a larger liberty resulting to the isolated personality, a more stringent supervision will perhaps be required in the interest of the many. Governments will multiply their powers by common and general consent. A man's house can remain his castle only on condition that it exists for the benefit of society at large. Sanitary legislation will be more searching, thorough, and general in its application. "Protective Tariffs" will be ventilated, to the stultification of their selfish and narrow-minded advocates. The rudimentary principles of finance will not be disputed with impunity, and advocates of fixed values to be imparted to bits of paper by legislative enactments will no longer gain the public attention. A comprehensive training for the duties of citizenship, and a practical education for children, are among the nearer reforms of the future; and Europe is quite as likely as America to show the way. Altogether, if we live in a turbulent period of the world's history, it cannot be denied that it is of the most absorbing interest, however unsettled and disappointing it may appear to the over-sanguine; and the future destiny of the human race, its continued advance, or the culmination of the present civilization, are problems to be mainly worked out here in the mother-land.

ALBERT WARREN KELSEY.

MENTON, ALPES-MARITIMES, FRANCE,
April, 1881.

A FORTNIGHT ago, we alluded to Professor W. C. Russel's forced retirement from his positions as Professor and acting President in Cornell University. Another reason than those then given as current for this action on the part of the Executive Committee is now stated. In the Philadelphia Presbyterian, we find this: "It is said that Professor Russel of Cornell University has been asked to resign by the Trustees, because he had no confidence in Mr. Beecher, and was therefore reluctant to ask him to preach in the college chapel. Mr. Henry W. Sage, a Trustee of the University, and a large giver to its funds, is a devoted friend of Mr. Beecher, and insisted at various times that he should be asked to preach. Professor Russel gave at least passive resistance to Mr. Sage's requirement, and the two gentlemen have been at odds. The contest has been an unequal one, and the weaker party has gone to the wall." We do not know whether this is authentic or not, and should be glad to hear from some of our friends at Cornell "the true inwardness" of this affair.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MILWAUKEE, May 9, 1881.

A paper read before the Fortnightly Club of this city by Mr. John P. McGregor deserves mention in the Index as a fearless expression of opinions maintained in its columns. This paper was entitled "General Principles," and the subject was considered briefly under three groups: 1. Those that apply to material things, the so-called laws of nature; 2. Those that apply to social relations, including human governments; 3. Those that apply to morals and religion.

"It may be true that no sharp, well-defined line can be drawn which shall absolutely divide one of these groups from the others, when we come to consider them as affecting human actions," says the author of the paper "but the distinction is sufficient for the end I have in view, which is to illustrate the great value of the acquirement and of the application of sound general principles in all three of these departments, to point out some of our shortcomings and failures in that regard, and to suggest remedies for these defects."

The contrast was then drawn between the advance in knowledge of religious principles and those which are embodied in material things. The earlier men seem to have looked upon the ordinary, every-day operations of nature without interest or curiosity, while extraordinary events, like tempests, eclipses, pestilences, etc., were attributed to the direct action of deities or demons. Nor can we take too much credit to ourselves as compared with our ancestors, when we consider how few comparatively in times of general education take an intelligent interest in and have an accurate understanding of the operations going on around us under natural laws which directly affect our country, our health, and our life itself. Many ladies educated and intelligent find the principles of domestic science an impenetrable mystery and the chemistry of culinary operations something past finding out, and many men are engaged in occupations depending upon the application of the principles of natural philosophy or other physical science, who have the most imperfect and inadequate knowledge of those very principles upon which success would seem to depend. We have got along and succeeded after a fashion, because a certain empirical knowledge has been acquired, and we have learned to do things by "rule of thumb."

Several instances of gross ignorance were related at some length to show the absurd notions upon which business could be carried on and the disasters which might and do result from the ignorance of general principles; and the importance of giving to children elementary knowledge of natural philosophy was emphasized, which once acquired would stimulate the pursuit of natural science and leave them unsatisfied until they thoroughly understood the why and wherefore of operations going on around them or in which they take a part; and they would work in unison with the principles of nature, and never attempt to carry on their operations at cross-purposes with her. The impossibility of regulating social and political affairs on wrong or unsound principles was fully considered, illustrated with several instances drawn from the writer's large acquaintance with the practical affairs of life and society, including the topics of universal suffrage, unequal taxation, usury laws, capital and labor, etc.

Coming to the survey of the moral and religious field, the most striking feature noticed was that while right principles were set forth at a comparatively early period and by alleged divine authority, to which men were required to conform their conduct, and while it had always been generally admitted that it was essential to the welfare of individuals that they should conform their conduct to these principles, and in all ages armies of prophets, priests, and preachers had been engaged in urging men to walk in the way commanded under threats of eternal punishment for disobedience and promise of everlasting bliss as reward for obedience, yet so far but a very moderate portion of mankind could be brought to square that conduct with these moral and religious maxims and commandments, and they only in a partial and imperfect way. It was no wonder that under such circumstances the theologians should have been driven to the doctrine of innate and total depravity to account for the perversity of man, or should have attributed it to the machinations of the devil, the enemy of God and righteousness. There must evidently be a defect somewhere. If this defect be attributed to a slow development, it will give us reason to hope that in the progress and higher development of the race a stage may be reached when the lower elements of human nature will be subdued and brought under the control of the higher and better instincts and faculties of the soul.

The sacerdotal class was mentioned as having been in turn powerful for good and powerful for evil. The rapid advance of general knowledge and of accurate and scientific modes of thought had made great havoc with superstitions and dogmas, making necessary a readjustment of the grounds of faith and religious ideas. Disaster to morality and religion was predicted by the sticklers for the Orthodox traditions, but the writer did not share their anxiety. His belief grew stronger and stronger that mankind in its upward and onward development would come to a realizing sense of the binding force of general principles, and come to feel and know that it is just as absurd and ruinous to enter on a course of conduct in violation of the sound principles of morality and religion as would be the effort to conduct material operations in defiance of the laws of gravity and chemical affinity. He believe we should yet come to the enjoyment of a reasonable religion, resting upon human brotherhood and the common welfare of the race, and finding proofs of its divine authority in its adaptation to the wants of man and to the requirements of an enlightened moral nature; a religion freed from sacerdotalism, bigotry, and superstition, and finally attaining to a faith serene, unclouded, effectual, perfect.

Digitized by Google

This brief outline of Mr. McGregor's paper scarcely does justice to its valuable points and literary symmetry, but it will serve to show its spirit; and it was noticeable that the sympathy of the club and the visitors in attendance was mainly with the views therein expressed.

During the discussion which usually follows the paper in this club, Rev. Henry Rose asked Mr. McGregor to define the terms "morals and religion," as he seemed to distinguish between them. The reply did not sharpen the distinction, as our Mr. Potter does; and anything less than a clear line causes confusion of ideas that results in a war of unmeaning words. Mr. Rose said, in the course of the discussion, that the history of the world was not old enough to formulate principles, with a sneering allusion to the scientists whose long, hard words mystified, but did not enlighten us. They talked of force, but it was vague, and of truth, but there was nothing which could be proven and called truth. Mr. Robert Spencer asked him if, as he called this force God, he "believed him to be truth." Assented to by Mr. Rose. "Can you prove there is a God?" "No." "Will you not grant to others the right, then, to call this power by other name than God?" "Certainly, I never deny this to any one."

The truth is, however, that Mr. Rose takes especial pains to announce through the newspaper press that he will speak upon the subjects of atheism and atheists, and does not, in the pulpit, apply courteous language to their belief nor to themselves. Mr. Spencer remarked, after the close of the meeting, to a gentleman who called Mr. Rose "a fair-minded preacher," that he was not; that he abused atheists from the pulpit, when there was no opportunity to reply to him; and he should take the opportunity of this club to say the same things. The tendency of intelligent thought in Milwaukee is toward the religious ideas embodied in the paper I have noticed; and it is very gratifying to me to take such notes of the progress of rationalism whenever and wherever I can find it. The platform of the Fortnightly Club is proven by such examples to be a free one, and such papers and discussions must bear rich fruits of progress.

A conversational club was organized during the past winter by Mrs. M. T. Dudley, and recently the conversations held in her parlors were led by Mr. C. D. B. Mills and Bronson Alcott. These two meetings of the club were largely attended, and reported through the press to have been of great interest.

Mr. Joshua Starke, President of the Milwaukee School Board, in his annual address made, among many thoughtful suggestions, the following: "One of the important duties of our successors will be the revision of the courses of study. However excellent the present courses and the results attained through them, there is room for improvement. The course of study in the high school should be made more definite and practical, and there is evident need of more attention in the district schools to the study and explanation of the common facts and phenomena of nature. No child who has been in the public schools to the age of twelve should be ignorant of the simple elementary laws of the physical world about him, and of the meaning and explanation of common natural phenomena. The instructions and discipline of our schools should recognize the rank of the child as the heir expectant to the high dignity of citizenship; and they should be directed to awaken and strengthen sentiments of manliness and independence, suited to fit man for a life of liberty and the possession and exercise of high political trust."

Progressive educational ideas are also good to "make a note on."

The legislature of Wisconsin, after all the important measures introduced during its late session and the active lobbying and generous support of many members, succeeded in passing only one or two bills which reflect any credit upon its members, although their introduction and vigorous support redound to the glory of our State. Woman suffrage, universal taxation, and secularization of schools supported by the State received serious consideration and were lost by small majorities.

That these questions were not disposed of according to the desires of the advanced members of that body, and men and women of Wisconsin, can be attributed to the very advanced ideas they embodied. The majority were simply unprepared to deal with these problems of sociology. That they have been ably introduced and actively supported shows the value we attach to them, and it is but a question of time when these problems shall be settled satisfactorily to the best social interests of the State.

The anti-treating bill which did pass became the source of much amusement, and the comments of the press throughout the country were tinged with a deserved ridicule. A test case was instituted in this city which resulted in proving the law unconstitutional; and the mistaken advocates of the so-called temperance cause can feel nothing but chagrin at the result of the passage of this bill. B.

LESSONS
ON
The Origin and Growth of Christianity.

XX.

THE LEGEND OF THE RESURRECTION.

"If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen."—I. COR. xv., 13.

1. The Betrayal and Crucifixion.

JESUS and his disciples went up to JERUSALEM at the time of the annual Passover festival, according to the custom of the Jews, to make their offerings at the TEMPLE, and eat together the Paschal feast. (Mark x., 1, 32, 46; xi., 1, 11; xiv., 12–26; compare Matt. xx., 17, 18; xxi., 1, 12; xxvi., 17–30; Luke xviii., 31, 35; xix., 1, 28, 41; xxii., 1–30.) At JERUSALEM, he is said to have foretold the destruction of the TEMPLE (Mark xiii., 1, 2; Matt. xxiv., 1, 2; Luke xxi., 5, 6), and to have been tempted to controversies with leaders of the Jewish sects. (Mark xi., 27–33; xii., 13–40; Matt. xxii., 41–46; xxiii.; Luke xx.) The Chief Priests and Scribes, fearing his influence, conspired to put him to death. (Mark xiv., 1; Matt. xxvi., 3, 4; Luke xxii., 2.) He was accused of blasphemy, condemned by the SANHEDRIN (Mark xiv., 53–65; Matt. xxvi., 57–68; Luke xxii., 66–71), and delivered up for execution by PILATE, the ROMAN procurator. (Mark xv., 1–15; Matt. xxvii., 1–26; Luke xxiii., 1–25.) The tradition declares that he was crucified, according to the ROMAN custom, together with two thieves. His body is said to have been given to one JOSEPH of Arimathea, who caused it to be placed in his own sepulchre. (Mark xv., 16–47; Matt. xxvii., 27–61; Luke xxiii., 26–56.)

NOTE.—According to the Jewish LAW, blasphemers were to be stoned to death. (Lev. xxiv., 16.) The power of executing the death penalty had, however, been taken from the Jews by the ROMAN government, and JESUS was therefore executed according to the custom of the ROMANS.

Some writers suppose that in his reply to the question of his accusers, "Art thou the Christ?" JESUS made use of the HEBREW name of GOD, "I AM" (Mark xiv., 62; compare Ex. iii., 14), to speak which was accounted blasphemous.

2. Paul's Doctrine of the Resurrection.

The earliest recorded allusions to the resurrection of JESUS are found in the writings of PAUL. (I. Cor. xv.; Romans i., 4; vi., 4–10; viii., 11; xiv., 9, etc.) PAUL, however, denied the doctrine of the resurrection of the physical body, saying, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." (I. Cor. xv., 50.) His idea appears to have been, not that JESUS was restored bodily to life, but that he was raised "from the dead"; that he was released from SHEOL, the resting-place of departed souls, and had ascended in spiritual form to PARADISE, the dwelling-place of GOD and the angels, whence he would soon come to judge the world and inaugurate the HEAVENLY KINGDOM. (I. Cor. xv., 35–54.)

He considers the testimony of his own alleged vision of JESUS (I. Cor. ix., 1; xv., 8; Gal. i., 12, ff.) as of equal authority and similar character to that of the apostles and brethren who are said to have seen him soon after his death. (I. Cor. xv., 5–8.) PAUL, however, appears to have been subject to remarkable "visions" and peculiar subjective experiences, in which he admits that he could not tell whether he was "in the body or out of the body." (II. Cor. xii., 1–5.) His vision of JESUS was evidently of this subjective character. The different accounts of it do not agree one with another. (Acts ix., 3, ff.; xxii., 6, ff.; xxvi., 12, ff.) They also contradict the GOSPEL narratives, according to which JESUS had ascended to heaven long before this vision of PAUL. His testimony is evidently wholly inadequate to prove the alleged fact of the resurrection.

3. The Gospel Narratives of the Resurrection.

The TRIPLE TRADITION says nothing of any miraculous appearance of JESUS after death, or of his ascension to heaven; the last twelve verses of MARK being a late and spurious addition, not found in the older MANUSCRIPTS of the NEW TESTAMENT. The stories of the resurrection in Matthew, Luke, and John, unlike the statements of PAUL, represent the appearance of JESUS in physical form, with a body of blood, flesh, and bones, exhibiting the wounds received in the crucifixion. (Matt. xxviii.; Luke xxiv.; John xx., xxi.) He is represented as eating and drinking with his disciples, and assuring them that he was not a spirit. (Luke xxiv., 36–43; John xx., 22–29.) These GOSPEL stories are manifestly legends which grew up subsequent to the death of JESUS. As statements of fact, they rest upon no evidence worthy of credence.

NOTE A.—Trace the growth of the legend through the GOSPEL narratives. In Mark, the earliest GOSPEL, there is no account of the reappearance and ascension. (Mark xvi., 1–8.) In Matthew, the record of his reappearance is exceedingly brief, and there is no mention of his ascension. (Matt. xxviii., 9, 10, 16–20.) In Luke, the account is expanded into a lengthy and circumstantial story, concluding with his ascension to heaven (Luke xxiv.); while the Fourth and latest GOSPEL amplifies still further, and concludes with the remarkable assertion that "there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written."

NOTE B.—The SYNOPTICAL writers agree only as to the alleged fact that the body of JESUS was not found in the sepulchre on the third day after the crucifixion. Some critics have supposed that it had been surreptitiously abstracted by some of the disciples. RENAN even throws some doubt upon the fact of his actual death on the cross. (Life of Jesus, chapter XXVI.) The truth or falsity of the report that the body was missing is now impossible to be determined. There is manifestly no trustworthy evidence here of any miraculous or supernatural occurrence.

4. The Christian Doctrine of the Resurrection.

The belief in the continued life and "second coming" of JESUS appears to have been universal among the early CHRISTIANS. PAUL bases his hope of immortality and "salvation" wholly upon the fact of the resurrection. This faith has become a dogma of the CHRISTIAN Church. The creeds, however, substituted the less rational doctrine of the resurrection of the body for the more spiritual conception of PAUL.

Disappointed in their expectation of the speedy return of JESUS, his followers nevertheless clung, and still cling, to the belief that he has risen "from the dead," and ascended into HEAVEN. The true significance of this fact lies in the evidence which it offers of the profound impression which the moral greatness and noble personality of JESUS, and the lofty unselfishness of his doctrine, have left upon the world. It could not be believed that death could extinguish such a personality. Discarding, as we must, the miraculous and legendary element in the GOSPEL narratives, RATIONALISTS may, nevertheless, regard JESUS of Nazareth, the MAN, as one of the world's true saviors and noblest benefactors.

NOTE.—EASTER: The CHRISTIAN festival of the Resurrection is identical in time with the SPRING-FESTIVAL of the older systems of Nature-worship, which the Jews, also, have preserved in their Passover feast. "EASTER" derives its name from that of the goddess ISHTAR, or ASTARTE (Teut. OSTERA, OESTRE), the deity who presided over this period of rejoicing for the resurrection of vegetation, and the conquest of the beneficent SUN over the death-like reign of Winter.

Digitized by Google

General Questions.

1. Why did JESUS and the disciples journey to JERUSALEM? 2. How were they received there? 3. Tell the story of his arrest, trial, and crucifixion. 4. What was the Jewish penalty for blasphemy? 5. Wherein was JESUS alleged to have offended? 6. What was PAUL'S doctrine of the resurrection? 7. Did he believe in the revival of the physical body? 8. How must we regard his testimony to the resurrection of JESUS? 9. How do the GOSPEL stories report the resurrection? 10. What evidence do they present of the gradual growth of this legend? 11. What weight ought we to give to their testimony? 12. How has the CHRISTIAN world regarded the resurrection? 13. What is the true significance of the survival of this belief? 14. What is the origin and meaning of "EASTER"?

To the Teacher.

This LESSON concludes the present series, which covers the period of the GOSPEL narratives, and the general topic of the Life and Teachings of JESUS. It is hoped that classes may be interested thereby to continue the study of the history of the ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY; tracing its development under the influence of PAUL and the early CHRISTIAN Fathers: the growth of ecclesiastical institutions; the history of the CATHOLIC CHURCH, the REFORMATION, and the different steps in the direction of rational interpretation and COMPLETE MENTAL FREEDOM since the birth of PROTESTANTISM. Such a course of study would prove of the greatest interest and value to all who would think wisely and deeply as well as freely upon these important topics.

Concerning this lesson, read the Bible for Learners, Vol. III., Book I., chapters XXXVI., XXXVII.; Book II., chapter I.; the lecture on "The Death and Resurrection," in SAVAGE'S Talks about Jesus: the last chapters of RENAN'S Life of Jesus; and chapter III. in SCHLESINGER'S Historical Jesus of Nazareth. Rev. JOHN WHITE CHADWICK'S forthcoming volume on The Man Jesus will contain an interesting and valuable presentation of the subject treated in these Lessons, from the stand-point of sympathetic RATIONALISM.

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

FOREIGN.

THE parliamentary paper lately issued, containing statistics as to the number of evictions in Ireland during the past two-and-thirty years, is a timely contribution to the discussion of the Land Bill. In 1860 there were 2,987 persons turned out of house and home for non-payment of rent. In 1880, the number was 10,457, notwithstanding the "terrorism" of the Land League, which was supposed to overawe the tyrannical desires of the landlords. How many will there be this year, if the Land Bill is not passed?

THE society founded for the purpose of securing in all the countries of Europe a public feeling in favor of international arbitration seems to be making some progress. It seeks to secure peace by creating an international tribunal. Branches of it have already been established in Germany, Switzerland, France, Spain, and Italy. Of the German branch, Herr Lasker has become the president. Victor Hugo is likely to become the president for France, and Signor Castelar the president for Spain. It is very probable that a series of meetings will be held in the large towns, to arouse English feeling in favor of the new scheme.

THE ancient Church of St. Saviour's, Southwark, is attracting a good deal of notice just now. Not only are the parishioners engaged in the slow process of electing a new chaplain, which would be proper enough if it were a Dissenting chapel, and not a branch of the State Church, but they are also being summoned for church rates. Most of us were under the impression that the compulsory levying of church rates had been abolished some years ago; but St. Saviour's, Southwark, is one of the few exceptions to the rule, and on Saturday several workingmen and others were summoned for not paying the shilling or two claimed from each of them, and put to great trouble in learning that they were really liable for the amounts. When will such nuisances be put a stop to?—Weekly Despatch, May 1.

THE SALVATION ARMY NUISANCE.—A party of the Salvation Army have on several occasions invaded Keynsham, near Bath; and their loud and vigorous demonstrations have caused much derision, and not a few riotous scenes have resulted. In consequence of these, the authorities recently bade the leaders of a procession which paraded the streets to halt and disperse; but they defied the police, and asked for the by-laws of the town, which is a small one. They then marched to a dissenting chapel, and commenced a service, which proved to be anything but a decorous one. During it, a member of the Army accused a "native" of creating a disturbance; and one of the congregation proceeded, notwithstanding his protestations of innocence, to eject him. His friends objected; and a free fight ensued, which ended in the Army being repulsed and ultimately defeated.

LLANDEGFAN CHURCH, which is attached to Beaumaris rectory, was on a late Sunday the scene of a singular occurrence. A commission having reported to the bishop that there was non-performance of duty in the parish, there being no resident curate, his lordship nominated one himself. At the close of the morning service, the curate read his authority under the bishop, and notified that he would hold evening service. The rector protested, and declared he would permit no intruders in his church, padlocked the doors, and drove away. The church-wardens, acting under the advice of the bishop's secretary, subsequently forced the doors; and the curate conducted the evening service. Upon the information of the rector of Beaumaris, summonses have been taken out against Mr. R. Lloyd James, secretary to the Bishop of Bangor, Mr. R. Parry, church-warden, and a number of other persons who were concerned in the forcible entry.

IN the sketch of Lord Beaconsfield's private life which appeared in the Times, there is a passage relating to his wife, which goes far to explain the domestic felicity enjoyed by the deceased statesman: "Lady Beaconsfield, almost till her last hour, spared her husband all cares connected with daily existence. It was her practice to wade through masses of the papers and ephemeral literature of the day, in order to extract all that might interest him. It may truly be said that in each event of life she strove to find something to gratify him. By the exercise of her power of discriminating organization, the household at Hughenden and in Grosvenor Street was maintained on a footing consistent with the dignity of the statesman. She bestowed thought on every detail; and nothing was too minute for her to study, if it could contribute to the gratification of him to whom she was a faithful helpmate. When near fourscore years, she exerted herself in a manner that might have given a lesson to a woman of thirty."

JESTINGS.

AN enthusiast is an individual who believes about four times az much az he kan prove, and he kan prove about four times az much az anybodey believes.—Josh Billings.

JUDGE: "See here, prisoner, if you do any more lying, you won't get off with three years." Prisoner: "But, Judge, how many years d'ye s'pose y'd gimme if I told the truth?"

A LITTLE boy takes up the sermon which he has heard his father preach that morning, and says: "Papa, I don't quite understand what this sermon means. Won't you please to get the meanness out of it for me?"

"AND did your late husband die in hope of a blessed immortality, Sister Wiggins?" inquired the new minister, who was making his first call on a fair widow of his congregation. "Bless you, no!" was the mournful response: "he died in Chicago."

AN exchange tells of a man who had $65 stolen from him, and who soon after received $25 with the following note: "I stoled your money. Remorse naws at my conshens, and I send you some of it back. When remorse naws again, I'll send you some more."

A FAMOUS surgeon advises one of his patients to undergo an operation. "Is it very severe?" asks the patient. "Not for the patient," says the doctor, "we put him to sleep, but very hard on the operator." "How so?" "We suffer terribly from anxiety. Just think, it only succeeds once in a hundred times!"

A GOOD parson, who had the happy faculty of saying a good word for everybody in whose behalf one could possibly be said recently officiated at the funeral of a farmer who was known to be the meanest and most miserable man in the neighborhood. Instead of execrating the deceased for his extortionate and niggardly habits, this kindly disposed clergyman simply spoke of him as "the best arithmetician in the county."

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.

OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. CLARK is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

On the 1st of July, 1880, the Free Religious Association assumed the publication of the Free Religious Index. This responsibility was undertaken without the funds necessary for the enterprise, but in the trust that the appeal for means, sent out a few weeks previous, would bring a sufficient response to insure the publication for at least a year. That trust has been justified. Somewhat more than $2,100 has been received; and this sum, in addition to the regular receipts from the Index, will be nearly or quite sufficient to insure the publication till July. In this year of experiment there has been, moreover, an increase in the subscription list of the paper,—an increase sufficiently encouraging to justify the continuance of the Index under the auspices of the Association.

But the Index is not financially self-sustaining; nor without an unprecedented sudden increase in its subscription list is it likely to become so at a very early day on its present business basis. In a careful consideration of ways and means for continuing the publication, the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association have resolved to make an effort to raise at once the sum of $10,000; and the undersigned have been appointed a committee to carry this resolution into effect. This sum, if raised, would certainly insure the continuance of the paper on its present financial basis for a number of years; but it is believed by some of our most competent advisers that in the course of two or three years, by a judicious use of this sum, under energetic management the paper may be made pecuniarily self-supporting.

The committee, a few months ago, privately invited a conference of a few friends of the Index in Boston, at which this and other plans were freely discussed. The plan above proposed was met by most cordial and encouraging approval, not only in words, but in substantial deeds for carrying it into effect. Among the sixteen persons present, subscriptions were made to the amount of $2,300. This has since been increased by the addition of other names to $4,245. And to this it is proposed to add the legacy of $1,000 left by Mrs. Lydia Maria Child unconditionally to the Free Religious Association for the spread of its principles. Her expressed interest in the Index has led the committee to believe that this disposition of her bequest would fully meet her approval. Putting Mrs. Child's bequest at the head of the list, we have already $5,245 pledged, and most of it paid into the treasury.

With this auspicious beginning, it should not be a difficult task to raise the balance from the friends of the Free Religious Association and of the Index throughout the country. But, in order to do it, there must be a considerable number of responses in large sums, corresponding to some of those already on the list. Will not those of our friends who have large means measure the extent of their obligation thereby? But let not those of smaller means feel excluded from the opportunity. If all who believe in the Index do what they can, the fund will be raised; and we hope it may be raised speedily.

Pledges or cash subscriptions may be sent to the "FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION," 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston; but all checks or money-orders should be made payable to the order of John C. Haynes, Treasurer.

(Signed) R. P. HALLOWELL, JOHN C. HAYNES, HANNAH E. STEVENSON, EDNAH D. CHENEY, WM. J. POTTER, } Committee.

Subscriptions to Special Index Fund.

Lydia Maria Child's Legacy, devoted to this object by vote of Executive Committee of Free Religious Association	$1,000.00
Mrs. Sarah S. Russell	500.00
Mrs. E. N. Hallowell	100.00
Miss Hannah E. Stevenson	100.00
John L. Whiting	200.00
Cornelius Wellington	100.00
Mrs. Charles Fairchild	120.00
Miss Emma D. Ireson	100.00
Miss Julia A. Ireson	100.00
Miss Kate C. Ireson	200.00
Miss Helen M. Ireson	100.00
Mrs. Benjamin Ireson	100.00
Miss Matilda Goddard	100.00
Mrs. Anna D. Hallowell	100.00
John C. Haynes	500.00
Charles Nash	500.00
Mrs. Charles P. Curtis	25.00
John M. Forbes	500.00
Henry L. Higginson	200.00
Matthew Luce	100.00
E. R. Knapp	100.00
Henry S. Russell	100.00
J. Malcolm Forbes	100.00
Henry W. Wellington	100.00
Rev. Photius Fiske	100.00
	$5,245.00

"An original thinker and an eloquent expounder of fruitful truth."

GEORGE H. CALVERT'S WORKS.

"Few men, probably none living, are his equals in the department to which he has given his especial attention. His books are genuine æsthetic studies in the best sense of the word."—Newport News.

Fine English Cloth. Price per vol. $1.50.

Essays Æsthetical.
Brief Essays and Brevities.
Some of the Thoughts of Joseph Joubert.
First Years in Europe.
Life and Work of Goethe. An Essay.
Charlotte von Stein. A Memoir. With Portrait.
Life of Rubens. With Portrait.
Arnold and Andre. An Historical Drama.
Wordsworth. A Biographic and Æsthetic Study. With Portrait.
Shakespeare. A Study.
Coleridge, Shelley, and Goethe. Biographic and Æsthetic Studies.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

METROPOLE
INSURANCE COMPANY,
OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,
No. 20 Kilby Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, Esq.,
Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.

GEORGE M. BARNARD, Esq.,
Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.

WILLIAM P. HUNT, Esq.,
President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1 50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which attracted so great attention, when first published, are now furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

UNMOUNTED PHOTOGRAPHS

Of ANCIENT and MODERN WORKS of ART, embracing reproductions of famous original paintings, sculpture, architectural subjects, etc. Price, cabinet size, $1.50 per dozen. Send stamp for catalogue of 1,000 subjects. JOHN P. SOULE, publisher, 338 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the

REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

As made by the most eminent scholars of England and America. Half the price of Corresponding English Edition. Large type, linen super-calendered paper, elegant binding. A separate "Comprehensive History of the Bible and its Translations," including a full account of the New Revision, given to subscribers. Best chance for agents ever offered. Send stamp for particulars at once.

The Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES	10c
SKULLS	10
GHOSTS	10
HELL	10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD	10
GODS	10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT	10
HUMAN RIGHTS	10
HEREAFTER	10
TOM PAINE	10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at $3 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli } SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 597.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 49.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

MERE suppression of vice does not constitute virtue. Can that be love which does not lead to vigilance with its object, or that loyalty which does not lead to instruction of its object?—Confucius.

I AM not at all uneasy that I came into, and have so far passed my course in, this world; because I have so lived in it that I have reason to believe that I have been of some use to it; and, when the close comes, I shall quit life as I would an inn, and not as a real home. For nature appears to me to have ordained this station here for us, as a place of sojournment, a transitory abode only, and not as a fixed settlement or permanent habitation.—Cicero.

IF, in conformity to right reason, you transact whatever affairs you have in hand with attention, steadiness, and benevolence, and without suffering anything foreign to your present purpose to interfere, you pay the same deference to the divine monitor within you as if you were the next moment to part for ever; if you can thus persevere, inattentive to anything further, and without shrinking from any difficulty, and act with simplicity and energy, according to the nature of the present business, with an heroic regard to truth in all your words,—you will thus secure a happy life. Now, it is not in the power of any one to prevent your acting thus.—Marcus Aurelius.

CONSCIOUS virtue is the only solid foundation of all happiness; for riches, power, rank, or whatever in the common acceptation of the word is supposed to constitute happiness, will never quiet, much less cure, the inward pangs of guilt.—Lord Chesterfield.

NO ONE can rank so high in the scale of mental excellence that it will be a letting down of his dignity to guide and inform any of his fellow-creatures.—E. H. Chapin.

IS IT not a kind of materialism so to exaggerate the life that eats and drinks and sees and feels as to deny the name of life to all that the living being does and creates and inspires, to deny the name of soul to the unity of this doing, creating, and inspiring force? The great brain and heart of him [John Stuart Mill] whom every line of these pages recalls to us now rest in peace beside the Rhone, near her who ceased not to live in his life, as his too will be continued in the lives of many more hereafter. His thought and spirit inspire generations now, and will continue their work to the end, as potently as they did yesterday when his heart was beating, with the same vitality now that it is still. For us, he lives and acts: we grow yet in his learning, we are kindled by his enthusiasm, we ponder over his reasoning. He sleeps there in the body, but his soul is not sleeping. He is but one whom we no longer see, as a living friend might be who were far distant and infirm, whose lifelong task were done. But we hear his voice still; and his work is ever taking new form. He has ceased to sow the seed abroad in the soil, but the seed has not ceased to grow. The grains of it are now numbered; but who shall number the fruit that it shall bear, and the harvests of which that fruit shall in time be the seed? What consciousness may be to such a one we know not, and of that we keep a solemn silence. But we know that the life is not ended here on earth, that its better part among us is but begun, and that we of all others have a right to say, O Death! where is thy sting? O Grave! where is thy victory?—Frederic Harrison.

CURRENT TOPICS.

BOSTON seems to be the only place left that keeps up an "Anniversary Week" with anything of the old spirit. In New York and Philadelphia there are still seasons for anniversary meetings; but the meetings are mainly business gatherings, of which the general public takes no note.

THE enterprise of the Western press is rigidly impartial. In piety or politics, it is all the same. As soon as the revised New Testament was let out of its imprisonment in New York, the telegraph was set to work to despatch it to the Chicago newspapers, and was kept at it until the mail had time to carry copies there, in order that, by means of the telegraph and the mail together, the Sunday papers might print as much of the book as possible. Apropos of this energetic action and of the comments on the revision, the Boston Traveller says: "The manner in which the Western newspapers tackle the revised New Testament awakens painful suspicions. Some of the reviewers fail to note the date of the first edition, and treat it as an entirely new work."

THE Hebrews in Washington have petitioned the School Board of the District that, in the appointment of school holidays, they will not discriminate on account of religious observances. They properly protest against a rule recently adopted by the Board, that "children, Christians, who desire to stay at home on Good Friday and Easter Monday, shall not be counted absent," and ask that "if, on a day kept sacred in the family to which the scholar belongs, the pupil is absent, let him or her be marked absent as for any other cause, thus avoiding, even by implication, the recognition of any class as favored. Thus, the child absent on Good Friday is marked absent; the child absent on the Day of Atonement is on an equal footing. Any different rule is unjust, unjustifiable, and un-American."

THE Presbyterian is becoming more and more exercised over the fact that the Episcopal Church gets most of the chaplaincies in the United States army and navy. It exclaims indignantly in its last issue: "The time has come to break up this pest, this oppression, this proselyting by the government itself. The General Assembly of our Church ought to move, in concert with such other of the Evangelical churches as with ourselves feel the pinch of the exclusion, and seek a remedy at the earliest possible opportunity. When we say the Assembly ought to coöperate with other Evangelical churches to rectify this matter, we do not for a moment think of excluding any effort at equity in all directions, wherever there is not a fair representation of our common Christianity in these public positions." But what about a fair representation of those who are outside of this "common Christianity"? Equity should be large enough to go round the entire circle of our common citizenship.

THE New York Sun has started a slanderous story against Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, charging that he is implicated in the Star-route frauds, on which, in spite of Mr. Blaine's prompt denial, it will probably continue to ring the changes for months to come, unless stopped by a libel suit. If innocent, Mr. Blaine owes it, not only to himself, but to the country, for which he holds such honorable and conspicuous office, to bring at once such a suit. It is full time that this kind of calumny against public men were dealt with with all the severity the law allows. A newspaper denial is not sufficient. And unfortunately, in Mr. Blaine's case, his omission to vindicate himself fully against a former charge of corrupt action makes it more easy for a suspicion to remain with regard to him than with regard to a man like Mr. Evarts, for instance, his predecessor in the same office, whose integrity had never been questioned. Yet the Sun's story appears to have been made up wantonly out of whole cloth.

PROF. RUSSEL, of Cornell University, denies the report that his resignation of his offices there was asked for because he would not invite Mr. Beecher to preach in the University Chapel. It seems to be becoming more clear that Mr. Russel's liberal religious views were the real cause of his being compelled to resign. The Christian Union says: "The real causes for that resignation are not obscure. The students have fallen off in numbers from year to year, under an administration which had alarmed those parents who desire their children to be under Christian influence; and, as almost all parents desire this for their children, including those who are liberals or agnostics themselves, it is not strange that the Board of Trustees were compelled at last to call for a change of administration, and this without casting any reflection upon the personal character of the administrator. The action has been indirectly sanctioned by the resident alumni at Ithaca, who, by a vote of thirty-two to five, have tabled a resolution questioning it, and tacitly sanctioned by the Faculty itself."

ONE of the leading Roman Catholic ecclesiastics of New York has recently reminded his people of their power in that city, and endeavored to impress upon them the importance of making it subservient to the support of a press that shall be the direct ally of their system. According to his statement there are five hundred thousand Roman Catholics in New York, who contribute a large proportion of support to some of its daily papers. He intimates that it is not only the proper thing for them to do, but also their bounden duty to withdraw their patronage from the non-Catholic papers, and concentrate it upon the establishment of wholly Catholic ones. This policy, of course, would tend very much to consolidate and strengthen the Roman Catholic system. It proceeds from the assumption that the supreme obligation of Roman Catholic citizens in this country is, as their chief aim should be, to seek to build up their Church, to augment its exclusive power and influence. Could anything better exemplify its essential and natural opposition to the free diffusion of enlightenment and intelligence?

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

IDEAL AND PERSONAL BEAUTY.

BY WILEY BRITTON.

It does not require an extensive knowledge of human nature to see that different races and different individuals of the same race have different conceptions of personal beauty. Nay, the same individual's conceptions of beauty are by no means constant. Culture may, and frequently does, develop dull and unappreciative æsthetic faculties into very keen and appreciative ones. Again, keen and appreciative æsthetic faculties may become blunted and unappreciative after the individual has been long withdrawn from cultured society and its concomitants, and placed in the midst of rude and uncultured society and its concomitants.

The ideal man or woman of any one belonging to the lower human races—as Esquimaux or Fuegians, for instance—would not be our ideal man or woman. Nor would the ideal man or woman of many of the uncultured belonging to the most civilized races be the ideal man or woman of the foremost artists of sculpture and painting, of the leading civilized nations. And in this connection it seems probable that most people are unable to represent in imagination human forms and expressions more perfect, or at most only slightly more perfect, than the best specimens of forms and expressions around them. I think, too, that there is reason to doubt whether the ideal man or woman, of the artist of genius even, is of a much higher type than some of the best specimens of men and women whom he has seen. Again, every one's ideal type of beauty, could it be produced in bronze or marble or painted, would no doubt reflect the race-type to which he belonged or with which he had been brought up. Religious characters, such as saints and holy families, of whom no likenesses are supposed to have been made during their lives, are sometimes represented by German artists with the German type of expression, by Italian artists with the Italian type of expression, and by French artists with the French type of expression, even in face of the fact that the saint or other holy person whom the statue or painting was intended to represent had belonged to a different race-type than that of the artist. Hence, the experienced art-critic would perhaps, in most cases of ideal pictures or statues of men and women, be able to decide from the expression of any given picture or statue the race or nationality of the artist who produced it. But while the most accomplished artists of the leading civilized nations of Indo-Aryan origin, if left to themselves to produce in marble or on canvas an ideal type of man or woman, would not likely quite agree with each other in their ideals, their works would probably correspond in so many leading traits that it would be almost impossible for an impartial critic to justly say why one should be preferred rather than another.

The system of physical culture which the Greeks adopted produced men and women of such perfect types that there was no need for artists of the Greek classic period to severely exercise their imaginations to produce fine types of men and women in marble, bronze, or painting. It was only required that the artist should be able to closely imitate the living model which he daily saw nude in the gymnasium or palæstra, to be sure of a good statue. There can be scarcely a doubt but that the great development of Greek sculpture was largely due to the splendid system of physical culture which was everywhere attended to with almost religious regard. It may also be remarked that the Greeks produced the perfect type of man in marble almost simultaneously with his perfect development by physical culture. It would be easy to point to evidence from other sources, showing that, when a people take a deep interest in the physical culture of their members, they also generally take a deep interest in art culture; that is, so far as it relates to ideal representations of the human form and expression.

Not only was physical culture thoroughly enforced in bringing up the young, but the young to be brought up were generally fine specimens, born of fine, healthy, and perfectly formed parents, who thought of no greater distinction than the rearing of beautiful, physically perfect, and accomplished offspring. A rigid selection of the healthiest and most perfectly formed children to rear, and the destruction of the weakly and ill-formed ones, produced among the Spartans, while the laws of Lykurgus were respected and enforced, a race of men and women of the highest conceivable type of physical perfection and beauty.

Races that differ so widely in their features as the peoples of Indo-Aryan origin and Chinese and Africans, we cannot reasonably hope will ever adopt a common standard of ideal beauty. A type of personal beauty considered perfect by those best fitted to judge among peoples of Indo-Aryan origin, we know very well would not be regarded as a perfect type of beauty by the most accomplished Chinese artists and scholars. A Chinaman, cultured or uncultured, requires his ideal men and women to be of the Mongolian type, with oblique eyes, high cheek-bones, broad faces, and small, flat noses, nearly even with the faces at the upper part of the bridge. Europeans, with their white skins and prominent noses, are not only not admired in China, but thought to have horrid features. And, among some tribes of negroes in Africa, a white man is thought to look like an old ape; and, among some Australians, he is thought of as a ghost. It is the almost uniform testimony of travellers, and those who have written upon the customs, manners, and modes of life of the inferior races, that nearly every people, no matter how insignificant a place they occupy in the world's history, regard themselves as superior to all other peoples. And if they have reached an intellectual development admitting of belief in fetishism, or the practice of a higher form of worship, they sometimes regard themselves as "specially chosen." While this racial and patriotic bias has from the first been essential to social integration and development, it has unquestionably been a bar to properly estimating other peoples, their institutions and laws. Frenchmen, for instance, prefer the French type of expression to the German type of expression, and vice versa. But a Frenchwoman who is thought beautiful by Frenchmen would also be thought beautiful by Germans, and vice versa. Again, a woman considered beautiful by her own race would probably be considered beautiful in comparison with other women of her race by all other races that can be said to have definite æsthetic conceptions. Her type of beauty, however, would not, as a general thing, serve as an ideal for any other race than that to which she belonged. As an exception, it may be noted that among exogamous tribes foreign women are perhaps generally regarded as handsome or even more handsome than native women. But among the lower races there is nothing to show that beauty is much taken into account in the unions of the sexes. The woman is generally a slave and drudge to the man; and, in taking or capturing a wife, it is of little consequence to him whether she be handsome or ugly. It is a fact that will hardly be contested from any source that among those peoples or tribes where the status of women is the lowest and most degraded there they are the ugliest or hardest featured. Not until something like courtship commences, which is almost unknown among the lower races, do the personal attractions of either sex play an important part in leading to the unions of couples. But when women are sought for as wives by men chiefly on account of their personal attractions they are likely to be better treated, and the unions more permanent, than when such qualifications are little or not at all thought of. A tribe or people among whom courtships are unknown and personal attractions little thought of by those about to enter into marital relations will be more conspicuous for the large proportion of unattractive members than for the large proportion of attractive members. Those species of birds and animals among whom courtships are established peculiarities between males and females before the hatching and birth of offspring are more conspicuous for their beautiful forms and colors than the birds and animals among whom such peculiarities are known not to exist. The unions of couples resulting from courtships must have commenced among the fair-skinned races at a much earlier period than among the dark-skinned races, on account of the greater clearness or distinctness with which the fair face reflects many of the complex emotions. It is true we can interpret very accurately certain emotions of dark-skinned persons by the eyes, by the contractions and relaxations of facial muscles, by the raising and drawing down of the eyebrows, by the pouching, biting, and eversion of the lips, by certain movements of the nostrils, expansion of the alæ, etc.; but there are numerous finer shades of feeling which spring from the tender emotions, and the emotions akin to love, that can scarcely be interpreted except by the coloring of the face, or the vermeil tinting of the cheeks of a fair-skinned person, and which would be partially or wholly invisible in the faces of dark-skinned persons. What will arouse a wave of the æsthetic emotion in any one of a keen æsthetic temperament quicker than the innocent blush of a healthy fair maiden of our race? Poets who are usually more sensitive to the beauties of nature than other people have not failed to appropriate the words "blush" and "blushing" as special poetic property. Among a rude people of fair skins, during the courtships of the young folks, the blush must often have given a deeper meaning to the emotions than was possible to be conveyed by undeveloped language. We should regard a man as almost destitute of the finer sentiments of human nature who could witness the innocent blush of a beautiful fair-skinned young lady without an æsthetic thrill. Such words as "the blushing rose," "rosy lips," and "rosy-fingered," it is not likely would ever have been thought of in connection with the emotional natures of dark-skinned peoples.

We now come to this question, Of the different types of ideal beauty throughout the world, may not an equally good argument be framed in support of any one of them, as the most perfect and most worthy of adoption by all races? To this question, a negative reply must be given, provided the subject be considered, as is here proposed, from the evolution point of view. If all the higher forms of life have been evolved from lower forms, as all evolutionists believe, it must be admitted that some species of the same order, some varieties of the same species, and some individuals of the same variety, ought to represent higher and more perfect types of life than others. A little explanation of the sense in which the terms "high" and "low" forms of life are here used will be useful. A creature, whose life is made up of few, simple, and relatively homogeneous actions, adjusted to only a few simple changes in its environment, we regard as a low form of life. But, coming to the human race, we may regard an individual whose life is made up of the most numerous and involved actions, directed to the achievement of remote ends, as representing the highest form of life. Fuegians, Bushmen, and Australians cannot, therefore, be classed as the highest types of men, but on the contrary as the lowest. We know very well that their present actions are never regulated with the view of aiding them to achieve certain desired results twenty years hence, nor perhaps even one year hence; for they do not lay out their plans of life so far into the future. When the Indians of the Californian Peninsula were first visited by missionaries, their present actions were never regulated with the view of achieving certain ends two or three days in the future. They had no time measure, and did not even know the meaning of year or month; and few of them could count higher than six. A European's present actions are not only regulated with the view of aiding him to achieve a certain end twenty years hence, but they are often regulated with the view of aiding unborn men a thousand years hence to achieve certain definite results. For instance, the astronomer of a thousand years in the future may be guided by the calculations and instructions of an astronomer of the present day to observe from a particular place the transit of a given planet over the face of the sun, or some other unusual interesting celestial or terrestrial phenomenon. It is a familiar fact to every one that a large proportion of our present actions are regulated with the view of accomplishing certain future ends. And we criticise those whose present actions have no reference to future contingencies, and who make no present sacrifices for the comforts of the closing periods of their lives.

Now, those races or peoples manifesting the least involved actions, adjusted to ends the least remote in space and time, are races that depart most widely from our ideal of physical perfection. Bandy-legs and disproportionate bellies are, according to the accounts of travellers, much more common among the lower human races than among the civilized races. And it is easy to see that the gaits or movements of individuals having these structural peculiarities must be clumsy, and wanting in ease and gracefulness. It may be noted here, however, that there are peoples generally classed as very low in the human scale who are yet reported to be rather well formed in body and limbs, and whose locomotion is not particularly faulty. Some of the lower Californian tribes who have many very degraded habits, and whose modes of life are about as primitive as human life can well be, may be named as such. This fact, at first thought, seems to tell against the doctrine just stated, that the lower races, as we class many of those small groups of men who are without any marked division of labor and whose actions are adjusted only to present needs, are less perfect in form and structure than the great and dominant civilized races. While none of the lower races are, perhaps, quite as perfect in physique as the civilized races, we can readily see why there should be occasional instances where a tribe ought to approach very nearly the civilized races in perfection of physique. It is an implication of the doctrine of evolution that all progress is rhythmical; and the history of every people, could we but know it, has been as often marked by periods of retrogression as by periods of progression, for there have been dissolutions of the body politic or social organism as well as of the physical organism of the social unit. The immense ruins of the decayed civilization of Central America and Mexico are unquestionable evidences that a race elaborately organized politically, and far advanced in many of the industrial arts and sciences, once occupied those regions. The Yuca civilization was, perhaps, but little inferior to the Egyptian civilization of the Nile Valley. What has become of the race that built those once great cities of Central America, and that had such an elaborately organized and complicated social system as is implied by the stupendous ruins of those cities? Remnants of that race, we have warrant for believing, were long scattered in isolated groups over the North and South American continents; and, if any of those isolated groups exist yet, they ought to show physical organizations not much inferior in many respects to their considerably civilized ancestors. How far an unfavorable environment, entailing degraded habits and disuse of faculties and organs, will undo for a highly perfected organization what evolution through thousands of generations has done, is a question upon which there seems to have been collected very little evidence. So far as I can see, the evidence furnished by palæontology indicates that, rather than initiate any very radical changes in the way of lowering the physical organization of a species, an unfavorable environment gradually entails extinction. It is not a new idea that most of the Indian tribes of this continent are rather rapidly dying out on account of their environments becoming more and more unsuitable to their nomadic and hunting modes of life. The Tasmanians have become extinct within the last century. I think, therefore, where we find tribes like some of those of South Africa, with an unusual number of individuals having bandy legs, prognathous jaws, and a simian-like locomotion, that the chances are largely in favor of the conclusion that they descended from truly primitive men, and that they probably never had ancestors much, if any, further advanced in social evolution than themselves. We thus see how cautious we should be about imagining that races we are in the habit of classing as "lower" really represent primitive men very nearly in many peculiarities of physical organization. We should also bear in mind that, though the corporate life of a nation may be brought to a close by a shock, such as an invasion by a more powerful and warlike people, yet that fragments of this nation, to avoid destruction, may escape into inhospitable and isolated habitats and, by adopting simpler and relatively degraded modes of life, long survive.

Digitized by Google

Flattened tibia are regarded by some writers, who have given a good deal of attention to ethnological researches, as a simian characteristic. The "Mound-builders," whose wonderful earth-works and relics are scattered over the Mississippi Valley and the regions of the Great Lakes, were probably a platycnemic race; that is, a race having flattened tibia. A large number of tibia taken from ancient mounds in Michigan, and carefully measured, show a remarkable compression, equalling, and in some instances surpassing, the flattening of the homologous bones in the legs of the gorilla or chimpanzee. A sabre-like curvature also characterized all these tibia. It has also been shown by cavern researches that the cave-men of France and Britain were platycnemic. But no theory satisfactory to the majority of ethnologists has yet been propounded to account for these remarkable peculiarities, and to indicate their ethnological significance. We only know that they were much more common among some of the most ancient races that we have any knowledge of, inhabiting remote localities from each other, than among existing human races, barbarous or civilized.

Perforations of the inferior extremity of the humeri are also regarded by some ethnologists as characteristic of the lower human races and of the higher simian types. As this peculiarity, however, is found in the most evolved white races, though perhaps in less numerous instances than in the extinct races of men and existing higher types of simia, I think we should be cautious about attaching much importance to it in connection with inferiority of race. It has been suggested that the peculiarity may be correlated with the habit, known to be quite prevalent among some barbarous peoples, of going on "all fours," like a creeping child. There may be something in the suggestion. We sometimes see pictures of Indians stealthily approaching game or enemies in attitudes very nearly of all fours, the weight of the body in locomotion being thrown on three limbs, one of the hands being left free to carry the weapons.

It is easy to satisfy one's self, by simple inspection of the jaws belonging to the skulls of the collection in the Army Medical Museum, Washington, that the jaws and teeth of the lower human races are relatively larger than the jaws and teeth of the most evolved white races. These characteristics, however, are not difficult to account for. Among the lowest barbarians, the teeth and jaws are required to do work in the tearing, manipulating, and breaking down of food, from which our teeth and jaws are almost entirely exempt by our elaborate culinary appliances. As an illustration of the hard work constantly required of the jaws and teeth of the lower races, we shall again refer to the lower Californians, among whom it is related that they were in the habit, when an animal was killed, not only of devouring those parts which we reject, but literally the raw skin. It is easy to see, therefore, that powerful jaws and teeth would be required to put such tough food into a fit state for assimilation and digestion. Here is a fit place to remark that the "swelled stomachs," frequently mentioned by travellers as peculiarities of many of the lower races, are due to the immense quantities of coarse food, when plentiful, the savage is obliged to take in, to enable him to meet the long fasts to which he is from time to time subjected. Mr. Herbert Spencer, in his Principles of Sociology, quotes a statement to the effect that it is not an unusual thing for a Yakut to devour forty pounds of meat in a day; and Jacob Baegert, a German Jesuit missionary, who lived seventeen years during the second half of the last century among the lower Californians, says that "twenty-four pounds of meat in twenty-four hours is not deemed an extraordinary ration for a single person." Individuals known to the missionary, who were gaunt one day from want of food, became so corpulent the next day by gorging that he says he could scarcely recognize them.

Let us return for a moment to the farther consideration of the jaws, and to that peculiarity of them termed prognathism. It should also be mentioned in this connection that the projections of the upper and lower front teeth almost invariably co-exist with this peculiarity. Of the various morphological and physiological peculiarities discovered by anatomists and physiologists, showing the kinship of man to the simian types, none are perhaps more convincing of such kinship than that of prognathism. And I think it will be admitted by every one competent to have an opinion on the subject that there is not the remotest evidence that an environment, no matter what radical changes it might entail in the habits and modes of life of the white races, would ever make them prognathous. Looking at the matter from an unprejudiced stand-point and in the full light of modern science, it seems difficult to doubt that the peculiarity has been transmitted from generation to generation from a remote ancestor who possessed it even more strongly marked,—whose jaws projected more and whose foreheads receded in a greater degree than among the races just named, thus forming a facial angle more sharply defined than the facial angles of the lowest existing savages.

The enormous development of the superciliary ridges, which we regard as a detraction from beauty, is also a characteristic of the lower races, particularly those of warlike and hunting habits, and who have long led lives of conflict with ferocious wild animals. In struggling with an enemy, or in looking at distant objects to discover whether they were enemies or prey, an efficient shading of the eyes from the direct rays of the sun must have been an advantage in the struggle for existence from the beginning. And those individuals in whom the peculiarity was most marked would be most likely to survive, and leave offspring with slightly increased development of the homologous parts, so long as their increased development continued to be an advantage to the individual in the struggle for life. But I do not conceive that great development of the superciliary ridges is a necessary consequence of all savage life. If the nature of his environment does not bring the savage into frequent conflicts with wild animals and other savages, and he lives mainly on vegetable food and insects and by fishing, as is sometimes the case, there would be no tendency to the development of the superciliary ridges in an unusual degree.

Flat noses, thick lips, and high cheek-bones are characteristics of the lower types of men, and are also recognized as facial defects among ourselves. The lowest savages are not only like the child of civilized man in their unreflective actions and emotional natures, but they are also like it in some respects in being incomplete in morphological development. The flatness of the nose and the spreading of its alæ are embryonic traits of the civilized man, and disappear and the individual assumes the normal type of the species, when full growth is attained. Anatomists and physiologists have pointed out that there are other parts in the lowest types of men in a very incompletely developed condition; but their mention in connection with the subject under consideration does not particularly concern us.

We will now glance at some of the prominent characteristics of an ideal Greek head, as represented in marble by the great masters of the Greek classic periods. In the first place, it is conspicuous for the largeness of the facial angle, which is now not only considered an element of beauty, but is generally regarded as a measure of mental capacity. At first sight, we are impressed with the fact that the bridge of the nose is higher and more nearly on a line with the forehead than we usually find it among the best specimens of our race of the present day. The forehead is prominent, the superciliary ridges are not excessively developed, the cheek-bones are so small that their projections are barely discernible, the face is straight and oval, and falls perpendicularly under the anterior regions of the head, the eyes are straight and directed slightly downwards, the mouth is small and upper lip deeply concave, the chin is on a line with the forehead and frontward parts of the face, and the jaws do not show the slightest of that prognathism which we have seen is a characteristic of the lower types of men. Though this is not, of course, a complete analysis of the ideal Greek head, there is enough of it to show what transcendent conceptions of beauty the Greeks had during the golden age of sculpture. Suppose we look at a young lady of Indo-Aryan type to whom the above outline analysis could be applied, whose crimson face, properly fleshed out, is sparkling with emotions caused by the revival in memory of some beautiful scene or pleasant associations; and we shall then be able to appreciate the remark of the Trojan elders when Helen came near them, that "Trojans and Grecians wage, with fair excuse, long war for so much beauty." If we would appreciate with the eye of an art-critic, trained in modern psychology, the ideal human figure in its totality, we must pass under consideration the proportion of parts to height, and also the proportionate girths of parts expressed in autometric lines. The evolution of sculpture shows, if we may be guided by the development of Greek sculpture, which we know has been from a rude and indefinite to a highly perfected state, that the proportion of parts to height, and the proportionate girths of parts expressed in subdivisions of the height, have been ever more closely attended to, until the figure attains its most perfect symmetric proportions. But we may here add the remark that the evolution of the sculpture of a people will always be found limited by their degree of social evolution, never representing a higher social state than really exists. The proportions of the human form, as represented in the masterpieces of the Attic school of sculptors during the brightest period of Greek art, are considered, by those who have carefully investigated the subject of human proportions, to have never been surpassed, and, therefore, as nearly perfect as it is possible to conceive. But it does not seem at all probable that the canons of proportions which were followed by the artists who produced those masterpieces will be materially improved by the artists of future ages. In the Greek Canon of Proportions of the purest age of Attic sculpture, the height of the human figure was taken as a modulus or unit; and, by division of this natural modulus into nine hundred and sixty autometric lines, a very convenient and minutely accurate autometric scale was obtained. The cubit, or length of arm from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger, is an ancient dimension of different nations, to whom we are indebted for much that goes to make up our advanced and involved social life, and is exactly the fourth part of the height of a symmetric figure. Now, the cubit of the Greek scale is divided into six palms, a palm into four digits, and a digit into ten lines. Thus, it will be seen that the vertical and horizontal proportions of the human figure are easily determined by this autometric scale, known as the Canon of Polycletus. According to this canon, the head of a full-grown person should be one-eighth of his height, or one hundred and twenty lines. Careful measurements have shown that the heads of the Venus of Milo and the Theseus of Phidias, two of the masterpieces of the Greek classic period, in a somewhat mutilated condition, are within a few lines of this proportion. Any variation in the height of the head from this proportion is regarded a departure from ideal beauty. In the Venus de Medici, the head is so small, being somewhat more than the ninth part of the length of the statue, that it is difficult to form a proper estimate of the otherwise faultless symmetry of the figure.

Digitized by Google

In some respects, the development of sculpture may be regarded as analogous to the growth and development of the individual. It is a well-known fact that the head of a child bears a greater proportion to its height than does the full-grown person to his height. So also in the early condition of sculpture, if we take it among peoples where it has reached considerable development, the head and neck bear a greater proportion to the entire length of the figure than they do in the most developed stages of the art.

Passing to other proportions, probably nearly every one can call to mind individuals whose bodies were too long and legs too short, and other individuals whose bodies were too short and legs too long. In the Greek Canon of Beauty, from the crown to the end of the trunk equals one-half the length of the figure; and any perceptible variation of the body and limbs from this proportion detracts from admiration of the human figure in its totality. The proportionate girths are also important elements to be taken into account, in considering the merits of the figure in its totality. An individual may be too slim for his height or too large around the body to claim our admiration in the same degree as an individual of perfect horizontal and vertical proportions. If the length of the figure be divided into nine hundred and sixty autometric lines, the individual should be around the loins, chest, and shoulders each, four-sevenths, and around the waist three-sevenths, of this number of lines. Those interested in knowing more about the horizontal and vertical proportions of a full-grown and symmetric human figure will find them given in an article on "The Canons of Beauty in Greek Art," printed in the Edinburgh Review for July, 1874.

The proportionate lengths and girths of the limbs are also important elements in considering the figure in its ensemble. Suppose, for instance, that the arms between the shoulders and elbows and between the elbows and wrists are of the proper lengths to the height of the figure; yet if the girths of these parts at their proximal and distal ends, and in the middle, do not conform to the canon that was observed by the artists who produced those masterpieces of Greek sculpture which have been preserved from the Greek classic period, we are unable to admire them. Some ladies, indeed, are almost as proud of their well-formed arms as others are of their good-featured faces. And the shapes of the hands and feet, and also their sizes relatively to the size of the individual, are constantly criticised as pretty or ugly. Fingers, too, that are slightly tapering, with small joints, are regarded as prettier than fingers with large joints, and that are as large at their distal as at their proximal ends. Disproportionately small hands and feet are sometimes most admired by the uncritical on account of their association with a life of luxury and wealth or a life less laborious than that led by the masses. The practice of cramping the feet of ladies of rank in China is probably never thought of in connection with improving the personal appearance, but as mark of class distinction. And in this country, too, there are numerous instances of men of fair culture admiring most ladies of delicate physiques, but wanting in many of the elements of beauty, as judged by the Canon of Beauty of the Greek classic period, because their constitutional states indicate modes of life little given to physical exercise.

Should the drift of the argument not have been clearly perceived by some, and the question arise, What has it endeavored to establish? the reply is, It has endeavored to establish the fact that the highest types of beauty are to be found only in those in whom there is harmoniously combined the most complete physical, intellectual, and moral development. Thus, when the intellectual faculties are excessively developed, the physical development of the individual must be less complete than it ought to be. Again, when the physical development is excessive, it is always at the expense of intellectual and sometimes of moral culture. And the undue development of the altruistic sentiment, a factor of the moral sentiments much referred to in ethical discussions, when carried to the extent of caring for the welfare of others more than for the welfare of self, must in the end entail on self pains, discomforts, and loss of power, which might have been avoided by not unduly postponing the self-regarding duties. We know, too, that a high order of intellectual activity is not usually manifested by athletes who spend their days in the gymnasium and palæstra, nor by other persons whose daily occupations require of them a large expenditure of physical force. A high standard of moral culture is also a factor of the very greatest importance, as I have shown in another paper in analyzing the influence of evil actions on the countenance, in evolving the perfect type of man and woman.

For the Free Religious Index.

IS MOSES A MYTH?

I notice in the Free Religious Index of February 17 a statement of "B. W. B.," that "it has been shown that Moses himself is a myth, like the British King Arthur and the Trojan Æneas." I would, in the interest of truth, inquire of "B. W. B." by whom has this been shown, and in what manner? In what work can I find conclusive evidence of the purely mythical character of Moses, and what is the nature of this evidence? I have endeavored to keep myself informed as regards the results of the latest scholarship in comparative mythology and in historico-scientific Biblical criticism; but I have failed to find anywhere any evidence in substantiation of the theory that, so far as the personality of the supposed Hebrew lawgiver is concerned, it is purely mythical. I am well aware that many mythical elements have clustered around the figure of Moses; but, so far as I am aware, no satisfactory evidence has been adduced that Moses, as an individual, never existed. It may be that evidence with which I am unfamiliar has been presented to that effect. If so, being in search of truth, I would, with many others, doubtless, be glad to be put on the track of it.

Dr. Abram Kuenen is generally recognized, and in my opinion justly, as the ablest living exponent of Hebrew theology. To my mind there can be no doubt that in clearness of insight and depth of penetration, so far as correct interpretation of the Biblical records and of the stages of growth of the religion of Israel is concerned, he stands head and shoulders above all other theologians, whether of the past or of the present. His grand work, The Religion of Israel, stands preëminent in Old Testament exegesis. Both in this work and in the Bible for Learners [Young People], which presents in a popular form the results of Dr. Kuenen's researches,—said results being generally accepted by the Dutch school of theologians,—in both these works, while the legendary character of most of the narratives concerning Moses is fully recognized, and their origin in great part indicated, still the personality of Moses is never called in question. While it is conceded that the patriarchs in the Genesiacal narrative may be mythical, the supposition that Moses may be a myth is never entertained.

Speaking of the transition from the legends of Genesis to the narratives of the Exodus, the Bible for Learners says: "The main lines of Israelite history are clear, many facts are established, and, most important of all, several of the chief actors in the history are known to us as individuals. From the darkness, then, we are coming into the twilight. We can distinguish several great personalities clearly. . . . At the head of Israel's history stands the mighty figure of Moses. . . . Legend plays a greater part than history in the accounts which we possess of him. . . . But Israel never lost the memory of the man who was considered the spiritual father of his people. . . . As such, then, he may claim a place of honor among the men whose lives have moulded the history of the world." (Vol. I., pp. 241, 242.)

Kuenen fully discusses, in the fifth chapter of his Religion of Israel, the relation in which Moses stood to the Hebrew tribes both as judge and lawgiver. While it is completely established that the whole of the Pentateuch dates from times long posterior to Moses (a few fragments excepted), much of it being first promulgated during the time of Ezra, eight hundred years after the death of Moses, yet Dr. Kuenen and the Dutch school think it probable that the Ten Commandments, or "ten words," in their primitive, simple form, were given the Israelites by Moses, and that possibly a few other provisions of the pentateuchal code may be referred to the time of the wandering of the tribes in the wilderness. That the B'ni Israel were led out of Egypt by Moses, and that the foundations alike of their political and religious fortunes were laid by him, Dr. Kuenen thinks more than probable; and in this I concur with him.

