A CONFIDENT talker in Sunday-schools, wishing to illustrate the difference between fiction and history, once came to sudden grief. He told in a graphic style the story of Jack and the beanstalk, to the great delight of his youthful audience. It didn't trouble them at all that the story was not true, and when he asked them, "Boys, do you believe the story?" they cried out with one voice, "No, sir; no, sir." Being pleased with his success, he went on to tell the historical story of David killing the huge Goliath with his sling. The boys listened with equal delight,—it was a mission school,—and when he asked confidently, "Do you believe this story, boys?" the answer came as promptly as before, "No, sir; no, sir." An explosion of laughter was inevitable, even from the grave superintendent and teachers, and the eloquent speaker was at his wits' ends.

Mr. Abbot's Classical School in New York City is intended to fit boys for the best Colleges by thorough individual instruction. It will open, Sept. 20, in the "Mott Memorial" building, No. 64 Madison Avenue, cor. 27th Street. Terms, $500 a year; number of pupils limited to twelve. For further information, apply on or after Sept. 13, between 3 and 6 P.M., to Francis E. Abbot, on the premises.

SUBSTANTIALISM;

—OR—

PHILOSOPHY OF KNOWLEDGE.

BY JEAN STORY.

Perceiving the oneness and continuous interchangeability of substance as essence and as form, the author discards the use of the term "spirit" and "matter," and substitutes therefor the term "essential substance," whose intrinsic elasticity or vitality is alike intact, whether condensed as form or expanded as essence or spirit; all the innumerable qualities of substance being solely the result of its spacial modifications. Viewing the phenomena of nature, the only source of positive knowledge, from this new stand-point, which differs from that whence any other system has been idealized, and accepting the exact sciences as the bases of speculative science, the author claims to present for public consideration a New System of Philosophy. Unarmed by other aid than its own intrinsic merits, it has been launched upon the stormy sea of public opinion to battle single-handed for its right to a voice in the general sentiments of the age.

The book is in cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. It can be obtained first hand at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. Price $1.50 at retail.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE soul is its own witness. The soul is its own refuge. Offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men.—Hindu.

THE life of every one is such as his love is. What any man loves is to him good. In heaven, by loving the Lord is not meant to love him as to person, but to love the good that is from him.—Swedenborg.

HE who begins by loving Christianity better than Truth will proceed by loving his own sect or church better than Christianity, and end in loving himself better than all.—Coleridge.

TRUTH is congenial to man. Moral truth is then most consummate, when, like beauty, it commends itself without argument. Man is apt to gravitate when he does not aspire. Whatever each man worships inwardly is his God, whether he knows it or not. The righteous not only does right, but loves to do right.—F. W. Newman.

THE letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.—Paul.

ASK not me, as Muftis can,
To recite the Alcoran.
Well I love the meaning sweet:
I tread the Book beneath my feet!
Lo, the God's love blazes higher,
Till all differences expire.
What are Moslems? What are Giaours?
All are love's, and all are ours.
I embrace the true believers,
But I reck not of deceivers.
Firm to heaven my bosom clings,
Heedless of inferior things.
Down on earth, there, under foot,
What men chatter know I not.

—Persian.

THERE are many words. Take the pith of them. Put a check on the tongue. Speak not much. Associate with the wise. Investigate the words of the teacher. He who knows what life is will seize his own: such as it is now, we will not possess it again. The travellers are hurrying on, expecting a purchase where there will be neither trade nor market.—Kabir (Hindu, sixteenth century).

BE true to thyself. Let no forms of business, no conventional arrangements of society, seduce thee into falsehood. Above all, be true to thyself in religious utterance, or remain forever silent. Speak only according to thine own genuine experience; and look well to it that thou repeatest no phrase prescribed by creeds or familiarly used by sects, unless that phrase really conveys some truth to thine own soul.—Lydia Maria Child.

SEEK only to be true, and you will hear truth speaking from heaven and from the earth and in your own being. Every one that is of the truth heareth her divine voice.—W. H. Furness.

HARMONY is the grand secret of universal being. There are no jarring chords in the music of the spheres. The laws of truth are severely simple, and refuse to assume the theatrical attitudes by which men would enhance their naked sublimity. The needle of human reason trembles violently on its centre at the deflections of error, prejudice, and passion; but its vibrations move through ever lessening arcs, and perpetually approximate to a final equilibrium. Philosophy has not achieved a fixed point of departure and a faultless method of advance; but, when these shall have been attained, she will vindicate her own transcendent nobility, and assume her rightful rank as the science of sciences.—F. E. Abbot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AGASSIZ used to say, "The pupil studies nature in the school-room, and when he goes out of doors he cannot find her." So we might say of too many people,—that they study religion in the church, and when they go out into life cannot find it.

TRENTON, N.J., has got ahead of Boston. They celebrated there, Tuesday of last week, the five hundredth anniversary of the translation of the Bible by Wycliffe. Nowhere but in New Jersey does the fact seem to have been remembered.

THE Civil-Service Reform Association in New York, of which Rev. Dr. Bellows is President, and which has had a nominal existence for four years, is, we are glad to hear, about to reorganize for active work, with more encouraging prospects than hitherto of being able to work effectively.

THE REV. MR. CHAMBERLAIN, of Cambridge, preached a vigorous as well as a Broad-Church sermon at an "Episcopal convocation" at Newton Lower Falls last week. With other good things, he said: "In creeds, the facts formulated are vaster than the formula. No man can spell out the Infinite with three letters into the Saxon word God."

MEMPHIS has been having a "Health-Jubilee," to celebrate its escape from the yellow fever this year. This is much wiser than the fasts that were appointed in some places two years ago, to supplicate Heaven against the spread of the fever. Yet we trust the citizens did not forget in their jubilee to give thanks for the special Providence of Colonel Waring's sewage system, which has doubtless kept the health of the city through the past summer.

A NEW ministry has been formed in France, under Jules Ferry as premier, in the interest of a stricter construction and a more rigid execution of the recent laws secularizing the public schools. M. de Freycinet, the head of the late cabinet, was disposed to compromise in the execution of these laws, —the terms which the religious orders (other than the Jesuits, already expelled) had offered and he had signified his willingness to accept, having, it is said, been drafted at Rome. Hence his downfall. M. Ferry was the author of the laws in question.

WE are not sorry to have Dr. Tanner defended, as he is by a correspondent in another column, even against some of our own innuendoes. We incline now to think what we doubted at first, that he honestly maintained his fast. Nor are we at all disposed to deny that there is some scientific value in such an experiment. But the benefit to science from the experiment is only to be gained on the principle of human vivisection; and, even if it were a settled question that this is allowable, what we should object to is the making of a public exhibition of the process.

ACCORDING to the following statement in an English journal, some of the Protestant missionaries in Persia have been trying to turn the famine to good ecclesiastical account: "Archbishop Cliozel, the head of the Catholic mission in Persia, states that at Ourmish there are twenty to thirty deaths daily from the famine. He complains that many Catholics are ostensibly becoming Protestants, in order to obtain relief from the Protestant mission, which, he says, receives seven thousand francs to ten thousand francs a week, but accords no help without a written adhesion to Protestantism."

IN the Christian Register's column of "Brevities," we find this paragraph: "Mr. Lecky comes very near to making a confession of faith in Christ, when he uses these words: 'It has been reserved for Christianity to present to the world an ideal character, which, through all the changes of eighteen centuries, has filled the hearts of men with an impassioned love'; and again, when he writes, 'The brief record of three short years of active life has done more to regenerate and soften mankind than all the disquisitions of philosophers, and than all the exhortations of moralists.'" These extracts show a belief in Jesus and a reverence for his character which are creditable to Mr. Lecky's discernment. But they neither say nor imply anything about his "faith in Christ."

IN the sessions of the Liberal League after the split, the tragic and the comic were inextricably mingled. Tragedy reached its climax when the Convention rose in a passion of indignation against Mr. Spencer, of Milwaukee, for wickedly making fun of it in a satirical resolution, and summarily expelled him by unanimous vote, Mr. Spencer voting with the rest for his own expulsion. And the tragical and the comical came to the surface together, when a gentleman from Michigan rushed upon the platform with his coat wrapped around his head, and, throwing it off began to harangue the audience in the style of a madman. He continued through his ten minutes of incoherent raving; and yet, a reporter says, "the joke of it was that the Convention did not appear to notice that he was as crazy as a loon."

DR. SUNDBERG, of Philadelphia, writes to the National Temperance Advocate of temperance in India thus: "In the July number of your journal, you mention, under the above heading, that drinking habits are fearfully on the increase among the educated and higher classes of natives in Calcutta. This is unfortunately too true as regards those who have received an English education or whose business brings them constantly in contact with Europeans, while the learned Brahman is as temperate as his forefathers were. For the introduction of the vice of drunkenness among the natives of India, the English are, in my opinion, altogether responsible; and, as they are all regarded by the natives as Christians, you will see the justness of the following suggestive remark, which I once heard a respectable Hindu make about a dissipated youth of his own race: 'He drinks and swears like a Christian.'"

MORALITY AND RELIGION.

BY E. D. STARK, ESQ.

Examples avail little to show the worth of religion or morality as practical regulators and motives of conduct, unless we shall first have defined the characteristic quality of each, and pointed out the line of demarcation between them. For any useful purpose of such a discussion, no definition can be given, except one implying a rational theory of their genesis. The origin implied in the familiar characterization of these faculties as "Gifts," "Endowments," etc., does not help. Whether I am correct or not in counting the facts of subordination and mutuality in our social race-history as the external factors of these two sentiments respectively, at least, the view which regards them as products is all there is left to us, when supernaturalism has become an untenable hypothesis. There are but two great classes of theories as to how things began, one rational and the other irrational. To the latter belongs supernaturalism, for it repudiates nature and reason.

If our theory of the genesis of these sentiments as in previous papers expounded is correct, religion is the older. Time was when it was substantially the only force compelling social order. This primacy is shown also in the history of the individual. That form of duty known as obedience comes to the child before regard for the rights of his equals. Where, and to the extent that, the relation of subordination exists, there is the duty of obedience; and being duty, in the large, loose sense of the word, it is "moral." Still, strictly and technically, in my view, the sense of duty which is constituted of obedience is at bottom religious, and all religion is essentially submission.

Inasmuch as there will forever remain subordination in the form appropriate to the filial relation, forever giving scope and action to its appropriate sentiment, the religious sentiment in this sense cannot lapse utterly. Still, when we consider how family government is becoming more and more republican, —less autocratic,—and obedience itself is modifying accordingly, and assimilating to the form of mutuality and equality, it follows that, even as a provisional stage appropriate to childhood, the sentiment is comforming to and becoming more and more what I call technically moral.

It results from my reasoning that this force is at best only a scaffolding in character-building, and that, even as provisional, its character is changing in the direction of morality.

The externalization of the religious sentiment into cults is, in this view, secondary. Cults are but remnants, crusts of custom, shells, the form which the sentiment took on during the period of its dominance as the practically controlling force in government.

I shall no doubt be considered as floundering beyond my depth in speculations on origins, and not advancing my thesis, that morality is a more evolved and higher ethical stage than religion. But I aim chiefly at my definitions; and, whether these two sentiments, or faculties, divide precisely on the line I am drawing or not, it is the only subdivision of that part of conduct comprised under duty I am able to make, —that is, of any practical value. I count acts technically moral to be those embodying the sense of duty arising from their perceived inherent quality as conducing to human well-being generally, and not at all deriving their coercive force from command; and I call those acts religious which, also embodying the sense of duty, arise as submission and obedience to the command of a superior will.

Conduct, in the large, loose sense of the word, called moral, comes of so many motives that, even with definitions and theoretical distinctions accurately established, there is yet much difficulty in giving to each motive its due proportion of credit in a particular case. The looseness of the general thinking is well exemplified by the fact that our chief word—namely, moral—means so many different things. It may mean, first, a large realm as distinguished from the physical; second, a lesser domain, comprising voluntary conduct; third, that part of voluntary conduct that is commendable, whether the motive to it be strictly moral or religious; and, finally, the narrower sense I give it,—namely, conduct inspired simply by regard for human rights and adjusted to the rule of human well-being.

Of course we can make no progress in determining the relative value of these two sentiments or forces, unless we shall define them in terms that are mutually exclusive. The usual treatment of the subject neglects this logical preliminary. The theological notion is that the entire field of voluntary conduct is covered by religion, that its office is to impart to the natural faculties a new quality. The divine spirit prompts and stimulates every action, and we thus get a superhuman aid. The observed facts, however, will hardly sustain so large a claim. Besides, no theist will explicitly deny to any form of actual goodness a divine influence, but will, I think, on the contrary, affirm it is everywhere and always, inspiring all pure human love and high aspiration and endeavor, as indeed their sole source and support. Being then a constant, universal, and uniform external factor or condition, we may for all purposes of my comparison leave it out of the account.

Human character and conduct must, after all, be analyzed by reference to the natural faculties as we find them manifesting themselves in society in this life; and, since the progress of opinion has vacated the divine character of fickleness, partiality, and capriciousness, the forces called the divine spirit, instead of being regarded objectively,—that is, as something acting outside of human nature,—are more profitably studied as reactions of the human faculties. The theological notion is that the natural moralities, by being incorporated into the religious code, and the "mere morality" being taken possession of by the spirit of true religion, the entire body of conduct has progressed to a higher quality and to an advanced order of duty; and that, poor human nature being reënforced in this way, there is a better guarantee of moral observance; while, in my view, such a change is a retrogression to a primitive, rudimentary, and less evolved stage, wherein the moral code becomes distorted and degraded by being made subordinate to rite, and the motive to duty, if in the particular instance made stronger, is so because the religious stage has not been fairly outgrown.

The popular notion that natural morality is improved by the religious sentiment is very easily shown to be error, if that sentiment shall be made to conform to my definition. No will, however supreme, can, in the nature of things, add sanctity or spiritual coerciveness to what is perceived to be inherently true and right. Still, it is claimed that in practice we do get additional motive to duty by considering it as divine command.

In popular discourse, the word "religion," like Christianity, instead of meaning anything distinctive and precise, is made to include everything that is of good report. The moral rules that guided good men before Christianity was invented are all accounted constituent parts of it. And the disavowal of it is in the popular estimation a denial of all moral obligation.

My contention is that there are two modes of entertaining the highest spiritual verities, so far as they relate to or influence conduct. One is their reception as from the authority of a superior person, the other as impersonal truth. Whether I am correct or not in accounting the former as characteristically religious and the latter moral, the immeasurable superiority in quality of the latter is to me plain. I cannot identify or make them coalesce. The extent to which one respects the truths of arithmetics on authority is the measure of his failure to appropriate and assimilate them. The same must be said, only more emphatically, of the truths that pertain to our spiritual being. They must come to us solely on their own merit or not at all.

I must insist that history and experience, not less than theory, show that the gradual transformation of obligation, or the sense of duty, from the religious stage to unreligious morality, is a necessary progress from a lower to a higher and better. The "Thou God seest me" stage, useful and necessary as it is, is not the resting-place of the moral sense. Those who do not outgrow it are victims of arrested development.

I instance a conspicuous example in support of my thesis in the want of intellectual honesty (that most exquisite and highest form of morality) shown in religious literature. Not referring to current pulpit utterances whose offence in that regard is rank, I contrast the stately and dignified volumes of apologetics, modern and ancient, with the literature of science. To my thinking, not the Gospels and Epistles, not even the lofty morality of Job, who excels all other Bible characters, can compare in simple love of truth for its own sake with the leading unreligious scientific literature. Even the genius of Christianity, which we account the best of all special forms of religion, is incompatible with that moral quality which resolutely subjects its dearest hopes and sanctities to critical analysis, and is content with simple truth alone. Business honesty is born and bred of the commercial spirit, and not otherwise; and its end is accumulation of wealth. That form of honesty cannot be developed where poverty is accounted a blessing. There cannot be intellectual honesty where the scientific spirit is not; and who will cultivate it that believes the "poor in spirit" are blessed? The mysticism and vagueness of words and phrases in which religion delights is, in the scientific code, a cardinal vice. Theology cannot abide science with her "instruments of precision."

Religious martyrdoms will probably outnumber,—at least, they have been made more conspicuous in history,—than unreligious ones; but that unbeliever in God and a hereafter, who, resisting entreaties of wife, children, and friends to recant his unbelief, replied, "No, it is better to tell the truth," went from the stake into non-existence, attained a higher morality than the martyr who expects to be born from the flames into paradise. Of course, that heroic virtue possible to a denier of all the forms of religion comes to him only in societies where religious profession is in the line of social advancement, and opens the door to all careers. I do not doubt a careful analysis will discover in all communities more moral courage among sceptics than among believers.

I instance Harriet Martineau. The impression I have of her, gathered from her writings, the biographies of her, and especially from her autobiography, is that no woman, ancient or modern, ever trod with firmer step and more womanly dignity and modesty the high pathway of integrity and intelligent beneficence than she. With strong religious biases in youth, as she approached the maturity of her wonderful moral and intellectual powers, she rapidly grew out of all religious beliefs and modes of thought; but, simultaneously with that progress, her character took on a morality of such massiveness and high ethical quality as left her alone among women.

I instance Charles Sumner. We have his moral diagnosis in a letter from his own hand so far back as 1833. The letter betrays earnestness and acuteness of self-study, and mental analysis of a high order. In it, he says: "I do not think I have a basis for faith to build upon. I am without religious feeling. I seldom refer my happiness or acquisitions to the Great Father. . . . Of the first great commandment, . . . I live in perpetual unconsciousness, I will not say disregard, for that perhaps would imply that it was present in my mind." Yet out of that soil grew a character and career that, in point of devotion to human rights, in stainless and uncompromising integrity, eclipses all our "Christian statesmanship." I only give the general verdict when I say that, among men in affairs, practical morality in him touched high-water mark in this age and country.

Such examples, and multitudes less conspicuous, all pointing in the same direction, confirm me in the opinion that, with the decay of the beliefs, modes of thought, and motives known as religious, there will grow a better code of conduct, a greater regard for human rights, and an increased volume of realized morality.

THE following is a list of the daily political journals at one sou published in Paris: Le Petit Journal, La Lanterne, La Petite Republique Française, Le Petit National, Le Petit Parisien, Le Petit Journal du Soir, Le Nouveau Journal Republicain, Le Citoyen, Le Journal à un sou, Le Petit Moniteur, La Petite Presse, Le Petit Caporal, Le Petit Republicain. The circulation of all these journals put together is more than a million copies a day. All these papers prosper and pay dividends. The circulation of the Petit Journal is six hundred thousand, the largest in the world; that of the Citoyen, a Socialist and Communist organ, founded only a few months ago, is already sixty thousand. Newspaper property in Paris pays well. The XIXe Siècle pays a dividend averaging from 58 to 70 per cent.; L'Univers, a Catholic organ, pays 20 per cent.; last year, the Republique Française paid 100 francs dividend on 1,000 francs shares; Petit Journal shares of 250 francs are quoted at 3,000 francs; Lanterne 250 francs shares are quoted 900 francs; the Petit Republique pays 26 per cent.

CONSCIOUSNESS CONSIDERED AS A SENSE.

BY D. S. GRANDIN, M.D.

From the days of Plato and Aristotle to Descartes, and from Descartes to Sir William Hamilton, and from Sir William until now, metaphysicians have been asking and trying to answer the question, "How comes man by his knowledge?" And the conclusions of all have been equivalent to the declaration that we do not in reality know anything, and that there is no certitude of knowledge, our best condition being rest in feeling or in belief without a doubt.

In an essay so short as the pages of a weekly paper will allow, it will be impossible to treat such a subject in an exhaustive manner; but we must condense an argument into the smallest possible dimensions consistent with the importance of the question. We will endeavor to be as clear and explicit as the use of simple and intelligible language will permit, so as to be understood by the common reader, who may not be disposed to rack his brain to determine what is intended to be understood by the obscure and often totally unintelligible language of writers of books for the learned, who leave their readers to find out their meaning as best they can.

We commence by answering the question we have named; namely, "How comes man by his knowledge?" And we reply in brief, By the joint action of sensation and intellection, confirmed by CONSCIOUSNESS as the sense of realization, which is the end of all controversy and the certitude of knowledge.

It is an undisputed and indisputable axiom in logic that "nothing is in the understanding which was not first perceived by some [or at least one] of the senses." Yet Dr. Reid of the Scottish school, in his painful effort to meet the question, lays down the following doctrine: "There exist in the mind of man various ideas or conceptions, both physical and metaphysical, which we have never derived either from sensation or reflection,—i.e., as these two terms were and are defined by metaphysicians generally."

"There must therefore exist somewhere or other in the animal frame or in man a third percipient principle, from which alone such ideas can have been derived.

"From this additional principle there is no appeal. It is higher in its knowledge and surer in its decisions than either the senses or the reason. It compels our assent in a variety of cases in which we should otherwise be left in the most distressing doubt, and gives us an assurance, not only that there is an external world around us, but that the primary and secondary qualities of bodies exist equally and uniformly in the bodies themselves, or, in other words, that everything actually is as it appears to be."

If, then, there are only five senses, the axiom above quoted,—namely, "Nothing is in the understanding that was not first perceived by some of the senses,"—does not hold good; for neither of the five senses can take cognizance of the operations of the intellect or of moral sensations or of moral truth, or subjects of any kind except its own individual physical impressions, nor even of these without the aid of consciousness to confirm them; and Dr. Reid's third percipient principle remains an unsettled matter to this day. For although the Doctor and his coadjutors said it was common-sense and tried to prove it, yet Dr. Good showed conclusively that they were wrong, without being able to show what it was, any more than he could show whether instinct proceeded from matter or from mind, while he insisted that it could not be derived from both. Now the ideas or conceptions mentioned by Dr. Reid are recognized by CONSCIOUSNESS as the sense of realization. If there is another sense necessary to the fulfilment of his proposition, we must search for it and find it.

CONSCIOUSNESS has never been defined by any of these writers, although they felt its importance and gave it a name and tried to define it; but they never succeeded in driving the pin at which they aimed. Some have come near a definition, yet the nearest have just missed it. All, however, have recognized it as an intuitive operation.

Dr. Reid called "consciousness an operation of its own kind which cannot be logically defined"; i.e., it cannot be defined at all. Again, he says, "The greatest sceptics admit the testimony of consciousness, and allow that what it testifies is to be held as a first principle."

Again, he says, "It is an immediate conception of the operations of our own minds, joined with a belief of their existence." Certainly, this is not a logical definition. Descartes called it "the innate idea of thought"; but this definition needs itself to be defined.

Locke says it is "the perception of what passes in a man's own mind"; but he does not make it an attribute of man, either of mind or body. Again, he makes it synonymous with conscience, which he says "is our opinion of our own actions, and consciousness is the same." Hedge says, in his Logic, "Consciousness, or reflection, is the notice which the mind takes of its own operations." So we have consciousness, conception, innate idea of thought, perception, conscience, opinion, notice, reflection, and operation, all synonymous terms so far as this word is concerned, and all in the attempt to define what Reid says cannot be logically defined; and, if we were compelled to stop here, we should conclude that the Doctor is right.

Sir William Hamilton defines consciousness to be a "cognition or knowledge of what is, now and here, present to the mind"; and he comes as near as, if not nearer than, any of his predecessors. Bowen nowhere attempts a definition of it in his book, but in a note on personal existence he says: "Properly speaking, consciousness is not an attribute of mind, but of me"; and adds he is "indebted to some excellent articles on the Philosophy of Consciousness in Blackwood's Magazine for 1838."

These writers and others all seem to know what consciousness is better than they can tell, and they all agree that its testimony is ultimate; and yet Sir William Hamilton in his book (pages 36, 37) says, "We are not compelled by a blind impulse to believe in the external world as in an unknown something. On the contrary, we believe it to exist only because we are immediately cognizant of it as existing. . . . If asked, indeed, how we know that we know it" (here is the bite), "—how we know that what we apprehend in sensible perception is, as consciousness assures us, an object external, extended, and numerically different from the conscious subject,"—i.e., from myself,—"how we know that this object is not a mere mode of mind, illusively presented to us as a mode of matter, then, indeed, we must reply that we do not in propriety [i.e., properly, really] know that what we are compelled to perceive as not self is not a perception of self; and that we can only believe such to be the case in reliance on the original necessity of so believing imposed upon us by our nature." "Distressing doubt," as Dr. Reid would say. We don't in "propriety" know whether we are awake or dreaming, the testimony of consciousness and all our other senses and faculties to the contrary notwithstanding.

Here Sir William Hamilton might have laid down his pen; for he gives up the certitude of knowledge of an external world, and places himself fairly and squarely by the side of Hume and Brown, the first of whom said, "There is no evidence of an external world, but we cannot help believing in its existence," while the latter exclaimed, "We must believe in the existence of an external world, but yet there is no evidence of it." Hamilton is not essentially better off in his effort in the same direction. He need not therefore have dragged us through the remaining five hundred pages of his book to tell us in the end that "we philosophize to escape ignorance, and the consummation of our philosophy is ignorance: we start from the one, we repose in the other." And yet he tells us that philosophy is the science of sciences, the knowledge of ourselves, which, according to his own testimony, is only the knowledge of our own ignorance; a fact we might learn without toiling through more than five hundred pages, much of which is unintelligible verbiage to all but the initiated.

Sir William is certainly a man of immense erudition, who seems to have read all the books in the world upon metaphysics, and comes out of the inquiry with the same success as did Lord Launfall in his search after the Holy Grail.

The whole difficulty rests in a defective definition of consciousness, which is not conception, perception, or cognition, opinion, notice, or reflection, but an automatic susceptibility, or capability, lying deeper, and upon which our conceptions, perceptions, or cognitions depend. It is that whose operation enables us to cognize, perceive, or know. It is the SENSE OF REALIZATION. Therefore, in answer to the question, How do we know? we reply, We know by the operation of our CONSCIOUSNESS, which is an unimpeachable witness.

To illustrate, I copy from Bowen:—

"A cause can never be confounded with its effect, even though it be the real or efficient cause, and not a mere invariable antecedent or concomitant event. Suppose that some uninformed person (observing that heat was always evolved whenever one body was rubbed against another, or when it was burned, or when it was condensed from a fluid to a liquid or from a liquid to a solid state) should say that the problem was solved, and that heat was unquestionably nothing but friction or combustion or condensation. A chemist would say that he did not understand the question, for to know that friction produces heat was quite a different thing from saying that friction constituted heat."

Nothing can be plainer than that it is by consciousness that we are able to realize the operation of all the other senses and of every physical and intellectual operation; and nothing is more manifest than that all men, whether philosophers or not, automatically and involuntarily use and speak of it as a sense, and can give no intelligible definition of it which does not correspond to what is meant when a sense is spoken of. In using it as synonymous with perception or cognition, an effect is taken for a cause; but how can man or mind perform the operation of cognition or knowing without a faculty, capability, or susceptibility to that end? If it be said that CONSCIOUSNESS and cognition or perception are simultaneous, that on the instant we are conscious we cognize, and that we can have no consciousness of consciousness until we are cognizant of a fact, we answer that every effect must be the result of an antecedent cause; and, although we can distinguish no difference in time, the operation of CONSCIOUSNESS must be antecedent to its consequent.

The recognition of CONSCIOUSNESS as a sense obviates all the difficulty under which all these writers have labored, and completely answers the want of Dr. Reid's third percipient principle: while the axiom, "Nihil in intellectu est, quod non fuit prius in senso," still holds good.

Hamilton says, "The Greek tongue was for a long time destitute of any word to express CONSCIOUSNESS, and so it was expressed by 'sense inmost, sense interior, sense internal,' also by 'intuitions, intuitive cognitions,' etc. 'I know a thing to be true because I feel and cannot but feel it to be so; because I feel that I believe.'"

Here we perceive they were unable to form any conception of the THING now called CONSCIOUSNESS except as a sense.

SCOTCH SERMONS, 1880. London: Macmillan & Co. 1880.

Signs of the disintegration of Christian orthodoxy and supernaturalism are multiplying upon every hand. Hardly a day goes by that we do not hear of some man of force and culture, here in the United States or elsewhere, who has been compelled by the force of his convictions to break away from theological and ecclesiastical moorings, at which he has long been swaying, restlessly enough in many instances, and set his face toward the open sea. And every man who thus emancipates himself reports a great body of men in the communions he has left, who only need the courage of their opinions to do as he has done. True, the opinions of those who have such courage are not in the majority of cases entirely rational; and, for that matter, whose opinions are? We cannot too seriously deprecate the impatience of many, who consider themselves thorough-going rationalists, with the halting and imperfect rationalism of those who are, in such numbers, breaking with the old systems of belief. Emerson says, "The new man always hates the newest, and the seceder from the seceder is as damnable as the pope himself." There is a great deal of truth in this; but it is hardly less true that the newest entertain for those who are on the move, but have not come up with them, a cordial detestation. This ought not so to be. The rationalists, pure and simple, if any such there be, ought to rejoice in every sign of the development of rational ideas. They have not themselves attained to their own standing at a bound. Or, if they have, the fact may be significant of evil rather than of good. The healthiest rationalism is that which comes by gradual evolution, not that which comes of sudden and violent reaction.

These remarks have been suggested by a volume of Scotch Sermons, 1880, the outward appearance of which is a pleasure to the eye, so sumptuous is the printed page, the subject-matter of which ought to delight every rational thinker, however it may fail in many instances of conformity with his own standards of rationality. No more significant volume has been published since the famous Essays and Reviews of twenty years ago. Indeed, that publication was less significant than this. It involved a type of rationalism much less free and bold, and it was addressed to a scholarly class, where this is addressed to men of average culture and intelligence. Then, too, the Essays and Reviews originated in the Church of England, where there had been many previous signs of theological disintegration. But Scotch Presbyterianism has been regarded until very recently as the strongest citadel of Christian orthodoxy. Triumphant comparisons were frequently made between it and its Anglican neighbor. But within the last few years these comparisons have lost their point. The development of rationalism in Scotland has been immense. And it has not been confined to the Established Church of Scotland. Prof. Robertson Smith, whose rationalistic treatment of the Bible in the Encyclopædia Britannica and elsewhere has excited a more general interest than all the rest of the development, is a member of the Free Church. Fergus Ferguson and David Macrae were ministers of the United Presbyterian Church, till it was made too narrow for their breadth. The leaven is everywhere at work, and it is working powerfully.

The sermons in this volume number twenty-three in all; and they represent about a dozen different men, the most of the sermons being in pairs. Some of the writers are well known in America; best of all, Principal Caird, whose philosophy of religion has been recently noticed in the columns of the Index. The two opening sermons are his. The first on "Corporate Immortality" is an impressive statement of the noblest truth which Positivism has taught on its religious side. Another name, well known among us, is that of Prof. Knight of St. Andrew's, whose cordial relations with Dr. Martineau made his situation very hot and uncomfortable a few years ago. His sermons on "Conservation and Change" and "The Continuity and Development of Religion" are the most thoughtful in the book. They are at the same time the most conservative; or, rather, they furnish a connected and elaborate statement of the spirit in which all the writers gathered here are well agreed. This spirit is characterized by a distinction between dogmas and institutions. Of dogmas even the most venerable, it is critical and destructive; of institutions, it is conservative. Prof. Knight argues the matter with much ingenuity; but he will not convince the less biassed and more candid, and his position must be regarded as only a convenient subterfuge that breaks the force of the transition from ecclesiastical to rational religion. The theology of Prof. Knight and his fellow-thinkers is not that of the Confession of Faith. It is radically divergent from that Confession. Either that Confession must be radically transformed, or Prof. Knight and his companions must venture forth into fresh woods and pastures new.

Two of the most interesting and valuable sermons in the book are by Rev. William Leckie M'Farlan of Lenzie. The subjects are "Authority" and "The Things that cannot be shaken." It is easy to discover by what writers Mr. M'Farlan has been most deeply affected,—Matthew Arnold and J. Allanson Picton. Their names do not appear, but their influence is unmistakable; and once we have a trout in the milk,—a direct quotation from Picton, its foreign origin confessed by quotation-marks, but its personal source not indicated. The sermon on "Law and Miracle" by Rev. D. J. Ferguson is one of the frankest and boldest in the collection. The causes that have contributed to a decline of the belief in miracles are set forth with admirable clearness.

Everything which has heretofore been most distinctive of Scotch theology is here remanded to oblivion or disgrace. Buckle's terrible indictment of that theology in the second volume of his History is an amusing commentary on these discourses, which he could have read with general approval. Here is Christianity and, after a fashion, Orthodoxy. But it is Christianity and Orthodoxy without an infallible Bible or a Bible anything but purely human, without any authority external to the rational perceptions of the mind, without total depravity or election or reprobation or eternal hell, without miracles, without vicarious atonement. The sermons are freest and clearest in their treatment of the Bible, most timid and vague in their treatment of the nature of Christ. Here refuge is taken in a miserable obscurantism, where phrases take the place of ideas, where words are used to conceal the writer's meaning. Dr. Edwin A. Abbott of the English Church is a conspicuous victim of the same dangerous and misleading habit of speech. With one hand he sweeps away the last vestige of the miraculous in the New Testament, and with the other attempts to establish Jesus, in some Pickwickian sense, as the peculiar Son of God or as "Very God of very God." How much wiser is Emerson when he declares, "The Soul knows no persons." The spiritual laws disdain all singular and isolated application. And certainly the New Testament record is too remote from the actual life of Jesus to establish any such enormous predicate concerning him as that he was in any special sense a manifestation of the Infinite and Eternal. All this is "transitional teaching." It has no "staying quality." The sooner it evaporates, the better.

The October number of the North American Review contains articles: by Emery A. Storrs, on "The Democratic Party Judged by its History"; by Thomas A. Edison, on "The Success of the Electric Light," which he expects publicly to demonstrate in the course of a few months; by Désiré Charnay, on "The Ruins of Central America, Part II."; by Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon, on "The Observance of the Sabbath"; by Judge D. Thew Wright, on "The Campaign of 1862," with a conclusion unfavorable to Gen. McClellan; by Rev. Dr. A. W. Pitzer, opposing "The Taxation of Church Property"; and by Prof. E. S. Holden, giving details of "Recent Progress in Astronomy." We will make brief comment upon the fourth and sixth of these articles, speaking first of Dr. Leonard Bacon's argument for observance of Sunday as a Sabbath.

All essays of this sort, put forth from the standpoint of Orthodox dogma, and claiming a Sunday-Sabbath as a Christian institution, abound in assumptions which are not only unproved and unprovable, but are susceptible of thorough refutation from the book to which they appeal as the rule of life and the authoritative and sufficient standard of duty. Dr. Bacon writes in the interest of one of that group of sects which call themselves "Evangelical," and which agree in insisting that the Bible is an authoritative rule, and a sufficient rule, in regard to Christian duty. Nevertheless, having undertaken to defend a dogma of Orthodoxy, and being accustomed professionally to assume that Orthodoxy is founded on the Bible, he boldly begins with an assumption that Sunday is the Christian Sabbath, though neither of his infallible Scriptures gives a particle of evidence in support of that claim. The Old Testament appoints a day for sacred observance, which Dr. Bacon does not observe. The New Testament not only appoints no day, and recommends no day, but expressly leaves Sabbatical observance to the free choice of each individual disciple. Elaborate demonstration of this can be found, by those who seek it, in the writings of Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, and in the Bampton Lectures of Dr. Hessey, entitled "Sunday." Dr. Bacon, then, upholds the Church to the support of whose dogmas he is pledged, in trying to manufacture a Christian duty in addition to the duties enjoined by the authoritative and sufficient written laws of Christianity.

In another particular, however, rationalists will heartily agree with Dr. Bacon; namely, in the desire to keep one day in seven free from ordinary labor and traffic, and to choose Sunday as that day.

Dr. Pitzer's apology for the exemption of church-buildings from taxation rests upon his assumption that the Church is "an institution of reform, of education, and of charity"; and we admit that, in each of these particulars, his assumption is partly true. But as, in considering Darwin's allegation of the "survival of the fittest," we must keep in mind the equally obvious fact of an immense and a constant survival of the unfittest, so, before accepting Dr. Pitzer's conclusion in favor of the churches, we should take into account the following unquestionable opposing facts:—

1. As to reform, the Church strongly opposes those vicious habits which are unpopular in its neighborhood. It is certain that a church-member is less likely to get drunk or to gamble or to steal than he was before becoming such. The alliance positively helps him in those particulars, and in others of that sort. As to cheating in trade, the immunity may be less perfect, because a certain amount of disregard of the golden rule is admitted, and expected, in mercantile circles. The distinction still exists which was defined in the old story of Deacon X. One man inquired of another, "What sort of man is the deacon?" "Do you mean Godward or manward?" "I want to know about his character and reputation." "Well, Godward, no doubt, the deacon is all right; but, manward, he is reputed to be rather tricky." In popular vices, however great, the Church is as likely to be on the wrong side as the right. While the slave-system was predominant in this country, the American Church, in all the great denominations, was not only the bulwark, but the active defender, of American slavery; and, in this country and in England, the influence of the clergy has always gone in favor of such wars as the governments of their respective countries chose to make, including the most unjustifiable wars of aggression. In the English House of Lords, the Bishops are to be counted on as the firmest opponents of reform of every kind.

2. As to education, admitting that sundry details of good principle, moral and religious, are taught in the pulpit and the Sunday-school, we must yet insist upon the fact that there is a vast amount of mis-education in both, which must be unlearned in future life before its receivers can become either intelligent (upon the matters in question) or rationally religious. The false notions taught in regard to God and man, and the relation between them, in the catechisms, sermons, and prayers of both Catholics and Protestants, probably do as much harm to the hearers, young and old, as the other ministrations do good. Many sermons have been apologies for the worst of vices, as in the cases above mentioned, of slavery and war. Much of the teaching in both pulpit and Sunday-school applies itself to the manufacture of sins out of acts innocent or praiseworthy, as in their prohibition of recreation on Sunday, and of various harmless amusements on other days; and much of that teaching deludes the hearers by false representations of duty, affirming that God requires attendance on their sermons, sacraments, and prayer-meetings, and pecuniary contribution to the expensive process by which their missionaries offer Christian errors as a substitute for heathen ones.

3. As to charity, the Church helps its own poor, just as the Free Masons and the Odd Fellows do. We know no other charity with which it is to be credited, apart from its system of propagandism, which has no right to be so called, and which needs much purification before it can claim to be good on the whole; i.e., to do more good than harm.

It seems to us that Rev. Dr. Pitzer fails to make out his case.

It cannot fail to gratify the readers of the Popular Science Monthly to find the two most notable papers delivered at the recent meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in the October number. We refer to that of the retiring President, Prof. Geo. F. Barker, on "Modern Aspects of the Life Question," and Prof. Bell on "The Production of Sound by Light." Both of these have already been referred to in the Free Religious Index, and of themselves give special interest to this number of the magazine.

There are, however, several other papers which no one will be disposed to pass who is accustomed to read this most valuable monthly. Among these may be specially mentioned "Fashion in Deformity," an illustrated article by Prof. W. H. Flower, showing the abuses to which the body has been subjected by savage people, and is still by the most civilized, through a perverted sense of beauty or personal attraction. Mr. George Iles' "Co-operation in England" presents a very interesting account of the results of this movement, and affords much material for study to those whose attention has been drawn to the general subject through recent enterprises of this nature in the United States. Herbert Spencer's criticism of his critics is always vigorous and subtle, and leaves him, to the mind of most readers, apparently with the best of the argument. Certainly, such seems to be clearly the case with respect to his "Criticisms Corrected" in this issue. "The Mysterious Sounds of Nature," by Robert Springer, supplies an intelligible basis or solution to much which has been hitherto consigned to the fabulous. The series of articles on "The English Precursors of Newton" is devoted in this number to Robert Hooke, a person of great eccentricity and wonderful genius. Then other articles are an illustrated one on "The Australian Ornithorhynchus," a strange member of the Australian fauna; "India Rubber Industries," by Thomas Bolas; "Education as an Aid to the Health of Woman," by Elizabeth Cumings; "On the Destruction of Infectious Germs," by Dr. A. Wenrich; "Possible Efficiency of Heat Engines," by Prof. W. A. Anthony; a "Sketch of George Boole."

The "Editor's Table," "Literary Notices," and "Popular Miscellany" are as usual of the highest excellence.

Messrs. George P. Rowell & Co. of New York have kindly forwarded to us their American Newspaper Directory for 1880. This is the twelfth annual issue of this very useful work. It needs but a glance at its contents to see that they could not have been made up without very great labor and expense. It is a neat, substantially bound, and handsomely printed volume of over one thousand pages, giving the names, general character, and amount of circulation of every newspaper in the country. These are arranged in alphabetical order in respect to states and towns, places in the United States and Territories, the Dominion of Canada, and Newfoundland, in which newspapers and other periodicals are published. There is, in addition to this, a condensed description of all the principal towns, the county seats and cities, including their location and principal distinctions, population, railroad and other connections. A supplement at the close contains much valuable information correlative to the general purpose of the compilation. It is an indispensable volume to the newspaper office and the advertiser, and so nearly perfect as to afford no opportunity for competitors.

DR. TANNER DEFENDED.

To the Editor of the Index:—

I have noticed for several weeks short articles in the Index on Dr. Tanner, that seemed to imply both in matter and manner that he and his experiment were humbugs, not worthy the attention of sensible people. I think this is a great mistake. Let me take your time for a few minutes to tell you why. An eminent chemist of New York City, P. H. Van Der Wyde, vouches for Tanner's honesty, and claims that several very important scientific deductions can be drawn from the experiment. No less a paper than the Scientific American also expresses a belief in his honesty, and in the importance of the experiment. The Scientific American is always crowded with valuable matter, but it spared room for an editorial and a long article upon the subject. Dr. Hammond, as you know, I suppose, conceded Tanner's honesty, and admitted that something had been learned; a remarkable admission from an old school physician. There is a radicalism in medicine, hardly less important than that in religion, and closely allied to it in principle. In both, the motto is to be your own "Saviour."

George Francis Train wittily puts it that there is a trinity, the world, the flesh, and the devil, represented by the lawyer, the doctor, and the priest, from which we are to labor to be delivered.

Dr. Tanner is, I believe, a religious radical, but that is not my reason for writing. I have some faith in his experiment, and a strong dislike to anything like dogmatism in the Index on any subject. In most other papers, I expect it.

Yours, Warren Griswold.

WHAT GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE THINKS OF AMERICA.

After all I had read or heard, it seemed to me that there were great features of social life there unregarded or misregarded. New York itself is a miracle, which a large book would not be sufficient to explain. When I stepped ashore there, I thought I was in a larger Rotterdam; when I found my way to the Broadway, it seemed to me as though I was in Paris, and that Paris had taken to business. There were quaintness, grace, and gayety, brightness and grimness, all about. The Broadway I thought a Longway, for my first invitation in it was to No. 1455. My first days in the city were spent at No. 1 Broadway, in the Washington Hotel, allured thither by its English military and diplomatic associations, going back to the days when an Indian war-whoop was possible in the Broadway. At that end, you are dazed by a forest of tall telegraph-poles, and a clatter by night and day, that no pathway of Pandemonium could rival. Car bells, omnibus bells, dray-horse bells, railway bells, and locomotives in the air, were resounding night and day. An engineer turns off his steam at your bedroom window. When I got up to see what was the matter, I found engine No. 99 almost within reach of my arm, and the other, 98, had been there that morning before I awoke. When one day at a railway junction I heard nine train-bells being rung by machinery, it sounded as though disestablishment had occurred, and all the parish churches of England were being imported.

A wholesome distinction of America is that industry alone is universally honorable there, and has good chances. There are no common people there, in the English sense. When speaking in the Cooper Institute, New York, I was reminded that the audience would resent being so addressed. Every man in America feels as though he owns the country, because the charm of recognized equality and the golden chances of ownership have entered his mind. He is proud of the statues and public buildings. The great rivers, the trackless prairies, the regal mountains, all seem his. Even the steep curbstones of New York and Boston, which brought me daily distress, I was asked to admire, for some reason yet unknown to me. In England, nobody says to the visitor or foreigner when he first meets him, What do you think of England? The people do not feel that they own the country, or have responsible control over it. The country is managed by somebody else. Not even the members of Parliament know when base treaties are made in the nation's name, and dishonoring wars are entered into, which the lives and earnings of their constituents may be confiscated to sustain. All that our representatives can tell us is that that is an affair of the crown. In America, there is no crown; and the people are kings, and they know it. I had not landed on the American shores an hour before I became aware that I was in a new nation, animated by a new life which I had never seen.

If young Englishmen could be sent a couple of years to take part in American business, they would come back much improved. An eminent English professor, whom I lately asked whether it would not do this country good if we could get our peers to emigrate, answered, "No doubt, if you could smarten them up a bit first." Everywhere in America you hear the injunction, "Hold on!" In every vessel and car there are means provided for doing it; for, unless a man falls upon his feet,—if he does fall,—he finds people too busy to stop and pick him up. The nation is in commotion. Life in America is a battle and a march. Freedom has set the race on fire,—Freedom with the prospect of property. Americans are a nation of men, who have their own way, and do very well with it. It is the only country where men are men in this sense; and the unusualness of the liberty bewilders many, who do wrong things in order to be sure they are free to do something. This error is mostly made by new-comers, to whom freedom is a novelty; and it is only by trying eccentricity that they can test the unwonted sense of their power of self-disposal. But as liberty grows into a habit, one by one, the experimenters become conscious of the duty of not betraying the precious possession, by making it repulsive. Perhaps self-assertion seems a little in excess of international requirements. Many 'citizens' give a stranger the impression that they do think themselves equal to their superiors, and superior to their equals; yet all of them are manlier than they would be through the ambition of each to be equals of anybody else.

The effect of American inspiration on Englishmen was strikingly evident. I met workmen in many cities whom I had known in former years in England. They were no longer the same men. Here their employers seldom or never spoke to them; and the workmen were rather glad, as they feared the communication would relate to a reduction of wages. They thought it hardly prudent to look a foreman or overseer in the face. Masters are more genial, as a rule, in these days; but, in the days when last I visited these workmen at their homes in Lancashire, it never entered into their heads to introduce me to their employers. But, when I met them in America, they instantly proposed to introduce me to the mayor of the city. This surprised me very much; for, when they were in England, they could not have introduced me to the relieving officer of their parish, with any advantage to me, had I need to know him. These men were still workmen, and they did introduce me to the mayor, as "a friend of theirs"; and in an easy, confident manner, as one gentleman would speak to another, they said "they should be obliged if he would show me the civic features of the city." The mayor would do so,—order his carriage, and with the most pleasant courtesy take me to every place of interest. To this hour, I do not know whom I wondered at most,—the men or the mayor. In some places, the mayor was himself a manufacturer; and it was a pleasure to see that the men were as proud of the mayor as they were of the city.

However impetuous Americans may be, they have one great grace of patience: they listen like gentlemen. An American audience, anywhere gathered together, make the most courteous listeners in the world. If a speaker has only the gift of making a fool of himself, nowhere has he so complete an opportunity of doing it. If he has the good fortune to be but moderately interesting, and obviously tries, in some humble way natural to him, to add to their information, they come to him afterward and congratulate him with Parisian courtesy. At Washington, where I spoke at the request of Gen. Mussey and Major Ford, and in Cornell University at Ithaca, where, at the request of the acting president, Prof. W. C. Russell, I addressed the students on "Moralities of Coöperative Commerce," there were gentlemen and ladies present who knew more of everything than I did about anything; yet they conveyed to me their impression that I had in some way added to their information.—Nineteenth Century.

Minister Noyes expresses his faith in the French republic in this fashion: "I am not able to see but the republic is growing stronger all the time. It is a government that represses the people in nothing, and it is difficult to show what they could rebel about. They have more liberty than they have ever had, and as much protection. Improvements are going on; new buildings are as plentiful as in Napoleon's best days. The shop-keeping class and the foreign society in Paris may pine unreasonably for the gilded days of the Second Empire, yet even there very little is heard. The government is sincere, and I think its leaders are all honest men."

POETRY.

IN TWOS.

BY W. C. GANNETT.

Somewhere in the world there hide
Garden-gates that no one sees
Save they come in happy twos,—
Not in ones, nor yet in threes.

But from every maiden's door
Leads a pathway straight and true;
Maps and surveys know it not;
He who finds, finds room for two!

Then they see the garden-gates!
Never skies so blue as theirs,
Never flowers so many-sweet
As for those who come in pairs.

Round and round the alleys wind:
Now a cradle bars their way,
Now a little mound, behind,—
So the two go through the day.

When no nook in all the lanes
But has heard a song or sigh,
Lo! another garden-gate
Opens as the two go by!

In they wander, knowing n t:
"Five and Twenty!" fills the air
With a silvery echo low,
All about the startled pair.

Happier yet these garden-walks;
Closer, heart to heart, they lean;
Stiller, softer falls the light;
Few the twos, and far between.

Till, at last, as on they pass
Down the paths so well they know
Once again at hidden gates
Stand the two: they enter slow.

Golden Gates of Fifty Years,
May our two your latchet press!
Garden of the Sunset Land,
Hold their dearest happiness.

Then a quiet walk again:
Then a wicket in the wall;
Then one, stepping on alone,—
Then two at the Heart of All!

—From "Unity."

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 30, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

The brief paragraph in our last issue, concerning the annual meeting of the National Liberal League, held in Chicago, September 17, 18, and 19, is more than borne out by the reports in Chicago papers since received. Not only as then stated, did Colonel Ingersoll withdraw from his office as first Vice-President and from membership in the League, but Mr. H. L. Green of New York and Mr. Robert C. Spencer of Wisconsin, who were among the most prominent and active officers of the League and of the Convention, also withdrew; and it is said that many others, probably nearly a third of the delegates in attendance, would go out with these seceders, although there was no combined action among them at the time. In short, there is another split in the League, and, it would appear, of nearly the same proportions as that which occurred two years ago at Syracuse.

And, what may seem more strange, the split occurs on the same question that caused the former division,—namely, the abolition of those portions of the United States postal laws, commonly known as the Comstock laws, which were enacted to prevent the use of the mails for the spread of immoral literature and merchandise: only this year the conflict came openly and directly on a resolution reported regularly from the Committee on Resolutions in favor of the entire and absolute repeal of these laws, and was not concealed under or involved with, as it was two years ago, a proposition for a change of officers or any other indirect movement. This direct and successful attack on these postal laws at this meeting we should think would serve to open the eyes of those who sympathized with the views of the seceding minority at Syracuse, but who yet remained with the old League, under the delusion that the question of the repeal of this legislation was not involved in the election of a new set of officers. But, however this may be, there can be no longer any reason, good or bad, for misunderstanding the position of the League on this question. And the local Leagues and their members will range themselves unmistakably on the one side or the other of it, according as they stay with or withdraw from the National League.

It had been supposed that there might be a heated discussion, and very probably a division on the question of nominating a Presidential candidate the present year, or of pledging the League to the support of one of the candidates already in the field. But, though several violent political speeches, chiefly against Garfield, were insinuated into the proceedings in spite of interrupting and, to say the least, not very complimentary nor brotherly protests, the political issue, so far as the resolutions and votes were concerned, was peacefully disposed of by a compromise, which deferred all action with regard to a Presidential candidate for another four years, the Leagues in the mean time to be effectively organized for that end. So other questions that came before the Convention were passed upon without much troublesome division of opinion. But this one question of the postal laws kept intruding itself from the start, was manifestly the one question uppermost in the minds of the majority, and, even after it was decisively settled, remained to give color and tone—and not always a very pure color nor very musical tone—to the proceedings of the subsequent sessions. It is quite evident that the majority from the outset were determined to force their opinion of this issue upon the League, and knew that they were strong enough to do it in spite of the vigorous and influential opposition of Colonel Ingersoll.

The subject was, as we have said, squarely introduced by the Committee on Resolutions, through T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York, chairman of the committee, who was undoubtedly the author at least of this portion of the series of resolutions presented; and the presentment was in the form of a square declaration that the postal laws in question should be totally repealed, and that the legal check of the immorality they were framed to prevent should be left to State legislation. (A vain resort, we may here say, since the States have nothing to do with the carrying of the mails, that being one of the rights they have constitutionally given up to the general government; and with the transfer of this right they have also imposed on the national government the obligation to see that the right is not criminally abused.) As soon as the resolutions were read, Colonel Ingersoll moved to substitute for those declaring for the abolition of these postal laws a resolution appointing a Committee of Defence, who should examine every case of arrest under the laws, and, if they were satisfied the arrest was wrong, should render in behalf of the League all the legal and financial aid possible. He very forcibly argued that the League could have no legitimate interest in defending the free circulation of obscene literature; that its only interest was to save freethought, decently expressed, on religious and scientific matters, from being wrongfully classed as obscene by ecclesiastical bigots, and thus stricken down under the forms of law; and this end his substitute, he contended, would secure. And from this time on, through the greater part of the afternoon session and through the whole of the evening session of Saturday, lasting to nearly midnight, he fought, with a few helpers, the resolutions of the committee tooth and nail. His first amendment being voted down, he substituted others declaring for various measures looking to a reform of the laws; and finally one, "inspired" probably by him, though introduced by another delegate, which waived "for the time being" the main question, and asked meantime that the laws be so "modified as to remove all ambiguity as to their meaning," and their "execution be surrounded by such checks" as to prevent the abuses legitimately complained of. But all in vain. Mr. Wakeman and his majority as vigorously resisted. And, within a few moments of midnight, the final amendment was voted down, and the original resolution passed by a vote of a little more than two to one. Colonel Ingersoll thereupon resigned his office, and retired from the meeting. And then came an action which disclosed the full significance of the proceedings. The Convention elected in his place as first Vice-President a woman whom the Religio-Philosophical Journal describes as an "ignored and discarded Spiritualist" of most unsavory reputation.

We have given larger space to this matter than we intended, and more, perhaps, than it deserves; yet it is a subject demanding some serious consideration, as showing the tendencies of a certain section of the large and undefined movement of Liberalism. It may be mentioned incidentally also that certain very radical communistic sentiments, and certain, in our view, very wild theories of government, found utterance on the platform, somewhat to the annoyance of the more prudent managers. In numbers, the Convention was not large. It is claimed that there are two hundred local Leagues. But, on the most favorable counting, there were but one hundred and thirty-eight delegates present. And this must have included many who had no credentials and did not appear in the votes; for the highest aggregate of the votes reported was but eighty-eight.

What will be the result of this new secession remains to be seen. As at present advised, we are not sure but that the best result would be the burial of the Liberal League, under all its forms and phases and names, fathoms deep under ground, that the soil may be left unencumbered for the springing up by and by of an organization that shall more worthily fulfil the hopes which this had originally at heart.

KEEPING THE COMMANDMENTS.

It is said that it is well to have a good opinion of ourselves, irrespective of what others think of us. The Catholic Review seems to exemplify this principle. It has an exceedingly high idea of its Church,—a very much better one, we think, than history or facts warrant. In speaking recently, for example, of the reactionary movement in the English Church, it says: "The influx of English converts into the Church does not seem strange, when we reflect that she offers the one sound rock amid the deluge of iniquity. The Church alone claims the right of guiding men toward God, and of helping them to keep the commandments."

It is common to imagine that things are going to the bad, if we have lost or are losing the control of them we once possessed. The Catholic Church is like human nature in general in this respect. We do not believe there is so much of a "deluge" as the Review thinks, certainly not the same kind of a one. There are few persons, we presume, who will contend that the times in which we live are what they ought to be. But yet there have been those far worse, when war and crime, brutality and coarseness, and unseemly deeds of every sort were very much more prevalent,—indeed, were well nigh all-engulfing. Unfortunately, too, this was the very period when the Roman Catholic Church, which it is claimed is so effectual in enabling men to "keep the commandments," was almost omnipotent. We do not say the Church did not afford in some degree a barrier to this tide of corruption, but it was for the most part but a very feeble one. The simple truth is that it very largely shared in the existing evil, if it was not in fact greatly responsible for it.

And how is it at present? Do Roman Catholics excel all others in the virtues? Are they more noted for industry and thrift, more temperate, peaceable, truthful, law-abiding? Do they as citizens here in America tend to render less necessary the almshouse, the prison, and the policeman? What answer do these institutions give? How is it of Roman Catholic countries,—of South America, Ireland, and Canada? Pass through the Roman Catholic quarters of our great cities, and what evidence do we get of the assumption referred to? Not to mention the mobs and scenes of violence that occur every now and then in Canada, in which Roman Catholics invariably take a leading hand, and the recent ones in Dungannon, Ireland, we may cite a still later specimen of the way that Roman Catholics "keep the commandments" in that country.

We allude to the unprovoked assault, just reported, upon the Rev. Neville Sherbroke, a prominent minister of the English Church, and Mr. Parkenham Law, Queen's Counsel, of Dublin, and one or two Irish-Protestant clergymen, while journeying through Connemara lately. According to the London Telegraph: —

> These gentlemen had done nothing more than visit a Protestant school in the extreme west of Ireland, and were returning, when they were assailed with showers of stones, first by young girls, then by boys and men, apparently in an organized crowd, who followed them for nearly a mile, pelting them with missiles. The tourists escaped unhurt, thanks to the speed of their horses; but Mr. Law declares that their lives were in "imminent danger." This outrage had not even the poor excuse of being agrarian,—it was not a cruel bailiff, a process server, a caretaker, or a tenant who had stepped into another man's farm, who was attacked,—it was purely an explosion of religious bigotry, which must have been stimulated by some of the fanatical priests of the district on the ground that the travellers were friends of the "soupers."

Verily, the Church does offer a "rock," if the above may be received as the meaning of the term. But it may be objected, it is of too small a kind, and there are too many of them. D. H. C.

Lee & Shepard announce among their forthcoming publications Mrs. John T. Sargent's Records and Reminiscences of the Radical Club of Chestnut Street, Boston,—a book the promise of which excites, in various ways, the interest of a good many people; also Gleanings in the Field of Art, by Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney —a field in which the author, both by natural taste and diligent culture, can speak with authority.

It is announced that a new system of submarine cables has been perfected, which is destined to revolutionize that now in use. The inventor, Mr. S. F. Van Choate, has been engaged for a considerable time in experiments which have led to the result. He is already distinguished for his inventions in telegraphy and as an electrician. Mr. Van Choate has the indorsement of the most eminent scientists in the country, who express entire confidence in the success of his system. A company has already been formed, composed of prominent capitalists in the United States and Europe, for the purpose of putting his improvements into operation.

It seems that Charles Bradlaugh was once a Sunday-school teacher. The Sunday School Times, in calling attention to this fact as deserving most serious consideration, which it does twice in the same issue, almost shudders over it as if a pit had opened under Sunday-school teachers everywhere. It asks: "How many such teachers as Charles Bradlaugh are now included in the 'withheld statistics' concerning the 1,500,000 teachers which our centenary rejoicings make a boast of? How many of those 1,500,000 are preparing to be infidel lecturers?" The Sunday School Times evidently suspects there are wolves in sheep's clothing in the fold. The same paper, on the authority of an English Wesleyan minister, gives the following account of the conversion of a brother of Charles Bradlaugh: "The name of Bradlaugh will, I presume, be well known to you: I mean the infidel lecturer. His brother William, who was never an infidel, attended one of the Moody and Sankey services at the Agricultural Hall, after which he sought Mr. Sankey in the inquiry room. Mr. Sankey questioned him for a time, and then requested him to read John iii., 16, inserting his own name in the text. He first read it to himself, thus: 'God so loved William Robert Bradlaugh, that he gave his only begotten Son, that if William Robert Bradlaugh believeth in him he shall not perish, but have everlasting life.' While thus reading the passage, he believed unto salvation."

A petition numerously signed by American Catholics has been sent to the Pope, asking for aid in paying Archbishop Purcell's debts. The petitioners say:—

> The evil consequences of the failure are far-reaching and wide-spread, there being, on the average, five or six persons dependent for support or assistance on each one of the creditors. Hundreds of families have been reduced to destitution. Men and women who carefully, year by year, put away their savings for old age, now that they have grown old and feeble and can work no longer, find themselves utterly penniless and helpless. People who deposited their earnings in order to accumulate enough to buy a home find the fruits of their labor lost, and that their industry has been thrown away, that their strength and energy have been spent; and they are not only left without homes of their own, but without the means to pay house-rent. Some have been reduced to beggary, some have lost their reason, many have lost their faith. The effect is incalculable. They scoff at religious teachers who preach honesty and retribution, while resting quietly and indifferently under the calamity which has fallen on a multitude of people, in a great measure on account of their trust and confidence in the Catholic Church. In the interests of good faith, of charity, of religion, adequate measures ought to be taken to liquidate the debt. The creditors would willingly coöperate in any practicable plan, and by making a liberal deduction from their claims facilitate a settlement. They, therefore, respectfully appeal to your Holiness, as head of the Catholic Church, to take their case under consideration, feeling confident that, if you will undertake to aid them, you will be enabled to effect a speedy and satisfactory settlement of the debt, and thereby put an end to litigation and the many evils resulting from the failure, and restore peace and happiness to thousands of distressed families.

Catholics ought to learn from this experience that, however valuable archbishops may be in other ways, they are not necessarily good managers of a Savings Bank.

THREE PHASES OF FREE RELIGION.

We may recognize these three forms of Free Religion: I. The Sympathetic, which affirms the best religion to be the broadest. Interpreting this statement to mean that all faiths have in them something that calls for agreement and response, it contents itself with keeping up friendly relations with them all; comparing their several utterances and influences, and taking the good of each and all, without hesitation or hindrance. II. The Antagonistic, which accepts that religion as truest which is most aggressive toward the false. It holds all narrowness of sect, all claim made by any system to monopolize truth or to be the sole agent of present or future good to man, as making such sect or system the legitimate and deserving subject of ceaseless condemnation and assault. In such aggression is its force continually spent. III. The Constructive, whose idea of the best religion that which accomplishes the most good for man, individually and socially. It discriminates the essential substance, the living principle of religion,—vital and universal,—from the overlying dogmas, forms, worships, institutions, that characterize the special religions, and not only separate their adherents from each other, but turn their thoughts aside, and prevent them from rendering a present practical service to humanity. It wields this religion as the instrument of individual perfection, social justice, and human progress, accepting all science, philosophy, and experience as its honored helpers.

One man, born and bred under liberal influences, and finding himself ever broadening therefrom, naturally gravitates toward the Sympathetic. To him, the purpose of Free Religion is sufficiently answered in the free conference and helpful counsel of all faiths with each other. Another, cradled in bigotry, coming up under the shadow of narrow and debasing views which darkened, depressed, and agonized his early life, having broken away from their influence, and realizing the years of loss and suffering thus experienced, cannot restrain his indignation at the teaching which caused it. So he joins the ranks of the unflinching and sometimes undiscriminating antagonists of sects and systems, engaging in incessant and unqualified onslaught upon them all. While a third, in whom the moral sense dominates, tends at once to the vital, the essential. To him, religion is the recognized ideal of life, to be realized and made actual. To the working out of that result, he is consecrated by the very impulse of his nature. He will work with all, of whatever name or faith,—or those making no claim to either,—who have this central practical purpose at heart. He has little interest or sympathy in efforts not thus impelled. The drifting of each of these into their several channels of exp ession and action is as natural as the flowing of a stream from its source in the general direction first given to it, or the product of an effect from its antecedent cause.

Now, it is not impossible that these three forms of Free Religion should meet in the same person,—very rare, very difficult, perhaps, but certainly not impossible. Thus meeting, they would give us the perfect individual impersonation of Free Religion; that is, so far as conception and purpose are concerned. Each tendency would of course modify and tone, while it would not utterly exclude the others. As such combination in the individual is so difficult, the next best thing is to effect this union by bringing into a common organization these different tendencies; giving each its place, its unhampered word, its unrestrained action, except so far as the mutual respect and courtesy, begotten of their intercourse and acquaintance, shall inevitably and properly determine. This is precisely what Free Religious Societies and, in a larger way, the Free Religious Association, has attempted, and to some extent accomplished. It is what they are still to keep in view and realize more fully hereafter, if they are to occupy any important place in the history of religious progress.

So the journal which is to be a worthy expression of the aspirations and purposes of Free Religion will give voice to each of these conceptions, making the full tone of each to be distinctly heard, that ultimately these may blend in the higher harmony of attained freedom, truth, and right. So shall it prove itself indeed an organ of varied notes, all resolving themselves at last, not into the "still, sad," but the glorious and triumphant "music of humanity,"—humanity enlightened, purified, perfected. SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Now that prayers for rain are pretty thoroughly "tabooed" among people whose reasoning faculties are not allowed to lie dormant, and meteorological prophecies are made from ascertainable data, the question begins to be discussed, May we not in time partially control the weather? An affirmative answer was prophesied,—without any reasons being given, however,—in a peculiar story which recently ran through several numbers of the Atlantic Monthly; and now the Scientific American approaches the same theme by permitting its correspondents to propose plans for the artificial production of rain. One of these suggests the construction of a huge hollow tower, fifteen hundred feet in height, through which a column of saturated air might be blown into the upper atmosphere, there be condensed, and fall as rain,—a reversal of the draught in the tower producing an opposite effect; that is, dispersing clouds, when rain is not desired. Admitting, for the sake of argument, the possibility of the erection of such a tower, the Scientific American easily proves that it would be of no practical value, but goes on to show that we are now unconsciously changing the weather in some parts of our country by a practical modification of this theory. In the once rainless districts of Colorado and Utah, for instance, several hundreds of locomotives are now discharging daily into the air at least two hundred and ten millions of cubic feet of steam, enough to make a very respectable little cloud; and rainfalls, the American believes, have in consequence become more frequent. Again, a correspondent of the New York Tribune states that at the time of the first settlement of Kansas. in the vicinity of Topeka, attempts to sink wells were generally unsuccessful, no water being found. The soil, moreover, during dry periods, became baked three feet down, "almost as hard as and more impervious to moisture than common bricks," while such rains as fell came in the shape of devastating floods, arising, as supposed, in the equatorial regions of the South Pacific Ocean. Now, however, water is found everywhere at a depth of from fifteen to twenty-five feet, and the rainfall is equally distributed throughout the year. He ascribes this great change to the ploughing of the land. "Formerly, the floods of water rolled from the grass-bound surface, as from a cake of tallow. Now, the gentle showers are absorbed by mellow loam, and are held as in a dish by the compact clayey subsoil"; and Eastern Kansas is no longer dependent "upon the foreign supply of rain." These two theories, taken together, are certainly worthy of some consideration; and even the crude plans for controlling weather, which now tempt to ridicule, may prove to be the first ineffectual reaching out after that which may some day be firmly grasped as one of man's greatest triumphs.

It seems, from a paper by Mr. Radau, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, translated in the Popular Science Monthly, that the physical characteristics of the centre of the earth are still unknown, and cannot at present be ascertained. Our ignorance on this point, however, does not result from any lack of attempts on the part of scientific men to solve the problem. On the contrary, every department of science has been searched for a solution. Astronomy, physics, chemistry, mathematics; the action of volcanoes and earthquakes and the geysers; arguments from the tides, from the heat of the sun, from theories regarding the formation of the solar system, the rotation of the earth, the precession of the equinoxes, the rings of Saturn,—all have been employed, thus far in vain. It is generally conceded at present that volcanoes and earthquakes are caused by the intense heat of the interior of the earth, and the generation of steam which ensues from the contact of water with this intense heat; but water, nevertheless, is not supposed to exist very far below the surface of the external crust. Whether the centre of the earth is fluid or solid or a pasty mass is an open question. It is very easy to reach an indisputable conclusion on this point, if we confine ourselves to the predictions of any one science at a time; but, unfortunately, some other science, followed with equal rigor, will furnish a different conclusion. The explanation of this paradox is, in brief, that none of the sciences are so far developed that they are competent to deal with the immense forces and unusual conditions which admittedly exist at the earth's centre. Our sciences, wonderful as are some of their generalizations, only hold good within certain limits; and some of the essential factors in this problem are beyond these limits. In the words of Mr. Radau, "What is the action of molecular forces, in solids or fluids, subjected to a pressure of several millions of atmospheres, and at the same time to a temperature of some thousand degrees? What is the solid or the liquid state under these conditions? Data on this point are absolutely lacking, and anything advanced thereon must be purely hypothetical."

We wish to call attention to the excellent opportunity for the formation of new and startling theories afforded by the unsatisfactory conclusion of Mr. Radau's paper. We wonder, indeed, that the ground—no, not the ground exactly, but the solid or fluid or paste, or whatever it may be at the centre of the earth—has not been occupied sooner. Orthodox theologians, for instance, have had more recent trouble in hanging on to hell than any other doctrine. Only let them be willing to make it small enough to be packed away in the centre of the earth, and they may yet save their precious treasure for many generations. There is good authority for this advice, moreover. Some of the ancient fathers believed that hell was in the centre of the earth. Why not put it there again? We wish, too, that some kind friend would carry the news to Joseph Cook that there is yet a spot of considerable dimensions which the telescope cannot look into nor the microscope probe, where the physicist's scales will not weigh, and the chemist's fires are "nowhere," where protoplasm is perhaps the unknowable, where everything indeed is perhaps, and where nothing has been logically catalogued. There is a good field here, too, for well developed "mediums." Cannot some spirit from the vasty deep tell us something about the very vast and very deep mass on the crust of which we are tumbling about? Spirits surely need not regard the known laws of matter. Mr. Jules Verne, in his Journey to the Centre of the Earth, foolishly confined himself to prolongations of facts. Some spirit should be able to "see" Verne's book, and "go" him several points better. This great riddle should be solved. Scientific men are confessedly confounded. Now, therefore, is everybody else's chance. We should appeal to the Concord philosophers, but their balloons unfortunately always soar toward the ether. We fear that it is useless to appeal to Orthodox theologians, for they are too busily engaged just now in saving Scripture texts from the deluge of criticism. We fall back, therefore, with trembling hope, upon Joseph Cook and the Spiritualists. The former has now exhausted the known universe, and could at least manage to fish out from this new unknown a course of lectures and another book; and any revelations which the latter might make could not possibly be discredited by scientific dogma. Let somebody improve the opportunity. The theologaster's chances are lessening every moon.

Ill-luck is proverbially asserted to run in some families; and the proverb is one of that kind, born of popular belief, frequently found to possess a certain basis of fact. There is no reason why a particular nervous or muscular or functional deficiency, not distinct enough to be easily apparent, but sufficient to keep a man continually in the rear in the struggle for existence, may not be passed down from father to son during several generations. Adversity and ill-health are undoubtedly often conjoined in individual experiences, and "the health-cure" may transform business depression into prosperity. The London Lancet suggests an application of the same remedy to those members of a family who may seem to have inherited the family ill-luck. A practical difficulty is that the "unlucky" person is the last to admit his own deficiencies, and no physician's diagnosis of his case is likely to meet with any credence.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Vacation Schools.

Is a long summer vacation good for all the children in a city? is a question which many people, with most knowledge of the matter, have for some time answered in the negative. But how to remedy the evil, since many of the children go out of the city, and ought to go, for the summer weeks, and the teachers certainly need their vacation, has been a practical difficulty. The ordinary routine of the public schools, of course, could not be continued. One woman, by a simple experiment of her own devising in one of the wards of Boston the past summer, has solved the problem; and the "Bulletin-Committee" of the Associated Charities of Boston thus announce her plan. Cut it out, and save it for possible use next summer:—

A vacation school has been held this summer in Ward 9, all the particulars of which cannot of course be given to the public; but the value and success of the undertaking have been such that it is felt the community should be informed of what has been accomplished. A lady, a teacher in one of our public schools, went early in the spring to the secretary of the committee for Ward 9, saying she wished to teach a free school for the poor children of Wards 8 and 9 during the two months of midsummer vacation. She had become convinced that the long summer vacation was very demoralizing to children between the ages of five and twelve years, and especially hard for their mothers, who could not keep them from the streets, where they often find wrong companions and become ill from eating bad fruit. This lady, Miss V., said she would gladly teach such a school three hours every morning, if the expenses could be paid. The secretary expostulated, trying to convince her that she needed rest; but the only reply was that she had determined to do it, and pecuniary assistance was all that was required. Application was then made to a member of the school committee for the use of the school-house at the corner of Pinckney and Anderson Streets, which was not only granted, but every possible aid was given by the gentleman to whom the appeal was made. His friendly co-operation made the whole labor comparatively easy of accomplishment. All the money needed ($100) was raised among the residents of Ward 9; and, when we consider the good that was done, we feel sorry that the secretary was obliged to work so hard to raise this in very small sums, when projects for one day's amusement for children, or the giving away of soup in winter, both plans of questionable efficacy, should cost the community of Boston three and four thousand dollars each. Sewing, music, and oral instruction were the occupations of the children.

The school opened July 6, with twelve children. The next day, forty-four came. One day, there were ninety. At last, the average attendance proved to be sixty children; and the names of two hundred and eighty-five stand on the record-book as the whole number of those who came once or oftener. There were both girls and boys, and one-half were colored children. There were several volunteer teachers, all working with a will, and two paid assistants, one for the sewing department and one for the school.

A good strict rule was made that the children should come clean; and one point at least was gained by the vacation school, that all the children who came to it were washed once a day. The only study required from the pupils during the summer was the committing to memory of pieces of poetry or dialogues to be spoken at the exhibition of the school on the last day, when the parents were to be invited. But the singing was the great feature. The voices of the children could be heard as soon as one turned into Pinckney Street, and their enjoyment in it was unbounded.

The exhibition was held August 27, in the vestry of the church for colored people (the Rev. Mr. Hunter's), on Charles Street. Every seat was occupied. Seventy of the children were present, and behaved remarkably well and spoke well. Twenty-five pieces were given, including five dialogues. The next morning at 10 A.M., sixty-five children, to whom tickets had been given, came to the school-room for their parting gifts. The children seemed perfectly happy, and had a feast of good things. Several of the mothers expressed their gratitude. "I can only say," writes the lady upon whom the whole labor hinges, "it has been the happiest vacation I have ever had. I did not do the hard work. [This probably refers to the necessary begging.] Surely, I have had everything to help me."

We can but wish that another summer may see vacation schools in every ward. Surely, they ought not to be taught by the regular teachers, because very few persons could bear the strain. This experiment proves that young women could be found, however, who would be glad of the occupation and a small salary. The idea that long vacations are bad is often formed by other parents beside the very poor, and little summer schools for the wise occupation of children are growing up at the seashore and among the hills. What a necessity they must be then for those children whose only recreation is to be found in the hot streets, among the reeking smells and unhealthy fruit!

Among the papers read at the recent national convention of the Eclectic Medical Association, held in Chicago, was one of exceptional interest by Dr. MacMaster, of Michigan, on "The Influence of Inebriety on Vital and Criminal Statistics." He states, as the result of extended inquiry, that forty-two per cent. of men in this country, and sixty per cent. of women, are total abstainers; that of the prisoners in the penitentiaries, seventy-eight per cent. were freely addicted to liquor-drinking before their imprisonment. It was shown from eminent insurance authorities that total abstainers were "the best risks," that liquor-drinking increased the social evil, and disqualified many for productive labor. "The paper throughout," says the Chicago Inter-Ocean, "was an unusually able presentation of the temperance side of the question." It is an encouraging sign of progress, when members of the medical profession take hold of the drink problem with the discriminating intelligence and earnestness shown by Dr. MacMaster in the treatment of his chosen theme. May his praiseworthy example be followed by many others in kindred medical and scientific bodies!—National Temperance Advocate.

FROM MRS. DALL ON A JOURNEY.

San Francisco, Cal., Sept. 4, 1880.

Dear Index:—

I wonder what your young people would like to hear of all this wonderful journey that I have taken? Shall I tell them of the Egyptian lotus blooming in the Calumet River, and sold by children in Chicago streets? Who dropped the seed just there, and nowhere else in this wide land? How is it possible to tell of it, and not recall the Egyptian head-dresses, and calm Osirian face of the finest Peruvian terra cottas, to be seen to best advantage in the museum at Ithaca, or in the superb collection of Walton Evans at New Rochelle? Shall I talk about the great pillared cacti of Arizona, rising fifteen and twenty feet, whose snowy capitals are alive with fragrance and beauty? Shall I tell how the ten stone toes of Atlas, protruding from the soil of Glen Eyrie, are nothing less than just such cacti turned to stone, or how the whole country is filled with mimetic ruins, Egyptian tombs, like those at Abou Simbel, with visionary giants leaning back like Ramses; old castles of the Rhine, with arches and portcullis; with mighty walled cities or fortresses a thousand feet up in the air, for which the country finds no grander name than "wash-outs"? Shall I tell how the decreasing herds of antelope still flash across the plain; how the bison are no longer seen, although their heads are nailed to many a frontier wall; how the lazy Indian still loiters round "the track," and shows her pappoose gladly for two bits, while away in mountain fastnesses, not out of sight of the mountain coach, the wild-cat and the mountain lion still dispute the pass with the rattlesnake?

Shall I tell how I saw a little child pass through one of the wildest and wickedest crowds in Leadville, leaning on the shoulder of her tiny jackass, whom she half-caressed and half-punished with her baby hand; or how, in the "Garden of the Gods," a snowy rampart from the Jura springs suddenly from the soil, and confronts the bloody sandstone of the Trias, with mysterious significance? Or shall I tell them how we climbed the Sierras, and with jaded eyes saw Lake Douner two thousand feet below, and at last gladly caught the first sea breeze at Sacramento, and floated down by its broad waters, till at last the white bosom of the mighty Pacific shone and throbbed for us beyond the Golden Gate? Shall I tell how the rocky steeps of San Francisco rise over hills too perpendicular for horses, with a climate whose coolness veils a burning heat, whose summer warmth scarce hides the winter's breath? Will they hear how, when I ask a question on the street in English, it is answered in a dozen different tongues? How the marvels of all lands lie in the windows of pawnbrokers' shops; and how the pleasantest place I have seen since I left home is the Grammar School on Rincon Hill, where Miss Clercland and Miss Stowell, with their score of assistants, preside in the old New England way, and half cheated me into believing I had not crossed the Rockies at all? From my window, I look down over China-town, where there is hidden the terrible traditionary refuse of a past faith and a past civilization, taking forms unintelligible to any but the student of Aristophanes. Among the coolies who trot by, smoking opium twisted in brown paper, and on a yoke across their shoulders, carrying baskets of fruit, vegetables, or meats, there is a worse slavery than that our civil war has hardly yet exterminated. I am not so afraid of the leper who drags his weary length along, a little behind, as of the legacy China-town,—yes, China-town,—even when broken up, demolished, and burnt clean, is yet to bequeath to this Western coast.

For the fortnight that I have been here, the sun has never once risen or set. He finds such a heavy breakfast of Pacific fog that it takes him all day to devour it, and the meal is followed by such throes of indigestion that he dare not lift his head from its gloomy sheets. Yet the market is full of peaches and pears and plums and grapes, of nectarines and apricots, of figs purple and figs white; so there is a sun somewhere, and he shines! Do all these things taste good? Not a bit of it. They bewilder the eye with their lovely colors; but one Northern peach is worth them all, and is a better hint of the infinite love and beauty. But there are less lovely things in the market. There are shrimps, those ghosts of shell-fish who bear the same relation to crabs and lobsters that May-flies do to the devil's darning-needle. There are cray-fish, with a wicked, uncanny look; and, since not only the Chinese, but all the foreign residents eat them, there are cuttle-fish, whose tentacles drop down from their small bodies like ropes of flesh, with small polyp-like blossoms all along. I saw one this morning with six arms, dropping down nearly seven feet each in length! And, all the years our respected fellow-citizens have been breakfasting on these gelatinous curiosities, our scientific friends across the water have been gravely wondering whether Victor Hugo did not invent the devil-fish! And that reminds me to say that one thing a traveller must learn on this Western trips and that is greatly to distrust the definite conclusion; of scientific men. No one who has seen a sudden storm undo the work of a century, an alkaline plain turn into a hay-field in one short month, or a lake thirty-five miles long by sixteen wide drained by a year's irrigation, can feel at all sure that into scientific chronology all the conditions have been entered.

Yesterday, I went to see the wonderful Park California has made out of six square miles of sand-dunes. I went to get my first view of the Pacific and the rocks where the seals still clamber; but, on the way, the fog the trade-winds bring—brown fog that could be cut into slices and toasted—shut me in. The seals wisely retired to private caverns, and I—took a remedial glass of lager instead of my first glimpse of the Pacific. This afternoon, I was carried off to Woodward's Gardens, not knowing in the least what I was to see. Glad indeed was I that I went, for nowhere in the world can one see so much for "two bits." It occupies two blocks of land,—one a pretty verdant slope of landscape gardening, the other supplied with swings for children, goat carriages and donkey drives, zoological dens, and a camera. There are four museums, menageries, and conservatories, an art gallery, and a vast audience-hall. It was impossible to see all these things in one afternoon; and I went to the regular entertainment, which was half over before I arrived. My part of it began with incredible feats by a flying acrobat, who always did what he undertook, but did it so clumsily that he kept me in perpetual terror. Then "California's greatest singer" stamped about the stage, and imitated very sadly the freaks of "delirium tremens." He was followed by a Rose Julian, who went through posturing feats in so little clothing that I could not have endured it, if she had looked in the least like a woman; but she was only a tangle of legs and arms that seemed to change places, and might have belonged to a cuttle-fish. The saddest sight of all was a dear little child not six years old, who danced skilfully to a tambourine, but with a pale face which told what she had suffered in learning. Comic songs and a comic pantomime were followed by a concert, and all these I left to go in search of something which delighted me extremely. I mean the subterranean aquarium, in which all sorts of fishes and shell-fish live in great tanks of sea-water, some dozens of which are set into the walls of a dark grotto. The light falls on the top of the tanks, and comes through them into the grotto. You see the fishes just as they see each other, vivid with iridescent color, darting with graceful play of fins or tails, half-transparent and altogether lovely. Aladdin must have inspired the whole thing. Then there are conservatories full of wonder, and a tank with a rockery for four gigantic seals. A seal is the ugliest creature in the universe. I wish it had not such a soft, intelligent eye; for it looks like an antediluvian snail strayed out of its cavernous shell, or lumbers over the rocks like an unwieldy leech. Now, dear Index, I have talked to you for a good hour; and not a word have I said that I wanted to. I should like to write about Salt Lake City, some things that I think you have never heard before. I want to speak of the open vices of San Francisco. I can't help being glad that in dear New England vice still pays to virtue the homage of hypocrisy. If you care to hear, just let me know.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

SHAKESPEARE had only fifteen hundred words in his vocabulary. But he knew how to arrange them.

GEORGE W. CURTIS is to deliver the address at the unveiling of the statue of Robert Burns in Central Park, in October.

MISS DICKINSON has written a four-act comedy entitled "An American Girl," and Miss Fanny Davenport will personate the heroine.

CARLYLE is reported to be busily engaged in revising and correcting a new edition of his works and in collecting materials for his biography.

THE owner of Swedenborg's summer-house proposes to tear it down, unless somebody will buy it for $1,300. It is proposed to bring it to this country for a relic.

A RUSSIAN publishing firm has entered into negotiations with Mr. Darwin for the exclusive right of translating his new work on natural history into Russian.

THE statue of Governor Winthrop set up in Scollay Square, Boston, on Anniversary Day, the 17th inst., is one of the best of such artistic memorials in the city.

MISS MARY GREW, of Philadelphia, a friend of the Free Religious Association, whose voice has been occasionally heard at its gatherings, is on a visit to Boston.

MR. AND MRS. WILLIAM FLETCHER, distinguished English spiritualist lecturers, have arrived in this country, where they will address audiences upon their favorite theme.

MRS. GLADSTONE has opened a home for business girls in London. The establishment will accommodate twenty-five young women, who will be expected to pay according to their means.

ANNA DICKINSON'S new play called "An American Girl," in which Fanny Davenport impersonates the heroine, has been performed at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, New York, and is pronounced a success.

MISS JESSICA LANDSEER, a sister of the late Sir Edwin, the great animal painter, died at Folkstone, England, on the 29th ult. Miss Landseer had also won much reputation as an engraver, and in other lines of art.

MRS. MILLER, wife of Rev. Mr. Miller, of Shelburne Falls, Mass., supplies his desk during his vacation. Mrs. Miller preaches original sermons, it is said; and her choir is reinforced by a detachment from the brass band of the village.

MISS A. C. FLETCHER, who has been an enthusiastic student of American antiquities for years, has prepared a course of lectures upon the subject for next winter. She has investigated the mounds of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS spoke recently in an Indiana town where thirty-seven years ago he had been beaten by a mob and left for dead. There were men there who had seen the murderous assault, and the woman who dressed his wounds after the mob had left him. The people wept as he recalled the story.

LARKIN G. MEAD, the sculptor, has just shipped from Florence, Italy, to America, the models for the two remaining bronze groups for the Lincoln monument at Springfield, Ill. He is now engaged on studies for a statue of Gen. Sutter, the California pioneer, at whose mill gold was first discovered in that State.

THE trustees of the University of Wooster, Ohio, have elected a woman as lecturer of modern literature. She is Miss Irish, the translator of several volumes of German literature. It is stated that Miss Irish has had entire charge of the foreign correspondence of Secretary Carl Schurz during President Hayes's administration.

MR. BROWNING is never so great as when he is solving in some form the old mediæval problem, How many angels could stand on the point of a needle? and yet solving it so that a certain fervor of passion flashes through and kindles into a white heat the needle on the point of which angels are expected to stand. —London Spectator.

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, the French astronomer, has been making several balloon ascents of late, one of them with his wife. He started from Paris, travelled all night, and came down near Rheims. He says that he did not feel any giddiness, but that he felt a vague desire to fling himself out of the car. "Although convinced of my immediate death," he says, "I felt a gentle temptation to let myself fall; and my own death became indifferent to me. But, happily, it is one of those temptations which can be resisted."

PROF. EDWARD S. MORSE delivered an interesting and instructive lecture upon "Household Art in Japan," before the Parker Memorial Society of this city, last Sunday. Mr. Morse is a distinguished scientist, and possesses the somewhat rare gift among scientific men of rendering expositions of science in popular language. He was for three years a resident of Japan, as professor of the University of Tokio; and his lectures upon that country are the result of personal experience there. Such a lecturer is sure to have something to say, and should have all he is willing to do in that line.

COL. INGERSOLL got out of bad company Saturday night, and is to be congratulated on his escape. He stated the exact truth when he said: "This obscene-law business is a stumbling-block. Had it not been for this, instead of the few persons voting here—less than one hundred—there would have been a congress numbered by thousands." Believers in Christianity may rejoice that the stumbling-block is there, but they may also agree with Col. Ingersoll in recognizing its existence. The Liberal League will never be a cause of alarm so long as it is the avowed champion of obscene literature.—Chicago Tribune, Sept. 20.

FOREIGN.

ON Saturday, Sept. 4, the Rev. Mr. Loyson celebrated, in the Gallican Church of the Rue Rochechouart, the marriage of one of his vicars, the Abbé Laine, with a young widow lady of Le Mans.

AT its last sitting, the Academy of Sciences decided that a subscription should be opened in its bureaux for the purpose of striking a medal commemorative of the celebrated naturalist, Mr. Milne-Edwards.

MME. BOTTA, of New York, has given 20,000 francs to the Académie Française, the accumulated revenues of which sum during five years are to be given to the best work on the condition of women which shall have appeared within that period. The prize will be awarded for the first time next year.

MODERN industry and liberal laws have democratized travelling by rendering it rapid and cheap. One hundred years ago, it used to cost at least a thousand francs to cross Mont Cenis. From Paris to Calais was, one hundred years ago, a journey of thirty-two hours; to-day, it is a journey of six hours. From Paris to Lyons was a journey of forty-nine hours instead of nine hours as it is to-day; and from Paris to Bordeaux, seventy-one hours instead of nine.

THE States of the Island of Jersey do not want the Jesuits. Hearing that some of those from France were about to come to the Island, a project was introduced in the States, of which the following is the first article: "Every Jesuit or member of the Company of Jesus is prohibited from settling himself in the Island, or founding any institution whatever under the style of school, seminary, college, or community, or brotherhood, under penalty of being summarily banished from the Island, together with his associates.

A SHORT time ago, Dr. Inowraclaver, a Jew, was appointed by the Presbytery of the Court Church at Breslau Teacher in Ordinary at the Friedrich Gymnasium. The appointment was, however, after a lengthy debate, quashed by the Provincial School Board; and, although the Presbytery claimed the right — under a statute of 1764, which opened the Gymnasium to members of every religious creed — of retaining Dr. Inowraclaver, its claim was rejected on the plea that the statute refers to pupils, and not to teachers.

THE majority of the Luton School Board is composed of churchmen; and they have recently given proof positive of the manner in which churchmen would, if it lay within their power, pervert the whole spirit of modern elementary education, by setting apart one hour a day to religious instruction, and appointing two examiners to test the children's acquaintance with the Bible. We are informed that this zeal on behalf of religion—which was certainly zeal without knowledge, inasmuch as it overshot the mark — gave rise to much exasperation in Luton, where the fact that the Scripture lessons usurped time set apart in the time-table for secular instruction was strongly commented upon. Two hundred and fifty children were, by means of the Conscience Clause, withdrawn by their parents from the Bible-drill; and an indignation meeting was afterwards held to emphasize their protest. Now, however, the Education Department has had its attention called to the matter, and the action of the School Board has been declared illegal. Such an example is well worth remembering, as it shows how the children of England would be educated, if churchmen could regulate their instruction.—Secular Review.

CULTIVATING INFECTIOUS DISEASES AMONG INFANTS.—At a recent meeting of the Orrell Local Board, near Wigan, in Lancashire, the clerk, in illustration of the difficulties which beset the control of infection, mentioned a practice which exists in that district, of mothers deliberately exposing their young children to the infection of scarlet fever and whooping-cough, under the belief that it was better that the children should have the disease while young. He designated the belief as a "superstition." We would rather term it a tradition arising from the imperfectly understood results of experience. The practice described is by no means confined to the part of Lancashire under consideration. Our own knowledge of it is somewhat extensive; but the exposure, so far as we have met with it, has been invariably limited to the obviously mild cases of infectious disease, and two elements entered into the practice. First, there was the practically universal belief that the infectious diseases of children had to be undergone by every child, and the sooner they were got over the better for the child, both as to its chance of recovery and its subsequent welfare; and, next, there was the belief that, if a child contracted the disease from a mild case, it would have a mild attack. Hence mild cases were selected to catch the disease from. In both these elements there was a substratum of truth, which long experience and common observation had shown, and which was unchecked by the more precise observation of the medical man.—London Lancet.

THE POLITICAL CREED OF THE FRENCH DEMOCRACY. A "returned exile" writes to an English journal that on the whole, apart from the pretty universal disgust of violent or sensational politics which he considers one of the healthiest symptoms in Paris democratic life, it would be hard for the present to discover any predominant or even strong leaning in the proletarian world. French workmen, for the most part, may be said to be tired of systems, and to have drifted to a kind of socialistic eclecticism. Their creed is gathered from what is most rational and practical among the teachings of the first half of the century: from Saint-Simon, his conception of an industrial and administrative epoch, that must be substituted for the military régime; from Fourier, his admirable views on the education and development of man; from Auguste Comte, his morals; from Lassalle, his "Volkstaat." The epitome is ruled by a wide-spread notion that individual property must for the present be accepted as a fact, but that the fact is a relative one, with nothing permanent in its essence, and that by successive and gradual transformations the use of accumulated capital ought to be, and must be, in process of time universalized; practically, and in the immediate future, a growing conviction that the working classes have to expect only from their own endeavors any advance in the social scale, and that their first duty is to secure a hearing in Parliament. This is sure to be the mot d'ordre at the general elections of 1881; and it may be safely expected that, at least by the great cities, an aggregate representation of a dozen working men will be sent to the Chamber of Deputies. It remains to be hoped that these will be of a conciliatory, not an eccentric or a sensational turn of mind. If such be the case, they will bring to the young Republic what she seems to have sadly lacked up to the present,—deep sympathy for the humble and care for those who are, after all, her most devoted and uncompromising supporters.

JESTINGS.

"Now THIS is what I call business," remarked an undertaker, as an unfortunate gentleman stepped into his store and died.

"Go OUT, young man. She's not here!" said a preacher in the midst of his sermon to a youth whom he saw standing hesitatingly at the portal.

BRIDGET: "And how shall I cut the poie, mum?" Lady of the house: "Cut it into quarters." Bridget: "And how many quarthers wud I cut it into, mum?"

THE last valse but four; time, 2.35 A.M.: Wife of his bosom: "Don't keep looking at your watch, Algy! One would think you were in church!" — London Punch.

A MISERLY, rich old man, on being rebuked for his parsimony, replied: "True, I don't give much; but, if you only knew how it hurts me, when I give anything, you wouldn't wonder." That's just what's the matter with all misers. Giving hurts them.

AN enterprising American shipped some wheel-barrows to Rio de Janeiro; and the natives filled them with stones and such, and carried them on their heads. They said it was a capital contrivance, and wondered how they managed to get along so many years without it.

GOING home from church, she remarked to her husband, "Did you notice that bald-headed man in front of us, and how young he looked? I never saw any one so young before with a bald head." Then he shut her up by replying, "My dear, I was bald-headed before I was a year old."

A LITTLE boy, in turning over the leaves of a scrap-book, came across the well-known picture of some chickens just out of their shell. He examined the picture carefully, and then with a grave, sagacious look slowly remarked, "They came out 'cos they was afraid of being boiled."

AN ENGLISHMAN related that, being at Naples, while taking tea with his wife, a thunder-bolt entered the chamber, and the poor woman was reduced to dust. "Ah, mon Dieu!" cried one of his auditors, "what did you do, what did you say?" The Englishman replied coldly, "I rang, and said, 'John, sweep up your mistress.'"

A LADY taking tea at a small company, being very fond of hot rolls, was asked to have another. "Really, I cannot," she modestly replied. "I don't know how many I have eaten already." "I do," unexpectedly cried a juvenile upstart, whose mother had allowed him a seat at the table. "You've eaten eight. I've been countin'!"

A CURATE who had adopted a monotonous whine in his prayers, on being remonstrated with by his diocesan, pleaded that such a tone was proper to acts of supplication, because beggars always assumed a whine when they asked for alms. The bishop replied, "Yes; but, when they do, I always know that they are impostors, and give nothing."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

THE following resolutions on Sunday observance were introduced in the Weirs' Landing Methodist Camp-meeting by President Durgin, of Hillsdale College, Mich., and we presume were passed:—

WHEREAS, The people of these United States have widely departed from the customs of our fathers in their observance of the Sabbath; and

WHEREAS, We have a great army of men on our railroads, steamboats, and street-cars, in our telegraph offices and post-offices, and in our manufacturing establishments—a great army of men who are compelled to toil seven days in a week, or lose their places and wages; and

WHEREAS, Many Christian people and ministers of the gospel have come to believe and teach that the fourth commandment has been abrogated, so that the law of God no longer requires men to abstain from secular labor on the Sabbath: therefore

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Conference, the fourth commandment has not been abrogated, and that the law of the Sabbath (as interpreted by the words of Jesus and the practice of the Apostles) does still bind the human race to abstain from secular labor on the first day of the week.

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend to our ministers to preach faithfully and plainly on this subject, and to our churches to make persistent Sabbath-breaking a matter of church discipline and exclusion.

Resolved, That we recommend to our people everywhere the formation of Sabbath societies, in which (imitating the spirit of the fathers in their struggle against slavery) we also struggle against the destruction of God's Sabbath,—struggle until every railroad, engine room, and office shall, on the Sabbath, be as silent as a graveyard; until every toiling operative shall have the Lord's Day for worship with his family; and until even the animals shall no longer be robbed of the rest which God in his decalogue has commanded us to give them.

An exchange says:—

"In Brooklyn, a child five years old, who has been suffering three years with a horribly diseased ankle, has recently been cured by the application of mortar from the chapel of Knock, County Mayo, Ireland, where have appeared the apparitions of the Virgin Mary and Saints James and John. The mortar was dissolved in water before applying. The Pope is to investigate the matter to see whether or not it is a miracle."

SUBSTANTIALISM;

—OR—

PHILOSOPHY OF KNOWLEDGE.

BY JEAN STORY.

Perceiving the oneness and continuous interchangeability of substance as essence and as form, the author discards the use of the term "spirit" and "matter," and substitutes therefor the term "essential substance," whose intrinsic elasticity or vitality is alike intact, whether condensed as form or expanded as essence or spirit; all the innumerable qualities of substance being solely the result of its spacial modifications. Viewing the phenomena of nature, the only source of positive knowledge, from this new stand-point, which differs from that whence any other system has been idealized, and accepting the exact sciences as the bases of speculative science, the author claims to present for public consideration a New System of Philosophy. Unarmed by other aid than its own intrinsic merits, it has been launched upon the stormy sea of public opinion to battle single-handed for its right to a voice in the general sentiments of the age.

The book is in cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. It can be obtained first hand at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. Price $1.50 at retail.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

ALL that we are is the result of what we have thought: it is founded on our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts. If a man speaks or acts with an evil thought, pain follows him, as the wheel follows the foot of him who draws the carriage.—Buddhist.

ALL that we are is the result of what we have thought: it is founded on our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts. If a man speaks or acts with a pure thought, happiness follows him, like a shadow that never leaves him.—Buddhist.

EVERY man reaps as he tills. Who lay up goodness have gladness; who lay up evil, sadness. The upright fear no thunderbolts. Would you know what you were, see what you are; would you know what you will be, see what you do. If one be not enlightened within, what lamp shall give him light? If his purpose is evil, what prayers shall he repeat?—Chinese.

THE true use of a man's possessions is to help his work; and the best end of all his work is to show us what he is. The noblest workers of our world bequeath us nothing so great as the image of themselves. Their task, be it ever so glorious, is historical and transient: the majesty of their spirit is essential and eternal. Goodness, beauty, truth, acquired by others, are original to them; hiding behind the eye, thinking on the brow, and making music in the voice. Such beings live simply to express themselves; the soul not being with them the servant of action, but action rather the needful articulation of the soul.—J. Martineau.

THAT regal soul I reverence, in whose eyes
Suffices not all worth the city knows
To pay that debt which his own heart he owes;
For less than level to his bosom rise
The low crowd's heaven and stars: above their skies
Runneth the road his daily feet have pressed;
A loftier heaven he beareth in his breast,
And o'er the summits of achieving hies,
With never a thought of merit or of meed;
Choosing divinest labors through a pride
Of soul, that holdeth appetite to feed
Ever on angel-herbage, naught beside;
Nor praises more himself for hero-deed
Than stones for weight or open seas for tide.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A CABLE despatch from London, October 1, reports Thomas Carlyle dangerously ill, and not expected to survive many days. Mr. Carlyle is within two months of eighty-five years old.

THE Christian Statesman appears to think that the employment of Col. Ingersoll as a campaign orator by the Republicans in Maine was one of the causes of the Republican failure there; and it bids the party to take warning therefrom.

REV. E. P. ADAMS of the Presbyterian Church, who during last winter and spring kept Western New York agitated by his heretical preaching against the doctrine of eternal punishment, has had an ecclesiastical trial, and been deposed from the ministry by the Buffalo Presbytery.

AFFAIRS have looked very warlike in Turkey within the last week; but, at the time we write, the prospect is brighter for a peaceable solution of the perplexing problem which the other powers in Europe have taken in hand,—namely, to coerce the Sultan into carrying out the Berlin treaty, by the merely moral pressure of a naval fleet in the waters adjacent his territories.

A PROMINENT lawyer in New Jersey arose in court the other day, and expressed his contrition for having obtained excessive damages in a case he had once advocated before the court, and also asked pardon for any discourtesies he might have been guilty of at any time in the heat of discussion. The judge was evidently surprised, but spoke in appreciative encouragement of this rare awakening of conscience. His legal brethren of the bar, however, have put in a plea of "temporary insanity"; and they back their opinion by alleging, as sufficient cause of the mental aberration, dyspepsia and zeal for religion and temperance.

ONE result of the "miracles" at Knock, Ireland, has been the conversion of an obscure little hamlet into quite a town, with thriving hotels. The dividends, too, on the railroad passing near the place, have largely increased. And, now, another village, with the euphonious name of Ballyraggett, has started wonderful apparitions. These ghosts evidently mean business. The Catholic ecclesiastics who have been appointed to investigate the phenomena at Knock are acting with the shrewd caution habitual with the Papal Church, and have not yet reported on their validity as miracles. We would recommend to this committee that they search out any land speculators there may be in the vicinity of these Irish villages, and subject them and the directors of the railroads to a course of cross-questioning.

THE Radical Club of Ithaca, New York, appears to us to present an example to Liberal Leagues and similar societies that is worthy of imitation. It does not confine itself to the class of subjects that are so apt to run into windy discussions, but includes those quite largely of a local and practical character. As an illustration of this, it may be mentioned that the one considered at its first meeting this fall was "Drainage in Ithaca." "The club herein," says the Daily Journal, "follows its custom of directing attention chiefly to themes of practical interest. Since its reorganization last spring, the questions of church-taxation, license-laws, the Bible in the public schools, and independent voting have been discussed on its platform by some of the ablest men among us; and the brilliancy of these debates is still fresh in the minds of our readers. We predict an equal success for the coming season."

HOLLAND at last has a monument to the greatest intellect the nation has ever possessed and one of the grandest characters in the history of all countries,—Benedict Spinoza. He was shunned and cursed in his lifetime, and more than two centuries have passed since his death. But the world has now come to know him better; and those who have come to know him best have learned to reverence him. The monument has been erected at The Hague, where he lived and died, by the loving contributions of special students of his philosophy in many countries. It supports a statue of the philosopher, which was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies and addresses on the 14th of September. Various attempts are now being made to revive the philosophical systems of the great thinkers of the past. But, among all the philosophies, we know of none more worthy to be revived or more replete with material for fruitful study than that of Spinoza. And in moral character he came about as near to perfection as any human being of historic fame has ever reached.

THE Unitarians evidently had a very good time at the meeting of their National Conference at Saratoga. The attendance was large,—so large that the absence of the mysterious "other Christian Churches," which give such a long name to the Conference, was not felt. (We incline now to think that this phrase must have been added to the name, in order to make another opportunity to define Unitarian Societies as Christian.) The deliberations are described as having been "remarkably harmonious." From the hurried reading—the only one we have yet been able to give—of the solid report printed by our neighbor, the Christian Register, we judge that the proceedings were strongly denominational, and that some new signs were disclosed of the ecclesiastical tendency which we have felt quite sure would be one of the results of the conference system of organization. The traditions of liberty, however, in the body, in spite of the dividing lines it draws, are so strong that this tendency cannot as yet make much headway; and no little difficulty will be found in drawing into any proper ecclesiastical orbits some of the eccentric Unitarian Societies in the West that have got used to all the freedom of the prairies.

PRISON ETHICS.

A Discourse before the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I.

BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

I approach my subject to-day, friends, from the stand-point of Free Religion. If there be anywhere among us a belief that God is a stern, cruel, inhuman task-master, that the estate of mankind is one of sin and misery, that the human being is conceived in sin and born in iniquity,—that belief can surely have no place here. The Evangelical idea of original sin and total depravity naturally ultimated in a very distinct separation of the saints from the sinners, and naturally subjected the sinners to harsh, often barbarous treatment. It was inevitable that, however much Orthodoxy might do to break down caste-distinctions, it should give its own tone to all the institutions around it. The divine plan, in its conception, included unrelenting punishment to the offender. Nothing but the fear of hell could save depraved, unregenerate humanity; and such as even that would not warn to the paths of virtue were consigned to endless torment. I should be sorry to do Evangelicism injustice; but, look at it as I may, I find punishment the central point in its conception of divine and of human rule. Fear has been the attribute to which it has in all cases appealed. And when the warden of one of our New England State prisons said to me the other day, "Our great object is to show the offender that the way of the transgressor is hard," he gave me the legitimate summing up of the Evangelical plan.

But we meet here to-day in the name of a new gospel. Striving to deal somewhat with problems of social science, we have discovered that the most melancholy fact with which the reformer has to contend is the division of the world into classes, alien to each other, ignorant of each other's needs, indifferent to each other's welfare. Tracing these distinctions back through past history, we find they have been much greater than they are to-day: that every step in the line of progress has been a lessening of class feeling and an advance toward a truer unity of the human family. So, to-day, the highest and purest forms of religion recognize, not simply in profession, but in practice, the brotherhood of man. If the lessons of this platform teach anything, they teach that. They affirm that no man liveth to himself alone; that, in a sense to be neither rejected nor despised, each man is his brother's keeper. The brotherhood of man never meant anything more than the brotherhood of a caste, until the idea of individual freedom was fully developed; and individual freedom never means anything more than freedom of a caste, until the idea of brotherhood is understood and accepted. We therefore, whose mission it is to stand for the new faith, can no longer consistently regard ourselves as the saints, and a body of men outside and beneath us as the sinners. We must needs rather look upon all human beings as members of one great family, in whom, as Seneca says, Nature has implanted mutual love. The father and mother in that family is the power we cannot comprehend, but which men call God. The laws by which the children are governed are always and universally applicable; but their design is simply to help the weak, to inspire the strong, to win all to that which is good and beautiful and true. The family bond, the bond of humanity, is therefore the strongest bond we know. It is with this golden chain of kinship, binding me not less to the crucified robbers than to the crucified Jesus, that I speak to-day. The links at one end may be darkened by sin and shame, at the other very bright with the lustre of virtue; but they are all golden still.

I think the alleviations in prison discipline and life, which are constantly going on, are caused primarily by this growing sense of human brotherhood. The world feels to-day as it never felt before,—that it cannot separate itself from any of its children, even though they be branded murderers and thieves. Our convicts are a part of us. Right in our midst to-day, meeting us on the street, mingling with us in business life, holding positions of trust and honor, are the boys and the men, and, alas! too, the girls and the women, who are to be the future inhabitants of our jails and prisons. We, the most virtuous of us, are inextricably interwoven with them in the great social fabric. We cannot shift the responsibility of fellow-citizenship from our shoulders. We are helping to make the institutions and customs which shall make or unmake them. The little boy who is the off-spring of physical drunkenness in more than one direction—whose cradle is a brothel, whose nursery is a dram-shop, and whose school is a gambling hell—becomes qualified to enter the reform school, thence to pass on to the jail, the State prison, and possibly to the scaffold; but he is a small sharer in the responsibility for the final result, compared with the parents who begot him and the good people who allowed the brothel, the dram-shop, and the gambling hell to take possession of their highways, while they were either wrapped in lazy luxury or engaged in a desperate struggle to save their souls for the kingdom of heaven. Pure birth in love and freedom, and healthy and virtuous surroundings,—these are the right of every human being; and the lack of them will account for almost any sin.

Well, that is a new idea. In its presence, many of the practices of the past could not stand. In its presence, many of the customs of the present will not long stand. Under feudalism, prisons were often, says Harrison, excavations in the earth, encased with solid masonry, or dug out in the living rock; and men were dropped into them as into huge bottles, or placed in recesses in the sides and built in with stone and mortar, to drag out a miserable and sometimes protracted existence, death offering the only hope of relief. In despotic countries, the policy has often been to cut off all facilities for the identification of prisoners. That all seems severe and inhuman, as it was. It has largely passed away. But the central idea of punishment, of working through fear, still remains. After making all allowance for difference in the severity of the treatment, it is still unhappily true that very much of the old spirit prevails. It could have been said as correctly during the reign of Louis XIV. as it can be now, and as correctly now as it could be then, that the object, the great object, of all prison discipline, is to show the offender that the way of the transgressor is hard.

Now, the advanced thought of the hour, seeing that the criminal is the product of causes frequently, if not always, beyond his own control, sees the transgression not in him alone, but in those who had to do with these causes; and, not to trace it still further back, it sees at once a divided responsibility. It concludes, therefore, that it can reach but one out of the many transgressors in a given case. Then it takes another step, and discovers that crime generally results from ignorance or lack of self-control rather than from deliberate evil intent, and concludes again that what an ignorant man needs is education, what a passionate man needs is power to govern himself. And so by a course of argument absolutely unanswerable, based on the deepest and broadest philosophy, it reasons punishment out of existence. It is with great unanimity, therefore, that the best thought and the finest instincts of the human heart unite to-day in condemning the idea of punishment as the important feature of prison discipline. The sentiment of human brotherhood, in view of all the facts disclosed by social science, cannot tolerate the thought that the great object is to show the offender that the way of the transgressor is hard. The great objects are to protect society and to reform the criminal, and the surest way, and the only way, to protect society in the long run is by reforming the criminal.

Of course, confinement is in itself punishment; but what I mean to say is this: it is not confinement for the sake of punishment, it is confinement for the sake of reform: it is not confinement for the purpose of showing the hardship of the way of the transgressor, it is confinement for the purpose of making him into a good and law-abiding citizen. The test questions, then, to be applied to every system of prison discipline, are these two:—

1. Does it protect society?
2. Does it reform the criminal?

The task I have set myself to-day is to show that our present system does neither of these things, and to indicate the general principles of a system which I think will do both.

Now, in examining our present prison system, I want to be perfectly fair and impartial. I might begin by showing you how much abuse may take place under it, unauthorized by law, and yet unrebuked. I might refer you to a case such as I know of in a New England State (and I am informed they are very common), where there is a man awaiting trial on a charge of perjury. In the theory of our law, he is supposed to be innocent until proved guilty, and is confined in jail in the absence of bail, simply to insure his presence when the time of trial comes. In this case, the man not yet convicted, and who may prove to be entirely innocent, is not only placed under the same roof with men under sentence of crime, and thus associated with the general reputation and influence of such company, but he is compelled to occupy the same work-room with them day after day, until it please the authorities to bring him to trial: not because the law requires it, but because for economical reasons the only rooms in this prison kept habitable during the day in cold weather are the work-rooms. That, we shall agree, is a very grave abuse,—a condition of things well calculated to demoralize a weak man, and an indignity to which an innocent man, weak or strong, ought never to be subjected. If I were speaking as a friend of the present system, and wanted to perfect its administration, I could multiply such and similar cases. But that is not my object. I want to convince you that the system itself is radically wrong; and, in order to do that fairly, I must pass over errors of administration, and try it at its best. The counts in my indictment are these:—

First. The system encourages the idea of antagonism between the prisoner and society.

Second. It usually groups prisoners of all degrees of guilt together.

Third. Where it avoids this, it adopts something as bad or worse in the solitary system.

Fourth. It is unnecessarily severe in mere conventional matters, greatly exaggerating their importance.

Fifth. It is based on definite terms of imprisonment.

Sixth. It generally includes capital punishment, and always the life sentence, which is but another form of the death penalty.

Seventh. It discharges the convict upon society without having secured his reformation.

Let us examine very briefly each of these points.

First. The encouragement of the idea of antagonism between the prisoner and society.—The person who has committed some crime against social order naturally feels that he has raised his hand against his fellows, and that they have raised their hands against him. They are henceforth enemies to each other. Now, the first question we ask, or should ask, when such a one is taken into custody, is, What must be done for the immediate protection of society? The answer is, He must be deprived of his liberty. That being accomplished, our second question, the more important of the two, is in order; namely, What shall we do to reform the criminal? And the answer of the most enlightened experience is that the very first step toward reforming him is to convince him that society is not his enemy; that it does nothing with him for the sake of punishment, but that it orders all the arrangements by which he is surrounded with a view to returning him to the active world where he really belongs. Is this the impression produced upon the mind of a prisoner by our present system? I answer emphatically, No! There is a very elaborate effort to produce just the opposite result. The spirit of the management of nine out of every ten of our criminal institutions is that of fear. Over the doors of most, if not all, of them might be fittingly inscribed the words, The Way of the Transgressor is Hard. How true this criticism is may be seen in the frequent selection of military men as prison wardens. I do not mean simply men who have fought for a great idea in some emergency, but men who are naturally full of the fighting spirit at all times. I would not be understood as reflecting upon the soldiers of liberty, but I do think that military glory is too often considered a certificate entitling the holder to a monopoly of all the virtues. I incline to believe that the less we have of the soldier in civil concerns, the better. The poet does well to sing of the general who turned defeat into victory by riding from Winchester, forty miles away; but he might as well celebrate the cannibalism of the savage as to embalm in song the same general's dealings with the Indians. War is always an evil, and its methods are justly obnoxious off the battle-field. Certainly, the last place for them is in the management of a State prison.

Miss Carpenter says, it seems to me with great comprehensiveness, that the will of the prisoner should be brought into such a condition that he will wish to reform: that his hostility to divine and human laws must be subdued: that his feeling of antagonism to society must be destroyed. And, she adds, this can never be done by fear, never wholly by suffering. Only by sympathy, only by making the convict understand that all to which he is subjected has in view his restoration to society as an honest member of it,— only thus can the desired end be accomplished. That our present system grievously fails in this will become more apparent as we examine other features of its administration. This brings me to my second point of criticism, the grouping together of prisoners of all degrees of guilt. In the dining-room and in the workshops, the murderer and the forger, the man sentenced for one year and the man sentenced for life, sit and stand side by side, holding no communication with each other, it is true, but still aware each of the other's presence. Some, perhaps all, of us know what it is to be sensitive to atmospheric conditions. In a company of congenial spirits, we can feel an inspiration, though no word is spoken. There is an influence of character which language fails to express, which indeed is often expressed without language. What must be the moral conditions in the atmosphere of a room of twenty-five, fifty, or a hundred men, representing all shades of crime from murder to theft, repressed by the unyielding rigidity of a harsh military system? Not such as any one within the sound of my voice would recommend as conducive to personal improvement. The very principle of association, which, under a system calling out the better impulses of its subjects, would be so desirable and beneficent, becomes, under our present system of permanent, artificial herding, a means of degradation and wrong.

But the solitary system prevailing in the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, often regarded as the only alternative, is equally unwise and injurious. As a punishment, solitude is undoubtedly more severe than silent association with fellow-criminals; but the great object of prison discipline, as we are viewing it, is or should be to fit the convict to reënter the world in a condition to hold right relations with his fellow-men. It was his lack of such ability that brought him to the felon's cell; and, so far as his reform is concerned, it is just that faculty of association which needs development in him. How a man is to be fitted to live and work with his fellow-men by being placed in a cell seven to eight feet one way by from fourteen to sixteen feet the other, in which he is to eat, work, and sleep, and with a yard adjoining eight by fourteen feet for his exercise, is something I cannot understand. I am aware that very philanthropic people differ widely as to the results of the congregate and solitary system, I am aware that the Pennsylvania prison has some very commendable features; but that it can teach men how to live in right relations with their fellows by absolutely depriving them of those relations, under proper restrictions, I do not believe. When Charles Dickens visited this country in 1842, he investigated quite thoroughly the prison at Philadelphia. In those much maligned American Notes, he speaks thus of the solitary feature:—

"I believe that very few men are capable of estimating the immense amount of torture and agony which this dreadful punishment, prolonged for years, inflicts upon the sufferers. I am convinced that there is a depth of terrible endurance in it, which none but the sufferers themselves can fathom, and which no man has a right to inflict upon his fellow-creature. I hold this slow and daily tampering with the mysteries of the brain to be immeasurably worse than any torture of the body. It is my fixed opinion that those who have undergone this punishment must pass into society again morally unhealthy and diseased."

I doubt if any one who has much conception of the character of the human mind will dispute this statement of Mr. Dickens. Just imagine, friends, for a moment, what effect such a course of treatment for a year, for six months, aye, even for one month, would have upon us; then tell me, if you can, that it is not a system calculated to crush and demoralize its victim.

But this element of solitude, absolute only under the system bearing its name, prevails in a limited form in all prisons. I refer now to what is accomplished by unnecessary severity in conventional matters. There is a room, say, with fifty men at work side by side. They are to stand there day after day, without uttering a word or looking up at a human being. If they do either, they receive punishment for it. There is solitude, you see, right in the midst of one's fellows,—solitude which can have no value whatsoever as a means of reforming the criminal. In my judgment, its only tendency is to deform him more and more. I have myself heard a prison official sternly rebuke a man for answering a question which he thought was addressed to himself, when in reality it was addressed to another. If our aim is to unfit the convict for the use of language, and to destroy what remnant of self-respect he may possess, this is a singularly successful invention for its accomplishment. If we would teach him how to associate with his fellows, how to speak respectfully and purely, if we would arouse within him the spirit of a man, then this method is an absolute failure, and deserves to be branded as brutal to the last degree. In the list of rules, a copy of which is placed in each cell of the Pennsylvania Prison, I find this: "You must not make any unnecessary noise, either by singing, whistling, or in any other manner." The idea underlying this rule, as also those previously quoted, is not reform, but punishment. Crush the evil spirit out of him, stamp on it, grind it to powder, do anything and everything that can be done to show the offender that the way of the transgressor is hard. It is an inhuman system, wrong in its aim, wrong in its philosophy of evil, and of course therefore wrong in its methods.

I come now to my fifth criticism, that of definite terms of imprisonment. And here again the old idea of punishment and the new idea of reform come into immediate and irreconcilable conflict. The wise parent whose child tells lies wants him placed under truthful influences, not for a specified time, but until his bad tendency is overcome and replaced by the opposite virtue. In other words, he desires not so much to punish as to reform him. I should like to see it shown that the reform of criminals can be best secured by definite terms of imprisonment, based not upon the character of the individuals, but the character of the crime. It is an absurd proposition, apparent without argument, that every man sentenced for six years needs just six years, neither more nor less, in which to reform. Who can sum up in a moment the differences in character and of treatment required between two men convicted of the same crime and sentenced for the same term? It is a matter for close observation and study,—a matter which only the daily deportment of the individual, when placed under the proper influences, can settle. It is infinitely more dangerous to release some men at the end of five years than it would be to release others, guilty of the same offence, at the end of two. It may be said, the object of reform in this direction is secured by the exercise of the pardoning power. The pardoning power is, at its best, a very poor way of doing a good thing, and it is exceedingly liable to abuse. The governor, or the governor and council with whom it sometimes rests, are political officers. Their interests often, their lack of intimate knowledge of individual cases always, will interfere with their reaching wise conclusions. Besides, the pardoning power must be exercised all at once, if at all; and, since no man can reform in a moment of time, no man ought to be unconditionally released in a moment of time. His reform must be gradual, therefore his restoration to society should be gradual.

What is true of all definite terms of imprisonment is true in an intensified degree of the life sentence. I have coupled this with the death penalty, with deliberation. Capital punishment can have no place in a true prison code. It is not only condemned as a doubling of the sin of murder under the forms of law, but it certainly is unnecessary as a protection to society, so long as escape from incarceration is, comparatively speaking, impossible; and it certainly cuts off all opportunity for reforming the criminal. But the sentence for life is only a refinement of cruelty from the scaffold. Did you ever think, friends, what must be the effect upon a human being of becoming settled in the conviction that hard labor, prison fare and discipline, and a felon's cell are all there is left for him so long as he shall live? Do you, can you, realize what it is to have the last ray of hope go out of the human soul, and nothing left in its stead but the very blackness of despair?

I have read recently a very touching story of a young man wrongly suspected of murder, who was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced, despite all the efforts of his friends to overcome the government testimony, which indeed seemed overwhelmingly conclusive, and who spent three years in prison before the error was discovered. During that three years, what a change had gradually come over him! An unnatural, severe calm, submission and desperation, melted into one, now characterized his every look and act. And when his friend brought him the news of the discovery of the real murderer and his own release, he received it as one in a trance. For hours he was silent and apparently lost to human interests and relations, so terrible had been the influence upon a mind once active, buoyant, and clear. Finally, in one of his reveries, his friend, who was a physician, said to him, "Well, this has been a very long fever; but we are all through it at last." Passing his hand over his face, he looked up to the doctor, saying dreamily, "Let me see! Is it all true?" and then, with a grave, wistful look, added, "It was not I who did that thing, then?" To such a condition had three years of imprisonment and suspicion brought an innocent man, that he really was not quite sure of his own freedom from guilt. It is only a story, but it is often duplicated in real life. The loss of hope, of ambition, of desire for progress, which results from the loss of all opportunity to better one's condition, means mental and moral, if not physical, death. Harrison, in his work on Prison Economy, says of imprisonment for life: "It is utterly and manifestly inconsistent with the idea of reformation as the object of penal detention. It cuts off at once all hope, all stimulus to effort, all motive for self-denial or self-control."

My seventh and final criticism of the prevailing system has been already suggested, indeed is the natural outcome of the fifth, the definite terms of imprisonment. It is the discharge of the criminal upon society without having first secured his entire reformation. It is precisely because of this fatal error that so many men serve more than one term in our penal institutions. We never ask,—under the law, we have no special right to ask,—Is a man reformed? He has served out his sentence and obeyed the rules, and that is the end of it. So he goes forth, in many cases incapacitated for earning his living, with the shadow of the prison darkening his pathway, and with few, if any, friends to help him regain his position in society. The statement made by the old Englishman aptly represents many a one thrown thus unprepared upon the world, and by it only hardened in crime. "I have been told a thousand times," said he, "to go and get work; but it was never said to me during twenty years, while in or out of prison, 'I'll give you work.' I was sent to jail for two months when a boy for stealing a loaf of bread, and no one cared for me. I walked to the seaports, but in vain. I tramped, sore-footed, thousands of miles when I was a lad, in order to get honest employment; but it did not answer. I was tempted to steal. I stole. I was imprisoned. Since then, I have learned the trade of a professional thief; and I intend to follow it." This plain scrap of autobiography shows not only that prison life never reformed its subject, but it shows also that, had it thoroughly reformed him during the time of his first imprisonment, and secured him, as it ought always to do, an opportunity to earn an honest living, he would have become an honest man and a safe citizen. That we deprive so many men of their liberty, keep them in custody for a term of years, and give them back to society no better and often worse than when first they came under our charge, is terrible evidence of the inadequacy and failure of our prison methods. "Prisoners discharged," says a modern writer, "without reformation, have taken their doctor's degree as teachers of crime." Think of that; every State prison a college in which every year some one finishes his education as a professor in crime!

The more one looks into this subject, the more one realizes the character of the philosophy underlying it, the more will he wonder that so little is said by liberal people against it. But there is a growing sentiment, oftener felt than expressed, before which these relics of barbarity, so long sustained by the old theologies, must give way. In that sentiment lies my hope for the future. It already sees the necessity for ruling out punishment for its own sake, it already condemns the spirit of fear and hate. Let us, with the poet,—

> "Thank God that we have lived to see the time
> When the great truth begins at last to find
> An utterance from the deep heart of mankind,
> Earnest and clear, that all revenge is Crime!
> That man is holier than a creed, that all
> Restraint upon him must consult his good,
> Hope's sunshine linger on his prison wall,
> And love look in upon his solitude."

But I must not stop with this criticism of the existing system and its methods. I want to suggest, if indeed you may not have seen them hinted in what I have already said, a few principles without which no prison discipline can be complete or even partially successful. Preliminary to that, let me sketch briefly three very remarkable experiments. They have all been made within the last fifty years. One was that of Col. Montesinos in the prison of Valencia in Spain, another that of Herr von Obermaier in the Criminal Prison of Munich, and the third that of Capt. Machonochie on Norfolk Island. Montesinos aimed to excite his prisoners to industry by allowing them small portions of their earnings. He enabled them to raise their position by good conduct; and, after they had won his confidence, he gave them errands within and without the prison walls. If under his treatment, the central point of which was to encourage reformation, he became satisfied that a convict had really reformed and could say no to temptation, he secured his discharge before the expiration of his sentence. Under his charge, the annual recommitments, which had been 35 per cent. of the whole number, were reduced to 2 per cent.,—a most astounding, but after all very natural result.

Herr von Obermaier was governor of the Criminal Prison of Munich in 1854. His convicts were of a desperate class, some under sentences of eight and twelve years, some for life. They were largely murderers. Yet he had no separate cells, no stern discipline, and exercised no perceptible restraint except the prison bars and walls. They were daily using tools with which they could easily effect an escape, but they never did. Each prisoner on his entrance was summoned before the governor, asked if his father and mother were alive, if he had a wife and children, brothers or sisters, etc., told that Von Obermaier was his friend, and given to understand that the aim was to reform and improve him. A constant and successful effort was made among the prisoners to create a public opinion favorable to good deportment, and unruly conduct in a new convict was sure to be condemned by the old ones. Von Obermaier maintained that criminals cannot be improved by severity, and that an enlightened spirit of humanity, emanating from the governor and from him passing to every individual in the prison, will supply the most perfect guarantee of obedience, diligence, and individual morality which can be procured. "If once," said he, "the prison is pervaded by a sound public opinion, and the desire for improvement has gained the ascendency, then the reformed penitents [he declined to call them convicts] become such powerful instruments of further improvement that complete security is established.

Captain Machonochie's system was possibly more severe, but was based largely on the same philosophy as the systems of Montesinos and Von Obermaier. The Captain held that the prisoner should be taught submission and self-command through a fixed period of probation. He looked upon punishment as a benevolent means instead of a vindictive end. His process of treatment was divided into two parts, specific punishment for the past and specific training for the future. In the latter stage, he grouped prisoners in associations made to resemble ordinary life, subdivided into smaller parties or families, as might be agreed to among the men themselves, with common interests, and receiving wages in the form of marks of commendation, exchangeable at will for immediate gratification, but a fixed accumulation of which should be required before the recovery of freedom. The Captain said, "My prisoners behaved well with me, because they were reasoned with, not bullied,—because they were sought to be raised, not crushed,—because they had an interest in their own conduct,—and because they knew, if they behaved ill, they would incur the censure of their companions, and be otherwise vigorously repressed."

The three experiments which I have most imperfectly depicted are well worth study. No man in their presence has a right to say that prison reform is a dreamy sentimentalism. That Montesinos, Von Obermaier, and Machonochie were geniuses in this line is undoubtedly true; but there must be others in the world that is and the world that is to be. Besides that, there was real genius in the systems. The spirit inspiring all was the spirit of humanity; and that is just what most of our systems lack, but what every good system must have. Captain Machonochie expressed this tersely, when he said, "You cannot recover a man except by doing justice to the manly qualities which he may have about him, and giving him an interest in developing them."

Now, what we ought to do, as it seems to me, is to follow in the footsteps of the makers of these experiments, not blindly, but intelligently and wisely. We must admit in the first place, of course, that the safety of society requires the confinement of the criminal: but we must recognize the fact that the moment society deprives a man of his liberty, which it can only justly do for its own protection, its first duty is to adopt such a course toward him as shall soonest thoroughly fit him to regain and exercise that liberty. The safety of society, the reform of the criminal,—these are the points, and the only points, to be considered. With this work of reform in view, I hold that a graded system is indispensable. That is to say, each prisoner must have the power gradually to better his condition, and ultimately to regain his freedom, not by working out a time sentence as now, but by real and thorough reform. There must be, to accomplish this, something similar to the mark system of Captain Machonochie. Place the convict at first, if you please, as he did, in a state of utter poverty and degradation, but let him understand that he can raise himself by his own efforts to the better conditions from whence he has come, and that he can be raised in no other way. To carry out such a plan to the best advantage, I believe a series of prisons to be a necessity. This is one of the vital points in the Irish system. Beginning with incarcerating in cells, it passes the prisoner from one condition to another, until in the last stages he appears to an outside observer like any free laborer working with his fellows. This series of prisons, in which in the last stages the word "prison" should be exchanged for a milder term, could easily be made to secure, indeed would of themselves secure, another most important rule; namely, that the final discharge should be when the man, penitent and reformed, is fitted to resume his place in society. And, lastly, it should be the duty of the State to see that such a one is not turned loose upon the world with nothing to do, but is placed largely above temptation by being provided with a congenial employment as a means for obtaining an honest living.

That the adoption of these fundamental principles, and the selection of officials calculated to administer them, would greatly diminish the amount of crime, is to me as certain as anything not already accomplished can be. It is because we live in such indifference to and ignorance of what is going on all about us, that the demand for these methods is so slight. They are only another way of recognizing the brotherhood of man. Surely, we who gather within these walls from Sunday to Sunday believe in that. To us there can be no sadder sight than some, perhaps all, of us have witnessed, when a human being has been brought to prison, to remain within its walls two, five, twelve years, or perhaps until the silver cord shall be loosed and the golden bowl broken. There he stands, a failure, his life once full of promise, an almost hopeless wreck. Perchance, friends, if you and I had been as badly conceived and born as he, we should be there too. I am sure we ought to hold him up. I am sure we ought to labor for him with an infinite patience. I am sure we ought to surround him, wisely, but constantly, with influences prompted by sympathy and love. The old theology with its rule of fear may doubt, and cry, "Visionary." But, for us,

> "Oh, never yet upon the scroll
> Of the sin-stained, but priceless soul,
> Hath Heaven inscribed despair."

We stand for faith in human nature. It is in the name of that faith that I criticise the prison discipline of to-day as a flagrant denial of it, and ask the adoption of a system which shall be guided by the human reason and respond to the warm pulsations of the human heart.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.— It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

HINTS FOR HOME READING. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1880.

Perhaps no work is carried on with less economy than is reading for self-improvement. And yet, in reading as elsewhere, it is economy or the lack of it that brings success or failure. How to get from books the greatest amount of information in the least time and at the least expense is a problem whose solution is of great importance to multitudes who have no time to win that solution through self-search. It was therefore a happy thought that led to the publication in book form of a series of articles on the Art of Reading, from several well-known writers, which originally appeared in the Christian Union. The work, which appears under the above title in the neat uniform of Putnam's Handy Book Series, comprises a dozen or so articles, a list of whose titles and authors is their best recommendation. We note among them: "Why Young People read Trash," Chas. Dudley Warner; "What to Read" and "Plans of Reading," Fred. B. Perkins; "Plans of Reading," H. W. Beecher; "The Choice of Books," E. E. Hale; "How to preserve the Results of Reading," Joseph Cook; "Hints for People who do not read," Lyman Abbott; "Suggestions for Household Libraries," G. P. Putnam.

At the end of the volume are given three lists of books with prices attached. The first contains five hundred volumes of the most essential works; the second, five hundred of the next most desirable; the third, one thousand volumes supplementing previous selections. The lists are intended to meet the needs of ordinary readers rather than of special students, but are made with much care and discrimination, and comprise the cream of English writings in history, biography, travel, fiction, poetry, and general literature, together with those masterpieces of foreign authorship, which exist in good translations.

The book meets a real want, and deserves to be widely read and used. The articles are simply and easily written, and full of practical, sensible advice. Special attention may be directed to Mr. Perkins' course of reading, to Mr. Hale's wise and happy suggestions about methods of reading, as well as to Joseph Cook's hints concerning the preservation of the results of reading. We believe the practice of marking important passages while reading, and afterwards learning them, to be better than any abstract or extract making. To put a passage on paper is dangerously apt to put it out of the memory. This part of the subject deserves to be handled more at length.

These articles were written for the assistance of people who want to read, but would not call themselves distinctively literary. It is, however, not improbable that many who consider themselves learned in books would, after reading this volume, be seized with something very like a conviction of ignorance. This conviction is so edifying that the chance of attaining it should not be lost.

ULTIMA THULE.—Houghton, Mifflin & Co. give us the latest songs of Mr. Longfellow, in dainty dress, with a picture of the poet in his silvery old age to grace the book. The collection includes the tributes to Bayard Taylor, R. H. Dana, and Robert Burns, the graceful responses to the children's present of "The Arm-Chair," made from the wood of the "Village Blacksmith Tree," and to the giver of the "Iron Pen," with other verses already endeared to Mr. Longfellow's admirer's, but not before gathered into a volume. Mr. Longfellow's sweet nature finds expression in these as in all his songs, and his catholic sympathies are most beautifully shown in his tribute to the poet of Ayer.

THE same publishers issue another attractive little volume, larger in size and stronger in poetic thought, the latest words of our beloved Dr. Holmes. He sings of old age, with the pathetic humor, the tender fun, that mark his verse. The opening poem, "The Iron Gate," convinces us that the Doctor is not so young as his still jaunty style would persuade us, for it is his response to the ovation given him by the Atlantic Monthly on his seventieth birthday. Nothing could be more delicate in its autumnal mingling of brightness and sadness than is this poem, our favorite in the collection. The world-wide pity of the gently satirical poet, a pity that is all the deeper for its keen shrewdness in detecting the shams of his fellow-men, throbs in the lines,

> "Ah, while around us rosy youth rejoices,
> For us the sorrow-laden breezes sigh,
> And through the chorus of its jocund voices
> Throbs the sharp note of misery's hopeless cry.
> "As on the gauzy wings of fancy flying,
> From some far orb I track our watery sphere,
> Home of the struggling, suffering, doubting, dying,
> The silvered globule seems a glistening tear."

He says truly that he has > "Never deemed it sin to gladden

> This vale of sorrows with a wholesome laugh."

Many of us owe Dr. Holmes gratitude, which he with reverence disclaims as he sings:—

> "If hand of mine another's task has lightened,
> It felt the guid mee that it dares not claim."

Many occasional and friendly poems of compliment are here, all bearing traces of that broad tolerance and cultured sentiment that have made Dr. Holmes a liberalizing element in our literature. Long may it be ere his lyre breathes only "Silent Melody" at his command!

THE Associated Charities of this city have prepared and A. Williams & Co. have published A Directory of the Charitable and Benevolent Organizations of Boston, which will be found convenient for reference and serviceable by way of suggestion to those in quest of such information. It includes classified lists of all societies or institutions that partake of this character, industrial, reformatory, humane, mutual benefit, educational, and religious, and tells the officers, the headquarters, and special peculiarities of each. It contains also legal suggestions, health hints, and other good advice to those engaged in philantlropic labors of various kinds, which much enhance its value.

THERE are some remarkably interesting and well-written articles in the International Review for October. This review is a great credit to American enterprise, and it appears to be well sustained. The editors and publishers seem determined to give it a superior character, and it certainly compares most favorably with the very best of the English magazines and reviews. J. Brouder Williams has a good article about Emile Augier, a French dramatist of the modern school. Geo. E. Ellis sketches, in his usually successful manner, the story of "John Cotton in Church and State." In a paper full of thrilling interest, M. LeB. Goddard gives an account of the wrongs of the Ponca Indians, and tells us what is being done on their behalf. Carroll D. Wright displays his great statistical knowledge in a valuable paper on the Census, and justly says that the census just taken, when its results shall have been reached, "must stand not only as the model in its kind, but as the noblest contribution which any country has ever made to statistical science." There are also valuable articles on our Railroad System, on the Philosophy of the Presidential Election, the Political Situation in France, and about James A. Garfield. Rev. Julius H. Ward writes very well about the Concord School of Philosophy; and there are reviews of Bundy's Garfield, Ward's English Poets, and Tuckey's Joan of Arc. This number has not a single dull article, but all are of first-class merit and by the ablest writers.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD for October is intensely sectarian. Every article is in some way distinctly devoted to the maintenance of the Catholic idea. In the first article, it attempts to show that "The Changes at Oxford" have led toward the Roman Church; and from the same sectarian position there is an article about Austro-Hungary. The diplomatic correspondence of the United States is severely criticised by John McCarthy, but from the church outlook. Of the same character are the articles about the Vatican Library manuscripts, the Genesis of the Catholic Church, and the early missions in California. Even the novel and the articles of travel and literary discussions are tinctured in the same manner.

FICHTE'S IDEA OF MARRIAGE.

To the Editor of the Index:—

Mrs. Sherman's eloquent article on Fichte reminds me that, of all the German philosophers, he had the truest insight into the heart of woman and the sanctity of the marriage relation. Kant, a cool, methodical old bachelor, makes one shudder when he approaches the subject. Hegel treats it ethically, but not from a standpoint so lofty as that of Fichte. Fichte alone fathomed the mystic secret of love, with its twin roots in earth and in heaven.

It is idle, he tells us, to ask the question as to whether woman has a right to woo. We might as well ask if a man has the right to fly. Let us wait with our questions until men fly and women woo. It is her own nature which will not permit woman to make wooing as such her aim. A woman gives herself to a man, not for her own sake, but for his, to satisfy her heart, which is the aim peculiar to her that she fulfils as a law of nature. Love is the only form in which the satisfaction of natural desire is perfectly harmonized with womanly self-consciousness. In this love, nature and reason are really one: it is their innermost and only point of union. The pure surrender of the woman is necessarily exclusive, unconditioned. Otherwise, love would not be love. It is a beautiful expression of this relation that the wife no longer bears her own name, but that of her husband.

How will the man, if he acts conformably to his nature, receive this surrender? He must first recognize the love of the woman in its whole extent, must see how she has given herself of her own free will into his power, all her external destiny, the whole inner quiet of her soul. He must be worthy of her love, or her misery, like her surrender, will be complete. He must look through this relation, must understand what she wishes, that she may really satisfy her heart, the inmost and deepest impulse of her nature, that the surrender to him may be perfectly fulfilled. This cannot happen, if, blinded by passion, he subdues himself to her, and lets her rule. Even as little can he oppress her, and use his authority against her, as though she were his willess tool. There is nothing more opposed to genuine manliness than to play the master, nothing that appears more contemptible to a woman.

The first form of manly sentiment which receives and returns the sacrificing love of the woman is generosity (Grossmuth), which springs from deep emotion. The husband wishes to be the one whom the wife makes her sole aim in life, to whom she surrenders herself wholly and for ever. He recognizes and looks through her will, and with full consciousness makes it his own. Thus, the two wills are blended in perfect unity, the husband receives into himself the soul of the wife, the generous sentiment becomes more and more tender, and love's completest triumph is achieved.

This relation is the real development of the whole man: it is the perfect union of two persons, grounded upon natural desire, an exchange of hearts through a unity of wills, in which the wife as perfectly fulfils the true conditions of the womanly nature as the husband those of the manly nature. In marriage only does the whole man exist. Therefore marriage is not a means for anything else but its own end. Natural desire is its ground; the love of the wife, the generosity of the husband, the whole inner soul-life based thereupon, its content. It unites one man to one woman. Hence its only form fitting to personal dignity is monogamy. Marriage contains the force in itself to make men not merely noble, but capable of sacrifice: there lives in it the natural impulse to virtue. Hence there is one natural motive to morality, and one only,—marriage. "Thus is the problem solved," says Fichte. "How can one lead the human race from nature to virtue? I answer, Merely by establishing the natural relation between both sexes. There is no moral education of humanity outside of this point."

"REMARKABLE ANSWER TO PRAYER."