Some confirmation is lent this view by the testimony of Manetho, the Egyptian chronicler, in an extract preserved by Josephus, the genuineness of which, so far as my studies have gone, has never been called in question. Manetho tells us that King Amenophis expelled the "leprous" foreigners from Egypt, their leader being a former priest of Heliopolis named Osarsiph, "who gave them a form of government and laws, changed his name, and called himself Moses." (Against Apion, i. 26.) The Egyptian tradition of a lawgiver for the Israelite tribes named Moses thus agrees with the Hebrew; and I think an undoubted historic fact underlies the traditions.

The most exhaustive work yet published, I believe, on Hebrew mythology, is that of Dr. Goldziher. Very few scholars, it appears, are willing to accept so radical and extreme a presentation of the subject as that found in his interesting and highly suggestive volume. The general opinion is that he has extended his mythical system further than the facts will warrant. Yet even Dr. Goldziher, while advancing cogent arguments and facts in sustentation of the mythical character of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and various other Old Testament personalities, recognizes Moses as an historical personage. "It is usual," he remarks (p. 23), "to find one or another mythical characteristic attached to historical phenomena. . . . We find attached to the picture of the life of Moses, which the Biblical narrative presents with a theocratic coloring, solar characteristics, indeed more specifically features of the myth of Prometheus." In Professor Steinthal's essay on the "Legend of Prometheus," published, with Goldziher's indorsement, in the appendix to his (Goldziher's) Hebrew Mythology, in speaking of the analogies between the legends of Prometheus and those of Moses, Steinthal is careful to say, "I speak here not of the historical, but of the mythical Moses; and I hope the reader will be inclined to distinguish the two as clearly as we distinguished the historical and the legendary Charlemagne." (Hebrew Mythology, p. 391.)

Perhaps some mention should be made of another school of thought, quite active about the beginning of the present century, but now almost expiring,—that of the extreme wing of the solar mythologists. Represented by such works as Dupuis' Origine de Tous les Cultes, Drummond's Œdipus Judaicus, Volney's Ruins, etc., Robert Taylor's Diegesis, etc., and Higgins' Anacalypsis, it for a time made some commotion in the literary and theological world; but of late years it has fallen into well-deserved desuetude and decay. To be sure, we occasionally see some shallow writer attempting to revive the exploded vagaries of Dupuis and the others, with sundry modifications and variations, the most marked instance in America being Dr. Woolley's ponderous volume on the Science (?) of the Bible. Blaratshy's Isis Unveiled and Inman's Ancient Faiths and Ancient Names also trench largely upon the domain of solar mythology, other elements as well, however, entering into their systems of speculation. As a notable example of the extreme limits into which the solar mythos may be pressed, though in another direction, Rev. G. W. Cox's Mythology of the Aryan Nations may be cited. Quite an effective rejoinder to Mr. Cox's extravagant theories in particular, and the more radical solar mythologists in general, may be found in J. P. Mahaffy's Prolegomena to Ancient History.

Digitized by Google

According to the systems of Dupuis, Drummond, Woolley, etc., all the principal characters in ancient religion, including those in the Bible, are mythical impersonations of the heavenly bodies and their accompanying phenomena. Moses, of course, under this hypothesis, is a myth; but I scarcely think so accomplished a scholar as "B. W. B." would base his views as to the true meaning of the Mosaic narratives upon the speculations of these writers. Then, again, certain supposed parallels between Moses and Bakchus have been pointed out by more than one author; the most circumstantial presentation thereof being probably that contained in a brochure entitled Moses and Bacchus, by Myles McSweeney, who is, if I mistake not, the last lingering public representative in England of the old Dupuis-Drummond school of solar mythologists. In this connection, it may be remarked that the latest and most elaborate work upon the Bakchik cultus, The Great Dionysiak Myth, by Robert Brown, Jr., contains, so far as my examination of it extends, no reference to any connection of Bakchik mythology with the legends of Moses; although we find in it full references to the elements of the worship of Bakchus, or Dionysos, in the Phœnician, Aramæan, Arabian, Chaldean, Assyrian, and Khamitic mythologies.

It is possible, however, that in my investigations I may have overlooked some valuable sources of information in this matter; and to the end that, if so, myself and other delvers after truth may be enlightened as to the direction in which farther researches should be made, are these remarks published.

Before concluding, it may be pertinent to remark that Dr. Tiele, one of the most untrammelled scholars and theologians of the day, and one of the highest authorities in comparative theology and mythology, in his Outlines of the History of the Ancient Religions (p. 85), while dealing largely with the mythic elements in ancient Semitic faiths, yet recognizes the historical existence of Moses, and thinks it not unreasonable to suppose that he established the worship of Yahweh among the Israelites in the place of that of El-Shádai. The same eminent scholar characterizes Dr. Martin Schultze's Handbuch der Ebräischen Mythologie, published in 1876, as "full of the most hazardous conjectures and the wildest combinations." Dr. Goldziher also speaks disparagingly of this work. Nork's Biblical Mythology of the Old and New Testament and his Etymological-Symbolical-Mythological Cyclopædia for Biblical Students, etc., are called by Goldziher "muddle-headed works"; while Braun's Natural History of Legend "is a kind of anachronism built on an antiquated theory, and not happier in its etymological identifications and derivations than Nork's writings." It is needless to say that such works as these do not suffice to show me that Moses is a myth.

WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

For the Free Religious Index.

CARLYLE AND POETRY.

Now that Carlyle is gone and can give us no more oracles, we begin to sift his opinions and to decry his paradoxes; and truly some of his estimates of men and things must be taken with grains of allowance. He had contempt for poetry and poets, as a matter of course; for his own mind lacked the shades of thought and feeling that are essential to a perfect whole. He was in literature what Cromwell was to courts,—a rough, honest man, an earnest man, who holds in supreme contempt whatever is not an ingredient in his own make up.

Marcus Spring and wife, it will be remembered, travelled abroad in company with Margaret Fuller; and, after an interview with Carlyle, Mrs. Spring wrote me the following from the lips of the dogmatic old fellow:—

"Men have something to do in the world besides sing. They should write what will arouse the world rather than what will lull the world." (Query.—Did he remember the old ballads that fire the blood like the blare of a trumpet,—Homer, Chevey Chase, Hardicanute, and even in our day the Marseillaise of De Lille, which so excited the populace that Napoleon forbade the singing of it?) Again, he says to his American friends:—

"There was Robert Burns, the greatest man that ever lived, who might have conquered nations with his great soul, but sat and sang. Of course, he could do nothing but bother his head over his poor excise account, drink whiskey, and break his heart at last. Elizabeth Barrett sent me some of her poems. I wrote her, if she had anything to say, she better say it in good plain prose, and not trouble herself to measure the lines."

It is for us to rejoice that Elizabeth Barrett Browning followed the impulse of her own genius rather than the advice of the radical prose-writer. We have versifiers in abundance. Poetry preceded prose; and the fact that all intelligent youth and maidens in our new country write verses at some period of their lives is proof of our extreme and not unwholesome youngness as a people.

"A man was not sent into this world to write verses," said Carlyle. How do we know that? His verses may not be great in themselves and nothing to the world at large, but they may work out the redemption of a household. They may gladden the arid waste of some poor soul who finds "life a muddle."

Those who find poetry hard in coming would do well to let it alone. Ours is an age of fact, of science; and, if our oracles do not come rushing from the tripod, we do not need them ourselves, nor the world either. Why, as Dr. Johnson said, make ourselves absurd by "having the contortions of the Sibyl without her inspiration"?

If poetry be the effervescence of youth and animal spirits, God be praised that they find vent through so harmless a channel. If it be the yearnings for sympathy, we all know how imperfect human sympathy is; and who shall forbid this cry of the soul from its vasty deep? If love touch the strings, accept the healthful and beautiful abnegation of self, which that sacred emotion implies. The youth who sings loudest and sweetest may fail to sing at all later in life; but the inborn poet must sing or die, must wear his bays to the verge of the grave, like Milton, in age, blindness, and poverty, weaving his song that the world will not let die. The irony and the flippancy of our day are repugnant to the spirit of poetry, which demands absolute faith and untiring earnestness.

The poet measures his lines and balances his syllables, because it is a part of the harmony of his soul to breathe in numbers; because like the bird of Milton, that "sings darkling," he was made to sing, despite Carlyle's assertion to the contrary, or be, like the "throatless nightingale" of Keats, smothered in his own sweetness.

Hundreds have the aspiration, the sensibilities, the æsthetic tendencies, and yet have never penned their inspiration. They write eloquently, like Madame de Staël, in prose, or are silent. These are not the poets. A step farther, and they might have been such; but, as they never take that step, they expire upon the threshold.

Emerson has defined the poet as "a man without impediment." The modern idea of art opens a wide field for laborious endeavor and a great sluiceway to plagiarism. A writer finds a thought full of poetic suggestion, and straightway he makes artistic use of it. I remember Mr. Emerson, in a conversation with me, justified the so doing; but to me it seems an ill use of another's property. A generous mind is willing to show his indebtedness, and is chary of encroaching upon the ground of another. To be artistic is not to be a poet, as the poems written by the young men who graduate at our colleges testify, where the mediocrity of thought, combined with a tiresome smoothness, wearies the senses. ELIZABETH OAKES SMITH.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON has just completed his seventy-eighth year.

GILES B. STEBBINS, the well-known spiritualist lecturer and writer, has become associate editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago, and has taken up his residence in that city.

REPORTS from B. F. Underwood inform us that he lectured at Kansas City, Mo., May 22, Valley Falls, Kan., May 24, 25, 26, Seneca, Kan., 28, 29, 30, and was to speak at Fremont, Neb., June 3, 4, and Lincoln, Neb., June 5.

MR. HENRY NORMAN addressed the Parker Memorial Society last Sunday. Mr. Norman impersonated the character of Cleon in the late representation of Œdipus Tyrannus at Cambridge, and has written it up for some journals.

REV. JOSEPH COOK tried to show at Edinburgh that alcohol hardens the albumen in the body and leaves permanent scars on the brain, by showing its effect on the white of an egg. The Medical Press pronounces the deduction from this little experiment insulting to common-sense.

MRS. A. L. DIGGS, of Lawrence, Kan., who addressed the Free Religious Association last week on Western Liberalism in so graphic and interesting a manner, will occupy the desk of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., next Sunday. As Mrs. Diggs is to pass the summer in New England, she will be prepared to speak to liberal societies elsewhere, if invited.

THOSE who read the papers, and there are few who do not in these days, may have read the statement that was going the rounds of the papers recently, purporting to be written by a reputable and well-known physician, to the effect that Colonel Tom Scott, who died a few days ago, had been restored to health by a miracle doctor. This shows how much confidence is to be put in such reports, even when they seem to be well authenticated.

PROF. HERBERT B. ADAMS, in his lecture in Sever Hall, Cambridge, on the origin and influence of the New England towns, advanced some practical views on the Southern question. A common idea, he said, has been that New England towns are the offspring of the government of the Congregational Church; but to-day it is proved that they are but a reproduction of the old English townships, which were in turn perpetuations of the villages of ancient Germany. In old New England towns, the lands were always owned by the people in common, and were granted only temporarily to individuals. It was very gradually that the idea of sovereign ownership gave way to individual rights of property. The common in every New England town is the survival of the communal domain. To introduce this New England local self-government idea in the South, political agencies have been tried, and have failed. The means to be employed now are science, religion, and education. The mission of the former is to remove the existing jealousy in the South of the town government as a New England institution, by pointing out that the town had not its origin in the North, but is a product of the common ancestry of the North and the South, dating back even to the institutions of Saxon Germany. The third agency — education — proceeds more directly than any other from New England experience and examples. To employ it beneficently is the purpose of the well-known Peabody Fund, which should be supplemented by a liberal appropriation from the national treasury. The former is being applied very wisely chiefly as a premium on local effort. The common schools are slowly leading the towns in the South to adopt self-governing principles like those of the New England town; and, under the stimulus of this educational fund, many of the towns are manifesting great zeal in local improvements, and are working out for themselves an enduring reconstruction.—Boston Advertiser, May 14.

POETRY.

WORSHIP.

Not forever on thy knees
Be before the Almighty found:
There are griefs the true heart sees,
There are burdens thou canst ease,—
Look around.

Not long prayers, but earnest zeal,
This is what is wanted more:
Put thy shoulder to the wheel,
Bread unto the famished deal
From thy store!

Not high-sounding words of praise
Sing to God, 'neath some grand dome,
But the fallen haste to raise,
And the poor from life's highways
Bring thou home!

Worship God by doing good:
Works, not words; kind acts, not creeds!
He who loves God as he should
Makes his heart's love understood
By kind deeds.

Be it thine life's cares to smother,
And to brighten eyes now dim:
Kind deeds done to one another
Unto God are done, my brother,
Unto him!

—Adapted from Moore.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 2, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

WITH this number of the Index, Mr. David H. Clark retires from his positions in connection with the paper and with the Free Religious Association. For more than a year, he has faithfully served the Association in many ways, and since the 1st of July last variously assisted on the paper. But the present exigencies both of the Association and of the Index compel a division of labor which is not in accord with his tastes or his abilities. He has a thorough understanding of and full sympathy with the Free Religious movement, has made heavy sacrifices for it, and we sincerely trust that he will somewhere find a congenial field for serving it. Our best wishes go with him.

THE ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The full report of the successful annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, held last Thursday and Friday, will be published in instalments in the Index, beginning next week. But the importance of the Resolutions that were adopted, looking to more active efforts on the part of the Association, leads us to anticipate the report so far as to print these Resolutions this week, especially as the reports of the convention in the Boston daily press did not give them quite correctly. They were as follows:—

Resolved, 1. That, in order to obtain the preliminary knowledge necessary to more effective work, the Executive Committee be instructed to select and appoint some able and zealous member of the Association, so far as possible, from each State, to act as Local Correspondent.

2. That the Executive Committee furnish said State local correspondents with a list of questions to be answered by them, relating to legal restrictions upon religious liberty, to general educational and church influences, to the possibilities of forming Free Religious Associations in their States, and to such other moral and social conditions as may be of use in gaining accurate statistical information respecting the progress and needs of our movement throughout the United States; and, further, that, wherever said local correspondents desire and the Executive Committee think advisable, the General Agent (if one be employed) be sent to aid in collecting these facts.

3. That a midwinter conference of the Association be held, at such time and place as shall be determined by the Executive Committee, before which the reports of the local correspondents shall be presented, together with the General Agent's supplementary report of State conditions.

4. That, in order to attain greater solidity and breadth of action, we now appoint a Special Committee to report to said midwinter conference a plan for the formation of State Auxiliaries to the National Free Religious Association, and for the suitable recognition of the delegate power of such auxiliaries in our Constitution, which plan, if approved by the conference, shall be submitted to the next annual meeting for final action; or, if such plan shall not in the judgment of the Committee be feasible, to report any other plan of increased activity which shall make our work more national and more effective.

These Resolutions were introduced by Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer at the business session on Thursday evening; but the lateness of the hour prevented their full consideration at that time, and they were deferred until the closing hour of the convention Friday afternoon. On introducing them, Mrs. Spencer explained that her main purpose was to get something done in the direction of a more systematically organized work, and that she was not at all urgent to keep the details of the special plan presented. The point on which most question was raised among other members was that concerning the formation of State Auxiliary Societies; and, in order that the Committee to be appointed under the fifth Resolution might be more free in their action on this very important point, the last clause of this Resolution was added in the meeting as an amendment to the form originally presented, Mrs. Spencer cordially accepting the amendment. The Committee appointed in accordance with the Resolution consists of Mrs. Spencer, as Chairman, Mr. B. A. Ballou of Providence, Mr. W. H. Hamlen of Boston, Mrs. Annie L. Diggs of Lawrence, Kansas, and Mr. Arthur Hill of Florence, Mass.

We may add to this anticipatory fragment of the forthcoming report that one of the most encouraging signs connected with the annual meeting of 1881 has been the interest and activity manifested by the younger members of the Association.

ANNIVERSARY WEEK.

In enumerating the institutions of Boston, Anniversary Week must not be forgotten. It is true it occurs in other cities; but the Boston one is as peculiarly its own as the Common, the Chestnut Street Club, or Public Library. Like everything else of any duration in this changing world, it has gone through a process of historic evolution. It is not what it was in the days of the Abolition reformers, the anti-sabbatarians, and early come-outers. The brave and eloquent champions of noble causes, precursors and inspirers of some of the grandest labors and influences of the present in the direction of equity and helpful service to humanity, whose voices long shall "echo through the corridors of time," have one by one been gathered to the silence of the departed. The outré-garbed, short-haired shriekers have had their day and ceased to be; while the essential ideas and principles for which they contended, in some measure, have been taken up under new forms of development, and find enunciation in representatives of gentler and more attractive grace, thoughtful and cultured tones of expression. The weather is always of particular moment on these occasions. This year, it was, on the whole, propitious. The proverbial rain did not appear. It could hardly be said it was like the Turkish paradise, "neither too hot nor too cold," which would be a thing much to be desired at such times, whatever it might prove in the future. In fact, the temperature, which began at a comfortable degree, grew hotter as the week advanced, and toward the close to the hottest of the season. It would be interesting to determine whether there was any relation between the external heat and the theoretical fires of the religious systems of those at the time assembled. If so, the adjustment seemed to be in an inverse ratio. Certain at least it is that the Free Religionists, who may be supposed as destitute of the theoretical fires as any who held conventions, had the heat poured in upon them at their Friday meetings at its extremest intensity.

There are always, during Anniversary Week, obvious tokens of it in the streets. It is not difficult to note, interspersed among their throngs, those who are unaccustomed to city ways. It is evident they have on their Sunday best. They stand at the depots and corners of the streets, solitary or in groups, with satchel in hand, inquiring looks, uncertain and bewildered expression. Their faces wear a browner hue than those about them. Sometimes, they are clergymen from rural parishes, who, to stretch a little a limited income or exorcise the devil who occasionally takes up his abode in the form of dyspepsia in a minister's stomach, have been fulfilling the command "to till the earth" in the garden of the parsonage.

The Woman's Suffrage cause shone forth in unwonted force and spirit. There were two conventions on the ground: the National Association, bringing with it many of the most prominent representatives of the movement from various parts of the country; and the New England Association, embracing, as its name would seem to imply, more of the local workers. These Associations, apart from the distinction we have intimated, differ somewhat on certain points of policy, but in the great central idea of the right of woman to the ballot, in the most comprehensive use of the term, are in full accord. The meetings of both were very successful. It always counts for a good deal to any reform to have a popular governor of the State where it is working identify himself with it. Gov. Long's presence, therefore, at the meeting of the New England Association, and his cordial and taking speech, could not but be regarded as a happy augury for the future of the cause in Massachusetts at least. The courtesies of the Governor in behalf of the State, and of Mayor Prince in behalf of the city, to the National Association must also have contributed much to enhance the pleasure of the visit of its members to the New England Mecca of reformers. To those who survey with a cool head the woman's movement, at least in its suffrage aspect, it would seem, with all the essential justice and truth of its principles, as though their practical realization was more distant than its advocates, in the heat of their hopefulness and enthusiasm, are wont to suspect. Even were suffrage granted to women at once, and they were ready to exercise it, which the mass of them are not, it is questionable whether the general interests of society would be subserved thereby, however much the individual might rejoice in it. Furthermore, the paths of woman's life and action are so distinct from man's, both through hereditary impulsion and the conditions of society, that it must be difficult for a long time to get them to heartily unite, to any general extent, in coöperation and interest in what is so foreign to the natural inclination of woman as public matters, and what is destined to remain in a largely preponderant degree, in any event, the concern of the masculine members of society.

The Institute of Heredity was a new candidate for public interest this year among the conventions of the week. Its object, it must be confessed, is of the greatest importance. There can be nothing of greater concern to society or its individual members than the nature of the human being born into the world; and, so far as this may be determined through possibilities within the reach of mankind, it is entitled to every consideration. It is the re form of all reforms. But it is one of a very delicate character. Unfortunately, those who are drawn to such discussions approach them very often in a bungling manner, with but little competence to deal with them, and rest under suspicion of questionable motives. It may be doubted whether, under such circumstances, the subject does not lose rather than gain in due appreciation. Indeed, if it is one for science and scientific methods instead of the idiosyncrasies and crude speculations of uninformed persons, it would seem as though there is little hope of it, beyond the light thrown upon it through the researches of this higher class of investigators. It was noticeable that the meetings of the convention here referred to were largely attended by well-known free-love apostles in and about Boston, including both the older and younger stagers of its unsavory fellowship; and some of the accredited representatives of its gospel were among the speakers upon the platform.

Digitized by Google

The annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, though scarcely up to the intellectual level of what it has been in some previous years, was in certain respects one of the most important and gratifying, perhaps, ever held. The address of Professor Adler on Friday morning upon "The Teachers of Ethics as the Successors of the Clergy," which was listened to by the largest audience of any of the sessions, including a good many clergymen, Unitarian and Orthodox, was wonderful in its impressiveness, abounding in fresh ideas and views, profound analyses, philosophy, and inspiring eloquence.

The disposition, quickened by the suggestion and favor of the President, to give to the Association a more national and comprehensive character, was quite general. The resolutions of Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer to this effect, which were well discussed and subsequently adopted, will serve as an initiatory step toward this policy. We welcome it with hearty sympathy; since we have long believed in it, and advocated it in a humble way as the thing of imperative need to the existence, expanding influence, and evident mission of the Free Religious movement. It is time for it to be taken out of the flower-pot and garden-soil of New England influence and transplanted to the open plain, where it may partake of another nurture, be fanned with other airs, and imbibe the elements of a sturdy growth, which shall make it at last a tree for the shelter and healing of the nations. But yet, after all, we fear that the plan of correspondence in respect to the prospects for religious work in distant places will not be found very reliable or valuable, since the reports in each instance will be much affected and colored by the degree or nature of the experience of the correspondent, the measure of his or her enthusiasm, opportunity of observation, and power of accurate impression. Two persons from the same locality, of different temperaments or experience, would not unfrequently make conflicting reports. How can the interest and prospect of distant sections, then, be correctly reported? Simply, as it seems to us, through missionaries or agents of the Association in such sections, so far as this may be practicable, to visit places where there is encouragement to do so, who shall make a thorough canvass of the situation and report accordingly, or initiate such measures in the interest of the Free Religious movement as may be fitted to the circumstances. This would of course necessarily limit such work to a few small centres of operation at first, with the tendency to greater expansion as the Association developed its resources.

It would be impossible in the space allotted to us to make more than the briefest allusion to the various causes and associations which as usual divided the time of Anniversary Week; many of them, as, for example, those in the interest of children of the destitute, discharged convicts, moral education, peace, and the like, deserving all cheer and commendation. The Unitarians presented their customary array of eminent persons on the platform, crowded meetings, grand festival, enthusiasm, good eating, agreeable company, and eloquent speaking. The tract societies, Bible societies, benevolent and missionary societies, home and foreign, of the orthodox people, if we may trust the newspaper reports, were well attended as a rule, and as full of zeal and fervor as ever.

In the olden times, men contended in the Olympic Games in running and racing and throwing the javelin, and various achievements in physical skill and dexterity, of which in these modern days we have less than would be well for us; and all Greece came to behold the spectacle.

But how much nobler in aspirations and aims is the competition in these modern days of our modern Athens, on Anniversary Week, which we witness,—the emulation of the diverse causes, enthusiasms, ideals, and purposes it presents to help and serve those who are cast down, usher in the fairer morrow, transform the world to higher and better realizations of knowledge, righteousness, and truth!

D. H. C.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

The Freethought Publishing Company of London has published a translation, by Mrs. Annie Besant, of Professor Ludwig Büchner's recent work on Mind in Animals. Some idea of the merits of the book may be gathered from the fact that Nature gives it a lengthy review from the pen of the well-known G. J. Romanes, who pronounces it "a highly valuable compilation of facts," and, "as a whole, a decidedly valuable addition to the literature of comparative psychology." One might naturally suppose that a periodical of the established reputation of Nature could afford to review a strictly scientific work without being obliged to recognize what Leslie Stephen calls "the solemn humbug" which rules the expression of opinion in matters theological. But even Nature is compelled to make a deferential bow to this "humbug." Mr. Romanes, in his opening paragraph, believes that the volume "cannot but be welcome to persons of all shades of opinion, however greatly opinions may differ as to the auspices of the Company which has undertaken and published the translation," and also hopes "that the subsequent efforts of the Company in this direction will prove as useful and beneficial as the one we are about to consider." We do not doubt that these words were meant to be kindly written. Mr. Romanes probably congratulates himself on his graciousness to the Freethought Publishing Company; but certainly he would never have written the above sentences, had Macmillan been the publisher of the book.

The enthusiasm and devotion of the Catholic missionary, alike in the past and in the present, are often more than a match for the enthusiasm of the man of science and for the devotion of the man of commerce to "the almighty dollar." The French people, for instance, have for some time past entertained the idea of building a railroad across the desert of Sahara. Colonel Flatters, who headed an expedition in search of the best practical route for the proposed railroad, has apparently met with some severe disaster, which will put an end to the project for the present; and Dr. Lenz has also returned, unsuccessfully, from an exploration of the same region. And now, in Les Missions Catholiques, Père Richard begins an account of a successful journey by himself and another priest into this same country of the Touaregs (the tribe said to have murdered Colonel Flatters),—a journey undertaken for the purpose of cultivating friendly relations with the natives, in order to establish a missionary station among them. Père Richard's narrative is made valuable to science and to commerce alike by the addition of an entirely new map of this part of Africa.

An analogous incident may be mentioned in this connection. At a recent meeting of the Geographical Society of London, a paper was read, from Colonel Tanner, on Kafiristan and the Siah-posh Kafirs of the Hindu-Kush. Great results in ethnology, geography, and philology, had been expected from Colonel Tanner's expedition; and it must have been somewhat mortifying, therefore, for the society to be told by Colonel Yule that Tanner's researches had added nothing to what has been found in the buried records of a Jesuit missionary's travels some two hundred years ago.

Professor Helmholtz has been the recipient of unusual honors during a visit to England. He has received, among other marks of respect, an LL.D. from Cambridge, an honorary fellowship in the Chemical Society, and an honorary doctor's degree from the University of Dublin, and a conversazione was held in his honor by the Society of Telegraphic Engineers. This last was unique. Various instruments and apparatus illustrated the most recent brilliant discoveries and industrial applications of electricity, as well as the best methods of present research; and many of the most eminent Englishmen of science were present. Honors are not often more justly merited. It is a significant coincidence that at the same time with the rendering of these honors to Helmholtz, and in the same country, another man, Professor Robertson Smith, a man of almost equal eminence in another branch of study, is prohibited from teaching, because of his honesty, originality, and profound learning. In other words, science honors the very qualities which theology despises and denounces.

Professor Helmholtz, already eminent as anatomist, physiologist, physicist, and mathematician, now takes rank as chemist also. In his lecture on Faraday at the Royal Institute, according to Professor Roscoe's summary, he "has founded a new electro-chemical theory, which reveals to us chemists conclusions of the utmost importance. He tells us, as the results of the application of the modern theory of electricity to Faraday's great experimental law, that the atom of every chemical element is always united with a definite, unvarying quantity of electricity; moreover, and this is most important, that this definite amount of electricity attached to each atom stands in close connection with the combining power of the atom which modern chemistry terms quantivalence.... Hence, then, thanks first to Faraday and now to Helmholtz, chemists have now a new and unlooked-for confirmation of one of their most important doctrines from the science of electricity."

The secret of Faraday's greatness, according to Helmholtz, lay in this: namely, that "his principal aim was to express in his new conceptions only facts, with the least possible use of hypothetical substances and forces. This was really a progress in general scientific method, destined to purify science from the last remnants of metaphysics." Now, that which Helmholtz means by "metaphysics" in this connection is, in our opinion, the falsifying element of present theology, which in this respect needs to be purified as much as science needed a like purification in the time of Faraday. Is it too much to hope for, that, fifty years hence, theology may be as free from "hypothetical substances and forces" as science is to-day?

R. C.

Digitized by Google

ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

By an Italian Newspaper, Warning them to Beware of the Church of Rome.

PENN, CHESTER CO., PA., Nov. 14, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER:—

Sir,—I herewith offer you the translation of a leader which was published at Rome on the 17th of last February in Il Diritto, the organ of the Cairoli government. No apology is needed for presenting to the American public this important address, emanating, as it does, from men of ability, born and educated under the influence of the hierarchy whose designs they so frankly and faithfully expose. The sincere thanks of every American are due to them for their generous interest in our welfare and for this kind and timely warning. You cannot but be struck, Mr. Editor, with their clear and thorough comprehension of our national condition, so remarkable in a foreigner of a different race, speaking a different language and living in a distant country; and it is impossible to suppress the wish that such thorough understanding of the subject were universal among our own people.

I remain, sir, very truly yours,

HOWARD WORCESTER GILBERT.

Catholicism.

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES:—

In the reception at its own bar of the great advocate of Ireland, the House of Representatives of the United States has committed an act contrary not only to good usage in parliamentary bodies and to courtesy, if not strictly to international law, but adverse also to the interests of the great Republic. Nevertheless, the act may serve to open the eyes more completely to a danger which threatens her, a danger much more grave than that which would result from the third term of Grant or the increase of the degraded classes. Catholicism is gaining ground, has already noteworthy influence, aims audaciously at preponderance, threatens the very foundations of the American constitution.

The danger had already been indicated. At first, when certain conscientious minds, in the name of free inquiry, pointed out the new menace which impended over the sturdy faith of their ancestors, they were heard with incredulity. And when the North American Review, after having shown the defects in universal suffrage, demonstrated the possible defeat of Protestantism, it seemed a foolish exaggeration. But it is the country of surprises; and to-day America, having come to herself, and reflecting especially on the case of Parnell and the great influence of the Irish Catholics, begins to measure the enormous danger, however distant it be.

There are in the United States, in a population which certainly reaches to-day fifty millions of inhabitants, seven million of Irish. They obey, like automatons, their prelates and bishops; and if they lack the political instinct, and even those aptitudes necessary to free existence, there are notable men who abandon Protestantism, in order to place themselves at their head, moved by the desire of easy victory, sometimes by the weariness of doubt. Who would have predicted when the Pilgrim Fathers, those fierce Presbyterians, landed on the American soil, or, when their descendants declared it free, who would have predicted those Catholics from whose abhorred tyranny they had fled would succeed in forming the most powerful religious community in their nation?

Not even the most audacious ultramontanes dared to cherish such hopes. A century ago there were a few hundreds of Catholics, the residue of the French domination, with a bishop and twelve churches. To-day, they reach seven millions, have a cardinal, sixty-three bishops, besides six thousand priests, with as many churches, and have besides five hundred convents, seven hundred colleges, seminaries, and academies, and two thousand parish schools. In twenty years, these figures will be doubled: it will be a fearful power. For, be it observed, the Catholics have attained this development in the United States solely from the period of the great potato-rot, which depopulated Ireland.

"We will absorb them, these beggarly Catholics; and how many races more vigorous have we not amalgamated with ourselves?" say the Americans; and even the Catholic clergy dreaded the contact of that unlimited liberty, of that individualism full and vigorous, and so contrary to their teachings. Instead of this, however, here, also, the superb confidence of the Americans in the force of their institutions was delusive. The Catholic religion had become for the Irish peasant a second nature. Catholicism had, as Herbert Spencer would say, transformed their blood globules, and in the United States, instead of becoming weaker, had gained new vigor through the life of greater ease of the emigrants, and held sumptuous churches, wealthy foundations, and sectarian schools, all that it had been able to accumulate during many centuries in the Old World.

"The Catholic community," says the Review already quoted, "is now the most numerous, the most robust, the most flourishing in the United States, its members are the most united and the most obedient to their leaders." For this end, the Irish alone, of the many nations who have emigrated into the Republic, preserve their peculiar individuality, form a state within a State, and have raised "an Irish question," still more formidable than slavery, which was at the point of imperilling the existence of the Union.

Let not the United States deceive themselves in this matter. The misfortunes of centuries, which we owe to the Church of Rome, confer upon us the right, and impose upon us the duty, of giving to the grand Republic frank counsels. We know, through experience, the dangers which threaten her; and we join the slighted Cassandras, to forewarn her. Either she must defend herself in time from Catholicism, or Catholicism will rend her in pieces.

The American Constitution is the purest and loftiest expression of the principles condemned by Syllabus. As in the Vatican are concentred all the efforts and all the hopes of reaction, so in the United States is shown what may be attained by individual energy, the principles of personal responsibility, and the power of citizenship. A republic of Catholics can be nothing but a theocracy: the United States would sink as low as Paraguay, which has tried it. In a minority, Catholics are good citizens, in the United States more than elsewhere, because there they enjoy unlimited freedom; but a Catholic majority cannot tolerate liberty of conscience, or of worship, or of speech, or of the press. It would soon provide for the fettering of thought: it would recall into vigor, by including it in the list of political disabilities, the excommunication. The effort which proved a failure for Gregory VII., in an age of darkness, would be reattempted, amid the splendor of civilization. A monarchy can contend with Catholicism: a republic will succumb, unless it furnishes the civil power with the necessary weapons, as in France, at the present time. The United States, also, cannot fail to discover that the principle of the Prussian laws of May, of certain laws of our own, and of the Ferry laws (however they may seem to conflict with the Constitution), is the only one which will serve to protect them from a great peril.

Everything in the development of the ultramontane doctrine, everything wounds the legitimate pride of that great nation. "We," writes one of their most illustrious thinkers, "we, so proud of our national schools, see them deserted by the children of the Catholics for their parish schools; we never have been subject to any other power, and now we are sold like the herd of an Italian priest; we thought our Union the grandest object in the world, and now we know that there is a thing still greater in its pretensions, the Church of Rome; we held patriotism to be among the loftiest of human virtues, we know that also must yield to the Catholic religion. What an enormous shipwreck, if we do not know how to avoid it in time!"

There is in this patriotic anguish much exaggeration; we do not deny it. The United States, too, may proudly repeat the non prevalebunt; and there are those who add that a few millions of Catholics will be lost in the immense caldron, and will indeed serve "to thicken and color the broth." Protestantism and freedom are the two strong barriers against the schemes of the Jesuits. America has no desire to exchange her vigorous religious dissensions and the more grave controversies concerning human destiny, her vital activity, in short, for the peace of death and quiet of the tomb. But let her not be over-confident.

We by no means suggest to the Americans that they should subject Catholicism to any portion of the persecution which it has inflicted on Europe. We desire neither martyrs nor executioners. But they must open their eyes and acknowledge the absolute incompatibility which exists between their political institutions and the ultramontane teachings. The vital love of country and ancient faith of their forefathers, reinvigorated in thought and action, will perhaps suffice to blast the flourishing hopes which the Jesuits already confess concerning the United States.

But, if in any great city, in any State in the Union, ultramontanism should become strong enough to dictate, by way of experiment, its own laws, we think it necessary that the rein should be tightened without delay. A first step will suffice. "Leave the Catholic priesthood free," said Thomas Cromwell, "and it is a lion: keep it in close bounds, and it is a lamb easily controlled."

The public of the United States has begun to see the danger, and the case of Parnell will serve to open their eyes; but, if our advice could be of any use, it would be that they protect themselves in time. Let Americans not delude themselves, as it is easy to do, at so great a distance; let them not delude themselves into the belief that the Church can compel into fraternal embrace the principles of civilization and the rags of the Syllabus. Let Leo XIII. bear witness. And we pause, moved by the tender reverence of those souls who have no refuge from the doubts which assail them, seeking in vain, among the multiplicity of sects, repose for their perturbed consciences, sighing for that peace which the excitement of modern life ever renders more dear, and who, humbly bowing down, approach the ancient and pure faith of the gospel. It is possible that, sooner or later, among their posterity, there may be religious renovation; but so long as the Church is the monopoly of the Jesuits, as long as the Syllabus prevails over the gospel, it will continue a constant menace to civilization, to the liberty of nations,—a menace against which the United States will act wisely by guarding themselves in time. —Lancaster (Pa.) Examiner.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE FINE ARTS IN ITALY, in their Religious Aspect, Letters from Rome, etc. By Ath. Coquerel, Jr. Translated from the French by Edward and Emily Higginson. London: Edward T. Whitfield, 178 Strand. 1859.

Those who remember with loving interest the visit of M. Coquerel to this country, and his admirable lectures on Rembrandt and other artistic topics, will feel a special pleasure in this volume, which, although not republished in America, has found its way to the Boston Athenæum. Its main interest lies not in the subjects treated of, though Italy never loses its charm, but in the point of view from which they are regarded. As a French Protestant descended from the old Huguenot stock, M. Coquerel looks upon the Catholic Church as his nearest and most dangerous opponent; and he does not treat even its artistic life with that poetic and sentimental indulgence which those who have never felt the pressure of its tyranny exercise toward it. Not that M. Coquerel is a narrow bigot,—he is, on the contrary, broad and liberal in his views of religion,—but he looks upon the existence of the Catholic Church as a real political and religious danger, not as a dying lion whom it is more magnanimous to admire than to attack. He certainly makes his points good: that the Catholic Church as a controlling authority, limiting art, has done as much or more to corrupt, narrow, and finally destroy it as she did, when a real inspiring religious force, to quicken it, and give it scope for its labors. But it seems to the present writer that his own Protestant views of Christianity, dwelling on it mainly as a sentiment of love and good morals, connected with affectionate reverence for Jesus, hardly do justice to the grand ideal of the Church, which, however distorted in utterance and action, did seek to express much more than this; namely, a grand religious union of all humanity, and a power to overcome all sin and evil. One interesting letter is given to the representations of Christ; and he gives the precedence, as most of us would do, to the exquisitely sensitive and tender beauty of Leonardo da Vinci's "Saviour." But he does not speak of Sodoma's strong, brave "Man of Sorrows," who helps us by the fact that he has borne deeper anguish than we have ever known; and he shows an utter absence of comprehension of Michel Angelo's conception of Christ, either as expressed in the Last Judgment, in the wonderful statue of the Santa Maria Sopra Minerva, or in the various representations of the Pietè. He says, "To speak truly, Michel Angelo has, in these two very celebrated figures, seen nothing beyond a magnificent opportunity of studying and reproducing the play of muscles and the shape of the limbs, in the full power of life in the one case, and after death in the other." It seems to me the trouble was that the critic saw nothing else,—did not see the triumphant mastery of faith and courage in the one, the tender pity and love of the other, which have carried strength and consolation to the hearts of hundreds of desolate sufferers. Standing by this very Christ, I said, "Now I know why Michel Angelo was called divine."

Digitized by Google

It is singular that no French critic, however high he may place Michel Angelo intellectually, ever seems to enter into his religious feeling. The French mind desires symmetry, balance, reason, propriety, good taste, and beauty in art, and in Michel Angelo's work it feels the want of these qualities, more than it recognizes the surpassing genius that overcomes limitations and defects.

But, while thus disagreeing with many of M. Coquerel's criticisms, I have read his book with great delight; for it is a fresh, frank utterance of thought by one who has studied earnestly and thought deeply, and whose views are in opposition to what is in danger of becoming the artistic cant of our own day. The letter on Italian architecture is full of suggestion, showing how much more Gothic architecture owes to influence of climate and race than to the direct power of the Church, and how Protestant architecture will probably find its models rather in the secular buildings of antiquity, reared for the use of the people, than in the cathedral designed for the glory of God, through some special order or priesthood. The fact that we shall never again hear the living voice which so charmed us gives an additional interest to these letters. E. D. C.

HENRY THE EIGHTH. — Shakespeare's "Henry the Eighth," edited by W. J. Rolfe, with its notes and portraits of Henry, his Spanish Queen Katherine, Anne Bullen, with her eyes full of gospel light, according to the epigram, and Wolsey, and its architectural views of famous palaces and abbeys, such as York Place, where the great Cardinal reigned and revelled so often with "meus rex," and Leicester Abbey, where he in his age and disgrace came to lay his bones, brings the stormy and gorgeous Tudor period of English history vividly to mind. When you have said that Henry the Eighth was a Tiberius and Caligula in lust and cruelty, you have not said all. He was colossal in will, temper, and ability also. His first queen, Katherine, or Kate, as he called her, loved him to the last, notwithstanding that he had wronged her brutally. When he ascended the throne, he bade fair, with his youth and manly beauty and bright intellect, to be one of the most popular of English sovereigns. The England which he began to rule was like the kingdoms of the continent, Roman Catholic through and through, and literally barnacled all over with monkeries, nunneries, wayside shrines, chapels, and idols, and the splendid seats of countless religious orders. The soil of England was held to as great an extent by the dead hand of ecclesiastical corporations as the soil of Italy, Spain, or Portugal. Henry the Eighth first signalized himself, and earned for himself and his successors the title of "Defender of the Faith" by writing a book against Luther and his so-called heresy. In Luther, he found an antagonist as haughty and unbending as himself, who literally showered him with vituperative and contemptuous epithets in his reply to the royal controversialist, so that the latter quickly grew sick of his voluntary championship of the Church of Rome against the mighty German reformer. At the beginning of Henry's reign, I say, England was Roman Catholic in every fibre. At the end of his reign, the Church of Rome, like a mighty forest tree which has been literally torn up by the roots by a whirlwind, lay disbranched, disfoliaged, and dead, so far as England was concerned. And one man did it,—namely, Henry the Eighth; and only just such a terrible personality could have done it. His wrath against Pope and Cardinals for thwarting him in the matter of divorce finally blazed into a furious conflagration, which was only appeased by the utter destruction of the Papal Church and the confiscation and secularization of its vast possessions throughout England. Mr. Froude has given us vivid details of the downfall of the papacy in England, which show how deeply rooted it was in the hearts and daily lives of an immense fraction of the English people to the very last. Only such a ruthless and mighty despot as Henry could have overthrown it. It matters not what his motives were in doing so. The divinity that shapes our ends has again and again converted personalities of the most repulsive kind into mighty historic forces for the inauguration of radical social changes and new eras. It was Henry the Eighth who released the Anglo-Saxon race from the clutches of superstition and ignorance, and made it the bulwark and propagandist of political and intellectual freedom in both hemispheres, made it a modern race centuries before even the French people became rational, modern, and democratic. It was Henry the Eighth who made the Anglo-Saxon capable of founding this American Republic. B. W. B.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

ON

"Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion."

BY KATE GANNETT WELLS.

III.

Fellowship.

[These lessons are not intended as question and answer for teacher and scholar, but simply as a basis for conversation, in which the teacher would expand or condense, deepen or simplify the meanings here implied, according to the requirements of a class. Each lesson could thus occupy one or several Sundays. The following, it is hoped, may aid children to recognize the need and extent of human fellowship, and to place it on a wider and surer foundation than on the sudden, capricious friendships of school years, or, in later life, on a mere society basis. A Sunday-school can well reach the world-wide relations of every homely virtue, and thus become a helper to the child's intellectual as well as spiritual growth.]

How does Fellowship begin?

As simple association, which may become close intimacy. It must always have some qualifying word to show that it is used in a good sense only; for there is fellowship as well as honor among thieves, and many criminal enterprises have been carried on through fellowship.

What is the opposite extreme to fellowship?

The feeling which considers that no other persons can be right or worthy of affection, honor, and companionship, except those who think just as one's self does, a blind prejudice against all other forms of goodness except one's own. Then prejudice becomes intolerance and persecution.

Mention the most noted persecutions.

What, then, is the underlying ground of all true fellowship?

A belief that every one at some time or other in his life has felt a desire to be better than he is and to help others; also a respect for others' rights as the duty we owe them, which respect we demand in turn. This feeling of justice leads toward fellowship, and appeals especially to boys.

Fellowship in religion must embrace all those who give a different name to God, the Buddhist as well as the Evangelical orthodox; and also those who, like the agnostic, are still in reverent doubt.

What are "The Ten Great Religions?"

How far is it possible to have fellowship with all men?

A spirit of kindness to others and the necessity of being truthful keeps the measure of just fellowship. But every little question of the home or of the Sunday-school has also its far reaching issues. Thus upon the answer given to this question comes a republic or a monarchy, an aristocratic or a democratic people.

NOTE.—Lead the children also to recall from their own experience how any pretended affection or any exaggerated expressions of love finally bring confusion and trouble, as the pretence or exaggeration is felt or discovered. Many people are called capricious, because they cannot keep up the same amount of demonstration with which they honestly began. Hence teach children to be very quick to do a kindness, and very slow to form a friendship. Yet we can all have sympathy for each other which will make us kindly in expression and act.

Are children as sympathetic as older people?

Are they more tender-hearted to animals than to each other?

Do they ever tease and snub one another? Is that fellowship?

What is it to speak the truth in love?

NOTE.—Illustrate this point by homely doings and sayings, graciousness to unwelcome visitors, a pleasant manner in telling another of his fault.

What is the most permanent ground of fellowship?

That where intellectual beliefs, practical principles, and aspirations coincide.

NOTE.—Explain what is meant in general by these three groups of words.

When people think alike, have the same reasons for action, the same understanding of the relation of one thing to another, and when their tastes and wishes are in similar directions, then a close intimacy is formed.

If fellowship is placed on intellectual beliefs, denominations arise. But, as we cannot make ourselves think as others do, we must have separate churches, and yet be able to hold a larger fellowship, which shall include all who have aspirations for a nobler life.

What striking examples are there of this larger fellowship?

The Catholic Church, with its numerous divisions; and the Episcopal, with its Low, Broad, and High Church parties. Mention individuals also, like Lydia Maria Child, Washington, William Penn, and others.

What helps toward a sense of fellowship?

To find that we all have moods, when we are like some one else, and some one else whom perhaps we dislike; that in turn we become types of other people; that temperament has largely to do with our ability to enter easily into fellowship with others. Some people are shy and nervous, others frank and easy.

NOTE.—Explain what is meant by temperament, and show how education can largely counteract its evil effects or strengthen its good points.

By a knowledge of our own weaknesses, charity toward others arises, and fellowship may begin with pity.

What is the opposite feeling to that of pity, which also is a ground for fellowship?

Reverence: out of pity, reverence, or a sense of justice, comes all fellowship.

NOTE.—Explain the nature of reverence, that it is the faculty which grows with our growth, that of admiring wonder, of keen appreciation of the veriest trifles that make for goodness in man, or for law, beauty, and use in the world, and of trust in and humility before the Unseen. Let the children seek illustrations of this from their own lives, the younger ones from their feelings toward their parents and teachers and the older ones from their heroes and ideals in books or life. Lead them to observe the struggle or the impulse that finally decides for the right, the refusal to take the prompt at school or to say or do a mean thing, and the courage to withstand a great temptation. Such victories arouse our reverence. Let them see how often they happen, if we are on the look-out for them. Make a great deal of this point, for on the power for sympathy and appreciation largely depends the ability for fellowship. Bring the struggle home to the child's mind. The boy goes out of a candy-shop looking flushed and sore, but his hands are clean. Does not such a scene awaken reverence? That is what is going on all the time, if we only see and feel. So never snub another's impulses or struggles. This universal sense of struggle and victory, or of failure, also produces a sense of fellowship.

Does fellowship mean intimacy, whether you like a person or not?

Certainly not. Upon sympathy and justice must follow degrees of affection. We want to be kindly enough to help others and to be able to work or play together. Children's parties, games, clubs, charities, societies, and politics all depend upon individuals being willing to be associated together and seeing the good points in each other, for the sake of accomplishing the end they have in common. The base-ball game as well as any society recognizes thus the difference between fellowship and intimacy: the first is necessary for work, the second for affection.

NOTE.—Ask the children to tell stories from their own lives; then they will understand the difference and see the universal need of fellowship.

Then there are degrees in fellowship?

Yes. Because the whole world is made up of a sense of relationship, must we acknowledge it for all of us in its widest sense, else we are snobbish and perversely ignorant.

NOTE.—Union is often founded on some one point. The names of associations indicate this: the wider the name, the broader the union; e.g., Athletic Society, Civil Service Reform League, Educational and Industrial Union, Young

Digitized by Google

Men's Christian Association, Union for Good Works, Unity Church.

Does not fellowship limit the freedom spoken of in the last lesson?

Yes: because of our love for one another, we rather lose many an opportunity to do as we like. Dearer often than our personal rights is our desire for human love. (Compromise limits individuality.)

What is the highest sense of fellowship?

When we can speak of it reverently and tenderly as trust in the Laws of the Universe, in communion with nature, with the Infinite Being, with God.

NOTE.—Let the class explain this sense by remembered sentences from the Bible, from hymns and books of meditation and poetry,—Wordsworth, Coleridge, "Hymns of the Spirit," etc. Tell them of Buddha, of Zoroaster, of saints and mystics. Ask whether it is a fading or a growing sense. (If growing, has science helped its growth, or has it merely changed its forms of expression, as in the contrast between the mediæval hymns and the modern ones, expressive of man's relation to nature?)

Why should we cherish fellowship in church especially?

Because the very purpose of a church is the recognition of worship; and of good-will to men: it embodies reverence and pity; it honors the past, trusts the future, and works together for and in the present.

NOTE.—Speak of the "how do you do" and "the let you alone" churches. One is friendship, the other is neglect.

What are synonymes for the word "fellowship"?

Let the children give words which shall range from its widest to its narrowest meaning, from brotherhood and coöperation to chum and crony.

Place the last emphasis again on fellowship in religion, that companionship may never be for bad ends.

The three lessons to learn from fellowship are patient charity with others' shortcomings, with trifles and with sins; reverence for the beginnings as well as the final issues of goodness; and justice in recognition of each other's claims. Daily human life and the greatness of moral relations to each other is made up of fellowship.

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

THE Western Unitarian pastor who lately sent down to Boston the plaintive question, "What is the matter with Unitarianism?" should read carefully the finely phrased, keenly discriminating, but arctically cool letter of Dr. George E. Ellis, written on occasion of the sixtieth anniversary of the founding of the Christian Register. Dr. Ellis speaks of "the interest I once felt in Unitarianism," and describes himself as now an unmoved, philosophic spectator of an enterprise in which, when he was younger and more susceptible to delusion, he allowed himself to become quite engaged. The letter is as reserved and distant, so far as indicating any family pride or affection is concerned, as the letter of Bishop Huntington. With the Bishop, Unitarianism and the Register are, of course, long disused toys. For many years, his whole mind, might, and strength have been given to building the Episcopal Church.—Christian Leader (Universalist).

TEMPERANCE EXHIBITION.—An exhibition of a novel character is to be held in the Agricultural Hall, Islington, England, in August next. It will comprise all temperance and non-alcoholic drinks, the machinery for their preparation, and the various modes of packing them, as well as machinery for cork-cutting, bottle cleaning, and kindred industries. There will also be shown a quantity of artistic tea and coffee service in silver and china, etc., and, as being peculiarly appropriate to the season, ice-making machines, and appliances for refrigeration. The profits are to be devoted to the benefit of a temperance institution.

MISS FRANCES POWER COBBE opposes in the London Times Mr. Darwin's defence of vivisection. Mr. Darwin advocates his position in the interest of science, Miss Cobbe hers in the interest of sentiment. And yet it would be hardly safe to conclude that Mr. Darwin is less humane than his opponent.

BEING above all beings! mighty One!
Whom none can comprehend and none explore;
Who fill'st existence with thyself alone,
Embracing all, supporting, ruling o'er,
Being whom we call God, and know no more!

JESTINGS.

"MY lord," said the foreman of an Irish jury, when giving in the verdict, "we find the man who stole the mare not guilty."

"PAPA, I saw a young sparrow fall out of its nest this morning." "Well, what of it, my son?" "Why, I don't think the Lord could have noted its fall, because the cat got it."

A DOCTOR went out for a day's hunting, and, on coming home, complained that he hadn't killed anything. "That's because you didn't attend to your legitimate business," said his wife.

DARWIN acknowledged himself sold when his little niece asked him seriously what a cat has that no other animal has. He gave it up after mature deliberation, and then the sly puss answered, "Kittens."

THE teacher had grown eloquent in picturing to his little pupils the beauties of heaven, and he finally asked: "What kind of little boys go to heaven?" A lively four-year-old boy, with kicking boots, flourished his fist. "Well, you may answer," said the teacher. "Dead ones!" the little fellow shouted, at the extent of his lungs.

"DO YOU really believe that an ass ever spoke to Balaam?" queried a man who prided himself on his intellect. Coleridge, to whom the question was put, replied: "My friend, I have no doubt whatever that the story is true. I have been spoken to in the same way myself." The man of the inquiring mind retired for meditation.

RECTOR POTTER, of Grace Church, says that two sailors once came up to his church and asked, "Is this Broadway Tabernacle?" "It is a Broadway tabernacle." "Does Dr. Taylor preach here?" "Dr. House Taylor used to preach here." "No, that won't do! We want the regular article. Heave ahead, Jack! Put her nose to the wind!" And away they went.

A FEW days ago, a youthful Zulu of about twelve summers, named Pea Blossom, was convicted of stealing in a Galveston court, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail. "He is rather young to steal, I should suppose," remarked a bystander to Uncle Mose. "No, sah. He is not too young to steal; but he is cotched a little earlier den de rest ob 'em. Dat's all."

CHILD of four, taken ill, is presented by considerate aunt with several fine oranges, one of which she commenced to devour with every manifestation of delight. "And what do you say to kind auntie, who brought you the beautiful oranges?" inquires grandma, anxious to call out the latent politeness in the child's character. "She may bring some more when these are gone," responds the child, her face shining with satisfaction and orange-juice.

MANY an amusing mistake has been made by people hard of hearing. We are told that a certain Dean of Ely was once at a dinner, when, just as the cloth was removed, the subject of discourse happened to be that of extraordinary mortality among lawyers. "We have lost," said a gentleman, "not less than seven eminent barristers in as many months." The Dean, who was very deaf, rose just at the conclusion of these remarks, and gave the company grace: "For this and every other mercy make us devoutly thankful."

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

PRESIDENT.
FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.
RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
ELIZABETH B. CHASE, Providence, R.I.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.
ANNIE L. DIGGS, Lawrence, Kansas.

SECRETARY.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.
HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.
JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
CAROLINE M. SEVERANCE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

All letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to "Free Religious Association," at the office.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO SPECIAL INDEX FUND.

Lydia Maria Child's Legacy, devoted to this object by vote of Executive Committee of Free Religious Association	$1,000.00
Mrs. Sarah S. Russell	500.00
Mrs. E. N. Hallowell	100.00
Miss Hannah E. Stevenson	100.00
John L. Whiting	200.00
Cornelius Wellington	100.00
Mrs. Charles Fairchild	120.00
Miss Emma D. Ireson	100.00
Miss Julia A. Ireson	100.00
Miss Kate C. Ireson	200.00
Miss Helen M. Ireson	100.00
Mrs. Benjamin Ireson	100.00
Miss Matilda Goddard	100.00
Mrs. Anna D. Hallowell	100.00
John C. Haynes	500.00
Charles Nash	500.00
Mrs. Charles P. Curtis	25.00
John M. Forbes	500.00
Henry L. Higginson	200 00
Matthew Luce	100.00
E. R. Knapp	100.00
Henry S. Russell	100.00
J. Malcolm Forbes	100.00
Henry W. Wellington	100.00
Rev. Photius Fiske	100.00
Robert Davis	100.00
	$5,345.00

The Faith of Reason.

A SERIES OF DISCOURSES ON THE LEADING TOPICS OF RELIGION.

By John W. Chadwick,

Author of "The Bible of To-Day," "A Book of Poems," etc.

"Free, original, brave, manly speech is here; never prosy, always earnest, often curiously apt, and sometimes swelling with its theme into fervid eloquence. . . . When we consider their quality, we marvel; for what sermons of the day can compare with these in richness, force, and beauty?"—Rev. Dr. F. H. Hedge, in the Unitarian Review.

"In this externally negative theology, there is an earnestness, a trustfulness in truth and honesty, a fearlessness as to the results of patient and reverent thinking, which has more of the freshness and fragrance of genuine faith than half the orthodox apologies and sermons of the day."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Everywhere pervaded by a spirit of profound reflection."—New York Tribune.

"There is extraordinary vigor and scope of thought in the treatment of these themes."—Boston Transcript.

"They are packed full of bold, strong, original thought. Perhaps their most striking feature is their utter fearlessness. . . . We venture to say that no book of equal volume issued from the press for years contains more vigorous and searching thought on more momentous themes."—Chicago Saturday Evening Herald.

One volume. 16mo. Price $1.00.

 Sold by all booksellers. Mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price.

Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

JUST PUBLISHED:

INGERSOLL'S NEW LECTURE,

What must we do to be Saved?

PRICE 25 CENTS.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN.

A COURSE OF LECTURES BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

Author's American Edition. Cloth. 12mo.
PRICE $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston.

DISCOURSES

BY

Frederic A. Hinckley.

The Sentiment in Religion. Just published.

The Cancer at the Heart.

What makes a Religious Society?

Price 10 cts. each; 20 copies for $1.00.

Also

Natural Religion. A Book of Selections for Sunday, School and Home Use.

Price 30 cts.

Send orders to the Author, Providence, R.I., or to Index office.

JUST READY.

A NEW VOLUME BY MR. SAVAGE.

Belief in God.

An Examination of Some Fundamental Theistic Problems.

In this latest volume, Mr. Savage meets with characteristic fearlessness and discusses from a purely rationalistic point of view some of the ultimate problems which must some day present themselves to every thinking mind.

These sermons have attracted very wide attention and excited the profoundest interest, as they have been delivered and published in pamphlet form. They are generally regarded as the best work which Mr. Savage has yet done, and their publication in neat book form should insure their reaching thousands for the hundreds who have heard them or read them in "Unity Pulpit."

Cloth, 12mo. Price $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston.

"An original thinker and an eloquent expounder of fruitful truth."

GEORGE H. CALVERT'S WORKS.

"Few men, probably none living, are his equals in the department to which he has given his especial attention. His books are genuine æsthetic studies in the best sense of the word."—Newport News.

Fine English Cloth. Price per vol. $1.50.

Essays Æsthetical.
Brief Essays and Brevities.
Some of the Thoughts of Joseph Joubert.
First Years in Europe.
Life and Work of Goethe. An Essay.
Charlotte von Stein. A Memoir. With Portrait.
Life of Rubens. With Portrait.
Arnold and Andre. An Historical Drama.
Wordsworth. A Biographic and Æsthetic Study. With Portrait.
Shakespeare. A Study.
Coleridge, Shelley, and Goethe. Biographic and Æsthetic Studies.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

METROPOLE

INSURANCE COMPANY,

OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,

No. 20 Kilby Street,

BOSTON, MASS.

JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, Esq.,
Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.

GEORGE M. BARNARD, Esq.,
Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.

WILLIAM P. HUNT, Esq.,
President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1 50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Digitized by Google

Cornell University
1882 to F

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c. " "
" 52	" . . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES	10c
SKULLS	10
GHOSTS	10
HELL	10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD	10
GODS	10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT	10
HUMAN RIGHTS	10
HEREAFTER	10
TOM PAINE	10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at $3 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli } SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 598.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 50.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

Selections from Phillips Brooks, D.D.

SOCIETY does not exist for itself, but for the individual; and man goes into it not to lose, but to find himself.

AN essential principle has flexibility which an arbitrary rule cannot have. A mere rule-maker can have no personal considerations. But God, in whom all principles reside, from whom they all proceed, finds room for personal discrimination and education within the application of His principles. It is the depth of His government that makes the specialness of His government. It is because his government comes out of the profoundest secrets of His character that it is able to adapt itself to all the individual peculiarities of our lives.

WHOEVER listened to Jesus could not help feeling that in his view the class was good or bad only as it made the individual good or bad, and that no class condition could overrule the essential condition of the personal souls within it. Here is where all party spirit shows its viciousness. Here is where all socialism shows its weakness. Here is where all the weak idolatry of organic methods fails. It loses sight of the final unit in its watch over some of the accidental and temporary combinations of mankind. The final unit is the man.

IT is not the intellectual man as such, not the man in whom intellect stands crudely forth as the controlling element in life, that other men are drawn to most. The greatest men that ever lived are those in whom you cannot separate the mental and moral lives. You cannot say just what part of their power and success is due to a good heart and what to a sound understanding. And in every circle there are apt to appear some persons of great influence and great attractiveness, of whom you never think as being specially intellectual. If any one calls them intellectual, it startles you; but, as you think about your wonder, you discover that it does not come from an absence of the intellectual life in those who are thus spoken of, but from the fact that the intellectual part of them is so blended and lost in the rounded and symmetrical unity of their life that you have never been led to think of it by itself.

MORE and more, we come to see that courage is a positive thing. It is not simply the absence of fear. To be brave is not merely not to be afraid. Courage is that compactness and clear coherence of all a man's faculties and powers which makes his manhood a single operative unit in the world. That is the reason why narrowness of thought and life often brings a kind of courage, and why, as men's range of thought enlarges and their relations with their fellow-men increase, there often comes a strange timidity. The bigot is often very brave. He is held fast unto a unit, and possesses himself completely in his own selfishness. For such a bravery as that, the man and the world both pay very dear. But when the grasp that holds a man and his powers is not his self-consciousness, but his obedience to his Father, when loyalty to Him surrounds and aggregates the man's capacities, so that, held in His hand, the man feels his distinctiveness, his distinctive duty, his distinctive privilege, then you have reached the truth of which the bigot's courage was the imitation. Then you have secured courage, not by the limitation, but by the enlargement of the life.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE completion of the repairs on the monument to Thomas Paine at New Rochelle, N.Y., were duly observed by ceremonies at the spot on Decoration Day. Mr. T. B. Wakeman made an address.

UNHAPPY Ireland is becoming more and more unhappy. The Coercion Act does not work, the spirit of resistance is as dominant as ever, riotings have ensued, and passive lawlessness seems to be fast changing into a state of active war. Meantime, the Land Bill is making its way but slowly through Parliament, and is evidently to meet more obstruction than at first seemed probable. And possibly the House of Lords will be so unwise as to throw it out altogether.

THE proposal to place a monument to Lord Beaconsfield in Westminster Abbey has not met with wholly unqualified favor. The simple fact is that the ex-premier's greatness was that of high position and success only, and not the kind which took a strong hold upon the veneration or affection of the British people. The generous effort of Gladstone in behalf of the contemplated honor to his powerful political rival affords a fresh illustration of the nobleness and magnanimity of his character.

THE revised New Testament is not received with favor in England. But if Mr. Smalley, the New York Tribune's well-known London correspondent, voices the common opinion there in the comments he has made in a letter to the Tribune on the revisers' work, there is much more prejudice than knowledge or judgment in the opposition. In this country, a very general disposition is manifest to accept the revised edition. The Presbyterian, it is true, advises caution and reserve in coming to a decision, and reminds ministers and congregations of the Presbyterian order that they are under a "law" to use only the "most approved translation" of the Bible; and it remains to be seen whether this is "the most approved." But it admits that the new revision may be approved, so as to come under the "law" five or ten years hence. In the mean time, however, this policy, it is evident, leaves the people in a state of painful uncertainty as to just what is the revealed and infallible word of God.

THE Churchman, the leading organ of the Episcopal Church, recently refused, it is said, an announcement of Stopford Brooke's "Faith and Freedom" for its advertising columns. It evidently fancied that the large number of the Episcopal clergy who are shaky on the doctrines—those who, for instance, as Phillips Brooks has said, do not believe the dogmas of plenary inspiration or eternal punishment, but have not yet the courage to say so to their congregations—might not be able to resist the wisdom and the power with which Stopford Brooke puts his case, and that the book had better be kept from their knowledge as much as possible. The Churchman's principle of hushing is not, however, altogether approved among the Episcopalians. One of the leading Broad-Church clergymen is reported to have said on hearing of this refusal: "I am not surprised at it. The Churchman is really our Church-woman,—only that is a slur upon womankind."

WE have received the notice or "annual call" of the Progressive Friends' twenty-ninth yearly meeting at Longwood, Chester Co., Pa., which began last Thursday. It will be seen by these words of the "call" that the principles and position of the Progressive Friends are identically those of Free Religion: "The object of this meeting is to promote religion, construed broadly as embracing all good, physical, moral, and spiritual. Untrammelled by dogma, we fraternally invite to meet with us all those who desire to make the world purer and better, and who hold the truth in higher honor than any creed or sect. We would meet on common ground as brethren, to consider by what means we may labor most effectually to lift humanity to higher levels. In a reverent spirit, we would examine the religious institutions which have grown out of the wants and convictions of the past, accepting them so far as they commend themselves to our conscientious judgment, and rejecting them freely when we must. Our supreme allegiance is due, not to the decrees of men, but to Truth itself." C. D. B. Mills and Patience Kent are the clerks of the meeting.

APROPOS of the journalistic enterprise, on which we made some comment last week, by which large portions of the revised New Testament were telegraphed to Chicago newspapers, it is sad to note that even emulation in such a pious work breeds a very unchristian spirit and conduct. The New York Nation says: "It now appears that the only paper that deserved to be credited with this journalistic 'beat' was the Chicago Tribune, which had the entire book, preface included, sent over the wires; and that what the Tribune calls 'the Wells Street concern,' which professed to have had the Four Gospels 'wired,' was guilty of a 'last and most brazen attempt to deceive the public.' The Tribune prints a number of parallel extracts, to show that its esteemed contemporary really palmed off on its readers the old King James version of 1611; and its theory is that 'the fraudulent newspaper set up the whole Four Gospels' from that version, and then attempted to get the corrections made by the revisers by telegraph, but 'broke down long before the job was completed,' and decided to face the matter out. This is certainly a flagrant piece of 'journalism,' and the refusal of the electricity to be a partner to it ought not to have escaped comment." To this, we may add that some of the errors in the common version have been attributed to the "pious fraud" of ancient transcribers. Should any errors creep into the new version hereafter printed by Western publishers, perhaps they may be traceable to the "pious fraud" of modern journalistic enterprise.

Digitized by Google

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

Free Religious Association, May 26 and 27, 1881.

The Free Religious Association convened for its Fourteenth Annual Meeting in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on Thursday evening, May 26. As heretofore, the opening session was devoted specially to the business interests of the Association. It was called to order by the President, Felix Adler, at 8 o'clock. The minutes of the last meeting were read by the Secretary, and accepted.

The Treasurer presented his report as follows:—

Receipts.

1880.
May 27.	Balance on hand, as per report	$1,924.42
May 28.	Membership and Patrons' fees and donations collected at Convention meetings and Festival	203.25
June 8.	Received from John S. Gannett, Treasurer of Festival Committee, balance in his hands, profits from sale of refreshments and flowers at Festival	23.32
Dec. 27.	Bequest of Lydia Maria Child, from Wendell Phillips, Executor	1,000.00
1881.
May 26.	From David H. Clark, Business Agent, from sale of books, reports, tracts, etc., during the year	26.98
May 26.	Membership and Patrons' fees and donations received during the year at the office and by the Treasurer direct	498.00
	Total	$3,675 97

Disbursements.

1880.
May 31.	Cochrane and Sampson, printing placards and circulars	$11.00
June 7.	Rent of Parker Memorial for Convention and Festival	75.00
July 13.	Organist and other Festival expenses	6.50
July 20.	J. M. W. Yerrinton, for reporting	65.50
Aug. 23.	One-half expense of carpeting office	33.40
Sept. 22.	Advertising expenses of Convention and Festival	50.12
Dec. 13.	One-half expense of book-shelves at office	8.50
1881.
Jan. 27.	One-half expense of coal and wood at office	4.75
Feb. 4.	Cost of Visitor's Book	7.79
May 7.	On account of "Religious Culture of the Young" (Department in Index)	60.00
May 10.	Transfer of Bequest of Lydia Maria Child to "Special Index Fund," per vote of Executive Committee	1,000.00
May 26.	For various expenses during year, including gas, telegrams, sign-painting, books purchased for sale, etc	13.16
May 26.	David H. Clark, Business Agent, for one-half of eleven months' salary, to May 1, 1881	550.00
May 26.	G. H. Foster, assistant at office, for one-half of five months' salary, to Dec. 1, 1880	87.41
May 26.	Isaac Pratt, Jr., one-half of ten months' rent of office, to May 1, 1881	125.00
May 26.	Expense of twenty-three different lectures in various places, in aid of Free Religious cause	378.85
	Total	$2,476 98

Balance on hand, May 26, 1881, $1,198 99. Of this amount, the Treasurer has deposited on call in the Boston Safe Deposit Company $1,000, upon which interest is payable at rate of 2½% per annum. JOHN C. HAYNES, Treasurer.

BOSTON, May 26, 1881.

Voted, That the Treasurer's report be accepted.

The report of the Committee on the nomination of officers was called for. None of the Committee was personally present; but the Chairman, Mr. A. W. Stevens, had sent a printed ticket as agreed upon by them, which was read by Mr. W. H. Spencer. It was the same as the list of officers of the preceding year, with the exception of Miss Mary Grew, of Philadelphia, and Mrs. Elizabeth B. Chace, of Providence, as Vice-Presidents, in place of Mrs. Lucretia Mott and Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, deceased; and Mrs. Caroline M. Severance, as Director, in place of Mrs. Rebecca N. Buffum, who declined a re-election.

Mr. Hallowell stated that he had positive information to the effect that Miss Grew would decline to serve as Vice-President, if elected. Various amendments were offered to the ticket as presented by the Committee. Messrs. W. H. Spencer, Geo. W. Stevens, and F. A. Hinckley were appointed a Committee for distributing the ballots and collecting membership fees, and also to act as tellers for assorting and counting the vote.

The Secretary then read the Annual Report of the Executive Committee, as herewith printed.

Report of the Executive Committee.

In our report a year ago, two different though allied branches of work were described as having been planned, and, if approved by the Association, as likely to engage the entire attention of the Executive Committee the coming year. The last annual meeting referred these plans back to the Executive Committee, with power to carry them into operation according to their best judgment.

The first of these enterprises was the assumption, by the Free Religious Association, of the publication of the Index. This was carried into effect on the 1st of July, 1880, and substantially according to the method sketched in our last report. The old "Index Association," having voted to close up its affairs, then transferred to the Free Religious Association all its rights and property in the Index, including the cash balance in its treasury (which amounted to $826.33), the only condition being that the Free Religious Association should assume the unexpired obligations to subscribers and advertisers; and on the same day, July 1st, the first number of the paper under the new auspices was issued, the name being changed to Free Religious Index to denote this change of proprietorship and management. The Secretary of the Association, as announced last year, agreed to take the editorial responsibility and management for at least one year.

The Association, when it assumed this trust, very well understood that the Index was not pecuniarily self-sustaining. The immediate cause why the old "Index Association" decided to give up the publication on its part was that the time of the stock-subscriptions was about to expire; and, as these subscriptions had been a necessary aid toward meeting the expenditures, there would after a few months have been a deficit in the treasury, and no way of meeting it except by making a new appeal for beneficiary funds. It was thought that the Free Religious Association, with its somewhat wider constituency, might be able to make this appeal more effectively, or perhaps in time bridge over permanently the gap between the receipts of the Index and the expenditures upon it. The first problem therefore, before the Association, after the question of editorship had been disposed of, was a financial one: it was how to meet the deficit that would undoubtedly occur in the Index treasury before a year should expire in the publication of the paper. No way seemed to open but to make a public appeal to the friends of the Association and of the Index for the requisite means. Circulars for this purpose were accordingly distributed at the last annual meeting; and a brief notice to the same effect has been kept standing in the paper the greater part of the year, with the names of donors attached. A considerable number of these donors were stockholders of the old "Index Association," who, in accordance with a suggestion first made by the late devoted editor of the paper, Mr. Abbot, gratuitously and generously paid to the new management what would have been the tenth annual assessment on their stock, if the old stockholders' Association had remained in existence. The result was that $2,120 thus came into the treasury; enough added to the ordinary receipts of the paper to carry the publication through (or nearly so, probably) to July.

But again the problem comes, How meet the deficit the coming year? for the Index, though there has been some increase in the subscription list during the year, is still far from being pecuniarily self-supporting. Nor can its expenditures be much diminished without cheapening it in style and character to a standard none of us would be satisfied with. Rather should we like to see it improved, and improved in ways which only larger means can secure. To this financial problem of future deficits, the Committee have been giving attention for several months. As the result of their deliberations, they resolved to make an effort to raise at once the sum of $10,000. This sum, if raised, would insure the continuance of the Index, even on its present financial basis, for at least three years. But some of our friends believe that, with this sum in hand and put to use under energetic management, the paper within this time may become pecuniarily self-sustaining. By private solicitations and a parlor conference in Boston, $4,245 have already been pledged toward this sum, and most of it has been paid into the treasury. To this, the Committee have voted to add the legacy of $1,000 left to the Free Religious Association by Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, making $5,245 toward the sum wanted,—$10,000. This project has now been made public through the Index, and awaits farther subscriptions. It is hoped that the sum will be largely increased at this annual meeting, and that the members of the Association generally will interest themselves in completing the fund. Upon raising this amount of money, the successful continuance of the Index depends.

In their action toward raising this fund, the Committee have assumed that the Association would deem the continuance of the Index desirable. All the reasons for undertaking the publication a year ago exist to-day, with only added weight. Were the Index to be discontinued, the Association would have no adequate channel for communication with the public. Our means of promoting the objects for which the Association came into being would be almost irretrievably crippled. There is, too, at this time special need of an organ such as the Free Religious Index aims to be: a journal that shall represent the freest and most advanced thought in religion, and at the same time meet the demands of scholarly culture; fearless and uncompromising in assailing superstition, dogmatism, and all the practical injustices of sectarian arrogance, but affirmative and constructive on the side of all the conserving virtues and humanities of society.

We may add that the plan for holding and managing the property of the Index, suggested last year as probable, has been carried into effect. Seven Trustees were appointed by the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, who have become incorporated under the General Statute of Massachusetts by the title of "Corporate Trustees of the Free Religious Index." Four of them are members of the Executive Committee, and three are outside of that Committee, but are members of the Association. They were chosen at the first election for different tenures of the office from one to seven years each, so that there is to be a new election of one member (which may, however, be a reëlection) every year. The new member is to be appointed by the Free Religious Association or its Executive Committee, or, in case of their failure to appoint, may be chosen by the other Trustees. The Trustees are now completely organized, with the By-laws appropriate for such a body and the officers necessary for the supervision of the business interests of the paper. The President of the Trustees is directed to make a report, to the annual meeting of the Association, of the general condition and prospects of the paper, financially and otherwise.

The second enterprise on which the Association entered a year ago included the establishment of a central office as head-quarters in Boston and the enlargement of the work of the office with reference to making it a lecture agency in the interest of the Free Religious movement, and otherwise aiding in the spread and more effective organization of liberal religious ideas. This has been a work not easy to get at, and in regard to which, evidently, there is not yet a very clear public opinion among us as to what is feasible to be done and what ought to be done. There is among people of radical and rational religious views a strong sentiment in favor of "Home Rule" in all matters pertaining to religion; and this sentiment is so entirely in accord with the principles and the practice of the Free Religious Association that it is difficult to find or to institute just those practical relationships of mutual helpfulness and fellowship between this Association and local liberal organizations which shall at the same time respect individual and local independence and secure the benefits of coöperation. In this delicate matter, we have been therefore rather feeling the way than inaugurating a policy. We have, however, made a beginning in the direction indicated by the plan proposed at the last annual meeting. A central office was obtained in a convenient location, which is also the publishing office of the Free Religious Index, and the expenses of which are equally divided between this Association and the Corporate Trustees of the Index. A General Agent was appointed to have charge of Association affairs at the office, who was also made Business Agent and Assistant Editor of the Index. To this position with triple duties, Mr. D. H. Clark was appointed. He has conducted the office correspondence both for the Association and the Index, been on the spot to receive callers and answer personal inquiries, given editorial assistance on the paper, and during the winter and spring arranged several courses of lectures as the Association's Agent, under the direction of the Office and Executive Committees.

Digitized by Google

This last has been the most special work in the line of this new branch of activity which the Committee have undertaken the past year. Five courses of lectures have been held at different points,—namely, in the towns of Malden (five lectures), Revere (six), East Dennis (four), Brockton (five), and Ipswich (three), all towns in Massachusetts. Another course, under very promising auspices, could have been held at Rockland; but the money appropriated for the purpose had been exhausted, so that only one lecture was there given. Various inquiries have been made with regard to similar lectures in other places, some of these inquiries coming from distant points in Maine and New Brunswick. The conditions on which lectures have been offered by the Committee are that the Association will pay the lecturers, provided the friends in the local community will meet all local expenses and pay the travelling expenses and furnish entertainment for the speakers. The desire has also been expressed by the Committee that there should be at least four lectures in a place. The lecturers who have done this work are Wm. H. Spencer, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Frederick A. Hinckley, L. K. Washburn, S. B. Weston, C. D. B. Mills, Miss M. F. Eastman, Miss M. A. Hardaker, Charles Ellis, and Wm. J. Potter. After the course at Revere was ended, Mr. Ellis gave four additional lectures there, the local friends bearing all the expenses.

What result, if any, has come from these courses of lectures, is a question not easy to answer. If any lectures do good, there would seem to be no reason for believing that these have not, since they have generally been given to thoughtful and sometimes large audiences, and by earnest men and women with something of value to say. Yet, if we were asked for some tangible evidence of the resulting benefit, it might be difficult to point it out. In one or two cases there has been apparently some strengthening of the local conditions of liberal organization, but it is too early to judge whether this is likely to be permanent. In two or three of the places, a local Unitarian element, aided by the American Unitarian Association, has been spurred to a competitive activity. From East Dennis, where there has been a Free Lecture Association for several years, there came a donation of $25 to our treasury. This much, at least, can be said: that, so far as these lectures have extended, they have served to acquaint people more accurately with the principles and aims of the Free Religious Association. Should they be continued, however, another season, it would probably be wise to introduce a somewhat more definite purpose into the conduct of them.

Another object contemplated in the new activities sketched last year—that of preparing lesson-papers or text-books for use in the instruction of the young—has also been kept in mind and to some degree advanced. By suggestion of the Executive Committee, a portion of the Index has been devoted to the topic of "The Religious Culture of the Young," wherein have appeared some thoughtful articles on this important subject, and also two courses of Lessons, designed for instruction of youthful classes: one by Mr. F. A. Hinckley on "The World we Live in," treating conversationally some of the simple elements of Natural Science; the other (not yet fully completed) by Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, on "Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion." The authors of these papers wish them to be regarded as suggestions of lessons to teachers rather than as matter to be taught by rote. Another series of Lessons, twenty in number, begun before the suggestions of the Executive Committee, have been printed in the Index, on the "Origin and Growth of Christianity," prepared by Mr. Lewis G. Janes, of Brooklyn, N.Y. These Lessons, covering the New Testament story of the teachings and life of Jesus, are written from a thoroughly rationalistic stand-point, and in the light of the most advanced scholarship on the theme. All of these Lesson-papers have been reprinted on slips for convenient use by teachers and classes, and may be obtained at the rooms of the Association at the price of one cent for each slip. Though prepared with reference to meeting a demand from the most radical Sunday-schools, it is of interest to note that there have been calls for these papers for use in some Unitarian schools. It should perhaps be added, to prevent possible misunderstanding, that, though these Lessons are published by the Free Religious Association, the Association as a body is not to be regarded as responsible for any opinions contained therein. This is a standing fundamental principle of the Association, never to be forgotten either with regard to opinions expressed in print or on the platform.

Speaking of the calls for these Lesson-papers from some Unitarian Sunday-schools leads us to note, as one of the most encouraging signs of the Free Religious movement, the condition of Unitarianism in the Western States. Here, in the East, organized Unitarianism finds as yet few points of affiliation with Free Religion. But in Western Unitarianism the advance in this direction is marked and rapid. A considerable number of its ministers, occupying prominent pulpits, are openly committed to the main principles of the Free Religious Association; and there are churches and conferences that are organized on the same basis essentially, though still retaining their Unitarian affiliations. In this broadening and liberalizing of Unitarianism in the West, perhaps, can be found the most tangible evidence that one of the missions of the Free Religious Association, in its fourteen years of existence, has not been in vain; and evidence, too, that its work is not yet completed.

Since our last annual meeting, two of the most honored names on our list of Vice-Presidents have been removed by death, Lydia Maria Child and Lucretia Mott. These renowned women, whose names have been familiar household words in our land for half a century, had already devoted an ordinary lifetime to the service of truth and humanity when the Free Religious Association came into existence. Yet they gave at once a most appreciative and even enthusiastic support to the new organization, seeming to find in its aims and aspirations the culminating interest of their life's work. Very different in their temperaments and methods, they lived to promote the same high causes of human welfare, and gave the closing service of their prolonged years to objects such as we here in this Association have specially at heart. Mrs. Child, also, by her will testified to her confidence in our work by bequeathing to it the sum of $1,000. And Mrs. Mott, coming to our meetings and speaking on our platform as long as health would permit, a few months before her death sent her annual donation, making it even more generous than usual. But of more value than any contribution in money is the worth of their names and their work to our cause; and the best legacy they have left with us is that memorial of their example, which should stimulate the younger generations among us to emulation of their deeds and their devotion.

As President of the Corporate Trustees of the Free Religious Index, Mr. Potter also reported additionally concerning the finances of the Index, giving a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures for the ten months from July 1, 1880, to May 1, 1881, by which it appeared that the receipts from all sources (including donations) had been $7,382.13, and the disbursements $6,371.02, leaving a balance in the treasury on the 1st of May of $1,011.11. This was entirely apart from the new fund spoken of in the Executive Committee's Report. This latter fund is not yet touched, and so far as paid had been deposited in the Boston Safe Deposit Company on interest. Other matters pertaining to the Index had been so fully considered in the Executive Committee's Report that no farther report seemed necessary this year, except to give the names and officers of the Corporate Trustees, which were as follows: W. J. Potter, President; Geo. W. Park, Secretary; John C. Haynes, Treasurer, Hannah E. Stevenson, Cornelius Wellington, John Curtis, Ednah D. Cheney.

A statement more in detail was also made by Mr. D. H. Clark of his work as General Agent of the Association, and as Business Agent and Assistant Editor of the Index.

Most of this report referred to Index matters, and has been transferred to the Index Trustees. In the part specially concerning the Free Religious Association, in addition to points included in the Executive Committee's Report, the interesting fact was related that statements of the history and principles of the Association, and of societies that might be considered representative of it, have been supplied, on request, to the United States Census Bureau, to Count D' Alviella in Brussels, and also to correspondents as remote as Australia, New Zealand, and Ceylon, to whom also packages of the reports and tracts of the Association have been forwarded.

Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer then offered the following Resolutions, and supported them with a brief speech, saying, however, that she cared not so much for the details as for the substance of them:—

Resolved, 1. That, in order to obtain the preliminary knowledge necessary to more effective work, the Executive Committee be instructed to select and appoint some able and zealous member of the Association, so far as possible, from each State, to act as Local Correspondent.

2. That the Executive Committee furnish said State local correspondents with a list of questions to be answered by them, relating to legal restrictions upon religious liberty, to general educational and church influences, to the possibilities of forming Free Religious Associations in their States, and to such other moral and social conditions as may be of use in gaining accurate statistical information respecting the progress and needs of our movement throughout the United States; and, further, that, wherever said local correspondents desire and the Executive Committee think advisable, the General Agent (if one be employed) be sent to aid in collecting these facts.

3. That a midwinter conference of the Association be held, at such time and place as shall be determined by the Executive Committee, before which the reports of the local correspondents shall be presented, together with the General Agent's supplementary report of State conditions.

4. That, in order to attain greater solidity and breadth of action, we now appoint a Special Committee to report to said midwinter conference a plan for the formation of State Auxiliaries to the National Free Religious Association, and for the suitable recognition of the delegate power of such auxiliaries in our Constitution, which plan, if approved by the conference, shall be submitted to the next annual meeting for final action.

Remarks were made on the subject of the Resolutions by Messrs. Adler and Potter. They were then laid on the table temporarily, while the Committee on the ballot for officers should report. This Committee reported that all the officers on the printed ballot were certainly elected except three, and that possibly a more careful recount, some of the tickets being difficult to decipher, might show the others elected.

Voted, That the Committee make a recount, and report at the session Friday afternoon.

Voted, That the Chair appoint a Committee to report on Friday afternoon a Committee for nominating officers next year.

The Chair appointed Messrs. W. H. Spencer, J. C. Haynes, and W. H. Hamlen.

Voted, That the Resolutions offered by Mrs. Spencer be taken from the table, and referred to a Committee to be appointed by the Chair, to be by them reported to the meeting at the close of the addresses Friday afternoon.

The Chair appointed for this Committee Mr. F. A. Hinckley, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, and Mr. Geo. W. Stevens.

The meeting then adjourned, to convene again in business session at the closing hour of the Convention Friday afternoon, and in Convention at 10.30 A.M., Friday.

(To be continued.)

For the Free Religious Index.

MR. MEAD AND THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

Mr. Edwin D. Mead's Introduction to his recently published collection of Stopford Brooke's sermons (noticed in Index, May 12) is an unusual bit of critical writing, and has a simplicity and force that we miss in the rather artistic style of the succeeding discourses. After an excellent résumé of Mr. Brooke's literary work in the past, he passes to consider his present religious position. He says, "Stopford Brooke is first and foremost a Christian, more purely and strictly and emphatically a Christian than almost any other great religious teacher of our time" (p. xv). To make his meaning clear, he distinguishes two things that have been connected with the name of Christ,—the teaching of Christ himself and a scheme of thought about Christ, or, as Lessing put it, the Religion of Christ and the Christian Religion, which is much like the line often drawn between the faith of Jesus and the faith in Jesus. We need not say that it is in the first of these senses that he calls Mr. Brooke so pronouncedly a Christian, saying, by way of illustration: "Platonism is not a theory about Plato. The true Platonist is he who accepts the philosopher's cardinal principles as cardinal in the constitution of his own thought. He is not to be tested by what was accidental in the philosopher's opinion, or merely incidental to the general conditions of his culture,—e.g., the cosmogony of the Phædon,—but only by the essential principles of his philosophy" (p. xvi). We regard this as sound; i.e., though popularly the name Christian may stand to us for the developed system of thought and institutional life, which owed only its beginnings to Jesus, and may have elements derived from other sources, or from merely accidental phases of Jesus' own thought, as, e.g., the prevailing conceptions, in which he undoubtedly shared, of demoniacal possession and Old Testament interpretation, yet, if we recognize the large and commanding features of Jesus' teaching, we are justified in calling ourselves after his name, though in many ways we may disbelieve in and combat the teaching of the Church and in certain minor details may disagree with his own teaching. Further, Mr. Mead gives us words of admirable spirit in respect to the principle of limitation, saying, "We cannot love John Smith's mother as we love our own, even if we admit with our whole head that she is as true a woman; and we feel toward him who has taught us truth or done us good as we cannot feel toward the mediator of equal good to others." And again, finely: "The 'cosmopolitan' of the Boulevard des Italiens is not the international man,—really not a man at all. In general, finally, be it said that while it is true enough that truth is universal, always and everywhere truth, it is also true that persons alone are the depositories and mediators of truth." (pp. xix, xx). The application of this to Moses and Isaiah and Jesus, or in general to the Jewish and Christian religions, must be allowed by any freethinker, who does not forget that some of the best elements in our civilization are to be traced back to these sources. If there were no choice but between Christianity and Buddhism and Mohammedanism and other world-religions, we do not see how any one who lives in our western world and has a soul of natural piety in him, could wish to disavow the Christian name. Even if the differences were a minimum, we should prefer to call ourselves Christian rather than to deny our parentage in the name of universal religion, which, we suspect, is a dream, so far as it expects to absorb and take the place of the special religions of the past. Universal religion, like universal being, seems to us an abstraction, that needs determinate and concrete predicates to become even real. But the aspect of the matter changes, when we contemplate the possibility of a distinct forward movement, which shall have an entirely different method from that of Christianity, and yet shall with that method strive to realize that which Christianity has in a great measure left still in the air. If one appreciates the changed view of the world that has come over us in modern times, and knows that the old heart of faith must fit itself to it and even get force from it, if it is to survive and win any fresh triumph, it becomes a serious question whether he shall render uncertain such thought and purpose by clinging to a name which naturally suggests so many other things. It is in this failure to point the issues, in this lack of historical perspective, that we think whatever weakness there is in Mr. Mead's treatment of the religious situation lies; and it is the weakness of Broad Churchism and liberal Christianity (for they are not so different) generally. Mr. Brooke nor Mr. Mead believes in the miracles; but they do not seem to be aware how widely they thereby depart from the general view of the world (into which miracles fit as a perfectly consistent part), of Jesus himself, and virtually cut at the root of one of the most commanding utterances of his consciousness—namely, that he would come again to judge the world and establish his kingdom. Here, indeed, we may distinguish between the imagery, the dress of the thought, and the thought itself; but to deny that Jesus conceived of himself as some day to stand before men as their divinely-appointed judge, and sentence them according to their deserts, would be a bit of rationalism quite intolerable to the historical critic. Supernaturalism is not an accident (at least to Jesus' own mind), but an essential part of his teaching, to be seen in the Sermon on the Mount (so called) and in frequent parables. We have no words to fling at this ancient way of thinking: we crave justice and a better social order so much, that, if they could come in that way, we should accept it, and would spend our lives in prayer for the deliverance to be wrought in accordance with it.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Mead's reduction of the essential principle of Christ's religion to "the oneness of humanity in its idea and essence with the divine" seems to us but a poor, faint transcript of the burning prophetic consciousness of Jesus (and how, by the way, can he call this "the distinctive doctrine of Christianity," when, on the same page, xvii, he says, "This truth has been in all religions"?) Jesus craved the kingdom of God, he had an eye for the ills of society, his soul called for the levelling hand of justice, for an abatement of the self-seeking and grasping spirit of men, for an era of brotherhood and humanity. We venture to say that, if he had only uttered such harmless thoughts as Mr. Mead takes to be fundamental, he would have died peacefully, after the manner of other philosophers, and would never have won the hold on the hearts of men that actually made him the founder of a new religion. We confess that we have too much sympathy with his spirit ourselves to wish to see it evaporated into Alexandrian or other philosophemes. It is not impossible, it is probable that Jesus did utter some such sayings as are reported in the Fourth Gospel; but a unity of thought and purpose is as likely (and we think more likely) to be meant as an identity of metaphysical essence. In fact, we doubt if Jesus was not too much in earnest to talk metaphysics (in the ordinary sense) at all. Man may be, every man may be (and Jesus may have believed it), in idea and essence one with God, "begotten, not made" (this is Mr. Mead's, not merely the Nicene creed); but this is poor consolation to us, so long as there are sad, dark facts for the eye of both body and soul, so long as man is so far beneath his idea, if not at times all unconscious of it. The supreme conception of Jesus,' if we heed our most trusty reporters, the synoptical Evangelists, was the Kingdom of God; and this is moral, social, political (we might almost say), and, so far from being a metaphysical reality, was first to be brought about by a reappearing of its for-the-time humiliated, but finally-to-be triumphant king. We, at the present day, cannot share in this expectation, though we have as much reason to believe that it was Jesus' own as that it was Paul's or the writer's of the Apocalypse, or, we might almost say, of the Christian Church in general. All our habits of thought make it impossible for us to have it. But if, notwithstanding, the burden of the world still rests upon us, and we feel how totally different must be our hope and plan of redemption, and are constrained from very seriousness to give up the attitude of patient waiting and prayer (which was most affectingly urged by Jesus upon his disciples) then it becomes a question bearing upon our practical usefulness and the claims of the great work lying before us, as well as one for our understanding and conscience, whether we shall march under a banner that hides our thought and purpose as much as it declares them.

Let us not be understood as suspecting for a moment that there is anything of the trifling spirit in Mr. Mead. His vigorous words on Dr. Stanley Hall's Broad Churchism in a recent number of the Index (May 12), the closing passage of this Introduction itself, in which he speaks of the nobility of bringing the ideas and ideals of Christ, freed from the superstition of the church system, so "to bear upon our modern life as to turn the world, the flesh, and the devil of us, the ennui and cynicism and greed and calculation, to shame and honest work, to reverence and vision, compassion and a rational socialism" (p. xxiii),—these reveal a mind too earnest for any species of doubleness or compromise. He, as other generous liberals of our time, have the spirit and are full of the thought of this modern world. His lack, and their lack, is simply one of historical perspective, in a rationalistic and not an historical reading of the past, in a confusing of issues where an utterance of the true ones should be clear and ringing; and this lack can only be made good by what is almost distasteful to a seething time like the present,—namely, a patient and sympathetic study of a period of life and development to which our modern thought and life are chiefly valuable in the way of furnishing a contrast. We think, after such a study, Mr. Mead would abate a little of the positiveness of the assertion that Stopford Brooke is "more purely and strictly and emphatically a Christian than almost any other great religious teacher of our time." To our mind, the power of Christianity lies in ideas of which neither Mr. Brooke nor Mr. Mead have any adequate realization, and of which we get hardly more than verbal intimations in our liberal churches, generally. Yet the demand for justice and a better social order is as great now as ever. The ideal of Jesus is not a perishable one, for it voices the needs and aspirations of humanity; but, if we have come to see and deeply feel that justice must be done by ourselves, that our prayers and cries to God are utterly vain, that a heavenlier order of social life will never be instituted from above, but must come in obedience to the pressure of our own thought and purpose,—in a word, that man must be his own providence and must find his connection with the Highest after some fashion quite other than the Christian,—then, whatever other name may belong to these convictions, it is but confusion to call them Christian. Rather may they seem to the genuine Christian believer like impiety, if not practical atheism. Mr. Emerson has recently told us, in words that should of themselves set at rest the question of his relationship to the venerable faith of Christendom, "We are born too late for the old and too early for the new faith."*

This may be an unhappy state of things; but it is a little less unhappy, if we frankly see and say that the old is the old, and do not seek to take shelter under a name, the heart and soul of whose meaning we have already allowed to disappear. I confess to a little impatience with these fine distinctions between the faith of Jesus and the faith in Jesus. The faith of Jesus, while it had other objects, was also a faith in himself as a divinely sent messenger, the rightful Lord of the human race, who would come again in glory to be man's judge. What trimmings have we from deft liberal Christian hands to reduce these magnificent proportions to the size of a clever moral and religious teacher! Undoubtedly, much was added to Christian faith in later times, but anything less than Peter's confession is not the faith of Jesus himself. How different was the feeling of those early times from the balancing, divided loyalty that is now so common! What kind of a return to the glow of primitive Christianity is Unitarianism? Once, Christian was a name to glory in: now, many a man takes it, not because he must, but because he has made it out satisfactorily to himself that he can. Can? Yes; but is that the mood for the religious teacher, who certainly, if he is to teach at all, must teach not merely what men may or can, but what they must do, and must himself work under a mighty inward constraint or be nothing? Professor Everett said not long ago, "A creed that one simply can utter is not a creed that lives";† and we do not know a word of wisdom better worth pondering for a light-hearted generation. Meantime, though we have no name to substitute for the Christian one ("Free Religion" being, to our mind, all too negative and inadequate), it is at least something to have the forward-looking thought, to recognize clearly the changed intellectual conditions, to lift no more hands to the heavens, to feel that the unattained ideal of Jewish and Christian faith demands a new expression and a fresh consecration and truer and more heroic methods for its accomplishment, and to set ourselves to the study of this world, of man, his needs and his possibilities, moral, social, political, with the same eagerness and more than merely scientific interest which once possessed the souls of men under the stirrings of a grand hope for the world to come. Out of these thoughts, when they mature, shall come (let us not doubt) their own fruits and expressions. There will arise new forms and institutions: and a name will come, which, even if it chance to be given by an enemy, will be redeemed and made sacred by the faith and devotion to great ends, for which we shall make it stand.

W. M. SALTER.

*"The Preacher," in Unitarian Review, January, 1880.

†"The Relation of Modern Philosophy to Liberalism." Unitarian Review, December, 1879.

For the Free Religious Index.

MR. JOHN WHITE CHADWICK'S ANSWERS REVIEWED.

1. A person who does not believe in the most essential points of Christianity, as we find them in the New Testament, and renounces publicly and privately the divine Christ and Saviour, or the "Lord and Master Jesus" cannot be "objectively" or "subjectively" a Christian. Disraeli was a Jew, renounced the Jewish creed, was accepted by a Christian Church, became a Christian and was made Lord Beaconsfield. Abbot was a Christian Unitarian minister, renounced the Christian creeds, was expelled from a Christian Unitarian church, accepted by men and remained a man only. Christianized Lord Beaconsfield tried to maintain and propagate royal and Christian civilization by the swords of his vassals. Humanized Francis E. Abbot strives to maintain and propagate civilization by reason, logic, scientific methods, and a "gospel of purity." The forum of reason must denounce the so-called "Christian civilization" as a false claim, and it implies (perhaps unconscious) insolence toward millions of civilized men, who have been "factors in the sum" of civilization outside of Christianity. When we wish to define Christianity correctly and impartially with reference to sects, we cannot do it from the extreme ends, Catholicism or Unitarianism, neither can we take the definitions of Catholic priests or Unitarian ministers; but we have to rely on what we read in the history of the New Testament and in our own reason.

Digitized by Google

2. I do not think that Jesus could conceive himself to be religiously any more a Jew than Abbot can conceive himself to be a Christian. It was not so much "the intense nationality of Judaism that prevented its opening out into a universal faith," as the selfishness, cunning speculations, and controlling influence and power over credulous people of the Jewish priests. As soon as the "new religion" was named "Christianity," similar conditions commenced and have continued ever since. Universal faith can only be established, maintained, and propagated by reason, sincerity, universal liberty, and in a truly secular republic. All the various efforts to Christianize the world create wrangling, and impede the strife for better conditions in humanity.

3. Reason and republicanism recognize only the historical man Jesus; but the intellectual development, occupation, and actions do not double or "forty million" an individual. Before the tribunal of Liberty and Justice, "all men are free and equal," and must receive equal shares of human rights. Any rational person must know that in "faculty" and "influence" "men are not created equal."

4. In each of the historical forms of religion exists the claim of superiority over all others, and also that the founders are superior to all other men. All such forms of religion are founded on tradition and faith, and all persons demand equal rights for their faith; but no ecclesiastical forum is enabled under the existing conditions to grant such equal rights. No one endowed with common-sense will assert "that all historical forms of religion are exactly equal." Morality and ethics belong to humanity: they are linked in the forms of religion, and carried out in accordance with the conditions of races, development of reason, commerce, climate, and atmospheric and terrestrial proportions. Republicanism is founded on facts and truth; and it is "so much the worse" for all of us, if we do not ascertain, maintain, and propagate republican principles, or let religious notions interfere with them.

5. Religion and virtue need no stamps. Any name attached creates false claims, contentions and speculations. We attain to manhood when we are religious for religion's sake, virtuous for virtue's sake, and give proof by actions rather than words.

CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N.H., May 29, 1881.

For the Free Religious Index.

LIBERAL NEWSPAPERS.

If Liberalism were judged by the character of the majority of papers that profess to advocate its cause, the verdict could not be creditable. One needs to be so radical as to be blind to all defects of style and matter, not to have a feeling of disgust in reading many papers that recommend themselves by the most liberal titles. Those heroic sheets seem to imagine that they are shouting the most inspiring battle-cries of reform, when they are denouncing "the obscenity of the Bible" or proclaiming to their readers the disgrace of some minister. These are two subjects which seem to possess a deathless charm to one class of liberal papers. Convince the world that the Bible is too filthy to be read in public and that preachers are the most sensual of men, and progress will no longer languish.

The first liberal publisher who conceived the idea of securing the services of the devil as one of his editorial staff may have been a prodigy of originality, but the intelligent reader will now certainly require some other evidence of progressive genius than a regular correspondence from "Pandemonium." These letters from "His Satanic Majesty" which have appeared so long in a number of liberal papers are becoming a little stale; and the progressive gentlemen who show such an appreciative regard for the epistolary abilities of the devil ought not to tax his endurance too far, since he has already been so liberal in trying to enlighten a portion of the world on some of the mysteries of his kingdom.

With the deepest sincerity, I wish to protest against this manner of discussing the religious issues of the age. It is unworthy the dignity and seriousness of the questions involved in this great revolution of thought that is now in process. Liberalism has been degraded too long by this puerile spirit and style, that are foreign to the earnest thought and manly heart which should lead the march of progress from the dead past to the living future. The cause of progress needs a heroism of a different type from that which glories in saying insolent things to the orthodox Deity and in publishing letters from the devil. This may seem very brave and radical to some Liberals who have been educated in that school of freethought, but it will never make men and women earnest and healthy reformers. How many liberal papers are there in the United States that children might read with profit? Of those I have any knowledge of, very few would ever reach a child under my care. It is a crying shame against Liberalism that its literature is not of a higher tone.

As it is impossible to define all those beautiful qualities that constitute the true gentleman or lady, so is it beyond the power of words to describe clearly the characteristics of a model reformatory journal; but, certainly, a decent respect for the feelings and beliefs of the Orthodox world is one of the essential elements in the composition of a truly liberal paper. If the liberal public demands this coarse style of agitation, so much the worse for Liberalism. But I do not believe that many Liberals wholly indorse the tone of the majority of liberal papers. I have never met one yet (and I have seen some who boasted of having no morbid delicacy) that did not profess an aversion to much that is published in many liberal papers.

H. CLAY NEVILLE.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

REV. W. R. ALGER spoke at the Parker Memorial Hall last Sunday.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN has gone to Wareham, Mass., for the summer; and that is his present address.

COL. JOHN C. BUNDY, editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, has gone on a voyage to the Azores for recruiting his health.

HON. ANDREW D. WHITE, during his residence in Berlin as the American minister, has made a valuable collection of medallions, gems, statuary, portraits and photographs for the benefit of Cornell University. Minister White is about to return to this country, and has been honored by a farewell banquet in Berlin, which was attended by some of the most distinguished literati of the city, as Professors Curtius, Mommsen, Treitschke, and Dr. Nachtigal, the African traveller.

M. LITTRE, one of the finest scholars of the age, and a devoted disciple of Comte, died last week in Paris, at the age of eighty. His most famous work was his History of the French Language. This was begun in 1863 and finished in 1873. Others of his books are: a Translation of the Works of Hippocrates; The Positive Philosophy; Translation of Strauss' Life of Christ; Application of the Positive Philosophy to the Government of Society; History of the French Language; and Médecine et Médecins. He was a zealous friend of the Republic.

THE charming Reminiscences of a Journalist, by Charles T. Congdon, published last year, contains a pleasant passing allusion to Emerson, from which we extract the following: "It is curious that I should first have heard the lovable voice of Ralph Waldo Emerson when he was the Rev. Ralph Waldo Emerson. One day there came into our pulpit the most gracious of mortals, with a face all benignity, who gave out the first hymn and made the first prayer as an angel might have read and prayed. Our choir was a pretty good one, but its best was coarse and discordant after Emerson's voice. I remember of the sermon only that it had an indefinite charm, simplicity, quaintness, and wisdom, with occasional illustrations from nature, which were about the most delicate and dainty things of the kind which I had ever heard. I could understand them, if not the philosophical novelty of the discourse. Mr. Emerson preached for a good many Sundays, lodging in the home of a Quaker lady, just below ours. Seated at my own door, I saw him often go by, and once in the exurberance of my childish admiration I ventured to nod to him and say, 'Good-morning!' To my astonishment, he also nodded, and smilingly said, 'Good-morning!' And that is all the conversation I ever had with the sage of Concord."

POETRY.

ODE

For the "Decoration-Day" Ceremonies in Tremont Temple, Boston, May 30, 1881.

BY THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

I.

Joy to the three-hilled city! Each new year
Heals something of the grief this day records;
Each year the plaintive lay
Sounds yet more far away,
And strains of triumph suit memorial words.
The old-time pang becomes a thrill of joy.
Again we turn the page
Of our heroic age
And read anew the tale of every patriot boy.
A modest courage was their simple wont,
The dauntless youths who grew to manhood here,—
Putnam and Savage, Perkins and Revere.
It needs no helmet's gleam,
Nor armor's glittering beam,
No feudal imagery of shield or spear,
To gild the gallant deeds that roused us then,
Where Cass fell dying in the battle front
And Shaw's fair head lay 'mid his dusky men.

II.

All o'er the tranquil land,
On this Memorial Day,
Coming from near and far,
Men gather in the mimic guise of war.
They bear no polished steel,
Yet by the elbow's touch they march, they wheel,
Or side by side they stand.
They now are peaceful men, fair Order's sons;
But as they halt in motionless array,
Or bow their heads to pray,
Into their dream intrudes
The swift sharp crack of rifle-shots in woods;
Into their memory swells
The trumpet's call, the screaming of the shells;
And ever and anon they seem to hear
The far-off thunder of besieging guns,
All sounds of by-gone war, all memories of the ear.

III.

A little while it seems
Since those were daily thoughts which now are dreams.
A little while is gone
Since, the last battle fought, the victory won,
We saw sweet Peace come back with all her charms,
And watched a million men lay down their arms.
But at this morning's call
We bridge the interval,
And yet once more, with no regretful tears,
Live back again, though now men's blood be cooled,
Through the long vista of the fading years
To days when Sumner spoke and Andrew ruled.

IV.

Courage is first and last of what we need
To mould a nation for triumphal sway:
All else is empty air,
A promise vainly fair,
Like the bright beauty of the ocean spray
Tossed up toward heaven, but never reaching there.
Nor in the past, but in the future, we Must seek the mastery
Of fate and fortune, thought, and word, and deed.
The past is on its starry track,
We would not win it back.
Gone, gone, for aye, the little Puritan homes;
Gone the beleaguered town, from out whose spires
Flashed forth the warning fires,
Telling the Cambridge rustics, "Percy comes!"
And gone those later days of grief and shame
When slavery changed our court-house to a jail,
And blood-drops stained its threshold. Now we hail,
After the long affray,
A time of calmer order, wider aim,
More mingled races, manhood's larger frame,
A city's broader sweep, the Boston of to-day.

V.

They say our Boston's star begins to wane,
Our heroes pass away, our poets die,
Our passionate ardors mount no more so high.
'Tis but an old alarm, the affright of wealth,
The cowardice of culture, wasted pain!
Freedom is hope and health!
The sea that all our ocean steamers ride
Is the same sea that rocked the shallops frail
Of the bold Pilgrims; yonder is its tide,
And here are we, their sons; it grows not pale,
Nor we who walk its borders. Never fear!
Courage and truth are all.
Trust in the great hereafter, and whene'er
In some high hour of need
That tests the heroic breed
The Boston of the future sounds its call,
Bartletts and Lowells yet shall answer, "Here!"

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 9, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE LAW OF HEREDITY.

The best hope of the world lies in the fact that any advantage which men and women, disciplined by the experiences of life, can secure in virtue, they can transmit to their children. The children thus come upon the stage of action better equipped than were their parents to play their parts with honor. It is in this way, by the gradual accumulation of a better mental and moral inheritance, that mankind has advanced from its primitive condition of brute barbarism to its present state of intellectual and moral civilization.

But, now that this law of progress has been discovered, the advance should be at an accelerated velocity. Human will and effort may coöperate with the law to add to its energy. Here is the crowning problem of social science,—so to improve the conditions of human existence that human beings shall be born with a greater advantage in the direction of goodness instead of a proneness to evil. To be born into conditions of goodness is to have good assurance of a good life. And we may say that it is the natural moral right of every human being to be so born.

But we have only to go into certain districts of any of our great cities, to have the conviction forced upon us that vast numbers of human beings are born into conditions of diabolism rather than into conditions of goodness; into conditions so evil physically, mentally, and morally that the wonder is rather that any of them should be rescued to useful and virtuous lives than that they should all go to utter perdition of evil. Where physical filth and wretchedness combine with mental darkness and moral depravity of every sort, it does not look as if there was much hope for any new fresh life that is there born. If the life only could come into existence really "new" and "fresh,"—but it is born already old in misery and vice; that is, in all the evil consequences of them, as if it had itself sinned. That any are saved to virtue from such surroundings, as they sometimes are, shows how persistently vital is the seed of virtue, and how powerful it might become for overcoming all evil, if it were only rightly cultivated.

Yet it is not wholly in the midst of such outward degradation that all evil temperamental conditions have their birth. The very seeds that have helped to generate this mass of corruption and wretchedness may have themselves been generated in homes of wealth and luxury. Vicious habits, abuses of appetite, physical and moral violation of natural law,—these will inevitably entail upon coming generations the burden of a disordered temperament, whether in the mansion of the rich and mentally cultivated or in the filthy hut of ignorant poverty and crime. The law of heredity cannot be evaded. No amount of money can purchase exemption from its authority. No amount of learning can devise any way to circumvent its operation. No amount of refinement can refine away its power. The evil habit, the coarse nature, the selfish ambition, the animal indulgence, the querulous temper, the grasping avarice, under however gilded and reputable exterior they may be concealed, cannot do otherwise than transmit an inheritance of evil to posterity. The evil may not always appear in the first generation, it may in individual cases be cancelled by some other element of inheritance; but somewhere the poisonous evil flows in the blood of after generations, to corrupt and disorder the currents of life. Here it may break out as physical disease, there it may appear as a mental infirmity; and again and more often it may indicate itself in a peculiar susceptibility to moral temptation,—sometimes, indeed, as an impulse almost irresistible to certain courses of vice and crime. Thus, in some form or other, it stays as a burden, instead of a help; as something to be striven against and resisted, something dragging the nature down and holding it back from achievements which might otherwise be easy to it. In the light of such a law, how urgent is the motive for uprightness and purity, for moral cleanliness of every form, for temperance, sobriety, and self-control! For in these virtues lie in embryo the clear brain, the pure heart, and the strong-fibred conscience of the generations that are to come.

But again, on the other hand, we sometimes behold homes in which goodness seems the natural law of their existence,—homes in which a pure and mutually equal and helpful love holds the supremacy over all motives and actions; homes in which truthfulness and sincerity and self-sacrificing devotion of the members to one another make the very atmosphere of family life; homes in which all the generosities and humanities, and all nobleness of feeling and doing, find instant welcome and constant hospitality; homes in which the temperate, easy simplicity in which all things are done detracts nothing from the prevailing good-cheer and joy and healthful pride in one another's success; homes from which all meanness, all impure thought, all intemperate appetite shrink away ashamed and unfed. Here and there, we see such homes, or homes approaching this ideal of goodness. And children that have the fortune to be born there are in very truth born into virtue, into godliness. How easy does goodness seem in these veritable temples of divinity! With what an unconquerable love of virtue, with what strong, well-nigh invulnerable armor for preserving virtue, must children grow up in such homes and go out from them into the world!

Said a candidate for the Orthodox ministry to a member of his ordaining council who put to him the usual question, "Can you name the time when you were converted and came into a state of grace?" "No; for I was born of a God-loving and God-obeying mother, and so I was born in a state of grace." The answer was heretical; but it was so sincere and truthful, and it opened withal a vista of such glorious possibility of a larger doctrine of regeneration than the questioner held, that it was allowed to pass. For children born and rightly bred in virtuous homes, under pure parentage, the word regeneration, either in its theological or moral sense, has no meaning. They begin with no depravity, but with a nature that is at one with the moral law, or with what the creeds call "grace." They begin with a temperament and tendencies that are naturally weighted toward goodness, and can only be prevented from achieving it by some act of unnatural violence.

STATE AND CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Revue de Belgique for April contains an article on this subject by Count Goblet d'Alviella, writer of an account of the Brahmo Somaj in the Revue des Deux Mondes, which was noticed in these columns last fall. The first section of this article consists of important passages translated from a sermon by Rev. C. W. Wendte, published January 20 in "an excellent Boston review, the Free Religious Index, the organ of religious rationalism in the United States."

The second section praises our American theory as the true one, but expresses a doubt whether the problem of church property can be solved by the laws now in force. These, as is well known, provide for the control of the possessions of each religious society by trustees elected by the members at short intervals, while the pastor is chosen by the majority of the congregation. Even among the Catholics, the nomination made by the bishop has to be ratified thus. But here is a state of things which the Church of Rome can never put up with at any price. On Oct. 1, 1829, a council of her bishops at Baltimore made a request, which twenty years later became a demand, that the control of all church property be vested in the bishops, who have thus become owners of $25,000,000 worth of real estate. There have been a few cases of opposition, one of the most important of which is related by Hon. James O. Putnam in his Addresses, Speeches, and Miscellanies, published at Buffalo, 1880. The parish of St. Louis in that city refused to give its property to the bishop, and therefore was put under an interdict. The members petitioned the Legislature of New York as follows: "Merely for refusing to violate the laws of the State, we have suffered the penalty of excommunication. Our name has become a by-word. All our congregation has been put under the ban. Our members are deprived of the sacred rites of baptism and burial. The sacrament of marriage is denied us. The priests are forbidden to pray before our altars. The holy consolations of religion are taken from us in sickness and at the hour of death. It is impossible for Catholics to exaggerate the importance of these privations." In 1855, the Legislature came to the relief of these petitioners with a law forbidding the transfer of property to priests and bishops, invalidating all future endowments not made according to law, providing that church property, left in the hands of any individual at his death, should pass not to his heirs, but back to the society, and finally stipulating that, in case the congregation should not have incorporated itself legally, the property should be taken care of by the State until the election of trustees. The speedy repeal of the interdict was among the results of this law. Eight years later, however, another act was passed, which favored the usurpation of Rome in a way hitherto unknown in the United States, and not at present permitted in Belgium. The board of trustees for a Catholic society was thus made to consist of the prelate of the diocese, the priest of the parish, and two laymen appointed by these ecclesiastics. This special legislation has given the Church of Rome the victory, after half a century of struggle against the independence of the Catholic parishes in the State of New York.

Digitized by Google

To this summary of the second section, I add a translation of the third: "Out of these facts arise lessons on which we ought to meditate at this moment, when all our legislation about the material part of the religions is under discussion. Should our places of worship be subjected to more direct control by the government, or even made simply a part of the property of the State? Or should we, as was recently requested by the common council of Brussels, suppress the pecuniary obligations of the municipalities toward the churches, and then break every connection with the civil powers? And shall the churches then retain a legal personality? Will not refusing this plunge us into all the perplexities of a reform not permitted by the state of our customs, confound the places of worship, demanded by the religious sentiment of the people, with the asylums of monkish parasitism, and finally lead to the establishment of close corporations? But will not granting it legalize all impositions on the popular credulity and give them full impunity, while ultramontanism will find new ground on which to fortify herself? Must not the solution be in adopting the American principle, with a few precautions suggested by experience; namely, the establishment of the worshippers at each church as an independent society, with the right of receiving and holding property within limits fixed by law, but also with the obligation of electing trustees periodically, of voting a financial budget annually, and finally of directly choosing the pastor, or at least ratifying the nomination? These are problems which can only be stated at present, but which deserve our closest attention; for the day is drawing near, thanks to the position of our clergy, when the dissolution of the last ties between the religious institutions and the public treasury will become a question of practical politics, and then we shall need to know how to reach results which will satisfy all legitimate interests, and correspond not only to the lessons of experience but to the demands of the age." F. M. H.

THE time was, and not so very long ago, when college students were almost invariably males. But this can scarcely be said to be the case at present. Among the graduates at the Boston University last week were a number of young women, including the daughter and only child of H. B. and Lucy Stone Blackwell. Two young women also graduated at the Technological Institute in the department of chemistry.

THE General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland has been trying Professor Robertson Smith for the third time. It has now deposed him by a small majority, for his heresies, from his professorship, but continued his salary. He sturdily refuses, however, to accept any pay, unless his right to teach goes with it. There is great excitement throughout the Church over the question, and the parties are so evenly divided that a schism seems likely to occur.

MR. BENJ. R. TUCKER sends us a reply to Mr. W. H. Tillinghast's criticism of his use of the word "anarchy," stating first that the criticism should have been made first against Mr. Wasson, who, in the Index discussion on Nihilism, was the first offender in this way; second, that, in spite of what the dictionaries may say, usage among the believers in the anarchistic doctrines warrants the application of the word which he and Mr. Wasson made, and that usage is an authority above dictionaries; third, that the use of familiar words in strange senses, so long as there is no intent nor effort to deceive, is justifiable by the fact that attention is thus fastened upon novel but important views, which might not otherwise get a hearing.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE enterprising lady who explored "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," and then told the interesting story of it, gives in her second volume an account of the Monto sect, founded in 1262, which protests "against celibacy, penance, fasting, pilgrimages, nunneries, monasteries, hermit isolation from society, charms, amulets, and the reading of the Scriptures in an unknown tongue," while it advocates freedom of thought and action, and recognizes that the family is the source and example of purity. One of the leading priests in this powerful body told her that the principal enemy which Christianity would have to encounter in Japan was not Buddhism nor any other religion, but the "English philosophy" of Mill and Spencer.

Another curious fact is that her entreaties to the Ainos, or aborigines, to give up the drunkenness, which is their besetting sin, were met with the answer, "We must drink to the gods, or we shall die." This is perhaps an extreme instance of the immoral tendency of a religion; but we know that no man can serve two masters or follow two standards. So far as any religion teaches aught besides mere morality, it sets up a different standard from the moral one. Thus, even Liberal Christianity would be thought by few of its adherents to favor scientific lectures and classes for the study of botany, secular history, and the modern languages on Sunday, though mental culture on any and every day is a plain moral duty. And so the questions, whether we should have the intellect or the emotions rule our life, whether faith or science is the true basis of knowledge, and whether we should live for this world or for the next one, will be answered in very different ways, according as we adopt a moral or a religious standard. Scientific morality must say, as Christianity does, "He that is not with me is against me, and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad."

AS SEVERAL brief articles on the subject of Vivisection have appeared in the Index, it may not be amiss to present, without comment, the opinion of Mr. Charles Darwin, as furnished by himself in a letter addressed to Prof. Holmgren, of Upsala, in answer to a request for an expression of his opinion upon the subject, which is just now much discussed in Sweden:—

DOWN, BECKENHAM, April 14, 1881.

Dear Sir,— In answer to your courteous letter of April 7, I have no objection to express my opinion with reference to the right of experimenting on living animals. I use this latter expression as more correct and comprehensive than that of vivisection. You are at liberty to make any use of this letter which you may think fit; but, if published, I should wish the whole to appear. I have all my life been a strong advocate for humanity to animals, and have done what I could in my writings to enforce this duty. Several years ago, when the agitation against physiologists commenced in England, it was asserted that inhumanity was here practised and useless suffering caused to animals; and I was led to think that it might be advisable to have an act of parliament on the subject. I then took an active part in trying to get a bill passed, such as would have removed all just cause of complaint, and at the same time have left physiologists free to pursue their researches,— a bill very different from the act which has since been passed. It is right to add that the investigation of the matter by a royal commission proved that the accusations made against our English physiologists were false. From all that I have heard, however, I fear that in some parts of Europe little regard is paid to the sufferings of animals; and, if this be the case, I should be glad to hear of legislation against inhumanity in any such country. On the other hand, I know that physiology cannot possibly progress except by means of experiments on living animals; and I feel the deepest conviction that he who retards the progress of physiology commits a crime against mankind. Any one who remembers, as I can, the state of this science half a century ago, must admit that it has made immense progress; and it is now progressing at an ever-increasing rate.

What improvements in medical practice may be directly attributed to physiological research is a question which can be properly discussed only by those physiologists and medical practitioners who have studied the history of their subjects; but, as far as I can learn, the benefits are already great. However this may be, no one, unless he is grossly ignorant of what science has done for mankind, can entertain any doubt of the incalculable benefits which will hereafter be derived from physiology, not only by man, but by the lower animals. Look, for instance, at Pasteur's results in modifying the germs of the most malignant diseases, from which, as it so happens, animals will in the first place receive more relief than man. Let it be remembered how many lives and what a fearful amount of suffering have been saved by the knowledge gained of parasitic worms, through the experiments of Virchow and others on living animals. In the future, every one will be astonished at the ingratitude shown, at least in England, to these benefactors of mankind. As for myself, permit me to assure you that I honor and shall always honor every one who advances the noble science of physiology.

Dear sir, yours faithfully,

CHARLES DARWIN.

To Prof. Holmgren.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

BY invitation of the Commissioners of the Prison for Women in Sherborn, Mass., a large number of the members of the New England and the National Woman Suffrage Conventions, held in Boston Anniversary Week, visited the prison on Saturday of that week, and made a thorough examination of its arrangements and methods. This institution is entirely under the supervision of women, and is fast becoming a model of its kind. Its Superintendent is Dr. Eliza M. Mosher, who evidently has a natural genius for the humane work. A correspondent of the Boston Traveller accompanied the party, and from his (or her) report we extract the following:—

Before going over the reformatory, Dr. Mosher explained, by means of a map, the relative local plan of the building and its system of working. The method is similar to that of a graded school. The prisoners are classified into four grades. The record of conduct is kept by marks, ten marks per week being that of perfect conduct. As the Traveller representative understood, one hundred and sixty marks, which is four months' perfect records, entitle the person to be admitted to the next higher grade. The privileges increase with each grade. From the fourth grade, which is the highest, the prisoner may be bound out to domestic service, the employer entering into an agreement to carefully watch the woman, and the reformatory being ready to again receive her, if necessary.

As has been stated, this prison for women is entirely under the control of women, the superintendent, the physician, the chaplain, the teachers all being women; and the only man employed is the steward and treasurer, Mr. Whiton, to whose courtesy and polite attention the party of guests are indebted.

At present in the reformatory there are two hundred and fifty women. Out of these, all but ten were engaged in their avocations; and, of these ten, three were able to engage in light employment, leaving only seven out of two hundred and fifty who were actually ill. The work of the institution, the cooking, cleaning, laundering, and the service in the house of the superintendent, is entirely performed by the inmates. Besides this, the special industries taught, and in which they are engaged, are sewing, both by hand and machine, knitting by machine, and manufacture of hammocks. The work which may be available to the women for earning a living after they leave the reformatory is the line of work selected in preference to one from which greater benefit might result to the institution, the good of the inmates being the first consideration in everything. They are each given one hour in school every day. The greater portion of them are able to read and write on entering. If not, they are taught this; and rudiments of the common studies are added. One of the inmates said on leaving she was glad to have learned to read, for now she could tell the streets by the lamp-posts. Last year, ninety-eight were sent out from the fourth grade, of whom only seven went back to a bad life. One old woman of some sixty years, some time after being discharged, wrote a letter to the superintendent, saying she had nothing to write,—O significant comment on a barren life!—that she had nothing to say, but wanted them to see that she had not forgotten how to write.

Digitized by Google

In the industrial departments, twenty-seven dozen shirts per day are turned out, eight hundred dozen pairs of stockings a month, and the revenue of the laundry is $130 per month. Much washing is received from the city, unselected family washing being done for 50 cents per dozen.

The tour over the house was one of great interest. The most exquisite cleanliness was everywhere notable. The lowest grade showed neat little rooms, with a white cot, a chair, small mirror, toilette bowl and pitcher, comb and brush, a hook placed for the robe de nuit on which the garment was hanging; and, being remarked by some one, Dr. Mosher said she considered every such detail of importance. The solitary cells for confinement are rarely in requisition. They are white-painted inside, with a little elevation of platform within to serve as a seat. The rooms are gradually better through the grades, as are also the tables, that of the lower grade having a plate, bowl, and mug only at each place, while on the fourth grade there is a table cloth, castor, and other conveniences. This, too, is a plan of Dr. Mosher's, to emphasize the refinements of life as privileges into which to grow. The work-rooms were scenes of busy activity. The sewing-machines are run by steam-power, and the women guide the work. In the finishing room, needlework was being done. We were shown the great laundry, the kitchen, where a table was piled with loaves of light sweet bread, and where great boilers of oatmeal were cooking. . . .

"What is the effect of women's work in the board and in the superintendence of this prison?" asked one of the visiting party of Mr. Whiton, the treasurer.

"Without women, this reformatory would not be in existence to-day," he replied. "It is proved here that women can govern women."

This proof, like the proof of all exceptional work, lies in the exceptional capacity of the woman-superintendent, Dr. Eliza M. Mosher, whose rare combination of poise with the gentlest sympathy, of insight in underlying causes and executive force regarding their effects, whose large comprehension, with also an attention to details, make up a character of very unusual gifts and power. . . . A little instance of her tact was in the case of the onion bed, which is one of miraculous proportions; but its gigantic area was explained by the Doctor, who informed the party that she had it as an express employment for each newcomer to have her own rows to weed. Each fresh arrival is kept alone by Dr. Mosher for a month, that she may not bring disorder to the others; and to give her air and exercise and the healthful stimulus of outdoor employment is the raison d'être of the onion bed. It is a means of grace. These instances of womanly tact, that could be indefinitely multiplied, imply their own significance. The recreation rooms for the prisoners are too important to be forgotten,—rooms where they may talk or play; and there is also a library for their use. The little room, half parlor, half office, where Dr. Mosher receives the women alone for talk, counsel, reproof, or encouragement, as may be, was noted. . . .

The industrial employments taught to the inmates of the Woman's Reformatory is a means of salvation to them. Many of them are ignorant of the simplest and rudest arts of life. The gospel of good work is an eminently wholesome one. The discipline is entirely an educative one. Hands, mind, and conscience are all considered; and the methods thus become the aid, the strong help, to a better life, not the punishment alone for the old, bad one. The drainage, about which so much has been said, is now considered in perfect order; and the sanitary measures seem to be effectual in every respect.

Birmingham Coffee-houses, their Management and their Great Success.

Wilson King, United States Consul at Birmingham, gives the State Department some very interesting information relative to the operations of the coffee-houses in that manufacturing city, and shows that they are a great stimulant to the trade of Birmingham. They have also resulted in a marked reduction in the amount of intemperance. The "Birmingham Coffee-house Company" was established in 1879. It was not established as a temperance or religious instrumentality. Its object was to give the general public, at a moderate price, opportunities of getting refreshments that are not spirituous, in as easy, speedy, pleasant, and agreeable manner as they can get their gin or beer. The coffee-house has as much glitter and splendor as its gin-house rival, and is conducted simply on business principles. No attempt is made to interfere with the religious or political or social opinions of any one who prefers to buy coffee instead of beer. No claim is made upon any one social class.

Customers who pay and behave themselves are always welcome, and every legitimate means is used to induce them to come. The rooms are comfortably warmed and brilliantly lighted, newspapers are supplied, and marble-topped tables, large mirrors, shining glass, and glittering chandeliers attract the eye.

The company was started with forty thousand shares at ten shillings each, of which twelve thousand five hundred and sixty-six only have been issued and paid up. According to the annual report, just made, there are now seventeen coffee-houses in successful operation in Birmingham; and the company last year had from one hundred thousand to one hundred and forty thousand business transactions weekly, varying from a penny upwards. This may be said to represent an average of twenty thousand daily during the six working days of the week; and many of these twenty thousand customers would almost certainly have drunk spirits, if these coffee-houses had not been available.

In addition to the ordinary coffee-house business, the company, having found that the high price of non-intoxicants worked against them, undertook to make its own aerated waters, with a result of supplying the coffee-houses and other customers with soda water, ginger beer, ginger ale, lemonade, etc., of first quality, with a profit at a penny a bottle. During the last summer, they made and sold two thousand dozen bottles per week; and the demand was so great as to warrant them in increasing their capacity to five thousand dozen weekly this year.

The report concludes by recommending a payment out of the profits of last year of a dividend of ten per cent. free of income tax, after having carried more than two thousand pounds over to the depreciation fund.

It has thus been proved that a skilfully managed company can carry on this trade in a wholesale manner in the midst of one of the largest English manufacturing populations, with the two very gratifying results of largely aiding to decrease the amount of drunkenness in a perfectly inoffensive and impersonal manner, and of paying an annual dividend of ten per cent.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

[The following letter was written by one of the most successful kindergarten teachers in Massachusetts, in response to the invitation of the Free Religious Association Committee to any persons interested in the liberal religious culture of the young to send articles on the subject.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Hinckley:—

I was deeply grateful to see the question, Have Liberals any religious instruction to give their children? agitated in the Index, and also grateful that it was given into such good hands. The subject opens endless fields for thought and work, and I sincerely hope no mental drought or deluge will interfere with an abundant harvest.

If religion means the highest possible idea of what is above and beyond us, and the largest interpretation of the relations growing out of this idea, then surely no class of people have such eminent right and responsibility to teach religion to their children as the Liberals; for they reject the old narrow idea that Christ has, in any supernatural sense, done any part of our work for us, and in its place make every human being a necessary part of the world's working force. With this view, it is necessary that we learn, and teach our children, how to fill our places best; and this involves a knowledge of our relations with what is above and beyond our comprehension, so as to deal with, and "lend a hand" in, the world of work around us. Religion can have no higher meaning than the perfect obedience to eternal law which insures the success of our work because it is in harmony with all onward movement. We want to begin such an education for our children as shall result in the triune harmony of physical strength, intellect, and feeling; and it is none the less religious, but all the more, because we follow the law of all growth, and begin with planting the seed, providing we plant faithfully and with a well-grounded faith that flower and fruit will be the inevitable result. A child's growth must begin with material things which he can see, handle, and make relations with; and these must be types to him of the maturer world of thought, reason, and feeling.