Mr. Hawker was walking one day on the cliffs near Morwentstow with Rev. Mr. W., when a gust of wind took off Mr. W.'s hat and carried it over the cliff. Within a week or two, a Methodist preacher at Truro was discoursing on prayer, and in his sermon he said: "I would not have you, dear brethren, confine your supplications to spiritual blessings, but ask for temporal favors. I will illustrate my meaning by relating an incident that happened to myself ten days ago. I was on the shore of a cove near a little insignificant place in North Cornwall, named Morwentstow, and about to proceed to Bude. Shall I add, my Christian friends, that I had on my head at the time a shocking bad hat, that I somewhat blushed to think of entering that harbor town and watering-place so ill adorned as to my head? Then I lifted up a prayer for covering more suited to my head. At that solemn moment, I raised my eyes, and saw in the spacious firmament on high—the blue ethereal sky—a black spot. It approached, it enlarged, it widened, it fell at my feet. It was a brand-new hat by a celebrated London maker. I cast my battered beaver to the waves, my Christian friends, and walked into Bude as fast as I could with a new hat on my head." The incident got into the Methodist Reporter or some such paper under the heading of "Remarkable Answer to Prayer." "And," said the vicar, "the rascal made off with Mr. W.'s new hat. There was no reaching him, for we were on the cliff and could not descend the precipice. He was deaf enough, I promise you, to our shouts."—Chambers' Journal.

THE Church of the Sacred Heart at Montmartre has already cost seven and one half million francs, and is scarcely further advanced than the foundations.

POETRY.

DISCIPULUS.

Weary of books and the vain strife of creeds
That darken knowledge to the fiery brain,
And mock the suffering spirit in its needs
With war of phrases on a shadowy plain,—

Sick of the shallow ripple of the pools
Which men call ocean, in their blind conceit,—
Tired of the harsh polemics of the schools,
Thirsting for living truth,—I cried with heat,

"O man of Calvary! O martyred Christ!
Do these thy followers offer cup and crust
To wayside wanderers, hungry and despised,
Whom bitterness hath robbed of hope and trust?

"Do they bear comfort to a stricken soul,
Dumb, blind with grief, upon a lonely hearth?
And bid the wave of anguish backward roll,
And lift the pall of death from a blank earth?

"Do they teach patience to the sorely tried?
Hope to the hopeless? Love to loveless ones?
Wisdom to the unwise? And all beside,
That sets fair flowers amid the barren stones?"

I joined the throng within the city's gates,—
Gaunt, hungry throng, with wolfish, gleaming eyes,
Madmen and murderers,—not their fau't, but fate's,—
Wan mothers crazed by little children's cries;

Pale cheeks that never felt the thrilling beams
Of one free hour, in God's rich gift of days;
Dull, sickled eyes, that only shone in dreams
When "hopeless fancy" on the heart-strings plays.

Famine and pitiless pestilence came near,
And swept them earthward like the sickled grain;
Haunting the stricken homes with hourly fear,
Darkening the streets, a ceaseless burial train.

Vainly I looked to see the saints of God
Pass through the crowd with holy, healing gifts,
With garb of faith, and feet in mercy shod,
To speak the word that strengthens and uplifts.

But they, in selfish terror, girt their loins
Closer and fled, lest plague should seize the hem
Of that seamed robe which feigned saintship joins
In many parts, to cover deeds of shame.

Was this the lesson of the Nazarene.
Dropped from his lips, in shade of olive boughs?
Was this the essence of that light serene
Which moved his smile and slept upon his brows?

And, lo! a man with countenance radiant
Stepped from the slums, and offered up his life
To save his brothers'. Free from priestly cant,
Untouched by bigot's chain or schoolmen's strife,

His only creed the creed of sacrifice!
He ministered to suffering and to dearth,
Till from the brassy arch of burning skies
Rain fell, and fever passed from the spent earth.

Then he who crucified his needs to give
His crust and cup to lips unsatisfied,
Who watched and toiled that fellow-men might live,
Sickened and sank, heroic smiled, and died.

Back to my tomes of centuried learning then
I went in wrath, and cast them on the flames.
What worth were they to succor tortured men?
What healing lay within their idle names?

For bread, a stone! For truth, a saintly lie!
Compared to these, one look that stays a crime,
One pitying heart, one throb of sympathy,
Shall vibrate to the end of circling time.

Whether the mystic "Light of Asia" shines
On India's hills, or reflex from the Cross
Or Crescent, hearts of gold shall blend the lines
Which fainter grow, nor Truth shall suffer loss.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 7, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

LIBERAL LEAGUE OBJECTS.

Now that the Liberal League movement is attracting public attention again, we wish to state our position clearly with regard to it. Of the recent annual meeting of the League at Chicago and of what happened there, we gave our judgment last week, and as yet we have heard nothing that would lead us to modify that judgment. We understand that after the meeting there was some consultation among the seceding members as to their future action; and it has since been publicly stated in Chicago and Milwaukee papers that the withdrawing minority had resolved on organizing a new League, with Colonel Ingersoll as its president, which should keep clear of all side issues, and devote itself strictly to the one object of the secularization of the State. From their point of view, this may be wise, especially if the old League remains active; but, from our point of view, it would seem better for the liberal cause if all the national organizations for Liberal League work should, at least temporarily, disappear, and the local Leagues, under changed names, should reorganize for active enterprises of local benefit.

If, however, the seceding minority at Chicago should determine on organizing another National League, we would call their attention to the fact that the association formed by the seceders at Syracuse two years ago still remains in existence, now under the name of the American Liberal Union, and that possibly a combination of the two sections of seceders might be effected in one organization. The American Liberal Union, though attempting no active work, has kept its organization intact, and represents no inconsiderable class of influential Liberals in the country who had no delegates at the Chicago meeting. We hold a minor nominal office in the Liberal Union; but we have no authority to speak for it, and do not know in the least what would be the opinion of those of its members who were most prominent in forming it, on this question of a junction of forces here suggested. But since the secession in both cases has taken place on essentially the same issue, and if we may assume that the two minorities acted with equal sincerity of purpose and are now agreed on the theoretical and practical object of a national organization, there would seem to be no good reason why they should not now unite in one body. But this question we leave to those who are most specially concerned in its solution, if they shall deem it important to entertain it at all.

For ourself (for whom only we can speak), we presume, even if such an organization were to be effected, we could give it only our indirect sympathy and support; and this not because we should not indorse its object, the complete secularization of the State, but because we could not indorse the means which, in all probability, it would adopt,—namely, distinct political action. Before the separation occurred at Chicago, a resolution was passed, apparently without any division of opinion, recommending active political organization in the local Leagues with reference to bringing forward in 1884 a Presidential candidate expressly and distinctively as the candidate of the National League. So, too, before there was any separation at Syracuse, in the Annual Convention of the old League at Rochester, N.Y., in 1877, a resolution was adopted looking to the organization of the League as a distinct political party at no remote future, though the machinery to this end was to be left for the time being in abeyance. It is evident that a strong majority of the membership of the League, perhaps from the start, has been in favor of separate political action; and, as the years have gone on, this opinion has increased, until at Chicago it took very definite shape,—the Wakeman and the Ingersoll factions apparently being equally eager for the adoption of distinctive political machinery. What would be the opinion of the American Liberal Union, we have no means of knowing definitely. We think it might incline the same way, though not, perhaps, so strongly. Now, our judgment is decidedly opposed to turning the Leagues into a political organization. We have always doubted the wisdom of such a policy, whenever the question has been broached. After the passage of the resolution at Rochester, we seriously considered whether we should not withdraw our name from the list of Vice-Presidents of the League and from membership, and only allowed it to remain because of the proviso by which any active steps toward political action were deferred to the future; for we were not ready to say that political action might not, at some time, be called for. But we certainly do not think that time has yet come. We think it is even further off than three years ago. The history, indeed, of the League for the last three years has made us even more decided in our judgment that it does not deal with questions that can be most effectively advanced by a separate political organization. For the present, and for a good while to come, wise and wide discussion of its questions is needed, in order to form the public opinion, which in any event will be necessary worthily to sustain a political party, and which may, when strong enough to do that worthily, accomplish the desired reforms without a distinctive political organization. We deem it the part of wisdom to avoid the division of political parties in this country by any lines of religious belief or non-belief, so long as any other way is open for securing the principles of mental liberty.

Personally, we believe in all the "Demands of Liberalism," as they were formulated by Mr. Abbot and kept by him standing in the first column of the Index, during all the last years of his editorship. These demands together constitute what is meant by the "Secularization of the State" in this country; and they are the legitimate objects of Liberal League work. We believe that there is need, whether in special organization or in other ways, for earnest and vigorous effort for attaining these objects. But we also believe that the desired reforms are to be accomplished piece-meal, through the gradual enlightenment and liberalization of legislators of all parties rather than by a political crusade exclusively for them; and that they can be more safely and securely accomplished in this gradual way than if they were to be made a bone of contention between two parties, the victory passing alternately from one to the other. Let there be a zealous and systematic moral agitation for the "Demands of Liberalism." Let it be aggressive, if you please. Liberals may initiate action for the reform of obnoxious statutes without an organized political party. Especially let Liberals be on the alert to resist any new legislation attempted in the interest of sectarian opinion. Let them agitate persistently, vigorously; but let them keep their agitation off of the plane of partisan politics. Above all things, let them keep it clear and clean from the studied indirection, chicanery, and low expediencies of partisan political methods.

AS MR. WAKEMAN SEES IT.

We mean to be fair to all, and most especially to those whom we feel it our duty to oppose. Hence we most willingly give to our readers Mr. T. B. Wakeman's interpretation of the issue between the two parties in the Chicago meeting of the National Liberal League. We should have printed it last week, in the same number with our own article on the subject, had it come into our hands in season; but, the letter not being directed to us editorially, we did not see it until our paper was about to go to press. Mr. Wakeman writes as follows:—

The case of the majority is not given in the newspapers at all, and I hope you will not be influenced by them.

The League and Col. Ingersoll do not differ about immorality. There is no issue as to that, as you will see by the fifth resolution, which is all his, except the guarantee to put it [obscenity] down, which I added and stand to fully.

The issue and difference is:—

1. That the League will not consent that the churches, through Comstock Societies, shall administer or control the secular criminal laws of our country, either in the States or the general government.

2. It will not consent that the general government shall make a postal censorship as to the meaning of mailed matter, nor that the post-office be used as a detective or decoy bureau for those Comstock Societies.

In forming our opinion of the proceedings at Chicago, we made due allowance for the disposition to exaggerate and ridicule in which the newspaper reporters may have indulged. We did give some weight, in judging the general tone of the meeting, to certain sentences and phrases alleged to have been uttered by some of the speakers, which were of such a nature that the reporters could hardly have invented them, and which sometimes they put in quotation-marks. But, in our judgment of the main issue, we confined ourselves to the resolutions and proposed amendments, which were given verbatim, and to the arguments of Messrs. Wakeman and Ingersoll, the leaders of the two sides, who appear to have been very fairly and impartially reported.

Mr. Wakeman, in his statements above, seems to us to obscure and draw attention away from the plain point at issue. This point is: Shall the United States, because they have constitutionally assumed the postal service of the country, be compelled to carry by mail criminally immoral literature and criminal articles of merchandise, or shall the United States, while giving all due protection to freedom of opinion and the press, have the power to prevent the postal service from thus being abused for criminally immoral purposes? On this question, Mr. Wakeman and the National Liberal League take the former side. Colonel Ingersoll and his friends at Chicago, the seceding minority two years ago at Syracuse, and the Free Religious Index, take the latter side.

What "the churches, through Comstock Societies," may be doing in administering or controlling "the secular criminal laws of our country," is another question. We were not aware that the United States had given to any churches or societies such jurisdiction. If such jurisdiction has been usurped, that is something, certainly, to be summarily suppressed. The United States government has made Mr. Comstock an agent of its postal service, with special duties for carrying out its laws against the abuse of the postal service for criminally immoral ends.

Mr. Comstock may not be the most judicious man for this office. We strongly incline to think that he is not. The methods he uses for detecting violations of the postal law, though common enough in the criminal detective system of the country, are not always, in our opinion, such as a very strict conscience can approve. That he has in some cases abused his trust, and procured, through a misinterpretation of the law, the conviction and imprisonment of persons who ought never to have been punished or even arrested for the offences charged, we have no doubt. But all this pertains to the execution of the law, and not to its purpose, and is argument for such amendments of the law as shall securely guard the sacred right of all innocent persons to liberty, and prevent similar abuses in the future. The purpose of the law, we must ever keep in mind, is not to make these abuses possible, is not to crush liberty of opinion and the press, but to break up a postal traffic in criminally immoral literature and merchandise. And this is also to be borne in mind in favor of Mr. Comstock and the "Comstock Societies" that give him their moral and financial support,—that, while there have been some half dozen, possibly a few more, of abuses of personal liberty in the execution of the law, there has been an enormous mass of this criminal literature and merchandise discovered and destroyed, and the manufactories of it broken up,—stuff which would tell its own foul and criminal character at once to any jury wherever summoned, and which Mr. Wakeman and Mr. Elizur Wright and all other decent people in the National Liberal League would denounce, as quickly as anybody, as fit only to be burned.

A SPIRITUALIST SPASM.

There occurred among the "Personal Items" in the Index of the issue of September 16 the following little six-lined paragraph:—

Epes Sargent is about to publish a new work on Spiritualism, considered from a scientific stand-point. There are those who may question whether Mr. Sargent is the person for such a treatment of the subject; but this makes no material difference to those who are wedded to a theory.

Of course, we might have known that it would need but to catch the eye of a spiritualistic editor to throw him into a paroxysm sufficient to put to flight all the guardian spirits hovering in his vicinity. Both the Banner of Light and the Religio-Philosophical Journal contained in their very next numbers what was intended, no doubt, for very withering comments. These are the Banner's:—

The above is from the Free Religious Index, which, as some of our readers may be aware, is a weekly journal published in Boston. The whole animus of the paragraph is contained in the part we have italicized, and amounts simply to this: "Mr. Sargent is not the proper person to treat the subject of Spiritualism scientifically, inasmuch as he accepts the spiritual hypothesis." Is not this prejudging the whole subject with a vengeance?

We should like to inquire just here whether this may be considered an average specimen of the logic and conscience of spiritualists. Certainly, it does not require a particularly keen intelligence to perceive that our words do not imply any such construction as that which is given to them. The question in respect to Mr. Sargent's qualification to discuss spiritualism was not raised because he is a spiritualist, as is obvious, but because he is not a scientist, or person of known scientific attainment. Mr. Sargent has some literary reputation, but he has no scientific reputation. We simply insist that any one who proposes to examine spiritualism scientifically shall be competent for the undertaking.

As to whether a spiritualist is the most reliable person to whom one could apply for sound conclusions as to his belief admits, to say the least, of a doubt,—for the very same reason that the editor of the Banner thinks he is better able to pass judgment on the reasonableness of Orthodox theories, such as those of the Seventh Day Baptist's, Roman Catholic miracles, and the like, than those who hold them; on the principle of common consent and practice that, in a case of difference of opinion, the interested person or partisan on either side is not the best one to refer to for an unbiassed decision.

The editor of the journal of longer name is even more out of temper. These are his remarks:—

No doubt "there are those who may question," but no one is competent to "question," unless familiar with Mr. Sargent's qualifications for the task. Evidently, the free religious chap who penned the above seeks to vent a little spleen against spiritualism by this implication against the attainments of a gentleman whose literary, scientific, and philosophical knowledge would fill the heads of a regiment of Index paragraphers.

If the power of the author of the above lines to see a point were equal to his power to evade it or ardor for his adopted theory, he would readily observe that the issue between us is not in respect to how much the "chap" of the Index knows, but whether Mr. Sargent has any real claim to represent science in dealing with spiritualism.

But so long as the editors of spiritualist papers are thus disposed to fly into a rage when the exponents of spiritualism are rightfully questioned, and to pervert the simplest statements of common-sense because they do not chime with their undiscriminating and extravagant laudation of such persons, it is not to be expected that there can be rapid progress in clear and rational thinking among those they aspire to lead and exercise their influence upon.

The foregoing running comments upon the recognition of us by our editorial friends, to which we have adverted, were written for the last number of the Index, but upon afterthought put aside, because the whole matter seemed to us of too small moment for so extended a notice. But, finding on opening the next issue of the Banner of Light that the editor was still boiling over, and had returned to the charge in an article levelled at us to the extent of three-fourths of a column, we reversed our former decision.

In regard to the insinuation that the Index, either under its present management or previous one, is unfriendly to spiritualism, we pronounce it, so far as we have authority to speak on the subject, utterly without foundation. If it has seemed to be thus, it has been for reasons already indicated.

It has always had spiritualists among its subscribers and contributors to its columns; for all spiritualists, we are happy to know, are not so narrow and absurdly touchy as some of the editors of their journals. It is the custom of the Index to publish so far as practicable, all communications to it that are written with creditable literary skill, or from those of due moral claims for such reception, always reserving to itself the right to dissent from whatever may be regarded insufficiently sustained or inconclusive. It aspires to secure an exchange of ideas and opinions, and as a consequence is opposed to a sectarianism in liberalism, such as that which spiritualistic editors as a rule seek to foster, and spiritualism, or spiritism, for the most part represents. Its aim is defined in that of The Free Religious Association,—"the scientific study of man's religious nature and history." It is not strange, therefore, that it should have been, in common with the greater portion of the best thinkers of the time, slow to accept, on testimony as questionable as is much of that adduced in support of the spiritualistic theory, what is apparently so contradictory to the course of things in this world, and largely intermingled with crudeness of mind, charlatanism, and an uncertain ethical standard.

It is not often that the liberal ministry gets so distinguished an accession from the Orthodox pulpit as one recently announced from England,—that of Rev. Stopford Brooke. Mr. Brooke has been one of the most effective preachers of the Broad Church wing of the Church of England. He is author of the Life of Frederic Robertson, has published one or more volumes of his own sermons, and has been, we believe, Chaplain of the Queen. The London Spectator speaks of his secession in this wise: "The step will cause much surprise and regret to his friends, as Mr. Brooke, though he belonged to the extreme wing of the Broad Church, was not supposed to have lost his belief in some form of the divinity of Christ. Having lost it, he is, as we conceive, entirely in the right in quitting the ministry of the Established Church, which upon that subject, at all events, is neither uncertain nor double-tongued. There is much to be said for Bishop Hind's argument,—that, if all the liberal clergy quit the Church, the Church will never be liberalized; but there is a limit to that maxim, suggested by common honesty. An atheist should not preach a God; nor should a Unitarian utter every day, with the authority of the pulpit, his belief that Christ was, in some sense at all events, very God." This may be commended not only to some other Broad Church preachers, but to some broad Orthodox and broad Unitarian preachers for the moral it contains.

In the last Christian Register, Rev. Charles G. Ames gave his valedictory as its editor. For three years, Mr. Ames has been the editorial head of the Register, with a free and able pen. During that time, the Index and the Register have been on the most courteous and amicable terms, though each advocating its own cause in its own way. We are sorry to have our friend go from our side. Perhaps, however, he is to be congratulated on his escape from editorial toils. We are sure that he leaves the Register's chair, not because anybody wishes him to go, but because another work calls him with, as he thinks, a more imperative summons elsewhere. He goes to Philadelphia to take charge of a new society, which for several years has been getting ready for him and waiting for his fusing, organizing touch. Our best wishes go with him. Of success, he is already sure.

The Universalists, at their State Convention in Cambridge last week, passed a resolution refusing aid to theological students who are in the habit of using tobacco. An effort was made to include in the resolution tea and coffee. This looks a little like an attempt at practical Christianity, and is worth a good deal more than preaching on the interpretation of sheol and hades.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

A very suggestive paper on "The Mysterious Sounds of Nature," by Robert Springer, is printed in Die Natur. The globe is played upon around its whole circuit by the billows of the ocean, and by the atmosphere moving in sound-waves. Around the mountain-peaks howl icy storms. In the deep bosom of the earth, the miner hears the murmur of running waters, the whistling of jets of escaping steam, the trickling of gathered dampness. Waves of sound, moreover, have the property of putting other waves in motion, so as to prolong the effect and produce a tone from the combination of wave-movements. Hence arise mysterious sounds, the real origin of which may puzzle the ordinary observer or even the learned investigator. The geographical location and probable cause of many of these mysterious sounds is given by Mr. Springer. They arise from changes of temperature in rocks; from the action of wind on reeds and rushes, and on the leaves and boughs of trees; from the peculiar conformation of caves and clefts in rocks; from combinations and repetitions of echoes; from the action of water; and probably, also, at times they have an electrical origin, or are caused by abnormal vibrations of the organs of hearing. A grotto in Finland emits a sound as of an imprisoned animal. A cave in Hungary has an explosive sound, like a pistol-shot. A rock in the Red Sea produces bell-tones. Another on the banks of the Oronoco gives forth musical sounds. Real melodies are heard in Fingal's cave. At Sinai, noises like thunder are caused by the rolling of sand among the rocks. Very many rocks are sonorous, when struck. Other natural, but sometimes as yet unexplained, sounds imitate the rolling of drums, or the tramping of horses, or the ringing of metals, or the blowing of trumpets, or the voices of men. That these sounds in early times should have been ascribed to supernatural beings was inevitable, and that they gave birth to numerous legends was a necessary sequence. But it is a striking evidence of the present decay of belief in the miraculous, and of the growing desire to interpret even Biblical legends in the light of natural events, that the Popular Science Monthly, in reprinting Mr. Springer's article, retains not only his references to Pagan myths, but also his interpretations of the voice of Jehovah heard three times by Samuel in the temple, of Habakkuk's story of the stones crying out of the walls, of John's account of the voice that cried from heaven, of the story of Paul's conversion, and even of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. That any one who clearly apprehends the bearing of the facts advanced in the article can any longer accept these legends literally seems impossible; but, if these naturalistic interpretations continue, the last vestige of supernaturalism must soon disappear from the Bible's pages.

The publication of the full text of Professor Barker's address—a very bare skeleton of which we presented a few weeks ago from newspaper reports—necessitates no modification of the observations then made. We are impressed, however, with the great care exercised by Professor Barker in the preparation of his address not to go one step beyond what the ascertained facts of science will fully justify him in asserting. Every position of importance is sustained by abundant references to the statements or discoveries of the men most eminent in the special department of science which he happens at the time to be considering. In speaking of the supposed identity of animal and vegetable protoplasm, for instance, he supports what he says in four short paragraphs by the names of no less than eighteen distinguished investigators; but these names are so easily woven into the regular structure of his sentences that the deep interest of the subject might cause the passages to be read without any observation of their presence.

Among the pregnant sentences of Professor Barker's address, we quote, without comment, the following, although they lose much of their force out of their connection, and unsupported by his evidences: "To the statement of the vitalist, that there is no evidence that life is a property of matter, we may reply with emphasis that there is not the slightest proof that it is not." "Chemistry . . . encourages the expectation that there will yet be found the precise proteid of which the changes of protoplasm are properties. The rapid march of recent organic synthesis makes it quite certain that every distinct chemical substance of the living body will ultimately be produced in the laboratory, and this from inorganic materials. . . . When, therefore, the chemist shall succeed in producing a mass constitutionally identical with protoplasmic albumen, there is every reason to expect that it will exhibit all the phenomena which characterize its life." "Since the protoplasm of the animal and the vegetable kingdoms is identical, the former in all cases being derived from the latter, the animal as such neither produces nor vitalizes any protoplasm. Two inferences seem naturally to follow from this conclusion: 1. That all the properties of animal protoplasm, and of the animal organism of which it constitutes the essential part, must have a previous existence in the plant. 2. That hence the solution of the life question in the myxomycetes will solve the life problem for the highest vertebrate." "Physiologically considered, life has no mysterious passages, no sacred precincts into which the unhallowed foot of Science may not enter. Research has steadily diminished day by day the phenomena supposed vital. . . . Every action performed by the living body is sooner or later to be pronounced chemical or physical. And, when the last vestige of the vital principle shall disappear, the word 'Life,' if it remain at all, will remain to us only to signify, as a collective term, the sum of the phenomena exhibited by an active organized or organic being."

Two interesting contributions to our knowledge of ancient countries have recently been made. The first refers to Egypt, concerning which Mr. Delamotte, who has studied its geology and geography for twenty years, reports that it was once watered (in prehistoric times) by other rivers than the Nile,—rivers which ran through present dry sand-channels, the Arabic name of which signifies "rivers without water." The whole plateau of Khartoum, he believes, was once the bed of an immense lake, from which the Nile issued, as it now issues from Lake Victoria; but, the cataracts being much higher than now, only a part of the stream ran through its present channel, the rest being turned aside into the present sand-channels. As the cataracts were worn away, larger volumes of water poured into the present main channel, being drawn away from the side streams or branches, until they at length became entirely dry. Mr. Delamotte is now reëxamining the Upper Nile for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility of raising the level of the cataracts and turning a portion of the water again into the long deserted channels. This theory, if correct, is important, as it furnishes more room for the working out of the problem of ancient Egyptian civilization, always a doubly perplexing one, because of the very narrow tract of country to which apparently it had been confined.

The other discovery relates to China and the supposed inflexibility of its peculiar institutions. Mr. Terrien de la Couperie states that the Chinese language is not distinct from all others, as has been supposed, nor are its written characters of Chinese invention and wholly peculiar to that country and language. Great changes, he believes, were made in the language in the early centuries of the Christian era, the present system of writing dating no further back than the fourth century. The ancient Chinese characters were derived from hieroglyphics, and were accompanied by a number of phonetic signs. Mr. Terrien recognizes in the spoken Chinese language an ancient member of the Ural-Altaic family of agglutinant languages, having certain "very marked grammatical affinities with the Ugro-Finnish tongues." The old Chinese hieroglyphics strongly resemble those of the ancient Chaldeans. Some resemblances between Chinese and Western features Mr. Terrien traces "to the first establishment in ancient China of a part of that Akkado-Chaldean culture to which our modern civilizations are indirectly so referable." R. C.

Professor Leon Provenzal, who for many years directed a Jewish school at Leghorn, has died in that city. He was one of the most distinguished masters in Talmud Torah. Affable and modest, he has left behind him no riches, but, what is infinitely better, a good reputation. It appears that the Rabbinical College at Leghorn is no longer as flourishing as it formerly was, although it has had some celebrated Rabbins, such as Benamozegh, for example, among its professors.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Concerning Vivisection.

The cutting up of living creatures regardless of their sufferings, for the gratification of curiosity or of a thirst for knowledge which may or may not become useful, has been so avowed and defended of late, that some statement of the repugnance of humane feeling to such a practice has been inevitable; and a debate has arisen on that subject, forcing its way into almost all forms of literature. The practice is frequently denounced, and as frequently defended, sometimes with warmth on each side, and sometimes with a shocking coolness on the part of its advocates which reminds one of the probable manner of Ignatius Loyola in urging his peculiar method of propagandism upon such of his brother Jesuits as hesitated to adopt it. Very likely there were differences of opinion among the Fijians upon the propriety of cannibalism; and undoubtedly, if any of those islanders objected to that custom, they were called by their opponents sentimentalists. There is hardly any custom so bad as not to find deliberate defenders among people of high intellectual culture. The keepers of prisons have long been aware that high intellectual culture is no preservative against either vice or crime.

Some of the opposers of the cruelties in question have had their zeal so unmixed with knowledge as to affirm that no aid to the science of healing has resulted from them. I think otherwise, and do not doubt that much light has been gained from them in regard to the medical and surgical treatment of human beings. Nevertheless, for two reasons, presently to be given, I should choose, in my own case, not to call a physician or surgeon who had gained his knowledge in this manner, but to suffer disease or death rather than obtain recovery by such means.

It is certain that there are some acts so mean and so base as to justify a decent man in peremptorily cutting the acquaintance of their perpetrator, or in declining to use any professional services which it might be in his power to render. There are acts so mean and so base that even solid advantages would be too dearly purchased by using them. For instance, to get a wife who is at once good, beautiful, and rich, is a legitimate object of desire; yet men think that perjury and imposture are not justifiable even for such a purpose. To get money enough to found and endow a hospital is not only desirable, but praiseworthy; yet it is not thought allowable to get it by theft or robbery. And in this category, I think, belong not only crimes which our present law will take hold of, but some of the vices which, being beyond the scope of existing law, are not yet crimes.

The first reason which leads me not only to discountenance vivisection, but to regard it with horror, is the suffering inflicted by it.

It seems agreed almost universally that it is allowable to take the lives of animals noxious to us and of other animals, to provide ourselves with food and clothing, the better portion of society, however, making an urgent plea that this destruction of life be as sudden and as nearly painless as possible. A proportion of men and women (chiefly, I am sorry to say, the latter) cause immense numbers of birds to be killed for the decoration of their persons and houses; and a smaller proportion of men and women seek and find amusement in the killing of animals. These latter cases seem to me to show that our civilization has not yet pruned off all the relics of barbarism.

But, allowing that we may rightfully take the lives of animals as painlessly as may be, for purposes of food and clothing and to protect ourselves from depredation, the murder of those creatures by inches, deliberately protracted until life is exhausted by intensity of suffering, seems to me a very different thing, and a thing not justified by the claim of increase of knowledge commonly made for it, even in the proportion of such cases which aid in the treatment of human disease and the prolongation of human life. Tens of thousands of animals are tortured to death in Europe and this country annually, by processes as agonizing as those formerly used upon men and women in the Spanish Inquisition. The reason alleged in the latter case was the salvation of souls. The reason for vivisection now alleged is the increase of knowledge, expected to conduce more or less to the alleviation of human disease and the prolongation of some human lives. In neither case do I admit the plea to be a sound one. As far as my own case is concerned, I should decline to purchase either health or life by consenting to the treachery and cruelty involved in vivisection.

My second reason for opposing these cruelties is the deterioration of character naturally to be expected, and no doubt often realized, in the perpetrators of them.

Cowper says truly,—

> "The spring-time of our years
> Is soon dishonored and defiled, in most,
> By budding ills, that ask a prudent hand
> To check them. But, alas! none sooner shoots,
> If unrestrained, into luxuriant growth
> Than cruelty, most devilish of them all."

In the early stages of debate upon vivisection, many humane persons were incautious enough to accept as true and as sufficient the plea in excuse for it,—that anæsthetics were used with these brute sufferers, as with human beings under surgical operation. The fact, however, is that only a very small proportion of the cases in question are susceptible of such alleviation, even if the carver of living flesh cared to trouble himself with it. In some of those cases, the object is to watch the pain, and see how far it affects the health, and how soon (or how late) it will destroy the life. In some cases, the agonizing interference with functional processes is designed to continue for days and weeks, and then, if life continues, to be repeated on a larger scale. It is only a brute animal,—only a horse, or a dog, or a guinea-pig, or a dove,—what matter how much it suffers, so science be advanced. The first step in science is the observation and record of facts,—facts, no matter of what kind nor how obtained. This Gradgrind theory is still largely in vogue among the devotees of science. A boy was lately brought into court for burning a rat to death, after saturating his fur with kerosene oil. The stupid fellow said he didn't know there was any harm in it, but nevertheless he was sent to prison. If he had said he was a student in physiology, anxious to ascertain how many minutes and seconds of the application of caloric in that form would be incompatible with rat-life, would he have deserved imprisonment less? I believe, however, that this supposititious case is the exact parallel of very many of the cases in which vivisection is practised. The attainment of new facts, an extension of knowledge, is the main object, and is considered to justify the means used. If some of these facts throw light on the alleviation of human disease, so much the better.

Years ago I read, in a reputable periodical devoted to medical science, an account of the deliberate starving to death of two dogs, in the interests of science. The process was to administer to each dog daily a definite, very small quantity of a substance unsuitable to nourish him, and to allow him no other food or drink; and the object was to see which of these two substances would keep its user longest alive. The particular effects of this treatment upon each dog, and the sufferings of each upon each successive day, were accurately reported, until one of the dogs died. So far, science was triumphant. But the period of death of the other dog was not reported, because—the scientist had forgotten to visit his other victim, who died unseen, with no recorded fact to counterbalance his protracted sufferings.

My first feeling on reading this account was, What sort of man can the editor of this publication be, to print such an abominable act without intimation that this was an unjustifiable way of advancing science? Alas! the explanation was only too plain. He had probably himself been depraved by familiarity with such cruelties.

In a recent discussion of vivisection, it was mentioned that one of the most extensive and extreme practitioners of it, being asked if the infliction of so much suffering did not trouble him, replied that he neither thought of it, nor cared for it in any degree whatever. Of course, such a man would neither take the trouble nor undergo the expense of providing anæsthetics for his victims. But the important thing is, that such practices tend to such a result in every case. Probably, few are thus thoroughly hardened. With equal probability, few escape deterioration who make a practice either of inflicting or witnessing the cruelties in question. The habit of mind thus established, the custom of producing or witnessing suffering with unconcern, certainly tends, as Cowper says to shoot into luxuriant growth. How soon this growing habit may suggest to the medical or surgical practitioner the idea of trying such experiments on human beings also, and in what number of cases science persuades them actually to try this species of research, we have no means of information. For myself, I should choose to decline the services of one who had selected this mode of acquiring knowledge; and I should do this partly from dislike of his soul, and partly from consideration for my own body.

C. K. W.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

New Orleans, Sept. 7, 1880.

The most forcible protest against the Sunday ordinances in Louisiana was presented to the Ascension Parish police jury by Judge R. N. Sims, attorney, in a petition signed by two hundred citizens. They objected to the ordinance of that body "requiring stores, shops, groceries, and other places of business to be closed on Sunday," with penalties for violation: 1. Because it was against the wishes and sentiments of a large number of citizens of the parish, representing a vast amount of capital and property on which they paid taxes. 2. It was a blow to commercial interests. Nine-tenths of storekeepers, opposed to the ordinance, had already suffered considerable loss by its enforcement. 3. On many plantations, laborers were paid on Sunday morning; and, if not permitted to make purchases on that day, they would be compelled to abstain from work on some other day, to the risk and loss of cane and rice planters. 4. The enforcement was contrary to the genius of republican institutions, which requires that the greatest good shall be done to the greatest number with the least possible injury to any. 5. That while petitioners were duly sensible of the propriety of the observance of a day of rest, as may be dictated by religious or moral ideas and preferences, they humbly submit that ancient usages are entitled to consideration and respect; that enforcement by one class against another, or under any other circumstance than by the crystallization of public opinion in its favor, will only serve to cause anger, turmoil, and strife. Apart from these considerations, memorialists were advised that "a law which prohibits them from exercising their trades on any day of the year is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of 1869." Indulging in the hope that the action of the police jury would "inspire them with the assurance that the government is indeed, as it should be, benevolent and paternal," and that "its only legitimate end is to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property," they prayed for the repeal of the ordinance.

The request of petitioners was denied, because a case testing the validity of the ordinance was then before the Supreme Court, and the granting of the petition would be a confession of judgment against the police jury. In connection with this action, a personal difficulty arose between R. J. Green, a town councilman and anti-ordinance petitioner, and B. Gibson, a police juror. Shots were exchanged, and Mr. Green was mortally wounded. The Common Council of the town of Donaldsonville subsequently adopted resolutions, drafted by a committee appointed for the purpose, which declared "that Robinson J. Green laid down his life as a sacrifice upon the altar of religious persecution," a result of "the recent ruthless and heartless persecution of a large number of citizens of the town," some of them "identified with its growth and prosperity for nearly half a century"; his memory should be cherished as "a man who quickly detected the right and combated the wrong," and that "the gaunt figure of Want shall never be permitted to enter the portals of those who were so dear to him and now left so desolate." A badge of mourning for thirty days, publication of proceedings, and adjournment of Council as a mark of respect, were ordered.

Some four months ago, a paper called The Workingmen's Union Advocate made its appearance in New Orleans. It is published weekly by the joint committee of labor organizations, and edited by Ludwig A. Geissler. Mr. Geissler is an ardent member of the Socialistic Labor Party; yet it is not claimed that the Advocate is an exclusive representative of that party. The joint committee, which controls its publication, is composed of delegates from the following associations; namely, Socialistic Labor Party, Union Laboring-Men's Benevolent Association, Bricklayer's Benevolent Association, Journeyman Baker's Benevolent Association, Cigar-makers' Union, Shoemakers' Union, Dairymen's Co-operative and Mutual Aid Association, German Progress Club, Cotton Yard Men's Benevolent Association No. 2, Teamsters and Loaders Union Benevolent Association, Longshoremen's

Union Benevolent Association, Slaters' Union, Coopers' Benevolent Association, Harmonia Benevolent Association, Male and Female Benevolent Association. Of these fifteen corporate bodies, several are colored.

The total membership is not less than three thousand. The object of the committee is to "gradually embrace all and any association of bona fide workingmen for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of laboring men and enabling them to come out victorious in their struggle against the encroachments of capital." The leaders claim that other associations not officially enrolled or represented on the committee are in accord with them. Editor Geissler recently sharply rebuked the tendency to keep up the race divisions in labor organizations. He advised them to drop at once such antediluvian notions, and stand fraternally in one solid phalanx; that race and nationality are artificial barriers erected by the non-producing classes to keep the workingmen apart. The meetings are well mixed in regard to colors and nationalities; and the joint committee has become a power in this city. The Democrat says, "The attitude into which certain designing incendiaries are endeavoring to force the workingmen is full of evil promise." The movement is headed by men of communistic and socialistic ideas; and it warns them that New Orleans respects the honest laboring man, but she has scant patience and a rough hand for disturbers and incendiaries. It is evident that we are on the eve of a number of strikes, and harsh strictures will not check the effects of evil counsel. The workingmen have proceeded cautiously to date. Many of their leaders are well-meaning men with some just grounds of complaint; and it is too early to assume that they menace the peace and good order of society. The advance in rents, exhausting hours of labor, and small wages are inducements to strike. There should be adjustments between employers and employés on the basis of the market value of products handled. The workingmen need kindly counsel, should be met in a humane spirit, and their demands carefully considered and answered. If all classes of laboring men continue under one united and harmonious leadership, many social changes may confidently be looked for as the result. It will prove an antidote to oligarchic tendencies, the bane of political and industrial progress in this section. E. B.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Miss M. A. Hardaker gave her lecture on Lessing at Florence, Mass., Sunday, Sept. 26.

Rev. George W. Cooke was the speaker at the Parker Memorial Sunday, Sept. 26.

Miss Florence Marryatt has taken to public reading, and contemplates a visit for the purpose to this country.

The Boston Young Men's Christian Association advertises "Brilliant Chalk Talks about Jesus." And yet Col. Ingersoll is accused of irreverence.

W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, Mass., will address the Parker Memorial Society next Sunday, Oct. 10th, on "Religion, Agnosticism notwithstanding."

M. J. Savage has returned from his summer in Europe, and was warmly greeted by his society and friends last Sunday, on his reappearance among them.

Dr. Eliott Coues, of Washington, who probably knows as much about the birds of the United States as any one, is about to issue a book entitled New England Bird Life.

Prof. Watson is making a telescope for his own use at the Wisconsin University to hunt for Vulcan, which he is still suspicious is prowling around in intramercurial space.

Rev. Mr. Williams, recently preaching at Chaplin on Abraham's call to offer up Isaac, very gravely remarked: "It was no doubtful voice. I believe that Abraham knew that he heard the voice of God, just as plainly as you know you hear my voice, if you are awake." Such a straightening up of a congregation as followed is not often seen in sermon time.

Sir William Harcourt, Home Secretary, England, wrote to a magistrate the other day, complaining of his sending a boy of eleven years to jail, and suggesting that he should have sentenced the lad to some "slight corporal punishment." Whereupon, he got for an answer that the only difficulty with the suggestion was that it was contrary to law. The Home Secretary subsided.

Father Healey, of Marblehead, if we may credit the report of him, is a person of a peculiarly loving and forbearing spirit. At a fair in his church, the other day there was a raffle for a picture of himself. A young lady was asked to take a ticket, and on her refusal he struck her twice in the face. The court was so inconsiderate of the rights of a priest that it imposed on him a fine of $20.

Bjornson, the Norwegian novelist and liberal, has arrived in this country for the purpose of witnessing an American Presidential campaign. The spectacle of the intelligent foreigner trooping over here to see how we act under the stress of a quadrennial canvass is suggestive. He will discover that each half of the American people thinks itself the largest and has a very poor opinion of the other half.

Mrs. Laura de Force Gordon, the first female lawyer who ever addressed a jury in California, defended not long since a man accused of murder. The San Francisco Chronicle, in speaking of the occasion, says: "Mrs. Gordon wore a black dress, and her only ornament was a rose at her throat. Her appearance caused excitement, and she was several times applauded. Her client was acquitted."

Rowland Connor has assumed charge of a liberal movement at East Saginaw, Mich., one of the most thriving and wide-awake cities of the State, for three months. The papers there give very liberal space to reports of his discourses. Mr. Connor unites with his fine literary abilities excellent talent for public speaking, which should be regularly occupied in the Free Religious cause that he has greatly at heart.

The friends of Prof. Adler have learned with much sadness of the prolonged and alarming illness of his young wife, during the summer. Soon after their marriage, last May, they went to the mountains in New Hampshire, and returned thence, some two or three weeks later, to the residence of Mrs. Adler's parents in Brooklyn, with the intention of shortly making an excursion to Colorado and the West; but it was evident, before many days had elapsed, that this pleasant anticipation must be abandoned. Mrs. Adler's health suddenly gave way, and has been for much of the time in a very critical condition since. We regret to learn that Mr. Adler's affliction has been heavily augmented of late also by the illness of his wife's father, Dr. J. Goldmark, whose recovery is considered extremely doubtful. It need not be said that the very sincere sympathy and tender solicitude of the numerous friends of the family go out to it in the great trial through which it is passing.

The Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals seems to be generously remembered from time to time by those of humane and kindly sympathies, as it ought to be. The following contributions to its treasury are announced in Our Dumb Animals for October. Rev. C. T. Thayer of Boston, who died in June last, left the Society $500, to be paid at the decease of his wife. "It is delightful to record the fact that the lady chose to anticipate its payment by calling at our office and paying it herself. The manner of it has made it a joint gift, to be gratefully remembered to the honor of both husband and wife. Our Society has also thankfully received from a lady, whose name cannot be made public, the sum of $500. There are certain conditions attached to this gift, which will prevent its being available for a time; but it strengthens the Society now, and will increase its work in due time." While it affords us great satisfaction to report such aid as the above toward the noble work of this excellent Society, we cannot but wish that the Free Religious Association and the Index might have a larger number of such friends.

FOREIGN.

The Czar's treasury has in a year given five million roubles for the support of the Orthodox churches of the empire.

The use of the strait waistcoat has been abolished in the prisons and penitentiaries of France, except in cases of violent lunatics.

The Catholic propaganda has decided to expend a half million lire to establish a college at Malta to promote missions in Africa.

The Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris was struck by lightning recently, but with no further damage than the dislodgement of a few stones.

A statue of Thiers was unveiled Sunday, September 19, at Saint Germain-en-Laye. An address was delivered by Jules Simon in the name of the French Academy.

Prince Alexander Lubomirski, a Galician nobleman who resides in Paris, has made a donation of a sum of two million francs to be expended in works of public advantage to the people of Galicia.

The attention of the Bishop of London has been called to the fact that an ordained clergyman who preaches in that city recently took for his text, "The Lord said," and began his sermon thus: "Of course you know, my brethren, that the Lord never said anything of the kind."

There was a demonstration at Florence on Sunday, the 12th ult., by the workmen's societies of that city and province. Cries were raised of "Long live the King!" "Long live the army!" "Long live Italy!" The people subsequently proceeded to the residence of General Mezzacapo, before which they gave cheers for the army.

Dog-fight in a Scotch Church.—During the first prayer at Sunday service in the Free Church, Lochearnhead, two collie dogs got into strife, and barked and fought furiously. Great excitement resulted. The minister had to stop his prayer abruptly, and a young gentleman tourist was severely bitten while trying to separate the combatants. The clergyman's dog was also in church. It sat in the family pew, but took no part in the disturbance.

The Ober-Ammergau Passion-Play.—Munich has this year been detestable, owing to the mad craze about the Ober-Ammergau play; and the dear old Quatre Saisons Hôtel, usually so select, has been crowded with the worst style of English tourists. The whole performance at Ober-Ammergau has been so deteriorated and vulgarized that, after this year, no representation of it is to be allowed.—London World.

That accomplished and eloquent London preacher, Mr. Stopford Brooke, is following the example of Mr. Voysey, and shaking the dust of the Church of England from off the soles of his heretical feet. Henceforth, his services in Bedford Chapel—the Duke of Bedford having extended his license—will be conducted on a Unitarian basis. He will use the liturgy of the Church of England, with certain rather important exceptions. Mr. Brooke will offer to return the money which his congregation have paid in advance for sittings.

It is announced that Professor Harnack, of the University of Giessen, and Dr. Von Gebhardt, Librarian of the University of Göttengen, have discovered in the Cathedral of Rossano, Calabria, a Greek Uncial Codex of Matthew and Mark's Gospels. The manuscript has been, by many eminent authorities, declared of the highest value for the text of the New Testament, and as showing the historical development of book-writing and painting in very early times. The Codex has been published at Leipzig by Giesecke and Devrient.

Our Brussels correspondent writes: "The unveiling of the Spinoza monument at The Hague took place on Monday. The concourse of people was very large, and among the distinguished foreigners present was Herr Berthold Auerbach, one of whose earliest works was a novel founded on the life of Spinoza. Dr. Van Slooten gave an address, and the statue was then unveiled. M. Van Limburg, president of the committee for the erection of the statue, then formally handed over the monument to the care of the town authorities. A banquet took place in the evening, at which all the Dutch and foreign members of the committee and a number of distinguished guests were present."—Pall Mall Budget.

The Abbé Crozes is the chaplain of the prison of La Roquette, in which are confined, among others, the prisoners who are condemned to death. Whenever an execution takes place, the Abbé Crozes accompanies to the guillotine the victim of the vengeance of society, and the newspapers chant dithyrambs in praise of his devotion. The venerable and worthy abbé gave Menesclou some cassis while the executioner was preparing the guillotine, then he kissed him and called him brother, gave him absolution and promised him the joys of paradise, since he had repented of his crime and since society was about to cut his body into two unequal parts. Capital punishment is thus seen to be a great benefit, since it enables peo-

SPAIN.—The baptism of the infant Princess was celebrated in great state on Monday. The Chapel Royal had been handsomely decorated and fitted up with tribunes for the court. The interior was crowded long before the King and the royal family entered the gallery facing the altar, which was splendidly illuminated. The clergy, with the bishops, the cardinals, the Archbishop of Toledo, and the Patriarch of the Indies, and the Nuncio, representing the Pope, formed imposing groups inside the railings of the altar, just as the saluting guns and the military band, playing a march, announced the approach of the Infanta in a gorgeous procession. The long galleries of the palace were lined with halberdiers in full uniform. The procession was headed by lords-in-waiting, grandees, mace-bearers, heralds, the king-at-arms, and the equerries attired in the gala dress of court ceremonies. Before the Infanta were borne the insignia of baptism, a salver, a mantle, a napkin, a taper, some salt, some cotton-wool, and a huge almond cake that is distributed afterwards to the guests. The Infanta Maria Isabel Mercedes was carried by a nurse in her peasant dress, blazing with gold and silver on velvet, and wearing the same necklace and earrings which were worn at the baptism of King Alfonso in 1857. The robe of the Infanta was a magnificent present of Queen Isabella, who walked last in the procession, surrounded by the great officers of the Palace and the Commander of the Guards. The ceremony was conducted by the Cardinal Patriarch of the Indies. Queen Isabella held her grand-daughter over the font. During the most impressive part of the proceedings, the choir of the Chapel Royal sang some beautiful hymns, and an artillery salute was fired as the Princess was again taken back by her household. A Council of Ministers proposed to the King on Monday many grants of crosses, titles, and three toisons d'or, one of them going to the son of the Duc de Montpensier. They also recommended a general amnesty for political prisoners, and a reduction of the penalty for criminals in penal servitude and the prisons. The King and Queen have received messages containing congratulations from many of the courts of Europe, among them being one from Queen Victoria.—Lloyd's Weekly.

A COUPLE of rag-pickers groping along the gutters discuss religion and politics. "For my part," says one, "I believe in neither priests, religion, nor churches. Napoleon did wrong to re-establish them." "Yes," said the other, "but such superstitions are necessary for the lower classes."

JUST before visiting the menagerie, Johnny had a passage at arms with the young aunt who assisted at his toilet, and with whom he flew into a rage. Arrived at the menagerie, Johnny was immensely interested by a strange foreign animal with long, lithe body. "What animal is that, mamma?" he asked. "It is called an ant-eater, my son." After a long silence: "Mamma, can't we bring Aunt Mary here some day?"

THE BOND OF SYMPATHY.—A man with a grip-sack in his hand halted before a Jefferson Avenue fruit-stand lately, and priced a choice variety of peaches. When told that they were twenty cents a dozen, he whistled to himself, walked softly around, and finally asked, "Are you a Baptist?" "Hardly." "Neither am I. I didn't know but that if we both belonged to the same denomination, you'd throw off a little. Do you lean to the Methodists?" "Can't say that I do." "That's my case. I never did take much stock in the Methodists. Twenty cents a dozen is an awful price on those peaches, considering how tight money is. I expect you are a Universalist, eh?" "No." "Neither am I. Can't you say fifteen cents for a dozen of these?" "Hardly." "Aren't you an Episcopalian?" "No, sir." "Neither am I, but I was afraid you were. I've been sort o' looking you over, and I shouldn't wonder if you trained with the United Brethren. Come, now, own up." "I never attend that church," was the steady reply. "Nor I, either. Say, what are you, anyhow?" "I'm a hard-baked old sinner." "No! Whoop! That's my case to a dot! I'm called the wickedest man in Washtenaw County! I knew there was a bond of sympathy between us, if we could only find it out! Now, do you say fifteen cents for a dozen?" The fruit-dealer counted them out without a further objection.—Detroit Free Press.

SUBSTANTIALISM;

—OR—

PHILOSOPHY OF KNOWLEDGE.

BY JEAN STORY.

Perceiving the oneness and continuous interchangeability of substance as essence and as form, the author discards the use of the term "spirit" and "matter," and substitutes therefor the term "essential substance," whose intrinsic elasticity or vitality is alike intact, whether condensed as form or expanded as essence or spirit; all the innumerable qualities of substance being solely the result of its spacial modifications. Viewing the phenomena of nature, the only source of positive knowledge, from this new stand-point, which differs from that whence any other system has been idealized, and accepting the exact sciences as the bases of speculative science, the author claims to present for public consideration a New System of Philosophy. Unarmed by other aid than its own intrinsic merits, it has been launched upon the stormy sea of public opinion to battle single-handed for its right to a voice in the general sentiments of the age.

The book is in cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. It can be obtained first hand at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. Price $1.50 at retail.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place: and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. "One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE virtues are not poured into us, they are natural. Seek and you will find them, neglect and you will lose them. To every faculty and relation belongs its normal law; but, without its fit culture, it will decay. How lamentable to lose this mind, and not know how to seek it! The end of wisdom is to seek the lost mind.—Mencius (China).

OF what use is wealth to him who neither gives nor enjoys it? What is strength to him who subdues not his own foes? What signifies a knowledge of the Scripture to him who fails to practise virtue? What is the soul itself to him who cannot control himself? —Hindu.

LET each man make himself as he teaches others to be. He who is well subdued may subdue others. One's own self is difficult to subdue. Self is the lord of self: who else could be the Lord? With self well subdued, a man finds a lord such as few can find.—Buddhist.

NO MAN is free who cannot command himself.—Pythagoras.

ONLY consider at what price you sell your own free will, O man, if only that you may not sell it for a trifle! The highest greatness and excellence perhaps seem to belong to others, to such as Socrates. Why then, as we are born with a like nature, do not all, or the greater number, become such as he? . . . Because my gifts are humble, shall I neglect all care of myself? Heaven forbid! Epictetus may not surpass Socrates. Granted; but, could I overtake him, it might be enough for me. I shall never be Milo, and yet I do not neglect my body; nor Crœsus, and yet I do not neglect my property. Nor should we omit any effort, from a despair of arriving at the highest.—Epictetus.

EVERY man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. I keep my body under, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway.—Paul.

IF ye do well, to your own behoof will ye do it; and, if ye do evil, against yourselves will ye do it.—Koran.

I SAW an Arab who said to his son, "O my child! in the day of the resurrection, they will ask you what have you done in the world, and not from whom are you descended." That is, they will inquire about your virtue, and not about your father.—Persian (12th century).

THE chief quality of leadership is the jewel of equity, by which is justified the obedience of every man to his leader.—Arabic (16th century).

BETTER conquest never canst thou make than arm thy constant and thy nobler parts against giddy, loose suggestions.—Shakespeare.

CURRENT TOPICS.

SCRIBNER'S SONS announce that they will soon issue in this country Dean Stanley's history of Christian Institutions.

THE REV. DR. MINER, the distinguished Universalist preacher of Boston, maintains that the miracles of Christ prove the truth of his revelation.

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia met in the Academy of Music, which, to all practical intents and purposes, is a theatre. Was it consecrated specially for the occasion, or what did the chairman mean, when he suppressed an applause that greeted one of the speakers, by reminding the brethren that they were in "the house of God"?

A QUESTION of considerable interest and a good deal of principle (pal) has been exercising the minds of the people of Boston the past week. It has been, How can banking be done so as to pay eight per cent. a month interest on deposits? The president of "The Ladies' Deposit Company," which has represented this extraordinary system, knows howe, if anyone. Gail Hamilton's effort to throw light on the subject the papers ungallantly pronounce simply a Dodge of the point at issue.

IN the discussion about the stricter observance of Sunday, it is always in order to quote the authority of Martin Luther on the question. He said: "As regards the Sabbath or Sunday, there is no necessity for keeping it; but, if we do, it ought not to be on account of Moses' commandment, but because nature teaches us from time to time to take a day of rest. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake, then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to dance on it, to do anything that will reprove this encroachment on Christian spirit and liberty."

THE Woman's Congress, which began its annual session in this city, Tuesday, October 12, has been several years in existence. This, we believe, is its first meeting in Boston. It is not a woman's suffrage association, though, it may be presumed, the majority of its members are suffragists; nor is it devoted to any special phase of what is rather vaguely termed the woman's movement. It is designed to promote union and sympathy among women, for the better accomplishments of various ends pertaining to the general interests of the sex. We hope to be able to give an outline of the proceedings in the Index of next week.

THE religious journals are still discussing the question which Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes raised in the International Review for July,—or re-raised, for it was first publicly raised by Dr. Bushnell,—whether Jonathan Edwards changed his views to a milder type of Orthodoxy in the latter years of his life. The unpublished manuscript, on the surmised contents of which the question was started, has now been printed. All that we have to say about the matter is that, if the unearthed essay proves Edwards a heretic, his heresy was of a kind that has now become so obsolete as hardly to be distinguished from the strictest Orthodoxy. He was still Orthodox enough and to spare for passing the inquisition of any Orthodox Congregational council in our time.

THE St. Lawrence, Lower Laurentides and Saguenay Railway in Canada, just completed, has been opened for traffic by a religious ceremony. The Roman Catholic bishop of Three Rivers was present and made a religious address, beginning with the fall of man and ending with committing the new line to the care of the angel Raphael as its special guardian, who, "as the angel watched over Tobias on his journey," might equally watch over this road and its passengers. He then pronounced his official benediction upon the enterprise. Nevertheless, it is to be hoped that the directors will not put too much responsibility upon the "Angel Raphael," but see to it that he has a good corps of trained conductors, engineers, brakemen, and switch-tenders to help him.

THE Nation uses the developments of "The Ladies' Deposit Company" as an illustration of the inefficiency of our common schools to impart education in practical, and especially financial, matters. It thinks such things could not occur, if young people were more effectually trained in a rudimentary knowledge of ordinary business operations. Certainly, our existing mode of popular education does not accomplish in this and other respects all we have a right to expect of it. There is a great lack, even among those who pass for educated people, of the power of sound and rational thinking. Hence the tendency of the masses to credulity and to be swayed by sensationalism. It was said of a certain noted person that he had so many books on his brain that they prevented it from acting. Is not this in some degree true of many who are counted among the intelligent around us?

A CALL has been issued by Mr. Felix R. Brunot, President of the National Reform Association, for a convention, under the auspices of that society, at St. Johnsbury, Vt., on the 19th of the present month. "National Reform Association" is the rather indefinite name of the organization, which has the very definite purpose of amending the Constitution of the United States, so as not only to bring into it a distinct recognition of Christianity, but an Orthodox view of Christianity. As Mr. Brunot's "call" says, its object is "to secure in the Constitution of the United States an acknowledgment of Almighty God as the source of all power and authority in civil government; of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler of Nations, and of his Revealed Will as supreme authority." This object, it needs no argument to see, is in direct contravention of the fundamental principles of our national government. Our national foundation is "the consent of the governed," not of the governor.

PROGRESS AND POVERTY.*

Under this title, Mr. Henry George, in a book which has attracted unusual, if not general, consideration, affirms not only that the vast improvements in the production of wealth, which modern science and invention have introduced, have not improved the condition of the laboring class, but that that class has become relatively less comfortable than the class whose subsistence is not maintained directly by labor.

After an able analysis of the current systems of political economy, showing that none of them are adequate to the solution of the problem he attempts to solve,—namely, the persistence and increase of poverty under conditions which, to a casual observer, have promised the rapid amelioration in material condition, at least, of all classes,—he finds, in the monopoly of land and the consequent rise of rents, the cause of the failure of these new forces and appliances to lift mankind generally to a higher plane of existence. The remedy he suggests and enforces by arguments less cogent than his statement of the evil is the levying of all taxes upon land. The real question involved in Mr. George's book is that concerning the production and distribution of wealth and the relations of capital and labor. This is indicated in all that he suggests. Indeed, the avowed material outcome of his theory is increased production and the just distribution of the results of labor. He justly considers these the all-important questions of the time,—questions which are daily forcing themselves upon the consideration of thoughtful men, questions which are to-day disturbing the industries of the world and threatening the peace and stability of society.

All Mr. George says to show that natural wealth, the unaided products of the soil, the forests, the mines, and the waters, of right are, and should be, common property, in which everybody has an interest which cannot be wholly alienated, has been said over and over again. So manifestly true is it, that the contrary, in so far as monopoly of the land is concerned, is reducible to an absurdity; for, where the land is all owned by somebody, a new-comer upon the face of the earth is poorer than was the Son of Man, who had not where to lay his head: the new candidate for membership in the great human family has not even a place where he may lawfully plant his foot. He may be ordered off all private domain as a trespasser; and, if he betakes himself to the highways, he may be arrested as a vagrant, and deprived of liberty. If it be conceded that every one has rights in the bounties of nature, it must be admitted that not every one is in possession of them; and the concern of all should be how again to come by our own, how to regain possession of these rights. Mr. George's method seems to me not only inadequate, but a surrender of the main issue. He claims that, as titles to large portions of the land have been conferred by royal grants, on quite inadequate considerations, it would not be unjust to confiscate them to public uses; but, as that cannot be easily done, he proposes to accomplish the same purpose by levying all taxes on the land, leaving the nominal ownership as it is.

Levying all taxes on real estate is advocated by some economists to-day (notably by Mr. D. A. Wells, who has made a study of the matter) as the most equitable way of raising revenue for public uses. They claim that as everybody uses land, or the products of land, about in proportion to their expenditures, or consumption of wealth, a tax on real estate will fall more equitably than any other, because it would be in the power of the owners to collect it in fairer proportion from consumers by increase in rents or in the price of products of the soil. They evidently have no thought, as Mr. George has, that the nominal value of the land would be impaired, or that the land would be less desirable as an investment of capital, or that it would practically restore, or even tend to restore, to every one his natural right in the soil, but only that the rent would be increased enough to pay the tax. Nor do I see how it is possible that the benefits which Mr. George so eloquently sets forth are to flow from the execution of the plan he proposes.

Levying all taxes upon the land is a practicable step in the right direction; but we must go further to accomplish the end Mr. George has in view. Nothing short of reclaiming and repossessing the whole of the land by the community, so that it may be administered in some manner that will secure the largest production of which it is economically capable, and to every member his or her natural share of its benefits, can satisfy the demands of justice, or afford a tithe of the good things Mr. George foretells.

But, if justice is to be done, the land can be acquired by the community only through some arrangement which will give to holders of the titles a reasonable compensation for its value; for, though titles may have been originally obtained without sufficient consideration, present owners have, in most cases, paid for them their full value, under an implied guarantee, by the state of permanent possession. To take such lands without compensation, were it possible, would be gross injustice. The attempt would be more likely to throw us back upon violence than to lead us into the paths of peace and prosperity. Before considering further this branch of Mr. George's theory, it is proper to examine his views about capital and interest; for these are so intimately related to land and rent, that no theory of the latter can be complete that does not take these relations into the account.

In treating of capital, Mr. George gives the definitions of eleven writers on political economy, each of whom differs, more or less, from the others, as if to show the absurdity of calling that a science whose expounders cannot agree on a statement of one of its primitive conceptions. His own definition of capital is "wealth in the course of exchange," which, notwithstanding his elaborate explanation, is rather obscure. I infer that he would accept the simpler statement, that capital is so much of wealth (exclusive of land) as is used, or kept for use, in the production of more wealth.

His idea that capital does not employ labor, but that labor employs capital, is misleading; for, while it is true in a certain fanciful sense, in a more important and practical sense it is capital that employs labor, or, strictly speaking, it is the capitalists and all who expend wealth, whether in the production of more wealth or in personal gratification, who employ laborers. The idea of capital, at least in so far as this discussion goes, is of something which yields income,—rent or interest or profit. In this country, land is not generally held for the political or social influence it exerts, but for profit, either as rent or for an advance in price, which is speculation, just as capital is invested in manufacturing or banking, or in railroad building, or even in stock speculating, for the profit which may accrue; and it matters not to the interests of labor whether you call it interest or profit or rent. Whichever it is, it comes ultimately from the products of labor; and, whatever its amount, it is so much of the products of labor which laborers do not get. As to rent of land, Mr. George agrees with Mill and others, that it is contrary to natural justice that land and the natural forces should yield any increase or income which does not enure to the general good; that is, that whatever may be derived from them, in the form of rent, beyond paying for all public or general purposes, should be distributed in some equitable way among the whole people, so that each may have his or her share of whatever nature unassisted provides. As to profits, such as arise from speculation are not considered by any economists as within the pale of legitimacy: they are mere transfers from one man's pocket to another's, without any equivalent, and are not to be regarded in any scheme of social economy. The profits which arise from such pursuits as promote the exchange and distribution of wealth, and cover such losses as are incident to distribution, are a proper charge upon labor. These functions, in a society based upon co-operation, would be performed at a minimum cost, yielding to those who perform them such compensation as is commensurate with the rewards which others of like capacity receive.

To the question of interest, Mr. George devotes three chapters,—one on "The Cause of Interest," one "On Spurious Capital and of Profits often mistaken for Interest," and a third on "The Law of Interest." In these chapters, he attempts to show that there is a natural and substantial relation between capital and interest; that is, that there is, in the nature of things, a good reason why capital, of right, should share in the products of industry. And this good reason he supports by the following illustrations. He says: "Supposing that in a country adapted to them I set out bees. At the end of the year, I will have more bees and the honey they have made. Or supposing, where there is a range, I turn out sheep or hogs or cattle. At the end of the year, I will, upon the average, also have an increase." And, immediately following, he says, "What gives this increase is something distinct and separate from labor,"—"the active power of nature, the principle of growth, etc."; and "it seems to me that it is this which is the cause of interest or the increase of capital." Now, the whole burden and tenor of Mr. George's book go to show that this active power of nature, this principle of growth, is of those forces which nature bestows, which, like the land, may not of right be monopolized to the exclusion of any from its equal benefits. He says (p. 145): "Land, labor, and capital are the factors of production. The term 'land' includes all natural opportunities and forces." How, then, can he award the product of these natural forces to capital as interest? Mr. George's third illustration is only apparently more forcible. He cites the increase by age in the value of wine, and claims this increase as the natural increment of capital. This looks, at first sight, very plausible; and, but for the absurdity of it, I should be tempted to say that this is the exception which proves the rule to the contrary. There is, however, no need of such resort; for Mr. George himself refutes whatever argument might be drawn from the fact of increased value in wine by age, when he says (p. 166), "In the last analysis, the advantage which is given by the lapse of time springs from the generative force of nature." Of course, then, it is not the force of capital that gives the increased value, and capital should not receive the increase as interest. It seems to me that Mr. George makes a fundamental error in considering capital as one of the factors of production, if he means that it is absolutely necessary to production. He certainly does make a mistake in affirming that interest is a "natural thing," "a result of the laws of the universe," except in the sense that every occurrence is the natural outgrowth of its antecedents. Interest is no more a result of the laws of the universe than rent is; and it, as well as rent, which is but a form of interest, must cease to be a tax on labor before we can realize from the advent of that partial reform—the levying of all taxes on land—the benefits which Mr. George predicts.

That capital per se has no reproductive force, no inherent power of increase, is so plainly stated by Mr. George, and others whom he quotes, that it is a wonder he should overlook the drift of the illustrations I have quoted. He cites and enlarges on Bastiat's example of the use of a borrowed plane, showing conclusively, in this case, so parallel to all employment of capital unassisted by natural forces, that the plane, the capital which William borrowed of James, did not enable him to accomplish any more work than he could have done, if he had made his own plane.

From the theory of compensating the lender for the use of his plane (his capital) beyond restoring to him as good a plane, the argument goes to show that the lender's gains and the borrower's losses are cumulative, and that in time the lender will absorb the whole of the borrower's labor. Mr. George states this case very fully (p. 158), and concludes justly that there is nothing in it to show that interest on capital so employed is natural or equitable. I have already stated that he puts all natural forces in the same category as land, which he declares to be the common heritage of mankind. If this be true, there would seem to be no "general characteristics of capital which give rise to interest." There is much in what he says about the lender of the plane gradually absorbing all the labor of the borrower, till he makes him virtually his slave. It is the reductio ad absurdum which ought to close the argument. There can be no natural right which leads to such destructive ends. There can be no "general characteristics of capital" which imply a reproductive force and which necessarily "give rise to interest."

There is, however, a cause for interest, a reason why it is paid for the use of capital, which Mr. George seems to have overlooked. A great majority of the wage-receiving class are as improvident as the savage. They have all his needs without his means of supplying them; and, in addition, the more artificial wants which are stimulated by their environment, and which are as clamorous for gratification as their natural wants. As a consequence, the wages of this class are consumed about as fast as they are earned; so that the little they may be able to save is entirely inadequate to keep them along till they can realize from the products of their labor, especially when their work requires much time to complete it. It is inevitable, therefore, while they are in their present state of development, and are living among men who by fortune or endowment are better circumstanced that they should draw their subsistence from their more fortunate neighbors; that is, that they should work for wages rather than for themselves, and on such terms as they can command, which generally will be such as their employers consent to give.

The relations of supply and demand will control to some extent. Wages will be governed by the amount of such labor for sale rather than by the amount of capital seeking employment. The amount of capital seeking employment is, nevertheless, an important factor in the problem, controlling in part the rate of interest. But in a much larger degree, especially in a new country like ours, affording so many opportunities for enterprise, the rate of interest depends very largely upon the skill and intelligence, and not unfrequently upon the unscrupulousness, of the enterprising. Men of force and intelligence, having control of convertible wealth, or capital, can command all the labor which has no skill for combination or self-employment, and can well afford to pay the capitalist, who may not be so enterprising, a portion of his profits as interest. In such cases (and all industrial enterprises are largely of such character), the rate of interest represents the ability of the enterprising to control to their profit the labor of the less provident or less gifted. As such employers get rich themselves, they have less use for the capital of others; and the rate of interest declines. This process has been going on rapidly of late years, because the means of producing wealth have greatly increased. Wealth has become more abundant than ever before. As soon as there is more of it than can find a market or than is consumed, there will be a reduction in the profits of capital, or interest, or there will be a suspension of production. There is generally both.

Now, if this capital could be employed in the production of more wealth, without the expectation of any return beyond the certain restitution of the amount so employed, the increased production would inure to the benefit of the producers. The owner of wealth would have all his wealth, and the laborer would have the results of his labor. To secure this more equitable distribution is the great desideratum. Why should warehouses be groaning with idle, sometimes decaying, wealth, which, in the process of consumption, would improve the condition of those who, while consuming it, would be producing more than they consume? This state of things is part and parcel of our civilization,—natural and inevitable, in the present phase of social development. Thus far, the attention of economists has been directed to the application of science to the arts of production, with little or no regard to a science of distribution. Already, this state of things is producing combinations among laboring men, strikes and riots and threats of violence, which, as periods of depression in trade and industry recur, may lead to political as well as industrial anarchy. The riots of a few years ago at Pittsburg, in California, and elsewhere, were but the mutterings which may sweep down upon us, in a storm of destruction, unless some Franklin arises to guide these electric forces into currents of light and usefulness. Mr. George recognizes the danger of retrogression. He points out the possibility that our civilization may be subverted, as others have been, by the abuse of power, which is sure to creep in where large accumulations of wealth, in the hands of the few, corrupt the moral instincts of the people. Such disintegrating forces are certainly at work now; and it may be that our boasted civilization is destined to go down in ruin, and that another cycle of centuries must elapse before the predicted era of harmony and happiness dawns upon an expectant world. But Mr. George evidently hopes for better things, which he proposes to bring about by having the State exercise the right of eminent domain in spoliating the lands,—an act of injustice so gross that it cannot be done till society has become demoralized to a degree utterly inconsistent with progress.

The safe and sensible alternative seems to lie in the direction of co-operation, not among the laboring class alone, but among and between all classes,—a co-operation wide enough and brave enough to secure to every individual opportunity to contribute, according to ability, his or her quota of work, and just enough to secure to each a fair compensation for the work done. But how is this to be brought about while intelligence and thrift are so rare, and ignorance and thriftlessness are the characteristics of so large a portion of the people? If any community should have the good fortune to become sufficiently hetero-homogeneous and intelligent to make such radical changes practicable, they would soon be disturbed and rendered futile by an influx of discordant elements. Even under our democratic form of government, which in practice, at least, is but a partial advance toward the emancipation of the masses from the thraldom of caste and its attendant circumstances, there is danger of our being swamped by the multitude of the ignorant and the undisciplined poured in upon us from the Old World. If we are hardly able to maintain these improved governmental conditions which touch us at so few points, how impossible it would be, in the present stage of development, to sustain those complex social relations which require not only the highest intelligence, but the purest morality, the clearest perceptions of justice, for their support!

It is true that thought and aspiration are always in advance of realization. While we always have the promise of something better to come, and are bound by all our better instincts to strive for it, we must remember that the hoped-for comes slowly, when it comes to stay. Our present social arrangements, the distribution and management of lands, the relations of capital and labor, of the governing and governed, are just such as our antecedents have made possible, and are about as good as we can have to-day. There can be no millennium, no harmony in human conditions, till the race has progressed far beyond its present acquirement in knowledge and virtue. Not, as it has progressed thus far, by the elevation of the few, while the many are depressed, or at best remain stationary. Reform must reach to the bottom of the social scale. The lowest must be raised, and education become general, till intelligence is more evenly distributed. The wisest may well become wiser; but the great need of humanity is that the unwise should grow broader and truer and nobler, especially that the sentiment of justice, a prompt recognition of the rights of others, should obtain in all intercourse among men. Only so fast and so far as the practice of these and kindred virtues becomes the rule, instead of the exception, is any general system of co-operation among laborers possible. To be successful co-operators, men must not only know how to work together: they must have faith in one another, and that they can have only by being worthy of such trust. Mankind has been ages in getting up to its present stage of knowledge and virtue. It may be generations, perhaps centuries, before it becomes capable of so much co-operation as will enable the workers to do without the use of the capital of others. Certain it is that only in proportion as, through the exercise of thrift and mutual trust, they are able to become their own capitalists, can they emancipate themselves from the necessity of paying interest to others. That such a time will come, a time when wealth will be abundant, and laborers no longer under the necessity of paying interest, is as certain as that humanity is in the line of progression without perceptible end. When it does come, and not till it does come, will it be possible to realize Mr. George's idea of the earth and all its bounties justly redeemed to the use of all the dwellers thereon.

CRUMBLING CORNER-STONES.

The New York Independent, it seems to me, has done well to express a desire (Aug. 19) for "a good history and criticism of missions from a Free Religious standpoint." Such a history could not fail to be instructive, especially if its writer succeeded in drawing a frank avowal of facts and reasons from those missionaries who, having taken service with the "American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions," have found it best, after trial of its methods, to withdraw from that service. If we could know how much has been suppressed and how much perverted before the abstracts of reports from foreign lands appear in the Missionary Herald, it might possibly help to open the eyes of some of those who pour from $450,000 to $500,000 annually into the treasury of its managers.

He who shall write this history must recognize and emphasize the distinction between the excellent, disinterested, self-sacrificing men and women who do the missionary work in foreign lands, and the officials who manipulate Christians at home, through the Missionary Herald and otherwise, in such manner as to make the Board appear conspicuously a strict guardian of the faith called "Evangelical," and thus to obtain unfailing pecuniary contributions from the sects which call themselves Evangelical.

But the means for fair and effective criticism of Orthodox mission work are at hand without waiting for the history of its past operations to be written "from a Free Religious stand-point." The comment I now have to make on that system is that the very partial measure of success it attains is accomplished by a substitution of Christian errors for heathen ones.

The one great object which the Mission Board sets forth as the sufficient reason for all the labors, sufferings, and expenses involved in its work is "the salvation of souls." Among the more bigoted of its contributors, "salvation" is plainly declared by the mission agents to be deliverance from hell; and this idea, no doubt, is the moving spring of the whole enterprise. But for the clerical assumption that hell awaits the unconverted heathen, no such immense sums of money would be raised; and no such sacrifices of comfort, health, life, and of the ties of family, friendship, and love on the part of the working missionaries, would be made.

But, among more intelligent people, the preachers of missionary sermons in behalf of the treasury prefer to represent the salvation they are to gain for the heathen as "deliverance from sin." If they could really accomplish this, it would amply repay all the sacrifices and all the expenses; but they never do accomplish it. Both preachers and converts, both at the mission stations abroad and in the mission-house in Boston, remain, and expect as long as they are in this world to remain, "miserable sinners." Nay, more: if any functionary of the society should claim in his own person to have experienced that deliverance from sin which they all are theoretically striving for, they would forthwith stigmatize him as a "perfectionist," and cast him out from among them. The reformations they accomplish are always partial, and are never expected to be more than partial, and so are not distinguished in kind from other reformatory movements.

I have said that, in the proportion of instances where success is claimed for the foreign missionary work, the thing really accomplished is a substitution of Christian errors for heathen errors. I shall speak now of only four of the errors prominent in missionary teaching, namely:—

Their doctrine concerning the Christ;
Their doctrine concerning the atonement;
Their doctrine concerning the Bible;
Their doctrine concerning the Sabbath.

1. Before speaking of the error in the missionary doctrine concerning the Christ, I wish to quote a correct statement in regard to the position taken by Jesus, contained in an article entitled "The Messianic Hope," by Rev. Charles W. Wendte, in the Unitarian Review for September, 1880. This writer says:—

"The interpretation which Jesus gave to the Messianic office to which he felt himself called was one quite at variance with both the ancient prophecies and the popular hope. They had conceived it as a kingly dignity to be assumed in triumph, he as a lowly life-task to be fulfilled with humility. The Old Testament prophets had portrayed a mighty, supernaturally endowed ruler, the bringer of good fortune and tidings of great joy. Jesus began his Messianic career in poverty, obscurity, and weakness, his gospel a call to renunciation and prayer. The sorrowing Messiah,—there we have in a word the characteristic of the Christ as conceived by Jesus. No wonder the Jews would not listen to one who so little fulfilled the Old Testament ideal of the Messiah; for everywhere in the Old Testament you find the Redeemer of Israel portrayed as a joyful, heroic, victorious prince, the darling of Jehovah, endowed with his might, and ascending the throne in glory. Not a word is here of a sorrowing, suffering Christ. Those passages in the Psalms in which later Christian piety saw a foreshadowing of the crucified Redeemer do not refer to the expected Messiah at all. They were written of King David when in exile or under the heavy displeasure of the Almighty. Those noble passages from the second Isaiah which Christian theology and Christian song have exalted into prophecies of the sorrowing Messiah,—'He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; . . . he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; . . . with his stripes we are healed: . . . he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; . . . he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter,' etc.,—these, far from being prophecies of the Christ, have no reference to the Messiah at all. As is easily seen from the context, this 'servant of the Lord,' to whom the prophet attributes all these things, is simply a poetic personification of Israel itself." And again:—

"Nothing is surer than that Jesus did not fulfil, either in his person or in his work on earth, the Messianic ideals and hopes of the Old Testament."

It is true, as above stated, that the view of Messiahship set forth by Jesus, and illustrated in his life and death, is utterly at variance with the Messianic predictions of the Hebrew prophets. The missionaries, however, misled their hearers by preaching, as confidently as if it were truth, a statement entirely opposite; namely, that the life and death of Jesus were an accurate fulfilment of Old Testament Messianic prediction. This foundation of their theological system, then, is an unsound foundation.

2. The missionary doctrine concerning the atonement also is unsound.

In various portions of both Old and New Testaments, it is declared that God will render to every man according to his works. This doctrine seems to me just and reasonable, and therefore probable. It is plainly to be expected that a Providence overruling human affairs must have arranged that, sooner or later, all well-doing shall produce increase of welfare, and all evil-doing a diminution of welfare. The missionaries also feel obliged to admit the truth of this doctrine, because it is written in the Bible; but at the same time they teach, and give special emphasis to a doctrine directly opposite to this,—namely, that future welfare depends mainly upon belief, and that a whole life of corrupt inclinations and evil deeds will result in welfare, if only a right belief be interposed just before death.

The absurdity of the doctrine that belief has any claim to be accepted as a substitute for righteousness will be seen at once, if we apply it to the transactions of this world. If a bank-robber on being brought before the judge should say, "I confess my dishonesty, and my evil character; but I believe in the president of the bank as an honest man, and I put my trust in him, and ask to be set free in consideration of his merits and my belief in them," he would be held to have added impudence to dishonesty. Yet the missionaries represent their heaven as attainable only by trust in the righteousness of another, not at all by a right life independently of such trust.

3. The missionary doctrine concerning the Bible is palpably unsound in various particulars. The preachers insist that that book be received as divinely inspired and infallibly correct in every particular, in spite of the abundant proofs of human error, often amounting to self-contradiction, which impartial scrutiny discovers in it. They pretend it to be homogeneous in character and perfectly consistent with itself, though its component parts are two heterogeneous collections of literature, including the history and laws of two different religions, written in different languages by many different authors, and covering a period of many centuries. The numerous widely different interpretations which have been given to these books by parties equally intent on maintaining their inspiration and authority have caused the most frightful animosities, the bitterest wars, and the most cruel persecutions known to history. These diversities of opinion in regard to what is commanded in the Bible increase rather than diminish, and theories naturally antagonistic are held and insisted on with as much pertinacity as ever; and yet the fact remains that no one of the contending sects leads a life in conformity with its own theory of Scriptural inspiration and authority. Not one of them acts as if it really believed the Bible the authoritative and sufficient rule of faith and practice; yet the preachers of each continue to assume that this character really belongs to it.

4. The missionary doctrine that the Bible requires the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath is utterly unfounded, and its hearers are misled and deluded as far as they accept such teaching. Sabbatism is one of the matters in which Old and New Testament teach not only different, but opposite doctrines. The former enjoined bodily rest on Saturday on all Hebrews: the second announced that this obligation had ceased, gave neither injunction nor recommendation for the observance of any other day, and explicitly authorized each individual to decide for himself whether any Sabbath day should be observed or not. The teaching of the missionaries about the duty of observing a Sunday-sabbath contradicts both parts of the book to which they appeal as an inspired and authoritative rule.

Protestant preachers of Sabbatism declare themselves shocked at the misuse of Sunday for recreation in Catholic countries; but the difference between Catholic priests and the Protestant clergy upon this point is one of degree only, not of kind. The former insist that half of Sunday shall be devoted to pious observances, just as strenuously as the latter demand the whole of it for that purpose. The fact is, both classes of priestly functionaries feel that attendance upon their services can be enforced only by the notion that duty requires the allotment of a specified weekly time to that business. So the priest tells his parishioners that the Church requires attendance at mass on Sunday morning, and the preacher tells his flock that God, in the Bible, demands their attendance on the sort of Sunday observance that he conducts. If they give up the day, they lose their congregations; and they, therefore, try to keep the day by claiming an ordinance of God for it.

In short, the objection to the missionary system, from the Free Religious stand-point, is that several of the doctrines taught by it as fundamental are untrue, and, because untrue, hurtful. The corner-stones of the Orthodox structure are crumbling under the tests applied by patient and impartial scrutiny. C. K. W.

HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. By John Richard Green, M.A. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.

It is a piece of great good fortune that we have here a History of England from its earliest beginnings down to the battle of Waterloo which is at once compact and readable and worthy to be read. Such a history we have not had before. The nearest approach to it is Knight's Pictorial History. But that, though readable and worthy to be read, is only moderately compact, containing at least twice as many words as this. And it is conceived in a quite different manner. It is "pictorial" not only in virtue of its containing many illustrations, but also in virtue of its style. It is more personal and dramatic and heroic than Mr. Green's History, which is much more profound than that, much more philosophical, much broader in its generalizations, much fuller in regard to processes of change and growth. Knight's History will not be superseded by the present work. It will still be "the delight of generous boys" and girls, and of all who have in them the heart of youth. Mr. Green's History is for the older, the more sedate, the more thoughtful. It is a book for earnest men. It will afford them much food for reflection and much ground for satisfaction.

Compact as is the present work, however,—the whole being contained in four volumes of less than five hundred pages each, printed in generous type and selling for ten dollars,—a notable consideration,—it is a matter of regret that Mr. Green's original work, his Short History of the English People, is not published in some legible form. It was there that Mr. Green's genius for condensation showed itself most admirably. Indeed, it is our impression that the average reader would bring away quite as much from the Short History as from this elaboration.

But this elaboration is still wonderfully compact. Covering the entire course of English history to 1815, it contains less printed matter than Freeman's five volumes on the Norman Conquest or Macaulay's eight volumes on the Revolution, a period of less than twenty years. For the scholar, for the persistent student of history, this work will not be sufficient. Such will go to the sources from which Mr. Green has drawn so large a measure of his strength, to Freeman's History of the Norman Conquest, to Stubbs' account of the Constitutional development, to Gardner for the reigns of James I. and Charles I. But all that is best in these Mr. Green has embodied in his own work. Another class of readers is made up of those who wish a history to be "as interesting as a novel." Mr. Green's History is hardly this, though for some of us the novels are few that could entice us from its pages. This class of readers will find what they want in Macaulay's "Whig pamphlet," in Froude's Henry Eighth and in his Elizabeth, where he is more trustworthy, in Miss Martineau's History of the Peace and Macarthy's history of Victoria's reign. But for those who desire either alone or in addition to more entertaining or more exhaustive works a history of England at once just in thought, careful in statement, noble in style and generous in spirit, the work of Mr. Green has no competitor, and it will be long before a successful one appears. This is a prophecy; but it is a safe one to make, the qualities which Mr. Green has brought to his task are so rare among the historians of the time. Careful investigators of special epochs are not lacking; but the men who have power of condensation are few indeed, or rather such as can condense without reducing their narrative to the mere skeleton of a chronology. Mr. Green has pressed his History into a small compass without pressing out its life. He has, too, an admirable sense of proportion. He seems to know intuitively how much space to give to each different epoch, person, or event. Not that his judgment is infallible in this respect. He is sometimes only sketchy, when a fuller treatment is desirable. Seldom, if ever, does he err upon the side of excess. He is the master of a style admirably adapted to his theme. It is as clear as crystal. Of fine writing, for its own sake, there is none. But ever and anon the language rises with the occasion to a subdued yet stirring eloquence.

Best of all, Mr. Green's History makes good its title. It is a history of the English people, not merely a history of battles and sieges, not merely a chronicle of court intrigues, not merely a series of biographical sketches of kings, "mostly fools," as Carlyle says of the world's total population. To an insignificant monarch, Mr. Green gives hardly more attention than to any other insignificant person. His concern with wars and battles is with the principles involved or with the results accruing. The "haunt and the main region of his song" is still the life of the people, industrial, intellectual, moral, political. His originality is not remarkable. So far as he is able to do so, he follows such great original investigators as Freeman and Stubbs and Gardiner, for whom his admiration is immense. He dedicates his work to the two former. Some of his critics have contended that his work loses in value wherever the lack of great original investigators to fall back upon obliges him to enter on the path of original investigation. It might well be; for we should hardly look for original investigation of the most commanding excellence in one who has Mr. Green's synthetic genius, his faculty for harmonious grouping and vivid presentation. But, in fact, he is hardly anywhere more instructive and impressive than in some of the later portions of his work, where he has been obliged to quarry his materials to a great extent before building them into architectural beauty. Take, for example, his account of the development of imperial England out of the insular kingdom that enthroned George III. in 1760.

One of the most admirable gifts that Mr. Green has brought to the accomplishment of his purpose is the power of entering with sympathetic appreciation into modes of thought and life of which he cannot intellectually or morally approve. He does not make our nineteenth century ideals the standard of excellence for any previous century. He recognizes that every age has its own best, and that men cannot be judged apart from their immediate environment. Nevertheless, being himself a man of progressive instincts, he is always at his best in delineating the character of a progressive movement or a progressive man.

Mr. Green has written a history of the life of England in all its various manifestations, but his own special aptitude is for literary studies; and nowhere is his book more valuable than in its delineation of the literary life of England from Cædmon and Langley and Chaucer down to the threshold of the present time. Indeed, it would be easy to abstract from his pages an admirable account of the origin and development of English Literature. There has been much discussion as to whether general causes or personal influences have contributed the most notable increments to human progress, but Mr. Green is not a partisan of either side in this debate. He has great faith in general causes, and he has equal faith in personal influence, and he is nowhere more happy than in characterizing some master-mind. His history is a gallery of portraits, which, whether they be like their subjects or not, are as life-like as can be desired.

There is cure for pessimism in such a book as this. It is an unvarnished tale, written to support no theory of progress. It records much that is painful, much that is dark and sad. The stream of progress often bends upon itself. But, taking the centuries together, the one overmastering impression is of wonderful amelioration of the conditions of existence, wonderful improvement of the average of intelligence and happiness and virtue. One cannot rise from the perusal of these pages without being glad that he inherits the result of so much patient evolution, that he is living now, and not in any of the good old times.

THE LORD'S PRAYER ANSWERED.

Our Father which art in heaven! My child, I am not only in heaven, but on earth and with and within thee.

Hallowed be thy name. Not by thy saying so, but by thy obedience to my laws, and by my doing unto thee as a loving father.

Thy kingdom come. It is already near thee,—only comprehend, appreciate, and enjoy it.

Thy will be done. It must be done, and thy will must be submissive to mine for thy own good.

Give us day by day our daily bread. Do not waste time in asking for it, but use the faculties which I have given thee, and earn thy daily bread.

And forgive us our sins, for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. Sins are caused by thy imperfections. Reason and conscience are thy monitors. Remorse punishes thee. Strive to develop reason, and thou wilt lessen thy sins and come nearer to me.

And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. A good and loving father will do no such wrong to thee. Reason, conscience, and true faith will deliver thee from evil. C. H. H.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

Concerning Organization.

On the supposition that all the friends of the Free Religious Association are imbued with missionary zeal, and wish practically to work for the spread of the principles of Free Religion, by what methods are they to work? The philosophy of Liberalism is so different from the current teaching of the pulpit, that it seems out of place and inconsistent to use the popular methods. In their estimate of character, Liberals reject many of the standards by which character is judged in the Christian Church. Prayers, graces, observing of holy days, readings of Scriptures, and partaking of sacraments are rejected by Liberals as standards by which to judge of character. And yet the production of true, manly character is the aim and object of the philosophy of true Liberalism.

In the introduction of the philosophy of Liberalism, through the public teacher, to minds wholly unacquainted with its mode of thought, what are the best methods to be used to gain the sympathy of the inquiring minds? Are the public efforts at teaching Free Religion to be confined to lectures? Is the platform to be substituted for the pulpit? If so, I fear it will greatly add to the difficulty of introducing Liberalism to the general public. Our public services will be held principally on Sunday, and the general public will relish a service on that day that partakes more of the nature of a church service than a lecture.

As the few liberal societies now in existence have each their own methods of conducting Sunday services, and as an effort seems likely to be made by those interested in Free Religion to introduce its principles into new communities, and, if possible, organize societies, it occurs to me that a discussion, through the columns of the Free Religious Index by its able and experienced writers, of the methods to be employed, would do much good. Rev. Charles Voysey, of London, attributes much of his success to the use of his Prayer-Book. Can Liberals use a service-book containing true and noble sentiments, that would serve as a substitute for the ordinary church prayers? I think they could. What hymns should we sing? It would tend to bring about a union of all liberal societies, if they could sing the same hymns and tunes. Would it not be advisable for the Free Religious Association to publish for gratuitous distribution to societies a few suitable hymns and tunes? How can we best approach the public and awaken a desire for mental and moral improvement, and teach our philosophy of life and destiny, without arousing too strongly their prejudices, is one of the practical questions that must, to a greater or less extent, trouble every missionary of Liberalism. Take from a minister of average ability his hymns, his prayers, and his Scripture readings, and he will find it difficult to conduct a service of an hour's length.

Can any helps be provided, whereby Liberals of ordinary ability and average judgment can hold Sunday services that would meet the wants of the anxious and inquiring? If such helps, consistent with individual liberty, could be devised, it would tend to develop a missionary spirit; for a strong desire exists in the minds of those who have received happiness and comfort from the philosophy of Liberalism to let others know what it is capable of doing.

To maintain Sunday services, local societies must depend mainly on the talents of their own members. What can be done to help those who are anxious to help themselves? George E. Baxter.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A colored woman got so much religion of some kind at a San Antonio (Tex.) revival that she died from the effects of the excitement.

Tacitus' Life of Agricola, with notes by Prof. W. F. Allen of the University of Wisconsin, has been published by Ginn & Heath of this city.

A clergyman of the English Church was recently inducted into the rectorship of an unwilling parish in the presence of a congregation of three people.

Anna C. Brackett, of New York, the well-known teacher and writer on education and other subjects, has been elected a member of the National Committee on Education.

Prof. Benj. Peirce, one of the oldest and most distinguished professors of Harvard University, and among the first mathematicians and physicists of the country, died at his home in Cambridge, last week.

There is trouble in the Unitarian parish at Lawrence, Mass. Among other charges against the Rev. Mr. Sanborn, the minister, it is urged that he is too much inclined to Ingersollism in his sermons, and more intimate than he should be with the great infidel.

Evidently, the Pope is inclined to believe in young blood. Rev. Michael Corrigan, D.D., Bishop of Newark, N.J., who has just been elevated by His Holiness to the dignity of an Archbishopric is but about forty years old, which is very young for so eminent a position.

Bjornson, the Norwegian poet, was tendered a public reception by the Scandinavian citizens of Boston, at Paine Hall, last Thursday eve. Among those present were Mrs. Ole Bull, and her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Thorpe, of Cambridge. Letters were read from Gov. Long, Longfellow, and others.

Frederick Douglass, we are glad to know from occasional notices that reach us, has not wholly merged in the office of a United States marshal his effective oratory. It is announced that he will deliver the oration at the State Fair of the colored people of North Carolina, this fall. Who is there whose words would be so likely to be fitly spoken on the occasion?

Prof. L. W. Mason, who went to Japan to establish a school of music for the educational department of the imperial government, is much satisfied with the progress of his labors. By actual experiment, he finds the Japanese teachers readily learn our system of musical notation. They know the Arabic numbers, and with the aid of the reed organs sent out have no difficulty in learning the system of the Mason charts.

Professor Charles E. Norton writes to the Harvard Register that the executive committee of the Archæological Institute are making arrangements for the investigation of the remains of an ancient Greek city on Turkish soil, and calling for unpaid volunteers. The work will probably begin in the coming February; and the expedition will have at its head Joseph T. Clark, with Francis H. Bacon as first assistant.

A lay essayist at the late Unitarian Conference at Saratoga, had for his theme the duty of the clergy to the people, or something to that effect. One of the duties, he thought, was to preach short sermons: yet he made his essay nearly three hours long, and then didn't read the whole of it. There are evidently some people in the world besides ministers who do not practise what they preach.—Vineland Independent.

The following account is given in the Independent of the way that the author of the Light of Asia found his wife: "Mr. Arnold was in the British Museum one day,—the day when the pictures by the old masters were allowed to be copied,—when his attention was arrested as never before by a picture of Perugino, which a beautiful young lady was copying. Irresistibly he halted, and admired the painting with her. Presently, the face of the fair woman in his eyes grew more charming than the work of Perugino; and Mr. Arnold did not rest until Miss Fanny Channing, the daughter of the Rev. W. H. Channing, of London, had become his wife. He was married in 1869, and his home life is said to have been exceptionally happy."

John Ruskin, the great English art critic and voluminous writer, must be an ardent admirer of Byron. He says of the great poet, in a recent article contributed in the Nineteenth Century: "He was the first great Englishman who felt the cruelty of war, and in its cruelty the shame. Its guilt had been known to George Fox, its folly shown practically by Penn. But the compassion of the pious world had still for the most part been shown only in keeping its stock of Barabbases unhanged, if possible; and, till Byron came, neither Kunersdorf, Eylau, nor Waterloo had taught the pity and the pride of men that

" 'The drying up a single tear has more
Of honest fame than shedding seas of gore.' "

Mr. B. F. Underwood appears to be meeting with more than his usual success in the far West this fall, if we may judge from the notices of his lectures that reach us. The Denver Republican, in an extended report of one of them, headed "Liberalism: the Popular Objections to it answered," says: "Without any excitement or advertising, save the bare announcement of his name and the subject he would speak upon, Mr. B. F. Underwood has, four times within the last two weeks, drawn to the Opera House large audiences to listen to his lectures bearing upon the subject of Liberalism. He delivered the last one last evening; and, in spite of the cold and damp, every seat in the auditorium was filled and many stood throughout the entire lecture, so great was the interest which they manifested in the subject."

PAN.

Who hears my reed-notes wild, forever more
Charm-struck he wanders from the haunts of men,
Waiting in forest dim, on lonely shore,
Until my pipings soothe his ears again.
I am the voice of deserts, and inspire
A nameless awe amid my Oread choir.

My coat of motley is the stars and seas,
The shaggy forests, flowers, and grass and streams;
My breath is tempest loud or summer breeze;
My bosom heaves beneath the moon's soft beams,
In foamy tidal waves of passion wild;
And oft my heart has Echo's voice beguiled.

I am the lord of mountains, which o'ergaze
With azure pinnacles the earth and sea;
I slumber sweetly in the noontide's blaze,
Lulled by the upland pine and murmuring bee;
Swiftly the sunset-reddened crags I climb,
Waiting the mystic night and stars sublime.

While sleep and silence hush the earth below,
And tribes of beasts and birds and men are still,
And huge Orion and Boötes glow,
The brooding night with melody I thrill.
My syrinx well may witch the poet's ears:
It breathes the music of the quivering spheres.

My shaggy beard is rays of sun and star;
My horns are flames of empyrean fire;
The dreadful Destinies my sisters are;
Apollo's self I vanquished with the lyre;
O'er shepherds, hunters, tribes of rural men,
I lordship wield, in ploughland, wood, and glen.

In pastoral Arcady, I wooed the Moon,
Till she descended through the stilly air,
While played I on my pipes a wizard tune,
Which made her deem my biform body fair:
The star-sown darkness veiled our dalliance sweet,
Hiding the ugliness of horns and feet.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 14, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

SCIENTISTS AND METAPHYSICIANS.

Within the time since the Index came under our control, there have been two gatherings of people in Massachusetts that have attracted special attention and have had for us a special interest. We refer to the Concord School of Philosophy and to the annual meeting in Boston of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. To the doings of both of these bodies, the Index has devoted considerable space. Of the School of Philosophy, Mrs. Mitchell, at our request, has given to our readers her cordial and appreciative review; though, excepting her statement, some of our friends think the Index has been disposed to belittle the Concord School, and has not treated it quite fairly. Of the work of the Scientific Association, more than one of our regular contributors has spoken at length with high appreciation; while one or two have indulged, more briefly, in respect to a portion of its proceedings, in satirical criticism.

Now these diverging utterances among our own contributors in our own columns indicate, what is doubtless true, that in the rather indefinite and vaguely bounded domain of "Free Religion" there are two quite distinct tendencies of thought, which have not yet found the philosophical bond of reconciliation. A very considerable portion of the constituency of the Free Religious movement came to the movement by the way of Transcendentalism; and a most excellent way it was as a way. Not a few have passed through that phase of thought to what seems to them a more stable position,—a philosophy capable of scientific verification; but not a few also remain in the Transcendental stage, claiming that it is not a stage or a way, but in itself a position, a stable goal of philosophy,—philosophy being to them not naturally allied with material science nor with the scientific method, but having a method and standard of its own, grounded in the human consciousness. These are intuitionalists. Then there are others who have never been Transcendentalists, and have never had much understanding or appreciation of the Transcendental philosophy, but who have come into the Free Religious movement from the side of science. They have seen their old theological beliefs fall into ruins before the advance of scientific discoveries. Science has really become the arbiter of their faith, and is quite apt to bound their faith by its own material horizon. They believe, so far as they can observe and generalize the laws of phenomena, and no farther. These persons appeal for the justification of their beliefs, as do those who have passed through Transcendentalism to a scientific basis of philosophy, not to individual consciousness, not to any metaphysically evolved standard of truth, but to the exact methods of science.

For ourselves, we believe that both of these tendencies or schools of thought, both of these classes of thinkers and workers who have broken away from the old bounds of theological authority, are needed to complete the sphere of Free Religion. By and by, possibly, when the forming period is more nearly finished and the inner philosophy of the Free Religious movement more fully develops itself, there will be a natural separation of the extremes at least of these two schools, each going to its goal of strongest attraction. And yet by that time it may happen, that all will have come so to recognize and accept the central philosophy of the movement as to find within it their natural bond of union, and a much stronger one than the merely negative bond of protest against the old theological standards of authority. But now, and for a good while to come, the two schools are to be needed for mutual criticism and correction, for suggestion and stimulus to each other, for incitement on both sides to larger horizons of thought and to a deeper sounding of its abysses. They are needed thus mutually to shape and mould the conditions for that organic fusion in a new philosophy, which is to come before Free Religion can do its perfect work.

Toward this philosophy, we believe that science will contribute its method,—applying it, without reserve, to all the problems of thought and life; and that the other side, the side of the metaphysical thinkers, will come cordially and gratefully to accept this method as offering the only hope of a solution of their problems. On the other hand, we believe that the metaphysical side is to furnish a large domain of facts (comprising, indeed, some of the most important and dominant forces in human life and history), which Science, or at least very many scientists, now look at askance, or pronounce as entirely beyond their realm, but which must be included and recognized, unless Science is to rest suicidally content with studying only half or even less than half of human experience.

Meantime, therefore, and for the purpose of smoothing the way to this desirable union in a large, sound, and effective working philosophy, the two sides should stand to each other in the attitude not only of courteous recognition, but of mutual respect and confidence; criticising each other, if need be (and need there will be, in order to bring out the truth), but doing it not in the spirit of narrow partisanship, but in the interest of larger truth. We have ourselves criticised the Concord School of Philosophy, because it seemed so studiedly, if not contemptuously, to ignore the achievements of Science and the scientific method, and so to be clinging to the vanishing shadows of past philosophers. We have also criticised the scientists, or many of them, because they so often appear to look with contempt on those who seem to them mere speculators in the realm of thought without any basis of fact, but who are nevertheless taking cognizance of another order of facts.

Sometimes, this lack of respect, this mutual show of contempt, comes, we believe, from an ignorance of or unfamiliarity with each other's dialect. To a person not specially initiated in science, however well-read he may be in general literature, there will be much scientific writing that will be as if written in an unknown language. So, too, one who has no special taste or reading in metaphysics may find the dialect of some metaphysicians almost or quite unintelligible. Though trying in a measure to keep informed of what both classes of thinkers are doing, we confess that we sometimes come across, both in scientific books and in metaphysical essays, sentences that might as well be in Choctaw for any idea they convey to our, we will not say benighted, but uninitiated mind. But we do not therefore say that there is no idea there. Sometimes, after reflection and going back to consult definitions and dictionaries, we do catch a glimpse of it. And always, when certain men speak and write, we think it may be safely taken for granted that they are not talking utter nonsense; that when, for instance, a man of note and position, like Professor Barker, speaks on problems of science, or when a man of the intelligence and practical sense in other things possessed by Professor Harris, speaks on problems of thought, they each have ideas,—ideas entirely clear to themselves, and which, however obscure to those of us not specially familiar with their use of terms, may be clear enough to those in their own province of thinking.

Our moral then is: mutual patience, respect, confidence, docility, conference,—with somewhat more of condescension to the use of simpler speech on both sides, and with great increase of aspiration toward a philosophy that shall embrace not a severed universe either of mind or of matter alone, but a whole universe of mind and matter harmoniously adjusted together.

THE Christian Union, in reply to an inquirer concerning the Buddhist legends, as to when they began and how far they obscure the real character of Buddha, attempts to distinguish between these legends and the legendary element in Christianity. It says: "These legends cannot be compared with those which grew in after ages around the name of Jesus, for the Christian myths are detected in their falsity by reference to the genuine Gospels, whose simplicity and naturalness give them a self-evidencing truth; while Buddhism has in its annals no straightforward story of Sakya-Muni. . . . One who is tempted to admit Buddha as a rival of Jesus should note the directly opposite processes by which our admiration of these characters is reached. Our appreciation of Jesus is invariably increased as we strip his life and doctrine of all the decorations of subsequent theology and ecclesiasticism, and study him as he is presented in the original Gospels. His character shines as the sun, whose glory is lessened by passing it through the mediums of human invention. On the other hand, Buddha is made attractive only as we change his record, or polish its crudities with European and even Christian philosophy. The careful reading first of the Buddhistic books and then of the books on Buddhism which are produced in Europe and America will convince one that the commentary is far more valuable than the text." The correspondent of the Union had evidently been impressed, by her recent reading, with the resemblance between the teachings and character of Jesus and those of Sakya-Muni; and her eyes were opened to the larger revelation than that which she had been taught to find in the bounds of Christianity. But the Union, contrary to all the results of the most thorough modern scholarship, would lead her mind off of this track of knowledge by setting up a fence of distinction that is purely arbitrary and fanciful. Of course, we have more materials that are strictly biographical concerning Jesus than we have concerning Buddha. And yet precisely the same process of legendary accretion and of idealization of character has gone on in both cases. It is not the Jesus of the "original Gospels," but the Jesus of the Christian consciousness of a good many centuries later, that is reverenced and worshipped to-day. Further, it is a question which even Orthodoxy now entertains, What are the "original Gospels"? for scholarship necessarily admits that the legendary began before the "Gospels" in the New Testament were written.

THE growing tendency toward freethought in this country is indicated in the organization of the Philosophical Society of Oakland, Cal., the plan and constitution of which some kind friend has sent us. Its preamble reads thus: "Being profoundly impressed with the unity and infinite value of Truth, and the detrimental effects of ignorance upon the human mind; and, believing that the right time has arrived, we propose the organization of a society whose sole motto shall be, 'What is Truth?'; its object, human improvement; and whose members, regardless of past associations, preconceived opinions, or expressed convictions, shall, in a spirit of simplicity and candor, associate for the investigation of questions pertaining to our common welfare and pertinent to the times in which we live." The officers of the society are: President, D. McLean, M.D., President California Medical College; Vice-President, Rev. L. Hamilton, pastor Independent Church, Oakland; Secretary, J. W. Mackie; Treasurer, L. C. Kelley; Chairman Executive Committee, A. Van Der Naillen, Principal School of Engineering. The meetings of the society are every Tuesday evening in the parlors of the Independent Church. The exercises consist of preliminary music or readings, a thirty minutes' address, followed by criticisms by members of the society of not more than five minutes each, the last fifteen minutes to be at the disposal of the first speaker. "It is not intended the society shall remain merely an intellectual one: it proposes to enter into correspondence with similar societies in the East, establish a kind of sodality between them all, and through coöperation (a coöperation of the best brains and the noblest hearts of the land) create a power for good, whose influence may be made to bear, at the proper time, upon all departments of human affairs, where such influence may be judged necessary."

THE great event,— the Pan-Presbyterian Council,— which has been talked of so long, with its delegates from all over the world, has closed its long session of two or three weeks, and now we breathe again. It appears to have been a union of the dry bones of old Presbyterianism and the younger blood of modern time, of a peculiarly qualified type, it is true, with a good deal more of the former than the latter. Considering how much was said of it in advance, it does not seem to have made so much of an impression as was expected. The secular press, outside of Philadelphia, as a general rule, applied a vigorous condenser to its proceedings. We suspect that the untheological and sceptically disposed intellect of our day is losing its interest in these evangelical alliances, Pan-Presbyterian no less than others. It will not be wholly strange, therefore, if this one should prove but a flash in the Orthodox pan, after all.

WE begin in this issue of the Index a series of Lesson-papers, designed for liberal Sunday-schools, on the Natural Origin and Development of Christianity. They are prepared by Mr. L. G. Janes, of Brooklyn, N.Y., whose culture well qualifies him for the work, and were intended specially for use in Mr. Chadwick's Sunday-school. But we have permission to strike off from the same types a larger edition in convenient slips, for use by any teachers who may desire them. The price will be small, though we are not able now to state exactly what. It will only cover the cost of paper and press-work. We need hardly add that these lessons will be prepared on the basis of the latest scholarship, with a view of giving an entirely natural and rational view of the advent of Christianity and the mission and character of Jesus.

THE REVISION OF THE BIBLE.

The controversy in the Woman's Journal regarding the expulsion of the beautiful and instructive story of the woman taken in adultery from the authorized text of the English Bible is quite too significant to be passed over in silence.

Mr. Blackwell contends that the committee should have retained the story on account of its moral value, and its truth to the ideal of Jesus, in spite of want of external evidence of its genuineness, and implies that the translators were influenced by their own prejudices in not doing so.

Mrs. Spencer defends the translators on the ground that their simple duty is to give the text as correctly as possible from external evidence alone, not letting their own estimate of the value or the character of the text influence them at all.

This controversy shows in a strong light the weakness of the Protestant position, which claims that the Bible is a sufficient rule for faith and practice. What is the Bible? is the first question then to be answered. And, after eighteen hundred years, the first scholars of the world are still in doubt.

Must we, poor ignorant women and others, wait until these learned bodies have decided whether this passage is or is not spurious, before we venture to lift up the fallen woman and tenderly help her to "sin no more"?

Resting on authority, the Catholic Church consistently says, there is as much need of revelation to decide the text and the interpretation thereof as for the original announcement, yet inconsistently claims that its discordant councils, where important questions have been settled even by so small a majority as one, furnish that infallible guide.

The liberal Biblical school has claimed that it is the internal evidence, and especially the character of Jesus, which establishes the truth of revelation. But here our standard is gathered from the very thing to be tried by it. This very story has been held to be one of the strongest proofs of the loftiness and beauty of the teachings of Jesus, and so of his divinity. Can we therefore reject the external evidence, and say this must be true because we believe it? Then it is our own spiritual nature which is the guide and authority, not the outward word.

But, if we accept the method of God and nature, what difficulty do we find in this dilemma? Nowhere do they give us an absolute standard, a fixed authority; but in the relation between the inner light and the outer facts lies the whole force of religious teachings.

This story, whether it be a fact or a legend, is a high-water mark of the moral sentiment on this point. Is it true that Jesus spake those noble words? We are glad, for we connect them with a name already revered and beloved. But, if another than he spake them, humanity is by so much the richer, that not he alone has risen to this height of excellence. And, if the story is only a poetic expression of thought, still in the response which it calls out in every noble and tender heart, it becomes just as much an authority and a help to us. The world will not give up this myth any more than it will that of Prometheus or of William Tell, or any other that embodies for us the heroic and eternal principles of humanity.

But the critics do us intellectually great service by the fearlessness with which they do their work; and if it is thus carried out, while it may pain some loving souls by casting doubt on what they have cherished as true, it may also bring great relief to others, to whom certain fearful sayings have seemed the very voice of God.

Nor are we obliged to accept the work of the critics as final. For ourselves, we can re-examine their judgment; and, if we find the evidence insufficient to outweigh the internal fitness of the story, we may still imagine the face of Jesus kindled with indignation and beaming with tenderness as he confronts the accusers and sustains the accused.

But, whether we let this story stand as fact or as fable, the lesson that it teaches the Christian world has not yet learned. Read from pulpits, painted in pictures, it has not been carried out in life or in legislation. Yet, if on any one doctrine I would rest for proof of the moral insight of the founder of Christianity, I would take this; and, if this be not accepted and carried into our morals, our life, our legislation, I believe that Christian civilization will perish, as have the civilizations of Assyria and Greece and Rome. "THE LIGHT OF ASIA."

The Light of Asia is giving a good deal of light to America. Who has not read this charming poem? People who five years ago had hardly heard of Lord Buddha, and could not be induced to read a prose history of the "Christ of India," are now completely fascinated with the story as sung by Edwin Arnold. And well they may be. It has set our preachers and theological professors all writing and lecturing about this wonderful man and the religion he founded, and comparing them with Jesus and Christianity. Of course, we expect to hear that Buddhism is nothing more than a "natural" religion, while Christianity is supernatural or "revealed," and that the "Light of Asia," as compared with the faith that is the "light of the world," is hardly more than a rush-light compared with the dazzling splendor of the sun, etc. But then, when Christians have arrived at that point when they are willing to hold up this heathenish rush-light side by side with the Christian Sun, they are taking their first lessons in the "comparative study of religion," and we ought to feel encouraged. One of the most candid comparisons of this kind which has lately come to our notice is from the pen of Rev. Dr. F. H. Hedge, given as a lecture in King's Chapel, Boston. What he says in commendation of the morals of Buddhism would greatly surprise good old Dr. Watts, who wrote:—

> "Were all the heathen writers joined > To make one Sacred Book,
> When once compared with thine, O Lord,
> How mean their writings look!"

On the contrary, Dr. Hedge confesses that "all the Christian virtues are inculcated" in the Bible of Buddhism. Indeed, he even admits that in some important respects the gospel of Buddhism is superior to that of Christianity. "When her ministrations of pity are contrasted with the reckless cruelties of Christian civilization, I must say that on the side of humanity the Buddhist who knows no God is kinder-hearted than the Christian who names him. Hospitals for sick and maimed animals have existed time out of mind in Buddhist land." "Again," he continues, "Buddhism stands preëminent in tolerance. It stands alone among the religions of the world. The sons of Buddha, the clergy, have never, even when they had power, used the sword as an instrument of conversion. They never instituted inquisitional tribunals or acts of faith or burning of witches. Their wide missionary efforts and their peaceful methods settle the question as to their tolerance."

After this very just and candid tribute to the superior ethics of Buddhism, we began to query why the doctor does not renounce Christianity and join himself to the disciples of Gautama Buddha. But we soon learn the reason. "Were religions," says he, "to be judged by their morality, then Buddhism would stand second to none.... But morality is not a test of religion. The real test is the vigor and joy it inspires and the lift it gives to the soul. This depends not on its morality, but on its view of the future. Here is the great difference between Christianity and Buddhism. Here we acknowledge a superiority on the side of Christianity which defies comparison. Christianity is a religion of boundless promise, Buddhism is a religion of despair. The end of Christ's mission was life, the end of Buddha's mission was the extinction of life." These striking antitheses are more admirable for their rhetoric than for any truth which they express. "Christ's mission was life"! Indeed, if we remember correctly, it was not Buddha who is reported to have said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: he that believeth not shall be damned." That is bringing "life" with a vengeance. Buddha never revealed any such life as that. "Christianity a religion of boundless promise"! Yes, but what does it promise?

Though we practise all the moral precepts of the Christian Gospels, and more, those of Buddhism also,—of temperance, tolerance, humanity,—Christianity promises us, if sceptics, a boundless future, indeed; but all that is infinitely more horrible to contemplate than anything which Nirvana of Buddhism could possibly mean. Dr. Hedge looks down into the recesses of his own religious sentiments and convictions, and there finds scraps of the first century Christianity, pure and simple, of Stoicism, intuitional Theism, and what not, and combines and idealizes them into a religion which he names "Christianity," and compares this with Buddhism. It is Hedgism, not Christianity, that is a religion of such "boundless promise." It is Hedgism, not Christianity, that inspires him with "joy" and gives a "lift" to his soul. It is unfair to compare this Hedgism, this ideal Christianity, with actual Buddhism.

But we cannot agree with him that "Buddhism is a religion of despair." That the gospel of Buddha is largely in the minor key, we admit; but so is the gospel of Jesus. Indeed, he is known as the "man of sorrows"; and his teachings, for the most part, are better adapted to a poor, unhappy, down-trodden people, like the ancient Jews, than for a free, prosperous, independent people, like modern Americans. There is for our taste too much of the ascetic in the lives of each of these great reformers, and too little of the Greek sense of joy and beauty in their teachings, and the sunshine that beamed out of old Socrates. But to say therefore that the religion of Buddha is a "religion of despair" is like saying that the religion of Jesus is a religion of "hell and damnation." We do not know just the import of the Buddhist's "Nirvana," expressed in our language.

> "Unto Nirvana, he is one with Life,
> Yet lives not. He is blest, ceasing to be.
> Om mani padme om! the dewdrop slips
> Into the shining sea!"

Of one thing, however, we may be very certain: that Nirvana is the Buddhist's ideal state. He can conceive of nothing better. It is to him as sweet a dream, as fond a hope, as bright a vision, as "heaven" is to the pious Christian. It is impossible to believe that four hundred and fifty-five millions of people should voluntarily espouse a faith which is to them what annihilation is to most Western peoples. Nirvana is to them heaven; and it is absurd to say that it is a vision of despair. But even suppose it does signify that! If it shall appear that the religion which has taught that "life is a curse," to use the Doctor's phrase, has most blessed that life to man and animals below him, that the religion which teaches that the great desideratum in life is to get rid of life has produced a completer system of morals than Christianity, we say, by all means, let us have it. We care not half so much for a religion that gives a "lift" to the soul into another world as for that religion which gives the greatest moral lift to the soul in this world.

If, on this ground, Buddhism can beat Christianity, then we count it the superior religion. We do not doubt that the "view of the future" which Christianity has held up before her devotees has inspired them with "joy" and "vigor," but neither can we doubt that the Buddhist's vision of blessed Nirvana has done as much for him. The test which the future will apply to them and to all religion is not which can picture before our imaginations the most beautiful heaven, but which can develop now and here the highest type of manhood and womanhood.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

ALTHOUGH the fate of Sir John Franklin's expedition was definitely ascertained some time ago, it has been hoped until now that the lost records might be recovered. This hope is dispelled by the return of Lieutenant Schwatka's expedition, which two years ago started in search of them; having been incited to do so by the recovery, by the captain of a whaling vessel, of a silver spoon which had once belonged to Sir John Franklin. The native, from whom the captain obtained the spoon, declared that it was taken from a deposit of the records and other property of the expedition on King William's Land, the island on which proofs of Franklin's death were discovered by McClintock's expedition in 1859. Schwatka's party appear to have learned the fate of the last remnant of the Franklin expedition. From the testimony of natives, many of whom are now grown old, ten white men were seen many years ago (thirty years) dragging a sledge and boat toward the southern end of the island. The men were very thin, and their mouths were "dry and hard and black." The next spring, a number of graves and bodies were found in and near a tent on the shore of Terror Bay; some of the bodies showing evidences of cannibalism on the part of the dying survivors, who had sawed off arms and legs. Various kinds of property were found by the natives, who gave their children the gold watches for playthings, and allowed the books and papers (including, in all probability, the precious records of the expedition) to be blown away by the winds and buried by the sands or torn up by the children. One grave was identified as that of Lieutenant John Irving, third officer of the "Terror," one of Franklin's vessels, by the finding in it of a silver medal awarded to Irving in 1820, as a mathematical prize by the Royal Naval College. Lieutenant Schwatka, whose name now becomes famous, is an officer of the United States army, a graduate of West Point, only thirty-two years of age, and was born in Oregon.

A FEW weeks ago, in a brief notice of the archæological expedition sent out to Central America by the French Government and by Mr. Lorillard of New York, we mentioned the fact that Mr. Charnay, in charge of the expedition, would send articles from time to time to the North American Review, and that we hoped to find in them some interesting or valuable information to which we could call attention. Our hopes in this regard have met with disappointment, notwithstanding the appearance of two letters from the gentleman mentioned. Either Mr. Charnay is writing under contract, and is under obligation to forward a monthly article, whether he has anything to say or not, or else, Frenchmanlike, he greatly underestimates the intelligence of the rest of the world, if he supposes that any regular reader of the North American can be satisfied with the very poor chaff he is furnishing. His last and long letter, in the October number, is a literary medley. Part of it appears to be hasty notes from his memorandum-book, tucked in as "padding," without regard to arrangement or worth. Unfortunately, moreover, there are some things in this letter well-fitted to create distrust of the reliability of anything which Mr. Charnay may hereafter write. For instance, the most learned part of the communication, that which discusses the meaning of the idol found at Chichen Itza, is not Mr. Charnay's at all, but a mutilated reproduction of a very excellent paper by Mr. Jesus Sanchez, who examined the idol at the request of the Mexican government. A correspondent of the New York World had already telegraphed a full translation of the paper of Mr. Sanchez. It appeared in the issue of September 17, and any one who has read the two translations will see at once the great inferiority of the work of Mr. Charnay compared with that of an unknown newspaper correspondent. What is worse, moreover, is the fact that no one, reading the North American Review alone, could distinguish between Mr. Charnay's work and that which originally belonged to Mr. Sanchez. Again, Mr. Charnay, criticising the Mexican historians as having "a weakness for hyperbole and amplification," says, "Thus Clavigero, my favorite author, in describing the ruins of Mitla, tells us that the columns of the grand hall were monoliths sixty feet in height, whereas they are only twelve feet. . . . How many other exaggerations like this pass unchallenged, and are accepted as true! Hence, we must believe only half, and scrutinize closely." And yet, in spite of this caution, he refers, a few pages further on, to this same Clavigero as "the most trustworthy and the most judicious of Mexican historians." The two paragraphs, taken together, make out a very bad case for Mexican historians or for Mr. Charnay. A sample of Mr. Charnay's impressions may not be out of place. Speaking of a senseless Mexican custom, he says: "It is thus that traditions are perpetuated, while not even they who hand them down know their origin. A certain intelligent man, to whom I mentioned this observation, simply replied, 'Do your French peasants who sing the mass in Latin know what they are saying?' To me, the reply seemed profound, and I was silent. The world is full of absurdities." We accept this last statement, but beg leave to suggest that the possible number of absurdities may be lessened somewhat, if the North American will suppress Mr. Charnay until he has time to write more carefully.

Professor Loomis, in the introductory lecture of the Medical Department of the University of New York, in explaining the fact of the prolongation of life in recent years and the shortening of time in the treatment of diseases, gave the following points: First, the discoveries which have given chemistry a controlling influence over all medical theories; second, the rapid progress made in chemical, microscopical, and experimental physiology; third, the increased attention paid to microscopy; fourth, the study of morbid anatomy; fifth, the new and more perfect modes of clinical study. This last was the special subject of his lecture. Among important changes in theories, brought about by the use of the microscope, he mentioned a complete revolution in the ideas previously entertained regarding vital action. "It had been based on the circulation of the blood; but it now became evident that, in animals as in plants, each integral part possesses an independent life of its own, and performs a series of actions peculiar to itself, and that the life of the body, as a whole, consists in the harmonious combination of its separate instrumental acts."

A subscriber sends us the following: "A little girl four years old, the daughter of an Orthodox friend of mine, has just been sent to Sunday-school, and, on returning one Sunday, said to her mother, 'Mamma, God is wicked,' and, on her mother's telling her it was wrong to talk that way, replied, 'Well, he is wicked, because he burned a whole city.'" How many children must have imbibed such an idea of God, through this false teaching of the Bible as an infallible book!

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Miss Jennie Collins, the founder of what is known as Boffin's Bower, an institution to befriend working-girls, is the conductor of one of the most unostentatious and useful of the philanthropies of Boston. In her tenth annual report, she gives much interesting information in respect to the class to which she is devoted. She defends them from exaggerated charges in respect to their moral character. Referring to the willingness of girls to enter upon vicious lives, she says it is very rare for a woman to deliberately take that course from inclination. On the contrary, it requires the most adroit, persevering, and persistent efforts to obtain inmates of houses of prostitution. It is but by their being overpersuaded, or drugged, or in some way violently overcome. According to Miss Collins' report, Boffin's Bower has given 3,700 free dinners during the year to girls out of employment, or who, for other reasons, were unable to procure them. The employment department has met with its usual patronage. The number of applicants for girls for the year ending May 30, 1880, was 1,370 in person or by written communication. And 1,440 have also made application for work. The receipts for the year have been $2,047, and the expenses have exactly equalled this sum. Miss Collins recommends, at the close of her report, free baths for those who have not the means to pay for them, and a private bath for those who have the money to do so.

The committee having in charge the contemplated fair in Boston, for abused and neglected children, report very encouraging prospects. Two hundred and fifty towns in the State have appointed representatives, and others are also expected to do so. There will be county as well as town tables. Various entertainments are planned for the occasion. At a meeting of the directors of the society a few days since, the general agent, Mr. Frank B. Fay, reported that during the month of September thirty-three new cases, embracing fifty-five children, and twenty-three old cases reviewed, embracing forty-five children, total one hundred children, came under the action of the society. The general agent had been appointed guardian of two children, and had petitions before the probate courts in two other cases. The society investigates cases in any part of the State without compensation. The officers of the society are R. E. Apthorp, president; George B. Dorr, treasurer; Frank B. Fay, general agent; Edwin R. Smyth, sub-agent. Office, No. 1 Pemberton Square.

Last week's Bulletin of Boston's Associated Charities shows what is done by personal visitation, and is full of profitable suggestion:—

The meetings of the Conference in Ward IV. have been held regularly during the summer, in spite of the absence of many visitors; and the office has been open every day. Looking back over the last few months, the work done is encouraging, the following being the history of some of the families visited:—

One family, consisting of a mother and several young children, was found by the visitor suffering from want of necessaries, and discouraged by failure to find work. In a short time, employment was obtained for the woman in one of the inland towns, and thither the family was sent with letters to people interested. The mother has now plenty of work, and writes very brightly. She is able to support her children, and her employers send good accounts of her work.

In another case, a man had lost employment through illness. He had partially regained his health, but was without work, was disheartened and needy. On reference to his former employer, it was found that the man was one who deserved help; and accordingly work was procured for him, which he did well. Since that time, he has supported his family entirely.

One old woman, for whom the almshouse seemed the only place, has now a home with some relatives, who were induced to take her on the understanding that the Overseers of the Poor would regularly give her a certain amount of groceries. This arrangement is better for the city as well as for the woman.

Another woman, who had been separated from her husband, and whose clothes were in pawn, was found in a state of great destitution. She now earns two dollars and a half a week, besides her board.

One family came to us with the reputation of confirmed beggars. The father had been partially crippled by an accident, and the family had been living on charity. At first, it seemed rather a hopeless case; but it has proved a very encouraging one. The man, though unfit for heavy labor, was found to possess skill in certain kinds of work; and a place was obtained, where he now earns seventy-five dollars a month.

A family of three, of whom two were unable to work, and were thought to be in consumption, was provided with better food and better sleeping arrangements. Through the kindness of the "Country Week," they were enabled to spend some time in the country; and the result of all these changes has been that both the invalids are now so much better that they are working cheerfully, and pretty much support themselves.

Beside the above-mentioned cases, employment either temporary or permanent has been found for twenty-eight other applicants; and two women, helpless on account of age, have been placed in charitable institutions.

The visitors have corresponded during the summer with the families in which they are interested, and in some cases have invited them into the country.

The Conference wishes in this report to acknowledge the kindness of the "Country Week," to which the Ward is much indebted for giving the sick and poor the pleasure and benefit of country life.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

Milwaukee, Sept. 30, 1880.

The position taken by Mr. R. C. Spencer at the recent Liberal League Congress in Chicago is a matter of much local interest—and, it must be confessed, of local pride also—to the citizens of Milwaukee.

At a meeting of the auxiliary League, held September 14, to elect delegates to the Congress, Mr. Spencer directed attention to the fact that an effort would, in all probability, be made to pledge the Liberals to the support of the Democratic party in the present canvass. He said that this would be in direct conflict with the platform of the National League, which is in harmony with that of the Republican party in regard to nationalism, and that he personally could act with the Republican party, deeming the candidate, Mr. Garfield, a liberal man, and in no sense a preacher, as had been urged against him by Liberals.

The spirit of the meeting, however, was to the effect that to associate with either party would be to make the League nothing more nor less than campaign clubs; and that the delegates should be instructed to advance the principles of the League, and recommended not to advocate the affiliation of the National League with either party, but leave Liberals to vote as they should choose, in case no nominations were made by the Congress.

This indicated a healthy tone in the Milwaukee League, as was doubtless that of many other Leagues which were represented at the Congress. The right intention of individual delegates cannot be questioned. The determination of the extremists, that the Congress should declare in favor of the repeal of the postal law, against the circulation of obscene literature, perverted, however, all other intents and purposes. The nomination of a Presidential candidate was deferred, and the vital questions upon which the League was originally organized were scarcely touched upon. A new platform, with exhaustive resolutions relating to repeal of postal laws, was drawn up and presented to the Congress. The noble struggle made by Col. R. G. Ingersoll to have these resolutions stricken out, his earnest and eloquent plea to the Congress to save the National League from destruction and disgrace, his refusal to act with the League if the resolutions were carried, and his resignation of the office of first Vice-President, and the election of a well-known spiritualist, Mrs. Juliet Severance, in his place, are now familiar facts to the readers of the Index.

The part taken by Mr. Spencer has also been widely reported by the newspaper press. In commenting upon it, the Chicago Tribune said that "this gentleman's display of nerve through the trying emergency was the most admirable feature of the Convention." At the opening of the Convention, Mr. Spencer addressed the audience with one of his characteristic speeches, tempered by his generous and truly liberal spirit, which ever is willing to accord respect to the opinions of persons who differ from him. He urged this spirit upon the League in its deliberations; said "it was not necessary to discuss theological questions to do away with the connection between Church and State; that concentration was what was wanted; that the society should not attempt more than it could accomplish."

As chairman of the committee on future work, Mr. Spencer presented a comprehensive report that covered all possible ground for liberal effort, and substantially the same as the "Demands of Liberalism" formulated in the columns of the Index for several years. This report was not acted upon until the committee on resolutions reported; and the objectionable clauses of these resolutions proved the rock on which the various conventions of the National Liberal League have been wrecked. The subsequent proceedings of the Congress were of such a disgraceful character that Mr. Spencer changed his tactics. He did not lose temper, but gave over the effort of urging the Congress to a temperate and consistent course of conduct. When called upon again to report for the committee on future work, after carefully reviewing the recent action of the League, he begged leave to report as to his own future work in connection with the liberal movement, for which he alone was responsible. The chair thereupon ruled that personal explanations were out of order in speaking upon a report of a committee.

[Our correspondent here describes in detail the proceedings in regard to Mr. Spencer's satirical resolutions and his expulsion from the League,—matters which we think have already had sufficient comment in our columns.—ED.]

The remaining hours of the two concluding sessions were devoted largely to the defence of a lady who had been arrested for being the author of a novel alleged to be obscene, and of an Iowa editor who had published it,—the defence of the latter taking the practical form of a collection for his defence before the court. The disgraceful conclusion of the Congress has been the subject of much comment. It has proved the best vindication of Mr. Abbot's attitude, and that of others who have year after year dropped out of the ranks of the National Liberal League, that could have been given. Not a few of Mr. Abbot's supporters and friends were doubtful of the necessity or the value of his vehement reiteration of views with reference to the main issue which had perverted the original objects of the Liberal League. There will be few now to say that he spoke one unnecessary word. We all stand reproved, in that we did not use the same effort he so vigorously gave to the defence of the decent side of Liberalism. The conduct of this last Congress will reflect upon every Liberal who has not with his whole strength defended decency. There is an adverse public opinion ready to fling its condemnations upon Liberalism, even when on its best behavior. Still, the very disgracefulness, becoming so apparent, may, if rightly interpreted, promote the true aims and ends of liberal effort.

The course taken by Mr. Spencer and Col. Ingersoll, after a long and persistent trial to pound a little sense into the Congress and to save it from everlasting disgrace, and the action of other members who have since withdrawn from the League, will carry conviction to the public mind that the advocacy of liberal ideas is not identical with indecency. This faction of "free-lovers" stands to-day as confessedly outside of Liberalism as of Orthodoxy. The denouément of the late Congress is the death-blow of the National Liberal League. It can henceforth be nothing but the name. A new organization will be the result, with aims too well defined to be subject to the intrusion of any element that does not take high ethical ground.

ON
The Origin and Growth of Christianity.*

I.
THE MESSIANIC DREAM.

"Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek Yahweh their God, and David their king; and shall fear Yahweh and his goodness in the latter days."—HOSEA iii., 5.

MESSIAH. (Heb. Mashiah.) The word means "the anointed of Yahweh." The form "Messias," sometimes used in the New Testament, is a Greek corruption. The Greek word "CHRIST" has a similar meaning.

No correct understanding of the life and teaching of Jesus can be obtained without some knowledge of the Messianic hope of Israel. This had its foundation in the belief of the Hebrews that they were the "Chosen People" of YAHWEH, in their faith in the Covenant between YAHWEH and Abraham. (Gen. xii., 2.)

Growth of the Messianic Idea.

The prosperous kingdom of Saul, David, and Solomon, seemed almost a fulfilment of this Covenant. Saul, anointed by Samuel as the first king, was the first to whom the title Messiah was applied. He was called "Mashiah neged," "the anointed chief."

1. The Messiah-King.

The Messianic hope first took form after the disruption of the kingdom, in the expectation of an "anointed king" of the house of David, who would restore the ancient glory of David's reign, and reunite divided Israel. In this form, the Messianic expectation was held by the older prophets. (Amos ix., 11 ff.; Hosea i., 10, 11; iii., 5; vi., 1; xiv., 1.)

Israel was to become chief among nations, judge and ruler of the world, bringer of prosperity and peace to all the earth. Hence the Messiah-King assumed the character of a Prince of Peace and Love,—the ideal of meekness and humility. (Micah iv., 1 ff.; Zech. I. ix., 1 ff.)

Questions.

Was not this early hope of Israel entirely natural? Suppose our Southern secession had been successful, and two separate governments had been established, would not many in both sections have entertained a similar hope? Do you not sometimes hear people wish that we might have a "second Washington" for our President, as they hoped for a "second David"? What is patriotism? Is it an unmixed virtue? May it not sometimes be held in excess as in the Chinese "celestial kingdom"? What do you think of the Chinese theory of patriotism? What is the tendency of "greenback" or "hard-money" theories in our own country? What of "protectionist" or "free-trade" theories? What do you think of the current prejudice against the Negro, the Irishman, or the Jew? Do you indorse Thomas Paine's sentiment: "My country is the world. My countrymen are all mankind"? Which is nobler, to live for one's self, one's family, one's country, or for mankind? (Read to the class Robert Burns' poem, "A man's a man for a' that!")

2. First Identification of the Messiah-King.

Isaiah I., writing in the 8th century B.C., was the first to connect the Messianic conception with a distinct personality. His earlier prophecies evidently refer to King Hezekiah. (Isa. vii., 14 ff.; ix., 2 ff.)

The Prophet Micah (about 720 B.C.) also refers to King Hezekiah. (Micah v., 2, 3.) Jeremiah, a century later, still expects a king of the house of David. (Jer. xxxiii., 14 ff.)

NOTE.—The Hebrew word "almah" (Isa. vii., 14), meaning "young woman," but mistranslated "virgin," when this prophecy came to be erroneously applied to Jesus, probably helped to give rise to the legend of his miraculous birth.

3. The Messianic Idea modified by the Captivity.

The Babylonian Captivity strengthens and broadens the Messianic expectation. The anticipated "good time coming" can only be brought along by the moral elevation of the whole people: this is the burden of the teaching of the great prophets of the Captivity.

In some degree, the personal expectation broadens into the conception of true and faithful Israel, the "suffering servant" of Yahweh, as the Messiah of the nations. (Jer. xxxi., 31 ff.; and the great prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah.)

NOTE A.—It should be remarked that all these earlier forms of the Messianic expectation are wholly unconnected with any idea of a life after death. No clear conception of immortality had yet entered the Hebrew consciousness.

NOTE B.—Deutero-Isaiah also identifies Cyrus as the Messiah. (Isa. xlv., 1 ff.)

General Questions.

1. Meaning of the word Messiah? 2. Its Greek equivalent? 3. What was the foundation of the Messianic expectation? 4. What title was given to Saul? Why? 5. Describe the first form of the Messianic hope? 6. In what Old Testament books do we find this conception? 7. How did the Messiah-King become "prince of peace"? 8. Who was first identified as the Messiah-King? 9. What effect had the Captivity on this idea? 10. How was the "good time coming" to be brought along? 11. What was the expectation regarding "faithful Israel"? 12. Did these hopes have reference to this or to a future life? 13. Why was Cyrus called "Messiah," and by whom?

To the Teacher:

For helps, read Knappert's Religion of Israel, c. xiv.; Savage's Talks about Jesus (lecture on the Messianic Idea); Bible for Learners; Renan's Life of Jesus; Conder's Judas Maccabæus; Rabbi Geiger's Judaism and its History: and Rabbi Schlesinger's Historical Jesus of Nazareth, c. i.

Look out the Bible references before meeting your class. Have some of them read. Induce the class to prepare the lesson, if possible. Let them ask questions as well as answer them. Encourage conversation. Think of questions outside the text. Attend the teachers' meeting regularly. This is the best preparation for your work.

To Teachers of the Younger Classes:

Adapt the lesson to your pupils by omitting such questions as those concerning the different theories of government, and those like No. 6, which require a knowledge of the Bible that they have not acquired. Simplify. Tell the story of Saul, of David's kingdom, of the Captivity. Tell about Cyrus and the Persians. Tell the stories simply and naturally as you would relate any other event.

*These lessons may be properly introduced by the study of the first two lessons of the series on "The Childhood of Jesus," by Rev. Wm. C. Gannett,—"Jesus' Native Land" and "Jesus' People."

FOREIGN.

A LARGE number of Jewish negroes have been found in Africa, near the boundary of Barbary.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN, M.P., has withdrawn his name from the list of members of the Newcastle-on-Tyne Liberal Association.

A ROYAL decree has been published in Rome, granting an amnesty to persons convicted for offences against the Italian press laws.

FIFTY-SEVEN tons of Greek marble have been delivered in London, free of all charges, by the Greek government, for the pedestal of the Byron monument.

MANY of the Norwegians are agitating for a separation from Sweden; and the Norwegian Storthing has denied the king's right to a final vote.

THE Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post says that duelling increases in the German army at a most alarming rate. Count Goltz, of the Captain-General's staff, has been killed by a brother officer in an encounter at Fulda.

THE Jesuits expelled from France are intrenching themselves in English and Spanish soil. They have established nine colleges throughout Spain. Large buildings to be used for a similar purpose have been purchased on their behalf in Wales, and others near Canterbury and other places in Great Britain.

THE Bible used by Martin Luther in making his translation has recently been discovered in a village of Bohemia. It is covered with marginal notes in his handwriting. It formerly belonged to the Royal Library at Dresden. The present possessor has been offered £750 for it by the University of Leipzig, but has refused the offer.

THE National Anti-compulsory Vaccination League held their annual conference at Birmingham on Wednesday, September 22, Mr. Hume Rothery presiding. There were about thirty delegates present. In the evening, a public meeting was held, when it was resolved to petition Parliament for the entire repeal of the Vaccination Acts.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury resumed the third quadrennial visitation of his diocese at Canterbury Cathedral on Wednesday, the 22d ult. Alluding to the conflict between science and religion, the archbishop asserted that few men of intelligence now see any inconsistency between the Mosaic records and the teachings of geological science. The Church had no fault to find with science, when reverently studied.

THIS judicial oath custom has now taken a new phase. Hitherto, it has been left to the sceptic to decline to kiss the covers of the New Testament; but the Rev. J. Watson, a Roman Catholic priest, has refused at Wandsworth to go through the osculatory form, on the ground that there ought to be a Roman Catholic translation of the Bible in every police court. Our Unitarian contemporary, the Inquirer, thinks that Mr. Watson "has reason on his side," because he may conscientiously believe that King James' version is, in "some important respects, false and misleading." Probably so; but since it is clearly impossible to have "weeded" Bibles—i.e., versions to suit all tastes and opinions—in our police courts, would it not be as well that the dictates of common-sense were attended to, and the custom of swearing abolished forever? As a guarantee for the truth of a deponent, every one knows its utter worthlessness.—Secular Review.

THE irritation of the clergy against the Burials Act seems to be increasing instead of diminishing. Wednesday's Guardian contains a page of correspondence on this subject, and most of the letters breathe the same spirit of anger, disgust, and defiance of the law. One gentleman who uses the strange signature of "A bleeding donor of land added to a churchyard" complains that at such a moment of trial the clergy should be asked "to listen to any counsel, however wholesome." Nothing will suit the occasion, it seems, but weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. Many of the correspondents are furious with Mr. Osborne Morgan for saying that the registration of burials is one of the most important duties a clergyman has to perform, and protest that no power on earth can induce them to register "non-conformist interments." Others pledge themselves not to use the burial office for persons without the communion of the Church, or dying guilty of grievous crime. Most of the writers seem to be country clergymen, wholly ignorant of the spirit of the times in which they live. If they wish to play into the hands of the enemies of ecclesiastical privilege, they cannot do better than proclaim their intention of breaking the law and insulting the consciences of those whose title to the rights of the churchyard is now as good as their own. Does Mr. Morgan, we wonder, still consider that it was worth while to sacrifice the principle of the bill for the sake of persons so petulant and unreasonable as these? We ought to add that the Guardian itself by no means assents to these most ill-considered counsels.—Pall Mall Budget.

JESTINGS.

IT is said the ordinary life of a bee is only ninety days. The end of a bee, however, is very lively.

"MARRIED.—In Chillicothe, Ohio, September 12, Herbert L. Rollingstone and Emma J. Moss. Thus does one familiar proverb receive a death-blow."

"DID you know," said a cunning Yankee to a Jew, "that they hang Jews and donkeys together in Poland?" "Indeed! then it is well that you and I are not there," replied the Jew.

"IN what condition was the Patriarch Job at the end of his life?" asked a Brooklyn Sunday-school teacher of a quiet-looking boy at the foot of the class. "Dead," calmly replied the quiet-looking boy.

THE Prince of Wales' two sons are somewhat lively. While on a sea-voyage recently, the younger was heard to exclaim, "Come, bub, tune up your fiddle and give us 'God save your old Grandmother.'"

A SCENE in a picture gallery shows a "model" in a man who serves as a model for an artist, and, in the artist's absence, explains the picture to a lady visitor. "From whom did Mr. McGlip paint that head?" "From yours obediently, Madam. I sit for the 'eds of all 'is 'oly men." "He must find you a very useful person." "Yes, Madam. I order his frames, stretch his canvas, wash his brushes, set his palette, and mix his colors. All he's got to do is to shove 'em on."

NOT many miles from New Bedford, a small company of colored brethren decided "to take up a collection." The presiding officer offered to pass the hat himself, and in order to encourage the others he put in a ten-cent piece. After the collection, during which every hand had been in the hat, the president approached the table, turned the hat upside down, and not even his own contribution dropped out. He opened his eyes in astonishment, and exclaimed: "Fo' goodness, but I'ze eben loss de ten cents I started wid!" The case called for urgent action. The presiding officer demanded the restoration of the ten-cent piece. But nobody came forward. After an impressive pause, a brother remarked, solemnly, "Dar 'pears to be a great moral lesson roun' heah somewhar."

SUBSTANTIALISM;
—OR—
PHILOSOPHY OF KNOWLEDGE.
BY JEAN STORY.

Perceiving the oneness and continuous interchangeability of substance as essence and as form, the author discards the use of the term "spirit" and "matter," and substitutes therefor the term "essential substance," whose intrinsic elasticity or vitality is alike intact, whether condensed as form or expanded as essence or spirit; all the innumerable qualities of substance being solely the result of its spacial modifications. Viewing the phenomena of nature, the only source of positive knowledge, from this new stand-point, which differs from that whence any other system has been idealized, and accepting the exact sciences as the bases of speculative science, the author claims to present for public consideration a New System of Philosophy. Unarmed by other aid than its own intrinsic merits, it has been launched upon the stormy sea of public opinion to battle single-handed for its right to a voice in the general sentiments of the age.

The book is in cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. It can be obtained first hand at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON. Price $1.50 at retail.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 565.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 17.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

I HAVE seen men die from treading water or fire, but never from treading the track of virtue. The true man will yield up his life to preserve his virtue.—Confucius.

WE honor the good spirit, the good kingdom, the good law,—all that is good. Good is the thought, good the speech, good the work, of the pure Zarathustra. —Zend-Avesta.

THREE friends man has in his life,—wealth, family, and his good actions. When in the hour of approaching death man calls on his friends to deliver him, wealth and family avail not; but his good actions respond, "Even before thou hast asked us, we have preceded thee, and have smoothed thy way."—Talmud.

PUT it out of the power of truth to give you an ill character; and, if anybody reports you not to be an honest man, let your practice give him the lie. And, to make all sure, you should resolve to live no longer than you can live honestly; for it is better to be nothing than a knave.—Marcus Antoninus.

MANY words satisfy not the mind, but a good life refresheth the soul.—Thomas à Kempis.

OUR ancestors have travelled the iron age: the golden is before us.—Bernardin de St. Pierre.

HE who indulges his sense in any excesses renders himself obnoxious to his own reason, and, to gratify the brute in him, displeases the man, and sets his two natures at variance.—Walter Scott.

THE greatest obstacle to being heroic is the doubt whether one may not be going to prove one's self a fool: the truest heroism is to resist the doubt, and the profoundest wisdom to know when it ought to be resisted and when to be obeyed.—Hawthorne.

NO HOPE so bright but is the beginning of its own fulfilment.—Emerson.

THE experience of humanity begets the conscience of humanity. The moral sentiment is not so much the product of inspiration as of transpiration. Moral truth has not been so much communicated to the world as extracted from the world. This is the guarantee of its permanence, the pledge of its indestructibility. It stands on the everlasting rock of experience; it has behind it all the past; it has been tried in the crucible of the ages.—O. B. Frothingham.

LIFE itself is our soul's guarantee, so enriched with everything for which we have invented gracious names. A beautiful and not a ghastly world, crowded with delights that besiege the portal of every sense, a bounty which no season can exhaust, nor length of years impoverish,—age cannot wither nor custom stale our feeling that we live in a great Hand, whose warmth penetrates us with confidence, and wins our blossoms forth.—John Weiss.

NO MAN is worthy to join in the search for truth who trembles at the sight of it when found. But a profound faith in the unity of all truth destroys scepticism by anticipation, and prophesies the solutions of reason.—F. E. Abbot.

PAUSE not to make the action of the hour
Rhyme with the deed which is already done:
So each be acted with one earnest power,
Wide on their different courses though they run,
Truth to a compact sheaf shall bind them round,
And from their many tones one mighty chord shall sound.
—W. W. Story.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Boston Advertiser is to change to an eight-paged quarto at the end of the year.

IN Lowell, two public schools have been closed because so many of the scholars have been removed to the Catholic parochial school.

THE Oregon Legislature has passed the amendment authorizing woman suffrage by a vote of twenty-one to nine in the Senate and thirty to twenty-seven in the House.

IT looks now as if not the man who is only a good soldier, but the man who is a good statesman also, would be the next President of the United States. But it is not well for anybody as yet to be too sure.

THE Sultan has at last yielded to the moral pressure of the English and French naval vessels on his coasts, and surrendered Dulcigno to the Montenegrins in accordance with the Berlin treaty. This may dispose of the Turkish question for a while, but does not settle it.

A DESPATCH from Ottawa, Canada, Oct. 12, says: "A pastoral in all the Roman Catholic churches of this city, forbidding parents sending their children to the model school on pain of deprivation of the sacraments. The model school is a government institution preliminary to the normal school."

IN one of the smaller New England cities, a local paper has this announcement: "Chocolate supper and Mother Goose entertainment at the Trinitarian church this evening." And this is a church that, fifteen years ago, was rigidly Calvinistic in its doctrine, and had a minister who not only preached the strictest Orthodoxy, but was a very Chesterfield in respect to all the ecclesiastical proprieties! Shades of the Puritans, what are we coming to?

A RECENT issue of the Christian Union contains a reprint of a number of advertisements from the Church Times, England, of the traffic, quite customary there, in manuscript sermons. One advertiser announces a "New Harvest Sermon: The Present Season and its Lessons." Another advertises sermons on the Sunday Gospels, Epistles, Collects, and Old Testament Lessons, and characterizes them as "sound, original, and practical." He adds that this is the eighth year he has thus served his brethren of the pulpit, and that more than five hundred of them have given voluntary testimony to the great boon it has been to them. Another advertises for sale to hard-worked clergy not only "plain and practical" manuscript sermons, but "original Orthodox." We are sorry to note that he rates the "plain and practical" at only forty shillings, while the "original Orthodox" are put at fifty shillings.

As we go to press, an Anniversary Woman's Rights Meeting is being held in Worcester. Thirty years ago this very week, the first National Convention was held in the same city. Its call was signed by nearly a hundred men and women from New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, almost every one of whom has since come to occupy conspicuous and honorable place before the public. Some of these have passed away. Others are in physical decline and have retired from active effort. But not a few of those who called the first meeting and took prominent part therein will be present at this commemorative gathering. The voices of some of the early pioneers, of some who soon joined themselves to the movement and became identified with it, and, also of the younger devotees, who have been nourished in the love of freedom and equal rights by this and kindred movements, will be heard on this occasion,—an occasion which will doubtless prove both interesting and profitable; a pleasant witness to the decisive progress thus far achieved, and an instigator to new and increasingly successful effort.

REV. THOMAS SPROUL, D.D., in an article in the Philadelphia Christian Statesman on the question, "Should Christians swear allegiance to the Government of the United States under the present Constitution?" takes ground squarely in the negative. His argument is that, since the Constitution does not expressly recognize the authority of Christ, therefore it is against Christ,—according to Christ's own statement, "He that is not with me is against me." Dr. Sproul says: "Every one who accepts Christ by faith gives himself wholly to him. This entire surrender of himself to Christ is inconsistent with membership in any national organization that does not acknowledge Christ as its King. His allegiance to Christ is absolute, and therefore to swear allegiance to a civil power that was not under allegiance to Christ would be to place himself under two conflicting obligations. The only way to avoid this is to swear allegiance to no government that is not in proper subjection to Christ." And Dr. Sproul carries this reasoning out consistently by denying the right of Christians to vote under the Constitution, since, though no oath be taken by the voter, he none the less declares his allegiance to the Constitution by the act of voting. For our part, assuming, as Dr. Sproul does assume, that there is no distinction between spiritual king and temporal king, or rather that Jesus conceived as spiritual king is thereby supreme king over all temporal kings and magistrates whatever, we think this reasoning is perfectly logical. The only escape from it is by denying in toto that Jesus is in any sense a king in temporal matters, whatever he may be in spiritual. Yet we do not believe that the average American "Christian" will be convinced by this reasoning of his own inconsistency in going to the ballot-box. He is too good a politician to sacrifice his vote to the logic of his church-covenant.

SCIENTIFIC RELIGION.

BY ALBERT L. LEUBUSCHER.

Science searches nature—for what?

For a few mathematical relations, for a dry list of facts, for statistics, for a clearer perception of forces, for a knowledge of phenomena? Is this the aim and end of science? No. She seeks to know more of the real. There is a meaning in things which we have not grasped; there is a beauty we have never seen; there are sources of joy we dream not of, of goodness and faithfulness and love we have never realized; there is a life—an ocean of existence—which even our material and intellectual eyes prophesy, that, if we search for it, we shall see widen and expand in sublimer and sublimer heights of grandeur. "An assurance that there is a reality, a beauty, a life, verily responsive to our appeals, in that with which we have to do, is the secret of her strength,—'her liver, heart, and lungs, whereby she lives.'" Science will always be on the march, the finite never reaching the Infinite; but more and more will be learned of it, rounder and nobler and more godlike will become our life.

What, stripped of its technicality, has science ascertained? The verdict of science is, that we are under illusion; that nature is not what it is to our consciousness; that the apparent and the true are different; that though, to our consciousness, nature is material, physical, inert, dead, it is not so, but is spiritual, alive, holy; that the cause of our perception of materiality, of passiveness, of inertness, is that our condition is as it is,—that we are spiritually dead. We live a coarse, material, sensational, relative existence, and call it life; but to the spiritual man, to manhood, such a life is death,—a life to material, dead things, a regard to the phenomenal, to the appearance, and not to the fact. "As rest to moving things is not rest, but motion, so life to inert things is not truly life, but deadness."

Science teaches that everywhere in nature is a wonderful, a heart-rending, and yet a joyous condition of things,—sacrifice. The individual in "the struggle for existence" is sacrificed to the species, and these again to a larger whole. Everything has to contribute its mite, its being, to the great Becoming. Life is neither a tragedy nor a comedy, but a sacrifice. Sacrifice, self-sacrifice, is the source and secret of spiritual life,—of life, in fact, since all other life is life only in seeming. Death—sensational life—is in self-seeking. Life—spiritual life—is in self-giving, self-sacrifice; is in devotion to the redemption of man, to his amelioration, to his salvation from sin and suffering; is in a willing dedication to the making man ALIVE. Life and an overwhelming joy are gained in devotedness, self-sacrifice, love, in serving, in faithfulness. With life, we gain freedom, holiness, and joy. In seeking happiness, we grow dead; in giving happiness, we grow alive,—alive to the divine. In losing all, we gain all. "Passion resisted is the source of life." Entire sacrifice of self and entire devotion to raising man to a true regard,—a regard not to the goods of life, but to goodness, to the REAL,—is not this the highest, the grandest, the noblest conception of life? Thus do we partake of the life of the Absolute, of the Divine, of God. True knowledge can only be gained by living, never by thinking. We cannot think Being, the Absolute, God: let us experience him.

This is the result of the teachings of science. It makes us know our own condition, and teaches us to have no more a regard to the phenomenal, but to the fact. We have conceived nature to be inert or physical, man to be not inert or spiritual. Science demands that we correct this natural impression. Man's defectiveness—ignorance and spiritual death—has made him believe nature to be material, physical, dead. Either the universe is defective, or man. Science proves that the perceived inertness must be ascribed to man's condition: first, by demonstrating that the phenomena are inert; and, second, that there is an essence and true being different from that which appears to us, showing that it deals only with phenomena, and not with the very essence of nature. The phenomena are the phenomena (the appearances) of something that is not inert. The fact that we feel ourselves in conscious relation to appearances, and think them realities, is only because there is not a life within us to respond to the life without. And the appearance will remain a reality to us just so long as we rely on the evidence of our senses and our intellect, accept the report they bring, and do not take into account our own defect,—defect of knowledge and of being,—which makes it appear reality. If we will but remember, in judging of anything, that the fact, the reality, may be different entirely from what it is to us, and that this difference is to be ascertained by finding out our own condition,—the attendant circumstances,—then shall we arrive at (relative) truth. "The history of human error is the taking it for granted that things are as they appear."

"'We are feeling things to be which are not: our practically true is not the very truth.' There is not the least difficulty in this. Our practically true in any large matter is continually not the true. Is not the earth practically flat? Or, again, it is the established doctrine of science, proved by overwhelming evidence, that motion once begun never comes to an end: the world is what it is, because all the motion within it never ceases. Yet practically motion continually ceases: we have consciously to do with motions, that, for the most part, come to a speedy end. Thus an unceasing motion gives us the feeling and the perception of ceasing motions; and the round earth gives us the feeling and perception of a flat one. Our 'practical,' therefore, may not be the true in any case: in fact, it is evident that in any case in which we are relatively very small, and our powers are capable of apprehending very partially, it certainly will not be the true. It is not hard, therefore, to credit that our practical world altogether (this world of 'things,' as we perceive it, or of 'matter and force,' as science represents it) is not the truly existing one, but is only the inadequate impression we receive from a world of a different order. It is a question of our capacity to perceive." *

Science declares, "There is not a physical, and a spiritual world besides; but the spiritual world, which alone IS, is physical to man, the physical being the mode in which man, by his defectiveness, perceives the spiritual. We feel a physical world to be; but that which IS is the spiritual world."

To arrive at absolute truth, to know truly, to know the FACT, the spiritual world (which the intellect can never do), we must have being, we must have life. We realize by experience: we know by living. We know being by being, not by thinking. Our present "life" has the same existence (being) that the shadow has,—not real, but relative. The Absolute, God, can only be known by being godlike: manliness, nobility, can be known only when we have the elements of manliness and nobility in us. Mathematically—that is, intellectually—we cannot know the fact of being, nor manliness, nobility, love. If the intellect cannot know, which Positivism affirms, may not manhood, God in us, know? "If that which we can conceive cannot be true, then why may not our moral powers be, in respect to truth, the guide and judge?" "We may translate all that the intellect can apprehend into moral terms; may read in it a spiritual significance; may affirm that, duly fulfilling the conditions of the case, to be the truth." For instance, is not the law of least resistance this, interpreted into moral terms: Action determined by want, giving called into operation by a need?

Science, therefore, declares that the inertness of the phenomenal is a proof of the activity of the true,—the activity of that of which the phenomena is the appearance to the senses and the intellect. The mind, being an imperfect mirror, cannot report truly, but can give only an appearance, which appearance may answer to the uses of the senses, but cannot satisfy the heart, the conscience, the man. How can that which is an appearance, a shadow, act? Therefore, that which causes us—dead men—to perceive nature as inert, physical, dead, must be in itself active, spiritual, alive. When we are alive to spiritual things, we shall perceive nature as spiritual. Another thing science declares,—the invariability of nature. But religion, the heart, raising its protest at the seeming inference of mechanical necessity, says that "invariableness is not a proof of inaction. Right action is invariable; right action is absolutely conformed to law. Why, therefore, should not the secret of nature's invariableness be not passiveness, but rightness? If invariableness implied passiveness, then God himself, who changes not, must be inert." Or, in the words of Mr. Chadwick, "The laws of nature are the methods of the divine unfoldment, the everlasting faithfulness of God." The rightness of the fact is the passiveness, the invariability of the appearance. Sensuously, we perceive law; spiritually, faithfulness. In nature, therefore, is more than we perceive: there is rightness, holiness: and freedom also, because freedom is there where is perfect obedience; and love, because love is in absolute fulfilment of law. Nature is conscious, and the apparent unconsciousness arises from our non-perception. In the unconscious things we find around us, we are dealing with an appearance, and not with what nature is.

Science thus becomes religious when it takes cognizance of man's relation to the real, to that which is not phenomenal. It is true that science consists in the study of phenomena and laws alone, and has no reference to the fact of existence; but it also teaches something of ourselves, and that our condition affects that which we perceive or conceive. It thus shows us in what relation we stand to the phenomena and to that which IS. The problem thus becomes religious. Science and religion, in the final analysis, can never be separated; the one urging the discovery of truth, of the real, of the meaning in things, of an answer to our prayers; and the other gladly accepting the task, searching, and investigating. Thus do they go hand in hand. Religion stretches its hands to the Infinite, the Absolute: science, through the phenomenal, reaches Him.

Religion, therefore, is founded on science, on knowledge. The religions of the past and the instituted religions of the present rest on tradition and dogma. They are true in so far as they have a regard for the real; but they often degenerate into a regard for the phenomenal,—ceremony and simple acceptance of dogma,—without the substance, the life. As men who, having no moral force—dignity, honor, courtesy, justice—of their own, imitate in others what they do not themselves possess,—having thus a regard to the appearance and not to the substance,—imagine that they have now acquired what they had not before, so man in his universal relations—because he has not life, the substance, the true regard—imitates, apes, what he conceives to be the spiritual life, and then thinks that his present state, his physical existence,—which is but a shadow, an appearance, a negation,—is life, is being, answers the purpose, is a true regard. A true regard is a regard to the real, to the worthy. The real is an overwhelming joy in the work of God, which is the raising of man to life,—self-giving, self-sacrifice, love, truth, honor, and fidelity, a regard to goodness. Jesus the Crucifier, whom Christianity teaches is the Christ, and Buddha the great Renunciator, who is well regarded as "The Light of Asia," are typical examples of the true life,—a life of self-sacrifice, which all men can, in their narrow circles, realize by a devotion to the amelioration of their brothers, and their redemption from death. Crucify self, and let God reign within. Be worthy.

Scientific religion builds on knowledge. As Mr. Frothingham tersely expresses it, "The Church is discredited; the Bible has been riddled by criticism; the oracles of the soul are not so confident as they were. The builder on knowledge has before him a wild, tangled, and unexplored field, which he must clear. It is an enormous task to undertake. To say that we have discharged it would be the height of folly. It is a presumption to say we have entertained it. To that presumption, we must plead guilty."

The scientist has faith in the possibilities of nature and in the possibilities of man. He says to man boldly, "You are in a world stored with knowledge: find it, and use it. You are in a world crowded with beauty: discover it, and rejoice in it. You are in a world rich with elements of well-being: make yourselves masters of them. You live in a world where there is a cure for every human ill: discover it, and apply it for yourselves; learn the nature of the evil, and the value of the remedy. In a word, the new faith believes in man,—not as he is now, a half-made, puny creature, struggling up out of bestiality, but as he may become,—in the possible man, the real man, the essential, fundamental; in the soul of humanity which is struggling with inertia and poverty in all hearts, and which has in it, if anything has, all the resources necessary for reconstructing society, and redeeming the world, has power to answer all questions that can be honestly asked, to solve all problems that are fairly submitted, to vanquish all enemies that immediately threaten,—power to extract order and good-will out of the rugged world wherever it shows itself most stubborn. The new faith believes in this, fixes its hope upon it, never takes its eye off, sees in the little child in the manger the possible man whose mature strength shall redeem society."

In brief, the attitudes of the dogmatic and the scientific faith are essentially opposite. The believer in the new faith asks, "What have you to give us?" The other asserts, "This you must receive from us." The new, the rising faith "will take its neighbor by the hand, and say, 'Tell me what you know: let me have your word of light, it is what I wait for.'"

FROM ENGLAND.

Oct. 1, 1880.

The well-known correspondent of the Christian Register spoke in a recent letter of Mr. Bradlaugh in terms which very much surprise me, and offend my sense of justice, although I regret as much as any one can that aggressive atheism prospers by means of the abilities and position of Mr. Bradlaugh. The terms of this, as it seems to me, unjust reference are as follows:—

"We have had too much of the atheistic Bradlaugh in our House of Commons. He has been given more notoriety and prominence than his rank among men naturally deserves, though no more than his crowd—ought we to say his mob?—of rough followers have enjoyed. For our own part, we should have preferred not to see a violent, and destructive and denunciatory spirit sent to take part in making laws. We believe in gentlemen. We prefer men of a wholesome and catholic temper. A man whose bias amounts to a passionate madness is not our ideal of a legislator. There does seem an incongruity in making a Mountain Jim of Colorado or a Bill Bagdale of the Sandwich Islands a peer in council with John Bright and Mr. Gladstone. It is this deep, instinctive feeling against the unsympathetic, the ungentle, and the violent man, which has united with mere bigotry to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the seat to which he seemed legally entitled. Then, too, he found himself willing to do anything for the sake of getting in. If he might not affirm, then he would swear, saying, 'For the sake of getting inside, I'll swear just like any priest or Christian.' The gods who wished to destroy Mr. Bradlaugh showed him up in this glass house."

I can't suppose that the writer of this is so little in the way of knowing what may be called the political truth in regard to Mr. Bradlaugh as to offer this account as strictly and literally true; and yet I am unwilling to ascribe to him resort to what may be termed "pulpit privilege" for saying broadly and loosely, with nose in air, what taken strictly would be untrue and unjust. There certainly is no truth whatever in the picture drawn. Mr. Bradlaugh may be a man and a character offensive in somewhat to good taste, to refinement, and to moral and spiritual sensibility. He may be, but I have seen no proof of it; and, if he is, it is out of the question entirely with England's best and wisest leaders. There is no more eminent Orthodox non-conformist in England than Dr. Allon, who said of the Bradlaugh case, "I, for one, am prepared to fight side by side with the infidel and the atheist in all the questions which compromise their civil rights as citizens." Mr. Bright took it upon himself, in the thick of the fight over the oath business, when Mr. Bradlaugh was described as "willing to do anything for the sake of getting in," to denounce as wanton outrage this view of Mr. Bradlaugh, and to indorse fully Mr. Bradlaugh's character for honesty and truthfulness. To represent Mr. Bradlaugh as saying, "I'll swear just like any priest or Christian," may do for a high moral toss of a refined nose, but taken strictly it is a shameful falsification. Mr. Gladstone truthfully and honorably repelled this view of Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct; and he threw the whole weight of his own magnificent truthfulness and sincerity into the plea that Mr. Bradlaugh had taken a perfectly honest and proper course to reach his seat, and that the House had itself made a mess of the matter and ought to recede. All that Mr. Bradlaugh said at the table of the House was that he desired to affirm as one legally entitled to do so. He made no reference to his opinions or to what he thought of the oath. This was dragged out of him against his wish and purpose. And, when it came out, there was nothing whatever to warrant the picture of the Register correspondent. Mr. Bradlaugh never represented that he could not honestly take the oath. The whole moral and legal substance of it, he said, he could take precisely as any one else would; only the theological appendix to the oath would have no meaning to him, and therefore could not be used by him except with the open and distinct protest that it was a meaningless form. The position Mr. Bradlaugh took was that he could say the meaningless words, if he must, because to him they were meaningless; protecting his own honesty by his protest, just as he could say abracadabra, if he must. But you, he said, should not compel me to this contempt of your faith. It is difficult to see how any man of honest and decent faith can submit to the form and manner of the oath taken in a British court. A filthy sixpenny Testament is kept; and to kiss this is the sacramental part of the oath, borrowed from Roman Catholic usage. The Testament is made into a cheap and nasty fetich, and anybody who has seen the oath taken would need to be very indifferent to truth to pretend that the form and manner of it are not disgusting. Yet the taking it as it is may be at any moment the only way to get to some important duty of justice and mercy. What one would like to do with the hateful relic of popery may be forbidden by the necessity of getting to a duty in the only possible way. Mr. Bradlaugh took exactly this view. He had to get to an important duty. He did not say, "I'll swear just like any priest or Christian." There could be no more gross falsification of the facts than this. He said just the contrary: that if, to get to his duty, he were forced to take the oath, he should do it, but only as an atheist and infidel, using the moral and legal substance of it as an honest and faithful affirmation, and the theological part as to him utterly meaningless. No more honest and honorable course was ever taken by anybody. The hypocrites who arraigned Mr. Bradlaugh pretended with their lying lips that if Mr. Bradlaugh had sworn and said nothing it would have been all right. Such dishonesty is the decent thing in high English circles. Mr. Bradlaugh is low and honest. He wished to make the formal oath honest by the distinctness with which, if forced to it, he would proclaim that the substance only of it had any meaning to him, and that he should use the rest only under vehement protest, as of no meaning to him. If any other man could not so do, he of course would not. But to Mr. Bradlaugh it was an honest and an imperative way of getting to his duty at the end of his twelve years' struggle to enter Parliament as a radical reformer; and common, decent justice and charity are outraged by whoever represents that Mr. Bradlaugh violated, or proposed to violate, truth and honesty to get inside Parliament. There is nothing in the whole affair so conspicuous as the perfect honesty with which Mr. Bradlaugh acted; yet, as Mr. Gladstone said, he first simply claimed to affirm, and put forward nothing offensive until he was unwarrantably forced to do so.

There is singular ignorance, if not something worse, in the representation that Mr. Bradlaugh is not a gentleman, but is the violent leader of a mob of rough followers, and that he has taken into Parliament a violent, destructive, and denunciatory spirit, and has been found an offence. There is not one jot of truth in saying, "We have had too much of the atheistic Bradlaugh in our House of Commons." Since Mr. Bradlaugh took his seat, he has not given the least sign that he is atheistic. Mr. Ashton Dilke, brother to Sir Charles Dilke, did avow in a speech in the House his freethinking opinions; but Mr. Bradlaugh has scrupulously avoided everything of the kind. He has taken part in business with great discretion, intelligence, and practical force, and has won only respect. It is a gratuitous calumny to say that he has carried into Parliament a violent, destructive, and denunciatory spirit. Even in his bitter fight for his seat, he made an immense impression by the complete success with which he kept clear of that spirit. His self-control and moderation as a member of the House are not exceeded by the best examples even. The ablest leaders of a House rich in men of great ability were cordial in acknowledging that Mr. Bradlaugh met them about his case with knowledge and ability of the first order, and I much doubt whether anything but prejudice stands in the way of Mr. Bradlaugh's gaining the position of one of the ablest and most useful members of the House. It is no mob whom he represents. He is not in Parliament as an atheist, but as a radical reformer, a Republican, who will serve the Queen honestly while she is Queen, but will, when time shall favor, move Parliament to alter the monarchy, as it has the right to do. Out of Parliament, Mr. Bradlaugh has begun to take a position which will give him popular rank among the leaders of the liberal party and the chiefs of radical reform. To compare him to Mountain Jim or Bill Bagdale is an outrage as absurd as it is unjust. Three weeks ago, a great meeting gave Mr. Bradlaugh a hearing in Sheffield on the land-reform question, a subject on which he will speak to more purpose than any of the great liberal leaders. He has since had similar meetings in Liverpool, Nottingham, Leicester, and other places. He will take in hand, as few are prepared to do, the matter of the gross corruption, behind decent appearances and loud pharisaism, which clings to the civil service of Great Britain in its upper ranks, where magnificent pickings and stealings of public money are maintained as the right of the privileged class, in the form of high pay and fat pensions. If Mr. Bradlaugh goes on as he has begun, he will have one of the first places in the kingdom for power with the mass of the people. His Life has been published, and it is confessed to be a story that does him credit.

The matter which he and Mrs. Besant fought out in the courts, very much to their prejudice, had nothing whatever in it necessarily discreditable. It was an attack on one of the most frightful evils of the brutal barbarism which has so large a place in English life. I do not know whether all due pains were taken to make the attack in the best way, but I do know that any failure of taste and delicacy here was no more than is common, and could not honestly be made evidence of evil intent; while the redress of the horrible wrong aimed at was about the most just thing possible to conceive, and the complaint against it was a shameless outcry of beastly coarseness. Mrs. Besant's treatment, especially in the taking from her of her young daughter, was from a moral point of view, and in honest truth and justice, apart from brutal law harshly administered by a judge of the Jewish persuasion, a wrong of the most monstrous character. Half of England, from top to bottom, from the Queen to the collier, is tainted with barbarism, and very often of the most brutal sort. Women especially suffer. The class for whom Mrs. Besant interested herself are an immense class, and they are great sufferers. In their rudeness and necessity there was ample excuse for not mincing matters. The men appealed to are no subjects for delicate and refined methods. And there is no possible honest fault to be found with the reform attempted. The plea that knowledge could be used for evil as well as for good was not just, nor was it honest. No honest and just plea can ever be taken against a real reform, nor against knowledge calculated to do the greatest good. The ordinary British howl for decency and delicacy comes from coarse people, who make up in clamor what they lack in culture. The loudest notes are those of the worst hypocrites. You may do anything behind the screen of decent appearances, but, if you see and scent moral rottenness, hold your nose and say nothing. To expose a nasty thing is the British unpardonable sin: to do one may be forgiven, as long as it is decently hidden. From prince to pot-boy, England is full of moral rottenness and brutal animalism; and a conspiracy of silence reigns everywhere. In many ways, the state of things pays somebody, and reform would cut off profits. Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh committed the deadly sin of attacking one of the most shameless forms of British evil without gloves or rosewater. The first rough means that was at hand they used, to do what they could. The time of just judgment will show that public opinion and judicial action, in the case, lost their heads and plunged into misjudgment and wrong.

It is a terrible business, the vast sea of evil under the surface of British society; and, if Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant had been crude fanatics, they would still have merited help rather than hostility. Mr. Bradlaugh, as a member of Parliament, bent on radical reform, has gained sympathy immensely, but not more than his cause and his character deserve. It is utterly untrue to say that fine feelings in good people helped to keep him so long out of his seat. The feeling that directed the whole fight against him was, first and foremost, a malignant desire to injure Mr. Gladstone by connecting him with "Bradlaugh." The only final effect was to rescue Mr. Bradlaugh, and bring him into a recognized position of great opportunity. The pitiful whine about gentlemen and atheists is dead. It is demonstrated that the robust liberalism of the country is not afraid to accord to an honest atheist at least as much respect as it accords to churchmen and "gentlemen" whose principles and piety are sadly doubtful.

Mr. Leslie Stephen justly declared that as an atheist Mr. Bradlaugh is exceptional only in his openness and honesty, and that his dishonest opponents "have done what lay in them to advertise the existence of a numerous body of atheists, and to make that body less afraid of public prejudice than it ever was before." Atheism has come in like a flood in England, in consequence of the heathen type of creed and church which wears here the Christian name. It is a form which reaction against intellectually false and morally pernicious faith has naturally taken, and there is nothing to do but to make the best of it until new method and new faith can recover the allegiance of honest and able and right-loving minds. If the learning of atheism is not so good as it might be, and its thought not so wise as it might be, and its feelings not of the finest, it is only because a rude and crude Christendom has made these defects inevitable. Mr. Bradlaugh will compare favorably in every respect with the average Christian combatant; and if honest atheism were treated justly, as it ought to be, no one would question his right to distinguished respect as a member of Parliament. Matthew Arnold says of England: "Our present state may be summed up thus: that we have an upper class materialized, a middle class vulgarized, a lower class brutalized." Quoting Plato, he says, "The young men of the governing class are as indifferent as the pauper to the cultivation of virtue." And he brands the clergy, in the words of Clarendon,—"clergymen, who understand the least, and take the worst measure of human affairs, of all mankind that can write and read." Under this state of things, Mr. Bradlaugh becomes a providential necessity; the great fight over him has done immense good; and any clear sense of what providence means should suggest that we are likely to have a good deal more of him before we are done. But we are not likely to have much more of the atheist. Mr. Bradlaugh keeps a conscience, and that advises him that he is sent to Parliament by orthodox as well as heterodox for political purposes. His main work now must be political, and he shows great discretion and a spirit the reverse of "passionate madness" in his political attempts. He is much cooler than Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, or Mr. Forster: he has thorough legal and political knowledge, and consummate skill and address in argument or debate; and he alone almost is a perfectly unmuzzled man, determined not to keep silence about corruption and crime in the body politic.

It is a curious fact that the Register correspondent, who puts up his nose against Mr. Bradlaugh, is himself, to use Mr. Leslie Stephen's words, "saturated to the core with the opinions which the clergy denounce as atheism and materialism." The Unitarian Herald of Manchester said the other day of a public sermon by him, "It impressed us as emptying nature of that with which modern science infinitely more than the old science shows it to be richly entreasured,—namely, divine significance; as removing the logical basis of the theistic faith and resolving it into a beautiful but vague idealization of humanity." To this uncertain theism, add disbelief in immortality, and the position is hardly one from which to throw stones at "the atheistic Bradlaugh"; and yet just this is the position of the Register correspondent, not a believer in immortality at all, and hardly half a believer in God. I reprehend nothing whatever of this type of suspended faith; but I do reprehend with some indignation the sort of high church hypocrisy with which the cultivated doubter makes faces at his thorough and masterful brother, and the inexcusable misrepresentation of the whole case, which seems to have sprung more from refined spleen than from any real knowledge or judgment. Doubt and denial are to be profoundly regretted by all who can still have ardent faith in God and hope of eternal life; but to doubters and deniers even may extend the charity that thinketh no evil, and certainly quite as much to the honest atheist as to the clerical agnostic. BISHOP MCNAMARA, of New York, does not concede any powers to the Pope that he does not possess himself. At the third anniversary of the Independent Catholic Church in that city, a few evenings since, an address, prepared by him, was read by Father O'Connor, excommunicating "the venerable Head of the Church" and warning Catholics against what was termed Italian despotism. It is evident that the Bishop intends to be even with his late spiritual superior—if he can be.

GERMAN THOUGHT FROM THE SEVEN YEARS' WAR TO GOETHE'S DEATH. Six Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, May and June, 1879. By Karl Hillebrand. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1880.

A notable sign of the times is the establishment of what may be called the International Lectureship. It recalls the time when the various universities of Europe were not obliged to be contented with the stereotyped instruction of a corps of local professors, but welcomed to their chairs the most famous scholars from abroad, and gave them audience for their most characteristic thought. Of course, the use of Latin as the common language of all scholars in the Middle Ages facilitated the interchange of professorial gifts to an immense degree. With the rise of nationalities and the cultivation of vernacular tongues, the solidarity of scholarship was much diminished. The invention of the printing-press and the translation of important books have done much to remedy the evil, but there is still room for improvement. A scholar expressing himself viva voce is a more active solvent than his printed book. He is still more fortunate, if he can speak to Englishmen and Frenchmen, and so on, in their own speech. So could not Renan in his recent English Conferences. M. Page Renouf and the writer of the book in hand have this advantage. And, though Prof. Hillebrand apologizes for his English, it impresses us as wonderfully pliant and forcible. His use of the term "rationalism" in a quite un-English sense is one of his most notable peculiarities. His opinion of "rationalism" is so contemptuous that a careless reader, skimming his book, might take him for a reactionary conservative. But his dislike of "rationalism," by which he means Voltairean disregard of the organic relations of the present with the past, is entirely consistent with his admiration of the most negative side of Kant as shown in the Critique of Pure Reason and of the criticism of Strauss and F. C. Baur, and with his desire for a religion without dogma or ritual.

A brace of articles on "Modern England" in the Nineteenth Century had recently given us a taste of Hillebrand's quality, so pungent that we approached this volume with the eagerest anticipations. It has proved all that we expected, except that the writer is too often content with exposition when we wish to hear him speaking in his own voice. If there exists anywhere else so lucid and instructive and suggestive an account of the revival of German literature in the eighteenth century, we do not know where to look for it. An introductory lecture treats of the part of England, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain in the work of modern Europe. In the second lecture, on the starting-point and first stages of modern Germany, a terrible picture is drawn of the ravages of the Thirty Years' War,—terrible and yet not exaggerated in the least degree. At the end of this war, Germany was two hundred years behind her proper stage of culture. How the seeds of thought began to swell in the bleak earth, how they timidly expanded in the chilly air,—these things are admirably told in the third lecture. Here, too, we have an account of the first of the three generations which have done almost entirely the great work of German culture,—the generation of Klopstock and Wieland and Winckelmann, of Kant, and, above all, of Lessing. The fourth lecture is styled "The Reign of Herder." The disposition in Germany at the present time is to do tardy justice to Herder, and Prof. Hillebrand's treatment is a sign of this disposition. He emphasizes Herder so much more than Goethe that the careless reader may imagine him the greater force. But here as elsewhere he is singularly judicious. He can admire and condemn the same person or persons. His treatment of the Romanticists in his closing chapter is a capital proof of this. He scourges their follies with a relish, but he has praise for all their better gifts. His account of "Young Germany" and "Little Germany" in his epilogue is all too brief, but it is to the point. The last lecture but one, on Goethe, Kant, and Schiller, is equal to the rest. Prof. Hillebrand finds in the Kant of the Critique of Pure Reason the true Kant. He takes exception to Kant's ethical position, but his criticism on this important point is exasperatingly brief. The significance of Goethe's scientific genius is rated deservedly high.

In Prof. Hillebrand's exposition, all that is best in German thought resolves itself into two ideas: organic evolution, as opposed to all mechanical theories and methods in science, politics, art, religion; and the wholeness of the individual, by which is meant the consent of the whole mind and body in all creative work, as opposed to the isolated operation of a single faculty. He has great faith in intuition therefore; but it is the intuition which implies, not that which transcends, experience.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By Jean Story. Boston: 1879.

Idealism and materialism, can they be reconciled? It is the philosophical desideratum of the age. No system has yet done it, and hence no philosophy is fully satisfactory. One school sees only soul and ideas, one only matter and laws. Yet these are bound together into an actual universe; and there must be possible an interpretation of man and nature, which will explain each without in any manner ignoring the other. Or is there some bias of mind, which produces idealism and materialism in different people, out of the same facts? Here is a book that does not attempt this problem, but which can perhaps be best described by saying it offers a solution. Many of its pages are full of idealism, but others are thoroughly materialistic. The author is a lady, and writes under an assumed name. She has made, in many ways, a suggestive book, though the problem stated is not as yet solved.

The author is a monist, and claims that matter and spirit are of the same nature. She says: "The fact that what the mind needs, when supplied, becomes mind, proves the impossibility of obtaining any definite comprehension of either body or mind, when investigated disconnectedly. Mental phenomena are essentially inseparable from physical phenomena. If inseparable phenomenally, they are correlated. Hence the popular assumption that mind and what is termed 'matter' are distinct, and are governed by distinct laws, must be false." She assumes there is a substance which has these two forms of expression; but she does not find that substance to be matter, as so many now do. Yet she is materialist enough to hold that man is of like nature with that he senses, and that "all elements" (including man) are "quantitative equivalents of substance." Substance, however, is intrinsically elastic and alive; and life is this intrinsic elasticity of substance. "Substance, whether or not its forms and motions are cognizable by human sense, is in effect what is popularly recognized as force." Force is the motive-power of substance, while substance is intrinsically homogeneous and essentially modifiable. It is because substance is homogeneous that man knows matter. The author says that what idealists call representative images of things "are their free surface-atoms, whose peculiar forms of moving are transmitted by vibrations to the essences which are continuously being forced into man's organism, as also into every other form opposed thereto; while only the less subtile are photographed upon their surfaces, the more subtile enter into and become a part of their non-objective organisms. It is thus that the atmospheric essences of things which are continuously radiating from every pore of their surfaces are continuously becoming, through the agency of light, sound, odor, sapidity, and tangibility, a part of every other thing within the range of their respective radiatory forces." These vibrations are transmuted into thoughts, because these surface radiations of things are of like nature with mind. This is surely materialism strong enough. The author goes so far as to say that "each man is what he senses, that his subjective and his objective universe are one and the same,—himself as perceived by himself." We are told that "man's physical and metaphysical growth is the same in substance, and involves the same genetic process, only the metaphysical is the repetition of the physical within itself."

Yet the author is undoubtedly an idealist, and does not accept materialism. The attributes of substance are said to be "identical with what is universally recognized as principle." "According to Plato, principle is a universal creative power within which design is inherent. In perceiving that nature's forms were ideas embodied in substance, he perceived that substance was the 'receptacle of form,' hence that the idea represented in each form was 'innate' in the form, which is identical with the perception that the principle or the design of the Architect of the universe is immanent in the substance of things. In the ultimate analysis of all the ancient theories, we glean the same central idea, that principle is archetypal." The author also "assumes that our world is a temporary matrice, whose aggregated essential germs, in becoming combined and individuated in the various types of form that subsist within it as its temporary organs, attain such motive tendencies as will secure their egress therefrom, and their ingress within, a more mature world as its temporary organs. Thus on and on, each lower condition fitting them for a higher, ad infinitum."

Universal substance, of the nature of force, but stamped with the characteristics of principles, is formed into phenomenal objects by the conditions of space and time. Here is the idea of the book. The force is ideal as well as real, and substance expresses mind as well as matter. Yet "mind and its subjective objects are substantial; otherwise, mind could not perceive the substantial, and its ideas could not be the images of substantial things." Mind is the motive tendencies of substance; but it is in all substance, and not alone to be found in man.

The book is a large one, containing nearly eight hundred pages. It deals largely with the problems of biology and evolution, describing the origin of life in a new manner, and giving a new interpretation to evolution. We cannot enter into these matters, contenting ourselves with indicating the general drift of the book. It is "based upon the perception that the emanations which are continuously radiating from the forms of substance that make up the objective universe are substantial thought-germs, whose doings, or modes of motion, within the organs of sense by which they are subjected, represent the special qualities—tangible, sapid, odorous, luminous, and sonorous—of the forms to which they are fruital."

Though following closely upon the scientific tendencies of the time, it does not adopt the mechanical theories of so many scientists, but teaches that nature is alive with thought, that everywhere ideas are imma nent in it. If the ideas of Plato or Schelling could be made substantial, we should have the main thought of this book.

The author lacks the power of clear definition, and, though adopting English terms only, neglects to tell us just what they mean. She writes with vigor, and is evidently well informed in regard to the problems with which she deals. The attempt to reduce matter and mind to one substance has been made by many, and is a favorite idea. It is more and more being accepted by thinkers as a necessary problem, yet it is beset with the most serious difficulties. The one substance becomes the source of many tangles, and one or the other of its manifestations has been lost sight of hitherto. To Emerson, matter is but the scoriæ of spirit: to Spencer, thought is but a manifestation of force. They agree in the idea of unity, that the world is not dual. Yet who can find the substance, while recognizing justly both factors? The book we have under notice gives some good hints, throws out some provokers of thought, suggests new possibilities toward a solution. That it will satisfy many minds, however, we cannot think. The book is radical in theology, dealing some sharp criticisms against the old forms of faith. It is pantheistic in its bearings, but maintains the belief in the immortality of the soul as justifiable on scientific and philosophical grounds.

THE Unitarian Review for October opens with a spirited article by Rev. S. R. Calthrop (to be continued hereafter), treating of the development, in order of time, of Israel's religion, and giving reasons for acceptance of the chronology of Kuenen, which shows the Pentateuch to have been written, not before, but after the prophetic writings. This is followed by articles on "Conduct," by Rev. George L. Chaney; on "The Sources of Religion," by Rev. James T. Bixby; on "The Philosophy of Religion," by Rev. W. M. Salter; on the "Glory of God in Concealing," by Rev. E. C. Butler; and by the "Editors' Note-Book," "Things at Home and Abroad," among which the position of women in the Methodist Church holds a prominent place, and by a "Review of Current Literature." The subjects, and the treatment of them, are more than usually interesting.

THERE has come to us, via India, a pamphlet of twenty-three pages, entitled "The Christian Religion; or, Thoughts for the Bhuddhists of Burma." By the Bishop of Rangoon. Glasgow: printed by William Munro, 81 Virginia Street, 1879." This bishop does not give his name; and, considering the character of his work, it was certainly prudent to withhold it. He does not define Christianity, but asserts that it "began with the human race," and is therefore older than Bhuddhism. To the claim of those who say, "Gautama Bhuddha lived before Jesus Christ: our religion is older than yours," the bishop says, "We reply that Christianity began with the first sins and sorrows of mankind, and that from the very first day of the human race there has been a living hope of Christ as the one personal Redeemer who should bring in salvation for the whole world." Again he says, "Christianity professes to have been a revelation of truth, which was known by degrees in historical continuity from the creation." He enumerates as belonging to Christianity the principal doctrines of Orthodoxy; and he seems to believe, and tries at any rate to make the readers of his pamphlet believe, that the historic and prophetic books of the Old Testament were written and published originally in the order in which we have them. What the bishop presents as Scriptural proof is fairly on a par with the assumptions above mentioned. In the compass of half a page there are four false quotations, represented as taken from the Books of Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Daniel, and Malachi. Who is the Bishop of Rangoon?

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A. BRONSON ALCOTT is about to start on a Western trip.

SARA BERNHARDT is on her way to this country; also Mrs. Scott-Siddons.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD and wife were in Boston last week and attended the Woman's Congress.

THOMAS HUGHES is visiting Boston this week, where he is to have one or two "receptions," and will lecture.

GEN. GONZALES has been declared President of the Republic of Mexico by a large majority of the House of Representatives.

THE Associated Charities of this city have received an interesting letter from Prof. Adler, detailing his plan for district nursing.

FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY will be one of the speakers at the anniversary meeting of the Woman's Suffrage Movement at Worcester this week.

PROF. ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, the inventor of the telephone which bears his name, is soon to deliver a course of lectures at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore.

PROF. ADLER resumed his lectures before the Society for Ethical Culture at Chickering Hall, New York, last Sunday, giving an able discourse on the Power of Association.

FANNY DAVENPORT pays twenty-four hundred dollars to Anna Dickinson for her new play, and fifty dollars a night for every performance after it has run three weeks.

REV. J. W. CHADWICK'S contribution to Harper's for November, entitled "In Western Massachusetts," gets very high praise in the notices that have appeared of the number.

GEN. GRANT had a brilliant reception in Boston last week. To what extent this applied to the speeches we are not prepared to say, as we did not hear them. It is the torch-light processions we refer to.

GARIBALDI and his son Chenotti have resigned their seats in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, giving as a reason for their action that they are unable to remain as deputies in a country where liberty is trodden underfoot.

GERALDO POLO, who claims to be an American citizen, though only eighteen years old, has returned from Havana, where he was imprisoned for alleged connection with the insurgents. He says he was kidnapped.

W. BOYD DAWKINS, Professor in the Victoria University, Manchester, Eng., and distinguished for his studies in Archæology and Anthropology, begins this week a course of twelve lectures on Primeval Man, at the Lowell Institute in this city.

JAMES STEPHENS, the founder of Fenianism, for whose person the English government offered a reward of $25,000, was discovered in New York a few days ago, destitute and starving. His immediate needs were supplied by a newspaper reporter.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES is writing letters to the London Spectator, over the pseudonym "Vacuus Viator." In speaking of his visit to Cincinnati, he says that city has done well to adopt the motto "L'audace, toujours l'audace," which is, indeed, characteristic of this country and this time.

EDWARD LEE BROWN, of Chicago, president of the American Humane Association, announces that the time for receiving models and plans in competition for the prize of five thousand dollars by the Association for the most approved cattle car has been extended until January 1, 1881.

THE Boston correspondent of the St. Paul Pioneer-Press says the Nantucket town-crier the other day announced a forthcoming sermon by Rev. Robert Collyer thus: "Robert Call-year, the Messiah, will preach at the First Church, Sunday," to the accompaniment of tremendous blasts on an old fish-horn.

REV. H. M. THOMAS, of Chicago, who has been noted for some time for his very liberal preaching, is henceforth to take his place with the heterodoxical. The Rock River Methodist Conference has been a good deal disturbed about the unsoundness of his theological views, and now request him on this account to withdraw from it.

THE funeral of Prof. Benjamin Peirce, late professor of mathematics and astronomy at Harvard College, was largely attended. An address was delivered by Rev. James Freeman Clarke. Among the pall-bearers were President Eliot, Prof. J. J. Sylvester of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, President Hill of Portland, and Dr. O. W. Holmes. Among those present were Ralph Waldo Emerson, Mayor Prince, Rev. Phillips Brooks, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, and Henry W. Longfellow.

JAMES REDPATH suddenly disappeared, a year or so ago; and the report was soon after in circulation that his mind had been temporarily disordered. It is charitable to believe from what we read of his speeches in Ireland that he can hardly yet have recovered from the affection. There is no doubt that the Irish people have been, and are still in some respects, an oppressed people. But such inflammatory and denunciatory addresses as he has of late been delivering contribute little to a wise and successful issue from the ills of their experience.

COL. INGERSOLL delivered his lecture, entitled "What Must I Do to be Saved?" on a recent Sunday in McVicker's Theatre, Chicago. The Young Men's Christian Association stationed a band at the door, and, as each one entered, handed him or her a card on which was inscribed, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." One of those who were about to enter paused and said, "That answer is sufficient: I don't care to hear any other," and walked away. A person whose decision could be thus summarily formed would not count for any more as to intelligence inside than out.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

BOHEMIAN LOVE SONG.

Flowing waters meet and kiss,
And the breezes wooing blow;
Roses, faint with passion's bliss,
In the sunlight flush and glow.

Love is in the air, the air;
And the birds, with joyous note,
Secret raptures soft declare,
Soon away, away to float.

Haste, my little maiden, haste,
With your blushes, sweet and shy:
Youth's a treasure not to waste,
As it hurries, hurries by.

Hist! she comes, so fond and true,
With her cheeks so red, so red,
Eyes of tender, melting hue,
And the dainty, drooping head.

Love is in the air, the air,
And the waves caressing flow:
Life and spring-time, oh, how fair,
While the breezes blow and blow!

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 21, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

TO THE OLD INDEX STOCKHOLDERS.

At the suggestion of Mr. F. E. Abbot, the Directors of the old Index Association, before closing its affairs, voted to send an appeal to all non-delinquent stockholders, asking them to contribute, for the publication of the Free Religious Index, the amount of the tenth annual assessment on their stock, which would have been assessed this autumn, had that old Association continued. A number of stockholders answered the appeal promptly, and either sent the cash or their pledges for the sum. This is the time of the year when the assessment would have been made; and we hereby renew the appeal. We think that generally the friends who have stood faithfully by the old Association for nine years, and made all their payments for that time, will want to square up their account by volunteering the payment of this tenth assessment. And we have hopes that even some others, who may have been delinquent perhaps for a year or more, may be moved to do the same. We begin below a new list of payments made the last week. Let it rapidly grow. We need the money, friends; and if you need the Index, or think it is needed for the cause of free, rational, and humanitarian religion, let us now have your pecuniary aid.

A CHRISTIANIZED CONSTITUTION.

We referred in a brief paragraph last week to the Convention to be held on Tuesday and Wednesday of the present week at St. Johnsbury, Vt., in the interest of the proposed amendment to the United States Constitution, so as to insert in that instrument an explicit recognition of God and of the authority of Christianity. By the time this reaches our readers, the Convention will have been held, though at this writing it is still in the future. Its proceedings, however, will probably have little immediate importance. We can readily imagine what will be the tenor of the speeches that will be made and the resolutions that will be passed.

But it is a matter of somewhat serious importance that there should be in this country an association systematically organized and steadily working for the object to promote which this meeting is held, and that this association should have on its list of officers a large number of distinguished and influential names. It is a matter of no little moment that there should be among us any considerable number of educated men in prominent public positions, who announce themselves in favor of making the United States Constitution a sectarian theological document. What the St. Johnsbury Convention may do may matter little, but the list of names signed to the call for the Convention matters much. Beside the signature of the President of the National Reform Association, Hon. Felix R. Brunot, of Pennsylvania, it has the signature of the New England Vice-Presidents of the Association, who are as follows: Rev. Julius H. Seelye, D.D., President of Amherst College; Edmund H. Bennett, LL.D., Professor of Law in Boston University; Hon. James Phelps, Judge of Supreme Court of Errors, Connecticut; Hon. Julius Rockwell, Judge of the Superior Court of Massachusetts; Hon. Joshua H. Drummond, of Portland, Me.; Rev. E. H. Webb, D.D., Rev. A. A. Miner, D.D., Rev. Dorus Clarke, D.D., Rev. Wm. R. Clark, D.D., of Boston; Hon. Thos. W. Bicknell, editor of the Journal of Education, Boston; Rev. Josiah Swett, D.D., President of Norwich University, Vermont; Rev. J. R. Herrick, D.D., South Hadley, Mass.; Rev. James P. Lane, Bristol, R.I.; Rev. Joseph Cummings, D.D., Middletown, Conn.; Rev. John S. Stone, D.D., Cambridge, Mass.; Chas. G. Nazro, Esq., Boston; Rev. Wm. Clark, D.D., Amherst, N.H.

These gentlemen have not only united in calling this Vermont Convention, but, since they are Vice-Presidents of the National Reform Association, they, with their equally distinguished associates on the lists from other States, must be assumed to be in favor of the special object of that Association, which is, as quoted last week, "to secure in the Constitution of the United States an acknowledgment of Almighty God as the source of all power and authority in civil government; of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler of Nations, and of his Revealed Will as Supreme authority." We would like to ask these gentlemen if they have seriously considered how many citizens there are in the United States—law-abiding, worthy, and useful citizens too—who cannot rationally accept the theology of this proposed amendment, and to whose consciences, if adopted, it would be a constant affront? Have they deliberately considered the purport of the language chosen? Even an amendment for the single purpose of expressing a belief in God would be antagonistic to the conscientious convictions of no inconsiderable number of good citizens, and should not be adopted. The Constitution was not made to inculcate theology, however true, but to provide equal and just government for a great people of various religious views. But the second clause of the proposed amendment expresses not only theistic belief, but contains a very decided sectarian conviction on one of the most disputed points in Christian theology. It distinctly calls "the Lord Jesus Christ the Ruler of Nations," and makes "his Revealed Will SUPREME authority,"—a statement which it seems to us impossible for any one to make who is not a strict Trinitarian. Possibly, an old-fashioned Arian might make it; but there are few such in the theological world to-day. We do not see how any modern Unitarians of any kind in any denomination—and there are several Christian sects that are Unitarian in their Christology—could speak oft he "Revealed Will" of Jesus as "supreme authority," and so place him on equality with God. Such an amendment, in fact, would be a standing offence to the consciences of a large portion of the Christian Church, not to speak of the Jews and the adherents of other faiths not Christian who may dwell among us, and the large body of unbelievers and unchurched, who, though they do not profess the theological faith of these gentlemen, have yet rights of opinion and conscience that the government which they serve is morally and legally bound to respect.

We would ask these learned gentlemen, some of whom are doctors of divinity, how they would like to see a distinct Unitarian or Free Religious statement concerning the nature of Jesus in the national Constitution. We would ask these gentlemen, some of whom are lawyers and judges, with what justice and equity they can demand that their religious opinions shall be placed in the Constitution of our common country, while the placing of them there would violate the religious convictions of hundreds of thousands of other people, who are every whit as sincere in conviction and as worthy of respect as themselves. We would ask all of these gentlemen to consider by what rules of common fairness and honor, as well as justice and equity, they can work for an amendment to the Constitution which would make it impossible for a large multitude of their fellow-citizens to take the oath to support and serve the Constitution. We would ask these gentlemen of the National Reform Association seriously to consider whether it will be for the benefit of this country so to amend the Constitution as to keep such a man as was Abraham Lincoln out of the President's chair.

THERE was one incident at the National Unitarian Conference at Saratoga that has not, so far as we have seen, excited much comment, yet has a somewhat curious significance. Among the appeals made for various educational institutions, Dr. Bellows, in his usual vigorous style, urged a new endowment of the Meadville Theological School; and he based his appeal on the ground that the school was now to be specially needed as a theological seminary "for denominational purposes," because the Cambridge Divinity School under the new interpretation of its relation to the University could no longer be considered as denominational. The new interpretation simply is that, since the Divinity School is a part of the University, which is unsectarian, its instructors should not be of one sect alone, but that, as opportunity offers through new endowments, the best scholars in their respective departments should be appointed to professors' chairs without regard to denominational relations; and, further, that the scientific method should be applied to the study of theology, as it is in the medical school to the study of medicine. And, in the appeal sent out last year for the one hundred and thirty thousand dollars of increased endowment, Dr. Bellows joined with the President and Professors in urging upon the liberal public, and chiefly the Unitarian public, the claims of the Divinity School on these grounds, maintaining that the Unitarians were the only religious body who could be expected to sustain a theological school on an undenominational and scientific basis, and whose future interests were in harmony with such a school. But it seems now that there are certain "denominational purposes" which a school so based will not supply. In other words, as some critics at the time pointed out, the Unitarian body is not yet so ready for an undenominational and scientific study of theology as the appeal for the Cambridge Divinity School claimed.

It is seldom that a man is attended to the grave by such a galaxy of scholarship as that which followed to their last resting-place the mortal remains of the late Professor Benjamin Peirce. The following appreciative and just words were spoken at the funeral service by Rev. James Freeman Clarke:

It is very seldom that a man goes away, whose place is not soon and easily filled. He may be a little wiser, a little better, a little stronger than others; but others come so near him in his special function that they soon replace him. Only occasionally can we use the poet's words, and say:—

"Nec viget quicquam Simile aut secundum."

"No one like him, no one near him."

But we must say so now. Our friend, who has left us, filled a place no one else can occupy. In that department of intelligence in which alone man seems emancipated from human liability to error, in which, with sure foot, he can advance step by step along the path of the creative mind, our brother stood among us alone. In this sphere, he was able to speak as one having authority; and who was there who could question or criticise? What a singular and strange gift was this mighty function of his intellect! It was born with him. He seemed able from the very first to read with easy facility the problems of mathematics, which others could only solve with labor. As a classmate, I remember that our teacher in mathematics, the good and strong man who has just preceded him,—George Ripley,—never ventured in the recitation-room to do more than ask one question of Peirce, and then allow him to demonstrate it in his own way, as he pleased. It is not for me, however, to speak of his accomplishment and attainment on this great line of thought. I leave the task to others, who will tell us how he has explored these regions of mystery alone, and has gone sounding along the dim and perilous ways untrodden before; how he has furnished new methods of discovery for those who shall follow him, and stated some results which thus far no critic has yet seemed able either to accept or to deny. But that which I most feel now, as I stand here with you to say our brief farewell to this noble friend and brother, is that on these cold peaks of primeval thought, where he stood alone with the eternal laws of nature, he saw no blind fences, no dead laws, but always spirit and life. His head was never divorced from his heart. While studying physical facts and methods, he was led, not toward materialism, but toward idealism. The more he became familiar with nature, the more he looked through nature up to the God of Nature. His intelligence was so large that it did not need to drop the spiritual side of the universe in its contemplation of the material order of things, but was able to hold both at the same time in its ample grasp. One-sided science and one-sided religion may be hostile, but in his soul these two were one.

It appears from another full column in the Banner of Light that Mr. Epes Sargent's scientific qualifications lie in "the science of transcendental physics, or psycho-physical phenomena." Ah, yes, now we see! Strange we did not think of it before. Of course, that settles it; and the point needs no farther discussion. But, since we remember no paper on this branch among the three hundred or so essays presented at the recent meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, we commend the oversight to the future attention of that scientific body.

The Lessons for Liberal Sunday-schools or for any young people, on "The Origin and Growth of Christianity," prepared by Mr. Janes of Brooklyn, and now being printed in our columns, are each week struck off in a neat four-page sheet, convenient for use, and can be obtained at the office of the Index at the rate of one cent apiece. Applicants by mail must include postage.

WOMEN'S CONGRESS.

As before announced, the Eighth Congress of Women was held in this city last week. The new Meionaon was well filled with earnest and cultivated women, with an occasional member of the other sex as an attentive and interested listener. The sessions continued three days. The mornings were devoted to private business, the afternoons and evenings to essays and discussions. The topics of the papers and their authors were as follows: "Coöperation," by Mrs. Imogen C. Fales, of Brooklyn, N.Y. (read, in her absence, by Miss Alice C. Fletcher, of New York); "Woman's Work in Society," by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe; "Scholarships for Women," by Prof. Rachel C. Bodley, dean of the Women's Medical College, Philadelphia; "Need of Women Physicians in Asylums for the Insane," by Lelia G. Bedell, M.D., Chicago; "Woman's Work in the Laboratory," by Prof. Ellen H. Richards; "Representation of Women upon Boards of Charities supported by Taxation," by Mrs. M. E. B. Lynde, Wisconsin; "Legal Position of Married Women," by Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Massachusetts; "Opportunities for Women's Work in the Southern States," by Mrs. Virginia Mermie, Louisiana; "Festivals, their Power as a Means of Moral Culture," by Mrs. Mary N. Adams, Iowa (read by Miss Mary F. Eastman, Massachusetts); "Physical Culture in the Home," by Mary J. Safford, M.D., Massachusetts; "Aids in Education and Research," by Prof. Maria Mitchell, New York (read by Miss Abby W. May); "Farmers' Wives," by Mrs. C. D. B. Colby, Nebraska. A glance at the above list of subjects shows at once the breadth and comprehensiveness of the outlook taken, while a hearing of the papers was instant evidence of the earnestness and ability of those engaged in directing it. Some of the essays were quite general in the treatment of their themes, characterized by a forecasting vision of future attainment rather than a grasping of present agencies for immediate and tentative results; while others were more marked by practical and explicit demands and proposed measures. The discussions following the various papers, which were participated in generally by most of those named above, and also by such well-known and able women as Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Mrs. Mary Livermore, Mrs. Fanny B. Ames, Miss Abby May, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Mrs. Elizabeth Boynton Herbert, Mrs. Mary Wright Thompson, Miss Ada C. Bowles, Mrs. Martha Lowe, and others, very finely supplemented whatever was wanting in directness and specific application to present conditions, and set forth whatever corresponding, modifying, or counteracting agencies were necessary to be recognized to do full justice to the themes. The address of the President, Mrs. Kate L. Doggett, of Chicago, on the last evening of the session, was upon the necessary measures for securing "Woman's Equality before the Law." The Congress has furnished another evidence of the possibilities of woman and prophecy of their eventual realization. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe was elected President and Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells Secretary for the ensuing year, with a large board of Vice-Presidents and Directors from different parts of the country. The members of the Congress were the recipients of courteous attentions from Gov. Long, Mayor Prince, Mrs. Wells, and the Artists' Guild. On Monday of this week, they visited the Women's Prison at Sherborn. F. H.

SOME LESSONS OF THE "WOMAN'S CONGRESS."

No one who attended the sessions of the "Woman's Congress," held lately in Boston, could fail to catch therefrom unmistakable indices of a new order of things for womanhood in general; and no one with the real interest of the sex at heart could fail to be cheered, encouraged, delighted, at those indications.

At every session of the three days on which the Congress was held, a large, orderly, and remarkably intelligent-looking audience met to listen, with critical, discriminating interest, to the essays written and read by members of the Congress.

Although I am no believer in the separation of the sexes, yet I confess myself glad that in all these proceedings, so orderly, so calm, so thoughtful and thought-inspiring, there were none but women who took part in the proceedings. Not a man's voice was heard throughout, and it is tolerably certain that no masculine counsel was asked or accepted. I was glad of this, because it is so often said that women cannot do any public work without invoking the aid and judgment of the more capable male sex; but these meetings must have carried the conviction to the minds of the few men and many women present that woman is capable of doing well many things for which her capacity has been questioned, and, granted her liberty and a certain probation of experience, will be sure to do many other things in regard to which her ability is still doubted, and do them as well.

We recognize the truthfulness of the homely old aphorism that we "must creep before we can walk"; and so, when any partial failures are made by her in any new and comparatively untried sphere, it is unfair to predicate her utter unfitness for that work, because of these first abortive attempts. The gist of most of the essays written by women for women, and read before the Congress, was to encourage these attempts at new but permissible and possible vocations for those who are now among the "anxious and aimless." Of those essays, one very creditable thing must be remarked. Our sex is accused by men of being altogether too emotional and illogical; yet I venture to assert that no similar series of essays written by men, for men only, could be more calm and philosophical in tone or more logical in method than were these. There was in all the proceedings a delightful absence of all rant, over-done sentimentality, and emotional rhetoric. The papers read were on practical subjects, pertinent to women, and viewed from a practical standpoint; and the discussion on each was carried on with a degree of thoughtful, sincere earnestness of which women are often deemed incapable. No male president of any association could preside in a more dignified or firm manner than did Mrs. Doggett; and in no assemblage of men could the rules and regulations which govern such meetings be carried out with more strictness or with a better understanding.

Although I am not among those who are sanguine enough to believe that with the advent of women into public life and affairs the millennium will be sure to come, I gratefully see strong evidence in the attitude taken by the women of this Congress, and as well by hundreds of women outside of it, that the new responsibilities they have assumed are giving to their characters a power, a steadiness, an equipoise, in which the womanly nature has hitherto been deficient. And this new strength and purpose in the characters of these tend to strengthen womanhood everywhere. The Woman's Congress of America is not yet a body that fills a large space in public recognition of its worth and works: indeed, I am sorry to say that I myself knew nothing of the organization before attending these meetings; but such annual meetings as these, held in large cities and attracting crowds of thoughtful women, are sure to have a radiating, ever-widening influence upon the minds of all womenkind. I took my place every day among women who were strangers to me. At every session there were ever new faces surrounding me; and I had thus opportunity to mark the deep, heartfelt interest and thorough appreciation of the work of the Congress felt by "outsiders," and it was a source of great satisfaction and gratification to me to observe the intelligent criticism and appreciative applause of those around me. Some of the "whisperings," of which the President justly complained, were as replete with interest to an eavesdropper like myself as anything from the speaker's platform; for they were "straws" which showed how strong the current was flowing in the right direction, proving the almost general interest now taken by women in their own advancement and enfranchisement.

It would perhaps be a help in the work to which the Congress is devoted, if its members took means to let it be more widely known what the scope and tendency of that work are. It would be well if its most active members found means to make its work and methods mentioned oftener in the daily newspapers, so as to awaken among women everywhere an interest in its noble mission. TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

As the name of Florence Liberal League is published in the list of auxiliaries of the National Liberal League, it becomes necessary to say that the charter of the Florence League was surrendered last May to the secretary of the National Liberal League, with a notification to strike off the Florence League from the books. The charter and notification were sent by registered mail, and their receipt was duly acknowledged by the secretary. The Florence League withdrew from the National Liberal League, after the division at Syracuse, and became an auxiliary of the National Liberal League of America, now the American Liberal Union. SETH HUNT, Pres't F.L.U.

NORTHAMPTON, Oct. 9, 1880.

[We have reason to believe that the above is not the sole instance where a local league or the name of an officer has been retained, in spite of withdrawal and protest, on the lists of the National Liberal League. If Mr. Hunt's communication does not have the effect to stir up the managers of the National League to an act of common honesty, it is to be hoped that it may lead other local leagues or individuals, whose rights have been thus abused, publicly to define their position.—ED.]

CHURCH TAXATION.

Editor Free Religious Index:—

Will you allow me to say a word, through your columns, to your New York State readers on the subject of church taxation? I have had printed, and will furnish on application, blank petitions to the New York Legislature for the taxation of church property, clergymen, and priests. A very good time to get signatures to these petitions will be Presidential election day. There should be some one present with one of these petitions at every polling-place in the State. In this way, we can have a number of thousand names to send into the Legislature the first days of the session. And allow me to request the vice-presidents of the New York State Freethinkers' Association of the various counties of the State to see to it that on election day a suitable person is on hand in each election district to attend to this business.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE British Association for the Advancement of Science met at Swansea at the same time that ours was in session at Boston. Neither country has any reason to be ashamed of the year's record of the work of its scientific men, so far as that record is contained in the proceedings of the two associations; nor need either country dread a comparison between the proceedings of the two associations. Any American, who has had occasion recently to look through the scientific publications of England, must have been surprised at the frequency with which the names of our scientific men appear there, and must have been highly gratified, moreover, at the unstinted praise which the work of our best men continually receives. Human nature is human nature, and scientific men may not always, therefore, be exempt from rivalries and prejudices; but they appear to be reduced to a minimum just now, and the cordial co-operation and appreciation existing between the scientific men of the two countries is producing happy results. Sir John Lubbock was chosen President of the British Association for next year.

ALTHOUGH no single paper read before the British Association announced any such brilliant discovery as that of Professor Bell before the American Association, there appear to have been more papers read, at the former, containing the results of patient and thorough investigation in special departments of science. We may mention those of Dr. Sorby in the geological section, Dr. Günther on the subject of museums, Professor Balfour (a very interesting paper on embryology), and Dr. Rudler in various departments of the biological section, Prof. Grylls Adams in the section of mathematics, and Dr. Gilbert on agricultural chemistry. Mr. Seebohm gave an evening lecture on the North-East Passage, Prof. Boyd Dawkins on Primeval Man, and Mr. F. Galton on Mental Imagery. These three lectures were of popular interest. Other papers presented, we have not yet seen or found time to read. "Mr. Galton's lecture," says Nature, "was illustrated by diagrams of some of the singular generic photographs with which he has identified his name; great amusement being evoked by the exhibition of the face of a 'generalized' Welsh dissenting minister, compounded from photographs of sundry non-conformist divines of Swansea."

THE inaugural address of the President of the Association, Prof. A. C. Ramsay, Director-General of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom, was a very clear presentation of some of the facts which have led geologists to reject the old theories regarding catastrophes and cataclysms. It was entitled "On the Recurrence of certain Phenomena in Geological Time," and in it Professor Ramsay showed: (1) That the phenomena of the metamorphosis of strata, clearly discernible in the oldest Laurentian rocks, continued from that time down to and including the formation of part of the Eocene strata; (2) that volcanic rocks have been ejected in all times from Silurian to Pliocene, and that there is no reason to suppose that volcanic forces ever played a more important part in any period of geological time than they do now; (3) that mountain-chains existed before the deposition of the Silurian rocks, that the Ural mountains were upheaved before the deposition of the Permian beds, and the last great upheaval of the Alleghanies was subsequent to the formation of the Carboniferous strata of that region, while the Alps, Himálayas, etc., underwent their chief upheavals after the deposit of the Eocene strata or even after the close of the Miocene period; (4) that salt-beds have been deposited through all time, from the Silurian to the present; (5) that, in like manner, fresh water and estuarine conditions are found in different regions through all ages; and (6), last, that glacial phenomena are not confined to the period known, distinctively, as the Glacial epoch, but began with the Cambrian, and occurred somewhere at intervals in various formations down to the present time. There has thus been a constant recurrence of all the principal geological phenomena in every age. His conclusion was that, "from the Laurentian epoch down to the present day, all the physical events in the history of the earth have varied neither in kind nor in intensity from those of which we now have experience."

A CHIEF feature of the British Association is the report of committees appointed to investigate special subjects in the various sections. Some of the reports reach no definite conclusion. Others are too technical to be of general interest. We append, without reference to systematic arrangement, some facts or inferences resulting from the work of these committees: A good gas-burner must regulate the supply of air and control the pressure, the maximum amount of light depending upon the correct relation of these two factors.——The rate of increase of underground temperature downwards is very slow for all distances thus far reached.——Erratic blocks, carefully studied, may throw light on many difficult problems of glacial geology.——Some Irish caves, supposed to contain ancient remains, contain only recent remains.——Various specific forms of Carboniferous Polyzoa have been relegated to their precise genera by Mr. W. G. R. Vine.——Four volumes of the Geological Record have been published. Each contains an abstract of all the geological work done throughout the world for one year, and the average number of entries is twenty thousand and two hundred in each volume.——Work in Kent's Cavern, which has been carried on for sixteen years, was suspended June 19, the number of finds having greatly decreased.——The teaching of scientific subjects in the elementary schools of Great Britain is practically discouraged, because of the incapacity of the school inspectors.——Very definite relations seem to be established between extremes of rainfall or temperature in any month or season and the weather of the month or season next following.——The conductivity of lightning-conductors is not increased by the additional surface of flat and tubular conductors. Conductors sometimes fail because made of very inferior copper, or because they do not terminate in water or in some good conductor below the surface of the ground.——Electric currents cannot originate in the ether such disturbances as those of light.——The best form of magnets for magneto-machines is circular.——Ink may be identified, in cases of forgery, etc., by colored reactions with various reagents.——Some soils need an artificial supply of magnesia.——Most oils attack copper and iron.——Large detached blocks of stone have been found in the English Channel.——The site of a Palæolithic implement manufactory has been discovered at Crayford, Kent.——As the climate grew colder in Pliocene times, the Miocene mammals migrated southwards.——Coast-lines may be the result of slips along the lines of weakness produced by earthquakes.——Eozoon Canadense is of organic nature, not of the mineral kingdom as some have supposed.——Pre-Cambrian rocks have been found in the Harlech Mountains.——The formation of stalagmite in caves is variable in rate, and sometimes very swift.——South-west Europe was submerged during the early human period, and palæolithic man and many of the older animals destroyed. R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Inebriety and its Cure.

Modern medical science makes careful discrimination among the various forms of intemperance. Considering drunkenness as the general term denoting the excessive use of stimulants, it applies the word inebriety to habitual and confirmed drunkenness; dipsomania (literally a craze for drink), to the periodical and irresistible impulse to intoxication; and chronic alcoholism to the physical, mental, and moral deterioration and decay which long indulgence produces in the human system. Certain specialists have, within a few years, given the subject their serious study and painstaking investigation. They have had some peculiar advantages for the pursuit of their inquiry. These were furnished them, and indeed the inquiry itself instigated, or at least greatly stimulated, by the existence of institutions established for the cure of drunkenness. The State Inebriate Asylum at Binghamton, N.Y., was incorporated in 1857, but did not go into operation for some time afterward. Earliest in working order was the Washingtonian Home in Boston, which, since its establishment in November of the same year, has maintained a steady growth and activity. Subsequently, some twenty or more institutions, known as homes, asylums, or by some similar title, sprung into existence in different parts of the country, and as many more in Great Britain and on the Continent. Some of these, through mismanagement or lack of support, have been discontinued; while those remaining carry on the work with zeal and such efficiency as the means placed in their hands enable them to command. Most of these are private establishments, built by funds contributed for the purpose, and sustained mostly by the payments of their inmates, whose coming and going are perfectly voluntary. A few are public institutions, founded and supported by the State, and made subject to laws regulating the commitment and continuance of patients.

The fundamental principle on which these establishments are based is that inebriety is an abnormal, disordered, diseased condition, requiring combined mental and moral treatment. By medical treatment is not meant merely the administration of drugs; certainly not of any specific, warranted to cure the craving for stimulants. The existence of any such panacea for the utter destruction of the appetite is scouted. What is meant is, rather, that comprehensive physiological treatment that uses medicines as they may be specially indicated, and all hygienic appliances that may be useful in restoring and strengthening the physical powers and functions, as the groundwork for the subsequent moral influence. That moral treatment consists in bringing all healthy intellectual, emotional, and spiritual forces into play to enlighten the mind, to impress the heart, to elevate the purpose, and to inspire the will; in a word, to bring forth the man out of the ruins of his humanity. The means relied upon are various: withdrawal for a time from accustomed associations; rest of body and mind from work and care; employment in fresh directions, sometimes of the hands, but especially of the thoughts, by reading, conversation, and general personal watchfulness over, kindly and respectful interest in, each individual by the officers of the institution; sympathy of patients with each other, so guided as to become co-operative effort for the good of all; stated chapel or parlor meetings, for such speaking, music, devotion, as are specially adapted to instruct, encourage, and strengthen; the discipline that comes of subjection to the general rules of the institution and compliance with the specific requirements of its directors; absolute restraint from all access to spirituous or alcoholic drinks.

The results of this method of treating the inebriate are not such as can be set forth in exact statistics. It is not possible, at least it would be very difficult, to follow each case after leaving the home through all the years of life. But many have kept up their communication with its officers, and voluntarily, or in answer to inquiries, reported their condition. Dr. Albert Day, Superintendent of the Washingtonian Home in Boston, which during the twenty-three years of its existence has treated over six thousand patients, coming from all parts of the country and from abroad, declared in a paper on the Curability of Inebriety, published two years ago, that he had at that time received more than a thousand letters from former patients, testifying to the benefit experienced. From several of these, he quotes statements to the effect that, though the appetite for stimulants had not been destroyed, their residence in the home and the influence thence received had strengthened them to resist its demands. Similar statements come from the superintendents of other institutions. The general opinion was affirmed by one of the ablest and most experienced among them, that not less than one-third of those treated might be safely claimed to be thoroughly cured. Besides those entirely reclaimed, many of the rest are to a greater or less extent benefited by their treatment. They are enabled to maintain their sobriety for a longer period and give way to fits of drunkenness at much rarer intervals. The friends of these institutions claim for them, and probably with good reason, that, putting their records side by side with those of general hospitals and asylums for the insane, they need not fear comparison in the least. In all there are thorough cures. In all there are cases of relapse, through the carelessness of the individual in exposing himself to the same influences that before caused his sickness, his insanity, or his inebriety. And in all there are incurables, whose condition can be alleviated only, and may perhaps need permanent restraint. The same results that justify the maintenance of hospitals for the sick and retreats for the insane equally vindicate the policy of asylums and homes for the inebriate, specially adapted, in their arrangement and methods, to the needs of their patients, as are the other institutions named to the necessities of theirs.

To a far-reaching vision, it may be, however, that the most valuable result of these institutions will be found in the special study of drunkenness, to which they have given rise. Ten years ago, professional interest in these establishments led to the organization of the American Association for the Cure of Inebriety. This was composed of the superintendents and other officers of the various homes and asylums for inebriates. Its purpose was declared to be "to study the disease of inebriety, to discuss its proper treatment, and to endeavor to bring about a coöperative public sentiment and jurisprudence." It has held annual meetings, at which papers have been read on all the various phases of the subject, giving the results of patient investigation, deep thought, and earnest study. In its declaration of principles are these affirmations, which in the words of the editor of the Journal of Inebriety for September, 1878, "have stood the adverse criticism of nine years, and the practical test in over forty asylums in this country and Europe":

"Intemperance is a disease. It is curable in the same sense as other diseases are.

"Its primary cause is a constitutional susceptibility to the alcoholic impression. This constitutional tendency may be inherited or acquired.

"All methods hitherto employed having proved insufficient for the cure of inebriates, the establishment of asylums for such a purpose is the great demand of the age. Every large city should have its local or temporary home for inebriates, and every State one or more asylums for the treatment and care of such persons. The law should recognize intemperance as a disease, and provide other means for its management than fines, station-houses, and jails."

These principles have been repeatedly reaffirmed and discussed in all their bearings. They have been misunderstood and misrepresented. They have been controverted and decried. But they have come forth more and more clearly out of the clouds of misconception and the storms of abuse. Involved in these statements are certain conclusions, giving practical direction to effort. Intemperance is not a sin to be forgiven, a vice to be rebuked, or a crime to be punished. Nor is it a habit to be instantly overcome by action of the Divine Will, or by any personal resolve, spoken vow, or written pledge. It is a disease to be studied pathologically; to be treated physiologically, in the natural, orderly, slow process of physical and moral recuperation, by the persistent use of all the agencies necessary to this result.

Some have vehemently assailed this declaration on the ground that it denies personal responsibility. But such forget, or have not yet learned, that there is no disease without personal responsibility somewhere. So, in this case, whether the sensibility to alcoholic impression be inborn or acquired, the element of personal responsibility is not wanting. If the taste for liquor has been imbibed at the mother's breast from her habitual use of stimulants, there can be little doubt where so much of the responsibility lies; if one has inherited the predisposition to intemperance, the immediate parents, or some remoter ancestor, through the habit of indulgence was the responsible cause of that; while so far as the subject has brought this condition of inebriety on himself by voluntarily ministering to the predisposition, or by a course of increasing indulgence has produced the "susceptibility," then upon him to that extent rests the burden of guilt. But, while this divided and discriminated responsibility for the condition is recognized in his statement of its nature, the scientific practitioner has to do only with the condition itself, and in particular with man's restoration from it. With this latter work there is connected another form of responsibility, which is of the greatest importance, and is unfailingly demanded. This is the individual effort of the patient in conforming to and coöperating with the efforts of those who are laboring for this restoration, and in keeping up such watchful and earnest effort afterward. To awaken him to a vivid sense of obligation in this direction, and to enforce his will to its fulfilment, is the ultimate purpose of the treatment, and of all the influences brought to bear upon him, whether physical or intellectual, social, moral, or religious. Only when this result is reached is success achieved.

To bring man within the range of these influences, free from the counteracting force of temptation, is the purpose of the home or asylum: the former, private, voluntary, serving those able and willing to use its help; the latter, public and compulsory, both as to the commitment of patients and their continuance under its care. For a most essential element of success is sufficient time, whether it be weeks or months or years, for the treatment to produce its desired effect; for the full work of physical cure, of moral strengthening, and the development and education of that "prudent, cautious self-control" which is not only "wisdom's root," but virtue's consummate flower. Not only is the association before mentioned committed to these measures, but they have been recommended by many physicians and medical societies here and in England, and also by the "Association of Superintendents of American Institutions for the Insane," the latter especially protesting against the commitment of an inebriate to the institutions which they represent, as not designed nor adapted to meet his case.

Beside the many able papers, advocating their principles and discussing all themes bearing on the general subject, which have emanated from the Association for the Cure of Inebriety, which have been read at its meetings and subsequently published and circulated, it has latterly been represented in the pages of the American Journal of Inebriety, which, since January, 1877, has been issued quarterly, and whose aim is to set before the public the results of the study of inebriety in hospitals and asylums, and present a record of the latest advances made both at home and abroad. Thus by teaching and practice is it laboring both to restore the inebriate and to enlighten the public. So that, though the actual number treated in these institutions and restored thereby may be very small as compared with the multitude of the inebriate class in the community, yet, through their cure, through the effort spent upon the partly restored and even for the incurable, and by means of the extended discussion of facts and principles growing out of and connected with the effort, the people generally will be enlightened and helped to wiser and more effective personal effort for themselves and theirs. Said an early president of the association and superintendent of an asylum, "One of the distinguished benefits that is being accomplished by such asylums is the formation of public sentiment; and when the people shall learn what intemperance really is, what are its remote as well as its proximate causes, then every intelligent household afflicted by the evil may become a miniature asylum, in which the subject will be treated upon principles that will ensure the judicious use of means, not only of cure, but of prevention." LIBERAL MOVEMENTS IN BROOKLYN.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

Rev. John W. Chadwick has returned, after his summer's rest, and given his people two sermons of rational religion, strong and fresh as the breezes which blow over the Chesterfield hills, where rests his summer home. He was greeted gladly by a goodly number of hearers. Last Sunday morning, his congregation had the pleasure of listening to a remarkably fine and inspiring discourse by Prof. Felix Adler. His theme was the comforting power of rational religion. Frankly admitting that the facts and philosophy of evolution, in his opinion, rendered the hope for personal immortality irrational,—demonstrating as they do that from the development of worlds out of the primeval fire-mist, up to the culmination of evolutionary labor in the production of man, nature everywhere is careless of the individual,—sacrifices it to the perfection of the type,—he asked what remained of comfort, and incentive to noble living, to the believer in rational religion.

This comfort and incentive he found in the utter abnegation of self in devotion to the general good,—in the consciousness that a life so completely devoted to noble ends would build itself into the structure of the social fabric of the future, and thus win a "corporate," if not an individual, immortality. The address abounded with practical suggestions, and overflowed with the loftiest moral inspiration. We could not help feeling that the mantle of the old Hebrew prophets had fallen upon this young preacher of practical righteousness.

Following the good example set by the Boston Radical Club, social parlor meetings of the friends of liberal thought have recently become an "institution" in our goodly city. Early last fall, a number of ladies and gentlemen met, by invitation, in the pleasant parlors of Mrs. Imogene C. Fales, and inaugurated a series of weekly meetings, adopting the name, suggested by Prof. Adler's Society in New York, of the "Society for Ethical Culture."

These meetings were not intended to be in any sense in opposition to those of the Philosophical Society. Some of the most regular in attendance were also active and interested members of the "Philosophical." It was their purpose to devote rather more time to subjects of an ethical and immediately practical nature, and to enjoy a larger opportunity for social intercourse and conversation than the more public meetings of the other society afforded. Several papers were read before both societies, among them the following: "The Devil; or, The Evil-Myth of the Semitic and Aryan Races," by Wm. E. S. Fales, Esq., the son of our hostess; "Summum Bonum," by Daniel G. Thompson, Esq.; "Immortality," by Wm. H. Boughton, Esq. (recently published in the Free Religious Index); "Poetry and Music," by Miss Anne Sheldon; "The Zoroastrian Influence on Judaism and Christianity," by Lewis G. Janes; and "European and Asiatic Thought," by Mrs. Fales.

The first paper of the season was a thoughtful and interesting one by Wm. M. Ivins, Esq., on "Cognition and Feeling as related to Morality." Mr. Ivins also read subsequently a charming essay, entitled "The Man of the World," putting a wholly new meaning into the old phrase by delineating the ideal character of a representative of true manhood,—a man of affairs, a thinker, interested in all which concerns the welfare of the race, to whom nothing of human interest is foreign or of small account.

November 8, Samuel W. Grierson read a paper entitled "Doubt, the Corner-stone of Progress," the general drift and purport of which are indicated by its title. December 6, Lewis G. Janes read an essay upon "The Genesis of the God-Idea," defending the theory of Spencer and the evolution philosophy against the criticisms of Fairbairn and other "orthodox" writers, and also maintaining the validity of the idea in opposition to materialistic and atheistic objectors. December 20, William Haslam defended the "Utilitarianism of Modern Science and Evolution," in an interesting and able paper. The following week, "Greek and Roman India" was the subject of an essay read by Thomas C. Evans, descriptive of the influence of India in Europe and on modern thought through Greece and Rome.

Dr. William Fishbough, the spiritualist writer, on January 3, read a chapter from a forthcoming book which he is engaged in writing, entitled "The Correlation of Physical and Spiritual Forces," and subsequently a paper upon "Ancient and Modern Cosmology."

The following week, Prof. Herman O. C. Kortheuer, formerly organist at the Second Unitarian Church, and one of our most skilful pianists, read a very brilliant and exceedingly interesting paper on "The Ethical Element in Music," illustrated by selections from the masters. Upon a subsequent evening, he favored us with an essay on "Beethoven and Wagner: their Treatment of Spiritual and Moral Relations." On several occasions, Prof. Kortheuer delighted the society with some of the finest musical selections, contributing greatly to the pleasure of all who were present to enjoy them.

William J. Armstrong, formerly correspondent of the New York Tribune, gave one evening some entertaining personal reminiscences of his life in England, including sketches of Disraeli and other English leaders. He subsequently delivered elsewhere a course of lectures on Modern History, grouping current historical events around biographical sketches of prominent personages. Those who attended the course found the lectures very instructive and entertaining.

On the last Saturday evening in March, Prof. Carl Bjerregaard read an interesting and erudite essay on "The Norse Eddas and the Niebelungenlied," giving some account of these ancient poems, and of the religious ideas of the Norsemen. The final paper of the season was one entitled "Evolution as Applied to the Future," by Wm. E. S. Eales, Esq.

More time was devoted to the discussion of the subject of co-operation, in its various phases, as a remedy for inequalities and hardships of our social conditions, than to any other single topic. Our hostess, Mrs. Fales, opened the discussion with a very able and philosophical treatment of the general question,—favorable, in the main, to co-operation, but deprecating the extremes of Communism. She believed that in the practical application of the principle of co-operation lay the cure for many social evils. Charles Frederic Adams, Esq., read an interesting and practical paper on "Co-operative Capitalization," setting forth a plan for the transformation of wage-labor into independent organizations, wherein the laborer should receive an interest and participate in the profits. Col. Wm. Hemstreet advocated "Reform in Land Tenures," holding that the government, not individuals, should maintain proprietorship of all lands.

Col. Thomas Sharpe read an essay in favor of "Co-operative Colonization," explaining and recommending a cheap method of transferring unemployed labor from the large cities to the Great West. Mrs. Hope Whipple presented the religious side of the question, in a paper entitled "Christianity and Co-operation"; and she was ably seconded by Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, in a lecture on "Christianity and Socialism." Theo. F. Cuno, Esq., a leader of the Socialists, in a paper entitled "The Old and the New," made a most violent and vehement plea for Communism, pure and simple.

While the more radical positions taken by some of the speakers are to be deprecated as impracticable and undesirable, and while a return to anything like Communism would be simply a lapse into a barbarism out of which all civilized communities long since happily emerged, may we not hope that many of the evils and hardships of present social conditions will yet find relief in a rational application of the principles of co-operation? It is to be hoped that practical efforts may be made in this direction, and that some system may be devised, which, without sinking the individual in the community or appealing too exclusively to legislation as a cure for social ills, may yet give the laborer a direct interest in the proceeds and profits of his labor, and a better chance to rise in the social scale. The times are ripe for such a movement. It is a consummation most devoutly to be desired.

At many of the meetings of the Society for Ethical Culture, the papers were discussed in pleasant and free conversation. Sometimes, a poem or a reading from the philosophers or classical writers of antiquity followed the regular essay. A delightful atmosphere of refinement and culture was thrown around the meetings by our hostess and her pleasant family, which added much to the enjoyment of all who participated in them. J.

LESSONS ON The Origin and Growth of Christianity.

II.

THE MESSIANIC DREAM (Concluded).

"He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not."—Isaiah liii., 3.

4. The Messianic Idea under the Restoration.

After the return from the Captivity under the protection of Cyrus, the restoration of the Temple, and Yahweh-worship at Jerusalem, was the chief desire. Priestly influences predominant. The priestly family superseded the royal. David's line became less prominent. Haggai and Zechariah III. faintly refer to ZERUBBABEL as the Messiah. (Hag. ii., 23; Zech. vi., 12.)

Thereafter, there is no personal identification of the Messiah. The decay of this conception for many ages is notably evidenced by the fact that the title Messiah was never conferred upon Judas Maccabæus, nor assumed by him.

5. Other-World Beliefs modify the Messianic Conception.

Contact with Babylon and Persia, with their notions of a future life and bodily resurrection, developed these ideas among the Hebrews. Ezekiel, instead of prophesying a prince of David's line, affirms that DAVID himself will rise from the dead and become the leader of the TRUE ISRAEL.—(Ezek. xxxiv., 23, ff.)

From the Captivity to the advent of Christianity, the Messianic belief assumes a closer and closer likeness to Persian ideas. The Persian notions of the destruction of the world by fire, the essentially depraved character of the present creation, the coming of SAOSHYAS or SOSIOSH, "the conquering Saviour," who would destroy the evil creation, raise the dead, and establish a new and heavenly kingdom on the earth, became popular among the Jews.

Malachi, the last of the prophets, does not expect a Messiah King, but a prophet, messenger, or forerunner, to prepare Israel, or the world, for the great day of judgment. (Mal. iii., I.) This is also a notion of Persian origin. Many Jews, in later days, identified this messenger with the prophet Elijah or Elias.

"A faithful prophet" was expected by the Apocryphal writers. (I. Mac. iv., 46; xiv., 41.)

The writer of the Book of Daniel (about 165 B.C.) uses the term "Son of Man," a common designation of the prophets, in his Messianic prophecies. (Dan. vii., 13.) He first distinctly announces the doctrine of a resurrection of righteous Israelites, to dwell on earth in the new and heavenly kingdom.

6. Revival of the Earlier Beliefs.

In the dark days of KING HEROD, the old hopes of a personal Messiah revived. Some of the Pharisaic Jews even renewed the former expectation of a coming king and deliverer of the line of David.

Religious enthusiasts, like John the Baptist, preached the speedy coming of the heavenly kingdom. Fanatics, like Juda of Gaulonitis, refused to pay tribute to Cæsar, and gathered their followers in armed rebellion.

GALILEE, especially, was the centre of this growing discontent. The popular mind was full of the Messianic expectation, which assumed various forms among different classes of the people. Such was the condition of affairs at the dawning of the Christian era.

NOTE A.—Tell the class, briefly, something about King Herod, and the stories of Juda of Gaulonitis and Theudas. (Acts v., 36, 37.)

NOTE B.—Let the teacher impress upon the class the fact that the Jewish Messiah was never conceived to be other than simply a man. He was the "anointed king," the "faithful prophet," the forerunner of the heavenly kingdom. He was Hezekiah or Cyrus or Zerubbabel. He was the "Son of Man," but never deified or identified with God. Such an idea was and is wholly repugnant to the Jewish religion.

NOTE C.—In the seventy or more so-called "Messianic prophecies" of the Old Testament, the word "MESSIAH" occurs only twice, and in one of these instances it is applied to King Cyrus. All these prophecies evidently refer to the immediate future, as is usually indicated by the context.

General Questions.

1. What effect had the return from Babylon and the restoration of the Temple on the Messianic expectation? 2. What was the Persian conception of a judgment, a future life, and a Saviour? 3. How did these ideas modify the Messianic hope of the Jews? 4. What did Malachi prophesy? 5. What new ideas do we find in the Book of Daniel? 6. What was the expectation of the Apocryphal writers? 7. What hopes revived in the days of Herod? 8. Whom did the Pharisees expect? 9. What did John the Baptist foretell? 10. Give some account of Juda of Gaulonitis? 11. What was the situation in Galilee at this time? 12. Did the Jews ever believe the MESSIAH to be God? 13. In the growth of this idea is there, at any step, any evidence of miraculous inspiration? 14. Is it not rather a natural evolution out of the varying environments and circumstances of the Hebrews?

To the Teacher.

Use the "helps" recommended in the previous lesson, and also read the accounts in Josephus of John the Baptist, Juda of Gaulonitis, etc.

Teachers of the younger classes should simplify and omit such questions as imply a greater knowledge of the Old Testament than the pupils possess. Explain "inspiration," "evolution," and "environment." The older classes can find material here for profitable conversation. Remember the Lesson Paper gives but a hint and suggestion, here and there. These should be expanded and utilized in conversation.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

The Ghosts of Knockmore.

SINCE Sunday, Sept. 5, people have been flocking in thousands to the chapel of Knockmore, within five miles of Ballina, where it is alleged the most wonderful spiritual manifestations have taken place and are nightly recurring. One old woman, named Mary Montgomery, said she had seen the visions on three different occasions,—Sunday, Tuesday, and Wednesday nights,—and in various forms. It was stated that on Sunday, after the celebration of holy communion, the form of the Blessed Virgin, bearing in her arms the holy child Jesus, appeared against the front of the altar, where it remained for some minutes, and was witnessed by hundreds assembled in the chapel. Later on, it appeared in another part of the chapel, over one of the stations of the cross, attended by two angels. The Virgin raised and waved her hands several times, as if blessing the people. On Tuesday evening, which was the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, the most wonderful sights are alleged to have been seen. It is attested by hundreds that, while the priest was repeating the rosary, a man appeared palpably on the altar, who the people say was the Lord Jesus Christ himself. He was a person of the most beautiful appearance, wearing a long beard and having a profusion of curled hair over his forehead. It is said he went round the officiating clergymen, looking intently at him and bowing toward him on each side. Saints Joseph and John appeared in company with the first figure. The Virgin appeared several times after this, nearly always accompanied by angels. The greatest excitement and expectation prevailed among the people, and several times during the night there were strange manifestations, including a hand which appeared against the altar. A most respectable man, who knelt at the altar rails within six yards of where the hand appeared, attested in the strongest manner that he saw it as plainly as his own, and actually counted the fingers upon it. At one time, a dim halo of light passed round the entire building, which is cruciform, and was followed by the shadow of two persons brought out in strange distinctness upon the wall, and which passed with a peculiar movement from the south aisle until they stood by the altar, from the steps of which the priest was watching them intently, at the same time beseeching the people not to become unduly excited, but to pray to and thank God for this special manifestation. The people remained in the chapel till after midnight, praying devoutly.—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

JESTINGS.

"AH!" said a deaf man who had a scolding wife, "man wants but little hear below."

WHEN Sydney Smith was out of health, his doctor advised him to take a walk on an empty stomach. The witty patient asked, "Whose?"

A DULL old lady, being told that a certain lawyer was "lying at the point of death," exclaimed, "My gracious! won't even death stop that man's lying?"

REV. DR. HALL said every blade of grass was a sermon. The next day, he was amusing himself by clipping his lawn, when a parishioner said: "That's right, doctor. Cut your sermons short."

A POET asks, "When I am dead, and lowly laid, . . . and clods fall heavy from the spade, who'll think of me?" Don't worry. Tailors and shoemakers have retentive memories, and you'll not be forgotten.—Norristown Herald.

A COLORED man came into a Galveston newspaper office, and wanted to take the paper. "How long do you want it?" asked the clerk. "Jess as long as it is, boss. Ef it don't fit de shelves, I kin t'ar a piece off myself."—Galveston News.

THE following letter was received by an undertaker recently from an afflicted widower: "Sur,—my waif is ded and wonts to be berried to-morrow at Woner klock. U nose wair to dig the Hole—by the siad of my two other wiafs—let it be deep."

A YOUNG gentleman was passing an examination in physics. He was asked, "What planets were known to the ancients?" "Well, sir," he responded, "there were Venus and Jupiter and" (after a pause) "I think the Earth. But I'm not quite certain."

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HE is a man who through his earnestness in seeking knowledge forgets his food, and, in his joy for having found it, loses all sense of his toil, and, thus occupied, is unconscious that he has almost reached old age.—Coarse rice for food, water to drink, the bended arm for a pillow,—happiness may be enjoyed even with these; but, without virtue, both riches and honor seem to me like the passing cloud.—Confucius.

THERE is no difference between knowledge and temperance; for he who knows what is good, and embraces it, who knows what is bad, and avoids it, is learned and temperate.—Socrates.

LOOK not thou upon the wine, when it is red, when it giveth his color, when it moveth itself aright: at the last, it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.—Hebrew Bible.

THE first draught serveth for health, the second for pleasure, the third for shame, and the fourth for madness.—Anacharsis.

THERE is a devil in every berry of the grape.—Koran.

THE vine bears three clusters,—the first of pleasure, the second of intoxication, the third of outrage.—We ought not to choose every pleasure, but that whose end is good. It belongs to a wise man to resist pleasure, and to a fool to be enslaved by it.—Epictetus.

CATTLE know when to go from grazing, but a foolish man never knows his stomach's measure.—Edda (Scandinavia).

BUT for the cravings of appetite, not a bird would have fallen into the snare. Nay, the fowler would not have spread his net. The stomach is chains to the hands and fetters to the feet. He who is a slave to it seldom worships God.—Saadi (Persian).

O THOU invisible spirit of wine! if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee—Devil.—Shakespeare.

WINE heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric man into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Addison.

TEMPERANCE is reason's girdle and passion's bridle, the strength of the soul and the foundation of virtue.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE smaller the drink, the clearer the head and the cooler the blood, which are great benefits in temper and business.—William Penn.

THERE is a moment in a bout of good wine, at which, if a man could but remain, wit, wisdom, courage, generosity, eloquence, happiness, were his. But the moment passes, and that other glass somehow spoils the state of beatitude.—Thackeray.

TEMPERANCE is corporeal piety: it is the preservation of divine order in the body.—Theodore Parker.

TEMPERANCE is the proper use of things. It primarily, therefore, refers to quality, not quantity.... The vice of intemperance is the conscious free choice of the worse in presence of an attainable better. It is, consequently, always a question of fitness. What reason cannot justify, morality must condemn.—Dr. F. R. Lees.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the Massachusetts Constitution, and the organization of the General Assembly under it, occurred on Monday last. In accordance with the general recommendation of the Governor, the event was recognized by public meetings and otherwise in Boston, Salem, and various parts of the Commonwealth.

WE learn through the Catholic Review that one of the priests at Ballyraggett in Ireland, where phenomena have appeared similar to those at Knock, has been making a practical application of the Pope's recent advice to the priesthood to use the instructions of St. Thomas Aquinas. Lest his people might exaggerate the importance of the alleged miracles, the priest told them that, according to the mystic theology of St. Thomas, whom he quoted, "these appearances are the lowest form of supernatural manifestations, and are principally intended, as a rule, for beginners, or those not so well grounded in the spiritual life: they are only its condiment or sweetness, and should not be preferred to the substance; they should not be desired or too much sought after, and should always be received with great caution, and not venerated, only conditionally, relatively, and after having been tested with the sign of the Cross and exorcism."

THE Council of Congregational churches, that was called in Brooklyn to act on the resignation of Rev. Geo. C. Miln from his pastorate because of his change of religious views, has adopted a report, "granting a dissolution of the pastoral relation and expressing confidence in the moral character of Mr. Miln and the purity of his motives, and the hope that he would be so established in the truth as to remain in the Congregational Church. The Moderator said, in answer to Mr. Miln's inquiry, that the Council did not fully recommend him to the fellowship of the Congregational Churches." From a statement of his belief made in his letter of resignation, Mr. Miln does not appear to have departed further from the standard Orthodoxy than have a considerable number of ministers who still preach acceptably in Orthodox pulpits. He believes in a modal Trinity; says he is not a Unitarian, for he thinks that Jesus was not merely divine, but Deity himself. On the doctrines of atonement and future punishment, he approaches more nearly the Unitarian view.

THE Sunday School Times says that it is more important to acknowledge Jesus as Saviour than to become Christian in life; or, if it does not say that, what does it mean in the following? "The question of prime importance to you is not, Are you a Christian? but, Is Jesus Christ your Saviour? These two questions may seem to aim at the same point; but they involve very different processes of mind in their answering, and herein consists the superiority of the latter form over the former. Your hope of salvation must rest not on what you are, but on what your Saviour is and does." In our opinion, such teaching as this is responsible for not a little of the practical corruption and gross want of moral rectitude that have been specially exposed in Evangelical churches in recent years. What would be the effect, if Sunday-school teachers were to act upon this sentiment and impress upon the children under their charge the idea, that not what they are and do is going to make their future secure, but what somebody else has done for them?

WE print this week in another column the call which has been issued for a conference to be held in Chicago November 15, for the purpose of forming a new organization to further the secularizing of the State. Our own views on this matter we gave in the Index of October 7, in an article on "Liberal League Objects"; and to those views we still adhere. But, so far as the object of the conference is expressed in this call, we find nothing in conflict with the position there taken. Nothing is said about making the new organization political. The whole question as to the modus operandi of the association is doubtless left open for consideration and discussion at the conference. And, with this understanding, we see no objection whatever to the proposed meeting, but believe rather that great good may come out of it. We would gladly attend it, were it in our power to do so. If the old Liberal League is to continue, as it now seems determined to do, it is important that another organization, freed from the evils into which it has fallen, should actively take the field to enlist the activities of those Liberals who desire specially to work for State secularization.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury has recently delivered a charge making the gauge of church-fellowship so broad that it might almost, if not quite, include the Rev. Stopford Brooke, who has just seceded from the Church of England because he does not believe in the miracles. Most probably, the Archbishop knows that the Church does include not a few clergymen who hold the same views that Mr. Brooke does; and he is not sorry for it, but would prevent, if possible, the necessity of their withdrawing. The Church Times, speaking for the extreme ritualistic party, severely criticises the Archbishop as having betrayed the Church of which he had been made the head. On the other hand, Rev. Dr. Parker, speaking for a large body of dissenters, cordially welcomes the prelate's statement, and intimates that on such a basis an alliance is possible which shall include men of all creeds and names, even Trinitarian and Unitarian. We may add, that lest the honesty of Mr. Brooke in withdrawing from the Church of England should be catching, it is said that Mr. Matthew Arnold is immediately to publish an essay to show that even those who deny all belief in the miraculous are nevertheless justified in remaining members of the Church.

"THE GENESIS OF THE DEITIES."

A Discourse Delivered before the First Parish Society, Haverhill, Mass., Sept. 19, 1880.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

Come, let us reason together.—ISAIAH.

Within the last decade, a new word, not yet incorporated into our dictionaries, has been introduced into our vocabulary. Who coined the word I do not know: But it was much needed, and with thinkers finds ready currency. It is the word "agnostic." It is derived from two Greek words, signifying without knowledge. An agnostic has come to mean one who assumes to have no knowledge of God. There are thousands of people who call themselves agnostics; and there are other thousands of people who are agnostics, without being aware of it. An "agnostic" is not, in the popular use of the word, an "atheist." An atheist is one who denies the existence of a God, who says, "There is no God." An agnostic does not deny the existence of a God. He neither denies nor affirms his existence. He simply says: "I do not know, and I see no reason to believe. There may be a God, or there may not be one. I do not know. I have no faculty by which I can know. Nature and her laws I see and know. Man and the duties of man to man I see and know; but as to God, if there is a God, I know nothing about it." This is the position of the agnostic. As I said, a very large number of people, including some of the finest intellects of the age, are agnostics. Herbert Spencer is their great philosopher. Leslie Stephen is perhaps their most aggressive magazine contributor. Robert Ingersoll is their most popular expounder in this country.

Suppose now, instead of getting angry and making up mouths and calling such people hard names, we invite them in the spirit of old Isaiah, saying, "Come, let us reason together." Let us do so, not for the purpose of beating them in an argument (that we should find it hard to do), but for the purpose of getting a view of the world from their intellectual stand-point. If we are wrong, we certainly wish, or ought to wish, to be righted. Let us love truth better than our present notions of truth. If in this noble spirit we pursue our inquiry, we may feel assured the result of that inquiry will be as good as the spirit of it.

I ask my friend, the agnostic: "How is it you say you know nothing about God? There may be one or there may not be one: you know nothing about it. You say you have no faculty by which you can know. Granted that you cannot know, but can you not believe? Can you help believing?" He replies: "I neither know nor believe, for I see no reason for believing. I used to believe, when a boy; for I was so taught. I accepted the belief on the authority of parents and Sunday-school teachers; but, since my own reason has assumed authority, it has rejected all the old grounds of belief. Of course," he continues, "I believe in Nature and her laws,—that we are her offspring. It is she that has brought us forth, and not we ourselves, just as she has given birth to all the vegetable and animal world. We are blood relatives of polyp and lichen. As a scientist, I delight in exploring the mysteries of Nature. As a poet, I bathe the wings of Fancy in the deeps of her wonders. All that my senses can perceive, I believe: all that reason stamps as genuine knowledge, I receive; but I believe in no power above Nature, for I cannot conceive of an 'above' in Nature. Nature is all in all."

"But how happens it," I again inquire of my agnostic friend,—"how happens it, if we can know nothing about God (if, indeed, there is one), and as you say we have no sufficient reason for believing in one,—how happens it that nearly all peoples, from the lowest savages to the most civilized and enlightened nations, have believed in either several supernatural beings or in one Supreme Being? Such an idea, if it is a false one, is so general that it must have had a general cause. Will you explain to me the origin of the idea of God, or, to use Herbert Spencer's expression, the 'Genesis of the Deities'?" And this brings me face to face with the topic of the day.

Opposite me sits an agnostic. He replies to my question first in the words of Mr. Ingersoll:—

"To me," says he, "it seems easy to account for these ideas concerning gods and devils. They are a perfectly natural production. Man has created them all, and under the same circumstances would create them again. Man has not only created all these gods, but he has created them out of the materials by which he has been surrounded. Generally, he has moulded them after himself, and has given them hands, feet, eyes, ears, and organs of speech. Each nation made its gods and devils speak its own language not only, but put into their mouths the same mistakes in history, geography, astronomy, and in all matters of fact, generally made by the people. No God was ever in advance of the nation that created him. The negroes represented their deities with black skins and curly hair. The Mongolian gave to his a yellow complexion and dark, almond-shaped eyes. The Jews were not allowed to paint theirs, or we should have seen Jehovah with a full beard, an oval face, and an aquiline nose. Jove was a perfect Greek, and Jupiter looked as though a member of the Roman Senate. The gods of Egypt had the patient face and placid look of the loving people who made them. The gods of northern countries were represented warmly clad in robes of fur, those of the tropics were naked. The gods of India were often mounted on elephants, those of some islanders were great swimmers, and the deities of the arctic zone were passionately fond of whales' blubber."

Thus, according to my friend, the agnostic, instead of a God making man after his image, man has made his God after his own image, and therefore "an honest God is the noblest work of man."

But, in any proper sense of the word "made," we cannot say, nor can the agnostic say, that man made his God. Man has indeed "made" idols, but these idols are not his God. They are simply visible images of him. The inner idea, for which the outer symbol stands, man did not make. It grew in some way, naturally, as all other ideas have grown. Now, granting that men's gods strikingly resemble themselves; granting, even more, that men's gods are not objective realities, but nothing more than subjective ideas or mental images, the profounder question comes up: "Whence came these God ideas? How did they originally get into the mind?" Mr. Ingersoll makes no attempt to answer this deeper question. But Herbert Spencer has grappled it, like a true philosopher, as he is. He attempts to explain the origin and development of the Gods, or, to use his own expression, the "Genesis of the Deities," on the principle of evolution. We may not agree with him, but we should at least thank him that he has had the courage to attempt the solution of such an intricate problem. I propose now to give you some of his reasoning, in as popular a form as I am able, after which I will briefly consider the theory advanced by Max Müller and the mythological school of philosophers. I do not hope to make the subject entirely clear to your minds; but, if I can succeed in provoking thought and inquiry on this subject, I have done something. According to Herbert Spencer, all sorts of supernatural beings originated from ghosts or "spirits" of the dead. The ghost of the enemy of the primitive man becomes an evil God, or devil, while the ghost of the friend becomes a good God. The ghost of some great chief or ancestor becomes the chief God, to whom sacrifice is offered. Thus all religion he regards as a modified form of ancestral-worship. The Chinese, to-day, still worship their ancestors. But, in nearly all the other higher religions, the ancestral name is dropped, the form has become expanded and spiritualized, until the God is looked upon as infinitely superior to man, blending his will and power with the laws and forces of nature. I said that, according to Herbert Spencer, all sorts of supernatural beings originated from "ghosts" or "spirits"; that the gods and devils were the spirits of good and evil men expanded and worshipped. But you will immediately ask: How did savages get the idea of "ghosts," to start with? How did they get the little "spirit" out of which to make the great spirits? Now, it will not do to assume here that there are spirits, and that they came back and communicated their presence to early man. That is not the way Mr. Spencer reasons. He assumes nothing except that the laws of thought are everywhere the same, and the primitive man reasoned naturally from the data as given to him. How, then, does the world appear to the primitive man? He knows nothing about law, order. These are comparatively modern conceptions. In the sky, that was clear a few moments ago, the savage sees a fragment of cloud that grows while he gazes. At another time, he sees it melt away and disappear. He knows nothing about the precipitation and dissolution of vapor. He simply knows that something became visible, and then vanished. So in the heavens, at night, he sees the myriad stars. But in the daytime they disappear. Where are they? And there is the moon, now waxing, now waning, now full-orbed, now a rim of light, now vanished. Where has she gone? Comets switch their fiery tails through the heavens, and disappear. Meteors dart athwart the sky, and vanish. The lightning flies zigzag amid the clouds, and is gone. The rainbow spans the heavens, like a brilliant scarf which evening flings over the neck of the retreating storm; and it, too, disappears. Where have all these things gone? They seem to have two existences,—one visible, one invisible. The water that was left by the rain in the hollow of the earth,—where is it? The sun came out and kissed the little pool, and it vanished. That mirage,—so wonderful, so startling even to the civilized man,—what must it be to the savage? Trees, a caravan in the desert, a ship on the sea, all bottom side up, and in the clouds. Now they disappear. What! Have trees and ships another self? And the wind that the savage cannot see, yet a power so terrible sometimes in its effects! The fossil which he picks up, he takes for a transmuted fish or snake or sea-weed. It suggests to him that the fish and snake and sea-weed have another self. Still more so do the astonishing facts of metamorphosis. A savage expressed his idea of immortality by saying, "Me lie down black man, jump up white man." No wonder he should think so, for doesn't Nature seem to say so to him? See this worm lie down caterpillar, jump up butterfly. In every way, Nature seems conspiring to cheat the primitive man; and she succeeds. She makes some insects so like the bark of the tree or the leaf of the plant on which they live, that no wonder the savage is driven to the conclusion that the bark and leaf have been transformed into insects, as some of us, when children, used to think that horse-hair in the trough was literally transformed into the thread-like, aquatic worm, Gordius. So many phenomena in Nature tend to delude the untutored mind! When the primitive man leans over his boat and peers into the pellucid waters, and beholds a face looking up at him, like his own, and far, far beneath, in a deeper deep, a heaven with its clouds, or its moon and stars, is it any wonder he fancies that reflection a second entity, his "double," his invisible self? Or, when standing on the hill-top he shouts and his voice rebounds from the neighboring cliff, is it any wonder he imagines a something over there, invisible, intangible, yet somewhat like himself, who is echoing his words? Do not all such strange phenomena inevitably tend to mislead the unscientific man, to delude him into the belief in his own duality? And these false inferences are confirmed by the suggestions which come from his dreams, from swoons, somnambulism, and diseased states of the mind.

A savage lies here by his camp-fire. All day he has pursued his game, but it has escaped him. Exhausted, hungry, he drops to sleep. In that sleep, he dreams. He starts a deer. The feathered shaft flies straight to the heart. He strips off the skin from the quivering flesh, on the spit a rib of delicious venison roasts over the glowing coals, with his knife of stone he cleaves off a piece of the smoking flesh, and is about to lift it to his mouth, when—he awakes. What has happened? We say that it was merely a dream. We have no idea that his mind left the brain, or the spirit the body and went off hunting, but that the brain was active while consciousness was asleep. But the savage doesn't reason in that way. He knows nothing of such abstractions as "consciousness" or "mind." He doesn't know whether he thinks with his brain or with his heart or his liver. He simply knows that he distinctly remembers hunting a deer, shooting it through the heart, skinning it warm, roasting a rib over glowing coals, and putting a bit to his mouth. That he remembers. True, he finds himself, ONE self, still by the camp-fire, hungry. What of that! It simply proves that he has two selves, like so many other things which he has seen. One lies asleep, while the other self goes deer-hunting at night. One self is visible, the other self is invisible; one self is tangible, the other self is intangible, ethereal, ghostly,—is, indeed, a ghost. This idea of the dual nature in man is confirmed in the savage by such phenomena as swoons, somnambulism, apoplexy, catalepsy, ecstasy, etc., when one's self seems to be away, and another ghost has possession. Thus, acording to Herbert Spencer, the idea of another self, a double self, an invisible self, a ghost or spirit, separate from the body, arose. And this ghost and "god" are at first the same. That is, the first "god" the primitive man conceives of or worships is a "ghost" of some dead man. It seems incredible that religious worship should start from such a source, yet Mr. Spencer fortifies his argument with abundant evidence. Many savages worship men before they are dead, and propitiate their ghosts after they are dead. They frequently make gods of their medicine men, and of superior strangers, or of a powerful chief. We can hardly wonder that savages deify men, when we remember that Paul and Barnabas were treated as gods by the priests and people of Lystra, and that so advanced a people as the Romans worshipped their emperors, and that almost all Christendom, to-day, is worshipping the "spirit" of a Jewish Reformer as Deity. "Anything which transcends the ordinary, a savage thinks of as supernatural or divine, the remarkable man among the rest. This remarkable man may be simply the remotest ancestor remembered as the founder of the tribe; he may be a chief famed for strength and bravery; he may be a medicine man of great repute; he may be an inventor of something new; and then, instead of being a member of the tribe, he may be a superior stranger bringing arts and knowledge; or he may be one of a superior race gaining predominance and conquest. Being at first one or the other of these, regarded with awe during his life, he is regarded with increased awe after his death; and the propitiation of his ghost becomes greater than the propitiation of ghosts which are less feared, and develops into an established worship." Thus, according to Herbert Spencer, the primitive idea of "god" is nothing more than the idea of "ghost" which expands more and more until the little spirit becomes a great spirit. The ghosts of enemies become the evil gods or devils, whose deviltry is to be warded off by the arts of the sorcerer or banished by the exorcist; while, on the other hand, the ghosts of friends, especially chiefs and great men, become the good gods, and the superior one of all eventually develops into the supreme god of all. Thus, ancestor-worship, using the term in its broadest sense, Herbert Spencer regards as the root of every religion on the globe. The gods are the ghosts of men, expanded and idealized.

But perhaps some of you will ask how it happens that men have worshipped as gods the sun and moon and stars, mountains and sea. Right here is where Mr. Spencer's theory of the "Genesis of the Deities" comes into sharp conflict with that of the "mythologists," prominent among whom is Max Müller, the Orientalist. According to this latter school, the gods of the primitive man are personifications of natural objects. They believe that early man instinctively personifies, or endows with life, everything he sees. He looks up to the moon, and, instead of saying "it," he says "she,"—makes her a goddess. He looks up to the sun, and, instead of saying "it," he says "he,"—makes him a god. So of all other natural objects. To illustrate this tendency, even in civilized life, they instance how a child will endow with life her China doll, or how a person will kick a stone or stick, over which he has stumbled, as though it were alive and to blame. But Herbert Spencer denies that the primitive man has this special tendency to personify or that his gods have originated in that way. The child of the civilized man and the most ignorant peasant, to-day, show no such tendency as is ascribed to primitive men. The familiar sun excites in the child no awe whatever, nothing like the religious sentiment. A laborer has not even respect for the earth he digs, still less any such emotion as might lead him to treat it as a deity. "It is true that the child may be awed by a thunder-storm, and that the ignorant may look with superstitious terror at a comet; but these are not usual and orderly occurrences. Daily experiences prove that surrounding objects and powers, however great, excite no religious emotion in undeveloped minds, if they are common and not supposed to be dangerous. . . . The lowest types of men are devoid of wonder." They exhibit no more innate tendency to personify natural objects than do children or undeveloped people among ourselves. The child does not personify its doll: it is simply dramatizing,—playing it's alive. It does not for a moment think or believe the doll alive. Should the doll actually bite the child's finger, nothing would astonish it more. No more does the savage instinctively endow with life such natural objects as sun, moon, stars, mountains, and sea. They were converted into gods, and imagined alive by no simple process of personification. That is altogether too easy an explanation. The process, according to Herbert Spencer, by which ghosts were expanded and idealized into gods we have seen; but it still remains to explain how the ghosts became identified with the sun, moon, mountains, and other natural objects, i.e.,—how ghost-worship is related to nature-worship. It is a subtle question, and I will detain you but a moment on it. One way is by confounding the parentage of the race with a conspicuous object marking the natal region of the race; one way is by giving a literal interpretation of birth-names; and another way is by a literal interpretation of names given in eulogy. Suppose, for instance, that a great chief, out of compliment, had been named the "Sun," as we know has been done. Suppose that when living the people worshipped him, and when dead worshipped his "spirit," as we know has been done, the world over. He was worshipped by the name of the "Sun." Do you not see how easy, how almost inevitable it would be that they would confound two objects which bore identical names? That is, they would worship the sun, as the visible symbol of their chief, named "Sun." Or, again, suppose, at the hour of a prince's birth, it was the dawn, or that the full moon was rising, or that a terrific thunder-storm burst forth, how natural it would be for the mother of this savage prince to commemorate the event by naming him the "Thunder," or the "Storm," or the "Moon," or the "Dawn"; and, if he became a great man in the tribe, he would likely be worshipped when dead under the name of "Dawn," or "Moon," or "Thunder," or "Storm"; and how easy it would be for after generations to confound the man with the natural objects or events which bore the same name! Or, again, suppose a superior race should come from over the sea, or from the east where the sun rises, or from a mountainous country. They would be called "children of the sea," or "men from the mountains," or "from the sun," indicating the place whence they sprang. Now, suppose that the king of this conquering race of men, of these "children of the sea," should become the "god" of the conquered people, as the Spaniards were deified by the Peruvians in the fifteenth century. They would worship him as a son of the sea, the literal offspring of the ocean. Thus, by mistaking the traditional source of the race for the traditional parentage of the race, the expanded ghost has become confounded with mountain, sea, sun, and even stars, and ghost-worship has blended into nature-worship. When once these erroneous personalizations have arisen, then the use of life-implying words will confirm them. "The mythologists hold that the powers of Nature, at first conceived and worshipped as impersonal, came to be personalized because of certain characters in the words applied to them; and that the legends concerning the persons identified with these natural powers arise afterwards." Contrariwise, the view which Mr. Spencer holds is "that the human personality is the primary element; that the identification of this with some natural power or object is due to identity of name; and that the worship of this natural power thus arises secondarily."

I do not expect, my friends, that this is perfectly clear in your minds. Do not, however, be discouraged. You can at least treasure up this much,—That Herbert Spencer teaches: (1) that the primitive man gets from his observation of the apparently double existence of many things in nature, from his dreams and the abnormal and diseased phenomena of mind, the idea that he has "another self," a ghostly self that is invisible and wanders about in his dreams,—this other self is his "ghost"; (2) that this ghost and his "god" are at first identical; (3) that the ghosts of his enemies become evil gods, or devils; (4) that the ghosts of his friends become good gods; (5) that the most prominent gods are the ghosts of the most prominent men; (6) that the gods of all religions are nothing more nor less than the ghosts of great men, expanded and idealized; (7) that, by the misinterpretation of language, these idealized persons became identified with natural objects, instead of these objects being directly personified; (8) that ancestor-worship, using the term as comprehending all worship of the dead, is the root of every religion.

This is the philosophy of the origin of the gods, as elaborated by the foremost living representative of agnosticism, Herbert Spencer. He not only declares that God, if there is a God, is the unknown and unknowable, but he does more. With his marvellous analytical ability, he dissects the psychological history of religion, discovers the god-idea in embryo, and traces its evolution up to its latest breath.

Now, to some of you, such a philosophy may seem to knock the bottom out of all religion. So it does, unless we can have a religion that rests on something more than assumptions. Unless the bottom of religion is truth, for one, I care not how soon science detects the sham and forewarns us. Give me truth without religion rather than religion without truth. But, when Herbert Spencer says that ancestor-worship is the root of every religion on the globe, he does not say that it is the top, or the flower or the fruit, of the highest possible religion. So astrology was the root of the splendid science of astronomy, so alchemy was the root of modern chemistry. So our republican institutions rooted down deep in monarchies, oligarchies, and despotisms. Religion may indeed have rooted in ghost-worship, and much of religion may yet have risen but a little above that root; but who can tell us to what towering heights the religion of the future may reach, flinging out its giant branches, whose leaves shall be for the healing of the nations, and under whose great arms the poor as well as the rich shall build their homes, and eat of their own vine and fig-tree? I believe in religion as I define it, in religion, agnosticism notwithstanding. And now one word more.

Let us, my friends, not be guilty of the intolerance which stains the name of believers in the past. Let us never conclude that a man cannot be noble and pure and true, because he holds a different faith from our own. Though a man avow himself "agnostic," though he declare that he neither loves nor knows nor believes anything about God, as commonly defined, do not therefore conclude that he cannot be loving and tender and generous and just toward man. That he may be, and devote his whole life to the service of truth and humanity unselfishly and heroically. Now, I propose to give you a glimpse of three men who may be called agnostics,—photographs of faces that, when they look up, see only the silent stars in the heavens. I might picture to you Herbert Spencer, or Stuart Mill, or George Jacob Holyoake, or Charles Bradlaugh or Mr. Leslie Stephen; but three names which first come to me are not included in these. The first one is Ludwig Feuerbach, a German professor, who died some seven or eight years ago. Says his biographer: "To the cause of freethought, Feuerbach rendered one service of inestimable worth. He has shown that it is consistent with a strictly irreproachable life. He himself was an unanswerable argument that the atheist is not of necessity a murderer, a liar, and a villain. If all that is said of him be true, he demonstrated the fact that an atheist may be a hero." "His purity, sincerity, and resolution," says one of his eulogists, "are only surpassed by his modesty, his simplicity, and his goodness of heart. His scholars called him 'the good Ludwig.'"

On the 5th of last January there died in the city of Milwaukee, at the age of seventy-six, a quite remarkable man, Surgeon-General Erastus B. Wolcott. He was no less skilful and famed as a surgeon than he was public-spirited as a citizen and beloved as a man. He lost his life in an attempt to do a kindly service to a brother physician of the opposite school. We are told that "gratuitous services were given by him in all charitable institutions in the city; and among the profusion of floral tributes bestowed upon his remains, as they lay for a few hours in a public place that his friends might take one last look upon the noble, kindly face, were many flowers that came as tokens of gratitude from those he had ministered unto without money and without price." The citizens of Milwaukee desired to do all honor to the beloved dead, but were restrained from parade and show, in accordance with his oft-expressed wish. All that he asked for was that some friend should speak of his character, in love and in truth, over his coffin. And this is what the minister, Rev. Mr. Gordon, said: "He was the soul of honor. His creedless life was searched as with candles. But there is no flaw. His morality was intact, his purity unbroken, his integrity whole and sound. He was a creedless man, but his praise is now in the house of creeds. . . . He was a good man; he was a pure man; he was a sweet man; he was a brave man. Creeds and sacraments cannot produce more than that. He had character. Nothing can be higher."

Some ten or twelve years ago, the Republican State Convention met in a certain city of one of our Western States to nominate their candidate for governor. The "slate" was all prepared beforehand. The delegates, it was well understood, were going to vote for a certain young and brilliant lawyer, exceedingly popular in his party. But, on the eve of the nomination, a delegation of ministers from the Methodist State Conference, in session in a town not far away, came to the Convention, and said to the managers, in substance: "We have heard that you intend to nominate this man for governor. He is an infidel. We warn you not to put him at the head of your ticket. If you do, the whole Methodist body in this State will combine solidly against him, and defeat him." What did the political managers do? Embarrassed, perplexed, they came to the prospective candidate, and said to him: "We must, some way, placate the Methodists. It will not do to lose their influence. Go to them and reconcile them. Make them believe that you are all right, that you have been foully misrepresented, that you agree with them in essentials, and so mollify them as you can easily do." But the young man saw the snake in the grass, and he sprang upon it with his heel. He went before the Convention; and instead of playing the religious hypocrite, instead of yielding to the temptation to sell his soul to the devil of insincerity for a governor's seat, he renounced that seat and retained his integrity. He went before that Convention, and told them that he was an infidel, and he gloried in the name, and that he despised with his whole soul the meanness of those bigots and intolerants who had dragged their creeds into the political field and put them up as a bar to his aspirations, but they could not bribe him, nor cow him, nor make him a truckling hypocrite; and he closed with these words, "I will see the Republican party in h—l before I will thus stultify myself."

I call that moral heroism. I say that a young man who could thus take the object of his political ambition and lay it as a sacrifice on the altar of integrity possesses some of the grandest virtues; and that man was Robert Ingersoll. One such magnificent deed as that is enough to atone for whatever unjust judgments he has rendered against the Church since that day. I tell you, my friends, it is not "God in the Constitution," nor "God" in the creeds, nor "God" on our lips, but goodness in our hearts, that is going to save us as a nation. When we can put more of that sincerity and incorruptible integrity into the character of our politicians and our people, we shall read no more—for shame!—of the suffrages of free American citizens, in the market, to the highest bidder. Cry out against such corruption, in whichsoever party it appears! Believe or disbelieve in a God above nature, or a God in nature, or a God one with nature, or an "unknown God," as you may; believe or disbelieve in the great philosopher's "Genesis of the Deities," or in some other hypothesis, as you may, but let us never cease to see eternal goodness enthroned king and ruler of our lives, and to reverence and honor every man, as he is loyal to that upper thought. If men call him "atheist" whose life is a struggle to obey the divinest law which Heaven has ever revealed to earth, then the name of reproach shall ere long become honorable and glorious.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE ENGLISH POETS: Selections, with Critical Introductions by Various Writers and a General Introduction by Matthew Arnold. Edited by Thomas Humphrey Ward, M.A. Vols. I. and II. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.

It would be quite impossible to extend too warm a welcome to such a book as this. Its plan is admirably conceived, and has not been anticipated by any previous collection or anthology. Many volumes of selections now before the public are admirable in their way. As a volume of lyric poetry, it is not easy to imagine a better selection than the Golden Treasury of Francis Turner Palgrave. But its scope is limited. Dana's Household Book of Poetry has a much wider range, and is an indispensable book. It will not be superseded by the present work. Its arrangement is by subjects, and it contains a great many anonymous poems, some of which are among the best. Emerson's Parnassus is another excellent collection, but it reflects the individuality of Mr. Emerson in a very striking and sometimes remarkable manner. Mr. Emerson, for example, does not consider Shelley a poet; and this opinion is expressed in the scantiness of his selections from his verse.

The aim of the work we are reviewing is more critical than those already named, and its arrangement is entirely different. The selections are arranged according to their authorship and in a chronological order. In these respects, it agrees with The Family Library of British Poetry, edited by James T. Fields and E. P. Whipple; but it differs from it in being the work of many instead of only two persons, and in having, besides a slight biographical sketch of each poet, a criticism of his poetry by a writer specially qualified for his task. This difference involves an infinite superiority. The selections are made in admirable taste, although inevitably the lover of poetry will miss many favorites. But the critical notices are what give the work its preëminent value. Many of them are by writers whom we have come to associate pleasantly with their subjects in the biographical series, English Men of Letters. Thus, the Chaucer is by Mr. Ward, the editor of the work: Spenser by is R. W. Church, the Dean of St. Paul's; and, foolishly enough, his ecclesiastical title is given, and not his name, as if there had been no Dean of St. Paul's before him and would be none after.

Only two volumes have as yet appeared; Two more will complete the work. This compactness is made possible by the exclusion of living writers and the dramatists, except as the latter are represented by their songs,—no mean representation. To have included dramatic poetry would have doubled the size of the work; and, moreover, extracts from plays are sure to be unsatisfactory. The better the play, the more necessary it is to know it as a whole. The exclusion of living authors is equally commendable. The first volume extends from Chaucer to Donne; the second, from Ben Jonson to Dryden. The fourth will end with Keble. One of the most interesting sections in the first volume is that upon ballads. The criticism is by Mr. A. Lang, and it is an excellent piece of work.

Some of the most admirable introductions in both the first and second volumes are by Edmund W. Gosse. He is particularly at home among the lyrists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The second volume is exceedingly rich with his selections and criticisms. Davenant, Denham, Waller, Randolph, Carew, and Herrick are all from his pen. He writes con amore and with much discrimination. The selections from Herrick are exceptionally rich and full. The Milton is by Mark Pattison, whose Milton in the English Men of Letters series left little to be desired. The Shakespeare is by Mr. Dowden, author of the Shakespeare Primer and among students of Shakespeare one of the best. He finds abundant satisfaction in the sonnets and the lyrics that are scattered through the plays.

We have saved the best wine till the last. But in the volumes it is served the first of all,—a general introduction by Matthew Arnold. He is always fascinating, and here he is at his best. Our own time is, he thinks, in greater need of poetry than some other times, because poetry preserves the ideas of religion while its forms are changing; and its forms are changing now at a quite unprecedented rate. His final test of poetry is the amount of truth and seriousness that it contains; and he applies this test to special instances with results that will be generally approved, but not wholly, perhaps, by the admirers of Robert Burns, though his opinion of "The Jolly Beggars" is extremely different from Principal Shairp's, by no means so conventionally proper.

ST. ASPENQUID OF MT. AGAMENTICUS. An Indian Idyl. By John Albee. Portsmouth. 1879.

"If we could listen but for an instant to the chant of the Indian muse," says Thoreau, "we should understand why he will not exchange his savageness for civilization." Civilization carried to excess buries man so deeply in the grave of custom, that his faculties grow numb, and he ceases to recognize what fills simpler souls with awe and delight. The Indian's intercourse with Nature permits independence to each. He does not project into all that he sees his own personality. His being does not escape from its narrow limits, like that of a modern poet, to flow with the waves, to dance and moan with the wind, to hover with the moon through the space of heaven, and feel itself one with the formless life of all.

> "The savage brought to all an eye, an ear,
> And left behind his mimic, fancied name,
> But not the deep imagined, reflex song,
> The earth revested by the plastic mind."

Mr. Albee's wreath of verse is a graceful tribute to the memory of this decaying race. He sings, as one breathes, simply and naturally. The graces of his style elude critical analysis. We are grateful for his serenity and mental repose, after the strained rhetoric and over-wrought expression characterizing much of our modern literature. It is like an oasis and deep well of refreshment to the mind and heart.

One of the great Algonkin race, St. Aspenquid, was

> "The Indian hero, sorcerer and saint,
> Known in the land as Passaconoway,
> And after called the good Saint Aspenquid."

Returning from a vain attempt to reconcile the Indian with the white race, he summons all the blood-bound tribes to their ancient meeting-place, the sacred mountain Agamenticus, that he may celebrate his funeral feast

> "With sacrifices due and farewell talk."

We see the tall warriors gathered round their camp-fires,

> "Sitting or standing, now in light or shade,
> As with the night-winds rose or sank the flames.
> And all about the mountain's woody slopes
> A veil of moonlit, opal mist crept up,
> Festooned across the pine-tree pinnacles,
> And islanding the band above the earth,
> With only night and stars for witnesses.
> They spoke but little, but the silence spoke;
> Men of few words and every word a thing;
> Impassive, taciturn, yet seeing all,
> And every sense infallible by use
> Of life lived in the sunshine or the dark,
> And conversant alone with Nature's works."

St. Aspenquid relates how he has sought to save his race with his rude craft of tomahawk and scalp, long bow and flinty arrow-head, and wiles taught to him by fox and hawk. But, more and more, the land

> "Was filled with these pale children of the sun."

Then he gathered all the charms known to Abenakian wizards, and spreading them out

> "Upon the mountain's highest, tabled ledge,
> I wove my arms toward heaven over them,
> If so be I might touch the Spirit's hand,
> And join His curse to mine against my foe."

Still, the redman warred; and he made one last effort, wandering westward, preaching that new word

> "Which I had heard when first the white man came,
> And asked of us, not hunting-grounds, but souls!
> Something he said of peace, good-will to men:
> Whether he meant this word not for himself,
> But only us, thereby to thrust a wedge
> Between our rights and his too treacherous greed,
> I know not; but, this thing to put to proof,
> I preached the white men's doctrines to themselves
> As they to us; did they not mean it so?
> And what was good for us as well for them?"

This, too, is in vain. Returning, he finds himself called the good Saint Aspenquid:—

> "People called me saint;
> Half scorn, half love! for they remembered not > To do the thing I taught, but only words!"
> . . . . . .
> Children of day, are these the pale-faced men;
> Children of night, are we the red man's tribes.
> The heavens are bright on them, and they will grow
> Like fields of maize in the long summer days.
> Yet you will fade before their orbing race,
> As when the hunter's roundest, riding moon
> Bathes wood and field in lustrous, frosty light,
> Then leaves their greenness all a blackened wreck."

THE Atlantic for November contains the first instalment of a new story by that gifted and delicate artist of fiction, Henry James, Jr., which all who seek the best of this class of literature will greet with pleasure. The Rev. S. J. Barrows makes a very successful magazine article on "The Silk Industry in America." Prof. N. S. Shaler of Harvard discourses wisely concerning "The Future of Weather Foretelling," and reports the progress already attained in this direction, while he indicates the complicated nature of meteorological science and the difficulties which attend its achievements. The Concord School of Philosophy obtains a temperate recognition from the stand-point of a neutral observer, in some reflections entitled "Philosophy and Apples," from the graceful pen of Geo. P. Lathrop. Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps discusses "What is a Fact?" and contends for the reasonableness of certain cardinal beliefs of religious faith or the spiritual life which the agnostic and materialist questions or denies. Miss Phelps argues with earnestness and ability, even if she may not be considered strictly logical or wholly convincing. Col. T. W.

Higginson, in a brief chapter of personal experience, to which he gives the title of "A Search for the Pleiades," hints at the unsuspected resources for the study of nature and romantic out-door adventure which await the explorer even near at home. There are two or three poems in the number, of which "The Jew's Gift" by T. B. Aldrich is the most striking. There is also a discriminating analysis of the characteristics of this author's fiction, which points out with much frankness his defects as well as his merits, and indicates the possibilities of his genius. The continued articles, "The Intimate Life of a Noble German Family" and the "Reminiscences of Washington," maintain their former excellence. Those who value magazines for their stories will find in "His Best" a powerful and touching sketch. "Recent Poetry" is a free handling of some volumes of poetry that have lately appeared. The book notices contain a very appreciative one of The True Republic by Col. Stickney, to which the attention of readers of the Index has been called. The Contributors' Club is as usual in keeping with the general excellence of the number.

IS IT SO?

A friend of mine maintains that thought and sentiment cannot be predicated of any being that has not brains; that the mineral and vegetable worlds are neither intelligent nor necessarily the product of intelligence; that there is no evidence of any being possessing infinite goodness, power, and wisdom; that what we call the works of God had no origin nor creator, being self-existent; that immortality cannot be proved; that the object of reverence is an idea and not a heavenly Father; that benevolence and conscientiousness are the principal faculties to be cultivated and relied upon for human happiness; that the works of art, the watch, the picture, the steam-engine, imply a human origin, and bear evidence of an intelligent cause, but afford no analogy for the operations of Nature; that the eternal order of celestial movements, the beauty and glory of the universe, are applications of laws of gravitation, cohesion, color, form, and not dependent on a being of intelligence or power. That friend of mine is remarkable for truthfulness and righteousness. W. G. B.

[To our thinking, while the evolution theory of the universe may not prove the existence of a being of intelligent power and goodness as creator, it does prove that the essence of moral intelligence is ingrained in the very nature and constitution of things. It is infinitely more important, and a better guarantee for the stability of truth and right, to know that the universe has brought forth myriads of beings like "W. G. B.'s" friend, who are remarkable for truthfulness and righteousness, and that the universe keeps doing this, than to know that there was one such being at the dim beginning of the process, if beginning there ever was.—ED.]

MR. F. E. ABBOT'S RETIREMENT.

A VOICE FROM AUSTRALIA.

Editor Free Religious Index:—

I have but recently read the announcement in the Index of Mr. Abbot's retirement from the editorship and management of that paper. I read it with much painful emotion, yet with some pleasure,—pain to learn that men of "liberal thought" should have forfeited their bond by failing to keep their engagements for the support of the paper; pain to see that out of the myriads of "freethinkers" in America there was no sufficient monetary help at the crisis; pain—greatest pain—that for these reasons the founder, the chief thinker and spirit of the Index, and its hardest worker, should, after an earnest labor of ten years in its behalf, be compelled to retire from that work.