For example, we give a child a few feet of earth—even a few inches will do—either in doors or out; and it is easy to lead a very young child to understand that, although earth, sunshine, and rain are furnished by a higher power, and are beyond his understanding and control, yet, so far as they relate to the seed he has planted and its needs, he has control enough to be reasonably sure of success, if he is willing, first, to obey the laws of growth. There is no more important fact to establish us in the way of life than to understand fully that, to reign and rule over mind or matter, we must first be ourselves in a state of obedience to law,—that we must have the quality of obedience. This little experience of gardening is one of an endless variety within our reach, and one of the best, as it is the most delightful, for teaching children that there is no power that will or can produce certain results, unless we do our part; that happiness and success depend upon our first learning the law and becoming obedient to it. Children in their plays with blocks, chairs, and other material are inclined to represent runaway horses, steamboat, and railroad accidents, falling buildings and bridges, and the like. This comes not from their love of accident or failure, for there is nothing a child desires more than success; but it is because they see in it a result, a strong effect, and it is like what they see or hear of going on in the world about them. It is not destructiveness, as is often supposed, though liable to lead to this, if not understood and guided; but their desire to analyze leads them to unmake to the last possible extent, and the first development of this analyzing quality in children seems to the uninitiated simply destroying. Let the opportunity for playing with these materials be indulged and enlarged, but at the same time teach the child by actual experiment that accident and failure come almost wholly from our disobedience to law; in other words, that we have not planned, planted, or builded the best we knew, or else have undertaken to do before we understood the work in hand well enough. Here is the practical working of the vital principle of religion: first, our joyful and hearty obedience to inevitable and beautiful law, so that we may work with it and not in opposition to it; and, second, that law brings good or ill, success or failure, just in accordance with the quality and measure of our obedience.

This beautiful unity of the divine with the human, and dependence of each upon the other, lifts human life out of monotony and drudgery, and forbids the cold and superstitious relations between the finite and the infinite.

If this interdependence exists, and is so full of meaning and possible good, there is certainly a science of growth that leads to it; and that phase of liberal thought which makes the development of this science and its application to children its central work will be the accepted one. A. R. Aldrich.

THE CORONA AND THE ZODIACAL LIGHT.

I was pleased to see the remarks of "F. M. H." in the Index, replicatory to certain astronomical statements of mine. It is the truth, facts, I am in search of, irrespective of the tendency of said facts, whether confirmatory of, or in opposition to, any theory or system of thought entertained by myself. Whenever in error, I am especially thankful to any one pointing out the error. However, in the present instance, I think I am not so far from the truth as "F. M. H.'s" remarks seem to indicate. I wrote from memory, in my essay, concerning the corona, etc.; but, consequent upon my critic's correction, I have carefully re-examined the matter, consulting a number of the best astronomical works, and I find the exact facts to be something like the following:—

First, some explanation is due of the meaning attached to the term "atmosphere," when applied to the sun's surrounding envelopes. It is used in two senses by scientists: (1) the atmosphere proper of the sun; (2) in a more comprehensive sense, as including, in addition to the sun's proper atmosphere, all the outlying appendages of that body. I was well aware that the corona and zodiacal light formed no part of the sun's true atmosphere; hence, in my essay, I refer to the corona as "a part of the sun's atmosphere, so to speak," the use of this qualifying phrase indicating that it formed no part of the true atmosphere, but was a part of that extended "outlying atmosphere" surrounding the solar body. The extent of the atmosphere proper of the sun has not yet been determined by astronomers; though, from certain facts, some think, and I coincide with them, that it lies interior to the chromosphere. Some, however, still consider the chromosphere and corona as parts of the sun's atmosphere. So eminent an astronomic spectroscopist as Prof. C. A. Young (formerly of Dartmouth, now of Princeton), in his article on the "Sun" in Johnson's Cyclopædia, vol. iv., p. 660, published in 1878, contends that the solar atmosphere is not so contracted as others claim, and that the chromosphere and corona are included within it. Prof. Schellen in his Spectrum Analysis, 1872, p. 253; Sir John Herschel in the late editions of his Outlines of Astronomy; the latest editions of Chambers' Encyclopædia,—all speak of the corona as an "atmosphere" surrounding the sun. Precedent therefore justified my using that term in connection with the corona, though, as I am convinced, it is not a part of the solar atmosphere proper.

Digitized by Google

"F. M. H." says that, according to the Encyclopædia Britannica, article on Astronomy, published in 1854; and Appleton's New American Cyclopedia, article on the Sun, published in 1863, long before Mrs. King's work was issued, astronomers generally considered the corona a solar appendage. I said nothing of what had been thought long before her work appeared, but, rather, the opinion of astronomers at the time her work was published. Turning to the eighth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. iv., issued in 1853 (not 1854), article Astronomy, it is found that scarcely any reference is made to the corona. In the ninth edition, now issuing, a section of some length is devoted to the corona, but in the eighth edition this section is omitted. There are two or three vague, indefinite allusions to the corona, of a few lines each, which say nothing as to the general opinion of astronomers concerning the nature of the phenomenon. They may be construed as signifying that the writer thought the corona a part of the sun's atmosphere, certainly nothing more, and even that is not definitely expressed.

In Appleton's Cyclopedia, article Sun, vol. xv., p. 187, published in 1865 (not 1863), after describing the appearance of the corona, it proceeds thus: "It is the opinion of some (no differing opinion of others is previously alluded to), Leverrier and Foucault among the number, that the corona does not belong to the solar atmosphere. The latter considers it an example of the 'interference of light,' the phenomenon being held to be analogous to the colored fringes seen on a screen in a darkened chamber when a solar beam is admitted through a chink in the wall." To this, Prof. Airy objected: the facts, in his judgment, pointing "strongly toward the existence of an atmospheric medium, capable of reflecting light, extending from the earth to the moon." Surely, this does not indicate that astronomers generally regarded the corona as a solar appendage. Three of the most eminent astronomers are named as opposing that view; while the fact that others thought the corona a solar phenomenon is only implied, not directly stated. But perhaps "F. M. H." refers to this paragraph, a little further on: "To explain the prominences, Arago suggests a third envelope above the photosphere, composed of faintly luminous clouds; and this hypothesis, which accounts for the corona as well, has been very generally adopted." Further on, explaining this third envelope, it is described as "containing in a vaporous condition iron, sodium, lithium, and various other metals." This description indicates this third envelope to be what has since been called the sierra or chromosphere, and not the corona which overtops the chromosphere. The corona does not contain vaporous solutions of metals, but the chromosphere does. The paragraph above is ambiguous, so far as it relates to the corona, it being impossible to tell whether the parenthetical reference to it voices merely the personal opinion of the writer or is a part of the hypothesis generally adopted. It may be construed either way. The hypothesis generally accepted was the existence of the third envelope in which the prominences manifested themselves; but whether the writer meant to convey the idea that the inclusion of the corona in this third envelope was also of general acceptance, or merely that, in his opinion, it would cover the coronal phenomena, no one can positively tell. Taken with his preceding remarks concerning the conflicting views of Leverrier, Foucault, Airy, and others, the article indicates that great diversity of opinion existed on the subject of the corona, in fact that astronomers were all at sea on the subject.

"F. M. H." says valuable evidence to the effect that the corona was a solar appendage was obtained during the eclipse of 1861. After a careful search of the records of the results obtained relative to the corona during the last two centuries, I fail to find the least trace of any valuable results obtained in 1861, or, indeed, of any telescopic observations of the corona at all in that year. In 1860, photography was first utilized in coronal investigations; and probably "F. M. H." refers to the eclipse of that year, not of 1861. However, no particularly valuable evidence was then obtained determinative of the nature of the corona; for, as the Encyclopædia Britannica (ninth ed., vol. ii., Astronomy) tells us, it was not till the eclipse of 1870 that photography shed any important light upon the nature of the corona.

Mr. R. A. Proctor has written extensively upon the corona and zodiacal light. In his Astronomical Essays, 1872, he has eight papers thereupon; and in his work on The Sun, 1871, chapter six is largely devoted to a history of the observations of the corona and the various theories concerning it. A good account of the observations of the corona, and of the theories as to the cause of the phenomena, is also contained in Grant's History of Physical Astronomy. In an essay by Mr. Proctor on "Recent Eclipses of the Sun," reprinted in the Popular Science Monthly, 1872, vol. i., pp. 17-25, he especially refers to the "contest" waged by astronomers concerning the nature of the corona, and the important results obtained thereupon by the eclipses of 1869-71. "So soon as the corona began to be thought of at all," he says, "astronomers were led to believe that it is not of the nature of a solar appendage, but rather a sort of halo in our own atmosphere, or else an appendage belonging in some way to the moon." Kepler and Halley thought it an illumination of the lunar atmosphere. La Hire deemed it produced by reflection of the solar rays from the inequalities of the moon's surface contiguous to the edges of her disk. Delisle thought it occasioned by the diffraction of the solar rays which passed near the moon's edge. About thirty-five or forty years ago, however, astronomers were becoming more and more convinced that the corona was the sun's atmosphere, not a solar appendage, but the true atmosphere of the sun. This belief was greatly shaken by the discoveries of spectrum analysis not very long after, which being applied to the "prominences" revealed the fact that the density of the glowing gas of the prominences was much less than should be the case if the corona was the sun's true atmosphere. This led to a reaction among many astronomers concerning the nature of the corona. "Accordingly, Mr. Lockyer . . . was led to express the opinion that the sun's atmosphere has no such extent as had been imagined, but that the corona is an appearance (only) in our own air, 'an atmospheric effect merely,' due to the passage of the sun's rays through our atmosphere. Prof. Faye held similar views, views somewhat similar to those of Airy, Foucault, and Leverrier. They were stoutly opposed, however; and facts were adduced inconsistent with the 'atmospheric-illumination' theory. Evidence was obtained during the eclipse of 1869, in America, 'which seemed to show that the substance of the corona was gaseous.' . . . But those who regarded the corona as a mere glare in our own atmosphere rejected these results, because they seemed 'bizarre and perplexing in the extreme.' . . . As the eclipse of 1870 drew near, I found (says Mr. Proctor) many of the intending observers proposing to direct their chief attention to the question whether the corona is a solar appendage or a mere glare in our own atmosphere." The general conclusion drawn from the eclipse of 1870 was, in the words of Sir John Herschel, that "the corona is certainly extra-terrestrial and ultra-lunar." Doubts, however, still remained. "Nay, the atmospheric theory was so successfully defended before the British Association last August (1871) as to lead Prof. Tait to remark that, in his opinion, it was in the main true; while the president of the meeting, Prof. Thompson, even expressed the opinion that the special observations made last December proved that the greater part of the corona was a mere phenomenon of our own atmosphere. The eclipse of 1871, though, seems to have given these theories the quietus, it being then thoroughly proven that the corona was a solar appendage.

The foregoing facts evidence the truth of my statement, that it was not till the eclipse of 1869 that evidence of the solar nature of the corona was obtained, and that it was even then opposed by Mr. Lockyer and others, till the eclipse of 1870 furnished more conclusive proof of its real nature, I might have added, to make the statement complete, that not till 1871 were the doubts of its solar nature entirely removed. My statement that astronomers generally rejected the solar theory when Mrs. King's work was published calls for some modification. It should have been stated that at that time astronomers were divided in opinion concerning the corona, some holding to the atmospheric illumination theory, and some regarding the corona as the sun's true atmosphere. Now, Mrs. King corrects both these ideas. I have failed to find any trace among those espousing the solar theory, up to 1866, of the idea that the corona was not the atmosphere proper of the sun, but an exterior solar appendage. But Mrs. King states that the corona is distinct from the true atmosphere of the sun. Speaking of this atmosphere, she says that encompassing it is "another medium, which is also visible around the sun when it is eclipsed, causing greater apparent density of its real atmosphere, and its apparent indefinite expansion beyond the surface of the body." She here anticipated the discoveries of science. Those astronomers who regarded the corona as a solar phenomenon deemed it a part of the sun's atmosphere. It was not till 1868 that this was shaken by spectroscopic examination of the red prominences. "F. M. H." is mistaken in saying that the corona "was thought by Mrs. King 'to constitute a part of the sun's atmosphere.'" My words were that Mrs. King taught that the corona "is a solar envelope." The phrase which he quotes from me, as expressive of Mrs. King's thought, was not used by me in connection with her, but was used thus: In 1870, I said, the corona had been demonstrated "to constitute a part of the sun's atmosphere, so to speak." By omitting the words, "so to speak," and quoting the remainder of the clause as expressive of Mrs. King's thought (which it does not express), injustice is done that lady and myself, it being made to appear that she indorsed a scientific error of her time of writing, when in fact she corrected that error, and stated what has since been accepted by astronomers in general as truth. Had she indorsed the error of the times, then the unreliability of her utterances would have been manifest. Her works contain numerous other corrections of scientific errors, owing to the imperfect knowledge of science of the day. The author manifests an encyclopedic knowledge of the current science, and in various instances refers to these errors of scientists, and supplements their conclusions with new facts and principles shedding fuller light upon many problems now engaging man's attention. No doubt there are errors in this as in all other books. Granting it assumed spiritual authorship, it is but the work of a human being, a few years since resident in America, who now simply writes from the higher stand-point of a more interior state of being, with wider opportunities for investigation of nature's laws and forces. There is no "superhuman knowledge or supernatural aid" given Mrs. King, her assistance being purely human and natural.

"F. M. H." says that astronomers long ago thought the zodiacal light a part of the sun's atmosphere. Very true; but many others thought differently. A number of theories have been propounded; but it still remains, as Mrs. King calls it, "an unexplained phenomenon." Some considered it as an atmospheric phenomenon, others as due to the circulation of a ring of matter surrounding the earth; and in Appleton's New American Cyclopedia, vol. ii., p. 253, published in 1858, it is positively asserted that the zodiacal light is due to a group of satellites rotating around the earth, within the moon's orbit. This theory is also stated at length in vol. xvi. of that work (1865); and in Johnson's Cyclopedia, vol. iv , 1878, the same theory is advanced, with the statement that the materials productive of this phenomenon cannot be an appendage of the sun.

Prof. Barnard, however, controverts this hypothesis in an addendum, stating that its solar character was now generally acknowledged by astronomers. I mention these facts to show how divided the sentiment among scientists at the time of Mrs. King's writing, and to indicate how firm a footing the non-solar or terrestrial theory had at that time, as evidenced by its incorporation as established fact in the leading cyclopedia of America. Mrs. King's prompter, however, steered clear of these vagaries, and announced a new truth to the world, one at that time not thought of, but now generally accepted by scientists, that the zodiacal light is an extension of the corona. Those astronomers who accepted the solar origin of the corona, previous to and at the time of her writing, deemed it the sun's atmosphere, as "F. M. H." says; but this Mrs. King corrected, as she had in case of the corona, and declared that neither was part of the sun's atmosphere, but was solar appendage. The theory given by her of the cause of these two phenomena does not agree with any yet broached by scientists, hence was not borrowed from scientific works. One curious phenomenon connected with the zodiacal light is that it is sometimes manifest extending beyond the earth's orbit, and sometimes interior to it. If Mrs. King's theory be true, such must inevitably occur, though no reference is made to it in her work. It also explains the differences in form of the corona as seen at different eclipses, which is an unexplained phenomenon.

Digitized by Google

WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN,
Presidio of San Francisco, Cal.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

HISTORY OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE. Vol. I. Edited by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Matilda Joslyn Gage. New York: Fowler & Wells.

This sprightly record covers ground from 1848 to 1861, and tacitly assumes the promise of future pages. Its bulk is considerable, but not unwieldy, and the mechanical finish very satisfactory, with fine steel engravings of some of the most eminent women who have figured in the strife. Their physiognomy surely betokens anything but the crude, pig-headed, bustling littleness that has been and in large quarters still is attributed to these determined workers. The elegant workmanship of the engraver could by no trick of his art impart such delineations of soul and discreet power as shine forth from the faces, whether more or less comely to the worldly eye. It cannot be denied that, in the rank and file of those who have been most observed in this movement, curious specimens of personal attire, and a sort of nondescript uncouthness, have stirred the laugh and sneer in the conservative multitude. It seems often to pertain to radical action in any department,—this tendency to overshoot the mark and baffle for a period the very objects sought. The ardent view of distant fields to be won and intermediate obstacles to be crushed leads the poor enthusiast to step somewhat hastily through the brambles that need not always be allowed to puncture his feet. At least, some of them can be parried without losing the guiding star.

Human nature, too, irrespective of sex, is not exempt from deflections in the toilsome path. Imagined glories often end in being swamp-lights, and teach the sadder and wiser victim to prize steady advancement in conscious power above the flicker of popular approval. A janitor of a hall that accommodated enterprises of various hue once remarked that he had little patience with the women's gatherings, they so often fell to wrangling because each could not be captain. That was some years ago. Experience teaches them, or should, if it does not, that self-forgetting devotion to principles in charge brings more enduring comfort than a little brilliant leadership. But these trifling drawbacks, it is pleasant to observe, have not hindered the solid and comely growth of the genuine cause at stake. Sufficient bone and muscle, even in the tender sex, have been brought to bear upon the clamorous demands of the question to insure a comparatively general awakening to the truth that stands as title-page motto for the volume in hand; namely, "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The wide-spread diffusion of common-sense in multiform departments of life cannot suffer this principle to escape eventual application, despite the selfish obtuseness and shrinking apathy of large masses of men and women alike. Tradition and repugnance to discord will deter the latter from any rapid assumption of their dues; but the constant influx of general intelligence must some time convince them that a self-respecting recognition of their own latent capacities is needful to the welfare of the men they love as well as the benefit of posterity, which is binding equally on men and women.

The features of the struggle portrayed in this new publication are well worth consideration, and would repay perusal by even those who are not in full sympathy, in the vivid dramatic coloring of many of the incidents recorded. The scene at an Ohio Convention in 1851, in charge of Mrs. Frances D. Gage, presenting the telling speech of stanch old "Sojourner Truth," is a notable case. J. P. T.

THE June Atlantic presents a rather dainty collection of literature. Charles Egbert Craddock has a backwoods story, called "Over on 'Tother Mounting," which works up legends and superstitions of the Western peasantry. The poetic delineations of scenery redeem the heavy human element, make us think of half-disciplined animals dwelling in paradise. "The Indoor Pauper" is a rather painful record of the cruelties and neglects visited upon the inmates of almshouses. Statistics and references are given, showing the comparative humanity and consideration displayed in the different States. We learn from this paper that Massachusetts leads in the grade of State charities. Three really dainty and charming papers are "A Spring Opening," by Edith Thomas, wherein we learn of the marvellous fringing, flouncing, rosetting, and blooming of nature's millinery; "A Taste of Maine Birch," by John Burroughs, in which we smell, see, and taste the beauty of these white and yellow-coated saplings, and even see them mirrored in the ponds around which they grow,—moreover, we catch sight of the painted trout which dart about in their shadows; and the last of the dainty paper is called "Bergen Days," by "H. H.," a story of Norway, with its simple life and sweet scenery of pines. "Who lost Waterloo?" is a careful gathering together of old despatches and dates by John C. Ropes, whereby it is made to appear that Napoleon was not so very culpable, after all. Henry James' "Portrait of a Lady" is moved along to the interior of the magazine, and gives indications of an unfortunate ending for the "Lady." We trust the catastrophe may yet be averted. Miss Phelps' "Friends, a Duet," is apparently ended, and rather unsatisfactorily,—a result which we have anticipated. The authoress seems to have foreordained that a sentimental woman shall obstinately throw away her own happiness. Carlyle's Reminiscences are reconsidered, and some of the new novels, as well as Whittier's new book and Swinburne's Studies in Song.

THE Popular Science Monthly for June is full, as usual, of solid and interesting scientific information. Dr. F. L. Oswald continues his valuable papers on "Physical Education," the present one being upon "Clothing," which, like those that have preceded, is written in a vigorous and somewhat pungent style, that shows a thorough acquaintance with the various phases of the subject, as illustrated through a reference to history and the customs of living peoples and tribes. Sir John Lubbock, who appears equally at home in different branches of science, tells some curious things about "Fruits and Seeds." "Sunstroke and some of its Sequelæ" is a timely article by Dr. I. Fayrer. N. H. Egleston, under the title of "The Value of our Forests," takes up the note of warning, which has already been sounded by others, in regard to the devastation of our timber lands. A. Graham Bell supplements his paper of last summer on the photophone, before the American Society for the Advancement of Science, with one on "The Production of Sound by Radiant Energy," in which he gives an account of farther investigation in the same direction. Herbert Spencer contributes another chapter in his series on "The Development of Political Institutions." There is also a brief sketch of Julius Adolph Stöckhardt, and the following interesting articles: "Degeneration," by Dr. Andrew Wilson (illustrated); "The Modern Development of Faraday's Conception of Electricity," by Prof. H. Helmholtz; "The Primeval American Continent," by L. P. Gratacap; "Natural Production of Alcohol," by Gaston Tissandier; "Glucose and Grape Sugar," "The Mental Effect of Earthquakes," and the customary fragmentary matter at the close of the number.

THE June International Review continues W. Fraser Rae's account of "George Eliot's Life and Writings," with some interesting quotations from her critical articles of earlier years. J. M. Gregory details "An Experiment in College Government," which advocates like attempts to organize the students themselves into self-governing bodies as a means of control suited to the independence of the time and as useful training for citizenship. A. A. Hayes writes of "The Pioneers of the Sierra Madre." J. Brander Matthews gives a critical analysis of the work of "M. Alexander Dumas, Fils." Eugene L. Didier describes once more that ever fascinating figure in history, "Lady Mary Wortley Montagu." A most valuable article is that by Elie Réclus on the "Zulu Kafirs." The habits, morals, and conditions of this people are here given us in a compact, clear, and intensely interesting manner. A warm tribute to "A Forgotten Astronomer" by Edward S. Holden, and a suggestive article on "The Assassination of the Tsar," finish the list of subjects for this month. This last article, written by Ivan Panin, a young Russian student in Harvard University, aims to show that the real question in Russian affairs is not, Can Nihilism be justified as a method, but could the conditions, of Russian life produce any other movement? The article should be read by all interested in Russian affairs, as the testimony of one not himself an extremist to the seeming necessity of the Nihilist measures.

THE North American Review for June presents its usual variety of articles for attracting a wide circle of readers. The reader of scientific or theologico-scientific proclivities will turn perhaps first to the last article, wherein Prof. E. S. Morse discusses "Prehistoric Man in America"; while not a few will think the first article, by Hugh McCulloch, on "Our Future Fiscal Policy," as first also in interest and importance. In the middle, between these, Frederick Douglass discourses, as one having authority, on "The Color Line." A good article, patriotic and genuinely democratic, is contributed by Dr. Geo. B. Loring, on "The Patrician Element in American Society"; and a timely one by Dr. Austin Flint, on "Vaccination," opposing the present reactionary tendency against Jenner's discovery. Another contribution of special note is Mr. Dorman B. Eaton's reply to Judge Tourgee's paper on "Civil Service Reform," in the April number of the Review. Other articles are "Shall Americans own Ships?" by Prof. W. G. Sumner; a legal paper on "The Right to regulate Railway Charges," by Judge J. M. Mason; and M. Charnay's continuation of his description of explorations among the "Ruins of Central America."

THE regular readers of Wide Awake will return with eager interest to the continued stories of "Honor Bright," "Rocky Fort," and "Polly Colongue," in the June number, which become more captivating as they proceed. In addition to these, "Silly's Hood Me," "Off the Track in a Sleeper," and "Original Waxwork Shows," are of particular interest. The six-paged illustrated ballad, "The Little Boggermuggers," by the favorite story-teller of the little ones, Mrs. A. M. Diaz, is very grotesque and funny. There are also other choice little bits of poetry and sketches by familiar writers which are worthy of mention. Babyland, from the same publishers, which of late has a handsome cover, with a new illustration on it for each number, besides those inside, continues the same delightful marvel of cheapness and beauty.

THE Index acknowledges the receipt of the Emerson Birthday Book, just published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It is solidly and compactly gotten up, with just enough of gilding for simple taste, has deep salmon-colored edges, and is of a size to be easily slipped into coat-pocket or satchel. It contains a portrait of the great Transcendentalist, taken in his prime, besides twelve landscape illustrations heralding the months. Each page gives space for two birthday extracts with the opposite blanks, and to these are added the dates of birth of great men, as well as memorable battles, etc. The extracts are both prose and poetry, and certainly present upwards of three hundred and sixty-five excellent things, if not the most excellent things, written by Emerson.

"THE land, my friends," said an Irish orator at a meeting, "has belonged to the people from the days of Adam." "Adam, indeed!" replied a voice in the crowd. "Do not speak of him: he was evicted from the Garden of Eden without compensation."

Digitized by Google

FOREIGN.

THE Swiss Federal Council, in pursuance of a resolution of the National Assembly, is, it is announced, "taking steps to ascertain the views of foreign governments with reference to the adoption of an international factory law."

AGITATION is said to be increasing in Crete; and the Christians are forming themselves into brotherhoods, a customary preparation for insurrection. The Assembly is in a deadlock, none of the Governor's projects of law having passed.

AT Soumy, in Russia, a man is soon to be tried on the somewhat novel charge of having murdered his son for joining the Nihilists. On the same date will commence the deportation of twelve thousand two hundred convicts to Siberia, via Moscow.

THE Bishop of Ghent has dissolved the religious community of the "Brothers of the Good Works" at Renaix, as twenty-nine of them have been condemned by the tribunal at Oudenarde for corrupting the boy pupils of the school which was intrusted to them.

THREE primitive Methodist ministers were recently summoned before the Belfast (Eng.) police court for unruly behavior in leading a large crowd which paraded the streets singing hymns. Two of the defendants were fined 40s., with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment; and, in the absence of the third, the case against him, which included a charge of assaulting a constable, was adjourned. The defendants refused to pay the fines, electing to take the alternative.

THE crowded and enthusiastic meeting of railway servants just held in Exeter Hall shows that directors will soon have to face the question of diminishing the hours of labor. The programme of the association, which was unanimously approved, demands the recognition of the nine hours' day and the six days' week. At present, it was stated, most of the one hundred and thirty-five thousand servants employed on railways in this country work from ten to twelve hours a day, with occasional stretches of from sixteen to twenty hours at a time, and that hardly any of them get a Sunday rest more than once in three weeks. Probably, no railway servant expects to see the nine hours' system established at once on English railways; but a beginning might very well be made by recognizing the principle that six days' work ought to constitute a normal week's work. Railway travelling would be safer and railway servants happier and healthier, if, for once, the directors and managers of railways would condescend to take a hint from the Decalogue.—Pall Mall Budget.

JESTINGS.

DON'T judge of a man's character by the umbrella he carries. It may not be his.

IT rains alike on the just and the unjust,—on the just mainly because the unjust have borrowed their umbrellas.—Buffalo Express.

A LITTLE boy, reciting a Bible verse about smiting the enemy hip and thigh, said they would smite him with a "hip, hip, and hurra."—Cin. Sat. Night.

A NEWSPAPER man, in putting on his last year's white vest, found a roll of bills in one of the pockets, amounting to $120, which he had entirely forgotten. P.S.—None of them were receipted.

THE following good story of the Emperor William is related by the Berlin correspondent of the Boston Post: "Last year, while hunting in Silesia with the Duke of Mecklenburg and the King of Saxony, the aged Kaiser proposed returning to their castle on foot; but, soon becoming weary of the walk, he hailed a passing wagon, and requested the driver to take them home. The peasant complied, but could not long restrain his curiosity, and soon remarked, 'I suppose it is all right, and you look all right; but will you please tell me who you are?' 'I am the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg.' 'Oho-o-o!' exclaimed the rustic; 'and who are you?' 'I am the King of Saxony.' 'Oho! ahem!' ejaculated their driver; 'and you, mister, who are you?' 'I am the Emperor.' 'There, that will do, my friends,' grinned the peasant; 'and I dare say you would like to know who I am. I am the Shah of Persia, and when it comes to joking I can take my part as well as the next man.' The three sovereigns were convulsed with laughter, but the peasant drew a long face when he found that he had been the only joker."

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
ELIZABETH B CHASE, Providence, R.I.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.
ANNIE L. DIGGS, Lawrence, Kansas.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
CAROLINE M. SEVERANCE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

All letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to "Free Religious Association," at the office.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c. " "
" 52	" . . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress Street, Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

Cornell University Library

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES	10c
SKULLS	10
GHOSTS	10
HELL	10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD	10
GODS	10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT	10
HUMAN RIGHTS	10
HEREAFTER	10
TOM PAINE	10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at 25 cts. each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,
Tailors and Clothiers,
6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,
23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 599.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 51.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

WHO purely invokes the truths, he has the essence of the supreme soul. Who honors truth in word and deed, he best serves and worships Deity.—Zoroastrian.

LET one collect virtue by degrees, as the ant builds its nest, that he may acquire a companion to the next world. For, in his passage thither, his virtue only will adhere to him. Single is each man born. Alone he dies, alone receives the reward of his doings. When he leaves his body on the ground, his kindred retire with averted faces; but his virtue accompanies his soul. Let him gather this, therefore, to secure an inseparable companion through the gloom, how hard to be traversed!—Hindu.

LET the wise man guard his thoughts; for they are difficult to perceive, very artful, and they rush wherever they list. Thoughts well guarded bring happiness. Those who bridle their mind, which travels far, moves about alone, is without a body, and hides in the chamber of the heart, will be free from the bonds of the tempter.—Buddhist.

I HONORED my father; I esteemed my mother; I loved my brothers; I found graves for the unburied dead; I instructed little children; I took care of orphans as though they were my own. For great misfortunes were on Egypt and this city in my time. —Ancient Inscription on Egyptian Tomb.

THE greatest penalty of evil-doing is to grow into the likeness of bad men, and, growing like them, to fly from the conversation of the good, and be cut off from them, and cleave to and follow after the company of the bad.—Plato.

THE world was given us for our own edification,
Not for the purpose of raising sumptuous buildings;
Life, for the discharge of moral and religious duties,
Not for pleasurable indulgence;
Wealth, to be liberally bestowed,
Not avariciously hoarded;
And learning, to produce good actions,
Not empty disputes.
—Inscription on a Mohammedan Mosque.

THERE is no other cause of perplexity and disquiet but an unsubdued will and ungoverned affections. A holy and spiritual man, by reducing these to the standard of his own mind, becomes the master of all his outward acts: he does not suffer himself to be led by them to the indulgence of inordinate desires that terminate in self, but subjects them to the unalterable judgment of an illuminated and sanctified spirit. —Thomas à Kempis.

IT is impossible you should take true root but by the fair weather that you make yourself: it is needful that you frame the season for your own harvest. —Shakspeare.

IF thou wouldst conquer thy weakness, thou must never gratify it. No man is compelled to evil: his consent only makes it his. It is no sin to be tempted, but to be overcome.—William Penn.

SELF-TRUST is the essence of heroism. It is the state of the soul at war; and its ultimate objects are the last defiance of falsehood and wrong, and the power to bear all that can be inflicted by evil agents. It speaks the truth; and it is just, generous, hospitable, temperate, scornful of petty calculations, and scornful of being scorned. It persists: it is of an undaunted boldness, and of a fortitude not to be wearied out. —Ralph Waldo Emerson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A JUDGE in New York has decided that the revised New Testament will not do for witnesses to swear upon in his court. Perhaps he was a parishioner of Rev. Mr. Talmage, who in his Sunday service, laying his hand on the old version, then and there took the oath that he never would use the new one.

THE Boston Society of Natural History is to open a seaside laboratory at Annisquam, Mass., June 15, the session to end September 15. There will be no stated course of instruction and no lectures, the purpose being to afford opportunities for the study and observation of the common types of marine animals under suitable direction and advice.

THE Birmingham (England) Weekly Post of a late date says: "Intelligence from Utah announces that forty-four Mormon missionaries have left there for Wales. If they should stop midway in the Atlantic, and at the bottom of it, neither Utah nor Wales would stand in any need of commiseration." A view with which a growing party in America will cordially coincide.

THE Catholic Review takes to itself some credit that Catholics are not found among Col. Ingersoll's audiences, which is not at all remarkable. Genuine Roman Catholics are seldom found in any audience where opinions are presented or discussed in regard to religion at variance with those in which they have been educated. The Catholic Church does not intend that they shall be.

A COURT in Indiana has given a decision that a subscription made in church on Sunday cannot be collected by law, if the subscriber afterward refuses to pay it. A church may receive collections "cash down" on Sunday; but a pledge on that day for future payment is an illegal contract, and cannot be enforced, even though the money was to save a heathen. Moral: Deacons must beware of "pledges" in the contribution-boxes.

IT appears that prejudice in respect to colored people, with its hateful concomitants, is not confined to the United States. They have a good deal more of it than is creditable to them down in the British province of Nova Scotia. The colored people there have been excluded from the public schools, and compelled to put up with "separate schools." They have held public meetings to protest against the injustice, and have also applied to the Board of School Commissioners and the Legislature for concession of their rights in this particular, in common with other citizens, but without effect.

THERE seems now some prospect that New York may get its streets cleaned. After exasperating delays by the official authorities, exhausted patience of the people, and untold sickness and mortality in consequence of the filthy condition of the city, the Mayor has appointed and the Board of Health confirmed James S. Coleman as Street Commissioner for undertaking the Herculean cleansing. Mr. Coleman has been a railroad contractor and superintendent, and is represented to possess just the experience and characteristics that are needed. Moreover, he is not mixed up at all with politics, which is certainly a very important and hopeful consideration in his favor.

THE Sunday Times of Charleston, S.C., piously says: "We have said very little, because we care very little, about the new version of the Bible which has been recently issued. If a God-inspired book has been teaching error for many centuries, we certainly have no faith in the revision that comes at this time through a human agency. If this practice continues, the Bible will be so altered in centuries to come that the apostles themselves will not be able to recognize it on the day of judgment." We have long been convinced that in any and every version of the New Testament there is a great deal which "the apostles themselves" would never recognize as their work on "the day of judgment" or any other day.

WE regret to learn that Colonel Ingersoll is to be one of the lawyers to defend General Brady in the Star Route rascalities. We know the general plea in such cases is that it is to be assumed a person is innocent until he has been proved guilty; but this, although it has a plausible look, possesses but little force in many instances. And the case of General Brady appears to be one of these. Indeed, it is pretty plain that a systematic course of robbery has been carried on under his very eyes, and for which some one is responsible; and, if not General Brady, who? Under these circumstances, we should have much preferred that Colonel Ingersoll should have been, if on either side, on that of the government rather than on the side of those implicated in the plunder. Infidelity, if it has a higher code of life and honor for the world, can ill afford to sacrifice itself to mere money-getting or put itself in so questionable an attitude.

THERE are few words more bandied about than the word "reform" in our day, or that have a more uncertain significance. Sometimes, the reform itself is the thing which most needs reforming; and then, again, a genuine reform is often inconsistent or goes but a little way at best. The Reformed Episcopal Church affords an example in point. Its convention a few days since made it clear that its reform does not cover doctrines of the Church which it has left, but relates chiefly to ecclesiastical fashions,—the lesser matters of the law. Hence, an article affirmative of belief in eternal punishment, brought forward for an amendment to the creed, though at first rejected, was adopted under another form of phraseology, thus indicating how much the word "reformed" amounts to in this branch of the Episcopal Church, in respect to doctrines which the really advanced portion of Christendom has nearly or quite abandoned.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

Free Religious Association, May 26 and 27, 1881.

[Continued from last week.]

The Association reassembled on Friday, May 27, at 10.30 A.M., a large audience being present, and was called to order by William J. Potter, the Secretary, who spoke as follows:—

Remarks of William J. Potter.

I am requested, ladies and gentlemen, by the President of the Free Religious Association, to call this convention to order.

This is the fourteenth year, in regular succession, that the Free Religious Association has presented itself to the public of Boston. I wonder how many are in this hall this morning who attended that first meeting, fourteen years ago to-day, in Horticultural Hall in this city,—that meeting in response to the first public invitation that was extended to the friends of progress and of rational thought in religion to come together for a free conference; that meeting which surprised us all so greatly by the numbers that congregated and by the enthusiasm that was manifest. Some of us who had the arrangements for that meeting in charge went to it in anxiety, lest we had secured too large a hall for the occasion, but hoping that we might possibly find it half-filled. On arriving, even before the appointed hour, it was difficult to get from the entrance to the platform on account of the multitude of people; and, for three hours, those of you who were there will remember the seats were crowded and the aisles were filled with people standing through all that time to listen to the speakers. That was the time of our fresh enthusiasm,—the time, too, when there was not a little curiosity on the part of the public to know what was to be offered from a platform which presented so many novel features for a religious body. There were probably people present who were expecting that some new form of religion was to be launched then and there upon an expectant world: and very likely those who so thought and so expected have been disappointed in the course of the years that have followed. For religions are never thus launched suddenly upon the public: they grow, they are not made. In the time of the Christian era, people were expecting some grand new form of faith suddenly to appear with signs in the heavens and commotions on the earth. And yet even that era had actually come and gone before people knew that it had come enough to reckon back the years to it. And so it always is in the great religious movements: they do not come at once full-grown, but they have to grow slowly,—"First the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear." And so, if some of the enthusiasm of that first time has vanished, if the flushed hopes of any have been disappointed, it is because we have come to see that there is work to be done as well as an enthusiasm to be felt. We have come now upon the years of hard work, when the same consecration is called for, when the same enthusiasm is needed, yet more wisely balanced, but when there is also needed that fidelity to principles which can go down unweariedly into the field of hard labor where every reform must finally be wrought out.

We have endeavored in this Free Religious Association to present especially this one idea,—that there may be fellowship in freedom, working fellowship on a basis of freethought. As I state that, it does not seem perhaps anything very striking or very novel; and yet I venture to say that in the history of religion it was an absolutely new departure, and that, moreover, it is one of the very hardest things to accomplish that has ever been tried or ever will be tried. Fellowship, or perfect, cordial unity on the basis of absolute freedom of thought,—that has been our aim, that is the aspiration of the Free Religious movement. Perhaps we have sometimes made mistakes; but we have always kept the aim in view, and we keep it still. Now, the difficulty of holding together an effective organization on that basis, if you will reflect a moment, will be evident. If you believe strongly in any truth, you immediately become zealous to impress that truth upon others. Just in proportion as people believe that their convictions and their principles are important, will they be fired with zeal to extend them. And so gradually they are likely to come to have more regard for that one thing which they have discovered and believe to be truth than for the intellectual freedom of their neighbor who does not hold the same convictions; who may be working in the same direction, but has not yet discovered the same thing. The difficulty is to combine in one association a working zeal for your own convictions with full respect for another's liberty to differ from them. What we aim for here is to bring together upon the same platform and into the same unity of work those who may be working on different lines of thought and who have not yet, perhaps discovered the same thing, and who yet believe earnestly and reverently in that which they have discovered; but who believe more in the free search for truth by all than they do in any one truth that has yet been discovered by themselves, because the search embraces all the future, while that which is discovered only covers the little segment of the present.

In this same spirit, with this same aim, the Free Religious Association, on this its fourteenth anniversary, presents itself to you to-day. I have simply, at the request of the President, made these introductory remarks in his place, because on the programme for the convention he himself is to take at once a very prominent part in the discussion this morning. The subject that has been presented for discussion at this session is one of the most important and one of the most prominent now before the community,—the Foundations of Morality; and the Perils, as they are sometimes called, to Morality from the Downfall of the old Theologies. That brings up a question here in which the President of this Association has been specially and profoundly interested in its various phases, and he will open the consideration of that general question by presenting to you an address on the Teachers of Ethics as the Successors of the Clergy. Dr. Adler will now address you.

THE TEACHERS OF ETHICS AS THE SUCCESSORS OF THE CLERGY.

Address of Felix Adler, Ph.D.

I do not feel at all competent to address you upon the great question that has been announced. There are subjects that require a gathering up of the entire soul, in order to do them approximate justice. There are moments when one feels a desire to be in possession of a degree of energy and power which, perhaps, at the moment is not at command, in order to express all that one would desire to express upon a given theme. And yet, having this audience before me and having announced the subject dearest to my own heart, I shall try at least to give some outline of the thoughts that have suggested themselves to my mind concerning this subject, in however imperfect and partial manner it may be.

The Free Religious movement is at present passing through a period of transition; and we know not yet whether the transition will be accomplished or whether it will not be accomplished. It has been distinctly one thing, and we hope it will be distinctly another thing. It has been a work, a movement, for a perfectly free and untrammelled expression of various definite or indefinite beliefs from various standpoints. It is working toward a stand-point of its own, which, however, shall guarantee absolute freedom to all who accept it. The Free Religious movement has hitherto stepped before the community and said, Let us have the Jew, the Mohammedan, the Buddhist, and the Christian, and let them state frankly and freely and with the full convictions of their heart those principles which they believe to be absolutely true. The new stand-point which I indicate is that of a company of men and of women who would unite upon the same platform, knowing that they cannot utter principles which are absolutely true, knowing that the religious movement in the future is not to be based on principles of faith that are absolutely true, and, so far as absolute truth of thought is concerned, abandoning the hope of it, and believing only in the absolute character of the search and not of the truth that is found. And yet our Secretary has wisely and truly spoken, in saying that such a movement cannot be founded on mere disagreement. And I, for one, believe that the reason why this Association is not stronger to-day than it is, is because it has been founded upon the divisions of its principles. There must be some one point, at least, of cordial union and of enthusiastic conviction for all in common. And if, as I have said, that point cannot be the adoption of any intellectual belief as an absolutely true one, why then, in sooth, it must be found, if not in the intellect, in the heart; if not in the perception of truth, then in the acting of truth. And thus I would explain what I mean by the belief that the religion of the future must be founded upon moral practice and moral culture rather than upon the unanimity of intellectual perceptions.

The movement has hitherto been preparatory in this direction: it has been mainly negative in its aspect. The leaders of Free Religion have hitherto been men who have been in early years instructed in some one or other of the positive faiths, and the greater part of their lifetime has been spent in emancipating themselves from those false principles which were inculcated in their youth. It is a noble and a grand work, this emancipating one's spirit from what is false; but it is only a preparatory work, after all. And a greater question still remains after it has been considered and established what is not to be, the question, namely, What is to be? The leaders of Free Religion have more or less united in the watchword of morality and moral virtue as the cry of our cause. Truth, righteousness, and love, these, it is said, are the aims to which we aspire, this the purpose which we seek to reach. But it is forgotten that all religions claim exactly the same purpose and the same aim. The religions of the past have also dwelt on truth, righteousness, and love, as much as we are seeking to do so; and the great question for Free Religion to answer is: Have we any means of establishing these great moral principles on a firmer basis than they have had before us? Have we larger views of righteousness than those of the past? Have we a finer morality to publish, and more effective methods of establishing morality than they? The Church has its methods. The ecclesiastical organization of the churches, their social organization, the scheme of doctrine, the sacrament,—all these are distinct and positive methods for the achievement of the moral needs of life. Have we such methods? What are the instrumentalities by which we seek to accomplish those purposes of religion which we are so loud in publishing as specially our own?

If we regard the facts, we shall find that the only way, almost the sole instrumentality hitherto used by every religion for the inculcation of its principles, has been the public discourse, the sermon or the lecture from the platform. In this respect, we have adopted one of the methods of the Church, perhaps the most important of the Church's methods, and have embraced it in our scheme of work. But while Christianity, Judaism, Mohammedanism, the various religions of the past, have adopted and instituted, outside of the public teaching, practical methods for the inculcation of virtue and righteousness, Free Religion is as yet almost entirely bare of any such instrumentalities; and the question is a serious question, which it behooves the leaders and the advocates of Free Religion to answer, whether the mere teaching from the pulpit or the platform suffices to secure what we desire. In place therefore of adopting the watchword on which we have so largely depended, let us buckle down to the task, if we can, of discovering in what positive directions we differ from the inculcations which have been given by the religions of the past, what new features we have to add to their teachings of righteousness, and what new methods we can suggest for adapting them to new lines of conduct in the scientific, æsthetic, and moral aspect of religion to-day.

In the first place, so far as the scientific aspect of religion is concerned, I believe there is a new feature to be included by Free Religion, suggested by the very phrase which I have just used, the scientific teaching of religion. The teaching of morality in the churches has been in one respect, and in one important respect, deficient, in that it has been desultory. It has been fragmentary. We are told that moral teaching is given in the pulpits. That is true. But if you will survey a course of sermons, if you will look over a year's course of sermons in any of our pulpits, I think you will find, at least in the great majority of cases, that, so far as doctrinal teaching is set aside from time to time, and moral teaching is supplied to the people, moral teaching itself is essentially fragmentary. One point of the moral sphere is touched, then another and then another, lying far off; but there is no connection between these parts that are thought and touched upon. There is no systematic teaching of morality from these pulpits and these platforms. And that is not an accident: that is a circumstance which is due to the very fundamental principles of Christian teaching. The morality of the Christian religion is supposed to be supernaturally revealed. There are two great codes in the Bible, the code of the Decalogue and the code of the Sermon on the Mount, which, it is claimed, embrace and embody the essence and sum total of the best morality which is possible to human nature. So long as this belief, this conviction, that the sum total, the acme, of morality has already been delivered in the past and is embraced in these two codes, prevails, so long the duty of the moral teacher will be simply to explain those codes or those other chapters of the Bible which, if followed through, lead to the same conclusion. In this matter, the moral teaching of the Church has been nothing more nor less than an exegesis of the Decalogue and of the Sermon on the Mount.

Digitized by Google

But, my friends, the world is beginning to see that in morality there is progress; and those indiscriminate laudations of Christianity, of the ethical teachings of Christianity and of Judaism, are beginning to be questioned. Not that it is my intention even to suggest that these teachings are not in their way most noble and pure and beautiful. That they transcend the practice of most men even of the present day is true enough. And yet these principles of morality, like the scientific views that are embodied in the Bible, show the deficiencies of the time in which they originated, and remind us of an age that is many thousand years in the past. To give only a single instance, I will point out here rapidly, in passing, that the very intellectual honesty upon which so much depends, especially in modern times, is almost totally lacking both in the Old Testament and in the New. Nay, in that very Sermon on the Mount, which it is claimed is the perfection of all moral teaching, that virtue of intellectual honesty upon which the progress of ethics and of human life in the modern world's society so essentially depends, is not only wanting, but is contradicted, and treated with contempt. "Blessed are the poor in spirit," it is said; while our whole age goes out in the benediction of those who are not poor in spirit; while the heart of the present age knows and understands that there is no greater curse than poverty of spirit, and that it is in no wise blest. I say it has begun to be conceded and to be understood that the morality of the Christian scriptures is, like the science of the Bible, by no means perfect; that the end of moral progress has not there been reached. And from the moment when that conviction is clearly understood and has become widely disseminated among the people, from that moment will date a new era in the religious development of the world. My friends, you read in the treatises upon science some such statement as this,—just as little children find in reading a book from beginning to end that, after all the evils have been recounted that occurred to the hero or heroine, then one day there came a helper,—so these treatises concerning the evils which the world has suffered from false science and from the retribution of intellectual abuses usually sum up with the triumphant outburst, Then there came a new time. Men excepted this from the Bible. They did not go to the Bible any more for their science. They learned to look at the face of the world with their own eyes, and then these features burst upon the human understanding in a brilliant manifestation of truth. So soon as men began to understand that they must not get their geology from the Bible, but from their knowledge of the earth, then geology as a science was suddenly found making a marvellous progress. So soon as men understood that they were not to look to the Bible for their knowledge concerning the science of life, then biology began to develop. So astronomy developed with marvellous rapidity. So soon as men cut loose from their dependence upon the Bible for their geology, astronomy, biology, and the other sciences, then those sciences began to grow and progress. It will be the same, depend upon it, with respect to morality. So soon as men will understand that they must not go back to the Bible for their morality, so soon as they understand that the Bible's views on moral questions are not a finality, so soon as they learn that they must see with their own eyes, that they must investigate with their own understanding and use their own reason, then morality as a science will begin, full of the greatest promise of fruitful achievement for mankind.

I am coming now to the chief point that I want to bring forward to-day. I say we must have a science of ethics, a science of morality. We do not know enough about morality to be moral. The fundamental work of clearing our moral conceptions has not yet been done; and it has not been done, because men blindly look back to the Bible and expect in its aphorisms to receive the sum total of moral truth. It is true, the majority of men are utterly astounded when they are informed that the moral conceptions of the world are not clear or sure. They still, for the majority of mankind, retain their schoolboy impressions that all that mankind needs to know is known. For every school-boy and every school-girl leaves school with the impression that the sum total of knowledge, if not in their individual possession, is at least in the possession of the teacher, and that whatever is necessary to be known is known to the human mind; and it has not even dawned upon their minds that the things most necessary for men to know are not yet known. As we proceed in medicine, we find that the things most necessary for us to know concerning the preservation of the health and the beating down of sickness are not yet known; that the discoveries most essential to the life and well-being of the physical man have not yet been made. And so in morality, also, the things we most need to know are not yet known. And the need of the science of morality is all the more urgent and crying, because the great majority of men are not even aware of that need, saying, "Surely our system of ethics is perfect," and not knowing how imperfect their ethics are and how little system they have. And this is not only my view of the case, but the most eminent thinkers of modern times agree in this view that the science of ethics is yet to be made. Mr. Herbert Spencer, in the introduction of his book on the Data of Ethics, says that this work, giving an outline of his theory of ethics, is the crown of his life; that the writing of a work which would give the scientific basis of the principles of right and wrong, he has always looked forward to as the ultimate purpose to which all his other purposes in life are subsidiary; and as he knows that it is the grand end of mankind, and when he is in ill-health he fears that he may not live long enough to publish the full work, he sends out at present, before its time, this outline of his ethics, solicitous to bring it to the knowledge of his fellow-beings, because he knows that the supreme necessity of the time is the scientific study of the underlying principles of right and wrong.

On the other hand, if I have spoken of morality as a new science, if I am seeking to impress upon your minds that the fragmentary, desultory teaching of morality in our pulpits, the inspirational theory of our morality, is wrong, that there is such a thing as the science of ethics, and that this false morality has kept the world for centuries from attempting to find the foundation of such a science, I have really pointed out to you one of the great achievements which Free Religion is going to accomplish. Free Religion which emancipates itself from these outward influences of Biblical teaching, Free Religion whose whole soul is in ethical culture,—Free Religion will find, as soon as it takes upon itself the proclamation of ethical science, that the grand work to be begun and the grand work to be done is the making of moral culture possible by clearing the fundamental conceptions concerning right and wrong which are now so obscure. For they are obscure, indeed! The ethics of sickness have never been stated, so that the common mind can comprehend them. The ethics of bereavement have never been worked out clearly. The ethics of trade, what shall I say of them? They have never been worked out with an understanding of the fundamental principles at the root of all morality. The ethics of industry, of the relations of labor to capital, of the relation between the sexes, have never been satisfactorily and clearly stated. The great questions of the conflict of duties, of whole groups of duties seeming to conflict with each other, the questions to which of these roads of duty we in our practice are to give the preference,—who has ever informed mankind concerning these vital problems of conduct, who has laid down the principles for clear guidance in this important matter? Do we not all act upon mere impulse often, or upon the traditions of public opinion that sway us and sweep us along in their current, without feeling that we have really mastered the problem of duty in hand and solved it? If a difficult mathematical problem be placed before one who has never studied the principles of mathematics, do you suppose he would have the audacity to pretend to solve it? And if he were to write down, as the result of his attempted solution, some words, some figures, which he had heard from another, his neighbor, and should offer them to his preceptor, what would you think of such a scholar? And do you suppose that the moral problem is less difficult than the mathematical problem, and that you can solve it by simply repeating the fancied solution which you have heard from your fellow-scholars, who may be just as ignorant as you? If we are to solve these great problems of the soul, we must have students of ethics who will make it their life's work to study these problems, and who will, in the first place, obtain the general philosophical discipline of the scientific mind, which is necessary to the study of the subject of ethics. The science of ethics has a groundwork in philosophy and cannot be understood without close, technical, professional study, as close, as technical, as professional as is required for the satisfactory study of medicine. We must have those who will be thorough students of ethics, who will obtain the necessary preparatory training for these subjects, and who will then acquire also the necessary knowledge of the life of to-day, with its many and momentous economic and social problems, in order to make application of these great principles which I have stated to the needs of the hour and to the vital questions of the day. Those men are to be the teachers of ethics in the future. They are to be the moral teachers of the new religion. They are to be the successors of the clergy. They are to fill that office of helpfulness to men which the clergy are filling in their way at the present day. They are to fill it in a better way. Being better instructed in the questions on which they are called upon to counsel, they are to guide men, not only in the morality of the past, but they are to lead mankind on to new moral conceptions and practice, and thus prepare the way for social and economic advance,—this double progress of the human race.

It is not, I say, upon the philosopher in his closet that I depend chiefly for the solution of ethical problems. I want to point out a new profession to you. I want to show what is to be the life's work of the teachers of the new religion. I say the teachers of the new religion are to be preëminently students of the new science, which is the science of morality; and they are particularly fitted to be the students of this science and investigators in this direction, because they are, or should be, in practical contact with the moral needs of mankind; because they have themselves, or ought to have, a deep moral experience, if they want to be fitted for the work; and because they are in constant contact with the deepest moral experience of their fellow-men,—with their deepest joys, their profoundest sorrows, their most haunting iniquities. And just as only he is competent to judge of the conditions of health and disease who sees those conditions as a physician, as a close student of medicine, and is best able to further the advance and study of medicine, so I believe the practical teacher of ethics, the peoples' teacher of morality, who is to be the clergyman of the future,—I believe that he is best fitted to understand the questions of morality, and to shed light into the intricate problems of the human conscience. I do not believe that the philosopher in his closet is best able to do this. He can contribute much; but he needs to be supplemented at least by those who are in the practical work and who can test their theories by holding them up to the actual needs of mankind to see whether their theories really cover those needs, those phases of the moral life with which they are constantly brought in contact. And this contact of their own moral life with that of their fellow-men is what will prevent them from giving false theories. It will correct their superficial notions concerning morality, and tell them, in words whose meaning cannot be misunderstood, by what theories the great facts of life are not covered. If the teachers and students of ethics whom we have had in the past had been in such constant contact with the moral life of their fellow-men as the practical teacher of ethics must be, I dare say we should not have had those superficial explanations of morality which are so commonly offered us.

If you could penetrate beneath the surface of the earth deep enough, you would come on fire at the centre below. The superficial crust of the earth is placed on central fire; and the fire has been there from the time when our globe first flew off, a ball of fire, from the central sun, and is testimony to us that our earth is of the same make as that sun in which it had its origin. And so, if you penetrate into man's nature deep enough, you come on fire. Eternal fire sleeps underneath the nature of man. He is not all crust, he is not all earth. That fire which makes itself felt in the volcanic eruptions and earthquakes of conscience and remorse is testimony to us that we are the same essential stuff as that sun of the infinite out of which in the beginning we were born. And there is no human being, no teacher of ethics, who will be able to be a helpful teacher of morality to mankind, who merely takes into account the surface view, the crust of human nature, and does not take into account the eternal, absolute principle of morality which works beneath. And so I claim that here for you, who are to be teachers of ethics in the future, is a new profession. You are not to be, as men suppose, merely repeating old tales. If the men to whom we say that religion is to be founded upon moral culture will but understand that morality is the dryest thing on earth, they will have learned the hardest lesson. It is the very synonyme of weariness. The teachers of morality are not to repeat the old as new. They are to create a science. They are to aid in forming a new science. They are not only to repeat old truths, but they are to be path-finders of new truth. They are to found a new science. They have a profession as distinct, as clear, as well marked as any of the other professions. They are not to dabble in general philology. They are not to skim superficially over every science. They are not to expect to know all about politics, all about literature, all about business, and all about comparative philology, and to skim the cream of a dozen subjects. They have a subject of their own, as distinct and as clearly outlined as any that has ever been given. The science of ethics, its theory, its application, that is their subject; and the working out of that science and the teaching of it is their profession. It is a science greater than any other science. They are to work out and to teach and to propagate among men the science of the higher life.

Digitized by Google

And if in this way Free Religion points to a positive work to be done, a work of the highest kind, if there is here a new work to be done, a new science to be founded, then Free Religion has its innovations to make in regard to the æsthetic side of religion no less. Art also is to be embraced in the scheme of the new religion. I do not believe for one that the mission of art in religion is past. On the contrary, I believe that art, especially music, never played a greater rôle in religion than it is destined to play when we become strong enough, and Free Religious societies are sufficiently endowed with means to realize that ideal. Its mission will be twofold. In the first place, it should exert the influence of a pleasant accompaniment, which builds a sort of bridge between the outside world and the inner world, the secret thoughts on which we are to dwell. But, over and above that, its mission and its purpose is an independent one. It has the same mission to fulfil as the discourse of the speaker, only in another way. It is to express in sound what the discourse aims to express in speech,—the outgoing of the human soul toward the infinite, toward the greatest and the holiest,—only that music, which has been called the utterance of the unutterable, will express those rapturous exhibitions of the human soul far more truly than any human speech of any mortal tongue can ever hope to do. I believe that the new principle in religion will eventually give us a new music. I believe that we shall eventually have some one who will be to the modern view of life what Palestrina was to Catholicism and what Bach was to Protestantism. Palestrina did not come into the Catholic Church until it had existed for over a thousand years, to give musical expression to the Catholic principle. Bach did not come into the Protestant Church until the Protestant Church had existed for centuries, and the moral life, the peculiar moral life which grew out of Protestantism, had had time to develop and to ripen. And so I believe we also may have to wait for years, perhaps for centuries, until the moral life which is beginning to cluster around our new ideas, and which is new in important aspects, will have had time so to mature and complete itself that it will be embraced by and translated into the symbolism of art,—of art which adopts nothing but the complete and the mature. The principle of Palestrina's music is the Catholic principle: it is that of adoration. The fact that the priest performed the service on the altar is a significant fact. The whole people are spectators, adoring spectators to the great drama. The mass music is that drama in sound: it is the altar, as it were, translated into sound. The Protestant principle was different from the Catholic principle, in so far as that the believing hosts no longer regard from the floor adoringly the spectacle of the drama, but the whole people join in adoration. The congregation itself takes the place of the priesthood at the altar. And so the legitimate consequence of that was that the mass music of Palestrina was changed into the choral of Bach, which expresses this new relation of the religious soul to the object of religion. And, if it is true that our attitude in religion has changed,—and it has changed,—the musical art will by and by express that change. We are no longer like the Catholics, spectators of the drama; we are no longer like the Protestants: we do not stand up, an adoring multitude stepping into the presence of the Almighty God to sing to him. We have a divinity within ourselves. We are a band of brothers and sisters, holding each other's hands; and, as we clasp each other's hands, feeling the weight of an eternal thrill through our souls, that new attitude, that new idea, carrying with it a new mission and a present divinity,—that idea and mission and present divinity will find a new expression in sound. And, that I may not seem to you to speak vaguely and without justification, I will mention one musical composition which seems to me to have caught that spirit and to describe that attitude. I mean the choral closing the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. Remember how slowly the mournful adagio flows along, gathering tributary streams of creation as it passes on, waxing and swelling and gaining and gathering, until with the opening of the fourth part come mighty summoning sounds, calling on all men to rise now from their work-a-day labors and their work-a-day lives and sing a song of joy. Soothing and ceasing, the grand rhythm of that mighty chorus bursts upon our hearts and souls. Now, it seems to us as if we could actually see in heaven that which the music describes: "Lo, a great multitude," gathered on the vast plain of mankind, gathered in a song of joy to the infinite. New tribes and new nations of mankind are constantly pouring in, and, as each tribe and nation arrives, it is greeted by that song of joy, and on its part throws its own voice into that tumult of song. And now the whole vast multitude is singing like a sea. Down on my knees it seems to pull me. Down on our knees all, for the majesty of the Most High is shining around us and the glory of the future is revealed in a song. It is the song of humanity. It is the sense of the infinite in us, over us, felt in and through and by our union with mankind.

But it is not enough that we shall have high teaching and high art. We must have something more than that. It is not enough that we stand for an obscure idea, and see the promised land of our ideals afar off, if we cannot ever reach that land of promise, if we cannot realize, if we cannot live, our idea. And so, friends, the last point of new work which Free Religion is called upon to perform, it seems to me, is the transfiguring of our lives. We all feel, every one of us, this terrible contrast between what we aspire to and what we are. Our whole life is one great jar, owing to this clashing of ideal and real. We must make an honest effort, an effort in earnest, to realize our idea. And now I come to the most vital part of the whole question, it seems to me, when I say here in Boston that we cannot do that by singing, by poetry, by imagination, by living apart, by standing apart, by trying to perfect each one himself apart. We can do that, if we wish not only to discover a science, but also to live the principles of a higher life: we cannot do it singly, we can do it only by association. In brief, I oppose the individualistic view of life. I know the great respect which belongs to the leaders of the individualistic school. The most honored name in New England, the most honored and the dearest name to me among Americans, is the name of one who has most prominently identified himself with the individualistic school. He points out how every attempt to depart from your sphere, the sphere of your own unity, how every attempt to associate with others, leads unmistakably to compromise; how, as soon as you endeavor to realize higher purposes in connection with others, your higher purpose becomes lessened, for you must then discover the ways and means in order to achieve your purpose, and these ways and means are sure to be the ways and means of the world; you must adapt yourself to realities. He also points with sharp and stinging criticism to the cramped and narrow spirit which takes possession of most reform movements. Here is a man, for instance, who is naturally zealous and honest: he becomes an advocate of a peace movement; and it becomes a monomania with him, and he reaps the horrible and disgusting treachery of his friends. Here are others aspiring in other directions, and see, he says,—"See what human beings they are; how narrow they become, how they exaggerate their one scheme, how they exaggerate their one virtue, how they lose their balance and stateliness and equipoise of soul, wherein true manhood and womanhood consist!" "In another way," says this leader of individualism, "shall the right be vindicated. Wherever on fields of danger, in the heart of cities, in the midst of business, one true, heroic soul finds himself, there the right shall be vindicated; for there must be union, but only inward union; there must be a union which is purely ideal, and never real; there must be such a union,—only all the enthusiasts are isolated. Let a man be only true in his place." And that is the sum total of his advice and counsel to his fellow-beings. Let every one be true in his place. Do you, sir, do you, madam, but be true in your place, and you do not need to care for the reform of the world, because, if you are true in your own place, eventually the whole world will come around to you. And this is a noble, it is a grand doctrine to enunciate: it is one that, when we hear it, lifts us up and fills us with strength and hope for mankind. And yet there is a fatal error, it seems to me, in the doctrine. He says to us, Do you each of you be true in your place; but it appears to me he has left out of sight that none of us can be true in our places, unless others are true in their places. That is, as no single star could keep its orbit in the heavens and be true to its place in the heavens, unless all the stars and all the satellites around about it were true to their orbits, so no human soul can pass between time and eternity without being detracted and pulled out of place by the desires and repulsions of other bodies around it, unless an effort is made to cause all to be true to their orbits.