Pleasure—heartfelt pleasure—in the noble and affectionate words in which Mr. Abbot tells us of his disappointment, not of his despair; in which he reluctantly resigns his high position among us, and in which he exultingly proclaims to us the bright advent of his successor.

Pleasure—great pleasure, too—it is for me, and for all "emancipated" men, I should think, to know that you, dear sir, have so generously responded to the call of duty, by taking upon yourself the arduous duties and responsibilities of the position. The mantle of Elijah has indeed fallen upon Elisha, while the spirit and the form of Elijah are still with us,—together to exhort us, to instruct us, and to guide us to the "highest paths."

If the much-vaunted spread of the principles of "freethought" in these modern days be true, and if they be of any moral effect upon the multitudes of "liberal thinkers," surely these men will now flock to the standard of the Index, and liberally support the paper and the cause with their purses, by their recommendations, and by their lives. I enclose names of subscribers obtained here, and subscribe myself your earnest well-wisher, B. R.

SYDNEY, N. S. WALES, Sept. 8, 1880.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will address the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., next Sunday.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC priest in Montreal, named Seguin, has written a letter to Bishop Fabre, announcing his conversion to Protestantism.

AMONG the successful candidates at the Cambridge (Eng.) University higher local examinations was Miss Helen Gladstone, the daughter of the Premier.

PROF. LUIGI MONTI, of Harvard College, began Tuesday, October 26, a course of six lectures on Dante, his Times and Works, before the Lowell Institute of this city.

REV. A. A. HOSKINS, who was recently deposed by his Methodist brethren of Milwaukee for heresy, it is reported, has been denied permission to officiate at a marriage ceremony in his former church.

MR. ROWLAND CONNOR, who has gone to East Saginaw, Michigan, to take charge of a liberal society there for a few months, writes, "The liberal movement here is far more promising than I had any reason to anticipate."

REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS is reported to have said that almost any company of clergymen gathering together and talking freely to each other will express opinions which would greatly surprise the congregations who ordinarily listen to those ministers.

PROF. ASA GRAY, the eminent botanist of Harvard College, will celebrate his seventieth birthday Nov. 18. It is said that Prof. Gray is soon to go abroad for a year. His head-quarters will be at the Herbarium of the Kew Botanical Gardens, where he will be engaged in studying the Compositæ for the next volume of his great opus, the "Flora of North America."

REV. S. J. BARROWS is announced as the new editor of the Christian Register. Mr. Barrows has ably and acceptably served as Mr. Ames's substitute in several vacation seasons, and is his natural successor. He is expected to enter on his new duties the 1st of next January. Meantime, the Register keeps the even tenor of its way in the efficient hands of Rev. Mr. Batchelor, of Salem.

PROF. JACOB BOLL, of Dallas, Texas, died September 29, while engaged in scientific exploration in Wilbarge County of that State. Prof. Boll was a Swiss naturalist and geologist, a favorite pupil of Agassiz, and a man of distinguished scientific reputation. His name is honored in the Harvard Academy of Science, in Philadelphia, Paris, Geneva, Berlin, Zürich, and other seats of learning in Europe. In Texas, in the absence of a State geologist, for six years past his labors have been of great value to science and to the State.

BISHOP COLENSO, of Natal, who was so much talked about a few years ago on account of his advanced views on the Pentateuch, lives a very quiet, uneventful life at Bishopstown, near Maritzburg. He is rarely seen in the city except on Sunday, when he conducts services. He is described as elephantine in appearance, being almost seven feet high and of massive frame. He wears a wide-brimmed stove-pipe beaver hat of the old-fashioned cut and a long coat of thin black material. He is regarded with awe and reverence by the natives, who salute him as supreme or great chief. The Bishop is now sixty-six years old, but retains his vigor of mind. One of his daughters acts as his amanuensis; and Kaffirs, whom he has always befriended, are his printers.—Independent.

THE funeral service of Mrs. Lydia Maria Child was held at her late home in Wayland on Saturday afternoon. In accordance with her own request, it was private. Among those present were some of Mrs. Child's former neighbors, some of them poor people who had been recipients of her charity, Wendell Phillips, two nieces, Mrs. Parsons of New York city and Miss Abbie Francis of Cambridge, Mrs. Russell of Boston and friends from Medford. The Rev. William Salter of Roxbury, who at present supplies the Wayland Unitarian pulpit, conducted the funeral services. He took the last book written by Mrs. Child, Aspirations of the World, and selected portions of it for the basis of his remarks. Wendell Phillips, who had been requested by the family friends to speak at the funeral, delivered a fine eulogy on the deceased. He spoke of her literary activity, reviewing her professional life-work from the time of writing her first book, Hobomok, when she was twenty, up to the date of her death. The principal events of her life, including her anti-slavery efforts, were also reviewed. Mr. Phillips remarked that Mrs. Child's greatest pleasure was in giving freely to the poor and to worthy charities. At the close of the service, the body of Mrs. Child was interred in the family lot beside those of her husband, David Lee Child, who died in the autumn of 1874.—Boston Advertiser.

MRS. LITA BARNEY SAYLES has these generous words for the Index in the last number of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, which in view of some sharp thrusts at us recently from the Spiritualist organs are rather soothing: "I like the Free Religious Index very much, and find, as usual, much information in it that I could not, if it was withdrawn. Perhaps just out of sight there's a bit of black ribbon in memory of our noble friend Abbot's ten years of splendidly done work, and its external relinquishment; but this is only a change in his life of usefulness, such as Mr. Frothingham has made in his, and which will probably result in much good to the world. And if our warm-hearted worker, Prof. Adler, can have the courage to stand above the dead body of his most devoted friend and helper, the good Mr. Seligman, and say: 'This is no time for tears. The world needs us: we must close up the ranks, and move along,' then we can well afford to say the same of Mr. Abbot's past work, and hope for the promise of the future. Free Religious people, whose organ the Index is, are a spiritually-minded people: they are not materialists, as is often averred. We need all the liberal papers possible, that are pure in tone and just in intent; and having derived so much pleasure from its pages, since its birth, I am glad to say this to Spiritualists who may have a little money left after sustaining our own organs."

DEFERRED.

If thou shouldst suffer wrong,
Of fraud or falsehood at thy brother's hands,
The hidden root of thy revenge nurse long
And patiently, until it flowering stands,—

High as the topmost heaven,
Deep as the ocean, broad as flowing light,
Warm as the circling life which God hath given,
To vibrate in thy veins and his. The might

Of justice on thy side
Shall make thee bold; but keep thy vengeance set.
Strike not, while fleeting wealth and power and pride
Make glad his world. Not yet, thy day, not yet.

Gaze on his fertile fields,
His fair domains, his happy, smiling brood
Of little ones, and all that fortune yields
To bless. Thine hour of triumph still holds good.

When storms shall sweep his roof
And fate shall blight his cattle or his grain,
When friends of fairer skies shall stand aloof,
When Death shall thrill his darkened home with pain,

Go thou, and lift the load
That weighs upon his burdened heart that day.
Set purse and scrip before him. What he owed
To thee shall melt in Pity's glow away!

Then, lest his eyes bowed down
Should lift, and find thee sudden, unaware,— Haste thee. For thus thy brow shall bear the crown
Reserved for holiest saints to win and wear.

Let him not know thy deed,—
So shall it spread and blossom in thy soul:
Until thy life hath past from earthly need,
Its growth and fragrance shall thy days control.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 28, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

TO THE OLD INDEX STOCKHOLDERS.

At the suggestion of Mr. F. E. Abbot, the Directors of the old Index Association, before closing its affairs, voted to send an appeal to all non-delinquent stockholders, asking them to contribute, for the publication of the Free Religious Index, the amount of the tenth annual assessment on their stock, which would have been assessed this autumn, had that old Association continued. A number of stockholders answered the appeal promptly, and either sent the cash or their pledges for the sum. This is the time of the year when the assessment would have been made; and we hereby renew the appeal. We think that generally the friends who have stood faithfully by the old Association for nine years, and made all their payments for that time, will want to square up their account by volunteering the payment of this tenth assessment. And we have hopes that even some others, who may have been delinquent perhaps for a year or more, may be moved to do the same. We begin below a new list of payments made the last two weeks. Let it rapidly grow. We need the money, friends; and if you need the Index, or think it is needed for the cause of free, rational, and humanitarian religion, let us now have your pecuniary aid.

BEARING FALSE WITNESS.

At a meeting recently held in Philadelphia in the interest of the proposed Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution, one of the speakers, Rev. R. C. Wylie, of Iowa, gave an essay criticising the Secular Theory of Civil Government. He appears, judging from the report of the Christian Statesman (the organ of the Christian Amendment party), to have had chiefly in mind the movements in behalf of State secularization in this country, and yet to have very imperfectly informed himself of the real aim of these movements. He bears, in fact, what must be called false witness concerning them.

For instance, he says—to name his most important misrepresentation first—that "secularism demands that our laws shall be wholly disconnected with morals." A more flagrant misconception than this could hardly be imagined. In the "Demands of Liberalism," formulated by Mr. Francis Abbot and adopted as the basis of all the organizations working for the secularization of the State in this country, the eighth demand reads as follows: "We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty." If Mr. Wylie wrote his essay without consulting the constitutions of the secularistic organizations, and especially without having before him the "Demands of Liberalism," which have been kept so constantly and so long before the public eye, then his negligence in preparing for his task was of a kind that is equivalent to a gross injustice. If he had the "Demands of Liberalism" under his eye, how is it possible that he could have written that "secularism demands that our laws shall be wholly disconnected with morals," when this common platform of the movement states explicitly that "all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of NATURAL MORALITY, EQUAL RIGHTS, AND IMPARTIAL LIBERTY"? Even if Mr. Wylie were to take the absurdly irrational and unhistorical ground that there is no genuine morality outside of Christianity, it would be none the less most unjust for him to impose this absurd interpretation upon secularists, who expressly claim that there is a morality which is natural, resting upon ethical laws deeper and broader than Christianity, and giving authority and sanction to all legitimate civil laws. The statement in the eighth "Demand" is so worded as to make it clear that what is meant is that civil government should not enact what is called Christian morality because it is "Christian,"—that is, resting upon the authority of alleged revelation,—but should leave it to take its place in legislation with universal morality, of which much of it is a part.

Some Liberals, in their, as it seems to us, mistaken and mischievous opposition to the United States postal laws against giving mail privileges to manifestly indecent literature, have in the heat of discussion uttered some such sentiment as this, —that the national government has nothing to do with regulating the morals of citizens; a statement which, unexplained and unmodified, might give foundation for some such charge as that which Mr. Wylie makes, and possibly is what he had in mind. But even those who have expressed this opinion, or something like it, have never been so wild, so far as we have seen, as to say that all our laws, State as well as national, should be "wholly disconnected with morals." What they have specially referred to in such statements is the postal laws; and it would be unjust to base even upon such statements, however morally dangerous they may be, the charge which Mr. Wylie brings.

Again, Mr. Wylie says: "Another thing demanded by this theory is the secularizing of education. It demands not only the expulsion of the Bible from the schools, but also the expulsion of all moral and religious training." And again we have to say in reply that an utterance like this could only come by gross neglect of the most natural means of information, or else—which we are unwilling to say—by gross fabrication. What "the theory" of secularism demands is the secularizing of that part of education which is under the supervision of the State at the public expense; that is, by means of money raised by taxation of all the people without regard to their religious views. On the ground of simple justice, this is demanded. But by no means the whole of education, even of those who attend the public schools, comes through those schools. There is home education. There is education through the church and the Sunday-school and by any instrumentalities that these may set in operation. And secularism makes no profession of any attempt to interfere with any amount of religious training that is given by these agencies. It simply would leave religious instruction to its recognized and legitimate instrumentalities. As to "moral" training, that is a very different thing. And Mr. Wylie should be required to give his authority for the statement that secularism demands "the expulsion of all moral training from the schools." So far from this being true, secularism, as we know it, lays special emphasis on moral training, and would require that it should be made a part of the regular school instruction. Secularism, indeed, holds that moral training can be wholly disconnected with theology; and there are prominent secularists who believe in the possibility and the urgent necessity of a moral text-book being prepared for school use, which, without touching on any controverted religious problems, could be made to cover all the most essential principles of morality,—an opinion to which we give full assent.

Again, but a point of much less importance, Mr. Wylie complains that secularism demands that the civil government shall not support chaplains in any of its departments or in prisons and reformatory institutions of the State. Yes, secularism does demand this,—demands it on the same ground that it demands that the money raised by taxation of all the people, without regard to their views of religion, shall not be used for any specific instruction in religion in the public schools. And, considering what an empty formality and even farce the performances of chaplains in legislative halls often become, the demand, at least in part, might be made even in the interest of religion. But the true reason for it is that, according to the spirit and principles of civil government in our country, religion, in all its departments and institutions, is left to the voluntary action of the people in their private capacity; and this, not for the sake of hindering or obstructing religion, but for protecting with impartial justice the equal liberty of conscience of all. With regard to the point under this head which Mr. Wylie makes most account of, —the appointment of chaplains in prisons and reformatory institutions, there is no reason why the churches should not consider these as missionary ground and support their own chaplains in them as they do elsewhere, under of course such disciplinary restrictions as may be necessary. And secularism makes no demand for the expulsion of such religious ministrations from penal institutions.

But, in fine, we must conclude our criticism of Mr. Wylie's address by saying that, if his action in this matter is a specimen of "Christian morality" and of the kind of religion the "Christian Amendment" party would introduce into the schools and the institutions of government, the less of it we have in them the better.

LYDIA MARIA CHILD.

Since the last issue of the Index, death has removed from the list of officers of the Free Religious Association one of its best known and most honored names, that of Lydia Maria Child. For the past eight years, Mrs. Child has been a Vice-President of the Association. And the position with her has not merely been an honorary one. She has shown an active interest in the welfare of the Association and the promotion of its objects. No year has passed, we think, when she has not sent a contribution to its funds. Usually, she has been in attendance at its annual meetings; though, on account of her habitual disinclination to appear on public platforms, few might know of her presence. One of her last expressions of interest was to send, a few weeks ago, from her accumulated stores extracts for the column of the Index entitled "Essence of all Faiths."

Mrs. Child became by natural right a member and officer in the Free Religious Association; for she had been for many years a worker for Free Religious ideas, and was in no small measure one of those pioneers who prepared the ground which that organization has occupied. Her most extensive literary work, the Progress of Religious Ideas, was written, indeed, from the stand-point of Free Religion. Personally we have to express our own great indebtedness to that book—read just as we began the professional study of theology—for opening our eyes to the equality of the religions in respect to their origin and the substance of their teachings. This book was a very remarkable one for any author to have written at that day. Of course in its information concerning the ethnic religions, it has been to a large extent superseded by the immense advance of research in this department of scholarship during the last twenty-five years—the period since Mrs. Child's book was published. Yet we know of no work on the same subject within this time that has been written with such absolutely fair, impartial, and unpartisan spirit and method. So perfectly did Mrs. Child succeed in her aim of "placing Christianity on a level with other religions, so far as the manner of representation is concerned," that no reader could tell from the book itself which religion among those she delineated she herself accepted. Her plan was to let the religions speak through their best voices for themselves; and nobly did she fulfil it. The book from this point of view, as an example of absolute religious and literary justice, cannot be superseded, and is most profitable reading to-day. For fulness and accuracy of information, too, up to the time of its publication, it has not been questioned.

But Mrs. Child was much better known to the community at large by her other literary works, which were voluminous and of wide range of topics. Her name in full—Lydia Maria Child—has been a household word in American homes for more than fifty years. She published her first book, an Indian story, before she was twenty years old; and her last, Aspirations of the World,—a book of extracts from all the world's faiths,—only two years ago. And what a busy life in the sixty years between, with the whole anti-slavery struggle, wherein she stood among the foremost in the heroic ranks, flung into the midst of it! Some other pen, we trust, will tell for our readers the completer story of this well-rounded life,—the story of a gentleness equal to her heroism and strength; of a heart actively sympathetic with every cause of human amelioration; of a self-sacrifice that was constantly finding, after the simple wants of her simple mode of life were satisfied, "more money by her than she needed," and sending it out on errands of philanthropy and mercy. It was not our fortune to know her intimately enough to more than hint of this side of her character and work. We only, from the outer circle of her friends, would bring to-day this tribute of grateful regard to place on her new-made grave.

Our Unitarian Free Religious co-worker in Chicago, Unity, makes the following good point in its latest issue: "Recently, as all the world knows, Robert Ingersoll delivered a telling Sunday address at McVicker's Theatre, urging the superiority of Righteousness over Creed; teaching that Salvation comes through conduct, not through vicarious atonement. At least, eight prominent pulpits in this city devoted the following Sunday to answering this lay preacher, seeking to counteract his hurtful influence. The same week there was gathered in this city a Saloon Keepers' Convention, called to devise measures to secure free traffic in whiskey. Before this body, committed to what is avowedly the most debasing and impious industry of America, appeared the Mayor of the city and made a complimentary speech. Bible texts were conspicuously displayed throughout the hall, lending a semblance of sanctity to their wicked business; and, as far as reported, but three pulpits in this great city undertook to counteract this demoralization. Is there not here a sad lack of moral perspective? Which is most threatening, doubt or drink? Which is more dangerous, Ingersoll or the saloon-keepers,—Free inquiry or free whiskey? Whom should the Church most fear, the prophet of character who denies the creed, or the destroyer of character who belies the creed?"

Postmaster-General Maynard has renewed the war against the lottery-dealers. His predecessor, General Key, began the good work, forbidding the use of the mails for carrying the circulars of certain Kentucky lotteries. The dealers carried their case to the United States District Court, which sustained the action of the Postmaster-General. From this decision, they appealed to the Supreme Court; and, for some reason not very clear, pending a decision on this appeal, General Key allowed the use of the mails for the circulars. Mr. Maynard not only agrees with Mr. Key that the law fully authorizes the exclusion of such matter from the mails, but he now takes the very sensible view that the court of proper jurisdiction, though it be not final, having sustained the action of the Post-office Department, that action must stand as law until reversed by the higher tribunal. The law under which this nefarious lottery-traffic has been forbidden the use of United States postal privileges is the same law which the Chicago Liberal League Convention clamored for repealing. The lottery-dealers are fighting the Postal Department with all their might; for they know, as do the dealers in filthy literature, that with the loss of mail privileges one of the chief means for sustaining their wicked business is gone.

THE ANTE-REFORMERS.

The name "Free Religion," so far as I know, is new; having first come into use, I believe, at about the time of the formation of the Free Religious Association, some thirteen years ago. Other designations have been employed to cover substantially the same thing,—as "Universal Religion," a term used frequently by Mr. Samuel Johnson; "Absolute Religion," often found in the writings of Theodore Parker; the "Religion of Humanity," etc. The phrase "Free Religion" is not quite happy, but perhaps no other any less objectionable can be selected.

But the thing certainly, whatever may be true of the name, is not new; and it would be interesting to trace the dawning and the growth of that idea in the minds of men in the different ages of the past. The old Hindus, who saw so much, and were so bright, catholic, and wise, did not fail to discern that religion is grounded in elements that belong to human nature universal, and that the special, the historic faiths are all essays more or less partial, and converge properly to the one fundamental and transcendent faith. Kalidasa, one of their most celebrated poets (he has usually been assigned to the first century B.C.), says, "The roads leading to perfection, which vary according to the different revealed systems, all end in Thee, as the waves of the Ganges flow to the ocean."

And the thought of the universality of religion, the essential oneness under all the forms of expression, and the over-arching ideal, finds expression constantly in the writings of the Sufi mystics, whose period corresponds approximately to what we call the middle ages in Europe. One of them, of the thirteenth century, says: "As water from the glasses is all poured into one vessel, so all the praises are mingled together. Since He that is celebrated is wholly one, all religions form but one religion." The external or positive can be dispensed with by him who has risen to the substance and spirit. "The compass," he says, "only serves to direct the prayers of those who are outside the Kaaba, whilst within it no one knows the use of it."

St. Augustine, the eminent church Father, seems to have had some vision of the same great truth: only, with the eager wish to appropriate as belonging to his own special faith, like to that which actuates many among the Liberals to-day, he is disposed to invoke for this universal faith the name and the characteristic features of Christianity. "That which is now called the Christian religion existed among the ancients; and never did not exist from the planting of the human race until Christ came in the flesh, at which time the true religion, which already subsisted, began to be called Christianity."

When ecclesiastical history shall be studied in a broader and nobler spirit than has hitherto obtained, it is probable that we shall be able to see gropings and dim anticipations of this truth in the early centuries in some of the sects that have come down to us under the brand of heretics. It has long seemed to the writer that the noted heresiarch, Manes or Mani (third century), could we once get at his real view, was a Free Religious reformer of his time. According to the Oriental writers, his aim was "to establish a perfect universal religion." He was an eclectic: he drew some things from Christianity, some from Buddhism, and some from Zoroastrianism. But, be that point as it may, it is not to be doubted that we have quite distinct enunciation of these principles in the sixteenth century, in the reign of the Mogul emperor Akbar. "A more extraordinary man," says Prof. Max Müller, "never sat on the throne of India. Brought up as a Mohammedan, he discarded the religion of the Prophet as superstitious, and then devoted himself to a search after the true religion." He invited representatives of all faiths to his court, encouraged the freest discussion and interchange of views, and sought to arrive at the fundamental grounds in which all faiths are one. He was for many years looked upon as a secret convert to Christianity, but was, as Müller assures us, "a rationalist and deist." "Akbar," says the Dabistan, "mixed the best and purest of every religion for the formation of his own faith." A remarkable liberality for a man that could neither read nor write, and stood the monarch of a powerful empire.

But in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries we find in India individual reformers that well deserve recognition as expositors and apostles of the universal word. There are many names. I can mention but two, Nanak and Kabir. The former was "a grain factor by trade, who threw aside Vedas and Koran, denounced caste, sati (widow-burning), and all other degrading customs and institutions, and preached pure theism, broad humanity, and a code of morals nowhere surpassed."* He was the founder of the band or association called Sikhs, which, taking on subsequently a political and military character, has in recent times played a very important part in the history of Northwestern India. "He alone," says Nanak, "is a true Hindu whose heart is just, and he only a good Mohammedan whose life is pure."

Kabir, in the sixteenth century, seems to have been a man of quite exceptional genius; and he certainly was one of the most remarkable religious reformers of modern time. Sentences from him are these:—

"Live according to your knowledge. Fetch water for your own drinking, nor demand it from others."

"The goose (man) abandons the lake, and would lodge in a water-jar. Kabir has called aloud, 'Repair to your own place, nor destroy your habitation.'"

(Emerson says in like spirit: "Why should not we also enjoy an original relation to the universe?")

"The Hindu fasts every eleventh day, the Mussulman during the Ramazan. Who formed the remaining months that you should venerate but one? If the Creator dwell in tabernacles, whose residence is the universe?"

The benign effect from the example and teachings of these pure reformers has never been spent. Within India and outside of India, it has been marked. From Akbar and his liberal court, Spiegel tells us, Ramohun Roy, and, by consequence, the Brahmo-Somaj of to-day, have their parentage. Buddhism, which itself originally may be called a form of Free Religion, has felt the influence. Witness the free churches of Buddhists in Siam, who "reject all that is miraculous, and adhere only to the moral teachings of their faith," and like movements for amelioration in Burmah Ceylon, etc. It is a proverb with the Chinese that "religions are many, but reason is one: we all are brothers."

Within the pale of Christianity itself was Quakerism, which, originally a worship of the inner light, would, if carried into full effect and allowed free scope and expansion, have founded the church of humanity, and inherited the great future.

Thus we see that all along the ages old and new, there have been ante-reformers, forerunners, baptists in the wilderness uttering their cry, and making straight the paths for the coming of the Most High. It seems to have been reserved for our own time to make the first distinct articulation of this broad principle, and to essay, albeit in very rude and elemental way thus far, some organization upon its basis. The Free Religious Association stands representative of this idea. It is in a degree a fulfilment, and in a larger measure, as I trust, a prophecy. Few of us comprehend the breadth of our thought, or the exceeding fruitfulness for humanity which it will yet reveal.

Free and universal religion is the only form of religious faith that can address itself to the advancing intelligence of the time, can command its suffrage and enlist its support. All the others are essentially outgrown, and have vitality and power only as they borrow from the universal, and accommodate themselves in a degree to the requirement of the present. It will, it naturally must, form close affiliation with science, and will work in connection with that powerful auxiliary, effectively for the physical and social redemption of man. What strength, what reënforcement it will minister to the individual soul, as it shall open before it the entire volume of the experience, the thought of humanity!

Doubtless, our conceptions fall at least as far short of what the future shall reveal as those of the early reformers, some of whom I have named, did of things which are well seen in this present. But have we not already enough in the ken of our vision, poor and partial as that still is, to incite us to do and to spend in behalf of the broadest, and most benign religious advance that has yet dawned on the world?

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

The Associated Charities of Boston published in last week's "Bulletin" the following interesting letter from Prof. Felix Adler, with regard to District Nursing among the poor, as carried out by the "Society for Ethical Culture," New York:—

We consider the duties of the district nurse to be: First, to bring about proper ventilation, to prepare proper food for the sick, to establish cleanliness, and of course to see to it that the physician's orders are carried out,—giving injections, applying bandages, etc. The nurses are always supplied with a large stock of bed linen and clothing, beef-tea, brandy, and the like. The nurse is also empowered to hire assistants for the purpose of scrubbing rooms, where, as is often the case, the filth of such rooms is too great to be overcome by the nurse's own efforts. But this is only a part of the nurse's duty. She brings a direct moral influence to bear upon the people whom she visits. A district nurse must always be a lady, in the full sense of the word; and the fact that the lady comes down to their plane of life, and shows herself willing to do the most menial offices for them, seldom fails to produce an impression in the hearts even of the degraded poor. There are touching instances of gratitude which I could mention in this connection.

There is a third and very important aspect of the nurses' work. Nearly every day of charity among the poor, we found ourselves frequently baffled by the tricks of impostors. It seems almost impossible even for the vigilant officers of charitable societies so to penetrate into the interior of families as to make deception impossible. It seemed to us that the district nurses, besides everything else that they might accomplish, would be our safe guides in alms-giving, would lead us to cases of real distress, and, without trespassing upon the privacy of their domestic life, would reveal to us the inward condition of the families of the poor. Nay, we hoped in course of time to acquire reliable statistics of pauperism in New York which might eventually become the basis for more effective measures than have yet been undertaken toward its amelioration.

I will only add that we have not been deceived altogether in these expectations, in that already many facts of the utmost significance come to our notice, revealing a degree of distress the very possibility of which we had never conceived.

Before we began our work, district nurses had already been sent out in New York under the auspices of the City Mission.

The points wherein we differ from the City Mission are sufficient to distinguish our work from others. The nurses of the mission are subject to the order of missionaries, and are sent upon their requisition. The object of the nurses' call is as much, or perhaps more, to convert the soul as to restore the body. Our nurses are attached to dispensaries, and are entirely under the control of a medical board appointed by the authorities of the dispensaries. Their object is purely humanitarian. I think our records will show that the majority of our patients, thus far about five hundred, have been Roman Catholics.

Our system of district nursing is completed by a Relief Committee, whose duty it is to follow the footsteps of the nurse wherever she reports distress. This Relief Committee consists of ladies and gentlemen of my society. We pay our nurses $600 a year, besides car fares. Expenses for bed linen, food, delicacies for patients, make a further article of expense, which must be taken into account, as it is indispensable. As our means increase, we propose increasing the number of nurses. We have at present two, attached respectively to the Demilt and New York Dispensaries.

Sociological.

DR. GILMAN, in his recent address before the Social Science Association at Saratoga, gave emphasis to the point that it is not a society for the promotion of reform, nor an assembly whose object is charity; but its object is the promotion of science, the ascertainment of principles and laws. Too much emphasis cannot be laid upon this point. Of course, there are not as yet, and, until Mr. Herbert Spencer finishes his great work, there will not be, any systematic treatises upon social science, such as are now plentiful upon any of the so-called natural sciences. Indeed, Mr. Spencer has written a special book upon the study of sociology, so little known did he consider even the methods of procedure for getting at its first principles. The portals of social science are yet clouded with many dreary superstitions. But there is no reason for denying the validity of the science itself, only because it is little known as a science, is complicated with other sciences, or is sadly lacking in development. As Prof. Gilman pithily remarks, "To those who say there is no social science, the answer is, There soon will be; for some of the ablest intellects in the world are now applying to the study of social phenomena the same industry in collecting facts, the same patience in weighing them, the same methods of analysis and synthesis, which have been employed with effect in geology, in zoölogy and biology, in anthropology, ethnology, and psychology." The aim of the Association was declared to be "a study of the conditions which tend to make a perfect state of society, where 'each is for all, and all for each.'" The great subdivisions of the science were enumerated as follows: First, those subjects which pertain to the physical well-being of the community. This includes commercial freedom as well as sanitary regulation. Next, morality or social order,—the conditions of society favorable to temperance, chastity, honesty, frugality, industry, and quiet. Then, intellectual culture, including all subjects relating to education. Finance comes next. "If the finances of a community are crooked, nothing will go straight. The currency is the route on which we all travel; and, if that leads down a chasm, down go we all, though the rails be plated with silver." And, last, is sound legislation accompanying good customs and usages.

NOW THAT ministers everywhere and of all denominations are beginning to recognize the fact that the most acceptable preaching is that which refers to this world, while references to another world and to the schemes of salvation for reaching its choicest spots are getting to be uncertain in tone and nebulous in meaning, we wish it were possible to persuade them in a body to turn their attention to the study of social science. Of course, as a body, they know almost nothing about it; and the task of mastering it may appear so formidable that many even of those who recognize the necessity for a change in methods of preaching will prefer to run the risk of hanging on to their pulpits by the slender threads of old-time theology yet left to them. But all whose brains are yet plastic, who have courage enough to face facts without flinching, and faith enough in humanity to believe that there is a good time coming, or that the bad time may be alleviated by a little work, a little knowledge, a little patience, and a little exercise of justice, and gentleness,—all, in other words, who are fitted to preach,—would find in the pursuit of this new knowledge enough to give an added zest to life, and to make them more serviceable to the world than they can ever hope to be, if they remain in the old familiar ruts. Sunday lyceums, into which so many churches are now degenerating, would have a greater influence upon Monday's living.

A SOCIOLOGICAL interest attaches to the concluding portion of Mr. Edison's article in the October number of the North American Review. Of more real importance, we believe, to civilization than the success of the electric light, will be the ability of the electric light companies to sell electricity for "power" in the day-time. "Power can be supplied," says Mr. Edison, "from twenty-five horse-power down to one one-hundredth of a horse-power on the same mains that supply light," and therefore "elevators, printing-presses, sewing-machines, fans, pumps, etc., can be run by electricity from a central station." In easing household labors, therefore,—that is, in making life better worth the living for a multitude of persons now condemned to drudgery,—this invention bids fair to do great good.

A LETTER FROM COLORADO.

The first settlement where Denver now stands was made some twenty years ago, amid dangers and difficulties seemingly of an insurmountable character. I stopped there on my way to California in 1871. The city then numbered seven thousand inhabitants. Its present population is thirty-seven thousand. Situated on the river Platte, fourteen miles from the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains, in the midst of a good grazing country, with five railroads, and others in process of construction, having a large supply trade with the mining towns of the mountains,—rich in almost every variety of metal and mineral,—with flour mills, steam mills, woollen factories, and a large number of industries, favored with a remarkably salubrious and healthy climate, and having a population unusually intelligent, wide-awake, and energetic, Denver has unquestionably many of the elements necessary for steady growth and substantial prosperity in the future. The industry and enterprise that have built up such a city, in so short a time, six hundred miles and more from what was regarded as the ultima thule of civilization on the Atlantic slope of the continent, in spite of the disadvantages of distance and isolation and continual trouble with savages, will assuredly overcome the obstacles which lie in the way of its expanding greatness.

Denver has spacious streets, substantial business blocks, first-class hotels, and a large number of very handsome residences. The streets are usually thronged with people; and in the evening, walking along one of the thoroughfares for a few blocks, one can easily imagine himself in Chicago or New York. Everybody seems to have plenty of money, to be full of business, and to think Denver the best place to live in on the globe. The city is no place for stupid people. But if a man is smart, active, and energetic, is acquainted with the world, and "knows what he is about," it is a place that will suit him. Chinamen in quite large numbers are seen on the streets; and their sign-boards over small shops announce that Sam Wah or Hung Lee does washing and ironing, and repairs clothes with neatness. They are acknowledged to be sober, very industrious, quiet, and well-behaved, honest in their dealings and strict observers of the law. Although "heathens," in some respects they set an example which many Christian workingmen who denounce them could follow, with improvement in their morals and manners.

There is a Unitarian Church at Denver, but it is not well sustained. A number of the most distinguished Unitarian ministers have occupied its pulpit a few months at a time, but the society now is without pastor and has no regular meetings. The difficulty is that the church and the congregations that assemble to hear its ministers are largely made up of men and women who have outgrown Unitarianism as well as the evangelical theology. The freethought element in Denver is very large. I have during the past nine years given half a dozen courses of lectures in the city, and almost invariably to large and appreciative audiences. The city has three or four daily papers, and they were all fair and just in the reports they gave of my lecture. The following, from the Denver Daily Republican of Sept. 27, will give some idea of the liberality of the press and of the people:—

"Denver is a city that of all others seems most certain to become a stronghold of radicalism. A self-dependent spirit naturally throws aside the superstitious dogmas that its reason cannot receive, and refuses to cringe before the power of modern priesthood, or submit itself to an abject worship of a faith that promises everything and gives nothing. The people of Denver are self-dependent; and in their freedom, which has been forced upon them by circumstances, they accord to others the rights that blind dogmas would deny. This is the basis of liberalism, call it by whatever name you may."

From Denver, I went to Leadville, by the Denver and South Park Railroad, riding a whole day through cañons, under the shadow of cliffs hundreds of feet high, by the side of massive walls of granite, red sandstone, and conglomerate rock that reach up to the sky, castellated monuments, frowning buttresses, and battlements that seem wrought to withstand a siege, over rugged heights and just on the verge of chasms whose awful depths made my head dizzy as I looked down into them; passing now and then grassy slopes and cosey homes, upon which the eye lingered with pleasure after seeing for miles the lofty precipitous cliffs and the deep gorges, gulches, and cañons of the mountains.

From a little camp of two or three hundred miners ensconced between two lofty mountain ranges, far beyond railroad facilities and without established lines of postal or business communication, Leadville has, in three years, become a city of more than fifteen thousand inhabitants, with the usual concomitants and conveniences of a city of this size, including railroad connections, streets lighted with gas, three daily and several weekly newspapers, churches, theatres, etc. The city is built upon a broad plateau, and is sheltered on the east, north, and south by the foot-hills of the Mosquito range; while the great mountain range to the west, visible a hundred miles, luminous with the sheen of everlasting snow, presents a scene at once majestic and sublime. Leadville is at an elevation of ten thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea. It is no place for people of weak lungs or settled pulmonary diseases. Pneumonia is a common disease, rapid in its progress and very fatal. The changes of air pressure are more sudden and frequent than at lower altitudes. The mountains are the battle-fields of the winds. There was a snow-fall while I was in the city.

The streets of Leadville are thronged with people day and night. One sees there men from all parts of the United States, and I may add from all quarters of the globe,—men who have travelled extensively and seen a great deal of the world and its doings, who are smart, intelligent, and even educated, remarkably quick-witted, excellent judges of character, able to discriminate at a glance between merit and mere pretension, strong in their likes and dislikes, courageous, generous, unreserved in manner and expression, and full of vivacity, energy, and good-heartedness. There is nothing effeminate about them. Some of them take pride apparently in their uncouth appearance and blunt speech, which, however, are less offensive than the form in which pride is commonly exhibited by the brainless fops and perfumed dandies of fashionable society. There is a circle of society in Leadville as refined and polished as can be found in any Eastern city, and the best talent of the country is secured for the stage, the pulpit, and the platform. Leadville is no place for pretenders or quacks. Drinking-saloons, dance-halls, gambling hells, and dens of prostitution are kept open day and night, and vice is unsystematized and attempts no concealment; but these evils and others are gradually growing less, and their restriction within the usual limits is only a question of time.

I spoke in the city to audiences that were large, intelligent, and apparently in sympathy with the most radical thought. At the close of the lectures, scores came up to the platform, whom I had met in a dozen different States,—as far east as Massachusetts and as far west as Oregon.

Of my return from Leadville by the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, and of my visit to other places in Colorado, I cannot speak in this letter.

There is something sublime in the onward march of civilization across prairies and mountains, in the procession of States as they spring up amid the "Western wilds," and one by one wheel into line. That which to-day is an unoccupied region of mountain, plain, or wilderness becomes to-morrow the seat of empire for an intelligent and enterprising colony, which lays broad and deep the foundations of a State, with laws and institutions out of which come education, development, and progress. "Westward the star of empire takes its way." In 1871, about eleven million acres passed from the dominion of the government into private possession. Fifteen thousand entries were made in Kansas and Nebraska alone. Every year, from the Eastern States, men full of energy and hope are pushing out into the Great West. And from Europe an annual immigration adds its multitudes, seeking new homes in our broad land. Across rivers and mountains, across marsh and plain, across valley and desert, steadily the column of settlement and civilization marches on. Upon the shores of the Atlantic and upon the shores of the Pacific, children are now playing, who will live to look across a continent filled with a population of more than a hundred millions of souls. Deserts now covered with sage-brush and alkali dust, subjected to irrigation from mountain streams and artesian wells, will yet be clothed in beauty, and be the homes of millions of people. No one who has "crossed the Plains" within the past few years can doubt it. And what then? A united and happy people, or feuds, contentions, and civil wars, and "States discordant, belligerent, and drenched in fraternal blood"? The history of nations and the fate of great empires tinge with sadness our contemplation of the distant future of America. As Seward said in one of his great speeches, "To obtain empire is easy: to govern it is more difficult." Yet we may reasonably expect that the career of the race, whatever may be the fate of particular nations or governments, will be in the future, as it has been in the past, one of progress. B. F. U.

ORGANIZATION OF A NATIONAL SECULAR ASSOCIATION.

Public Call.

An informal meeting will be held at the parlors of the Grand Pacific Hotel, in the city of Chicago, on the 15th day of November next, at two o'clock P.M., for the purpose of organizing a National Association, for the specific object of secularizing the State, the association to be formed on a basis broad enough to admit members regardless of their religious or non-religious opinions, and narrow enough to exclude all "hobbies" not germane to the question of State secularization.

To this Conference is invited one delegate from each auxiliary Liberal League that approves of this movement, one delegate from any other society in sympathy with the proposed meeting, and one delegate from any neighborhood or town where ten or more persons reside who favor this call, but where no secular organization exists.

JESUS AND HIS BIOGRAPHERS.

"Test all things thoroughly; hold fast that which is good."—I. THES. V., 21.

1. Limitations of our Knowledge.

JESUS himself left no written word. He is not mentioned by any contemporary writer. Our knowledge of his life and teaching is derived wholly from the NEW TESTAMENT. Its earliest writings are the Epistles of Paul. PAUL, however, never saw JESUS, was not in agreement with PETER and the Apostles,—the immediate friends and successors of JESUS (see Gal. ii., 9–14; Titus i., 10–14),—nor does he attempt to give any account of his life.

JESUS and his disciples spoke Aramaic, the current language of the people of Palestine,—a corrupt form of the Chaldee tongue. So far as we know, they could not converse or write in Greek. We possess no Christian writings in the native language of JESUS.

NOTE.—According to JOSEPHUS, the Jewish historian, who wrote in Greek, but few even among educated Jews, understood that language in his day. He confesses difficulty in using it himself, and calls it "an alien and strange language." (Pref. to Antiq. 2.) He also declares that he alone understood the information brought in by deserters to the Roman army during the siege of Jerusalem. (Contra Apion. i., 9.)

2. The Four Gospels.

GOSPEL.—(From god, "God" or "good," and spell, "discourse" or "tidings.") The word means "Good Tidings." The four Gospels profess to record something of the life and teachings of JESUS. They are the only sources of this information. We do not know the authors of any of these books.

The Fourth Gospel, or Gospel "according to" John, bears internal evidence of being written later than the others, and presents a very different picture of the life and teaching of JESUS. There are few points in common between this and the three other Gospels. There are reasons for believing its writer to have been a Greek-speaking or Gentile Christian, imperfectly acquainted even with the country in which JESUS lived. It is almost valueless, therefore, as testimony concerning the life and teaching of JESUS.

NOTE A.—For account of the disagreements between the Fourth Gospel and the other three, see Bible for Learners, vol. III., Introduction, pp. 27-29, and chap. xiii.; also Chadwick's Bible of To-day and Savage's Talks about Jesus.

NOTE B.—The passages in Josephus referring to JESUS have been interpolated or greatly altered by later Christian writers, and are worthless as history. Suetonius, a Roman writer, speaks of JESUS as "a restless, seditious Jewish agitator." Another historian writes that, "under a ringleader named Chrestus, the Jews raised a tumult." These are about the only references to him by early non-Christian writers.

NOTE C.—The headings or titles, "The Gospel according to Matthew," etc., were no part of the original MSS. They were prefixed some time after the composition of the Gospels.

General Questions.

1. Did JESUS leave any written word? 2. Is he mentioned by contemporary writers? 3. Whence comes our knowledge of his life and work? 4. What are the earliest writings of the New Testament? 5. Does Paul give any account of the life of JESUS? 6. What language did JESUS and his disciples speak? 7. Could they converse in Greek? 8. What does Josephus say concerning the use of Greek among the Jews? 9. What New Testament books record the life and teaching of JESUS? 10. What does "Gospel" mean? 11. Do we know who wrote the four Gospels? 12. What can you say about the historical value of the Fourth Gospel? 13. What early non-Christian writers speak of JESUS?

(Talk about Language and verbal inspiration. Is language a perfect medium for the expression of thought? Variations in the meaning of words from age to age. A good opportunity here for interesting conversation with the class.)

To the Teacher.

For helps, in this and the succeeding lesson, read the Bible for Learners, vol. III.; Chadwick's Bible of To-day; Savage's Talks about Jesus; Renan's Life of Jesus; Supernatural Religion; article "Gospels" in Encyclopædia Britannica; and article "Bible" in Appletons' Cyclopedia.

To Teachers of the Younger Classes.

Make this a sort of object lesson. Take the Bible in your hand. Ask what it is. What does the word "Bible" mean? (Explain.) What is a biography? Which of these books contain the biography of Jesus? etc. Tell about Josephus, —who he was and when he lived. Tell the story of the siege of Jerusalem.

FOREIGN.

THERE are tribes about the gates of Moscow who know nothing of Christianity. They adore sacred trees, as they did three hundred years ago.

THE Spanish government has resolved to proceed against all priests who introduce politics into their sermons, and to dismiss all mayors who are notorious Carlists.

CONVICTION OF A SMOKER.—A farmer named Roberts, at Knighton, has been fined at Ludlow £1 12*s.* 6*d.* for persistently smoking tobacco in a carriage on the Central Wales Railway.

THE anniversary of the date on which the first French Republic was proclaimed was celebrated with a banquet at Paris, in the Salon du Progrès, on the 21st ult. M. Louis Blanc presided.

THE Moslems resident in London celebrated September 6, the great Moslem feast which closes the Mohammedan Lent, in a room consecrated for the purpose; and they propose shortly to open a mosque in the capital of the greatest Moslem-ruling power of the world.

ALL the editors of the chief journals of St. Petersburg have been summoned before General Melikoff and told that their continual discussion of a constitution for Russia has highly displeased the czar, that nothing more on the subject would be allowed to appear, and that during the present reign it would be premature to discuss a constitution.

THE Bishop of Lincoln has received two addresses, signed by about two thousand clergymen, thanking him for his services in opposing the Burials' Bill; and it is intimated that more are coming. A large number of the Dorset clergy have addressed a protest against the bill to the Archbishop of Canterbury. They say the bill is opposed to the mind of the Church.

AT a meeting of licensed victuallers held at Ashton recently, Mr. C. N. Newdegate, M.P., referring to the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh into the House of Commons, said that, if they once admitted the one element that the governing power ignored the existence of a Deity, which even the Buddhists and Mohammedans acknowledged, there would be a universal rebellion against the Empire of India.

ONE hundred heads of Jewish families at Bucharest, among whom are seventy handicraftsmen and a larger number of agriculturists, have petitioned the Alliance Israelite Universelle to purchase land for them in Palestine, on which they may found an agricultural colony. They offer to contribute a sum of four hundred francs each, and to pay the remainder of the amount advanced by the Alliance in annual instalments.

THE Secular Review says of the late Brussels Congress of Freethinkers,—The Congress was a thorough success, and was exceedingly well attended, being really an international assembly, as will be seen from the list of delegates. The arrangements made for the Congress reflect the highest credit upon our Brussels friends, who did their best to make visitors as comfortable as we hope their labors will prove profitable. Dr. de Paepe was most active and obliging to all.

THE Bishop of Manchester, at a recent art exhibition, remarked that he did not consider it a desecration of the Lord's day for such an exhibition to be opened on Sunday afternoons. People were not made saints necessarily by singing songs about heaven. He would rather believe that they were made holy men and acceptable to God by trying to do their duty as husbands and heads of families in that station, be it high or low, in which Almighty God had placed them.

ANOTHER lake village, assigned by experts to the age of bronze, has been discovered at Auvernier, near Neuchatel. Several millstones, quite new, others half-made, have been brought to light, from which it is inferred that the place may have been the seat of a manufactory of these articles. Another conclusion drawn from this find is that Swiss pine buildings served as actual dwellings for the primeval inhabitants of the land, and were not, as has been supposed, used merely as storehouses.

THERE is history in almost every street of this city. At No. 25 Rue du Jour, a little street near the Rue du Mail, there is a quaint old stone house, built in the style of the seventeenth century. Erected in 1613 by the Abbé de Royaumont, it later became the property of Count Montmorency Bouteville. This gentleman was one of the best swordsmen of his day. His room was hung with deadly weapons, and his exploits have filled more than one romancer's page. They say the house was haunted with the ghosts of those slain on the duelling-ground, and mothers warned their children to keep away.—Parisian.

THREE days after the earthquake which destroyed half the city of Manilla on the 20th of July, there was another longer and more violent shock, which completed the havoc. The correspondent of the Western Morning News describes the disaster. The emptiness of the city alone prevented hundreds of deaths. The panic-stricken people were camping out in tents and huts, or lying in the more open fields. Not even the public officials, except the Captain-General, remained at their posts. Owners of mansions in the city deserted them as if plague-stricken, and were paying fabulous prices for occupying mud huts in the open country. On sea, the earthquake produced remarkable effects, like the sudden bursting of a storm; and river boats crowded with refugees rocked violently and were swamped. An open-air mass supplicating divine mercy was celebrated in the vacant space surrounding the destroyed cathedral, and thousands of persons were running about in a state of sheer idiocy from terror and despair. After the last great shock, the neighboring volcanoes burst forth, discharging dense smoke and lava; and it was hoped that thus nature's pent-up forces would find relief.

A DIVINE REVELATION TO STEAL.—Thomas Alcock, 24, was charged at the Worship Street Court with having stolen a sum of £9 10*s.*, the money of his mother, under the following circumstances: The mother, a widow, keeping a small shop in the Wick-road, Hackney, deposed that on Sunday, the 12th inst., she went to church, and on her return found, scribbled on a piece of rough paper left lying in her bedroom, the following words: "Dear Mother,—Don't worry about it. I had a revelation where the money was, and it was like as if God told me to take it, and would return you three or four times the amount. Before you receive this, I shall be at Doncaster races, the Ebor Handicap and St. Leger.—Your affectionate son and repenting son, T. A." The witness added that she knew the handwriting as her son's. He did not lodge in the house with her. She looked for her money, and found that her drawers had been opened, and £9 10*s.* stolen. Detective Chapman, N division, said that he took the prisoner into custody; and he said that he had lost all the money except £3, which he had spent. He had a revelation, he said, which told him to take the money. Mr. Bushby, after receiving the prisoner's plea of guilty, said that whether the prisoner was in his right mind or not would be ascertained in gaol. He sentenced the prisoner to six months' hard labor.—Lloyd's Weekly.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

A SUBSCRIBER to the Sunday School Times criticises a statement made by the editor, and receives a reply as follows:—

I do not wish to be hypercritical, but a sentence in one of your recent editorial notes struck me as containing an absurdity. You said of Abraham's faith: "He was sure that he should have grandchildren, even if he should never have a child." Now true faith does indeed walk by sight; but is the impossible possible with God? A whale or a fish may swallow a man; but that fish which could swallow a man, could it be swallowed by the man? Can God give me a grandchild without first giving me a child, any more than he can make two mountains without a valley between them? Would it not have been more correct to say, "He was sure that he should have grandchildren, even while he had as yet no child"?

On looking over that statement of ours, it strikes us that it does contain "an absurdity." And, remembering how we wrote it, we are sure that we intended to have it do so. Therefore, we must say that the proposed correction would not be correct; for the very reason that it would be correct, and we did not intend to have any cold-blooded correctness about that statement. What we were driving at was this absurd idea, that we are to decide with our little hazel-nut brains whether or not a thing that God promises is a thing that God can do; whether, in fact, God knows what he is saying, when he makes a specific and unqualified promise. Sarah thought that God's promise —in this very matter in discussion—involved an absurdity; and, although she did not want to be hypercritical, she couldn't keep from laughing at the seeming nonsense. But Abraham believed God, without stopping to consider how God was going to do as he said he would. If we are Abraham's children, we shall spend more time hunting out the promises to him in which we may be sharers, and resting down on them confidently, than in looking into the possibility of God's making those promises good,—according to the teachings of "our reason." The most reasonable thing in the world is to believe that God will find out a way of doing as he has agreed to, whether we see how it is possible or not. And, as to the use of extravagant or hyperbolic language in suggesting God's ability to compass the impossible, our Lord speaks of a man's swallowing a camel, while our reason would say that the camel could easier swallow the man; and again of a camel's going through a needle's eye, whereas the needle could go through the camel's eye. All talk just here about a small gate called "the needle's eye" is simply an absurd attempt to show that absurdities are not the very modes of speech to suggest God's power as beyond our utmost conceptions.

MR. K. A. BURNELL thus speaks of the men's special prayer-meetings at Mr. Moody's Northfield Conference:—

The tent 9 to 11 A.M. sessions have been eminently waitings upon God. There are no seats: the ground is covered with straw, and in part with army blankets. More than one hundred men, representing nearly a score of States, are prostrate before Him,—in many cases literally on their faces,—and for fifteen or twenty minutes there is silence, only broken by suppressed sobbing.

JESTINGS.

A VERY impressive sermon was recently preached on the Brighton race-course. Time not given.—English paper.

ONE of the earliest female archery clubs we read about was when Ruth was out in the field with her Boaz and harrows.

THEY had to put off the dedication of a church at Leadville for a week, because the fire-works ordered for the occasion failed to arrive.

TWO OF the most respectable citizens of Galveston got to talking politics yesterday. "You are as obstinate as a mule," said one. "But I never make an ass of myself, like you do." "Gentlemen," said a bystander, "such near relatives ought never to talk politics in public."

THE following comes by way of the Chicago Times: On a rainy morning, a small boy who has exhausted all his excuses for not putting in an appearance at school opens the door and says to the astonished master: "Sir, ma says I can't come to school to-day. It's raining too hard."

THE Roman Catholic Bishop of B—— is a most energetic cleric. He performs as much parish duty, I believe, as most priests. He received, the other day, the confession of a little boy. At the close said his right reverence, "Well, have you anything more to tell me?" "No," said the lad, deprecatingly; "but I'll have more next time."

THE Parisians love to consult their doctor in the street. It is probably for that reason that most doctors have a carriage. Dr. T. has found a very good means of getting rid of the ingenious persons who stop him in the street, and say: "Ah, doctor, I am glad I have met you. I was just about to call upon you. I have a queer pain in my side." . . . The doctor does not dare to count this impromptu consultation in the bill. Dr. T. then says to the man who stops him in the street: "Shut your eyes, . . . close, . . . close! Now show me your tongue." . . . And he rides off.—Parisian.

PROFESSOR PROCTOR explains away the Lot's wife miracle, by proving that she was only buried under a meteoric shower of sodium. Now, this simplifies it. This brings it out of the fanciful realm of the supernatural, and places it within the credible sphere of every-day events. We always had very grave doubts about the pillar of salt business; but, when science quietly explains that the poor woman was simply buried under a meteoric fall of sodium, then we can readily accept it. There is nothing singular, remarkable, or unusual about that. Very few people are there, indeed, who do not know of hundreds of instances in which their friends and acquaintances have been caught out in a shower of sodium and buried. It is wonderful indeed how science simplifies the miracles.—Burlington Hawkeye.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

BEWARE of anger of the tongue: control thy tongue. Beware of anger of the mind: control thy mind. Practise virtue with thy tongue and with thy mind. By reflection, by self-restraint and control, a wise man can make himself an island which no floods can overwhelm. He who conquers himself is greater than he who in battle conquers a thousand thousand men.—Buddhist.

THERE is nothing like keeping the inner man. The sage embraces unity, and so is a pattern for the world. He puts himself last, and yet is first; abandons himself, and yet is preserved. He has no selfishness, yet preserves self-interest intact. He is not self-exalting, and therefore he stands high; and, inasmuch as he does not strive, no one in all the world strives with him.—Lao-Tse (Chinese).

CONTENTMENT, returning good for evil, resistance to sensual appetites, abstinence from illicit gain, purification, control of the senses, knowledge of sacred writings, knowledge of the supreme mind, veracity, and freedom from anger form the tenfold system of duties. Let a man continually take pleasure in truth, in justice, in laudable practices, and in purity; let him keep in subjection his speech, his arm, and his appetite. Wealth and pleasures repugnant to law, let him shun, and even lawful acts which may cause future pain or be offensive to mankind.—Manu (Hindu).

THOU shalt abstain from acquiring or keeping, by fraud or violence, the property of another. Thou shalt abstain from those who are not the proper objects of thy desire. Thou shalt abstain from deceiving others by word or deed. Thou shalt abstain from intoxication.—Buddhism.

IF all diligence were used to extirpate vice and encourage virtue, instead of discussing idle questions, how much evil and scandal among the people and discord in the community would cease!—Thomas à Kempis.

SOME men think that the gratification of curiosity is the end of knowledge; some, the acquisition of fame; some, the pleasure of dispute; some, the supporting of themselves by their knowledge; but the real use of all knowledge is this: that we should dedicate that reason which God has given us to the use and advantage of man.—Lord Bacon.

THE most truly religious state of society is that which secures to every human being the freest exercise of all his powers for the endless progress of mankind.—Charles Follen.

THE Past has done much for thee, and has given the Future an order upon thee for the payment. If thou hast received some mixture of alloy in the coin, melt out the dross and pass on the pure metal.—Lydia Maria Child.

HOW MUCH richer than the litany of any one religion is that of these common truths of justice, mercy, and faith, responded to each other from nation to nation, around the globe and through history, across wide oceans and wider ages, blending in one symphony, where diverse races are the singers, and all humanity the choir, and collapsing creeds are but the cadences, sinking only to swell again into a sublimer strain of worship, proclaiming ever more clearly the Brotherhood of Man and Fatherhood of God!—J. Ll. Jones.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE negro who defined bigot as "a man who knows too much for one and not quite enough for two" might help the dictionary-makers.

THE recent brutal assault upon the helpless Chinamen of Denver, Col., is deplorable evidence of the alarming extent to which barbarism survives in American civilization.

SOME of the wealthy Episcopalians of New York are sending contributions toward paying the debt of "Father Hyacinthe's" church in Paris. "Father Hyacinthe" is now simply Monsieur Loyson; but he is as eloquent as ever.

AN Irishman who applied for a license to open a liquor-saloon, and was asked by the commissioner if he had a certificate of moral character, replied, "In faith, your honor, I don't see as it requires much moral character to sell liquor." He seems to have understood the situation better than did the law or the commissioner.

AMONG the many books written by Lydia Maria Child, the Life of Isaac T. Hopper, the heroic Quaker philanthropist, is a fitting memorial of a noble life, that deserves still to have numerous readers. Such biographies would be vastly more wholesome reading to young people than most of the stories published for them in these days.

IT is reported that a pastoral letter has been read in all the Catholic churches of Ottawa, Canada, forbidding parents, on pain of deprivation of the sacrament, to send their children to the Government Model School, which is a preparatory school to the normal one. Thus the issue between ecclesiasticism and State secularization upon this continent grows in distinctness and intensity.

THE local Liberal Leagues of Angolia, Indiana, and of Enterprise, Kansas, have voted to withdraw from the National Liberal League, on account of the action of the latter at Chicago. Mr. Green sends sixteen new names to be added to the call we printed last week for the Secular Association Conference, to be held in Chicago, the 15th of November; also makes six erasures in the list of names as then printed.

FISK UNIVERSITY, Tennessee, has a branch of the Young Men's Christian Association. The members of it are colored. They were invited with other branches to a recent State Convention of the Association at Murfreesboro'. But the Christian citizens of Murfreesboro' refused to entertain them. What a pity, for the sake of preventing such scandals on Christian hospitality, that change of heart should not produce change of complexion!

AS WE go to press this week, the country is in the throes of the Presidential election. Whichever of the two great parties shall succeed, we hope it will be by so overwhelming a vote as to admit of no question. We shall ourselves vote the Republican ticket; yet we think it would be vastly safer for the country to have Hancock for the next President by a decisive ballot than that the vote should be in dispute for several months as it was four years ago.

REV. DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, who, although nominally a Methodist, has been one of the most liberal preachers in Chicago and has fraternized to a considerable extent with Unitarians, has now been formally voted a heretic. The Rock River Conference, of which he is a member, has "resolved," by 110 to 48, that he held and preached theological views at variance with the well-known principles of theology in the Methodist Church, and that he be requested to withdraw from the Conference. What the theologically condemned man and his society, which is supposed to be largely in sympathy with him, will do is not yet manifest. He is admitted by all to be a man of high ability and character.

WE have received a prospectus, addressed "to the lovers of philosophy," of a monthly periodical to be called the Platonist, which is to be devoted to the dissemination of the Platonic philosophy. The prospectus says: "This philosophy recognizes the essential immortality and divinity of the human soul, and posits its highest happiness as an approximation to, and union with, the absolute one. Its mission is to release the soul from the bonds of matter, to lead it to the vision of true being, from images to realities, and, in short, to elevate it from a sensible to an intellectual life." The publication is to be issued at Osceola, Mo., which State has already curiously proved itself favorable soil for the idealistic philosophy to take root in. The price of the Platonist is to be $2.00 per annum, and those interested in its purpose are desired to address Thos. M. Johnson as above.

THERE are signs that Methodism has in some particulars reached the turning-point of its prosperity. There has been much praise bestowed upon the excellent administrative character and effective operation of its organization. But there is reason to conclude that it was better adapted to earlier conditions than the more advanced intellectual ones of the present, and hence must undergo important modifications, if it does not eventually become seriously disintegrated under the influence of the modern spirit. The itinerant system, formerly so complacently and generally acquiesced in by Methodist ministers, is very obviously falling more and more into disfavor among them. As evidence of this, we need but to refer to two prominent ones who have just withdrawn from its fellowship on this account. These are the Rev. W. F. Crafts, of Chicago, and the Rev. W. H. McAllister, a popular preacher of New Haven. The former goes to the Congregationalists, the latter to the Independent Methodist Church of Baltimore. And it is stated that no less than a dozen preachers of equal note in the denomination have left it during the past two years for the same reason.

THE OBLIGATIONS OF LIBERAL FAITH.

A Discourse delivered before the First Congregational Society, New Bedford, Sept. 12, 1880.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

In resuming our services here this morning, after our vacation respite, I wish to speak of certain special obligations that rest in our time on the adherents of liberal faith.

I find an impression prevailing to a considerable extent among liberal thinkers that their work in religion is pretty nearly done. Of course, their personal obligations in respect to character and a good private life, they will admit remain the same; but their duty as theological and religious reformers, their obligation to uphold a public propagandism of liberal religious views, a certain class of Liberals incline to think is nearly or quite over. This kind of work, they say, is being done at the present time by other agencies,—by science, by literature, by all thorough scholarship, by the general progress of enlightenment among the people,—and being done by these agencies so effectively and so rapidly that there is no farther need of any direct instrumentalities for propagating liberal religious views. When the staid and scholarly and conservative Encyclopædia Britannica prints articles upon the Bible which are as destructive of the old view of the special inspiration of the Scriptures as was Theodore Parker's criticism a generation ago, what need of any special publications on the part of Liberals against the old theologies? The work, too, it is further said, is being done in so-called Orthodox pulpits; the change in this respect having been so rapid in the last twenty years that one hardly knows to-day what are the Orthodox and what the heterodox pulpits. What need, then, it is asked, and asked by liberal thinkers themselves, to organize new liberal societies or even to put forth any great exertion to maintain the old ones, when there are Episcopalian, Methodist, Orthodox Congregational pulpits to-day that are uttering sentiments which are fully abreast of the standard Unitarianism of thirty years ago, and some of them emitting views even much more modern than that? Seeing that liberal views are thus making such rapid headway in the great Evangelical denominations of Christendom, why should liberals, scattered and unorganized as they are, waste their strength in any farther warfare in this direction? Why may not they retire in honor from the field, satisfied that Orthodoxy itself should have become infected with their sentiments, and content now to leave the work to be completed by the zeal and efficiency of these large and strongly organized denominations, so much better adapted to do it?

The argument, when thus put, is plausible; but it is specious and sophistical. First, it does not take a large and comprehensive view of the work of religious reform; and, second, it does not take account of all the facts.

Admitting, first, that the facts are all reported and that they are just what they seem, and that they indicate the rapid and vast theological progress in the limits of Orthodox Christendom which such facts as those named above appear on their face to indicate, still it does not follow that the work of liberal inquirers and thinkers is done. It would only follow that one branch or stage of their work is done, or at least well begun. It would only follow that one piece of reform was accomplished or well on the way toward accomplishment, and this the negative reform of destroying an erroneous system of theology. But does this one work complete their view of the philosophy of human life? This one reform achieved, does the progress of humanity stop? Have these Liberals come to an end of all progress, that they now talk of retiring from the field? Have not the science, the advance of knowledge, the explorations of thought, within the last thirty years, brought to them any new and completer views on religious topics, but left them with only the views they had when they began,—left them with no broader platform, with no larger outlook, with no deeper insight into man's practical needs and the ways of supplying them? If so, then do their reformatory ideas need themselves to be reformed. Progress with them has come to a stand-still. It is only one goal achieved, not the growth and upward movement of a lifetime. Moreover, if to them and pioneers in the domain of thought like them be due this remarkable theological advance in Christendom, as to large extent it is, then they are still needed as pioneers to sight and cut and smooth the way for still farther advance in the churches, unless they shall make the egotistical claim that they have come to the end of the way and discovered all truth, and the churches are now only to build on ground which they, the pioneers, have already occupied. Progress of mankind does not stop with any one generation of workers, however faithful they have been. And the advanced guard of workers, the explorers and discoverers, the fellers of forests and the climbers of mountains, those who lay the axe at the root of old superstitions and deal the first heavy blows at errors and wrongs, making the air ring with the sound of their battle-axes, and thus, perhaps, first awaking their neighbors to the fact of there being such errors and wrongs,—these pioneers will be needed as long as humanity has before it any progress in truth and right still to be achieved.

But the argument that the public organized work of liberal thinkers is now ended is specious and sophistical, secondly, because it does not take account of all the facts. The facts indicating progress in the Evangelical pulpits and sects, such as those named, are on the surface, where they are easily seen and then widely published abroad. But the very fact that they excite so much attention, the very point that they are remarkable, shows that they are still exceptional, and cannot therefore be taken as proof of a thorough change of theology in the Orthodox churches, but rather that such change as yet is only here and there, in certain localities perhaps where the conditions are exceptional. The change may be in progress through the whole body; but the facts only show the progress to have begun, not yet to have permeated the mass, much less to have approached very near its termination.

But there is another class of facts, not so evident on the surface, not so easily seen, and not so exceptional when seen as to excite much attention and remark, whose testimony on this question of the growing liberality of Evangelical Christendom is in quite another direction,—facts which show the inertness, the immobility, the stagnation, of the great mass of Orthodox Christendom, Catholic and Protestant together. Latterly, I have had occasion to consult the publications, the weekly papers and the magazines, issued under the auspices of the various branches of the Christian Church; and I have been myself astonished at the tenacious adherence to old dogmas and to the old theories of Biblical interpretation that is shown in many of these publications. I have been amazed at the crudity, the ignorance, the superstitious beliefs, that prevail among great multitudes of people, and still more at the audacity with which sheer ignorance often flaunts itself as the only sound and saving truth. I find dogmas and superstitions, which I had fain thought rapidly passing to oblivion, very intensely alive yet and pushing their way in the religious world, in spite of all the science and literature and general enlightenment, to places of recognition and power, with a zeal and energy that are tremendous and that are my envy for the cause of liberal religion.

Look, for instance, at the Evangelical Sunday-school work, whose interests are represented by several publications specially devoted to it, and which makes large use also of the secular press for distributing its Lessons on the Bible. The Sunday-school is comparatively a new institution in the Christian Church, yet it has already become one of its most absorbing and powerful agencies; and it is an enginery that is being largely used for building up the old dogmas of the Church. The Sunday-school Lessons that are printed by the million and scattered through the land are prepared on the old theory, which first-class scholarship has everywhere abandoned, that the Bible is throughout the infallibly inspired word of God, and the one sole book to be studied for religious and moral instruction. In this view, the great mass of the children of our land, taken at their earliest years, are being educated; for what the comparatively few liberal Sunday-schools are doing to offset this indoctrination in the old theology is but as a drop in the ocean. What are called the International Sunday-school Lessons, and all their type, are founded on the narrowest and most literal kind of textual teaching,—a kind of teaching that begins and ends in a regard for the Bible that is superstitious and that leads to a Bible-worship that is nothing less than idolatry. So long as such elements as these are going into the education of the great mass of the children of Christendom, there will be work for liberal societies for many a year yet.

Take another sign. Mr. Moody represents one of the most energetic elements in the Protestant Orthodox Church to-day. He draws great multitudes of people to hear him. All the Protestant Evangelical churches give him more or less encouragement and support. Men of learning go to consult and pray with him. Men of wealth are drawn to sit as disciples at his feet and give him their purses. The Moody and Sankey hymns, the one pervading sentiment of which is salvation by the blood of Christ and by that alone, are becoming the popular songs of Christendom. Moodyism is an acknowledged and petted power in Evangelical Protestantism to-day. Yet Mr. Moody is a man whose boast it is that he knows but one book, the Bible; and it is a boast that I never heard impugned. He is a man whose superstition is equal to his zeal: a man whose ignorance is as unquestioned as his sincerity. The science of our time, the general enlightenment and literature, of whose potency in liberalizing religious views we hear so much, have not struck him, nor the multitudes that follow him. He knows nothing of such enlightening, rationalizing influences. Probably he knows nothing whatever of those essays on the Bible which Orthodox scholars of Great Britain have written for the Encyclopædia Britannica. His method of reading and interpreting the Bible is one that belongs to a past age. Here is a specimen of what he said in an address on the Bible at a recent Sunday-school Convention in Illinois. "People cavil at the story of Jonah. It is very common to cavil at it. They say, 'You don't really believe, do you, that Jonah was swallowed by a whale?' 'Yes.' Some of these scientific men will say that it is physically impossible,—that the mouth of the whale is only just large enough for a man's fist, and that a whale could not swallow a man. Well, the Scriptures say God prepared a fish to swallow Jonah. Couldn't God prepare a fish to swallow a man, and couldn't he prepare man to swallow a whale? They say it is impossible that a whale could swallow a man; but is it impossible to think that God, who created the heavens and the earth, could not create a fish to swallow a man, and preserve his life in that whale?" Such are the puerilities put forth as an essential part of the only saving knowledge of God by a man who is one of the dominant powers in the Orthodox world in this eightieth year of the nineteenth century. Some of you have smiled while I have quoted. And yet it is fit cause for sadness rather than for smiles,—for sadness that a man so crude and ignorant and superstitious should be one of the most prominent religious teachers of our day, and be speaking to such multitudes as hardly another man in the country has opportunity to reach. Orthodox pulpits here and there may be getting so rationalized that it is sometimes hard to distinguish them from Unitarian pulpits; Orthodox creeds may be growing more lenient to exercised consciences; but, so long as Moody is a power in Orthodox Christendom such as he is to-day, let it not be said that the mission of liberal thinkers in religion is ended.

Look at another fact. I have just been reading in a Catholic newspaper an entire page narrative of the pilgrimage to Knock in Ireland on the day of the Feast of the Assumption, August 15. This little village, you know, has been for the past year the scene of alleged apparitions of the Virgin Mary, attended with miraculous cures of a large number of diseased and infirm persons. On the day specially consecrated to her, and just about a year from the time when the phenomena, whatever they are, first began, it was thought that the Blessed Virgin would appear with extraordinary power. So, from far and near, natives and foreigners, sick and well, rich and poor, streamed to the little village. More than twenty thousand people, it is estimated, were gathered there. Several thousand were assembled in and around the little village church at one time. Says the narrator: "Cripples, paralytics, deformed persons, blind men, an epileptic child, were led around the church, raising their supplications aloud with a tender genuineness which no words can convey. Others were hammering here and there at the walls for a fragment of the precious plaster, or even for a morsel of the church's earthen flooring, to carry away with them for its healing virtue." In the church, at the doors, and on every foot of ground around for yards away, people were prostrated on their knees, praying aloud. Around a little statue of the Virgin, a crowded group were passionately repeating their litanies, with eyes intently fixed on the face of the image. Intelligent men affirmed that they had seen the eyes of the statue move. A gentleman who believed himself cured there of a long-standing disease declared that, while praying, he saw a luminous star shoot from the holy tabernacle across the church and go back again. A young woman hurried into the vestry with a story of how the "Divine Saviour" had appeared to her on the road, as he did to the women at the tomb on the resurrection morning. A tempest arising, with flashes of lightning illuminating the church, the kneeling crowd were thrown for a time into a panic of excitement and awe, believing that the miraculous apparitions were about to begin on a scale befitting the day; and they would only admit the naturalness of the phenomenon, when the pelting rain drove the multitude outside to seek some shelter. And all this in this nineteenth century, in the limits of the most enlightened religion, and in the realm of the most enlightened empire on the globe! And this is the kind of faith and devotion that the Roman Catholic Church, the grandest organization in Christendom, the mightiest Church in the world, protects and fosters. In another newspaper, I read of the preparations now in progress in the same Church for the annual pilgrimage to the older miraculous shrine at Lourdes, in France. The number of pilgrims from Great Britain and Ireland, it is said, is to be counted by the thousands; and the pilgrimage is to be headed by no less a personage than Cardinal Manning. It is a sad and discouraging sight when one sees a multitude of poor and ignorant and half-civilized people under the delusive sway of such a superstition. And yet that does not seem wholly hopeless. All that they want, we say, is knowledge, education. But when I see a man of the fine intellectual abilities and scholarly acquirements possessed by Cardinal Manning, prostituting these noble gifts to fostering this very ignorance and superstition of the people, while one word from his authoritative voice—and a word which in his heart he must know he could utter—would let the daylight of truth in upon their darkened minds,—when I see this sight, my hope for my race drops down toward despair. If the appointed leaders of this vast multitude of the ignorant and superstitious, though they might, yet will not, lead them out to the light of knowledge, where is the hope of humanity? When we speak of the rapid growth of a more liberal theology in the Orthodox section of Christendom, it is really only certain sections of Protestant Christendom that we have in mind. We overlook the huge bulk of the Catholic Church, with its membership of two hundred millions strong, more than double the Protestant sects all together, and with an ecclesiastical machinery that may well be the envy of the strongest governments on earth. The Catholic Church, it is true, like the Protestant, has a progressive party. Pope Leo, it is even said, belongs to it. But it is a party of theory mainly. When it comes to practical matters of church declarations and government, it is a party that makes itself felt scarcely perceptibly against the great party that has centuries of tradition and formality and a central ecclesiastical polity behind it. The Catholic Church has a leadership able, astute, learned; it has a vast membership of ignorance; but it has never shown any disposition to bridge the gulf between the leaders and the led by imparting, beyond a certain narrow range, the light of the one to the darkness of the other. It is a Church that designedly fosters ignorance and protects superstition. The light that is to break in upon its darkness will not come from within itself. It must come from the outside. It must come from those who believe in the light, and who, however few and scattered they may be, will yet hold up the truth they have found firmly and persistently, and let it shine out as far as it may over the darkness. As long, then, as such scenes as I have above described exist in Christendom and in the name of religion, as long as the Catholic Church exists, will Liberals in religion have a public mission, which it is their duty not only to maintain, but to strengthen and extend.

And the Catholic Church, though shorn in recent years of its official temporal power, was never more active or more shrewd or more aggressive than it is to-day. Nor is it only on the other side of the Atlantic that its power is felt; not alone in the old countries of Europe that the menace is made to the public welfare which lies in the shadow of its cultivated ignorance. The Catholic Church, with its vast power and its unchanged, persistent policy, is at our doors; and, in a country whose government rests on the basis of universal man-suffrage, it is vain for us to hope that we shall not feel its power. We have depended on our free public schools for throwing new and more American influences around the Catholic children, and thus neutralizing these dangers. But what we have regarded as our safety the Catholic leaders sagaciously discern is the peril of their Church, and so the fiat has gone forth to Catholic parents, "Withdraw your children from the public schools, and put them in parochial schools." And this is being done as rapidly as the vast conditions of the work, and the shrewdness of the leaders in evading an open conflict with public opinion until they are fully prepared for it, will admit. So the Catholic Church confronts us in this country to-day with a challenge of our public school system. But that Church will not stop, we may be sure, with the establishment of parochial schools. It will next demand a certain share of the public funds for sustaining them; and in not a few cities it would have the power to obtain the demand, unless prevented by some superior law. With such momentous problems as these right before us, and others as momentous which will inevitably grow out of this growing power of Catholicism, it is not a time for liberal thinkers to talk of disbanding their forces. To do such a thing would be to incur the infamy that attaches to the soldier who deserts his colors in face of the enemy.

I have thus culled certain facts, not from the exceptional, but from the ordinary activities of both Catholic and Protestant Christendom of the present day, to show that the work of those who hold liberal views in religion is yet far from completed. All honor to the learned scholars or to the preachers who within the old churches have dared to break the bonds of their creeds and to proclaim a larger truth! But these men are still the exception, not the rule. Still, the popular superstition is enormous, the popular ignorance appalling; still, by great masses of people, the exercise of an emotion, the assent to some ancestral belief, the observance of forms, are held to be the sum and substance of religion. Not yet, therefore, can the pioneers of free thought in religion be dismissed from their service. Still they are needed to lead the way with their torches, fearlessly and tirelessly, into the mysteries of the truth yet unrevealed. Still liberal societies are needed, to uphold the sacredness of the right of free inquiry, to proclaim character as more important than creed, and the fellowship of humanity as grander than the fellowship of a sect.

And, in saying these things, I have meant, friends, that we should apply them here to ourselves. I would, as we come together again to renew our services here, that we might feel with new power the meaning and worth and importance of our position as a free and independent religious body; that we might feel with a more vital and effective intensity the obligations to sustain these services in all their dignity and efficiency, not only for what they are or might be to ourselves, but for what they are to the community around us. The other churches are doing their work and in their own way, with their own ideas of success; and, so far as they help men and women to battle more vigorously against the temptations and trials of human life, we can bid them "God-speed" in it. But ours is a different position and a different way. Where, among all the other churches, however liberal some of them may be growing, shall we find one that after all represents our faith and our aim? Where is there one among them that could be to us a religious home? Let us, then, make this more our religious home,—give to it more of our energies, more of our zeal, more of the encouragement of our presence, more of our faith. When the Master Mind of the universe shall bid the human mind halt in its march toward truth and the human soul to fold the wings of its aspirations, then may we be dismissed from our posts, to fold our hands to rest and our eyes to sleep.

It is far more important that we should love our wives than that we should love God. And I will tell you why. You cannot help him: you can help her. It is far more important that you love your children than that you love Jesus Christ. And why? If he is God, you cannot help him; but you can plant a little flower of happiness in every footstep of the child from the cradle until you die in that child's arms. . . . While I live, I propose to stand by the folks.—R. G. Ingersoll.

"THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF SPIRITUALISM."

Editor Free Religious Index:—

My attention has been called to a paragraph in the Free Religious Index of October 21, in reference to myself, the whole tenor of which may be inferred from the first five lines, which I here quote:—

"It appears from another full column in the Banner of Light that Mr. Epes Sargent's scientific qualifications lie in 'the science of transcendental physics, or psycho-physical phenomena.' Ah, yes, now we see! Strange we did not think of it before."

Here the ironical intent would seem to be to depreciate a yet unpublished book by creating the impression, first, that the author has no "scientific qualifications" for the task he has undertaken, and, secondly, that there is no such thing as a science of psycho-physical phenomena. As this term simply indicates a science, under the facts and phenomena of which man is regarded as having a soul as well as a body, a mind as well as an organism for its expression, it would be interesting to learn since when it has been decided among "Free Religionists" that the recognition of a psychical principle in the human subject must be ruled out with a sneer as unscientific?

I am well aware that the writer has the authority of certain specialists in scientific pursuits, foreign to that of psychology, in taking his extreme materialistic view. Professor Newcomb, the astronomer, in his address at St. Louis before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, said to his hearers: "So far are we from forming any conception even of our own souls as sensible existences that no question affecting them, even now, is a scientific one. . . . The soul can neither be seen nor in any way be made evident to the senses of others."

But are there not many things which we can neither see nor make evident to the senses of others, but of the existence of which we have a scientific assurance from their effects? The emergence of consciousness among the processes of a purely material structure is a problem which those who deny a psychical principle in man are called on to solve. Have they yet done this scientifically? Can they ever do it?

When, in broad daylight, I enclose a blank sheet of paper in a locked box, or hold out a covered slate, and in both cases get intelligent writing, under conditions without a conceivable flaw, will my critic explain to me why such a fact, if proved by a competent amount of irreproachable testimony, is not a veritable fact for scientific scrutiny and consideration? There must be hundreds among the subscribers to the Index who can testify to the phenomenon. Has it no significance? Does it not conclusively prove the intelligent action of an invisible agent on matter?

I am aware that there are scientific specialists, like Youmans and Carpenter, who tell us that no amount of human testimony could prove to them a phenomenon like direct writing. And why? Because it is in violation of what they know of the laws of nature. But how do they know that it is also in violation of what they do not know of the laws of nature? They assume that the operation of a spiritual force is unnatural or supernatural. Where is their proof? Theirs is a mere petitio principii, an a priori conception, and directly in violation of their professions of loyalty to the experimental method.

From 1835 to 1847, I investigated, at every opportunity, the great facts of somnambulism, as induced by mesmerism; and for three years of that time I had a remarkable somnambulic subject, in whose presence the most impressive phenomena took place. From 1847 to the present time, I have spared no labor or expense to arrive at certainties in regard to the basic phenomena of spiritualism. In 1842, just before the death of the illustrious and revered Channing, and while residing in the same house with him at Lenox, Mass., at his request I acquainted him with the phenomena of induced somnambulism through the late Mrs. Mowatt. He was deeply interested, and was convinced, much to his satisfaction, of two great facts: the insensibility of the subject to pain in the comatose state of a limb, while she had her lucid somnambulic consciousness; and the power of the somnambule to take cognizance of an unuttered thought which he willed to communicate. Did Channing regard our psycho-physical science as unscientific? On the contrary, he says: "This scepticism as to things spiritual and celestial is as irrational and unphilosophical as it is degrading.

Now, Mr. Editor, with all deference and modesty, let me say that I regard a synthesis of thoroughly tested facts—for which, far back from the period of the earliest Egyptian records to the times of Pythagoras, Socrates, Plutarch, Tertullian, Porphyry, Van Helmont, Baxter, Glanvil, Blackstone, Lord Brougham, Wallace, Crookes, and Zöllner, no stable hypothesis except the spiritual has been offered by any of the great thinkers of our race—is entitled to recognition as scientific, when it presents, as it now does, such perfectly demonstrable phenomena as direct writing and the power of reading what is written on tightly folded pellets.

I ask Dr. F. H. Hedge, or any other opponent, to point to the one eminent man of science, who, having patiently and faithfully investigated these phenomena, has denied their occurrence in the manner described. In concluding the preface to my forthcoming volume, I say: "The hour is coming, and now is, when the man claiming to be a philosopher, physical or metaphysical, who shall overlook the constantly recurring phenomena here recorded, will be set down as behind the age, or as evading its most important question. Spiritualism is not now 'the despair of science,' as I called it on the title-page of my first book (1868) on the subject. Among intelligent observers, its claims to scientific recognition are no longer a matter of doubt."

In short, in common with some millions of my contemporaries, I have satisfied myself of certain hyperphysical facts that seem to present a scientific justification for hypothecating a spiritual organism, associated with the physical, as the only explanation of these facts, and as supplying the vehicle of man's individuality at the transition called death. Notwithstanding the sportive references in your columns to this ancient hypothesis, and to my own "scientific qualifications" for treating it, I do not regard it as yet so obsolete that some of your readers will not be disposed to receive with indulgence any sincere testimony on the subject, together with such speculations as it may fairly suggest. BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

REVUE DES DEUX MONDES, 15 September, 1880. Paris: Rue Bonaparte 17. Boston: Carl Schoenhof. New York: Christern, Sompers, Brentano, etc.

This number of one of the ablest of literary magazines contains a very interesting article by Count d'Alviella on "The Fiftieth Anniversary of the Brahma Somaj." This celebration took place last January; and the sect now numbers one hundred and thirty congregations, fifty meeting-houses, a score of periodicals, and tens of thousands of adherents, many of them highly distinguished in India. Such is the strength of the form of natural religion established by the successive labor of three pious and enlightened Brahmins, Ram-Mohun-Roy, Debendra-Nath-Tagore, and Keshub-Chunder-Sen.

An effort to unite Islamism and Brahminism was made in the fifteenth century by the weaver Kabir, one of whose disciples became the founder of the Sikhs; and the union of these religions with Parseeism, Judaism, and Christianity was attempted by the Mogul Akbar. Before the close of the last century, Ram-Mohun-Roy learned in a Moslem school to renounce idolatry and worship one God only, though he still rested on the authority of the Vedas, as did the other early members of the Brahma Somaj, or Society of God, which he founded in January, 1830.

After his death, the sect languished until 1843, when Debendra-Nath-Tagore joined it with a large body of adherents whom, before he reached twenty, he had gathered into an association for the search of truth. Under his leadership, the infallibility of the Vedas was given up, and a creed adopted called the Brahma Dharma, with four articles teaching the unity and personality of God, the immortality of the soul, the moral efficacy of prayer, and the necessity of repentance for forgiveness. All distinction of caste in public worship was now abandoned, and this increased the number of members rapidly.

The social separation of the castes was first attacked by Keshub-Chunder-Sen, who found such opposition in the sect that he left it, and founded a new one called the Bharatbharsia Somaj or Brahma Somaj of India, whereas the more conservative body had been known as the Brahma Somaj of Calcutta, though it is now called the Adi Somaj, from a word meaning ancient. In 1870, Keshub and his followers founded the Indian Reform Association, whose objects are the elevation of women, education, cheap literature, temperance, and charity. Soon afterwards, they secured the passage of the Native Marriage Act, which has saved them from the necessity of conforming to any of the authorized religions in order to enter into legal matrimony.

These Neo-brahmaists, as Count d'Alviella calls the seceders, are also distinguished for fervency of worship, especially at their festivals, when the whole congregation have often, at the close of the services, formed themselves spontaneously into a procession with the minister at its head, and marched through the streets, singing the glory of God. They avow their faith in a "revealed deism produced by the action of the holy spirit on the soul, raised above the reach of ordinary philosophy or of science, and designed to bring the human will into harmony with the divine." They believe that the inspiration which gives some light to every soul fills providential men with so much of the divine presence that they become incarnations of God and revelations of his will to all mankind, and in so far as they obey the indwelling spirit are raised above ordinary rules of morality, and made infallible.

Aspiration after a place among the great prophets has led Keshub to found circles of mystics, with regular degrees, the attainment of which gives authority in the sect, and to spend most of his own time during the past four years in meditation and prayer, to the neglect of public preaching and of educational institutions, some of which have been abandoned.

In March, 1878, he gave his daughter in marriage to the rajah of Couch-Behar, when both parties were below the minimum of age on which the father had insisted at the passage of the Native Marriage Act; namely, eighteen for the boy and fourteen for the girl. This inconsistency, together with the introduction of veiled idols at the ceremony, led the Brahmaists, who had in vain protested against the match, to call upon Keshub to resign his office of secretary and cease to preach. He replied by proclaiming his own infallibility. Indeed, he has since dared to say: "The Lord has given me perpetual inspiration. I am not to blame for what he has commanded me to do." He kept possession of his pulpit by the aid of the police. At last, his adversaries seceded, and formed a new society, which they call the universal one, or Sadharan Somaj, and which is on very friendly terms with the original one, the Adi Somaj.

Despite these differences and dangers, the Count expects that the Brahmaists will do much more to enlighten India than the Christian missionaries can accomplish.

Another very valuable article, the second of a series on "Contemporary Moralists," treats of "French Positivism and Independent Morality." Here Alfred Fouillée sketches the positions of Littré, Taine, and Vacherot, acknowledges their inferiority to Spencer, and asserts that no one has yet succeeded in making ethics independent of metaphysics, a point on which some of us must differ from him. That morality can be and should be made independent of theology, he has no doubt. Indeed, he says that for us to consult revelation instead of conscience is like refusing to read our own authors except in poor translations into foreign tongues.

Perhaps the most readable article is that of Alfred Maury on "Ancient Scandinavian Civilization." It is curious to see how commerce and the arts flourished among the Vikings.

We have also a plea for the "Annexation of Tonquin" to France, which already has a colony in Cochin-China; an account of some recently published letters by Mme. de Lafayette, a French novelist who flourished two centuries ago; a tragic story by a George Eliot who has not married Mr. Cross; a poem on an infant-phenomenon; a chronicle of the past fortnight; and a rather severe review of a book called "A Moral Malady. The Evil of the Age," by Paul Charpentier, who finds so much that is sickly in Byron, Rousseau, Chateaubriand, Musset, George Sand, and Goethe, that the critic suggests that, if these great writers are diseased, it may sometimes be unfortunate to have too good health.

THE CREATION, AND THE EARLY DEVELOPMENTS OF SOCIETY. By James H. Chapin, Ph.D., Professor of Geology and Mineralogy. St. Lawrence University, New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 182 Fifth Avenue.

This book, elegantly bound and printed, has a handsome frontispiece (which, however, is not sufficiently described), no Index, and no adequate Table of Contents. There is a great deal of valuable information in a very readable form, especially in Chapter VI., "The Geological Record," and Chapter VIII., "The Problem of Civilization,"—in discussing which it is shown that "the general adoption of the communal principle would be a return toward primitive barbarism. Not a return to it, but a step in that direction. For communism, pure and simple, was the original condition." Particularly interesting are also Chapter XI., on "The Antiquity of Man," which is estimated at sixty or seventy thousand years, and Chapter XII., on "Remains of Ancient Civilization in North America,"—namely, the famous mounds, whose builders are supposed to be ancestors of the Aztecs, Pueblo Indians, and Moquis.

The author seems to be preaching at Meriden, Connecticut, and lecturing at Canton, New York; but he evidently wishes to give us all the geology he can, without cutting altogether adrift from Genesis. Indeed, he writes much more like a scientific professor than a Universalist pastor, though he does assert, "The mound-builders to so far antedate," etc., and says that "the remains found in the mounds of this country are more decayed than those in the Celtic mounds found by Cæsar," who is not known to have dug up any relics. Of much more importance are the opposition to Darwinism, the supposition that the great nebula, out of which came the sun, earth, and planets, was originally dark, and the omission to mention that birds did not appear before mammals, whereas Moses says that "the winged fowl" were created as early as any other animals, and a whole day earlier than the "cattle and creeping things and beasts of the earth." On the whole, however, the scientific view is given fully and fairly; but the Mosaic account is so hurriedly dealt with, that all the self-contradictions and most of the discrepancies with the elder Scripture in the rocks are kept out of sight. Of course, the deluge is said to have been only local, and the days of creation to have been immense periods. The same position is now generally taken by the Orthodox.

Dr. Noyes, in his lectures at the Cambridge Divinity School, was wont to enlarge on this fact, as well as on the unanimity with which the old commentators held to a literal interpretation, and then say: "Now, I agree with the Old School of Orthodoxy, that the Bible teaches that there was a universal deluge, and that the creation took place in six literal days; and I agree with the New School of Orthodoxy, that there never was any such deluge nor any such days of creation. So you see that I am Orthodox all round."

Surely, it is doing no honor to the early chapters of the Bible to admit that they could not give correct teaching until they received the help of modern science. These nominally conservative books, which take geology for granted and try to bring Genesis into agreement, simply show that science has an authority which the Bible can no longer claim.

DRAMATIC IDYLS. SECOND SERIES. By Robert Browning. London: Smith, Elder & Co., 15 Waterloo Place. 1880.

This is by far the most interesting book which Browning has given us since 1871, the date of Balaustion's Adventure. All these six idyls are readable, and two of them, Pietro of Abano and Doctor ——, highly amusing. Muleykeh is the touching story of the Arab who takes such delight in his pet mare's fleetness that, when she is stolen, and he has almost overtaken the thief, he tells the latter the way to rouse her to full speed, because he loves her too much to see her beaten. Most curious of all is Clive's account of a duel with an officer who had cheated him. The hero of Plassy found his life at his opponent's mercy, but felt no fear of being killed, only of being spared and charged with slander.

All who like Browning will enjoy this book, and we hope to see it reprinted speedily.

IN the North American Review for November there are three political articles. Montgomery Blair criticises the centralizing tendencies of the Republican party, as does the Hon. W. B. Lawrence, in an able article on the "Monarchical Principle in our Constitution." He claims the President has far greater authority than any constitutional monarch of Europe, and one that is full of danger. There is an address on the political situation from a financial stand-point, in defence of the Republican party, signed by about two dozen New Yorkers. Howard Crosby furnishes a very interesting paper on the coming revision of the Bible, in which he expresses great regret that the Bible cannot be translated into the vernacular of to-day. Rear-Admiral Ammen presents the advantages of the Nicaragua route to the Pacific, and there in another paper on the ruins of Central America. Bishop Doane writes as only a bishop could of the "Advantages of Free Religious Discussion," and along with a great many platitudes says some very good things.

THE Catholic World for November is as polemical and dogmatic as it was last month, but is a much better number. It has very good articles on De Tocqueville and Hawthorne. There is a lament over the decline of the study of metaphysics, and an attempt to show that the Catholic Church provided popular education before the Reformation. It is shown in another article that during the reign of Elizabeth the Catholics were shamefully persecuted. Whoever would like to know how completely faith in a church can dominate the minds of men ought to read a few numbers of the Catholic World. Nothing so completely sectarian can be found, even among the smallest and most uncultured of Protestant sects.

"OUR LITTLE ONES at Home and in School. An Illustrated Magazine for the Little People. William T. Adams (Oliver Optic), editor." This is the title of a new venture in the department of literature for the juveniles, in this case designed for the very juvenile. Pleasing to the eye, with wealth and beauty of illustration and simplicity of style, it will hardly plead in vain for popular favor from the pets of the household. Issued monthly by the Russell Publishing Co., Boston.

"THE REAL PRESENCE" is the title of an excellent and glowing sermon by John W. Chadwick, the last that he preached to his society before the summer vacation this year, and the first of a new series of his discourses to be printed in pamphlet form by James Miller, 779 Broadway, New York. It will be sent by mail for the low price of six cents, which includes postage; or the whole series for the season to any one address for fifty cents. The same can be procured of Geo. H. Ellis, 101 Milk Street, Boston, at same rates.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 16, 1880.

The labor agitation continues to be a very prominent social feature. All classes of tradesmen and day laborers appear to be perfecting organization for the reform of abuses or higher wages. The cotton-yard men by a strike threatened to seriously embarrass the trade, but finally yielded to reasonable remonstrance from their employers, who had taken large contracts early in the season. The car-drivers protested against the railroad boarding-house system as not conducive to manhood, and it may result in allowing the drivers to choose their own dwelling-places. The hotel-waiters struck yesterday for higher wages, and came out badly. The proprietors refused their demand point blank, and, calling clerks and other employees to the tables, served their meals without delay to their guests. The negro exodus during the past summer withdrew from the plantations a considerable amount of labor. The remaining laborers quickly formed associations, and in two or three parishes struck for higher wages. It caused dismay among the planters for a time, and on various pretexts the State militia was called out and dispersed the strikers. But discontent still prevails. Other strikes are contemplated, and the press complains of a scarcity of labor. Arrangement was recently made to import fifteen hundred coolies from Cuba for sugar plantations; but the resistance of the Chinese consul at Havana and the Spanish authorities, who jointly demanded $8 per head for passport fees, has temporarily checked the movement. The laboring men of the State are preparing to combat the introduction of these coolies, and threaten by systematic strikes of blacks and whites employed on plantations to keep them out.

These exhibitions of independence are astonishing to those accustomed to the servile demeanor of labor during the slave era. They show that new ideas and institutions are rooting themselves in society and displacing the rule of a few over the many. Railroads are rapidly crossing this section of the country, and with increased commercial activity they bring in cosmopolitan influences which antagonize local prejudices. Newspapers are increasing in circulation, because of a daily increasing reading public. The South is awakening to her possibilities, and moving on to a higher stage of prosperity than ever before enjoyed. The greatest impediment in her pathway is the leadership of the old era, which yearns for power under the new. The new wine cannot be safely left in the old bottles. The friends of free speech, free schools, a free press, a free ballot and a fair count, should stand firmly in opposition to the present political leadership of the South, and thereby assist in the growth of that spirit of individual independence without which political, industrial, religious, or social reforms are almost impossible. The old leadership rendered powerless by defeat of its aspirations, new combinations and new men will succeed them; and many anxieties and grave fears for the future will be dispelled by forces already in motion here. PERSONAL ITEMS.

Z. L. WHITE, late of the New York Tribune, has become the managing editor of the Providence Press.

THE Harvard Register for October contains an appreciative sketch, with a likeness, of Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

MR. WHITTIER spends much of his time out of doors, walks a great deal, writes when he feels like it, and is in good health.

MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, Eng., will address the Parker Memorial Society of this city next Sunday in the morning and evening.

MRS. CLIFFORD is to receive a pension from the Civil List, in recognition of the eminent services to mathematics of her late husband, Prof. W. K. Clifford.

P. T. BARNUM is going to give $1,000 for a reading and amusement room in Bridgeport for young men who might otherwise spend their time in saloons. Certainly not a bad use of his accumulations.

REV. OSCAR CLUTE, of Iowa City, an Index subscriber, has been lecturing lately upon "Popular Misconceptions of Darwinism." Another illustration of the influence of science in our day upon the pulpit.

ANDREW D. WHITE, our Minister to Germany, is writing a Life of Thomas Jefferson, to form one of a series of biographies of the founders of the American Republic, which is to be published during the coming winter. Prof. Goldwin Smith is to write a Life of George Washington for the same series.

JAMES T. FIELDS begins, November 3, a course of twelve morning lectures at the Hawthorne Rooms in this city, upon English Literature. There are few men of our time who have enjoyed so large and intimate a fellowship with literary persons, or who have so abundant a store of such reminiscences or greater enthusiasm in the subject.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD goes West immediately after election to resume his lectures. He will speak at Hamilton, Ont., November 4; Union City, Mich., November 6 and 7; Climax, Mich., November 9, 10, and 11. He also contemplates attending the liberal convention to be held in Chicago the 15th, for the organization of a State Secularization Association.

THE only monument to Raphael at Urbino has been hitherto the simple inscription placed above the door of the house in which he was born. It has lately been determined, however, that a more imposing memorial shall be erected in his honor; and subscriptions have been opened all over Italy for the purpose of setting up a statue to him in his native town on the occasion of the fourth centenary of his birth, which occurs April 6, 1883.

IT has been well known in literary circles that Mr. William A. Wheeler, the author of the Dictionary of Noted Names of Fiction, left at his death an uncompleted book of reference. This work was taken in hand by Mr. Charles G. Wheeler, his nephew, and carried forward to completion by him. It will be published by Lee & Shepard, of Boston, under the title of Who Wrote It?—a title which does not refer, as the ingenious reader might suppose, to the duality of authorship, but to the character of the work, which is an encyclopædia of the authorship of noted novels, poetry, and other literature.

THE following letter was recently addressed to the English Spelling-Reform Association by Oliver Wendell Holmes:—

If I have not taken sides with the spelling-reform movement, it is very probably because I was not taken hold of early enough. I spell "honor" and "favor" with the u, and I may yet come to "catalog" and "felosofe" if that is good phonography. At any rate, I should not care to be an obstructive, if I could be, in the way of any well-organized, scholarly attempt to reform our English (and American) language. It is certainly barbarous to make ough take so many forms of pronunciation as it now does. But you must allow a fair share of old square-toed prejudice in their personal likings to the old square-toed people. I hate to see my name spelt Homes, yet I never pronounce the l. I know from old Camden that its derivation is from the word holm, and I want the extra letter. An l is as good as an inch in this connection, if I may venture a debilitated pleasantry. There are many things I should like to have a glimpse of a hundred years from now; among the rest, our English spelling. I have little doubt that many of the changes you contemplate will have taken place, and that I should look back upon myself in 1880 as a hopeless bigot to superannuated notions long since extinct.

Believe me, my dear sir, yours very truly,

O. W. HOLMES.

THE words "Theist" and "Deist" have recently been pretty freely thrown about in theological controversy. Surely, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Voysey, however they may differ in other respects, both agree in being Theists, and both agree in mistaking this word for a synonyme of "Deists." To maintain scientific accuracy, the word Theist should be employed, as it usually is, in works on philosophy or on the history of religious doctrine, in a generic sense, as including all who believe in a God. It is thus opposed to Atheist. The word Deist, on the other hand, came, by the usage of the last century, to designate a person who, believing in a God, or perhaps one only God, as proved by "the light of natural reason," disbelieved in any supernatural revelation. Whatever the opinions of Mr. Voysey may be, it is certainly a curious phenomenon to find an Archbishop of Canterbury "charging against" Theism.—Pall Mall Budget.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

BYRON AND SHELLEY.

Like theirs no accents since have rolled:
The whole wide earth from zone to zone
In briefest years they made their own,
For they were doomed not to be old.

No sickled, cloistered bards were they:
Their songs are fresh as breaking day;
They felt the impulse wild and free
Of Europe bent on liberty;
They groped not in the twilight dim
Of mythic times for myths to hymn
In dainty numbers, honey-sweet,
To lull the ear of caste effete.
Though on the heights of fortune born,
They were the scalds of Freedom's morn,
And through their glowing numbers came
The Revolution's breath of flame.
An indignation fierce, sublime,
Made theirs no dilettante rhyme.

For man, the martyr held so long
In despot's clutch, they wrought with song,
Indignant melody, that made
His dull oppressors' hearts afraid.

When Czar and Kaiser's sceptres old
Are broke and tyrants' days are told;
When the last Pontiff lies inurned,
And ritual spice no more is burned:
Then on some rose-hued Alpine height,
Which rays of morn and evening smite,
Their forms colossal wrought should stand,
High o'er the Switzer's chainless land,
Far-seen, far-shining ever more,
While pilgrims haunt Lake Leman's shore.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 4, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

THE Christian at Work evidently does not think that professedly Christian congregations ought to listen to any thought which they do not already accept, as witness the following: "The strange spectacle was presented last Sunday of a professedly Christian congregation assembling in its own church and listening to a discourse, the burden of which was that there was no such thing as immortality! Brooklyn was the city, the Second Unitarian Church supplied the place and the people, and Professor Felix Adler was the speaker. If old Satan was present at the service, no doubt he went home greatly cheered and comforted."

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

We print in another column of this week's Index Mr. Epes Sargent's statement with regard to the scientific validity of the doctrine of Spiritualism, and we do it most willingly. The Index, in this matter, has no prejudices to be conquered. We have personally given to the claims of Spiritualism no little thought, and we may take this occasion to express our views on the topic.

In the first place, whether Spiritualism is capable of being scientifically established or not, we think it cannot be rationally claimed, and will not probably be claimed by any person of intelligence, that it is a belief which has risen and spread thus far on scientific grounds. Spiritualism may be considered as a form of religion by itself. And, like all religions and all great sects, it has had its root and sustenance largely in man's emotional nature, —much more largely in this than in any cool, deliberative, investigating activity of reason. The vast numbers of people who have accepted Spiritualism have not done so because of anything that could be called scientific research. Religions have never come in that way. Great popular religious movements have never thus come. But they have come through the sway of sentiments. And Spiritualism is no exception to this rule. It has made its appeal to the seat of the most intimate and cherished affections of the human heart. It has attempted to bring a solution to the problem of man's deepest hopes and fears. It has taken special possession of a domain in the broad territories of religion which has always been full of interest to the spiritual imagination, as wel las the cause of infinite solicitudes and yearnings in human hearts,—the undiscovered country beyond the sea of death; and it has presented a claim to answer with definite knowledge the questions which heart and imagination have hitherto sent out into the mystery. And it began to do this at a time when the old theology of Christendom, with its awful day of judgment at the opening of the future life and the exile of the wicked to a doom of perdition too horrible to contemplate and the exile of the good to a heaven hardly less awful in its solemn and unnatural occupations of ceaseless worship, was already falling into discredit. Spiritualism came as a reaction and revolt from this stern theology, the very heaven of which was grim and unfamiliar and unattractive; and it spread, catching in amazing rapidity the adherence of multitudes of openly and secretly dissatisfied souls, because it presented a sweeter hope,—because in a more natural and familiar way, though in no very lofty mode, it answered the heart's longings; because, in fine, it lifted the curtain of death, and bid eyes heavy with weeping and dim with uncertainty or despair look beyond the mystery to a life very like this present, only less gross, where sundered hearts were to be reunited. In other words, Spiritualism became established among the mass of the people, who accepted it, not because they made any very close scrutiny of the phenomena on which it was alleged to be based, but because it met their wishes. It was through their hearts that their heads were convinced, and not by any logic appealing, according to the method of science, to the head alone.

Now, secondly, among a people coming to their religious belief in this manner, it is certainly safe to say that we should not naturally expect to find the most impartial and thorough investigators of the grounds of the belief. Nor, in affirming this, do we affirm that there are not individual believers in Spiritualism who may have begun as unbelieving or even sceptical inquirers into the facts on which it is claimed to be based, and who have become believers, without any bias from their emotions or affections, on what seems to them satisfactory evidence addressed to the understanding. We only say that Spiritualism among the mass of believers in it has not spread in this way; and therefore we do not find very often among Spiritualists those who seem thoroughly competent to investigate, in a purely scientific spirit, the foundations of their faith. Only he who loves the truth, whatever it may be, more than the special spiritualistic belief which he is seeking to justify, can be an impartial investigator. This is a temper of mind which is very rare. It is rare everywhere, but especially in a body of religious believers; and, from the nature of their distinctive doctrine, it has seemed to us particularly rare among Spiritualists. Credulity has certainly been a marked characteristic of Spiritualists as a body. Hence frauds, which have been again and again exposed, have found easy access among them.

Indeed, and this is the third point to be noted, so prevalent have fraud and delusion become in connection with spiritualistic phenomena that the greatest difficulty, at the outset of any investigation, is to get at the exact facts. That there are certain remarkable phenomena that have given rise to the spiritualistic belief, we have no disposition to deny. We do not think they can be rationally denied. But these have been so often simulated by imposture, deceiving even the very elect of spiritualist intellects, and at best they occur under conditions so unlike those to which the ordinary tests of science are applied, and so easily permitting delusion, that it seems to us quite impossible, as yet, rationally to affirm just what the phenomena are.

And, fourthly, the facts being so uncertain and so ill-understood, it seems to us wholly unwarrantable to draw from them the conclusion that there is a personal spirit-communication between this world and another, such as Spiritualism alleges. So far as they are genuine, the phenomena belong, it appears most probable, to the mysterious region (into which science as yet has made so little progress), of the relations between matter and mind. At some time, when the deep problems here involved shall have been more adequately fathomed, the solution may throw important light on the questions of the human soul's entity as distinct from its physical organism and of personal continuance after death. But, at present, we do not think any such claim can be legitimately made. The belief to which Spiritualism asks our assent, though there may be no a priori reasons for rejecting it, is such a tremendous belief, so utterly beyond the range of anything else in our experience, that we are justified in accepting only the clearest and best authenticated proofs for substantiating it. Incidentally, too, it is a very strong objection to the spiritualistic theory, that the alleged communications have added nothing to the stock of human wisdom; that even the brightest departed intellects of our race, though they are said to have sent many messages, have as yet said nothing to indicate that they retained the mental vigor they manifested on earth.

For our own part, therefore, while we believe that Spiritualism occupies in part a field which is to be of interest to science in the future,—this field of the relation between mind and matter,—and specially concerns itself, too, with questions that have always had and still have a near interest to the human heart, we cannot think that the conditions of solving the problem have yet been discovered. We must add, also, that Spiritualism as a practical religious faith seems to us to have somewhat of the same evil that attached to the old Calvinistic theology,—an excess of "other-worldliness." To declaim in glowing phrases about the delights of the "summer-land," and of our anticipated abodes and occupations when we are ourselves translated to that clime, may be a sweet and comforting self-indulgence in the midst of our storm-tossed lives, but it is not the sustenance of those stalwart souls who do the most effective work for humanity on earth.

MRS. CHILD'S BEQUESTS.

When we spoke last week, in our article on Lydia Maria Child, of her interest in the Free Religious Association, we had not seen the final testimony she gave of that interest in the generous legacy left to the Association by her will. The entire will, so far as concerns the public,—and it seems probable that she has disposed of nearly all of her modest fortune for public objects of benevolence,—is a good interpreter of her character and the noble aims of her life. It is as follows:—

To Hampton Agricultural College in Virginia, under General Armstrong's care, $2,000. "Said sum is never to be used for any species of theological teaching."

For the elevation of the character of women, and the enlargement of their sphere of action, $1,000, to be used in such a manner as Colonel Higginson and Mrs. Livermore may direct.

To the Free Religious Association, $1,000. "I do this to express my cordial sympathy with those who are trying to melt away sectarian barriers which so balefully divide the human family, whether they exist between the different sects of Christians or between the different religions of the world." If that "Association" has ceased to exist, Colonel Higginson and William J. Potter are to use this sum for the same object.

To the home in Myrtle Street for old colored women, $1,000.

To the town library of Wayland, $100.

After the death of one of her legatees, she leaves:

To Abby W. May, for the education of destitute Protestant children, $1,000.

To the Consumptives' Home, $1,000.

To the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, $1,000.

To Quaker schools for the education of the Indians, $1,000.

To the Homœopathic Hospital in Boston, $2,000.

Two of the New York journals, the Times and the Herald, and especially the Herald, are striving to stir up opposition to the Democratic nominee for mayor of that city, Mr. William B. Grace, on the ground of his being a Catholic. Mr. Grace is admitted to be a man every way qualified for the office in ability, character, position, and experience; but because he is a Catholic voters are urged not to elect him. We have no sympathy with the Catholic Church as a church, as witness a portion of the discourse printed in our columns this week; but, because we believe in religious freedom, we fully believe in giving to the members of that Church who are citizens among us all their constitutional rights as citizens. On this question, we say Amen to the Catholic Review, which says: "Candidates for the suffrages of our citizens should be weighed by their position in the community, their interest in it, and their share in the public stake, by their intelligence, their business capacity, and their general fitness to the post to which they aspire. Their religion or their nationality should be no qualification for a public post. Neither should it be a disqualification and a bar." And again when it says: "The public offices in this country are open to all citizens competent to fill them, irrespective of creed or any other consideration. That is one of the distinctive features of our republican form of government, and one on which we justly pride ourselves. If a man is to be proscribed for being a Catholic, another amendment had better be added to the Constitution to this effect: 'No Catholic, however worthy, shall hold office in this Republic. To hold office, it is first necessary to deny his faith.' Such is the policy actually advocated by newspapers like the Herald and the Times in their mode of opposition to an appointment to the mayoralty. Carry out their policy, and the Constitution may be torn up as so much waste paper."

INGERSOLL AND THE AUTHORITIES ON "REPEAL."

James Parton is among those who regret that Colonel Ingersoll left the National Liberal League. In a letter recently published, he says: —

"I explain his withdrawal thus. Colonel Ingersoll is essentially a poet, as indeed all very great orators are and must be. What a poet was Chatham, Patrick Henry, Cicero, and even Webster in his great days! Having the qualities of a poet, he has the limitations that belong to the character, among which are aversion to—no matter what. . . . Let him enjoy the poet's privilege of doing just as he likes."

A man may be a poet, and yet not be wholly devoid of common-sense. Admitting Ingersoll is a poet, his views and arguments on the right of the government to forbid the transmission of obscene literature through the mails have the approval of clear-headed men and women generally, including able jurists who are not so much as suspected of being poets. His withdrawal from the Chicago Convention is almost universally regarded as wise and sensible. It was as "level-headed" a thing as he ever did. Strange it is that some of the advocates of repeal did not discover Ingersoll's "limitations," his lack of judgment and other qualities essential to an understanding of the question at issue, when his name was being used, without his authority, to bolster up their positions!

Elizur Wright expresses the opinion that the "one or two of the ablest and most eloquent workers for mental liberty" who left the League at Chicago withdrew, not so much "because they differed from the majority of the League on the question of the constitutionality of that law as from political expediency;" but he says further, "I think it was a mistake of the League not to accept the resolutions Colonel Ingersoll offered, which would have left him without any excuse for withdrawing." The poetical view of the subject evidently did not occur to Mr. Wright.

In his letter, sustaining Wakeman in his demand for the repeal of the postal laws against obscenity, Mr. Parton asks, "Who can define obscenity even for a jury?" But can it not be defined under United States law just as correctly as it can be defined under State law? This objection, if it had any weight, would be an objection to all laws against the circulation of indecent books and pictures.

With Mr. Wakeman, whose objections Parton repeats, the repeal of the postal laws in question has become a hobby. To it, the harmony of the National Liberal League, and even its usefulness as an organization, have been foolishly sacrificed. To it, in some of the freethought journals, the consideration of great and important subjects pertaining to the liberal movement have, during the past two years, been subordinated. In consequence of the prominence given to this hobby, men of distinguished ability, originally identified with the League, have stood aloof from it; and some of them, owing to the abuse heaped upon them and from other considerations, have retired to private life, convinced that for a while their silence would be more effective than their speech. Meantime, men and women without ability or influence, including several of rather unsavory reputation, who manifested no interest in the National Liberal League until its legitimate work was dropped or subordinated to the demand of Wakeman, Bennett, and others for the repeal of these postal laws, have come to the front, and, just now, through the columns of all the papers whose influence they have secured, they are assailing Ingersoll, questioning his sincerity, underrating his ability and judgment, or denouncing him as a bigot, and at the same time abusing, in their characteristic manner, those who withdrew with him from the Chicago Convention.

From the platform and in the papers, Elizur Wright, T. B. Wakeman, and James Parton are very often referred to by advocates of "repeal" as though they, above all other men, were qualified to decide points of constitutional law, and to determine for the people the views they should hold in regard to the postal laws of the country. With no disposition to question the ability or sincerity of these gentlemen, I must yet say that there are others who are quite as able, who are quite as well qualified to form correct judgments on questions of liberty and law, who are quite as distinguished for their devotion to the cause of human freedom, who have been quite as long identified with radical Freethought, and to whom Liberalism is quite as much indebted for its present advanced and advancing condition, who nevertheless believe that the government of the United States has the right, and that the best interests of society demand it should exercise the right, to prevent the transmission through the mails of a class of books and pictures which all decent men and women condemn. Mr. Wakeman is a lawyer, but the position he takes on the postal laws is one in which the members of his profession do not generally concur. W. S. Bush, of Washington, D.C., has recently shown, in my opinion, the utter untenableness of his position. Mr. Wright is justly honored for his anti-slavery labors. His interest in State secularization, and his able advocacy of this reform the past few years, have been appreciated and highly valued by thousands who yet decline to acknowledge him as an authority on postal laws, and disapprove of much he has written the past two years. James Parton, although neither a "poet" nor a logician, is a very good writer of biographical sketches. The reputation he had achieved in this field of literature added somewhat to the strength of the Liberal League when, four years ago, he permitted his name to be identified with it; but, remembering some of the letters he has written of late, the conviction is unavoidable that what he says of Ingersoll is most emphatically true of himself. He has "limitations," "among which are aversion to—no matter what." Some of his utterances and letters of the past year or two have been such as one might look for from a recent convert to Liberalism,—one who had been badly treated by the Church, and had left it in spite, and suddenly changed his views; although the truth is, I presume, that Mr. Parton has been a freethinker many years, and the utterances and letters referred to are quite likely very poor indications of his best thought and spirit. Yet his views outside of his special province of study are certainly not entitled to such great consideration as the frequent use of his name in connection with the postal law controversy would seem to imply.

That the position taken by Col. Ingersoll at Chicago will be sustained by the Liberals of the country, I firmly believe. His views on this subject are not simply those of a "poet." They are the views of men of judicial minds, like Judge Hurlbut, of Albany, and Julian, of Indiana; and they accord with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. They are the views of the great mass of Liberals, who have had time to ponder the subject, and who have not jumped to a conclusion after reading one-sided and exaggerated statements, such as have been sent from New York all over the country the past two years. If a new organization shall be formed on a basis that will exclude irrelevant issues, and confine itself to the work of State secularization, it will, in my opinion, prove a grand success. B. F. U.

French Novelists.

The greatest of these have laid worthy offerings on the shrine of Freethought.

Dangerous as George Sand often is in her lawlessness, there are some half a dozen of her books which show that Charlotte Cushman was right in saying:—

She is in truth the most wonderful preacher. To me, she revealed my religion; and she has been able to produce nothing but good in me.

Of all her novels, Spiridion is most remarkable, on account not only of the vigor with which it attacks all the churches, especially the Romish, but also of the utter absence of love-making, and even of female characters. The romantic element is supplied by the ghostly visitations of the deceased abbot, who gives his name to the book, where he is represented as occasionally appearing to the most enlightened members of the convent which he founded after he had travelled out of Judaism through Protestantism into Romanism, and before he reached pure Theism. His last results were so advanced that he had to conceal them in a manuscript which he commanded his single confidant to bury with him, and not mention till his own last days, and then only to some one friend, who was again to hand down the secret to another, until one of them should have courage enough to dig up and publish the scroll. There are vivid pictures of the persecutions which the bigoted monks inflict on their liberally disposed brethren; but the chief interest of the book is in the struggles of these latter in casting off their cherished religion, without any knowledge of what is to take its place, yet with a consoling and strengthening hope that truth, which they are themselves unworthy to behold, is yet to be revealed to bless their race, and thus all their toils and sufferings be repaid. The book is full of passages like these:—

I professed theology as an exalted apostle, making use of the spirit of discussion and inquiry which was in me, to demonstrate the excellence of a faith which proscribed both.

Since so many philosophers and sages had risen up around me, and had so greatly instructed me without pluming themselves on having any exclusive connection with the Divinity, I could no longer believe in revelation. It appeared to me that St. Paul was no more inspired than Plato, and that Socrates was not less worthy to redeem the sins of the human race than Jesus of Nazareth.

By studying the philosophers, I ceased to be a Christian.

These atheists, justly extolled for their intellectual greatness, are men of profoundly religious sentiments, who become weary, or lose their way in their flight toward heaven.

I have understood that the religion of Christ was stained, that the doctrine of Christ was incomplete, that Christ himself should take his place in the pantheon of divine men; but that his task was accomplished and that a new Messiah must arise, a new evangile arrive, a new law, to reform, perfect, and replace the ancient law.

O Thou whom, under different names, all generations and all people have foreknown and adored! always athirst for thee, I sink again into thine essence, and, by the horror which I have of annihilation, I feel that Thou hast not created me for annihilation.

I have quoted thus freely from the translation published by Charles Fox, London, 1842, because the book is scarce. It might well be reprinted.

At the conclusion of The Countess of Rudolstadt, a sequel to Consuelo, there is a highly wrought account of the admission of the heroine into a secret society of the friends of liberty, who call themselves the Invisibles. These builders of the Temple of Virtue, after subjecting her to the perusal of the persecutions suffered by various sects, and the sight of the worst scenes and instruments of torture, and after testing her fidelity to her husband, finally welcome her to their membership, in an amphitheatre adorned with the statues of the chief friends of humanity, Jesus standing between Pythagoras and Plato, Apollonius of Tyana and Abelard close to St. John and St. Bernard, and Jean Huss and Jerome of Prague beside St. Catherine and Joan of Arc.

And then there is her beautiful drama, Les Sept Cordes de la Lyre. The hero is a philosopher, descended from Faust and Margaret, and the heroine an enthusiastic girl of seventeen, with an ancient lyre on which no one else can play, but from which at her mere touch pours forth wondrous music that inspires her to sing the grandeur of the Infinite, the beauty of Nature, and finally the glory of humanity and the woes inflicted by tyrants.

Of the author's own painful struggle after a faith that could satisfy her emotions as well as her intellect, there is a striking picture in Lélia, a very disagreeable novel, which contains a few such passages as this:—

The Deity I serve is that of Plato and Pythagoras as well as of Jesus. To make Him propitious, it is not enough to be charitable and humble: we must be great, we must cultivate the lofty faculties of the mind as well as the sweet instincts of the heart, in order to be in communion with this infinite power, this perfection itself, which preserves all things in kindness, but which reigns in justice. After thine example, O Perfection without bounds, man should make himself just; and there is no justice without knowledge.

The story of an aspiring though erring life is much more pleasantly told in her autobiography, L'Histoire de ma Vie, where we find her so ardent a devotee at fifteen that her confessor has to command her to jump rope and romp with the other girls, in order to cure her of such morbid self-reproach as he declares to be sin before God. Her Impressions et Souvenirs show not only the ardor of her youthful studies, but the peace of her ultimate conviction that:—

The time is coming when we shall say as little as possible of God, never dispute about him, force no one to pray to him, but leave worship to the sanctuary of private conscience; and this we shall do, when we are truly religious.

O Thou who ignorest the egoistic prayer of the idolater, but hearest the cry of the heart, I shall not pray to Thee. I have nothing to ask which the law of my life has not offered me. My not having taken it is my own fault and that of my race.

Communion with Thee cannot be in written or spoken words, for these have been invented for use between man and man. With Thee there is no language, but all takes place within the soul. There all is fire and transport, and yet firmness and wisdom.

Victor Hugo's greatest aud best-known work, opens with a touching picture of Christianity at its best in the good bishop who turns his palace into a hospital, and who shows to the jail-bird who robbed him a charity which makes Jean Valjean reform and become the hero of Les Misérables. But even this faithful shepherd is obliged to bow in homage to the grandeur of the surviving leader of the reign of terror, who has torn away the drapery from the altar to stanch his country's wounds, and who dies full of faith in progress, and of hope that science is yet to govern man. The second part, Cosette, paints with great power the suffering, waste of time, and treachery to social and family duty which characterize cloister life when it is purest:—

Monasticism has been the scourge of Europe. He who says "convent" says "marsh." Monasteries were good in the tenth century, were open to discussion in the fifteenth, and are detestable in the nineteenth.

Thus speaks an author whose words are all the more weighty because he adds:—

We are for religion against the religious. Woe to him who believes nothing. The Infinite is necessarily intelligent, because otherwise it would be to that extent finite. The ideal is God.

Still better is the latter half of this wonderful book, where we have Marius, Enjolras, Combeferre, and the other friends of the abased,—young heroes who believe in humanity, liberty, and progress too devoutly to care for servile and reactionary rites and creeds, or to hesitate about laying down their lives when duty even seems to call. Here, as in The Toilers of the Sea, we see how much to blame are those who assert that liberal views are likely to check self-sacrifice.

And besides these works, so plainly in our interest, by George Sand and Victor Hugo, there are some very interesting romances by professed Roman Catholics, zealous to reform and purify their church. Eugene Sue's Wandering Jew is well known as a highly wrought account of the rapacity of the Jesuits. Similar in object at least is Jules Janin's Religieuse de Toulouse.

One of the ablest writers who seek to reform Romanism from within calls himself L'Abbé , but his real name is Deléon. In Le Maudit, he shows a devoted servant of the Church carried by his zeal against pious fraud and oppression into unwilling hostility, which ends only as he dies in excommunication, seeking to the last to save the Church which has cast him out. A similar story is told in Le Jésuite; but this latter work is overloaded with historical details, especially about the perversion of Pius IX. from a reformer to a reactionary, and the plot is rather repulsive. Equal in power to Le Maudit are Le Confesseur and Le Curé de Campagne. The former is the story of the misery wrought in a pious family by an over-zealous confessor, who nearly drives them all out of the Church. The other romance shows how terribly the vow of celibacy can darken two devout and virtuous lives. In these and other books, the author professes the firmest loyalty to the Church; but, whatever may be the object of such works, they can have but one tendency. So absolute are the claims of the Church of Rome that reform means rebellion. Indeed, a Church whose most devout and intelligent servants find most cause for complaint cannot be considered by outsiders as worth reforming. Sue and Deléon show as plainly as Huss and Luther did, that no attack on Rome from without is more effective than the attempt to reform her from within.

All the books mentioned above, except Lélia, can safely be put into the most innocent hands. Among other novels which have this advantage, though not that of laying much stress on liberal views, are the following: Eugénie Grandet by Balzac; L'Homme de Neige, La Mare au Diable, Fadette, François le Champi, Jeanne de la Roche, Les Maîtres Mosaistes, and Mlle. la Quintinie by George Sand; Tolla, Germaine, Le Roi des Montagnes, and Trente et Quarante by About; La Maison de Penarvan and Mlle. de Seiglière by Sandeau; La Tulipe Noire by Dumas; Atala and Le Dernier Abençerrage by Chateaubriand; Picciola by Saintine; L'Homme qui Rit and Ninety-three by Victor Hugo; and the historical romances of Erckmann-Chatrian.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

JUDGE E. R. HOAR, in his opening address as President of the recent Unitarian Conference at Saratoga, referred to the sermon of Mr. P. W. Clayden, delivered the previous evening, as "that noble discourse of last night, which struck the key-note for the action of our Conference." Something must be forgiven, we suppose, to the presumed necessity of a presiding officer to consider everything from a favorable point of view, especially the production of an English guest; but, if Judge Hoar had searched the dictionary through, he could scarcely have selected a more unfortunate word, under the circumstances, with which to characterize the sermon than the word "noble." With considerable felicity of diction and excellence of feeling, it was nevertheless very superficial in the treatment of its subject, and, as regards its main assumption, might almost be characterized as vicious. Mr. Clayden asserts that Unitarian congregations "need to be confirmed in their Unitarianism, not as against Orthodoxy so much as against scientific scepticism and the unbelief of mere worldliness." The important element of this assertion, the need of confirmation against scientific scepticism, appeared in various forms throughout the discourse; and, if this idea should be really adopted as the key-note of Unitarianism, the denomination would be quickly doomed. If there can be among intelligent men to-day any worse scepticism than a distrust of the results of scientific inquiry, we have yet to hear it proclaimed. "Can a man believe in science, and still believe in heaven?" Mr. Clayden represents the world as asking, "Can there be in these times the old dependence upon God?" These questions illustrate Mr. Clayden's own attitude,—a pitiable, begging attitude, the direct reverse of that which is manly or "noble." We are glad to observe that Unity, the organ of Western Unitarianism, criticises the sermon from a similar point of view.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES is another Englishman who, for the sake of his own reputation, would do well to limit the number of his speeches while he remains in the United States. We remember with pleasure the impression received years ago from his Tom Brown at Rugby, and have avoided reading it since, not caring to risk any destruction of the old-time enthusiasm. And we remember his eloquent words at Boston during his visit at the close of our civil war. And we respect his motives in the present attempt to establish a colony in Tennessee. But an address given the other day to the students of Haverford College, near Philadelphia, showed that Mr. Hughes would probably make an appreciative member of Mr. Clayden's congregation. In giving some account of the methods of Dr. Arnold at Rugby, he bestowed highest praise upon Dr. Arnold's religious instruction. "I believe," said Mr. Hughes, "his early teachings have saved many of us, in these trying times, from sacerdotalism on the one side, and agnosticism on the other,"—a sentence the full meaning of which can be better appreciated, if we know that he had just used the word "agnostic" as synonymous with "scientific." Mr. Hughes continued: "There is nothing there [in the Bible] to lead us intellectually into paths where it is almost impossible for men to find a firm foothold. Only one firm foothold he used to teach us, and that is the foothold which rests upon God, is made manifest in the flesh, and revealed to us in the New Testament. With that rock under your feet, you can approach all those deep questions which are stirring men's minds so tremendously in these times." The peculiar rhetoric of this passage may be overlooked, but the bigotry and ignorance of science which it displays are scarcely pardonable in one of Mr. Hughes' reputation.

THE duet sung by Mr. Clayden and Mr. Hughes is supplemented by a solo in the same key, by Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, in the November Atlantic. Miss Phelps furnishes us with a dialogue between a believer and an unbeliever. This she carries on with tolerable fairness for a while; but the burden of reply soon becomes too heavy, and she indulges the believer in a long tirade against the unbeliever. "You forget," says the wise believer to the non-present unbeliever, "or you have never learned, that the MENTAL SCIENCES EXIST. You have not remembered that there is a philosophy of mind, as there is of matter; that there is a philosophy of soul, as there is of sense," and so on. To this scream of small capitals and italics, no unbeliever, of course, would venture to reply. Nor can the following be answered: "You burrow, you dig, you descend. Choosing the company of the lowest forms of manifestation, you will find that the influence of their atmosphere is upon you. If a human mind keeps the exclusive company of vegetables and insects and fossils, is it to be wondered at that it fails to see the transfigured cloud which veils, while defining, the motions of the eternal sun? If," etc., ad nauseam. We have quoted this passage, because it is a good illustration of a fact of frequent observation; namely, that there is yet in many minds a survival of some remnants of the old dual doctrines of Eastern religions, of Ormuzd and Ahriman. The same fancy crops out in Clayden, in Hughes, in Miss Phelps, and in scores of others, that the investigation of matter is degrading, that the scientist cannot have "the trained spiritual sense by which we recognize the spiritual fact." This has always been an assumption of all mystics, and, we may add, of all "exalted natures" who fail to be "understood." The scientist has indeed, as Miss Phelps supposes, no reply to make. He can only mournfully smile, and try to get what comfort he can out of a forgetfulness of his deficiencies, and the society of his grubs and fossils.

ONE degraded scientist, Professor Owen, has got considerable comfort recently out of a fossil discovered in South Africa. It is that of a lizard-like reptile, with a tendency toward certain low types of mammalian structure. The animal must have been a not very remote cousin of the ornithorhyncus or duck-mole of Australia, and is one of the most important "missing links" yet discovered. The St. James Gazette, in speaking of the pedigree of the mammalia from the reptiles, says that we now have, among living or extinct forms, "first, the primitive reptile; then a reptile with nascent mammalian tendencies; next, a still more mammalian, but ovoviviparous form; then, again, a group of pouched mammals; then a group of closely allied, but pouchless mammals; and then the various lines of descent, culminating in our highest existing creatures. And the geological succession of all these forms is exactly what, on the theory of evolution, one would expect to find it." R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE UNION.— Social science, not sectarianism, is the weapon to be employed in dealing with intemperance. So far, then, as the "Women's National Christian Temperance Union," which has recently held its seventh annual meeting in this city, emphasizes its Evangelical ideas and methods or its exclusively Christian membership, it of course does not command our sympathy. An evil so widespread among all classes and conditions of people as the excessive use of artificial stimulants demands to be treated in a more humanitarian spirit and with a broader co-operation. Yet, inasmuch as this society, through its extensively circulated publications and its frequent and various kinds of meetings for public appeal and for informal, social converse, is awakening attention more and more to the forms which the evil assumes in our country, its great extent, the influences which foster it, and the unrestricted traffic which supplies its demands; as the society labors, through the school and the home, to instil the principle and form the habit of temperance with the young, seeking to introduce into educational institutions "such text-books on physiology, chemistry, and political economy as will show the good that comes of abstinence," and to gather women together to "be addressed by those of their own sex who are qualified to impress upon their minds the laws of cause and effect involved in the subjects of hygiene, heredity, and prenatal influence"; as the leaders of the enterprise are summoning women generally to thought and action on this subject in all its bearings, even to the securing and use of the ballot for the accomplishment of their object, thus educating them for and leading them on to larger opportunities of influence and action,—for these reasons, and in these directions, we welcome their efforts and rejoice in their success. F. H.

Coffee-Houses.

AS THERE is quite an interest manifested in various parts of this country in relation to the establishment of coffee-houses, it may be well to call attention to one of the most successful undertakings in this direction, which is now in full operation in Philadelphia. The "Central" and the "Model" Coffee-Houses were established in 1874, and have been in continuous operation ever since. This is a private enterprise, and sustained wholly by one individual; but it is none the less a public benefit and a grand benevolent and philanthropic institution. Joshua L. Baily, Esq., a modest and successful merchant, undertook the effort to supply an antidote for the liquor-saloons; and he is now feeding about four thousand persons daily, limited only by the capacity of the buildings. The "Model" is worthy of its name. Constant improvements have been made to keep fairly abreast, if not ahead, of anything of the kind in the world; and intelligent travellers testify that, in extent of its business and completeness of its accommodations, it is superior to the more pretentiously titled "Coffee-Palaces" of England. The finest coffee and the purest milk in the market are furnished, and the apartments are all first-class. The promptness and politeness of the waiters are unsurpassed. A reading-room and public hall for meetings are regularly maintained, and productive of great good. Many cases of radical reform directly resulting from these instrumentalities are reported. Here the work of prevention shines forth most prominently. Scores of clerks in stores and counting-rooms are saved from the temptation and pollution of the liquor-saloons. A thousand dollars' rent was offered for a tobacco-stand to be kept on the premises, but it was promptly refused. The mental, moral, physical, and spiritual interests of the many persons employed in these coffee-houses are looked after with great minuteness by Mr. Baily, and with great good success. Hundreds of thousands of temperance tracts are regularly distributed through this agency. We commend this institution to all those who are about starting "coffee-houses," as a worthy "model" and important aid to the temperance movement, as well as a financial success.—National Temperance Advocate.

One Way to Prevent Labor Strikes.

THERE is one branch of the silk industry in which it may confidently be said that America leads the world; and that is in the manufacture of what is called spun or waste silks. The perfection which has been reached in this branch is due to the ingenuity, patience, and perseverance of the Cheney Brothers, of South Manchester, Conn., who own the largest silk-mill on the continent, and whose products are known all over this country and are being imitated in Europe. There were eight brothers in the family, but not one too many. They became early interested in silk culture, and made various attempts to colonize the silk-worm; but their silk-growing experiments failed. They gradually returned to South Manchester, and started the manufacture of sewing-silk from imported raw silk. At that time, this country was supplied almost entirely from Italy. The Cheneys made a close study of the Italian method. After experimenting for some time, Mr. Frank Cheney succeeded in twisting silk on the same plan that the Italians did; but what they did by hand the Cheneys did by machinery. This was the beginning of their success. New buildings began to dot the fields at South Manchester, and the number of operatives steadily increased until the old farm was converted into a beautiful manufacturing village.

One of the pleasantest and most noteworthy features in connection with the work of the Cheney Brothers is not merely the improvement they have made in silk machinery, but their practical solution of the question of the pleasant and equitable relation between capital and labor. They have established, and been able to manage with surprising success, an ideal manufacturing village. The reputation they have gained among philanthropists and economists is hardly second to the reputation of their silks. Many persons visit South Manchester yearly, not to see the silk-looms, but simply to see their charming village and learn the secret of their success. To the Cheneys there is no secret about it. They started their mills, and have conducted them for business purposes, not merely for social experiments. But they began and have continued in the right way. They have treated their employees not as slaves, but as men and women. Instead of living in the city away from their mills, and thus having no personal interest in the welfare of the village, they have built their own houses upon beautiful sites near their mills. They have built a large number of cottages on the place, which they let to married employees at a low rent. They have established boarding-houses for the unmarried and schools for the children. A large hall, erected at a cost of nearly $60,000, which is supplied with a good organ, scenery, and dramatic appliances, is one of the best monuments of their generosity. A free library and reading-room furnishes their employees with the latest newspapers and magazines and the best current literature. Unsectarian religious services and a Sunday-school are provided every Sunday in the hall, the Cheneys paying the expenses of preaching. There are also a Methodist and an Orthodox Congregational Church in the place, which many of the operatives attend. An excellent orchestra, numbering eight or ten pieces, organized from among the employees, meets for practice every Sunday afternoon in the large hall, and, accompanied on the piano by the accomplished daughter of one of the employers, renders some of the most difficult classical music. Concerts and dramatic entertainments take place occasionally, which furnish cheap and excellent sources of amusement. The cottages are each supplied with water, gas, and a pleasant garden-plot. The mills are well lighted and ventilated. The grounds are laid out with great taste: there is no fence on the whole place. In fact, everything is done to make it convenient and pleasant to the employees. South Manchester seems rather like a great factory family than a factory town. It is hardly necessary to say that the Cheneys have never suffered from strikes.—S. J. Barrows, in Atlantic Monthly.

JESUS AND HIS BIOGRAPHERS. (Concluded.)

"In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established."—II. COR. xiii., 1.

3. The Synoptical Gospels.

The first three Gospels, called Synoptical (from σὺν, "together," and ὄψις, "view"), are, therefore, the true sources of our knowledge of JESUS. They are the production of three independent authors or compilers. They report many things in common. Some matters not reported by all are mentioned by two of these writers. Each writer, in addition, mentions some events which are not reported by either of the others.

The terms used by two or more writers in describing the same event are often nearly or quite identical. This would appear to indicate that they drew upon some common source of information, either a writing or oral tradition.

Sometimes, however, they vary in their several accounts of the same event. This indicates that they wrote independently, and without collusion.

Questions.

If several persons attempt to relate, independently, the same incident or event, in their own language, would they use the same or different expressions? Would they not naturally vary considerably in their modes of expression? Is not the inference inevitable that these writers borrowed from some common tradition or writing?

NOTE A.—It is probable that there were several MSS. older than our Gospels in use among the early communities of Christians. (See Luke i., 1-4.)

NOTE B.—It is not certainly known when the Gospels were written. They could not have existed, in their present form, before the beginning of the second century after Christ. They are not quoted or identified with certainty, by Christian writers, until about the last quarter of the second century.

NOTE C.—"WITNESSES": (See the Lesson's text.) Anonymous, all; therefore only to be trusted when their testimony is consistent with itself, with the known history of the times, and with the dictates of reason. They are not "witnesses" of the events described, but only to the existence of certain traditions about the events.

4. The Triple Tradition.

The matter which the Synoptical Gospels contain in common is called the TRIPLE TRADITION. This is evidently our nearest possible approach to the true history of JESUS.

Beside the Triple Tradition, MARK and LUKE have a good deal of additional matter in common, and also MARK and MATTHEW. In striking contrast, MATTHEW and LUKE have no additional matter in common. They contain nothing in common which is not found, in a slightly modified form, in MARK. From this and from other internal evidence, we may infer that MARK is probably the earliest or most primitive of existing Gospels, and approximates more nearly than the others to the original tradition.

In studying the life and teaching of JESUS, our sources of information will be, therefore: 1st, the Triple Tradition; 2d, the additional matter in MARK; 3d, the additional matter common to two writers; and, 4th, with great caution, some of the statements made by MATTHEW or LUKE alone.

We shall, however, submit every statement to the test of REASON and scientific criticism. We must not forget that these books were written many years after the events which they assume to describe, in an uncritical and superstitious age, and that their authors are unknown to us. They would naturally contain, therefore, a large admixture of error.

NOTE A.—The leading characteristics of the Synoptical Gospels are: 1st, MARK presents the most natural and human view of the character of JESUS (Mark i., 5, 9; vi., 5; x., 18); he exalts his human personality; 2d, MATTHEW represents JESUS as the Jewish Messiah, fulfilling the Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament (Matt. i., 22, 23; ii., 5, 6; 15, 17, 18, 23; iv., 14, 15; viii., 16, 17; xi., 10; xii., 17, 18, 19, 20; xiii., 14; xxi., 5, xxvii., 9; 3d, LUKE sets aside the Jewish exclusiveness, and magnifies the mission of JESUS to the Gentiles. (Luke iv., 32; iii., 6, 38; iv., 27; x., 1, 14, 25, 37; xxiv., 47).

NOTE B.—The oldest existing MSS. of the New Testament date from the 4th and 5th centuries of our era. There are only eight MSS. extant which contain the four Gospels complete. In four others, they are nearly complete, but with some omissions.

NOTE C.—The first translation of the Gospels into English was made by JOHN TYNDALE in 1525. Our common Protestant translation of the Bible was completed in 1611, in the reign of King James of England. It contains some interpolations of matter not found in any of the older MSS. and many minor errors of translation.

General Questions.

1. What are the first three Gospels called? Why? 2. Were they written by the same or different authors? 3. What do they report? 4. Are these writings original or are they copied in part from older traditions? 5. When were these books written? 6. What is the Triple Tradition? 7. What information does this give us? 8. Which is probably the oldest Gospel? 9. Upon what must we depend for information concerning Jesus? 10. What can you say of the age in which these authors wrote? 11. Can we accept all they have written as historical truth? 12. How must they be tested? 13. What are the leading characteristics of these writings? 14. What is the date of the oldest existing MSS. of the Gospels? 15. When were they translated into English?

To the Teacher.

Use the "helps" recommended in the previous lesson. Illustrate, by giving accounts of the same event as related by the different authors: e.g., the story of Jesus and John the Baptist; the Parable of the Sower.

Give the class some explanation of the new translation of the New Testament.

FOREIGN.

IT is stated that the differences between the Vatican and Brazil with regard to the Roman Catholic Church in that country have now been definitely arranged.

IN the British Parliament, the Dissenters are more numerous than at any time since the Commonwealth. There are 25 Independents, 5 Jews, 5 Baptists, 9 Wesleyans, 29 Presbyterians, 48 Irish Roman Catholics, 16 Quakers, and 1 Bradlaugh.

THE Bishop of St. Albans opened a new church recently at Bushey. In the course of his sermon, his lordship said that the church was built for working men, who, it was said, were unbelievers; but he did not think they were, though they were miserably negligent in religious worship.

ANOTHER plot against the life of the Czar is reported by the Warsaw Journal, which states that a mine containing charges of dynamite has been discovered under the Losowo-Sebastopol railway. The explosion, it is stated, failed during the Emperor's recent journey, in consequence of the accidental cutting of a wire connecting the dynamite with a galvanic battery.

THE owner of a wine restaurant at Brighton, a renewal of whose license has been refused, has revenged himself, by placarding his premises with the announcement that they will be reopened as a general marine-store, where "the best price will be given for rags and bones." He has for neighbors Lord Londesborough on one side, and the Hon. Lady Hill on the other.

THE latest strike is that of the women and girls who work in one of the largest perfumery factories in France. A Paris correspondent states that, notwithstanding the high prices at which the articles of luxury produced by them are sold, the women in question earn only from 1*s.* to 2*s.* a day, that large stoppages, frequently amounting to the whole sum earned, are made from their week's wages, and that other grievances are complained of.

ENGLISHWOMEN AS DOCTORS IN CHINA.—A letter from China in the Temps mentions that Miss Howard, an English lady, has been appointed doctor to the Countess Li, as also to the management of a hospital established at Pekin by the foreign residents. The Countess Li supplies all the medicine for the patients, is a great friend to animals, and on being lately asked by Miss Howard whether it was true she supported a hundred cats replied, "Alas, no! I have now only seventy."

TEN convicts who escaped from New Caledonia have been arrested in Queensland, and will be sent back to the French convict settlement. According to the Sydney Evening News, the convicts on their arrival in Queensland represented themselves to be Communists; but the governor received information of their being ten of the worst description of criminals. Since their arrest, eight other convicts have made their escape from New Caledonia, and are supposed to have landed on the Australian coast.

A WAYWARD Hebrew named Marks has been outraging the feelings of the "uncos" at Christchurch, N.Z., by selling on Sunday "apples, oranges, and lemonade," as the theatre confectioners have it. The powers that be have decided that the vending of stick-jaw, acid drops, and fruit on the Sabbath is inimical to the moral welfare of the people, and that the baneful influence of such traffic is heightened by the accompanying trade in those maddening drinks called lemonade and hop-beer respectively. This marks an era in civilization, observes a press correspondent.—Sydney (Australia) Bulletin.

OUTBREAK AT AN ENGLISH REFORMATORY.—A mutiny broke out recently at the reformatory, Stanwix, Carlisle, where forty-three boys are confined. Mr. Crowther, the governor, has two assistants, one of whom left for the night at seven o'clock. On going into the dormitory, the governor found the gas turned out, and on asking the reason he was struck on the head with a stick. Other blows followed, and he fell insensible. All the boys rushed out and escaped, but some returned voluntarily to the reformatory. Others were arrested in Carlisle. The police continued the search for the remainder, about half of the whole.

THE tenth anniversary of the entry of the Italian troops into Rome under General Cadorna has been commemorated in Rome. There was a grand popular demonstration, in which the members of the government, representatives of the Senate and Chamber, and the principal State dignitaries, took part. Wreaths were laid on the tomb of Victor Emmanuel, and speeches were delivered by Signor Cairoli, the Italian Premier, and Signor Armellini, the Syndic. A royal decree has been published in Rome, granting an amnesty to all persons convicted of offences against the press laws. A Roman telegram announces that about forty Internationalists attempted a Republican demonstration at Cesaro on the 19th inst. They were, however, dispersed by the police, and ten of their number arrested.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.—The Manchester City News says: "Mr. George Jacob Holyoake is about to contribute a series of articles, under the title of 'Among the Americans,' to the Co-operative News. The successive chapters, some fourteen in number, will deal with the voyage out, pleasant days in New York, interviewing, political affairs, eminent men in Boston, pulpit and political orators, manners and opinions, discoveries and incidents, and other subjects. Mr. Holyoake's fascinating essay on his American journey in the Nineteenth Century, two months ago, encourages the hope that the promised series of papers will prove exceptionally suggestive and entertaining." These articles will include an account of correspondence and interviews with the Canadian, American, and English Governments respecting co-operative emigration; and the Official Guide Book for emigrants. The following will be the titles of the chapters: Sea Ways and Sea Society; Courtesies of New York; The Republican Convention at Saratoga; Propagandist Uses of Interviewing; Men of Action in Boston; City of Holyoke,—Discourses in Free Churches; Wanderings in Five Great Cities; American Orators,—Wendell Phillips, Ingersoll, and Curtis; Famous Preachers,—Ward Beecher, Robert Collyer, and Professor Adler; Co-operation in the New World; State Socialism in America; Co-operative Emigration; Visits to the Premier of Canada and President of America; Wayside Incidents; Manners and Opinions in America.

STATUES.—During the past week, the town of Blois has been en fête; and all the local celebrities, together with two or three high officials from Paris, have been unveiling a statue of Denis Papin, the discoverer of steam-power. Every kind of steam-engine (with some few trifling exceptions) includes a cylinder and piston; and of the cylinder and piston Denis Papin was undoubtedly the inventor. It was from Denis Papin that Newcomen and Watt, the English fathers of steam machinery, gathered their first ideas on the subject. Newcomen, adopting the cylinder and piston of Papin, added to it Savery's method of condensation, and produced the first atmospheric engine. It was in experimenting with a model of what was then known as "Papin's Digester" that Watt himself saw his way to farther mechanical triumphs. Papin having been a victim of the edict of Nantes, the Republicans of Blois took advantage of the occasion of the fêtes in his honor to manifest their liberal and anticlerical ideas. At Clermont-Ferrand, a statue has been erected in honor of Blaise Pascal; and in a few days a statue of Frederic Sauvage will be erected at Boulogne-sur-Mer. Frederic Sauvage was the inventor of the screw-propeller, on the perfection of which he expended all his energies and resources, insomuch that he was lying in prison for debt at Havre while other people were profiting by his invention. Alphonse Karr, in one of the volumes of his Livre de Bord, relates how he found out this injustice, and did his best to repair it. Sauvage finally went mad, and died in misery in 1857.—Parisian.

JESTINGS.

THE process by which a church fair pays church debts is thus described by a Presbyterian elder: "Now, brethren, let us get up a supper and eat ourselves rich. Buy your food. Then give it to the church. Then eat it up, and then—your church debt is paid."

"GO WHERE there is the most sin, sir," said the old clergyman's coachman, when asked which of two calls the dominie ought to accept. The good man thought over it, and concluded that where there was most money there would be most sin. So he accepted the call which offered the most substantial salary.

UNTO an Oxford professor, married late in life, a child was born. That child has now advanced to the mature age of three years. "A charming little fellow!" say all the professor's friends. "Yes, yes," replies the learned man, dejectedly. "But I fail to see in him the least leaning toward the exact sciences."

BELIEVERS in metempsychosis have had their faith refreshed by a recent child, who, upon coming into the world, made a searching scrutiny of his surroundings, and sinking back in the nurse's arms remarked, "Thank Heaven, at last I have got myself born into a family that is comfortably fixed."—From the French.

"WERE any minutes taken at your meetings?" inquired Mr. Hickman Molesworth, barrister, Belfast (Vic.), of a member of a school committee against whom the teacher had brought an action for illegal dismissal. "Minutes!" exclaimed the witness. "It wasn't minutes we tuk: we wur hours at it."—Sydney (Australia) Bulletin.

LITTLE Robby came home with his new hat limp as a dish-cloth. "For goodness' sake," cried his mother, "where have you been?" Robby began to whimper as he replied, "A fellow threw my hat into a frog-pond." "Oh, Robby!" exclaimed his sister: "you threw it in yourself. I saw you do it!" "Well," said Robby, contemptuously, "ain't I a feller?"

THE Orangethorpe Sunday-school celebrated its sixth anniversary last Sabbath afternoon. In the review of past lessons, the question was asked: "What did God do on the seventh day?" (referring to the creation of the world.) Answer: "He rested." "What else did he do?" Promptly came the answer from a little eight-year-old boy: "He read his newspaper!"

NOTHING neater and more pointed has been said in the way of gloom than the remark of a New York wholesale liquor-dealer, who said that, since Mrs. Hayes came in, his orders for wines to serve to parties and at dinners at Washington had fallen off immensely. "Ah," said he, mournfully, "I don't know as it seems so to everybody, but I think the world is going backward."

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

CURRENT TOPICS.

MR. GRACE was elected Mayor of New York, but by a very small majority for a Democratic majority in that city. Comparing his vote with Hancock's, many thousands, it is evident, must have voted against him merely because he is a Catholic.

THE First Church (Unitarian) in Boston is to celebrate its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary on the eighteenth of this month. The speakers invited are not only Unitarian, but Episcopalian, Orthodox, Congregational, and Ralph Waldo Emerson.

A BAPTIST clergyman in Kentucky refuses to contribute to the missionary fund on the ground that the Bible says that, whenever the gospel is preached unto all people, the end is reached, and God forbid that he should contribute one cent toward hastening that momentous period. Here is a nucleus for the formation of a new sect.

AT a recent Unitarian Conference in Michigan, Rev. J. Ll. Jones made some strong and good talk against the sensational Sunday-school now in vogue. Along with other things, he said that he regarded "chalk-talks, mechanical and other contrivances of the professional Orthodox Sunday-school man, as largely responsible for the flippancy of the age."

THE Nation for October 28 says, "Since the death of Rosenkranz, not a single Hegelian professor lectures in Germany"; and the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. xi., p. 621, says, "Hegelianism has now ceased to exist as an isolated system in Germany": and also that in England, "few, if any, profess to accept the system in its integrity." So the Concord School of Philosophy seems to be Hegel's last refuge.

THE Catholic Review is informed that the circulation of the New York Herald fell off forty thousand copies in six days on account of its violent opposition to Mr. Grace for the mayoralty because of his being a Catholic, and adds, in no very Christian spirit of forgiveness, "If this is not the fact, it ought to be; and, if the Catholics of New York, Brooklyn, and Newark have the courage of their convictions, the Herald will be excluded from every Catholic household in these dioceses."

WHILE the religious newspapers in this country are protesting, some of them with a vehemence that is quite secular, against the proposed representation at Booth's Theatre, New York, of the Ober-Ammergau Passion-Play, the Ritualists in London are preparing to exhibit the play in their churches by the stereopticon. A white sheet is stretched across the chancel to receive the pictures, a priest will explain from the pulpit, and the choir will sing in the midst of the performance appropriate hymns.

REV. DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, it is now stated, though compelled to withdraw from the Methodists by their polite invitation to him to go out, will not unite with any other denomination, but will remain in that city, preaching in a hall to an independent congregation. Independency seems to be "catching" in Chicago. Cheney, Swing, and Thomas have seceded respectively from the Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Methodists, and set up in their own way. They might come together to make a very respectable denomination by themselves.

THE readers of the Christian Register are to be congratulated that the Rev. Charles G. Ames, in withdrawing from its editorship, does not lay aside his pen as a contributor to its columns. The number of that paper for October 30 contains a characteristically good article by him on Roman Catholic Education, in which he makes this point against its unprogressive character: "Even if the Catholic system were on the whole superior,—which facts disprove,—it would still be true that an inferior system, if in constant process of improvement, would soon outstrip a better one in the hands of men whose official pretensions arrest its development. Free and open criticism is the proven instrument of correction and progress; but such criticism has never found a welcome in the somewhat complacent circles of sacerdotalism, though greatly needed there as elsewhere."

THE Convention of the National Reform Association (Christian-Amendment-to-the-Constitution party) recently held at St. Johnsbury, Vermont, appears to have given good satisfaction to those who are devoting themselves to this retrograde reform. The Christian Statesman, organ of the movement, says that "the work has received the most cheering impulse, and great and substantial gains for the cause of truth have been secured." One of these gains was the formation of a "State auxiliary society," of which Hon. L. P. Poland, late Senator and representative in Congress, is President. Rev. Professor McAllister, of Geneva College, temporary chairman of the Convention, in his opening remarks, expressed the purpose of the meeting thus: "The objects for which we have met may be briefly defined as the maintenance of existing and imperilled Christian features of our government, the development of these into a complete and consistent national Christianity, and the securing, in the written Constitution of the United States, of such an expression of the nation's relations to God, Christ, and the Bible, as will place all Christian elements of the political life of the nation on an undeniable legal basis." And, further, he said: "Our nation, to be a Christian nation, must acknowledge God according to the distinctive teachings of the Christian religion. As God has committed all authority to his Son, and as the way of acceptable approach to God for men or nations is through the mediation of Jesus Christ, a Christian nation must acknowledge the Messiah, the Anointed, and hold relations with God through him." How many Evangelical religionists are there, who are so blinded by their zeal as to be ready to commit this gross and mischievous injustice of inserting their theological convictions in the United States Constitution?

THE PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER.

A Critic Criticised.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

A volume appeared some months ago from the pen of Van Buren Denslow, LL.D., entitled Modern Thinkers, containing sketches of a number of eminent philosophers, with reviews of their writings and theories. All these essays are characterized by vigor of thought and expression, and some of them evince considerable analytic power and critical acumen. The author has aimed, he says, to elucidate the systems of thought which he has reviewed "more constructively and sympathetically than is usually done in histories of philosophy." The work possesses much merit and is well worthy of perusal, however widely one may differ from the author in some of his judgments on the subjects of these sketches.

But it contains one essay of more than fifty pages, a critique on the Philosophy of Herbert Spencer, which, while it seems to have been written with much care, and is in the author's best style, does Spencer great injustice, and cannot but prejudice the common reader against one who has done more for philosophic thought, and has been more misunderstood and misrepresented, than any other thinker of this generation. That Spencer's positions should be misstated, and captious objections to his philosophy should be raised by narrow-minded critics and by zealous theologians, was to be expected; but one could not help looking for a just and fair estimate of Spencer's philosophy from a writer of Professor Denslow's ability and liberality. Yet this critique, far from having anything "sympathetic" in its statement and review of Spencer, ignores much of his most brilliant work, disparages his labors, and is devoted chiefly to criticisms that seem to be based upon an imperfect acquaintance with his philosophy.

Although Spencer's reputation is now so well established that it cannot be affected among those who are familiar with his writings by criticisms like Professor Denslow's, yet, as many unacquainted with his philosophic views are liable to form their estimate of the great philosopher and his work from this critique, I yield to the inclination to exhibit some of its fallacies, and on the other hand to state some of Spencer's leading positions and principles.

Professor Denslow begins his essay with the statement that "there are not a few, especially in America, who think that Herbert Spencer has reached the end of philosophic thought, has achieved a final and conclusive system," that "numerous thinkers of much repute in their respective circles so believe," while on the other hand Mr. Lewes has shown "that a philosophic creed is impossible," that "the function of philosophy" is not to give us "fixed conclusions," but "to educate us in the principles of reasoning," its end being "merely dialectic skill."

That Spencer "has reached the end of philosophic thought," his most ardent admirers do not believe, nor has any one, so far as I know, made any such extravagant claim; but that Herbert Spencer is a profound, comprehensive, and original thinker, who has made vast contributions to philosophy, who has discovered important principles, supplied us with formulæ for the interpretation of complex physical and mental phenomena, and given us the first and only systematic statement of evolution ever written, is now generally admitted by those who are acquainted with his labors. "The same ethical canons of research," says Prof. Youmans, "which gave to Copernicus the glory of the heliocentric astronomy, to Newton that of gravitation, to Harvey that of circulation of the blood, to Priestley that of oxygen, to Dr. Young that of the undulatory theory of light, and to Darwin that of natural selection, will also give to Herbert Spencer the honor of having first elucidated and established the law of universal evolution."

That the end of philosophy is "merely dialectic skill" can hardly be believed by any serious mind,—certainly not by such a profound and earnest thinker as George Henry Lewes. That philosophy of which Lewes, in his Biographical History of Philosophy, says its "movement has been circular," is the philosophy which has sought to know the noumenon. "To aspire," he says, "to the knowledge of more than phenomena, their resemblances, coexistences, and successions, is to aspire to transcend the inexorable limits of human faculty. To know more, we must be more. The reader will have perceived that I use the word Philosophy in some restricted sense; and, as this is the sense which will be attached to it throughout the present History, an explanation becomes requisite." (Introduction, p. 12.)

This is a philosophy that Spencer unites with Lewes in characterizing as utterly fruitless. But they equally agree in the great progress that has been made in that philosophy which is occupied with the phenomenal world, that philosophy of which Spencer is the greatest living representative. If Professor Denslow had looked into his work, Problems of Life and Mind, he would have seen that the sub-title of that work is "The Foundation of a Creed"; and, if he had turned to page five, vol. i., he would have read the following:—

"I have indeed incessantly for some thirty years tried to dissuade men from wasting precious energies on insoluble problems. That purpose still animates my efforts. But, although formerly I regarded problems as insoluble which I now hold to be soluble, there has been no other change than this: that I now see how problems which were insoluble by the method then in use are soluble by the method of science. This is not a retreat, but a change of front. Throughout my polemic against metaphysics, the attacks were directed against the irrational method, as one by which all problems whatever must be insoluble."

No reader can obtain a correct general idea of Spencer's philosophy from the Professor's statement, in which he attempts to give it "reduced to a nutshell." He has, however, the fairness to state that such an outline "must be imperfect, and may not escape being presumptuous." If the author had given the leading principles of Spencer's philosophy in the order of their importance, unobscured by the fancies of Fourier and the unrelated theories of others, meanwhile restraining his impatience to point out weaknesses until he had completed his outline, he might have given a summary, which at least would not have misled the average reader or prejudiced him against an author who needs to be carefully read in order to be fully appreciated.

Laying stress on what Spencer fails to do, the Professor emphasizes and repeats that he does not explain the existence of space, matter, force, time, and motion, or law, including the law of evolution, "the independent existence and separate identity of which are assumed as the necessary conditions precedent, without which his evolutionary machine cannot be wound up and set running."

If Spencer's critic had condescended here to state briefly the position of one whom he justly calls "the greatest of living English philosophers," he would have done real service to those readers who are but imperfectly or not at all acquainted with the works of Herbert Spencer.

Rejecting the superficial theory of Reid and others of the "common-sense" school, that we know things as they are, that in every act of perception they are given immediately in consciousness, Spencer maintains, with Kant substantially, that external things are known to us only as states of consciousness, alike in their so-called primary and secondary qualities. What things are in themselves cannot be represented by feeling. To us, matter is a congeries of qualities,—weight, resistance, extension, etc.; and these are names for different ways in which our consciousness is affected. If we were destitute of sight, touch, smell, taste, and hearing, these qualities would cease to exist, although the external reality which causes these groups of sensations would still exist. To beings organized differently from ourselves, so differently that their mode of being could not be conceived by us, the objective reality might give rise to states of which the word "matter" would convey no idea to our minds. Nevertheless, the fact that we have sensations that come and go independently of our volitions is evidence of something that determines them. The doctrine of the relativity of knowledge necessitates the postulation of an unknowable existence beyond consciousness. "If after finding that the same tepid water may feel warm to one hand and cold to another, it is inferred that warmth is relative to our nature and our own state, the inference is valid, only supposing the activity to which these different sensations are referred is an activity out of ourselves, which has not been modified by our own activities."

"When we are taught that a piece of matter, regarded by us as existing externally, cannot be really known, but that we can know only certain impressions produced on us, we are yet by the relativity of our thought compelled to think of a positive cause. The notion of a real existence which generated these impressions becomes nascent. The momentum of thought inevitably carries us beyond conditioned existence to unconditioned existence; and this ever persists in us as the body of a thought to which we can give no shape. . . . At the same time that, by the laws of thought, we are rigorously prevented from forming a conception of absolute existence, we are by the laws of thought prevented from ridding ourselves of the consciousness of absolute existence, this consciousness being, as we see, the obverse of absolute existence:" (First Principles, p. 396.)

The absolute existence, then, can be known only as it is manifested in consciousness, only as it is colored and modified, so to speak, by the conditions of the organism.

It cannot be identified with what we call matter; for that we know only as a series of phenomenal manifestations or, psychologically speaking, only as coexistent states of consciousness, which we call the perceptions of resistance, extension, color, sound, or odor. It cannot be identified with mind, for that we know only as the series of our own states of consciousness.

"If I am asked to frame a notion of mind, divested of all those structural traits under which alone I am conscious of mind in myself, I cannot do it. . . . If, then, I have to conceive evolution as caused by an 'originating mind,' I must conceive this mind as having attributes akin to those of the only mind I know, and without which I cannot conceive mind at all. . . . I cannot think of a single series of states of consciousness as causing even the relatively small groups of action going on over the earth's surface. . . . How, then, is it possible for me to conceive an 'originating mind,' which I must represent to myself as a single series of states of consciousness, working the infinitely multiplied sets of changes simultaneously going on in worlds too numerous to count, dispersed throughout a space that baffles imagination?"

"If, to account for this infinitude of changes everywhere going on, 'mind' must be conceived as there under the guise of simple dynamics, then the reply is that, to be so conceived, mind must be divested of all attributes by which it is distinguished, and that when thus divested of its distinguishing attributes the conception disappears, the word 'mind' stands for a blank." (Spencer's Essays, vol. iii., pp. 246-249.)

According to Spencer, force, matter, space, time, motion, are but forms which the indeterminate substance assumes in consciousness. But matter and movement he reduces—as is sufficiently evident from the foregoing—to manifestations of force; and space and time are cohesions—one of coexistence, the other of succession—in the manifestations of force. Force then remains the primary datum; but that we know only as states of consciousness,—in other words, as the changes in us produced by an absolute reality of which we know nothing except in its relation to us.

It may be well to illustrate a little more fully that, according to Spencer, we know matter only as coexistent states of consciousness.

"A whiff of ammonia coming in contact with the eyes produces a smart, getting into the nostrils excites the consciousness we describe as an intolerably strong odor, being condensed on the tongue generates an acrid taste, while ammonia applied in solution to a tender part of the skin makes it burn, as we say." This illustration from Spencer's Principles of Psychology shows that one and the same external agency produces in us different sensations, according to the avenues through which it affects our consciousness. Which of these feelings, so widely different, does the external cause resemble? Probably, none of them. What it is, independently of consciousness, we never can know, owing to limitations imposed by the very constitution of the human mind.

The effects produced on our consciousness—different feelings—can be compared and classified; but how can we compare and classify that of which nothing can be known? Knowing is classifying. Classifying is grouping together of things that are alike. Reasoning is grouping together of like relations among things. Our knowledge regarding the centripetal force that keeps the planets in their orbits consists simply in knowing (what the ancients did not know) that it is like the force that causes the apple to fall from the tree to the ground. But the absolute, be it one or many, that which persists through all phenomena, we can never know, because there is nothing given in experience with which we can classify it.

According to Spencer, then, the "five primordial or antecedent facts," which Professor Denslow names "space, matter, force, time, and motion, or law," can be known only as states of consciousness, coexistent or sequent; and the absolute nature of the being, substance, or power which produces these states, is unknown and unknowable. Not, as many who attempt to criticise Spencer suppose, that the unknowable is such from lack of attainable knowledge, but from limitations organically imposed, and which no degree of advancement can possibly remove. All the assumptions of theology respecting the power of which the phenomena of nature are manifestations are by this philosophy deprived of their validity, while the true field of science and philosophy is shown to be in the phenomenal world. It does not attempt to solve the problem of existence, to explain why the universe exists, why the unknowable exists. "By strict necessity," says Spencer, "explanation brings us face to face with the inexplicable. We have to admit a datum which cannot be explained." The mind cannot overpass the limits which enclose it. Philosophy, then, as Lewes has shown, and as Spencer maintains, must, to be successful, abandon all attempts to define or explain the nature of the absolute, and confine itself to the region of the relative. It is in this region that the brilliant triumphs of Spencer have been achieved.

It is the "function of philosophy" to give to knowledge a unity that shall comprehend the fundamental truths of all the sciences, as the general definitions and propositions of each science include all the diversified phenomena of its recognized province. For the convenience of study, we divide phenomena into departments, and speak of geological, astronomic, and biological truths, although the universe of phenomena is a whole, of which the parts are all co-related. The sciences deal with different orders of phenomena, and their formulæ are those which express the changes and relations of these orders respectively. But nature knows no such divisions; for every class of phenomena interacts and commingles. Now, philosophy is a synthesis of all these sciences into a universal system. For instance, when Spencer discovered that Von Baer's scientific principle, that the growth of an organism from a germ-cell is characterized by a change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, is applicable to the development of the solar system, the earth, life, intelligence, society, language, government, ethics, etc., he discovered a philosophic truth. In short, philosophy differs from science in this,—that it is more general, abstract, and remote in the relations it formulates, in the truths it comprehends in its propositions.

The philosophy that "prolonged its sterile reign through thirty centuries" was the philosophy that attempted to explain noumena, not phenomena, that imagined it could obtain a view of things as they exist independently of human consciousness, and not the "synthetic philosophy," which attempts to generalize a multitude of facts, and to express in an abstract formula the vast variety of phenomena; which concerns itself not with creation, but with formations, not with the purposes of a deity, but with the order of the phenomenal universe.

Professor Denslow says, "Given space, matter, force, motion, and time as the factors, would all progress be found to consist in an evolution of forms, organisms, motions, and activities from the homogeneous or simple into the heterogeneous? It must be conceded that the array of instances in which this is true dazzles and almost bewilders the imagination by its variety and beauty.... But if it shall appear that each instance he [Spencer] adduces as an illustration of differentiation of the simple into the complex also illustrates a unification of previously differentiated and diverse elements into one simple and homogeneous entity or substance, is it quite clear that we have made any advance in our knowledge of the principles of universal science?" (pp. 218, 222.)

To strengthen his objection, the author selects one of Spencer's own illustrations, furnished by the differentiation of the bean-seed "into vine, leaf, blossoms, and ultimately the new fruit,"—and calls attention to what he declares is a fact, that this process equally illustrates the unification of diverse elements into one homogeneous substance.

That in the growth of the bean-plant diverse elements are united in one structure is very evident; but the correctness of characterizing as a "homogeneous entity" a complex production, in which several elements united in different proportions have produced all the variety afforded by the root, vine, leaf, blossom, and fruit of a bean-plant, is by no means apparent. On the contrary, a bean-plant is, in substance as well as in form and activity, a very heterogeneous structure. The chemical differentiations produced in plants generally by rearrangements of the chemical elements and by modification of tissues and organs are well described by Spencer.

"In plants," he observes, "the albuminous and amylaceous matters which form the substance of the embryo give origin here to a preponderance of chlorophyll and there to a preponderance of cellulose. Over the parts that are becoming leaf-surfaces, certain of the materials are metamorphosed into wax. In this place, starch passes into one of its isomeric equivalents, sugar, and in that place into another of its isomeric equivalents, gum. By secondary changes, some of the cellulose is modified into wood; while some of it is modified into the allied substance, which in large masses we distinguish as cork. And the more numerous compounds thus gradually arising initiate farther unlikenesses by mingling in unlike ratios." (First Principles.)

In the inorganic world there are compound substances, like water, produced by the union of different elements, which to all appearances are homogeneous as to substance; but we must not expect to find such homogeneity in highly evolved organisms, like the bean-plant. And how the integration of a number of diverse elements into one structure diminishes the weight of Spencer's claims, it is not easy to see. Spencer's primary law of evolution is not, as Professor Denslow seems to think, change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, but the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion, which we see exemplified in the concentration of units that form a crystal as well as in the combination of elements that compose the structure of a complex organism. And consider a moment how the integrations of matter, the combinations of several elements into one body, gives rise to heterogeneity and differentiation in the inorganic as well as in the organic world. Think of the different combinations and transpositions of which the elements admit, and the multitude of substances thus produced. Add a molecule of carbon to a hundred molecules of iron, and a peculiar hardness is produced by the conversion of the iron into steel. Carbon in variously proportioned combinations with oxygen and nitrogen develops the several properties of wood, fruits, grain, grasses, tobacco, and opium. Carbon united with oxygen as carbonic acid gas combines with molecules of the metal calcium in forming lime-rocks and marbles, the bones of animals, and beautiful translucent pearls. A triple alliance of molecules of hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon imparts a wonderful diversity of proportion to a multitude of organic substances, as wood, vegetable oil, animal flesh and fat. Hydrogen molecules united with oxygen are converted into acids, and combined with nitrogen are converted into alkaloids, as in the formation of ammonia. If the proportion of molecules of nitrogen and oxygen in the atmosphere, composed by weight of nitrogen seventy-seven and of oxygen twenty-three, be reversed to oxygen seventy seven and nitrogen twenty-three, nitric acid is developed. Vinegar, burnt sugar, butter, animal fat, nutmeg oil, are all composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen in different proportions. Opium and quinine contain the same elements in different proportions. It is unnecessary to multiply illustrations to show that the union of diverse elements in different proportions gives us compounds more or less homogeneous in substance, but all differentiated from one another as to substance as well as in form and motion. The number of such substances is limited only by the inconceivably immense number of combinations and varying proportions in which between sixty and seventy elements may unite. So the combination of heterogeneous elements in substances less heterogeneous is a process by which variety, differentiation, and heterogeneity, in substance as well as in form, have been produced. By this process has grown, from a nebulous mass, a planet with all its variety of water, land, and sky, fitted for the habitation of living creatures, themselves an exemplification of the same process. It is the primary law of evolution.

It may be that all the so-called elements are but so many modifications of one substance, one ultimate element, as all the senses are modifications of one,—that of feeling,—and that the difference between oxygen and hydrogen or gold and iron, as well as the difference between the different parts of a bean-plant or an elephant, is due to the positions, relations, and activities of the atoms composing these elements and objects. If this be true, as some thinkers, including men of science, are inclined to think, all the multitude of objects with which we are familiar, from the commonest speck of dust to the precious diamond, are in reality one substance, with atoms in different relations, and all the phenomena of the universe are at bottom but the changes of these atoms. On this hypothesis, however, it is unnecessary to insist, as it is not capable of proof. Sufficient has been offered, it is believed, to show that Professor Denslow's objection to Spencer's theory of evolution, based upon the unification of elements, is superficial and weak.

INSINCERITY IN THE UNITARIAN PULPIT.

In heading my article as I do, I but follow the example of an able and a prominent divine of the Unitarian Church, who in the September number of the North American Review gives us an article on "Insincerity in the Pulpit." The author looks over the fence into the garden of our Orthodox friends, and finds there many hurtsome weeds, which it would be well to uproot. It struck me that it might be wise in us, who are Unitarians, to take a look over our own little patch, and see if there be not also weeds among our flowers.

The professed aim of Unitarian ministers is that we give to the people the whole truth,—we hold nothing back. The feeling that this, as a rule, was carried out, has been our bond of union in the absence of any creed. Indeed, this feeling has made the Unitarian ministers so united and compact a body that their superior in this respect cannot be found. In a word, the union is deeper than words: it is as deep as heart. While, however, we pledge ourselves by this,—the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth,—we may ask whether or not we are free from "policy and cunning" in our teaching.

It may be questioned whether we have attained the point where it is with us

> Perish policy and cunning,
> Perish all that fears the light,
> Whether losing, whether winning,
> Trust in God and do the right.

How do we speak?

It has been suggested that some of the Unitarian ministers are more Evangelical than they profess, that they have a higher idea of Jesus than the common Unitarian one. This is hardly possible. We know that in the Unitarian Church there exist the profoundest love and reverence for Jesus. Indeed, some of us who are now Unitarians never truly loved Jesus until we felt him flesh and blood with ourselves. We therefore think there is no man among us who would not speak out freely all his love for Jesus of Nazareth. It is difficult for us to imagine that it is on this side our insincerity lies. We feel that it is on the other side,—we are more humanitarian than we profess: we are pure theists.

The name Christian is ours by birthright: we therefore justly claim that name. But, when we define Christianity as "one with the Absolute Religion of Nature and Reason," and say that this Absolute Religion "has been made clearer by the teaching and life of Jesus," certain consequences follow. Our Christian Register defines Christianity as above given. The definition is acceptable, and also the consequences which follow. For if Christianity be one with the Absolute Religion, and Jesus made this more clear to us, then may we say that Buddha also made the Absolute Religion clearer to us. Even more, our particular phase of that Absolute Religion, or, what is the same, the Christianity of Jesus, is an ethnic religion, just as is Buddhism or the Parsee religion. We should acknowledge this. But we hesitate. Few among us will say Saint Buddha or Saint Zoroaster, and make it mean all that Saint Paul means to us. Are we sincere? In spirit, we do feel that our religion is more than the particular phase made clearer by the teaching of Jesus; nevertheless, in our sermons, in our statements of belief, we adhere too closely to that phase of religion given in the New Testament; and, what is worse, we hug, as if fascinated, to the form given by Trinitarians.

This last statement is the easiest possible one for which to find illustrations. We have never, or seldom if ever, put forth "a statement of belief" without moulding it in the Trinitarian form. We begin by reference to the persons in the Trinity,—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,—that is, we feel under obligation to explain the nature and office of each of these, as if, even after all, there was a Trinity in the Deity. As Christians, in the broad sense given to the name,—that is, as believers in and professors of the "Absolute Religion,"—all that can be demanded of us is a simple statement of belief in God as one, in the sonship of the race, and in our immortality. This might be summed up in belief in the kingdom of God within us, here and hereafter. If we choose to go further, and in some manner define the position of those who have made this religion clearer to us, then should we define the position occupied by Buddha and Zoroaster as well as that of Jesus. Without this, are we sincere in our profession?

It may be replied that our statements of belief define our phase of this absolute Christianity. Here we have confusion between Christianity as one with the Absolute Religion and our phase of Christianity, to which also we give the name Christianity. We profess to believe in this broad Christianity; yet, in our statements of belief, we seem to ignore this profession, and go on to set forth the doctrines of the more narrow Christianity. We should make ourselves clear on this, so that no one may imagine that, in defining our phase of the Absolute Religion, we pretend to comprehend it all, or that our phase of Christianity, set forth in our statements, pretends to be the Christianity which is one with the Absolute Religion. Without this distinction, are we sincere?

But, again, our phase of this Absolute Religion is Unitarian, or rather humanitarian. We should therefore define the position occupied by Jesus in terms which would not admit of any great mistake. Do we do this? A reference to any statement of belief will show us that we make use of Orthodox phrases which to the people mean one thing and to us, who make the definition, quite another thing. By our definitions, we try to make it clear that we do not believe him Deity. We have not completely succeeded in this. We seem to place him everywhere and nowhere. The only honest and sincere thing for us to do is to write it: Jesus is man, not mere man, but man. Here we are in need of sincerity.

We go further, and attempt to define the meaning of the phrase Holy Ghost. How feebly this is done, let those judge who read. We have taken out of the phrase all its meaning. Why, then, bolster it up with texts and expressions which to us are meaningless? For us, the name Father has all and more of the comfort and nearness implied in the name Holy Ghost. Are we herein sincere?

I used the word "texts," which calls to mind a little more of our cunning. We speak of "inspiration as a universal, a divine illumination in all souls, and an impulse and guidance toward truth and goodness" (see New Hampshire Statement). We accept the definition. But, if it be true, then may we accept as inspired the Tripitakas and the Zend-Avesta as well as the Old and New Testaments. From these, we may draw texts in support of our doctrines. This we do not insist upon, since we are defining only our phase of the AbsoluteReligion. But in one thing we are unique,—that, having taken all special authority from the Bible, we support our doctrines by references to it, and it only. This is a marked weakness in our statements of belief. What wonder they fall dead from the press. Is this sincerity?

It would be easy to make of this a longer article by speaking of other terms used by our pulpit,—terms which to our Orthodox friends mean a great deal, while to us they cannot mean anything. We forget the advice of Jesus about putting new wine into old bottles. We confess there is a roundabout, metaphysical way of making these terms mean nothing, and with this no-meaning meaning some of us can use them. But is it sincere?

This use of terms, this moulding of our creeds in Trinitarian models, this bolstering of our belief by texts which are without authority, is at the bottom of much insincerity in the Unitarian pulpit.

FRAGMENTS OF CHRISTIAN HISTORY. To the Foundation of the Holy Roman Empire. By Joseph Henry Allen, Lecturer on Ecclesiastical History in Harvard University, author of Hebrew Men and Times, etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

A few years since, after a period of comparative silence, Mr. Allen began again to make himself heard, though speaking in a quiet tone, above the noisier voices of the time. His utterances on great public occasions among his Unitarian brethren are now anticipated with as much eagerness as any other man's, and they are remembered with great satisfaction. Three of these utterances have recently been brought together into a pamphlet, with the title Three Phases of Modern Theology. These phases are Calvinism, Unitarianism, and Liberalism. There is a breadth and candor in the treatment of his themes, which are not too common. Apparently, it is as hard for him to dogmatize as it is easy for most men. He can always see the other side. His style in these discourses, as in the volume that we have in hand, is remarkably simple and straightforward; while it occasionally betrays a warmth and color that make us wonder if Mr. Allen has found out the secret of Swedenborg's angels, who grow younger instead of older all the time.

Mr. Allen's Fragments of Christian History is a natural continuation of his Hebrew Men and Times, which at the time when it was written (1861) embodied the best results of Old Testament criticism to date. A new edition, with an admirable introduction, was published about a year ago. The central idea of the present work is that the key of nascent and growing Christianity is to be found in its fundamentally ethical character, not in its speculative dogma or its ecclesiastical organization. Mr. Allen's phraseology is occasionally a little more old-fashioned than our own. He prefers to speak of Christianity as a revelation, while to us the term seems a misleading one. But he makes it plain that he considers this revelation "as a manifestation of the Divine Life common to humanity, coming in the fulness of time, and as much prepared for by all that went before as a crop of fruit is ripened by the sunshine and the showers of the whole season." His method is entirely rationalistic. He can speak of Christianity as having "stifled thought in the interest of morality, reduced art after its rich classic development to a bald symbolism, and made a free science or literature impossible"; but at the same time his attitude is entirely sympathetic. Instead of the noble Latin motto which adorns his title-page, he might have chosen "Put yourself in his place," and it would be a perfectly truthful index of the aim and spirit of his book. For it is everywhere his purpose to put himself, as far as possible, in the place of the early Christian, and endeavor to appreciate his motives. That he is always successful in doing what he attempts, it might be too much to claim. But, that he is generally so, we are convinced. We think he does succeed in showing that an "ethical passion," as he is pleased to call it, was the most characteristic trait of early Christianity, and that this passion was the shaping force of church and dogma as well as of individual character; that the dogma which has for us the least intellectual attractiveness was frequently the awkward symbol of a moral tendency which was essential to the progress of mankind.

Mr. Allen's lectures are twelve in number. An admirable introduction, a chronological outline, a good index, add much to the value of the book. The lectures are not all of equal excellence, but this is because the subjects are not equally important. Of two or three, it would be hard to say which is the best; but the fourth, "The Mind of Paganism," we have read and returned to with more satisfaction than any other. It is a good lecture to read in connection with Gibbon's famous chapters on the conversion of the Roman Empire. It rather supplements these than confutes them. It shows how much of real religiousness there was in the Empire outside of Christianity in the first Christian centuries. The popular theory is that Christianity was interpolated, because the world was hopelessly evil. An admirable point is that concerning the deification of the Roman Emperors. It is shown that this nourished itself upon the characters of the best emperors, and perished from the abuses of the worst, and also that the acceptance of Jesus as a god was made vastly easier by this deification of a man already in vogue. Mr. Allen proves that the sympathetic quality of his mind is not retained upon the Christian side, when he writes, "There never was a faith in a deity actually walking the earth, and conversant among men, more positively, sincerely, or in its way devoutly held than this deification of the Emperor among the people of the provinces." Another good point in this lecture is that concerning the preparation for the sacrificial theology of Christianity in certain sacrificial notions of the Roman world.

It is best for us to read that which is opposed to our ordinary ways of thinking, if it is well and kindly put; and therefore, for those who are habitual readers of the Index, the most important chapter in the book is probably the first, "The Messiah and the Christ." Mr. Allen attempts to show in this chapter that the Messianic idea had a much more contracted development than is commonly supposed,—that its influence extended only from the Maccabean period (165 B.C.) to the last desperate struggle of the Jews under Barkochab in 132 A.D. The Messianism back of this period is mainly a reflection from the flaming passion of the later time. It is further shown how little of definiteness there was in the conception of a Messiah; and, while it is frankly allowed that Jesus considered himself the Messiah, it is shown that he measured himself by no popular, but by his own personal ideal, and that under the circumstances nothing could have been more natural.

It has been so common, latterly, for Unitarians to side with Athanasius rather than with Arius in the Arian controversy that Mr. Allen's position is not a surprise. He might have shown, in addition, that the fear of ditheism was a potent factor on the Athanasian side. The Christ of Arius, so near God and yet not God, was sure, they thought, to be a second God sooner or later. In reality, both parties were actuated by the same fear.

We should like to speak of other chapters in this book, but our notice is already long. From beginning to end, the book is replete with interest and instruction. Such as consider themselves ex-Christians or anti-Christians should certainly read it, for these cannot afford to do injustice to Christianity as a historic development. Their position should be held in the clear light of the most luminous exposition of that development. If it will not bear this light, then it should be abandoned.

It will be noticed that Mr. Allen's title is not Professor, but "Lecturer on Ecclesiastical History in Harvard University." But why not Professor? The University would honor itself much more than him by elevating him to this position. There is not a man of liberal scholarship in the United States more manifestly suited for the place. The young men of the Divinity School are to be congratulated upon such a teacher. They cannot give too close attention to his words.

AFTER DOGMATIC THEOLOGY, WHAT? MATERIALISM OR A SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY AND NATURAL RELIGION. By Giles B. Stebbins. Boston: Colby & Rich. 1880.

The professed materialist should give a cordial welcome to this little volume. It is the statement of a positive antagonist, which is in itself always a good thing to read, and in this instance possesses the additional excellence of coming from one who sincerely believes that his views are decidedly more "advanced" than anything the materialist can ever reach. It comes from one who asks for no odds in the battle of ideas, who is undismayed at the loudest noises yet beaten on materialistic gongs, and who will not cry out for quarter, if fairly defeated. Moreover, he is as thoroughly "emancipated" as any scientific opponent from the rule of the prevailing religious dogmas, and makes his final appeal to the same court of authority,—that of instructed intelligence. The book is an attempt, and we believe a successful attempt, to show that modern Spiritualism—that is, the common belief uniting the sect or body of persons known as Spiritualists—has evolved a consistent philosophy. We do not mean, of course, in saying this, that we necessarily accept all the author's "facts" as facts, or his explanation of them in all instances, or even in any instance, as correct. We mean only that his explanations, the assumptions of his philosophy being once granted, are clearly made out and are consistent with that philosophy, and that his conclusions are therefore worthy of respectful consideration.

We do not propose to discuss the work in detail,

although in reading we marked several passages for possible quotation, but add a few words of general criticism. Nearly all that Mr. Stebbins says, in the opening portion of his work, upon the decay of dogmatic theology, will be accepted without question by every candid and reflecting person of whatever school of philosophy. In discussing materialism, however, as the equivalent of "negation," and in much that he says of inductive science as "external and dogmatic," we are inclined to believe that Mr. Stebbins tips the balance of his scales toward his own conclusions a little more than the present condition of scientific inquiry will warrant. Modern science is by no means the equivalent of old school materialism. Some, perhaps most, of its best exponents are pronounced idealists in philosophy; and the contrary impression, which Mr. Stebbins certainly conveys, is not, therefore, strictly correct. The conceptions of matter, moreover, now growing in the minds of its best investigators, are very different from those of the "crude and outward stuff" against which Mr. Stebbins directs his heaviest guns. The "spiritual body"—from our author's description of which we obtain a clearer idea than any ever before received from a spiritualist book—is fully as material in its essential elements as many forms of matter now under investigation in the physicist's workshop. It sees with "clairvoyant eye"; it hears with "clairaudient" ear; it is "organic"; and, in common with the coarser body from which it emerges, contains a mysterious life principle or soul. Parts even of the molecular motions of the brain-cells of the "natural" body are stored up for future use in the "spiritual" body. If these descriptions be correct, if the "spiritual body" is a tenuous, etherous phase of matter, shaped or organized by the indwelling mind, certainly the physiologist will some day discover it, weigh it, and allow for it, even if he cannot imprison it or account for it. If not true, on the other hand, the same physiologist will eventually demonstrate its non-existence. Mr. Stebbins' faith should be strong enough to enable him to look hopefully upon the investigations now making by scientists into the more subtile manifestations of matter, for in this field we are persuaded will Spiritualism ultimately be confirmed or overthrown. The "facts" of spirit presence we consider, therefore, to be Mr. Stebbins' stronghold, and his most important contribution to the real subject.

The book is theistic in doctrinal teaching, devout in spirit, of exalted moral sentiment, and contains not even a recognition of the existence of the social theories which have brought discredit upon some advocates of Spiritualism.

UNITY HYMNS AND CHORALS FOR THE CONGREGATION AND THE HOME. Edited by W. C. Gannett, J. V. Blake, and F. L. Hosmer.

This little book is certainly an improvement on its predecessors. It shows a very great advance in Unitarian thought. Indeed, it could not have been produced by any phase of Unitarianism less liberal than that at the West. The addition of some selections from Matthew Arnold, Lowell, Chadwick, and Whittier, which, so far as we know, have never appeared in any of the hymn-books, is a most pleasing sign of progress. The choice from the older collections has also been made, as one hardly need say, remembering the compilers, with refinement of taste and, we should think, from the liberal Unitarian stand-point, with excellent judgment. The music of its kind is all that could be wished, and we know of no book in existence so well adapted to the use of liberal societies. We are not certain that this collection aspires to meet in any way the needs of Free Religion, and so are not quite sure that we shall be right in trying it by the Free Religious standard. Still, this should be said. There is too much of the theistic sentiment running all through it, to leave it free from criticism. Not that we should object in such a book to an occasional hymn affirming the personality of God or taking the form of prayer to a personal Father, but that in this case, as in so many others, it is made the one prominent thing. We offer this criticism with hesitation, feeling that it is sure to be misunderstood and knowing well how difficult it is to find hymns which express the natural religion of the human heart in the presence of the Universal and Unknown. Nevertheless, we believe the hymns of Free Religion are being written, and that sooner or later a collection of them will be made, in a way to demonstrate that worship does not involve assumption and religion does not involve theology. Meanwhile, this book, omitting its Glorias, most of its anthems, and selecting wisely from its hymns, many of which are a realization of the ideal, will be found an efficient promoter of natural and practical religion in the congregation and the home.

F. A. H.

THE Popular Science Monthly for November contains the preliminary to a series of articles by Herbert Spencer on "The Development of Political Institutions." It contemplates the application of the principle of evolution to a department of human life which, though more or less involved in his previous discussions, has not, it may be presumed, received so thorough and specific a treatment asthat now proposed. The article which follows on "The Sun's Heat," by Professor Young of Princeton, explains the method of determining its influence upon our own planet and the system to which it belongs. The tendency of our present mode of education to disqualify for manual pursuits is pointed out in an impressive manner by Professor Thompson. B. F. DeCosta maintains the existence of "The Glacial Mass in America." "A Flock of Mythological Crows" is the title which Dr. W. H. Gardner chooses for a very interesting account of the peculiar fancies associated with various birds in the mythologies and superstitions of ancient time. "The Electric Burglar Alarm" details the working of the new guarantee it affords against the unwelcome visitors indicated. An article on "Mental Imagery," by Francis Galton, suggests an important species of self-culture. The sketch of Dr. Lewis H. Morgan, President of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, of whom there is a likeness, is an interesting and deserved tribute to one who has pursued with singular ardor and devotion certain lines of research. Equally worthy of mention is an extract from a recent commemorative address by Professor A. M. Mayer on the late Professor Henry, "The Evolution of Organic Form" by Charles Morris, "The Profusion of Life" by Miss Arabella B. Buckley, "Criticisms Corrected" by Herbert Spencer, and "Hypnotism" by Geo. J. Romanes, which, with the concluding miscellany of book notices, correspondences, etc., make up a most satisfactory and pleasing number.

IN the November International Review there are several very good papers. The first is by Prof. Geo. L. Andrews, of West Point, on the case of cadet Whittaker. Its spirit is not at all such as we can commend; and, if it represents the tone of the academy, we do not wonder the colored cadets have a hard time there. It is a piece of special pleading painful to see, betraying a spirit too narrow, aside from any question of Whittaker's guilt or innocence, to be intrusted with such an interest as doing justice to an inferior race. De Pressensé writes very interestingly of the French Republic and the Jesuits, taking the ground that it is a great mistake to persecute any religious party or order. One of the editors, John I. Morse, Jr., writes of old Boston lawyers; and there are able articles on the relations of railroads to the State, State debts and repudiation, and an account of a very interesting attempt in Germany to bring out a series of the greatest dramas, with the best actors of the empire in all the parts.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

REV. W. H. H. MURRAY has again been heard on the platform in Boston.

WENDELL PHILLIPS is the executor of the estate of the late Lydia Maria Child.

GENERAL GRANT visited Plymouth recently, and made an address to several hundred school-children near the famous "Rock": a talk full of good sense.

ANNA DICKINSON will resume the lecture platform this winter, her subject being "Danton." Her intention, no doubt, is to make this a companion to her "Joan of Arc."

THE venerable A. Bronson Alcott spoke at the "neighbors' reception" at Shelburne Falls, Mass., on Thursday evening. Among those present was Miss Sprague, the author of An Earnest Trifler.

THOMAS HUGHES was given a "reception" at Cooper Union in New York last week. Geo. W. Curtis presided; and Mr. Hughes delivered an address on Co-operation, a subject that is rapidly drawing to itself increasing interest in this country.

TWO HARVARD students have been arrested at Cambridge for carrying away a sign and conducting themselves in a disorderly manner generally, and have been held in $300 bonds. It requires something more than life within college walls to make one a gentleman.

THE Rev. Mr. McAll, who has a Protestant mission in Paris, is entitled to much credit for the practical turn which his work takes there. It includes, under his direction, libraries, soup-kitchens, savings-banks, and lectures. He has twenty-three stations in the city where this work is carried on.

JOSEPH COOK has given this explanation of the origin of Unitarianism in one of his addresses. "It was," he says, "chiefly a deep secularization of the Church by its connection with the government, and the influence of the French and Indian wars and the Revolution, that brought on Unitarianism."

MISS ELIZABETH THOMPSON, the well-known philanthropist, has made a liberal contribution for the publication of the History of Woman Suffrage in the United States, which Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Matilda Joslyn Gage, and Susan B. Anthony are compiling. Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony will spend the winter at Mrs. Stanton's New Jersey cottage.

PRESIDENT ELIOT has sent confidential letters to the parents of all the students at Harvard, requesting information as to whether the students have been accustomed to attend prayers at home, and asking the parents' opinion on the subject of compulsory attendance at morning chapel. It is expected that, if the answers to these interrogatories be favorable, attendance at prayers will hereafter be voluntary.

FIFTEEN years ago, the number of young men from New York city (Manhattan Island alone) in attendance on Harvard University was thirteen; the number at Yale College was thirty-two; and the number at Princeton was fourteen. During the past year, the corresponding numbers have been: for Harvard, forty-eight; for Yale, forty-four; and for Princeton, thirty.—President Barnard of Columbia College.

THE HEART OF CARLYLE.

[A newspaper correspondent has recently given a pathetic account of the frequent visits of Thomas Carlyle to the grave of his wife, as revealing a tender side of his nature, not hitherto much known to the world.]

O rugged Sage! that with thy humors grim
Hast sought to sway mankind to fitter trim,
For ways and works of nobleness and truth;
To wrench, by sturdy pull of thy strong youth,

The hearts and manners of the world from sham
And mockery, to serve the great I AM,
The high Reality that though appearance gleams,
That was, and is, and will be, whate'er seems!

While men have shuddered at thy heavy strokes,
Wherewith for them thou breakest galling yokes
Of superstition, cant, and hollow forms,
And quailed before thee as some god of storms
And fury, riding on the winds of wrath,
And dealing vengeance in thy dreadful path,

Yet ever in thine eyes hath Pity seen
Her image wild, no angry hate between;
Thy yearning soul, deep glancing in thy look,
Thy face, of love and sympathy a book.

Nor can they dream who own a kindred sense,
That in thy heart, or warmly pouring thence,
Is aught, or could be, that in truth were not
Of love divine and human faith begot.

Nor needed we thy bended form to view
In yonder church-yard, where thou dost renew,
In lonely vigils of thy constant soul,
That troth to her which keeps ye, sundered, whole.

But as we walk with thee, and mark thy tread,
Feeble with age, to where thy treasured dead
Doth lie, and see thee stoop and kiss that grave,—
Thou ever upright, manful, stout, and brave!—

We turn again, with reverent, grateful mind,
Thee in thy other, stormier self to find,
Well pleased that in the tempest of thy style
Heart's tender melody played all the while.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 11, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

THE Presidential campaign has ended by giving to the Republican party another opportunity for the administration of national affairs. All of us can hope together that the opportunity will be used so wisely and well that by the time of another election the old issues of the war will have been outgrown, and that parties will have advanced to new issues demanded by the new times.

THE CATHOLICS AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Since we assumed the editorship of the Index, we have had occasion several times to report, with reference to localities in New England and elsewhere, that the Catholics had established a parochial school, and that orders had been given through the priestly authority that Catholic parents should withdraw their children from the public schools and send them to the parochial schools. That this is now the policy of the Catholic Church, and that it is to be pushed as rapidly as circumstances will allow, there can be no doubt. Catholic publications are zealously urging it; the priesthood, where everything is ready for the change, are enforcing it; and preparations are going on where things are not ready for making them ready. The attitude of the Catholics toward our public schools is to be, evidently, one of the live questions in both our educational and political affairs in the next decade.

That the Catholics, from their point of view, can make a strong argument for this policy which they are adopting, is not to be denied. The Romish Church has always kept education in the hands of the priesthood. It does not believe in secular education as distinct from religious instruction; and by religious instruction it means instruction in the doctrines and forms of the Church. Its primary object is to make good members of the Roman Catholic Church, assuming that everything else of value will follow, if this object is achieved. And it is making a vigorous push for this object now in this country, because the sagacious priests see that practically, under the influence of our public schools and other free institutions, the younger membership of the Church is, to no small extent, drifting away from the authority of the Church. With the priesthood, it is the old struggle to maintain ecclesiastical authority against mental liberty. If they can keep the education of the young in their hands, they have more than half-won this battle.

Nor, again, will it be denied that the Catholics have a perfect legal right to establish parochial schools and to send their children to such schools. They have as much right to do this, if it be their conviction of the proper mode of education, as have the Baptists or Episcopalians or any other denomination to set up and patronize schools of their respective religious persuasions; though it may be questioned whether the great majority of Catholic parents, on account of the power which the priests have of acting upon their fears, can move in such a matter of their own free judgment, as can Protestant parents. The Catholic Church, in fact, takes the rights of Catholic parents over their children's education into its own hands.

There is, however, one serious obstacle which the Catholic priesthood have at present to contend against in carrying out this policy of inaugurating separate schools; namely, poverty. The great bulk of the Catholics in this country are poor. They are not capitalists, but day laborers. Multitudes of them pay only a poll-tax, if they pay any. The proportion of the school fund which all of their tax-payers together pay into the public treasury is very small compared with their number of children. So long, therefore, as their children are in the public schools, they are educated at very small cost to the parents. If the children are put into parochial schools, their parents and Catholics generally have still to pay their proportion of taxes for the public schools, and have also to meet the whole of the cost of maintaining the parochial schools. The burden of this double expenditure, doubtless, greatly interferes with the plan of the Church to get the exclusive control of the education of its children.

But the astute leaders of the Church are not dismayed by this obstacle. They expect not so much to surmount it as to remove it. In due time, they will declare this double taxation, imposed upon them by reason of their conscientious convictions, to be not only a burden, but an injustice; and they will make their appeal either to be relieved of paying their quota of the public-school tax, or else to receive it back from the public treasury to be used for their own schools in their own way.

And, when this demand is made, how shall it be met by the public? Obviously, it cannot be acceded to without establishing a principle which every religious denomination might, and probably in that case would, equally avail itself of; and the result would be that our common school system would be broken up into a large number of fragmentary sectarian schools. In other words, if the Catholic demand were to be granted, we of this free republic should turn back to the mediæval plan of committing the interests of education to the ecclesiastical authorities, at the very time that the most enlightened nations of Europe are endeavoring to emancipate their educational interests from the sectarian power of the churches. We do not believe that the American republic can be persuaded or driven into any such retrograde movement; but rather that, when the appeal is once made for justice and is listened to, an advance will be made to put our public school system on even a broader and more consistent ground of justice than can now be claimed for it.

The State will then meet the Catholic demand by the declaration that the object of the State is not to make good Catholics or good Baptists or good Methodists or good Unitarians, but good citizens; that, as a condition of good citizenship and of preserving its own liberties, it has a right to insist on the education of every child who is to have a voice and vote in determining its destiny,—in other words, that it is its (the State's) duty to secure and guarantee to every child in its borders the privileges of a certain measure of education; that, for this end, public schools shall be maintained, not for teaching any religious tenets or upholding any forms or doctrines of worship, in respect to which the citizens are divided in opinion, but for imparting mental and moral instruction, in which all citizens have an equal interest; that these schools, free from all sectarian teachings and observances, and freely open to all children within certain ages, shall be supported by the impartial taxation of all citizens as a public obligation for the general safety; that, though parents in the exercise of their freedom may choose to send their children to private schools, they shall not thereby be absolved from their duty as citizens to sustain the public schools; and that all children who do not attend public schools shall yet come at intervals before school-examiners representing the State, to give proof that their education in certain essentials which the State may justly require is not neglected.

In a country which has no established religion, but permits, at least theoretically, full liberty of conscience, and tolerates all faiths, and aims to bring people of all shades of religious opinion into harmonious co-operation under one free government, is there any other course than this, with regard to education, that is fair and just? Is there any other course which consistently leaves religious instruction where our system of government meant to leave it,—to the voluntary action of the people,—and yet makes education, what no free government can afford not to make it, a public duty?

THE LATE EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

This notable assembly, which closed in New York, a few days since, its annual session of three weeks' duration, deserves a passing notice in these columns. The Episcopal Church is an imposing organization in many respects, and embodies much that is worthy of a radical's reflection and study. It is one of the most numerous, wealthy, and intellectual denominations of the country. It is also one of the most elaborately and compactly knit together of the Protestant sects, and surpassed by none in zeal and activity. Strong in the persuasion of its divine origin, that it is the Church, founded as no other upon Christ and the apostles, it is naturally a missionary one, and tends to spread itself out over a wide area and into new territory. It thus not only flourishes in great cities, but presses hard upon the advancing steps of civilization, and even among barbarous peoples and savage tribes beyond. It comprises in this country forty-six dioceses and thirteen missionary districts (including its foreign ones of Africa, China, and Japan), sixty bishops, three thousand three hundred and seventy-five clergymen, and about two thousand parishes.

The late Convention apparently embraced representatives from nearly all, if not every State and Territory. It is impossible for one who holds the doctrine of evolution to contemplate the Episcopal Church without perceiving the close and striking analogy which it bears to the Roman Catholic,—that it is simply a step forward in the line of ecclesiastical progression, but the natural outcome of the elder system and faith.

This accounts for such reactionary movements toward Roman Catholicism as that witnessed in the Episcopal Church in this generation. It is an easy transition, an example of the avatism which the scientist points out as peculiar to lower species.

Taking its rise in the Old World, and under the potent influence of monarchical institutions, when authoritative dictation and ceremonial usage were very much more dominant than at present, it is not strange that Episcopalianism still largely represents the character and spirit of these conditions of its origin.

The monarchical principle is its great distinguishing one. It is pre-eminently, in Protestantism, the religion of authority and ceremony. This was very noticeable in the aspect and whole mode of procedure of the Convention referred to. It was more suggestive of Europe than America, of courts and royal assemblies than republican life and manners. This was particularly applicable to the opening service of the Convention, when the bishops in their robes moved in procession down the aisle of the church amid lofty and inspiring strains of music. Upward of thirty of the chief dignitaries of the Church participated in this introductory service.

The frequent references to the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies, and the formalities which attended their communications, the construction of every resolution presented, and the simplest transactions of business were calculated to deepen this impression. A very large portion of the time of the Convention was consumed in discussions that would seem to an outside observer of but trifling practical moment, on questions of the rubric and ecclesiastical regulation, or slight verbal changes proposed of the ritual,— the mere mint, anise, and cumin of religious consideration ather than righteousness, judgment, and truth.

t seemed as though the simplest objects could be effected without running counter to the ities and prescriptions of the system; thus affording evidence of excess of organization, its power to obstruct and embarrass practical ends. The question naturally arises, Is Episcopalianism adapted to our republican life? Can it flourish upon American soil? For an answer to this, we need but to point to its history and present prosperity. Very largely are people everywhere to-day led and swayed by authority, and especially in religion; and scarcely less here in republican America than anywhere else. Out of the thousands of persons who adhere to the Christian creeds in this country, how few have ever given to them any critical examination! There is, moreover, a strong fondness in human nature for that which is established, that possesses outward impressiveness,—an historic order, whether real or imaginary, ceremonial and formal precision. This is not peculiar to the rude alone, but to the lettered and refined. Appealing, as the Episcopal Church does, so strongly to the sentiment of faith and to the religious and æsthetic sensibilities, we see no reason why it may not continue to grow in power, and survive for a long time to come in this country.

We referred to the correspondence between Episcopalianism and Roman Catholicism; and this might be further shown in various ways, did space permit. A single illustration from the late Convention seems to strengthen this view. We refer to its report on education, and the effort which it is making to build up "parochial schools," "under the auspices and control of the Church." The report contains the following passages: "That it be strongly recommended to all churchmen to use their means and energies in founding parochial schools and other church institutions of various grades, commensurate with the demands of the age and the needs of our people in science, literature, and art."

Of course, nothing could be more sectarian in its influence and spirit than this aim; and, though unaccompanied with the Roman Catholic denunciation of our common-school system, it is plain that the effect is practically the same.

But while Episcopalianism does but little to foster a sympathy with the advanced thought of the age, to encourage an acquaintance among its people with the leading minds in science and philosophy, but tends to ignore these, and lays its stress upon fidelity and service to the Church, and the literature of its own production; while its part in political and even social reform has been insignificant in this country,—its intellect, as we have intimated, even if of the ecclesiastical type, is exceedingly active, and its spirit very largely one of self-sacrifice to its ideal of duty. This was most honorably evinced in the reports of the missionary bishops in the Convention, and especially in the devoted labors of Bishop Whipple and others among the Indians. For this, and its influence in the line of a certain type of culture of social order and refinement, the courtesies and amenities of life wherein it is exercised, it is also entitled to no small degree of praise. From these, its zeal, and the administrative efficiency of its organization, cumbersome even as it is, Free Religionists and radicals may take a lesson; and this is one which we here commend, so far as it is available to them.

D. H. C.

A WRITER in the October number of the Harvard Register, Mr. Charles F. Thwing, has a statistical article concerning "The Decrease of Harvard Graduates entering the Ministry." By a thorough examination of the Quinquennial Catalogue, he shows that the proportion of graduates adopting the clerical profession from the year 1642 (the time when the first class graduated) to 1650 was .533, while in the last decade given in the catalogue the proportion was only .067. From the beginning of the college to the end of the seventeenth century, "the percentage of graduates who entered the ministry was .522; in the eighteenth century, it was .293; and in the first seven decades of the nineteenth it was .114." This decrease, however, has not been uniform. The highest percentage of those choosing the theological profession was reached in the decade 1670–80, when it was .571; and this was nearly reached again in the two decades, 1700–20. In the Revolutionary period there was a marked diminution, the proportion dropping from .289 in 1760–70 to .159 in 1770–80. In the following decade, it rose again to .207, but in the thirty years succeeding fell steadily, until in 1810–20 it dropped to .144. In the next decade there was a marked rise, the percentage reaching .184. This was the period, 1820–30, in which the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy culminated, and the legal rights of Unitarianism had become established in Massachusetts both in respect to the college and the Congregational churches. In this decade, too, the Harvard Divinity School was inaugurated. From 1830 until 1870, the decline has been steady, and apparently with increasing ratio. Mr. Thwing gives as "the general cause of this remarkable decrease the diminution of the demand for college-trained clergymen." And, for this diminution of demand, he attributes three reasons: 1st, the greatly decreased attendance on church services; 2d, the increased compactness of population in cities, so that one minister can supply the needs of more people than formerly; 3d, the rise of denominations not requiring college-bred clergymen. To these, we think he might have added a fourth reason, that would account especially for the marked decrease in the last thirty or forty years,—namely, the impulse given to freedom of thought by the advancement of science, and the uncertainty whether young men going into pulpits would be permitted to draw there a full and free intellectual breath.

WE find the following interesting statement in the American Israelite: "The Russian tourist and ethnographist, W. J. Stemirowitsh-Dantshenko, published at St. Petersburg his travels in Caucasus, in which he describes his stay of eight days at Daghestan with a warlike Jewish tribe, that has been there for unknown centuries. This tribe, he says, is distinguished from the other Caucasian highlanders only by its religion and ancient Hebrew names. Their names are exclusively such as occur in the Bible prior to the seventh century before the common era. It is supposed, therefore, that they had come there in the time of Salmenassar. These Jews live according to the laws of Moses, although they are warlike as the other Caucasians, and are in no wise distinguished from them. Mr. Pfaff, the Orientalist, also mentions Caucasian Jews in the provinces of Cartaliny and Cochetina, who are agriculturists. It has been supposed that they came there in the early days of the Maccabees. Upon the southern declivities of the Caucasus, there are Jewish and even Gentile families who claim to be descendants of King David."

PRISONERS' AID SOCIETIES.—As a step toward the higher prison ethics, the wiser and better treatment of the criminal, we may regard the various societies for aiding discharged convicts. The society which, in this city, devotes itself to assisting female prisoners on their release, held its seventeenth annual meeting a few days since. It reports one hundred and eight women and twenty-five children received into its asylum the past year, forty-six of the former having been sent to places during that time. The average number in the asylum has been thirty-two. Expenses for the year, $5,632.75. Two legacies have been received,—one of $1,500 from the late founder of the asylum, Hannah B. Chickering, and one of $1,000 from the late Hannah Flagg.

THE fair for the benefit of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, to be held in this city December 8–18, is rapidly assuming large proportions. A general committee of six thousand two hundred persons, distributed among the thirteen counties of the State, is engaged in soliciting and providing for it; while an executive committee of thirty is to have charge of the arrangements at the fair. The managers announce that raffling and every species of gambling will be discarded, that there will be no importuning of visitors, and that everything will be done to make the occasion pleasant to all. Tired and disgusted as most people are with fairs, yet the importance of the society's work, and the public interest taken in it, will doubtless make this one to be well patronized.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Treatment of Insanity.

THE National Association for the Protection of the Insane and the Prevention of Insanity, recently organized, has issued a pamphlet containing the constitution and by-laws of the society, setting forth its aims and methods, and also three essays read at the time of its organization. The general purposes of this association are clearly indicated in its title. Its methods, as more fully expressed in its constitution, and very ably and comprehensively presented in the first of the three essays, by Dr. George M. Beard, of New York, one of the most earnest organizers and efficient promoters of the new society, are these:—

I. To enlighten the public as to the true nature of insanity; to impress upon the people generally the idea that insanity is a disease, to be promptly recognized, to be freely acknowledged and openly cared for, not a disgrace to be hidden away out of sight, or to be spoken of with shamefaced hesitation.

II. To urge upon the medical profession the thorough study and careful observation of its present conditions not only, but of the causes that produce, continue, increase, and modify it.

III. To secure better modes of treatment for the insane; more kindly, trusting, discriminating methods of care and cure.

IV. To bring about a reform in legislation on this subject; the enactment of wiser and uniform laws in the different States.

V. To obtain the establishment of a central governmental supervision in each State, which shall enforce the rights of the patients, prevent the confinement of the same, protect the officers from false popular judgment, assist the friends of the insane in the selection of the best institutions for the different classes, encourage and justify larger public confidence, and elevate the standard of study applied to the whole subject.

Lastly, to help in any and every possible way the solution of the problem, how to prevent insanity, "how to reduce to a minimum the friction of modern life" which produces it.

In the line of the general purposes of the association, and of some of the above methods in particular, run the remaining two essays of the pamphlet. The first of these, by Dr. J. C. Shaw, Superintendent of the King's County Insane Asylum, Brooklyn, is on "The Practicability and Value of Non-restraint in treating the Insane." It is in the main a history of the reform effected in that asylum under Dr. Shaw's management, by the removal and destruction of all restraint apparatus, and the almost entire discontinuance even of seclusion as a mode of control, a change so marked that from one of the worst the institution became one of the best managed. The account is very briefly, but very clearly given. The conclusions of the essay are that non-restraint, combined always with active employment, as much out of doors as possible, is not only feasible, but the most natural and efficient method of treatment, and most promising of speedy and eventual cure.

The other essay, by Dr. E. C. Sequin, of New York, is in a similar vein, and is entitled "The Right of the Insane to Liberty." It is a strong protest against the indiscriminate and despotic confinement of all grades and classes of insane; a process which reduces the victims of disease to a level with criminals, and exposes them to loss of life, property, and happiness. The essay is prefaced by a quotation from Dr. Henry Maudsley:—

"The true principle to guide our practice should be this, that no one, sane or insane, should ever be entirely deprived of his liberty, unless for his own protection or for the protection of society." Its conclusions, confirmed by the adduced opinions of many others experienced in the treatment of the insane, are thus stated:—

"A large number of the inmates of asylums could be taken care of with open doors and unbarred windows, and of course without restraining apparatus."

"Many insane now confined in our asylums could be trusted almost implicitly to go and come at will, could be given nominally remunerative occupation, and, above all, could be provided with simple amusements suited to their station in life."

"The phases of insanity should be watched more closely, with especial reference to the early discharge of a patient, to his transfer to another institution, to the amount of liberty allowed him, etc. And I do not think it safe to leave this power wholly in the hands of the superintendent."

"The time has come to look around and attempt in this country the English and Scotch plan of placing harmless insane persons singly in the families of farmers and of others willing to undertake the task under frequent and efficient visitation."

With such statement of its purposes and spirit, the association makes its appeal to the public. Considering how wide-spread insanity is, and how extensive the interest felt in its treatment by the families and friends of its subjects; the necessary ignorance and inexperience, as well as possible abuse, that often characterize the treatment,—any effort that proposes to protect the helpless victims of mental derangement, to guard them against abuse, and to improve the methods of dealing with them, will certainly at once commend itself to popular sympathy. Taking into view the facts, so forcibly presented in Dr. Beard's essay, that the last fifty years have witnessed the manifestation of new forms of insanity, and a large increase in the numbers of the insane, especially in our own country, the subject of prevention, of warding off the evil, of counteracting the tendencies thereto, will be not less powerful in its appeal. The new society can hardly fail of receiving prompt response and cordial co-operation in both directions.

FRAGMENTS OF SCIENCE.

ANOTHER DISCOVERY.—Prof. Swift, Astronomer of the Warner Observatory at Rochester, N.Y., discovered another large comet on the evening of October 10th. The fact was noted in the associated press despatches, but some important and interesting details which could not be telegraphed are herewith given. The new celestial visitor is in the constellation of Pegasus,—right ascension, 21 hours, 30 minutes; declination north, 17 degrees, 30 minutes. Its rate of motion is quite slow, being in a north-westerly direction, so that it is approaching the sun. It has a very strong condensation on one side of the centre, in addition to a star-like nucleus, which indicates that it is throwing off an extended tail. From the fact of its extraordinary size, we are warranted in presuming that it will be very brilliant; and the additional fact that it is coming almost directly toward the earth gives good promise that it will be one of the most remarkable comets of the present century. This is the fifth comet which Prof. Swift has discovered, and the increased facilities which Mr. H. H. Warner, the popular and wealthy medicine man, has given him, by erecting a magnificent observatory for his benefit, promise much more for the future. There is a possibility that further developments may prove this to be the great comet of 1812, which is being constantly expected, in which event astronomers will have an unusual opportunity to test the spectroscope for the first time upon these eccentric bodies, and ascertain certainly what they are.

The Earth's Magnetism.

THE great physical problem of terrestrial magnetism has engaged the attention of numerous physicists lately, and it is well known that several ingenious solutions of it have been propounded. Professors Ayrton and Perry, for example, conceived the happy thought that the earth was charged with static electricity, which, being carried round on the surface by the diurnal rotation, acted like a circulating current, and magnetized the core. A severe blow was dealt to this hypothesis, however, by the mathematical criticism of Professor Rowland, who pointed out that the surface charge required was competent to send a spark from earth to moon. A theory based upon the existence of electric currents flowing in the atmosphere around the earth was promulgated later; and now we have another supposition, which has a better claim to serious attention than any of the rest, because it is supported by direct experiment. Starting from the idea of M. Edlund, that an electric current is really an ether current flowing in the circuit, and that electrostatic effects are due to rarefactions and condensations of the ether, M. Selim Lemström considered that he might produce this ether current by mechanical action. He therefore made a paper tube having two concentric walls and mounted on an axle. A core of soft white iron was placed within the tube, and on rotating the latter the core was found to be magnetic, as demonstrated by two fine astatic needles. Reversing the rotation reversed the magnetic poles; and M. Lemström concludes that the relative motion of the ether in the revolving tube and the stationary core was the cause of the polarity. It follows that, if the tube be stationary and the core revolved, a similar effect will be produced; and hence, if a magnetic body like the earth be rapidly rotated round its axis in an insulating medium like the air, it will exhibit magnetism. Pursuing this idea into mathematics, M. Lemström arrives at an expression for the magnetic moment of the earth, which agrees very well with the formula of Gauss.—Scientific American.

Energy developed during Rains.

PROFESSOR TAIT, of Edinburgh, thus illustrates the gigantic scale upon which Nature performs some of the most ordinary of her operations: Suppose a mere tenth of an inch of rain to fall from the lowest mile of the atmosphere. An inch of rain is five pounds of water to the square foot, and gives out, on being condensed from vapor, approximately, three thousand units of heat, on the Centigrade scale. The mass of the mile-high column of air, a square foot in section, is about three hundred and sixty pounds, and its specific heat about a quarter that of water. Thus, its temperature throughout would be raised by about 33° Centigrade, or 60° Fahrenheit. For one-tenth of an inch of rain, therefore, we should have a rise of temperature of the lowest mile of the atmosphere amounting to 3.3° Centigrade,—quite enough to produce a very powerful ascending current. As the air ascends and expands, it cools, and more vapor is precipitated, so that the ascending current is further accelerated. The heat developed over one square foot of the earth's surface under these conditions is equivalent to work at the rate of a horse-power for twelve minutes. Over a square mile, this would be ten million horse-power for half an hour. A fall of one-tenth of an inch of rain over the whole of Great Britain gives heat equivalent to the work of a million millions of horses for half an hour! Numbers like these are altogether beyond our comprehension. They enable us, however, to see the full explanation of the energy of the most violent hurricanes in the simplest physical concomitants of the mere condensation of aqueous vapor.

Contagion,—What is it?

CONTAGION, says Nineteenth Century, consists physically of minute solid particles. The process of contagion consists in the passage of these from the body of the sick into the surrounding atmosphere, and the inhalation of one or more of them by those in immediate neighborhood. The little particles of contagion are irregularly scattered about in the atmosphere, so that the inhalation of one or more of them is purely a matter of chance. Naturally, the germs will be the most numerous in the immediate neighborhood of their source, the person of the sufferer; but, excepting this one place, they may be pretty equally distributed through the room, or they may be very unequally distributed. One who enters the room may inhale a germ before he has been in it ten minutes, or he may remain there for an hour without doing so. Double the number of germs, and you double the danger. Diminish the size of the room by one-half, and you do the same. Keep the windows shut, and you keep the germs in; open them, and they pass out with the changing air. Hence the importance of free ventilation, and hence one reason why fever should be treated, if possible, in large, airy rooms. Not only is free ventilation good for the sufferer, but it diminishes the risk to the attendants.

Botanical Discovery.

PROFESSOR ASA GRAY gives in the last March number of The Botanical Gazette the following description of an interesting phenomenon, which was entirely new to the veteran botanist. He says: "Mr. E. J. Loomis, of the Nautical Almanac office, Washington, recently showed me a phenomenon which I suppose has never before been noticed, and which is commended to the attention of botanists. A tuft of Asplenium Trichomanes, gathered last autumn in the mountains of Virginia, is growing in his house in a glass dish. About two months ago, he noticed that one of the fronds—a rather short and erect one, which is now showing fructification—made quick movements alternately back and forth, at right angles to the plane of the frond, through from twenty to forty degrees, whenever the vessel was brought from its shaded situation into sunlight or bright daylight. The movement was more extensive and rapid when the frond was younger. When I saw it on the 23d of January, its compass was within fifteen degrees, and was about as rapid as that of leaflets of Desmodium gyrans. It was more rapid than the second-hand of a watch, but with occasional stops in the course of each half-vibration. This was in full daylight, next a window, but not in sunshine. No movement had been observed in the other fronds, which were all sterile and reclining, with the exception of a single one which was just unfolding, in which Mr. Loomis thinks he has detected incipient motion of the same kind. It is very easy to obtain this little fern and to set it growing. We may expect farther observations to be made upon it without delay."

FROM AN AMERICAN LADY IN PARIS.

PARIS, Oct. 6, 1880.

In no portion of the enlightened world is the thinker and historical student brought in such direct "rapport," as the French would say (perhaps "communication" is a better word) with the civilization of the past as in this wonderful metropolis, which may properly be called a vast storehouse, in which are gathered the records of the most advanced peoples of the world, from the earliest ages to this, our evening of the nineteenth century. To the native and the life-long habitant of lands of newer civilization, life in Paris, amid its wonderful galleries of sculpture and paintings and its immense libraries, is a living history. For fifteen centuries, neither capital nor labor has been spared to rescue from oblivion, and preserve for future generations, all that can tell the story of humanity's growth from the eras when mind first began to triumph over matter. In the Louvre galleries of antiquity, the present is forgotten in contemplation of the first evidences of the triumph of mind by the early Egyptians over crude matter; and in their unintelligible hieroglyphics upon mummies, rude ceramics, and hideous statuary, we moderns realize how aristocratic was the knowledge of the ancients, and how by being hidden from the masses of its own time it is now lost. Then the thought comes that the masses were not ready, at that age of the world's progress, to receive the light of knowledge, and were as unable to free themselves from physical as from mental tyranny, and that in the natural course of evolution the mind of antiquity progressed as fast as it could, and that to judge the peoples twenty centuries past, by those of the present, always leads to fallacious reasoning. Grecian statuary and painting is a living embodiment of the very slow growth of the human mind in an ethical sense. Nevertheless, growth is perceptible in the ethical status of the ancient Grecian over the Egyptian mind. Though the majestic and benign features of a Socrates, put to death in his seventieth year for heresy, indicate the status of his people, the reflection comes that a Socrates was possible at that age, and was possible only through the progress of mental evolution. And while passing the statues and busts of Plato, Pericles, Alcibiades, and the few philosophers who rose above the Greek masses, and pausing before the seraphic face of a Sappho, who could not attune her inspired lyre without accepting the woman's crown of thorns and the reputation which ancient pagans gave to their Juno and their Venus, and modern Christians to their Madonna and Magdalen, it is easy to comprehend how congenial to the Greek masses was the religion of lust and license which one sees portrayed in the ancient Greek paintings, which cover walls and ceilings, and which, however wonderful in an artistic sense, demonstrate how a nation so licentious and immoral must perish, in spite of its few sages and philosophers, whose mental growth, as indestructible as matter, enriched the whole world, but failed to elevate the people among whom it had its birth.

As one continues to read the life physical and the life mental, in statuary, medallions, paintings, and ceramics of the contemporary generations of Continental Europe, from the time that the glory-loving Parisians willingly accepted the yoke of Julius Cæsar, down through the ages of their Merovingian, Carlovingian, and Capetian races of monarchs, the slow but sure spirit of evolution continues omnipresent. The magnificent Jupiter of the Romans becomes the God of Christian mythology, somewhat changed, higher, nobler in his attributes, but Jupiter still, in his visible features in painting and statue, as in the demi-god, demi-man conception of Christ, and the imaginary omnipotence of personal deity, according to human reasoning of crude yet continually developing mind. The Virgin Mother and Mary Magdalen are a higher conception only of Juno and Venus; while the magnificent Minerva, the Goddess of Wisdom of the Romans, finds no place in Christian mythology, to which I have always in a great measure attributed the subservient position women were consigned to, when Roman civilization was swept away. The world has yet had no age when its progress did not require an ideal. And the ideal of the Christian woman, whether as the Virgin Mother of a God or demi-god, or the Magdalen, who loved without reason and without self-respect, or the Margaret, too weak to resist the imaginary Mephistopheles, or the thousands of women canonized as saints, is ever a low ideal of womanhood, inferior to the Roman Minerva.

A peculiarity of the French nation is that its love of glory, its reverence for history, and its taste in all ages for decorative art, has caused it to memorize every event, and to render immortal the names of all who have contributed to make its history one of the most interesting and instructive to mankind. No event of the great revolution of the eighteenth century is unmarked by statue, painting, or memorial column. In the magnificent Column Juliet, one reads the destruction of the frightful Bastile, in whose dungeons many a bright mental light expired. The memorial chapel of Louis XVI., while it tells of the sufferings of an unfortunate family in its statue of Louis XVI., before his execution, with the priest pointing upward, as if saying, "Son of Saint Louis, ascend to heaven"; and the suffering Marie Antoinette, who, kneeling in marble, supported by Madame Elizabeth, portrays the agony of queenly and maternal grief, reads a terrible lesson of the reactionary power of the wrong to which centuries of injustice and misrule led, by for a time effacing conscience and humanity, in rulers unused to power. The progress, mental and material, which grew out of the terrible revolution of the last century, to France, is evident everywhere here in Paris, and is impossible to estimate. Living, as I do, among the bourgeoisie, the great middle classes of France, it is impossible to realize that Paris is the city which foreigners regard as a modern Babylon of vice, immorality, and public corruption. A more industrious, intelligent, self-respecting people exist nowhere, and to them and the peasant classes the France of to-day owes her material prosperity. While the majority of these people attend the Catholic Church, they seem to do so merely as a matter of form, and have the utmost respect for people of other religious views, or for Liberals. They are, as a unit, bitterly opposed to union of Church and State, and wholly in favor of secular education. But they love tranquillity and ease; and were it not for the agitators, who sometimes are too enthusiastic and idealistic, no progress would have been made in the past, and none certainly will be made in the future. Still, France is working on gloriously to mental and political freedom. All political parties seem truly anxious for peace, and in their own way are as good and pure patriots as our own people of free America; and sometimes I think they understand where liberty ends and license begins better than American Republicans. Bartholemy Saint-Hilaire, Antoine Proust, Jules Ferry, President Grévy, and indeed the republican leaders of all factions, labor earnestly to bring about true progress by the careful education of the masses in purely secular and common schools and by the cultivation of moderation.

In an artistic sense, women have the same rights as men, their work being rewarded according to merit, and not sex. Madame Léon-Bertaux received an order from the owners of the Grand Opera House for a bust of Sophie Arnoult last week; and the Countess Beaumont-Castries, one for a bust of Madame Vestris.

The steamer "Equator" sailed from Bordeaux on the 5th of October, with the Niger Exploring Expedition, consisting of seven hundred men. France now holds under protectorate the country between the Upper Senegal and Niger Rivers, which the expedition, under command of Borguis des Cordes, will explore. A railroad is projected through this territory, and doubtless much valuable geographical and scientific knowledge will be gained by the expedition regarding Eastern and Central Africa.

Though mental light shines brightly in France, superstition still lives, and the shrines of Lourdes are crowded with pilgrims, who believe themselves cured of physical ailments by bathing in the springs of that place, in which the Virgin Mother is thought to have an especial interest. Several persons died there last week; but the priests assured the faithful that they desired to die, to be rid of their sufferings, and that the Madonna had heard and answered their prayers. The pilgrims are just as well satisfied, since, whether they live, die, recover, or continue diseased, they believe the will of the Madonna is accomplished.

Jeanne d'Arc is to have another statue erected to her memory, which will be unveiled at Compiègne, with imposing ceremonies, on the 10th of October. The veritable white banner with which the Maid of Orleans led her hosts to victory, and which, it is said, has been carefully preserved at the Hôtel de Ville of Orleans, will be unfurled on the occasion. It bears a picture of the Almighty, represented by an old man, bearing the globe of the world in his hand, underneath which on a rainbow are inscribed the words, "Jesus, Maria." The device is said to have been chosen by the valiant Joan.

Madame Thiers has purchased additional ground adjoining that where the first President of the French Republic is buried, at Père-la-Chaise, which she intends to ornament and beautify. Representatives from all political parties recently attended the unveiling of the statue erected to M. Thiers, and the press paid universal homage to his memory. At the ceremonies, however, the private secretary of M. Rochefort protested against classing Thiers with the patriots of France. The protest was heard, but only arrested the ceremonies a moment, which afterwards went on uninterrupted to their close, indicative of how mercurial France is learning moderation.

THE BIRTH AND CHILDHOOD OF JESUS.

"Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James and Joses, and Simon and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?"—MATT. xiii., 55, 56.

1. His Birthplace and Home.

JESUS was born in NAZARETH, a village of Galilee. The common recognition of this village as the place of his nativity is implied throughout the New Testament. (Matt. xxii., 54, ff.; xxi., 11; xxvi., 71;

Digitized by Google

Mark i., 9, 24; vi., 1–4; x., 47; xvi., 6; Luke iv., 16, 34; xviii., 37; John i., 45, 46; xix., 19; Acts ii., 22; iii., 6, etc.) No other locality is mentioned as his birthplace by Mark, the oldest of the Gospels, or by John, the latest.

The stories of the birth in Bethlehem (Matt. ii., Luke ii.) are contradictory and irreconcilable. Matthew states that the family of JOSEPH first lived in Bethlehem, fled to Egypt to avoid the massacre of children ordered by HEROD, and, on their return, chose Nazareth as their home from fear of ARCHELAUS, the son and successor of HEROD. Luke, on the contrary, represents them as dwelling originally in NAZARETH, and going to Bethlehem to be taxed. The assessment, however, is proven to have taken place ten years or more later than HEROD'S time, and not until after the deposition of ARCHELAUS. (Josephus, Antiq., XVII., xiii., 5; XVIII., i., 1; ii., 1.)

NOTE A.—The story of the birth in Bethlehem probably grew out of Micah v., 2. The reason given (Matt. ii., 23) for the selection of NAZARETH arose from a misinterpretation of Judges xiii., 5, 7. This passage applies to SAMSON, and not to the Messiah. The word "Nazarite" has no reference to NAZARETH, but is the name applied to those devoted to the fulfilment of a certain religious vow.

NOTE B.—The massacre of children is not mentioned by Mark, Luke, or Josephus, and is a wholly unhistorical legend, growing probably out of the story of the massacre said to have been ordered by the Egyptian Pharaoh, in the time of MOSES.

2. His Parents.

The parents of JESUS were called JOSEPH and MARY. (Matt. i., 16; xiii., 55; Luke ii., 27, 41–48; iii., 23; iv., 22; John i., 45; vi., 42.) His father's name is not mentioned, however, either in the Triple Tradition or in any part of Mark. JOSEPH, the father of JESUS, was a carpenter. It is probable that JESUS also worked at this trade during the early portion of his life. (Mark vi., 3.)

NOTE.—The story of the miraculous birth might reasonably be rejected on the general principle of the incredibility of miracles. It rests, moreover, on no evidence worthy of credence. It is not even alluded to by Mark or John, or in the later chapters of Matthew and Luke. It conflicts with the genealogies, which trace the pedigree of JESUS through Joseph. It probably grew out of a misinterpretation of Isaiah vii., 14, and the current Persian legend of SOSIOSCH, the conquering saviour, who was to be "born of a virgin."

3. His Ancestry.

Little is known concerning the ancestry of JESUS. He sprang, probably, from the ranks of the common people. The genealogies, which assume to trace his relationship to DAVID, are contradictory and unreliable. This tradition seems to have grown out of the Messianic expectation of a King or deliverer of the line of DAVID. JESUS nowhere speaks of himself as a "son" or descendant of DAVID, though he is sometimes represented as accepting this designation from others without protest. In the oldest Gospel, and Triple Tradition, however, he seems to have expressly disclaimed this ancestry. (Mark xii., 35–37; compare Matt. xxii., 41–46; Luke xx., 41–44.) His Galilean nativity would render his descent from DAVID extremely improbable.

4. His Childhood and Education.

We have no reliable account of the early years in the life of JESUS. The miraculous legends in the Apocryphal Gospels are too extravagant for belief.

The Galileans were generally considered an ignorant people. Their pronunciation was so corrupt as to be easily recognized. (Matt. xxvi., 73; Mark xiv., 79.) The Jews, however, paid much attention to the religious education of their youth. In later times, schools were attached to the Synagogues. The TALMUD declares: "The world is saved by the breath of school-children." It is doubtful, however, whether JESUS received any secular education or literary training. (Mark vi., 2; John vii., 15.)

It was impossible for any one to be without some knowledge of the LAW. Religious instruction was given frequently in the Synagogues. The weekly discourses on the Sabbath made even the common people acquainted with the wisdom of the Jerusalem rabbis. (Rabbonim.) The higher education, however, could only be acquired at Jerusalem.

NOTE.—Talk about EDUCATION. Did these Jewish schools resemble our FREE SCHOOLS? What important differences are noticeable? How do you suppose a little "heathen" would have been received at one of these schools? Do you approve of education in schools under the control of a religious sect? Do you know of any such schools in our day? What do you understand by "secular education"? Ought religion to be taught in our public schools? Is it just to compel the reading of the Bible, or religious exercises, in these schools? Is it not an infringement on the rights of those who disagree with such forms and services? i.e., the Jew, the Catholic, the Freethinker? Can true liberality exist under a Theocratic form of government?

General Questions.

1. Where was JESUS born? 2. Is NAZARETH generally recognized as his native place? 3. In what Gospels is BETHLEHEM mentioned? 4. Do the Bethlehem stories agree? 5. What is the origin of the legend of the birth in Bethlehem? 6. What is a Nazarite? 7. Who were the parents of JESUS? 8. Had he brothers and sisters? 9. What was his father's occupation? 10. How did the legend of the miraculous birth originate? 11. What is known of the ancestry of JESUS? 12. What gave rise to the legend of his descent from DAVID? 13. What can you say of his childhood and education?

THE Italian Baron Bettina Ricasoli, ex-prime minister of Italy, is dead.

ONE of Father Hyacinthe's assistants, Abbe Paul Bichery, has returned to Romanism, after writing a most abject letter.

AS THE Bishop of Liverpool, on Sunday evening, was on his way to St. Martin's-in-the-fields church, his carriage was stoned by a body of roughs.

VERA ZASSOULITCH, of Nihilist notoriety, will shortly contribute to M. Felix Pyat's journal, the Commune, a series of articles on the revolutionary movement in Russia.

A HALF-STARVED youth, charged recently at the Worthing police court with stealing a turnip, value one penny, was sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment with hard labor.

SIGNORINA ANGELA DELLA CHIARA, formerly a pupil of the normal school in Florence, Italy, has been received as doctor of letters, history, moral philosophy, and pedagogy, at the Padua University.

GARIBALDI and his son Chenotti have resigned their seats in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, giving as a reason for their action that they are unable to remain as deputies in a country where liberty is trodden underfoot.

THE Pope has issued an encyclical, describing the labors of Saints Cyril and Methody among the Slavs, and appointing them a place on the calendar as doctors of the Slav countries, to be prayed to throughout the world that they may protect the Catholic religion in the East.

A LARGE library and building having been offered to Bath, Eng., by a resident gentleman, the city has been polled for the third time, in order to decide whether means would be provided for the support of the institution. The result was again adverse to the project. The figures are: against, 3,857; for, 2,298. Majority against, 1, 559.

THE British Museum has secured a vaulted wooden Egyptian coffin, well preserved, and a gilded mask and mummy of a lady named Tahutisa or Thothsi, one of the court or family of the queen of Amasis I., of the eighteenth dynasty. The museum has also lately received five boxes of antiquities from Babylon, the result of the excavations.

MINISTER LOWELL leaves London shortly, to visit the Duke of Argyle at Inverary Castle, whence he will go to Edinburgh to lecture, on the 5th of the present month, before the Philosophical Institute. During his Edinburgh visit, he will be the guest of Mr. Findlay, chief proprietor of The Scotsman. November 6, he accepts a public dinner, at which numerous Scotch notabilities will be among the hosts. Lord Roseberry is to speak. Mr. Lowell insists that this dinner be offered him not personally, but as an American minister.

SUNDAY EVENINGS FOR THE PEOPLE.—The committee of the Sunday League have secured Southplace Institute, Finsbury, for a series of Sunday evenings for the people during the coming winter. The series will open on the 17th inst., with an address by the President, Mr. Jas. Beal, a lecture by Dr. Aveling, and selections from the Creation. During the series, lectures will be delivered by Dr. Andrew Wilson, Dr. Zerffii, Hy. J. Slack, Esq., Rev. E. M. Gildardt, etc. The selections of sacred music during the series will be rendered by Miss Royd, Mme. Alice Barth, Miss Bond, Damian Marie Cope, Mr. J. H. Pearson, Richard Temple, Egbert Roberts, etc., with full band and chorus.

THE lecture delivered by Mr. Charles Bright at the Theatre Royal, on Sunday evening, entitled "Saul, the Orthodox: Paul, the Heretic," was listened to with marked attention by a large audience. Mr. Bright drew attention to the conclusions adopted by critics of the Tübingen school relative to the career of Paul, based on the alleged discrepancies between the accounts given in Acts and those contained in the Epistle to the Galatians. The schism between the Judaic Christians, headed by Peter, James, and John, and those headed by Paul, who threw over the Hebrew ritual, was dwelt upon, and the heroic and independent career of the latter, as a heretic, forcibly presented. Mr. Bright announced that next Sunday Freethought would give place to science in the person of the distinguished astronomer, Mr. Proctor; and that, on the following Sunday, he (Mr. Bright) would resume his lectures, giving one entitled "Science in its relation to Freethought."—Sydney (Australia) Telegraph.

THE London Despatch contains these briefs concerning the tumult in Ireland: "It is confidently stated that the Irish Government have made up their minds to prosecute certain members of the Land League for conspiracy to effect an unlawful end by unlawful means, and that the notes of the London reporters, taken at country meetings, and the proceedings of the Land League itself, will form the groundwork of the action, which will be immediately taken, in the form, in the first place, of summons to the police-court. Society is in a very disturbed state, and a feeling of insecurity is becoming very evident among landholders, but especially among the larger proprietors. It is rumored that a few well-known proprietors are about to leave their residences in the Ballina district for England and the Continent. . . . The military authorities in Ireland are making extensive preparations in view of the apprehended disturbances in the west. All barracks are to be made ready to receive additional troops, and houses have been hired by the Government in Tuam, Headford, and Balla, for immediate occupation by the military. The action of the military authorities in sending large bodies of troops to the west of Ireland gives rise to a rumor that the Government have received information of some intended lawless proceedings, which they deem it advisable summarily to check. On Tuesday night, a special train, which was conveying a number of soldiers to the west of Ireland, broke down between Ballinasloe and Woodlawn, but none of the troops were injured. . . . It is stated that a Dublin manufacturer has recently been applied to by several gentlemen throughout Ireland for coats of mail. A sample of the best mail has been tested in Dublin, and it is said that at a distance of ten yards a bullet went through the armor and a one-inch deal board. As an illustration of the state of feeling among landlords in those parts of Ireland where the present agitation has taken the deepest root, we may mention that a Birmingham manufacturer a day or two since received from the vicinity of New Ross an order for a coat of mail for an Irish landlord resident in the neighborhood. The letter containing the order stated that the applicant had been endeavoring to obtain the article in question in several quarters, but had failed to meet with any one who could supply it. The local firm, we believe, has accepted the order."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

THE MARVELS AT LOURDES.—There was an imposing ceremony at the Church of Notre Dame des Victoires, Paris, recently. The pilgrims who had just returned from Lourdes had been invited to offer up the homage of their gratitude at the foot of the statue of the Virgin. After the congregation had joined in singing the Magnificat, Father Picard got into the pulpit to give an account of the pilgrimage. He remarked that seven trains were found necessary to transport to Lourdes the multitude of pilgrims, not only from Paris, but from all parts of France. Some two thousand of them were invalids, of whom nine hundred performed the journey at the expense of the funds subscribed for the pilgrimage. In spite of the fatigues of so long a journey, only two deaths occurred on the road, or during the sojourn of the pilgrims at Lourdes; and, according to Father Picard, these two unhappy individuals, far from going to the Virgin's shrine to implore a cure or long life, had, on the contrary, undertaken the journey to pray for an early death. Up to that moment, one hundred and thirty-seven cures or great ameliorations had been certified. The preacher drew special attention to five blind persons who recovered their sight, and to speech and hearing being given to two, one of whom had been deaf and dumb from birth, and the other from the age of thirteen months. Many persons who had been stricken with paralysis, or were suffering from what were considered incurable diseases, were also restored to health.—New York Tribune.

MODERN MIRACLES NOT IMPOSSIBLE.—It is nonsense to say "the day of miracles is past," for it is the same omnipotent God rules the universe now as ruled it at an earlier date, and it is not for us to dare decide the special period at which it may please His divine Majesty to work miracles through his servants or through his own special will. The whole matter comes to this in a nutshell. The power is with God; and, when we see that power work the miraculous effect, we must believe the testimony of our senses, or else act like the man who denied the existence of matter till a dagger was thrust into his hip-joint. However, as we said before, we repeat now that we suspend our judgment in relation to the Knock apparitions and others till the Church solves the matter.—New York Tablet.

JESTINGS.

"WHERE is your mother?" said a worthy man to a little street miserable. She answered diffidently, "She is dead." "Have you no father?" "Yes, sir. But he is sick." "What ails him?" continued the questioner. "He has got a sore finger, sir." "Indeed!" "Yes, sir." "Why don't he cut it off then?" "Please, sir, he hain't got any money to buy a knife." —Sydney (Australia) Bulletin.

"HELLO! when did you return?" asked Snopson of his friend Binns, whom he met on the street. "Why, I haven't been away," replied the latter. "You haven't been?" incredulously asked Snopson. "Why, you look so worn out and near dead that I positively thought you had been away to one of the watering-places for a few weeks for the benefit of your health."—Norristown Herald.

A FURRIER recently sent the store-boy to the back part of the establishment to bring forward a certain fur cape. After some time, the youngster returned, with the article neatly folded up, and was greeted with, "Well, you've got back at last, have you? You've been gone long enough to sail from South America." "Well, sir," said the lad, as he modestly raised his parcel, "I did double the cape."

"POOR Herbert, how I wish you did not have to slave so from morning till night!" murmured his wife, as, with a fond caress, she seated herself on her husband's knee and gently stroked the auburn locks from his lofty brow. And the grave, stern man of business understood her at once, and said, "Well, Susie, what is it,—a bonnet or what? Don't be too hard on me, for money is scarcer than ever."

A CLERGYMAN at Pittsburg, Penn., lately married a lady with whom he received the substantial dowry of ten thousand dollars, and a fair prospect for more. Soon afterward, while occupying the pulpit, he gave out a hymn, read the first four stanzas, and was reading the fifth,

"Forever let my grateful heart
His boundless grace adore," when he hesitated, and exclaimed: "Ahem! The choir will omit the fifth verse," and sat down. The congregation, attracted by his apparent confusion, read the remaining lines:—

"Which gives ten thousand blessings now,
And bids me hope for more."

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." — LUCRETIA MOTT.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE wise man has life-long vigilance, but not one morning's serious trouble. To nourish the mind, there is nothing better than to make the desires few. —Mencius.

JUSTICE is the beginning of political equality, but brotherly love is the completion of it.—Pythagoras.

IN things of the mind, we look for no compulsion but that of light and reason.—Oliver Cromwell.

JUSTICE is the freedom of those who are equal, injustice is the freedom of those who are unequal.—Jacobi.

THERE is no general doctrine which is not capable of eating out our morality, if unchecked by the deep-seated habit of direct fellow-feeling with individual fellow-men.—George Eliot.

THE old faiths, like cotyledons well stored with starch, are perishing as the spring advances; yet only to yield their nourishment for a better faith.—F. E. Abbot.

I MAKE an obvious but a most important distinction between faith and belief. Belief is of the understanding: faith is of the soul. Belief is intellectual: faith is spiritual. Belief belongs to the realm of criticism and knowledge: faith to the region of conscience, conviction, and feeling. They are therefore entirely distinct things. The great believer may be a man of little faith. The man of faith may be a very imperfect and confused believer. Many a person who can repeat exactly his articles of credence, give a very minute account of them, define them in each particular, fails utterly, by reason of feebleness in the conscience, faintness in the heart, imbecility in the will, to achieve anything serious in the world; and, on the other hand, men of clumsy, contradictory, and chaotic ideas, by virtue of an overwhelming power of conviction in them, a purpose which is moral and spiritual, often carry the multitude before them, fashion the creeds of millions, and fasten ideas on centuries that follow after their death.—O. B. Frothingham.

I BELIEVE in the supreme excellence of righteousness. I believe that the law of righteousness will triumph in the universe over all evil. I believe that in the law of righteousness is the sanctification of human life; and I believe that, in furthering and fulfilling that law, I also am hallowed in the service of the unknown God.—Felix Adler.

SCHILLER, the poet of grand thoughts, has said, "Those only love that love without hope." There is in those few words more than poetry: they contain a whole religious philosophy, that we do not yet well understand, but that futurity will. Life is a mission: its end is not the search after happiness, but knowledge and fulfilment of duty. Love is not enjoyment, it is devotedness. If on the path of duty and devotedness God sends us some beams of happiness, let us bless God, and bask our limbs, enfeebled by the fatigues of the journey; but let us not suspend it for long. Let us not say, We have found the secret of existence, for the action of the law of our existence cannot be pursued from without. And, if we meet only suffering, still march on. Suffer and act. God will measure our progress toward him, not by what we have suffered, but by how much we have desired to diminish the sufferings of others, by how much our efforts have been directed to the saving and perfecting of our brethren.—Mazzini.

CURRENT TOPICS.

SEVENTEEN Mormon elders recently left Utah for various Southern States to secure emigrants (and converts) for a settlement in Colorado.

WE shall give to our readers next week, in full, Rev. Dr. Bartol's sermon, preached in his church in Boston, in memory of Lydia Maria Child.

THE Bible has just been introduced as a text-book at Wilbraham (Methodist) Academy in the regular four years' course of study of that institution.

BOOKSELLERS and publishers occasionally get some curious inquiries. Here is one that came lately to a Philadelphia firm from a Western town: "Do you publish a good family Bible of a high moral tone?"

ONE effect of the forged Morey letter was probably the brutal assault on the Chinese in Denver. Somebody, it is to be hoped, besides the poor Chinese will be made to suffer for the crime of imposing on the country that false and malignant letter.

THE Workingwoman's College of London is reported in a prosperous condition. It aims to afford women who are occupied during the day an opportunity for a higher education than that ordinarily within their reach. Cooking is included among the branches taught.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury thinks that the chief danger from the Catholic revival in the Church of England arises from the reaction which it will produce. He says, "The current of popular opinion throughout the world is all in the opposite direction from superstition; and I have great fear lest, in the long run, the faith of our Church and country may suffer far more by abstraction from than by addition to its approved system of Christian doctrine."

MR. MICHAEL DAVITT, the Irish orator, is reported to have said, in Faneuil Hall the other evening, at the meeting on the Irish question: "Unless the Irish race wants to be obliterated from the face of the earth, they must realize that their duty is to remain on their native soil, and, if necessary, die there at the point of the bayonet." The sentiment was greeted with "unbounded applause"; and "The Wearing of the Green" was played in response by the Irish national band, amid an outburst of patriotic enthusiasm.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago must either be unacquainted with Felix Adler's philanthropic work and reputation in New York city, or else it allows its gaze into the heavens, searching for the future life, to divert its vision from a most earnest and beneficent enterprise for the present amelioration of human life here on earth. Otherwise, the Journal could not speak in such belittling and unjust terms of Mr. Adler as it did in its issue of November 6, taking from one of our correspondents a single utterance of his for a text.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES is receiving much attention among our countrymen. There is a very general interest manifested in the success of the colony, Rugby, which he has been instrumental in establishing in Tennessee. Among the numerous "receptions" given to him, none has been more hearty or more widely representative in its religious aspects than that at the rooms of the Christian Union journal in New York. Orthodoxy naturally prevailed; yet all shades of religious opinion might have been registered there, from Trinitarian to "Free Religious," had any one cared to do it. But all were bent on honoring the man who represented, for the time being, a living humanitarian interest.

FREE-MASONRY has entered a claim upon the obelisk which Egypt has sent to New York. A book written by John L. Weisse, M.D., entitled The Obelisk and Free-Masonry, and published by J. W. Bouton, New York, is intended to show that the hieroglyphics on the obelisk are substantially the same as the symbols of the Masonic order, and that the use of "Masonic tools" must have been known in order to build the shaft. Incidentally, too, the book makes the claim that Free-Masonry goes much farther back than all the obelisks and pyramids and Egypts,—that it "commenced from the creation, and was established by the family of Seth"; and that "the Masonic apron originated from the covering or apron of fig-leaves adopted by Adam and Eve after the fall."

ONE of the questions in the recent General Convention of the Episcopal Church in New York, which excited a most earnest though brief debate, was a question involving the permission to clergymen, under certain circumstances, to use prayers not printed in the Book of Common Prayer; that is, their own, either written or extemporaneous. The majority of a committee to whom the question was referred reported against such permission. But a minority of the committee, consisting of Rev. Phillips Brooks, of Boston, and Rev. Charles Richards, of Rhode Island, presented a report, urging that such permission be granted; and they pleaded earnestly with the Convention to vote for this more liberal course. Rev. Mr. Brooks spoke of extemporaneous prayer as one of the "inalienable rights" of the minister which the Church did not confer and could not take away. Rev. Mr. Richards said: "I tell you, sir, we are entering upon a party strife such as the Church has not seen for years. I know of no more effective battle-cry than free speech. I can think of nothing more intolerable than that we are to be told that we dare not address our Father in heaven, unless in a prescribed form." The majority report was, however, adopted, though not by so large a vote as to discourage the remonstrants from renewing their attempt.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER.

A Critic Criticised.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

[Concluded from last week.]

Professor Denslow says again: "Mr. Spencer has sought to strengthen his leading postulate by certain minor postulates, such as that in nature 'every cause produces more than one effect' and that there is 'an inherent instability in the homogeneous.' . . . But who will say that any of the complex unities we have been considering, such as a plant, an army, a state, an opera, a planet, or a literature, is not one effect produced by many causes? Or that the heterogeneous entity called a flock of sheep, or of birds in flight, has any quality of stability (unless the capacity for reproduction be regarded as an element of stability), which is not shared, in at least an equal degree, by the homogeneous mile-stone, coral reef, or sponge?" (p. 227.)

Here not only a plant, in which are integrated several elements, producing a variety of form, fibre, color, etc., but an army composed of thousands of men, uniformed, officered, disciplined, armed, and equipped in subdivisions of infantry, artillery, and cavalry,—a State, millions of men, women, and children under a complex government, general and local, with a multitude of arts and industries, with religion, literature, customs, etc., all the result of centuries of growth,—an opera in which the greatest heterogeneity of sounds, united with scenic representation and dramatic action, is so arranged as to set forth events and represent a variety of thoughts and emotions,—a planet, with its land and water, its mountains and valleys, its atmosphere and climates, its minerals and metals, its multitude of animal and vegetable organisms,—a literature, including poetry,—from the school-girl's first efforts to Shakespeare's immortal works,—romance, history, philosophy, art, and science,—is each mentioned as an effect, and the question is asked if each has not been produced by "many causes." A multitude of objects and relations are grouped together mentally, and characterized as a single entity, and then the fact that such an entity (like an army or a State) is the result of many causes is adduced to offset Spencer's postulate that "every cause produces more than one effect." Sophistry so shallow is unworthy a writer of Professor Denslow's ability.

Every object named by our author is an illustration of Spencer's proposition. There was a time when our solar system was less heterogeneous than it now is. It is true of the plant, the army, the State, the opera, the planet, the literature. They all contain "internal evidence" of their growth and development from rudimentary conditions. Their development has unquestionably been characterized by increasing heterogeneity. This can be shown inductively. But Spencer shows deductively as well as inductively the truth of this proposition.

We know cause and effect as manifestations of force. One manifestation precedes another, in invariable and, as logicians say, unconditioned sequence. We call the antecedent cause, and the consequent effect. Now Spencer's proposition is substantially that, in the process of evolution, the manifestations of force increase in number and variety; that, "in the actions and reactions of force and matter, an unlikeness in either of the factors necessitates an unlikeness in the effects."

All parts of a homogeneous body cannot be conditioned precisely alike with reference to its environment. The parts must be subject to the action of unlike forces or to unequal intensities of the same force. We see this illustrated by the crust formed on a loaf of bread in consequence of the unequal exposure of the outside and inside to the heat of the oven. Additional exemplifications of the instability of the homogeneous are afforded by the rusting of iron, the uneven cooling of molten lead or sulphur, and the impossibility of keeping a body of water free from currents.

The more heterogeneous a body becomes, the more rapid the multiplication of effects. The heterogeneous composite becomes a bundle of dissimilar forces, which in their turn act and are reacted upon in more dissimilar as well as in more numerous ways. Every part of the body upon which an incident force acts is not only itself affected, but it differentiates that force, which gives rise to a variety of changes; and each of these leads to a multiplication of changes; and thus similarly multiplying changes go on with the increasing heterogeneity of the aggregate, and of the medium which modifies and is modified by it. Every event, which involves a decomposition of force into several forces, produces greater complication and increased heterogeneity.

And, in an aggregate of mixed units and dissimilar forces, segregation takes place, separating those that are unlike, uniting those that are alike, and coöperating to make the differentiation sharp and definite.

While the homogeneous is unstable and tends to heterogeneity, the heterogeneous aggregates that escape destruction by hostile forces tend to still greater heterogeneity and wider differentiation. The forces becoming more complex in their amounts and directions, a multiplication of effects follows as a necessity. Thus is shown deductively that which is amply sustained by induction, and which is exemplified very clearly in the development of "a plant, an army, a State, an opera, a planet, or a literature."

But, imagining he can apply to Spencer's theory of evolution the reductio ad absurdum, Professor Denslow refers to a flock of sheep or of birds in flight, and asks wherein they are more stable than a mile-stone or a coral reef. A body like a mile-stone, which has passed the limits of that simple evolution which illustrates the integration of matter, is, owing to its loss of molecular motion, apparently unstable; but, operated upon by external forces, it still serves to show the instability of the homogeneous, for, exposed to the air, rain, sunshine, etc., the outside becomes different from the inside, portions crumble while others remain firm, and the change of the whole to a diffused state is only a question of time.

And the sheep and birds, highly complex organisms, exemplifying that compound evolution in which, with the integration of matter, has gone on increasing heterogeneity of form, with perpetually increasing mutual dependence of parts, are still subject to changes that tend to greater complexity of structure and differentiation of parts.

A highly evolved organism, in which there is a systematic unity that insures the communication to the whole structure of any injury that threatens its parts, and which, while preserving its individuality, enables the organism to adjust itself to circumstances, stands a better chance to survive in a heterogeneous environment than does a simple homogeneous structure, like those creatures that resemble a mass of jelly, which are so lacking in co-ordination of action that a portion may be destroyed by some incident force without the knowledge of the whole. At the same time, the more complex structure, subject to a greater variety of forces, although maintaining its integral state, its coherence of parts, and co-ordination of functions, must become more and more differentiated in form and specialized in its parts. The evolution of the exceedingly complex creatures of to-day, from the more homogeneous forms now extinct, a change that Professor Denslow recognizes in his review of Haeckel's Evolution of Man, is a sufficient general illustration of the fact.

But the propriety of mentioning a flock of sheep or birds as "a heterogeneous entity," and referring to the mechanical movements and change of space relations by the individuals of the flock as an illustration of the instability of the heterogeneous, may be fairly disputed. The instability that is conspicuous in a flock of sheep or birds is merely a change of position. The sheep and birds are rendered thereby none the less sheep and birds, the flocks none the less flocks.

If a flock of sheep is to be regarded as a complex unity, of which each individual is a component part, the mere change of relative position in the members of the flock is in fact proof of the instability of the heterogeneous, about as the organic changes in any one of the sheep is an indication of the instability of that particular organism, the difference being only that, in the former case, the "heterogeneous entity" is a somewhat promiscuous collection of independent entities, while in the latter the body is a single individual in which there is integration, heterogeneity, and a subordination of every function to the general activity of the whole. The instability of the lime-stone involves its destruction. The instability of a flock of sheep, as referred to by Spencer's critic, is simply a movement to get food or to escape destruction, and it promotes the stability of the flock. Professor Denslow is not always happy in his illustrations.

Some of Professor Denslow's objections to Spencer's positions seem to be based upon the misconception that he considers the passage from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous as the primary law of progress, and that he shuts his eyes to the same process in all those changes to which the name of progress cannot properly be applied. The fact is that, while Spencer maintains that this law is verified in all secondary rearrangements of matter, where, with the integration of matter and dissipation of motion, there is sufficient retained motion to admit of redistribution among the parts of the body, he fully recognizes that mere increase of heterogeneity and multiformity of parts do not constitute progress. A cancer introduces into an organism changes that make it more heterogeneous, yet it may cause death. The anarchy resulting from a revolution makes a State more heterogeneous, yet it may be the precursor of its dissolution. The law of passage from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous is a law of progress, but not the law of progress. The primary law of progress (or evolution, which in his later works Spencer substitutes for the word "progress") is the integration of matter and the concomitant dissipation of motion, which is alike exhibited in the crystallization of carbon into a diamond and the growth of an animal from a germ. But when, as in the field of biology, there is, with continual integration of matter, increasing heterogeneity of form, progress is possible only when there is also increasing coherence, definiteness, and mutual dependence of parts, and a subordination of the various parts and manifold functions to the movements of the whole structure. The cancer produces differentiations; but, as they cannot be integrated in harmony with the rest of the body, they result not in progress, but in death. Thus, it is seen that evolution is a double process,—a movement toward unity as well as diversity. Integration, the primary process, under certain conditions the most completely realized by organic bodies, is accompanied by a complementary process from indefinite, incoherent homogeneity to definite, coherent heterogeneity. Variety increases with the unity it accomplishes. The evolution of an animal from an egg or a tree from a seed occurs by the integration of various elements into a complex structure, in which, at the same time, go on continual differentiations and local integrations, making the whole a compact aggregate that presents great heterogeneity in itself, and at the same time a wide differentiation from all other aggregates.

The field of this compound evolution is among bodies of a density intermediate between gases, wherein the molecular movement is too rapid to admit of structural formations, and solids in which the amount of retained motion is too small to admit of the rearrangement of the molecules. Spencer observes that "a large amount of secondary redistribution is possible only where there is a great quantity of contained motion; and, on the other hand, these redistributions can have prominence only when the contained motion has become small, opposing conditions which seem to negative any large amount of secondary redistribution." It is in organic bodies "that these apparently contradictory conditions are reconciled," for their peculiarity consists in the concentration of matter in a high degree with a far larger amount of molecular motion than is found in other bodies of the same degree of concentration, as Spencer has clearly demonstrated.

"But," says Professor Denslow, "no defect in Spencer's theory of evolution is so illogical as its necessary implication of a beginning without the designation of any supernatural factor capable of beginning it. Assign any desired period, say a billion of years, as the time required to evolve out of chaos the present cosmos. Of course, we have only to double the period to demonstrate that the cosmos should have reached its present condition of order one billion of years ago, and should now have attained a billion of years more progress than it has, and so on." (pp. 228, 229.)

The defect here spoken of is purely imaginary, and the foregoing objection to Spencer's theory of evolution is founded upon an evident misconception of his teachings. According to Spencer, there is throughout the entire universe ceaseless redistribution of matter and motion. Such redistribution involves, on the one hand, an integration of matter and dissipation of motion; and, on the other, a disintegration of matter and absorption of motion. The former process constitutes evolution, the latter constitutes dissolution. One is the correlative of the other. These two processes, owing to the universality of the rhythm of motion, must go on simultaneously; and there must be epochs in which, in some regions of space, one predominates over the other.

The evolution and dissolution of a planet or a planetary system, according to Spencer's theory, represent an immense rhythm of duration, beyond the power of the mind to conceive, which we may picture to ourselves as a series of waves carrying a world or system from a state of extreme diffusion before the formation of nebulæ to a condition of extreme concentration, and then by disintegration bringing it back to a diffused state. The "implication" of Spencer's theory is that worlds and systems admit of evolution, because of previous involutions in the form of disintegration of matter and absorption of motion.

Force is persistent. It is revealed to us under two opposite modes, attraction and expansion. In that portion of the universe observable by us, attraction predominates now; for there is an integration of matter and an evolution of forms, as exemplified in the history of this planet. In other regions, expansion may exceed attraction, dissolution may predominate over evolution. In ages inconceivably remote, the elements of our system now undergoing evolution were doubtless subject to the opposite process. Other worlds must have grown old and returned to a great mausoleum of worlds, in which was absorbed all their motions, ere the elements could continue existence under the forms and manifestations that we behold. But "beginning" there was none. Every condition, during both processes, has grown out of preëxistent conditions. Every form of matter and every manifestation of force are results of previous forms and manifestations, of which they are the modifications. Evolution and dissolution are waves of an ocean whose motion never began, and will never cease. The evolution of a world from the "chaos" of stardust involves a "beginning," only as the formation of a crystal from the "chaos" of a solution implies a beginning. There is, according to Spencer's philosophy, as little need of a "supernatural factor" to explain evolution as there is to explain the opposite process, dissolution; and one is as little indication of a "beginning" as the other, except the word "beginning" be applied to certain rhythms of motion, certain manifestations of force, certain forms of matter, which, nevertheless, were preceded by and sprung from other rhythms, manifestations, and forms, all due to and dependent upon self-existent, inscrutable power.

Professor Denslow is so anxious to accumulate objections to Spencer's theory of evolution that he quotes Von Hartmann (who is no scientific authority whatever), to the effect that it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether there are any actual tendencies toward a transmutation of species among plants and animals, such as the evolutionary theory implies; yet in the very next article, a review of Haeckel, this critic, who urges the above objection against Spencer, says, "In Haeckel's great work, The Evolution of Man, a flood of scientific demonstration is shed upon the question of man's origin, such as conclusively shows that the next generation of children must be taught, along with the other indisputable conclusions of science, the law of the descent or evolution of man from the lowest perceptible phases of vegetable and animal life, from a cousinship not merely with monkeys, but with worms and sponges, aye, with the mere flakes of gelatinous sperm that puzzle the naturalist to distinguish their doubtful life from that of the liquid waters in which they float. . . . The Darwinian theory is no longer a theory, but a discovery." (p. 261.)

We may overlook the Professor's obliviousness to the multitude of facts and unanswerable arguments of Spencer in favor of transmutation; and we shall find no fault with his extravagant estimate of Haeckel's recent work, which, although a valuable contribution to the literature of evolution, has scarcely added in any way to the confidence of scientific men in the theory of evolution (for that was abundantly established before it appeared). Yet to urge in one chapter the doubtful character of the theory of transmutation of species as an objection to Spencer's philosophy, and in the next chapter to regard it as a demonstration or to declare it is not simply a theory, but "a discovery," is hardly excusable in one who, as a thinker, attempts to indicate the weaknesses of great systems of thought.

Passing over several criticisms, I will content myself with adding the following to those already quoted:—

"But the fundamental assumptions are still religious,—that the power working under all, the origin whence all come, and the destiny to which all are going, are alike unknown and unknowable." Then the assumption that we know the ultimate origin "whence all comes," that we can have some conception of the absolute, that it is a personal Deity, and that we know where we are going,—to heaven or hell, and the universe to nonenity,—must be unreligious or irreligious.

I here conclude this notice of Professor Denslow's review of Herbert Spencer's philosophy. To follow him in his review of the Data of Ethics would greatly extend the length of this essay; and that attempt, if made by me at all, must be reserved for some future time.

CONCERNING FAITH AND HOPE.

Something is.

Necessarily, therefore, something always was.

Was this existence without beginning matter or mind, or both?

The existence of man, and of the world he inhabits, and of the universe around him, necessarily implies preëxisting intelligence, and, therefore, a preëxisting intelligent being, adequate to the accomplishment of these works.

Are we asked to prove or to describe or to account for such a being? Let us inquire, first, if these are reasonable demands, and if there is any need of our undertaking to answer them.

Nearly fifty years ago, Mr. Andrew Crosse, an English electrician, thought, for a time, that he had produced living insects by the action of the voltaic battery upon certain chemical fluids. Repeated experiments showed much reason for doubting the soundness of this conclusion. But, if Mr. Crosse had really produced a living insect from inanimate substances, is it not utterly absurd to expect that this insect could comprehend or describe or account for Mr. Crosse?

Can any work of man, however complicated and wonderful, understand the man who made it? And can man possibly understand the intelligence which devised and accomplished him?

It is unreasonable, then, to expect any man to comprehend or describe or account for God. A frank confession of ignorance is the proper reply to the questions of doubters or cavillers concerning him. One may properly say, in regard to that matter: "This knowledge is too wonderful for me. It is high. I cannot attain unto it."

If, then, the querist further asks why I believe in a preëxisting being, adequate in power and intelligence to the production of this earth, and of man its inhabitant, although I can neither prove his existence nor describe him nor comprehend him, I admit this to be a fair question, and one that I am bound to answer.

In reply, I answer, first, I believe thus because I cannot help it.

I would not deliberately adopt an absurd opinion. But, to my mind, it seems nothing less than absurd to assume that such existences as this planet and its inhabitants had no intelligent cause. And my inability to explain or understand or account for that cause does not disturb me, because an expectation that the creature could understand the Creator would be another absurdity. I am content to remain within the limits of possibility,—content not to know more than a human being can know.

Though the original causal intelligence whose existence I venture to assume is not to be comprehended by us, we may fairly and rationally, it seems to me, reach some conclusions respecting him. The vast provision of capacities and materials for comfort, enjoyment, happiness, in this world, proves, I think, that its deviser and accomplisher cannot be evil. Not only comfort, but welfare, seem manifestly to have been intended for us. In great numbers of cases, we clearly trace the absence of such welfare to negligence, error, or perversity on our own part, to our own disregard or misuse of opportunities, or our deliberate preference of present gratification to welfare. On the other hand, the great number of existing evils and sufferings not thus accounted for do not absolutely disprove the goodness of the superintending intelligence, since we see but a small portion of his works and ways, and the whole great plan may have arranged for an ultimate elimination of evil and increase and permanence of good. If so pleasant a conviction as this is not irrational, and if by it we escape the absurdity of assuming effects without a cause, why should we not entertain it?

My own consciousness corroborates the testimony of vast numbers of people eminent for intelligence and excellence in regard to the reality of the powers in the human mind called hope and faith. Two instances of the manifest exercise of these powers are the following: an expectation, almost universal among peoples and individuals, of a prolongation of conscious existence after the change we call death; and a persuasion, very widely and confidently held, that "the power not ourselves which makes for righteousness" here will continue that action in the life beyond, with progressively more and more success, so righting the wrongs which we see in this world's experience, and ultimately availing to justify the ways of God to man.

The commonness of the exercise of faith and hope in the human mind seems to show that these faculties are parts of our nature; and the commonness of their exercise in the two directions above mentioned—namely, the expectation of personal continuance of human beings, and of a reign of righteousness yet to be realized in their affairs—seems to be just what it would be, if such a God as we suppose did really exist and rule. And these expectations seem rational. When an elaborate and immense foundation has been laid, we look for a superstructure proportionate to it in extent and excellence. Judging of the capabilities of human nature by the best specimens known to us of intellectual ability, moral heroism, and spiritual elevation, and then observing on what a low plane in each of these departments an immense majority of our race live and die, we see plainly that a superstructure corresponding to the foundation is not attained here and now. But what right have we to expect it here and now? Human history carries us back only a few thousand years, during which time there has been manifest and very great improvement; but the process of formation of that which is to endure is necessarily slow. Agassiz told us that the peninsula of Florida was thirty thousand years in making. Ought we not, in modesty and decent recognition of our own limitations, to wait at least thirty thousand years more before deciding that such a foundation as the human mind and soul is to have no adequate superstructure? Are we competent, A.D. 1880, to decide either that there is no God or that God will not carry out what he obviously appears to have intended?

I have tried to explain how it is that I can't help believing in God, can't help believing in his power, wisdom, and goodness, and in his paternal relation to mankind. But in another way also I come to the same conclusion.

Of late years, several authors of eminence have elaborately written out their notion of the process by which our sun and its planets attained their present form, and by which the vegetable and animal inhabitants of the earth, including man, were evolved from it. These people imagine a certain state of things, and describe a certain series of processes, which, if we suppose them actual, might, could, would, or should be the possible explanation of all the existing phenomena of matter and mind. The manufacturers of these hypotheses may or may not believe in God, but they do not speak of him in connection with the processes in question; nor is there any need that they should, since processes and phenomena are the subjects of their story. Their theory is very ingenious, and in some parts very plausible; but it is not adequate, since several links of the chain are missing, and since (worse still) the first link, which should be firm enough to support all the rest, is merely a conjecture. These people cannot make a solar system out of nothing. They must have material out of which to manufacture it. So they assume (make out of whole cloth, as the saying is) first a fire-mist diffused through space, and then a vortex to begin that motion which shall ultimately make the solidified sun revolve on its axis. Unless you give them these things, they can do nothing. But I decline to give them either a diffused fire-mist or a vortex to move it. If I must (as everybody must) suppose something to begin with, it is far easier, far more reasonable, far more satisfactory, to suppose God. God being given, with eternity to work in, everything else follows of course. He can give us the fire-mist and the vortex (if he chooses to work in that way), and he can also give man's body, mind, and soul, with reason, conscience, and heavenward aspiration, of which, without him, there is yet no adequate explanation. So I believe in him and his providence, because that is the theory which seems to me most free from doubts and difficulties.

But freedom from doubt and difficulty is not enough. We instinctively desire not merely negative, but positive satisfaction. An intelligent lady, a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, once expressed to me her joy at having found "a comfortable religion." No doubt that form of faith is comfortable to vast numbers of persons, and therein it has a decided advantage over some gloomy forms of Protestantism. But, if the same advantage can be gained without such shock to or abnegation of the reason as acceptance of Romanism implies, by all means let us seek it; and I think this pearl of great price may be found by exercising faith and hope in a rational manner.

A man once asked by a proselyter whether he had religion replied, "None to speak of." And men generally are sparing of speech upon this as upon other of their deepest and most intimate concerns. So true is this, that fluency of delivery in regard to a man's own piety or morality is commonly held a suspicious circumstance, an indication of lack rather than superfluity of the possession thus paraded. The people among our acquaintance whom we would most confidently rate as good are not those who most abound in pious talk. Nevertheless, there is abundant reason to believe that religion is natural to man; and that the people with whom our conversation, when we meet them, turns upon the affairs of this world, are not, any more than ourselves, thoughtless in regard to duty and responsibility to the Higher Power. Confession of sin and promise of amendment are made more habitually and more widely to one's self than to a priest; and the efficiency of belief in retribution will be more, not less, when it is conceived as exercised by a loving Father instead of a vindictive Judge, by one whose rod as well as his staff is designed for the benefit of the offender.

A loving Father! To me it seems natural and rational to assume the reality of his existence and of his truly paternal character. Among the most precious portions of the Christian Scriptures is the description of a love to God so great in quantity and so pure in quality as to cast out fear. Faith and hope move us to the exercise of such love as this. Whoever attains it, whether he be Christian or heathen, will have attained the greatest blessing this life can afford,—a religion at once rational and cheerful.

THE HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By Edward Gibbon, with notes by Dean Milman, M. Guizot, and Dr. William Smith. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.

An American edition of Gibbon equal to the best English edition in every respect has long been a desideratum. The American editions heretofore competing have been breeders of ophthalmia, their typography has been so ruinously bad. Meantime, the best English edition in eight octavo volumes was beyond the reach of all persons of moderate means. Now, for half the money, Harper & Brothers present us an edition that is a pleasure to the eye, as elegant as the most fastidious reader can desire. Moreover, their generosity must be commended in putting it into six volumes, when eight would have conformed to the English precedent, and been for them much more profitable. The limits of these six volumes must very nearly correspond to those of the six original quartos; but the reader must remember that the original first volume ended with the famous 15th and 16th chapters on the conversion of the Roman Empire. These chapters are here pushed forward into the second volume by the insertion, at the beginning of the first, of Gibbon's admirable autobiography, one of the frankest and most admirable autobiographies that vie with Franklin's for the highest rank in this department of literature.

Who that has read that charming story of a studious and splendidly creative life has failed to reread many times over the passages which relate the circumstances of the beginning and the end of the great history? "It was at Rome," he writes, "on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the bare-footed friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started to my mind. But my original plan was circumscribed to the decay of the city rather than that of the Empire; and, though my reading and reflections began to point toward that object, some years elapsed and several avocations intervened before I was seriously engaged in the execution of that laborious work." In 1764, Gibbon was twenty-seven years old. Milton was not more possessed with the idea of writing "a song to generations" than Gibbon with the idea of writing a history that would immortalize his name. Many subjects attracted him before the greatest shaped itself in his mind. One was the history of liberty in Switzerland. Another was the history of the Medicis in Florence. When the decline and fall of the Roman Empire pushed aside all others, he fully apprehended the laboriousness of his undertaking, though his first extension of his subject was only from the fall of the city to the fall of the Western Empire. His ardor and his patience were not greater than his self-restraint. Twelve years elapsed from the origin of his design to the publication of his first volume, which saw the light in February, 1776, just as the Common Sense of Thomas Paine was hot from the press here in America, and the beginning of another nation (whose decline and fall are, let us hope, far distant) was at hand. Two additional quartos were published in 1781; and the three last, May 8, 1788. The composition had been completed nearly a year before. "It was on the day or rather night," he says, "of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a berceau or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, the mountains. [He was at Lausanne, in Switzerland.] The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom and perhaps the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a melancholy was spread over my mind, by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that, whatsoever might be the future date of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious." And so indeed it proved. He died January 16, 1794, at the age of fifty-six.

Seldom has the life of a great scholar and writer been so concentrated upon a single task. All that he did beside was inconsiderable. But no man ever furnished better confirmation of the proverb, "That man is terrible who does one thing." For what a splendid thing it was,—a history of the most central life and action of the world, with due attention to the subsidiary life and action of the outlying spheres, for a period of fourteen hundred years! When we consider that it was written a century ago, it is wonderful how little time has dimmed its lustre or diminished its authority. The notes of Guizot and Milman and Smith have already a more antiquated tone than the body of the text, in many instances. A set of notes by Mr. Lecky or Prof. Seelye, author of Roman Imperialism, would be a real addition. Mr. Freeman is probably the best qualified of our living English historians to judge of Gibbon, and his opinion it is perhaps worth while for us to transcribe: "That Gibbon should ever be displaced seems impossible. That wonderful man monopolized, so to speak, the historical genius and the historical learning of a whole generation, and left little indeed for his contemporaries. He remains the one historian of the eighteenth century whom modern research has neither set aside nor threatened to set aside. We may correct and improve from the stores that have been opened since Gibbon's time, we may write again larger parts of his story from other and often truer and more wholesome points of view; but the work of Gibbon as a whole, as the encyclopædic history of thirteen hundred years, as the grandest of historical designs, carried out alike with wonderful power and wonderful accuracy, must ever keep its place. Whatever else is read, Gibbon must be read too."

The chapters on the early growth of Christianity and the conversion of the Roman Empire have given rise to more discussion than all the other fifty-nine. They did not satisfy the orthodox contemporaries of Gibbon, and they do not satisfy the most liberal scholars of the present time. But Gibbon himself knew that his five causes were themselves effects, and did something to account for them, but not much. His charging the zeal of the Christians to their Jewish extraction is almost puerile. His study of their moral characteristics is altogether inadequate, as Mr. Lecky has abundantly shown. Gibbon's nature was singularly deficient on the moral side. He could not easily believe in moral greatness. Like Rochefoucauld, he was always suspecting some latent selfishness. But his greatest mistake was in his utter failure to perceive that the early centuries of Christianity coincided with a religious revival in the pagan world, from which it drew no little of its nourishment. Seelye and Lecky have exhibited this phase of the matter, and very recently one of our first American scholars, the Rev. Joseph H. Allen, in his Fragments of Christian History, notably in his chapter on "The Mind of Paganism." It must be confessed that Gibbon contemplates the fall of the Empire with regret and the rise of Christianity with aversion. But the most violent anti-Christians of to-day are generally able to perceive that the establishment of Christianity was the establishment of a new moral order, which, whatever its defects,—and they were many,—was an immense advance on that which it displaced.

But Gibbon's fifteenth and sixteenth chapters are only two out of sixty-one. There is little to which even the Christian apologist can object in his treatment of controversial and ecclesiastical Christianity, after the two famous chapters. It was a necessity of his time for him to substitute innuendo for direct attack. But, for this necessity, we should have had a manlier tone. But how many delicious innuendoes we should have lost! His most obvious service in dealing with Christianity was in dispersing "that vague halo of assumption, which gave a totally unreal character to all discussions about the origins of Christianity." But what he did in general was to present the grandest set of pictures ever painted by the historian of the most important events that have happened in the experience of the human race. Considering the grandeur of his attempt, the wonder is that his success was so remarkable.

J. W. C.

HALF A CENTURY. By Jane Grey Swisshelm. Second Edition. Chicago: Jansen, McClurg & Co. 1880. pp. 363.

An English lady has given us, in fiction, her idea of A Noble Life. On reading the book above named, which proves to be an autobiographical sketch, we are strongly impressed with the feeling that here is the reality of a noble life. Mrs. Swisshelm's means of early education (as that word is commonly used) were very limited, and increase of knowledge showed some of her early instruction to have been erroneous. But her rare gifts of common-sense, conscientiousness, and independence, proved far better than the most elaborate book-learning, and her self-education by conflict with obstructive surroundings was an admirable preparation for the work which fell to her in life. She was in herself an entire "Harry Wadsworth Club," always hopeful and cheery, looking up and not down, forward and not backward, and always most efficiently "lending a hand," when help was to be given or evil to be opposed. Much of the labor to which circumstances called her was opposition to organized evil, with few helpers, and with wealthy and powerful opponents; but, when this opposition necessarily called for vigorous personal attack, she was able to make it without spite or bitterness. She seems to have been nearly incapable of fear; and her fertility of resource, her resolute persistence under difficulties, her promptitude of action, and her wit and readiness in countermining opponents, equal all that Mrs. Child has related of that remarkable man, Isaac T. Hopper.

In her preface, Mrs. Swisshelm announces that her primary object in this book has been to supply some details of the inside history of the great abolition war, and to record incidents characteristic of the peculiar institution overthrown in that struggle. Other objects were to give an inside history of the Union army hospitals during the war of the Rebellion; to explain the causes which produced the Woman's Rights agitation, and the causes which limited its influence; and to show, by her own experience, the force of education and the mutability of human character. All these matters are pertinently and forcibly illustrated in the work before us, and other valuable lessons are incidentally given. Mrs. Swisshelm's hospital work seems to have been exceedingly helpful, and it was made more so by her determination not to let red tape interfere with the necessities of the sick and wounded. She repeatedly did what Florence Nightingale was so honored for doing; namely, seized, on her own responsibility and at her own risk, stores of food and clothing urgently needed by her patients, but withheld from them by the neglect of some one in authority to give a formal certificate of authorization. And she seems to have assuaged much suffering and done much other important service by having regard to what was needed rather than to what was officially ordered or permitted.

These ideas, and this course of action, necessarily brought Mrs. Swisshelm more or less in conflict with authority. Also, her plain and unvarnished way of setting forth evils that needed remedy, and of commenting on the respectable officials to whose action or neglect the evils were due, of course made her enemies. Her life has been, in the main, a stormy one; and most people who have heard her name have thought of her as eminent among the class opprobriously called "strong-minded women." The historical details of her book are given from memory only, her notes having been lost or destroyed in some exigency of her conflict with slavery. So, whenever hostile criticism shall be applied to these details, abatement may have to be made in more or fewer particulars; but, after such abatement, if one of the women who pique themselves upon being not strong-minded can show a record of genuine and timely help to human beings half as good as Mrs. Swisshelm's, her biography, too, will be well worth writing and reading.