So I oppose the individualistic doctrine very decidedly. In place of holding that we can only reform the world by reforming ourselves, which is a half-code, I hold, on the other hand, that we can only reform ourselves by beginning to reform the world. I hold that it is impossible, as Emerson maintains, to be simply true in my place, to do no wrong act, to do nothing at all, to keep perfectly still rather than consent to any compromise. It is a noble sentiment; but it is impossible of execution, because it appears to me once more that, while he counsels inaction, he seems to make the mistake of supposing that inaction means non-action; while, on the contrary, inaction to my mind means bad action, the worst action that can be done. For if you do nothing at all, if you keep perfectly still in your place, and content yourself with simply refraining from doing any act which you believe to be improper and not fully in accord with your ideas, do you not see that you are thereby strengthening the influence of all that is bad in our present life? Has it not been demonstrated in politics that he who withdraws and does not vote is thereby voting on the wrong side? We cannot simply content ourselves by saying we will withdraw ourselves from all association, we will live a life of our own, because, in so far as we do nothing to change the evil of the world, we are responsible for that evil; and it is just exactly those, the indifferent class, the do-nothing class, who are the people upon whom evil reckons for the increase of its power. And so it is also the same in the churches. The men who simply withdraw, who simply say we will not take part,—they are taking part in so far as they do not produce the change which it is in their power to produce. And so the dilemma is not as the individualist would have us understand, that we are to choose between non-action, or between non-association and those more or less imperfect associations which may be devised, but the real choice is between these imperfectly good associations and worse associations which we encourage by desiring no association at all. And so I, for one, believe that it is necessary for us, if we cannot reform human life, to ask ourselves seriously the question, whether an association cannot be perfected which shall more approximate to the ideal conditions of the higher life than any that now exists. If such associations can be created, they will be the churches of the future. The chapter-houses in which those associations will meet will be the holy places of the future. The great events in the history of those associations, their date, even the birth or death of their greatest leaders, will be the festivals of the new religion; and thus a new religion, complete and whole in all its parts, will grow out of the effort and make the higher life a reality. I have seen a dozen men pulling at a heavy stone and spending their strength to lift it, and by pulling together they succeeded in lifting that weight which no individual one of them could have raised a hair's breadth. And so I, for one, want to pull together in lifting that stony weight of vice from my soul and from others'; and I believe that we shall succeed by the strength that is in unity.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

FRAGMENT OF THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

No. II.

"God of the granite and the rose,
Soul of the sparrow and the bee,
The mighty tide of being flows
Through countless channels, Lord, from Thee.
It leaps to life in grass and flowers,
Through every grade of being runs,
While from Creation's radiant towers
Its glory flames in stars and suns."

"This world was once a fluid haze of light,
Till toward the centre set the starry tides,
And eddied into suns, that whirling cast the planes."

"What solid was by transformation strange
Grows fluid; and the fixed and rooted earth,
Tormented into billows, heaves and swells."

In the above quotations, the basic principles of the religion now being disclosed are to a limited extent outlined; namely, that all life originated in Deity or spiritual energy; that it has differentiated through countless grades of being, until it culminated in a specific type of a perfect humanity.

Hence, the three essential features of the new religion, as of the old, are the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, and the Divinity of Humanity.

But in the evolution of every new system of thought as well as in the evolution of new and higher forms of life there is a new element evolved, which element, although contained in a germinal form in the old systems, yet constitutes a divergence in kind and the establishment of a new and higher order of thought or of life upon the earth.

And, although the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man are the essential features of the new religion, as well as of the old, there is an element which, when fully evolved, will effectually separate the new religion from that of the old.

That element is the recognized correspondence between the soul or mind of Man and the soul or mind of Deity, by and through which the relationship between the Finite and the Infinite is at last established! In this recognized correspondence lies the basis of a positive knowledge for a positive belief.

In order, however, that this statement of the essential Divinity of Humanity may be substantiated, as well as to obtain a clear and definite meaning of the terms employed, it will be necessary to go back in thought and establish primarily the relation between invisible things and their material counterparts.

That all life, or the sum total of the material universe, has slowly evolved from a simple, homogeneous, indeterminate condition into one of a more highly organized heterogeneous determinate condition, is a truth that will be universally accepted. But the present condition of scientific thought, so far as it regards the first principles of life, is still unsatisfactory, because there is no firm and ascertained foundation, upon which the mind can rest. "The problem of existence is not solved, but only removed further back." The tendency, however, of scientific philosophy is to reduce all things to unity, to realize that beneath this constantly increasing heterogeneity, beneath all the manifold manifestations of life, there is one everlasting Principle or Power disclosing itself, yesterday, to-day, and forever the same.

That this is the tendency of modern thought there can be no question; that this tendency admits of such realization that the zero stage in thought may be reached there can also be no question; for every great generalization brings us nearer and nearer the truth, until the last great generalization is made which supplements, fulfils, crowns, and coördinates all others.

By the zero stage of thought is not meant nothingness, or the creation of the material universe out of nothing; but what is meant is that point in the algebra of thought where calculation commences, so that all the fragmentary parts of life may be bound or linked together, and consolidated into one.

We have seen that science presents to us a succession of changes, of vast extent, and of almost inconceivable operations. These changes being the result of laws, only dimly known however, and imperfectly apprehended. In all these changes there is, in the strict and literal sense of the word, no creation, if by that term is meant the creation by arbitrary fiat of something out of nothing, or the commencement of existence where nothing existed before. Such a supposition is in violation of the first principles of reason, and is not to be entertained for a single moment. But if by creation is meant such a transformation of preëxisting elements that these elements reappear in new forms, powers, and principles, then the expression, when understood in this light, is one which commends itself to the reason, and also in a limited degree to the experience of every observer of nature.

In tracing the evolution of the material universe to its original primitive constituents, the mind cannot, as we have said, find any resting-place in the theory of the nebular hypothesis, true as it undoubtedly is; for diffused matter as much needs accounting for as aggregated matter. Diffused matter must have had its origin in matter of a still more inconceivable kind than that of the nebula. For we know that every new departure in life is the result of the combinations of pre-existing elements. In the combination, such a transformation is effected as to virtually amount to a "new creation."

Hence, the material universe before it was resolved into form must have been derived from pre-existing elements of a still finer nature; and, as matter contains the promise and potency of all the forms of life, including thought, these primordial elements could only have been centres of energy or matter in its ultimate primeval condition of energy or force.

This energized matter, which has its source in the one Supreme Energy, cannot be considered in the common-sense of the word as material; for, while it contained the potentialities of matter in all its forms, it was not subject to those laws which govern matter in its coarser manifestations. Yet it must be conceded that it still was matter, but matter in its highest degree of refinement, that of spiritual energy or force. It is true that every material particle that the senses can take cognizance of can be divided and subdivided into an almost infinitude of parts, without ever approaching a point where analysis ceases and synthesis begins. But it is not simply with the division and subdivision of matter into various forms that we have to deal, but with the successive degrees of matter, from its coarsest, most inert, and ponderable condition to that of a vibratory force, Power and Intelligence; for matter, carried to its last and highest manifestation, ultimates itself in thought.

Yet, under all its subtile manifestations, it still is matter which confronts us, but matter so changed and radiant with new and undisclosed energies that, through difference in degree, it amounts at last to difference in kind. It still is matter, although it eludes the senses, and is, in essence, absolutely one with spirit and thought. There is the derivation of matter, there its genesis. For spirit and substance can never be disassociated, being forms and phases of one and the same thing.

Thus we perceive that that which by way of explanation we call spirit, and that which also by way of explanation we call matter, are in reality convertible terms. Although dual in forms of expression, in their last analysis they are one.

Only one step further has inductive thought to go, in order to accept the statement of the convertibility of material elements into spiritual ones. Already has it, through its leading minds, arrived at the conclusion of the inseparableness and convertibility of one force into another; that the annihilation of force or matter is impossible, but only a constant transformation or change of action in force or spirit, corresponding to molecular changes in matter. One step further, and as we have constantly before our eyes the transformation of visible, measurable energy into invisible, immeasurable energy, so will we have before our mental vision the transformation of spiritual elements into their material counterparts. Matter and spirit, being one, is the root or source of all that is. Spirit, with its energy of thought, is matter in its highest, finest, purest condition. Matter is spiritual energy or thought resolved through various degrees into form. The two are one, and that one is infinite substance and infinite thought.

"O backward-looking son of time!
The new is old, the old is new,
The cycle of a change sublime
Still sweeping through."

IMOGENE C. FALES.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MISS ANNA DICKINSON is said to be considering an offer in London to produce her "Anne Boleyn" there.

EDWIN P. WHIPPLE is to prepare a sketch of the life and writings of the late James T. Fields for the Atlantic.

THE coming sessions of the Concord School of Philosophy, it is said, will have lectures upon the Kantian theory by President Porter, Rev. Dr. Hedge, Mrs. Howe, J. Elliot Cabot, and probably Prof. C. C. Everett, and Dr. Mears of Hamilton College.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER gave the sermon in Boston last week at the celebration of the two hundred and forty-third anniversary of the "Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company," which is one of Boston's noted institutions. The sermon was in Mr. Collyer's best style.

THE whole of the last volume of M. Renan's Origines du Christianisme is now in type; and the author is at present busy with the huge index for the seven volumes. Before writing his history of the Jews up to the second exile, he intends to visit the Holy Land as well as Sinai, if his health will permit.

GEORGE BANCROFT, the historian, is at his Newport residence for the summer season, where he may be seen attending to his roses, which have a national repute for their perfection, or, early in the day, on horseback on some of the country roads leading out of the town. He will be eighty-one years old next October.

ARCHBISHOP LYNCH, of Toronto, gives creditable urgency in his Jubilee Pastoral to the pressing demands of "justice, honor, and humanity," with practical hints suited to the times and to his flock. This has a welcome savor to Liberals, despite its being sandwiched amid detailed duties of church-going, ecclesiastic alms-giving, and fasts.

TWO YEARS ago, the Rev. Dr. Lorimer, of Chicago, was charged with appropriating without credit extracts from the sermons of the Rev. Dr. Parker, of London. He claimed that the plagiarism was unconscious, and wrote to Dr. Parker an explanatory letter, which the latter did not receive with very good grace. Now, the Baptist Weekly charges Dr. Parker in turn with having incorporated without credit in his book, entitled These Sayings of Mine, a passage from a sermon on the late Rev. Dr. Neale, preached by Dr. Lorimer in 1879, and used in 1880 with due credit by the Rev. Dr. Hague.

CARL SCHURZ, who has been a senator himself, discusses "the courtesy of the Senate," which he says is by stealth and indirection bringing about a change in the laws and the balance of governmental powers. He concludes: "We neither charge nor believe that Senators who support the rule of courtesy entertain any design to alter the Constitution. They simply wish to have their own way about offices, and they perceive that the most effectual means of compassing that end is to enter into a mutual compact that all hands shall unite to reject any nomination not acceptable to any two members of the body. But the change in the spirit and practical working of the Constitution, brought about in this way, will be just as effectual as though accomplished by a vote of two-thirds of Congress and ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States."

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

CLEOPATRA.

What shall we leave behind for men to sing,
We of the Western world who live to-day,
Whose quiet feet in virtue's paths would stray?
Power such as thine, a feared, an untried thing,
O beauteous Queen, whose wondrous praises ring
Down the long years with ever-widening fame?
The fear of nations was thy charmed name,
And joy of man: thy burning glance would bring
His glowing heart captive to thy proud face!
And they have christened thee the deathless queen.
Song yet unwearied sings thee, marbles trace,
On melting canvas will rapt dreamers trace.
What shall we leave behind for men to sing,
Whose feet are set in quiet virtue's ways?

ABBIE M. GANNETT.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 16, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

FELLOWSHIP IN FREEDOM.

To establish religious organization on the basis of perfect freedom of thought is the task to which the Free Religious Association has set itself. The difficulty inherent to such an aim was briefly touched in the introductory remarks it fell to our lot to make at the recent annual convention of the Association. But the importance of the point deserves a more complete statement. It is the point that, in our opinion, marks both the strength and the weakness of the Free Religious movement hitherto. How to combine harmoniously entire freedom of thought with that zeal of conviction which not only has been historically the motive power of religious organization, but seems to be the necessary motive power of all human progress, is the problem.

As a matter of fact, the spirit of intellectual liberty and zeal for intellectual convictions have seldom been found together. In religious history, they have existed rather in inverse proportion to each other than in happy combination. As freedom of thought has been recognized and emphasized, zeal for religious faith has been paralyzed and has vanished. So that it would almost seem as if liberty in religion and zeal in religion were antagonistic rather than harmonious and mutually helpful principles.

It is true that, in all the great religious eras, the spirit of liberty has to a certain extent prevailed, and has helped to make the era. But it has been a proclamation of liberty for certain new convictions as against the power of convictions already established, not a proclamation of liberty to hold any convictions that might seem reasonable to the holder. In the origin of Christianity, in the rise of Protestantism, in the Puritan and Independent movement in England, there was a strong outbreak of the spirit of liberty against instituted ecclesiastical authority. But in each case there was also the proclamation of a new and definite belief as a rallying-point for all minds that were ready to revolt against the old. The liberty claimed by the reformers in these eras was liberty for their own convictions; and this was a claim entirely consistent with the utmost zeal for those convictions. The two forces, under these limiting conditions, worked together and aided each other. But that intellectual liberty was not comprehended in its entirety at any of these epochs is shown by the fact that, as soon as the new convictions had won their ground, they in turn became an authoritative standard of belief. Liberty had only gone so far as to exchange one authority for another; and this, in fact, was the extent of its claim. This being accomplished, there was no more liberty, but only zeal; and the zeal, in each case, became persecution of any attempt to call in question the newly established beliefs. When the spirit of liberty rose again, it had to repeat the old course of revolt and secession. Not until our own time has the conception of absolute freedom of thought—that is, freedom for all thinkers to form such convictions as their reason shall require—found a lodgement in religious organization. This conception is an importation into the domain of religion from the domain of modern science.

But, with this freedom for all thought and for all convictions to which rational thought may lead, how can there be fellowship? Especially, how can there be fellowship in an organization that means to work for certain definite ends? Where is the zeal to come from, the enthusiasm, the embodied and organized consecration, which hitherto in religion have been wedded indissolubly to, if not originated by, very positive personal convictions? How can one be fired with any very strong impulse to work in behalf of his beliefs or feel even that his beliefs are very important to the world, when he is pledged to respect and guard his fellow-member's right to perhaps utterly different beliefs and to the utterance of them, as loyally and sacredly as he respects and guards his own? And how can these two be brought together in an effective working society? They can come together, of course, on a platform for free discussion and for whatever benefits accrue from free discussion. But the Free Religious movement means something more than this: at least, many so believe. Liberty to speak and to print is a great right to achieve; and the free comparison of views on the platform and in the press is a most essential instrumentality in eliciting—what? not simply more speaking and more printing, but in eliciting and establishing Truth. Liberty of thought and utterance is the sacred right which it is, not because it is an important end in itself for every person to express his or her opinions, but because it is the necessary condition for the attainment and spread of that knowledge which concerns the highest interests of human society and life. And the ultimate purpose of the Free Religious movement is certainly nothing less than this,—the promotion of the highest interests of human society and life. It has claimed and worked for the freest and fullest discussion of all problems of religion, in the confident assurance that thereby a larger totality of truths, philosophical and practical, would be discovered and ultimately accepted, for the entire moral, mental, and physical improvement of mankind.

Now may there not be a zeal for the promotion of truth, an enthusiasm in the pursuit of truth, without reference to the propagation of a particular set of truths? And may there not be cordial and close and effective fellowship in such pursuit, with this zeal and enthusiasm purely for truth itself as the uniting soul and vital inspiring breath of the union? As science has given to religion the conception of absolute mental liberty, so let it answer for religion these questions. Where shall we find in modern days or in any days more enthusiasm in one's vocation, more ardent and persistent zeal, more self-sacrificing devotion, than among the men of science,—more particularly among those who are the original observers and investigators, the patient toilers and discoverers who are searching out, first-hand, nature's secrets? Impelled simply by the desire to learn what those secrets are, and thus to add to the sum of human knowledge for human benefit, these men show us how fervently truth may be loved and how strenuously pursued just for truth's sake. Cannot the same free and effective devotion be manifested in the search for the more special truths of religion?

And, so far as the promotion of truth is an object of religious organization, the scientific associations also set an example for those of religion. Truth is the aim and end which all the members of a scientific society have in common; but no statement of any one truth or series of truths believed to have been discovered has to be pronounced as a shibboleth to qualify for membership. Even though all might agree in such statement, they do not make it. As a matter of fact, they do not all agree in all cases as to what is to be accepted as truth. Evolutionists and anti-evolutionists, for instance, meet to-day and work together in the same scientific organizations. But these differences do not disturb the unity of their aim and purpose, nor the spirit of fellowship, nor harm the effective working of the societies. Rather are the members eager to get statements from as many genuine investigators as possible, whether agreeing in their conclusions or not. And yet not simply a free comparison of views, but the discovery and establishment and dissemination of truth, is their supreme aim. But, having made each in his own line of investigation the utmost effort possible to set forth clearly with all its evidence the truth he believes himself to have found, they are content to leave the result with the world,—confident that truth, once published and plainly proved to be such, will, by the very constitution of the human mind, be gradually accepted and added to the world's stock of positive knowledge, never more to be questioned. Why cannot societies for the promotion of the truths that specially concern religion work in the same way and with the same assurance?

But religious organizations have other and even stronger bonds of fellowship, and other objects which in themselves are adapted to kindle zeal and enthusiasm. They exist not only for the promotion of truth, but for the upbuilding of character and the social and moral elevation of humanity. Free Religious societies, in particular, profess to have these latter objects specially at heart and to hold them as of paramount importance. Emancipated from the dividing and disintegrating claims of sectarian creed and institution, their members are free to bring all their resources into some common associated effort for these high aims. If the phrase "enthusiasm for humanity" has a genuine meaning for anybody, it should certainly have such meaning for believers in Free Religion. Of practical efforts for moral and social improvement, religious fellowship in freedom should not mean less, but more. It has been one of the strongest arguments used by liberal thinkers against the churches, that much of the best power of human minds and hearts is spent in them on building up irrational dogmas and maintaining ecclesiastical warfares, which otherwise might be applied directly to the betterment of human society. Those who are freed from this waste of faculty and resource should prove the validity of this argument by their active interest in promoting sounder morals and ameliorating the conditions of human existence. They may rightly be expected to show that "fellowship in freedom," whatever else it may mean, means at least a church of humanity.

Digitized by Google

OUR LIBRARY

XI.

Evolutionists as Scientists.

The men who have done more than all their predecessors to substitute scientific and practical truth for superstitions and fancies have taken the experience of the race as their highest authority, established the superiority of the present age over all former periods by proving that it is their natural product, and shown that every form of matter or of thought is a legitimate result of necessary laws of universal development. The greatest victory yet won over the theologians and metaphysicians has been gained through refuting their theories about the origin and early history of man. Progress in all directions became easy, when what Goethe and other daring thinkers, including some of the early Greek philosophers, had often suggested, was proved by Darwin; namely, that from the simplest forms of life have been gradually produced all the others. This truth he based upon four well-known facts: first, that many more plants and animals than can reach maturity are constantly coming into existence; second, that those who survive do so in consequence of natural advantages over those who perish; third, that differences in such advantages frequently appear spontaneously among members of the same family; and, fourth, that all such individual peculiarities are transmitted, though with some variation, by inheritance. From these facts, Darwin reasoned that the most favored members of any species survive so much longer than the least favored as to have a larger number of descendants like them, or, in other words, that the type in any family which is best adapted to its surroundings will be propagated most largely. Thus there will be slow but constant improvement of each species, until it comes into such complete harmony with all the circumstances that no farther change would be advantageous; and, if the amount of change necessary in order to reach such harmony be sufficient to constitute a new species, such a species will be developed accordingly. When changes cease to be advantageous, there will be no farther development; and this is at present the general state of our plants and animals. Only some change in the conditions of existence could open the way for the formation of a new species. It is to the differences of soil, climate, elevation, etc., which have constantly become greater and greater on the earth's surface, that we must attribute the advance of our animals and plants from primitive simplicity and uniformity to the variety and complexity which now exist.

Thus, I have tried briefly to state the views which Darwin, after twenty years of special study, presented in 1859, so thoroughly reasoned out and so well supported, not only by the accumulation of facts, but by the consideration of possible objections, that The Origin of Species gained immediate attention as well as the steadily increasing support of scientific men. The great discoverer's caution led him to delay publishing the most important of his results, until he found Huxley, Vogt, and Haeckel vigorously striving to show that men were developed from lower animals. Then, in 1871, appeared his Descent of Man, an interesting and forcible demonstration of our animal origin, as proved by general laws already stated, and also by three great classes of special facts: first, similarity of the unborn man to the unborn fish, bird, and quadruped; second, survival in our body of organs useless and sometimes dangerous to us, but very valuable to the lower animals,—for instance, the tail-bones still found in the human skeleton, the external shell of the ear, a part of the intestines which seems to have no function but that of sometimes causing death, etc.; and, third, other resemblances in structure and many in character between men and the lower animals. These resemblances in character, I may add, are especially important, because knowledge that our vicious propensities are inherited from the brutes, who were our remote ancestors, gives a scientific solution of the great problem of the origin of evil, vainly attempted by so many theologians and metaphysicians.

The Descent of Man is mainly devoted, however, to physical facts, especially those of sexual selection, or the tendency of the tender passion to lead men and other animals to develop peculiarities of voice and structure not otherwise advantageous. The whole book is deeply interesting, and so is that on The Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication, as well as the Journal of Researches, recently reprinted for young people, under the title of What Mr. Darwin saw in his Voyage round the World. His works on the motions of plants, their fertilization by insects, the emotions in men and animals, insectivorous plants, etc., have great scientific value, but are rather too technical for general reading.

One of the most curious facts about Darwin's view is that he was first led to publish it by finding that the discovery had been made independently by Wallace, whose essay will be found among his Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection, a book maintaining that man's superiority is due to mental rather than physical advantages, and also that many of our peculiarities cannot be accounted for without supposing that we are guided by a Supreme Intelligence. This latter position is a singular one, in view of the hostility generally admitted to exist between the development theory and the argument from design. Ministers have so stanchly maintained that, if Darwinism be true, belief in God is not warranted, that they will have to take the consequences of these rash assertions. And, whatever may be Wallace's merits as a theologian, he certainly has earned the gratitude not only of special students, but of all who like to read natural history, by his Malay Archipelago, Geographical Distribution of Animals, Tropical Nature, and Island Life.

Huxley, who fully adopted Darwinism in his Lectures to Workingmen, delivered in 1860, as well as in his treatise on Man's Place in Nature, published in 1863, has also attracted much notice by his Lay Sermons, in behalf of scientific education, and more recently by his American Addresses, in which he describes many intermediate links, especially those forming a complete chain between the existing horse and an extinct quadruped whose foot had several complete toes. And, besides larger books of interest to specialists, he has written several important articles, especially one on evolution, for the Encyclopædia Britannica, a work which gives the last results of scientific, Biblical, and literary scholarship, with such unrivalled accuracy, fulness, and boldness, that it is in itself a whole library of advanced thought. And with Darwin's, Wallace's, and Huxley's books should be mentioned Vogt's Lectures on Man, first published in 1863, and Haeckel's History of Creation and Evolution of Man, both of which works are valuable for their minute accounts, illustrated by many plates, of embryological similarities and rudimentary organs, as well as for their notices of the works of other naturalists, the last-named book being more recent and more full of detail than the History, which is comparatively popular in style.

And the views of these five authors have been strongly supported by a number of books on the early condition of our race; for instance, Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man, McLennan's Primitive Marriage, Lubbock's Prehistoric Times and Antiquity of Man, Tylor's Early History of Mankind and Primitive Culture (the latter of which works is remarkable for its account of the origin of religious ideas), Maine's Early History of Institutions and Village Communities, Geikie's Great Ice Age and Prehistoric Europe, etc.

The last-named book is one of this year's publications, and particularly interesting, not only for its plates and maps, but for its evidence that the first appearance of man in Europe was some two hundred thousand years ago. All who have recently written from a scientific stand-point about the first men represent them as dwellers in caves, ignorant of agriculture or the use of metals, destitute of any tools or weapons except what could be made of bones and unpolished stone, any clothing except skins, any domestic animals, or any pottery except perhaps the rudest possible specimens, and generally resembling the lowest existing savages. Scattered over Europe and Asia are relics showing that this primitive barbarism is far older than even the earliest forms of civilization. Since we must go down as far as this to find our first parents, we should not object to going still further and to still lower animals. The deeper the point in the scale of being which we take for our origin, the higher should be our pride in those mental and moral faculties of ours which have carried us up so far, and the firmer our trust that our destiny is progress.

Our best hopes as freethinkers consist in the triumph of scientific habits of thought over the metaphysical and theological. Nothing, therefore, can be more encouraging than the wide circulation of the works of Darwin, Wallace, Huxley, Vogt, and Haeckel, Reade, McLennan, Lubbock, Tylor, Maine, and Geikie, besides Tyndall, Proctor, Draper, and other authors in the International Series, of whom more may be learned from such useful books as Routledge's History of Science. Considering the popularity of such books, as well as of the Popular Science Monthly, Nature, and similar periodicals, and also the attention given in every respectable high school and college to scientific study, which has rightly been called in a recent book by the most competent judges the Culture demanded by Modern Life, we may look forward hopefully to the time when our colleges, schools, churches, newspapers, and legislatures will come under the control of men and women who will honor scientific habits of thought, and care nothing for those theologians and metaphysicians who fancy they can dispense with science. Thus our victory draws near. F. M. H.

THE numbers of the Index containing the report of the recent annual meeting of the Free Religious Association will be sent to all members of the Association, whether they are subscribers to the paper or not. We appeal, however, to all members who are not subscribers to become so. This is your paper. Will you not do your part to sustain it?

THE editor of a Western paper, called the Mirror of Progress, is a little drowsy on an acknowledged point of journalistic courtesy and justice. It reprints in a late issue, without statement of its source, a paper on "The Prospect of an Apotheosis in Morals," by Mr. Rowland Connor, which was furnished by him to the Index in February, 1880. In another instance of earlier reprint, the source given was named New Index, which would not stand in recognition of the actual paper concerned.

THE Catholic Church is not the only one that seeks to restrict its members to the use of religious books and newspapers of its own manufacture. Some of the Protestant sects have of late been emphasizing the same policy in respect to their literature. The Rev. Dr. Stowe of the Methodist Book

Digitized by Google

Concern recently counselled his brethren, at an Indiana conference of his Church, to crowd out, so far as possible, from their Sunday-schools, the papers and publications issued by other sects, and to use those alone of the Methodist denomination. Of course, the relative merit of the publications in such cases is of small consideration.

THE communication of Mr. B. R. Tucker, to which we referred last week, for reasons pertaining not to the matter, but to the manner of it, was not printed in the Index. It has been printed, however, by Mr. Tucker on his own responsibility, and will be sent by him, according to the announcement below, to any one wishing it:—

ANARCHISM OR ANARCHY? By Benj. R. Tucker.

An article written in reply to Mr. Wm. H. Tillinghast on "Misuse of Words" in the Index of May 19. Mailed free to any person sufficiently interested to send his or her post-office address to

BENJ. R. TUCKER,
P. O. Box 3366, Boston, Mass.

"THE EASTERN QUESTION."

One aspect of the "Eastern Question," as it presents itself to the civilization and humanity of England, is graphically portrayed in the following letter recently received from a lady friend in Asia Minor, by Rev. Photius Fiske, of this city:—

BRITISH CONSULATE, SALONICA, April 25, 1881.

My dear Mr. Fiske,—

No doubt through the papers you have heard of the terrible calamity that has befallen us, and God only knows what is to be the issue.

On Thursday, the 7th of April, at half-past ten at night, we retired to rest. My husband, who had been writing all day and was tired, was soon asleep. Little Daisy had been asleep some hours. I had not yet entered my bed, and was about to lower the lamp, when I was startled to hear the dogs barking furiously in our yard, and shortly after muffled footsteps on the landing outside the bedroom door. It was not until I heard a scream, a heavy fall, a clash of arms, that the thought struck me that we were attacked by brigands. I cannot describe our feelings when the horror of our situation burst upon us. I called out, "Harry! brigands!" and my husband immediately jumped out of bed, half-asleep, and seizing his rifle ran to the door, which he threw open. On seeing the landing full of men (there were about thirty), he slammed the door to again.

Then they commenced pushing from outside, we from inside. At length, we closed the door; and Harry, on their thumping at the door and demanding to be let in, asked them who they were and what they wanted. I ran to the window, and called to the soldiers who lived next door. But, to make you understand matters more thoroughly, I must explain that our Consul-General, Mr. Blunt, had (to insure our safety) provided us with a large guard of soldiers, consisting of two officers and sixty soldiers. Seven of them lived in a house about seven yards from ours, and there was a sentinel supposed to be on the watch all night. On the night of the attack, it is said there were very few soldiers in the village, most having been sent elsewhere. The officers and their soldiers lived in a building about one hundred yards distant. Now, I think you can understand the position.

The hammering at the door continued; and I pulled our child out of bed, and told her not to be frightened, but to lie flat on the ground, because I feared they would fire through the door. My husband now called on the soldiers to come to our rescue. Immediately his voice was heard, the brigands fired a volley into the air. The soldiers returned the firing, not into the air, but straight into the house. The bullets, passing the walls, entered the rooms. It is a miracle to me that no one was killed. My husband, rifle in hand, stood near the door, ready to fire on the first one to enter. But now they commenced to break in the door with an axe; and, having no help, he opened the door. Eight or ten men rushed in, and seizing my husband, demanded his money. All he said was, "My wife and child! Do whatever you like to me, but spare my wife and child." One answered it was not their object to harm women or children, they had come for money. Notwithstanding this, one man drew his sword, and, placing it on my breast, told me he would kill me if I did not tell him where our money was hidden. I called to my husband, and he again made an appeal on my behalf, telling them I was expecting my confinement, and should be very ill, if treated so. On this, some order must have been given; for the man drew away from me, and I gave him £4, all the money we had in the house.

All this time, the firing on both sides continued, and, had the soldiers acted like men, and rushed into the house, we should have been saved. Instead of which, they hid behind a wall and fired into the house. The brigands advised Harry to go out on the landing and tell the officers to stop their firing; and this was done, and they obeyed. The brigands now commenced sacking the room. Some had bags, and whatever could be converted to their use was stowed away,—sheets, towels, socks, handkerchiefs, scissors, needles, thread, calico, medicines. We kept a store for the workmen, and here they loaded themselves with colored handkerchiefs, sweets, coffee, sugar, tobacco, and other groceries, coolly telling the store-keeper to keep account of all they had taken, and charge it to their Master (Morey). During all this, we were being ordered to dress; and it was most difficult to find anything to put on, for all our trunks had been emptied into the middle of the floor. The next question was whether the soldiers would renew their firing on our leaving the house; and, to secure ourselves at least from this new danger, we again communicated with the officer, and he promised that no pursuit should be made; for the brigands said, if pursued, they would kill us.

My husband's arms were now tied; and he was led by a brigand, I next him, and Daisy carried by a servant. We were surrounded by brigands; and thus we filed out of the house and out of the village, and commenced the ascent of a steep and rugged mountain near the village (Isoore). It was painful for me to ascend such a place in my condition. However, the Almighty gave me, in those hours of peril, marvellous courage and strength. After two hours' climbing, we reached the top, which was quite flat. There, coverings were spread on the ground; and we were told to sit down, as a consultation was about to be held concerning the ransom. Questions were put as to the existence and means of our relatives, and the probability of their paying a ransom. On our replying that no ransom could be got from either friends or relatives, they asked what was Harry's employment. He said he was a partner in the mining district of Isoore, but until shipment of the ore was made he was a paid clerk at £12 a month. Their answer was that the ransom must be paid, and that it must be arranged between the English government and the "Marbo Agha," a nickname they gave the Sultan. They remarked it would have been very easy to have captured Mr. Suter when about his work, where they had often seen him; but their object was to show that, though surrounded by Turkish soldiers, we were not safe from them.

They then ordered Harry to write to Mr. Blunt for £15,000. They also wrote themselves. Harry said, "It is useless for me to write for such an impossible sum, and you may as well cut my throat at once." They replied that it was no use sitting on the mountain, wasting time and words. If he refused to write, all three prisoners would pay the forfeit with their heads on the spot. Whereupon, we asked for time to discuss the matter; and the letter was finally written, on my giving my solemn promise that I would start immediately for Salonica, and urge on the Consul to prevent the soldiers from pursuing, and do my utmost to obtain the ransom.

If I enter into more details, I shall never finish writing. I was thrown from my horse, but, thank God, only bruised outwardly. I rode for nineteen hours. It is eighteen days since all this happened, and we do not know where they have taken my husband. He wrote two heart-rending letters, calling on the government to protect him. But this was ten days ago, and since then I have not heard from him.

Can government refuse to help? My father was Consul in Persia for years. Harry's father was in the consular service thirty-seven years. There are now four Consuls living, three uncles and a cousin. They say if government pays, an Englishman is no longer safe in this country. And yet is an innocent life to be sacrificed in this cruel manner?

I have had interviews with no end of Turks and Consuls. They all tell me things will be arranged, but I feel that this is out of pity and to cheer me. Good God! is it not a hard case to be torn out of one's home in this cruel way? If I could feel sure he would be spared, and was well, I could be patient; but everything seems to go on so slowly. I trust in God. Is it possible that He who has brought us safely through so many trials will forsake us now? Daisy and I are staying at the Consulate, where we receive every attention and every kindness; and the Consul is doing all in his power to save my dear husband's life. A friend wrote to the brigands, offering them £500 out of his own pocket, if they would release Harry; but they have not answered the letter. Good-by, my dear Mr. Fiske. I trust I shall have better news soon. Yours sincerely,

LOUISE SUTER.

For the Free Religious Index.

WAS IT WELL DONE?

In the notice of the convention of the Institute of Heredity, in the Index of June 2, 1881, "D. H. C." after throwing out the imputations that we "approached the discussion of the subject in a bungling manner," with "little competence to deal with it," "with the idiosyncrasies and crude speculations of uninformed persons," "and resting under the suspicion of questionable motives," adds, "It was noticeable that the meetings of the convention here referred to were largely attended by well-known free-love apostles, in and about Boston, including both the older and the younger stages of its unsavory fellowship; and some of the accredited representatives of its gospel were among the speakers upon the platform."

What is the point aimed at in this? There were Congregationalists, Methodists, Liberals, Baptists, Unitarians, Universalists, Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, Free Religionists, and people of all faiths and modes of thinking, in our convention; and the presiding officer was a member of a popular Baptist church in this city. Our list of speakers was arranged and printed in advance, with the exception of Dr. Lozier, Mrs. Hooker, and A. B. Alcott, who were not expected; and there was not an "accredited representative of the free-love gospel on the platform," not one.

Every new and progressive movement arrests the attention and enlists the sympathies of advancing minds. This has been true of the Free Religious movement, which has drawn to its conventions people of almost infinitely varied shades of thought; and many of the same people who attended the meetings of the Institute, two days later were in the convention of the Free Religious Association. And Mrs. Stanton spoke to both assemblies; and if there were free-love apostles in one, so there were in the other convention, and in many other meetings and conventions.

The great majority of Christendom abhor Free Religion quite as much as they do Free Love, and hold that both should be kept under restraint. And they are right, until both learn to behave wisely.

Now suppose a writer in the Congregationalist or Watchman, speaking of the late convention of the Free Religious Association, had said,—which he might have done with as much truth as "D. H. C." did,—"It was noticeable that the meetings of the convention here referred to were largely attended by well-known free-love apostles, in and around Boston, including both the older and the younger stages of its unsavory fellowship; and some of the accredited representatives of its gospel were among the speakers upon the platform."

The sole motive of such a publication would have been to burden Free Religion with the odium of Free Love, and so frighten people away from it. And such a publication would justly be regarded as an exhibition of orthodox bigotry and intolerance. And is not the spirit the same, when shifted from Orthodoxy to Free Religion?

The one sole end and aim of the Institute of Heredity is the evolution and development of the highest and noblest types of mankind, through knowledge and obedience to the laws of life and transmission. This will require and involve our highest and best endeavors; and, if we are "crude," "bungling," and "incompetent" at the outset, we shall strive all the more to perfect ourselves in our work. So we cannot take on the added burden of Free Love, Free Religion, or any other heresy, popular or unpopular.

Digitized by Google

Yours in the broadest charity,

LORING MOODY.

[On recurring to the article above objected to, we do not think it carries the interpretation put upon it by Mr. Moody, in his first point. The writer, after stating the supreme importance of the reform to which the Institute of Heredity is devoted, said, "Unfortunately, those who are drawn to such discussions approach them very often in a bungling manner, with but little competence to deal with them, and rest under suspicion of questionable motives." It did not occur to us, on our reading of this sentence, that it applied or was meant to be applied to the managers of the Institute of Heredity, as Mr. Moody interprets. If that was the intention, we for our part should wholly disclaim it. But Mr. Moody will doubtless agree with us that there are persons to whom it does apply; and that this fact was one of the reasons why such a society as the Institute of Heredity, approaching the subject by the strict and wise method of scientific investigation, was called for. As to the other point, that "some of the accredited representatives of the 'free-love' gospel were among the speakers upon the platform," we assumed that the writer spoke of matters within his knowledge. We know not his evidence, but are glad that it can be so positively called mistaken, as he doubtless will be. The Institute of Heredity occupies a new field and a most momentous one. So far, it has seemed to us to move with cautious wisdom. May it not be questioned, however, whether a popular convention is the best way for advancing such a cause, or whether at least the time has yet come for it?—ED.]

BLEICHERODE AM HARZ.

THURINGEN, GERMANY, May 20, 1881.

In a valley of the Spurs of the Harz, nestled under hills, is located this ancient little town, whose population has not doubled in half a century, though large families are the rule. Nature here grants the laborer a scant reward; and from its sterile soil and uninviting climate thousands have turned their faces, and none returned to claim the Fatherland as home. Were the disembodied spirits of those who twoscore years ago lived and labored here to rise suddenly and appear in the flesh, it could not occasion more astonishment than a summer visit from the German American whose good fortunes caused emigration while young to the Better Land. Bleicherode or Bleachville derives its name from the industry of bleaching linens, which are still woven here by hand-looms. In its physical and social nature, it bears the impress of the feudal ages. Its mountain-peaks are crowned with ruined castles, celebrated in song, story, and legend; and during the short summer season tourists from the cities in the vicinity resort hither for recreation. The aspect of the country is picturesque, the entire horizon being outlined with the mountains, whose highest peak is Mount Broken. Winter lingers through the vernal season, and autumn's blasts follow quickly in the wane of summer. In the heart of Protestant Germany, amid the scenes of Luther's birth, life, and labors, theology, according to the light Luther had, is still expounded in pristine purity. During services, lighted candles are used; and the walls are decorated with paintings of the crucifixion, and other forms evince by outward signs the faith of the primitive Christian theology. The hills are dotted with rude stone monuments, in memory of the events of the German Reformation, and much of the honesty which that change brought to Germany is yet inherent in the mountaineers of to-day.

The casual observer sees a very great distinction of caste in the population, apparent in dress, manners, and conversation. Upon farther study, however, the lover of freedom learns that people's rights have progressed somewhat in half a century, though there are many needs of humanity yet unheeded in legislation, and the poverty and depression of the masses are not alone caused by sterile soil and long, cold winters. The hereditary aristocracy since the revolution of 1848 are subject to the same laws as the gentry and burghers. Before that time, they retained some of their feudal rights, having courts of their own peers, to whom only they were accountable. The people are honest, plodding, and industrious. Their uneasy, adventurous sons and daughters have emigrated to more genial climes; and they enjoy a semi-Rip Van Winkle sleep of contentedness, the rich growing richer, and the poor poorer. The schools are among the best of Prussian Germany, but are not free. Though teachers receive their salaries from the government, parents pay tuition per capita. Teachers, like the clergy and all government officials, are appointed for life, and receive pensions when too aged for active duty. Salaries bear favorable comparison with those of the United States. Lady teachers are only employed in the primary grades, and opportunities for the higher education of women are meagre beyond description. A smattering of modern languages, needle-work, a little music, and knowledge enough to pen an ordinary letter, with housekeeping, is all that women are taught. Though naturally intelligent, kind, honest, and hospitable, an intellectual woman is an exception. Much oral teaching is in vogue, and the memories of pupils are strained at the expense of their reflective powers. Object-teaching prevails largely in the primary grades; and, while very interesting, seems a waste of time and strength, inasmuch as a great part of the instruction suggests itself to the mind of any child not an idiot, and is a waste of pedagogic powers. Children are not taught the principles of independence and self-reliance, as we teach them. They lean too much upon the teacher. Great attention is given to correct language and pronunciation, thoroughness is inculcated, but more studies are pursued at a time than in our country. The discipline is as good as ours during recitations; but the noise is greater in removing slates, closing desks, walking out, and school-buildings are not so neat and clean. Teachers illustrate lessons very beautifully and clearly, and much is praiseworthy in the system of German pedagogics. It is, however, too cumbrous and not sufficiently broad for our country, so far as I have studied it; and the only thing we could profitably learn from it is to teach our children the true principles of free republican government, in history and geography, as the principles of monarchical subjection are taught to German children from the primary grades to the highest. A portrait of "Kaiser Wilhelm," laurel-crowned, hangs in every school-room. Reverence for the monarch is inculcated to a degree I would believe impossible, had I not heard it. History is taught in connection with geography; and in the primary grades the study of the latter begins with the school-house and the home, and is continued gradually from that starting-point, till completed with a knowledge of the entire globe. It requires eight years, however, to finish this and other studies. The chief aim of the German educational system seems, to me, to be to so thoroughly imbue the youthful mind with loyalty to the government, and to so engraft Germanic ideas, that they will not be forgotten.

The school text-books, such as readers, histories, and geographies, are filled with accounts of the Volkslore, legends, and historical traditions, most prominent among which are those of the immediate neighborhood. Interesting though they are, they are often myths, and are not sufficiently taught as such. The old theologies, too, are fairly hammered into children by catechism and other teaching, varying in Romish and Evangelical creeds according to their parentage.

As throughout the Germanic empire, Jews form a very important and influential part of the community in Bleicherode and vicinity. They seldom have social intercourse with the Christians, do all the banking business, are money-lenders, merchants, and linen-drapers, live in the best houses, dress well, and are more cosmopolitan than their fellow-citizens. They are very unpopular; and, if such a thing were possible, every Jew would be driven from the place in twenty-four hours. Judging from an intelligent American stand-point, they are sharp business people, who have made money-getting a study for generations and centuries, who have brains, and use them without the dulness which too often results from the tremendous amount of malt liquors consumed throughout North Germany. The Saxon races are honest, but not equal to cope financially with the Jews. The latter always have money, and are ever ready to lend it, upon good security; and the former will borrow and mortgage their domains.

The sterile soil, under the highest cultivation and most fortuitous circumstances, scarce yields half the crops of lands in the United States. And when, through misfortune or lack of calculation and business ability, mortgages which are held by Jews are foreclosed, debtors suddenly remember that Christ suffered crucifixion at the hands of the ancestors of their creditors, and anathematize them, though they forget the fact when they borrowed the money. Admitting that there may be reason for ill feeling toward the Jews, much of it results from not well considering the dangers which may result, if enterprises are unsuccessful. The Jews are the nations' capitalists; and Germany, if she should expel them, may meet the fate which overtook Spain, when Isabella permitted Torquemada to overrule her conscience and her judgment.

Bleicherode was the birthplace of Dr. Petermann, the eminent geographer, his relatives still residing here. A short walk over the mountains presents a view of the villages in the valleys where Dr. Luther began preaching against the sale of indulgences, and in this vicinity his birthday is observed with many traditional ceremonies. The town is very loyal to the imperial government, which form seems to suit the people, who love stability. It is erroneous to suppose that better and more honest results are obtained in permanent officials. On the contrary, from observation, our system of frequently changing all officers, even though it reduces politics to a scramble for offices, is preferable. Enormous taxation is requisite to sustain the pomp of courts; and where all officers hold positions for life, with good pensions when they cease active work, the work is not so well done as where an opposing political party and a free press discuss the merits or demerits of public servants. ROSA L. SEGUR.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

ON

"Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion."

BY KATE GANNETT WELLS.

IV.

Character.

[The aim of the teacher in treating this special topic should be to show how one virtue or attribute runs into another in making character; that it is something to be made; that non-inheritance is little excuse for non-striving; that the gradual formation of character is thus the sum of separate efforts. It should be remembered that this series of lessons is intended simply as a basis for conversation, in which the teacher can expand or condense, deepen or simplify the meanings here implied, according to the requirements of a class. They are only offered as tools, imperfect, yet it is hoped helpful, in inducing children to think and talk.]

Let the first work of the hour be to draw out from each child his idea of the meaning of the word "character": let them compare their definitions, and see if their answers do not all rather lean toward the robust side of goodness.

What is character?

It is the mark of what one is.

What is the difference between character and characteristics?

Is not the first the larger word?

The first is variously used, as when we speak of a person of weak character, and yet again it is said that another has character.

Can there then be a good and a bad character?

It is something one can hunt and work for; and people can tell which kind is found by one's actions, looks, and words.

Why is it important to start at once to form a good character?

1. Because, if once gained, it will last through life. (Illustrate the influence of habit.)

2. Because doing takes up more time than thinking. "Three-fourths of life is conduct." A little thinking will suffice as basis for much action. Illustrate e.g. A child has resolved to accomplish his task: the lesson takes an hour; the resolution, five hard minutes. He is willing to run on an errand for some one: the impulse is momentary, the errand calls for a walk of a mile. He wants to be kind to his sister: through all his life, he carries out that purpose.

3. Because, unless one has a firm character, one can never be master of one's self. Some children obey and disobey themselves every hour. Each new whim is their master. Contrast whims with habits: the first lead to capriciousness, the second to strength.

4. Because character is the most powerful agent against temptation. Try to rouse their enthusiasm by recalling instances of temptation withstood; e.g., the refusal of Regulus to remain in Carthage; the martyrs; the hungry child, who would not take another's portion.

Digitized by Google

Speak of bribery: the boy who receives a bribe at school becomes the bribing and the bribed politician. Show them how scandals in our own government would never have arisen, if men had had power to withstand temptation, especially in the form of bribes.

Ask the class to name certain virtues necessary for character, and to find how many of those named can be classified under the four heads of Truthfulness, Temperance, Concentration, and Usefulness. This attempt to classify some of the virtues would be a slight lesson in ethics, as our duties to others and to ourselves is involved in such classification. Let them perceive that several minor virtues are requisite for one great attribute; e.g., patience, perseverance, and fidelity are all necessary, in order to obtain concentration.

NOTE.—Under the second head of Temperance comes self-control. This special virtue has much to do with the practical application of character to life. Show the children how without it truthfulness is at a disadvantage, how even concentration cannot be produced, how usefulness is impaired. Guide them to regard it as the armor of character, by which the force of character is at once brought to bear upon adversity and success; one is neither cast down by misfortune nor elated by prosperity. Children constantly fail to obtain what they want, even in such small affairs as games, by flying into a passion; or else they often become sulky when they cannot have what they want.

Have not children, then, frequent occasion for self-control? Did they think that such a big word could be applied to their early years?

What is "To seem" and "To be"?

Which person has character, one who seems or one who is?

How quickly is the seeming perceived?

NOTE.—Ask the children for instances to illustrate this; e.g., false excuses, pretended feelings, an intention to appear as knowing more than one does or being more than one is. Let them trace out for themselves how in each case there was a failure in final or lasting success, though at first it seemed certain, because of this pretence.

Is not an idea of courage or manliness implied when we say in praise of a friend, that he has a great deal of character?

What is the difference between courage and manliness?

Animals have courage, human beings manliness, which is the larger word, embracing animal courage, thoughtfulness for others, and the capacity for self-sacrifice. Give instances of courage and of manliness. Athletes, prize-fighters, hospital nurses. Wreck of the "Birkenhead," where the women and children went off safely in the boats, while the four hundred men ranged themselves by companies on the deck, and stood there till the boats had gone, when the ship keeled over and they went down to the death below. Martyrs for truth's sake, dying by persecution or living amidst it bravely.

Are not all of us, even children, called upon to "bear witness" to one or another truth?

Is not a test of character its loyalty to truth?

NOTE.—Ask them for illustrations from their school life; e.g., being on the unpopular side, helping the girl who is not a favorite, not pretending to like another for the sake of receiving an invitation.

Must not common standards of judgment often be given up?

Does not one's standard grow higher and higher?

Does not adherence to it often involve keen pain to one's self, as lack of sympathy is met with?

In such a case, does not adherence to the truth prove the strength of one's character?

Is not, then, adherence to duty involved in the idea of character?

If these two phrases—loyalty to truth, adherence to duty—become maxims of daily life, can one fail in character?

What is the danger to character in these phrases against which one must guard?

That one's wishes are not taken for the truth; one must think and reason as well as feel, else loyalty and adherence may become obstinacy and prejudice in the mind, and one's manners become unyielding or rough.

What is one of the outward results of character in reference to the person alone?

His behavior.

NOTE.—Again let the children follow out this point for themselves, and find unconsciously how they have judged of a schoolmate by his behavior. Ask them for proverbs showing the connection between mind and character; e.g., "Fine manners are the mantle of fine minds," "Behavior is a touchstone."

What is another outward result of character in reference to others?

Success in life, control of circumstances, leadership, ability for great usefulness. Character is victorious; is felt as the adjusting force in all difficulties; the power that is trusted, that is believed in. See how children invariably believe each other, as where the boy or girl, who was in the right and had the courage to own it, led the others to do right against some temptation at school or in play.

Does the power of leadership lead to self-conceit?

If it does, then one has missed at once the power of character. True character may possibly recognize its power by its results, but feels that the individual counts for little. It is the truths he recognizes and stands for. True character is as modest and unconscious of self as it is invincible.

Does it then ever need self-defence or appeal to others?

Does character depend upon inheritance?

It conquers by its own right. "The heart is the throne of will."

NOTE.—Could not this point occupy a whole lesson? Children do not in words or conscious thought visit their transgressions upon their parents, but they do fall into a habit of excusing themselves by saying, "I can't help it, I was made so." Show the difference between the inheritance of physical and mental peculiarities: the first is comparatively out of one's power to change, the second is largely within one's power to effect. The shape of the mind, not of the face, can be altered. To offer excuses for weakness or sin in one's self is cowardly, fatal to effort, and gives less moral strength to be transmitted to those who come after us. Character is made by self-education. Its germ may be inherited, but education is brought at once to bear upon it, (1) by others, (2) by one's self; and the work one does for one's self counts the most. Let the children review their own few years, and see how much they have educated themselves, how many bad habits they have already conquered. Show the importance of self-education, else children who may be good at home will yield to temptation when it attacks them at school or abroad. It is hard work to have character when people influence one in various ways. But the hard work must become easy work.

Does not character reach from individuals to nations?

Illustrate from history: the Greeks stood for beauty, the English stand for stability, Americans for liberty.

What is, then, the lesson to be drawn?

That each individual must make the most of himself in order to help forward his nation; that each life counts, and each impulse in each life; that there is no standing alone; that we are all bound in together by relationships of example and inheritance, and each in working for himself works for all.

The child must feel these grand relationships of all subjects and facts by having them grouped to him in striking and picturesque outlines, also by taking one little event in his life and tracing out all its connections. Then bring him back again to the importance simply to himself of the formation of his own character.

Does not character become not only the mark of what one is, as at first stated, but also is it not one's actual self? Then guard it day and night, that "truth of speech and rectitude of behavior" may grow ever fuller and more complete.

A SPECIAL service in memory of Calderon de la Barca was held, on the two hundredth anniversary of the death of the poet, in the Church of St. Joseph, Madrid. The city was gayly decorated with flags, and the streets thronged by thousands of sight-seers. A visit was paid in procession to Calderon's tomb; and the troops in Madrid defiled past the statue of the poet in presence of the King and royal family, who witnessed the march from the balcony of the palace.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

REV. MR. TALMAGE does not take kindly to the revised version of the New Testament. This is the way he treated it, in a style of mingled superstition and sensationalism, Sunday before last, according to the New York Tribune:—

One of the largest congregations which have assembled in the Brooklyn Tabernacle for a year or more was present to hear Rev. T. De Witt Talmage preach on the revision of the New Testament, yesterday morning. In his introductory prayer, he repeated the words of the Lord's Prayer, and started to say, "For thine is the kingdom," etc., when he ended abruptly, remarking, "Here we are commanded to stop." He chose as the lesson of the day John v., but he had read only a few verses when he remarked, "I don't think I'll read any more of it: that has been abolished or made doubtful." Then he turned to John viii., and began reading concerning the woman taken in adultery. Breaking off in the middle of the story, he said, "But that also has been abolished, and I'll pass that." Turning to I. John v., he read a little and then stopped, saying: "I go no further with that reading, as that also has been abolished. I think I will have to turn to the Old Testament, for the Old Testament Commissioners have not reported yet, and will not for three years." He then read Psalm xix.

Mr. Talmage had been announced to preach on "The New Revision—a Mutilation and Profanation." His text was II. Samuel vi., 6, 7: "And when they came to Nachon's threshing-floor, Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it; for the oxen shook it. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah, and God smote him there for his error." He said: The sacred chest of acacia wood, called the ark of the covenant, about four feet by two, golden-lidded and golden-hinged, and mounted on two cherubim, and made to contain the divine covenant, and at one time holding a bowl of wilderness manna and Aaron's rod that budded, was the most sacred box ever created. It was in the presence of that chest God communed with the Israelites. Improperly to touch that box was death. All the people understood it. On one occasion, fifty thousand and seventy people lost their lives by irreverence to the box. That box long ago perished, but we have a sacred chest, an ark of the covenant,—the Bible. Like the ark of old, it contains the divine covenant and the manna for poor wildernessed pilgrims, and the rod of trouble that has budded into fragrant consolation, and over it the mercy-seat. It is so sacred that the hands of worldly criticism and the hands of pedantry and the hands of useless disturbance had better keep off of it. Wrongly to touch that omnipotent box is to die. We are in the midst of a great agitation consequent upon the new revision of the Scriptures. We had a translation two hundred and seventy-six years old, embosomed in the warmest affections of all the good of earth, interlocked with the best secular literature, and pronounced by the Websters and the Washington Irvings as the masterpiece of English prose. All Christendom was satisfied with the translation except a few doctors of divinity.

But two companies—an Old Testament Company and a New Testament Company—have been busy for ten years changing the book, and a few days ago the New Testament Company launched the result of its labors upon the world. After universal advertisement of the intended book, and the dramatic withholding of the book till a certain day, the work came forth. Two million copies were sold in two days. What a compliment to the Scriptures! Yes; but be not deceived. Did the two million people suddenly become passionately fond of Scripture reading? No These two million Bibles went into houses where the Bible was already enthroned. All those of us who honored the book wanted to know what these men had been doing with our favorite for ten years. In addition to the general curiosity about the iconoclasm of parts of our best book, the denominations of religionists were anxious to see if their peculiar views would be favored or opposed by the new version.

The Church and the world have the famous revision before them. We are asked for our verdict. There are many who do not want to oppose the ecclesiastical ring, for each denomination has such a ring; and there is as much bossism in the church of God as in the world, and monopoly would rule the kingdom of Christ, if it could, as it rules the money market and legislatures of the world. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand regret in the depths of their souls that the revision has been attempted, and look upon it as a desecration and a profanation and a mutilation and a religious outrage. I am willing to take it as a commentary and to stand it respectfully on my bookshelf behind other human opinions of the Word of God; but to put it upon my private stand, or in my family room, or on my pulpit as a substitute for King James's translation, I never will! I put my hand on the old book and take the oath of allegiance, so help me God! [Loud applause.] I am glad to know that Lord Shaftesbury and the Archbishop of York and many other strong men on the other side of the sea are anti-revisionists. But, supported by high authority or no authority, I here and now take my stand. [Applause.]

Digitized by Google

These fifty men, after ten years' tinkering with the Word of God, announce that they have not found a new doctrine. If it had been found that the translation was teaching any false ideas of God, or of the soul, or of the future, I would say, by all means Give us a new revision, and put forth immediate and mightiest effort for the organized obliteration of the old translation. The world cannot afford to have wrong notions of God and the soul and eternity. This revision of 1881 is a depreciation of three hundred million copies of the Bible, out in the world and doing their work. It assails the magnificent liturgy of the Episcopal Church, and makes all her Prayer-Books vast inaccuracies. It makes the inscriptions on the graves of your dead untrue. It reflects upon the old family Bible, and to the initiated leaves nothing certain save the record of marriages, births, and deaths. If this new version succeed for the next few years, you will have to watch your children's offering of the Lord's Prayer, and jerk them up short before they run over the evil one into an uninspired doxology. [Laughter.] It is an out-and-out war against all the religious literature of the ages.

FOREIGN.

THE Japanese government has just published a great dictionary of military and naval terms, in five languages,—Japanese, French, English, German, and Dutch. This is said to be the first Japanese dictionary arranged on the European plan. The compiler is Colonel Kadumite.

ARRESTS of Nihilists still continue in St. Petersburg, an important capture being that of Ivan Michailovitch, an accomplice of the persons recently hanged for the murder of the late Czar. An official account of the mine recently discovered in St. Petersburg states that it was laid last summer for the purpose of killing the late Czar, and was discovered by the confession of a convict, whose statements have been proved on search to be accurate.—Pall Mall Budget.

ROUMANIA.—The fêtes held in honor of the elevation of Roumania to the rank of a kingdom commenced on Sunday, 22d of May, with the coronation of King Charles. The ceremony was performed in the presence of an immense concourse of spectators, and passed off with great éclat. Thanksgiving services were held in all the churches, and at night the city was brilliantly illuminated. The chambers have voted the creation of a new Order, to be called the Crown of Roumania. On Monday, the festivities had to be adjourned on account of the weather.

SOME doubt appears to have arisen as to whether the revised New Testament may be used in churches. The Archbishop of Canterbury states that it has not yet been adopted by Convocation, and the Bishop of London regards it as a work to be read outside the pulpit. But a vicar asserts that no particular version of the Scriptures has been stamped with legal authority, and hence clergymen will be perfectly free to follow their own inclinations with respect to the revised book. The public are showing an evident intention to study the book for themselves, orders having been already given in this country for nearly two million copies.—Lloyd's Weekly.

MR. BRADLAUGH AT KEIGHLEY.—An enormous crowd, estimated at from fifteen thousand to twenty thousand persons, met Mr. Bradlaugh at Keighley on Saturday afternoon, and escorted him, with a band of music, to the Keighley Radical Club, where, after formally opening the club, Mr. Bradlaugh addressed the assembled crowd from the window. He said he acknowledged the magnificent greeting as meant for the electors of Northampton, as well as for himself, and that there, at any rate, the hearts of the people were with him in his struggle. In the evening, Mr. Bradlaugh spoke at the Mechanics' Institution, and said he was determined they should not beat him out of Parliament.

THE ANTI-SEMITIC AGITATION.—The Governor-General of Kharkoff has issued a proclamation forbidding the persecution of the Jews. It concludes in the following terms: "The Jews, equally with all other faithful subjects of the Tsar, are under the protection of the laws of the government; and their persons and property must therefore be equally respected. I, therefore, call upon all well-disposed persons to help, by all the means in their power, to tranquillize the public mind; and I hereby give notice that, in the event of farther attacks being made upon the Jews, I shall proceed with the greatest severity against the disturbers of the peace. I shall not hesitate to use armed force, or to place the country under martial law, if necessary."

PROTESTS continue to be made by Liberal and Radical associations against the erection of the national memorial in Westminster Abbey to Lord Beaconsfield. It has been resolved to appoint an Executive Committee to take steps for the erection of a public memorial to Lord Beaconsfield. The Morning Post says that Her Majesty has accepted a portrait statuette of Lord Beaconsfield, modelled by Lord Ronald Gower, and "has been pleased to express her gratification at possessing so excellent a likeness of an attached and devoted friend." The two favorite peacocks of the late Lord Beaconsfield have been sent from Hughenden Manor to the Queen at Windsor Castle by Her Majesty's desire. After their arrival, Her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold drove to the royal aviary to see the birds.

A MEETING to protest against the admission of Mr Bradlaugh to Parliament was held on Friday night at Exeter Hall, under the presidency of Earl Percy, supported by Sir John Kennaway, M.P., Mr. Lewis, M.P., Major Storer, M.P., Mr. E. A. Hicks, M.P., Archdeacon Whateley, Admiral Fishbourne, and many members of various denominations. Before commencing the proceedings, a body of Mr. Bradlaugh's supporters, who had gained admission, it was alleged, by false tickets, created considerable confusion, necessitating the aid of the police to restore order. After the chairman had opened the proceedings, Sir J. Kennaway, M.P., moved the first resolution: "That, whereas the constitution of this country acknowledges the supreme authority of Almighty God, any alteration of the law for the purpose of admitting an avowed atheist to sit in Parliament involves, in the opinion of this meeting, a subversion of constitutional principles and a national defiance of Almighty God." This was seconded by the Rev. Canon Taylor, and, after a protest from Mr. Bradlaugh's supporters, declared to be carried. A second resolution, also objecting to legislation that would facilitate the admission of atheists to Parliament, proposed by Mr. Lewis, M.P., seconded by the Rev. Mr. Cassin, and supported by Mr. Varley, was also carried. The adoption of a petition to Parliament and a vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the meeting. An excited crowd assembled in the Strand.—Lloyd's Weekly, May 29.

JESTINGS.

AN old lady who had been reading the health officers' weekly report thought "Total" must be an awfully malignant disease, since as many die of it as all the rest put together.

"JOHN," said Dean Ramsay, "I'm sure ye ken that a rollin' stone gathers nae moss?" "Ay," rejoined John, "that's true; but can ye tell me what guid the moss does to the stone?"

GREECE has only five miles of railway; and, when a farmer's cow breaks a leg, he often has to carry her a long distance to get to the track and leave her there, so he can obtain pay for her. It's awfully unhandy.

OPTICS.—Lecturer: "Now let any one gaze steadfastly on any object,—say, for instance, his wife's eye,—and he'll see himself looking so exceedingly small that"— Strong-minded lady (in front row): "Hear! hear! hear!"—Punch.

"MR. THOMPSON presents his compliments to Mr. Simpson, and begs to request that he will keep his piggs from trespassing on his grounds." "Mr. Simpson presents his compliments to Mr. Thompson, and begs to suggest that in the future he will not spell pigs with two gees." "Mr. Thompson's respects to Mr. Simpson, and will feel obliged if he will add the letter E to the last word in the note just received, so as to represent Mr. Simpson and lady." "Mr. Simpson returns Mr. Thompson's letter unopened, the impertinence it contains being only equalled by its vulgarity."

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.00
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc.
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.50
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER.

Cornell University Library

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" of "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

INGERSOLL'S LECTURES!

MISTAKES OF MOSES.....10c
SKULLS.....10
GHOSTS.....10
HELL.....10
LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD.10
GODS.....10
INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT.....10
HUMAN RIGHTS.....10
HEREAFTER.....10
TOM PAINE.....10

☞ The last named lecture was delivered at the Central Music Hall, Jan. 29, 1880. So great was the demand for seats that they sold at $5 each, and hundreds went away, unable to get even standing room.—Complete edition of either of the above lectures, handsomely printed in pamphlet form, will be sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cts. each, three for 25 cts., or the nine for 50 cts. You can send stamps by mail at my risk. Address PHILIP V. KING, Publisher, 121 Monroe St., Chicago. Agents Wanted Everywhere.

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—No. 600.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—No. 52.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

WHOEVER lives looking for pleasure only, his senses uncontrolled, immoderate in his enjoyments, idle and weak, the tempter will certainly overcome him, as the wind blows down a weak tree. Whoever lives without looking for pleasures, his senses well controlled, his enjoyments moderate, who is faithful and strong, the tempter will certainly not overcome him, any more than the wind overthrows a rocky mountain.—Buddha.

TRUTH is to be sought with a mind purified from the passions of the body. Having overcome evil things, thou shalt experience the union of the immortal Divinity with the mortal man.—Pythagoras.

WHO is wise and understanding among you? Let him show by his good life his works in meekness of wisdom. But if ye have bitter jealousy and faction in your heart, glory not and lie not against the truth. This wisdom is not a wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For where jealousy and faction are, there is confusion and every vile deed. But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without variance, and without hypocrisy.—New Testament.

TRUTH is an immortal and an eternal thing. It bestows not a beauty which time will wither, nor a courage which may quail before a human tribunal, but only things just and lawful, from which it divides and destroys all that is unjust.—Epictetus.

THE ideal of morality has no more dangerous rival than the ideal of highest strength, of most powerful life. It is the maximum of the savage.—Novalis.