THE MODERN REVIEW, No. 4, October, 1880.—Professor Kuenen continues his discussion of "The Critical Method," and shows that it is eminently constructive in its ultimate results. Mrs. William Grey writes intelligently and impressibly of "Things New and Old in Italy." Dr. Carpenter discusses "Nature and Law." His article is particularly valuable for its admirable exhibition of the truth that there is no analogy between the laws of nature and statute laws. The constantly recurring notion that there is, is a survival of anthropomorphism in a coarse and brutal form. H. Schütz Wilson discusses "Facts and Fancies about Faust," without adding much of anything to previous expositions. William Bemis is one of a great multitude who are inclined to tell us what they know about "The Religious Drama." A "Defence of Philosophical Necessity" by Constance is an interesting and valuable article, though it does not make everything clear. England's opium-dealings are bravely and sternly characterized by the editor of the Review. Mrs. Herbert Martin comes to the rescue of Gilbert Wakefield's honorable fame. Her tribute is well merited. The Notes and Notices are excellent. Three of the writers of the principal articles are women. The steadily increasing presence and power of women in English literature is very notable. The most difficult subjects pique their ambition, and they prove their ability to compete with the most vigorous masculine genius of the time.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW DAYS.—Exceedingly interesting, though fragmentary, is the pamphlet of Reminiscences, by Austin Bearse, bearing the above title. It recounts some of the incidents of one of the most momentous decades in the history of the Union; namely, that extending from 1850 to 1860, the last ten years in the life of American slavery,—the culmination of the "irrepressible conflict," soon to be changed into civil war, by means of which freedom should win its final and complete triumph. Perhaps nothing could have better prepared the people for the contest, and fired them with resistless opposition to the institution which had been a perpetual menace to the peace and harmony of the country, than the passage of the Fugitive Slave Bill in 1850, and the subsequent attempts to enforce it in the Free States. It is of these attempts, as made in Boston, that this pamphlet treats. The arrest and rescue of Shadrach; the trial and surrender of Sims; the seizure and rendition of Anthony Burns, the last of the fugitives returned to slavery,—with many a minor incident of hunted men hurried away to a place of safety, and of freshly escaped slaves passed on from hand to hand till placed beyond possible pursuit,—these are its themes. Not the least interesting part of the pamphlet is its list of the Committee of Vigilance, under whose guarded and more or less secret administration the work of rescue was carried on,—a true roll of honor, embracing more than two hundred names of men of the highest genius and of the humblest pursuits, all united in their love of freedom and their resolute purpose to resist, by every legal and every honorable means, the return of any man to slavery; ready at a moment's notice, by day or night, to do whatever was necessary for the accomplishment of their purpose. Mr. Bearse was their collector, messenger, door-keeper, and executive agent for practical work. He is now declining in years and in feeble health; and this pamphlet is published for the benefit of himself and his daughters. The expenses of publication have been generously borne by Rev. Photius Fisk, who has before evinced his appreciation of the anti-slavery heroes and martyrs by the erection of monuments to Torrey, Drayton, and Walker. The entire proceeds of sale, therefore, will be available for the object. Those wishing a souvenir of the times and scenes in which they may themselves have participated, and those desiring to understand the methods and the men of that anti-slavery struggle, will do well to secure a copy.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THOMAS HUGHES is on his way home to England.

IT is Froude the historian, it is now reported, who is to write the Life of Thomas Carlyle.

IT is reported that Mr. Whittier is to make a visit to New York this fall for the first time for many years.

A NEW edition of Clarence Cook's House Beautiful is promised by Charles Scribner's Sons for the holiday trade.

WILL CARLETON, the poet, was the guest of the Ace of Clubs at their dinner at the Parker House, a few days since.

LITTLE BRIGHT EYES, Mr. T. H. Tibbles, of Nebraska, Rev. Edward E. Hale, and others, pleaded the cause of the Ponca Indians at the Tremont Temple last Sunday evening.

LYDIA MARIA CHILD requested that her funeral should be strictly private, her coffin of the plainest, without flowers; and that she should be buried in her simplest clothes.

PRESIDENT PORTER, of Yale College, is to be one of the lecturers at next season's session of the Concord School of Philosophy. Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, it is stated is to be another.

FEW literary men are doing the amount of work at present undertaken by Henry James, Jr. Two serials are in progress, and this is only a part of the work which he finds time to do.

HON. A. A. RANNEY, Republican Congressman elect, is a prominent member of the Rev. Mr. Savage's congregation of Boston, a friend of the Free Religious Association and the Index.

PROF. GRIMMER has announced some very grim prophecies for the period of seven years from the present. It is comforting to know that the professor's predictions are based on astrological calculations.

EDWIN C. SEAVER, master of the English High School of this city, has been elected superintendent of the public schools of Boston in place of Samuel Eliot, LL.D., who recently resigned. Mr. Seaver is a graduate of the Bridgewater Normal School and of Harvard College. The choice appears to give very general satisfaction.

THE following announcement has just appeared in a Lynn paper. Rev. L. K. Washburn, who has been supplying the pulpit of the Free Religious Society for some time past, has taken up his residence here, and will use his best efforts toward building up the society. Regular services will hereafter be held every Sunday afternoon at the Oxford Street Chapel.

MONCURE D. CONWAY was greeted with a large audience at the Parker Memorial in the morning, a week ago last Sunday. Mr. Conway no longer appears the young man so well known on the platform in Boston twenty years ago. A long and silvery beard, and the use of glasses in reading before an audience, are among the signs of the marks which age has been leaving on him as the years have passed by. But he is still charged with the same vigorous, racy, and flashing eloquence characteristic of the earlier period. In the evening, Mr. Conway lectured on "The Wandering Jew," giving an exceedingly interesting and instructive review of the legends, history, and fortunes of the Jewish people. He questioned whether such a person as Judas ever lived, and thought that he represented the country of Judea, and thus the betrayal of the Saviour fell on the whole people. He regarded it in view of the persecutions that the nation has undergone, as a wonder that they have not been utterly exterminated from the face of the earth.

THE funeral of Karl Heinzen, one of the ablest and distinguished German freethinkers and editors of the country, who has been for some years past in feeble health, occurred at his late residence in Roxbury last Monday afternoon. We are indebted to the Boston Globe for the following notice of the occasion: "The obsequies were attended by a large number of the German citizens of Boston and other cities. The Boston Turnverein was represented by President Carl Eberhardt and one hundred members. The services consisted of addresses by Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney and S. R. Koehler, and singing by the Orpheus Club. A telegram was received from the officers of the North American Turnerbund, authorizing the officers of the Boston Turnverein to represent them at the funeral. The casket enclosing the remains was covered with the floral offerings of personal and literary friends of the deceased. The word 'Rest' on one design seemed very significant, considering the busy life of the deceased and the troubles he had passed through. There were eight pall-bearers, all friends and countrymen of the deceased; and, as they bore the body from the house, the Germania band played the 'Dead March.' A procession, consisting of the band, followed by fifty members of the Turnverein on foot, the hearse and mourners in carriages, proceeded to Forest Hills Cemetery, where the remains were interred. An address was made at the grave by Mr. Eberhardt, and vocal selections were given by the singing section of the Turnverein. Mr. Heinzen was seventy-one years old, a native of Germany, had been in this country thirty years, and edited the Pioneer."

LIFE OF LIFE.

Bending Parsee at thy distant altar,
Eastward gazing reverently to pray,
Steadfast keep thy germ of truth, nor falter:
Thou dost voice the Science of to-day.

Showers that fall o'er blossom, bud, and brier,
Waking into freshness withering green,
Own allegiance to that subtle fire,
Endless rise and fall in silver sheen.

Never rose nor lily sprung to beauty,
But the sun's glad beams have shaped it fair.
Never vine hath drooped in clusters fruity,
But hath drawn his nectar from the air.

Never song of bird that waked the morrow,
But hath trilled the sweeter for his rays.
Never mound that hid a ceaseless sorrow,
But hath grown the greener through his days.

Every pulse that bounds to happy laughter,
Every blush that blooms at Love's sweet word,
Every sigh, or tear that trickles after,
Every thought that's uttered or unheard,

Owns him king across the heavens unmeasured;—
Motion, music, life, and death are his,— Riches that in deepe-t earth lie treasured,—
All that hath been ever, or that is,

On this planet steeped in power and splendor,
Circling with its sister stars through space.
Priest anointing, father, mother tender,
Is that orb which gave those planets place!

Sacred light which laid its golden chrism,
Æons since, on brow of earth new-born,
Folding it in solemn, sweet baptism,
Gracious covenant of its earliest morn!

Christendom shall learn from lips of Persian
All that's best and deepest in his lore.
Science weave, in new and faultless version,
Truths he caught through centuries of yore!

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 18, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

We are now sending out bills to the subscribers of the Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a special favor if our friends will remit at once; and we shall be equally well pleased if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew. The Index is greatly in need of such a response. If its friends will give it their hearty aid, it may before the end of another year become self-supporting. If every subscriber would determine to get an additional subscriber, this desirable object would at once be accomplished. There are many who are doing a good deal more than this, but there are others who have never put into effect the suggestion. It is to these we appeal. Let us emulate our Orthodox friends in their zeal, and do this much, if not on account of our personal interest in the paper, at least for the cause it represents. Remember also that the most effectual way of improving the Index is to give it the means which will enable those in charge of it to make the improvements desired, and which none desire more than themselves.

LUCRETIA MOTT.

Only three weeks ago, we chronicled here the death of Lydia Maria Child. To-day, we have to announce the death of Lucretia Mott. Both were Vice-Presidents of the Free Religious Association. It must be a very rare thing for any society to have to erase within so brief a time two such distinguished names from its roll of officers. It is seldom, indeed, that death takes from any country, in a single month, two women who have been so long in public service and have won such honorable distinction. And, in their position in the Free Religious Association, they were not merely honorary officers. They were interested and active workers in and for the Association and for its objects.

At the meeting in Boston in May, 1867, when the Free Religious Association was organized,—that thronged, expectant meeting in Horticultural Hall, which no one who was there can ever forget,—Lucretia Mott was one of the invited and most prominent speakers. She gave her indorsement of the new movement in these words: "I believe, as fully as that the command was given to Abraham, that the command is now to many, 'Leave now the kindred of thy father's house, and go into the land that I shall show thee.' As George Fox was drawn away from all organizations of his time, and had to retire alone, and there be instructed from a higher power than himself, from the divine word within, and claim that as the highest authority for action,—with no Bibles, no human authorities, no ministers, no pulpits, no anything that should take the place of this divine, inward, every-day teacher, so simple in its instruction,—as he, I say, was thus called out from all his kindred and from his father's house, and brought into the land that was thereafter shown unto him, so, I say, there is an increased number now of this description." But, though favoring the movement in her address, Mrs. Mott was not willing at that time to accept office in the Association, on account of one expression in the proposed constitution, that seemed to her (contrary to her own convictions) to lay stress on the technical study of theology. From a feeling, perhaps, that she was a guest, and that it was not becoming in her to appear to antagonize those who had been most concerned in the arrangements for the new organization, she did not press the point, nor at the time very fully explain her objection. Afterwards, as she continued to manifest a deep interest in the Association, and to come, whenever her strength would permit, to its annual meetings,—saying that, after the anti-slavery struggle had ended, there was no reform movement that enlisted her sympathies so fully as this,—it was discovered on both sides that her objection was rather to the form of the expression in question than to the real intent of it; and then (in 1872) she became one of the Vice-Presidents in the enlarged list elected that year. A year or two later, she suggested an amendment, which was accepted as a better statement of the idea intended than were the original words. Her amendment is what now stands as the statement of the third object of the Association,—"To encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history." And this is Lucretia Mott's contribution to the constitution of the Free Religious Association. Originally this clause had read, "To encourage the scientific study of theology,"—a much inferior statement.

Yet Mrs. Mott did not withdraw from her connection with the Society of Friends. There was no occasion that she should, in order to join the Free Religious Association. Though her views were very liberal, even for the Hicksite (or Unitarian) branch of the Friends' Society, she yet retained her membership and her place as preacher among them, to her death. She was a firm believer in the original distinguishing tenet of Quakerism, the doctrine of the Inner Light, and she carried the doctrine, in no rigid but in a large and liberal sense, to consistent conclusions in theory and in practice. In dress and speech, she kept the Quaker mode, and made them so becoming that her very presence was a propagandism in their favor. In the anti-slavery struggle, to which, like Mrs. Child, she gave the most active energies of her best years, her reformatory zeal brought her under the rebuke of a large portion of the Friends, and there were efforts among them to effect her disownment. But she always managed her cause with such consummate sagacity that not only could they not relieve themselves of her, but she carried many along with her. In her special meeting, she kept her place by the very force of her character and intellect. She was the natural leader, and yet led in the true Quaker way,—not by any usurpation of position or authority, but by convincement of the understanding and heart. Thus she had won there the whole "weight" of the meeting to her own way of thinking and doing, so that it was not easy for any ecclesiastical discipline to touch her.

Sagacity, mental quick-wittedness for meeting an emergency,—a sagacity that might have been called shrewdness, had it not been for a persuasive heart quality that went with it,—was one of her prominent traits. An incident illustrative of this characteristic was related to us a short time ago by a gentleman who commanded the merchant-vessel in which she returned from England in 1840. A large number of Irish emigrants were on board in the steerage. On the voyage, Mrs. Mott was moved to hold a religious meeting among them. But, the matter being broached to them, their Catholic prejudices objected. They would not hear a woman preach, for women-priests were not allowed in their Church. But the spirit that was pressing upon this "woman-preacher" for utterance was not to be prevented from delivering its message without a more strenuous effort to remove the obstacle. She asked that the emigrants might be invited to come together, to consider with her whether they would have a meeting. This was but fair and right, and they came. She then explained how different her idea of a "meeting" was from the church service to which they were accustomed; that she had no thought of saying anything derogatory of that service, nor of the priests who ministered to them; that her heart had been drawn to them in sympathy, as they were leaving their old homes for new ones in America; and that she had wanted to address them as to their habits and aims in their every-day life in such way as to help them in the land of strangers to which they were going. And then, asking if they would listen (and they were already listening, because her gracious voice and words so entranced them they could not help it), she said she would give an outline of what she had wanted to say at the meeting. And so she was drawn on by the silent sympathy she had secured, until the spirit's message was delivered; and only the keenest-witted of her Catholic hearers waked up to the fact, as they were going out, that they had "got the preachment from the woman-priest, after all."

This quality of sagacity was of excellent service to her in her anti-slavery work; and, by means of it, she was frequently able to foil the purposes of the pro-slavery foe, and find safe exit both for liberty and for herself personally from most perplexing emergencies. Her work, indeed, in this cause was of the heroic order. Her house was well known to be one of the stations of the "Underground Railroad" for the escape of fugitive slaves; and no fugitive was brought before a judge in Philadelphia to plead for his right to freedom but found her there as counsellor and aid, though an angry mob might be raging at the door to lynch him, should he be declared free. The mob sometimes tore her abolition companions from her side; but no American mob was ever brutal enough to touch one hair of her queenly and saintly head.

It was not, however, simply her sagacity that saved her. It was the calm, undaunted majesty of her moral strength. Her intellectual faculty, on the practical side, was of the highest order. Mental clear-sightedness, alertness of perception, logical acumen, accuracy and solidity of judgment, these were all hers in eminent degree. But these were all at the service of her moral intuitions. They were all permeated and dominated by her moral force, which was the pre-eminent faculty that crowned and ruled all the rest. It was moral force put to the service of philanthropy that determined her career.

In her private and domestic life, Lucretia Mott was as winning and as strong, too, as in her public service. The household inevitably moved about her, yet without any seeming effort of hers. No duties of wife or mother were there neglected, because of the manifold work she was doing outside. Nothing for herself, everything for others, was her principle of personal conduct in the home. Simplicity, moderation, temperance, and relf-restraint in all material things, abundance and overflow in things intellectual, bright conversation, cheerful temperament, unbounded hospitality for the best thought and the loftiest aims, the motherly heart and helpful hand for all in need,—these were the characteristics of her house. Her marriage was one of rare happiness,—as near the ideal perfect marriage, perhaps, as ever happens in our human lot

Mrs. Mott cared very little for the speculative problems of religion. Though rationalistic in her religious thought, it was the practical and moral side of religion that enlisted her sympathies. On this point, we may fitly quote from one of her last utterances on the platform of the Free Religious Association, and, with this message from her own lips, close our imperfect sketch of a life that stands unique in our American history, and was not more epically complete in its well-filled and rounded eighty-eight years than in its moral grandeur. Her theme was the essentials of religion:—

"I want we should tread under foot our speculations, and everything that will mingle aught that is uncertain with the religion which we have heard presented to us to-day,—which is certain, which is sure; for that which is self-evident needs no argument. And so we come near to the beautiful truths and testimonies that rise out of this pure religion and undefiled, that need no scholastic learning, that need no pulpit explanations. They are clear truth, justice, love,—highest, noblest, finest instincts of the human heart and mind, which we are to apply to all that we can imagine of the unseen and unknown. That divine power will be ours, if we seek it; and, when these principles are stated, they are self-evident. They need no learned oratory, and it is not employed with regard to them. You do not hear, in any of the pulpits, a definition of what love and justice and mercy and right are. You know, and all know, that they are innate, self-defined. Therefore, I say, preach your truth: let it go forth; and you will find, without any notable miracle, as of old, that every man will speak in his own tongue in which he was born. And I will say that, if these pure principles have their place in us, and are brought forth by faithfulness, by obedience, into practice, the difficulties and doubts that we may have to surmount will be easily conquered. There will be a power higher than these. Let it be called the Great Spirit of the Indian, the Quaker 'inward light' of George Fox, the 'Blessed Mary, mother of Jesus,' of the Catholics, or Brahma, the Hindu's God,—they will all be one, and there will come to be such faith and such liberty as shall redeem the world."

THE "ASSOCIATED CHARITIES."

The system of active beneficence, known as the Associated Charities of Boston, seems to be the most successful effort ever made in this country to subject the giving of alms and the care of the poor to methods of scientific and practical operation. It aims not only to minister to the present needs of the destitute, but to put them in a condition to help themselves, and thus arrest and reduce the growth of pauperism. It endeavors to bring all the charitable societies and organizations of the city into mutual understanding and coöperation, so that their labors may be prosecuted with greater effectiveness and economy. For this purpose, it has provided a large building, which is wholly devoted to these ends, and intended to supply a bureau of information, and the central head-quarters for all the charitable work of Boston. Here reports are rendered of the applicants for aid from all the societies and wards of the city, with accompanying statements as to their respective cases. This arrangement serves to preclude imposture, by enabling the societies and the charitably disposed to know, in each instance, whether the applicant for help is already a recipient of it from any other society or part of the city.

This organization held its second annual meeting at the Tremont Temple in Boston, last Thursday evening. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen, including many of the best known and most respected citizens. In looking over the audience and noting its obvious signs of gentility, one could not but feel that it seemed as though charity were in a fair way of becoming fashionable, if it were proper to speak thus of those present. We mean, of course, in the best sense.

The meeting was very happily presided over by Governor Long, who delivered an earnest and sympathetic introductory speech, clothed in chaste and eloquent language, in which he quoted with approval the motto of the association, "Not alms, but a friend,"—and stated that its aims were: "1st, To give relief wherever needed, promptly, fittingly, and tenderly; 2d, To prevent unwise alms to the unworthy; 3d, To raise into independence every needy person, where this is possible; 4th, To make sure that no children grow up to be paupers." Mr. Robert Treat Paine, Jr., gave an account of the work of the year; and Mrs. L. E. Caswell told what had been done at the North End in the way of teaching women to sew, and enabling them to earn something from the employment; also of agencies of a laundry, a cooking-school, a boy's workshop, under the direction of a skilled mechanic, and like industrial projects. Then followed excellent quickening addresses from Edward E. Hale, James T. Fields, Phillips Brooks, and others.

But the most unique in some respects, and noteworthy to the radical mind of the occasion, was the speech of Roman Catholic Vicar-General Byrne. It afforded strong corroborative testimony to the position so firmly and persistently held by Francis E. Abbot in the Index,—that Roman Catholicism is the most logical and legitimate development of primitive Christianity of any the Church presents.

The reverend gentleman, in beginning, admitted that it was a somewhat anomalous procedure for a Roman Catholic to enter into coöperation with Protestants, even in labors of charity, and mentioned that the methods and spirit of the association differed in some important particulars from those he was accustomed to hold were essential to the success of such work. He believed the best charity was that which was performed under the auspices of the Church and through the inspiring power of religion. And hence, if this enterprise failed, it would be, he thought, because it was too much under the influence of economic and humanitarian considerations. The Vicar-General was even more at issue with the association in respect to the evil of poverty. Christianity did not pronounce poverty an evil. These are his words on this point:—

> I think I detect a tendency to class poverty among the evils that ought to be eradicated from society at whatever cost. Now, poverty, properly speaking, is in itself no evil; nay, voluntary poverty is a virtue in the Christian code of morals, or rather one of the perfections of the Christian life, which, being a matter of counsel, and not of precept, few are called upon to attain to in exterior practice. Nevertheless, the words of our Lord remain true for all,—"Blessed are the poor in spirit." Poverty, therefore, has its uses. Every industrious hive supports some drones. Nor are the drones themselves entirely useless. Natural history teaches us that they discharge a most important function in the commonwealth of busy bees. The spirit of poverty is one of the elements of true Christian perfection. "If thou wilt be perfect, go sell all thou hast, and give to the poor, and then come follow me." If the rich man could find no poor in regard to whom he could exercise the virtue of charity by way of alms-giving, I fear it would be utterly impossible for him to enter into heaven. Remember, even as it is, he enters as a camel through the eye of a needle. Truly, charity for the rich man is the loophole, as it were, through which with great difficulty he climbs into heaven, the narrow way that leadeth to eternal life.

The clerical gentlemen on the platform, and others, even the amiable and genial Governor, smiled at this unwonted interpretation of Christianity; and yet one need not be specially versed in the New Testament to see that the view presented was in stricter accord with its teachings than the customary usage and impression of Protestant people. The Roman Catholic Vicar was in fact the truest exponent of Christianity, for the time, upon the platform, absurd, no doubt, as sounded his dictum to the greater number of those present.

To THE following remarks of the New York Independent on the Denver mob, we can give emphatic indorsement. Our Quaker blood, to be sure, a little reluctant at the suggestion of "a battery of cannon" and "grape-shot"; but we remember the reason given by one of our patriotic Quaker neighbors, still in "good standing," for supporting the Union army in the war of the Rebellion,—namely, that "the army was only the expansion of the police force of the country." We think that the police force in Denver needs a "vigorous expansion":—

Suppose the news should come from China that a mob had attacked the American missionaries in Fuh Chau, had killed several of them, had cut off the ears of one, had beaten several, and had torn down their houses,—all this occurred without the slightest provocation having been given by the missionaries; the authorities tried to control the mob, but could not; there were one thousand rioters who hurrahed and yelled, "Lynch the foreign devils!"—what would the press of the United States say? Would not there be a united demand for energetic remonstrance by our representatives in China, for the punishment of the inciters of the mob and indemnification for the property destroyed? The scene which might have occurred in China has occurred in the United States. A mob of about a thousand persons—not wild Indians, but civilized men—attacked the Chinese in Denver, October 31st, and, with cries of "Lynch the lepers!" beat, shot, and mutilated the defenceless and unoffending foreigners, tore down their houses, and destroyed their property; and the police and fire department combined could not stay the rioters. Such outbreaks are exceedingly mortifying to our national pride. It is bad enough when the savage Indians descend upon settlers, and massacre them horribly; but this is only done in retaliation for wrongs received. What wrongs have this miserable crowd of mad men at Denver received at the hands of the one hundred and fifty Chinese in that town? Our notion of the proper treatment of such an outbreak would be to sweep the streets with a battery of cannon, loaded with grape-shot. That is the kind of argument that such men would listen to. And now what is to be done in the way of reparation to China? Nations go to war for far less sufficient causes than this.

THE dramatic scene in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, where, at a political meeting, just before the election, Robert G. Ingersoll was introduced as the orator of the evening by Henry Ward Beecher, is receiving considerable attention from the press. After a brief reference to the political issues, Mr. Beecher said:—

I stand here, not as a minister, but as a man among men, pleading the cause of fellowship and equal rights. We are not here as mechanics, as artists, merchants, or professional men, but as fellow-citizens. The gentleman who will speak to-night is in no conventicle or church. He is to speak to a great body of citizens; and I take the liberty of saying that I respect him as the man that, for a full score and more of years, has worked for the right in the great broad field of humanity and for the cause of human rights. I consider it an honor to extend him, as I do now, the warm, earnest right hand of fellowship.

As the two men stood there with clasped hands amid the enthusiastic and tumultuous applause of the audience, while cheers were hurrahed for each of them in turn, with swinging of hats and handkerchiefs, it was evident that to them as to the audience the scene was significant of something more than a political alliance for the evening. It meant an alliance for free thought and free speech, if not also—since Mr. Ingersoll, in the course of his speech, turned and addressed very complimentary words to Mr. Beecher—an indorsement of each other's theological heresies.

THE last number of the Banner of Light reprinted from our columns Mr. Epes Sargent's letter, together with our article on "Spiritualism and Science," and continued the subject with another editorial. To the latter there is no occasion to reply, except to ask the editor of the Banner to look at our article again. If he will, he will see, we think, that his enumeration of persons of more or less scientific reputation, who have been convinced of Spiritualism, as they think, on ample scientific grounds, has no point against our position. We expressly allowed for such. But we said, and still say, that it cannot be rationally claimed that the great mass of Spiritualists have come to the belief in that way. And, in spite of the authorities named, the verdict in the full court of science is as yet "not proven."

MR. ADLER has resumed his Sunday lectures in New York under great difficulties,—his wife having been very ill, and his own health, on account of a summer of anxiety and care, far from vigorous. For these reasons, he has not been able yet to furnish a copy of one of his lectures for our columns. But we trust better days are in store for him soon, and that the Index will ere long have the benefit of his earnest thought and inspiring speech.

SOME of our readers have inquired why Mr. Chadwick, who is announced among our contributors, does not write for the Index. It is therefore due to him to say that we have had the help of his facile pen in frequent articles since the first of July. You do not always know, friends, whom you are reading in those mysterious "Book Notices," which generally had best travel incog.

ERRATA.— In the poem in our last number, "The Heart of Carlyle," several misprints escaped notice. "Though" in second verse should have been "through"; "wild," in fourth verse, "mild"; "dream" in fifth verse "deem"; and "ye" in sixth verse "you."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE fact of man's long-continued existence upon earth, stretching far back into an undefined past, is now so well established that continued reference to its proofs would not be justifiable, except for the many daily evidences that the old doctrine of a comparatively recent creation, although seldom openly defended, is by no means abandoned. The existence of many theological dogmas depends upon its retention. It is still taught in secular schools and in Sunday-schools. It is still the underlying assumption of very many sermons. It is still floated along in newspaper editorials and in popular lectures and essays. Only by constant reiteration of the new can we ever hope to push the old superstition out of the prepossessions of the unthinking multitudes. For this reason, as well as for other reasons, we welcome every new contribution of fact or suggestion which goes to confirm the theory of man's derivation as distinguished from that of his creation, and helps to put it into more definite form.

A SIGNIFICANT contribution to the hypothesis of long-continued existence is that of Mr. De Costa in the Popular Science Monthly for November. The race of men found by the Spaniards in Central America were not an aboriginal race, but first came to this country in some unknown way, but probably from some country bordering on the Mediterranean, about the time of the Christian era. They dispossessed another race, who were likewise not an aboriginal race. The red Indian, also, was not aboriginal, but trod upon the graves of an older race. In the Icelandic Sagas relating to America, conclusive proofs are found that, when the Icelanders first visited America, the natives met with were not Indians, but Eskimos,—called by the Icelanders Skrællings. That the Skrællings and the Eskimos were identical seems an unavoidable conclusion from the array of facts presented in evidence. The Indian discovered by the early navigators of the days of Columbus was a new comer upon the eastern shores of America. He had driven off the Skrællings, probably between the years 1000 and 1200, who had gradually retreated toward the North. But of greatest significance is the suggestion (rapidly becoming much more than a suggestion, however) that the Eskimos are direct descendants of the pre-glacial man, and therefore the oldest known continuous race in the world.

THE facts which have led to the conclusion that glacial or pre-glacial man existed in America—that he was wide-spread over the continent, dwelling as far south as the Delaware Valley, where his relics are to-day found in the gravel beds, deposited by the terminal moraine, and that the maximum cold did not destroy him—are daily accumulating, but cannot of course be given here. New study, doubtless, will hereafter be given to relics heretofore hastily ascribed to the Red Man, and the Eskimo will be invested with a new and even romantic interest. Mr. De Costa believes that in some words in the Icelandic Sagas, taken from boys captured by Karlsefne in 1006, we have the oldest known words of human speech. Discredit has heretofore been thrown upon these Sagas, because the men they described as living so far to the south in America were not our Indians; but, now that their identity with the Eskimos is admitted, the former occasion for suspicion becomes a new proof of reliability.

WE are sorry that the Eskimo is not a more pleasing subject for study. As described by Mr. Ludwig Kumlien, naturalist to the Howgate expedition, in the fifteenth Bulletin of the United States National Museum, he is, when full grown, so begrimed with soot and grease that it is impossible to tell his real color. When upon hunting expeditions in the summer time, a tub, placed in the centre of a whale-boat, carrying three or four families, becomes the receptacle of the animal proceeds of the expedition; and from this putrefying and malodorous garbage heap, which is never cleaned out, each member of the boat's crew picks out a piece of meat whenever he feels hungry. At home, in their tents, the women use their bare thighs as boards for cleaning sealskins. Most of the men cannot count higher than ten, many not higher than six. They preserve a very primitive form of priesthood in the ancoot. The ancoot heals the sick, talks to Tomgarsuk,—who is both God and devil, but more of the latter than the former,—deals in prophecies, and practises conjurer's tricks. Their igloos, or ice houses, are inconceivably filthy. Their account of the creation is suspiciously like that of the Hebrews in some particulars, the first man, for instance, who grew up from the earth, getting his wife from one of his thumbs instead of from one of his ribs. The whole of Mr. Kumlien's account is of interest.

BISHOP DOANE'S article on "The Advantages of Free Religious Discussion," in the North American for November, is charmingly pedantic and amusingly "stilted" in style. Some parts of the article are really better even than some of the best things in Mark Twain's Innocents Abroad; for we know that Mr. Clemens intends to make us smile, if possible, but the good Bishop does so without intention. In precisely those passages, in fact, in which he desires to become most solemn, our smiles grow broadest. The article is not in the least degree an illustration of the "solemn humbug," which Mr. Stephen tells us is so plentiful among the English upper classes; for Bishop Doane believes all that he says. Whenever he thinks that his plummet touches bottom, we can almost hear the placid chuckle with which he holds on to his line, and settles back in the assurance that no one can go any deeper than his proposition. The utter innocence of any suspicion that his plummet is too light to sink very far, and that it by no means follows that bottom is touched when a man has run out all the line he has got, this, too, is amusing and instructive. It furnishes a good illustration of a fact of observation; namely, that there is a positive arrest of intellectual development on the part of many persons, which wholly incapacitates them from any understanding of the progress of modern science, or of the facts which have put religion to-day in a different position from that occupied twenty-five years ago. We should perhaps add that Bishop Doane's idea of Free Religious discussion is only that of discussion between an instructed believer, on the one hand, and the one who wishes to believe, on the other hand, and who is "sad" because he does not already believe.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

What Can be Done for Civilizing Indians.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Springfield Republican, "S. A. M.," writing from Carlisle Barracks, Pa., gives the following interesting description of the progress made in a single year by the young Indians that were brought there from Dakota to be educated in the ways of civilization:—

Just a year ago to-night, at half-past twelve o'clock, were landed at these barracks eighty-four Sioux boys and girls, in their wild costumes, taken from their homes on the far-off plains of Dakota, where they had roamed as free as the air from their infancy. There was no time spent in packing trunks or arranging clothing. Bare-headed, with their blankets around them, they came. Some had bundles under their arms,—precious bundles to them, a few trinkets, with now and then a pipe and a pair of moccasins.

That was a wonderful night,—a dark night, which has proved the dawning of a brighter day for the Indian. Imagine, if you can, that train winding its way through the lane into these grounds. The silence was broken only by the jingling of the bells on their leggins. Hungry and wearied by the long journey, they needed rest and food, which had been kindly provided by the ladies. To take these poor creatures, and cleanse and clothe them, noble hearted ladies did not long hesitate to undertake. It was not all done in a day or a week, but persevered in until they were made as sweet and clean as other little boys and girls. I shall never forget the half-hour spent in coaxing and teasing the first little girl (as she came to me from the hands of lady barbers) to get into the bath-tub. Exhausted with my efforts, I playfully seized and stripped off her only garment, crying out, "Washta!" (Good), and before she knew what I was about she found herself in the water. This same little girl, dressed in her new clothes, went out and told the others, "It wouldn't hurt!" And so one by one they took the initiatory steps to civilization.

To-night is our anniversary meeting. Our number has increased to one hundred and ninety-six; and, as I glance over this assembly, I ask myself, Are these the same boys and girls that one year ago came to this friendly roof? Yes!

> "The very same boys
> With their trinkets and toys,
> The very same girls
> Now with bangs and curls,
> That came to this friendly roof."

Truly, as the president of Dickinson College said, "It is little less than miraculous." This gentleman saw them when they arrived, and has watched their steady progress, giving an impulse to the work by his warm sympathy and coöperation. Friends and teachers contribute to the occasion by speeches and songs. Speeches from the students in their own languages and in English are listened to with great interest. We sang our first tune, which we learned coming down the Missouri, which was a great contrast to their favorites now, in which the bass is quite prominent, "Take the name of Jesus," and "Give me the wings of faith." Capt. Smeade's speech was exceedingly interesting to all. He had been in their tepees, and assisted in capturing seventy of their tribes only two years ago. He contrasted their condition then and now, and showed them the great advantages they now are enjoying.

The Indian pupils have been lending additional interest to the recent local county fair by entering many products of their industry. Besides the exhibits of their industry were to be found many things now to be looked upon as relics. A case of Indian clothing, implements, ornaments, and curiosities, attracted very general attention, and by the thoughtful could not but be contrasted with the articles manufactured by the children of the school. There were seen a suit dressed with the scalps of the owner's Indian enemies, and a female sack ornamented with elk teeth, near them plain and neat clothing made by the apprentice tailors and seamstresses of the school; moccasins trimmed with beads, in contrast with shoes made by the Indian pupils; bows and arrows for the hunt, and near by excellent bread baked by Indian bakers, and grains, fruits, and vegetables raised in the fields connected with the school, by Indian labor; tomahawks, knife-sheaths, and tobacco-pouches, greatly contrasting with the neat, well-made tables, tin cups, rattles, and pans, fresh from the shops at the school; rude and grotesque paintings, side by side with very fine specimens of penmanship and plain drawing, showing what rapid progress the boys and girls have made. Among the articles exhibited were shoes, new and repaired, buggy and wagon harness, quilt, child's dress, boys' shirts, machine and hand-made, night-dresses, chemises, specimens of darning, boys' pantaloons, table with inlaid top, tinware in great variety, bread, agricultural products, such as corn, potatoes, and vegetables of all kinds, also specimens of penmanship and drawing. A number of the Indian boys also afforded the crowds of visitors much entertainment by their exhibitions of pony-riding, foot-racing, and shooting with the bow and arrow.

THE Republican also gives an account of the progress of the Chippewas on their reservation in Minnesota. Probably there are no Indians in the country incapable of civilization, if only wise methods of honesty and humanity are used to reach them, instead of white agents to cheat them, and soldiers to hunt them down for resenting the outrage:—

The Chippewa Indians, settled on White Earth reservation in North-western Minnesota, have adopted the habits of the whites, and have made such progress toward civilization that White Cloud, their head chief, reports that the Chippewa bands still wandering want to abandon the chase and work the soil for a living. White Cloud says: "They are getting tired of their precarious means of living, and now they ask the great father to assist them with a few cattle and agricultural implements, to enable them to earn their bread from the soil. The head men are especially anxious that their children shall receive some degree of education, that they may have a better chance of getting along than was enjoyed by their fathers. It is only eleven years since we commenced work on the White Earth reservation. Before that time, the chase was our only occupation. Now, we raise nearly all we require for subsistence. We have plenty of the best land, with lakes full of fish, wild rice in abundance, and can raise enough crops to support the whole Chippewa nation. We are already almost self-sustaining. Our young men work in the field; and some twenty-five or thirty of them, with others from the other tribes, went to work in harvesting the wheat on the Dalrymple farms. All the bands are favorable to the plan of living together and opening farms. They see themselves crowded out by the whites. They see the white men stealing their pine timber, and they know that they must do something for themselves, or starve."

White Cloud thinks that in from fifteen to twenty-five years the whole Chippewa nation can be made a self-sustaining and prosperous community. As an illustration of the progress that has been made in the brief period of a dozen years, he says that, through the noble exertions of Bishop Whipple, nine full-blooded Indians are now ordained clergymen of the Episcopal Church; and they are scattered among the Indian tribes, inculcating good morals among them, elevating their tastes, and inspiring them with the manly desire of doing something for themselves and their children. "That shows," says White Cloud, with a smile of satisfaction, "that we are on the road to civilization. All we need is a little aid and encouragement from the government; but, above all, the heads of families should be furnished with a title to their farms of one hundred and sixty acres of land, so that they may have an interest and hold in the soil."

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 3, 1880.

The Presidential campaign and election have dominated all other interests and affairs in Milwaukee. Consequently, this letter will be of a gossipy nature, referring to such local matters as were able to win public attention during the prominence of politics.

Religious councils and conferences were quite numerous in the city in the month of October. The Episcopalians and the Presbyterians each engaged in a three days' session, and the Young Men's Christian Association held a convention.

The Episcopal Council preserved a somewhat more dignified attitude during this late session than has previously marked its convocations. The abusive personalities and unclerical squabbling of this body in its sessions has subjected it to much well-deserved ridicule and reproach.

The Presbyterian Conference was favored with the attendance of several of their most celebrated Western representatives, who participated in the lengthy deliberations. Some of the wisest of these essayed in solemn and learned style to reconcile the story told in Genesis with the latest geological investigations, and no doubt succeeded in satisfying those who devoutly desired this reconciliation that there was no real discrepancies existing. The lavish waste of words and time in attempting to hold together the worn-out fabric of an old theology, and patch it with scientific phrases, is to a progressive rationalist a positive source of pain. We weigh their splendid opportunities of wealth and culture against their activities, and measure the possible good they might do in humanity's cause with their strenuous efforts to combat social progress, and it causes a real regret.

The Methodist conferences in the West have been subjected to several vexatious sessions on account of heretical tendencies in their ministers. The story of the Rock River Conference is familiar to the Index readers. The editor of Unity, commenting upon this case, expressed the sentiment of most Liberals on the subject in these words: "When the Rockford Conference asked Dr. Thomas to withdraw, they asked him to increase his manhood. We fear that now in the presence of a heresy jury the Doctor will be more willing to state dogmatically a belief toward which in future he will be obliged to confess a second heresy, or else disappoint the growing years he has thus far ennobled."

The heresy of a Methodist brother, Mr. A. Haskins, of this city, has also needed looking after by the Wisconsin Conference. Mr. Haskins has opened his church — which, by the way, is an independent society, and not under the control of the Conference—to different persons who have lectured on various secular subjects. At the late conference, Rev. Mr. Haskins requested permission to withdraw from the Methodist body, which was granted, and no doubt very readily.

A tedious scandal trial has been continued among the Wisconsin Methodists, the subject being the dereliction of a minister, the principal charges being preferred by a brother minister.

The Methodist Conference passed a resolution to allow their ministers who were to remove from their present pastorates to remain until after election, that they might use elective privileges, evincing themselves an eminently practical and patriotic as well as pious body.

With a casual mention of Rev. H. Rose, of Plymouth (Congregational) Church of this city, the religious items will conclude. The Sunday week following the sad disaster, the wreck of the "Alpena," Mr. Rose advertised that he would preach upon the subject, "How to reconcile the loss of the 'Alpena' with the love of God." The newspaper report of the sermon showed it to be of the nebulous character common to such unfruitful themes. They neither console bereavement nor convince any careful thinker.

There was a novel feature in the political canvass of our city, novel at least to Milwaukee. It indicated the possibilities of the far future, when women with the right of suffrage shall participate in political affairs. The Canal Boys, a Republican club, held one of their public meetings in the Academy of Music. It was a political matinée, occurring in the afternoon for the express purpose of giving ladies an opportunity to attend; and they responded to the invitation extended them in an enthusiastic manner. The Academy was filled to overflowing, the number of ladies predominating. The various schools and colleges, both male and female, were represented, having been given a half-holiday for this purpose. Eloquent speeches were made, interspersed with campaign and war songs, the large audience uniting in rendering the choruses.

On the evening after the election, the Academy was opened at a small price of admission; and the returns were read from the stage, the telegraph wires being brought into the building. Quite a large number of ladies were present, which gave the occasion the character of an entertainment. Orchestral music and singing by a quartette club filled pleasantly the gaps of time between the receipt of the despatches. The ladies who availed themselves of the opportunity experienced a novel sensation, and the contrast between this occasion and the usual hubbub at head-quarters where returns are read was remarked upon by the gentlemen. Here was no smoking, no rudeness, scarce any interruptions, during the orderly reading of the despatches. Ladies occupied seats upon the stage, apparently as much interested in the result of the election as were the committees. All demonstrations were enthusiastic, but evidently modified by the environment. It was a capital argument against the oft-repeated assertion that women will be subject to rude treatment and become demoralized, if they take part in elections. It was a well-displayed argument that the influence of women while sustaining the right of suffrage will be salutary.

There is a law existing in Wisconsin, forbidding that children under twelve years should work in factories. It has, however, been so seldom enforced that it is almost a dead letter, and entirely unknown to employés. It has become known through the instrumentality of the Humane Society, lately organized in this State, that a large number of young children are employed in factories; and a movement is now on foot to compel the enforcement of the law regulating the labor of women and children in factories. There are also a few sanitary laws by way of proper cleanliness and ventilation. Simple as these are, they have been disregarded by employers; and the laws have never been enforced. This heedlessness on the part of manufacturers works great evil, resulting in the disease and death of the hands. An ordinance on the subject is at present before a committee of the Common Council; and the question will be brought into public notice by Rev. G. E. Gordon, President of the Humane Society, in his address at the annual meeting of the society, to be held in November. A compulsory law, the inevitable outcome of the agitation of the question of the employment of young children in manufactories, will also be agitated with a view to having a bill presented at Madison this winter.

A course of popular Sunday afternoon entertainments is now in progress, not, however, under the auspices of the Sunday Lecture Society. This society was disorganized during the business depression of 1878-79. The manager of the Academy of Music has taken it in hand, and the indications are that it will be a financial success. The course includes the best concert and platform talent in the country, and the admission is but twenty-five cents. It meets a popular demand, and is well patronized.

CATHOLICS AS MAYORS.

ALBANY, NOV. 7, 1880.

Editor of the Free Religious Index:—

In your last able and excellent paper, I see you criticise unfavorably the New York papers for opposing the nomination of a Catholic for mayor of New York city.

In the same paper, I see an item to the effect that a Catholic bishop in Canada has denounced with excommunication any of his people who shall send their children to the government, or public, school,—an act which we see nearly every day in New York and other of our States; and we also see that the cities of New York, Albany, Troy, and I know not how many more, have Catholic mayors.

In this view of the case, can a man be a good Catholic and at the same time be a good mayor? I grant them all rights, and full toleration consistent with the safety of our government and institutions; but I would certainly protest against a political autocracy, like Tammany Hall, foisting a foreigner, holding superior allegiance to a foreign potentate, especially where education, intelligence, and morality were concerned.

M. MCGOWIN.

[We do not wonder that apprehensions, such as our correspondent expresses, are aroused at the prospect of Catholics in responsible public offices, where the laws permit, if not almost invite, them to act officially for the benefit of their Church. And this appears to be the case in New York city. If we are correctly informed, the apportionment of the enormous school fund of that city is intrusted to a Board of Commissioners who can act largely at their own discretion. The mayor is one of this Board, and, if he were to be a Catholic, the majority of the Board would be Catholic for the coming year; and hence the fear concerning the school fund,—even the Nation saying, "In fact, we are willing to stake our slender reputation as theologians on the assertion that, if Mr. Grace as Mayor has discretion in the disposition of the school fund, and fails to give the Catholics a share [for their own schools], he will commit [in the eyes of the Church] a sin." Nevertheless, we abide by our position that Mr. Grace, if otherwise an entirely fit man for the office, should not have been rejected because a Catholic. The evil in this case is in allowing such "discretion" to any Board, however composed. There should be constitutional provisions, and appropriate laws enforcing them, absolutely prohibiting the use of the public school fund for any school or institution under sectarian control; and then the proper procedure would be not to refuse to elect a man to office, if otherwise qualified for it, for fear his religious faith or non-faith would prevent his administering its duties justly, but to impeach him, whether Catholic or Protestant or Freethinker, if he disobeyed the laws to advance his own special opinions concerning religion. Nor should we assume that a Catholic in public office, under our forms of government, whatever his ecclesiastical theory may be, will practically give his "superior allegiance to a foreign potentate." We are bound by our republican principles to grant him all the rights and privileges of an equal citizen until he commits some overt act of treachery and treason; and then there are or should be laws amply adequate to meet the case. With regard to Mr. Grace, if the exposures of his commercial career, which the New York Tribune has been making, are well founded, there were ample reasons for opposing his election without raising the unrepublican question of his religious convictions.—ED.]

In the article on the Treatment of the Insane in the last number, the word "same" in the fourth line of paragraph marked V. should have been sane: an important correction, as it is one of the prominent objects of the society, and of the supervision it seeks to have established, to prevent insane asylums from being perverted from their legitimate and useful work by malice or greed and made places of confinement for those who are not insane.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.

"In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."—MATT. iii., 1, 2.

1. The Messianic Period.

The Messianic expectation of the Jews, which had been growing since the time of the earlier Maccabees (about 165 B.C.), culminated during the reign of HEROD, and continued to agitate the people until some time after the fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.).

The great DAY OF JUDGMENT, foretold by the later prophets (Zeph. i., 14–18; Mal. iii., 2; iv., 1), was looked for by many, to be followed by the establishment of the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, wherein all should yield obedience to the sacred LAW.

2. John the Baptist.

About the year 28 A.D., an extraordinary man appeared in JUDEA, assuming the garb and appearance of the ancient prophets (Zech. xiii., 4; Isa. xx., 2; II. Kings i., 8; ii., 13–14), and prophesying the speedy coming of the MESSIANIC KINGDOM. His name was JOHN (Iohanan). We know nothing concerning his ancestry or early life, the miraculous legend of his birth (Luke i., 5–25, 39–41, 57) being wholly unhistorical.

He adopted the habits of an ascetic, eating barely enough to sustain life, wearing the simplest clothing, and dwelling in the wilderness between JERUSALEM and the Jordan, apart from human habitations (Mark i., 3, 6; Matt. iii., 1, 4; xi., 18; Luke iii., 2). In these respects, he resembled the Jewish sect of the ESSENES, who lived in the wilderness near the Dead Sea, refrained from the use of meat and wine, and performed frequent ceremonial ablutions. The legend in Luke (i., 15) represents him to have been a NAZARITE; i.e., devoted by vow to these rites and abstinences from birth.

NOTE.—The legend respecting the birth of JOHN is not in the Triple Tradition, and is mentioned only in Luke. His alleged relationship to JESUS is contradicted by the facts as related in the historical portion of the Gospels, which represent them to have been strangers when JESUS sought him to be baptized.

3. His Preaching.

Gathering around him willing hearers, prepared to listen by the general Messianic expectation, he exhorted them to REPENTANCE, in anticipation of the awful Day of Judgment, which he declared was close "at hand." (Matt. iii., 2; Mark i., 4; Luke iii., 3.) Those who neglected the warning, he said, would be "burned with unquenchable fire." (Matt. iii., 12; Luke iii., 9, 17.) He declared the insufficiency of formal observances of the law, or descent from ABRAHAM, for salvation from this doom (Matt. iii., 9; Luke iii., 8), and denounced the PHARISEES and SADDUCEES as a "generation of vipers." (Matt. iii., 7; Luke iii., 7.) He appears to have preached against riches and extortion, and to have taught a sort of communism of property, similar to that adopted by the ESSENES. (Luke iii., 11–15.) JOSEPHUS declares that many people sought him, and "were greatly moved by hearing his words." (Antiq., xviii., v., 2.)

NOTE.—"Preaching"; "exhorted." Very terrible and earnest his appeals must have been. But do you approve of this method of convincing people of their sins? Which is better,—to convince the reason by argument and persuasion, or to appeal to the feelings and fears of people? Do we have any such "preaching" in our day? What do you think of the methods of "revivalists," or "evangelists," so called? Is TRUTH discoverable through the emotions, or by calm and reasonable investigation? Which is the better way?

4. His Baptism.

As a symbol of purification and repentance, JOHN adopted the rite of baptism, or immersion, in the waters of the JORDAN. (Mark i., 4, 5; Matt. iii., 6; Luke iii., 7, 16.) This rite was preceded by a confession of sins. (Matt. iii., 6; Mark i., 5.) He proclaimed repentance and righteous living to be the conditions essential for admission to the heavenly kingdom. (Matt. iii., 8; Luke iii., 8–10.)

NOTE.—BAPTISM: From a Greek word meaning "immersion," a rite probably of Eastern origin. Frequent ceremonial ablutions were commanded by the Persian and Jewish scriptures, and were especially regarded by the ESSENES. The name "Sabian," applied to the Sun and Fire worshippers of CHALDEA, is also derived from a word meaning "to immerse," and baptism was a rite of their religion. The later Christian form of sprinkling appears to have grown out of the Roman (Aryan) rite of Lustration.

General Questions.

1. What was the duration of the Messianic period? 2. What was foretold by the later prophets? 3. When and where did JOHN THE BAPTIST appear? 4. Describe his dress and appearance. 5. His manner of life. 6. What Jewish sect adopted similar customs? 7. What did JOHN THE BAPTIST prophesy? 8. Describe his preaching. 9. What does JOSEPHUS say about it? 10. What do we know of his ancestry? 11. What is baptism? (Meaning of the word.) 12.

What did JOHN declare to be essential for admission to the kingdom of heaven?

To the Teacher.

For "helps," read Bible for Learners, vol. iii. (ch. vii.), Renan's Life of Jesus (ch. vi.), Savage's Talks about Jesus, lecture on his "Public Life," Josephus (Antiq., xviii.), and J. H. Allen's Fragments of Christian History.

Explain "asceticism." (A good opportunity here for interesting conversation.) Talk about Baptism, its symbolism; the efficacy or non-efficacy of this and similar rites; the danger of placing emphasis on the form at the expense of sincerity and truthfulness. Is it not best to dispense with forms which possess for us no longer the meaning and importance which they hold in the minds of "Evangelical" believers?

FOREIGN.

THERE has been another outbreak of Roman Catholic fanaticism in Mexico against Protestants. On a Sunday appointed for the opening of a Protestant church at Salatitlan, near Guadalajara, a mob, headed by the curate, attacked the congregation and killed several persons. The curate generously offered to confess the dying and save their souls. The curate and his associates in the crime will probably be punished.

A BILL has been introduced in the States Assembly of Jersey by the provisions of which "it is forbidden to any Jesuit or member of the Congregation of Jesus to take up his residence on this island or establish any institution whatever under the title of school, seminary, college, community, or brotherhood, under pain of summary banishment from the island, together with all those aiding or assisting him." And it "is equally forbidden to the members of any other religious orders who are bound by monastic vows to establish any institution before mentioned without having first obtained the sanction of the States, on pain of a fine not exceeding £50 for each member of the said order who shall neglect or refuse to apply for such authorization."

CONSIDERABLE interest has been current during the past two days, in certain rumors to the effect that the Government had under consideration the question as to whether Mr. R. A. Proctor should be permitted to deliver on Sunday his promised lecture, entitled "A Sabbath Survey of the Vastness of God's Universe." To-day, Mr. Proctor received a communication from the Inspector-General of Police, stating that the delivery of the lecture would be disallowed. Mr. Proctor at once wrote to the Colonial Secretary, urging reasons against the course taken by the Government, and requesting a reconsideration of the decision. In reply, Sir Henry Parkes stated that the determination announced by Mr. Fosbery had been arrived at after due deliberation, and could not be rescinded. The reason assigned for the prohibition is that a charge was to be made for admission to the lecture.—Sydney (Australia) Bulletin.

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

Viewing the phenomena of nature as the only source of positive knowledge, and accepting the exact sciences as the basis of speculative science, the author claims to present a new system of philosophy. Cloth, 12mo, 784 pages. $1.50. Summary of the above, 35 cents, postage free. For sale at office of FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 570.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HE who lives pure in thought, free from malice, contented, leading a holy life, feeling tenderness for all creatures, speaking wisely and kindly, humble and sincere, has the Deity ever in his heart. The Eternal makes not his abode within the heart of that man who covets another's wealth, who injures living creatures, who speaks harshness or untruth, who is proud of his iniquity, whose mind is evil.—Hindu (ancient).

CONSIDER, you who are going to take your trial, what you wish to preserve, and in what to succeed. For, if you wish to preserve a will in harmony with nature, you are entirely safe; everything goes well; you have no trouble on your hands. While you wish to preserve that freedom which belongs to you, and are contented with that, for what have you longer to be anxious? For who is the master of things like these? Who can take them away? If you wish to be a man of modesty and fidelity, who shall prevent you? If you wish not to be restrained or compelled, who shall compel you to desires contrary to your principles, to aversions contrary to your opinion? The judge, perhaps, will pass a sentence against you, which he thinks formidable; but can he likewise make you receive it with shrinking? Since, then, desire and aversion are in your own power, for what have you to be anxious? Let this be your introduction, this your narration, this your proof, this your conclusion, this your victory, and this your applause. Thus said Socrates to one who put him in mind to prepare himself for his trial: "Do you not think that I have been preparing myself for this very thing, my whole life long?"—By what kind of preparation? "I have attended to my own work."—What mean you? "I have done nothing unjust, either in public or in private life."—Epictetus.

THAT we ought to do an action is of itself a sufficient and ultimate answer to the questions, Why we should do it? how are we obliged to do it? The conviction of duty implies the soundest reason, the strongest obligation, of which our nature is susceptible.—Whewell.

WHAT I must do is all that concerns me, and not what the people think. This rule, equally as arduous in actual and in intellectual life, may serve for the whole distinction between greatness and meanness. It is the harder, because you will always find those who think they know what is your duty better than you know it. It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after your own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.—R. W. Emerson.

THE simple precept, seek the truth, respect the truth, speak the truth, and live the truth, is one without which no character can be perfect; and it is one which will make a character for a man, though he never read a line of theology, never listened to a single sermon, never entered the portals of a church.—G. J. Holyoake.

FREEDOM to seek and find
All that our dreams designed,
Patience to wrest from time
Something of Truth sublime,
Or of Beauty that shall live,—
We beseech Thee, give!

CURRENT TOPICS.

THANKSGIVING DAY! A very good day to keep; but it is strong enough to stand alone without any Proclamation from President or Governor. The churches and the homes, especially the latter, will take care of it.

IT is announced that Hon. Andrew D. White, nominally President of Cornell University, but at present American minister to the German government, is writing a Life of Thomas Jefferson, which is to be one of a series of biographies of the founders of the American Republic to be published the coming year. Prof. Goldwin Smith is to write the Life of Washington for the same series.

MR. GEO. H. ELLIS is printing another series of Rev. M. J. Savage's sermons, in neat pamphlet form, all ready to bind together into a book by and by. The three that lie before us are entitled "Autumn Philosophy," "Stones of Stumbling," and "After Election"; and, from the glance we have cast into them, we are sure they are full of the strong good sense that habitually characterizes Mr. Savage's sermons. We note that Mr. Savage continues the habit of using Bible texts for his sermons. We wonder why. Will not he use the column that awaits him in the Index to tell us?

MR. G. S. HUBBELL writes us from Cincinnati, in defence of Colonel Ingersoll and the minority of the Liberal League, and protests against the action of the majority at the Chicago meeting in committing Liberalism to untenable ground with regard to the national postal laws. He takes the sound position that the general government, having been intrusted with the carrying of the mails, is bound to see that they are not used for a criminal traffic. The laws, as he justly thinks, may need amendment to prevent their abuse to purposes of religious persecution; but with equal justice he protests, in the interest of morality, against their repeal.

REV. DR. SCHAFF announces that "the American Bible Revision Committee have completed the revision of the English version of the New Testament, and transmitted the result of their labors to England. The British Committee will meet in November for final action; and the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge are expected to issue the revised New Testament in February, 1881. The Old Testament will be published two or three years after." It is also officially announced by the Revision Committee that "only those editions of the New Revision, including the marginal renderings, which are published or approved by the University Presses of England, will be recognized by us as the authorized editions."

THE agitation in Ireland seems no nearer a solution. The Gladstone Cabinet, it is clear, though claiming energetically that the laws are to be enforced and the peace preserved, shrinks from pushing matters to extremity. The strongest part of the Cabinet undoubtedly feels that the Irish peasantry are suffering wrongs that should be righted. But how to settle the land question in Ireland without touching the same question in England, and how to touch the land question in England without bringing on an issue which neither the Cabinet nor the Liberal party in England is yet ready to meet, is the perplexing problem. Gladstone's present administration has been no bed of roses, and from present appearances is not likely to be.

POPE LEO has addressed a letter to the former officials of the Pontifical States, repeating the old story of Pius IX.,—that, since the absorption of Rome into the kingdom of Italy, the Pope has been kept "a prisoner in the Vatican." It was hoped that Leo XIII. would be too liberal and too sensible to keep up this pious fiction of "imprisonment," when he knows that he is as free as any other man in Rome to go where he will. But the exigencies of administering a church of two hundred thousand souls, of whom he is recognized as the Infallible Head, will play strange pranks with both a pope's natural liberality and his common-sense. Pius IX. began as a liberal, and ended with fulminating vain bulls against everything liberal in the spirit and progress of the age.

PROF. ROBERTSON SMITH has again been brought to trial by the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, and this time defeated by a vote of two hundred and two in his favor to two hundred and seventy against. His punishment is suspension from his professorship for six months, which will give him time for fresh studies of the Bible, and the evolution of new heresies for future volumes of the Encyclopædia Britannica. The opinions for which he has been condemned are those expressed in the article on the Hebrew Language and Literature in the eleventh volume of the revised edition of the Britannica, the last volume published. In this article, he calls Eber, the alleged ancestral head of the Hebrews, "an ethnological or geographical abstraction"; says the Song of Solomon is a "lyric drama," and that the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are "singularly destitute of literary merit"; and he gets over the troublesome miracle of Jonah and the whale by pronouncing it "a parable." Such things to the old Orthodoxy of Scotland are very irreverent and horrible; and, with charming naïveté, his accusers affirm that a man who can say such things of books of the Bible cannot believe that God wrote the books, or at least will seem to others not so to believe. Professor Smith now protests against the decision on grounds involving the validity of the court, and perhaps will take his case to a legal tribunal, where ecclesiastical opinions and traditions may not have so much weight.

Discourse in West Church on Lydia Maria Child.

BY C. A. BARTOL, D.D.

"This woman was full of good works."—ACTS ix., 36.

There are human creatures who seem to be not so much individual persons as universal sympathies, incarnations of divine goodness, born to be humane. Existing oftener in the shape of women than of men, they are impellers rather than organizers of philanthropy,—as it were, the powder-part in the ammunition of every holy war. Their exceeding sensibility possibly takes at times, as in the case of her of whom I shall speak to-day, that nervously irritable or capricious form, which implies no malignity, but is only an enraged benevolence or a sort of cutaneous fever or fault. Mrs. Child had the defects of her qualities, and her defiant moods, which were virile virtues in a tender soul. From Mahomet to Garrison, history will show that the reformer has commonly been blessed with a sympathizer and help-meet in his female companion or wife. But in Lydia Maria Child we have an example wherein the feminine partner was leader in the sacred firm, stirring her excellent husband till he was kindled with an equal zeal of devotion to the welfare of his race. Some of us remember that good man, accomplished scholar, and acceptable preacher, Dr. Convers Francis, her brother, with ardor more than of kindred blood for every worthy cause of freedom and truth.

The religious motive of Mrs. Child appeared in her early care for the young, as editor of the Juvenile Miscellany, almost the first widely known and effective attempt among us to interest children in literature; and how well people, now gray in years, recall the joy with which, all over New England, they hailed the successive numbers of that periodical, whose bound volumes are doubtless on the shelves of many of their libraries, in what was the dawn and aurora of magazine intelligence in this country fifty years ago! It is her honor to have been instrumental in the new intellectual birth of the rising generation, especially when the nation itself was scarce more than a child.

Mrs. Child was also one of the first in the land not only to feel the wrong of negro slavery, but to propose and institute measures to remove that sin and curse. There was a stroke of genius, and an argument so conclusive as to make any others intrinsically superfluous and needless, in the title of her book published in Boston in 1833, An Appeal in Favor of that Class of Americans called Africans; for were they not all of them, after the foreign slave-trade had ceased, native Americans, however not included in that political party, but considered as apes, yet men age after age born on the soil, in dumb and dreadful mockery of the word American or America, whenever it was flourished in any debater's speech, lawyer's plea, senator's eloquence, historian's annals, or patriotic oration on the Fourth of July? On a fly-leaf of Mrs. Child's book is an engraving of a black man, with a cloth about his loins and over one shoulder, a bracelet on his right arm, one knee bent to the ground, the hands clasped, and eyes turned to heaven, a feathered cap and some tropical fruit at his feet, and, on the edge of the shore he was brought to, the lightnings of heaven flashing out of breaking clouds. How long it was ere, by the thunder-storm of war shaking all our borders, the rude print with its far-distant light and ominous, overhanging shade became true! In her preface, she says the "book will be abroad on its mission of humanity long after the hand that wrote it is mingling with the dust." But the author, though ill-treated for her book, lived to see its errand done, and the United States swarming with the promise of a new people having no memory of bondage or battle in their mind. Young men and maidens of twenty leave it all behind. Mrs. Child had a cordial bond with that Female Anti-slavery Society which, so long before the Woman's Rights movement, affirmed and used those rights, and had its meeting, at which she was not present, broken up by the mob that pursued Garrison, threw a rope around his body, and then over the carriage—to stop or overset it, if they could—in which the municipal power bore him for safe keeping to the Leverett Street jail.

But Mrs. Child befriended not only the unfortunate and injured: the sinful and criminal had her care. She came into connection thus with that trial of the pirates, now near half a century ago, which made perhaps the most thrilling dramatic scene in the recent history of Boston. Being then a divinity student in Cambridge, in order to get a lesson in human nature, I attended on the proceedings in court. David Lee Child, the husband of Lydia Maria, had been chosen by the accused, on account doubtless of his well-known sympathy, as well as his wife's, with their kind,—and not favoring capital punishment, if my impression at the time was correct. The throng, the heat, the wild rumor that ran to and fro; the people beating like billows at the door; the intense concern within; the fearful suspense of fate, as if a sword hung by a thread in the air; the sharp encounter of legal arguments, the occasion being too solemn for any stroke of wit to raise a smile; the judges intent with their authoritative rulings, grave and still as statues, in a bent posture and with ready pens on their bench; the final charge, an hour long, of the learned Chief Justice Story, father of our eminent sculptor; the final doom of some to the gallows,—how well, as I speak, I bear it all in mind! The vital part of the testimony bore of course on the identification of the indicted men; and one witness, in the passionate certainty of his recollection walked straight from the witness-box, and, laying his hand vigorously on the shoulder of one of the pirates, declared, This is one of those by whom our vessel was murderously assailed on the high seas. Whereupon, the man in question arose, and claimed the protection of the court. Mr. Child was earnest and faithful as an advocate; but he had the misfortune to find in the prosecuting attorney, Dunlap, an opponent of eloquence, if not acumen and ability, far superior to his own; and, after Mr. Child had been dwelling on the fact of frequent misrecollection in case of men accused of crime, and how easy and natural it was to confound the features of one man with those of another, with a considerable lapse of time, the attorney, who had a ringing voice, lively gesture, and dark, glittering eye, answered with oratorical vehemence to the bench by a Latin quotation, translated for the benefit of the jury: Hærent fixi in pectore vultus,—"In the bosom, faces cling, and are firmly fixed." Never was citation more apposite, or cogent and conclusive in its point. That line of poetry, all the way from Rome, in fact hung those at whom, by the persuasive and cogent counsellor and servant of the government, like a lasso it was launched. The audience had a vision of the gallows going up and of the noose already knotted, as he spoke; for it concentrated to decision, and seemed to articulate the sentence and judgment of court and jury, in a phrase. The feeling that issued all through the chamber was like a fire long smouldering, which from a lighted taper at last kindles and bursts into flame. The persons arraigned were most of them condemned, with diverse penalty suited to their diverse degrees of demonstrated guilt.

But, as an after-piece at the end and completion of this tragedy in several acts, Mrs. Child, who had vivaciously shared her husband's engagement in the case, went to Washington to implore a pardon from the President of the United States for those under ban of the law; and, encountering the chief magistrate, if I am rightly informed, without offering any very special introduction, she fell on her knees before him on the Capitol steps. The grim soldier—for it was he, General Jackson—who then presided or rather reigned in the White House, fancied that it was a crazy woman rather than an intelligent and responsible party that brought the petition, which, however,—no doubt, for reasons of the public protection,—he refused; and the last act, in the gloomy theatre which Boston had become, was without relenting performed. But, as one of the dramatis personæ, how true Mrs. Child was to that cradle-gift of humanity, which her hand and mouth throughout her life were open to bestow. It was her birth-mark to be generous and good. Not only was her charity as a spiritual grace boundless, but from her adequate means her charities flowed plenteously almost to a fault; and, whatever prejudice against any one she may have had, she was frank as daylight to confess.

But, if her heart was a fountain, her head was a sun, a globe of light and warmth; and her mind, not glowing with that divine spark of genius which puts thought into unchangeable and immortal form, was yet quick, versatile, many-sided, and amply stored, expressing itself always in a genial manner with a clear and flowing style. Editing the anti-slavery standard, she was as a journalist, a peer among the best. She wrote a score of interesting and instructive books, novels in their day widely read, such as Hobomok and Philothea and Romance of the Republic, also Biographies of Good Wives, among whom we must surely reckon her name; Aspirations of the World, two volumes of charming letters from New York, pamphlets and volumes from a prolific pen too numerous to mention here; and, in the ripeness of her faculties, a History of the Progress of Religious Ideas, which, if it have not the permanent value which comes only from studious and scholarly exploration of original sources, is at least an interesting collection of opinions in various ages and lands, shows how religion itself with its sensitive cord branches into all sympathetic forms, and was one of the first strokes among us for theological justice to the gods of every nation and the worship of all time. Yet she was a devotee of art, too, as well as piety. The music of Ole Bull charmed, enchanted, and lifted her into the highest stretch of enthusiasm; the Acropolis of Athens drew her as strongly as did the Mount of Olives, and the Greeks, with their graceful proportion in all things, won her love and favor more than did the Jehovah-adoring, impassioned, and fanatical Jews, whom she held to be one of the most narrow-minded of all the tribes and families of man. Mrs. Child was no sectarian or partisan, but humanitarian, cosmopolite, and lover as well as citizen of the whole world. Rarely has one so individual been so broad. She was a revelation in herself how much of that spirit, invisible, untraceable, and illimitable as the wind, can flow through woman and womanhood, to cleanse, renew, and inspire all in the sphere it may visit and possess.

Mrs. Child was, however, no more strongly characterized by kindly sentiment than by the moral sense. Lover of liberty, she was hater of license wearing its mask. One day, reading a novel and coming to a passage that implied the doctrine known as Free Love, she in wrath first tore the leaves, and then flung the shameful and thus by her disgraced book to the floor. Her religion was moral: it rested on an ethical basis, and had its blossom not in any insulting tolerance of others, but in justice to and communion with honest thinkers of every sect or of none. Toleration, to give or take, she put quite away. The last time I saw her, not many months ago, was at dinner in a company of good men, but mostly atheists, as I supposed. We were both there on that same platform of a common humanity, which permits no member of it to boast; for assumptions of superiority, on the ground of an opinion presumed as more acceptable to God, she could not endure. Yet she was no materialist herself, but spiritualist in the high sense, giving God-speed to Spiritualism in its candid investigations, abhorring aught in it of trick, and, while encouraging its explorations and convinced it was not all imposture, not subscribing its creed. She believed in and adored the Supreme One, would sometimes call him Father, and doubted not his righteousness, but professed no assurance, in the church sense, about the forms or details of a future life. She said some months before her decease, to Mr. Salter, the minister visiting her and who officiated at her funeral, "I think, but do not know, there is for us a future state." She wrote recently to a friend that the idea of not being gave her no horror, but that after her long and weary pilgrimage she longed for rest. Her book, published in 1866, entitled Looking toward Sunset, has two mottoes: one from Jean Paul Richter, that "the shadows of the setting sun lengthen, but all point toward the morning"; the other from Goethe: "I am fully convinced that the soul is indestructible, and that its activity will continue through eternity. It is like the sun, which to our eyes seems to set in night; but it has in reality only gone to diffuse its light elsewhere." In the preface to this same work, which is a collection of original and selected pieces, she writes: "When I was myself near the fairy-land of childhood, I used my pen for the pleasure of children; and, now that I am travelling down the hill I was then ascending, I would fain give some words of consolation and cheer to my companions on the way. If the rays of my morning have helped to germinate seeds that ripened into flowers and fruit, I am grateful to Him from whom all light and warmth proceed. And now I reverently ask his blessing on this attempt to imitate, in my humble way, the setting rays of that great luminary, which throws cheerful gleams into so many lonely old homes, which kindles golden fires on trees whose foliage is falling, and lights up the silvered heads, on which it rests, with a glory that reminds one of immortal crowns."

This passage I cite as at once an admirable illustration of her manner of writing and a record of her faith when she was over threescore years of age. I think the wonder of the world and all things in it grew on her as she advanced, and certainty for her was drowned in mystery. A dogmatist for or against any particular views of origin or destiny she could not be; nor did she complain because she could not be sure. She never rebelled against the divine decrees. She went at last out of her fleshly form and that present aspect of the creation, which is through our mortal senses made known, without fear, in perfect trust, even as, when she lay down every night, she entered the land of sleep and dreams. If I may use language once applied to another who had been an orthodox doctor of divinity, she set her "feet gently in the stream of Jordan, and reserved her triumphs till she should tread the farther shore." She was agnostic, not in the technical sense of any positive or aggressive school, as to no denomination did she belong, but simply in not pretending to know the coming event. She was not an intelligence inspired, inflamed or rapt into the third heaven, like some old patriarch, psalmist, prophet, apostle, or great redeemer of his age or race. She had no celestial visions or transcendent experience, but was a faithful steward of her talents, and bore true witness to all that came within her earthly sight. I should go to her less as a leader of my thought than as an example for my life. What a pattern for her own or the other sex she was! In 1865, she printed what she called the Freedmen's Book, rewriting all the biographies of which it consisted, refusing compensation and proposing to invest entirely the proceeds in other volumes, to be distributed throughout the land; or any residue of money given to the "Freedmen's Aid Association" for schools. My text is about Dorcas and the weeping widows showing the coats and garments which she while living had made. What a collection, finer than any needle-work, could there be of substantial deeds of mercy by Mrs. Child, the last of them that in which one's character is so well shown, her Will, containing bequests to the Hampton Agricultural College, "never to be used for any species of theological teaching"; "for the elevation of the character of women, and enlargement of their sphere of action"; to the Free Religious Association, as "trying to melt away sectarian barriers"; to the "Home for Old Colored Women"; to "the town library of Wayland," where she resided; "for the education of destitute Protestant children"; to "the Consumptives' Home"; to "the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals"; and to "the Homœopathic Hospital in Boston"! In an article of her own, she cites, concerning another then past her sixtieth year, the words, "Her Dorcas labors would form an amazing pile." Of the benefits of such a life as her own, who shall reckon the sum? Thinking of herself alone, the idea was not dreadful of death as an eternal repose, nor might it be to any one of us; but it is unwelcome as we think of a friend or noble person like her. It might be unwelcome to some one thinking affectionately of you or me.

God gives us "one world at a time," and it needs improving. With or without, before or after any man's or woman's rights movement, there is room for a resolute person to act; and this woman stirred the community more and better than if she could have cast ten thousand of those votes in whose base or ignorant multitude we should be swamped and ruined, but that their balance is redressed by some knowledge and rectitude of the people, in their true representatives, at their best, and by a providential defence. As our feet are steadied by the gravity, not of the earth alone, but of the solar system, and as that derives from the weight of all the stars, so something beyond considerations of terrestrial utility is necessary to our moral support. How still lie together the ashes of those who strove and differed in their mortal life! They have made up. They work, let us trust, in unison of love and peace. It is not worth while to quarrel. But for a little time shall we meet here. Let us do the great and good will, like the angels of God elsewhere.

So she felt, devoted to her task, yet ever owning the other side or dual nature of man, declaring she did not care for or covet that continued existence to which, nevertheless, with curiosity and desire and belief, she returned. She was not peculiar in this alternating or wavering state of mind. Does not our own faith wax and wane, darken and brighten, as our vital conditions change? The celestial light hangs within us in our upper thought, but is observed or unheeded, according as we cherish solemn musings or pursue outward earthly aims; as the lamp, burning in the roof of the car, which is invisible while the train glides through the sunlit, winsome landscape, illuminates the whole interior of the long and moving house at the mouth of some dark and dismal tunnel. At some of our passages through the world, we cannot proceed or get along without the high immortal light.

Mrs. Child will be remembered among those non-resistants, whose righteous claims, with other causes, here below, step by step, led to that bloody atonement of civil war, in which one soldier, in hospital or prison or battle, died for every eighth emancipated slave.

LUCRETIA MOTT.

[From the Boston Sunday Herald, Nov. 14.]

Our most famous American woman lies dead in her home near Philadelphia, and will be laid away to-day in her last resting-place beside her husband, whose death preceded her own by some dozen years. The funeral services are announced to be strictly private, and of the simplest character. In her eighty-eighth year, Lucretia Mott has passed away. She lived through all which has made the United States a nation; and, whether in public or in private life, her career was influential and unique. Rarely have so many different qualities gone to the making of a woman. She had great personal beauty. Her brow and eye were magnificent. Her conversation had great playfulness, amounting to wit. She was brilliant and logical at the same time. There was a rare simplicity in her manner. She never assumed anything. She had a patient earnestness, what the French call unction, which made every one listen to her. She never grew old, never became stiff in her opinions, was a child, in the finest qualities of freedom and elasticity of mind, as much in her eighty-eighth year as she was sixty years before. She had great command of pathos as a speaker. She also had the rare tact of knowing just what to say, and to whom to say it. She had a playful way of tapping a speaker in a public meeting as a horseman touches his horse with the tip-end of his whip. Once Mr. Wendell Phillips says that she tried this experiment on him, when, in 1870, at an anti-slavery meeting in Worcester, he had ventured to say that one of the drawbacks of the movement was the indifference and contentment of the women themselves. Other speakers touched upon other points where Lucretia Mott differed from them. She arose, and touched them all around with her gentle raillery, offending no one, just pronounced enough in her speech to be effective, in no way compromising herself. She had the look of command. It is said of her, as it was of Channing, both being diminutive in size, that she made you think she was larger than she actually was. She never weighed ninety pounds in her life. In her last years, she weighed less than eighty; but the amount of force, will, and intelligent power in her small body was enough to direct the universe.

The question arises, Whence came Lucretia Mott to be the woman she was? Was she an exceptional person, or did she grow out of a rare and powerful ancestry? It is not said that her father, who died in his fortieth year, was more than an honest, upright, seafaring, God-fearing Quaker of Nantucket, where she was born in 1793; but her mother belonged to the remarkable race of the Folgers, a race as distinguished for its blood as that which has descended from Jonathan Edwards, and is traced in Dr. Timothy Dwight, the President of Yale College, in Pierrepont Edwards, the famous and dissipated lawyer of Connecticut, and in the still more famous Aaron Burr.

The Folger blood culminated in Benjamin Franklin, who carried a kingdom in his head; but it is traced quite as distinctly in Lucretia Mott, and was almost equally manifest in the late Mrs. John Milton Earle, of Worcester, who greatly resembled Lucretia in personal appearance and intellectual ability. Lucretia's mother, Anna Coffin, had great ability. When Capt. Coffin, who was descended from the stock of the English Admiral Coffin, was away on long voyages, Mrs. Coffin, who kept a store, used to visit Boston to exchange oil and candles, the staple products of the island, for fresh supplies of groceries and other goods. In an unlucky hour, her husband indorsed for a friend, and was compelled to exchange his property for his honor. It was a blow from which he could not recover. The family removed to Boston in 1804, where much of the support of the family devolved upon the mother, who had remarkable energy and tact. "Here," said Lucretia, "in the public and private schools of that city, I mingled with all classes without distinction." Both father and mother had a high ambition for their children, eight in number, Lucretia being the second, and did all they could for their education. In her fourteenth year, Lucretia and a younger sister were sent to a Friends' "boarding-school" in Dutchess County, N.Y.; and there, pursuing her studies with patient zeal, she remained two years, without once going home for holiday or vacation. At fifteen, a teacher having left, she was made an assistant, and at the end of the second year was tendered the place of teacher, with the inducement beside that her services would entitle a younger sister to her education.

Her parents gave the necessary consent to this arrangement; and Lucretia remained here until 1809, when she joined her family in Philadelphia, to which city they had just removed. Her story is now best told in her own words: "At the age of eighteen, I married James Mott, of New York,—an attachment formed while at the boarding-school. He came to Philadelphia, and entered into business with my father. The fluctuations in the commercial world for several years following our marriage, owing to the embargo, the war of 1812, the death of my father, and the support of a family of five children devolving on my mother, surrounded us with difficulties. We resorted to various modes of obtaining a comfortable living,—at one time engaged in the retail dry-goods business, then resumed the charge of a school, and for another year was engaged in teaching. These trials in early life," she adds, "were not without their good effect in disciplining the mind, and leading it to set a just estimate on the world's pleasures. I, however, always loved the good, in childhood desired to do right, and had no faith in the generally received idea of human depravity." James Mott was himself a Quaker, but in all personal qualities the very opposite of his wife. He was at first a teacher. Later on, he engaged in the cotton business, but abandoned it when it was becoming remunerative, because of its connection with slave-labor. It was at this time that Lucretia, who then had four young children, opened a school, and maintained the family until her husband found employment. He finally took up the wool business, and was able to retire with a competence some years before his death. He and Lucretia were as truly one and inseparable as Damon and Pythias, in Grecian story. Their home was remarkable for the strength and beauty of their united lives. He had the cool judgment, she the enkindling enthusiasm; he had the slow, clear brain, she the quick, impulsive movement; he liked nothing so much as silence, she nothing so much as talking. The one was completely the complement of the other. Their opinions, their convictions, every act of their lives, met with mutual approval; and from their marriage, in 1811, up to 1868, when James Mott died, nothing came between these loyal hearts.

Lucretia Mott's public career began early. In 1818, she began to preach in the Friends' meetings, and must have been in those days singularly attractive in voice, person, and manner. She was easily first in her mother's family, but won her position without assuming it. The brothers and sisters all deferred to her. When Mary liked to put on a ribbon or two and be a little gay, it only required a look from Lucretia, who was very strict in early life, to send her bouncing back to her chamber, where the ribbons disappeared. She ruled her home as she ruled on the platform, through the unconscious influence of a great mind over a little one. Yet she was always modest, presumed nothing, and had none of the personal airs of leadership or influence. She became less rigid in adherence to Quaker principles as life advanced, and even went so far as to tolerate a piano in her own home. In her early preaching days, she used to travel through Pennsylvania, and also through New England, Maryland, and a part of Virginia, advocating the tenets of the Friends, and opposing generally the evils of intemperance and slavery. "My sympathy was early enlisted for the poor slave," she says in a letter to Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, "by the class books read in our schools, and the pictures of the slave-ship as published by Clarkson." The ministry of Elias Hicks and others, on the subject of the unrequited labor of slaves, and their example in refusing the products of slave-labor, all had their effect in awakening a strong belief in their behalf. The unequal condition of woman in society early impressed my mind. Learning, while at school, that the charge for the education of girls was the same as that for boys, and that, when they became teachers, women received about half as much as men for their services, the injustice of this was so apparent that I early resolved to claim for my sex all that an impartial Creator had bestowed. At twenty-five years of age, surrounded by a little family and many cares, I felt called to a more public life of devotion to duty, and engaged in the ministry of our society, receiving every encouragement from those in authority, until a separation from us in 1827, when my convictions led me to adhere to the sufficiency of the light within us, resting on truth as authority rather than 'taking authority for truth.'" In becoming a Hicksite Quaker, she affiliated herself with the Unitarian movement, the Hicksites being called the "Unitarian Quakers." She liked the larger freedom she thus gained. She adds: "The popular doctrine of human depravity never commended itself to my reason or conscience. I 'searched the Scriptures' daily, finding a construction of the text wholly different from that which was pressed on our acceptance. The highest evidence of a sound faith being the practical life of the Christian, I have felt a far greater interest in the moral movements of our age than in any theological discussion." Her spiritual life was deep and earnest, but entirely her own. It was intuitional. It was connected with no rites or ceremonies, and was best expressed in her daily habitual communion with God. An anecdote is told by Colonel Forney, which illustrates her spirit: "When her family moved into the home where she lived to the end, the rich though good man of the neighborhood objected to her manner of procedure on Sunday,—for Lucretia Mott worshipped on all days, not Sundays exclusively,—and so expressed himself to her friends. He admitted, however, that she was a good woman, and did much good, yet with a sigh said, "What will become of her soul?" Lucretia Mott replied to Colonel Forney when he asked her, a few years since, what her present convictions were: "Put me down as heretic of the heretics, radical of the radicals, and, although I am not an infidel, I am also not an orthodox, and would as lief be thought one as the other." Her leniency toward other forms of belief may also be inferred from the fact that, while very firm in her own religious views, she could say that "we are all ignorant, and should not presume to teach any one the eternal source of good." The writer once had the loan of her copy of The Life of Rev. Joseph Blanco White, an excessively rare book, which for years had been one of the companions of her closet. It was thoroughly worn, and the magazine abounded in her notes and marks of approval. She always had by her a copy of Channing's works. She was also fond of Buckle's History of Civilization, and of his miscellaneous writings.

Though the nurse of her own children and doing her own sewing, she spent the time often employed by others in ornamenting their clothing in reading some important book, and was always growing in mental power. These habits of early womanhood came out strong in her latest years. Recalling the poetry she had committed to memory in her youth was her favorite pastime during the last summer, and she would sit "in the cool of the evening," reciting in her sweet voice, the liquid charm of which age had not destroyed, page after page from some favorite, Cowper's Task, and other poems. The Scriptures she referred to continually; and her religious warmth, marked by her devotion to what she regarded as the great principle of religion, the illumination by inward divine light, was always characteristically manifested.

It was about 1830 that William Lloyd Garrison was in Baltimore with a Quaker, Benjamin Lundy, whose paper, "The Genius of Universal Emancipation," advocated slow and gentle steps to this end, while Garrison was for exterminating slavery, root and branch, as quickly as possible. It is believed that she first met Mr. Garrison, to whom she was ever after as an elder sister, on his return from Baltimore at this time; but their first joint action took place at the organization of the American Anti-Slavery Society at Philadelphia, Dec. 3, 1833. Here, the little woman had a great deal to say, and interpolated the phrase "according to Scripture" into the famous declaration of principles then adopted, where the word "man-stealer" is used, which Scriptural reference Mr. Garrison disliked, though it was adopted by a majority vote, because he wished to vest the rights of man purely and entirely upon the basis of reason. This society took the ground of immediate, not gradual, emancipation, and impressed the duty of unconditional liberty without expatriation. In 1834, the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society was formed, Lucretia Mott becoming one of its chief managers, and her home being henceforth one of the chief asylums for fugitive slaves in the Middle States. Concerning her connection with it, she has said, "I have travelled thousands of miles in this country, holding meetings in some of the slave States (as Delaware and Maryland), have been in the midst of mobs and violence, and have shared abundantly in the odium attached to the name of an uncompromising modern abolitionist." Mr. Wendell Phillips is authority for the fact that, at one place where she was speaking, the mob had such control that they compelled the man who accompanied her to ride out of town on a rail, though no violence was offered to her. She did not, however, think it wise to stay in that town over night. From 1834 onward to Lincoln's proclamation of freedom, she was one of the hardest-working abolitionists in the land; and even Mr. Garrison was scarcely more abused. Lucretia had to face great opposition among her own people, the Friends. For thirty years there was a large portion of the society which would have gladly seen her quit its membership. Some, indeed, would gladly have disowned her, but she knew her rights; and, though never suspending her ministry or her attendance at meeting, the opponents of her anti-slavery work could never catch her in the wrong.

When the World's Anti-Slavery Convention was called to assemble in London, in 1840, the Pennsylvania society sent over among its delegates Lucretia Mott, Mary Grew, Abby Kimber, Elizabeth Neall, and Sarah Pugh, the Massachusetts society sending Emily Winslow, Abby Southwick, and Anne Greene Phillips, the last-named being the just-married wife of Wendell Phillips. The convention, however, adhering to English ideas, refused to admit women, after a hot debate, in which Daniel O'Connell, Dr. Bowring, George Thompson, and Wendell Phillips earnestly advocated their cause; and they consequently took no part in its proceedings. William Lloyd Garrison was so indignant that he withdrew from the convention and remained only as a spectator. It was here that Mrs. Stanton first met her. Seated by her side at a dinner-table, says Mrs. Stanton, though a bride with my husband by my side, "I was soon oblivious to everything but the lovely Quakeress. . . . She was the first liberal-minded woman I had ever met, and nothing in all Europe interested me as she did." It is believed that disappointment at her exclusion from the London convention, though many courtesies were shown to her, decided her tendency toward the assertion of the equality of the sexes. Sectarianism in England in 1840 was about ten times greater than it was here at the same date. A Unitarian in London was as much tabooed as an abolitionist was here. It was customary in those days not to gather people for dinners, but to have teas. It was at these teas that the English and American reformers used to meet for conference. But religious prejudice crept in even here. At the house of Samuel Gurney, where the famous Elizabeth Fry did the honors of the head of the household, the antipathy of the Orthodox to the Unitarian Quakers was such that Elizabeth would have nothing to do with Lucretia. If Lucretia sat down at the table, Elizabeth would flee to the garden, or, if Lucretia happened to be in the garden, Elizabeth would escape to the house. Scarcely less was the prejudice shown by Josiah Foster, the Quaker pope of the period in England, at one of their teas. Different persons were called on to speak. When one would call out for a word from an American Friend, Lucretia would rise to respond, when Josiah, gathering up the skirts of his coat, would half-rise and say, "Yes, a Friend, but not one of the Friends," and down he would sit. Then Lucretia, with that quiet, serene, unchanged tone, would respond, "Not a Friend in thy opinion, Friend Josiah, but still a Friend." Foster would not allow that the Hicksites were Friends; and this process of putting Lucretia down would be repeated, perhaps, a dozen times, always with the same result. But in other quarters Lucretia was received with distinguished honor. The Duchess of Sutherland was her devoted friend, and Lucretia was never more truly herself than when in her ladyship's society. The duchess was so fond of her that she employed Benjamin R. Haydon, who took the heads of all the members of the anti-slavery convention, to paint the heads of Garrison and Lucretia upon the same piece of canvas. The picture may still be seen in the Sutherland collection. Lady Byron and her daughter, Lady Lovelace, were also deeply interested in her.

This was her only visit to England. While walking in the streets of London one day during this visit, Lucretia and Elizabeth Stanton resolved on a woman's convention as soon as they returned to America, which was finally held in 1848 at Seneca Falls, where Mrs. Stanton then lived. James Mott presided at this first "woman's rights' convention," which continued through two days, was well attended and extensively reported. It was held in the very height of the excitement connected with the reform era in New England; and its declarations in regard to suffrage, property, work and wages, though now generally accepted, convulsed the nation with laughter.

Her efforts to give women a better standing upon the basis of human rights were outmatched, if possible, by her practical interest in the rescuing of fugitive slaves after the famous Dred Scott decision of 1856. In 1853 came the celebrated Dangerfield case in Philadelphia, almost the only instance in which a fugitive slave was discharged from custody, a case in which Lucretia was intensely interested. During the slave times, every fugitive slave captured in Philadelphia or the neighborhood found in her a friend in procuring counsel and in giving personal sympathy and advice. The Dangerfield case is a good sample of many others and similar cases. The trial was conducted before Commissioner Longstretts, who took advantage of a flaw in the indictment and released the victim. The excitement was so great that Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth P. Peabody, J. Miller McKim, and several others, sat up for two nights with the fugitive, to see that he was not dragged away by the mob. During the trial, Lucretia would frequently go and sit by the prisoner's side to comfort him. The prosecution would frequently change the prisoner's position, but as often as it was done she would again go and sit by him. It was so manifestly her will that this man should be rescued that she inspired the court with her purpose, and he was discharged from custody. The charge made at the time was that the man was a thief. George H. Earle, Edward Hopper (a son-in-law of Mrs. Mott), and William S. Pierce, now one of the judges of the common pleas, defended Dangerfield, and by their efforts procured his discharge. It was a remarkable case, and drew an immense crowd to the court-house. People gathered in the streets, threatened to carry the legally acquitted man to Maryland; but Lucretia Mott was still his friend, as the sequel showed. Foreseeing trouble, the counsel procured another negro resembling Dangerfield, and led him out and placed him in a carriage, which was rapidly driven off. This put the angry crowd on a false scent; and Dangerfield was hurried off to Harrisburg and taken before the Legislature, then in session, and by the underground railroad was afterward safely conveyed to Canada. It was after an all-night's session, at six or seven o'clock in the morning, that the prisoner was acquitted.

She was in no sense a writer, but her addresses in the Friends' meeting and elsewhere had immense influence. She had such a sweet way of speaking that she disarmed opposition. She was deeply interested in temperance movements, in the amelioration of the laboring classes, in the assertion of religious freedom, not less than in woman's suffrage and anti-slavery work; in fact, there was nothing pertaining to humanity in which she did not have a hand. Robert Collyer was a horny-handed blacksmith in her neighborhood, when she first knew him,—fond of debate and taking sides against the reforms in which she was interested. She quietly won him over to her own side; and Robert saw things with new eyes, and handed over his anvil to another party. She had a hand in the making of Anna E. Dickinson; but her best work was the standing side by side with William Lloyd Garrison through thick and thin, when it cost something to be an abolitionist. Her domestic life was something unique. It was a merry and happy home she lived in, full of sunshine and joy. She had great frugality. The table always contained enough, but there was never too much. No housekeeper was ever more prudent, more saving, more careful. She carried this to excess. If friends gave her new clothing, she would save it to give away, and go on wearing the old garments. If the family supplied her ever so well with writing paper, still she would write her letters on the inside of old envelopes, on bits of paper, on cancelled notes, as Bishop Eastburn and Alexander Pope are said to have done. She was saving of odds and ends to a fault, and generous to a fault also, in the quietest of ways and where money was needed. It was hard work to make her wear anything that was whole. Her special passion was making of rag carpets, in which no one excelled her. They were fastened with "ravellings," because she would not use so expensive material as thread; but no seams, no signs of piecing, were to be traced, when her beautiful handiwork was completed. Her precept was, "Waste nothing"; and she held to it with great tenacity. She was always knitting or sewing, when not otherwise engaged. This busy woman, however, was a confirmed dyspeptic for over forty years, and hardly ever knew what it was to be free from pain arising from this source. Her children tried to make her promise that she would not speak in public, and she consented to stop when she reached her sixtieth year. But the fact was that public speaking was one of her keenest enjoyments, and was not given up down to the last year of her life. She was always busy, always had a sunny smile, knew nothing of temper, and, alike in her public career and in her home, made the sun shine, in whatever quarter she moved, at once the most eloquent of women on the platform and the best of housekeepers at home. One of her noble sisters in reform has finely said of her: "Birth made Victoria a queen; but her own pure, sweet life made Lucretia Mott a queen,—queen of a realm on which the sun never sets, the realm of humanity. If ever any woman 'inherited the earth,' it was this blessed Quaker woman."

FUNERAL OF LUCRETIA MOTT.

The remains of the venerable Lucretia Mott were yesterday afternoon interred in Fairhill Cemetery, on Germantown Avenue, near Cambria Street. Notice having been given that it was the wish of the deceased that the funeral should be private, there were only a few friends from other cities present at the house or grave. As is the custom with members of the Society of Friends, the services were of the simplest character. The coffin was perfectly plain, without any ornamentation. Previous to removal to Fairhill, the body lay at the old homestead of the deceased, on the York road, near Oaklane station, on the North Pennsylvania Railroad.

Here were assembled the relatives and a number of friends of Mrs. Mott. Among the latter were Rev. Dr. W. H. Furness, Rev. C. G. Ames, William Lloyd Garrison, Jr., of Boston, Thomas Hicks, Amos R. Little, Edward T. Steel, Enoch Lewis, Henry Bently, Jay Cooke, Robert Shoemaker, James A. Wright, Dr. John B. Griscom, R. B. Westbrook, Anna Lee Merritt, Mrs. Sarah McKimm, and David Newport. The only ceremonies were addresses by Rev. Dr. Furness, Rev. Mr. Ames, Mrs. Deborah F. Wharton, Mr. Westbrook, Mr. Newport, Mrs. Gaskell, and Alfred H. Love. The pall-bearers were Edward Harper and Henry C. Davis, of this city, Richard P. Hallowell, of Boston, and Thos. C. Parrish, of Colorado Springs, all relatives of Lucretia Mott. The body was placed beside that of the husband of the deceased, and Dr. Henry T. Child made a few remarks over the grave.

Fairhill is a small spot of ground used for many years as a burial-place by the Society of Friends, to whom it was given for the erection of a meeting-house by George Fox. The old meeting-house is stlil standing.—Philadelphia Ledger, Nov. 15.

"INSINCERITY IN THE UNITARIAN PULPIT."

Editor of the Free Religious Index:—

Apropos to the article of "Credens" upon the above title in your last issue, I wish to relate the following: Not long since, a distinguished Unitarian minister preached in a certain small town. Of those who assembled to hear him, more than half were Orthodox people. The sermon was upon Christianity. After speaking very sympathetically of Catholicism and Orthodoxy, the preacher went on to speak of Unitarian Christianity, which he claimed to be his own faith. He set forth, as the central ideas of Unitarian Christianity, the personal God and the Christ. He seemed to think, however, that everything from the religious point of view depended upon the acceptance of the latter. When men lost "the Christ," it was argued that they lost the personal God, personal immortality, and gradually drifted into spiritual darkness; and, finally, their tendency was toward immorality. Rationalism was spoken of with much less favor than either Catholicism or Orthodoxy. The two latter were never more alive, it was said, than now, and they were both destined to live; while Rationalism was self-destructive and of short duration. Unitarian Christianity, however, was the faith that was to finally conquer the world. The preacher was a Unitarian of the Unitarians; yet the sermon, the prayer, and the benediction were so much in the spirit and phraseology of Orthodoxy that, but for the distinct statement of the preacher to the contrary, one would think he belonged to that faith,—to the more liberal wing of it, perhaps. The Orthodox people were of course delighted. They had heard what seemed to them a good Orthodox sermon. Several of them being asked if they thought the preacher regarded Jesus as a human being, like Buddha or Socrates, "Why, no, indeed!" was the general reply.

Now, I wish to say that either the Orthodox people were right, or the sermon, from beginning to end, substantiated, in one case at least, the criticism of insincerity in the Unitarian pulpit. I am inclined to think, however, that the preacher and many other Unitarian ministers believe that Jesus was something more than a human being. If they do not regard him as such, the language they use in the pulpit makes them utterly unworthy of their position; for it is misleading, unscientific, and insincere, and deserves to be righteously condemned. My observations have led me to think that it is the radical wing of the Unitarians who use Christian phraseology in an entirely misleading way. They adopt the language of the conservative wing, while they differ very widely from them in thought. FRANCIS.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

The editor of the weekly Vineland Independent reviews the communication "The Lord's Prayer Answered," as follows:—

A writer in the Free Religious Index attempts to improve upon the phraseology as well as the spirit of the Lord's Prayer, and demonstrates most clearly that the iconoclastic pen is quite as destructive of human reverence and tru-tfulness as the iconoclastic hammer is of public virtue and social stability. We do not think that this prayer, the sublimest utterance of human faith ever uttered by mortal man, needs any additions or subtractions to increase its helpfulness or make it better adapted to human needs and individual aspiration. If the Lord's Prayer could enter the heart of every child, and remain there in spirit, unaltered and unchanged, all through his subsequent career, much of the cynicism and sourness of human life would cease to be manifested. Nothing is so much needed in our time of fretfulness and in this nation of fault-finders as some such hallowing influence as will make us accept the Providences of every-day occurrence as above our control, and incapable of change by our frantic criticism of their happening. The man who allows his trust and the sweetness of his temper to be cut down with the early frost that kills his potato-vines needs nothing so much as the real Lord's Prayer, made manifest in his walk and conversation. We are not unmindful of the fact that progress is a great thing, and religious progress as valuable as any; but the codes of ethics which have governed the lives of the world's saints have become axiomatic, and need no farther alterations, and that common expression of Christendom, embodied in the prayer of Jesus, inasmuch as it has been the inspiration and the article of faith and devotion of the world's best workers, needs not to be remodelled by any religious reformatory journeyman. That which the Master made in perfectness ought not to be transformed by any of his apprentices.

Will our reviewer have kindness and fairness enough to publish the article "The Lord's Prayer Answered" in his paper, and give his readers a chance to decide how correctly and impartially he has criticised the same, and what a destructive iconoclast I am? With all due deference for your sincere faith, my brother in humanity, I assure you that I had not the least intention to destroy your nor any other idol. But, with the development of our reason, our childish beliefs must change; and we can follow no "Master" or find perfection in his prayer, wherein he asks an all-wise, all-mighty, all-just Father, "Lead us not into temptation," etc.

Liberals and Free Religionists have certainly sufficiently demonstrated that they have more rational human reverence, public virtue, and trustfulness than very many of those who assume to have all religion in hire, and they rather live and act than to babble a prayer. But, if they give thanks to the Creator, they do it in accordance with the reason and spirit of the nineteenth century. C. H. H.

DOVER, N.H., Nov. 7, 1880.

DR. EDWARD SEGUIN, the eminent physician, who died in New York, October 27, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, is thus referred to in the last number of the Scientific American: "Probably no man ever did so much to put the work of elementary education upon a reasonable and thoroughly scientific basis. This, however, without directly attacking the traditional methods of teaching. Dr. Seguin was educated at the colleges of Auxerre and St. Louis, Paris, and early turned his attention to the education of idiots by physiological training. He established in 1838 the first school for this sort of work, achieving, by his marvellous skill and patience, results which won him a place in the front rank of the world's benefactors. His school became a model, after which seventy-five similar institutions have organized in various countries. The French Revolution of 1848 obliged Dr. Seguin to take refuge in this country, where he spent the next ten years, practising medicine in Ohio. Subsequently, he revisited France, and then returned to this city. Among his more important works are: Hygiène et Education des Idiots (1843); Images Graduées à l'Usage des Enfants Arrières et Idiots; Traitement Moral, Hygiène, et Education des Idiots et des autres Enfants Arrières (1846); J. R. Pereire, Premier Instituteur des Sourds et Muets en France (1847); Historical Notice of the Origin and Progress of the Treatment of Idiots, translated by Dr. J. S. Newberry (1852); Idiocy and its Treatment by the Physiological Method (1866); New Facts and Remarks concerning Idiocy (1870); Medical Thermometry (1871); Prescription and Clinic Records (1865–77); Mathematical Tables of Vital Signs (1865–77); Thermomètres Physiologiques, Manual of Thermometry for Mothers, Nurses, Teachers, etc. (1873); Official Report on Education at the Vienna Exhibition of 1873, published in 1875. Among his later essays, 'The Physiological Training of the Idiot Hand' is perhaps the most valuable."

POETRY.

FROM KARL HEINZEN.

TRANSLATED BY MRS. E. D. CHENEY.

[From a poem to Luise.]

Why should we look through the dark veil?
The wish of man is his faith and his dream.
But who will build the world-laws on his wishes?
We fall off, as the flowers from the trees.

The flower comes back in the new spring.
Is it the same that fluttered from the tree?
In eternal circles and through wider range
Renews itself the All from that which passed away.

The flower whose breath delights thee here
Blooms, when it dies, perhaps in Kongo's Valley:
The soul which leaves us here awakes perhaps, refreshed,
Unrecognizable, under the distant sunbeams.

In the world's course, unmarked, the thread is spun
On which a tiny human fate is hung.
The lion pauses not upon his way,
Because a crawling worm across his path has gone.

[From the Frühlings Stimmung.]

My spirit is not weighed down by idle wishes,
My heart is not by idle anguish torn,
And no power has bowed my will.
Freedom it was that winged for me the spirit,
And Truth that kept my heart forever young,
And Nature fed me in her stillness.

Not in weak artifice and flatteries,
In jugglings and in secrecies,
Held I the truth as contraband.
The torch of thought have I kept wholly kindled,
The aim of Willing have I wholly shown,
And nothing human ever held as shame.

Who, conscious, trusts the Spirit's onward course,
And throws down that men's fear alone built up,—
The unworthy barriers of the active mind,—
Impossible for him is weak unrest.
He only like the Olympic gods becomes,
Who stands, like thought, forever fresh and young.

And so, perchance, the all-devouring sea
Has thee engulfed,
Dissolved thou runnest in its flood.
Thy spirit's lovely song has died away,
The fire of thy glowing heart is burned out.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 25, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

THE CHICAGO CONFERENCE ON STATE SECULARIZATION.

As our readers are aware, the minority, who followed Colonel R. G. Ingersoll's lead and withdrew from the National Liberal League at its meeting in Chicago in September, took counsel together after their withdrawal, and resolved on calling a Conference forthwith with reference to forming another organization. The public call for this Conference, signed by a long list of names in various parts of the country, with Colonel Ingersoll at the head, was printed in our columns, October 28; and on Monday, November 15, the Conference was held in the Grand Pacific Hotel, Chicago. The meeting was literally for conference, deliberation, comparing of views, formation of a new organization, if that should seem best, and settlement of the policy by which it should be conducted.

We have received Chicago papers containing quite complete accounts of the meeting. From these, we learn that there were about fifty regular delegates present, and that they came from eleven States, the extremes being Massachusetts and Texas. Colonel Ingersoll does not appear to have been among them, though we suppose what was done has his approval. Among the most prominent speakers were Mr. Van Buren Denslow of Chicago, Mr. R. C. Spencer and Rev. G. E. Gordon of Milwaukee, Mr. B. F. Underwood of Massachusetts, Mr. H. L. Green of New York, and Mr. Reuben Daly of Jeffersonville, Ind. The meeting was quiet, orderly, and dignified, the only excitement that appears in the reports arising from Mr. Daly's difficulty in keeping to the new rôle of not attacking the churches, though he seems to have sincerely tried to do so; for a prominent feature of the proposed policy of the new organization, on which the Conference was very nearly unanimous, is that it is to confine itself so strictly to the one object of separating all relics of ecclesiastical authority and usage from the State as to invite and hope for the co-operation of even Orthodox people who believe in this object. And Mr. Daly, though he was looking for something more exclusively "Liberal," and feared the organization was going to be too timid for effective work, declared finally that he should work with it rather than with the old League, which had gone off the track into ways abhorrent to his conscience. According to the reports, no other opposition to the proposed plan of action appeared. The gist of the plan is shown in the following resolutions which were adopted:—

Resolved, That this meeting favors the complete secularization of the State.

Resolved, That while much organized work may be necessary to this object, and the elements which may be brought to co-operate in such work are so diverse and widely diffused, and many of them of such divergent religious and political views, we deem it important at present to form such a provisional organization for correspondence and initiatory work as shall lead to the ultimate crystallization and union of all these elements in the most effective manner. To this end, we therefore recommend the appointment by the meeting of a Committee on Correspondence, a Committee on National Address, and a Committee on Finance.

This plan can hardly be objected to except by those who want a more aggressive and warlike campaign. We confess that we have ourselves had a hope, if a new organization there was to be, that it would be of a nature more calculated to draw Liberals away from the old Liberal League, so as, if possible, to break up that now demoralized organization. But much good and effective work may be done under the plan proposed, if it is only undertaken with zeal and energy. All will depend on the activity of the Committees. These were appointed as follows: On correspondence and an address to the American people, B. F. Underwood, R. C. Spencer, and Van Buren Denslow; on finances, Robert G. Ingersoll, Washington; John C. Bundy, Chicago; Lucien Prince, Worcester, Mass.; Prof. P. H. Philbrick, Iowa City, Iowa; J. C. Lutes, Gardner, Ill.; Z. Shedd, Fremont, Neb.; G. H. Walser, Lamar, Mo.; G. B. Fleming, Angola, Ind. This Committee organized by electing Mr. Ingersoll president, and Mr. Bundy treasurer, and is now ready for business.

The former Committee made a report at the evening session concerning future organization, sketching the points of the Address to be published. This report we shall print next week, and we can then, perhaps, speak on a better basis of knowledge with regard to the movement.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION ABROAD.

The question in respect to a larger and freer use of Sunday appears to be eliciting, at present, more earnest discussion in some parts of the world than in this country. It has been brought to the front, especially in Australia, through a late occurrence there. We refer to the notice of the Colonial Secretary served upon Professor Proctor, through the influence of the Sabbatarians, forbidding him to deliver one of his lectures on astronomy at Sydney, on Sunday evening. If there is one class of subjects which, more than another, should pass unchallenged in public discourse on Sunday, it would seem to be the one to which Professor Proctor is devoted. Surely, if the great object of religion is to awaken elevated feeling and inspire the sentiment of reverence and adoration toward the Creator, as its votaries claim, in what way can this be more effectually accomplished than by enlarging the knowledge of his works through the revelations of science? Thus alone can worship be rendered rational and intelligent. This is particularly pertinent to the theme which Professor Proctor had chosen on the occasion referred to. It was "The Vastness of God's Universe." But these considerations seem to have had but little effect upon the narrow-minded, self-conceived guardians of his honor and interests of the British Colony. Indeed, there is reason to believe that a lecture on some less exalted theme,—may we not say truly less religious?—would have encountered less opposition. There is reason to believe that, at the bottom, what troubled the bigots was the fact that the professor's mode of dealing with the problems of the universe was not the Biblical one, rather than a professed sense of the desecration of the Sabbath, since Sunday lectures and, indeed, entertainments of an even more objectionable character are not wholly unknown in Australia. Nor are the people in that distant part of the world, distinguished above all others for a Sabbath-observing disposition.

Perhaps nothing could better indicate the benighted spirit of the interference with Professor Proctor's lecture than that it was forced to resort to an act of George III. in order to make a case against him. "Just consider," says the Sydney Telegraph, "the wretched straits to which they are reduced, when they have been compelled to dig up this obsolete law from obscurity, in order to convict Mr. Proctor of breaking the law. This precious enactment saw the light at a time when people were hanged for trivial offences, and when the Statute Book of England was, on the authority of the greatest writers upon jurisprudence, a disgrace to any civilized country."

The point on which the objectors laid their stress was that a price of admission was charged at the door to the lecture. But this, though it might answer the legal requirements of the case, could not the moral ones, since, as the Telegraph observes, "simple people will fail to see the difference between the delivery of a Sunday lecture and the running of a Sunday train. If the one is an every-day business, so is the other. If the one is done for money, so is the other. For government to open out new lines of Sunday traffic of its own, and at the time it is doing this to intimidate an astronomical lecturer, on the ground that he is pursuing his avocation in the manner and according to the terms of his ordinary week-day engagements, is, to say the least, a piece of inconsistency that may command extensive sympathy, but will win nobody's respect." The subject admits of numerous correspondent illustrations. It is interesting to know that, while the course of Sir Henry Parks in the matter called forth numerous commendations in formal addresses, letters, etc., from the exultant Sabbatarians, the press, and a very considerable portion of the people, have been no less unqualified in their condemnation and disapproval. The ultimate result, we can but hope, through the discussion which the event has evoked, will be a more rational conception and expansive use of Sunday in that region, which will be at once an important gain to the cause of enlightenment and religion. In a subsequent issue of the Index, we may take occasion to refer to some of the aspects which the Sunday question has assumed in England, and perhaps in other portions of Europe.

KARL HEINZEN.

On Friday, November 13, Karl Heinzen died at Roxbury, aged seventy-one years. Few in our community know what a life of stern heroic struggle for truth and freedom closed that day. Early exiled from his land on account of his political sympathies, and his outspoken love of truth, Karl Heinzen was cut off from the natural expression of his powerful intellect by his failure ever to command the language of the country he loved and adopted as his own.

An intense and glowing writer, a strong and earnest advocate of reform, a genuine poet, his influence has been confined to his own countrymen, by whom he has been revered, admired, and loved.

As he lay in the calm stillness of death, with hardly a trace of the terrible sufferings of a year of paralyzing sickness upon his strong, beautiful face, he recalled the features of Dante; and he had many of the traits of that lofty and passionate soul. His scorn and wrath were tremendous; but his love was also true and deep. He "grappled his friends as with hooks of steel," and it seemed as if they became a part of his very life.

Breadth and courage were the distinguishing characteristics of his intellectual work; and his loyalty to truth was so intense and exacting that he would not let himself believe where demonstration was not perfect. If he thus failed to find in faith an assurance and comfort which other men do find, was it not because the larger sweep of his mental range made it harder to satisfy his questions, and complete the circle of his philosophy? But, in a recognition of the grandeur and nobility of universal law and in the subordination of all personal opinions to the demands of truth, all selfish views to the good of humanity, he was unswerving; and this is the principle, if not the sentiment and the joy, of religion.

It is to be hoped that some of his friends who knew him thoroughly will preserve for us a full history of this remarkable life. At present, I will only give a hasty literal translation of a few stanzas from his most important poems.

He was buried at Forest Hill Cemetery with distinguished honor, a large number of his fellow-countrymen walking to his grave to the accompaniment of music.

Mr. Koehler read a funeral oration in German, and a lady friend spoke in English to testify to his reverence for and truth to woman.

We are now sending out bills to the subscribers of the Index, and asking a renewal of subscriptions. We shall esteem it a special favor if our friends will remit at once; and we shall be equally well pleased if those whose subscriptions have expired will promptly renew. The Index is greatly in need of such a response. If its friends will give it their hearty aid, it may before the end of another year become self-supporting. If every subscriber would determine to get an additional subscriber, this desirable object would at once be accomplished. There are many who are doing a good deal more than this, but there are others who have never put into effect the suggestion. It is to these we appeal. Let us emulate our Orthodox friends in their zeal, and do this much, if not on account of our personal interest in the paper, at least for the cause it represents. Remember also that the most effectual way of improving the Index is to give it the means which will enable those in charge of it to make the improvements desired, and which none desire more than themselves.

The Brooklyn Eagle of November 2 has a noteworthy editorial article on "The Decline of Church-Going." The tenor of the article may be judged from the following extract:—

> During the past half-century, the advancing tide of scientific discovery and Biblical criticism has steadily increased in volume and force. The several books of the Bible have been studied, not as a mysterious whole, whose plenary inspiration made it irreverent to question any particular part, but as separate treatises, narratives, or poems, stamped with the individuality of their separate authorship and circumstances. The "five books of Moses" have ceased to have the awe-inspiring clasp of "Pentateuch" to bind them together and repel the scrutiny of the curious. Genesis no longer leans upon Exodus for support, and the first chapter no longer passes muster under the protection of the later ones. Other hands beside that of Moses are visible, and to some critics the hand of Moses is not visible at all. Thus, the historic element of the Bible, as well as the authenticity of each separate part of it, has been and is being subjected to the Pauline test, "Prove all things: hold fast that which is good."

The article throughout is written from the stand-point of the freest modern scholarship with regard to the Bible. It takes equally advanced ground on the question of miracles. The bearing of the argument on the question of church-going is that the pews have outgrown the antiquated theology usually presented from the pulpits. The writer closes thus:—

> The pulpiteers insult the conscience and intelligence of their hearers and of the age, when they tell, with a long face, the old scarecrow fables which nobody believes, and teach dogmas and miracles which the average intelligence of a child rejects at sight.

This is pretty plain talk for a secular paper in the city of churches, and for one edited, as we believe the Eagle is, by a Roman Catholic. It almost looks as if Col. Ingersoll, on the occasion of his recent visit to Brooklyn, must have invaded the Eagle's sanctum and seized the editorial pen.

The Boston correspondent of the Chicago Inter-Ocean has been interviewing Mr. John G. Whittier with regard to his religious views, and especially as bearing on the question of a coming "Moral Interregnum," on account of the decay of the old creeds, as prophesied by Prof. Goldwin Smith. Mr. Whittier thinks there may be a temporary moral disturbance, but that things will come right without any serious collapse of society. With regard to his own creed, he says: "I believe in absolute religion above all written revelations. All revelations presuppose and appeal to it, and absolute religion rests on absolute truth. I do not think that truth is wholly a relative matter, but that there is an absolute basis of truth in all minds, which is the same; and that, in all difficulties growing out of the relations of old religious ideas to new facts, we shall have enough of absolute truth to carry us through. In these periods of transition, all remedies must prove their adaptation to our needs by satisfying the necessities of our reason and our spiritual wants."

It looks as if the action of the Government of France in expelling all the non-authorized religious bodies might become a test-measure of the power of the Republic to sustain itself. The Ferry ministry, hardly yet warm in its seats, barely escaped overthrow by a union of the extreme Left with all the forces opposed to the Republic in the Assembly, on the second day after the recent opening of the session. The "Imperialists" were very bold, and there was great turbulence, so that the Assembly had to be adjourned for the day. With regard to the religious orders, the Government, in passing the laws against them, would have been wiser if it had observed the motto Make haste slowly, and stopped awhile with the breaking up of the mischievous Jesuits. The call is now for Gambetta, the real Republican leader, to take the helm. He should do it before it is too late even for his great ability and the prudence he has been learning from experience, to weather the gathering storm.

Any one who may desire to procure a good likeness of Lucretia Mott will do well to call at the rooms of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, and examine one on exhibition there. It is in crayon, and executed by Mr. Wm. Aitkin, a skilful artist of this city, and fittingly and elegantly framed. The merit of the picture is generally conceded by those who have witnessed it, and the price is but moderate for its size and grade of excellence.

MR. JANES' Lessons on the Origin and Growth of Christianity will hereafter be published once in two weeks, enough matter being given in each one for two exercises.

STATE RIGHTS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Now that the Liberal League movement of 1876 has failed of its object, and it is proposed in various quarters to make another effort in the same direction, it seems the proper time to renew a protest which was humbly made three years ago, "after the fact." The writer of this note is in favor of the most thorough and uncompromising secularization of every department of the government. But he must confess to being enough of an "old fogy" to view with great solicitude any encroachment of the central government upon the domain of local authorities, whether for the purpose of protecting individuals in their rights or of promoting the interests of education. Now, these apprehensions may be groundless. The doctrine commonly known as "State rights" has certainly lost caste during the last few years, and may be destined to go to the wall. But is it essential that an organization whose prime object is to secure the complete separation of Church and State should incorporate into its platform any plank with reference to this question? Do secularization and centralization necessarily go hand in hand? Would it not be better to nail to the mast simply the fundamental principle upon which we all agree, leaving it to individual members to decide for or against what some will persist in regarding as national interference with State prerogatives. Perhaps the number of those who were deterred from joining the old League on account of its pronounced Hamiltonianism was very small. The writer must confess that he knows of only one. But if the new organization, if there is to be one, can find it consistent with its interests to leave some humble place in its ranks for those who still hold the principles of Jefferson in high esteem, the subscriber does not wish to have his name left out.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Political Education.

THE organization of the Society for Political Education was a most excellent idea. Its object is to diffuse a knowledge of political economy in all its branches, and to this end proposes a similar work to the Society for Home Education. It is managed by an executive committee of twenty-five members. The present committee consists of Prof. W. G. Sumner of Yale College, New Haven; Hon. David A. Wells, of Norwich, Conn.; Charles Francis Adams, Jr., of Boston, Mass.; George S. Coe, Horace White, George Haven Putnam, R. R. Bowker, E. M. Shepard, and R. L. Dugdale, of New York city; Franklin Mac Veagh and M. L. Scudder, Jr., of Chicago, Ill.; Gen. Bradley T. Johnson, of Richmond, Va.; Hon. John H. Ames, of Lincoln, Neb.; A. Sydney Biddle, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Archibald Mitchell, of New Orleans, La.; George Mason, of Galveston, Tex.; and Peter Hamilton of Mobile, Ala. The society has selected as a course of reading for the first year Nordhoff's Politics for Young Americans, Prof. Perry's Introduction to Political Economy, Johnson's History of American Politics, and McAdam's Alphabet in Finance. Tracts will be published: by Edward Atkinson, on "What is a Bank?" and by Turgot, the great finance minister of Louis XVI., on "The Creation and Distribution of Wealth." It is proposed to issue lists of books on political economy and political science, so that persons can take up courses of reading by themselves. The society has two classes of membership, active and co-operating. Active members pledge themselves to read the books recommended by the society for the official year, which begins in September; and co-operating members pay $5 a year, which entitles them to receive all the tracts published by the organization. Mr. Richard L. Dugdale, 79 Fourth Avenue, New York city, is the secretary for the East, and the treasurer.

The society seeks to arouse an interest in good government, and to diffuse a knowledge of the best methods, by furnishing the best books to libraries, by the publishing of pamphlets, and in every other possible manner. It also seeks to avoid party lines,—its managers being from all parties,—and to create a universal knowledge of laws and principles leading to good government. Its managers announce the following convictions as those which will govern them in their efforts to diffuse political wisdom:—

The nation, parties, and public men must keep good faith. The right of each citizen to his free voice and vote must be upheld. Office-holders must not control the suffrage. The office should seek the man, and not the man the office. Public service, in business positions, should depend solely on fitness and good behavior. The crimes of bribery and corruption must be relentlessly punished. Local issues should be independent of party. Coins made unlimited legal tender must be of full value as metal in the markets of the world.

Sound currency must have a metal basis, and all paper money must be convertible on demand. Labor has a right to the highest wages it can earn, unhindered by public or private tyranny. Trade has the right to the freest scope, unfettered by taxes, except for government expenses. Corporations must be restricted from abuse of privilege. Neither the public money nor the people's land must be used to subsidize private enterprise. A public opinion, wholesome and active, unhampered by machine control, is the true safeguard of popular institutions.

Industrial Charity.

AT the recent annual meeting of the "Associated Charities" Society in Boston, the following address by Mrs. L. E. Caswell, as reported in the Advertiser, describes one of the most interesting and important branches of the philanthropic work of this organization:—

Mrs. L. E. Caswell, of the North End training school, said that a little over a year ago she with others was asked to establish a conference of the Associated Charities in Ward 6, that portion of the North End about North Street. In looking over our district, we found a population of about fifteen thousand people, swarming the streets and dance-halls and tenement houses, of all nationalities, ranging from the prosperous merchant to the Italian organ-grinder and rag-picker. We said to the officers of the Associated Charities, "What can we do in such a district as this to carry out your plan of work?" And we received the answer, "Remember you are to give not alms, but a friend." And then we pitifully answered back, "But these people are starving, they are suffering destitution and pauperism. How can we work here,—how can we prove ourselves friends to these people, if our hands are tied as to alms-giving?" And again we received gently but firmly the answer, "You must raise them out of this state of pauperism and destitution, you must raise them above the need of relief, you must set them at work." We went into our work with considerable enthusiasm, and thought we would try to get the people to work. But we very soon came face to face with a very serious difficulty: our people did not want to work; and, if any of them did by chance want to work, they didn't know how. And so, through the perplexity, grew up the Ward 6 Workroom, which was opened about a year ago in a large empty building in the North End. We got a large room, and there offered these helpless, inefficient women a place to come and learn to sew. We paid them something for working, and we sold the garments they made to the poor for reasonable prices. But we soon found they were leaning too much on us, and were earning all their money from us. So we ceased to pay them money, but provided them with fuel and food and room-rent; and, as soon as a woman could earn more than that, we obtained employment for her elsewhere, discharged her, and took another in her places. But some women could not learn to sew; and so we opened a laundry, and invited all who could not earn their living by the needle to come and learn to do laundry-work. As soon as they learned, we assisted them in getting work, and gave them the privilege of coming to the laundry and washing the clothes of their customers, obliging them to put into the laundry-box ten cents on every dollar that they earned. Last month, when I went to pay the bills of the laundry, I found I could pay all the bills for soap and starch and blueing, and a part of the coal, with the ten-cent pieces these poor women had put into the laundry money-box. [Applause.] Any woman, for five cents an hour, may come and do her own washing there, if she is earning enough outside to pay the five cents. Any shop-girl, or any woman who is at work by day, can come there during the evening, and do her washing for ten cents. Any lady can come there, and for twelve cents and a half an hour, under the direction of our matron, can learn to wash and starch and iron properly.

Our visitors, in going about among the families, soon made another discovery,—that those mothers and daughters were very helpless in caring for their families. So we started up in this wonderful building an industrial room, where these mothers and daughters are taught to make and mend their husbands' and children's and their own garments. Then we came to another difficulty: these mothers and daughters did not know how to cook proper food for their families; and so a cooking-school was established, under the kind auspices of the Boston cooking-school committee. There are classes in the forenoon and afternoon and evening, under the kind care of Mrs. Parloa, where two hundred women and girls have learned to cook. A man met me the other day, and said, "My girl," and she is only twelve years old, "can make as good a beef stew with dumplings as Mrs. Parloa can." And another man was so pleased with some fishballs that Mary, his wife, had made for him, that he said, if she could cook like that, they would live like kings. [Applause.] After a time, the boys began to throng the steps of our wonderful building. They said, "You are doing everything for the girls, and nothing for the boys," and by their very importunity they forced us to do something with them. And so we opened a boys' workshop, where boys of twelve years old and upward are learning, under the guidance of a skilled carpenter, the use of tools. Kind friends have sent in some work for them to do, for which they are paid.

Every department in this building has a money-box, and everybody has to pay something for the privilege of coming there and learning. The boys' money-box was opened by me the other day, and I was surprised and delighted to count out $43.78 that these little fellows had earned by the use of their tools. They then passed a vote, very gravely, that they would give half of it to the institution and keep the rest themselves. The pay-day was a very pleasant day to me, because they were so proud that they had earned some money,—these little fellows from the streets. One boy confided to me—a little fellow who was only twelve years old—that he had been for years wanting a pair of skates, and now he could get them. Another boy said he had wanted a pair of mittens he saw in the store window, and now he could get them. Another boy confessed to me he had had very hard work to keep the rule of "no swearing," and said he, "I came very near swearing the other day, but I said 'Christopher,' and that saved me." Another little fellow said, "When I want to swear in the workshop, I always say, 'Jerusalem'; and it does me just as much good as though I swore." [Laughter and applause.]

At last, the mothers who had little ones came to us and said: "Can't you do anything for us? We would go to work by the day, if there was any place for our children." We applied to a dear lady, well known in Boston for her sweet charities to children, and she came to our relief and opened a day nursery and a kindergarten school; and now ninety little ones, from eighteen months old to five years, are there daily, playing and working and enjoying themselves, having their little baby naps and their lunches and their dinners, sweet and clean and happy all day long. And the mothers come at night and take these wholesome little creatures to their homes, and I think the influence is very good on the mothers.

So, you see, our work has grown. This industrial building is only a year old, and we expect great things from it in the future. It has grown beyond our highest anticipations. God's work always grows. We only now, just at present, have ambition for two things: we want, in this building, to organize a class of girls who can be thoroughly trained to go into your families and assist you in your household work; and we want a circulating library and reading room, which would purify the atmosphere of the North End and give it all a higher moral tone. You say, many have said it to me, week after week, "Where do you get the money to run all these departments? as they go through this large house." And I always say, and shall say, that Boston always takes care of a good work. Boston never lets a good work languish. She has kept us in the past; and I know she will take care of us this next year, and will not let this work go down. And now, we all, certainly those who have tried this experiment and are proving it a success, beg of you at the South End and at the West End, and in all the outlying districts, to try to establish these industrial educational institutions, so that no one can say, "No one will hire us, for we don't know how to work." I say to you, take the first step, and all the lions you so much fear you will find chained; and you will always find the door open, when you are ready to go forward with zeal, putting your whole heart and soul into the work.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE DRAMATIC WORKS OF BAYARD TAYLOR. With notes by Marie Hansen-Taylor. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.

In the late years of Bayard Taylor's life, he wished to withdraw himself from the large public which had so eagerly read and enjoyed his lighter writings, and to make or find an inner circle of readers for a higher and more permanent form of literature. Those lighter writings of his, poured forth for many years with exhaustless fecundity into the willing ears of his countrymen, were mainly the records, in prose and verse, of travels up and down the earth in known and unknown quarters. They were the delight of his generation,—a generation which had not yet begun to travel,—a generation, one might say, in a very youthful state of mind regarding the outside world also, well pleased with external description and narration, and without taste for philosophic, and, so to speak, comparative travelling.

It was inevitable, therefore, that the professional pilgrim should continue to make books of travel, as fast as he went over the world; and he went as fast as he could. When a man does not stop to think, to study, to philosophize, his only safety with the omnivorous and greedy reading public, is speed and the sponge of freshly recurring impressions. The sort of book which immediately requires another, lest it and its author be forgotten, is the fatal employment of the literary class. The fate of Sisyphus is theirs. But there is not one of them that does not aspire and struggle to intercalate an enduring composition amid their frost-work; to work with the right hand for fame and with the left for bread. It is certain that no one writes, however popular he may be, without a secret consciousness of that small circle of readers who give fame, but never popularity.

It is an interesting point, therefore, in Bayard Taylor's intellectual history, when he deliberately puts his past work behind him, and challenges a small, select public with an entirely new attempt. He meant also to rest his claim upon our memory with the three dramatic poems contained in this volume; namely, "The Prophet," "The Masque of the Gods," and "Prince Deukalion." The question for us is, Has he succeeded in his endeavor and in his wish?

We cannot refuse our admiration to his noble ambition, to his deliberate, earnest intention of doing somewhat more worthy of praise and permanence than hitherto, with all his successes, he had accomplished. What prouder encomium can be bestowed on a writer than to declare truly that he strove to do better and better work, and constantly advanced to higher and more enduring themes? What so sad as to declare truly that for us he has failed? That, although he must have enlarged himself, we are not enlarged thereby? And Bayard Taylor failed in all but as an encouraging example. Not utterly, but in meeting the challenge and expectation. For this volume is published as an American classic, as if the public, even that small one, to which its titles appeal, called for its preservation in its present elegantly simple and substantial form; and its notes, by Mrs. Taylor, reproduce for the mindful reader the very procedure and tone of Mrs. Shelley's notes to her husband's poems. They had better been omitted. They do not add to the interest of the works, and they do reveal some facts which it is as well the impartial reader should not know. The genesis of a literary production, and the incidents of its elaboration, become of value when the place of the production has been fixed high in the regard of mankind. These notes seem either to assume or anticipate such a position. They seem to say to the reader: "You have conceded other poems to be masterpieces, and you will be glad to know that Bayard Taylor and Mr. T. B. Aldrich formed, unknown to each other, a coincident scheme of a dramatic poem; and that at the very time when Taylor was writing 'The Prophet,' Mr. E. C. Stedman was advising him 'to try a dramatic poem on a strictly American subject.' You will also be glad to learn that a certain stanza of a song in 'The Prophet' was written Nov. 9, 1873, 'on the railway to Gotha'; that the prototype of David Starr, the hero of 'The Prophet,' was not Joe Smith, but Rev. Ed. Irving; that the vision of David Starr was based on a personal experience of the writer; that the writer considered a passage in the third act the most tragical of the whole poem," etc.; and, indeed, this last is a fine fragment, though far from tragical in its effect, and ends, as is usual with Taylor, in the naïve sentimental. One other remarkable passage commemorates—"sets up an expiatory monument to poor 'Pickets' and 'Beppo,' " is the language of the notes—two dogs killed to save them from madness. We have given a faithful condensation of the notes on "The Prophet," and we can but ask if they have a genuine interest and are not slightly wanting in dignity.

And what is it that is so circumstantially annotated? A dramatic poem without dramatic interest, intended to be American in its place and coloring, but having no national characteristics that we can discover. The central figure, the Prophet, has none of the vehemence, none of the power and dignity belonging to that character, even of a false one. He is very commonplace, even in his Scriptural quotations; in his love for another woman than his wife, as trite as a novel, except that it is made the only apparent motive for his introduction among his followers of polygamy. He has no personality, he does not act: he feels, suffers, loves, and soliloquizes, and at the very last is ready to abandon his mission. The plot, if any, the situations, are unfathomable, and require a great number of supposes. There is neither subordination nor correlation of parts, no natural coherence of actions or sequence of events; in fine, no artistic insight. The theme was in its nature unfit for a poem. Its selection was the first mistake. If it is necessary to have an American subject for poetry, nothing but utter poverty would lead one to find it in Mormonism, even for an historical background, than which there is no sect in the world which offers to the imagination and invention a more dreary, flat, and thoroughly prosaic theme.

If America has no better subjects for the poet, let him migrate. But, indeed, this cry for something strictly American in literature is altogether specious and misleading. The poet may find it here or there; but, if he consciously try to make it American, he will assuredly fail. On the contrary, it is the unconscious elements in a literary creation that identify it with a particular time, place, and race. For instance, "The Masque of the Gods," which in this volume follows immediately "The Prophet," has ransacked every land for the oldest and youngest mythologies, and has represented their character and attributes, put into their mouths sentiments and doctrines, more truly modern and strictly American than anything to be found in the intended realistic and native types and ideas of "The Prophet." It may be said truly that one can study with care and faithfulness a past time, and reproduce it more effectively, and more easily interweave the spiritual aspect of his own period, than he can manage the same effects successfully in a contemporaneous subject belonging to his own country and race. Who has been equal to this? Not Shakespeare himself; and Æschylus, in "The Persians," barely escaped, and only by its flattery of Athens, unsuccess.

The imagination wants distance, remoteness, twilight, ambiguity, the room for its play. "The Masque of the Gods" had all these helps, and consequently produces the mood of poetry. In it there was room to insert such experience, knowledge, observation, beliefs, as the poet himself, as well as the world and the times in which he lived, had inherited or acquired. There is no modern poem of equal length that probably more truly pictures current views as to ancient religions, and expresses their harmony with the superior spiritual significance of the latest revelation.

In this poem and in "Prince Deukalion," there is great variety of lyrical measure, and it is handled with ease and sometimes with power. The notes acknowledge the influence of Goethe about the period of their composition. It was unnecessary. No one could fail to notice the resemblance in form and general scope to the second part of Faust. But that work was the poetic treasury of eighty years of striving and of thought. The plainest word has therefore a deep, inner meaning. Talent cannot reach to that power, nor common destiny, nor middle age. The form is there, rhythm and language are there; but the symbol does not symbolize, there is no living spirit under the body. In these poems, the form has not been a natural necessity, but has been superimposed. They are an elegant temple, but the god, "speaking with inspired mouth, smileless, unperfumed, piercing through the centuries," is not within.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK, Nov. 11, 1880.

A great interest is being rearoused in co-operative organization. This has assumed more public notableness owing to the recent visit and addresses of Mr. Thomas Hughes. It is seldom such an ovation awaits a public man, good and strong, if not great and powerful, within the chief city of a country foreign to his own. With all due respect to those who believe otherwise, your correspondent, an Englishman born, holds each year more firmly to his first conviction, that the English-speaking people of this nation are decidedly foreign, though not alien, to the parent stock and country. The unlikeness was most strikingly made apparent by a trinity of Englishmen who appeared on the Cooper Union platform last Friday evening. They were Mr. Hughes himself, the honored guest of the evening, the Rev. Robert Collyer, whom George Wm. Curtis happily introduced as a "Yorkshire Yankee," and Mr. Robert Blissert, tailor and labor-leader. Perhaps, of the three, Mr. Collyer is the most Americanized, and Mr. Blissert, in a certain sense, the least. I am not sure but, as I mean it, the latter fact is the most complimentary. However, I shall not diverge further on that line, at this writing.

Somehow, I believe that Mr. Hughes is really not so well satisfied with his Rugby projects as he would have us and himself also believe. With all due respect, I think that behind it there is a tolerably large speculation, whose origin begins in Boston, and to which Mr. Hughes is not in spirit or intent a party. But Rugby is not co-operation, though it may, and it is to be hoped will yet, become an example of the benefits of association, the combination of small or moderate means to a large end. So far as any reports have come to us outside of the would-be Rugbyites themselves, the English colonists hardly appear to have the right idea of what a pioneer colonist has got to do. Nor does the land appear to have been selected with judgment for the larger farming contemplated in Mr. Hughes' outlook.

But I was going to write of co-operation and the present efforts to revive an enduring interest therein. The Cooper Union meeting was a proof of interest, and a striking evidence not only of the esteem in which Mr. Hughes is held, but of the wish to evolve peacefully some idea of trade and economics which will nearer approach the law of equity than the modes that now exist. I had not seen Mr. Hughes since 1867, when, as correspondent of the New York Tribune and other American journals, I was present at the Co-operative Conferences at Manchester and Rochdale, England, of that year. He has aged considerably in these last thirteen years. His voice has lost its deeper timbre, and his manner of speech even the impediments of drawling delivery which he had, though but slightly, in common with all English public speakers I ever heard, outside of Messrs. Bright, Gladstone, Disraeli, and Bradlaugh, with a few pulpiteers. The treble of advancing age, which was plainly perceptible in his tones, enhanced and heightened the description I once before referred to, of his being very much the embodiment of Matthew Arnold's "sweetness and light." All the applause and honor accorded to "Tom Brown" by an American audience, such as that of Friday last, was and is the due of this modern "man of Ross." In person tall, with slender, well-knit frame; a long, high head, well set on his neck; a face long and oval; a fine, strong, but not large, though well-shaped chin and lower jaw; a mouth of flexibility and kindliness of expression; eyes gray-blue in color, but which have become a little faded and weary-looking; a small, though well-shaped nose; high, round, though not broad forehead, and a head peculiarly marked in the coronal region, where phrenologists locate benevolence, hope, reverence, and other faculties of the ethical complexion; soft, white-gray whiskers; a bald, fine-skinned crown, fringed with a little tonsure of silky hair; a sympathetic voice, having a lingering touch of the adviser in its tones; and an easy, rather lounging style of figure; a style, voice, and manner which take his hearers, oratorically speaking, into his confidence,—such is Mr. Hughes as he appeared to the writer on Friday night last. As to the matter of his address, I confess to some disappointment. Mr. Hughes was either tired, which was most probable, or he did not feel it necessary to go as fully into or generalize on English co-operation, as he might have effectively done, because he presumed the fuller acquaintance of his audience with the topic than was the case. Certainly, his address did not read so satisfying as that of Mr. Holyoake, some twelve months since, made in the same hall and to an audience equally en rapport.

Nothing new was said, unless, indeed, it was a lame and—must I say?—unfair definition by Mr. Hughes of the German socialistic philosophy of Karl Marx and Lasalle. If it is really, as Mr. Hughes said, a philosophy which only aims at securing from and by the State good wages from every one, it is a philosophy so insufficient as to make unaccountable its powerful influence on the minds and acts of intelligent labor, in the large cities of this country as well as throughout the German Empire and other European countries. Lasalle deserved intellectually, right or wrong, a better statement than Mr. Hughes accorded. Again, he seemed to me wholly wrong in classifying M. Gudon, the founder of the Guise Familistére, with Schulze-Delitzsch and the self-help school, as against that of State help presented by the publicist Lasalle, and embodied by the organizer Karl Marx in the Internationals' platform. Gudon is an extreme radical in these social-economic matters. His wonderful Palace of Industry is the concrete effort of a strongly benevolent heart and will, which must do something direct and during his own times. But he is personally far more committed to the "State help" than to the "self-help" school. Mr. Hughes made one noteworthy piece of phrasing, when he spoke of protecting the freedom of the weak without destroying the freedom of the strong. Dr. Rylance, of Grace Church, Protestant Episcopal, who is much in earnest, made a serious avowal when he alluded to co-operation as an attempt in business "to Christianize Christianity." George Wm. Curtis was, as always, graceful, eloquent, scholarly, and happy. "Bob" Blissert somehow—his name should have been for that occasion "Blizzard"—fell upon the smug and decorous demeanor of the good-meaning but slightly Philistine gentlemen, who have gotten up the "Central Co-operative Board," so called, and are quite disposed to do a little kindly patronizing, which wage-laborers, like Blissert, are indisposed to accept. There is in the movement which secured Mr. Hughes' speech an element of condescension, to the evolution of which Mr. Hughes would, in England at least, not condescend. He has learned better from long dealings with English workers. I don't think he ever had it in any marked degree.

The "Central Co-operative Board" proposes to reverse the methods by which certain forms of co-operation in England and Germany have been so eminently successful. It is proposed to begin from above, and not grow from below. This, at least, is how it looks to me. Mr. Allen R. Foote, the organizer of the movement, has draughted an excellent plan for co-operative retail stores, and now proposes to secure capital by friendly taking of shares to a central association, which is to be charged with work of practical operation and setting in motion. A board of influential persons have been selected.

Among them are announced Prof. Adler, Rev. Dr. Rylance, Rev. Dr. Heber Newton, John Gledhill, buyer here of the English wholesale society, Dr. John Law, Mr. Courtland Palmer, Mr. Crowell, and several well-known insurance and other brokers and bankers. There is not a single woman on it, and, so far as I remember, not a wage-laborer. The essential purpose is right. I only speak of the plan, and perhaps of the spirit a little. It is announced to be a movement for the benefit of the laborers. What should be said is that it is a movement to organize co-operation,—the law of equity in trade. This is a good thing in itself to do, and should be pushed and organized, regardless of what laborers will do or wish to do. There is not, in my judgment, any notable practical outcome to Mr. Foote's plans, except perhaps the wide-spread discussion of ideas and hopes that may ensue. But a meagre showing as to organized work was made. There are few stores projected, but none really in an organized shape. There is, outside of all this, quite a notable movement for securing hands under colony colonization, of which I shall write hereafter. And this is all. Let us hope for more.

Dr. Adler was not present at the Hughes meeting. His friends will all regret to learn that his own health is not good, and that that of his bride is very poor indeed. His Sunday discourses do not show these disturbing agencies, however. THINON.

VII.

THE PROPHET OF NAZARETH.

"And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan."—MARK i., 9.

1. The Baptism of Jesus.

The child JESUS had now grown to manhood. Doubtless, in his Galilean home, he had heard of the wonderful prophet of the Judean wilderness. He came among the multitude who sought JOHN, and listened to his impassioned exhortations. A fragment of the early "Gospel of the Hebrews" represents that he was urged by his mother and brothers to seek JOHN and his baptism. "Confessing his sins," probably, like the other disciples of the BAPTIST (Mark i., 5), he was immersed in the river Jordan. (Matt. iii., 13; Mark i., 9; Luke iii., 21.)

NOTE A.—The miraculous legend of the descent of the "Holy Spirit" upon JESUS in the form of a dove must be rejected as contrary to reason. It is, nevertheless, a very early tradition, being related in all the Synoptical Gospels; but the accounts vary materially, and are fatally defective as testimony to an historical fact. In MARK, the oldest Gospel, the incident is apparently represented as a subjective vision of JESUS, the voice from heaven being heard by him alone. (Mark i., 10, 11.) In MATTHEW also, it appears as a vision, but of JOHN instead of JESUS. (Matt. iii., 16, 17.) In LUKE, it is represented as a palpable fact, perceptible by all present. (Luke iii., 21, 22.)

NOTE B.—MATTHEW alone represents JOHN as recognizing the superiority of JESUS to himself. (Matt. iii., 14.) This, doubtless, was a tradition of later growth, and unhistorical. It is contradicted by the accounts of the subsequent relations of JOHN and JESUS. (Matt. xi., 2–6; Luke vii., 19–23.)

2. Jesus begins his Work.

We have little knowledge of the life and thought of JESUS before his baptism. His contact with JOHN probably intensified ideas which had long been growing within him. Previous to this, he may have occasionally exhorted in the Synagogues of GALILEE, according to the customs of the Jews. (Luke iv., 15.)

JESUS began his public career, apparently, as a disciple of JOHN. After a protracted period of fasting and solitary life in the wilderness, which is reported to us in the legend of the Temptation (Mark i., 12, 13; Matt. iv., 1–11; Luke iv., 1–13), he learned that the BAPTIST, who had withdrawn from JUDEA to PEREA, beyond the Jordan, had been arrested and imprisoned by HEROD the Tetrarch, the ruler of that district. (Mark vi., 17–20; Matt. xiv., 3–5; Luke iii., 19, 20.)

This undoubtedly seemed a portent of the speedy coming of the Messianic kingdom, and impressed him with the necessity of taking up the burden which JOHN could no longer bear,—that of exhorting his people to prepare for the approaching Judgment. He returned to his native GALILEE (Mark i., 14; Matt. iv., 12; Luke iv., 14), and commenced to preach the gospel, saying, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand." (Mark i., 15; compare Matt. iv., 17.)

NOTE.—The imprisonment of JOHN, according to JOSEPHUS, occurred within two years of the termination of PONTIUS PILATE'S term of office as governor or procurator in JUDEA. This would confirm the testimony of the synoptical writers that the public career of JESUS lasted little more than one year. The Fourth Gospel makes it about three years.

3. The Calling of the Disciples.

There were probably many among the humble people who listened to JESUS who were disposed to give heed to his warnings. Some of them became his close companions and followers. The accounts of the calling of the disciples are brief and fragmentary. (Mark i., 16–20; Matt. xiv., 18–22, etc.) The story respecting the earlier disciples, related simply and naturally by MARK and MATTHEW, is expanded in the later Gospel into a miraculous legend. (Luke v., 1–11.) We must reject this as unhistorical and contrary to reason.

From the abruptness of the narrative, we might infer that there had been no previous acquaintance between JESUS and the disciples; but it is more reasonable to suppose that they were known by him, and had often listened to his teachings.

The disciples are said to have been twelve in number, corresponding with the twelve tribes of ISRAEL. It is represented that they were commissioned by JESUS to preach his gospel to the people, and that he held frequent communication with them. (Matt. ix., 9; x., 1–14; xii., 1, 2; Mark iii., 13–19; ix., 14; Luke vi., 12–19; viii., 1–3, etc.)

NOTE.—MATTHEW declares that the Disciples were instructed to preach only to the Hebrews (x., 5–6). LUKE alone speaks of seventy others beside the twelve, who were sent into "every city and place" (x., 1–20). This is apparently unhistorical.

General Questions.

1. Give some account of the baptism of JESUS. 2. What was the legend of the descent of the "Holy Spirit"? 3. Why must this be considered unhistorical? 4. Did JOHN recognize JESUS as his superior? 5. How did JESUS begin his work? 6. Why was JOHN the Baptist imprisoned? 7. What did JESUS commence to preach? 8. How long did his public mission last? 9. Describe the calling of the disciples? 10. Their number? 11. To whom were they sent? 12. What is the story of the seventy related in Luke? 13. Is this historical or legendary?

To the Teacher.

Read Bible for Learners, Vol. III., chapters viii., ix.; Savage's Talks about Jesus; Renan's Life of Jesus, chapter vi. Look out the Bible references, and have some of them read in the class. The stories of the baptism of Jesus, and the calling of the Disciples, with proper explanation, will prove interesting to the younger scholars. Read the accounts of the calling of SIMON, ANDREW, JAMES, and JOHN in Mark and Luke, and explain the growth of the legend.

ing the fete of the 20th of September in celebration of the entry of the Italian troops into Rome as accursed. The Pope complained of not being free, and said that the Head of the Church, in the circumstances in which he was now placed, could do little to combat the infidelity invading the world, and particularly Italy. His Holiness also strongly condemned the Italian school system.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL ON SUNDAY OBSERVANCES.—Speaking on October 25, Monday night, at the inaugural meeting of the Glasgow Sunday society, Dr. Tyndall asked whether the public desire for instruction, which was the motive power of all healthy progress, was to be quenched or left unsatisfied, lest a mode of Sunday observance—unknown to the early Christians, repudiated by the heroes of the Reformation, and insisted upon for the first time during a period of national gloom and suffering in the seventeenth century—should be interfered with. He claimed that the intellect of this country was gradually ranging itself on the side of their movement, and that clergymen, statesmen, philosophers, and moralists were joining their standard. Resolutions in favor of the movement were passed.

ANOTHER highly creditable act on the part of a Jewish merchant is mentioned by our Russian contemporaries. A Christian merchant, ruined by unfortunate speculations, was compelled to sell his goods and furniture for the benefit of his numerous creditors. The man and his wife gave vent to loud lamentations on seeing their most precious effects, amassed by long and honest labor, sold at so much below their value. Touched by the despair of these unfortunate Christians, a rich Jew, who was present at the sale, bought up all the most valuable articles and returned them to their owners. The Jew disappeared from the scene before the grateful couple could thank their benefactor. The bystanders were compelled to acknowledge the generous feelings of the Jews, and several of them loudly expressed a wish that all Christians would resemble them in this respect.—American Israelite.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

REV. W. H. CHANNING sailed for England last Saturday.

MR. A. BRONSON ALCOTT has no faith in the opinions of the ancient disciplinarians of New England. "I hold," said he the other day, "that the man who cannot govern children, or men either, by moral means,—by the power of his eye, the charm of his manners, the resources of his intelligence,—is not worthy to control his fellow-creatures."

AT a recent dinner-party in the city of Paris, of twelve gentlemen of high distinction in the scientific world, five of them were above the age of eighty-three. The conversation is described by one who was present as having been extraordinarily brilliant, marked by wit, wisdom, fun, and repartee of the freshest description; and one of the very brightest of the company was ninety-seven years old.

PROF. HENRY DRAPER, of New York, has succeeded in photographing the great nebula in Orion, one of the most puzzling objects in the heavens, and historically the most interesting of the nebulæ. It is hoped by photography to show with certainty any changes in the nebula, and perhaps determine some of the laws ruling these elementary forms of matter, and even indicate the process of the genesis of solar systems.

THE Scientific American for Nov. 13, contains two full-page illustrations of Captain Eads' proposed railway for transporting ships with their cargo across continents. Captain Eads claims by his plan to be able to take loaded ships of the largest tonnage from one ocean to the other across the Isthmus of Panama, as readily as can be done by a canal after the Lesseps plan, and at a much less cost for engineering construction.

REV. ROWLAND CONNOR, who has been preaching in the Academy of Music so successfully for the past seven or eight Sundays on a three months' engagement, is giving such eminent satisfaction to those who have enjoyed the pleasure of listening to him that steps are being taken by his many friends to secure his services for one year from the expiration of his present engagement, and with the best prospects of success. Church building is also earnestly agitated. —Saginaw Courier.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,— all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE man of character does not go out of his place: he is modest in speech, but exceeds in action. He will hold rectitude essential, bringing it forth in humility, performing it with prudence, completing it with sincerity. What he seeks is in himself.—Confucius.

THERE exists not any man, in any nation, who may not improve in virtue, if he adopts his own true nature as his guide. When I say nature, I mean nature in its genuine purity, not when it has become corrupted by evil customs.—Cicero.

IF you have discovered anything in human life preferable to truth, justice, temperance, or fortitude,—in short, anything more excellent than a mind satisfied with itself, and sufficient to its own happiness, and, whilst it acts conformably with right reason, acquiesces in whatever, without its own choice, is allotted it by fate,—if, I say, you have discovered anything superior to these virtues, pursue it with your utmost effort and enjoy your discovery. But . . . if you think everything of less importance, and contemptible in comparison with these things, never bestow a thought upon any other object, which, by diverting your attention, may prevent from pursuing your chief object without distraction. For it is a kind of rebellion against the sovereignty of reason to suffer anything foreign to encroach on her province.—Marcus Aurelius.

I PERCEIVE there is in the world a good-nature, falsely so called, as being nothing else but a facile and flexible disposition, wax for every impression. What others are so bold to beg, they are so bashful as not to deny. Such osiers can never make beams to bear stress in Church and State. If this be good-nature, let me always be a clown: if this be good fellowship, let me always be a churl. Give me to set a sturdy porter before my soul, who may not be equally open to every corner. I cannot conceive how he can be a friend to any, who is a friend to all, and the worst foe to himself.—Thomas Fuller, D.D.

THAT man, I think, has had a liberal education, who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure all the work that, as a mechanism, it is capable of; whose intellect is a clear, cold, logic engine, with all its parts of equal strength, and in smooth working order, ready, like a steam engine, to be turned to any kind of work, and spin the gossamers as well as forge the anchors of the mind; whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature and of the laws of her operations; one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience; who has learned to love all beauty whether of nature or of art, to hate all vileness, and to respect others as himself.—Thomas H. Huxley.

SWEEP away utterly all frothiness and falsehood from your heart. Struggle unweariedly to acquire what is possible for every man,—a free, open, humble soul. Care not for the reward of your speaking, but simply and with undivided mind for the truth of your speaking: then be placed in what section of space and of time soever, do but open your eyes, and they shall actually see, and bring you real knowledge, wondrous, worthy of belief.—Thomas Carlyle.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE expelled Jesuits, who went from France into Spain and Portugal, have not been allowed to remain. Old laws were found by the governments on the statute-books that were adequate to the occasion. All Catholic nations have had trouble with the Jesuits, and know how it is. It looks now as if the exiles would find no asylum except in Protestant countries.

MR. MOSES KING, editor and publisher of the Harvard Register, announces that next year the Register will appear as a magazine, issued monthly as now,—that is, if it appear at all. For the announcement is also made that the publication has not hitherto been a success financially, and will not be continued, unless new encouragement is immediately given to the enterprise. It would seem as if, among the large number of Harvard alumni, there must be enough to whom so excellent a register of what the College has done and is doing would be a sufficient necessity to put the publication above mendicancy. But, whatever may be the result, Mr. King at least, who is still an undergraduate, will have proved himself possessed of eminent gifts for newspaper work, and will have no difficulty in choosing his career.

PUNCTILIOUS Christians have been pretty well satisfied with Mr. and Mrs. President Hayes. But the Presidential party in California, it seems, did as the Californians do, and travelled on Sunday. For this dereliction, the stricter Sabbatarian journals are vigorously calling them to account, without respect to persons. A California correspondent of one of these papers speaks of "the sad fact that President Hayes and party, on several occasions, had desecrated the Lord's day by unnecessary travel thereon," and the correspondent testifies against what he calls the President's "public sin," and in a second letter takes pains to add, for farther relief to his conscience, that he is not quite sure whether he had "also mentioned Mrs. Hayes as a violator of the same holy law." How these "mint-anise-and-cumin" Christians would have been shocked at seeing Jesus "violating the same holy law" in the corn-fields! If none of our Presidents had ever committed any worse "public sins" than this of President Hayes and party, we should have been a fortunate nation.

WHAT may be called a scientific prayer for rain has been invented by a Mr. Daniel Ruggles of Fredericksburg, Va., who has taken out a patent for the same. Noting that rainfalls are apt to occur soon after heavy cannonading, he infers that rain may be artificially produced by causing a violent disturbance in the atmosphere. He has therefore contrived a machine by which a balloon is sent up freighted with torpedoes and cartridges that are charged with all kinds of explosives, such as nitro-glycerine, dynamite, gun-cotton, etc. The balloon is retained in connection with an electrical battery on the ground, and when at a sufficient height the electricity is let on and the powder-cargo exploded. Thunder is produced, certainly; and the inventor claims that a shower will follow. If the invention prove a success, it will afford opportunity for another kind of prayer-gauge than that proposed a few years ago by Professor Tyndall, and free from the special objections which some of the theologians made to his proposition.

THE newspapers, both religious and secular, have been industriously discussing the question whether the Ober-Ammergau Passion-Play ought to be allowed in American theatres; and it is now announced that the proposed introduction of it at Booth's Theatre, New York, has been abandoned,—and in deference to the religious sentiment which was so pronounced against it as Manager Abbey says in his candid letter to the public. From our point of view, the special religious objections that were made to the exhibition would have no weight. Jesus had a perfectly natural career. He was one of the world's great prophets and grandest heroes, who nobly battled for the right and met a tragic fate. As such, his story may be fitly dramatized,—as it has been, without protest, in poetry for reading. But there are ample reasons, on grounds of art, for wholly discountenancing the sensational attempt to transplant behind the foot-lights of a New York theatre a play of this nature,—which is more an act of worship than a play,—and which, in its native soil where it has grown up, derives its special attractiveness from the simplicity of the peasantry who conduct it and from its surroundings and historic antecedents. We should as soon think of bringing over the soil and pavements of the Roman Forum to put down in Broadway.

GOV. HOYT of Pennsylvania having spoken, in his recent Thanksgiving Proclamation, of the State as a "Christian Commonwealth," the Hebrews of Philadelphia forwarded to him a protest. They reminded him that they were law-abiding and patriotic citizens of the Commonwealth, and would like to participate in the religious acts to which the proclamation summoned the people; but this phrase excluded them, as if they were aliens. The Governor, very justly, heeded the protest, and promptly changed the words, which he said had been inadvertently written, to the excellent substitute "Commonwealth of Freemen." Whereupon, the Christian Statesman of Philadelphia is much grieved. It says: "This amounts to a formal official disclaimer of any connection or relation between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the Christian religion. . . . It reminds us painfully of that early treaty between our government and a Mohammedan power, in which it was formally declared that 'the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion, and contains in itself no character of enmity to the laws or religion of Mussulmans.'" This last sentence, inserting "pleasantly" instead of "painfully," we can heartily adopt as our own. It is pleasant to remember, too, that that treaty was signed by George Washington.

THE WORKINGMAN'S SCHOOL.

A Discourse delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture at Chickering Hall, N.Y. City, Oct. 24, 1880.

BY FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

It is necessary to resort to radical measures, if we wish to help the poor. Confronted by the great misery of the so-called perishing classes, there is hardly any one of generous nature who does not attempt, at one time or another, to bring succor to the needy, and avails himself of the ordinary instrumentalities of charity for this purpose. Such efforts have their value, and ought on no account to be remitted. But those who have most zealously engaged in the cause of charity commonly feel most keenly a lack of real satisfaction in their work. It seems so hopeless a task, so much like pouring water on a hot stone! The evil weed of poverty, when lopped off at the surface, continues to grow with redoubled malignity from the roots. It were well, if one could penetrate to the root itself and extirpate that,—if one could help the poor to help themselves. Education is the only accepted means of doing this. And, therefore, all those who have given the subject of human misery careful thought unite in the opinion that education, the best and most thorough education for the people, is what we pre-eminently need. And one hears on all sides the cry, "Education! Education! That is the one sovereign remedy which will help us solve these terrible problems." But while every one is willing to cry, "Education," What is being actually done? is the question we ask. What steps are being taken to give the poor the right education which they need? People are commonly satisfied with having acknowledged the necessity of education, and nothing further is done.

Now, therefore, let us endeavor to make clear to our minds, in the first place, that the sort of education which the children of the people receive is not satisfactory. I do not wish to enter into any extended controversy to prove this. I shall content myself with quoting the opinions of a distinguished writer of this country, whose views carry weight with them as well on account of his name as on account of their own justness, and who at any rate will not be charged with importing foreign ideas into his criticism.* After referring to the report on the Norfolk County schools in Massachusetts, and its astounding exhibition of imperfect methods and deficient results; after saying "that, taking one district as a whole with another, the weight of evidence would seem to indicate that the highly unsatisfactory condition of affairs which has been found to exist in Massachusetts will be found to exist pretty much everywhere else," he proceeds to characterize our common schools "as huge mechanical educational machines, organized, as nearly as possible, as a combination of the cotton mill and the railroad with the model State's prison. It is company front all the time. From one point of view, children are regarded as automatons; from another, as India rubber bags; from a third, as so much raw material. They must move in step, and exactly alike. They must receive the same mental nutriment in equal quantities and at fixed times. Its assimilation is wholly immaterial, but the motions must be gone through with. Finally, as raw material, they are emptied in at the primaries, and marched out at the grammar grades." The complaint is that the science of teaching is neglected, that the universities do not even admit that there is such a thing as a science of teaching. "They have medical schools, devoted to the study of man's body; they have dental schools, devoted to the study of his teeth; but when it comes to the educational development of those who are to constitute the future state, though we spend millions on millions upon it, the universities turn their heads away, and class them as something less than the grass of the field. They grade the child's mind as lower than his teeth." And again, further on, "We turn over our children to those whom we would never dream of intrusting with our potato patch." The result of a purely mechanical method of education, as could not otherwise be expected, is that the memory of the pupils of our common schools is drilled to the neglect of their understanding; that they are taught to remember facts and rules, but that they are not taught to think. We have therefore an educational system without any proper training of the intellectual faculties; that is to say, a system of education with the real educating part left out. The gravity of these charges cannot be overestimated. To those who have previously recognized the overweening importance of education, who have seen how every hope of redemption for the masses of mankind depends upon their right education, the fact that our vaunted common school system is thus shown to be so egregiously deficient must be depressing and saddening in the extreme.

The first impulse upon the hearing of such statements as these might lead to inconsiderate attempts at change. Indignant persons might think of calling public meetings to protest against the management of the schools, or fill the newspapers with articles upon the subject, and thus seek to arouse public attention. More thoughtful persons again might select the remedy proposed by the writer whom we have quoted; namely, to found chairs for the science of teaching in American colleges and universities, and thus by the tardy process of educating the educators seek to cure the evil from above. But, while the former course of conduct would be over-hasty, the latter would be needlessly slow. Agitation alone will not bring about the desired result, because a system of teaching so widely ramified, and upon which the employment of thousands of persons depends, cannot be assailed without exciting violent hostility; nor can it be changed in a month or a year. On the other hand, it should be unnecessary to defer our expectations of improvement until American universities shall have introduced the scientific study of teaching, and the slow results of such a step shall have reacted upon American teaching. It seems to me that private persons of generous disposition ought to take hold of this matter in the first place; that the first thing to be done is to exhibit, by one example, the right method of teaching itself, and to show how superior its results are above those commonly achieved. This can be accomplished, if a number of persons will, of their own volition,—because the improvement of their fellow-men by education has their whole interest,—guarantee the means necessary for the building up of a MODEL SCHOOL, by which the right method shall be illustrated, and will see to it that only the most competent teachers are employed in connection with it. One such school conducted in the right way will do more to change the evils of the existing system than the most earnest advocacy in other directions. The right example, when it has once been set, must be followed; and the persuasiveness of excellence will here, as in other instances, do its work.

The next question that arises—after the persons have been found to start such a school (and the persons have been found, the lower classes of the school are now in operation in this city, with one hundred and fifty scholars)—the next question that arises is, In what ought such a model school for the people to differ from the common schools as they now are? It ought to differ in many respects. It should teach, for instance, history in a better way. The object of the lesson in history should not be to store the pupil's minds with dry facts that are barely connected among themselves, and possess little attraction. It should not aim to fill the imagination of the pupils with pictures of bloody war and the power and pomp of kings. It should not glorify the great slaughterers of their fellow-men, who have been misnamed heroes; nor should it nurture an exaggerated and foolish national pride among the young. But it should awaken in them, as far as possible, an intelligent sympathy with the life of the world and the great phases through which humanity has passed in its struggle toward progress. To do this, the instruction in history must be alive and enlivening. The pupil's intense interest must first be secured. The rule is to be here, as elsewhere, Begin from the near and go on to the remote. Biographical narration should precede the study of history itself. The young children must first be interested in some great persons who lived in Greece, and some remarkable men who lived in Hindustan, and some illustrious men and women who lived in England and France and Spain and Italy, before they will care to know about the countries in which these persons had their home and about the people by whom they were surrounded and about the vicissitudes of those people's history. From the wonderful story of the life of Socrates, to which every child listens with delight, it is easy to conduct the interest of the pupils to the story or history of Athens, in whose market-place Socrates dropped his words of wisdom, in whose streets he held his remarkable conversations with cobblers and aristocrats, and where also his Xanthippe treated him so badly. So the life of Buddha will awaken an interest in Hindustan, the life of Peter the Great an interest in Russia, etc.

The study of geography should be treated in the same way, the rule here also being to proceed always from the near to the remote. The child should first be taught the geography, so to speak, of the house in which it dwells, of the garden around the house, of the street on which the house is situated, of the city which includes all the streets. From the city, the geographical lesson proceeds outward to the State, to the country, and then to other countries. The studies in geography and in history will mutually supplement each other and add to each other's interest. The information which is given the pupil concerning places will become more attractive, because of the knowledge of the historical events which happened there, and the distinguished persons who lived there. The knowledge of events and of the lives of persons, on the other hand, will become more real and more present to the pupil, because he knows the background on which these events appear, the very streets on which these personages walked.

A knowledge of the English language should be communicated in a better way than it now is. The monstrosities of the spelling-lesson should be discarded. The pupil should acquire command of the right spelling of his language by the teacher's careful attention to compositions, by indirect rather than direct ways. He should acquire a firm hold upon the grammar of his mother tongue, by studying the grammar of a cognate tongue; so that a consciousness of the meaning of grammatical forms may be awakened in him by comparison. For, as it is necessary to have two legs to walk well, so it is necessary to command grammatically at least two languages in order to talk well.

A knowledge of mathematics should be communicated in a more effective way than it now is; and our system of work instruction, of which more will be said further on, is peculiarly useful in this direction. Drawing should be taught in the youngest classes, and not left to an advanced grade, as it now often is. Singing should be taught from the fourth year of the child upward. The taste of the pupils in reading should be sedulously cultivated, so that, though they be the children of poor men and women, they may, in later life, be enabled to enjoy the classics of the English language; and so a great fountain of pure recreation may be opened to them, of which they are now unnecessarily deprived, and they may thus be protected against taking pleasure in vicious literature.

A knowledge of the simpler facts of natural history should be communicated, even in the lowest classes. The children's power of observation should be sharpened; and, wherever it is possible, they should be brought face to face with the objects of nature themselves. There is here an open field of instruction which is too little cultivated in the schools. We complain of the dearth of happiness for the majority of human lives: we ought, at least, to utilize those means of happiness that are at hand. The book of nature offers many noble and elevating lessons to those who are able to read its language: it were well worth while to make even the children of the poorer class proficient in understanding that beautiful language.

In all these respects, we do not claim to introduce what is novel in education: we simply follow where the best educators of Europe have long since pointed the way, and give to children who are now educated by methods that are behind the age the benefit of such methods as are abreast of the progress of the age.

But there is one main point on which we believe we have to offer what is essentially new and what will constitute an epoch in education, if it be generally accepted. We mean the inclusion of hand education as an essential part of school education.* I take it for granted that free popular education ought to be especially for the children of the poorer class, who are not able to provide suitable education for their offspring themselves; for the children of the working people, who will be in their turn the working people of the future. I take it that public education ought especially to fit this class for their future station in life. And it is this class whose needs ought especially to appeal to the sympathy of the more fortunate, whom we have had in view in attempting to build up a model school. Now, if there is any one thing which the working people need and which, therefore, the common welfare demands,—for the interests of the community at large and of the working people are most intimately bound up together,—it is that greater dignity shall attach to hand labor. There is no kind of work that does not become attractive, when dignity attaches to it. Work of the hardest kind is performed every day by men of science, work which involves personal discomfort and the overcoming of physical disgust, and yet it is cheerfully done because of the intellectual dignity that elevates such work. Every physician renders, in his practice, menial and repulsive services which no servant could be hired to render; and the physician, far from being disgraced, is ennobled by his service. In the same way, we believe that the tedious work of the working people could be rendered more easy to them, and even elevating, if only greater dignity could be made to attach to it, if only more intellect could be put into it. And we look to hand education in the school as a means of accomplishing this desirable object. There are certain mental operations that underlie manual operations. These the children should be taught, so that their manual operations may become transparent to the mental operations that underlie them. There are great natural laws and wonderful powers of human contrivance illustrated in the machines that surround the worker in the factory, but the eyes of the worker are closed, so that he does not see; the ears of the worker are dull, so that he does not hear; his brain drowses in the midst of these splendid activities, because it has not been roused by early education.

In modern times, capable men have discovered that there is such a thing as a theory of tools, that tools can be classified and grouped, and that a child's mind can be led along in orderly succession, in learning them. It has been shown that there are three great types of tools, involving three principles through which, and their combinations, every kind of tool can be explained. There are reasons underlying manipulation. There is a reason why the teeth of the saw are set in a particular manner; there is a reason why an axe should be wielded in a particular way, why an axe splits and why a knife cuts wood. The double-cutting edge of a plane exhibits a rational contrivance, and has an interesting explanation of its own. The children ought to be taught these reasons, and made to understand these explanations, even while they use the saw and wield the axe and strike with the hammer and move to and fro the plane. And, later on, in a higher stage of industrial education, what is called the Russian system comes into play. The novelty and the importance of this is that it is developed in a graded series of workshops, which are used for educational purposes only; that the products of the young workman's labor are not salable articles, are not intended at all for the purposes of barter, but are, in all cases, typical forms, intended solely for the purposes of manual instruction. The educational workshops form a graded series. In each workshop there is a particular class of learners, and there are elementary lessons for the use of beginners in the schools, and advanced lessons for the more advanced. And, in each of these workshops, the use of one set of tools only is taught; and the pupil remains in this one workshop, until he has mastered the theory and practice of this one set of tools. He is then graduated into a higher workshop, until he has finished the whole course. And so he learns how to work in wood, and learns metal turning, and fitting and planing and forging. And some of the coarsest and some of the most repugnant kinds of labor are thus made interesting, and redeemed from their coarseness because they are now saturated with understanding. The labor of the hands becomes attractive, because it blooms with mind.

And now, another step forward; I believe that work education can be given to the youngest children, in the lowest classes of the school. And here is perhaps the main point, in which the importance of what we consider to be our new departure in education becomes apparent. For industrial education has long ago been given in many countries of the world, to older children, boys of fifteen or sixteen years of age; but industrial education has never, to our knowledge, been given to the younger children, has never been introduced in the lower classes of schools, has never been combined organically with the whole scheme of education, and been made to support and coalesce with all the other studies of the child. And there are other ways, assuredly, which must occur to everybody, in which industrial education must tend to elevate the workman, developing his æsthetic sense, giving him a taste of the artist's pleasure in his work, giving him greater skill, and thus enabling him to command higher wages and more of the comforts of life. But it is with industrial education as a means of fostering the dignity and independence of the workman that we are mainly concerned. For, upon the possession of these qualities, it will depend whether the working-people of the future will work out their own salvation.

And, if it be true that by industrial education we can give greater dignity to labor, I should like to dwell now upon the necessity which exists, especially at the present time and in our country, for elevating labor in the eyes of the laborer. For, in this country, the political equality of the entire people is the very fundamental principle of our form of government. But history has shown, in lessons whose terrible significance ought not to remain unheeded, that wherever political equality exists, and with it great social inequalities, there the greatest danger menaces republican liberty. The people are taught to consider themselves sovereign. From them, all authority emanates. There is no distinction between the richest and the poorest in their rights before the law. Every citizen is, as it were, a king; but thousands on thousands of these kings are kings in rags. They have all the proud feeling of independence and of equality with their neighbors, but their actual condition comports ill with these pretensions. They are poverty-stricken, live meagrely in wretched houses, in filthy quarters of large cities. They cannot help comparing their own surroundings with the palatial residences of others, with the ease and abundance enjoyed by their neighbors, while their own hard drudgery scarce gives them the crust of bread which they need to satisfy hunger. And they cannot help reflecting that those others are their equals; they have been taught to consider them so, and they are goaded even into mad, mob fury by the thought that those who are more fortunate than themselves have no title to what they possess. It is in this way that anarchy arises, and freedom is entombed amid the ruins of civil order. It was in this way that Florence fell into the hands of the Medici, because the poor republicans could no longer tolerate the difference between themselves and the rich republicans; and the rich republicans, becoming alarmed, and willing to sacrifice their liberty rather than their riches, called in despotism to keep down the hungry crowd by force of arms. It was in this way that French republicanism fell, because the men in blouses, hearing of nothing but liberty, fraternity, and equality, concluded that it was neither liberal nor fraternal nor, above all things, a sign of equality that they should drink sour wine and live on the miserable pittance of a few sous, while there were others, their fellow republicans, who dwelt in sumptuous affluence and controlled the wealth of nations. And so, the possessing class of France being terrified, it became possible that an adventurer, whose hand was stained with blood, the murderer of the 2d of December, was able to establish a second time the yoke of imperialism, that his sins were forgotten, his falsehoods were forgiven, his murders were condoned, and he himself was hailed as the savior of society. And in our country also, though the safeguards are still strong, though the very idea of a subversion of our institutions seems to many so improbable as to be outside of discussion, yet have we, too, already had distinct warnings that all is not well. The flames of the Pittsburg riot, which startled the whole land, were kindled during the last financial crisis. A season of prosperity has returned to us, and what has gone before is by many forgotten.

But another panic will come after the prosperity; the experience of the past leads us to expect that with almost certainty. And, when there are again want and starvation among the people, who will say why discontent should not again assume wild forms? The same conditions are beginning to exist here as elsewhere; and, where there are the same conditions, it is inexorably true there must always be the same results. The same conditions are beginning to exist here as elsewhere. A pauper class is beginning to grow up among us, incapable of permanently lifting themselves to better conditions by their own exertions, incapable of obtaining the satisfaction of their most natural desires, and only rendered more dangerous and furious by the sense of equality with all others, with which our political institutions have inspired them. If the evil has not yet become so aggravated as it is in the Old World, let us utilize the time of respite that is given to us by undertaking earnest and vigorous measures to check the evil's growth. And, of all these possible measures of prevention, a suitable, a sensible system of education is assuredly the most promising. Let us use what influence we have to correct the false idea of equality that is everywhere current around us. Let us teach the people the true meaning of the great principle of equality,—namely, that all men are created equal in respect to certain fundamental rights, such as liberty, the protection of the person, and a right to the pursuit of happiness, but that there is by no means equality of natural fitness and endowment, and that the offices of life must always therefore be unequally divided. Let us impress upon the minds of the children that the business of life will always be carried on in a hierarchy of services, and that there is no shame in doing a lesser service in this hierarchy; that all honor accrues to us only in doing that function well to which we are committed, and taking pride and finding dignity in its performance. And to enable the working people of the future to take pride and find dignity in the work of their hands is the object of the work education which we are seeking to introduce into our school. I do not say that the present hierarchy of services is arranged upon a just or fair plan. I do not say that those are in the higher grades who ought to be, and those in the lower who belong there. The reverse is often true. But, if a change in the interest of righteousness is to be made, it must come from the working people themselves. It is their heightened self-respect, it is their increased intellectuality, it is their sense of their dignity as working people, which will alone enable them to accomplish the wished-for result.

And there is another and a higher reason why greater intellectuality should be infused into labor, and why the union of work instruction with other branches of instruction will be of far-reaching importance. For the intellectuality of labor is an indispensable—so far too little appreciated—means of emancipating the minds of the laborers from the bondage of superstition. We do not propose, in our workingman's school, to interfere with the religious faith of any of our pupils. We hold, in the strictest possible sense, to the principle of unsectarian education. We do not cast a slur, either directly or by implication, upon the creeds that obtain among the majority of our fellow-citizens. We invite Catholic and Protestant parents to intrust their children to our guidance equally with the unbelievers. As a matter of fact, the majority of our pupils are probably Catholic and Protestant. We cannot speak of this with certainty. We do not know. We never inquire into the religious or non-religious views of those who bring their children to the school. We leave all matters of creed severely alone. But, while we do not think it our province to refer to religious views, we aim to cultivate the power of independent judgment among our pupils; we aim to sharpen their understandings and to quicken their consciences, so that they may naturally repel and cast off from them, later on, every kind of superstition. We aim to give them, though they are only the children of the working people, in the true sense, a liberal education. We aim to give them a mind, into which the abject quality of fear, out of which all superstition grows, will never enter. We aim to educate them so that they will never become the stuff of which idolaters are made. We seek to give them such high and free views of the meaning of human life as it is commonly believed only the most cultivated are capable of holding, but which, I am sincerely persuaded, can be made the common property of all men, in every walk of life, if only the right training be given in childhood. And I look to industrial education as a special means for achieving this result.

Let me here draw an historical parallel between what we are endeavoring to accomplish and what the Jesuits accomplished, in order to make my meaning more clear. I refer to the Jesuits, because they afford the most wonderful illustration of the power of education to change the world. We all theoretically believe that education can do a great deal; but, in the results achieved by the Jesuits, we have ocular testimony of what education can do. The Jesuits did change the convictions of nations. In the year 1551, they were first introduced into Germany. Fifteen years thereafter, they had already worked a marvellous alteration in the sentiments of large bodies of the German people. Their order was the power which checked the seemingly irresistible current of Protestant opinion, which was sweeping over the nations and threatened to carry everything before it. Their influence went on increasing from year to year. At the end of the seventeenth century, the pupils of a single one of the colleges numbered three thousand; and there were over six hundred of these colleges, besides more than the same number again of other educational institutions in their hands. And the same instruments which the Jesuits used for exerting deep influence by means of education, we are to use, only that we must differ from them, as pole differs from pole, in the purposes for which these instruments are applied. We are to learn, in the first place, that they achieved their splendid victories by the excellence of their schools. They did their work excellently well. The philosopher Bacon praised them; Descartes praised them; the Protestant educational reformer, John Sturm, was compelled to give unwilling testimony to their superiority. The sort of instruction which they offered the people was better than the instruction to which the people had access at that time, and therefore they gained the confidence of the people. And we must learn from them that, if we would gain the confidence of the people, we also must give a superior kind of instruction to that which is obtainable elsewhere. We are to note in the case of the Jesuits, as a second significant fact, that their services to the people were rendered gratuitously,—that it was free education which they offered, in order that the people might not suspect them of mercenary motives in their efforts for the common good. And we may learn from them that such education as we have to offer to the children of the working people must be gratuitous likewise, at whatever cost to ourselves, so that we, too, may not fall under the blighting suspicion of motives which we do not entertain. And thirdly, and chiefly, we may learn from the Jesuits to make education complete in itself, so that the life of the pupils may become harmonious in all its parts. They deemed it their mission to uphold the principle of authority in religion,—yes, it was the supreme object of their order to reëstablish the habit of unquestioning submission to religious authority, which had been shaken by the Reformation. But they were far-sighted enough to perceive that they could not maintain the principle of authority in religion, unless they maintained it also in science, in literature, and in life throughout.

And so they established a series of popes, so to speak, for every department of mental activity. A pope for philosophy, Aristotle, whose authority was not to be questioned; a pope for theology proper, Thomas Aquinas, from whose authority no one was to depart; a pope even for style, Cicero, from whose modes of expression no essential deviation was permitted: and all these popes, in order to strengthen the authority of the supreme pope in religion, because the Jesuits well knew that the habit of accepting on faith must be cultivated in every direction, if it is to hold good in any. And we, who wish to achieve the very opposite end of that sought by the Jesuits,—namely, to establish the principle of liberty in place of authority,—can yet learn from them the means by which we are to gain our end. If it is not possible partially to educate the human being with any good results; if, to make him free in one direction, it is necessary that the habit of freedom be cultivated in every direction,—then is it most necessary that independence of judgment should be cultivated in that which constitutes the daily practice of men's lives, in their vocations. If the whole meaning of the combat against darkness, against the infamous tyranny of soul enslavers, is to make men accept nothing upon tradition, merely because some authority has said or written it, but to induce them in every case to ask the reasons why; if this habit of asking the reason why be itself the emancipation of the human race,—and, if it were general, would permit no form of spiritual despotism ever again to assert itself,—then is it most essential that men should know the reason why in those things which they practise daily,—that they should not perform a task, ten hours every day, six days of the week, of which they do not understand the reasons why, which some one has merely set them to perform, which they perform with automatic precision, because the habit of doing things automaton-like, of acting without understanding, and therefore, by an inevitable connection, of believing without understanding, is thus so deeply ingrained into their lives. And so there can be nothing more salutary, more wholesome, more efficient for good than a system of work education, which shall relieve industry of its deadness and its dulness, and give to the laborers the reasons why of those occupations with which they are daily concerned.

For there are complicated intellectual processes incorporated in the machines that fill the factories. A system of education, therefore, we must have, that shall enable the future workman to read the marvellous instructions contained in the machines that surround him. There are lessons stored up in the wood, in the iron, in the coal, in the raw material of the factory's products, that would open up endless riches of scientific information to the mind of the worker, if his mind were trained to appreciate them. A system of education, therefore, we must have, which shall train the workman to look upon the raw material, whereon he labors, no more as the raw material only of his employer's profits, but as the product of nature's bounty, the key to some of nature's most wondrous secrets. We need, we are seeking to apply the principle which ought to be at the foundation of every modern scheme of education: that, as experiment conjoined with observation, is necessary to the discovery of truth, so object-creating must supplement object-teaching in that rediscovery of truths which it is the purpose of all education to facilitate. We lend entirely new import to the method of work education in the schools. It is not a something outside of their regular instruction, it is a part of the regular instruction; it becomes a means of teaching mathematics more thoroughly, causing the pupils to work out mathematical propositions, as it were, with their very hands. It becomes the means of teaching natural history more effectively. It is worked into inseparable connection with the entire scheme of the scholar's mental and moral development. And so we keep in view the one great purpose which is so essential for the workman's future happiness, to make the hand a wise and cunning hand by putting more brain into it. But, on the other hand, we also seek to make the brain a clear and vigorous and enlightened brain, by giving it the constant corrective of the demonstrations of the hand. And the children of the richest ought to avail themselves of this benefit as well as the children of the poorest. And so industrial education has a message for all classes, if it were only understood.

And here it may become apparent why our school is not an industrial school in the sense which commonly attaches to that word. We shun the name, and call ours the workingman's school, because we wish to keep away from us the ideas that are associated so frequently with the name of industrial schools. We do not propose to give our pupils an aptitude for any particular trade. We do not propose to make them tailors or shoemakers or printers. We would consider that a retrograde step rather than a step in advance, if we were to prevent these young lads and little girls from enjoying even a few years in gaining knowledge, without any reference to the pitiable necessities of their after-lives. We do not propose to yoke their young souls, before they have had time to expand at all, into the harness of trade, merely for the sake of getting their bread better afterward. We propose to give them that which will secure them bread and many of the higher treasures of human existence besides. We propose to give them broad and generous education, such as children of the richest might be glad in many respects to share with them; which will prepare our pupils for their future station in life, but also make them capable of living in a truly human way. We propose to educate our pupils, so that they shall become not working drudges, not working clods, not working slaves in the treadmill of labor; but, if they are to be *working*men and *working*women, that they shall also be, and never cease to be, in the best and noblest sense, working*men* and working*women*. And so our school shall not be a "ragged school" either. We do not want the odor of the charity school about it. The rooms shall be light and airy and bright, and the appointments such as would be found in any well-conducted school. We do not want the sulky air of the charity pupil about our pupils. The tone of the children shall be manly and joyous and free; and they shall not know at all, if we can help it, until they are much older than they now are that they have any one to thank for what they receive.

Such a school, then, we would build up, whose fundamental purpose may be expressed in the words, the emancipation of the working classes through their work. And, if we cannot find competent teachers here, we shall not wait till American universities will give us what we want, but we shall call the most competent teachers we can obtain from abroad, and so transplant the richest results of European experience to our own soil, though always so modifying the matter and the method of instruction as to suit the altered conditions of American life.

And if there be any one who says: What business of ours is it to take an interest in such endeavors? What interest have we in the children of laborers? Let the public school system go on. If it must be changed, some one will in due time change it; but why should we put ourselves to trouble and expense for such an undertaking?—Oh friends, if any one asks such a question, I cannot answer him! That he should ask the question is proof that he has no heart for the needs of his fellow-beings. When did it occur to the men who spilled their precious blood like water on the battle-fields of the Rebellion to ask what business of theirs it was that the slave's chains should be unloosed, that the black man's rights should be conceded, that the blot of human bondage should be erased from the Constitution of our land? The men who fought for their country, the men who died for the cause of liberty on the American Continent, knew that it is the highest interest of every individual that right shall be done and that wrong shall be overthrown, that happiness shall be multiplied on earth and unjust sufferings shall be washed away. And so it is a part of our highest interest, of the highest personal interest of every one, that the chains of ignorance shall be broken which load down the multitude, and that the sufferings shall be obliterated which are but the consequence of their mental helplessness. And, if any one says: Yes: the work is great and holy, but it is too great, too vast, too mighty for us to do it, I answer: We can do at least our part. We can make a beginning in the right direction; and, when the good results begin to appear, others will come to our assistance, and the good work will not be allowed to fall to the ground.

The other day, when I visited this workingman's school of ours, of which the two lower classes are now in operation, I asked the principal whether he could show me who is now the best pupil in the school. He pointed to a little fellow in one of the foremost rows, saying: "This little boy came to us almost covered with filth. For a time, it was necessary to wash him every morning in the school itself before he could be admitted to his class, and he appeared to be utterly dull and stupid; but, after a time, it seemed as though with the physical filth the mental filth also wore off, and he became bright and attentive, as if a new light had been lit in his soul." More of that light we want. Come, those who have an interest in the welfare of their kind, and help us to kindle it.

"INSINCERITY IN THE PULPIT."

Another Voice.

To expect men to be perfectly sincere when you place them in a position like that of most ministers is expecting too much of human nature. Insincerity is simply inevitable. The mass of men, whether in or out of the pulpit, whether regenerate or unregenerate, churchmen or worldlings, are ruled by a stern utilitarianism. They may acknowledge the claims of a lofty idealism; but they are one thing in faith and another in practice. Occasionally, a rare soul rises above all material considerations, and is willing to face desertion, persecution, and poverty, in his loyalty to his own mind and conscience. But as yet the great majority of us are nearer to men and to the earth than to the gods. The clay indeed abounds in our composition, and is most felt and recognized.

The minister, it is true, professes to serve God, and not Mammon. But, when a man has given up all thoughts of every other occupation but that of preaching, when he is absolutely unfitted by long habits of life and mind and study for any other pursuit but that of the minister, and has become dependent upon the good opinion of congregations for his own and his family's living, is it not too much to expect that he will be perfectly sincere, if that sincerity may cost him his bread and butter?

The theological basis of the various churches of Christendom inevitably converts them, in time, into organizations for the suppression of truth. This was not their primary object. They had a purer and grander aim. But with the lapse of time, and the unfolding thought and energies of the mind, they become this in the end,—organizations to suppress the truth.

Can the fearful pressure of these organizations be felt by hundreds of thousands of poor ministers, without the production of insincerity? We take for granted that these ministers read the newspapers of the day, at least. We suppose that they have an ordinary love of truth, that they have ordinary activity of mind, that they know what is being thought and said in the world, and that they are subject to the mental and moral forces which move society forward.

If this be true, it is absolutely inevitable that the pulpit must contain a vast amount of insincerity. It grows out of the very relation of the minister to his church and his sect. In becoming the servant of that sect, he has virtually given up his individual rights as a thinker. He has hired himself to do what? Not merely to preach the universally acknowledged principles of truth and justice, but something more; namely, those ideas of God, of man, of creation, of redemption, of inspiration, of the Bible, of heaven and hell, which have come from a past full of ignorance and superstition. If the man, then, does not absolutely stand still, what else possibly must be the result but insincerity? The cause, however, lies back of the pulpit; and, if the churches persevere in their stupid refusal to change their standards or their forms, let them not complain, as they do, of heartlessness and inefficiency. Put out a man's faith, and you extinguish his fire. Let him feel that he occupies a false position, that he is out of harmony with the creed he professes to believe, and he will have little soul for the work in which he is engaged. R. H.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE EARLY HISTORY OF CHARLES JAMES FOX. By George Otto Trevelyan, M.P., author of The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay. New York: Harper & Brothers.

An author's second book could hardly have a better recommendation than Mr. Trevelyan's first will generally be esteemed by the reading world. The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay was certainly an admirable book. It was made so both by what Lord Macaulay was himself and by Mr. Trevelyan's management of his material. It would, however, have been quite possible for Mr. Trevelyan to follow that success with as eminent a failure with a subject so different and so differently approached as this which he has chosen for his second book. As his nephew, Mr. Trevelyan stood very near to Lord Macaulay and was in full possession of all the letters and papers necessary for the development of his work. He had not to choose between various and oftentimes conflicting authorities. The canons of taste by which he had to square himself marked his principal danger and his most admirable success, which had its limits. That in the life of Charles James Fox he has a much greater subject than he had in Lord Macaulay, the fondest admirer of the Whig historian will not deny. But he is a century remote from the period of which he treats. Many opinions have prevailed concerning Fox, and he must hold the balance with judicial fairness. Success here is by no means certain because the success with Lord Macaulay was so ample.

We take for granted that The Early History of Charles James Fox is the precursor of one or two other volumes that will rehearse with equal fulness the middle and later periods of the great statesman's life. Mr. Trevelyan would hardly content himself with writing, however well, that part of his hero's life which was the least heroic. When the remaining volumes are written, if they are equal to the volume before us, Mr. Trevelyan will have written a book that will be a much greater and nobler and more difficult success than his life of Lord Macaulay. And it will be much more than an excellent biography of Charles James Fox. Not unadvisedly, we imagine, has the author called his book a "History." It is a history thus far, and it will probably continue to be one till the end. The life of Fox is presented in a setting, social and political, which brings out the features of his mind and character as they could not be brought out in any other way. This setting is necessary, in order that we may know to what an almost unexampled extent the faults of Fox were those of his generation, while his virtues were preëminently his own. Yet, even at this remove, it is hard to understand how such a lively sense of political justice as was his could coexist with such a degrading vice as gambling carried to the last extreme of madness.

Mr. Trevelyan's new book is a success, whatever waits beyond. No future failure, which we need not anticipate, can blur the lines in which the early character of Fox is drawn upon these pages, in connection with the brilliant series of events that gave to his career its points of opposition and departure. An opening chapter gives a clear idea of Lord Holland, Fox's father, who was certainly no saint, but had some good qualities mixed with his many bad ones. The childhood and youth of Fox are exhibited in the second chapter, and in the third we have an admirable picture of the society into which Fox was launched while still a brilliant boy. A more frivolous, gambling, drinking, licentious, and venal generation England has not seen before or since, despite the good example of the king, all of whose virtues were private, all of whose sins were sins against the State. The relation of the king to the two great parties is well depicted in the fourth chapter. Chapter fifth reviews the Wilkes controversy and the espousal of his cause by the Foxes; and chapter sixth continues the same subject, with Lord Chatham once again upon the scene. The next chapter treats of the conditions which attended the entrance of Charles Fox on his parliamentary career, of his literary tastes, his travels on the continent, and his return. In the following chapter, we see Fox making his maiden speech, with Burke for an opponent. We see him go on as wrong-headed and violent as possible, opposing every principle with which his name became identified in his maturity, assisting liberty by making tyranny too odious even for its habitual apologists, wonderfully clever, but exceedingly pert and impudent. But, in the two succeeding and final chapters, we perceive already the beginnings of that change which was to revolutionize his temper and his aims. We see him advocating the Dissenter's Relief Bill, arousing by such action the animosity of the king; and then going one step further,—a step that was a stride,—opposing the Royal Marriage Bill with an earnestness and sincerity that drove him out of the ministry, made the king his inveterate enemy, and opened for him that magnificent career in which, "sick of the prison-house whose secrets had so early been familiar to him, he dissolved his partnership with Sandwich and Wedderburn, and united himself to Burke and Chatham and Savile in their crusade against the tyranny that was trampling out English liberty in the colonies and the corruption that was undermining it at home." And all this is so clearly told, in a style so admirable for its serenity and force, with such an evident determination to tell the simple truth and abjure all whitewashing, that we are swept along by the current of the book almost too rapidly, and suddenly find ourselves at the end, impatient for the next instalment. May it come as soon as it can, and justify the promise of the part in hand!

THE December Atlantic contains a large number of articles, with variety enough to satisfy a large number of readers. E. L. Godkin argues for a higher code of newspaper ethics, by showing that public opinion both in England and in the United States fosters an untrammelled freedom of the press; that the public appetite for personal and private news items is omnivorous; and that this state of things leads to a great amount of mental suffering on the part of persons defamed by newspaper reports, while the legal remedy for this kind of injury is quite inadequate. The argument will interest those who are eager to see formal legislation keep step with the refinements of a high civilization. Henry James, Jr., continues his story, "The Portrait of a Lady." It is not a thorough work of art, in that he has made his heroine and the accompanying characters embody a multitude of theories, which he carefully states beforehand. The fulness of his analysis leaves us little to imagine about them; but it is a representative story in showing the effect of nationality on personal development, and (perhaps with a touch of disapproval) the modification which womanly character undergoes when intellectual culture outstrips emotion. It contains more fact and philosophy than art, but is very agreeable reading. "The Later Writings of Mr. Mallock" is an article which stirs the intensest interest of those who deem that the final settlement of religious problems ought to employ the keenest intellects of our generation. As a matter of fact, it seems a pity that so much mental power should be spent in philosophizing upon the old facts, while there is such crying need of its expenditure in the acquisition of new ones. It would certainly be more rational in those who, like Mr. Mallock, deplore the probable effect of agnosticism on human character, to direct their studies by an observation of the characters of typical agnostics rather than to argue about the fatal results of the new philosophy from the solitude of their libraries. The criticisms upon Mr. Mallock are candid, and make this article the best in the number. "The Romance of Sunrise Rock," by Charles Egbert Craddock, is a tender and beautiful little love story. "Children's Labor: a Problem," is a short statistical paper by Emma E. Brown. It is valuable as one more attempt to apply the scientific method to philanthropy. "The Æsthetic Value of the Sense of Smell" hints at a possible classification of odors, and dwells upon the inferior development of this sense in the human species. "Reminiscences of Washington" gather up the political, social, and artistic occurrences of the Polk administration. "Gray, Collins, and Beattie," is a paper which will interest those who care for nice criticisms and comparisons of the lesser English poets. Kate Gannett Wells writes a half-dozen pages about "The Transitional American Woman," which impart to us an uncomfortable conviction that the American woman is a very Protean institution, indeed, which is not to be found at present in any particular shape. As nearly as we can make out, the writer considers that there is much to deplore as well as much to hope for in the transitional woman. The most instructive point which she makes is her reminder that the faces and manners of American women are "stamped with restlessness and self-consciousness." "Mary Wollstonecraft," by George E. Woodberry, is a vindication of the memory of the first Englishwoman who planned and wrote for the elevation of her sex. The story of her life is told in very touching and tender fashion.

Of the poetry of the number, Rose Terry Cooke's "All Saints' Eve" will linger with a sweet painfulness in the minds of those who read it carefully; and Oliver Wendell Holmes' tribute to Benjamin Peirce is a just and beautiful expression of reverence and indebtedness to a man of science and a loving friend.

IN the International Review for December, R. W. Dale, D.D., begins a series of articles on the "State Support of Denominational Schools in England." He shows how popular education is crippled and hindered by sectarian influences. Only the poorer classes really attend the public schools there. All the leading denominations maintain schools of their own and in consequence, in a large majority of localities, public schools are impossible. To this system, the English seem to be very thoroughly wedded. Dr. Dale sees no promise in the direction of perfectly secular public schools, wherein there shall be no religious teaching of any kind whatever. This is the only hope for the future, sure to be ultimately realized in this country. Religious instruction must be outside of the schools, in the home or elsewhere, but not in the school. We suggest to Dr. Dale this remedy as the one he seeks. There is a very careful account of the "English Philosophy and Philosophers," pointing out its leading characteristics, calling attention to some of its younger teachers, and claiming great things for it in the future. "The Drink Problem" is handled in a very able manner by Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in one of the best articles on the subject which has appeared in a long time. There are also papers of considerable value by Karl Blind, Walter Chamberlain, M.P., Edward Atkinson, and others.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 2, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

PULPIT ETHICS.

If the object of Rev. Edward Everett Hale, in writing his article last summer for the North American Review on "Insincerity in the Pulpit," was to start talk on the subject, he must be abundantly satisfied with the result. As our own columns bear witness, the question is one that has struck vital interests, and writers from various points of view have had their say upon it. Orthodox journals especially have given their attention to it. Secular papers, too, have given it a piece of their minds.

But talk is not always discussion; and Mr. Hale, we notice, complains, in an article in the Independent of November 11, that the talk in this case, particularly in the orthodox journals, avoids the question which with him was the primary one, and the one expressly stated, namely: "Does the American people, as a whole, believe that the preachers say all they know?" Even if the preachers are not insincere, he thinks that there is a very prevalent belief that they are so, and that this popular belief is undermining the power of the pulpit. How this popular belief has arisen, and how it may be removed is a question of great moment for the preachers, and for all who have the interests of religion at heart, to answer.

But what has specially and painfully struck us in the newspaper discussion of the subject is the disposition to apologize for and excuse insincerity in preachers. The preachers are but men, it is argued. They are generally poor men with families; and it is a struggle with them for a livelihood, and they are subject to the same motives as other human beings in similar circumstances. Our good, radical friend, "R. H.," in the communication we print this week, in his eagerness to set the blame back on the churches, sets forth this argument,—rather to our surprise, we confess, if, indeed, he did not intend to be understood as speaking satirically. Elsewhere, we have seen the plea put forth that ministers, in general, are under the same conservative influences as their congregations; that, on the average, the men in the pulpit are of the same natural temperament, the same mental timidity, the same degree of moral courage, as the people in the pews; and that, therefore, no more can be expected of the preachers in the recognition and utterance of advanced theological views than of the hearers.

Now, with all due respect to those who would come to the defence of the preachers with such pleas, we must express our conviction that they are doing their clients a very poor service, and are helping to bring the pulpit into the very disrepute from which they would seek to clear it. All attempts to justify or excuse insincerity in the pulpit on these grounds, seem to us of essentially the same piece with those apologies that are too frequently offered at the present day for moral shortcomings, and offences of all kinds, on the part of ministers. It is not infrequent that even grave moral delinquencies in the ministerial profession are now passed over with the remark that ministers are but human, like the rest of mankind, and that it is not to be supposed that they are removed wholly above the ordinary temptations of humanity. And this mantle of apologetic charity is further enlarged by the strong modern tendency among ministers themselves—a tendency encouraged by the community—to come out of the traditional exclusiveness of the profession in respect to many habits and forms of conduct, and to mingle freely with the world and do as other people do. They are but men, it is said: let them act like men.

There is a speciousness in this plea that confuses, because there is one good, healthy sentiment at the bottom of it. We do not wonder that there should be a revolt from the old-time idea of formalistic ministerial morality, and that standards of professional conduct, which have been held rigidly in certain traditional grooves of habit, should be overhauled, and compelled to give a good reason for their existence or be cast down and abandoned. All this is as it should be. The minister is a man as well as a minister, and he does not abjure his manhood by becoming a minister. Yet we are old-fashioned enough to believe that a man who becomes a minister does thereby profess a higher standard of conduct, and is to be practically judged by a higher standard, than the average standard prevailing in the community around him or even in his own congregation. If he does not, why does he become a minister at all? By his very office, he is to be a teacher of morality; and, if he lives by no higher standard than that which obtains practically in society about him, what and how is he to teach? Is there any law of ethics by which moral profession and moral practice can be disconnected? We fully admit—nay, claim—that by entering the profession of the ministry a man does not take upon himself any vows to go apart from human society into a select circle of beings, where there is a special code of ethics; that he does not pledge himself to the performance of any extra-human morality. But we maintain that he does, by his very adoption of the ministry as his work, take upon himself a vow to preach and to practise the very highest human morality; that he does pledge himself, with his own conscience and with the community, to abstain from certain habits and actions which may be prevalent enough in average society around, but which it is one of his special functions to reform or remove;—not that these actions and habits are merely inconsistent with a formalistic standard of a ministerial life, but because they are inconsistent with the highest manhood, to the illustration of which by precept and example the minister has consecrated himself. The things that a preacher must do or abstain from doing are the same that are obligatory upon all men, because to do or to abstain is the condition of true character; but upon him the obligation rests with special force, because he has assumed the office of giving public instruction to men concerning their highest obligations.

Therefore, we cannot appreciate the apologies that are made for insincerity in the pulpit, more than for any other moral delinquencies of ministers, on the ground that ministers are only human beings and consequently not above the temptations of human beings. Yes, ministers are human; but nevertheless they should by their position be above such moral infirmities as it is sought in this way to excuse, or else they have no legitimate right to the position. They are to define the word "human" by its noblest and strongest contents, not by its weakest; and because of the greatness of their office they are rightly to be judged by an exceptionally high standard of character. We ought to look for something better from them than from most people. It is no more than just or proper to expect of ministers less of regard to mere outward prosperity and financial success than is found in the average man or woman of their congregations. We ought, indeed, to be trained to expect of them that heroic fidelity to convictions of truth and righteousness which succumbs to no considerations of mere prudence, and takes no counsel of policy or expediency. Sincerity, especially, is the cornerstone of all the virtues. If a minister have not this, he not merely fails of reaching the highest success in his office, but he teaches positive immorality, and is a public bane. If the ministerial profession has lost somewhat of its old power, we believe that the loss is owing not a little to the lowering of its standard of conduct, under this plea that its members are but "human," so that only a common goodness can be expected of them. It is a fatal fallacy to suppose that the immoral part of the world is to be made better by leaders who have a fellow-feeling with its infirmities by such close proximity to them as actually to share them. The lift must come from those who have already freed themselves, and reached some height clean above the common moral level of their times. Put into the pulpit or upon the platform that utter sincerity, deadly in earnest, which is the root of all valorous deeds, and let it be trained to the service of the free intellect and the humane heart of the new times, and the ministry will in time win back its old leadership.

AFTER THANKSGIVING.

A word concerning our great, no longer New England, but national, autumnal festival just passed, may yet be timely, though one of retrospection rather than anticipation. It is quite obvious that, irrespective of the views entertained in regard to it, whether those of the conservative or radical, it is a day of universal welcome. Fortunately, it has always been much more than a religious one, as the term ordinarily is used. If it has been an occasion for church-going, prayers, and songs of thanksgiving, it has been no less distinguished for good cheer, and the pleasures of the table, the reunion of families, the quickening and strengthening of reciprocal friendship and affection.

According to early New England record, the indispensable turkey was a conspicuous figure in the gustatory attractions of its initiatory celebration.

At the close of the first autumn, the Pilgrims of Plymouth were much elated with hope. "The husbandry of the year had proved a prosperous beginning.... All summer there was no want.... There was a great store of wild turkeys, of which they took many, besides venison." The fowlers were sent out by the Governor, "that so they might, after a special manner, rejoice together after they had gathered the fruit of their labors," the first celebration of the national festival of New England, the autumnal Thanksgiving. On that occasion of hilarity, they "exercised their arms," and for three days "entertained and feasted" Massasoit and some ninety of his people, who made a contribution of five deer to the festivity. "Health was restored, household fires were burning, and in good heart and hope the lonely company disposed themselves to meet the rigor of another winter." (Vide Palfrey's History of New England, vol. I., p. 187.) And this festive characteristic of the observance, indicated by the passage here quoted, has been steadily gaining on the other. It is this purely natural and humanitarian element which has chiefly contributed to give to it the permanence it has assumed as a custom, as is the case in respect to similar festivals.

Its religious character has declined into a comparatively insignificant association of the day. If it had been more distinctive of Puritanism than it has been, a day more marked by gloomy asceticism and abstinence than cheerful and enlivening enjoyment, it would ere this, like much else of the time, have become obsolete and forgotten. Nature takes care of these things.

It was perfectly natural that the early settlers of Plymouth, in view of the religious conceptions they held amid their primitive surroundings, when life and subsistence were so precarious, should have been moved to such religious demonstrations as those expressed in the word "thanksgiving." But the circumstances of life in this western world are very different now from what they were then.

We do not live in dread of famine from year to year, nor in fear of the surprise of the red man to overrun our homes and slaughter their inmates. Our crops are sufficiently uniform and abundant to relieve us from all anxiety as to their ample provision for our needs. And the securities of an advanced social and civil order and the regulations of a sufficient police enable us to rest undisturbed at night on our pillows, without thought of molestation or danger. Hence the religious sentiment, in connection with thanksgiving, is much less acted upon than it was under the circumstances in which the day came into existence. Added to this is the great change which has passed over the minds of men since the days of the Pilgrims, in respect to religion itself. How different is the conception of life and religion today from what it was then.

The supernatural interposition in human affairs, which was then a common belief, and which the mind was constantly looking for, and that suggested the interpretation to all its events, survives, so far as it does survive, but as the relic of crude, irrational theories, which the more enlightened and scientific intelligence of our time discards as useless and outgrown, in solving the questions of existence.

All results, events, and human experience are in the line of and proceed from the processes of infinite, unintermittent complications of law. Such is the persuasion to which study, observation, and enlarging knowledge are more and more moulding and bringing the intellect of mankind. It is not strange, in view of these facts of our modern life, in view of the fact that mankind are getting to feel that the care and destiny of life is much more in their own keeping, and less to be referred to that of Deity than they were once accustomed to think, that much of it is inevitable, which no power steps in to interfere with or arrest, be it whatsoever it may,—it is not strange, we say, in view of this condition of thought in our day, that the religious emotions should be but little stirred, in the customary sense of what constitutes such emotions, on the annual returns of Thanksgiving. Although the preachers' sermons on the occasion are generally the product of more than usual labor, and among their ablest of the year, the congregations, as a rule, are at a minimum even of church congregations. Nor is the case very perceptibly improved by a union of churches in the service.

As an illustration of this, in the report of one in which three participated in this city, and no less than four clergymen, the sermon being by a popular preacher, we read there was "a rather small attendance." Nor was this, it is quite safe to conclude, a solitary instance.

The explanation consists largely in this: that, so far as religion survives to-day,—and we think it does survive in far grander and nobler expression than any that has gone before,—it is far less than formerly in outward worship, ceremonies, and sacrifices. Its emphasis is not on church-going nor any of these things; its spirit tends away from them. It is on and toward the development of simple human virtues, the elevation and improvement of humanity, the creation of a higher and more perfected order of society, the glorification of life and the universe in which we dwell, through a quicker and intenser sense of its wonders, a more intimate acquaintance with and superior mastery over its laws.

It is thus that even this modern spirit, so far as it enters into the religious use of the day referred to, is not sufficient to save its religious character, since it carries with it a pretence of something to which neither the common heart nor intellect responds. It loses also in this respect much more than it gains by its usual official appointment of the State and national executives. It is not natural to enlightened religious sentiment to pray or offer thanksgiving at the dictation of an officer of State. Such a usage has a tendency to make people, in a free State and age like ours, renounce even more than they would otherwise its observance. It furthermore implies a union between religion and the State, which is offensive to the majority of the people of this country, religious people no less than others. It is therefore, we hold, altogether objectionable and should cease. Let Church and State stand on their own foundations, free from all entangling alliances and formal relations, and in the long run both will be the gainer. D. H. C.

A HISTORY of the First Church in Boston, which has just celebrated in very catholic spirit (within Christian limits, of course) the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its organization, is soon to be published by Hall & Whiting of this city. Mr. Arthur B. Ellis, son of Dr. Rufus Ellis, the pastor of the church, is preparing the volume. Dr. Ellis himself has been giving on Sunday mornings a series of historical sermons concerning the church.

IN our article in the Index two weeks since upon the "Associated Charities" of Boston, we spoke inadvertently of the building where the society has its head-quarters, as if the society had provided it. As matter of fact, to which the Registrar of the Associated Charities calls our attention, the building is provided by the city of Boston, and is offered free of rent to the various charitable organizations that occupy it. And it was the bringing of these organizations together in close proximity and under one roof that facilitated, as the Registrar says, their actual co-operation, and made the "Associated Charities" Society so easily successful.

OUR readers will turn with special interest to Mr. Adler's lecture on "The Workingman's School," which we print this week from his own carefully prepared manuscript. He discusses indirectly a subject that is attracting wide attention,—the aims and results of our public schools,—and speaking, as he does, from the vantage-ground of an actual experiment in a school under his own leadership in New York city, his able and lucid presentation of the matter deserves to be widely read. Next week, we shall publish in full the discourse, given a few Sundays since in Mr. Adler's place, by Mr. M. D. Conway, on the "Religion of Humanity." It is an eloquent and most interesting treatment of the theme, in Mr. Conway's best style, and will find many satisfied readers in this country among the author's old friends, who will here get the central thought of his present advanced position on religious questions. The following week, we shall give a biographical sketch of that noble man who has recently died among us, Karl Heinzen, with the addresses made at his funeral. Of these issues of the Index, we shall print an extra number, in the belief that their special value will create an extra demand for them.

DOES "Satan" have all the good sermons as well as the good tunes? It would seem so in Scotland at least, from the following extract from the very orthodox Sunday School Times of Philadelphia:—

Not many months ago, theological circles were disturbed by the publication of a volume of unorthodox discourses entitled Scotch Sermons, professedly illustrative of a style of preaching "increasingly prevalent" in the Scotch churches. The book was marked by extreme radicalism in its treatment of Christian doctrine and complete divergence from what are distinctively known as evangelical views. And now follows a volume of a very different character, but with a similar title, The Modern Scottish Pulpit, presumably intended as a counter-manifesto on the part of those ministers of the Presbyterian churches who are within the lines of evangelical Protestantism in Scotland. The volume consists of twenty-six sermons by as many clergymen on miscellaneous Scriptural subjects; and the conservative character of the discourses is sufficiently guaranteed by the list of contributors, including, as it does, such names as those of Sir H. W. Moncreiff, the Rev. Dr. Begg (who regards church organs as Satanic inventions), and Dr. Jamison, the well-known commentator. The sermons are not particularly noteworthy. In matter and treatment, they are commonplace, and some of them are stiff and inelegant in expression. . . . It is hardly creditable to the anonymous editor of the volume that a better compilation was not made.

AN OLD VOICE HEARD AGAIN.

DEAR EDITOR:—

It is with keen regret—it would be with contrition as keen, if the consciousness of overtasked strength did not come to the rescue of conscience—that I remember my unfulfilled promise of contributing to the Index, when you so unselfishly assumed the labor of editing it. Sickness during the summer, and the exigencies of a new enterprise in the autumn, have defeated my sincere intention of proving my sympathy with your efforts by my best co-operation. You yourself know the facts, and have never once reminded me of that undischarged debt. All the more because of your generous forbearance do I feel it a duty to excuse myself to your readers, many of whom may wonder why I have so long failed to redeem my pledge. But no one who ever knew me will suspect that want of sympathy with you could be among the possible causes of my silence. The simple truth is that I have had neither time nor strength to do all that has devolved upon me in connection with my new school in New York; I have been swept away helplessly by the resistless current of circumstance. It is due to you, who alone announced my promise to your readers, that I should thus justify you in their eyes, even if I fail to justify myself. So I snatch the last moments of my brief Thanksgiving vacation at home to send you this poor apology for an article.

There is, however, another reason why I feel impelled to write a word for your columns. The season for renewing their subscriptions is approaching for a large number of your subscribers; and I cannot help appealing to them earnestly, at least to those of them who kindly remember my own long struggle to make of the Index a first-class journal, to give you now their heartiest aid in sustaining and increasing the mail-list. It will be a personal favor to me if they renew their own subscriptions promptly, and still more if they take the pains to strengthen your hands by getting new ones at this season. As I feared would be the case, you have been regaled with criticisms in the place of generous help—criticisms as carping and unjust as they are ungenerous. Which of the critics would have done better than you? Which of them would have done as well? Which of them would have thrown aside his own best judgment, and adopted the contradictory judgments of the critics that he too would most certainly have had? Surely it is the dictate of justice, no less than of generosity, to put oneself in your place, and to remember the exceeding difficulty, nay, the utter impossibility, of doing anything in this world that shall suit many minds in all respects. Why do we not all of us forget the things we would do differently, and accord a noble appreciation to the things that are done so well? Where the spirit of fidelity to conviction and the love of truth for its own sake are so manifest as they are in your Index, and especially in your own writings, I am ashamed that thousands of our best Liberals have not rallied about you long before this. I hope they will yet do so; for the enterprise of sustaining and establishing such a paper as you make is one of incalculable consequence to the cause of Free Religion. Will nobody forget his private hobbies out of loyalty to that cause?

For myself, I have no criticisms whatever to make of your editorial labors; I have so unfeignedly admired the power and beauty of your work, so profoundly sympathized with the objects you make uppermost in all you do, that I gladly leave to the crabbed, the opinionated, and the censorious, the ungrateful task of picking flaws in a journal into which you have thrown so much intellectual ability, moral enthusiasm, and exquisite feeling. Whoever carps and cavils, let me leave it here on record that your predecessor applauds, and applauds only; and that, while you have never undertaken to do some things that he thought and still thinks important, he rejoices to bring an honest tribute of praise and admiration for what you are doing. The Liberals may sweep the horizon with a telescope before they can find another editor who will do better or as well. Let them, if they are wise, if they have any public spirit or unselfish devotion to their cause, unite before it is too late in keeping you steadily at work, well sustained by their active assistance and well cheered by their fraternal sympathy, at least as long as the decade I spent in their service. If I only had the means, I would put fifty thousand dollars in the bank to your credit, for the purpose of securing to the cause of Free Religion the inestimable services which you are now rendering to it. Are there no great souls among our liberal millionnaires to do this very thing? If not, are there not enough great souls in the liberal rank and file to do by co-operation what the wealthy could so easily do unaided? Anxiously I wait to learn.

But the sands are running out, and I must conclude this hurried scrawl. With unfailing faith in you and strong hope for the future of my still loved Index in your charge, I am

Yours with "hooks of steel,"

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[Mr. Abbot's ringing letter modestly put itself into small type without our knowledge.—ED.]

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

A READING of the Princeton Review makes a peculiar impression upon the mind of one who is not in sympathy with orthodox theology. Notwithstanding vigorous attempts to divest ourselves of prejudice, the contrast between it and the untheological reviews appears very striking, and that, too, when the subjects treated are very similar. The writers of the Princeton seem to us to be doing their work, while conscious of the fact that they are defending a lost cause. They are retreating, facing the enemy indeed, moving backwards slowly and sullenly, and taking advantage of every indiscretion on the part of the advancing and exultant foe, but, nevertheless, continually retreating; and the growing strength of the probability that they will never be able to reoccupy their old vantage-ground seems to oppress them, while at the same time it nerves them to a desperate resistance in defence of the ground they still occupy. Perhaps we should say that not all writers of the Princeton Review profess to support the old theology, and that our criticism therefore does not apply to all.

TWO ARTICLES in the November number give something of the impression we have tried to indicate as coming from the defenders of the theology of this Review. "The Antiquity of Man and the Origin of Species" is the somewhat high-sounding title of a very ordinary article by Principal Dawson. It is a notice of two French publications by Gaudry and Saporta, of Dawkins' Early Man in Britain, and of Barraude's Brachiopodes. Of these writers, he tells us that "Barraude is an uncompromising opponent of evolution as ordinarily held," and that the others are theistic evolutionists, "not descending to the special pleading and one-sided presentation of facts so common with the more advanced advocates of the doctrine." This phrase is certainly a peculiar one, and suggests several questions that Mr. Dawson might find some trouble in answering; but we do not doubt that he received considerable consolation as a result of penning it. Undoubtedly also, he enjoys telling us that when Gaudry, in his studies of "the grand procession of mammalian life" in the Tertiary, finds "unquestionable elevation in rank, by whatever means effected," he "piously refers it to the operation of the Creator"; tho (to copy Princeton's spelling of though) we doubt if even Dawson always believes that piety is best displayed by making "the Creator" a synonyme for our ignorance. In his notice of Dawkins, Mr. Dawson manages with considerable ingenuity to bring in the deluge as the possible historical record of the great land subsidence, "which closed the residence of paleocosmic men in Europe." Of late, we have often wondered to whom the orthodox world of America will turn for a scientific defender, when Dawson dies. They have no one of equal ability to fall back upon, and no coming man to pick up his mantle.

The second article is on "The Historical Proofs of Christianity," by Professor George P. Fisher of Yale College, and is a striking illustration of special pleading. Two propositions are argued in the article before us, which is apparently the first of a series. The first proposition is as follows: "The known assertions of Jesus respecting his authority and office among men, if they are not well founded, imply either a lack of mental sanity or a deep perversion of character; but neither of these last alternatives can be reasonably accepted." Fifteen pages of argument bring him to the conclusion that "the abiding conviction in the mind of Jesus respecting his own mission and authority is inexplicable, except on the supposition of its truth." This part of Professor Fisher's article should be read by those who do not know how easy it is for an orthodox theologian to dispose of the pretensions of Mohammed, Buddha, Confucius, Zoroaster, and other persons whose "abiding convictions" might be supposed to resemble those of Jesus. His second proposition is this: "The sinlessness of Jesus is in its probative force equivalent to a miracle; it establishes his supernatural mission; it proves his exceptional relation to God." If these discussions are fairly illustrative of the best defenses of Christianity that Orthodoxy can now make,—and we know of no abler defenders than Professor Fisher in theology and Principal Dawson in science,—its final doom among intelligent persons must be nearer than we had believed.

THREE papers on the observance of Sunday, all of which are supposed to consider the subject scientifically, have appeared almost simultaneously. The first, by Professor Tyndall, was a lecture before the Glasgow Sunday Society, and the first portion of it (which alone we have read, as reprinted from the Nineteenth Century in the Popular Science Monthly) will well repay reading. The second paper is by President Seelye, in the Princeton Review for November. We may be pardoned for saying here that President Seelye has always been a peculiar puzzle to us. Although a man of undoubted ability and considerable scholarship, we do not remember any important work he has publicly undertaken but he managed in some way to put his foot in it. As an illustration of the scholar in politics, in which character he went to Congress, he made every scholar tremble; his position on the Geneva Award affair, for instance, being positively immoral. As an advocate of the God-in-the-Constitution amendment, his history and logic have been preëminently flimsy. And now, on this "Sabbath Question," he tries to prove that the Mosaic Sabbath was divinely instituted, and that the command to obey it is of universal application and covers our modern Sunday. Some preliminary assertions in the article, with regard to human deterioration, read almost like the productions of a diseased mind. The third paper, the shortest, and, from a practical point of view, the best, is by Dr. James Freeman Clarke, in the December North American, and is entitled "Rational Sunday Observance." Its character is precisely indicated by its title. The fogs begotten of Seelye's eighteen pages are cleared away by a single paragraph of Dr. Clarke's common-sense, and his practical suggestions are excellent. It is only old habit, we suppose, which leads Dr. Clarke to speak of Sunday as "the Lord's day," after giving, in pugilistic phrase, a right-hander to the use of "the Sabbath," and a left-hander to the use of "God's day," as giving an authority to Sabbath-keeping which it would not otherwise possess.

THERE will be considerable demurring, doubtless, to this expression of belief from Mr. Daniel Greenleaf Thompson in the International Review for December: "After the present day, I do not believe there will ever be anything called philosophy, save by its authors, which does not profess to stand upon experience as its sole foundation, or which assumes to be aught other than the highest generalizations of the facts of experience." But nearly every one will agree with his next sentence: "If this result should come about, the outcome, in large measure, must be attributed to modern English philosophers." Mr. Thompson accepts the definition of philosophy as "the science of sciences"; and nearly all that he says of "English Philosophy and English Philosophers," in his short and very readable paper, can be accepted without serious qualification by all who have studied the subject upon which he writes. He refers—and correctly, we believe—to the sciences of psychology, biology, sociology, and ethics, as having been either for the first time created or fundamentally reconstructed by British philosophy. And no one can doubt that "religion, likewise, has been profoundly affected,—to the extent of thoroughly undermining old dogmas, and setting free everywhere mental activities to seek some truly scientific basis for religion, upon which it may stand justified." SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

The Indian Question Again.

The interest aroused in the case of the Ponca tribe of Indians somewhat more than a year ago, by the visit of Mr. T. H. Tibbles to the East, is being revived at the present time. At his first visit, meetings were held in this city and elsewhere. Much discussion was had, and correspondence conducted to elicit the facts in the case. A committee was appointed to mature and carry out such measures as in their judgment should be deemed advisable. At the head of this committee stand the Governor of the State and the Mayor of the city; while associated with them are a number of the most prominent business and professional men in the community. It is proposed under their auspices, and through the management of Williams' Lecture Bureau, to hold meetings in various places, to be addressed by Miss Susette La Flesche ("Bright Eyes") of the Oneaka Tribe, and Mr. Tibbles, who has been so identified with the efforts for the Poncas. The first of these meetings was held in this city on Sunday evening, Nov. 14th, and was addressed by the two speakers just mentioned, and also by Governor Long and Revs. E. E. Hale and W. B. Wright.

The facts of the case, so far as the Poncas are concerned, are these: Three years ago, this tribe of peaceable and friendly Indians, about seven hundred and fifty in number, were illegally and forcibly removed from their home in Southern Dakota to the Indian Territory. In consequence of the change, more than two hundred have since died. One hundred and twenty-five have struggled back to the borders of the old reservation, and are living in a state of partial destitution. The rest remain in the Indian Territory, waiting to be restored by the government, or disheartened and indifferent to their fate. A committee of the United States Senate, within a year, has investigated the case, and reported that the Poncas were robbed of their lands and unlawfully held in the Indian Territory, and recommended their immediate restoration to their old lands and their treaty rights. In the spring of 1879, a decision in their favor was rendered in the United States District Court for Nebraska. Still they have not received redress. Fresh suits have been entered in the United States courts for Nebraska and Dakota, and are expected soon to be brought to trial. To supplement the collections made last year for the prosecution of these suits, and also to secure, through the influence of public sentiment, such action of Congress and of the Indian Bureau as shall effect the earliest possible restoration of the tribe to their old and unoccupied homes, this renewed effort is being made.

The effort is not confined to this result or to the Poncas alone. It aims also to bring about the conferring of titles in fee-simple to lands occupied by all Indians, and the recognition by Congress of their citizenship, for the opening of the courts and the protection of the law in their behalf. These proposed measures seem to us eminently wise and just. The desirableness of the first is conceded by the Indian Department, and has been recommended to Congress by Secretary Schurz. The other, if not directly opposed by the Bureau, fails to receive any effective encouragement from it; while the special effort for the Poncas, one of whose results, if successful, would be to help establish legal rights for Indians everywhere, seems to receive their unqualified and, to us, unjustifiable opposition. It is conceded on all hands that the removal of the Poncas was a gross violation of their rights on the part of the government. There can be but one just method of undoing the wrong, and that is to return them to their former home. If the Indian Department cannot and Congress will not do this, it surely seems a legitimate thing to appeal to the courts, and there test the question whether the Indian has any rights which the white man is bound to respect, and, further, whether there is any power in the land that can maintain his rights. For the government to persist in throwing every possible obstacle in the way of such an appeal, to thwart every effort made to further it, to malign and abuse the men who are moving in it, is nothing less than disgraceful and iniquitous. To represent, as agent Whiting does in his recent report, that the Poncas are happy and contented in their new abode, if it be a correct representation,—which is certainly disputed by those who claim to know,—does not a whit lessen the wrong done or in any measure atone for it. Indeed, the petition, forwarded with the report from certain chiefs of the tribe, asking permission to come to Washington and sign away their rights in Dakota, gives as a reason that their young men are unsettled and discontented, thus contradicting the assertion of the agent. Further, the petition itself looks like the result of an attempt to get the Poncas to relieve the government of the necessity of acknowledging the wrong done, and righting it by consenting to submit to the wrong and in their helplessness declare their satisfaction with it. As if a knave, after defrauding his victim, should induce him to accept the cheat, and say no more about it! To speak of those who are trying to help the Poncas to their rights as "intermeddlers," whose action begets the discontent, is an impertinence and an insult. As if the people, who are the source of power, seeing a wrong done by their official servants, have not the right to expose the wrong and demand its redress! As if any one of the people may not legitimately show the subject of the wrong how to proceed to secure the redress, and moreover help him in the undertaking! No doubt commissioner and agent find their peace disturbed by the complaint, and would be glad to be let alone. But, as a lie well stuck to is not so good as the truth, whatever belief or practice there may be to the contrary, so a wrong, however maintained, does not become right thereby. That is not settled which is not settled justly. Unsettled, it must be the source of continual disturbance.

Back of all other things in the case of the Indian is the position in which he is made to stand toward the government. He is an alien to be dealt with by treaty, and a treaty which, because of the weakness of one party, may be and has been broken by the other and stronger party. He is a conquered subject, to come and go, plan and act, only as the will of the ruler may decree or permit. Never will the Indian problem be satisfactorily solved till this abnormal and incongruous relation be broken up, and he is woven into the common mesh of human citizenship, to hold his land and have his home, to be by law protected in his rights and by law punished for his crimes. This must be, of course, a work of time and patience, one of wise, discriminating, and gradual effort. But it is equally one to be distinctly recognized, clearly and earnestly set forth, in order that it may eventually be realized. We hope the effort for the Poncas will result in successful redress for them, and a prospective advance toward the desired larger result for the whole Indian race.

Another measure, which the government owes alike to itself and the Indians, is the education of the youth. This is attempted in the various scattered agencies. But, with the miscellaneous and somewhat indefinite duties assigned to the agent, we imagine the attempt is attended, save in exceptional instances, with very uncertain and imperfect results. A more promising though as yet somewhat limited method is that adopted at the Training Schools of Hampton, Va., and Carlisle Barracks, Pa. The Index has copied from the Springfield Republican a very vivid description of the work of the latter, as seen in the contrast presented by the eighty-four Sioux boys and girls when first brought to the school a year ago and at the recent anniversary, and also of the mechanical skill they had acquired as exhibited in the recent county fair. Since the appearance of the article referred to, we have received from Lieutenant R. H. Pratt, in charge of the school, a letter, accompanied by his recent report to the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, and the report of the committee on the exhibit at the local fair. From the latter we learn, in addition to what has been already published, that a considerable number of prizes were given, both to the boys and girls, for articles of clothing, bedding, harnesses, tin and wood work, also for bread-making and needle-work. From the lieutenant's report, it appears that the school opened Nov. 1, 1879, with one hundred and forty-seven scholars, including ninety-eight boys and thirty-eight girls gathered from Dakota and the Indian Territory, with eleven young men from Hampton. To these, additions were made, at various times, from different tribes, aggregating two hundred and thirty-nine. Of these, thirty-seven have been returned to the agencies, for various reasons, and six have died, leaving, at the time of making the report, one hundred and ninety-six. Half of these had received instruction at the agency schools, the others came directly from the camps. Two-thirds of them were the children of chiefs and head men. About one-tenth were of mixed blood.

The instruction of the school is both intellectual and industrial. The former consists of the study of the English language, reading, writing, spelling, numbers, geography. The method is objective, by examples rather than books, pictures instead of description. Their progress in the school-room will compare favorably with that of other children in the same period. In the industrial department, it is the purpose to train each student in some particular branch. The older ones, desiring to become professional mechanics, are kept continually at work and have a night-school. The rest work not over two days of the week, studying the other days. A blacksmith and wagon-maker, a carpenter, painter, harness-maker, tin-worker, shoemaker, tailor, printer, and baker carry on their respective trades, with from three to ten apprentices each. All boys not instructed in trades work periodically on the farm. Their progress and willingness to work are very satisfactory. The capacity and industry manifested warrant the conclusion that, with equal chances, the Indian may compete successfully in these branches with his white neighbor. The girls have been placed under a similar system of training in the making and mending of garments, machine and hand sewing, and household work.

During the summer months, a number of boys and girls were placed in private families, for different periods, with favorable results. Discipline in the school has been maintained without difficulty, sometimes a court of the older pupils being called into co-operation. The mingling of the sexes has given no trouble, but has proved advantageous. The drilling of the boys in army tactics has improved both their appearance and their habits. A brass band of twelve pieces, which were a gift from a Boston lady, has acquired sufficient skill to furnish music for their parades. Active sympathy and aid have been given by the townspeople. Letters from many parts of the Indian country are being received, showing an awakened desire among the Indians for educational and industrial training. Lieutenant Pratt closes his letter of November 16: "Our present number is two hundred and twelve, from twenty different tribes; and our confidence and success have increased since the report was made." This school as well as that at Hampton, of which we hope to be able to speak hereafter, may be made of incalculable value, not only as a means of education for their students, but also and especially of turning out an unbroken and ever-increasing line of educators for their people.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

Report of the Chicago Conference.

The call issued for a national conference to be held in Chicago November 15, for the purpose of forming a new organization to promote state secularization, met with a favorable response; and various States were represented. About one hundred delegates met on Monday afternoon at two o'clock in the parlors of the Grand Pacific Hotel, including several liberal ministers and other well-known representatives of liberal movements. Rev. Charles Cravens, of Toledo, Ohio, was appointed chairman, and Mr. H. L. Green, of Salamanca, N.Y., secretary.

Prof. Van Buren Denslow, of Chicago, opened the conference with an explanation of the purposes of the gathering, and the decisions of an informal conference that had been held in the forenoon, at which a somewhat different policy than at first anticipated had been agreed upon. It had been thought best, he said, to make the conference a provisional organization, and he offered the following resolutions for discussion:—

Resolved, That this meeting favors the complete secularization of the State.

Resolved, That, while much organized work may be necessary to this end, the elements which may be brought to cooperate in such work are so diverse and widely diffused, and many of them of such divergent religious and political views, that we deem it important at present to form such a provisional organization for correspondence and initiatory work as shall lead to the ultimate crystallization and union of all the elements in the most effective manner. To this end, we therefore recommend the appointment of this meeting of a committee on correspondence, a committee on national address, and a committee on finance.

The first resolution was adopted. The second provoked a long and spirited discussion.

Mr. Robert C. Spencer, of Milwaukee, opened the discussion by an able exposition of the objects this organization was seeking to accomplish. Mr. Spencer's views were identical with the main objects of Liberal Leagues, which the readers of the Index thoroughly understand. It will not be necessary to report the remarks at any length. They were dignified and temperate, maintaining firmness in stating the exact position of the organization with reference to established orthodox customs. They also evinced a generous consideration of individual convictions upon religious subjects, and advised wisdom in the forthcoming movement, that if possible the sympathy and co-operation of all intelligent people might be enlisted, who would act apart from private opinions and solely with reference to national equity.

This temperate method was somewhat violently opposed by Mr. Rufus Daily, of Jeffersonville, Ind., a thorough-going radical, with an impatience born of worthy zeal. Mr. Daily said he was not willing to temporize, and did not approve of the provisional organization. He desired something tangible, some objective point for Liberals to work toward, and was opposed to secularists toadying to the Church.

Although Mr. Daily was ruled out of order, it was easy to excuse his enthusiastic expressions in consideration of the fact that it is to the handful of iconoclastic liberalists to whom the world is indebted for initiatory movements in establishing any new order of things as opposed to conservatism and conventionalism.

It may be that at heart the feeling of many Liberals present was with Mr. Daily, but the object of the conference could never be obtained by his erratic policy. Secularization involves changes in the legislation of every State in the Union. The end aimed at is legislative, judicial, and rational. It must, to be obtained, have the assent of millions of people. The need of keeping close to the subject of secularization, and not introducing side issues, was very urgent; and several gentlemen set forth these clinching facts in such pointed remarks that secularization was thereafter pretty closely attended to.

Notable among these were Mr. H. L. Green, B. F. Underwood, and Rev. G. E. Gordon.

Mr. Gordon said secularization was not a question for Liberals alone: it was for everybody, Orthodox or Liberal. He knew an eminent doctor of divinity connected with an Episcopal theological seminary who had almost a mania on the subject of Church and State. The necessary reforms could not be accomplished without the aid of orthodox people, and they ought to be invited and gladly received.

Mr. H. L. Green, in a few calmly spoken, well-chosen words, spoke to this point, alluding to the war of the Rebellion. There was in that combined effort no thought of religious convictions. That was a work which stood for justice and for freedom. So also does this work; and we must call in the aid of such as believe this and will work for it.

Mr. B. F. Underwood thought that orthodox people should be invited to join in the secularization of the State. He said that everybody knew he was a radical of radicals, that he would be the last person to "toady" to the Church, but he would never forget courtesy nor say any word to give personal offence to Christians. He wanted the orthodox people to be invited to join and to be treated courteously, and he would work cordially with them. He also said, with regard to a provisional organization, he thought it might sound pompous for them to call this a national organization, that for three months at least there should be correspondence, issue of addresses, and then a future large organization.

These remarks influenced the wordy discussion, and the resolution as read was adopted.

The chair hereupon appointed, as a committee on correspondence and provisional organization, B. F. Underwood, R. C. Spencer, and Prof. Van Buren Denslow. This committee was instructed to prepare the national address.

The Platform.

At the opening of the evening session, Mr. Denslow, of the Committee on Correspondence, reported as follows:—

The Committee on Correspondence and Organization respectfully report that more time than is afforded by the duration of this conference will be necessary for the preparation of a satisfactory and effective address to the people of the United States upon the subjects which have been under discussion, and we therefore ask the authority of this conference to prepare and issue in its name, at the earliest convenient opportunity, an address to the people, embodying the following points:—

First.—A succinct statement of the history of the principle of secularization of the State, of the efforts of the founders of our institutions to incorporate the principle in our Federal and State Governments, and of its various claims as a principle upon the assent and co-operation of all the people of the United States, regardless of creed, color, or theological bias.

Second.—A statement of the principle of secularization of the State as one promotive of the welfare, progress, and happiness of each and every class of our people, in harmony with sound morals, and as affording special relief to each and every class of thinkers whose views may not be largely assented to by others.

Third.—A clear exposure of the injustice and impolicy of connecting religious offices and functions with either legislation, the administration of justice, the punishment of crime, the education of youth in our public schools, or with any other State function, and a like impolicy and injustice of exempting religious property or persons from any of the duties to or burdens of the State.

Fourth.—A clear exposition of the political, social, moral, and religious advantages which will ensue in this country from perfecting and completing that principle of State secularization which formed a leading motive on the part of the founders of our Republic, and which they sought to embody in all our constitutions, and did include in them to the extent to which the principle was then understood.

Fifth.—This address shall be drawn so as to commend the principle of State secularization to all persons who rightly apprehend the nature of our institutions regardless of nationality, party affiliations, and religious or theological views.

Concerning organization, this committee reports that the chief objects toward which its correspondence shall be directed ought to be:—

First.—To call out and publish through the public press, and such other channels as shall offer, the views of all classes of persons concerning State secularization.

Second.—To stimulate the formation and co-operation of local organizations in every town and neighborhood in the United States, where possible, which, whatever may be their other objects, shall, as one of their objects, co-operate with this committee in promoting State secularization either by circulating documents, collecting audiences for lecturers, or contributing to its funds.

Third.—To draw out from leading minds, whose opinions concerning ways and means of organizing are entitled to respect, their best views as to the proper modes to be pursued in effecting permanent organizations, whether national, State, or local, and the relation in which the national should stand to the State and local organizations, if such relation should be deemed expedient.

Fourth.—When it shall appear to this committee that the farther work aimed at by this conference shall require a more consummate plan of organization, and that the materials for a sufficiently comprehensive organization will be at the disposal of this conference when convened, this committee ask power to convene this conference, and in convening the same to invite also such other suitable persons and organizations as may have evinced a desire to co-operate in its purposes, with the view of extending or protecting such organization as will best promote the object.

Inasmuch as the Finance Committee to be appointed by the conference will probably have no time to report during the present session thereof, we respectfully suggest that the conference instruct the chair to appoint a finance committee of seven persons, whose chairman and treasurer shall be chosen by the committee, and whose treasurer shall be treasurer of this provisional organization. Said Committee on Organization shall incur no expenses without the sanction of the Finance Committee, through its chairman, nor unless there are funds in the treasury for their payment; and the secretary of the provisional organization shall receive such compensation out of the funds to be raised by the Finance Committee, and when the same shall be raised, as said Finance Committee may deem proper, and shall work under the instruction of the Committee on Correspondence.

This report was discussed at length, substantially upon the same points drawn out in the afternoon discussion, and was adopted.

A definition of State secularization being called for, the following was submitted:—

By State secularization, we mean:

I. That acts of religious worship enforced as acts of worship, including Bible-reading, shall cease in legislatures, prisons, and public schools, and institutions sustained by taxation.

II. That no property shall be exempted from taxation, and no persons from contributing their just share to the burdens of the State, on account of their being used or engaged in religious effort.

III. That all laws enforcing the observance of one day above another upon religious grounds shall be repealed.

IV. That all laws requiring judicial oaths to be in any religious form or limiting the admissibility of persons to testify, hold office, sit on a jury, or perform any other civil function because of any lack of religious belief, be repealed.

The Finance Committee was appointed as follows: Robert G. Ingersoll, of Washington, Chairman; John G. Bundy, of Chicago, Secretary; Lucian Prince, of Worcester, Mass.; Professor Philbrick, of Iowa City, Ia.; J. G. Lutz, of Gardner, Ill.; Z. Shed, of Fremont, Neb.; G. H. Lamar, of Missouri; G. B. Fleming, of Angola, Ind.

Suggestions were offered by Mr. H. L. Green with regard to the best methods of securing the co-operation of local organizations, whatever might be their nature. Any club, literary society, or league could, if they desired, work with the national organization; but it was not thought advisable that this body should exercise governmental powers over or establish auxiliary leagues. He also suggested individual effort by correspondence, writing for the press, or securing subscriptions to journals that advocate the views embodied in the separation of Church and State, and to secure audiences for capable lecturers on subjects germane to the organization. Mr. Green said he had received a large number of letters containing expressions of sympathy with the movement, and suggested that they be printed.

Before the close of the conference, Mr. Underwood very practically called attention to the fact that various expenses had been incurred for this conference that must be immediately met, and the delegates very practically responded by handing in sufficient to defray the necessary expenses.

The time and place of the next conference were left to the decision of the Committee on Correspondence and Organization.

The conclusion drawn from the proceedings of this conference of secularists is that henceforth hobby-riding will be ruled out of such congresses as shall be called by Liberals, and that the scheme will be to create an organization with well-defined objects, and so limit it that side issues and irrelevant movements will be impossible. The polity of the secularists in desiring to co-operate with the Orthodox must not be misunderstood. It expects nothing but intelligent co-operation on the basis of equity. It is well known that the question is assuming such importance that orthodox ministers, preëminent among these standing Rev. Dr. Spear of Brooklyn, are making vigorous appeals for a total separation of Church and State, and sounding warning voices upon the evils they see in the future, unless the ecclesiastical encroachments on the State are checked or destroyed.

It is not, as the Chicago Tribune states in an editorial evoked by the secularists' conference, "a very small number of people who are possessed with the notion that there is such an association between the Church and State in our government as threatens the future liberties of the American nation."

This number is already large. It is speedily growing larger. This growth will be accelerated by the future efforts of the national body organized for this purpose. The national address will reach every portion of our country, will arouse the attention of the American people; and it is safe to say that this address will be so framed as not only to awaken the fears of the people, but will support the arguments in favor of State secularization in such a manner as shall render it a formidable weapon with which to rebut the commonplace objections to the movement that it must inevitably confront.

If the same spirit that was manifest at this first conference of secularists obtains throughout all future deliberations, if the same temper and wisdom is used in all future constructive work, then the ultimate success of State secularization will be certain. B.

FOREIGN.

The minister of justice has informed the Papal Nuncio at Madrid that the government has determined to expel from Spanish territory any priests who introduce political subjects into their sermons. A Basque priest has already been compelled to quit Spain for this reason.

A meeting of the Birmingham branch of the Church of England Temperance Society was held last month in the town hall. Lord Lyttelton, who presided, said that, unless in the temperance movement churchmen worked in unity with dissenters, unless the moderate drinkers worked with the total abstainers, and the rich with the poor, they could not expect to reap success.

One-fifth of the inhabitants of Newlyn East, a village in central Cornwall, are lying stricken with typhoid fever, the result of contaminated water being used either for drinking or for washing milk-tins. The villagers being destitute and ignorant, immediate help was needed; and a subscription started was so generously responded to that all money required has been obtained. Doctors, nurses, and necessaries have now been despatched to Newlyn.

Mr. Gladstone, writing to the chairman of the Glasgow Junior Liberal Association, says he is far from renouncing all communism and sympathy of feeling with a large number of his fellow-subjects, because they call themselves Conservatives; for he is satisfied that, apart from party feeling, the people of this country have many important sentiments in common, as the citizens of a free State. But experience convinces him more and more that the liberal creed is that which most effectually has conduced, and would conduce, to the honor and strength of the nation and to the stability of its institutions.

The promoters of the movement for opening public libraries and museums on some part of Sunday were, perhaps, hardly discreet in bringing the question under the consideration of the Library Association, when meeting in a Scotch city. Scotland will no doubt be the last stronghold of those opposed to the proposition, and the ranks of the few English opponents were strengthened by a considerable accession of its natives. The feeling against the movement burnt so fiercely that an attempt was made to prevent the subject from coming under the notice of the members, and would no doubt have been carried, had it not been ruled out of order. The result was that, after some display of passion from the antagonists of the movement for throwing open such places for study on some portion of Sunday, the proposition was rejected on a show of hands "by a large majority." Those who have the interests of the "Sunday question" at heart will perhaps act judiciously in confining their operations, for the present at all events, to some other country than Scotland. There is plenty of fresh ground for them to break elsewhere.— Pall Mall Budget.

School Dinners in Paris, Gratis.—We find the following paragraph in some Paris correspondence of this week: "The Paris municipality has taken a really grand measure with regard to the primary schools. Last year, little dinners were served at two sous to poor children who would have lost time to go home, perhaps to poor rations. Now, a liberal vote of the town council provides for these dinners gratis." Our readers may remember that not many weeks ago we dwelt on a kindly suggestion made by Miss Braddon, in favor of dinners for our poor little London school-children. Her gentle heart will rejoice to find that her idea—put aside by hard men of the world, with many other admirable ideas, as impracticable—has found favor on the other side of the Channel. The French are ever most gentle to the young. Their love and care of children is a characteristic which condones many of their faults. It would be too much to ask the London School Board to provide dinner gratis for hungry little students of pothooks; but might they not promote penny dinners? We answer for it that the author of Lady Audley's Secret could let them into the whole mystery of penny dinners; for, out of her busy life, she has spent many hours in mastering it, and reducing it to practice.—Lloyd's Weekly.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Moncure D. Conway sailed from New York, last Saturday, for England.

Secretary Schurz's report is said to recommend an appropriation to pay the Ponca Indians for the loss of their lands in Dakota.

Mr. Henry Clay, the grandson of the statesman, who joined the Howgate expedition, intends to spend the winter at Rittenbenk, Greenland.

Mr. John Fiske will deliver a course of lectures on "American Political Ideas" at Hawthorne Rooms, on the first three Thursdays of December.

Rev. J. H. Clifford, of North Andover, addressed the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., last Sunday in the morning and evening.

The name of H. W. Longfellow is suggested for mayor of Cambridge. If put into effect, it would certainly contribute at least a little toward making public life respectable.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., began, on Tuesday of last week, a course of twelve lectures on "Common Law" at the Lowell Institute of this city. Mr. Holmes is the editor of the Law Review, and, though a young man, has already acquired high rank as a student of jurisprudence.

Miss Augusta Larned will contribute a volume of stories, drawn from the rich stores of the Elder Edda, to the holiday books. It will be called Tales from the Norse Grandmother, and will doubtless be as popular with young readers as are her Old Tales Retold, from the Greek mythology.

General Conway says that a hundred thousand negroes from the South are already to emigrate to New Mexico. Seven hundred thousand acres of land have already been purchased in New Mexico, and more will be acquired as it is needed. The movement will be conducted by business men, on business principles.

Wendell Phillips attained his sixty-ninth birthday last Monday. Although the day was quietly passed at home without special demonstration, it was pleasantly marked by the congratulations and kind remembrances of some of his friends. A delegation from the Irish societies of Boston made a formal presentation to him of an elegant floral harp.

Superintendent Spicer, of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, has issued a circular for the Grand Trunk Railway Temperance Association, in which he speaks in the highest terms, after four years' experience, of total abstinence pledges among railway employees. He asks, in behalf of the mutual welfare of employers and employees, that those who have pledged renew for twelve months, and that those who have not pledge now. Surely, if there is any occupation in which strict temperance principles should be adopted, it is in the one here referred to.

Dr. McCosh is reported to have said at the late Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia that, "of the four hundred students under him in philosophy, who have graduated at Princeton College, he knew of only four who graduated sceptics. All four of these he saw separately in his study, and prayed with them. He then gave the history of each subsequently, and declared that all of them had become Christians, and that three of them were, or were preparing to become, preachers." But then we are to remember that there is such a thing as philosophy and philosophy, and this distinction is particularly to be observed in referring to that at Princeton.

"Inventive newspaper correspondents," says the Evening Post, "have had much to say that was interesting, but untrue, respecting Mr. Herbert Spencer's plans. They have reported, for one thing, that he was about to visit this country, in company with a number of students, for the purpose of making studies for his works; and, for another, it has been gravely asserted that he contemplated a controversial work in opposition to the doctrines of Mr. Carlyle. As a matter of fact, Mr. Spencer is engaged solely upon the task which has occupied his attention for twenty years, and he will not undertake other literary or philosophical work, while so large a part of that task remains to be done. In his prosecution of that work, he will next discuss the evolution of civil government."

Colonel Ingersoll has been obliged to publish the following announcement, in order to protect himself against unauthorized editions of his lectures: "I wish to notify the public that a Mr. Baldwin of Chicago, also Rhodes and McClure of the same place, are publishing pamphlet editions of my lectures. All the lectures published by them are grossly inaccurate,—filled with mistakes, horribly printed, and outrageously unjust to me. These men are simple literary thieves and pirates, and are obtaining money from the public under false pretences. I take this course to warn the public that these publications are fraudulent. The only correct copies of my lectures are published by C. P. Farrell; all others are published by people who are willing to steal from me and defraud the public besides. These wretches have published one lecture under four titles, and several others under two or three." Really, it looks from the evidence like this, which has appeared of late, as though some professed Liberals were as bad as they are accustomed to represent Christians to be.

JESTINGS.

An Irishman, on seeing a very small coffin, exclaimed, "Is it possible that coffin was intended for any living creature?"

A Tennessee man can so pertly imitate the sounds made by two dogs engaged in fighting that he can call a Memphis congregation out of church in three minutes.—Southern Paper.

"Ah," said a conceited young parson, "I have this afternoon been preaching to a congregation of asses." "Then that was the reason you called them beloved brethren," replied a strong-minded lady.

A Junior was heard to remark on a recent Sunday after Professor —— had preached an eloquent sermon: "That was a splendid sermon. Gad! One hundred and eight single gestures and thirteen doubles."

"Have you given electricity a trial for your complaint, madam?" asked the minister, as he took tea with the old lady. "Electricity!" said she. "Well, yes, I reckon I has. I was struck by lightning last summer, and hove out of the window; but it didn't seem to do me no sort of good."

The famous old Dr. John Brown, who was of old the minister at Haddington, England, was in the habit of talking to his divinity students in a way which might wisely be followed by some of the professors of the present time. He would say to them: "Young gentlemen, ye need three things to make ye good ministers: ye need learning and grace and common-sense. As for the learning, I'll try to set ye in the way of it; as for grace, ye must always pray for it; but, if ye have na brought the common-sense with ye, ye may go aboot your business."

SUBSTANTIALISM; or, Philosophy of Knowledge. By JEAN STORY.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
A WEEKLY JOURNAL
PUBLISHED BY THE
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
AT
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.
EDITOR,
WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.
For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
THE NEW ENGLAND NEWSPAPER.
INDEPENDENT—NOT NEUTRAL.
[Established in 1824 by Samuel Bowles.]

The Weekly edition of THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN is a comprehensive and intelligent review of American life from week to week, taking due notice as well of all important events and movements elsewhere throughout the world. Its summaries of news are prepared with great care, special attention being given to the presentation of New England news. Its editorial articles discuss broadly and with independence a wide range of topics, political, social, literary, scientific, and ethical. Its correspondence is of unusually high character, embracing regular letters from Boston, New York, Washington, and other centres of interest in this country and abroad. Frequent stories and choice selections of original or quoted poetry lend variety to the paper and increase its attractiveness. Each number contains a column of religious intelligence. Agricultural matters are fully treated, particularly those that are local to New England, and market reports are published with special reference to the information of farmers. New Englanders both at home and abroad find THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN a valuable assistant and guide in maintaining their acquaintance with public affairs and their knowledge of the growth and condition of the older States of the Union.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

WHO can deservedly be called a conqueror? He who conquers his rancorous passions, and endeavors to turn his enemy into a friend. Thou shalt not say, "I will love the wise, but the unwise I will hate"; but thou shalt love all mankind.—Hebrew (Talmud).

RENDER to all what is due to them: tribute to whom tribute is due; honor to whom honor. Owe no man anything but fraternal love; for he that loveth others hath fulfilled the law.—Paul.

ONE came and said to the Prophet, "My mother has died: what shall I do for the good of her soul?" Mohammed thought of the panting heat of the desert, and replied, "Dig a well, that the thirsty may have water to drink." The man dug a well, and said, "This have I done for my mother."—Mohammedan.

THUS saith the maiden Lachesis, the daughter of Necessity: Ye short-lived souls, a new generation of men shall here begin the cycle of its mortal existence. Your destiny shall not be allotted to you, but you shall choose it for yourselves. Let him who draws the first lot be the first to choose a life which shall be his irrevocably. Virtue owns no master: he who honors her shall have more of her; and he who lights her, less. The responsibility lies with the chooser. Heaven is guiltless.—Plato.

> MORTALS, that would follow me,
> Love Virtue, she alone is free;
> She can teach ye how to climb
> Higher than the sphery chime:
> Or, if Virtue feeble were,
> Heaven itself would stoop to her.—Milton.

O YOUNG men and women, you who are still upon the threshold of life, who may reasonably hope to see the years unrolling before you in long and glad succession, to whom life is precious, who can dream and hope, and purpose and aspire,—I beseech you, I implore you, before the evil days come in which there is no pleasure, before the beautiful gates of satisfaction are closed, make up your minds to earn for yourselves a passage into the world of nobleness, of truth, of purity, which is not necessarily a world of happiness or fame or power, but which has all that is implied in character. Happiness? It is for the very few, and with them it does not last long; but to be human is the universal privilege. Power disappoints, reputation flourishes but its hour. There is but one thing that endures: the heart, the conscience, whatever of kindness, of justice, of truth, is in you,—that endures; and, by virtue of that, you are carried into an ideal world, where, if there be not happiness, there is contentment which is never disappointed, and peace that is never broken.—O. B. Frothingham.

FOR myself, rather than anything else, I would seek the joy that comes from helping others. The greatest pleasures and the most lasting satisfactions of my life thus far have come to me when some one has taken me by the hand and said: "That which you did, that which you wrote, that which you said, helped me. It made me stronger, it lifted a burden off my heart; it was a little ray of light, when I was in doubt and darkness, which cheered, which comforted me, and gave me a motive for doing good; it helped me to believe in God, it helped me to believe in my fellow-men." And, when I die, rather than anything else would I have it written upon my tomb, "Here lies one who did what he could to help his fellow-men."—M. J. Savage.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Middlesex Club fittingly observed the twenty-first anniversary of the hanging of John Brown. Thus the old hero's "soul is marching on"!

THE Christian Union says that "one hundred Jesuits expelled from France have been sent to Constantinople, where they will doubtless increase the difficulties and labors of our missionaries." How these Christians love one another!

GREAT jealousy of the Jews appears to have broken out in Prussia, going even to the extent of a memorial to Parliament, signed by eminent names, asking that Jews be excluded from all public offices, and be weighted with other disabilities. No result has yet been reached beyond a warm debate in Parliament. Bismarck, it is said, gives the silent aid of his sympathy to the memorialists, but he has not yet openly shown his hand; while Emperor William would stand by the Jews. It does not seem possible that Prussia should take such a retrograde step toward intolerance as the memorialists ask for, especially as no heavier grievance seems to be alleged against the Jews than that in the "struggle for existence" they have a persistent habit of coming uppermost.

THE Catholics in New York, judging from the testimony of their own journals, are deadly in earnest in hunting down the Herald because of its hostility to them on the mayoralty question. A very large number of Catholics, it is reported, who have been steady patrons of the Herald for years, now forbid its coming to their houses or places of business, and have ceased to advertise in it. The priests are taking the matter up, and are beginning publicly to denounce members of their congregations who help in any way to give pecuniary support to the paper. The Herald is a powerful antagonist; but so is the Catholic Church in New York. It will hurt neither of them to be subjected to considerable loss of power; and, if they will do this good office for each other, all the better for the community.

THE special attention of our readers in Boston and vicinity is invited to an appeal in the advertising columns of this number, in behalf of the well-known and very worthy liberal German Association, the Turnverein, which opens a fair in this city the present week. The card referred to is signed by some of the leading German citizens of Boston, and sufficiently explains the character and merit of the Association to entitle it to a generous response. The fair, we understand, is for the purpose of removing a debt upon the building of the Turnverein, in Boston. As the society is not accustomed to thus present its claims often to the public, we trust its effort at this time may receive deserved and helpful consideration. It is our intention to give in a later issue of the Index a fuller account of the Turnverein and its objects.

IF all reports from Paris are true, the French government would do well to turn some of the zeal it has shown against the religious orders in the direction of the press. The most abominably immoral literature, in the shape of newspapers and cheap novels, seems to be having free course. If the State's necessity was good ground for the laws suppressing the religious orders, it should be better ground for laws adequate to suppress licentious publications. Bigotry may be dangerous to the freedom of a people, but even more dangerous is the impure literature that saps a people's morals. Nor does a sane mind have any difficulty in drawing a clear line of distinction between liberty of opinion, which a free State must preserve at all hazards, and obscenity, which the same free State must hunt down without mercy.

IT does not seem too much to expect from those who have in charge the interests of education a more than average share of wisdom. It is on this account that we were led to wonder a good deal at what struck us as a very absurd and illiberal resolution submitted at the last school board in this city. We refer to that which proposed to exclude married women from teaching in the public schools. Why a married woman should be less eligible to the office of a teacher than a single one, if she have the recognized essentials in other respects for its requirements, is something that passes our comprehension. The simple fact is she may be the better qualified of the two, while there may be special reasons beside that the position should be open to her. We are happy to record that the resolution was tabled, as very properly it ought to have been.

WE comment elsewhere on a discourse delivered in Philadelphia, before a special audience of women, by Rev. W. J. Knox-Little, one of the extremest of the English Ritualists. It being understood that he has been subjected to somewhat of a persecuting spirit in England because of his opinions, and that his Episcopal brethren in this country are generally inclined to turn the cold shoulder to him, solely in the interest of free speech we signed, with representatives of various religious beliefs, an invitation to him to give a lecture on Ritualism in Boston; for we would allow even to Ritualism a fair hearing. But, since reading the sermon to women, we are disposed to believe that Mr. Knox-Little has met with no antagonism but that legitimate kind of mental and moral resistance which such sentiments deserve. The lecture on Ritualism was given in Boston to a large audience in Meionaon Hall last Monday A.M. And, having sincerely done our small part toward helping the Ritualist missionary to a free platform, we exercise our reciprocal right through a free press to express the opinion (judging from the portion of the lecture we were able to hear) that Mr. Knox-Little is a fervid sentimentalist, with no brains to spare for giving instruction, and who would do better to confine himself to the "works of charity" of his order.

What is the Religion of Humanity?

Delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture, at Chickering Hall, New York city, Nov. 14, 1880.

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY, M.A.

The phrase "Religion of Humanity" has been much and vaguely used, and best phrases so used are liable to degenerate into cant. There is something pleasant to everybody in the word "humanity." No doubt, all sects would claim that theirs is the religion of humanity. Even sects with creeds based on a curse upon human nature would declare their religion adapted to and revealed to save humanity,—therefore the religion of humanity.

Among more liberal people, we sometimes hear the word "humanitarian" used for a believer in the religion of humanity. "Humanitarian" was coined to represent the doctrine that the nature of Jesus was human as distinguished from divine or angelic. It is a good sign when such theological disputes are so far past that their phrases are put to more substantial work. And this other phrase, the Religion of Humanity, which I believe came from the merit of Positivism, also shows a tendency to do various duty. To the majority, it probably means a religion which believes in the perfectibility of mankind: it would include the idea of human progress, also the sentiment of charity, of sympathy with mankind, and a spirit of benevolent reform. No doubt, underneath the humanitarian hypothesis of the nature of Jesus, there was at work a faith in human nature; and under any conception of a religion of humanity there would be found the spirit of love to man, the feeling of fraternity, and belief in a happy destiny for all mankind.

These high feelings will, however, be reinforced in proportion as it can be made clear to our minds whether there is any sense in which that group of sentiments in us which relates to humanity can be defined as a religion; in what sense it is a religion, distinct from other so-called religions; and whether it is one which is fully credible to us,—whether, that is, it represents the facts and phenomena regarded by the religious sentiment.

That which we call "humanity" is the totality of all that is moral in nature, all that distinguishes and chooses; which discriminates right from wrong, good from evil, where all nature not human is unmoral, gives equal support to good and bad.

All history is the history of the war of mankind against external nature. When we go beyond history to tradition, and behind tradition to mythology, we find this, and only this,—man combating arctic frost and torrid heat, tempest and flood, the barrenness, the ferocities of the earth, the pitiless cruelties of the pestilential and the rainless atmosphere. That siege of man against nature has never been relaxed: it goes on still; and, in all that time, man has learned that his own nature represents all that is moral in the universe he can comprehend. I say "represents," for certain animals seem capable of love and mutual service; but they possess these in the ratio of their approach to human nature, and of their association with it. Therefore, they are man's humble constituency: their feebler mind and affections are represented by him as against the inorganic universe, their common enemy.

Now, this ancient interminable war between man and inanimate nature has not been one of sentiment, but of necessity. To wage it has always been the condition of human existence on the planet: all the animals that could not wage it to some extent have become fossil; and man would have followed them into extinction, if he had not steadily resisted his hostile environment. But, during all this war, man's sentiments were on the side of his great adversaries. He sung hymns to the sun which consumed him, to the storm which beat upon him; he evoked a vast array of deities out of the elements, and, prostrating himself before them in one moment, in the next arose to fight and conquer their cruelty.

Primitive man ascribed to the gods as their particular realm all the elements and regions of nature which he himself could not control. His own empire was built up in practical hostility to this elemental empire of the gods. It was the necessity of the humanized world that it should ever be encroaching on the gods' world, turning the chaos they had created to order and use. So thus there was no love lost between the two. Man's attitude toward the gods was fear; and that of the gods toward man was deemed to be jealousy,—sometimes fear also, lest he might build a tower high enough to besiege heaven, or seize on the apples of immortality. Then resulted a divorce between man's practical life and his theology. That set of beliefs and diplomatic ceremonials to the sky which were called religions had nothing to do with man's humanity, which was necessarily devoted to constant revision and correction of that nature supposed to be the creation of the gods.

All of which may seem very childish notions. Yet the so-called religions of the world have been generally cast in the same mould; and that is the shape they bear to this day. The wild powers of nature are translated by theology and catalogued in the creeds. Where do you find the doctrine of satisfaction or expiation? Where do you find any basis for the doctrine that no deity can forgive an offence except the penalty be suffered and the law satisfied? You find it in every creed, but you do not find it in the heart and life of humanity. People do not so exact from others rigid legal satisfaction. The parent who worships a god demanding satisfaction forgives the child daily without any satisfaction. Humanity could not have survived, if it had practised the theology of invariable expiation. But you will find that dogma a reflection of the unswerving course of natural objects, the unvarying sun and seasons, the ever-recurring, remorseless powers that now freeze, now bring famine, and listen to no entreaties.

Where will you find the doctrine of vicarious suffering? Not in the voluntary life of humanity. The judge or the parent may worship a deity satisfied by the suffering of the just for the unjust, but he would be shocked at any suggestion in the court or the home that the innocent should suffer for the guilty. And, in the household or society, who would deliberately visit the sin of a father upon his children? Where, then, do the creeds get these notions? From the hard forces of nature, which furnish transgressions of natural law, even though they be virtuous deeds; secure the good of one by the sacrifice of another; now make the mother victim of the child, next make the child heir of the parent's infirmities.

We might, indeed, go through the whole list of dogmas, and we should find them to be a rough translation of nature's roughness; not religion at all, because confusing good and evil; unrelated to the moral sentiment; a crude, primitive science, or attempt at a scientific theory of nature. Those which were anciently deities personifying the inorganic aspects of nature, are now abstract dogmas reflecting the same thing; and as when they were deities or demons, so now when they have become dogmas, they represent precisely all that part of nature which it is the business of humanity to resist, restrain, or even exterminate.

We must indeed never forget that human beings are much better than their creeds; that inside their stony, dogmatic walls are cultured spots of humane feeling; that they speak and act gently, while they worship wrath; and deal justly, while worshipping an unjust deity. There is a blessed Necessity which exterminates from the practical life anti-social principles; and, while it allows tongues to recite what creed they please, holds heart and hand to their need and duty by an iron grip. Nevertheless, mankind are not passing unharmed through this opposition between their dogmas and their humanity. It is a very serious thing that men should throw the sanctions of sentiment and piety around deified reflections of that inorganic world which it were man's real religion to master and make into his own human image and likeness. These ancient "religions" have adopted many humane sentiments; some of them even patronize human life and its joys; but they never make humanity the main thing, the great religious force and director. All those immense powers of piety and devotion and enthusiasm, which together make religion, are still on the side of the inorganic universe and its traditional phantoms.

We may then answer our question, What is the Religion of Humanity? by saying, It is a religion which transfers to the moral and intellectual forces which are mastering nature all the piety that now worships personifications of the obstructions mastered. There is need that our sentiment and our work should be on the same side in this great struggle of humanity with mountain and desert, volcano and flood. It is a grievous anomaly to worship the mountain-god, while we tunnel the mountain, and praise the lightning-god, while we raise a rod to divert his bolt. What kind of homage and praise are due to skill and science and hard-handed labor, not to the wild powers they are levelling and curbing for us! It may be said that such adorations of personified forces do no harm: they are directed to powers that cannot hear or heed them. But there is harm done when the finest seeds are sown on clouds instead of in a soil where they might bear fruit. We little dream what a reinforcement of the human work of the world it would be, if all the devotion and wealth lavished on deities and dogmas were directed to aid and animate man in his tremendous task of humanizing his world.

But it may be asked,—and it is the anxious question of many hearts,—Is there no God of nature, no God in nature? Is there no power above ourselves—or power not ourselves—that makes for righteousness? And, if there be none, are we not orphans? Are we not robbed of all heart and hope in our struggle with earthly evil, having no certainty of ultimate success?

The Religion of Humanity answers, Yes, there is a God in nature, a God and ruler of nature; but that divine Parent is nowhere discoverable except in the spirit of humanity. You may cry for help to glowing suns and circling stars, to gravitation and electricity, to ocean and sky, or to all of them together; but no help or ray of pity will you get, until you have turned to lean on the heart and arm of human love and strength. For these are the answers of the universe to your cry. The proof of love in nature outside you is a loving heart inside you. Nature has labored through untold ages to give you that heart to rest upon, that hand to clasp yours. We must credit nature with what has come out of it. Wild as are the forces around us, terrible as is this vast machinery roaring around us,—amid which we move like wandering children, or at some misstep of ignorance are caught up and crushed,—we may still say that out of it all was evolved the thinker to warn us, the man of skill to devise good for us, the man of science to show us the safe path, the physician to heal us, the artist to beguile us on the way, the poet to cheer us; the friend, the lover, the father, the mother, who try to guard us, or, if we are wounded, seek to heal our wounds. All these were evolved out of nature. They show us nature pointing us to humanity,—to humanity the crown and hope of nature's own self, the power which nature has created for its own deliverance,—in distrusting which, we distrust the only God in nature, the God manifest within us, and in the sweet humanities around us. Therefore must we love nature. As we go forth to contend against its inorganic forces, we recognize that our contest with nature is a friendly contest for deliverance of that inanimate world itself, which suffers the pains of labor until now, awaiting its adoption into the liberty of the sons of God: it is the steadfast transfiguration of nature in a light higher than any dawn, a grandeur which its beauties but faintly hint and symbolize.

In these days, when, under the fierce light that beats upon the throne of superstition, the ancient images are falling from many household shrines,—images which, however low their origin, have been hallowed by the tender pieties and associations twining around them, there is a pathetic cry on the air. The fine gold has waxed dim, the white statues are crumbling. "Give us back our gods!" cried the pagans of old, when the Christians shattered the fair idols of Europe. "Give us back our saints, our blessed Mother!" cried the Catholics, when Protestantism broke up the altars. "Give us back our faith, our divine Lord!" cry Protestant hearts in turn. But know they not why these perished, and can never return? They could not do the work of humanity: they could not hear, they could not heed, the cry of hearts that needed something more than statues, pictures, or sentimental beliefs.

The other day, we heard of the Holy Virgin appearing in Ireland. The press even sent reporters, who gathered detailed information about the light that was seen, and Mary, Joseph, and John in the midst. But, in their descent, these heavenly beings did not bring bread to save one starving Irish family. That was left to Saint America, who went over with a loaded ship and is now doing for poor human beings what the Virgin Mary does only for her own altars and priests.

The heretic is not heartless, because he cannot be silenced by the piteous appeal of piety that its idols and illusions shall be spared. He is listening to a more sorrowful cry than that: it comes from the great deeps of human agony, want, evil, despair; it is a cry ever burdening the air, but never heeded by the idols, which have neither eye, ear, heart, nor hand. How sweet those idols seem to those who decorate them, cover them with devotion, heap on them their gold, their love, and bathe them with their tears, when so cruel they seem to one who knows that it is for want of just that devotion that millions of human beings find this world a hell! Poor humanity, how is it tortured even by those abstract dogmas, which, inheriting the sway of demons, have power to pervert the human heart, to make it act cruelly, unrelentingly, like the brutal elements they embody in words and images! I picture humanity as poor Juliet in her agony. There she is, the beautiful soul, the perfect heart, the supremest thing in nature! Around her an environment of persons who represent the wild elements. The vindictive feud of Montague and Capulet, cruel as venom of serpents, parents who have taken pomp and pride into their breasts instead of hearts, a silly, ignorant nurse. They all represent the inorganic elements surviving in human nature, pride, ignorance, vengeance; these not hidden there as shameful things, but consecrated as duty and dignity: this is the lot with which that heaven, to which Juliet has prayed all her life, has surrounded her gentle soul in its sore need!

> "Is there no pity sitting in the clouds,
> That sees into the bottom of my grief?
> O, sweet my mother, cast me not away!"

But the mother, slave of her lord, has gone. Then once more to the clouds Juliet cries, "O God!" No answer,—the poor, ignorant nurse alone is left.

> "O nurse! how shall this be prevented?
> My husband is on earth, my faith in heaven:
> How shall that faith return again to earth,
> Unless that husband send it me from heaven
> By leaving earth? Comfort me, coun el me.
> Alack, alack, that heaven should practise stratagems
> Upon so soft a subject as myself!"

Alas! Juliet finds that heaven is against her. She thinks how different it would be, if Romeo were only able to leave earth and be God for a time. She meets religion presently: the sympathetic, helpful friar is a disguise for the Religion of Humanity. For this friar is a true, holy father where the lordly father had failed: he does not point Juliet or Romeo to heaven, nor bid them pray, sing, or confess. When Romeo has slain one in his desperation, the friar gets him off to a safe place. He has drugs and secret schemes by which he tries hard to outwit the inorganic tempers that are crushing the lovers. He fails in the end; but that torch he holds over the dead faces of those he sought to save is the torch of the true religion, burning through a midnight of tragedies, on to the hour that shall raise its light to be a flaming dawn.

Do you ask what tidings more glad can the Religion of Humanity bring to hearts in their agony, the agony caused by the discord, pride, ungentleness of spirit in men and women? Why, it brings hope of a time when hearts will not be proud and harsh, because religion will have concentrated all the power of its renovation upon them. Religion will recall its protecting forces from the gods, and gather them all around human beings, to love them, help them, save them; so that when Juliet cries, "O God!" her father shall be at hand, her mother shall serve her as if Juliet were the one Holy Virgin; so that no human being shall ever be brought up to fancy that there is any higher religion than to promote human happiness, the purity and the wisdom of mankind. Do you suppose the strength-power in man, the power which has made men sacrifice millions of their fellows, would not be equally strong to save man, if that were its supreme aim? Do you suppose that the sentiment which beautifies the world with churches and temples would not also build houses for the poor, if that sentiment of humanity were its supreme end and aim?

The Religion of Humanity thus has its meaning and promise for the individual heart, for the soul with its own grief, in that it brings back piety from its wanderings to seek out and love the divine in every heart; but it also holds out to the world at large a hope unknown to any theology, the promise of a perfectly developed humanity implying a perfect world. For this religion shows mankind to be the creator, and a loving creator, whose eternal design is not the salvation of certain elect ones, of those only after they are dead, and from evils that do not exist, but the salvation of all, of the living, from actual evils. It reveals to each generation that it is not only the heir of all the ages, but the incarnation of their summed-up powers; that this trust bequeathed from all preceding generations represented not only man in the past, but all that preceded man,—every bird that ever sang to its mate, every tiger that ever defended its young, nay, every atom that ever clung to its fellow-atom amid the starmist, in the first throb of that spirit of life which has climbed on to the splendor of reason and glory of a heart, beside which the sun and moon are mere sparks.

This is the Holy Mother. This is the ever-blessed, unwearied Madonna, bearing her man-child in her arms. A legend runs that, when Mary was travelling in Egypt, and her arm failed from long bearing her babe, a third hand grew out to sustain the child: even so is it with the maternal spirit which is caring for the world, watching over human hearts, bearing it onward. Does the old support fail? Lo! and then already our dear mother is many-handed. Wherever are love, thought, sympathy, and a devotion to truth and right, there are her sustaining arms. Her unwearied watch is with the student seeking truth and wisdom, with the reformer, the philanthropist, the physician, the man of science, the poet, the artist. Wherever there is one who is contriving a new benefit for the earth, some relief from evil, some mitigation of pain, some beauty which shall soothe and delight earth's way-worn pilgrims, some sweet song to beguile sorrow and pain into forgetfulness, win hearts from vain regrets, cast a sunbeam into the darkened breast of guilt, proffer a draught of Lethe to the lips of despair and death, there is our divine Father, and there is our heavenly Mother, majestic and beautiful. All nature is glorified in them: with them are the sign and seal by which all nature, however fierce and wild, is forever bound to follow and obey their eternal attraction.

This Religion of Humanity, therefore, has not the disadvantages of some new sect or new idea: it not only exists already, but it has existed for ages. I believe it to be the only religion that does really exist, and that alone which the great teachers have taught.

It is a very common experience with those who abandon an established church, sect, or creed, that they never cease to honor the great teacher said to have founded that church or creed. Most freethinkers feel that they love Christ much more than the Christians do. The same phenomenon appears throughout the world. Wherever there is a protestant movement, we hear the cries: Not Buddhism, but Buddha! Not Confucianism, but Confucius! Not Christianity, but Christ! It is not difficult to see why we love the teacher while opposing the system named after him. The teacher represented the Religion of Humanity. No matter what he taught, he was another step: he sought to remove some evil or error, and added something to the ever-growing life of the world. But the system which has borrowed his good name is invariably one based on that which he resisted. Every so-called religion is a new edition of the old nature-worship: it is a system trying to sanction its power with the prestige of a breaker of systems. But such power can never be built up except by reversing the freedom and humanity of the system-breaker, because it must rule by bribe and menace. There never was a prophet who did not teach love, forgiveness, gentleness: there never was a system which did not make its prophets teach wrath, expiation, vengeance. "Love your enemies," says the prophet as he was: "Depart into fire," says the prophet as the system makes him.

As time goes on, this anomaly is seen. The Human Religion is at work. People grow ashamed of their dogmas: they more and more dwell on the sweet parables, the kindly deeds, the human side of their prophet; they try to hide and forget the awful character which the system assigns him. But it is impossible. That awful character is an old rôle in the drama of the gods. Jehovah had to play it, Zeus and Jove, and Jesus. Every successful name has to be put to that part, if a creed is to survive after it is unloved and unbelieved. So, steadily, as knowledge and liberty advance, must such systems crumble and their idols follow them. When their supernatural terrors have become grotesque and their essential promises antiquated, there are left only the vulgar fears and interests to which every existing order appeals, and from that moment the familiar face of selfishness is seen beneath the mask of piety. Such is the process now going on. By it, true and faithful hearts are hourly set free; and there is fair prospect of seeing a swiftly growing and expanding union among the really religious, through the discovery that what each sincerely loves in his prophet his seeming opponent loves equally, and what he discards is that which none can love, though it may be tolerated. No man loves Jesus for his miracles; no heart responds to his curse on a fig-tree; none rejoices in his formula for cursing the goats at the last day. The Jesus beloved is he who spoke of the forgiven prodigal, who wept tears over his dead friend, who knew the scripture of the lilies and the waving corn, who promised peace, and bade men rest in the faith that, even as they forgave the trespasses of men, all the more would the divine love forgive them. That is the Jesus really beloved by the sincere and lowly hearts that are not concerned in Christianity as a politic system; and they do not love him more than those called infidels.

There is one belief concerning Christ in which all sects, churches, secularists, theists, atheists, agree: they all agree that he was a man. Some believe he was a God-man, others a miraculous man: all agree that he was a man. That, then, is the only doctrine that can be pronounced literally catholic,—that is, universal.

And, as the definition of a man grows truer, and as more and more mankind come to feel how dependent they are for all advancement upon the fidelity and wisdom of great and good men, it will not be thought derogatory to Jesus that he should be called a man. But it will be found derogatory to connect him with the thunder-gods of primitive ages. It will be resented more and more, as a lowering of his goodness and greatness to call him the "Incarnation of Jehovah," whose Biblical record is one of wrath, injustice, and cruelty. As Jove and Jehovah have died of inhumanity, so will the doomsday Christ pass out of human love and belief. When Christians speak of God becoming man, we have only to say, Let him be a real man, and we can believe on him. Remove from him the theologic costume of miracle, of unforgiving, last-day wrath, of ceremonials and ritual preserved from the ancient worship of the elements by cowed and terrified barbarians. Give us the great heart and brain, the real man as he was, ally him with the grand work of humanity on earth, unite him with his true brothers, his peers of every age and race, and be sure there will be no heart on earth which shall fail to surround him with love and homage.

Already there are signs that this is the way Christianity is tending. The character of its defence has completely changed. We no longer hear its defenders resting it upon miracles or upon Judaic history, but upon the moralities and the humanities they believe bound up with it. They plead for the social and domestic virtues, and say that for the masses these rest upon Christianity. That is a good sign. It is necessary to prove to them that Christianity does not come into this moral tribunal with clean hands; that it carries into homes a book containing cruelties and obscenities as God's word; that it propagates superstition, and teaches man to rest for safety upon metaphysical dogmas rather than righteousness. But, while maintaining this, we may gladly recognize a happy change in the fact that the dogmas are steadily overlaid by considerations of practical virtue. This I believe will go on until out of these transitional controversies shall emerge the full-formed religion of Humanity, to be loved and honored of all, and to include all races in a fraternal competition to promote the health, happiness, and virtue of the family of man. Those styled "apostles" felt and foresaw this. "Be not deceived," cried one: "he who doeth righteousness is righteous." Said another, "Pure religion and undefiled is to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted by the world." A third added, "Love is the fulfilling of the law." Equally was this the testimony of Zoroaster, of Buddha, and Confucius.

In this religion have the prophets and sages lived and died; and this will remain forever the religion of the faithful and the true, the helpful and the just, when all our controversies have died away. When the dogmatic systems have taken their place among other relics of antiquated philosophy, there will still be growing and expanding in the earth the religion of humanity,—the hatred of pain, which to superstition was a means of grace; hatred of all sacrifice of human welfare on any account whatever; passionate horror of all evil and all that inflicts suffering; passionate love of all that promotes happiness; worship of health, concentration of all powers within man and out, which health of body and mind alone can wield to the humanization of man and his world; and the immortal hope that humanity will survive forever, conquer all evil, attain perfect knowledge and joy. This religion will flourish over the graves of all idols and creeds; and this is the Religion of Humanity.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF GOETHE. By Herman Grimm. Translated by Sarah Willand Adams.

The charm of this book will be most fully felt by those who thirty years ago shared in the great intellectual and æsthetic revival caused by the introduction of the study of German literature. Then Goethe illumined the heavens and the earth, and all science, religion, philosophy, and art "were the colors of his spirit."

It has seemed an almost inexplicable phenomenon that the books then the daily companions of life should have remained for days or months unopened, during all the crowded years which have followed; and yet the spirit and the wisdom of this great master went with us through them all, and now the new interpreter comes to bring us to his feet again, and he recognizes the necessity of the seeming departure.

"We live in a new era, which must create anew its own image of him: it overthrows the old one, but does not touch him. To-day, more than ever, it is important that our attention should be turned to him; but another stand-point must be accepted."

If this be true,—and many indications show that it is as true of New England thought and culture as of German,—we must be profoundly grateful to Professor Grimm for having given us these lectures, which present to us not the old picture of Goethe cracked and faded by time, but a new and vivid portrait as he looks to the young German of to-day, who understands his life and work by the new light of German freedom and unity.

The book is dedicated by the translator to Ralph Waldo Emerson; and most fitly is this done, since the writer acknowledges his large debt to one whom he styles "the greatest of living authors," and since we find the fruit of Emerson's influence in his own work. How like Emerson are many passages, in his description of Goethe's personal power! Speaking of private letters from Weimar in Goethe's time, he says: "If the people have nothing else to say, they announce at least whether Goethe is at home or on a journey; mentioning the last as an abnormal circumstance, as if they had a right to his presence among them. . . . Every one who comes in contact with him by the instant surrender of himself makes the highest demands upon Goethe, and he fulfils them all."

It is impossible now to give an analysis of Professor Grimm's work. Enough to say that it is a rare intellectual delight to come again into Goethe's atmosphere, introduced by one of such rare poetic imagination and critical insight.

But we also owe a great debt to the translator, who by her patient labor and by her loving perception has made of her translation a work as fresh and beautiful as an original. Herself deeply imbued with that early reverence for Goethe, and with rare literary culture which eminently fitted her for her welcome task, she has taken us with her to listen to the words of the Professor. We are not conscious that we are not hearing his own words, and yet not a trace of the German idiom mars her pure and fluent English. It reminds one of the translation by Bettina Brentano of her own letters into English, when her intense search for the exactly fitting word banished sleep from her pillow.

We are proud that an American woman abroad has done herself such honor and her country such service, and we trust that this will not be the last work of her pen. The reader will find in this book a rich mine of instruction and enjoyment, and the expressed satisfaction of the author will assure him that he has the advantage of getting his thought as truly as he could in the original. LITTLE WOMEN; or, Meg, Jo, Beth, and Amy. By Louisa M. Alcott. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

"Here's richness!" as said the immortal Squeers of Dotheboys Hall. We do not propose to go into the merits of Little Women at the present time. Its fame is secure. One might as well question the hold of Robinson Crusoe on the affections of the universal boy as the hold of Little Women on the affections of the American girl. And the girls are not alone in liking it. It has been read by hundreds of thousands of children, by many of them over and over again with increasing delight. And now at length, as is fit and right, we have a beautiful illustrated edition to take the place, on Christmas day, in hundreds of happy homes, of the much thumbed and battered copies of the old edition, that have comforted and entranced so many flying hours. There are over three hundred illustrations, all made for this book. That all of them are excellent we shall not pretend. But many of them are full of spirit and admirably reproduce the sentiment of the text. Many of the figures seem to us over-tall, not to say long. The illustration opposite page 449 is one of the best. Very admirable, too, is the engraving of Miss Alcott's face, and on the opposite page "the Home of Little Women," which is at the same time a confession; for it bears an unmistakable likeness to Mr. Bronson Alcott's home in Concord, Mass. Happy Miss Alcott, to have carried pleasure to so many children's hearts and to have now the prospect of renewing and extending it to an unlimited degree!

A GUERNSEY LILY; or, How the Feud was Healed. A Story for Girls and Boys. By Susan Coolidge, author of What Katy Did, The New Year's Bargain, etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

"Blessed are the eyes that see the things that ye see," may be said to the children of to-day confronted by this Guernsey Lily. Very different were the books that our childhood enjoyed. Think of it! Two hundred and sixty-seven illustrations! And many of them very charming, though few, if any, of them have, we imagine, been prepared expressly for this volume. The pictures are good, but the story is better. It is by Susan Coolidge, and this makes its goodness sure. It is the story of a family feud, and tells how the children put their heads together and made a sort of bridge by which the older folks could go half-way and meet each other with reconciling hands. And the print is so good that the children can read without injuring their eyes and the old folks without spectacles. And over and above the story there is a great deal that is very interesting about the Island of Guernsey, of which there is a map on the fly-leaf. Even the advertisements on the insides of the covers are a pleasure to the eye. The fragrance of the "Guernsey Lily" pervades every chapter of the book, but we shall not forestall the pleasure of the reader by saying one syllable in regard to its genus or species.

THE SPELL-BOUND FIDDLER. A Norse Romance. By Kristofer Janson. Translated from the original by Auber Forestier. With an Introduction by Rasmus B. Anderson. $1.00. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. 1880.