A BATTLE is constantly going on, in which the humblest human creature is not incapable of taking some part, between the powers of good and those of evil, and in which every even the smallest help to the right side has its value in promoting the very slow and often almost insensible progress by which good is gradually gaining ground from evil, yet gaining it so visibly at considerable intervals as to promise the very distant but not uncertain final victory of Good. To do something during life, on even the humblest scale, if nothing more is within reach, toward bringing this consummation ever so little nearer, is the most animating and invigorating thought which can inspire a human creature; and that it is destined, with or without supernatural sanctions, to be the religion of the future, I cannot entertain a doubt.—John Stuart Mill.

IN man, Nature endeavored not merely to exalt, but to transcend herself. He must not, therefore, be merely an animal repeated. He must be something more, something better. He ought, because he can. The sensual efforts and enjoyments are already fully developed and exhausted in the animal kingdom. It is not for their sakes that man exists; as, in fact, no creature exists for the sake of that which was already attained on lower stages of existence, but for that which has been newly conquered through itself. Thus, man must interpenetrate and rule the animal in him by his higher faculties, by the qualities which extinguish him from the brute. The wild savage struggle for existence has already had abundant play in the brute world. Man cannot entirely avoid it, in so far as he is still a product of Nature; but, in the measure of his higher faculties, he should know how to ennoble it, and in regard to his fellow-men should mitigate it, especially by the consciousness of their kindred and the mutual obligation of race.—D. F. Strauss.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE 19th of June has come and gone, and the world still stands. But then the season this year is "backward."

THE latest sensationalism in the pulpit that we have heard of is "Me Too" as the subject of a sermon. It was in Brooklyn.

IT is reported that the revised New Testament has been adopted at the Phillips Academy, Andover, for use in all services.

A GOOD deal of interest appears to be manifest in the secular press as to whether or not the revised New Testament has abolished "hell." We hasten to say that it has not. At least, it has only abolished three-sevenths of it. About that proportion of it has been changed into the milder "Hades." But enough of the old place remains to accommodate all newspaper men who do not tell the truth.

SOME little girls at Newport made a collection of a hundred dollars for the Channing Memorial Church of that place, and presented it to the Trustees as a subscription to its fund. It has been decided to devote the money to the purchase of a baptismal font for the church. The incident serves to illustrate how tenaciously Unitarianism still clings to the ecclesiastical associations and usages of the past.

IF a person is disposed to evil practices, it is pretty clear that association with sacred things does not always save him, not even the revised edition of the New Testament. As an illustration of this, an agent of a religious publishing-house was arrested the other day in Boston, on the charge of advertising to send through the mails revised New Testaments to those forwarding six cents in postage-stamps. The promise was not fulfilled, and hence the arrest.

A THEOLOGICAL student anxiously inquires of the Christian Union concerning the danger of Romanism in its frequent engulfing of Protestants, and whether it can be fairly asked, "Is Protestantism a failure?" The answer contains a condolent recognition of the pitfalls, but suggests as the most potent remedy the diffusion of "intelligence and liberty." But would there be no danger to the snug hedges of Christian Protestant fields in a very full application of this remedy?

THE following cutting from the Presbyterian has a lesson for Radicals quite as much as for the Evangelical readers for whom it was intended: "As with George Eliot, so with Carlyle, with all that blackness of darkness of theoretical religious unbelief into which for whatever reasons they wandered, they could neither of them outlive, outgrow, or rid themselves of certain most profound spiritual convictions and religious sentiments which were wrought into the substance of their character and very nature by those peculiarly intense and pronounced Evangelical religious influences that environed their earlier years."

IT is to be noticed that the long procession of carriages, which is the usual accompaniment of Irish Catholic funerals, is at last becoming discountenanced by the church authorities. The custom is a very senseless one to say the least, and frequently entails heavy expense upon those who can ill afford the expenditure. The New York Tablet comments upon the subject as follows: "The vanity of giving a decent funeral to departed relatives has left many a poor family in straitened circumstances for years. It is melancholy to see a cortége of twenty or more carriages following to their last resting-place the remains of a man who has left his widow and children in absolute want. We have known instances of persons reducing themselves to beggary in order to have a 'fine funeral' for the departed member of the family. Though admiring the generous spirit that inspires such liberal sacrifices, we must deplore the folly and vanity of such idle show, and trust that the clergy of New York will take up the matter and raise their voice against such extravagant folly."

THE English Government has found the case of Herr Most—arrested for exulting in his journal, the Freiheit, over the assassination of the Emperor of Russia, and for recommending imitation of the act in other countries—a rather difficult one to deal with. It was claimed by some of the journals that the prosecution had been undertaken in obedience to the wishes of Germany, which circumstance, in view of the fact that there is a pretty strong feeling in England that the Socialists are as much sinned against as sinning, gave less relish to the proceedings than they might have had otherwise. The question whether a general exhortation to tyrannicide in a newspaper is a violation of English law pertaining to murder is not yet settled. In the mean time, Herr Most has been convicted under the provisions of a law concerning libel. The Pall Mall Budget says in regard to this law that it is "a disgrace to the statute-book, and its rigorous enforcement would leave every newspaper in the country at the mercies of juries." According to the report of the trial, the Lord Chief Justice said, in his charge, "The jury must consider whether or not this article was high and virtuous; and, if they were of that opinion, they should acquit the prisoner; but if, on the other hand, they found it was subversive of law and morality, they should convict him." "Now, we would ask," observes the Budget, "is that the limit which any reasonable Englishman would assign to the liberty of the press? Is there a journalist in England who would defend a law which sent him to jail if ever he penned an article which, in the opinion of twelve men who may be prejudiced, ignorant, and fanatical, was not 'high and virtuous'?" The animus of the jury is pretty clearly indicated in its recommendation of the prisoner to mercy, in connection with the verdict, and censure of the German Government, which ought, it would seem, to afford a crumb of comfort to the malefactor and his friends.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

Free Religious Association, May 26 and 27, 1881.

[Continued from last week.]

MR. POTTER.—We have with us one who has been a good friend to the Free Religious Association for many years, but who has never before, I believe, appeared on our platform, who is now to address you,—Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton,—and who is to speak of the bearing on moral problems, and especially on the condition of woman, of the prevailing theological conception of Deity as masculine.

ADDRESS OF ELIZABETH CADY STANTON.

My text for this address will be found in Gen. i., 27. —"So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

If language has any meaning, here is a plain declaration of the existence of the feminine element in the Godhead, equal in power and glory with the masculine. The Heavenly Mother and Father! "God created man in his own image, male and female." Thus Scripture, as well as science and philosophy, declares the eternity and equality of sex,—the philosophical fact, without which there could have been no perpetuation of creation, no growth or development in the animal, vegetable, or mineral kingdoms, no awakening nor progressing in the world of thought. The masculine and feminine elements, exactly equal and balancing each other, are as essential to the maintenance of the equilibrium of the universe as the positive and negative electricity, the north and south magnetism, the centripetal and centrifugal forces, the laws of attraction which bind together all we know of this planet whereon we dwell and of the system in which we revolve.

Thus, the Old Testament, "in the beginning," proclaims the simultaneous creation of man and woman, the eternity and equality of sex; and the New Testament echoes back through the centuries the individual sovereignty of woman, growing out of this natural fact. Paul, in speaking of equality as the very soul and essence of Christianity, said, "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." With this recognition of the feminine element in the Godhead in the Old Testament, and this declaration of the equality of the sexes in the New, we may well wonder at the contemptible status woman occupies in the Christian Church of to-day.

But the fact that it is so only shows that the passing generations are far more influenced by precedents and authorities, no matter how monstrous and absurd, than by their own common-sense, reason, and the noblest sentiments of the human soul. The Church builds all its opinions of woman's degradation and subordination on the Scriptures; and yet the first chapter of Genesis declares the simultaneous creation of man and woman, their equal dominion over everything on the earth, their divine origin and destiny. Yet Adam Clark in his Commentaries takes no note of these grand declarations, but draws his conclusions of woman's true position from the allegory in the second chapter, and teaches the rightful subordination of woman, over and over, from Genesis to Revelation. The most grievous wounds that could have been inflicted on woman have come through the teaching of the Church that she was not created with man, that she was an inferior, an afterthought, made for him, but he not for her; a being of secondary importance, a lower caste, of feebler intellect and of more depraved tendencies, cursed of Heaven, and unworthy the companionship of holy men. All the provisions of the canon law and decisions of ecclesiastical courts, based on these ideas, have not only degraded woman, but deeply injured and retarded civilization.

The Church, looking upon woman as under a curse, considered man as God's divinely appointed agent for its enforcement, and that the restrictions she suffered under Christianity were but parts of a just punishment for having caused the fall of man. To this end, the scientific facts of creation are falsified and perverted, and the opinion seriously expressed by learned divines that the creation of woman was no part of the great original plan: whereas facts and philosophy alike prove that the masculine and feminine elements must have existed from the beginning; that man never was perfect, and therefore never fell; that the race, through a process of evolution, is gradually coming up from ignorance, superstition, slavery, and animalism to a degree of morality and intelligence unknown before. But, all along through these dark ages, these slowly changing centuries, the most grievous burdens have fallen on woman. To degrade her more completely, learned councils of bishops have decided that she had no soul. Catholic and Protestant countries alike agreed in holding woman as the chief accessory of the devil. The terrible persecutions for witchcraft fell chiefly on her, in which even such men as Luther, John Wesley, Richard Baxter, Cotton Mather, and Sir Matthew Hale believed, and stimulated the persecution. The victims were chiefly women; the young and beautiful, the old and feeble, alike were sacrificed, hundreds in the same hour burning in the town square; while scarce one wizard to a hundred or thousand witches was ever sacrificed. While the practice of medicine among the lower classes was almost entirely in the hands of women at one time, their skill in healing and their scientific knowledge were attributed to diabolical agency. It was a maxim of Luther's that "no gown or garment worse becomes a woman than that she shall be wise." Charles Kingsley, in a letter to John Stuart Mill, says there will never be a good world for woman until the last vestige of canon law and all the legislation for woman, and the monastic ideas that have grown out of it, are civilized off the face of the earth. "Though Puritanism was first dominant here in New England, it brought no element of toleration for women," says Lydia Maria Child, in her History of Woman. "Under the Commonwealth, society assumed a new and stern aspect. Women were in disgrace. It was everywhere reiterated from the pulpit that woman caused man's expulsion from Paradise, and ought to be shunned by Christianity, as one of the greatest temptations of Satan. Man, said they, is conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity; it was his complacency to woman that first caused his debasement; let him not therefore glory in his shame, let him not worship the fountain of his corruption. Learning and accomplishments were alike discouraged, and women confined to a knowledge of cooking, family medicines, and the unintelligible theological discussions of the day."

Canon law had its largest growth through the pious fictions of woman's created inferiority; and its whole tendency has been to separate man and woman into a holy or divine sex and an unholy or impious sex, creating antagonism between those whose interests are by nature one. All the evils that have resulted from dignifying one sex and degrading the other may be traced to this central error, a belief in a trinity of masculine gods from which the feminine element is wholly eliminated.

We find the same discrepancies between the liberal universal principles, enunciated in all religions, and the practices of the churches, that we find between the spirit of our Constitutions and the practices of governments. Both alike declare justice, liberty, and equality for humanity, but by their creeds and codes make the people slaves and pariahs. Man is godlike in his perception of truth, but blind and faithless in its application. There are moments when prophets and seers, statesmen and scholars, seem to rise above their ordinary conditions and surroundings into an atmosphere where, with more extended vision, they catch glimpses of eternal principles, and their utterances from these divine heights find a ready response in every true soul,—principles that, like the north star, always point the same way, guiding those who will watch and follow to liberty and peace. It is this fine, almost imperceptible cobweb of truth, binding society together, that will make the religion, the government, and social life of the future peaceful, satisfactory, and enduring. It is thus, in his inspired moments, that man has given his highest, truest perception of exalted womanhood, making her a divinity to be loved, honored, and worshipped, while in his creeds and codes she is the most degraded of his subjects. While exhausting his genius to dignify the ideal woman, he has summoned all the powers of Church and State to degrade the real woman.

The most demoralizing doctrine taught by the Church of to-day is that woman brought sin and death into the world. A curious old blackletter volume, published in London in 1632, entitled The Lawes and Resolutions of Woman's Rights, says, "The reason why women have no control in Parliament, why they make no laws, consent to none, abrogate none, is their Original Sin." To this idea, we may trace all the humiliations and deprivations, political, religious, social, that have been visited upon woman as the result of the degradation of her sex. It is for the women who fill the churches to-day to abjure this doctrine of "Original Sin," and to preach the equality of sex in dignity and power, a simultaneous creation, eternal in the Godhead.

What we call God is the infinite ideal of humanity. The preposterous, ridiculous absurdity of supposing God so defined to be of the male sex, and of calling God him only, does not need a word to make it apparent. This idea which we all reverence, and for which we yearn, necessarily enfolds in one the attributes which, separated in our human race, express themselves in manhood and womanhood. Thence come our limitations, our mortality in this state of being. In God's perfect form, the creative attributes, separated in us, together flow out as life, energy, production, power. Our probation here is to reconcile and combine the fractional life of man and woman into complete unions: then shall we become like gods, knowing all truth. In proportion as man and woman learn to put their lives together spiritually and harmoniously, the divine order of society becomes possible, and the spiritual world will unfold to this twofold consciousness. Men and women naturally antagonize and misunderstand each other until and except as they harmonize by love. To render this harmony universal and integral is the great work to be done. No amount of wisdom divorced from love will enable the sexes to understand each other. The horrible selfishness of the disintegrated society in which we live could not continue, if man and woman ceased to be rivals. The desolation caused by pent-up passion would cease, if we began life with co-education made the central point, the foundation, of all culture; and if we proceeded thence in a social order in which the positive and negative magnetism would all the time be finding its equilibrium. In such natural, normal relations, life would not become tame on the one side, nor would the animal propensities run riot on the other. The body would be the obedient servant of the soul! There would be a continual flow and interflow of moral, spiritual, and intellectual forces; and the natural law of relation would be found, when men and women would think together as one.

Now, the first step to this grand result is to equalize these great moral forces; and instead of making sex a crime, marriage a defilement, maternity a curse, and womanhood the sport of devils, the victim in all ages alike, under canon and civil law, under all forms of religion and government, let us proclaim the eternity and equality of sex in the Godhead, and in the whole universe of mind and matter. Let this be the cornerstone of the Religion of Humanity. If the Free Religious movement is to be successful, it is to be made so through the recognition and elevation of woman. The Catholic Church with a wonderful adaptability gave her children the mother of Jesus for an object of worship. Without intending it, she has given us a feeble apotheosis of woman. Art is deeply indebted to Rome for this beneficent gift to her inspired sons. The genius of Raphael dwelt fondly on the Queen of Heaven, Mary, our Mother. Swedenborg also meets this hunger of the heart by giving us a divine man, in whom wisdom and love represent the masculine and feminine principles. He always speaks of God as the Divine Marriage. Much that is plaintive in music, sad in poetry, and pathetic in art is the expression of the soul's instinctive sigh for a divine mother. We shall give a new impulse to religious thought and civilization, when we uplift the veil that hides the heavenly Mother's face, and with loving lips pray after this manner, "Our Father and Mother who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name." Here is the reason above all others of the enduring power of the Catholic religion. In speaking of it, Lord Macaulay says that the Roman Catholic Church is older than any civilized government on the globe. It is the only institution left standing which carries the mind back to the time when the smoke of sacrifice rose from the Pantheon, and when tigers and camel-leopards bounded in the Flavian Amphitheatre. The proudest royal houses are but of yesterday, compared with the line of the supreme Pontiffs, traced back in unbroken series, from the Pope who crowned Napoleon in the nineteenth century to the Pope who crowned Pepin in the eighth; and far beyond stretches the august dynasty, until it fades into the twilight of fable! She saw the commencement of all the governments on the globe, and of all the ecclesiastical establishments now existing; and there is no assurance that she is not destined to see the end of them all. Lord Macaulay, in accounting for her astonishing longevity as compared with other institutions, turns with felicitous insight to female influence as one of the principal causes.

Digitized by Google

In her system, he says, she assigns to devout women spiritual functions, dignities, and even magistracies. In England, if a pious and benevolent woman enter the cells of a prison to pray with the most unhappy and degraded of her sex, she does so without any authority from the Church. Indeed, the Protestant Church places the ban of its reprobation on any such irregularity. "At Rome, the Countess of Huntington would have a place in the Calendar as St. Selina, and Mrs. Fry would be Foundress and First Superior of the Blessed Order of Sisters of the Jails."

But even Macaulay overlooks another element of power and permanence in the economy of the Catholic Church. God, as Father and as Son and as Holy Ghost, might inspire reverence and dread only, in hearts that at the shrine of the ever-blessed Mary, Mother of God (God the Mother), would kindle into humble, holy, and lasting love.

Frances Power Cobbe, though deprecating the worship of the Virgin, yet says of it: "The Catholic world has found a great truth,—that love, motherly tenderness and pity is a divine and holy thing, worthy of adoration. . . . What does this wide-spread sentiment regarding this new divinity indicate? It can surely only point to the fact that there was something lacking in the older creed, which, as time went on, became a more and more sensible deficiency, till at last the instinct of the multitude filled it up in this amazing manner."

When Theodore Parker, in his morning prayer on a beautiful summer Sunday, addressed the All-loving as "our Father and our Mother," he struck a chord which will one day vibrate through the heart of universal humanity. It was a thought worth infinitely more than all the creeds of Christendom.

That mild virgin face is omnipresent not only in our homes and cathedrals, but in the gloomiest prisons of the Old World. As you descend into those fearful dungeons of Venice, below the Bridge of Sighs, which in the days of the glory of this strange city no one ever recrossed but on his way to execution or to the tomb, the sweet face of the Virgin Mother guards every turn. As you go down, down from the light of day, deeper and deeper into the oppressive darkness, ever and anon the light of the guide's torch reveals the same mild face, above the door of some cell of torture, some oubliette into whose depths the poor prisoner is forced to leap,—above the conduits for the blood of the victims who perished there,—above all this and from every side looks down the Holy Mother, designed, tradition says, to add intensity to the death agony by its mocking show of pity. Facts were there, realities of awful import; but to me they have a deeper meaning: they seem like prophecies of the day dawning, when the mother soul shall descend with healing in her wings into these abodes of sorrow and suffering, of outrage and oppression, giving light and joy and peace where darkness and despair and death now reign.

In Catholic countries, the Virgin Mary is the avenue through which the religious nature of man is reached. Her name rouses in man the same love and tenderness that the name of Jesus inspires in woman. Dr. William F. Channing says, "A French teacher and companion whom I had in Rome, when a youth of sixteen, told me that, if I should say to an Italian, 'I do not believe in God,' he would shrug his shoulders; if I should say, 'I do not believe in Christ,' he would say, 'What a misfortune'; but if I should say, 'I do not believe in the Virgin Mary,' he would take up stones to throw at me." I do not think this relation of sex to the very substance of religion can be overstated. The old masters represented the trinity by three bearded male heads. To have made the Holy Ghost feminine would have been more in harmony with the Biblical description of the divine family, and with the offices the third person in the Godhead was supposed to fill. The frequent reference to the Holy Ghost as the Comforter seems to imply the presence of the feminine element, its love, tenderness, and mercy. The third person in the Trinity, then, should not have been Christ, but the aggregate of humanity, the whole human race. Religions like the Jewish and the Christian, which make God exclusively male, consign woman logically to the subordinate position assigned her in Mohammedanism. History has perpetuated this tradition. The subjection of woman has existed as an invariable element in Christian civilization. It could not be otherwise with the Godhead represented as a trinity of males. It stood to reason and appealed to fanaticism that the male form was the godlike. Hence, logical intellect and physical force were exalted above the intuition of conscience, the finer sentiments, the more tender affections, and attractive charms. The male religion shaped government and society after its own form. The reason why we have an exclusively male God, and a religion which depreciates and degrades woman, is that our religion is purely emotional, hence feminoid, and sustained mainly by women; and, as we naturally deify and aspire to our opposites, woman's God is man. Our Scriptures and creeds are written from the man stand-point, our priesthood are men; and hence God, religion, and the Church, with its ordinances, are not so attractive to men. The existing churches being projected by the emotional side of our nature, not merely by woman, but by the feminoid in man, they are hitherto the product of the infantile or feminoid state of the race. The race has not yet reached its maturity, when governed by reason. It is still governed by its emotions, often by its reverse passions, as hate, fear, greed, rather than by love, attraction, devotion. It will glorify woman, when it comes to its reason. The Positivists, who base everything on reason, whose religion is masculoid, point to the church of humanity, which makes woman, and especially the mother, the central figure, the actual Divinity. It remains for us to take the next step, and reunite both in the trinity of Father, Mother, and Child.

Is this practicable? you will ask. It is impracticable to the last degree at this stage of our development; but, as thought precedes action, discussion precedes decision. Now is always the time for those who first perceive a great truth to utter it. Then, it is caught up by one after another, and reiterated, until it becomes familiar to the multitude. This idea of the eternity and equality of sex is a quest after the ideal of God and man; but, as an ideal, it points the direction and path of progress for society and religion. Meanwhile, the social steps must not be destructive nor arbitrary. We shall grow up to the social changes rather than mechanically contrive them. We are finite and mortal beings, because disintegrated by the cleft of sex. The divine being, the divine type, is the communion of the masculine and feminine attributes, and thence complete, infinite, without limitation. We enter the divine order on earth in proportion as we attain the reconciliation and communion of sex in every phase of social life; and that is the divine order which, under far more fluent conditions, we shall enter upon in our next experiment of living. This gives a new meaning and wider scope to the woman movement.

The Church, springing as it did from the emotional element and supported by woman, having a male tyrant for its God, has done its worst to degrade woman; and she has accepted her position as coming from divine authority (though of her own creation), as the Russian peasant identifies the Czar with God, and worships him while suffering from his tyranny. There is no power by which the human soul can be held in such bondage as through the religious emotions, no realm of thought where it is so difficult to displace error with truth as the religious realm. And, so long as we base our religion on the fundamental error of a "male God," it is in vain to struggle for woman's equal status in the Church; and, until her equality is recognized, all talk of establishing a religion of humanity is idle, since one-half of humanity is in social, religious, political subjection to the other. I have often thought that we shall take the first step for woman's freedom and for that of humanity, when we shall have outgrown the popular idea of a male God in the skies or elsewhere: then, we might see and worship God in humanity; then, we might love home and deify each other. "If you love not man whom you have seen, how can you love God whom you have not seen?" The highest form of revelation is that of God in man; and yet we place everything, seen and unseen, scriptures, Bibles, sacraments, altars, vestments, symbols, cathedrals, all above humanity in sacredness, dignity, authority. Religion is native to us; but, to exalt the true God, we must dethrone the false. I do not think the idea of King God can long maintain itself in a genuine democracy. You see in Europe how naturally and inevitably the democrats, the nihilists, and the communists are or become infidels. The two ideas of a divine sovereign and a human sovereign go together. They will stand or fall together. They antagonize the idea of Divine Humanity and the individual sovereignty of personal freedom as the basis of public order. Even the Catholic Church is quite different in its actions in this country. Its votaries will not submit to its tyranny here as they do in the old monarchical countries. Why is it possible for France to be a republic? Because her leading minds are infidel. When Russia throws off the superstitions of the Church, she will be a republic. When woman discards its creeds, dogmas, and authorities, she, too, will be free; and a free, enlightened woman is a divine being, the savior of mankind. We would not have man deify and worship a slave. He cannot, if he would. I believe we have reached a point where the world of thought is ready to accept anything which can be proved to be true, whether it is indorsed by the Church or not. That is a great step in advance. People no longer ask, Is this in the Bible, or according to Bible teaching? but, Is it true? Is it according to the nature of things? Not, Does God's word in a book, not, Does the Church, affirm or deny this? but, Does God's human reason say it? Is it according to logic and mathematics? Then, Can it be proved practically? Does it tend to make us happy? Will it work? Will it pay? These are the questions we ask to-day: they are the signs and tokens of an extended emancipation, that has come so gradually that we hardly realize it.

The Church still keeps its form, but the substance is not there. If it were not for the intense conservatism of woman, the dogmas and superstitions of the Church would be nowhere. Thanks to the law of progress, woman is awaking to the degradation she has endured in the name of religion, and is interpreting for herself the laws of life. Were the existing ecclesiasticism out of the way, man would naturally deify woman, as men do who are emancipated from the Church. But with the Church as it is, sustained mainly by woman, yet degrading her and deifying absolute, tyrannical force, what could we expect? And here is the reason our popular religion has so little power over man. Women fill our churches: only through their prayers and tears and persuasions can the men be drawn thither. The woman worships the male God and the male Christ as man never can. He is to find his Deity through his opposite. To the inspired sons of earth, the poets, the painters, the prophets, it has been the same at all periods and under all forms of religion and government. All ages alike have bowed down to exceptional women with love and reverence, according them places of power and influence in both State and Church. This ideal womanhood has immortalized itself, too, in marble, and on canvas. Go into the galleries of art, and there you find the graces, the virtues, the beatitudes, music, poetry, painting, philosophy, science, liberty, justice, mercy, the seasons, day with its glorious dawn, and night with its holy mysteries, all represented by woman. Is it not a wonder, then, that, while the ideal woman is thus exalted and glorified, the real woman should be so degraded and humiliated? It is a light matter in the minds of even many advanced thinkers that woman's natural rights are the mere football of popular caprice; but the great fundamental principles of all just government and pure religion, violated in the person of the humblest citizen, must be fraught with danger to all. The spirit of liberty, in whatever form it comes, whether as African, Chinese, Woman, Nihilist, Socialist, Communist, will assert itself and avenge its wrongs. Ariosto tells a pretty story of a fairy, who by some mysterious law of her nature was condemned to appear at certain seasons in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her in the period of her disguise were forever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed in her power. But, to those who in spite of her loathsome aspect pitied and protected her, she afterwards revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their homes with wealth, made them happy in love and victorious in war. Such a spirit is liberty. At times, she takes the form of a hateful reptile. She grovels, she hisses, she stings. But woe to those who in disgust shall venture to crush her. And happy are those who, having dared to receive her in her degraded and frightful shape, shall at length be rewarded by her in the time of her beauty and glory.

The world has been slow to understand that all the accumulated wrongs of sex have made the superior class of women, the writers, the thinkers, the artists, the noblest wives and mothers, especially those of great men, with but few exceptions uniformly sad and despairing. All men note the fact, some but to travesty the sour old maid or scolding wife in "Caudle Lectures" and the "Taming of the Shrew." Other men go deeper, and feel in part the insults and humiliations heaped on womanhood, but wonder at the cause. So black is the page of history with crimes against my sex that even a Russian poet makes one of his heroines say, "God has forgotten the nook where he hid the keys of woman's emancipation." The hearts of noble men are responding at last to this infinite sadness, awaking to the agonies of woman's crucifixion, and prophesying the coming transfiguration. Thomas W. Higginson, at the anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Union, in New York City, as long ago as 1858, in an address upon women in Christian civilization, said: "No man can ever speak of the position of woman so mournfully as she has done it for herself. Charlotte Brontë, Caroline Norton, and indeed the majority of intellectual women, from the beginning to the end of their lives, have touched us to sadness, even in mirth; and the mournful memoirs of Mrs. Siddons, looking back upon years when she had been the chief intellectual joy of English society, could only deduce the hope 'that there might be some other world hereafter, where justice would be done to woman.'"

Digitized by Google

The essayist, E. P. Whipple, in a recent speech before the Papyrus Club, of Boston, said of George Eliot: "The great masculine creators and delineators of human character, Homer, Cervantes, Shakspeare, Goethe, Scott, and the rest, cheer and invigorate us even in the vivid representation of our common humanity in its meanest, most stupid, most criminal forms. Now comes a woman endowed not only with their large discourse of reason, their tolerant views of life, and their intimate knowledge of the most obscure recesses of the human heart and brain, but with a portion of that rich imaginative humor which softens the savageness of the serious side of life by a quick perception of its ludicrous side; and the result of her survey of life is that she depresses the mind, while the men of genius animate it, and that she saddens the heart, while they fill it with hopefulness and joy. I do not intend to solve a problem so complicated as this; but I would say, as some approach to an explanation, that this remarkable woman was born under the wrath and curse of what our modern philosophers call 'heredity.' She inherited the results of man's dealings with woman during a thousand generations of their life together."

The man was master, the woman was an appendage to him. He alternately worshipped and wronged her: he knelt as lover, but commanded as husband; and he established the absurd superstition that she belonged to the "weaker sex," because her brute force was inferior to his.

Now, when the worth of woman is more generally realized; when her substantial equality with man is forcing itself into legislation; when she is fast becoming the co-mate, and not a mere helpmate of man, we may hope that when another George Eliot appears, with equal comprehensiveness of intellect and equal creativeness of imagination, she will teach to our common humanity a gospel of cheer as cordial and humane as that which has ever come from any man of genius since the creation of the world.

I never look a colored man, woman, or child in the face that my soul does not glow with an intense desire to render them some service, to give them some sign of my recognition of their equal humanity, as their just due from every member of the Saxon race for all the wrongs they have suffered at our hands. It seems to me that every true man must have a touch of this same feeling toward woman, in view of all the insults and outrages perpetrated on her by his base creeds and codes and customs. And yet into how many manly faces have I looked in vain for the equal recognition of my unhappy sex.

We see reason sufficient in the outer conditions of human beings for individual liberty and development; but when we consider the inner life, the self-dependence and solitude of every human soul in all the great emergencies of life, we see the need of courage, judgment, independence, skill in the use of every faculty, and sense of mind and body strengthened and developed in woman as well as man. In that solemn solitude of self that links us with the immeasurable and the eternal, as individuals each one stands alone forever. A recent writer says: "I remember once, in crossing the Atlantic, to have gone upon the deck of the ship at midnight, when a dense black cloud enveloped the sky and the great deep was roaring madly under the lashes of demoniac winds. My feeling was not of danger nor fear (which is a base surrender of the immortal soul), but of utter desolation and loneliness; a little speck of life shut in by a tremendous darkness. Again, I remember to have climbed the slopes of one of the Swiss Alps, up beyond the point where vegetation ceases, and the stunted conifers no longer struggle against the unfeeling blasts. Around me lay a huge confusion of rocks, out of which the gigantic ice-peaks shot up into the measureless blue of the heavens; and again my only feeling was the awful solitude!" And yet in the estrangement and antagonism of man and woman there is a solitude which each and every one of us has always carried with him, more inaccessible than the ice cold mountains, more profound than the midnight sea,—the solitude of self!

Our inner being, which we call ourself, no eye nor touch of man nor angel has ever pierced. It is more hidden than the caves of the gnome, the sacred adytum of the oracle, the hidden chamber of Elensinian mystery; for to it only omniscience is permitted to enter. Such is individual life. Who, I ask you, can take, who dare take on himself the responsibility of deciding the rights, the duties, the limitations of another human soul?

For the Free Religious Index.

MESSIANIC THEORIES.

In James Freeman Clarke's very interesting narrative of probabilities in regard to "Thomas Didymus," it is truly represented as the expectation of the Jews in his time that the Christ, when he came, would expel the Latin legions from Palestine, and make Jerusalem the delight of the world; would be accepted as ruler, not only by the Jews, but by all other nations; would soon and utterly destroy the Romans; would be the son of David, and sit on David's throne and rule the twelve tribes of Israel; and would also rule the whole world, drawing all peoples and nations to himself.

It is there also truly represented that the expectations thus held arose from prediction by the Hebrew prophets that these very things would take place,—predictions regarded by the whole Jewish people as divinely inspired, and thus as infallibly correct.

It is there further represented that Jesus declared that, when the Christ should come, men would flock to him from all lands for a last great battle with the hosts of darkness; and that, after this war, there would be no more war on the earth, but that peace would permanently reign, and that the time for this was near; that then the Christ would reign by truth and love, and that the whole Jewish people would be the prophets of this faith, and would teach it through all the world.

It is further represented in "Thomas Didymus" that, after long disappointing and puzzling his disciples by refraining from such a claim, Jesus at last plainly declared that he himself was the Christ, but that he explained by degrees, to their still greater surprise and mystification, that his reigning and ruling would be far otherwise than most people thought; that what he meant by Messiahship was a teaching of higher and nobler ideas than had previously prevailed; that it was his being in the Father and the Father in him which made him the Messiah; and that, though the Jewish nation was to possess the earth, it was only by being teachers, helpers, comforters to all nations.

It is now plain that the predictions of the Hebrew prophets in regard to a deliverer and ruler of the Jewish people who, sitting on the throne of David, should establish in Palestine a permanent reign of peace and righteousness, have failed of fulfilment. The mistake of the Jews was not at all in recognizing the fact that Jesus did not fulfil those conditions, but rather in expecting that any one at any time would fulfil them.

Mr. Clarke, in this book, represents Jesus as claiming Messiahship on quite different grounds from those included in Hebrew prophecy and Jewish expectation. He represents him as giving a new idea of the Messianic function, entirely different from that which the prophets had expressed and the whole Jewish people received. He represents him to claim recognition as "King," on account of his excellence as a teacher; as "Master and Lord," on account of his eminent helpfulness as a servant; as "the Christ," because he was in the Father and the Father in him. If Ben Butler should gain a suit by insisting that the words used in it bore a meaning entirely different from that assigned them by the dictionaries and common usage, it would be called pettifogging; but Mr. Clarke seems to claim this interpretation of Messiahship as sound, and to hold Jesus the true fulfiller of that function.

What makes this judgment the more surprising is that the predictions put into the mouth of Jesus in this book have failed of fulfilment as obviously as those put forth by Isaiah and Jeremiah. That kingdom of heaven which Jesus preached was declared to be "at hand"; soon coming; to be watched for from day to day; to be established during the lifetime of that generation. But now, after eighteen hundred years, the reign of a Messiah by truth and love has not come spiritually any more than temporally. Far from "embracing all mankind," it has not embraced even the twelve tribes of Israel; the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is not worshipped throughout the whole earth; the law of love has not been accepted as the supreme law in any nation; the whole Jewish people have not become prophets of the new faith, teaching it through all the world; all kinds of selfishness and cruelty have not been conquered; and wars and fightings have not ceased throughout the earth. Mr. Clarke's book represents Jesus as predicting or promising all these things, and promising them as soon to be expected. How the failure of these wonders to appear in the course of eighteen hundred years can be reconciled with the claim here made for Jesus of true prophetic vision and infallible leadership is not very clear.

Of course, Jesus, being human, was liable to errors of judgment; but so noble was his character, and so great the wisdom and excellence of much of his teaching, that it would be gratifying to find evidence that mistakes so great as some of those ascribed to him in the Gospels were attributable to the writers of those narratives rather than to him. If the Gospels were written by apostles or other eye-witnesses, and especially if the sayings and doings of Jesus were noted down soon after their occurrence, we must admit that Jesus really had confident expectations and made confident announcements, which the lapse of time has proved to be erroneous. If, on the other hand, in the absence of positive proof regarding the authorship and date of the four Gospels, it shall appear quite doubtful whether they were written by any contemporary of Jesus, we may reasonably refer the errors in question to the variations of tradition naturally occurring in its oral transmission from one generation to another, and thus remove the discredit of them from Jesus. C. K. W.

For the Free Religious Index.

"IS MOSES A MYTH?"

I refer the writer of the article under the above caption in the Index of the 2d of June to Bishop Colenso. There may have been at the centre of the nimbus of Mosaic legend a kernel of reality; namely, a person who was rescued in infancy by an Egyptian king's daughter from the waters of the overflowing Nile, on which he had been left afloat among the reeds by his Hebrew mother, to save him from a general massacre of Israel's first-born in Egypt. Such a foundling may have been nurtured in the palace of the oppressor of his race, and secured through his personal beauty and mental brightness adoption into that oppressor's family, and on coming to his majority he may have felt the ties of race stronger than those of adoption, and have become the champion of his enslaved countrymen in Egypt, and finally their leader out of the land of bondage. There is a parallel case in the Anglo-Saxon Norman period of English history; namely, that of the famous Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who in his exaltation turned his back on the Norman king and nobles, whose favorite he had been, siding with the oppressed Saxon race from which he had sprung on his father's side at least, for on his mother's side, according to Thierry, he was of Saracenic blood. It was an alliance brought about by the Crusades.

The traditional author of the Iliad and Odyssey may have been a reality, and roamed with his harp in hand, a glorious tramp, through the old Ægean world, singing for bread. But the better opinion is that Homer was a personification of the epic genius of the old Ionian Greeks, a convenient name rather than an actual blind old minstrel of Scio's rocky isle. The primitive races personified everything and traced everything to personality, the world itself to a personal creator. They invariably merged themselves and their history in some representative person, who was their progenitor, legislator, spokesman, prophet, founder, guide, philosopher, and friend, the incarnation of their racial, tribal characteristics, the specimen brick by which they were willing to be known to all subsequent times, a personal summary of themselves and their peculiar genius, traits, and fortunes.

Digitized by Google

Such eponymous heroes, founders, liberators, and law-givers may have been realities or may not have been. Moses is in the same category with Numa and his Egeria, Epimenides, Lykourgos, et al. They all belong to those crepuscular times of myth and fable, in which objects loom with a gigantesque vagueness. Such objects may be hazy reflections of realities or they may be shadows pure and simple. At any rate, they are highly questionable and debatable. The student of the remote past can take such stock in them as he sees fit. If he has outgrown old-fashioned Orthodoxy, he certainly will feel under no obligation to believe in them as realities Of course, they are full of significance, and are the signs of great events which happened in a far-off time, when man was just beginning to be historic. Mr. Gladstone studies "The Youth of the World" through the eyes of Orthodoxy, and of course believes in the reality of Homer. He goes further, and finds that Apollo and the unmothered goddess Athenè were Homeric versions of the Son or Saviour and of the Holy Spirit. In short, the British Premier is the Dr. Akakia among Homerists. In Germany, his Homeric studies have afforded much innocent and genuine amusement to the leading Hellenists, such as Ernst Curtius and others.

B. W. BALL.

For the Free Religious Index.

RELIGION.

Religion is more important than any other thing which can be named, because it includes so much. As I would define it, it means the aspiration of the human heart after truth and the efforts of the individual toward perfection of character. This aspiration is not limited to a single truth, but to all attainable truth in every department of being; and the effort toward perfection is not limited to perfection in one branch of being, but in every thing in which it is possible to improve. The truly religious person will therefore love and demand the truth, no matter where it leads; and he will also love and strive after a perfect life. He will try to deal justly with others and with himself. He will endeavor to be kind, loving, truthful, and noble, and to build on the foundation of character. He will seek to order his life in a line with law and order and the spirit of progress. True religion is progressive: it casts off all error and superstition, and adopts new truth as soon as it is proved to be truth. As perfection of character requires that the individual should be physically upright, strong, and healthy, as well as morally so, it demands that the laws of health be learned and obeyed as well as the laws of truth, justice, love, and kindness. It places disease of the body on the same immoral basis as moral obliquity, and insists that it is just as much a sin to be sick as it is to lie and steal, the only difference being one of degree, and not of kind. I might enlarge on this view of religion until a whole book was written; but I need say no more, for each one can follow out the idea for himself. Religion needs no relation to a future state of existence, and has an equal value whether there is any everlasting life or not.

M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

FOREIGN.

A CONFLICT is reported to have occurred at Copenhagen between a body of Socialists and the police, many of the latter having been wounded.

THE Queen has transmitted, through the Marquis of Lorne, the expression of her great sorrow for the Victoria disaster, and her deep sympathy for the bereaved.

THE Standard's Paris correspondent telegraphs particulars of a revolutionary meeting held in Lyons. Louise Michel denounced the French Government and the deputies, and, holding up a blood-red wreath of flowers, swore fidelity to the revolution, which she predicted was near at hand, concluding her harangue by exclaiming, "Vive la Commune!"

ON Saturday, May 28, a meeting of upwards three hundred gentlemen met in Glasgow, and had dinner together. Subsequently, they offered to raise any sum of money that Prof. Smith needed. His reply was that he should decline any personal testimonial; but, if they would raise sufficient to endow a Biblical Chair in the Edinburgh or Glasgow University, he would accept the chair.

THE ANTI-JEWISH RIOTS IN RUSSIA.—The trial by court-martial of the ringleaders in the recent anti-Jewish riots in Kieff was concluded at ten o'clock yesterday evening. Proborzewa, the organizer of the disturbances, was sentenced to three and a half years' penal servitude, with loss of civil rights, while three of his most active accomplices were condemned to one and a half year's penal servitude each. Eight of the remaining prisoners were sentenced to two months' imprisonment, and four to three weeks' detention. Seven of the accused were acquitted.—Weekly Despatch, June 5.

ARCHDEACON DENISON, in his visitation at Bridgewater, reminded his hearers that when the proposal to revise the New Testament was made, some ten years ago, he protested against it; and he did so still, not only because it was not wanted, but more particularly because it was unsettling and dangerous, especially at this time. He could find no language to express the intensity of his distress that it was proposed and carried out by the Convocation of Canterbury. At Taunton, the Archdeacon again severely condemned the revision as being dangerous at the present time. He said it tended to foster the prevailing habit of private judgment and private interpretation, which was eating away the life of humble simplicity and childlike faith. The Archdeacon especially dwelt on the fact that the committee had been aided by "a man who did not believe in the Godhead of our Lord and Saviour."

MR. BRADLAUGH AND THE OATH.—On Monday evening, an open-air meeting was held on Clerkenwell Green, "to protest against the unconstitutional expulsion of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, the duly elected member for Northampton, from the House of Commons." Mr. J. C. Patrick presided, and said the House of Commons had acted illegally, and it was for that meeting and for the working-men of England generally to show those men in the House who presumed to dictate as to who should be the representatives of the people and who should not that they had no ground upon which to stand. Mr. J. A. Manson moved a resolution calling upon Government to take the earliest opportunity to pass the Parliamentary Oaths Amendment Bill, so that Mr. Bradlaugh might perform the duties for which the constituency of Northampton had elected him. Mr. S. Brighty seconded, and the resolution was carried with a few dissentients. —Lloyd's Weekly, June 3.

A MR. VARLEY, from Northampton, applied for admission to the London and Dover Convalescent Home, an association maintained by public subscription, of which the honorary superintendent is a Mrs. Rusher. This lady replied, "Not only must I have a medical certificate, but, as the patient is a Northampton man, I must have a written statement that he has not in any way helped Mr. Bradlaugh to get into Parliament. . . . If Mr. Varley can send me a satisfactory medical certificate, and one proving that he has no sympathy with Bradlaugh or his adherents, I could admit him any day next week." Centuries have gone by, but the world is still the same as when the Levite passed by on the other side on seeing the traveller who had been stripped and wounded, and when the Samaritan, without asking for a certificate from doctor or clergyman, attended to his wants. But the woman Rusher is even worse than the Levite. She has been intrusted with the donations of other people, who assuredly would be as disgusted as I am at this instance of want of Christian charity.—Weekly Despatch.

THE Archdeacon of London, Bishop Piers Claughton, delivered his charge on Wednesday morning at St. Sepulchre's Church. He congratulated the clergy on the comparative quiet which prevailed, and attributed it largely to the judicious action of Convocation which deprecated imprisonment as a means of coercing clergy who refused obedience. He urged the clergy, however, to avoid even the appearance of what seemed Romanism. "When infidelity stalked abroad," he said, "it cannot be with too great thankfulness that I remind you of the very noble stand which our own Legislature has made: I do not mean against the admission of a professed atheist, but against his being allowed to profane an oath by taking it with the avowal of unbelief on his tongue. This is an encouragement; but the fact remains that the whole constituency of Northampton, by its majority, has returned such a person to Parliament. It is here that the evil lies. The spirit of unbelief is among us; and we must, laying aside our differences, combine against the common foe, to save alike our country and our Church from the ruin which will infallibly follow in the track of atheism." —Pall Mall Budget, May 29.

LAY MEMORIAL AGAINST ROMISH RITUAL.—The following memorial has been forwarded to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury: "We, the undersigned, lay members of the Church of England, beg leave hereby most respectfully to express to your grace our firm attachment to the doctrines and ceremonial established in the Church of England at the Reformation, and set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. We desire to represent to your grace that, while we are most anxious to maintain such reasonable latitude of opinion and practice as is not inconsistent with the teachings of the Formularies, Articles, and Homilies of the Church of England, taken in their plain, grammatical sense, or with a faithful adherence to the Rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer, as interpreted by the custom of three hundred years, we nevertheless feel ourselves constrained to enter our solemn and emphatic protest against the toleration, within the Church of England, of any doctrines or practices which favor the restoration of the Romish Mass, or any colorable imitation thereof, any reintroduction of the Confessional, or any assumption of sacerdotal pretensions on the part of the clergy in the ministration of the Word and Sacraments." The memorial is signed by upwards of twenty-four thousand Churchmen. The following reply has been received from the Archbishop of Canterbury: "Lambeth Palace, S.W., May 16, 1881. My dear Sir,—I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of the important memorial which awaited my return from the Continent a few days ago, together with your letter commending it to my notice, and to assure you that the subject is receiving my most serious consideration. I am, my dear Sir, yours faithfully, A. C. CANTUAR."
"H. SMITH BOSANQUET, Esq."

THE leading article in the Catholic World for June is by Rev. I. T. Hecker, who makes a very vigorous attack upon those who claim that "Reason and the Catholic Church are irreconcilable." The Protestant dogma of total depravity necessarily denies to man, he says, "his God-like reason and the noble faculty of his free-will, and hence leaves no ground upon which religion, morals, law, or human society can stand." In consequence of this, Protestantism, as a system of religion, "is rapidly losing its hold upon the conviction of intellectual minds, and no longer commands their reverence or even their respect." The Catholic Church has always opposed the doctrine of total depravity, and has been "ever jealous and vigilant over the rights of reason." Further on, "Reason and the Catholic faith are inseparably united, and the Catholic Church appeals with entire trust and unswerving steadfastness to the decisions of reason for her support and defence." We agree with Father Hecker in his strictures upon Protestantism, but can hardly grant his claims for Catholicism.

POETRY.

SAN TERENZO.

[Near the little village of San Terenzo is the house in which Shelley was living before his last cruise in the "Don Juan."]

Mid-April seemed like some November day,
And through the tideless waters, dull as lead,
Our boat, like shadowy barques that bear the dead,
Slipped past the forts that guard the Spezzian bay,
Rounded a point, and San Terenzo lay
Before us, a bright village, yellow and red,
With walls that sheltered Shelley's homeless head,—
His house,—a place deserted, bleak, and gray.
The waves broke on the door-step, fishermen
Cast their long nets, and drew, and cast again;
Through the still woods we wandered silently;
Then suddenly the forest deeps were stirred
By waving wings, and, lo, a great sea-bird
Fled forth, like Shelley's spirit, to the sea!

—Andrew Lang, in Scribner's for May.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 23, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

MORALITY AND THE SCIENCE OF MORALITY.

In the current discussions concerning the foundations of morality and the need of putting ethics on a scientific basis, two things are in some danger of being lost sight of, which it is very important, both for the clearness of the discussion and the value of its results, should be kept in mind.

First, morality is already here in the world, as a part of the world's phenomena; and the discussion is about the philosophical theory of it, not about its existence. The forces and facts of morality have been intertwined with the whole history of man. They have been growing with his growth and strengthening with his strength,—thus developing according to the natural laws of historical evolution,—until there is now a great body of these practical facts and forces, motives, inward impulses, and outward actions, which, in the aggregate, are named morality. The problem put before science is to trace these to their origin; to show their inter-relationships and their relations to other facts in human experience; to study and observe accurately all the facts, and then, by careful comparison and generalization, to press from the facts, if possible, the secret of their creation and the law of their growth and continued existence. But, meantime, the moral facts and forces do not cease to be. Their operations go on, even though science may not discover their secret. The moral law continues to declare its authority and to execute its decrees, without waiting for science to justify its validity. It gets its validity, not from science, but from nature. Science is not to create morality, but to explain it. It is not to create a new foundation for morality, but only to discover the actual foundation for the moral law that exists in the natural history of man, and so be able to declare a new fundamental principle for a new philosophy of morality. And this is all that is properly meant by putting the moral law on a scientific basis and building a new science of morality.

And the need of a scientific explanation and justification of morality, at this special era, arises from the fact that the old theological theory of morality as the supernaturally revealed will of God, is vanishing. So far as morality has been interlinked with religious beliefs and motives, it is, probably, somewhat imperilled when these beliefs and the motives arising from them disappear. Hence, the demand, as the old theologies and their supposed moral sanctions decay, for the scientific method in ethical philosophy to disclose and declare the actual foundations of morality that exist in the nature and experience of man below all the theologies. That the scientific method, applied to morality, will clarify, enlarge, and in many ways strengthen the application of moral principles to conduct, is true. It will not create those principles, but it will increase their scope and power. And thus, in time, it will stimulate morality to a new productiveness, and actually create, we may hope, a new era of moral enthusiasm and effort. Knowledge is one of the elements involved in a complete morality. But the question of applying the scientific method to morals is sometimes so stated as to leave the impression on unthinking minds that morality itself is to be scientifically created; that problems of right or wrong conduct are to wait until science can solve them; that the moral law is to suspend operations until science can justify its validity; which is much the same as if we were to say that the facts and forces that make up the science of astronomy could have no existence until man scientifically discovered the law of their existence; or that the physiological operations of the human body, the circulation of the blood, for instance, must be suspended while the operations are being observed and generalized, and only permitted to go on when the law of their operation is learned. The very first principle in the application of the scientific method to morality is a recognition of the distinction between Morality itself and the Science of morality; that is, a recognition of Morality as the aggregate of certain facts and forces in the natural history of man, and of moral Science as simply the classified knowledge of those facts and forces, and not any mere bundle of assumptions and speculative theories concerning them.

The second point that needs clearly to be kept in mind in the current ethical discussions is that, however important knowledge may be to a complete, broad, and widely related moral conduct, and however absolutely essential it may be to the aggregate development and growth of morality in the human race at large, it is not, to any high degree, a necessary accompaniment of a very quick and true moral sense and a very pure, even relatively perfect, moral practice in individual characters. In inculcating the need of knowledge for the sake of enlarging the field of morality and even for determining what are moral duties in many of the problems of social life, it is necessary to guard against the danger of weakening the present sense of moral obligation by conveying the impression that, where there is little knowledge, there must be great uncertainty as to what acts are duties and what not. As a matter of fact, we know that there are men and women of very humble mental gifts and attainments, who by the exquisite sensitiveness and purity of their moral nature, and their unswerving persistency in virtuous and benevolent ways amid all the temptations and trials that come to their sphere of life, make clearer to us all what is the strength of the moral law and what the substance of moral conduct. It is these characters, quite as much as those in more conspicuous stations and with richer intellectual endowments, who keep alive the seed of morality in human society and transmit it from generation to generation. It is by no means always the scholars who give the best living illustrations of morality, nor always those who best understand the science of morality whom we would take as the best specimens of morality in practice. And this fact of the presence and power of the moral law, sometimes in exceptional strength and beauty, among men and women of very obscure and lowly lot, and the other fact that some of the highest teachers of morality that the world has ever had have been persons of very little general scholarship and little or no comprehension at all of morality as a science,—these facts are a part of those natural phenomena in the history of moral progress which ethical science must explain. We believe that they are strictly explainable by the scientific method. And the scientific ethics may also show in time some of the natural practicable conditions for attaining such moral characteristics. Yet this is not to say that, though the large knowledge does not exist, the sense of moral obligation may not be very vital and the performance of duty very noble and effective. Knowledge may be an efficient aid to morality, but is not its root. Its root lies somewhere in man's sense of an eternal equity. Wherever this root is vital, it produces the materials for moral science; that is, the impulses and actions of practical morality. Wherever this root is dead, no knowledge can be a substitute for it.

THEISM AND PESSIMISM.

It is time that the charge against atheism, as if it must necessarily lead to wickedness, should be put down. I do not think atheism a satisfactory philosophy of life. I do not think theism a satisfactory philosophy of life. I am not covetous of the title of atheist: it is a purely negative and non-descriptive term. But, nevertheless, I wish to point out that pessimistic atheism has been not only consistent with, but favorable to, the production of a certain generous and amiable cast of character among those whose minds it has controlled.

There are two conspicuous examples of pessimism: the one, the religious system of Buddha; the other, the philosophical system of Schopenhauer. Now, in both these systems, the salient feature that strikes us at the very first glance is the prominence which is given to the practice of human sympathy. "The world is full of pain," cries the prophet of pessimism. "Oh, what blackness obscures the face of existence! What a failure this life is!" But because pain is universal, because there is no hope in the future, is that a reason why we should turn from the contemplation of pain, and selfishly seek to secure from the general wreck as much as we can for ourselves? It is true, the selfish egotists may say, "The world is bad: now, therefore, let us make the most of it." But the benevolent natures, on the contrary, may say: "The world is bad, and from his own experience every one can divine how much others can suffer: now, therefore, let us seek to make this bad world as endurable as possible for each other. For we are all in the same ship; we are shipwrecked on the same stormy sea; we are exposed to the same dangers; the same darkness is waiting to whelm us all in everlasting night."

Sympathy was the key-note of Buddha's preaching. Sympathy is also the corner-stone of Schopenhauer's moral philosophy. He commands that we shall check our selfishness, in order that we may not inflict additional pain upon others over and above what is entailed on them by the nature of things. We shall refrain from hurting others, and that will lead to the practice of justice. We shall seek positively to heal the hurts of others, and that will lead to benevolence, the second of the two chief virtues. Yet it is true that there is something beyond the obedience to the sympathetic impulse that Schopenhauer's philosophy demands of us. The world, it says, is wholly evil; its fancied pleasures are all deceptive; its bright hopes a phantasmagoria. Now, therefore, if we would equip ourselves against pain, we must recognize the hollowness of all that attracts us. We must kill desire; we must negate the will that binds us to life; we must gain that state of composure, out of which nothing can disturb us, because of all things desirable we cease to feel the desirableness. In order to this end, Schopenhauer advises that we withdraw ourselves from the things of the world; that we practice abstinence, and, above all, dwell in protracted inward contemplation, so that we may fully realize the truth that all is vanity, and part company, even in thought and wish, from these vanities. He does not, however, permit suicide. And here we perceive the ecstatic element of his thoughts. The will that is present in man and impels him is a part of the great world-will. He who simply ends his terrestrial existence has left the affirmative impulse of the universal will unimpaired. The true duty of man is to make quiescent the will of the world, so far as it has appeared in him, and thus contribute his share to the world's redemption, by causing the fiery stream of existence to be embosomed in the Lethe of oblivion and annihilation.

Digitized by Google

And in like manner the second great system which was atheistic and pessimistic—the system of Buddha—was distinguished by sympathy as its most salient feature. Nor is it an accident that pessimism should impress sympathy upon men as the rule of conduct. For pessimism does not divide between men, signalling some as elect for paradise and others as doomed to damnation; but it gives to all who accept its doctrine the sense of common misfortune. And it is well known that common misfortune draws men's souls together, and makes them cling close one to the other. Never was so tender a gospel of sympathy for human needs preached as the Buddha preached it! He was one of those rare beings who thrill responsive to every sorrow in their neighborhood, and who have the power to touch and move the heart and soften pain. The two classes whom the ancient Hindu treated with special cruelty—women and common laborers—he made the special objects of his mercy. Women he exalted by receiving them into his dear companionship; and with the meanest of slaves he was ready to enter into cordial fellowship, saying, "My law is a law of grace for all men; my law is like the sky which encompasseth all, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the old and the young." Yes, even toward the dumb creation the Buddha was tender and merciful in the extreme. Hospitals not only for sick men and women, but also for sick animals, were erected under the inspiration of his teachings. And, indeed, never have pity and consideration for every kind of suffering been so impressed upon the minds of men as they were by that doctrine of hopeless yet most gentle pessimism, more than two thousand years ago.

If you enter the Roman Catholic cathedral of the city of New York, some afternoon, while the western light is streaming in at the windows, you will see in the stained glass the form of a Christian conqueror at the head of his soldiers, spreading the gospel amid death and slaughter. On the ground are seen the livid face and the starting eyes of a heathen who seeks to ward off a spear which a Christian soldier is running into his breast. The dead and the wounded lie around. The forms of holy Evangelists are seen sailing in a cloud over the Christian army and encouraging them in this sacred work. If you enter the same cathedral in a morning hour, you will see in an eastern window, through which the rising light is streaming, the form of St. Bernard in his white robe, holding high the cross, preaching the crusade against the infidels, with warriors round about him, who dedicate their arms to the great slaughter which he recommends. Thus, morning and evening, as the sun rises and sets over the city, it illustrates in burning colors the lesson which all the inhabitants who have observant eyes may read,—the lesson of the dreadful means, wounds and bloodshed, by which the religion of love has sought to secure its supremacy over the nations.

Not so in the religion of the Buddha. No pictures of slaughter and of crusades there, no records of persecution disgrace its annals, no glorification of war by its priests and teachers.

It has been said that Buddhism, like every system of pessimism, whenever its full conclusions are drawn, becomes destructive of human happiness. Undoubtedly, that is true. Pessimism, consistently followed out, puts a stop to the business of life. But I quote Jesus' words, and say, "Let those who are free from sin throw the first stone." What would become of the world, if the principles which are at the bottom of the prevailing theology were followed out to their full conclusion? What is the salvation of the world to-day, if not this,—that the believers are better than their beliefs, and that they do not consistently apply the principles of their creeds? Well, then, allow the unbeliever the same privilege of being partly inconsistent; make an allowance for the atheist in the same way as the atheist must make an allowance for the great majority of his opponents, who are theists. And let us not, because a theory when viewed in the abstract asserts its weaknesses and moral perils, imply that the character of those who hold the theory is weaker than ours or more imperilled. Happily, men never act solely according to their theories. It were ill for the world if the pessimist acted out his theories: happily, he does not. It were ill for the world, perhaps, if you, as a theist, acted out your theories: thank your God that you do not.

As for pessimism itself, I do not defend it. It is plain that the hopeful view of existence is necessary for us human beings. And, even though we cannot mathematically demonstrate that the world is good, the common-sense of mankind will always deny the theory that it is bad. Beyond the instinctive judgment of the common-sense, however, rises the moral argument, and gives us a grander and deeper assurance that the tendency of things is toward the best. This much, however, must be claimed in favor of pessimism: that the quality of sympathy has been astonishingly intensified among those who hold the doctrine, and that, beyond all dispute, the gentlest and kindest of all religious systems that has yet existed has been the pessimistic one. As regards the effect on character, the conscience of the modern world will declare itself satisfied neither with what atheism has achieved nor, be it distinctly understood, with what theism has achieved.

FELIX ADLER.

IT seems that we are to have "The American Version" of the New Testament, in which the readings of the American Committee not accepted by the English revisers are to be incorporated into the text. Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock, President of the Union Theological Seminary of New York, has done the work, which will be published by Fords, Howard & Hurlbert, in form corresponding with the Oxford long primer octavo of the authorized English edition. In the English edition, these American amendments are printed as an appendix; and the American revisers bound themselves to give their "moral support" to the edition issued by the English university presses, and not to publish a rival edition for at least fourteen years. But, having no copyright, they could not bind anybody but themselves. Hence, an American Revised New Testament is to come at once, to present its claims for the place of authoritative standard. Perhaps patriotism will decide that the American revision is the infallible book this side of the Atlantic.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE Southern Workman is a large, twelve-page monthly, published at Hampton, Va., and edited and managed by the officers of the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute. It is thus specially the organ of that excellent institution for the benefit of the colored race, and is helping forward its noble work of educating and civilizing the negro population in the South. The June number is largely devoted to the recent anniversary exercises of the Institute and the annual reports of its responsible officers. From the report of General Armstrong, the able and devoted principal of the school, we quote the following extract, as indicating both the need and the encouragement for such work: —

The educator of the American negro is, I think, dealing with the most responsive and satisfactory student material to be found among the less-favored races of this or of any land.

When and where have manumitted slaves, or any men in like low conditions, in half a generation produced and accumulated property, as they have; or been so law abiding, or sought and secured so earnestly and successfully the ideas of civilization? There never has been such a harvest from spelling-books as from those scattered since 1863 through the South.

The greatest difficulty with the negro is deficiency in moral strength. He has enough physical stamina, as the increase of population and of property shows; and brains enough. No school for freedmen ever found serious difficulty at this point. Morally, the race must confess to weakness. This is worse than ignorance. Inherited tendencies are like mill-stones about their necks, dragging them down.

Our graduates, who are usually keen, disinterested observers, give varying accounts of the condition of the colored people in this and the four neighboring States. There are negro communities, moved by a common impulse to better things, and others, where morality seems to have utterly broken down; where a teacher of their race must run a gauntlet of temptations, and character is tested in a way unknown where decency prevails; where religious leaders cannot rebuke gross misconduct in their church members, and one who raises a voice in behalf of good conduct is denounced. Education is not appreciated; for the people say that they themselves have got along without it, and their children can. Their children are practically slaves till of age, and fare far worse than under the old régime. Appeals have come to us to take the one or two worthy young men and women who were left in such places, that they might not go down with the rest, but be educated, and return as their teachers.

Even among the better class, who are making the most of their opportunities, inclined to education, thrift, and temperance, yet ignorant, a fall from virtue is not deeply felt on moral grounds. But those who never rose never fall.

It is to be regretted that the terms usually applied to such people have a needless reproach or sting, as the words "despised," "degraded." It would be better if the idea of being behind, implying lack of opportunities, rather than below, implying a fall, could be conveyed in our descriptive phrases: this would not wound their self-respect.

The negro and the Indian are low, but not degraded. They are not a moral ruin, like reprobates from a high civilization, whose fall is as into a bottomless pit. The reprobate who lives on their plane is far lower than they. He is demoralized, they are not. They are not conscious of being debauched, he is.

The surprise of our work for both races is the growth of character. Colored youths who have lived in society not recognized as respectable, with all that heredity can do to push them down, soon show a moral sense and a self-respect that, with three years' growth, has been well sustained in after life. In ten years, not six per cent. of our girl graduates have gone astray. I think we may hope for good results from our Indians, when they shall return.

Incessant and well-directed action of both physical and mental energies and systematic living are, on the human side, paramount to the development of moral strength in the lower races, as they are the basis of all stability of character.

Digitized by Google

I have increasing faith in the power of right surrounding influence and wise training to build up character. While selected individuals with special opportunities may make rapid progress, the main line of people must move slowly. Patience is quite as important as hope, in dealing with our race problem.

No one will, I think, deny that the colored race has made more relative progress, from ignorance to education, from poverty to prosperity, from their starting-point in 1863, than the white race, during that time.

The statistics of the Indian Department show that the red man had gained greatly as a producer in ten years.

The rate of progress rather than results is the main thing.

Vacation School.

A chance for children who have pleasant vacations to give poor children the same.

The Associated Charities of Boston have issued the following bulletin, which may also be suggestive for other places besides Boston :—

The Committee of Ward 7 have received for the children at the North End a gift of about fifty-five dollars, raised and presented by some children in Brookline. This money has been put in the hands of an independent committee, to be spent in a vacation school, where the children who have nowhere else to go for a vacation can come and be comfortable, busy, and happy from 9 to 12 every morning during July and August; where they can sing and play games, read books, learn how to sew, knit, make fish-nets, work with wood splints in making frames, or draw and write on slates; where kind ladies and gentlemen will try to do all they can to make the time pass pleasantly.

A sea captain has offered to teach the children how to make sailor knots in ropes, how to drive nails; and indeed, being able to do everything, as all sea captains are, he will know how to make it lively for the boys and girls. Others will help in various ways. The children will be told never to lose a chance to go to the country; but, as there will be many who never get a chance to go, we want to try to give them some real enjoyment at home, and also relieve their mothers of all anxiety and care of them for half of every day at least. Except in the music in which all would join, liberty will be allowed the children to choose (under the guiding influence of those in charge) taking up any of the amusements or work going on, just as they would if they were visiting relations in the country.

The children of Brookline having given the Committee the aforesaid money, if some well-to-do children of Boston will send one hundred dollars more to the Committee, they can arrange a delightful summer session for the less favored ones at the North End. They would also like to receive games and toys, books and magazines, pictures, cloth (for the sewing), nails and hammers, twine and wrapping paper, slates and slate-pencils, pieces of rope, and anything that boys and girls would find a use for in the sort of school they want to have.

Gifts of either money or articles can be sent to the care of Mrs. James Lodge, Room 48, Charity Building, Chardon Street, marked "For Vacation School," any day before the 25th of June.

Signed by Committee on Vacation School.

Miss A. C. Candler.
Miss S. M. Simmons.
Mrs. James Lodge.
Mr. W. R. Holm.
Mr. R. H. Dana, Jr.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

New Orleans, May 30, 1881.

On the 19th inst., the Supreme Court of Louisiana, through Justice Poche, rendered a decision in the suit of the State v. Mrs. Susan Baum, on appeal from the District Court, parish of East Baton Rouge. This was a prosecution in the name of the State, by indictment, for a violation of an ordinance of the police jury of East Baton Rouge, prohibiting the opening on Sundays of places of business for the sale, barter, or exchange of intoxicating liquors and all kinds of merchandise. The decision declares Act No. 84 of 1878, empowering police juries to enact Sunday laws, unconstitutional, annuls the judgment of the lower court, quashes the indictment, and discharges defendant at plaintiff's cost. The law was defective in title, and is an attempted transfer, by the General Assembly, of powers vested in it to the police juries of the State to be used in the name of the State, which has no general Sunday law. Both these objections were fatal to its validity. Relative to the failure to incorporate in the title of the law the pledge of the State to its enforcement, the court says:—

In our researches and study on this question, we were mainly guided by a wise and salutary principle, universally recognized: that laws in derogation of common right must be strictly construed, and cannot be extended beyond their clear and precise import. Of this character are, in our opinion, all laws seeking to restrain persons in their inherent and constitutional right to pursue on any day avocations or trades which are not wrong in themselves, or not forbidden on other days; and of that class we consider all laws tending in the least in their import to infringe upon the salutary doctrine of the complete separation of Church and State, a doctrine which has dictated the brightest page of American history, and has always been the distinguishing feature of American freedom.

This admirable epitome of sound Americanism was unexpected by either friends or opponents of Sunday ordinances, and shocks them with paralysis. If the friends of sound morals, who allowed their energies to be misdirected by the clergy, will now rally to the support of a general temperance law, they will have no reason to regret this decision of the Supreme Court. Keep on the statutes the Sunday ordinance law, and there would be differing legislation in every one of the fifty parishes, or none at all, as an oft-changing numerical majority at the polls might dictate. Pass a wise temperance law, and it would have fewer chances of repeal, be uniform in its operation, and have no dependence on a class of special religionists for its support.

E. B.

FROM A STROLLING CONTRIBUTOR.

By Wave and Rail.

Dear Index :—

If you should grow weary of heading the hope of Free Religion, and should wonder in which direction to turn for repose or where you might find comfort in the shade, go down to the end of Commercial Wharf and take the steamer for St. John. By the time you have ranged out by the Cunard steamer and got fairly under headway down by Governor's Island, and turn your back to the east to get a last look at Boston, as you glide by Nick's Mate, and feel yourself expand, body and soul, with the broader freedom of place, you will already realize that there is no place like the sea to rock tired limbs and rest a weary brain. If the day should be fine, and you must take no other, you will enjoy the panoramic view of the North Shore as far as Rockport; and from there to Portland you will catch glimpses of headlands and islands along the shore, while here and there, away in the background of sky, you will see the silent mountains. The passage into Portland Harbor gives you a very fine view of the hill-side city; and as you steam out and away again to the eastward, with the tide at high water, you pass, by "inland passage," through the hundred islands that cluster in the eastern confines of the harbor.

Up from the lessening horizon, night rises with its invisible shadings of darkness, until the shores have disappeared, the beacon lights gleam out here and there with their voiceless warnings of hidden danger, and the stars have opened their eyes. Now, you are alone with the sea and the night. The line of white foam, stretching out into the darkness astern from the pounding wheels, becomes the line of life; and you think of the hopes, aspirations, and efforts you have made or attempted, and seem floating away into the past. Success, defeat, joys, sorrows, and disappointments pass in review; and the great wide sea becomes a picture of life, in which all things melt away into trackless level.

A good long night's rest, and you come on deck to find yourself in a strange country. In Eastport, you see two nations side by side, both unlike what you left at home. They seem to be struggling to throw off the weight of heavy eyelids, and to force themselves into the current of nervous life that characterizes the people to the west of them; and, by slow degrees, I suppose they are succeeding. Within a few years, they have waked to the fact that they have just as good "little fishes" as can be found in the Mediterranean; and, when they are "biled in ile," they make sardines that are in every way equal to those that are brought across the ocean. This new business is growing rapidly, and promises to become an important trade.

After an hour's delay in Eastport, we steamed away for St. John. We were in the famous "Bay of Fundy," as wonderful for mighty tides as the "Bay of Biscay" is for wild seas. As we glide out of harbor into bay, a dense fog settles down over all; and the whistle begins its warning scream, answered back from the shore. About half-way to St. John is a long, low point of land, called Point Le Preaux. From this point, far out into the bay, the water is shallow; and the swift current rushing over this ridge in the bottom makes what sailors call "the rip." I saw this "rip" several times when I was a boy, and remembered it so well that, the other day, when we were running in that dense fog and passengers were wondering where we were, I happened to catch a glimpse of this "rip," and said, "We are off Le Preaux, and will hear the fog-whistle inside of a minute." We all waited; and sure enough, in about fifty seconds, away on the larboard beam, we heard the hoarse note of the old steam-horn.

St. John was once one of the most busy and prosperous cities in British America. It has built many of the finest ships that have sailed the seas. Its importance as a lumber mart was second to none in the world. But its day of glory has departed. The lumber interest has dwindled, the ship-yards are empty, the city is in the sleep of old age. The terrible fire of 1877 was almost the utter destruction of the city; and the many ruins you pass, in a limited ramble through the streets, show that very much yet remains to be done before St. John will stand as well as it did before the fire. Yet, while trade is not so brisk as in years gone, there is still as much fine shipping to be seen at the wharves in St. John as in any city of its size on the continent. The view of the harbor and the shipping, in stream and dock, from the high ground of Prince William Street, as you pass from the steamer at Reed's Point up through the city, is exceedingly fine, far superior to anything you can see in either Boston or New York,—not that there is not vastly more to be seen in either of those places, but because the elevation of the street gives you so much finer a point of view than anything you can get on the level of the docks at home.

I inquired of the landlord what time the Halifax express left St. John in the evening. About ten o'clock, he said. I eat my supper, and sat down to read. Happening to see the time-table, I glanced along it for my train, and found that the time had been changed to 7.30. I looked at the clock. It was 7.15. I jumped for my hat and started. On the street, not a vehicle of any sort was to be seen, and I had nearly a mile to go. When I had gone about half the distance, an old fellow, with an old horse and an old carryall, tiptoed out of an alley, and wanted to know if I was going to the station. "Yes, can you get me there in five minutes?" "Yes, sir, git in." I was in by the time he had said it, and was continually reminding him that he had just so many minutes. He had a very short whip which he flourished over the steed without making the slightest difference in the world in that noble animal's locomotion. I was growing slightly restless, when the Jehu turned and began to question me if I had come in the steamer, where I was going, my business, etc. I exploded a little, and told him to stop and let me out, as I could go faster on foot. "Oh! I'll git there." "Very well, then, wake up. If you don't get me there in time for the train, you won't get a cent." It was amusing to see how the horse understood me. He went away like a racer; and, as he drew up at the station, I ran and leaped upon the train as it was pulling out. We ran to Monckton, about seventy miles from St. John; and there the conductor informed me that we had to wait five hours and a half. The station was locked; and, presently, they locked both doors of the car I was in. And there we waited, with snoring men and squalling babies all around, from 11 at night until 4.30 next morning. I wished the old horse had failed to get me to that station in time. This is an imposition upon the public that I protest against. The railroad is run by the government, which advertises a "Halifax Express" that keeps you locked in a car waiting five hours and a half in the night for some other train to come along and take you up! As you might suppose, there is very little Free Religion in this country.

Charles Ellis.

Digitized by Google

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE. By James Parton. In 2 vols. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.; the Riverside Press, Cambridge. 1881.

We could have wished that Carlyle had given us, by way of study of the eighteenth century, a Life of Voltaire instead of his Life of Frederic the Great of Prussia. It would have been a less laborious job than "the valley of the shadow of Frederic," as his wife used to call his great historical biography of the Prussian monarch, while he was engaged in the long and tedious task of writing it. Carlyle's essay on Voltaire shows that a complete biography of the great French iconoclast of the eighteenth century from his pen would have been replete with his grim fun and humor at its best, and would have fairly thrown Don Quixote and Pickwick into the shade in the matter of provoking mirth and laughter, to conjecture nothing about the serious features of such a production. All readers of Carlyle's essays will remember the ludicrous description in that upon Voltaire of the frequent journeyings of the lean and much-enduring poet and philosopher with his scientific lady-love, Madame du Chatelatini, in the coach of the period, and of the occasional mishap of a broken axle, which would result in the overturn of the huge vehicle, burying Voltaire under a mountain of bandboxes, shrieking maid-servants, and other lumber, which the beloved object always took along with her on her excursions. Then, again, in Macaulay's essay on Campbell's Life and Times of Frederic the Great there is such a vivid glimpse of Voltaire at the court of Frederic in Berlin and Potsdam as to make us wish that Macaulay had written a life of the great French philosopher, encyclopedist, epigrammatist, dramatist, epic poet, stock-jobber, biographer, historian, stock-raiser, agriculturist, shipowner, city-builder, manufacturer of watches, vindicator of outraged humanity against the Inquisition, and audacious assailant of the old, rotten Church-and-State system of feudal Europe, commonly known as the old régime. In his Life of Franklin, Mr. Parton was brought in contact with Voltaire, and, while writing that, formed doubtless the resolution of writing this Life of Voltaire. There was, up to the time of the appearance of this his latest biographical effort, no greater desideratum in English or American literature than just such a work as he has written. There were essays enough on Voltaire, such as those of Carlyle and Morley, for instance, theories of him and of the significance of his genius and career, but there was no thorough-going, circumstantial biography by a perfectly competent hand like Mr. Parton.

To most people, even intelligent people, Voltaire has been and is a mere name, a vague sort of personality, the theme of puerile pulpit denunciation and declamation, looming like a Harz spectre on the fog of the past, a wicked and ungodly wit, an anti-Christ raining down vitriolic showers of ridicule on the most sacred beliefs, documents, and institutions, in a spirit of pure diabolic malignity and impish glee, who finally died the remorseful death of the wicked sinner that he was, suffering such death-bed horrors as gave him a lively foretaste of the infernal pit into which his unregenerate and unshriven soul was about to be plunged. Such was the whilom Voltaire of the pulpit and Sunday-school book, the pious myth and fiction of the vindictive theological imagination. At last, we have all the facts in the great eighteenth-century Frenchman's life put into organic shape by a master of biographic writing, so that he who runs and reads with Mr. Parton's two volumes in his hands can become acquainted with the real and veritable Voltaire, as he lived and wrote in all his unparalleled activity of mind and body both; can become acquainted with all the strange incidents, haps and hazards, joys and sorrows, triumphs and humiliations of his long life, which extended from the reign of the Grand Monarch, Louis XIV., to that of the ill-starred Louis XVI., who expiated the sins of his dynasty under the guillotine.

The youthful student of history will find Voltaire's Life, as written by Mr. Parton, the vestibule as it were of the French Revolution, the fitting prelude and introduction to it. Above all, he will learn the full significance of the current phrase "The Revolution," which is so often on the pens and lips of the friends and foes both of freedom and freethought, of Ultramontanes and Liberals. He will learn furthermore from it that Voltaire was thoroughly human in his quick, irrepressible sympathies and beneficent and unwearied activity, and not in the least degree the demon or fiend which both the Roman Catholic and Protestant pulpits used to represent him to have been, thus being unanimous and at accord in their absurd attacks on the greatest wit of the eighteenth century, while foes to the knife, with the knife to the hilt, in all else. It is high time that Voltaire was vindicated and made intelligible to the mass of readers, and that the world at large knew him, as thinkers and scholars have long known him, in his real significance as a great and beneficent historic factor. To understand him thoroughly, all that is now necessary to do is to procure the two volumes of Mr. Parton's Life of him and read them. The perusal will not be task-work, but a delightful recreation and illumination of the mind, as exhilarating as and infinitely more profitable than the perusal of one of the novels of the period by the inimitable and illustrious Mr. This or That. The reader of Mr. Parton's Life of Voltaire will find himself away back in the Latin Europe of the beginning of the eighteenth century, in the France of the old régime, when kings were kings in deed as well as in name, ruling by the grace of the old ecclesiastical God of history and tradition, who was then in full vigor "in the heavens," and portrayed by the Jesuits as a venerable old gentleman with a long white beard sitting up aloft, with the Son and the Virgin Mary at his elbow, and Ignatius Loyola and St. Francis Xavier, the founder and first apostle of their order, for his right-hand men and counsellors. Thus, the Jesuits in the early part of the eighteenth century not only bore sway on earth, but in the heavens also. They not only moulded the poor old superstitious dotard, Louis XIV., and the dastardly and incestuous Louis the Well-beloved of "the Park of Does" to their purposes like wax, but the founders of their order were represented as being equally influential in the celestial court above. Outside of Great Britain, where it was not healthy for them to show their faces, the Jesuits in the early part of the eighteenth century seemed to be omnipresent and omnipotent; that is, just before their suppression by Pope Ganganelli. Voltaire was educated by the Jesuits at their college of Louis le Grand, where he learned under their instruction "Latin and nonsense," branches which they still continue to teach, and where he exhibited a precocious facility at writing epigrams and verses, a facility which he retained almost to his latest breath. Voltaire, like Frederic the Great, always had a kindness for Jesuits, although he was the implacable enemy of papal Christianity, which was in his time, as it is now, "run" by the disciples of Loyola.

In their day of exile and expulsion from Portugal, Spain, France, and Italy, when their order was suppressed by papal decree, Voltaire and King Frederic both always harbored members of the homeless order. Thus, they showed themselves to be magnanimous foemen. Voltaire, outside of literary rivalries and jealousies, was through all his life one of the kindliest of men. He loved money, and knew how "to make it," poet and philosopher though he was, but to the victims of poverty, outrage, and persecution his purse and heart were always open. He was in fact the greatest Christian of his time, not in the ecclesiastical, but the primitive sense of the word. Christ himself would have hailed him as a brother, had they lived contemporaneously. Here at least we are on firm ground, so far as Voltaire's character is concerned. He was always kind and charitable to the poor and oppressed of all creeds and nationalities; and it was a beautiful trait in him that he was fond of giving young men a start in the world, both with his purse, encouragement, and powerful influence. That fact stands out in bold relief in his life. It is the great, salient, moral fact about Voltaire, which Mr. Parton brings out in all its beauty and amiableness. Voltaire, as man of wealth, if he had never written a line of prose or poetry, but had been simply the beneficent man and large-hearted friend of the poor and oppressed that he was all his life through, would be entitled to a niche in any temple anywhere dedicated to the friends and benefactors of their kind. That fact being settled once and forever, farther wholesale denunciation of Voltaire in his character of impugner of the old-fashioned alliance of Church and State, which kept Europe for ages, or the masses of its people, in utter poverty and superstitious, brutal ignorance, the mere footstools of priests and kings, and the convenient objects of their lusts and cruelties,—farther wholesale denunciation, I say, of Voltaire under that head, by the pulpit, will be more and more futile, and only recoil on those who are foolish enough to indulge in it. Voltaire as a man is thus fully and sufficiently vindicated by a mere statement of the facts of his life. Carlyle calls him, in his character of philosopher, poet, and literary man, a persifleur, a sort of wanton wit, exulting in the havoc which he makes with his pen for the havoc's sake, as if he did not cordially hate the shams and abominations of his age, but was rather delighted with his power to carry dismay to their upholders, and with the exercise of that power, than with any social amelioration which might be the fruit of its exercise. As if a man could spend a long and consistent life from youth to extreme age, incurring all sorts of peril in one engrossing aim and pursuit, namely, the overthrow of arbitrary power both civil and ecclesiastical, in a spirit of mere wantonness and persiflage! This theory of Voltaire is preposterous on the face of it. Voltaire had all the volatility and volubility and grimace of his countrymen. He was, in a word, the typical Frenchman not only of his own, but of all time. There is a seeming air of frivolity and insincerity, perhaps, about his writings, but it was adopted in part as a cover and disguise, to throw the masters of Bastiles and great armies off his trail. Carlyle, in Voltaire's environment, would have had to resort to the same artifice for safety. At bottom, Voltaire was in the veriest earnest in his warfare against the infamous Church-and-State system of the old régime, against that infamous alliance of the priest and king of the old order, whereby they held the souls and bodies of men in perfect thraldom. Martin Luther was not more in earnest, not a greater soldier in the war of liberation of humanity.

In fact, Voltaire was a French Martin Luther, the Luther of Latin Europe, which to its ultimate sorrow rejected the great reformer of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and by way of penalty has been suffering all sorts of bloody revolutions and humiliations up almost to the present hour. The French Republic of to-day is the final outcome of Voltaire's gospel of freethought and toleration, which he learned in the England of Locke and Newton, where fortunately, in his early manhood, he was an exile, after a dose of Bastile administered by his paternal government. It was fortunate for Voltaire that for a brief period of two years he breathed the oxygen of British liberty, with its outspoken freedom of thought. He returned from England to the Continent with a knowledge of English, and so thoroughly Anglo-Saxonized in mind that his great purpose ever after was to deliver France from the sway of a Jesuit-and-harlot-ridden monarchy, and establish in its place a constitutional government, such as the English people had finally established under William of Orange and Mary, after a century of revolutionary agony. Such a consummation was not vouchsafed to Voltaire in the lifetime of his mortal body; but his soul after his death kept marching on like John Brown's since, until finally in this current year, 1881, it beholds a French Republic of ten years' standing, whose archetypal idea existed in its own depths more than a century ago. Says Mr. Parton, "The Life of Voltaire since his Death could be an interesting and important book, if the time for it had come." Such a post mortem life is written already in the great events and consummations of the last quarter of a century, in the unification of Italy and the depression of the Pope to a mere high-priest and Italian subject, in the republicanization of France, in the destruction of slavery in this country, in the secularization of education in France, and the substitution of science, political economy, and a sound, rational literature for "Latin and nonsense." The spirit of Voltaire still lives and visibly works in and subdues to its purpose the grand world-remoulding events of our own immediate time. I say, in reading Voltaire's multitudinous works, his Biographical Dictionary, Zadig, Candide, Life of Charles XII., Henriade, etc., and recalling the magical influence and excitement which their publication created in the Europe of his day, his versatile genius reminds us of the Ariel of Shakspeare's "Tempest." It kept all Europe literally ablaze for half a century with its scintillations and coruscations, and was at the same time so volatile that it successfully eluded for the most part the talons of offended power, while riddling it with its shafts, which the archer kept constantly hissing about its ears, whether he was in flight or concealment. During a large part of the eighteenth century, Voltaire literally, in the language of Shakspeare's "Tempest,"

Digitized by Google

"Flamed amazement; sometimes he'd divide
And burn in many places; on the topmast,
The yards and bowsprit would he flame distinctly;
Then meet and join. Jove's lightnings, the precursors of the dreadful thunder-claps, more momentary
And sight-outrunning were not,"

than Voltaire's terrible wit and irony, in their ceaseless play on the old rotten order of things on the Europe of his day. So far, by way of general remark and observation on the renowned theme of Mr. Parton's latest biography. We only wish there were space enough to give to the readers of the Index a faithful summary of it, with occasional tastes or sips of the vintage of Voltaire's wit, both in prose and verse, with which Mr. Parton has wisely and copiously seasoned his narrative. But this may not be. There is not room for thus compressing two volumes, each containing between six or seven hundred pages.

Of course, everybody knows by this time that Voltaire's real family name was Arouet. On his father's side, he came of a race of tanners and drapers of Poitou, who were prosperous, thrifty people only. On his mother's side, he was of the noblesse. There never had been a literary Arouet until Voltaire appeared. Thus, his appearance was unaccountable. He was a case of resplendent genius turning up in a respectable, prosaic family of bourgeois, a word which is the synonyme of intellectual dulness. In the twenty-fourth year of his age, he assumed the name of Voltaire. He was an eagle hatched in the nest of a dunghill fowl. Previously to his assumption of the above name, at school and elsewhere, he had been known as "little Arouet," the epigrammatist; for he was of diminutive stature, and in his babyhood so frail that his parents did not expect to raise him. But he lived; and, though in ill-health and "dying" all his life, according to his constant assertion, he lived to become the greatest "paper-smudger," to borrow a phrase of his own, and "literary fellow" of all the ages thus far evolved. He was never a Bohemian, but a man of inherited wealth, to which he was constantly adding by his writings and enterprise and thrift; thus reminding us of Shakspeare, whom he, unfortunately for himself, thought a barbarian, with occasional immense things in his plays, single scenes of which would outweigh the whole Voltairian drama. Great as Voltaire was in wit, he flew in the lower regions of the air as a poet, while Shakspeare soared in the empyrean. His immediate household and numerous beneficiaries—such as his adopted daughter, Bonne-et-Belle, afterward Madame Vellette, and his secretary, Wagnière, a Swiss—cherished his memory after his death with idolatrous tenderness and effusion. The former, all through her subsequent bereaved life, used to burn a grain of incense daily before his bust. Such was Voltaire in the hearts of his surviving dependants and family, after he had ceased to live. He was in one word what the Greeks denominated "a demonic man," like Socrates. The closing chapters of Mr. Parton's Life cannot be read without profound emotion, such as one feels when first reading of the death of Socrates and Christ and other great lifters of the human race from "the Slough of Despond" through the ages. I quote the opening sentence of Mr. Parton's Life of him: "At that time [Nov. 21, 1694, the date of Voltaire's birth in Paris], Louis XIV. had been for fifty-one years styled King of France and had twenty-one years to live. William and Mary reigned in England. Prussia was a dukedom. Charles XII. of Sweden was a good and studious boy of twelve under his father's tutelage; and Peter I. of Russia, twelve years Czar, had not begun to build the present capital of the Russian Empire. The great Newton, still in the prime of his years, had done the immortal part of his work, and was about to become Master of the Mint. Racine lived, the first name in the literature of the Continent. Dryden, the head of English literature, was translating Virgil. Pope was six years of age. Such was the old Europe into which Voltaire, or rather François Marie Arouet, was born."

MANY a Christian minister needs to be sent back to him whom we call the heathen Socrates, to read these noble words in the Phædo, which whole dialogue is itself no unworthy pattern of the best qualities of preaching: "You, if you take my advice, will think little about Socrates, but a great deal about Truth."—Phillips Brooks.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S death is imminent. She cannot recognize her nearest friends.

ALBERT STICKNEY, a well-known lawyer of New York, shows in Scribner's for July how to smash the "machine."

PROFESSOR ALPHEUS HYATT, of Boston, and a party of students, are off for a scientific cruise to Cape Sable and the Bay of Fundy, in the yacht "Arethusa."

THE REV. EDWARD EVERETT HALE says that the revision of the Bible "will end forever the idolatry of a book which has been a dead weight on Protestantism for three centuries."

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & Co. have published a book on The Philosophy of Carlyle, by Edwin D. Mead, which attempts a full and careful survey of Carlyle's place as a thinker and writer.

THE President has appointed Miss M. M. Gillette, late of Wisconsin, a notary public in the District of Columbia. Miss Gillette has been engaged in the study of the law for some time, and is proficient.

SENSATIONALISM does not always pay. Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, who was advertised to lecture at Rochester, N.Y., one night last week, declined to appear, there being only one hundred persons present.

THE First Parish (Unitarian) of Cambridge has unanimously voted to extend a call to the Rev. Brooke Herford, of the Church of the Messiah, Chicago, at a salary of $5,000 per annum. It is thought he will accept. At the same time, Rev. Dr. Mackenzie (orthodox), of Cambridge, has been called to a society in Chicago. And it is thought he will not accept.

JEFF DAVIS' book is severely criticised by some southern newspapers. The Richmond (Va.) State says: "His chronological arrangement is faulty to extreme degree, and as a history the work is a failure. The English used is also faulty, and very faulty; the style is bad; and the spirit of the whole work is personal, not impartial, and in the nature of a special pleading instead of a judicial record."

REV. A. D. MAYO, formerly of Springfield, after considerable travel through Louisiana, writes that "within five years the progressive white men of all parties will unite with the colored voters to rescue the State and city from the clique of imbecile political implacables that now controls it, and establish a government under which free labor, free suffrage, and the free school will be defended against all their foes."

REV. W. H. SPENCER has received a unanimous call from the Free Religious Society of Florence (Northampton) to become their resident speaker. He will speak there again on next Sunday, and the question of his going there will probably be settled at that time. It is reported that he will accept the call. The society is strong and flourishing, including many prominent business men of the village, and offers many advantages.—Haverhill Gazette, June 15.

FEW writers have given more pleasure to their readers than the humorous poet John G. Saxe. But Mr. Saxe is himself a man of sorrow. Within the past year, he has lost his wife, mother, two daughters, and a favorite daughter-in-law. He has never recovered from injuries received in a railroad accident of six years ago, and persistent ill-health and family losses have resulted in a melancholy which seldom lightens. He has decided to break up his Brooklyn home, and to pass with a son, in Albany, the remainder of his days.

THE late M. Littré, who was for many years one of the most eminent exponents of the positive philosophy, was baptized as a member of the Roman Catholic Church a few moments before his death. Whether this was done by his own wish or was done for him by superstitious friends who could not bear to see him die without that chance of "salvation," we have not seen stated. A year ago, M. Littré published a profession of his faith, in which he said: "Some pious souls have troubled themselves about my inmost feelings. It has seemed to them that, not being an absolute contemner of Christianity, and heartily acknowledging that it possessed grandeur and conferred blessings, there were chords in my heart that it might touch. It was a beginning of faith, they thought, to entertain neither hostility nor contempt for a faith which has reigned for many centuries over continents, and which even now is the consolation of some of the faithful. I have questioned myself in vain. It is impossible for me to accept the conception of the world which Catholicism imposes upon its true believers; but I feel no regret at being outside of these creeds, and I can feel within me no desire to enter within their pale."

JESTINGS.

A TEXAS man was stung by a hornet twenty years ago, and the same instant struck dumb. A few days ago, his speech was restored, and his first words were oaths. Texas men must have good memories.

CARLYLE, being once asked the difference between a natural fool and an educated fool, replied, "Just about the difference between you and me, I suspect." The questioner was never able to determine which kind of a fool he was.

PROBABLY the meanest man on record keeps a boarding-house in San Domingo. Last winter, an earthquake turned the edifice clear upside down, and the very next morning he began charging the garret lodgers first-floor prices.—San Francisco Post.

"HOW DO you like the character of St. Paul?" asked a parson of his landlady one day, during a conversation about the old saints and the apostles. "Ah! he was a good, clever old soul, I know," replied the landlady; "for he once said, you know, that we must eat what is set before us, and ask no questions for conscience' sake. I always thought I should like him for a boarder."

COLERIDGE was a very awkward and ungainly man physically, but intellectually he was a match for the best. When trudging along a country road, he was met by a wag, who thought to have some sport. "I say, man," he cried out, "did you meet a tailor on your way?" Coleridge looked up and mildly said, "Yes, and he told me that a little further on I should see his goose."

THERE are several Turkish youths studying in Paris at present. At a recent examination, a professor, wanting to make matters easy for one of the young fellows, asked, "Can you mention some of the Greek authors?" No answer. "For instance, you must know something about Homer?" "Oh, yes!" answered the student. "Omar Pasha! Everybody knows about him."

BROWN: "How uncommonly well the Tories have treated Bradlaugh!" Jones: "Eh! what? treated him well? They don't allow him to go into the House!" Brown: "Exactly so. They spare him all the boredom of debates; but they let him go into the lobby, and the smoking-room and the dining-room, where all the fun is. Hang me, if they haven't treated him too well."—Punch.

AMERICAN TRAVELLER (who is being ferried over the sea of Galilee in a very slow boat): "Who rowed this boat before you?" Ferryman: "My father." American Traveller: "Who had it before him?" Ferryman: "My grandfather." American Traveller: "How long has your family followed this business?" Ferryman: "About three thousand years." American Traveller: "Was it one of your ancestors that ferried Jesus Christ across?" Ferryman: "Yes, and in a boat just like mine." American Traveller: "Well, no wonder he got out and walked!"

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

Digitized by Google

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
ELIZABETH B CHASE, Providence, R.I.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.
ANNIE L. DIGGS, Lawrence, Kansas.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
CAROLINE M. SEVERANCE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

All letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to "Free Religious Association," at the office.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A

METROPOLE
INSURANCE COMPANY,
OF PARIS, FRANCE.

A Large Paid-up Capital, Good Surplus, Ample American Deposits.

UNITED STATES BRANCH OFFICES,
No. 20 Kilby Street,
BOSTON, MASS.
JOHN C. PAIGE, Resident Manager.

Trustees in Boston for the United States.

H. H. HUNNEWELL, ESQ., Of Messrs. H. H. Hunnewell & Sons.
GEORGE M. BARNARD, ESQ., Of Messrs. George M. Barnard & Co.
WILLIAM P. HUNT, ESQ., President Atlas National Bank, and President South Boston Iron Company.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN.
A COURSE OF LECTURES BY
FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

AUTHOR'S AMERICAN EDITION. Cloth. 12mo.
PRICE $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston.

DISCOURSES
BY
Frederic A. Hinckley.

The Sentiment in Religion. Just published.
The Cancer at the Heart.
What makes a Religious Society?

Price 10 cts. each; 20 copies for $1.00.

Also

Natural Religion. A Book of Selections for Sunday. School and Home Use.

Price 30 cts.

Send orders to the Author, Providence, R.I., or to Index office.

"An original thinker and an eloquent expounder of fruitful truth."

GEORGE H. CALVERT'S WORKS.

"Few men, probably none living, are his equals in the department to which he has given his especial attention. His books are genuine æsthetic studies in the best sense of the word."—Newport News.

Fine English Cloth. Price per vol. $1.50.

Essays Æsthetical.
Brief Essays and Brevities.
Some of the Thoughts of Joseph Joubert.
First Years in Europe.
Life and Work of Goethe. An Essay.
Charlotte von Stein. A Memoir. With Portrait.
Life of Rubens. With Portrait.
Arnold and Andre. An Historical Drama.
Wordsworth. A Biographic and Æsthetic Study. With Portrait.
Shakespeare. A Study.
Coleridge, Shelley, and Goethe. Biographic and Æsthetic Studies.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.50
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.00
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, 3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 "	. . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51 "	. . .	6c. " "
" 52 "	. . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT L[AW],

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 FLEET ST., London.
[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an Illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 601.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 53.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE sweet scent of flowers is lost on the breeze, but the fragrance of virtue endures forever. Whatever men do of good or evil, they shall reap the fruit in due season. The foolish, like a child, knows not if things grow better or worse; and while, drawn by the roses, he lets the orchard go, he will mourn over the fading flower, and lose the golden fruit.—Hindu.

TO BE able to practise these five things everywhere under heaven constitutes perfect virtue,—gravity, generosity of soul, sincerity, earnestness, and kindness. If you are grave, you will not be treated with disrespect. If you are generous, you will win all. If you are sincere, people will repose trust in you. If you are earnest, you will accomplish much. If you are kind, this will enable you to employ the services of others. . . . To subdue one's self and return to propriety is perfect virtue.—Confucius.

MAN perfected by society is the best of all animals: he is the most terrible of all when he lives without law and without justice. If he finds himself an individual who cannot live in society, or who pretends he has need of only his own resources, do not consider him as a member of humanity: he is a savage beast or a god. —Aristotle.

MANHOOD is composed of liberality and benevolence. Do not imagine that it consists merely in the material form. Virtue also is requisite; for a human figure may be painted on the gate of the palace with vermilion and verdigris. When a man hath not virtue and benevolence, what is the difference between him and the figure on the wall? It is not wisdom to acquire worldly wealth, but to gain one single heart.—Saadi.

OUR remedies oft in ourselves do lie which we ascribe to Heaven.—Shakspere.

AMONG the other excellencies of man, this is one, that he can form an idea of perfection much beyond what he has experience of in himself, and is not limited in his conception of wisdom and virtue.—Hume.

FORTUNE! There is no fortune: all is trial or punishment or recompense or foresight.—Voltaire.

WORDS are good, but there is something better. The best is not to be explained by words. The spirit in which we act is the chief matter. Action can only be understood and represented by the spirit. No one knows what he is doing while he is acting rightly, but of what is wrong we are always conscious.—Goethe.

THE true harvest of my daily life is something as intangible and indescribable as the tints of morning or evening. It is a little star-dust caught, a segment of the rainbow which I have clutched.—Thoreau.

LOOK not mournfully into the past, it comes not back again; wisely improve the present, it is thine; go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear, and with a manly heart.—Longfellow.

THE man who gives himself to other men can never be a wholly sad man; but no more can he be a man of unclouded gladness. To him shall come with every deeper consecration a before untasted joy, but in the same cup shall be mixed a sorrow that it was beyond his power to feel before. All truly consecrated men learn little by little that what they are consecrated to is not joy or sorrow, but a divine idea and a profound obedience, which can find their full outward expression not in joy and not in sorrow, but in the mysterious and inseparable mingling of the two.—Phillips Brooks.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Concord School of Philosophy opens July 11, and will continue for five weeks. The terms are three dollars for each of the five weeks. Single tickets, fifty cents each.

TWO SONS of the Prince of Wales recently had an interview with ex-king Cetawayo, who received them very cordially, and called their attention to a picture of the Queen which hung up in his room. They were also asked to convey a message to her majesty, requesting her to tell him what offence he had committed, and expressing his desire to visit England.

FORTUNATELY for the newspapers and the people, a fine comet has unexpectedly appeared to absorb the interest that was beginning wofully to lag in the monotonous, not to say repulsive, proceedings over the election of senators at Albany. The comet, though puzzling to the scientists and alarming not a few superstitious people who think it the harbinger of the coming end of the world, is at least not charged with corruption nor office-seeking; and at present it seems peaceably disposed to leave our solar system with all its planets and moons undisturbed.

IT is proposed to make an experiment of coöperative housekeeping in the suburban town of Winchester near Boston. The plan contemplates the selection of a desirable lot of ground on which a collection of attractive residences well-adapted to the object in view shall be erected. In order to escape the odors of cooking, this work is to be performed in a distinct building set apart for the purpose, which is also to include a commodious dining hall. The arrangements in regard to meals admit of their being partaken in family groups at a general table, and when desired in private apartments. This must seem to housekeepers, who have grown weary and dispirited with the cares and vexations incident to housekeeping experience, like the coming of the millennium.

A DELEGATION is to go to England from Pennsylvania, authorized to request and arrange for the removal of the bones and dust of William Penn to be interred in the new City Hall at Philadelphia. But the enterprise is not likely to succeed. The English members of the Penn family will not accede to it; and the Quakers generally, on that side of the Atlantic, are strongly opposing the plan, especially those who have care of the little country graveyard in Buckinghamshire, where Penn's ashes until now have reposed in peace. Better let them remain there. William Penn's best monument in America is the great State he founded and the doctrine of peace he founded it upon. Let the Pennsylvanians who would honor him keep that monument in good political and moral repair, according to original plans, and all will be well.

THE present Legislature at Albany passed a bill granting freedom of worship to the inmates of workhouses and other public reformatory institutions. It sounds queer to talk of giving criminals in a penitentiary freedom of worship. But it only means appointing chaplains according to the ecclesiastical preferences of those to be served. Governor Cornell has vetoed the bill, on the ground that, though right in theory, it is impracticable on account of the exigencies of discipline. The Catholic papers claim, on the contrary, that the theory has been proved practicable where tried, as in the Albany Penitentiary and the Rochester House of Refuge, in both of which institutions Catholic and Protestant chaplains have worked amicably together. But suppose all the sects should claim to have each a chaplain in every public institution.

STARTLING events in science are not uncommon in these latter days, but one of the most astonishing that has occurred for a considerable time is that just announced. Prof. M. Cammille Faure, of Paris, may well exclaim, Eureka, since he has at last achieved what has long been, in the way of speculation and conjecture, anticipated, as one of the awaiting wonders of the future. We refer to his discovery of the means by which electricity may be stored and transported from place to place, and applied to various uses. Sir William Thompson, the distinguished English electrician, to whom a box of the new power was sent, after having subjected it to sufficient tests, wrote a communication to the London Times, full of enthusiastic delight in respect to the results. It is thought it may eventually supersede coal in all the uses for which it is at present employed, as well as become a motor in all kinds of machinery; and that its influence upon the electric light, in respect to the economy and convenience of method, will be of like importance.

THE Independent remarks: "Considerable excitement has been caused by the substitution of 'from the evil one' for the familiar words of the Lord's Prayer by the revisers of the New Testament." It also makes this unorthodox concession in respect to the sources of some of the New Testament teachings: "A strong argument for the old translation can be drawn from the post-Biblical literature of the Jews. The Karaites have a prayer in which the words occur 'lead us not into temptation, but deliver from the evil event,'—words which appear to be the prototype of those used by our Lord. The Hebraistic character of the Lord's prayer has often been noticed. Almost every clause in it can be matched by similar Jewish petitions, and the idioms are throughout Hebraistic." Now, these are things which Free Religionists have been saying and writing these many years, not alone in respect to the New Testament, but to the other portions of the Bible, as well as the Christian system in general. The Independent appears to have got the idea at last, and is disposed to impart it to the brethren. The world moves, and Orthodoxy moves with it.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

Free Religious Association, May 26 and 27, 1881.

[Continued from last week.]

The PRESIDENT.—As time is passing rapidly away, although much of what we have just listened to would invite appreciative remark, I shall content myself with simply introducing to you our next speaker, Mr. Minot J. Savage, whom it is hardly necessary for me to introduce to an audience in Boston.

ADDRESS OF REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.

I would like, in just one word, to dispose of a matter that is purely personal, and then ask you to forget all about me and notice one or two things that I shall try to say. I shall not be able to make any such address as I would like on the subject that is given me this morning. I have been suffering so for the last two or three weeks that my head is in no condition to do any hard, clear, connected thinking. I shall only, then, make a few somewhat disconnected, I hope not feeble, remarks.

I have been asked by your Secretary to take up and speak somewhat concerning a question that has been introduced to our modern world, by some of its leading thinkers, on the supposed dangers at the present time of a "moral interregnum,"—the dangers of the transition period from the old theories of ethics to the new, as to whether there are such dangers, and as to how important and how threatening they are to be supposed to be.

I confess that it has been somewhat amusing to me, as I have followed the course of even educated and powerful thought in this direction during the last two or three years, to see how men have allowed themselves to get into a state of what seems to me unnatural and unfounded fear, as to whether the great principles of ethics are not really slipping out of our hands. The very last number of the North American Review, or one of the last, contains an article under the caption, "What Morality have we left?" And it comes to the somewhat discouraging conclusion that we have not any left, and it advertises for a new ethics. An article, within a year or two, by the same writer, judging by the tone, in the same magazine advertises for a new religion. We seem to be getting out of religion and ethics both. Only a little while ago, one of the leading doctors of divinity, of America, came to give us a course of Lowell Lectures on the supernatural origin of Christianity; and he prefaced his course by telling us that it needs to be done because, after eighteen hundred years of Christian salvation, the world is getting worse and worse. And only a year or two ago there was a large meeting of the divines and theologians of the country in New York, having it for their express purpose to tell us that the world had got so degraded under the influence of the Church, prolonged century after century, that its affairs were pretty nearly bad enough to be wound up and declared bankrupt, so that we were in process of passing into the hands of a non-celestial receiver. This disheartening condition of affairs, the fact that we are getting so thoroughly and discouragingly destitute of morals and religion, according to these men who took it upon themselves to prophesy concerning our condition, reminds me of a story that amused me a good deal, a few years ago, concerning an old lady out on the frontier. It was at the time when Illinois was the extreme far West. A colporteur came along one day, bringing what a good many people on the frontier had left behind them, the material basis for religion and ethics in the shape of Bibles and tracts. After engaging in conversation with the old lady as she came to the door, he asked her if she had a Bible. She bridled up immediately, and, as if to meet the implication of such a question, asked him if he took her for a heathen just because she lived out there on the frontier! Of course, she had a Bible. He pressed the inquiry, and asked if she would be kind enough to get it and let him see it. This disconcerted her; but, being determined to make the best of a bad case, and recollecting that she had not seen it herself for a long time, she started off to do her best in searching for the desired volume. She was gone a good while, and came back at last, discouraged and down-hearted, holding in her hand one cover and a few fragments of dilapidated leaves; and, while the colporteur looked at her inquiringly with an amused expression on his face, she attempted to apologize, as best she could, for the disastrous outcome of her confidence as to the possession of a Bible by saying, "Well, I declare, I didn't know we was so near out." And so it has seemed to me, as I have read the newspapers and magazines and heard public addresses in this direction and that, that civilization is just waking up to the fact that, in some fashion or other, it is dreadfully near out of morals.

I want to raise the question, then, for just a moment, as to whether there is this serious danger of a moral interregnum that is supposed. Unquestionably, the theological, supernatural conception of ethics is passing by. This standard is fading out into thin air in the minds of the most conservative, thoughtful, educated men. It does not make any difference whether the points that I am making now are well taken or are to be ultimately supported or not; but the fact to-day is apparent that men do not behave this way or that because of any supposed supernatural theory of conduct, or because of any supernatural sanction or authority behind their moral intuitions. That belief, for example, in the supernatural authority of the Bible, as our President has so ably illustrated this morning, which has been, through the ages of Christianity, supposed to be the fountain and standard of all ethical thought and judgment, is rapidly passing away. It has passed away from the minds of all intelligent and competent thinkers who have investigated the matter. Men no longer believe that an Italian priest at the Vatican has any way of knowing the mind of God, as to what he would have us do or refrain from doing, that is not equally open to any intelligent man in any country or in any church or in no church at all. Men are surrendering this supernatural theory of ethics. And a close and careful study of the Bible shows again, as our President has pointed out, that the theory of ethics contained in the Bible is, in many respects, behind the best moral life and thought of the age. Even the very God himself of the Old Testament is no longer, in the highest and noblest language of the time, a moral being. How can he, then, be the fountain of moral authority and of moral life? Even the churches themselves,—and this is a point which, perhaps, you may not have thought of,—even the orthodox churches themselves in practice do unconsciously modify the Biblical ethical teaching. They select, they choose, they drop this or that which does not work, which they find to be unpractical, they supplement and rationalize. Even the Unitarians (of which I am one), who claim that the great charter for religion is the Sermon on the Mount,—the Unitarians, if they are critical and thoughtful, must confess that there is much in the Sermon on the Mount that no man ever did practise, ever can practise, ever should practise.

The Sermon on the Mount, then, is not perfect as an ethical standard or guide. The supernatural theory of ethics, as I say, is passing away. And I believe that that which has gone by the name of the Transcendental theory is equally a thing of the past in ethics. This belief in a God as the source of a categorical imperative,—whatever that may be,—somewhere out in the depths of the infinite that no man can hear or see or measure or compute, cannot be converted into a model for a scientific ethics. Conscience has been explained. The moral intuitions have been found out and are discovered to be, as this writer in the North American Review says, only the summed-up experience of the human race. I should most decidedly leave off the only. He raised the question, since these are only the summed-up experience of the human race, why we should be bound by their authority. For my part, I know of no authority in the heavens above or in the earth beneath grander, more imperative, more far-reaching, more eternal, than the summed-up experience of the human race on any particular point. On what is it that our total civilization is built? What is the corner-stone of society? What is the corner-stone of government? What is the corner-stone of any department that you choose to select of that which we call civilization, except the summed-up and accumulated experience of the human race? On what do we rest when we build an iron bridge, flinging our spans from one bank to another and taking our heavy trains of cars fearlessly across it? Simply on the summed-up experience of the human race that iron is strong, and arranged in such and such a manner is capable of justifying the faith we put in it. And so all we know and all we do and all we are is simply the summed-up experience of the human race.

These theories of ethics are things of the past that lead us to this supposed transition, this interregnum; and this I want to look at simply for just a few moments. There is and there must be a certain danger in any change like this which we are contemplating; but I believe the danger is very much exaggerated. Let us first see what the danger is. If, for example, a man has been accustomed to tell the truth, to keep his business contracts, to be faithful to his wife and his children and his neighbors in all the different relations of life; if, in other words, a man has been accustomed to fulfil what he calls his moral obligations, because something else in his mind has been supposed to be true; and, if that is the whole reason, and then you persuade him that this something is not true,—why, of course he is all at sea, and he does not know whether it is necessary any longer for him to behave himself or not. That I take it is what it comes to when we talk about this moral interregnum. If, for example, a man has been accustomed to behave himself, simply because he is afraid that in the next world he will fall into the hands of an angry God and be sent away into everlasting punishment,—if this is the sum total of the reason that has kept him moral, take that away, and of course he will cease to be moral. If his faith in the Church has been the foundation stone in his morality, and you undermine that, no wonder you fear that he may turn out immoral. And so, if any one of these beliefs has been the real deep-down reason for a man's conduct, and that is taken away, why, of course the danger is that the conduct itself will be unsettled. And this is the assumed truth as it is ordinarily held in common thought and as it is frequently preached from our pulpits, and here is the basis of a very large part of the popular scare. The pulpit tells you, if you touch the Bible, if you touch the belief in future punishment, if you touch this or that creed of their theological faith, that you will upset the foundations of morality, meaning by that that it is simply belief in these things that leads people to behave themselves. I have no doubt that in some cases this is true. The New York Nation not a great while ago referred to a young man, as perhaps you will remember, who had been in Europe, and whom some one asked after he got home if he had had a good time. Well, he remarked, rather indecisively, that he had enjoyed himself very well indeed, and might have had just the grandest time in the world in Paris, if he had not been converted just before he left home. I remember an old friend of mine out West, when I was in the Orthodox Church,—I don't believe he represents Orthodoxy, he represents only a very few people, a particular class of men,—who said that he did not believe there would be many Christians, if there were no devil. Now, if these are the reasons why men obey the laws of morality, why, of course there is a great deal of danger, if you take them away. But do you notice one thing? All this kind of talk carries with it a very curious and striking implication, that I wish you would get very clearly into your minds. I have never seen it published or spoken of anywhere, and yet it seems to me very important. If morality in this world simply finds its standard and authority outside, if there is no natural reason, no reason in the circumstances, in the conditions of our life, in the nature of things, why men should behave in this way rather than that, then do you see what it means? It means that God by and by, in another world, is going to punish us for doing things that did not hurt anybody a particle in this world. Because if the things we are doing, thinking, and saying every day do help or hurt people of this world right here, then these helpings and hurtings are the indications of the natural laws and the natural standards of moral action; and we find our authority here in the facts of life and society, rather than somewhere else outside of and beyond it. I believe then that all talk of a moral interregnum is on the face of it an absurdity, for the simple reason that the great majority of people do not behave in the way that they think is right for any such reason as they are popularly supposed to. Take your own case, for example. How many of you tell the truth, simply because you think God will be angry with you, if you do not? How many of you ever reform, because you are afraid of the devil either here or in the next world? How many of you are kind to your husbands and wives, tender and faithful to your children, how many of you keep your business contracts, for any of these supposed theological or supernatural reasons? The simple matter of fact is that morality is just as natural a product of this soil of human experience as are the grasses of our fields or the roses of our gardens,—simply a springing up of the natural laws of life, growing out of the experience of men and women living together and related to each other as they are.

Digitized by Google

Just one word more in regard to this moral interregnum, and then I pass on to a concluding thought. An interregnum means the cessation for a time of the governing power. An interregnum is a time when there is no king, between the death of one and the mounting of the throne by another. It is a time when there is a suspense of the governing power. Now consider for a moment as to whether there can possibly be any such thing as this in morals. If morality is something other-worldly, something having in fact nothing to do with merely human experience, something acquired, something not inherent in the laws and facts and affairs of human life, then you can conceive it suspended. Let us take an illustration to make perfectly clear what I mean. First let me make the statement, and then illustrate it. If it were possible for all moral laws to be suspended for a week or for a month, then do you not see that during that week or month it would be absolutely impossible for any man, woman, or child in the world to do wrong? You could not possibly do wrong, if you tried, during a moral interregnum. If there be no law, there is no law to break; and immorality is a disregard of the law. Suppose, for example, that in my case for twenty-four hours the law of gravitation should be suspended. I will not suspend it for the whole universe, because that would make too much trouble,—but suspend it for twenty-four hours in my case. I might try my best to jump off of a five-story brick building or down a precipice, but I could not possibly do it. I could not hurt myself, if I tried, because the law for the time being is suspended; and there is nothing to break. But if I should take it into my head that the law of gravitation in my case was suspended, and should try it, I should be likely to be convinced of the impossibility in a very short space of time. Now take this idea with regard to the suspension of the law of morals. If you should suspend for any period the law of morals,—that is, the reason for right conduct,— it would not be possible for us during that period of suspension to do anything that is wrong; but, if we take it into our hearts that these laws are suspended for a little while, and should begin to break them, then, if the laws of morality are real, we should find it out very rapidly, and should discover very soon that it did not pay; and, though we might try leaping over a precipice for ourselves, our companions and friends would be too wise to follow us. The talk of a moral interregnum seems to me to be just a forgetting one's self; and to have no reality at its root; for I believe that the laws of morals, the laws of conduct in us, are real, mighty, ever-present, eternal, omnipotent. They are just as mighty as the laws of gravitation or of chemical affinity or any other of the great, so-called physical forces of the world.

Now just one word in concluding. I am trying to run over rapidly a few ideas that are large enough to make a book. Before there can be any science of ethics,—and I agree most heartily with all that our President has said in regard to the necessity of such a science,—before there can be any science of ethics, there must be discovered, demonstrated, and agreed upon some one clearly outlined standard by which conduct is to be tested and tried, to decide as to whether it be right or wrong. I believe that we are beginning to get a clear outline of the scientific theory of ethics; that we have discovered the place at least where the corner-stone is to be laid and where this standard is to be set up. Now, what is it? It must be external, something tangible, something that can be estimated, something that can be outlined, something that can be dealt with; and it must be one. Is there such a thing? I believe there is; and that that one standard of ethics, the one thing by which all action is to be tried, may be put into just one single word, and that word is Life. The central thought of this universe is the evolution of life. The one universal instinct of the race is for life. The one hunger is for life. "That we might have life, and have it more abundantly," is the expression of the universal, the eternal thirst of humanity. And the world, the history of human life here on earth, has demonstrated this one fact. And you may run over in your mind now or by and by the list of those things that you call virtues and vices, and you will find that it agrees perfectly with what I have said. Whatever the experience of the world has demonstrated to be antagonistic to the higher development of individual or social life, whatever has taken away from the fulness of life, whatever has degraded it and kept it from its grandest development, anything that has stood in the way of this evolution of life, humanity has agreed to call wrong; and it is called wrong simply because the experience of the world has demonstrated it to be an evil and a fault and a hindrance in the way of man. And, whatever the human experience of the world has demonstrated to be a help toward development, toward increasing the complexity, the fulness, the power, the evolution of life, this the world has agreed to speak of as right. And here I believe is the beginning. Here we are to lay the corner-stone. Here is the central word from which we are to start out in the discovery of our science of ethics. And since the laws of right and wrong are identical with the laws of life and the laws of the diminution of life, which means the laws of death, and since these laws are eternal in their sweep and omnipotent in their supremacy, there can be nowhere outside of a diseased imagination any such thing as a moral interregnum.

The PRESIDENT.—We have one more speaker before the morning session closes, in whom I am sure that many of those here present will be intensely interested. I, for one, who have never had the pleasure of hearing him, am extremely desirous to hear what word he will give. But, before introducing Mr. George Chainey to the audience, I have just one word to say with regard to the remarks to which we have just listened.

Mr. Savage's address, as he justly said, relates to ideas which are large enough to make a book. But even so sketchy a statement as it was possible for him to make is so full of interest and bears upon a point so very important that I cannot forego the temptation to spend at least two minutes in making one or two counter-statements. For I want the audience to understand that I, who am not a Unitarian, who am not even a theist, am far more inclined to take the ground of absolute philosophy than Mr. Savage. It is a strange contrast that one who still represents Christianity, though of the most advanced type, should find it accord with his views to appeal only to human experience, and to the test of helpfulness and hurtfulness as the standard of morality, while one who has advanced in his own development beyond all churches, and whose essential predilections are so strongly in favor of complete liberty, whose whole life's work is tending, as mine is, toward the building up of a noble humanity, should find these tests of simple human helpfulness and human hurtfulness as a basis of ethics inadequate; and for this reason,—I will be quite brief,—that it is simply impossible to say what is helpful and what is hurtful; that the whole sum of human experience which has been gathered hitherto is not sufficient to enable us to say of any single action that it is really helpful. We all know that many actions which we have supposed to be helpful at the time when we did them have at a later period turned out to be in reality hurtful. Many actions which we did, supposing them to be hurtful, have, later on, proved themselves to be helpful. Now, in order to determine in respect to any one action whether it is really helpful or really hurtful, it would be necessary for me to take in the sum total of the causes and effects of the universe; that is to say, to measure and know how far this particular action of mine affects the totality of universal action. And that that is beyond the power of any human experience to say is self-evident. I also rely upon human experience as a starting-point. But I believe that we shall find in the constitution of the human mind itself the direction, the basis, of a new ethics. I believe that, as there are certain logical truths which are not the result of human experience —such as, for instance, the idea of cause and effect, which is not the result of experience, but precedes all experience, explains it, and makes it possible,—so there are certain elements in human nature which make possible all experience of mankind. This, however, does not exclude the scientific study of human society; for it will be found that those very principles of which I speak give us only a general scheme of action, while the particular rule for any given case can only be obtained by the application of the general scheme to the circumstances of the case before us. Just as, in any particular instance, the general idea of cause and effect will not give us any satisfactory result until by close observation and experiment we have applied it to the facts of the universe, and even then we are not quite certain that we have found the true cause to connect it with its proper effect, so in morality also we are never quite certain that we have found the true moral formula which expresses the fundamental reality, though certain that there is a fundamental reality. Our morality, like our science, is absolute only in the search. And I would also call attention to the fact that the laws of morality are different from the laws of gravitation. The law of gravitation is a law which we cannot escape from. Morality would cease to be morality, if it involved necessity like the law of gravitation. The very morality of an action of ours depends upon the freedom that it has. I do not wish to argue this question at length, but simply to state my counter-view. An action which is done with the necessity of the law of gravitation in my estimation ceases to be moral: it is instinctive; it has not the attributes of morality.

I will not detain the audience longer, but shall now ask our friend, Mr. George Chainey, to give us the benefit of his advice and his word.

ADDRESS OF MR. GEORGE CHAINEY.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—I have been asked to present to you my ideas concerning The Basis of Morals. You will understand that a theme of the magnitude of this, in a brief address, can only be treated in a fragmentary and shadowy fashion. I cannot stop to present in detail the chain of reasoning, the inward conflict with outward authority, and the multitude of facts that have forced me on to my present convictions. I may not stop to analyze, in technical phraseology, the pictures I wish to hang before your imagination. But then we all believe in freedom, whatever else we may differ in. So you can admire or condemn as you please. Whether you curse or bless, that which is true will remain true; that which is good, good; and that which is beautiful, beautiful.

In the idea of morality, we assume that somehow there is a right and a wrong to human conduct, an ought to be which often condemns that which is. The query arises, Have we any right to consider this an open question? Many honest, well-meaning people think that this was settled long ago, amid the thunders of Sinai and in the Sermon on the Mount. For us to meet here to-day to consider this problem in the light of reason is, to them, a pure absurdity and, in itself, an evidence of the corrupting power and chaos-producing character of unbelief. With them, they claim, is the whole law of righteousness and the light of life; while in our hearts is the depravity of rebellion to manifest duty, and in our minds the darkness through which we shall stumble into everlasting death and ruin. They tell us that, if we succeed in planting our ideas in the minds of people, we shall break down every barrier to crime, open all the floodgates of vice, blast all the fair flowers of virtue, and plunge society into a universal chaos and disorder, in which the only law will be, Every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost. Now, if we have any suspicion that this is true, we have no business here. If we are not persuaded in our minds, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that with us is life, with them death, with us light, with them darkness, with us loyalty and fidelity, with them disobedience and infidelity, with us order and beauty, with them chaos and deformity, we have no right to be here asking how to put our philosophy of life in the place of theirs. That you are here to-day to celebrate the idea of liberty and ask anew the questions of life and duty is strong indication that you have found this clear path for your feet.

But now another question arises. Has Christianity demonstrated the saving power of its theory of right and wrong? Can the Church, in view of what it has done for humanity, convince the reason of any free and unprejudiced man or woman that this question of right and wrong is forever closed? For nearly nineteen centuries, Christianity has been in the world. What real contribution has it made to the moral life of mankind? Has it been glad tidings of great joy to all people? Has it fulfilled any of the promises with which it made its advent? Are its disciples to be distinguished by the love they bear one another? Do all who accept it agree as to what is right and wrong? Do you not hear Catholic anathematizing Protestant, and Protestant cursing Catholic? Is not Protestantism split into numerous warring and jealous sects, each one of which presents a different rule of life? Have not Christians in every age murdered each other in cold blood by the thousand? Is there anything that man can do that can give strength to his mind or joy to his heart that has not been pronounced a crime by some faction of the Church? It is the power of righteousness so called; but its history is the history of crime. It is claimed to be the religion of love; and yet, wherever the cross has gone, it has engendered hate. It promises life more abundant; but its path is bordered with gibbets and paved with skeletons. Its history is written in blood. It has leagued itself with every tyranny and supported every injustice. What supports the infamous despotism of the Czar, that almost maddens us to think on it? The Church. What blesses, and furnishes chaplains on State pay for, every standing army in Europe? The Church. What pours its oil of divine sanction on the head of every crowned murderer and thief called a king or a queen? The Church. What supported and maintained slavery in this country? The Church. That is to say, that underlying all these wrongs is the doctrine that faith in the unknowable is the basis of morals. Now, when I deny this, and in return am called infidel, I am proud to be so honored. I am confident I shall live to see the day when those who bear this name will be written in the page of history as faithful to truth, justice, and liberty. When the Church says to me, You are destroying the foundations of right, for without faith there is no law and no morality, I simply turn the tables. I say the society you have established lines our streets with brothels, crowds our prisons, poor-houses, insane asylums, and a large part of every city with thousands of men and hundreds of women that are starved and punished for the crimes you have committed, simply because the true idea of right can never be seen until we renounce faith entirely as a guide. Trusting to its pilotage, the great ship of humanity has beaten helplessly before every storm of passion, been bruised and battered against every rock of tyranny, deceived by every false light of ignorance, and preyed upon by every pirate of injustice for nearly nineteen centuries.

Digitized by Google

But while the Church has done its best to slay reason, the only true arbiter of right and wrong, in order to set faith above its grave, this true light of life has never quite been quenched. Through all the long night-watches of the world's darkness, a few have kept her torch alive. Out of their untiring devotion, her flame begins to conquer the night, and the new glad morn of truth and right begins to gild the horizon. Reason, bursting from the grave of faith, shall yet assert her full and only prerogative to say what is wrong and what is right. For the true basis of morals is the pure perception of reason that it is the equal inborn right of every man and woman to enjoy life, liberty, and happiness. The real foundation on which shall be built the final temple of righteousness was laid in the establishment of the French and American Republics. But mankind had been so long debauched and degraded with superstition that they only scotched the snake of superstition, instead of killing it; and so she has closed and become herself again, wounding our poor hearts with her former tooth. Even here, in America, a compromise was effected between liberty and slavery, the State and the Church. Justice was betrayed in order to be tender to sentiments entwined about falsehoods. And so, both in Europe and here, as Walt Whitman says in Leaves of Grass:—

"The sweetness of mercy brewed bitter destruction, and the frightened rulers come back.
Each comes in state with his train, hangman, priest, tax-gatherer, soldier, lawyer, lords, jailers, and sycophants.
* * * * * * * * * * *
Corpses lie in new-made graves, bloody corpses of young men;
The rope of the gibbet hangs heavily, the bullets of princes are flying, the creatures of power laugh aloud.
And all these things bear fruits, and they are good.
Those corpses of young men,
Cold and motionless as they seem, live elsewhere with unslaughtered vitality.
They live in other young men, O kings;
They live in brothers, again ready to defy you;
They were purified by death, they were taught and exalted.
Not a grave of the murdered for freedom but grows seed for freedom, in its turn to bear seed,
Which the winds carry afar and resow, and the rains and the snows nourish."

From this bitterness of destruction, we are learning slowly but painfully that the principle of toleration and compromise with a lie is always death and destruction. The conviction is entering deep into many true hearts that reason must entirely destroy faith, or faith will murder it. However beautiful and noble may have been the heart from which Christianity blossomed into existence, yet the seed that it has borne on hundreds of battle-fields, the hollow mockery and stupidity of its creeds and ceremonies, the discords between its profession and practice, the bitterness of our own wrestling with its claim to our devotion, proves that it is utterly false and harmful. Its kingdom is not of this world. Its hope for humanity was beyond the skies; and so millions, cheated by this illusion, have bowed their necks submissively to the feet of tyrants in Church and State. But the true state is that of this world, and the true paradise to seek right here and now. The hell from which we need to be saved is the actual one of vice, ignorance, poverty, and crime. As the light of reason flashes down into the pit of human misery dug and fed by superstition, it shows us that these things are all wrong. Children ought not to be crying for bread nor set to work in factories. No parent ought to be driven insane with looking upon his or her helpless babes growing up in filth and ignorance, from which they cannot deliver them. The Church that creates an order of society that is responsible for hundreds of thousands of young women selling their bodies to the service of lust and the poison of disease ought to create a revolution against itself. No one ought to be left in the helpless shackles of ignorance. There are light and air, soil and water, food and fuel enough for all. Right is either the heritage of all or none. If there is any sense or meaning to justice, it should be impartial, calling no man master, but leaving each man and woman free to walk erect and own no superior. If there is any truth, it should illuminate every mind. What do these prisons mean? Level them to the ground and build hospitals. These are the sick for which society is responsible, not they for society. What mean these gibbets? What right have you to deprive any one of life? Do you not know that in doing so you pass sentence of execution upon yourself? The hand is not more part of the body than they of you. Do not maim and degrade yourself. The disease only grows worse every time you thus torture it. Seek to purify the stream at the fountain whence it flows. In the light of reason, you yourself are responsible for these things. If perfect justice was established in the State, and each man and woman was equal before the law, there would be no crime.

Reason, entirely liberated from superstition, sees clearly that the true basis and source of moral life is the just state. By this, I mean a state of society governed only by the inalienable rights of each man and woman to life, liberty, and happiness. Like begets like. Beneath a just state, the individual would be just. His own highest interest would be brought into perfect harmony with the good of all. The principle of selfhood, of self-respect and honor, instead of being denounced and vilified, would be found one of, if not the most beneficent of all in the nature of man.

But reason, men say, is cold and heartless. But, though this may be true, it is only on this rock we can build a temple of liberty and justice. Still, if we can only get this right securely laid, we need not be afraid that the hearts of men and women will fail to furnish the motive power. I agree with the Church that perception of what is right, without the desire to perform it, is not enough. But I am very sure that, when the head-light of reason comes to the front, the motive power of the heart will furnish the incentive to action. All history will bear me out in saying that, when reason has been to the front, the human heart has throbbed with stronger love and thrilled to richer inspiration than was ever born of the pale, cold-hearted fear of religion. That which men have called religion appears ever in some new form. The new life that is to touch duty with emotion is already born into the world. As of old, its prophet is not to be found in the palace of Herod nor among the authorities of the Church. Again, his cradle is with the lowly, and his most devoted disciples among the common people. The message he brings is that the kingdom of man is at hand. Those who can observe the signs of the times see that it is nigh. All sacrifice to deity is robbery. All devotion to another world is a cruel waste of that which is so sadly needed in this one. Already, the truth of this gospel has been heard all around the globe. It is flashing forth its fiery rays of promise in the black clouds of revolution gathering over the despotisms of Europe. It is growing strong in the hearts of Nihilists, Socialists, and Land Leaguers. It is organizing in the just claims of labor and of political and religious demands in this country. Here, we may see its beautiful sway established by peaceable methods. By the power of agitation, through the spoken and written word,—in time in organization, and eventually by the ballot,—we may establish a true democracy, where woman shall be the equal of man; where the free choice of the people shall appoint every officer, and as freely reject him whenever he shows himself incompetent for or unfaithful to his task; where no one truth shall be shown any advantage over any other truth; where no opportunity of land, air, water, education, or public action shall be given to one that is not open to every other man or woman on the same terms; where the body shall have the salvation and devotion once given to the soul; where all that is true, good, or beautiful shall be taught in all the schools, proclaimed from every pulpit, and freely inspire the whole people, in the ministrations of genius through the hitherto undeveloped powers for good of art, in painting, statuary, music, romance, and the drama.

One word more to the Free Religious Association, and I am done. If you would help to establish this basis and bring in this temple of humanity, you must ally yourself closely to the heart of the common people, and, rejecting sternly and steadfastly all the glittering allurements of the sentimental and æsthetical refinements of the old beliefs, stand firmly and unflinchingly by the full and final demands of reason, however dire and foreboding with destruction of the present order they may be. Above the most destructive cataract is the bow of beauty painted on the spray, showing that the iron hand of law and order reigns over the fiercest turbulence and seeming disorder. The enthusiasm that shall again touch duty with emotion is the ripening fruit of all the centuries. Every dart of pain, every glow of love, every tear of sympathy, every thrill of joy, every star of hope, every ray of beauty, all the struggles of humanity to find what is just and true from the beginning until now, all self-denial that stood steady and aloof on wrecks and saw others fill the seats of the boats, all offering of substance or life for the good old cause or for a friend's sake or opinion's sake, all pains of enthusiasts scoffed at by their neighbors, all the limitless sweet love and precious suffering of mothers, all honest men baffled in strifes recorded or unrecorded, —all these swell the measureless impulses that bring new life and blessing evermore to our shores. Only as we connect ourselves with this real inspiration will our work avail aught. My opinion or your opinion is of little concern in comparison to the real forces that control the destinies of mankind. The success or failure of any particular person or movement cannot change, in any important particular, the final result. We are all but as bathers on the margin of this incoming sea of humanity. According to our skill, we may drown or receive new life from its electric waves.

In vain do foolish and short-sighted Canutes bid the yeasty waves of reason to stop. Futile is the fury of every theological Xerxes as he lashes the seething, heaving billows of thought, commanding the return of the dead calm of ignorance and faith. Whether we sink or swim, fall or conquer, the great tide comes on, freighted with untold and unimagined blessing.

The Convention then adjourned till 3 P.M.

For the Free Religious Index.

REASON vs. SUPERSTITION.

Among the oldest prudential maxims is the injunction to think with the wise and to talk as though you agreed with the foolish or with the multitude. Another is to keep your thoughts locked up in your own breast, but to wear an open countenance, as though you had nothing to conceal. All this of course means that, in the presence of the canonical usages and beliefs of society, it is the best policy for the wise man to be a hypocrite or seeming conformist, and on purely selfish, prudential ground this is as good advice to-day as it was thousands of years ago. For the above Machiavellian maxims point directly to the fact that the very first movement of reason and reflective thought brought the primitive thinker into collision with the established orthodoxy of his age and country, and so in rude times exposed him to mortal peril at the hands both of the lay and clerical elements of society. All religions are alike in one respect at least; namely, that they are all equally offensive to awakened reason and common-sense. In this respect, Greek and Roman polytheism, Hebrew monotheism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity in all its denominations, and Mohammedanism, present the same front and aspect. They are all alike based on fables and puerile legends about the origin and destiny of man and the world. Lange says, "With the beginning of consecutive thinking there arises a struggle against the traditional assumptions of religion. Religion has its roots in the earliest, crudely inconsistent notions, which are ever being created afresh by the ignorant masses." In the presence of the tissue of fables and of the mob of imaginary supernatural personalities called gods and creators, which figure in the various religions, "awakening thought calls for order and unity, and hence every system of philosophy has entered upon an inevitable struggle with the theology of its time." Of course, few great thinkers and scientists have believed in the gods of the multitude and of the popular religions. Newton is claimed to have been a believer; but the truth was that he merely acquiesced, having given the subject of theology little or no consideration. Socrates was put to death with poison, because he was accused of not believing in the tutelary gods of Athens; and Aristotle had to flee from the same city, to escape a similar fate. And Athens was not only the most enlightened, but the only enlightened community of the pagan foreworld; yet superstition and its inquisitorial tribunal, known as the Areopagus, were too strong at times for the great Athenian thinkers and scientists. They had either to succumb penitentially to the tempest of popular and priestly indignation aroused by their innovating doctrines and ideas, by the new truths which they announced, or to "go" elsewhere for safety. Aristophanes, the comic poet, was with all his wit a bigoted polytheist, and, in modern parlance, a Bourbon, although he occasionally in his plays ridiculed the Olympians unmercifully. In his "Clouds," he represents Socrates as having introduced a new deity,—namely, Deinós or Vortex,—as if one should say at the present time that Darwin and Herbert Spencer had undertaken to dethrone the old God of history and tradition, and to put in his place a new creator,—namely, Evolution. Coleridge speaks of "the fair humanities of old religion." And there lies the strength of all the religions. They are all thoroughly human. Each one is an outgrowth of the particular sort of human nature which it enthralls. They all minister to the weaknesses, hopes, greeds, and longings of human nature, and scourge it into submission through its dread of post mortem penalties and horrors, which the theological imagination has depicted with topographic exactness. The gods are simply human nature writ large. They conveniently resided "in the heavens," until science summarily evicted them. All the religions speak dogmatically, that is, with perfect assurance. "The plan of creation" is always to be found in their Thirty-nine Articles.

Digitized by Google

Theologians naturally detest scientists, because the latter have dispelled their holy cloudlands and celestial air-castles by their revelations of natural truth. The primitive gods were cases of deified ancestors, the deities of home and the domestic fireside, Lares and Penates. Such a worship, of course, carried the heart along with it. The ethnic or national deities were deifications of the national spirit, supernatural leaders and protectors of cities, tribes, and nationalities. The Jewish Jehovah was as much a tribal God as Pallas Athené. He led the Israelites against their enemies, and acted as a guide for them through the wilderness. There is no reason in the world for classifying the Hebrew Jehovah under any other category than that which includes the Greek Zeus. Christ in his supernatural character is also one of the race of gods; and the Virgin Mary is the Christian goddess of maternity, the mother of the Christian Pantheon. All the gods of all the religions are as like to each other as peas of the same pod. Science lumps them all together in one lot as cases of the irrepressible personifying tendency of the human imagination in primitive times. In the works of Cicero there is a treatise on "The Nature of the Gods": it is the most satisfactory theological essay extant. Pagan theology and Christian theology are substantially at accord. Recognizing this fact, the organs of Jesuitism published in this country, such as the Catholic World, have finally rallied to the defence of ancient paganism and its rites. These priestly organs had no choice. A temple consecrated in New York to the worship of the old Athenian goddess, our Lady of Wisdom, would be no more an anachronism than are the churches devoted to the worship of the Dolorous Mother. Clearly enough, a cathedral of to-day is a case of survival of the ancient Greek or Roman temple. Holy water—that is, salt and water in a vase—invariably stands in the vestibule of the former, as it invariably stood in the vestibule of the latter, as Middleton pointed out long ago. There has been no sundering of continuity. The religion of Latin Europe to-day, and of all northern communities which have adopted the religion of Latin Europe, is substantially the religion which flourished in the days of Socrates and Aristotle and of Cicero and Cæsar; and it was and is a natural outgrowth or, to borrow a phrase, "a structural growth" of irrational, primitive human nature. "The heart doth need a language," says Coleridge. And the religions accordingly voice the blind emotions and instincts of the human heart. Their gorgeous rites and cunningly mixed potions and lotions for weakness, sin, sorrow, and death are admirably adapted to their patients. It is not wonderful, then, that the elaborate and venerable superstitions called religious persist so long and exhibit such vitality, even in this period of reason and enlightenment, because the mass of mankind are still, as of old, when regarded from any high intellectual stand-point, "mostly fools," as Carlyle was so fond of asseverating.

Superstition has always and everywhere been inextricably interwoven with the fibres of the human heart. It is a polyp in the numerousness and tenacity of its tentacles. All over the East, religion is and always has been a part of the routine of daily life. All through the south of Europe, Southern Germany, Poland, Russia, etc., it is such in an almost equal degree. The very roadsides of the above regions are strown with idolatrous imagery in wood and stone and gaudy pigments. Religion is essentially, radically barbaric. The civilization which is based on religious rites is whimsical and largely ridiculous to the eye of awakened reason and common-sense. Such was the ancient Greek, Roman, and Jewish civilization; and such is the Hindu, Mohammedan, Southern European, South American civilization at the present time. Imagine the general of a modern army refusing to give battle to his foe because the bowels of a slaughtered ruminant were not of the right hue and aspect. The countries in which religion is still the core of society, so to speak, are notoriously behind the times. Primitive manners and customs still prevail in such. Unthrift, ignorance, and squalor are everywhere noticeable in such countries. The people of superstitious countries are the hummers and camp-followers of modern scientific, democratic, progressive civilization. They are necessarily its drudges, because they are too ignorant to take an intelligent part in its movements. They are irresistibly carried along with it, even while they are taught by their religious guides and tyrants to despise the free, enlightened, progressive life of to-day, and to be social obstructions and stumbling-blocks. Fortunately, they and their advisers are kicking against the pricks, damaging themselves more than civilization.

But the time has undoubtedly come, when it is a grave offence against civilization to practise or countenance superstitious religious observances, which were well enough in the childhood of the race or excusable because of its childhood. Puseyism, Ritualism, Newmanism, or revived Romanism, all mean just this; namely, an implacable and desperate war against the modern spirit, against the spread of popular intelligence, and consequently of free, popular government. Hence, all who cultivate or patronize such ecclesiastical observances are, in reality, the foes of current civilization, rollers back of the wheels of society, enemies of the grand, current revolutionary movement to extricate mankind from poverty and ignorance and political and ecclesiastical thraldom. Americans can, of course, only be amateur Bourbons and Ultramontanes; but they, by being such, give aid and comfort to European despotism. B. W. Ball.

For the Free Religious Index.

ANOTHER VIEW OF LIBERAL NEWSPAPERS.

I noticed in the Index of June 9 an article from Mr. H. Clay Neville, entitled "Liberal Newspapers." Many years since,—when I was a subscriber for the Boston Investigator,—I recollect seeing Mr. Neville's name among its list of contributors. In his communication to your paper are one or two points which attracted my attention, and to which, with your permission, I would like to reply; and will endeavor to do so in as brief and appropriate a manner as I can. The first point in his communication is embodied in the following terms: "These sheets seem to imagine that they are shouting the most inspiring battle-cries of reform, when they are denouncing 'the obscenity of the Bible' or proclaiming to their readers the disgrace of some minister." Of course, Mr. Neville has a perfect and undoubted right thus to express himself; but, really, it does seem to me that this attitude of liberal papers, in regard to the obscene portions of the Bible, as also in regard to the deeds of many of the clergy, is a fair and legitimate one. Claiming, as these papers do, to represent freethought and liberal views, I do not very well see how they can do differently than to thus express themselves. Further along, Mr. Neville writes: "Certainly, a decent respect for the feelings and beliefs of the orthodox world is one of the essential elements in the composition of a truly liberal paper." No doubt, these words express the exact views of Mr. Neville, in the premises. In my own case, however, I fail to see why liberal papers should take undue pains to respect the feelings and beliefs of the orthodox. So far as my own experience is concerned,—and that in more than one instance,—I have not found the orthodox particularly careful to respect the feelings and beliefs of freethinkers. I am of the opinion that in too many instances there is a disposition on the part of freethinkers to follow the plan of turning one cheek when the other is smitten. I think that, in so doing, we liberals and freethinkers are inviting renewed treatment of the abovementioned character at the hands of the orthodox devotees. There is no use in cringing like spaniels. Let us show that we have rights and privileges, which we are not disposed to yield or surrender to any class of theologians, even if they claim to be ever so "orthodox." We owe it to ourselves to take this course There is no other course for us to take. It will not do to manifest a timid, halting, temporizing spirit. Having rights, let us dare maintain and preserve them.

Very truly yours,

Edwin H. Bartlett.

For the Free Religious Index.

DIVINE MOTHERHOOD AND FATHERHOOD.

In the Index, of June 16, in an essay on the "Religion of the Future," it is asserted that three essential features of the new religion, like the old, are the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood and divinity of man, but not a word is said about motherhood. Now, I would respectfully ask, Is not the motherhood as essential and as important an element and feature in any explanation of the origin of things as the fatherhood? The old religion is based on a male God, and the feminine principle is ignored. But the feminine principle is just as necessary as the masculine; and, if you personify the latter, then why should you not the former as well?

In the same essay, the Original Source of all things is asserted to be one Supreme Energy. Now, force or energy can have no existence without two forces. For the evolution of force there must be two forces to act against each other, else there is no force at all. So that duality is a necessary feature in the first primal cause or origin of things, without which no energy could manifest itself. Franklin Smith.

Dedham, Mass.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

INFANTA.

O daughter of art that is ever unrest,
The robes of the purple will cover thy breast;
But harms of the world to the hope in thy heart
Will sever thy life and its anchors apart.
And war-storms will shatter thy temples of truth;
And thistles will grow in the days that are youth,
To mock with th ir mocking of thorns at thy plea
To God that is Beauty and Go l that is Free.
The roots of the laurel will hurt in thy brain;
And men will seem little and hopelessly vain,—
As fools, with their idols and shibboleth crie-;
As fools, with their folly of hoarding of lies;
As demons of folly and traders that sell
The ashes and chaff and the charters of hell;
As fools, with a folly that mocks in their creeds
In Nazara's name at his kindliest deeds.
But roses and birds from a sunnier clime,
With wearing and wasting and ruin of time,
Will make in the wrecks of thy temples their homes,
Redeeming the broken and desolate domes
With love that is motherhood, love that is might,
With song that is glory and bloom that is light.
O child of immortal and child of unrest,
The heart of a poet will beat in thy breast.

Willard Pennington.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 30, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE W. COOKE, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

A CORNER-STONE OF FAITH.

Being asked recently what was the fundamental, central principle of our own personal faith, our answer was, "Belief and trust in the universe." This is a principle which we believe to be substantiated both by intuition and experience. But it is not our purpose here to go into the philosophy of it. We wish simply to regard it in its aspect as a foundation principle. By belief and trust in the universe, we mean reliance upon the facts of the universe, whatever they may be, and upon the purport of those facts as man gradually discovers what it is; and, by "universe," we mean all actual or possible existences of persons and things.

It is a principle, then, that goes below all possible creeds. All the creeds, all the statements of faith that have ever been made, are only attempts to interpret man's personal relations to the universe in which he finds himself. But the creeds are all written from a human and therefore changing stand-point. The statements are all made by fallible human beings. At the best, therefore, they can only be partial and incomplete. The vision of the observer is necessarily limited, finite; while the objects toward which vision is directed are boundless, infinite. Only a segment of them can possibly be included in the vision. The facts cannot all be seen at once. The range of them is constantly widening. Facts upon facts and new realms of facts are being constantly discovered. No creed that man has made could ever embrace them all. Even though the creed may include a statement concerning Almighty Being, what finite mind could ever comprehend such a being, what statement ever adequately define him in his entirety or trace perfectly all the threads of relation that must exist between such a being and mankind? As thought widens and new facts are discerned, the old statements must obviously look narrow and poor. The new knowledge at first is put into the old creed, and an attempt is made to make the creed carry it. But, by and by, the very increase of the knowledge bursts asunder the old creed; and a new one has to be framed, to meet, however, in time the same fate.

The formal creed, therefore, whether written in church covenant or in Bible or pronounced by the lips of world-revered prophet, is no sure reliance. The statement made for one generation or one age or one nation, and adapted to that, is necessarily imperfect and must be outgrown. Time and advancing knowledge are the natural enemies of every statement of religious belief that was ever formulated. We must get below all the statements of faith, which are the temporary, changeable interpretations of man's relation to the universe, to a principle that grasps and covers that relation itself in all its possibilities, before we reach a foundation that is impregnable to the assaults of time and knowledge. Such a principle is that stated above. When we say, "We believe in and trust and accept the universe," we touch that underlying ground-foundation of all enduring religious faith, than which nothing can be deeper, nothing higher, nothing wider, to which there is no possible outside, and from which, therefore, nothing can be excluded. This is a principle that includes and covers all that is: all the facts there are and whatever they are, personal or impersonal, known or unknown; all actual existences and relationships, whether already comprehended or yet to be comprehended or to remain to us incomprehensible. We accept and trust the universe in all its actuality and possibility. This is the corner-stone of our faith. If a new name were wanted for those who hold a faith thus grounded, why not call them Cosmians?

LIBERTY IN UNITARIANISM.

Rev. J. T. Sunderland, a radical Unitarian minister of Ann Arbor, has lately been writing a series of letters to the Alliance, expounding the principles, or what he regards as the principles, of Unitarianism, to the readers of this liberal orthodox weekly. It appears that this organ of Professor Swing has been hinting very broadly that, if the Unitarian denomination would but get rid of the radicals, it might form an alliance with the liberal orthodox, represented by Swing, Beecher, Thomas, and Brooks; and the fruit of the union would be a grand Orthodoxo-Unitarian body, liberal enough for all creation, and Christian enough to be sure of salvation hereafter. But Mr. Sunderland, much as he is drawn toward the Swing phase of Orthodoxy, cannot consent to a divorce between conservative and radical Unitarianism. The reason which he assigns why the Unitarian body cannot, if it were so disposed, rid itself of its radicals, is because you can find no place for the cleavage. Channingism merges into Parkerism by such insensible gradations that nowhere along the line can you find a spot for denominational excision. He admits that there was a time when—to quote his language—"Unitarians were somewhat agitated about 'wings,' and over the thought of 'radical' and 'conservative.' But the signs are pretty clear that that time has gone by, and gone never to return. We are none of us sufficiently sure that we have got all the light there is, or that we are infallible in our views of religious truth, to be willing to disfellowship good men and true, who in essential matters are with us, . . . even if they do take somewhat more advanced ground regarding miracles and Bible criticism than some of the rest of us see our way clear to take. . . . Unitarianism in this country has reached the point where it is no longer afraid of radicals or conservatives, so only that they are religious and earnest men."

Now, such a statement from Mr. Sunderland respecting the spirit of fellowship of the American Unitarian body sounds very strange to those who know the history of that body for the last fifteen years, and see the present doctrinal position of the denomination. We heartily wish that the Unitarian body were as free as Mr. Sunderland represents, and evidently believes it to be; but it is not so. The trouble with the gentleman and other Liberals like him is that he mistakes his own "ism" for Unitarianism. Sunderlandism, indeed, would be "unwilling to disfellowship good men and true," because of theological or christological differences of opinion; but Unitarianism has disfellowshipped, does disfellowship, and means to disfellowship every man who will not wear its dogmatic yoke. Mr. Sunderland, and no other man, has any authority to define for the body what Unitarianism is. They have defined that for themselves. If he wishes to inform the orthodox readers of the Alliance how very broad is the fellowship of the Unitarian denomination, let him refer them to their published official statement of faith. He will find it recorded in the action of the National Conference, which first met in New York in the spring of 1866, and has had biennial meetings since in Syracuse, New York, Boston, and Saratoga, and published yearly in their "Year-Book." There, he may read whom, and only whom, the Unitarian body invites to its fellowship.

The credal article in their Constitution reads thus: "Reaffirming our allegiance to the gospel of Jesus Christ, and desiring to secure the largest unity of the spirit and the widest practical coöperation, we invite to our fellowship all who wish to be followers of Christ."

That is the breadth of the Unitarian fellowship. We commend it to Mr. Sunderland, when he advises the readers of the Alliance that Unitarianism is "unwilling to disfellowship any good man and true." Does he mean to tell us that every good man and true must wish to be a "follower of Christ"? As he defines that phrase, possibly; but not as thousands of "good men and true" must define it for themselves, so that they are practically excluded from the Unitarian fellowship and field of work. In our opinion, the proper definition of the phrase "follower of Christ" is the popular one; and the popular definition is the common orthodox one. It signifies not only a moral life, but more,—a theological belief, an attitude of mind toward Jesus as a religious teacher, quite different in kind from that we hold toward any other character, past or present. No man, in our opinion, can properly say that he wishes to be a "follower of Christ" who simply desires to possess his spirit of brotherly love and kindness. You might just as logically and properly say you wished to be a follower of Gautama Buddha, and call yourself a Buddhist, because you admire the loving spirit of this Christ of India. Such a confounding of language leads to confusion of ideas, and is only pardonable in those who are so blind that they cannot see a point till they get their noses on to it.

But whether we are right or wrong in the meaning we attach to this credal clause is not the question. It is a simple matter of fact that large numbers of radical people, "good men and true," define the phrase as we define it, and are therefore disfellowshipped. This is the truth; and Mr. Sunderland cannot afford to blink it, and thereby blind others to the true status of the Unitarian denomination. You cannot tell where to draw the line dividing the radicals and conservatives, therefore you cannot separate them, he says. Why, the line is already drawn,—drawn so as to cut off such men as Frothingham, Abbot, Adler, Hinckley, and Gannett, and generally all the members of the Free Religious Association. The dividing line was drawn along the ninth article of the Constitution. We were cut off, and have been cut off for more than ten years. Again and again, the attempt has been made at the biennial meetings of the Conference to graft the severed limb upon the old trunk, by Unitarians of the spirit of Mr. Sunderland East and West, but in vain. Meanwhile, however, the severed slip has been planted, and has taken firm root, and promises something good in the "Free Religious Association." As to Unitarianism, it is doing a large work in many ways. We rejoice at its success. If Mr. Sunderland shall claim for it that it is eminently "respectable," especially around Boston, we admit it. If he shall claim that it usually obeys the laws, and insists that others shall do the same, we admit it. If he shall claim that Unitarianism, as a rule, gives liberally to educational, charitable, philanthropic objects, we freely grant it, and give it our blessing. If he shall, moreover, claim that Unitarianism, far more than any other sect of Christianity, teaches freedom, fellowship, character in religion, we admit it. But when he goes still further, and claims before the readers of the Alliance that Unitarianism has no creed, but welcomes "all good men and true" to its fellowship who are in essential accord in spirit and purpose, then we protest that the gentleman is palming off a bit of Sunderlandism for Unitarianism, and he ought to be taught better morals. So long as the Unitarian body in convention assembled has formulated and published its condition of membership, and has reaffirmed that decision again and again, we think that we are bound to accept that statement as the position of "Unitarianism." There is no other authoritative measure of what the name stands for. When the gentleman writes another letter to the Alliance defining the Unitarian fellowship, will he let that body speak for itself? And, to bring before its readers the real hospitality of that faith, let him put the platforms of Unitarianism and Free Religion side by side. Here they are. See how they look :—

Digitized by Google

Unitarian Fellowship.

This is the "preamble" of the Constitution adopted by "The National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches" in April, 1865 :—

WHEREAS the great opportunities for Christian labor and consecration at this time increase our sense of the obligations of all disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ to prove their faith by self-denial, and by the devotion of their lives and possessions to the service of God and the building up of the kingdom of his Son.

And here follow nine articles, defining the name, constitution, and purpose of this body. It cannot be said that the Unitarians did not know that the language of this preamble was obnoxious to the radicals in their body. The "Battle of Syracuse," in October of 1866, where F. E. Abbot and others fought for freedom within the denominational limits and were defeated, is on record. But still, fearing that some of the radicals would steal into the body through some cat-hole in the door of the preamble, the conservatives, in October, 1870, under the leadership of Rev. G. H. Hepworth, attempted to shut up every possible avenue of ingress to radicals, by compelling the body to adopt a lengthy, formulated creed. They failed to accomplish all they aimed for, but did not fail to force the body upon a compromise platform. Instead of limiting their fellowship by a long creed, they limit it by a short creedlet. And this is it, already referred to. Let us repeat it for Mr. Sunderland :—

ART. IX. Reaffirming our allegiance to the gospel of Jesus Christ, and desiring to secure the largest unity of the spirit and the widest practical coöperation, we invite to our fellowship all who wish to be followers of Christ.

That article does indeed welcome every Roman Catholic in the land, every Evangelical Christian, every man who "wants to be a Christian"; but it does not welcome the Free Religionist or the man of whatever name or no name, who may have as much "enthusiasm for humanity" as any Unitarian in that denomination, but who thinks that to wish to be a follower of truth is a vaster, grander, diviner desire than to "wish to be a follower of Christ."

These people are excluded, they were meant to be excluded, they are well known to be excluded by Unitarians from their denomination; and Mr. Sunderland should so inform the readers of the Alliance. Here is a hospitality of faith as wide as the one he describes and desires. We welcome him to this Free Religious Fellowship.

ARTICLE I. of the Constitution.—This organization shall be called the Free Religious Association, its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

ART. II.—Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief, or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief, or as interfering in any other way with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural "right of every rational being," etc.

When Unitarians have adopted a platform as broad as this, then, and not till then, has Mr. Sunderland a right to say of them, "Unitarianism in this country has reached the point when it is no longer afraid of radicals or conservatives, so only that they are religious and earnest men."

W. H. S.

THE MORAL OF ŒDIPUS.

In the many discussions of the morality of the great Greek tragedy, an obvious point seems to have been entirely overlooked; namely, that it is not the will of the gods as expressed by the oracle, but the attempt to escape the predicted fate by any means, however guilty, which brings on the disastrous result. Goethe says :—

"Thou must not resist thy fate,
Neither must thou shun it blindly:
If thou'lt go and meet it straight,
'Twill invite thee on most kindly."

So, in "Macbeth," Banquo does not feel bound to scheme for the accomplishment of the prophecy which makes him "father to a line of kings," but Macbeth no sooner finds his ambitious imaginings shaped into a distinct promise than he rushes to the swiftest and guiltiest means of securing their fulfilment.

Had Laicus and Jocasta believed that what came from the gods must be for good and not for evil, and fulfilled their duty to the child, some other explanation of the oracle would have revealed itself, as was so frequently the case in classic mythology; but, full of distrust in the gods, they seek by their cunning sin to kill the babe, and escape the predicted danger. It is the desertion of the duties of the parent which alone brings the fulfilment of the fatal oracle within the bounds of probability. Œdipus also deserts the duties of his position, and, instead of checking the violence of temper which made a parricidal crime possible, he gives way to it, and slays the unknown stranger for a slight offence. Thus, this sublime drama does not celebrate a blind, inexorable fate crushing the innocent with undeserved suffering, but vindicates the moral law which makes the outward act the result of the inward nature.

"Our temperament is our fate," says Alcott. The way in which we control it or yield to it makes our character and our destiny. E. D. C.

PRACTICAL PREACHING.

The words of those who strive to practise what they preach reach the hearer, in all times and places, with tenfold power. They bear with them a sort of unction that stirs the will and tends to set in motion among those who come within their range purposes and action of kindred vitality.

Mr. W. M. Salter, who filled the desk of the Parker Memorial last Sunday at the closing service of the season, spoke with inspiring fervor of the need of reconstruction in social aims and work; of the pressing claims of the less-favored classes for culture and comfort from those of higher resources; and the absolute necessity of such exertion on the part of the latter, if they would be just exponents of the noblest elements in human capacity.

He made large citation from the writings of Channing; and, to those who happened to know of the practical efforts of this young preacher in trying to benefit and elevate the most needy who fall within his reach, the stirring words of that elder prophet came with fitting energy from his lips. When radical societies shall undertake in good earnest the principles thus urged upon conviction of the highest and best in the human soul, there will be small danger of bankruptcy from empty pews. J. P. T.

WE have already explained to our readers that Professor Adler, owing to severe family cares and afflictions during the past year, combined with his peculiar method of preparing his lectures, has been unable fully to keep the promise he authorized us to make, that he would furnish one lecture for publication in the Index each month. So keenly alive, however, is his conscience to a sense of the obligation that, since his lectures in Chickering Hall closed for the season, he has been using a considerable portion of his time in recalling and preparing several of them for the Index, which will be printed in due time. We are sure that our readers will share our grateful appreciation of this labor, which was induced by a delicate sense of honor, and carried through for their benefit.

THE Seymour Times, Indiana, a journal of the extreme materialistic type of Liberalism, is moved to a long article by our correspondent Mr. Neville's criticism of "Liberal Newspapers," in the Index for June 9. The article is evidently inspired by the motive of self-defence; but it takes the occasion to deal rough blows upon what it calls the "Boston, free-religious" style of Liberalism over Mr. Neville's shoulders, stating that he "hails from Boston or thereabout." We do not know how far from Boston "thereabout" may extend, but it happens that Mr. Neville "hails" from Missouri. If he, therefore, is within the radius of "Boston culture," there is a chance that our Seymour brother may by and by be touched by the same beneficent power.

THREE hundred and seventy-five Roman Catholic pupils have been withdrawn from the public schools of Philadelphia, because one of the teachers read portions of history in an ordinary historical exercise concerning former misdoings of the Catholic Church in Europe. The school directors rightly sustain the teacher, claiming that she merely stated well-known facts in connection with the events of certain historical periods.

THE American Archæological Institute proposes to establish at Athens a school for the study of archæology. The project meets with much favor among scholars, who are interested in this line of investigation. Certainly, the advantages of location for the prosecution of such studies cannot fail to be very great, and the contributions to classical knowledge increased in a correspondent ratio.

Digitized by Google

SOIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE editor of the Popular Science Monthly, in his special department of the July number, has some timely, and, as usual, vigorous writing under the caption of "The Science of Biblical Criticism," suggested by the recent revision of the New Testament. Speaking of science in general, he says: "In the newspaper column of 'Science,' we have a list of results of late experiments of all kinds. In looking over many scientific periodicals, it would be inferred that the term is restricted to physical science. From the text-books, we should conclude that science consists of the facts and principles that have been established and collected in different groups under this name. But it now begins to be understood that science properly means a method by which all these results are produced. It is a method of thought, a method of investigation, having for its simple object the establishment of the truths of nature. This method has grown up gradually in modern times to greater perfection, and has widened its scope, until now it includes many subjects with which it was at first supposed to have no relation." The latest and most impressive proof of the progress of the scientific spirit he regards the recent treatment of the Christian Scriptures: "Biblical criticism has long been affected by the scientific method, and is now to be controlled by it. How far the critical spirit is already advanced and diffused, so that the Bible is regarded as a book with a human and an imperfect side, and containing errors that can be removed with better knowledge, is shown by the fact that the English translation of two hundred and fifty years' standing has lately been attacked by a body of able and learned revisers, who, after eleven years of labor, have just given us a corrected edition of the New Testament. This is a great step in the direction of rationalism."

Alluding to Prof. Robertson Smith, who has lately been thrust from his chair in the Aberdeen University on account of his independent and scholarly way of dealing with the Bible, he continues: "The true scientific ground is here openly and broadly taken; and it is generally admitted that Prof. Robertson Smith's book represents authoritatively the scope and objects and method of the critical school which has been growing during the last half-century." Of course, our orthodox friends would be likely to take quite a different view of the case, which accounts for the close connection they are accustomed to give to the terms infidelity and science.

A BILL was passed the last session of the Illinois Legislature, authorizing insurance against tornadoes. It is not proposed, we assume, to insure against their occurrence.

ATTENTION has recently been drawn, in two or three articles of a popular character that have appeared, to some qualifications of the theory of evolution that are not generally recognized or but vaguely apprehended. We refer to arrested development or retrogression of the members of certain groups or classes of organization, side by side with the advancement of other members of them to more specialized and complex forms.

Although these facts are distinctly taken into account by Darwin, in his presentation of the doctrine of development, they have been an occasional stumbling-block to his critics. A writer in the Pall Mall Budget finds in the English representatives of the insectivora, the hedgehogs, moles, and shrews, indications of the arrest of development. "Time was," says he, "when the ancestors of dogs and deer and sheep and rabbits had risen no higher in the scale of life than these small-brained and stupid little creatures. But, while the other races have for ages outstripped their hedgehog-like ancestors, the hedgehogs themselves have remained at the same low level of development and intelligence."

In a review of The Evolution of the Cryptogams,—the product of the conjoint authorship of the French botanists, Saperta and Marion,—in a late number of Nature, it is remarked: "The authors lay some stress on the fact that a less complex organization does not necessarily imply relative antiquity. Circumstances exceptionally favorable to certain series of plants have forced their development to a state never afterward surpassed, but which, on the contrary, has retrogressed by the elimination of hastily developed or prematurely adopted types." The same subject is treated at length, and with much fulness of illustration, under the heading of "Degeneration," by Dr. Andrew Wilson, in the Popular Science Monthly for June and July. A thorough understanding of it would go far toward solving the problem over which so many have been troubled concerning the "missing links" in the progressive series of evolution.

STUDENTS of Biblical and Egyptian antiquities will naturally be interested in the discovery just made by explorers in Palestine of the Hittite city of Kadesh. It is related in Egyptian history that Rameses II., a contemporary of Moses, fought a battle with the Hittites near their sacred city above named, which is described as situated beside a broad stream running into a lake. The lake has been supposed to be identical with the Baheiret Horns, through which the Orontes passes; but the city had not been found. It is now quite conclusively demonstrated to the explorers that its site was the same as the ruins Tell Neby Mendeh. They lie on the left bank of the Orontes four English miles south of the lake. The modern name belongs to a sacred shrine on the highest part of the hill on which the ruins lie, and the name of Kadesh still survives. So that here is another instance," it is remarked, "of the vitality of the old names which linger in the minds of the people long after they have forgotten the Roman, Greek, or Crusaders' names. Not only the name is preserved, but the ancient moat of the city itself."

D. H. C.

ERRATA.—In our review last week of Parton's Life of Voltaire, Madame du Chatelet got transformed into "Madame du Chatelatini," and Madame Villette into "Madame Vellette."

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

JOAN OF ARC, "THE MAID." By Janet Tuckey. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The story of Joan of Arc, by whoever told, cannot fail to be of absorbing interest. She is a unique character in history, whose brief and marvellous career is, in some respects, enigmatical to even the modern rationalistic mind. Whatever conclusion one may adopt as to the "voices" under whose direction she professed to act, it is impossible for any reasonable person to doubt the patriotism, purity, and sincerity of her motives. She stands out in unspeakable moral relief and beauty, amid the coarseness, pusillanimity, and spiteful meanness of her surroundings. The contemplation of her character calls forth our admiration, and touches us with feelings of pity and tenderness. It is one that is inconceivable under other circumstances than such as those in which she lived. The author prepares her readers, in the opening chapter of her book, for the narrative that follows, by describing in a clear and summary way the distracted condition of France at the time Joan appeared upon the scene. She gives glimpses of the childhood of her remarkable life, amid the humble associations of her pleasant home, in the little village of Domremy, and indicates the extraordinary spirituality and moral and religious devotion which she evinced even thus early, and shows with what entire consistency of disinterestedness and faith she pursued her course through all its heart-breaking disappointments and vicissitudes to its bitter and most pitiful end. It is well to renew our acquaintance with one so good in bad times, and refresh our minds with the influence of a spirit so lofty in its endeavors, patient amid the most irritating trials, irreproachable and pure in conduct.

The volume is one of the biographical series which the Putnams are publishing under the title of the "New Plutarch," which will form a very choice collection of its class.

SORDELLO: A Story from Robert Browning, by Frederic May Holland, author of the Reign of the Stoics. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1881.

Admirers and students of Mr. Browning will welcome this book, or rather booklet, for it is all included in twenty-six pages; and the pages are as fair as the fine book-art of the Putnams habitually produces. Sordello is one of the most difficult of Browning's poems, both for understanding and for reading when one does understand it. Mr. Holland's essay helps in both ways. He first extracts and tells the story of the poem in simple prose, so as to make it intelligible, at least much more intelligible; and, in doing this, he leads a reader into that sympathy of feeling with the poem which is necessary for conveying the meaning when reading to others. Five or six pages of critical notes are added, and the actual historical basis of the poem stated. For there was a real poet named Sordello, some of whose life-incidents and mental characteristics Browning has woven into his poem. A few of Sordello's poems are still extant, of which Mr. Holland gives a pleasant specimen. The book gives evidence of accurate literary research.

THE July Atlantic retrenches in the number of articles, and expands them in length. It seems less like a plate of assorted literary cake than usual, and the fewer kinds have a finer relish. John C. Dodge writes of "Trial by Jury," with an attempt to overthrow this fundamental Saxon custom. Indeed, he shows that it is not Saxon, but post-Norman in English history. "Andrew's Fortune," by Sarah O. Jewett, is a short story, fairly told. The scene is laid in a farmhouse. "H. H." writes a poetic description of a Norwegian journey, entitled "Four Days with Sauna," the latter word being the name of her fellow-tourist. John Fiske answers the question, "What is Mythology?" by digging down to the Greek root of the word. Charles Eliot Norton gives a short account of the "Greek Play at Harvard." Gail Hamilton condescends to use her true name, and indulges in several pages of what may be called "sputtering" over the history of the famous "Ladies' Deposit." She seems to be trying to make the newspapers, the city government, and mankind in general, responsible for that piece of feminine cunning. Henry A. Clapp follows with several pages of criticism on the same theme. He names his article "Sympathetic Banking," and takes occasion to point out the weakness of Miss Dodge's defence. Miss Phelps' "Friends: A Duet" is played out in this number. We are astonished at the denouement. It is very rare that a silly woman becomes suddenly wise, as the novelist allows her heroine to be in the final chapter. Miss Phelps' heroines always seem slightly French in their morality, possessing exalted ideals, but also keeping a flag conspicuously flying over those ideals. "Kaiser" is decidedly the best character in the story. He has the marks of common-sense Henry James, Jr., continues his "Portrait of a Lady," and brings about a new complication in an already complicated plot.

THE Sanitarian for July contains three stated papers, at least, of great practical importance to every community: "Soil and Water Pollution," by Moses T. Runnels, M.D., an elaborately illustrated paper, showing the nature of water pollution, how it is effected, and its dangers. The subject is dealt with in a clear, common-sense manner, and is particularly commendable to general readers. "The Necessity and Means of Removing Organic Refuse from Populous Places," by O. W. Wight, M.D., Commissioner of Health of Milwaukee, deals with a subject of interest to all city authorities. Dr. Wight is evidently an officer of much practical experience; and while he forcibly states the dangers of organic refuse, and the absolute necessity of preventing its accumulation, he is by no means blind to the economic aspects of the question. His conclusions are eminently practicable and commendable. "Cellars," by A. N. Bell, M.D., the editor, is a paper of great interest to everybody. It not only deals with cellars in a technical sense,—showing how important it is to have them dry, light, and ventilated, and how to effect these objects,—but with building ground and materials of structure. No one can read this paper without the satisfaction of feeling that he has thereby been rendered much more competent for the preservation of his own health and life, and of all who depend upon him. The other stated papers are "The Contagious Diseases Acts of Great Britain" and the "Italian Society of Alienists," both giving practical experiences on subjects of great importance in the practical economy of State medicine. The leading editorial, in review of a recent paper by T. J. Turner, M.D., Medical Director United States Navy, on the "Hygiene of Emigrant Ships," is particularly timely in its relation to the thousands of emigrants now daily arriving at our shores, and the abuses to which they are subject, in consequence of the excessive crowding and other defective arrangements of emigrant ships. The importance of space, dryness, cleanliness, wholesome provisions, and systematic care, is all forcibly dwelt upon, and with sufficiency of detail to show that the abuses which now so commonly obtain are practically avoidable, and should be made so. "Menu," the "Mortality Statistics" of the chief cities, United States and foreign, and review of "Publications on Sanitary Subjects," are, as usual, profitable reading. We are sure we cannot do our readers a better service than to commend to their attention this excellent magazine.

THE Art Amateur begins its fifth volume with the issue for the current month. Besides the usual variety of patterns for art work, among which will be found drawings for a set of tiles, the number contains many interesting illustrations, including sketches of works, exhibited at the last salon in Paris. The account of the cleverness of Edward Mason's sons, Percy and Leon, encourages the hope that two artists of extraordinary merit will soon be added to the list of American painters. The illustrations in the article on "The Style of the Empire" give an excellent idea of the luxurious taste of the age of the first Napoleon. Entertaining and instructive matter is furnished in each department of this useful periodical.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

ON

"Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion."

BY KATE GANNETT WELLS.

V.

Religion.

[In the following suggestions, as outlines of a Sunday-school Talk, it is well to avoid all philosophical or varying definitions of religion, laying the emphasis of the teaching, instead, upon the practical application of religion to the every-day affairs of life. None of the series is intended to serve as direct question and answer for the teacher and scholar; but it is hoped that it may be useful as a basis for instruction through conversation, the most successful way of teaching, in which the teacher would expand or condense, deepen or simplify, the meanings here implied, according to the requirements of a class.]

Let the first work of the hour be to draw out from the children their idea of the meaning of the word Religious. Let them compare their answers, and see if there is any agreement of thought between them, or whether they were chiefly alike in their indefiniteness. Then be guided by these answers to ask such questions as shall help them to formulate their ideas; e.g., Does Religion make people sober?

Do religious people dance or go to parties and theatres?

Are good children religious children?

Is it only old people who are religious?

Such questions, simple as they are, will help the children to become interested and talkative; and, from their varying answers, they can be led to see that a sense of relationship and obligation to an Infinite Power is involved in the idea of religion; for they probably have said enough to show, that they thought they ought and they ought not to do certain things, because of some other reason. Thus, the teacher is enabled more directly to lead her children to estimate rightly the universality and growth, the personal necessity, and the general need of religion in the world.

1. Its universality and growth.—Was there any religion in the world before the birth of Christ? If so, where and when?

What is the earliest form of religion, and why?

Fetichism, "because, by means of his fetich, the negro thinks he can control his deity."

What is the second form of religion? Totemism, or belief in beings of a higher and less material nature, like trees, rivers, animals.

NOTE.—If the class is sufficiently advanced, show them how, after this second form, religion undergoes modifications, owing either to the intellectual progress of the races or to the changes produced by physical causes.

What is the next general advance in religion?

Idolatry: the idol assumes the human form; idolatry is closely connected with the worship of ancestors. The dead were commemorated by statues, idols, which gradually became deities; and these deities have generally been warrior kings.

What is polytheism?

The worship of many gods. As one god was found more powerful than another, the worship of one god arose out of the recognition and worship of many gods.

How does monotheism change?

From a material to a more and more spiritual conception of God, the moral conception of a god growing nobler and more lovable.

NOTE.—The amount of illustration and extension of the above line of thought depends on the kind of class; but, with any class, these general processes of growth should be clearly outlined, that the children may understand that a sense of religion has been and is universal, and that it is also a matter of growth.

Is our idea of religion still growing?

Are there not opposite opinions about the extent of the meaning of the word?

Do not some confine religion to a certain sect or denomination? Do not others say it means devotion to any ideal?

Is it merely a matter of intellectual belief, or of personal experience, or of certain ceremonies, or of a spirit of love and helpfulness and trust that pervades the whole life?

Explain by illustrations, such as a bigot, a suddenly "converted sinner," a ritualist, and the best, truest, dearest person one knows.

2. Personal necessity of religion.—Why is religion necessary for the individual?

Because without it one lacks the finest development of character. It is the realism of the soul, the looking up to and striving after the highest possible endeavor and purpose. It is self-consecration to noble work for one's self and for others. Religious feeling adds intensity to the sense of obligation and relationship. The moral sense itself is strengthened by it.

Are religious feelings then different from the ordinary feelings of love, fear, reverence, aspiration, such as we feel for friends and nature?

No: religious feeling is not a new feeling; but when felt for the infinite power, for God, it becomes religious feeling. Trust and reverence is the beginning of religion; yet, unless religious feeling works through and with moral laws and means, it is of no real value. (Many revivals, death-bed conversions, and sudden changes of heart are emotional alone, therefore temporary and injurious.)

Is emotion an element of religion?

Yes: and a justifiable one, for strong, healthy emotion enriches the soul.

Then it is manly to be religious?

Yes: boys and men are often afraid to own that they have religious feelings, lest they be considered sentimental or weak. Real religious feeling is helpful, brave, and reverential.

3. General need of religion.—Why does mankind need religion?

Because without it we are likely to work chiefly for temporary measures, and not for the promotion of the permanent and highest interests of mankind. Religion cares for the soul as well as for the body of man.

Must it not care for the body first, in order to reach the soul?

Yes, as a general rule; but that does not detract from the supremacy of the soul.

Is it because of these highest interests that Sunday should be partly observed by going to church and Sunday-school?

Is not morality as essential to mankind as religion?

Yes, but they help each other; yet a moral man may lack the fineness and tenderness of thought that comes from religion.

Does extent of knowledge lessen religious feeling?

Does not judgment, reason, often follow on moral impulse, and strengthen it?

Is not religion an element in all religious systems and in the lives of individuals?

Does it not mean the best expression of the best thoughts and feelings on the best subjects, and the best outward manner of performing the best actions from the best motives?

Yes: religion is the best.

How can every one help on this development of the best? Either by active belief in it or by silent approval. Which will you do? Which is the franker, braver course?

If religion is the highest form of goodness, does it not then become a power?

How do children first realize the principle of religion?

By their involuntary love and reverence for their parents as representing to them power and friendliness, which feelings expand into a sense of kinship with, and worship, through growing knowledge, of the infinite power and friendliness.

Is religion greater, then, than either freedom, fellowship, or character?

Are not all three necessary for its highest manifestation?

NOTE.—Ask the children to apply each attribute to religion, and see how, without each, religion could not be the highest manner of living. Substitute for them subjection, clannishness, and weakness; and religion loses its three grand necessary characteristics. Human society and the individual life need the three, in order that religion may work for the promotion of the highest interests in both society and life.

Why is freedom necessary in religion?

That the idea of religion may not be confined to any special set of doctrines, but that, through the spirit of inquiry and reverence, the knowledge of how to choose will be acquired, which will end in "perception of the best." No authority should be exercised by individuals, churches, synods, or councils in compelling another to accept as the best some one's else perceptions rather than his own.

Why is fellowship necessary in religion?

Because organization and association is needed in any extended plan of action for the permanent and highest interests of mankind. By feeling that we have the same end in view, we learn to have sympathy for others and comprehension of their means.

Why is character necessary in religion?

Because loyalty to truth and adherence to duty are chief elements of character, which, carried into religion, make it an active principle in work for others, instead of a sentimental emotion.

NOTE.—Then, by illustration, let the children feel how the understanding of the facts of nature, of the wonder that is wrapped up in the mystery of plant and crystal, lead to religious feeling. By chosen lines from favorite hymns arouse their emotions of gratitude and adoration; by anecdotes of religious feeling, culminating in action, awaken their zeal for action,—e.g., the story of the Crusades, the establishment of the Dutch Republic, or the founding of our own Puritanic commonwealth. Make the feeling for the necessity of religion pervade their souls as a glow, a warmth of exaltation, an intellectual need, a practical result.

Thus, in this lesson, all specific definition of religion has been avoided, because what one might accept as conclusive would be partial to another, and also and chiefly because the child might thus be induced to regard religion as a definition, when the main purpose is to persuade him to incorporate its spirit into his life, remembering always that religion grows as knowledge and reverence grow.

Digitized by Google

[These lessons are reprinted in a convenient four-page sheet, and can be furnished, from the beginning, at the office of the Free Religious Association, at one cent each, exclusive of postage.]

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Ex-Rev. W. H. H. Murray is in Texas, and has a farm there.

Thomas Nast is on the way to the Black Hills, where he owns a mine.

Secretary Windom is winning golden opinions for his management of the Treasury.

George Eliot's mother is still living at the advanced age of ninety years. She is in Hobart, Tasmania.

Mr. E. C. Stedman is to read a poem at the opening session of the Concord School of Philosophy, July 11.

Mr. B. F. Underwood has returned to his home in Thorndike, Mass., from his spring lecturing tour in the West.

Mr. Edward A. Freeman, the popular English historian, will soon make an extensive tour of the United States, from which may come a book.

Mr. and Mrs. Professor Adler have spent the month of June at Rockaway Beach, Long Island. In July and August, they are to be at Gloucester, Mass.

President Garfield is one of the Trustees of Williams College, and is to make an address there at the inauguration of Mr. Franklin Carter as President of that institution.

Sojourner Truth takes pleasure in considering herself "de oldes' lecturer in de world." Her religion is of the liberal kind, and she does not believe in a "brimstone hell or a devil with a cloven foot and a pitchfork."

Mrs. Harriet H. Robinson, "Warrington's" widow, supplied the material concerning Massachusetts in the new History of Woman Suffrage; and she has now in Roberts Brothers' press a book on Massachusetts in the Woman's Rights Movement.

Mr. Giles B. Stebbins has returned to Chicago from his Eastern visit, and is again in the editorial chair of the Religio-Philosophical Journal. While he was in New England, the Journal printed a number of interesting letters from him.

Mr. Millais' well-known picture of the "Prince in the Tower" has just been sold in London for $19,000. The artist has lately had an unpleasant accident. As he was leaving a levée, a footman, in hastily shutting the carriage door, jammed two of the fingers of Mr. Millais' right hand, crushing them severely.

Dr. Howard Crosby says that the common version of the Bible is not perfectly intelligible to the common people, and that it has "little insidious obsolescences" running all through it. We can imagine that many of these common people would not quite understand that kind of thing.—New York Independent.

The Chinese Government having requested the services of an officer to organize for their navy a marine corps similar to our own, First Lieutenant D. Pratt Manning of the United States Marine Corps has been selected for the important duty, and has been granted permission to enter the service of the Chinese Government for that purpose.

Mrs. Gladstone is a benevolent woman and does many kind things for the villagers of Hawarden. She has given them an excellent coffee-house, which is open week-days and Sundays. She has also established near the castle a home for orphans. Many of the Gladstone servants have been on the estate twenty, thirty, and forty years.

It is said that Parnell will return to the United States and make an extensive stumping tour of the country, as soon as the land bill passes through the committee in the House of Commons. His speeches will be directed to the advocacy of local home rule for Ireland and the formation of a great confederacy of the kingdom and colonies.

Rev. Dr. Cheever, it seems, is still alive; or is this a voice from the tombs? He is reported as saying of Professor Robertson Smith's Encyclopædia Britannica article on the Bible, "It is a mere résumé of the speculations and conjectures of infidel critics; a primer of the creed of second-hand Rationalism for the use of those who cannot read German authorities in the original."

Mr. W. M. Salter preached for the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, Parker Memorial Hall, last Sunday. The services are now to be suspended till September. On a previous Sunday recently, Mr. Salter gave there a discourse on the subject, "After Free Religion, What?" of which we have heard high praise. We have it in hand ready for the printer as soon as the present press on our "Long Essay" department is over.

It seems that it was not Dr. Lorimer, but some of his injudicious friends, who thought, as we announced two weeks ago, that the charge that he had plagiarized from Dr. Parker, of London, could be thrown back against Dr. Parker for stealing from him. An Exchange says: "Lately, an egotistic collection of Sayings of Mine, by Dr. Parker, contained a sentence, 'No honest man had occasion to fear him; no unjust person could feel quite easy in his presence,' which Dr. Lorimer had used in the funeral sermon of Rev. Dr. Rollin H. Neale in 1879. Lorimer's friends saw a chance to hit back, and promptly accused Parker of plagiarizing from Lorimer; but it is since found that the expression was Parker's, and appeared in a sermon of his printed some months before Lorimer preached about Dr. Neale. This is one of the most unlucky set-backs possible. Apropos, Rev. Dr. Woolfolk, of Danville, Ky., writes to the Courier-Journal in championship of the unconscious absorption theory, which he says is satisfactory 'to any one familiar with psychological laws.' This reminds one, though of course it is wicked to say so, of the colored gentleman who, found with chickens in either pocket and one peeking out of the rents in his hat, couldn't imagine how they came there, unless they got in while he was praying down behind the old persimmon that stood just behind the chicken-roost."

FOREIGN.

The Khedive of Egypt, it is said, intends to create a department to deal specially with slave questions, the total abolition of slavery in Egypt being considered by his highness as of the greatest importance.

The Russian political police have arranged to send agents to track Russian Socialists in all the principal cities of Europe. Four will be sent to London, Paris, and Geneva respectively, and two to the capitals of each of the other European States.

In the speeches of a Deputation to Convocation on "The Infidelity and Indifference to Religion which so widely exist," it came out that the most successful churches in London in winning the masses are the Ritualistic. Especially in St. Alban's, Mr. Mackonochie's parish, "religion has been made to lay hold of the working classes."

A society entitled "The Rational Dress Society" has been formed, under the presidency of the Viscountess Harberton, in England, the objects of which are thus described: "To promote the adoption, according to individual taste and convenience, of a style of dress based upon considerations of health, comfort, and beauty, and to deprecate constant changes of fashion, which cannot be recommended on any of these grounds."

The Spiritualist Case.—In connection with this case, an intimation was given, as reported on Saturday, to Mr. E. D. Lewis for the applicants, and Mr. St. John Wontner for Mrs. Hart-Davies, to the effect that Sir James Ingham had decided to grant a summons against that lady for perjury alleged to have been committed in evidence given against the convict Susan Fletcher. Farther intimation has been sent to the legal advisers on both sides, to the effect that Sir James Ingham has reconsidered the information, and determined not to grant the summons, the matter alleged to have been falsely sworn to not being material to the issue either in the inquiry at this court or upon the trial at the Central Criminal Court.—Weekly Despatch, May 29.

Here is an instructive and significant story which is told by a correspondent of the Standard: "I happened last Sunday to attend two religious services, held within a few yards of each other. One was at St. James' Church, Piccadilly; the other at St. James' Hall. I found St. James' Hall crowded from end to end, galleries and all, with a congregation listening to a sermon delivered by Mrs. Booth, of the 'Salvation Army.' At St. James' Church, I found leaflets scattered in every pew, containing an appeal on behalf of the Bishop of London's Fund, describing the spiritual destitution of the metropolis, and the urgent need for more clergy, more parsonages, more schools, and more churches. Meanwhile, the congregation in this church, the centre of a most populous parish, in the middle of the season, was lamentably scanty. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that there was room for four times the number that were present."

The fanaticism of anti-clericalism is perhaps even less lovely than the bigotry against which it is directed. A story which is going the round of the Parisian press affords an illustration of a spirit which sets the teeth on edge quite as much as the intolerance of the persecuting priest: "A young girl who was being examined about the Crusades spoke of St. Louis. The examiner put on a look of astonishment, and replied: 'Mademoiselle, will you explain yourself? Is it Louis IX. of whom you wish to speak?' 'Yes, sir,' answered the girl. 'Very well, mademoiselle, call him Louis IX. I know that by great gifts of money they obtained his canonization from the clergy; but I do not know him under the name of St. Louis.'" One need not be a clerical to lament that a school inspector should use his office for the propagandism of his belief, whether religious or irreligious. But the Justice praises this examiner as "a brave man, who puts his conscience into his work." So did Torquemada.

The Anti-Jewish Agitation in Russia.—The Vienna correspondent of the Daily News says that advices from Brody state that the emigration of wealthy Jewish families from Russia into Austria continues. Much excitement prevails among the Jewish population of Lublin. In Kieff and other southern towns, military reinforcements are arriving to act against the plundering bands, and to compel the demoralized peasants to return to their agricultural occupations. A Nihilist manifesto has been distributed among them, which says the time has come to divide the estates of the present landlords among the peasants. A Reuter's telegram from St. Petersburg says that the Jewish community there are inclined to view with disfavor the steps taken by their brethren in England, and deprecate any intervention on the part of the British Government, as being calculated to retard the promised reforms in their behalf in Russia. In Upper Hungary (according to the correspondent of the Daily News), great irritation prevails against the Jews. In Tarpa, where a Jew suspected of incendiarism was recently thrown into a burning house and perished, the authorities have taken rigorous measures for the protection of the Jews.

JESTINGS.

Barnaby, who has three boys under the age of twelve years, says he supposes Darwin believed mankind to be descended from the monkey, because it gets into mischief so naturally and readily.

Two children were presented to a West Troy clergyman as candidates for baptism. One, a little girl, was asked if she had ever been baptized before. "Yes," was the answer, "and mine took, but Charlie's didn't."

Wife of an Episcopal clergyman to her washerwoman: "Well, Bridget, how did you like the sermon Sunday?" Bridget: "It was beautiful. I like to go to that church. It's so nice to see your husband courtesying around in his shroud."

"Do you think," asked a college student of a professor of theology, "that the lion and the lamb have never yet laid down together?" "I don't know," answered the professor; "but, if they have, I have no doubt that the lamb was missing from that date."

Drawing a Line.—Mr. Moses: "We've just started a new fake, Mr. Welch,—'Patent Majolica-handled Toothbrush and Unbreakable Glass Coal Scuttle Company Limited.' Join us, be a director, give us the use of your talent, and I guarantee you four times as much as you make by betting." Mr. Welch: "No, no, Mr. Moses: there's been too much of it during the last few months. Besides, though I am a swindler, I transact my business with men. I don't rob widows and half-witted elderly maiden ladies."

Digitized by Google

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
ELIZABETH B. CHASE, Providence, R.I.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.
ANNIE L. DIGGS, Lawrence, Kansas.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
CAROLINE M. SEVERANCE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

All letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to "Free Religious Association," at the office.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for one year, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN.

A COURSE OF LECTURES BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

AUTHOR'S AMERICAN EDITION. Cloth. 12mo.
PRICE $1.00.

For sale by FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX ASSOCIATION,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston.

DISCOURSES

BY

Frederic A. Hinckley.

The Sentiment in Religion. Just published.
The Cancer at the Heart.
What makes a Religious Society?

Price 10 cts. each; 20 copies for $1.00.

Also

Natural Religion. A Book of Selections for Sunday. School and Home Use.

Price 30 cts.

Send orders to the Author, Providence, R.I., or to Index office.

"An original thinker and an eloquent expounder of fruitful truth."

GEORGE H. CALVERT'S WORKS.

"Few men, probably none living, are his equals in the department to which he has given his especial attention. His books are genuine æsthetic studies in the best sense of the word."—Newport News.

Fine English Cloth. Price per vol. $1.50.

Essays Æsthetical.
Brief Essays and Brevities.
Some of the Thoughts of Joseph Joubert.
First Years in Europe.
Life and Work of Goethe. An Essay.
Charlotte von Stein. A Memoir. With Portrait.
Life of Rubens. With Portrait.
Arnold and Andre. An Historical Drama.
Wordsworth. A Biographic and Æsthetic Study. With Portrait.
Shakespeare. A Study.
Coleridge, Shelley, and Goethe. Biographic and Æsthetic Studies.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Catalogues free.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

POPULAR BOOKS

Sent by mail postpaid at

PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life. By W. R. Alger	$3.50
Creed and Deed. By Felix Adler	1.00
Radical Problems. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol	2.00
History of Civilization. By Buckle. 2 vols	4.00
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick	1.50
The Faith of Reason. By J. W. Chadwick	1.00
Aspirations of the World. By Lydia Maria Child	1.25
Self-Culture. By James Freeman Clarke	1.50
Origin of Species. By Charles Darwin	2.00
The Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin. 2 vols	3.00
History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. By John W. Draper	1.75
Myths and Myth-Makers. By John Fiske	2.00
Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. By John Fiske. 2 vols.	6.00
The Unseen World, and other Essays. By John Fiske.	2.00
Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. Representative Essays published for Free Religious Association	1.50
Heroines of Freethought. By Sara A. Underwood	1.75
Religion of Humanity. By O. B. Frothinghaam	1.50
Creed and Conduct. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Cradle of the Christ. By O. B. Frothingham	1.75
Rising and Setting Faith. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Visions of the Future. By O. B. Frothingham	1.00
Beliefs of the Unbelievers. By O. B. Frothingham	.25
Man's Place in Nature. By Huxley	1.25
On the Origin of Species. By Huxley	1.00
Lay Sermons. By Huxley	1.75
The Gods and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Ghosts and other Lectures. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
The Mistakes of Moses. By R. G. Ingersoll	1.25
What must we do to be saved? By R. G. Ingersoll	.25
Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion. By Samuel Johnson:
India	5.00
China	5.00
Problems of Life and Mind. By G. H. Lewes. Vols. I. and II. Per vol.	3.00
The Physical Basis of Mind. By G. H. Lewes	3.00
Origin of Civilization. By Sir John Lubbock	2.00
American Religion. By John Weiss	1.50
Wit, Humor, and Shakspeare. By John Weiss	2.00
The Immortal Life. By John Weiss	1.50
A True Republic. By Albert Stickney	1.00
Sketches of the Radical Club of Boston. With Essays, Discussions, and Poems, by Emerson, Whittier, Longfellow, Holmes, Potter, Abbot, Higginson, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Peirce, Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe, and others. Illustrated	2.00
The Childhood of the World. By Edw. Clodd	1.50
Childhood of Religions	1.25
History of Materialism. By Prof. F. A. Lange. 3 vols. Each	3.50
History of Rationalism. By Lecky. 2 vols. Each	2.00
Buddha and Buddhism. By C. D. B. Mills	1.25
Chips from a German Workshop. By Max Müller. Per vol	2.50
Vol. I. Essays on the Science of Religion
Vol. II. Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs
Vol. III. Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities
Vol. IV. Comparative Philology, Mythology, etc
The Bible for Learners. By Dr. H. Oort, Professor at Amsterdam, and Dr. I. Hooykaas, Pastor at Rotterdam, with the assistance of Dr. A. Kuenen, Professor at Leyden. A popular exposition of the "Dutch School" of modern inquiry in the historical study of the Bible.
Vol. I. Patriarchs; Moses; Judges	2.00
Vol. II. Kings and Prophets	2.00
Vol. III. New Testament	2.00
Age of Reason. By Thomas Paine	.50
Morals of Evolution. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Talks about Jesus. By M. J. Savage	1.00
Belief in God. By M. J. Savage	1.00
The Reign of the Stoics. By Fred. May Holland	1.25
Volney's Ruins; or, Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires	1.25

Any book in the above List, or any other obtainable book that may be desired, will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash.

Address: THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE, Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & [illegible]ER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., B[illegible]

GEO. W. PARK. G[illegible]PER

PUBLICATIO[illegible]

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Cornell University Library

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Ten Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents, 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

The Secular Review.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The Sole Journal of Constructive Secularism.

(Articles appear weekly by G. J. Holyoake.)

The SECULAR REVIEW has a distinct province. That province is defined by its name. It represents Secularism, which means the material and moral improvement of this life, so far as such can be determined from considerations purely human. This ground is practically common to those who have theological views and to those who reject them altogether. It is common ground also in politics, since Liberal and Conservative alike have Secular aim. Secularism concerns itself with material and moral science. It goes no further.

The SECULAR REVIEW being the sole journal representing Constructive Secularism, it may fairly ask the support of all who think this form of opinion should have open opportunity. Though special in principle, its columns are open to other views in its "Independent Department." It is neither the rival of, nor is it unfriendly to, any other paper. It merely seeks to do its own work.

Publishing Office: 84 Fleet St., London.

[Published every Thursday. Post-free, 2½d.]

GOOD PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. W. NEWMAN,
W. H. SPENCER,
CHARLES VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,
W. J. POTTER,

are for sale at this office, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single photographs, 15 cents each; complete set of Nine Photographs, $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 TREMONT PLACE,
Boston, Mass.

LADIES, USE

Corticelli SPOOL SILK AND TWIST.

IT IS THE BEST!

Brilliancy and durability of color, smoothness and evenness of size in thread, with softness of finish and freedom from all deleterious dye-stuffs, are the qualities which have established the reputation of the Florence, as the only Knitting Silk which has met with favorable consideration. It is for sale by dealers in fine fancy goods everywhere. Ask for it, and do not allow substitutes to be imposed upon you.

Samples of this Silk, and an illustrated Book of Rules for using the same, sent on receipt of a 3-cent stamp. Address

NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

WALTER C. BROOKS & CO.,

Tailors and Clothiers,

6 UNION STREET, BOSTON.

JOHN CURTIS. WALTER C. BROOKS.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

MARSTON'S DINING ROOMS.

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN,

23 & 27 Brattle Street, Boston.

Remember, THE BIG CLOCK is directly in front of our Dining Rooms.

R. MARSTON & CO.

Digitized by Google