This little book shows how Ole Bull and other Norwegian violinists have been persecuted by the Orthodox clergy. Instances are given in the introduction, and also in the body of the work, of men of high musical genius being driven into poverty, despair, and drunkenness by these bigots. How the hero of the romance, whose real name was Torgeir Audunson, learned all his music by listening to the Force-grim, the water-fall near his father's mill; how he won the high-souled Kari for his bride, and how happy and innocent they were for some years,—is related charmingly. Then came the rule of a cruel Sabbatarian, whose hatred of all merry-making prevented Torgeir from earning his living at home, and tortured him with fears of endless misery. He wandered away, and became dissipated. His style of music grew wilder and wilder, so that often he was carried away completely, and could not stop until utterly exhausted. His wife remained faithful to him and his art. On his death-bed, he was haunted by strains of music in the air, and begged Kari to send for the priest to drive out the black devils; but she did not wish to have him "die with a curse over the best there had been in his life." She was still in doubt what to do, when their son returned from his musical studies abroad. The sound of his violin called up all the bright visions of the father's boyhood, "and all living things came and thanked him who had woven them into his tunes." Then the music grew sadder, but it turned to "praise to God and thanksgiving for all his struggles and sufferings," as "his son gathered up all his gloom and sorrow into a flood of melody, and carried him into God's own bosom without asking leave of any one."

POEMS OF THE LIFE BEYOND AND WITHIN. Voices from Many Lands and Centuries, saying, "Man, thou shalt never Die." Edited by Giles B. Stebbins. Second Edition. Boston: Colby & Rich.

The title of this compilation expresses its general character, but the selections are really very much better than the title necessarily indicates. As most of our readers are aware, the editor is an ardent Spiritualist; and we confess that we opened the book with some trepidation, as we reflected upon the kind of twaddle that might easily be gathered under the above heading. But we closed the book with thanksgiving. The selections are in excellent taste throughout, judging by what is omitted as well as by what is retained. Only once does the editor seem to us to yield to a direct temptation of the devil, and that is when he inserts an imitation of Burns produced by a "medium." "I have aimed," says Mr. Stebbins in his preface, "to be catholic and impartial, and have gathered from ancient Hindostan, from Persia and Arabia, from Greece and Rome and Northern Europe, from the Catholic hymns of the Middle Ages, from early Protestant sources, and the great poets of the centuries in Europe, down to some of the best words of living men and women in our own and other countries, closing with inspired voices from the spirit land." The aim has been well carried out, and the selections are mainly from classical writers. Only three "inspirational" poems are given,—the one to which we have objected, and two by Lizzie Doten. The last of these, supposed to be an inspiration from Poe, we do not hesitate to pronounce equal to some things which Poe himself really wrote.

The selections are printed with clear type, on tinted paper; and the volume is tastefully bound.

THE North American Review for December opens with a vigorous article on "The Future of the Republican Party," by George S. Boutwell. The ex-Secretary is in the habit of thinking clearly, and stating freely and fearlessly the results of his thought. We think he sums up the situation well, when he says: "We demand a full, free vote and an honest count. The duty resting upon the Republican party is to extort from the Constitution every legitimate power for the enforcement of this demand." This is its opportunity, in his view; and it must go forward to improve it with the courage of its convictions. He believes that our policy toward the South should be "determined, bold, aggressive." He holds that a case has arisen in nearly half the States of the Union, where the bayonet must be used to protect the ballot or Republican institutions will disappear, and puts a great deal of truth tersely, when he says, "With the ballot free, we can control the bayonet; but, when the ballot is suppressed, the bayonet is supreme." He would have each House of Congress reject all claimants to seats the record of whose election is "tainted with fraud or stained with crime," and calls for the exercise of the power, and indeed the discharge of the duty, provided for by Section 4 of Article IV. of the Constitution, which decrees that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them from invasion."

The essay on "Rational Sunday Observance," by James Freeman Clarke, is a most interesting one, both on account of the subject and the author. Mr. Clarke says, "Whether the results of telling the truth seem to be good or bad, the truth ought to be told"; and he has put no small quantity of very wholesome truth into this article. He brushes aside the absurd idea that, even from the Biblical stand-point, the command to keep the Sabbath has any bearing upon the Christian Sunday, and asserts that there remains, for the Protestant, no argument for the observance of Sunday as a day of rest from the avocations of the week, "save its utility, or necessity for the good of man." It is necessary as a day of rest; it is necessary as a day for popular education and refreshment. He indorses the use of public parks on Sunday afternoons and evenings in the summer, paints with evident satisfaction the picture of Coney Island on a hot Sunday, and suggests that the usefulness of our city churches would be greatly increased, if public halls could be connected with them, where on Sunday and week-day evenings during the winter months "music, pictures, reading-rooms with newspapers, coffee-rooms, and places for conversation," might be furnished to the well-disposed. Mr. Clarke has certainly done the rational cause a valuable service in championing without qualification a free and sensible use of Sunday for the good of man.

The article of Mr. Richard Grant White, on "The Public School Failure," is destined to excite much unfriendly criticism, more we think than its general thought deserves, because of many extravagant statements which are exaggerations, some of them very extraordinary exaggerations of the truth. The title itself is the truth so magnified as to make it a lie. His closing sentence, speaking of our school system as one which results, as the experience of half a century shows, "in deterioration in purity of morals, in decency of life, in thrift, and in all that goes to make good citizens," is wide of the mark. Still, it is too true that, as a complete system of education, as a system calculated to fit men for the duties of life, our public school is a failure. No doubt we have prided ourselves too much upon it, no doubt some of us have expected too much of it. Every day increases the necessity for an improvement of its methods even in the intellectual field it claims to till, and the addition to it of the essential elements in industrial and moral culture. We think Mr. White realizes this necessity, though his criticisms in our judgment would have been more effectual, had they been a little less antagonistic.

Articles by Prof. Ernest Curtius on "Discoveries at Olympia," John Jay on "Southern Statesmen and their Policy," Désiré Charnay on "The Ruins of Central America," Dr. Leonard Waldo on "The Distribution of Time," and Aaron A. Ferris on "The Validity of the Emancipation Edict," complete the number, which is rich in its breadth of view as well as in the quality of its discussions. F. A. H.

THE Catholic World for December criticises very severely the late Episcopal convention. There is a very suggestive and sensible article on "Irish American Colonies," which urges that the emigrants to this country should settle as farmers in the West, and not go to the cities. It proposes a systematic movement to this end, and points out how it may be accomplished. In an article on the "Transitions of American Literature," there is a remarkable amount of misstatement, and a general misconception of the tendencies of American literature. It rightly criticises, however, the tendency to look to Europe for models and for inspiration, and finds that American literature is not properly encouraged.

For the Free Religious Index.

A SPIRITUALIST'S WORD.

It was with much regret that I saw Mr. Abbot's relinquishment of the editorial conduct of the Index. From its first issue, under his able management, it had endeared itself to me, more particularly so during its latter years, owing to its persistent and consistent advocacy of the purest morality in conjunction with the largest liberty, in contradistinction to the loose system of morals, coupled with practices corresponding, in vogue with a large class of so-called Liberalists. Mr. Abbot's bold and aggressive warfare upon all laxity in the ethical domain, whether theoretical or practical, won my most hearty approbation; and just when, as it seemed, moral looseness was in the ascendant in liberalism, came Mr. Abbot's severance from the Index, to my deep regret, as before remarked.

Anxiously were the first few numbers of the Free Religious Index, under its new management, examined, that its policy might be compared with that under its aforetime management; and glad was I to find that the Elijah mantle had fallen upon a worthy Elisha's shoulders, and I am sure that the many readers of the paper must rejoice with me to find so little change in its spirit and general conduct. The same breadth of scholarship pervades its pages, the same reverence for truth, the same deep insight into the mazes of quasi-liberal casuistry and sophistry, the same devotion to the cause of universal justice and equity, the same broad philanthropic and humanitarian sweep, the same cordial indorsement of the scientific method of investigation and analysis, in ethics as in physics, in religion as in mathematics. For one, I am more than pleased with the Free Religious Index; and, if its career of usefulness should be at all commensurate with its evident merits, the friends of "cultured freethought" could scarcely wish for more.

Some individual utterances in the Index, recently, having been the subject of rather sharp criticism from some of my spiritualistic confrères, and the Index having published some words of cordial approvement from one Spiritualist, in partial counterpoise, I, as a Spiritualist, was moved to send you a few words of appreciation and cheer, as above. I have read with interest the editorial on "Spiritualism and Science" in the Index of November 4; and I have been thinking of submitting to its readers, at no distant day,—provided I can find sufficient time for their preparation,—a few remarks thereupon. At present, suffice it to say that it was a fair and candid statement of the difficulties attending the acceptance of Spiritualism by the cultured, thoughtful non-spiritualist; and it embodied much truth regarding the defects inherent in the popular phases of the spiritualist movement. In my opinion, it does not cover all the ground, though; and I have thought to briefly supplement your statement with some facts indicative, probably, of a deeper basis for bona fide spiritual actualities than would appear from a perusal of your editorial.

Before concluding, allow me to express my emphatic approval of the remarks of Mr. B. F. Underwood, in the Index of November 4, concerning the Liberal League and the "Repealers." His observations anent Mr. James Parton, Mr. Elizur Wright, and Mr. Wakeman, are eminently true; indeed much more could with truth have been said in criticism of those gentlemen's proceedings,—the infamy at present attaching, to a large extent in the public mind, to freethinkers in general, as defenders and advocates of immorality and vice, being largely due to the extremely unwise line of conduct pursued by them and their associates, of whom many of the latter are far beneath their more cultured coadjutors in honesty of intention and purity of conduct. I am in hopes that the conjunction of the American Liberal Union and the new secular organization, as suggested by the Index, may be effected; so that all the friends of State secularization not in sympathy with the present status of the old League may be in unison in organization and practical work; and could a strong Secular Union be built up, with Mr. Abbot, the founder of the League, at its head, so much the more would I rejoice. Perhaps in time even this desideratum may be realized.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE collection of Mr. Ruskin's scattered letters, which will shortly appear, is to bear the characteristic title of Arrows of the Chace.

THOMAS HUGHES has arrived safely home in England, in excellent spirits. He is delighted with his visit to this country, and is full of high hopes for his Tennessee colony.

EUGENE HARDING, the well-known Signor Blitz, of slight-of-hand fame, accidentally shot and killed himself, while duck-hunting on the Hackensack River, near Little Ferry, N.J., last week.

CHARLES READE, the English novelist, has sent Mayor Cooper of New York slips from Shakespeare's mulberry at Stratford-on-Avon, with the suggestion that they be planted in Central Park.

DR. ANDREW WILSON, of the Edinburgh Medical School, has in press a volume of Chapters on Evolution. Dr. Wilson has been supplying the desk of Mr. Conway, in London, during his absence in this country.

AN enterprising Japanese sent his son to Switzerland in 1877, to learn watch-making. The boy has now gone home, and established a factory with government help, at which father and son are industriously teaching the trade to native Japs.

A NUMBER of friends of John S. Dwight of Boston, among them Henry W. Longfellow and Robert C. Winthrop, have written him a complimentary letter, proposing a testimonial concert at Music Hall in return for his services in behalf of music; and he has accepted.

THE Harvard students, not to be outdone by their fellows at Oxford, are mastering Sophocles' Œdipus Tyrannus, and will produce the play some time next spring; Professors White and Goodwin drilling the actors in pronunciation, and Professor Norton planning the costumes.

IT appears that we still live in the age of the prophets, as the following newspaper item testifies: "Henry G. Vennor, the Canadian weather prophet, foretells a good ice crop; and John H. Tice, the St. Louis weather man, heavy rains at the South, and heavy snows North."

REV. GEORGE C. MILN, whose heretical tendencies forced him recently to dissolve his connection with the Orthodox Church in Brooklyn, N.Y., over which he was settled, is reported to have been invited to become the successor of Robert Collyer in the Church of the Unity, Chicago.

A COLORED man of Philadelphia, an owner of property and a tax-payer for twenty-five years, is unable to get his children into the public schools on account of their color. And yet the children of our schools are taught that all men are created free and equal, etc. Is it any wonder that we have occasion so often to complain of untruthfulness and insincerity in these days?

HENRY BACON, a noted American artist, who has been living abroad for the last ten or twelve years, most of the time in Paris, has lately returned to this country for a visit. He is the son of the Rev. Henry Bacon, a distinguished Universalist preacher in his day, who was settled for many years in Philadelphia, where he died some twenty years ago. Mr. Bacon is also the brother of Edwin Bacon, the managing editor of the Boston Advertiser. His old Boston friends will extend to him a cordial welcome.

DR. WILLIAM S. DENNETT, of Boston, has examined 1,100 children of the public schools of Hyde Park in regard to their eyesight, and his work shows some interesting results: "76 per cent. were found to have what may be considered perfect sight; 12 per cent. were prematurely far-sighted; 8 per cent., near-sighted. These eye troubles were found mainly among the older children. Of the 530 scholars under ten years of age, only 18 per cent. were found to have defects of vision; while, among the 60 high-school scholars, 31, or over 50 per cent., were found affected in some degree. This is a strong argument for regular examination of school-children's eyesight, and timely intervention to prevent injury. Of the 279 children whose eyesight was found defective, 134 were prematurely far-sighted. They will have to put on glasses quite early in life. The 95 who are near-sighted testify that they experience constantly increasing difficulty in distinguishing objects. All these cases might have been mitigated, if not prevented, by the timely use of properly selected glasses."

FOREIGN TRAVEL.

The vast sky dwarfeth all below,
That man has reared or earth can show:
Then wherefore wander to and fro?
Mount, minster, pyramid, and sea
Are trivial matched with cosmic space
And pomp of worlds which night displays:
Then wherefore bird of passage be?
In every land, the stir and strife
Are for the bread that feedeth life:
One spot, one people, teacheth all
The lore of this terrestrial ball.

The relics of the past are vain:
The haughty palace, pillared fane,
Cemented were with human blood,
And bestial keep the multitude.
Lone prairie of the unploughed West,
That poor man welcomes to its breast
With wheaten plenty, land and home,
Is fairer spot than storied Rome.
The old States moulder into dust
With all their pomp of palace, shrine,
And sceptred sway by right divine,
Because to man they are unjust.
What though the golden prairie flower
Blooms not amid superb decay?
The rising, not the falling, tower
It perfumes,—structures of to-day:
For people, not for priest or king,
Their doors unfold, their arches spring.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 9, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER,
Sec'y F. R. Association.

THE IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT.

It is a common saying in our time that the spirit of theological difference is abating, and that there is a tendency among the different religious sects toward unity and coöperation. And this, in a measure, is true. With regard to the so-called Evangelical sects of Protestant Christendom, for instance, there is very much less antagonism than half a century ago; and in many ways they work together. And between the Liberal sects of Christendom, on the one hand, and the Evangelical on the other, there are to-day acts of courtesy and occasional participations together in religious gatherings, which show that the old-time bitterness and hostility that separated them have largely departed.

Yet all the sects in themselves are subject to an internal conflict. It is a conflict of ideas, of tendencies, of interpretation of doctrine, of ecclesiastical method. The conflict may not anywhere come to an open separation,—no new sects may grow out of it,—because there is not such momentous emphasis placed on the forms of belief as once there was, and nowhere is the sectarian spirit so dominant. Yet the conflict none the less exists. In a general way, the parties to it may be denominated as conservative and reformatory, stationary and progressive. On the one side there is tenacious adherence to the old creeds and to the old forms of church action, and a corresponding suspicion and fear of any change as fraught only with evil. On the other side there is openness to new thought, a more cordial welcome to the progressive influences of the age, and a serener trust in the spirit of truth as still holding some things in reserve not revealed to former generations, and as continuing to be a safe guide to mankind. In a word, the conflict that is now going on in all the Protestant sects of Christendom is the old conflict between authority and freethought in religion, or between the conclusions reached by the human mind centuries ago, and believed to be vested with supernatural sanction, and the conclusions of the same human mind reached by the freer inquiry and the wider knowledge and the more scientific investigation and the clearer comprehension of nature and man, that are in vogue in the modern world. It is the "irrepressible conflict" between the human mind bound and the human mind free, which has more or less shaped the whole course of Christian history, which produced the Protestant movement and the various sects into which it subdivided, and which must needs go on until freedom of thought has conquered and placed the seal of its possession on the whole domain of religion.

We have been led to these general thoughts at this time by noting how this conflict has appeared in the conventions of the various large denominations which have been recently held in this country. In the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Philadelphia, it was marked by the great difference of views among the papers read. While it was evident that a portion of the members would yield nothing of doctrine to the new notions imported by science and the evolution philosophy, it was equally clear that others had felt the influence of modern research and thought, and had in consequence much modified their views of the inspiration of the Bible, of the creation and original condition of man, and on other important points of dogma. This difference of opinion was not pushed to open rupture, because the programme of the Council did not necessitate it. It was a meeting rather for theoretical consideration of religious problems than for any form of practical action. But the same differences were there that are now producing, in the case of Professor Robertson Smith, such bitter practical agitation in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, even threatening to sever the body in twain.

In the Episcopal Convention, held in New York, there was greater apparent harmony, perhaps; certainly, much more harmony this year than in most of the recent sessions of that body, owing to the fact that the question of High-Church ritualism, which has heretofore been a firebrand in the General Convention, seems to have been raked up on the hearth and at least temporarily smothered with ashes. But from Broad-Church members of the denomination flashed forth the fire of freethought in most vigorous protest, when, by certain votes, the screws of ecclesiastical authority were turned upon them. It is evident that the elements of a conflict were all there, and that it will be the part of prudence (which the Episcopal Church usually heeds) not to turn those screws too tightly.

In the more recent National Council of Orthodox Congregationalists, at St. Louis, the same conflict appeared, only in still more open and intense form of antagonism. Two or three times, the differences culminated in discussions that are pronounced as "heated" and "acrimonious"; and, on one occasion, the prolonged and excited debate is described by the reporter for the Christian Union as "quite reaching the extreme limits of Christian courtesy." Another witness speaks of the scene as calculated to grieve all good Christians and disgrace the cause of religion in the eyes of the world. The subject-matter of this latter discussion was an elaborate report by Dr. Smythe, of Andover, recommending some stricter regulations with regard to ministerial standing, the gist of them being the appointment of a standing committee in each local association, who as a kind of grand jury should have jurisdiction over the credentials of ministers. One, perhaps the chief, object of this measure was to protect the churches from what were called "ministerial tramps," who are quite likely to turn out immoral men and bring scandal upon their profession. But it was not disguised that another end, which the plan was intended to accomplish, was to protect the churches from heresy. And it may be safely assumed that it was this latter point that brought on the "heated discussion."

Another animated but briefer debate ensued on the proposition for the framing of a new creed, or a statement of a consensus of belief in the Orthodox Congregational churches at the present day; and still another on a report favoring some change in the old Puritan Parish system, by which the church proper rather than the society should have the greater power.

All these propositions were regarded by the jealous defenders of the independence of the local churches as tending strongly in the direction of ecclesiastical centralization—as, indeed, they did; and hence they were vigorously resisted, not only by the liberal wing in theology, but also by those who are conservative in matters of church polity, though it should be said that some who favored a new statement of beliefs did it because they believed the old statements outgrown. But, on the other hand, it was argued that the National Council should not be vested with any authority to form such a statement. All the vexing questions were finally disposed of by referring them to committees who should report, not back to the Council, but to the churches for their consideration, or by voting to print the reports and send them to the churches for such action as the churches should deem fit; which, of course, was a victory, for the time being, of the principle of the independence of the individual church, and to that extent a victory for freethought as against ecclesiastical encroachment.

But the battle is not ended. It is only shifted to other ground. The two principles are there in conflict, Freedom and Authority,—freedom to think out one's own beliefs, acceptance of beliefs externally imposed. The two principles are irreconcilably opposed. There can be no peace between them. One must conquer the other, or they must separate as wide apart as the poles. The ultimate of one is the papal infallibility of the Church of Rome, the ultimate of the other is absolutely Free Religion.

A FRIEND has sent us the Philadelphia Times of November 25, containing a report of a sermon to women, delivered in St. Clement's Church in that city, by the Rev. W. J. Knox-Little of Manchester, England. The Reverend Knox-Little is a representative of the extreme High-Church type of an English clergyman. His views of woman and of the marriage relation are, certainly, quite in keeping with the mediæval character of the High-Church theology. Indeed, they go quite back to the "primitive simplicity" of barbarism, when woman was held as a slave, or we might even say to the pre-adamite era of brutalism. Hear him: "To her husband, the wife owes the duty of unqualified obedience. There is no crime that a man can commit which justifies his wife in leaving him or applying for that monstrous thing, divorce. It is her duty to submit herself to him always, and no crime that he can commit justifies her lack of obedience. If he is a bad or wicked man, she may gently remonstrate with him, but refuse him never." And again: 'Widows and maiden ladies are designed by Providence for the purpose of giving a tone to society. They should all be religious women. An irreligious woman is a bad man spoiled. For the disgusting product of modern times, a woman who does her own atheistical thinking, I have nothing but contempt." And there is more of the same sort ad nauseam. It is not such weak and wretched talk as this that is going to confirm the sanctity of the marriage relation in public opinion. On the contrary, it is such views as these—survivals of an era when animal strength was law—which have led to the present demoralizing reactionary sentiment concerning marriage that appears in "Free-Love" theories and easy divorce laws. If this English missionary has nothing better to teach American women than he offers in this sermon, he had better betake himself at once across the Atlantic. America has just lost a woman—Lucretia Mott—who was accustomed to do her own thinking and acting, and one remembered word of whom will do more for American women than all the sermons this preacher of the primitive gospel of the woods can have ever uttered. She at once meets his barbarianism and the modern reactionary license from it by that favorite sentence of hers, "In the true marriage relation, the independence of the husband and wife is equal, their dependence mutual, and their obligations reciprocal."

IF the Ponca Indians do not succeed in getting their wrongs righted, it will not be for lack of earnest friends and sympathizers in Boston. The meeting held in this city last Friday evening, though not so numerously attended as might have been expected, was nevertheless exceedingly interesting, and on the whole successful. Indeed, Mr. Phillips pronounced it the most so of any that had ever been held in Boston on the Indian question. Governor Long, who presided with his usual ease and grace, made a telling and vigorous speech, in which he severely arraigned the government for its course in respect to the Indians, and particularly the Poncas. The addresses of Mayor Prince, Mr. Tibbles, Little Bright Eyes (Miss La Fiesche), and Wendell Phillips, were forcible and pointed, and calculated to excite the desire to do justice to a long-suffering and abused people. Letters were read from Rev. Edward E. Hale and Senator Dawes, and the following resolutions written by Judge Russell were adopted:—

1. Resolved, That the removal of the Ponca Indians from the lands which they held on the faith of a treaty with the United States was an act of grievous wrong, without reason, excuse, or palliation; that national honor demands their prompt restoration, with such compensation for past suffering as is possible, and that nothing short of this will redress their wrongs or repair the violated faith of this government.

2. Resolved, That it is unbecoming in a free government to allow its agents to slander, persecute, and imprison those whose only offence lies in befriending the victims of that government's oppression; and that it shows consciousness of wrong and fear of justice, when high officials belie their principles by denying a hearing in our own courts to those who claim the protection of our laws.

3. Resolved, In the light of the facts now fully known and admitted, we call upon the President to promptly use the large powers conferred upon him to rectify the injuries done to these people during his administration; and we urge our senators and representatives in Congress to secure by all practicable means the enactment of laws which will enable Indians who may hereafter be exposed to like perils to defend themselves in our courts.

A late newspaper despatch announces that it has been decided by Judge Dundy in the United States Court of Nebraska that the Poncas are entitled to the lands of which they have been dispossessed. It simply remains now for the government to act in accordance with this decision.

IN the Independent of November 18, Rev. Dr. Martin, president of a college in Pekin, China, gives an interesting account of a sect in Japan, whom he calls Reformed Buddhists. They claim still to be true Buddhists, but Dr. Martin thinks they have been much influenced by contact with Christian doctrine. He says:—

This sect assumes the title of Shinsin, or the "True Religion"; and a temple of vast extent, bearing their name and dating back several centuries, suggests that the spirit of reform is not of yesterday. The temple differs little from others; but the college connected with it is without a parallel in the empire, and proves conclusively that the reform spirit, whatever may have been its origin, has of late awakened into fresh activity. The buildings, in the most approved style of European architecture, and said to have been erected at the cost of 360,000 zen, or about $300,000, supply accommodations for the several departments of instruction usually found in our Western universities; but the organization is not yet complete. In the department of natural philosophy, we saw a large assortment of apparatus for physical experiments; and in that of theology we saw a class of forty candidates for the priesthood, taking notes of a lecture which was being delivered by a venerable-looking Bonze.

In a tract handed to Dr. Martin by the vice-principal of this institution, the special doctrine of the sect is thus described:—

The principal object of Buddhism is to enable men to obtain salvation from misery according to the doctrine of extinction of passion.... This salvation we call Nirvana, which means eternal happiness and is the state of Buddha. It is, however, very difficult to cut off all the passions; but Buddhism professes to teach many ways for obtaining this object.... These ways may be classed in two divisions; one being called self-power, or help through self, and the other being called the power of others, or help through another. Our sect, called Shinsin, literally meaning "free doctrine," teaches the doctrine of help from another. "Now, what is 'the power of another'?" It is the great power of Amita Buddha. Amita means "boundless," and we believe that the life and light of Buddha are both perfect.... Rejecting all religious austerities and other action, giving up all idea of self-power, we rely upon Amita Buddha with the whole heart for our salvation in the future life, which is the most important thing; believing that at the moment of putting our faith in Amita Buddha our salvation is settled. From that moment, invocation of his name is observed to express thankfulness and gratitude for Buddha's mercy. Moreover, being thankful for the reception of this doctrine from the founder and succeeding chief priests, whose teachings were so benevolent and as welcome as light on a dark night, we must also keep the laws, which are fixed for our duty during our whole life.

This approaches the Christian doctrine of salvation by faith, but without the adjunct of the sacrificial atonement. It may have come, without any "Christian" influence, as a natural reaction in the development of Buddhism, and is not in all respects a progressive "reform."

OUR LIBRARY.

V. English Novelists.

George Eliot is so consummate an artist that she shows full sympathy with mystics like Savonarola, Dinah, and Mordecai, and lays no stress on her own advanced ideas. The piety of her noblest women, Romola, Maggie, and Dorothea, is free from superstition or extravagance, and full of culture, philanthropy, and self-reliance. Some of her strongest and noblest men—Lydgate and Felix Holt, for instance—are thorough radicals; and one of her weakest, Bulstrode, tries to justify his sins by his devotions. Here and there, too, we find shrewd sarcasms, like the account of Aunt Glegg's shutting herself up with Baxter's Saint's Rest whenever she quarrels with her husband. Among her stories most full of satire on fanaticism and formalism is Janet's Repentance. But she is never so bitter as Dickens, with his grim Miss Murdstone and Mrs. Clennam, rapacious Pecksniff, greedy Chadband, and red-nosed Stiggins.

Both these writers show far less knowledge of the weak points of the popular churches than does Canon Kingsley, whose novels much resemble those old-fashioned English comedies, in which witty and daring libertines succeed in everything, even in reforming just as the curtain falls. So the wealthy and philosophic Hebrew in Hypatia, the poor Chartist poet in Alton Locke, and the shrewd, burly doctor in Two Years Ago, triumph over the church-people in both love and argument, until the concluding chapters, when they suddenly appear as new converts, for no particular reason except to give a happy ending. The asceticism, bigotry, and ignorance of the early Christians, are made all the plainer by the contrast to the pure, earnest, thoughtful woman who kept alive all that was best in pagan philosophy until the monks made her a martyr. The novels about England complain bitterly of the priests for trying to monopolize education and keep the poor from getting any more than will make them slaves and bigots. One of the most powerful passages is that in Two Years Ago, telling how the revivalist who is frightening to death a cholera-stricken village falls himself before a sermon against his "devil's doctrines." Curious, too, is the caricature in Alton Locke of that optimistic pantheism which makes no difference between right and wrong. The great charm of this book, however, is its sympathy with the down-trodden operatives.

The same spirit is shown in Sibyl, or The Two Nations, where Disraeli expresses his wonder that England cannot spare missionaries from Tahiti for her own heathen. His Tancred and Lothair also deserve our notice, on account of the vigor with which in the former book he defends the Jews against persecution and slander, and in the latter takes sides with the liberators of Italy against the Church of Rome. There are few books, however, which rebuke bigotry more severely than Jane Eyre does; and Miss Brontë seems to take a special delight in heroes and heroines who are thoroughly secular and unconventional.

But to mention all the novels inspired by this feeling would fill our remaining space. We must hasten on to Bulwer's Zanoni, as an instance of the height to which religion can rise, when wholly free from institutions; and then to Jenkins' Lord Bantam and Mallock's New Republic, as evidence that our views have such beauty and strength as even caricaturists cannot help reproducing.

Thus we come to the novels avowedly on our side; and, among these, the most telling, I think, is Mrs. Linton's Joshua Davidson. The hero is the son of a Cornish carpenter, but of royal race. He is a mere boy when he asks the rector in church, why he does not follow Christ, and give all he has to the poor. After some vain attempts to work miracles, he devotes himself to trying to reform the London outcasts and criminals, and is particularly successful with a street-walker named Mary. He gets so little sympathy from pious and respectable people that he is provoked into blaming them severely. At last, he is driven into revolt against the existing social order, and joins the Communists. Mary follows him to Paris, where she is shot; but he returns to England, and is murdered by a priest-led mob. His biography is supposed to be written by a faithful companion, whose first name is John. The meaning of all this must be plain, especially when we remember that the Old Testament Joshua is called Jesus in Acts vii., 45. We cannot read Mrs. Linton's story of the purity, tenderness, and self-sacrifice in which her hero gives his life for the poorest and most sinful, without being deeply moved. Surely, if he erred, it was only because he was too faithful a follower of him who came seeking for them which were lost, and who found his work so opposed by the pious and respectable men among whom his own disciple, Paul, was proud to claim a place, that he was led to denounce them as vipers and whited sepulchres. Can we look at taking sides thus with the outcasts against respectable people as culpable folly in London, but the holiest wisdom in Jerusalem?

The same dilemma—namely, that, if our public opinion is right, Jesus was wrong—is handled with great power in Wilkie Collins' Fallen Leaves, where the Magdalen ultimately marries the hero, a Christian Socialist from America; and also in Modern Christianity a Civilized Heathenism. The preface of this little book urges that the religion of the New Testament and the early Church, with "its incessant enmity against the world," its fervent piety, and its anxiety to be saved, differs so much from the life of worldly pleasure, formal ceremony, and self-complacency led by most of those who call themselves Christians, that these latter are really heathens. To illustrate the inconsistency of claiming to follow Christ and yet trying to get all we can of the social standing, transitory wealth, and earthly pleasures which Jesus bade his disciples disregard, we have a conversation of a Hindoo with a clerical friend, whom he tells that he sees no reason why he should become a Christian, since doing so does not, according to received usage, involve any improvement of the life he already leads out of regard to commonsense: —

"Christ has said that the joys of this life are wholly incompatible with the joys of the life to come. You Christians take your fill of pleasure on this earth, and expect to have pleasure also in heaven.... It is all very well for your archbishop to talk about converting us poor heathen. Let him try his hand first at the conversion of the House of Lords. Why, if he would speak and act like his master, Christ, for one single week, he would not have a friend left in London.... If Christianity has anything to do with Christ at all, civilization must ever be its deadliest foe. The two labor in totally different fields. Christianity wins souls for heaven, civilization wins prosperity for men on earth. Christianity works for the glory of God, civilization does not pretend to take any such object into account, but simply works for the glorification of human talent and the success of human enterprise.... It is perfect mockery to tell me that I must imitate a Christ who, all his life, was covered with reproach and ridicule, and, in the same breath, to tell me that I am not required to expose myself to ridicule and reproach."

While talking thus, our Hindoo keeps offering to try to be a Christian, if he can be shown one living instance of real imitation of Jesus. At last, he finds what he seeks; and the book ends with a pathetic picture of a true pastor, who gives his income to the poor, spends his time in reproving the fashionable, comforting the wretched, and pleading with the wicked, and, in visiting a dying sinner, is smitten fatally by scarlet fever.

Both these books are very readable; and so are Maitland's Higher Law, and Pilgrim and Shrine. The latter professes to be the autobiography of a young Englishman, named Ainslie, who has nearly finished his studies for the Anglican ministry, when his doubts become so urgent that he leaves his home in search of an ideal which can satisfy all his love and faith. This, after wandering through many lands and many views, he finds at last in the lovely and thoughtful Mary Travers, whom he meets in Australia. His adventures there and among the gold-diggers in California are told with much vigor and humor; and the book is full of bright speeches. For instance, a sea-captain asks a priest, who is arguing that faith is better than experience, how he happened to take passage in his ship. His reverence answers:—

"I have seen too many vessels not to know when they are all right."

"There now," exclaimed the sea-captain, in a tone of mock disappointment, "I was going to give you credit for faith; and I find it only experience, after all."

The whole problem of how far we may believe, and when we must doubt,—or, in other words, what regard we should pay to authority,—may easily be settled by remembering that it is only such faith as is founded on experience that is trustworthy, and that any belief not so supported can be nothing better than a delusion and a snare.

Ainslie's own final results are these:—

"Within the limits of the finite and the knowable lie the whole duty and happiness of man.... In love alone, in pure and unreserving love, does all questioning find answer. At once tree of knowledge and tree of life, fortunate are they who can eat thereof without trespass and without penalty. Believe me, my friend, only those who feel know; and where love is there is no dogma."

The novels just described are remarkable mainly for their heroes; but the interest of Frederika Macdonald's Nathaniel Vaughan centres in a girl of eighteen with blue eyes, a rippled stream of sunny brown hair that flows down her shoulders to her waist, a clear, fearless gaze on her delicately lovely face, a warm, sunny heart, full of delight in nature and love toward all around her except her priest, a highly cultured fancy, and a quick and thoroughly healthy intellect, trained to rest serenely in her knowledge of the visible world and the present life. She is the ideal of freely yet highly developed womanhood, and superior to Mrs. Linton's Patricia Kemball, delightfully unconventional as the latter is. Miss Macdonald's Fay is, indeed, almost equal to Judd's Margaret, and especially like her in appearing all the brighter for her perfect freedom from the bigotry and superstition which darken all the background of these fascinating books. Nathaniel Vaughan himself is so powerfully drawn in his hopeless love for Fay, his gloomy self-denial, his blind, pernicious zeal, his unconscious but fatal cruelty to the child whom he kills in a vain attempt to force her into his own pattern, that our only doubt is whether we should look at him with hatred or pity.

Freethinking novelists, like all others with a polemic purpose, are too apt to put all the virtue on one side; and this failing is especially marked in McDonnell's Exeter Hall and Heathens of the Heath, which compare philanthropic infidels to pleasure-loving and selfish priests with too great severity. Thorndale; or, The Conflict of Opinions, on the other hand, is highly philosophic, but rather too much so for the interest of the story. Miss Fothergill's Probation and Wellfields, however, show such skill and vigor that they have a place in the Leisure Hour Series.

For notices of Mrs. Linton's Under which Lord and Miss Christie's Lady Laura, I must refer to the Westminster Review for January, 1880, and to the Nation for October 7. The former book represents a clergyman's sister as saying that all infidels are "emissaries of the evil one, and this so-called modern science is the means by which he works." Miss Christie's doctrine is: "All that man believed God to be in the past he must himself be in the future. That is the new covenant. We must be gods on earth, or we shall be eternally condemned for having hinted that there is no God in heaven."

It is so difficult to find such books, either in public libraries or the bookstores, that we should do what we can to assist the circulation of our views in this interesting form; and, as the season of gifts draws near, we should take care to select such presents as will give our friends not only momentary pleasure, but lasting strength and peace. I must therefore take the liberty of mentioning that Lady Laura was published by Strahan & Co., London, that Joshua Davidson has been reprinted by Lippencott & Co., and The Pilgrim and the Shrine by G. P. Putnam's Sons, that Nathaniel Vaughan can be procured for $1.50

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

The Diet of the Poor.

Mr. Roger S. Tracy, described as a sanitary inspector, has been engaged in making an investigation into the health and physical condition of the shop girls of New York city. Under whose auspices the investigation was made, and how thorough it may have been, we have no means of knowing, but Mr. Tracy's report states that the pallor and general appearance of unhealthiness noticed among the shop girls are occasioned by their manner of life out of working hours. Late hours, attendance at balls and parties, indulgence in confectionery and pastry, and an insufficient supply of wholesome and well-cooked food are enumerated as reasons for the ill-health of shop girls as a class. We notice that the facts upon which Mr. Tracy bases his conclusions were chiefly derived from employers, and that they are quoted to refute the notion that the practice of compelling shop girls to stand all day has something to do with their physical feebleness. This is clearly a non sequitur. We do not need statistics, nor an investigation by a sanitary inspector, to prove that having to stand contjnuously through a long day's work, week in and week out, is exceedingly injurious to girls and women. Employers who impose this needlessly upon their shop girls cannot evade the responsibility for their inhumanity by producing counter evidence to show that the girls further injure themselves by the hours they keep or the food they eat. When we remember what a desperate struggle the average shop girl has to keep soul and body together on the scant wages she receives, we are surprised that they maintain any degree of health, and that more of them do not go altogether to the bad, morally as well as physically. That they huddle together in unhealthy rooms, and that they eat too little and choose their food unwisely, are evils quite as much due to environment as to choice. When one attempts to figure out the average shop girl's problem, and see how room-rent, meals, and a certain amount of clothing respectable enough to enable her to keep her position, are to be paid for out of three or four dollars a week, one is ready to judge her mistakes more charitably. While these facts as to the improper and insufficient food consumed by shop girls are not to be accepted as an excuse for the unnecessary hardships imposed upon them by their employers, they are nevertheless worthy of the serious attention of the philanthropic. Not only as regards shop girls, but the poor in general, it is undoubtedly true that a better knowledge of what is suitable for food and of the best methods of preparing it would accomplish more than any single agency that could be named toward improving the morals and elevating the home life of the community. The first temptation to take to drink often comes from eating unfit or ill-cooked food.—Boston Journal.

The Religious Newspapers and Hop-Bitters.

Napoleon used to say, "Four hostile newspapers were more to be dreaded than a hundred thousand bayonets." I suppose, on the other hand, four or several great religious weeklies favoring any one thing will bring to it glory and fame and riches: at least so thinks, evidently, the president of the Hop-Bitters Company in Rochester, N.Y. For all quack medicines, I am told the religious press is far preferable to the secular as an advertising medium, probably because the Christian sanction thus given makes the mass of the people believe the patent medicines thoroughly reliable and efficacious. Hostetter's Bitters cured all ills, and were duly advertised a few years ago, till by some accident the papers discovered that these contained 43 per cent. of alcohol; and then, after all the harm had been done, they were dropped by the press, and are now found in their appropriate place on the ale and beer list at restaurants. Having seen a column weekly concerning hop-bitters in a large number of religious papers recently, some persons asked the Massachusetts State Assayer, Mr. Charles R. Fletcher, an able chemist, to carefully analyze a bottle of these bitters. He found, to our astonishment, that they were composed of water 85.056 per cent.; alcohol, by weight, 14.630 per cent.; and hop-bitters and extractive matter, 0.314 per cent. In other words, they contained from three to four times as much alcohol as there is in lager beer, and over one-third of 1 per cent. solid or hop matter! And the following is what the religious papers say this marvellous compound will do: An old lady over seventy, and entirely helpless, after using one bottle walked about the house, and after two walked to her neighbor's! A paralyzed man was completely cured by two bottles! The wife of a member of the Canadian Parliament had a pimpled face "that annoyed the life out of her. One bottle made her face as smooth as a child's"! A lady who had travelled all over Europe to regain her health, spending thousands of dollars, took two bottles, and is now perfectly well! A man of seventy-eight took one bottle, and feels as though he were thirty! The president of the Hop-Bitters Company says, "when a man whose moral nature has been perverted by indigestion" is condemned for crime, he recommends society to order him a bottle of hop-bitters rather than put him in jail. The fourteen per cent. of alcohol would probably be more relishing to the criminal than prison fare. Col. W. H. W., of Baltimore, was completely cured of drunkenness, appetite quite removed, says the press, by hop-bitters,—"a perfect panacea for the drunkard's curse"! This is the first time we have ever heard of alcoholic patients being cured by alcohol. Irritable and fretful ladies are made lovely! The Living Church says: "We do not allow anything in the line of bitters to enter our paper that contains alcohol, but we are satisfied that your bitters are free from that ingredient." This is used by the president as an advertisement. Can it be that a thing of his own making has fourteen per cent. of alcohol, and he not know it? He says there is more hop strength in a bottle of hop-bitters than in a whole barrel of beer. As there is over one-third of one per cent. hop matter in a bottle, it shows how little there must be in a barrel of beer. Most patent medicines are humbugs, and this new applicant for favor would seem to be as much so as the rest, save that it uses water more freely, is cheaper for the producer, and, therefore, more of a money-making affair. It is to be hoped that the press and the people will some time learn not to be imposed upon.—Sarah K. Bolton, in National Temperance Advocate.

LESSONS ON The Origin and Growth of Christianity.

VIII.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

"Now after that John was put into prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God." —Mark i., 14.

1. The Kingdom as Defined by the Jews.

The "Kingdom of God," or "Kingdom of Heaven," is a phrase often used by Jesus. It was not, however, original with him. It is of frequent use in the Talmud and other Jewish writings, where it means, simply, Judaism itself,—the true religion,—or devotion and obedience to the Mosaic Law.

In the Book of Daniel, it is identified as the Messianic kingdom of the future, and described as "an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away." (Dan. vii., 14, 22, 27; ii., 44.) Into it were to be gathered "the people of the saints of the Most High." (Dan. vii., 27.) The dead were to be raised,—some to "everlasting life" in this kingdom, and others to "everlasting shame and contempt." (Dan. xii., 2.)

2. Jesus' Doctrine of the Kingdom of God.

Jesus appears to have held this current belief, but to have modified it by the introduction of certain ideas peculiar to himself. With him, the conception was less material, and more spiritual and moral. His "Kingdom of God" was a redeemed and purified world, wherein all would be obedient to the Divine will. The condition of admission to this kingdom was not formal observance of the Jewish Law, but practical righteousness. (Matt. v., 20; vi., 33; Mark xii., 28–34.) It was not merely an earthly dominion. It depended upon the spiritual and moral state of the individual. (Luke xvii., 21.) The "sons of the kingdom" were to make preparation for it, by beginning now the divine life of righteousness. It was to be received with the simple faith of a little child. (Mark x., 13–15; Luke ix., 46–48.)

Yet, on the other hand, the coming of this reign of good would be a grand and sudden revolution. A new order would govern the world. Those who are now first would be last, and the humble, if righteous, would be exalted. (Mark x., 31; Matt. xix., 30; xx., 16, 20, 28; Luke xiii., 30.)

3. The Speedy Advent of the Kingdom.

Jesus taught that the time of the establishment of the heavenly kingdom was "at hand"; that it would come in the generation of those then living. (Mark i., 15; xiii., 30, 31, 35, 36; xiv., 62; Matt. iii., 2, 17; x., 23; xvi., 28; xxiii., 36; xxiv., 34, 44; xv., 13; Luke ix., 27; x., 11; xii., 40; xxi., 32, etc.) It would come suddenly, at an unexpected hour. (Mark xiii., 35; Matt. xxiv., 36.) Its coming would be preceded by tribulations, woes, and wars between the nations. (Mark xiii., 19, 24, 25; Matt. xxiv., 21, 29; Luke xxi., 9–13, 16, 25, 26.) Its advent would be heralded by the appearance of the Son of Man, "with power and great glory." "in the clouds of heaven." (Mark xiii., 26; Matt. xxiv., 27, 30; xxv., 31; Luke xxi., 27.) After its establishment, he would sit upon the Messianic throne, as King of the new Israel; while the twelve apostles would also sit upon twelve thrones as judges of the twelve tribes. (Matt. xix., 28.)

Note.—Talk about Christian views of the "Second Advent." (Read to the class Whittier's poem, "Abraham Davenport.")

4. Jesus and the Messianic Office.

Jesus appears, at first, to have deemed himself to be simply a prophet of this heavenly kingdom, warning his people of its speedy advent, and exhorting them to repentance. Later, he unquestionably held the conviction that he was the Messiah, who was to bring about this reign of God on earth.

He first accepted the titles: "Son of Man,"—a common designation of the later prophets, sometimes meaning the Messiah,—and "Son of God,"—which indicated his office as messenger or forerunner of the kingdom of the Heavenly Father. Toward the end of his public career, he permitted himself to be addressed more plainly as "Messiah" or "Christ." (Mark viii., 27–30, etc.)

Note A.—The expression "Son of Man" is found a few times in Job and the Psalms (Job xxv., 6; Psalms viii., 4; lxxx., 17; cxliv., 3), but only as a poetical repetition of the generical term "man." In Daniel and Ezekiel as well as the New Testament, it is used as a personal title. In Daniel, it appears to be synonymous with "Messiah." (Dan. vii., 13.) Ezekiel is called "Son of Man" about ninety, and Jesus about eighty-four times. Jesus designates himself by this title more frequently than by any other.

Note B.—The term "Son of God" was not only applied to Jesus in recognition of his office as prophet of the kingdom of God, but it was also a common designation of all who accepted this doctrine. (See John i., 12; Romans viii., 14, 19; Phil. ii., 15; I. John iii., 1, 2.) God, the ruler of this Theocratic kingdom, was the "Father," and all the true believers were his "sons" or children. This phrase was wholly unconnected, in the minds of Jesus and his early Jewish disciples, with the subsequently developed notion of a miraculous birth.

Note C.—This idea of the "Kingdom of Heaven," as held by the Jews and early Christians, is evidently wholly irrational. Jesus, in this instance, as in others, simply accepted a current belief of his time. The New Testament prophecies of the speedy advent of the Messianic kingdom were unfulfilled.

But is there not something in this teaching of Jesus, which is true now and for all coming time? Is there not a sense in which we may all cherish this hope of a regenerated world? May we not rationally desire the establishment of the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN on earth, through the more perfect obedience to all physical, mental, moral, and spiritual laws? Ought we not to work for it, with all our might, every day of our lives?

Digitized by Google

General Questions.

1. What was the Jewish idea of the Kingdom of God? 2. How does the Book of Daniel describe it? 3. Did JESUS accept this doctrine? 4. In what way did he change it? 5. What was his condition for admission to this kingdom? 6. Upon what did he make it depend? 7. How was it to be received? 8. How would it revolutionize society? 9. When was this kingdom to appear? 10. What signs would precede its coming? 11. How would its advent be heralded? 12. Who would reign in it? 13. What titles did JESUS accept? 14. How is the term "Son of Man" used in the Bible? 15. What did the title "Son of God" indicate? 16. Can we accept the Jewish idea of the Kingdom of Heaven?

To the Teacher.

Read the admirable chapter on "The Messiah and the Christ," in Allen's Fragments of Christian History; Bible for Learners (vol. iii.), ch. xii., xiii., xxv.; Renan's Life of Jesus, ch. vii., viii., xv.; Chadwick's Bible of To-day, lecture on the Four Gospels. FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, NOV. 15, 1880.

The Workingmen's Union Advocate, organ of the Joint Labor Committee, has suspended publication, after an existence of but a few months. It was the first attempt to establish a journal in this city for the special advocacy of labor interests, and appears to have failed for want of appreciation by those it aimed to serve, as well as from the unpopularity of the socialistic doctrines of the editor. It is announced that an effort will be made to revive it again by securing the necessary funds. As one instrument to stir up a sluggish community to the latest phases of modern thought and the evils of unchecked demagogism, the Advocate was valuable; and, for the general good of this section, a revival should be hoped for.

There is an association of Spiritualists here, small in number, earnest in devotion to their religious revelations, and composed of people of very fair intellectual and social standing. I attended a meeting at Minerva Hall, on Clio Street, Sunday, 7th inst. Captain Grant presided, and nearly twenty-five ladies and gentlemen were present. A lady lecturer from Texas (Mrs. Auck) was the speaker of the occasion, and delivered an address, without notes, well received by her hearers. Possessing experience as a public speaker, and a good knowledge of her theme, her effort was impressive, if not a convincing exhortation. I learn that the association met for a time in an upper story of the Bible House, until the managers of that institution, failing to appreciate a free religious standard of toleration, declined to rent longer to these unorthodox brethren. Since then, meetings have been held in private residences, and occasionally in Minerva Hall. They seem to have undergone just enough of intolerance and teaching to make them steadfast in their faith, and to go on their way rejoicing with the approval of their consciences. In so far as Spiritualism is an ally to the Free Religious forces of the country, its presence is welcomed.

The police jury of Lafourche Parish received two petitions, for and against a Sunday ordinance, and with true republican spirit referred the whole matter to a vote of the people. By a large majority, on the 2d inst., they voted against an ordinance. In Calcasieu Parish, temperance prohibition was rejected in six of the eight wards. It will operate in the two wards where approved by majorities, by virtue of the Revised Statues on local option, the wisest of Louisiana laws.

The Jewish South mentions a circular letter addressed by Israelites of Brownsville, Texas, to co-religionists in that State, calling upon all Jewish organizations to join them in petitioning the Legislature to revise Article 2838 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that "all regularly licensed or ordained ministers of the gospel," etc., "are authorized to celebrate matrimony between all persons legally authorized to marry," etc. The word "gospel" is so identified with the Christian religion that it virtually excludes a rabbi, and it is thought advisable to place the matter beyond such a limitation by courts of law. Nearly the same words occur in the statutory law of nearly all the States where a license is required. The South suggests that Dr. Vorsanger, who will be at Austin in January, to advocate the abrogation of the Sunday law, will give the subject his attention.

The South recently republished a London Standard article, announcing that the ancient "Palace of the Inquisition" at Rome was for sale, advertised by an auctioneer, "without any reserve," with all its "changes, dungeons, torture-cells, ghosts, and associations of every sort," because the late proprietor had reduced his establishment, and was in no farther need of the premises. Said the South: "We would suggest that some of our Jewish wealthy men purchase this distinguished palace, and convert it into some charitable institution. How refreshing it would be for the eyes of the inquisitors, if they happen to turn up from their graves, and could behold such a great change in the history of Israel! Yes, buy it, and place upon its portals the inscription, 'The Lord preserveth all those that love him.'" What a comment! But it carries a lesson with it. E. B.

FRAGMENTS OF SCIENCE.

London Fogs.

THE dense fogs which so frequently convert London day into night, while the surrounding country is bright with sunshine, are commonly attributed to the smoky coal which London burns; and it has been proposed to import Pennsylvania anthracite as a remedy. Doubtless, smoke has something to do with the density and blackness of London fogs; but we very much doubt the possibility of largely dispelling them by any change of fuel. It is, we believe, not so much the smoke of London fires as the great volume of water vapor which they produce that serves as the primary cause of the fogs. A necessary product of combustion is water; and the million or more fires of London must send into the air of the city enormous volumes of heat vapor, in addition to the steam of boiling water incident to cooking, manufacturing, and similar operations. While the atmosphere of London is thus being kept at the point of saturation, the manner in which the city is laid out prevents any free passage of wind to sweep away the superabundant moisture. London is made up of a congeries of towns scattered over a hundred square miles or more of area, each with its peculiar net-work of streets and roads, and all grown together into such a snarl of passages, all short and nearly all crooked, that a hurricane would be confused and lost in an attempt to pass through the city. No other large city in the world bears any comparison with London in this respect. All other large cities have long thoroughfares through which the winds can sweep their entire length or breadth. In most cities, such avenues are not only long and broad, but measurably straight. The nearest approach to such a thoroughfare in London begins at Shepherd's Bush and runs along the Uxbridge road, down Oxford Street to Holborn Viaduct. This allows the west winds to penetrate to the very heart of the metropolis, and it is a fact well established by observation that this route is singularly free from fogs. The native Londoner is apt to deride the chess-board plan of most American and many European cities, with streets crossing each other at right angles and running in monotonous straight lines, mile after mile. This plan may not lend itself so readily to architectural effects as the short and tangled streets of London, but its sanitary and commercial advantages are beyond question. It may be that, after all is said and done, London may have to choose between enduring an almost ever-present fog or the breaking up of its beloved labyrinths by cutting broad and straight avenues, in various directions, across the length and breadth of the city.—Scientific American.

A New Barometer.

A NEW glycerine barometer has been invented by Mr. James B. Jordan, of the London Mining Record office, and is being tested at Kew. The cistern is a cylindrical vessel of copper lined with tin, five inches deep and ten inches in diameter, fitted with screwed cover, the air having access through a small hole in the cup attached to the cover, which has a recess holding cotton-wool for filtering out the dust. The main tube, twenty-seven feet long, is connected with the cistern by attachment (with a soldered joint) to a projecting piece of tube, which enters the cistern through the bottom, and is fitted at its opening with a screwed plug. The tube is an ordinary piece of metal gas-pipe, five-eighths of an inch in diameter, furnished at the top with a gun-metal socket, into which is cemented a glass tube four feet long, with an inside diameter of one inch, terminating in an open cup, and fitted with an India-rubber stopper. The fluctuations of the level of the column of glycerine are observed and read off on brass scales, placed on either side of the tube, and fitted with indices and verniers moved by mill-heads at the bottom of the scales. One of these scales gives the length of the column of glycerine, the other the corresponding length of a column of mercury. A variation of a tenth of an inch in a mercurial column is shown by a change of more than an inch in the glycerine column, and the latter is therefore expected to show minute variations which are imperceptible in the former. Glycerine absorbs moisture freely, when exposed to the air; but this is prevented in the new barometer by covering the exposed surface in the cistern with a layer of heavy petroleum oil specially prepared.

FOREIGN.

A VOLUME of poems in Burns' handwriting has been presented to the trustees of the Burns monument at Ayr. It is a small quarto of fifty pages, and was given by the poet to Mrs. General Stewart, of Afton, in 1787.

FELIX PYAT, the communist, has suspended his paper, the Commune, as his sentence to two years' imprisonment has been confirmed, on appeal, for publishing articles justifying the attempt to kill the Russian czar in Paris in 1867.

A STATUE in bronze, to the memory of Robert Burns, was unveiled at Dundee recently by Mr. Henderson, M.P. A procession of from fifteen thousand to twenty thousand workingmen paraded the streets, and the ceremony was witnessed by nearly one hundred thousand spectators.

M. EMILE BLAIN, the author of a disgusting tale published in the Petit Republicain, of Paris, has been condemned to one year's imprisonment and a fine of five hundred francs. The manager of the paper in question was also sentenced to four months' imprisonment and a fine of five hundred francs.

A CURIOUS relic of Robert Burns was recently sold at auction in London, in the original draft of the poem, "The Friar's Curse," written on two panes of glass in the summer-house of Robert Riddell, near Dumfries. The panes have been put between two pieces of plate glass, and heavily framed in oak.

IT seems to be decided that the use of the drum is to be abolished in the French army. The reasons assigned for this step are that the drum cannot be heard amid the din of battle or on the march by the ranks in the rear. Then the drum is useless in rain, as well as an incumbrance in the field. There is also talk of suppressing the regimental bands, and of only having one band in every garrison town. The question is one of economy both in men and money.

ANGELS IN THE HOUSE.—In the last fasciculus of the Bulletins de la Société d'Anthropologie de Paris (tome iii., fasc. 2), M. Bertillon gives the results of his comparative analyses of the statistical tables of suicides for France and Sweden. These results show singular accord between the two countries, and the author considers himself justified in maintaining that they establish the two following laws: 1. Widowers commit suicide more frequently than married men; 2. The existence and presence in the house of children diminish the inclination to suicide both in men and in women.—British Medical Journal.

DR. SCHAEPMAN, a Roman Catholic priest, who has been elected a member of the Second Dutch Chamber, has been allowed to take his seat, in consequence of the vote of the majority of the Chamber. He is the first Roman Catholic priest holding a seat in the Dutch Chamber. By the Constitution of 1840, Roman Catholic priests were formally excluded; and the Constitution of 1848 says, in Article 91: "The members of the Second Chamber cannot at the same time be ecclesiastics." Dr. Schaepman, however, had declared that from the day of his admission to the Chamber he would cease his ecclesiastical functions.

Wednesday, and reminded Mr. Newton that a few days since a summons was granted, at the instance of Mr. Stewart Cumberland, against Miss Houghton of Park Street, Grosvenor Square, as "healing medium," for obtaining money under false pretences. He had now to apply for a farther summons against the same lady for having obtained, on the 18th ult., the sum of 5*s.*, by using a "certain subtle craft to deceive and impose," by pretending to hold communication with a deceased person, Dr. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. Her theory was that Dr. Harvey was her controlling spirit. Mr. Newton referred the applicant to Mr. Mansfield, who had granted the summons. On Thursday, Mr. Pain repeated his application to Mr. Mansfield, who granted the summons.—London paper.

MR. RUSKIN'S RAVINGS.—Mr. Ruskin, who is the Conservative candidate for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University, wrote in July last the following letter to Mr. A. Mitchell, of Inverness, who has forwarded it to the press for publication: "Brantwood, Coniston, Lancashire. My dear Sir,—What in the devil's name have you to do with either Mr. Disraeli or Mr. Gladstone? You are students at the University, and have no more business with politics than you have with rat-catching. Had you ever read ten words of mine with understanding, you would have known that I care no more either for Mr. Disraeli or Mr. Gladstone than for two old bagpipes with the drones going by steam, but that I hate all liberalism as I do Beelzebub, and that with Carlyle I stand, we two alone now in England, for God and the Queen. Ever faithfully yours, J. Ruskin."—It is stated that the above note has caused the students to send an invitation to Mr. Irving, the tragedian, requesting that he will allow himself to be nominated for the Lord Rectorship. Mr. Irving's reply has been satisfactory. —Lloyd's Weekly.

THE Rector of Sparkford (the Rev. C. W. Bennett) and about seventy others of the clergy of Somerset have just prepared a petition for presentation to the magistrates at Wincanton, Yeovil, and other places, asking them to refuse any application for extension of hours on club days or fête days, as being conducive to an increased danger of riot, disorder, and drunkenness. The first-named memorialist sent a copy beforehand to Mr. T. E. Rogers, of Yarlington, one of the county magistrates; and Mr. Rogers, in reply, has addressed a long letter to the rector, in which he expresses his hearty dislike for all unnecessary legal restrictions on the liberty of the subject, which, he says, used to be the pride of Englishmen. He regards it as the function of the State rather to punish with severity offences against order than to interfere with the legitimate freedom of purchase and sale and the ordinary conditions of demand and supply. It is, he says, an extremely painful thing to have to see the Anglican clergy banding together to invoke the aid of the law for the purpose of hampering the recreations of the people and of "making those sad whom the Lord has not made sad."—Pall Mall Budget.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

Prayer-cure.

ON Tuesday night, Mr. W. J. Harris held an inquest at Upchurch, a village about five miles from Sittingbourne, touching the death of Henry Arthur Sears, aged thirteen months, the infant child of John Sears, agricultural laborer, who died from inflammation of the bowels under circumstances which have led to the committal of the father, who belongs to the persuasion known as the Peculiar People, for manslaughter. For some years past there has been a considerable following of Peculiar People at Upchurch, and they hold their meetings there in a disused wheelwright's shop, situate near the parish church. Among the "brethren" present were two of the "elders," named Smith and Coppins, men who are brickmakers by occupation. The latter explained to the coroner and jury that "Brother Smith" was an "appointed elder," and he himself was an "ordained elder."

Alice Ann Sears, mother of the deceased, who was dressed in the style adopted by the "Peculiar" women, was examined, and stated that her child was taken ill on Monday, September 13. She gave [illegible]thing, but laid her hand upon him in the na[illegible]Lord. The Lord delivered him. On Tues[illegible]k the child out into the hop-garden; but, [illegible]her was wet, she brought him home. He w[illegible]tter. She did not take him out again until Thursday, the 16th, when he was taken ill, and his eyes became thick. She carried him home, and sent for "Brother" Smith.

The Coroner: Do you mean your natural brother?

Witness: No, my spiritual brother. Brother Smith is an appointed elder of the Peculiar People, to whom I belong. He is not a man skilled in medicine. He is employed in a brickfield. He anointed the child with oil in the name of the Lord, and said prayers over it. The child appeared to have diarrhœa, and still grew worse. On Sunday evening, the 12th, she sent for Brother Coppins, an ordained elder; and he anointed the child outwardly with oil, and prayed. During the child's illness, she gave it beef-tea, port wine, cornflour, and arrowroot, and it took the breast until Thursday, the 23d, when it died. During the whole of that time, she or her husband did not send for medical aid. They had religious objections to doing so. She believed in the Lord, and that He would answer the prayer of faith, and would have raised the child up, if it had been His will to do so. It was not for want of means that she did not call in a doctor. She left him in God's hands with faith. Many times the Lord had delivered her dear babe. Mrs. Sears added that she gave the brandy, arrowroot, etc., to the child as nourishment, and not as medicine.

Samuel Smith, about thirty, a laborer employed in the brickfields, stated that he was an appointed elder of the Peculiar People. He was sent for by the deceased's mother on Thursday night, September 16, and saw that the child was very ill. He anointed him with salad oil, and laid his hands on him in the name of the Lord.

The Coroner: That is, literally in compliance with the directions contained in the fourteenth and fifteenth verses of the Epistle of James? He read the verses referred to. Mrs. Sears: Yes, and I believe it, praise God. Smith (to the coroner): It is in accordance with the word of God. The Coroner: You did that, believing the cure would follow? Smith: Yes, believing that God heals the sick, if it is not unto death.

Mr. Henry Penfold, surgeon, practising at Rainham, stated that by direction of the court he on Friday last inspected the body of the deceased child, and made a post-mortem examination. The cause of death was enteritis,—exhaustion produced by inflammation of the mucous membrane of the bowels. From the healthy state of all the other organs, he was of opinion that the child might have recovered under proper medical treatment.

The coroner asked the father of the child if he wished to say anything, and informed him that he was not bound to do so, unless he chose.

Sears replied that he had nothing to say, except that he had the same opinion, and believed in the same things as his brethren who had given evidence.

The coroner briefly summed up the evidence, and a verdict of "manslaughter" was formally returned against John Sears, who was committed for trial at the next Kent assizes. He was taken into custody thereupon by Police-superintendent Mayne.—Recent English paper.

A WELSH MIRACLE.—Wales, not to be outdone by Ireland, is enjoying a miracle of its own in the form of apparitions at Llanthony Abbey, the retreat of the famous Father Ignatius, the father himself being the principal witness of the transaction. He declares that on August 30th, during the celebration of the sacrament, the silver vessel in which the host is held at benediction was distinctly visible through the thick doors of the tabernacle. A sister afterwards witnessed the same phenomenon, and in the evening of the same day four boys saw the figure of the Virgin Mary. The figure was dressed in white alb, only the sleeves were wider than alb sleeves. The hands were both raised, and from head to feet a dazzling white light, oval shape, was shining round the body. The figure glided toward an adjacent hedge, and vanished; but "the bush continued in a dazzling light for some minutes after its disappearance." In concluding his narrative, Father Ignatius says: "These are extraordinary, absolute facts. They challenge inquiry; and the boys are still on the spot, and free to be catechised respecting their amazing statement. That the two apparitions occurred on the same day seems most marvellous, as the Lord intended one to corroborate the other. The sceptic may and will scoff; but his scoffing will not explain or diminish the truth or supernatural character of these absolute and incontrovertible facts."

JESTINGS.

BOSTON is trying to compel gentlemen to appear in full dress at opera. That is right. It doesn't look well to see a man at the opera pull off his coat and vest and throw them over the back of a chair, and then remove his neck-tie and unbutton his shirt-collar, just because the temperature of the room goes up to 89°.

A WELL-DRESSED gentleman sauntered up to a street-car driver to ask him what time it was, when the driver, with an emphatic gesture, called out: "Keep away from that mule. He kicked three times at the president of the street-car company, when he had his Sunday clothes on. That mule isn't scared of anybody."

VISITOR from the country, to German next door: "Jane not at home, did you say?" German: "Nein: Chane's not at home." Visitor: "Where is she?" German: "She's gone der cemetery down." Visitor: "When will she come back?" German: "Oh, she von't come back already any more. She's gone to stay: she's det."

"WELL, I'm getting about tired of this 'ere life," said an ultra specimen of the genus Tramp. "Going half-starved one day, and drenched to the skin another; sleeping one night in a barn, the next night under a hedge, and the third in the lock-up,—this life is not what it used to be. Tell yer what 'tis, boys, if 'twasn't for the looks of the thing, I'd go to work."

A LITERAL-MINDED little fellow visiting on Cape Cod, who found the inscription in the village graveyard, "Not dead, but sleepeth," ran to his mother and said: "We must go home right off. I won't stay here all night, anyhow. They bury people here, when they go to sleep. I saw one of them out in the graveyard; and do you suppose I'll sleep here to-night, and have them bury me?"

REV. MR. GENUFLEX fell downstairs last Sunday morning, with a flower-vase in one hand, a pitcher of water in the other, a lamp-globe under his arm, and a china saucer tucked in his coat-pocket. He was trying to carry all these things downstairs, and he succeeded. But, when he got them to the bottom, and his anxious wife screamed from the head of the stairs to know if he had broken anything, he took an account of stock, and calmly reported that "he had broken everything but the Sabbath." "The only thing," petulantly commented his careful and economical wife, "that we could afford to break."—Burlington Hawkeye.

The Boston Turnverein,

The oldest and most numerous German Society in this city, intends to hold a Fair from the 11th to the 18th of December next, for the purpose of raising part of the heavy load of indebtedness resting upon its building.

The Undersigned, a Committee consisting of persons who are NOT members of said Society, appeal to the public at large for assistance, on the ground that the BOSTON TURNVEREIN is an educational and charitable association; that for thirty years past, it has devoted itself to the mental and physical education, not alone of its members, but of al Germans of Boston and vicinity, whom it could reach; that thereby it has assisted to educate a class of citizens worthy of this city; that it has contributed its share to all public charities, besides assisting in the support of needy Germans, so that they should not become a burden upon public charity; that its usefulness is greatly hampered by this debt, and that it has never before appealed for aid.

Contributions in money, or articles to be sold at the Fair, will be gratefully received by either of the undersigned, or at the Turn-halle, No. 29 Middlesex Street. All proceeds of the Fair will be devoted to the reduction of the debt.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
A WEEKLY JOURNAL
PUBLISHED BY THE
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
AT
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.
EDITOR,
WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.
For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold objec — "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. THE NEW ENGLAND NEWSPAPER.
INDEPENDENT—NOT NEUTRAL.
[Established in 1824 by Samuel Bowles.]

The Weekly edition of THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN is a comprehensive and intelligent review of American life from week to week, taking due notice as well of all important events and movements elsewhere throughout the world. Its summaries of news are prepared with great care, special attention being given to the presentation of New England news. Its editorial articles discuss broadly and with independence a wide range of topics, political, social, literary, scientific, and ethical. Its correspondence is of unusually high character, embracing regular letters from Boston, New York, Washington, and other centres of interest in this country and abroad. Frequent stories and choice selections of original or quoted poetry lend variety to the paper and increase its attractiveness. Each number contains a column of religious intelligence. Agricultural matters are fully treated, particularly those that are local to New England, and market reports are published with special reference to the information of farmers. New Englanders both at home and abroad find THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN a valuable assistant and guide in maintaining their acquaintance with public affairs and their knowledge of the growth and condition of the older States of the Union.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

WHATEVER the mind longs for, whatever the hands reach, whatever the reason considers, these, O Lord, are thy forms! I am pervaded by thee; thou containest me; and I have sheltered me under thy protection. Thou art Scriptures and laws, planets and suns, the formed and the formless; and the day and the night are thy eyes. Those who possess knowledge, and whose minds are pure, see the whole world as the form of Wisdom, which is thine!—Hindu.

THE sentient principles of all bodies that act aright are angels. Whatever is on the earth is the resemblance and shadow of something that is in the sphere. While that resplendent thing remaineth in good condition, it is well also with its shadow. When that resplendent object removeth far from its shadow, life removeth to a distance. Again, that light is the shadow of something more resplendent than itself; and so on up to the Light of lights.—Persian.

IF I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me. Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. —Hebrew.

THE first creation of God in the works of the days was the light of the sense, the last was the light of the reason; and his Sabbath work ever since is the illumination of the spirit.—Bacon.

VIRTUE is an angel; but she is a blind one, and must ask of Knowledge to show her the pathway that leads to her goal. Mere Knowledge, on the other hand, like a Swiss mercenary, is ready to combat either in the ranks of sin or under the banners of righteousness,—ready to forge cannon-balls or to print New Testaments, to navigate a corsair's vessel or a missionary ship.—Horace Mann.

MODERN philosophy has shown, and modern science confirms, that all that which seems to us most real is but the shadow of an existence behind it. The grass, the meadows, the everlasting hills, the solid planet, the hard stone, are but images in a mirror; and the mirror is our soul. We see beautiful colors of flowers; but unimaginable beauty escapes us, because our vision is not fine enough to receive it. We hear ravishing sounds; but the physicist proves that there are numberless air-waves which we never appreciate, because the instrument of our ear is not fitted to translate them into tones. The outside world and its thousand-fold phenomena knock at the antechambers of the soul, and are received by the senses, that are the ushers of the inward life. And these usher in whomsoever it pleaseth them, and we are wholly dependent on their service. And yet, though we can never penetrate to things outward, but remain ever within the pale of subjective impressions, we know that the material world by which we are surrounded is a reality, and that the images in the mirror of the soul are not mere phantoms. We know this because of the Laws. The laws of the mind alone establish the certainty, the safety, the very sanity of our existence. And if this is true of the laws of the mind, so far as they relate to external things, and we may wholly trust them thus far, how much more, then, shall we trust the highest law which we call the MORAL LAW, which is naught but the supreme expression of law, the law universal, and believe that it, too, corresponds to a reality deeper than all other reality, a reality wiser than we can tell, truer than we can ever demonstrate.—Felix Adler.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AFFAIRS in unhappy Ireland are becoming more and more stormy. The resistance of the peasantry seems solid, and is approaching the proportions of a revolution.

AMONG the most just and beautiful of the many tributes to Lucretia Mott is Robert Collyer's memorial sermon, which was printed entire in the New York Tribune.

FATHER GAVAZZI is again in this country for the purpose of obtaining pecuniary aid for the Protestant churches in Italy. He reports the progress of the Protestant movement throughout the Italian kingdom as very encouraging.

WE never open the Herald of Health, published by M. L. Holbrook, New York, but that we find in it something of interest and value to read. It aims at health in a threefold sense, physical, mental, moral. With the new year, the Herald enters on its sixty-seventh volume,—a fact indicating a financial success which is well deserved.

THE University of California, being a State institution, very properly does not attempt to give any specific religious instruction nor to hold services of worship. Some of the more rigid Christians of the State are in consequence becoming dissatisfied with it, and there is a movement among them for establishing a distinctively "Christian" university.

IT is pleasant to read in the President's message, at the opening of the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress last week, that "the government of the United States has lost no opportunity to urge upon that of the Emperor of Morocco the necessity, in accordance with the humane and enlightened spirit of the age, of putting an end to the persecutions, which have been so prevalent in that country, of persons of a faith other than the Moslem, and especially of the Hebrew residents of Morocco."

WE are not an unqualified admirer of Roscoe Conkling, but must confess that in the letters that have passed between him and Senator Bayard, just published, he appears in much the more favorable aspect. The letters of Bayard are not what would be looked for from a person of a high sense of honor. They are evasive and unsatisfactory, and provoke very damaging suspicions. We hope the matter may be probed to the bottom, whatever the issue. There is need of greater protection for reputation than what exists in this country. It should be clearly understood that, in the light of true conceptions of things, it is no less criminal to deliberately libel or vilify another than to rob at night a sleeping household. And this we should say as quickly if the tables were turned and Senator Bayard were the one aspersed, as Mr. Conkling and the other public men associated with him in this instance. It is in the interest of all public men and parties that the authors of slanderous fabrications like the Morey letter and this last outrage of the kind, if it shall prove such, shall be severely dealt with, irrespective of what their antecedents may have been, or the rank be high or low they occupy.

REV. DR. S. H. TYNG, Jr., avows his belief that the age of miracles is not past. He thinks that genuine miracles are of frequent occurrence to-day, and credits the phenomena at the Roman Catholic shrines at Lourdes and Knock as miraculous. In this avowal of faith, we think he is at least theologically consistent. In the usual Protestant argument against the continuation of the miracle-working power beyond the primitive apostolic age there are two weak points: first, the argument leaves it with human reason to decide whether there is proper occasion for a miracle or not,—the same "poor human reason" whose infirmities, it is alleged, make a miracle-revelation necessary; second, if human reason is to decide when there is proper occasion for miracles, it would seem that by all means they ought to occur in this age of scepticism. When was there ever so much unbelief that needed to be convinced as to-day? Let us have a good indisputable miracle, such as the standing still of the sun in the heavens, which all eyes could see and at which there could be no cavil, and it would confound all infidels at once, and might possibly throw the ranks of believers into some temporary confusion. Our own position, therefore, would be, miracles now or none; but we should not accept Mr. Tyng's horn of this dilemma.

THE need of a uniform marriage law in this country was never made more evident than by a case recently reported from the West. A man married his first wife in Ohio, and removed with her to Iowa. After a number of years, he became dissatisfied with the Ohio wife (reason not given), and wished to marry another woman. He went to Chicago, and, under the laws of Illinois, secured a divorce, and, on the same day that the divorce was obtained, returned to Iowa and married the Iowa woman. The courts of Iowa being appealed to in behalf of the first wife, the Illinois divorce was declared illegal, and his first marriage the only valid one. The Illinois courts were then appealed to in behalf of wife number two, and the Superior Court of Chicago has decided that the second marriage is valid, and the only valid one, the first having been legally broken. The result is that in Iowa, where his home is, he can only live legally with his first wife; but, if he comes across the State line into Illinois, she ceases to be his wife, and the second wife has the only legal right to that position and title. If he locates near the Mississippi River, he can live legally with both wives,—with number one on the Iowa bank of the river and with number two on the Illinois side; and, should the two wives consent to such an arrangement, where is the law, as the case now stands, to prevent this practical bigamy?

Funeral Ceremonies for Karl Heinzen.

Translated from the German.

BY MISS M. A. HARDAKER.

On Monday, November 15, Karl Heinzen was borne to his resting-place in "Rock Garden," as he had himself named the beautiful burial spot which he had chosen in Forest Hills Cemetery. The funeral services were to take place at 2 P.M. At 1 o'clock, it began to snow,—the first snow of the season. The storm was but slight, however, and by 2 o'clock the rooms and corridors were crowded by hundreds of mourning friends and guests.

Heaps of lovely flowers indicated the place where the departed lay in death, and the peaceful look upon his noble countenance impressed all who approached. Men and women passed reverently by the open casket one after another, until a stillness fell upon all as Herr S. R. Köhler, editor of the American Art Review, in a voice tremulous at first, but growing firmer as he proceeded, presented the following memorial address:

Address of Mr. Köhler.

Honored Guests and worthy Friends,—The painful event which has brought us together is one which calls out unusual thought and emotion. The death of a human being is an occurrence which must ever throw the chords of the soul into painful vibration, for all the recollections of the past crowd in to swell the bitterness of the present, and painful forebodings of the future force themselves upon us. All these circumstances unite to-day, and yet others that seem strange and painful, to deepen our grief.

When a statesman or a writer is borne to his rest, we are accustomed to see the celebrities and eulogists of the country crowd around his bier, and there is no lack of praise and honor. Here before us lies a statesman in the sleep of death, a man who devoted his whole life—all his immense energy, all his great talents—to political activity; and where are the statesmen, the celebrities, the orators? Before us lies a writer who had a better command of his mother-tongue than any other among his countrymen in America, who knew how to give to his thoughts the most pregnant and vigorous expression, a master of pure classical style; and where are his brethren of the pen? Not one of them is with us. As Karl Heinzen lived, so has he died,—alone, save for the few who knew, prized, and loved him; and so it happens that we who are neither statesmen, celebrities, orators, nor authors, are come together to bear him quietly to his rest.

The question, Why is this so? will seem to most an easy one to answer. For most knew only the rough and blunt exterior of the man whom we honor, and to few was it granted to get a glimpse of his true inner life. But, now that death has begun the great work of atonement, it is full time to give the truth its due, and to acknowledge the eternal foundations upon which he reared his life. Even in the year 1827, when but a nineteen-year-old youth, he wrote:—

"Methinks, indeed, that satire need
No lofty spirit's whiteness sully;
And where one finds no noble deed,
There may he heap the blame more fully.
Thus shall it be! Fatal to me is eulogy:
No show of words nor soaring praises will I mutter;
But ever to this world of fools
Right frank and brave the truth I'll utter."

And in his advanced years he sung again:—

"My mind is not weighed down with empty learning,
My heart is not with idle passions burning,
And never earthly power has bent my will.
'Twas Freedom that my spirit fired and strengthened,
'Twas Truth that my heart's spring-time kept and lengthened,
And Nature fed me silently my fill.

"Not by base arts and flatteries sought I favor,
My speech ne'er of hypocrisy did savor,
Nor open truth held I as contraband.
The torch of thought I have kept brightly flaming;
Toward high endeavor have kept boldly aiming,
And never thought it shame to be a man!"

"'Twas truth,"—yes, it was truth as he saw it, and to that truth he sacrificed everything. We may well admit that, in his rigid adherence to what he deemed the truth, he went too far, that he was too immovably steadfast in the conviction that he alone had caught sight of the absolute truth, when he maintained that no honorable man could differ from him; yet in all this there is a noble trait, which all the scorn and contumely of his enemies cannot efface. It was the spirit which has inspired the martyrs of all times. Who would blame him, if, in the midst of his debates, he was not always gentle? Other reformers before him have been called snakes and vipers by their opponents, and it has been pardoned; and Dante is not the less esteemed, because he has banished all his adversaries to hell.

But it was not simply the truth, it was the whole truth that he wanted. "The torch of thought I have kept brightly flaming": here is the greatness of his nature revealed. Compromise with the imperfection of human nature, which most of us stand ready to accept, he would not listen to. Concentration upon one point to the neglect of every other was folly to him. To be merely the enemy of spiritual or temporal tyrants, merely an anti-slavery man, merely a defender of woman's rights, or merely a labor-reformer, was impossible to him. The whole column must march together; and, as scarcely another man had the courage to enter the ranks with him in this gigantic fight, he threw himself alone upon the enemy, and even those who did not share his views, or who disapproved his methods, confess that he conducted the fight with a mighty energy.

By this unity of his nature, by this imperative endeavor for the universal, by this hatred of compromise, of half-measures, and of one-sidedness, we may explain the painful aspect of his life,—the comparative lack of real, palpable results. We are not now thinking of material results, of the winning of money,—for he never strove for such things,—but of the consciousness of having attained the purpose of life. The dying abolitionist can close his eyes in the certainty that the one task of his life has been performed. Our dying friend knew that in no direction had his efforts found full realization. But it was the immensity of the task to which he had set himself that compelled him to quit the field ere the seed ripened. Yet he sowed abundantly, if often upon stony ground.

Alas! that this life so full of lofty and comprehensive plans, so full of struggle and renunciation, so full of hate,—counteracted by little and yet all the more intense a love,—that this life must end thus! That the active mind, which preserved its steadiness to the very last, must lose its activity; that the powerful man, who prized his personal freedom above all other things, must depend upon others; and (what to him was surely the bitterest of all) that he must behold the death of his beloved journal. He had thought to have all this far otherwise.

Years before, he had written, in one of his most beautiful poems:—

"I know the strength of my life's day
Full soon will fail, and will not slowly wither;
No mouldering stem will mark this tree's decay,
But the fierce storm uptear it like a feather.

"Thus dream I, and I thus accept my fate.
Well, let it be! Grim death I will not bribe,
When from the marching ranks with sudden hate,
His shot would snatch me,—for the fight is idle.

"I am prepared, I ever keep my book
In order, that the reckoning's ending
Fail not: with trust and pride, I look;
In storm and strife, I stand with soul unbending.

"Full many a heartache the world never sees;
Much I endure, all speech disdaining.
Shall I be weaker than my fate decrees?
Shall I disturb the world with weak complaining?

"Silence! Live on as ye have ever lived.
I care not whether ye be foe or lover;
Such as I am to-day, I'll ever be;
And ye will bury me, when life is over."

But the seemingly unkind close of this poem does not fully characterize our friend. It shows but one expression of his face,—that expression indeed which most men saw,—but he had another expression. How tender and warm his heart was, how self-sacrificing he was toward his friends, and how gladly he shared his means with others, only those know who were near to him; for he never showed these traits to the world.

And so we may comfort ourselves with the thought that in Karl Heinzen we have lost a friend from whose memory we may gain inspiration. Whether it be free, self-directed will, or whether it be but the natural development of a noble soul, it is ever an inspiring conviction that there are men who can renounce all the enticements of self-love for the sake of an idea; who prefer poverty with freedom to wealth in the service of tyranny; and who are capable of sacrificing themselves, if necessary, to the cause they have espoused. That Karl Heinzen was such a man his whole history has proved to us. He was compelled to flee from his native land to America before the outbreak of the Revolution of 1848, which again carried him homeward after the strife was begun, and which drove him pitilessly through the world, until at length he found a resting-place among us. As such a man, we will hold him in our memories; and we will endeavor to learn from his life what we have often learned from the thoughts which he gave forth in speech and writing.

Let us part from him with the words which he himself once wrote in memory of a beloved one:—

"Full well I know, for us no happy meeting:
Shall that forbid to keep thy memory dear?
Because I know for us no heaven of greeting,
Therefore my constant love I'll give thee here.
* * * * * * * *
"Beside thy grave, a sacred watch I'm keeping;
The dearest part of thee I've borne away,
And, till in death beside thee I am sleeping,
Thy presence shall go with me day by day."

Address of Mrs. E. D. Cheney.

I feel embarrassed in speaking to this company of friends, who know so much better than I can tell them the noble qualities of the man whom we have all met to honor. But I feel it to be fitting that a woman of the country he adopted as his own should add her testimony of gratitude and respect to him, for what he has spoken and done for woman. He has always felt for woman that deep respect, as well as tenderness, which makes a truly manly man.

In this solemn presence of death, we feel the greatness of a true life, and in him the fulness of life was his strongest trait. He was colossal in his proportions, grand in physique, bold, large, and penetrating in intellect, and had great force of personality and will.

"Death is a great revealer," and I feel as if I had known him better in these last few hours, when I have communed with his thought, and sought for fitting words to present him to you, than in the twenty years I have known him.

His own words fitly express his character, the wholeness of his devotion to freedom and to truth.

But as we stand by him to-day, and look on this face, which death seems not to have touched,—so peaceful is it after his year of suffering and imprisonment in the paralyzed frame,—we cannot but question of the spirit which animated it and made it what it was. Hear his own words uttered as he stood beside the grave of one dearly loved.

[Mrs. Cheney here read one of the translations printed in the Index of November 25.—Ed.]

He says "perchance,"—and we dare not assert that we know of the future in any positive form,—but you will permit me to say for myself that I have never stood thus beside a form which had been filled with a noble soul, without feeling a deep and ever-renewed assurance of the life and the influence of that spirit upon me still,—the more so, the more deeply it was beloved and the more terrible the parting from it; and in this assurance I could live on.

But our friend's love of truth was so intense, so rigid, so exacting, that he would not let his dearest wishes shape his thoughts: he would forego everything that was not to him based on solid evidence.

We may not know the future; but one thing we do know,—the inestimable worth of such a life as his, full of noble truth and devotion to freedom and right, full of warm, glowing love for humanity,—as well as for the dear kindred and friends whom he bound to himself by such strong and enduring bonds, full of thought and beauty, and all glowing with life and warmth.

While we are here, such memories are with us still a power, an influence, a help; and the best of all consolations, as we stand by the image of the friend from whom we are parting, is the greatness and goodness of the life he has lived among us.

Biographical Sketch of Karl Heinzen.

Translated from the Freidenker by Miss J. A. Sprague.

Karl Heinzen, the man of incorruptible truth and the brave-hearted pioneer of radicalism, is no more. He died on the 12th of November, after a year of intense physical suffering, which had left him weakened and helpless as a child; but his ideas survive him, and they will remain as the bequest of his spirit to coming generations. Radicalism, which concerns itself with the reform of political and social institutions, and which keeps the idea of popular sovereignty ever foremost, looks to a future whose every victory must be a reminder of Heinzen. We can give him no warmer appreciation than to quote his own words as a key to his life-experience: "I know of no position in the world which I would purchase or accept with the surrender of one iota of my convictions or of my character." Self-respect and the respect of those whom he himself respected were of more consequence to him than ambition, the favor of the crowd, or external position and splendor. He prized these latter only as a means of carrying out noble ideas. He craved no higher honor than that of being an independent and radical writer.

Heinzen called himself an agitator, who, if necessary, could become a revolutionist. He possessed in an eminent degree the qualities of a reformer,—an ideal conception of things, which made him dissatisfied with anything short of perfection; a critical understanding, which enabled him to compare realities with an exalted standard; and a powerful will, which stimulated him to the removal of hindrances.

We present a hasty, biographical sketch to the readers of the Freidenker, trusting that abler pens will hereafter take up the story of his life and work.

Karl Peter Heinzen was born on the 22d of February, 1809, at Grevenbroich, a little town near Cologne. He lost his mother by death, when he was but four years old. He always preserved his tender, childish affection for her. She possessed no high culture; but she was of fine physique, had remarkable intelligence, and a true and loving heart. His father was a man of scholarship and a supervisor of forests. At the time of the French Revolution, he was a fervent Republican, but later he was worldly-wise enough to accommodate himself to circumstances. He misunderstood his son, and endeavored to rule him by severity and pedantry, whereas the boy could be influenced solely by mildness and affection. Besides the regular schools which were under church supervision, a pious and bigoted aunt, and an uncle who was canon of the cathedral at Wittlar, contributed to his education. He was intended by his relatives for a Catholic priest. His whole education was upon a mistaken plan; and he lived in continual war with his instructors, both at home and at school. They recognized his talent, but his self-will brought them to the verge of despair. One trait which accompanied him into his later life he displayed equally in his youth,—the disposition to conceal friendly feeling and to display unfriendliness.

In 1827, he entered the University of Bonn, in order to study medicine. He was, however, far more inclined to philosophical studies, to literature, and to the fine arts; and, when he was called upon to test his skill in the dissecting-room, he was so seized with disgust for his profession that he afterward gave it only nominal attention. He was expelled from the University in 1829 on account of a hot-headed oration against its faculty. Thirsting for adventure, he resolved to see something of other countries, and went with a fellow-student to Batavia. They were without means, and thus were obliged to become soldiers of Holland. He quickly learned to despise the life of a soldier, and in the winter of 1831 he again reached Rotterdam.

Love for a woman restrained him from farther excursions, and he entered the civil service of Prussia. Louisa Moras, daughter of Lawyer Moras of Cleve, and widow of a Herr Schiller, wrought this transformation. She died when he was scarcely twenty-six years old; and, robbed of the inspiration of her mind, he began to chafe under the oppressive system of taxation in the Prussian service. He endured it for eight years, but could hold out no longer.

In his contest with the Prussian bureaucracy, he had need of all his moral power. He now worked as a journalist and writer, and having married again was compelled to take a position as secretary of a railway company and later of a fire-insurance corporation. His denunciation of the Prussian bureaucracy cost him his latter position, and he was obliged to flee to Belgium. From Belgium, he journeyed with the poet Freiligrath to Switzerland. He soon became the leading spirit of all attempts to revolutionize Germany. With such men as Freiligrath, Ruge, Herwegh, Julius Fröbel, and others, he cultivated the warmest intimacy. He was editor of a political quarterly called The Opposition, which he found means for circulating through Germany. He says of these endeavors: "I did not imagine that I could create a revolution in Germany by mere essays and pamphlets. But I reasoned that the servile spirit of the German people, if continually wrought upon, must at last become rebellious. I was bound to speak so boldly that at last they would be spurred to deeds. That which a people continually feels and thinks, it learns at last to do. I wanted to mature the minds and hearts of the people, so that they would take advantage of any accident which would help to their emancipation. I am convinced that a single pen, steadily working year by year, could at last stimulate an oppressed people to take measures for self-elevation."

Heinzen was hunted from one place to another, and finally resolved to come to America. He reached New York in January, 1848, after a voyage of nearly four weeks. Meanwhile, his warm friend Eichthal, editor of the Express, had suddenly died. Heinzen associated himself with another in the editorship of the orphaned Express, and immediately found himself involved in controversies right and left. The communists tried to draw him into their schemes, but he declared himself an implacable foe to communism. In his journalistic activity, he tried to harmonize his duty as a citizen of the Republic of the United States with his sympathy for the fate of his Fatherland. Having become free himself, he held it as his most sacred duty to make others free.

The Germans in the United States took the most lively interest in the revolutionary measures of their brethren at home, which followed the French outbreak. Inspiring conventions were held in New York and Philadelphia. Heinzen was appointed representative of the revolutionists, and empowered to carry their congratulations to the provisional government at Paris. But he was far more radical than the constitutionalists, and after a year's absence he returned to New York in August, 1850. This return marks the beginning of his thirty years' activity in America.

He made a clean distinction in the manner of conducting a revolution in a Monarchy and in a Republic. In a Monarchy, one must proceed by force of arms; in a Republic, everything must be conducted by the sanction of law. The ideal of the Republic is a pure democracy, and this is to be reached by constitutional revision, by political organization, by diffusion of ideas through a free press and free speech.

He became founder, editor, or associate editor of five or six journals in New York, Boston, and Louisville. The paralytic shock which stretched him upon a sick-bed toward the close of 1879 compelled him to give up the editorship of the Pioneer. It was absorbed into the Freidenker. But, in spite of his illness, Heinzen continued to act as its associate editor until his death. One fruit of his journalistic activity was the establishment of the radical party which nominated General Fremont. A multitude of radical political organizations owe their existence to Heinzen.

Since 1858, he has lived in domestic seclusion with his wife and son at Roxbury, working constantly with his pen, and sometimes making a journey to promote the cause he loved. Gardening and grape-culture were his pleasantest recreations. His last wish, expressed in beautiful verse, was that he might be buried in the forest. He rests now in its shady stillness, and we think of him to remember that Freedom has never known a sincerer friend than Karl Heinzen.

Other Testimonies.

[A friend sends us the following translations: first, of an article from the Volks Tribune of Washington, D.C., but one of many tributes to Mr. Heinzen's character which the German papers are publishing; the second, an extract from another friend's testimony.—Ed.]

Karl Heinzen.

"His weapons are not broken,
Only his heart broke."

Karl Heinzen has died from us by slowest degrees. Already, a year ago, the sturdy body was struck down by paralysis, the fate of so many Titanic minds. Neither hand nor foot moved more; hardly were the eyelids lifted; only the heart still beat warm, and what thoughts must have pursued one another through that brain,—thoughts to which the tongue could no longer lend expression. At last, on November 12, the long wished death-angel appeared.

Karl Heinzen dead! We had expected it, even wished it; but still, when the news came, it seemed as if a common bond uniting us with the noblest of men, and with the boldest of ideals, had been suddenly broken, and we saw a gulf open which will never be filled up again. To weep and lament is not fitting at the grave of a hero, who has fought all his battles, honorably completed his course, and, weary unto death, has passed into the kingdom of absolute rest,—no. But his weapons let us take up, for they are not broken. Let us use them in the contest, which he has bequeathed to us as the most precious inheritance.

We will attempt here only to show briefly what has been Heinzen's work for this period of our civilization. Karl Heinzen's activity, although divided between two quarters of the globe, and extended over a long life, was always of one and the same mould. Out of a restless student-life, out of a period of travel rich in experiences, still a youth, he showed himself an entire, positive Republican. With ease, he digested the philosophic bombast of his school-days, and almost without a model he created the clear language of a strictly logical thought, comprehensible to all,—what might even be called a scientific method of thought. Heinzen lived in the conviction that, when men should once comprehend the idea of a perfectly just State, and labor for its establishment, they would have neither time nor desire for the phantasies of religion. The idea of a just State! Already, in the mind of the youth in the soldier's uniform, this idea hovered, this idea sustained him through the eight years' service as civil officer in Prussia, and strengthened him to an uninterrupted battle against the arbitrariness of Prussian bureaucracy. Then fell the last external fetters. The freed bird sought for a free nest, and from Switzerland he sang those bold songs whose notes chilled the very heart's blood of German princes and their lackeys. Indisputably, the period when Heinzen wrote his renowned pamphlets in Switzerland is one of the most important of his life. Only one man! and that, too, one who, even in free Switzerland, was ordered away and hunted from place to place. Only one man! and yet before him the sovereigns of Europe trembled, while secretly at his name freedom exulted in the hearts of all good men.

We may boldly say that, among all the forerunners and all the contemporaries of the Revolution of 1848, Heinzen was the only one who had a sure aim before his eyes; who, uninfluenced by the various currents of opinion, steered straight toward this aim, the democratic Republic; and, after all the mad disorders of that half-comedy, half-tragedy time, who ever brought this forward again in the forum of the people.

Germany was not then ripe, or, rather, we should better say, the leaders and pioneers of the German revolution were not ripe for the ideas which Heinzen defended. Thus, then, he, the rejected son of his Fatherland, came to the shores of our present home. He found here a Republic without Republicans; he found a State which, in spite of its democratic name, was suffering under the inheritance of ancient monarchical institutions: and he began here, at once, his work as agitator, reformer, teacher of the people. For a quarter of a century, the Pionier was the organ of the uncompromising, incorruptible friends of liberty. This unpretending weekly paper, in which Heinzen's originality with indestructible freshness mirrored itself in thousand forms, is in and for itself already an undying civilizer. As the Pionier marched on in advance of all, as it aimed to liberate the negro slaves, and was also the first to awaken even a consciousness among the German-Americans of the disgrace of slavery in a free land, so he ever unweariedly held up the sublimest images of the ideal. For him there was no resting satisfied, no backward looking, no reposing upon laurels gained. For almost a quarter of a century, the Pionier was the solitary voice crying in the wilderness. Execrated by the indolent and the indifferent, by low selfishness and servility that dance around the golden calf, by a lachrymose sentimentality, and by the cowardly desperation of the pessimist, by the whole priesthood and the hollow-eyed crowd of ghost-seers, by the entire German daily press, he also has honestly paid them back all they gave; and no greater monument to his honor can there be than the rage with which to-day stupid cowardice and cowardly stupidity feel their very hairs stand on end, when they even think of the Pionier. But when, in a distant, happier future, some student of the literature of our time, busy at his work, feels disgusted with the Byzantinism of our sages, with the empty phraseology of our poets, with the low materialistic tone of our great daily press, his eye will brighten and his heart beat joyfully as he finds in Heinzen's works the genuine moral indignation and the profound though shyly displayed love of humanity, and those original demands of justice in which perhaps mankind already will rejoice as an accomplished fact.

It is, of course, impossible for us in a newspaper article to delineate the many-sidedness of Heinzen's character. We should have to recall his value as the creator of a German style, a German language in America; we should have to depict him as humorist and satirist; we should have to summon before us the image of his character hewn as it were in stone, which may well with its corners and angles often repel us as unamiable, and his personality, which, embittered through solitude and innumerable disappointments, could often be unjust toward individuals. It suffices here to give expression to the happy conviction that the work of this man will some time find its resurrection in the consciousness of this whole great nation.

Heinzen's life was one single moral act, up to which our children's children can look with even the same admiration as we ourselves. It was a continuous pressing of himself into the service of the universal. And if to us, now and then, during Heinzen's lifetime, some of his weaknesses crossed our path disagreeably, yet, from the image of the man as he lives in our memory, all these trifling defects fall away, and we see only the mighty giant-figure, as with torch and sword it forward points, and, as it marches on, crushing under foot all meanness and all servility.

If there is one who deserves Heine's words as his epitaph, it is Karl Heinzen:—

"I fall unconquered;
For my weapons are not broken,
Only my heart broke."

ROBERT REITZEL.

If, among the preëminent qualities of this man, any pardonable defect is to be found, it was a want of knowledge of mankind, from which must have proceeded partly that ungrounded distrust, partly that unjustifiable trust. His enemies he hated fearfully; but one must hate, in order to be able to love. Hence there was no man who loved the good and hated the evil more than he. His enemies have done every thing to destroy this noble great man; but he was protected by a stinging armor of thorns, so that his enemies always wounded themselves by their attacks. They gathered in vain at the foot of this pyramid to overthrow it.

If we ask whether we shall please all or none, the man of principle replies, "Rather none." Therefore, Heinzen had few friends, although his intellectual greatness was acknowledged even by his enemies. In principle, he was unbending; and what his sturdy frame was in the physical world, that was his character where principle was concerned. As writer and journalist, Heinzen distinguished himself by a profoundness and clearness of thought as well as by a pure classical style. We recall to mind in this respect his philippic against Kossuth in 1851, remarkable for its classical Demosthenic eloquence. The Magyar hatred against Germanism, for which Heinzen at that time reproached Kossuth, has lately been fully confirmed. The woman's rights question has been treated by no one so thoroughly and so philosophically as in Heinzen's "Essay." Other essays, such as "The People," "The True Democracy," "Humanity," as well as his autobiography, have high literary value. Every educated German should read Heinzen's writings. He will find there enlightenment, excitement to thought, and also education in principles. Heinzen was a socialist and an ultra-radical in political and religious relations. He fought through his whole life for freedom and the right. Heinzen has forsaken us; but we, his followers, do not forsake the departed.

KARL ROESER.

ALL divine services except that of the Roman Catholic Church are prohibited in Spain. The new criminal code prepared by the committee to be reported to the parliament contains again a section headed "On Religious Crimes," in which Art. 134 ordains that all public ceremonies and services except the Catholic are prohibited, and the participants to be punished with imprisonment.

FROM ENGLAND.

The correction attempted by me of the Christian Register correspondent's account of Mr. Bradlaugh has had a noteworthy confirmation, since I wrote, in a speech made at the great Church Congress lately held at Leicester. The matter is reported by the Daily News as follows:—

"A paper by Prebendary Row anticipated as the only result of a spread of agnosticism the rupture of all existing moral obligations and social ties. In the course of the discussions on the evils of secularism, opened by the Archdeacon of Warrington, the Rev. J. E. Symes, Cambridge University Extension Lecturer, described secularism as not a science nor a philosophy, but a religion, and warned the Congress that they would greatly err, if they supposed that the secularists were ignoring the emotional and spiritual side of human nature. He claimed acquaintance with Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Besant, and other leaders of the secularist movement, and declared that he had attended their lectures, and had never heard one in which an appeal was not mainly made to those emotions which Christians recognized as among the noblest of our nature. Their heroes were martyrs to freethought. Their time, thought, and energy were devoted to what they believed to be religion,—a religion certainly which must be combated, but not by misrepresentation. He repudiated the notion that, if the religion of the secularists triumphed, this would be a godless world; for God's presence in the world did not depend on man's belief in it. The method of dealing with secularism favored by this speaker was that the gospel should be preached as good news, not as bad news. He represented secularists as having turned away from the teaching of eternal punishment, the infallible dictation of the Scriptures,—a cold Calvinism. The gospel preached should not be something from which people thankfully turned to the cold negation of secularism."

"The President (the Bishop of Peterborough) characterized the speech of Mr. Symes as able and manly, and impressed upon the Congress the lesson of that speech not to accuse individual secularists or Positivists of immorality, merely because they saw that the logical tendency of secularism or Positivism was toward immorality. The bishop felt little apprehension as to the conflict between science and religion, which, being on different paths, did not come into such violent collision as many supposed. He pointed out that religion was obliged to cast its revelations in the language of human thought,—thought moulded by various systems of human philosophy. As time went on, the language became obsolete; and then there was a danger that men would jump to the conclusion that it was the religion which had become obsolete instead of the philosophical language in which it had been clothed for the time. Religion and philosophy were married and divorced at least once in a century. The bishop did not point out whether, in his opinion, such a divorce was necessary now, and what it was that he would divorce from religion as at present taught. He contented himself with saying that the Church could afford 'to wait patiently for the passing away of this and that incrustation,' and that their hope was that antagonism to religion was really an antagonism to false philosophy mixed up with it. One speaker, who followed the President, strongly objected to the epithet 'vulgar,' which he had heard applied to secularists, and advocated all possible conciliation toward workingmen secularists, in the hope of bringing them into the Church."

Thus far the report of the Daily News, of a scene which has extreme significance as one of the signs of the times. It is entirely the success of Mr. Bradlaugh in getting into distinguished position, as a member of Parliament conspicuously able and honest and reasonable, whose cause Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, and orthodox non-conformity did not disdain strenuously to support, which has made it possible for the bolder and more sagacious churchmen to shame the devil and tell the truth, as was done by Mr. Symes, and approved by the Bishop-President, Dr. Magee, who is the great orator of the Episcopal bench, and a conservative in his political course. Dr. Magee takes the identical ground for taking which Theodore Parker was denounced and drubbed with melancholy groanings and tears and rage by men and brethren of Unitarian name.

The Church of England has many men who would be advanced liberals of a type which only recent Unitarianism has much manifested; there are numbers of her clergy, and a very great proportion of her laymen, who would go quite beyond Unitarianism, if perfect freedom existed. Dr. Rowland Williams, who was in his day one of the leaders of the Church and eminent among Cambridge University men, said this in so many words: that, if he were to go free from the Church, he should go to America, and repeat the experiment of Theodore Parker. The real mind of such men endures the cover—the hypocrisy, I must say, though in a mild sense—of what Dr. Magee calls "this and that incrustation." Hypocrisy, of a consciously virtuous sort, survives in England from Catholicism; and as yet average people, who perfectly well know that they have as their living faith a sort of divine secularism, and that the faith which is professed for them in their church articles and service is a scab which would fall from parson and people alike, if the bandages of establishment and endowment were removed, are content to "wait patiently," as Dr. Magee says, because it pays so well to do so.

Mr. Stopford Brooke has allowed the long hypocrisy of his understood position to cease. I do not for a moment say that this hypocrisy has prevented in the least Mr. Brooke from manifesting in very many large and noble ways entire honesty of mind and heart. It has not tainted his character. It has only in one broadly significant way covered up his character, concealed his truth, and hidden under a bushel his light,—the one way of his nominal profession. What Mr. Brooke would have done, if the discontinuance of Anglican hypocrisy had meant to him what it would mean to Dean Stanley, one can but sorrowfully decline to ask. Rank and revenue Mr. Brooke does not lose by his withdrawal from the Church of England. His pulpit was his own, and he can go on in it without any change. His congregation he has made his own; and, if a few left, more would eagerly compete for the vacant seats. All that he has done has been to give notice that he will no longer have it supposed that he could, if he would, preach Anglican doctrine, and that the liturgy which he has used will be altered to conform to his belief. It is a delicate, not to say a painful, question, how much and how long he has said one thing and not meant it, but meant another, in prayer and confession, anthem and hymn. But one has need to judge with penetrating charity I will not say, but justice and discernment, in such a matter, where circumstances have held a man in their inexorable grasp; and he might well enough doubt whether the inward truth would not lose rather than gain by any outward change which he could make. I hold such doubt always a mistake, so far as I can see, after more than twenty years of the severest punishment for going to the extreme the other way; and if I could be put back into my traditional position, with everything to gain by doing as Dean Stanley does, and everything to lose by trying as hard as I could to be honest first and worldly-wise successful afterward, I would ask rather to have no life than to be overcome by the temptation to put my service of truth into the livery of self-service, and see the vision of God through the devil's spectacles.

Mr. Brooke, I have no doubt, bears a punishment, and that a heavy one, for the course he has taken. He has gone on mouthing the name of Jesus, in place of the only name at all a name of worship with Jesus as he really was, before the Apostles (falsely thus self-called) made him over; and now he comes out of the Church of England without coming out of the supreme error which that church has inherited from the heathen-Jewish pseudo-Christianity of the Fathers and the Apostles. Instead of learning, as with uncovered eyes he would long since have learned, not to worship an historical teacher, of whom fraud and ignorance make a Master and a Lord, but to worship, as that teacher plainly taught, God only, and not God even by doctrine and lip-service so much as by purity and humanity, by love to man and love of right, Mr. Brooke sticks in the false confession of the "Lord Jesus," where Jesus honestly known would say to him, "Thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men."

It is pitiful, not to say shameful, to take up many of the professedly corrected versions of the New Testament, and see with what pious fraud they leave "Master" as the common title of Jesus, while in notes or otherwise they acquaint us with the honest fact that the term really used is not this, but Teacher; and with what convenient inattention to easily known facts they use "Lord" the same as for God, when the Greek word (kurios) carries only the meaning of Sir, Master, and means one thing as applied to God, and a totally different thing as applied to a teacher, who, even as a master, sought rather to be a master of example and truth, to win the mind to free obedience and trust, than a master of disciples, to put the yoke of his authority upon men.

The slowly growing honesty of Biblical learning has broken out a good deal in the elaborate "Analytical Concordance to the Bible," by Robert Young, which no preacher or student can afford to be without. Dr. Young gives kurios as meaning Lord, Sir, Master. I am living among rural English who still use words as they were used when our version of the Bible was made, and they use master precisely as kurios was used in the Judaic Greek. A beggar says, "Master, can you gie me a penny?" A child seeing a man at the door says, "There's a Master come." Every woman calls her husband Master: "Tell Master to come to tea." "Master is gone to town." If there is a gentleman lodging in the house, he becomes emphatically the Master; and, if the housewife says, "Master wants his tea," the child or servant will know that the lodger is meant. The word kurios had exactly this use, and has no sense whatever of Lord except as applied to God. Mr. Brooke keeps the false sense into which the disciples of Jesus were dragged by their crude Jewish notions, when he announces that he will continue in the name and faith of "our Lord Jesus Christ." SPAIN.—Restrictions are to be placed on the admission of French monks into Spain.

A PAPER in the interest of the Bonapartists has appeared in Paris. It is called the Napoléon.

UNFAVORABLE reports continue in regard to the health of the Czar. It is rumored that he suffers from paralysis.

"THE Church of England in Canada" is the formal title settled upon in a recent provincial synod by the Canadian Episcopalians.

SEVERAL persons have been arrested in Paris while proceeding on Sunday to La Vallais Cemetery to make a demonstration at the grave of Communist Ferre.

THE Belgian Liberals have gained a seat in the Senate by the election at Ghent of M. De Kerckhove. The seat was formerly held by a member of the clerical party.

ROCHEFORT seems determined not to rest on his laurels he affects to have won at the Cissey trial. He announces his intention to apply to the municipal authorities for permission to have statues erected in certain public places in memory of the heroes of the commune.

THE Russian millionnaire, Warschawski, has been arrested for defrauding the Russian government in connection with an army supply contract in the last war. The swindle is estimated at twenty-two million roubles. Two other Russian officials are under arrest on the same charge.

SINCE 1821, the public and private contributions to the building fund of Cologne Cathedral have amounted to $4,500,000. Adding the contributions of past centuries, notably the money expended on the colossal foundations, a German paper finds that as it now stands the cathedral represents about $10,000,000.

M. RENAN has just written a letter expressing great admiration for Garibaldi. "The men of action who made Italy," he says, "are Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi, and their names will always be coupled in history with a common glory." This letter having been communicated to Garibaldi, he has shown great gratification.

ARCHBISHOP CLIOZEL, the head of the Catholic mission in Persia, complains that many Catholics are ostensibly becoming Protestants, in order to obtain relief from the Protestant mission, which, he says, receives seven thousand francs to ten thousand francs a week, but accords no help without a written adhesion to Protestantism.

THE Bishop of Liverpool, at a late meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, expressed pleasure at meeting on the platform a number of his non-conformist brethren, but said the division between them, due to the conduct of the Church in days gone by, was of too long standing for him to expect it to be healed till the Lord should come again.

A GERMAN newspaper, Das Bukarester Tagblatt, some time ago made its appearance in the Roumanian capital. The paper, which is edited exclusively by Christians, is a phenomenon of journalism in this bigoted country, as it comes forth as an undaunted champion of the Jews. It is the only journal in Roumania that has yet had the courage or the honesty to warmly advocate their cause.

THE interpretation of providences is always perilous. An English Low Churchman discovers in the recent deaths of several clergymen of his party an indication that "God has a controversy with the evangelical section of the Church of England." One of the special sins of the party, he thinks, is that it has entered upon the "downward path of compromise" with advanced High Churchmen.

BISHOP ELLICOTT, presiding at a recent conference of the clergy and laity of the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol, said that he hoped the Burials Act would be frankly and loyally carried out. The clergy should not recede from their position as guardians or trustees of the church-yards, but they should be thoroughly conciliatory in the exercise of their rights, making no distinctions between Churchmen and Dissenters. The use of the church, however, should be limited to church people.

SIR STAFFORD at the meeting of the Society for the Promotion of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, at Exeter Hall, said at the present time there were many reasons to be anxious for the prospects of religion and the Church of England. It had to contend against the spirit of the accumulation of wealth, against the spirit of infidelity, and against the spirit of rationalism, which were all largely growing and developing themselves; while at the same time the influence of the Church had been in many ways diminished by the course of events.

THE Berlin correspondent of the Daily News announces that Prince Bismarck has sent a Commission to Alsace to study the condition of the workmen there, especially with regard to their dwellings, which are somewhat on the English cottage principle, every man living in his own house. This system (the correspondent adds) seems to be in favor with the Chancellor, who wishes it to be introduced all over Germany by government help, which he conjectures will go a long way to satisfy the lower classes and make them dependent on the State.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—The Rev. R. T. Davidson, chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, writing to the Guardian, says: "Inquiries reach me from many quarters as to the truth of an absurd or malicious rumor, to the effect that the Archbishop of Canterbury contemplates marriage with some mysterious person unnamed. Although for those who know the archbishop any contradiction of the report founded on this silly hoax is unnecessary, it has yet been so widely circulated that perhaps you will allow me to make your paper the medium for stating that the rumor has not, and never had, a vestige of foundation."

ACCORDING to the Liverpool Courier, a telephone has been laid down from Childwall Church, a Liverpoolian fane, to the house of a lady resident at a distance of half a mile from that place of worship, whose infirmities do not admit of her attending divine service outside her own dwelling. By aid, however, of the electric "far speaker," as the German Postmaster-General has christened Mr. Edison's invention, ritual performances, we are told, are instantaneously conveyed to this pious valetudinarian's ear every Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening, as she reclines comfortably upon her drawing-room sofa. The distinctness with which she hears the chants, hymns, and lesson, it would appear, leaves nothing to be desired. But, probably owing some to elocutionary shortcomings on the part of the Childwall preachers, she can only "catch fragmentary sentences of the sermons."

THE following letter, written by the Rev. C. N. Williams, the vicar of Sutton Valence, Stapelhurst, to his parish clerk, Mr. E. Davis, on the occasion of the funeral of a Dissenting parishioner, has been printed and widely circulated: "MR. DAVIS,—Please remember tomorrow to have the church locked up and even the tower door locked and no bell to be rung, and if the parties do not finish the service before eight o'clock they will be guilty of a misdemeanor. You cannot attend the funeral as parish clerk and join in the service; but you should attend to protect the church and graveyard, and as sexton to give orders as to filling up the grave. My fees and your charges you must ask for just the same, and they must be paid you. You have nothing to do with any certificate of burial. This must be transmitted to me by the person responsible for the burial.—C. N. W., Vicar." The parish clerk, it is stated, did not act up to his instructions.

WORKINGMEN'S COLLEGE.—Following the custom which has obtained in previous years, the annual meeting of the Great Ormond Street institution is to be followed by a series of free popular Saturday evening lectures, the first of which was given last night. The new session, it may be observed, was initiated on Thursday night, when Mr. J. Russell Lowell, the United States Minister, delivered the opening address, at the conclusion of which he announced his intention to present the council with the sum of forty pounds, to be expended for the benefit of the institution. A large attendance favored last night's lecture, which was given by Dr. W. B. Carpenter, who took for his subject "Human Automatism." In every individual case, said the lecturer, our action was determined by surrounding influences, which were unquestionably of an hereditary character. Men of science now considered this question from the stand-point of the uniformity of causation, and not from the views taken of it by Christianity. There was this difference between the human automaton and a mere machine, that the one was a moral agent and responsible for his actions, and the other an entirely irresponsible thing. Referring to our habits, which, he said, were made for us, not by us, he asserted that experience convinced him that such a tendency as the love of alcohol was transmitted from one generation to another. He knew a case where the individual was not responsible for the temptation to which he had succumbed. Our organic functions, which had to do with the building up of the body, and had afterwards to maintain it, were essentially automatic in their essence. This he instanced by the process of deglutition and digestion. As an illustration of the automatism of deglutition, or swallowing, he pointed out that, where it was possible to eject poison from the stomach, when every other means had failed, it was a common thing to have recourse to tickling the back part of the palate with a feather, and on these occasions it has happened that the feather had been drawn in by the mass of nerves which has its seat at the base of the brain. The same phenomena was found in introducing sugar into the brain of puppies. The lecturer next dwelt on the heart's action, respiration, &c., to show that every part of the human body was subject to automatic action. A cordial vote of thanks to the lecturer closed the proceedings.—Lloyd's Weekly.

AN EVENING WITH WEISS AND EICHBERG.

Subtlest of thoughts in most noble speech!
Great Shakespeare's soul and sense were in the air:
Ah! unto them my nature strove to reach,
And almost would, dear love, had't thou been there.

When words had gone as far as words could go,
Music climbed up the heavenly winding stair,
One great circle more, and entering, lo!
Heaven's gate I might have won, hadst thou been there!

THE TRUE FRIEND.

(FROM THE PERSIAN.)

The wrong he would not have you do,
The right incite you to pursue;
Your shame he fain would seek to hide,
Your honor spread both far and wide;
Your struggles he his own would make,
In evil times would ne'er forsake:
By all these signs—of truth the test—
You know the friend who loves you best.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 16, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

CHRISTIAN ARROGANCE.

Rabbi Jastrow, of Philadelphia, in introducing his synagogue service on Thanksgiving Day, referred appreciatingly to Governor Hoyt's amendment of his official proclamation appointing Thanksgiving, so as to make it read "Commonwealth of Freemen" instead of "Christian Commonwealth," as originally printed, and then added the following very just rebuke of a prevalent habit of Christian arrogance: —

There are certain words and phrases that long survive the ideas they were originally designed to represent. . . . The identification of the word "Christian" with "civilization" is one of those verbal relics of antiquated views which carry with them dangerous prejudices. Modern research has established the fact that the two currents which combine into making up our present civilization are the Greek, with its æsthetic refinement, and the Hebrew, with its stern morality. History further shows that the Jewish people occupied a high position in science and enlightenment at a time when the so-called Christian world was busily engaged in destructive sports of all kinds. Every impartial observer of our own days readily admits that in this point of charity and humanity Jews may fairly claim at least an equal rank with their Christian fellow-citizens. Yet it is but a few days ago that in our City of Brotherly Love the words "Christian love and sympathy" fell inadvertently from the lips of the presiding officer of a charitable society which counts among its co-laborers many an active Jew and Jewess. It may be that, owing to centuries of continued oppression, we are a little more sensitive than is reasonable; yet we claim nothing but justice for ourselves when we are anxious to abolish from the dictionary of daily talk words which modern thought has proved to be misapplied.

The incident above related of the presiding officer reminds us of a story illustrating the same "inadvertence," not to give it a worse name. The story was told us by a Jewish lady who was our hostess a few years ago, for several months, in a Southern city. During the war, this lady had been devotedly engaged in company with many of her neighbors, like the good women in our Northern cities, in sewing and preparing hospital supplies for the soldiers. In this way, she was brought into intimate association with ladies of various Christian sects, with whom hitherto she had had no acquaintance. They well knew her religious faith, and at first were disposed to treat her rather coldly. But, as she was really a woman of fine ability and power, as well as benevolence, their humane sympathies finally got the better of their religious prejudices, and all went on harmoniously. After the war, one of these ladies, a zealous Methodist sister, called upon her one day with a subscription paper, to ask for her contribution toward sending out a Christian missionary for the conversion of the Jews in Palestine! On her naturally expressing astonishment by the question, "Why, do you not know that I am myself a Jew?" "Oh, yes," was the Methodist sister's reply, "I knew that; but you have been so much like a Christian with us in the work for the soldiers that I thought you might be interested in this work, too."

Our Jewish friend, of course, though devoted to all good charities, had nothing to give for the conversion of the Jews in Palestine. She had, on the contrary, a firm faith that the Jews would yet regain possession of Palestine, and would convert it from its semi-barbarous condition. She was also too genuine a lady to show any resentment for the insult to her religious convictions which was not intended, but into which her devout neighbor, by excessive missionary zeal, had unwittingly fallen. Yet she none the less keenly felt the traditional insult, which had thus come down through a long line of Christian inheritance and was all the more expressive by the fact that her Methodist visitor unconsciously uttered it. In the blundering utterance of this Methodist woman appeared the designed and persistent teaching of the whole Christian Church for centuries. Because this lady, born and bred a Jew, had shown herself possessed of the humane and philanthropic virtues, therefore she must in some way have abjured her faith; for these are Christian virtues, not Jewish! This is the common Christian argument.

Our acquaintance with this Jewish family confirmed our opinion previously held, that Christianity has no monopoly of any of the virtues, not even of those usually considered among Christians to be specially "Christian,"—as meekness, patience, submissiveness, fortitude under trial, uncomplaining and trustful self-sacrifice. Most of the property of the family had been swept away by the war. Their house with nearly all its furnishings had been burned. Father and son had died. The widowed mother and her daughter, reduced from affluence to poverty, were left to take up the burdens of life alone. Nobly had they risen to the emergency, opening a rented house for boarders and converting an old billiard building into a school-room. Leaving losses and bereavements behind them, unmurmuringly they had set themselves to the task of earning a living, and through it all kept their trust and cheer, kept their serenity and faith,—kept, too, the quickest of sympathies and the kindest of hearts, not forgetting in their narrowed circumstances how still most helpfully to serve others' needs. Remembering these Jewish women, we never now hear the phrases "Christian graces," "Christian virtues," "Christian charities," without feeling what an intense haughtiness of Christian arrogance there is in such use of language. Here were precisely the same qualities growing on Jewish stock. And they are to be found on the stock of other religions. They are not "Christian virtues," nor are they "Jewish," nor "Mohammedan," nor "Buddhist": they are human virtues.

"PHARISEES," WITH A DIFFERENCE.

There is a paper issued in this city by the title of The Boston Investigator (to parody the way in which it speaks of the Index), edited by Rev. Horace Seaver, and published by Josiah P. Mendum, who, on account of his age and services to the liberal cause, might be called another Reverend. To be sure, Mr. Seaver does not usually have the prefix "Rev." to his name. But none the less we like to give it to him. He is entitled to it as much as we are. He speaks in meeting nearly every Sunday, and deserves the "Rev." more than many who wear it as a familiar appellation. And, if he says he doesn't claim it and doesn't like it, we can only reply, Neither do we. These two, Reverends Seaver and Mendum, are assisted by a corps of pretty regular contributors,—at least "fourteen," we should think. (We wish that our published "fourteen," if that be the number,—we take the Investigator's count,—would write as regularly.) The Investigator is much older than the Index: indeed, it is quite an antiquity, and is justly proud of its ancestral blood. Sometimes, we have ventured to think that it is a trifle too proud,—disposed to look down, a little too haughtily, upon all who have not the fortune to be of its family line,—and also, as is apt to be the case with ancient institutions, that it is somewhat behind the times in the arguments it uses on religious problems. But we do not now press these objections; for the Investigator has been a doughty champion of freethought, and held its way with a faith in its convictions and a moral courage that might well be the envy of many people of religious names. What has chiefly drawn our attention at this time is that in a late number this venerable organ had an editorial article headed "Pharisaism," which epithet it appears to throw at us of the Index, because we have called the National Liberal League a "now demoralized organization." Are we Index folks any better, it asks, than Elizur Wright, T. B. Wakeman, and other prominent members it names of the League? But, concerning these gentlemen's personal characters, we have said nothing, and do not propose to do so. What we should have complained of, if we had named them, is that they had given the shelter of their names to persons of proved immoral conduct in the League, and to social theories that are practically demoralizing wherever they gain a foothold. And for this course we should find justification, we are happy to acknowledge, in the columns of the Investigator itself. In our long acquaintance with our venerable contemporary's teachings, we have noticed that it has been ever on the alert to publish any exposed immoralities in clergymen and prominent church members, and that, if it has detected any disposition in the churches to conceal or whitewash such immoralities, it has promptly characterized the act as showing the "demoralized" condition of the churches, or something much worse. We have a pretty distinct recollection of having more than once seen in its columns entire camp-meetings and revivalistic congregations spoken of as demoralizing, because of the ease with which loose moral practices might enter and find shelter among them. We fear, therefore, that our venerable friend who has rebuked us is in the same pharisaical boat with ourselves. The only difference between us appears to be that the same rule which the Investigator applies to churches and church members we would apply also to Liberals and their organizations. It is a poor moral rule that doesn't go round the whole circle. We trust that our reverend freethought contemporary will yet overtake us in the application of its own rule.

THE Radical Club of Ithaca, N.Y., and the State Secularization Association recently formed in Chicago, seem in the line of Darwin's doctrine of the transmutation of species. The former, we believe, was until lately the Liberal League of the place; and the latter is also a development from the same organization. There is something in a name after all, notwithstanding the recorded reflections of a certain English gentleman of a literary and poetic turn of mind some three hundred years ago of a contrary import, especially when the name has become as odious as the one which the Liberal League has made for itself. The Radical Club of Ithaca, we notice, by reports of its meetings that reach us, appears to be full of vitality and intellectual and moral activity, which probably accounts for the change we have referred to. It meets in the vestry of the Unitarian church, and includes its pastor, several professors of the university, and some of the most intelligent and influential of the community among its members. While it does not forget the questions of the Bible in the schools, the taxation of church property, and the like, it dovotes much of its time to subjects of more immediate and pressing interest. Just now, it is agitating the need in Ithaca of a public reading-room. An association with such a stock of good sense and such useful aims can hardly fail to neutralize much of the prejudice it would otherwise have to encounter.

THE Milwaukee Sentinel, in an editorial suggested by the late convention in the interest of State Secularization, at Chicago, thus refers to some comments of the Tribune of that city upon the observance of Sunday: "If traced back to first causes, it would probably be found that Sunday has been really retained because a day of rest is a physical need. Mankind has appeared to sacrifice much to religion; but, if other causes had not intervened to assist, religion would probably never have been strong enough to secure the retention of Sunday any considerable length of time. It happened to fit in with what was necessary. That was all. Sunday has no effect on men in matters which it has been found desirable to carry on on Sunday. The railroads do business on Sunday. Newspapers do. Other departments of industry, which it would be unprofitable to stop, also pursue the even tenor of their way on Sunday. If religion has made Sunday, why has it not been strong enough to make mankind keep it? It is only because in most employments a rest of one day in seven is desirable that it is taken. The proposition the Tribune pretends to criticise is as follows: 'That all laws, enforcing the observance of one day above another upon religious grounds, shall be repealed.' The Tribune has been talking about something else."

IT is a special encouragement to us that so goodly a number of the stockholders of the old Index Association have responded to the invitation first made by Mr. Abbot, and paid, as a voluntary contribution, for the continued publication of the Index, what would have been the annual assessment on their stock. Of course, we lay no claim upon this. It is a purely gratuitous donation. All the more does it gladden us to see the list of these donors grow from week to week; and, as the year wanes to its close, we trust the column will wax in stature.

IF any of our subscribers who may wish specially to help the Index as well as to spread its ideas, will send us ten dollars, we will mail the paper for one year to any four persons whose post-office addresses may be forwarded to us with the money.

WE trust our readers in this neighborhood will not forget the two excellent fairs in progress this week in Boston, the one for Abused Children and the other for the Turnverein. They will be good places for those who share in the generous sympathies of these closing days of the year to visit.

THE REFORMED EPISCOPALIAN is the suggestive name which the Appeal, published at Chicago, is to take on the 1st of January. The paper will continue of course to advocate the interests of reform in the Episcopal Church, and Rev. Dr. Cheney will remain its editor-in-chief.

REMINISCENCES OF LUCRETIA MOTT.

The Index has lately spoken, and very fittingly, of Lucretia Mott, dwelling upon her exalted worth and eminent services in behalf of humanity. The departure of such a soul from earth sets vibrating numerous chords in us all,—all certainly that have met and known her; and there will be many reminiscences called forth. It was a very fruitful and memorable life.

Mrs. Mott I first saw in the western part of New York, now more than twenty years ago, at a meeting of the Friends of Progress in Waterloo. The audience was made up largely from those who had been of the Society of Friends, but who from considerations of anti-slavery and on other grounds had left the denomination. She was already somewhat advanced in life, must have been sixty-five or more, but was excellently well preserved, of fine presence, and still very beautiful. There was something very attractive in her address. Her speech had the charm of fine music. I remember that she emphasized the doctrine of non-resistance, of peace,—then much called in question or denied among abolitionists, the war at that time already looming in the horizon,—and the claim of spiritual freedom. It was evident from the strong desire manifested to hear her, and from the rapt attention with which she was listened to, as from the enthusiastic greetings that met her at every step, that she was the favorite, the idol, of the meeting. It was an occasion long to be remembered from her presence and speech. She was eloquent and deeply touching. She bore us away with the inspiration, the sincerity, and earnestness of a woman's tender soul. I could easily believe what a friend of mine, years before, had told me of the effect of her appearance in an audience of plain farmers in Northern Ohio, men whose sentiment was that of indifference or hostility to her theme, whose emotions were not easily touched, whose eyes were unused to weep. She portrayed the wrongs and woes of the American slave; and gradually she took possession of all the hearts, and melted that multitude into one. Those plain men, as he described, might be seen, one after another, drawing their sleeves across the eyes to wipe off the tears that would not be stayed.

Of late years, I have seen her but seldom, and never, that I recall, within the last ten or twelve have I heard her speak in any meeting. But not seldom have I heard of her attendance, especially at meetings of Friends, and of her wonted impressive and charming utterance there.

Last summer, in June, being in the vicinity of Philadelphia, I received from her an invitation to call upon her in her home just out of that city. This I gladly accepted. She was very slight, looked fragile indeed, but was perfectly preserved in her mind. She spoke cheerfully and with deep interest of the living questions of the time. She had followed all the agitations and discussions that had marked our recent history. And her eye saw the rising light of the new morning that is gradually, as we hope, breaking for man.

Her memory was indeed a storehouse of recollection. It reached back to the death of Washington in 1799 (and to years before), and very interesting reminiscences she gave us of that event. She also responded very cordially to inquiries in regard to Garrison and Emerson, when in the old days they were wont to visit and speak in Philadelphia. The former she had known very well, standing indeed as his brave auxiliary in times of fearful trial. The latter she also knew; and she gave very entertaining anecdotes of his appearance and conversation, as she had met him socially. Her interest at present was chiefly in regard to the religious progress of the time. She asked to have brought to us a volume of essays published within recent time by Dean Stanley (addresses and sermons, London, 1877), in which were one or two papers that, as she told me, she had read and reread many times, so that she almost had every syllable of them in her memory. One of these, as I note, was the address given to the students of St. Andrew's, on "The Hopes of Theology." As I rose to leave, she placed in my hands the little book, begging me to accept it, which I gladly did. I prize it for itself, but much more for the fact that it had deeply interested her, and bears the mark of her hand all along the pages against the passages that she most liked and enjoyed.

Apparently she had little thought, certainly she had no solicitude, in regard to the great change that she must have known then could not be distant from her. She manifested no disposition to speak upon this. It was life, the struggle and growth of humanity that interested and absorbed her.

The ancient Greeks said Iris "of the flashing feet" was a messenger from the gods. The rainbow they conceived was a bridge arching the space between heaven and earth, and thereon the swift-footed heralds came, bearing communications from Zeus to men. This woman was one of those messengers, beautiful as Iris, speeding down from the skies and dwelling a goodly term on earth, to reveal to us the eternal verities, and lift toward heaven. In her look shone an eye-beam from the face of God, her voice was a note from the music of the spheres. Such a presence appearing in the flesh gives us new respect for and new trust in humanity, exalts our view of its possibilities and its destiny. The New York Tribune has lately declared hers "the most high and helpful life granted to any American woman."

Blessed be thy name and memory ever, thou pure, white, royal soul! Long may they abide, cherished on earth, a talisman, sign for conquest, an inspiration and strength for those that remain! Well hast thou done and fought, and the victor's wreath is fitly and forever thine! For all thou hast been and wrought in thy generation and time, we honor and bless thee.

Said Julius Cæsar, as reported by Tacitus, "It is not the chief duty of friends to honor the departed by grief, but to remember their designs and to carry out their mandates." The watchword for us is, Onward! And I think none more than she would cordially adopt and emphasize as her message to us words like those of Prof. Max Müller, written in introducing his translation of the Rig Veda, "The true way to honor the memory of our departed generals is not to halt where they fell, but to advance to new conquests." SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE first volume of the publications of the "Challenger" has appeared in England, having been eagerly expected for the past four years, and will be followed by fourteen or fifteen additional volumes, all of which are to be in the hands of the public by the end of the year 1884. Some conception of the great labor expended in the preparation of these volumes may be obtained from the statement that "the zoölogical specimens collected and preserved in alcohol during the voyage filled 2,270 large glass jars, 1,749 smaller bottles, 1,860 glass tubes, and 176 tin cases; while 22 casks and 180 tin cases held objects preserved in other ways." These specimens were distributed for critical investigation among scientific men of special repute in different departments of natural history, many foreigners co-operating with the English workers. From Professor Huxley's notice of Sir Wyville Thomson's General Introduction, we obtain the following facts: The characteristic deep-sea or abyssal fauna is richest between six hundred and twelve hundred fathoms; but there is a large and varied assemblage of invertebrate (and perhaps also of vertebrate) forms of life at a depth of two thousand fathoms. Around the coasts, the shore forms of life gradually die out toward the two hundred fathom depth, and there is no relation between the shore forms and the abyssal forms. All over the world, in the darkness and cold of the marine abysses, a busy life blindly toils and moils; and this life is everywhere similar. The depths of the ocean may be likened to a continuous world-wide lake of comparatively still and very cold water; and the life existing therein is intimately related to, and apparently descended from, the deep-water life of the Oolite, Chalk, and Tertiary formations.

SIR WYVILLE THOMSON concludes his Introduction with the statement of "a strong personal impression on two points": one is that the abyssal fauna lends a powerful support to the doctrine of evolution; the other is that it does not support the theory which refers the evolution of species to extreme variations guided only by natural selection,—an opinion from which Professor Huxley dissents, and gives good reasons for disbelieving, from facts furnished by Sir Wyville Thomson himself. But, aside from any bearing upon speculative opinion, the voyage of the "Challenger" has made a large and permanent addition to our natural knowledge, and has overturned the theories of the last generation of naturalists with reference to deep-water life. That so important and so unforeseen a contribution to knowledge should also confirm the doctrine of evolution is a singularly striking proof of the essential correctness of that doctrine. The universal acceptation of this doctrine, indeed, seems now to depend not so much upon fact or argument as upon time. As the older and less convincible portion of the community passes away, the new generation will accept this belief as a matter of course; and the idea of special creation will rapidly pass into a fading superstition, its holders to be looked upon as curiously as we now look upon the negro preacher, Jasper, and others, who still assert that the sun and not the earth does move. SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

The Hampton Institute.

This school, though so well known to the public, is charged with such an important work that its claims may well be brought frequently forward. Not a seminary or college in the ordinary sense of the word, it aims at certain specific and practical results. Its title of "Normal and Agricultural Institute" indicates these results. Its purpose is to prepare colored teachers for the colored race; "to build up manhood and character in its pupils, and through them among their people." For this, it combines with a course of English studies training in some branch of manual labor, principally farming, but not exclusively that; thus providing for the teacher that is to be independent means of support, in whole or in part, and also making him more useful in his work. It opens equal opportunities to both sexes, educating them together to the better appreciation and fulfilment of their future life work. The Butler School, with its two hundred pupils, furnishes them practical drill in teaching. During the twelve years in which the school has been in operation, between fourteen and fifteen hundred pupils have been admitted, remaining for different periods, some of them very brief. Over three hundred and fifty have passed through the regular course and have graduated. Ninety per cent. of the latter are teaching in various parts of Virginia, North and South Carolina, and beyond. Many of them farm during the summer and teach in the winter. Their success is witnessed to by the friends of education, and by their own letters to the Southern Workman, a monthly paper published at the Institute. This year's enrollment embraces three hundred and fifty-four pupils, including sixty-eight Indians.

Interesting as this institution is on account of its special work for the freedmen, its more recent labors for the education of the Indian have given it added interest. In working for these, it seeks the same practical results. The work was commenced at Hampton for the benefit of a portion of a band of Indian prisoners, held in Florida, under charge of Lieutenant Pratt, now at the head of the government school at Carlisle Barracks. There being then no other institution that could meet their desire for an education, Hampton opened its doors to receive them. Seventeen of them came for that purpose in April, 1878. In the autumn of the same year, forty boys and nine girls were received from Dakota, and in 1879 ninety-six boys and girls. Eleven of the Florida captives subsequently went with Lieutenant Pratt to Carlisle, two to their homes, three died, and one remained at Hampton. Of the original seventeen, one has relapsed into barbarism, the rest are doing well. Four of the Dakota Indians died, and eight were sent home sick. Some of these were diseased before leaving home, or took heavy colds on the way. This partly accounts for the large percentage of sickness among them. The heat of the summer months is also found unfavorable. This has led to the shortening of their studies at that season, and the providing of temporary homes for them at the North, where they can earn their board by their labor. The number of scholars July 1, the present year, was forty-seven boys and twenty-one girls, to whom others have since been added. Sixty-two of these were aided by the government, and six entirely supported by charity. The estimated expense of each scholar per year is $250. The government appropriation provides $150, $30 are credited to the labor of the pupil, leaving $70 to be provided by contributions of money or clothing, and by scholarships.

The results of the efforts made here are similar to those reported at Carlisle. The superintendent's last report says: "Their studies are rudimentary. . . . They are now reading simple stories, are eager to learn, and most interesting as pupils. In work, they are slow, but, as a rule, willing, and have made satisfactory progress. . . . Three years at Hampton will, I believe, fit Indians for a simple life of labor in their own homes." Similar statements might be quoted from the report of one of their colored teachers, a graduate of Hampton.

The relation between the two races is friendly, almost without exception. The colored youth, boys and girls, are ever ready to encourage and aid the Indian in study, labor, and in acquiring the social and domestic habits of civilized life. In this respect, the colored wards of the nation at Hampton contrast most favorably with the white wards of the government, who are receiving an aristocratic culture at West Point, and who are encouraged by the superintendent of that school of honorable gentlemen to regard themselves as the "blood horses" of the human race with whom the black "beasts of burden" are not worthy to associate.

Fear has been sometimes expressed that, returning to his home, the Indian will drop his civilized acquirements and fall back into barbarism. The safeguard against this is in making his teaching and training a real development of manhood as far as it goes, and in the exercise of some care as to the time and method of his leaving, and the circumstances to which he shall return.

The work in which this institution is engaged, for both the black and the red man, is of the greatest importance, as falling into line with that last and best endeavor to solve the problem of both races. Charles Sumner, sixteen years ago, declared that education must crown the work which the government had undertaken for the black man,—the work which began with emancipation and was continued with enfranchisement and equality. The author of Bricks without Straw affirms the prime necessity of education for both white and black, as the true means of renovating the South by removing old prejudices and giving its people a larger outlook; and that such education ought to be provided for and enforced by the government. This, too, is being recognized as the necessity and promise for the Indian; an education which is to mean for him, as for his black fellow-student, not instruction merely, but development of self-reliant manhood. "It is as necessary," says Secretary Schurz, "to teach Indian children how to live as how to read and write," and for this "to withdraw the pupils from the influence of home surroundings sufficiently to facilitate the changes in their habits of life," as cannot be done at the agency schools. To Hampton belongs the credit of offering itself as a pioneer in this work. Encouraged by its success, the Carlisle school followed, and recently one or two others have been added. We are pleased to learn from the report of the Secretary, made to the present Congress, that it is the intention of the department to largely increase the number of such schools, to be, like Carlisle, under government support and control. For every effort in this direction, the department deserves and will receive popular credit and encouragement.

Boston "Associated Charities" Bulletins.

A GENTLEMAN tells the following experience with a child who was begging:—

A little boy came up to me in the street, very cold, saying he was hungry, and would I give him something to eat. "Where do you live?" I asked. "My mother lives a long way off from here, near Charlestown." I tried to think what to do, remembering the strict rules against street beggary; and, for the benefit of others in like strait, I will say what I did and what good came of it. I went with the child to the corner grocery,—for we were too far from any of the Temporary Homes to make them available,—and gave him as much bread and milk as he would eat. He was not VERY hungry, not hungrier than an active child always may be at five o'clock, who has been out of doors since dinner. While he was eating his supper, I got from him the address of his parents, which I sent at once by mail to the Registration Office, Room 41, Charity Building. This address was immediately forwarded to the branch of the Associated Charities working in the district where his parents lived. They were discovered and put under surveillance with regard to their children, who can by the laws of Massachusetts be taken from them, if they prove themselves "unfit" to care for and educate their offspring. By this method, I was sure the little fellow did not go hungry that afternoon and for the future that he would be kept from street-begging, with a chance of making a good man some day, instead of a helpless, lifelong pauper.

AT the annual meeting of the Council of the Associated Charities, held in Charity Building, Thursday evening, November 18, 1880, it was voted: To engross on our records and to communicate to the newspapers the thanks of the Council, in the name of the Associated Charities, to the Registration Committee for their work which has been so faithfully and thoroughly done; also thanks and appreciation of the services of Miss Z. D. Smith, the Registrar. The Registration Committee, having completed the labor of establishing that office, resigned, feeling that they had brought the work to a state requiring little effort, which could be more economically exercised in point of time by the Executive Committee who accept it.

THE Executive Committee of the Associated Charities lays the following statement before the public. Their work divides itself into two branches: First, Registration, to discover the causes of poverty and how to deal with it. For this, we require three thousand dollars a year, and our treasury is now empty. Second, district agents and offices, for which eight hundred dollars a year is the outside necessity in any one district. This is the entire cost of a work which has proved and is proving such a beneficence to our city. Believing in its value, we hopefully ask for the money from our friends and the public. Industrial schools, sewing, knitting, carpentry, laundries, etc., which may eventually be established in connection with district offices, must prove their merits by results, and, so far as judicious, will no doubt be supported, but for these the Associated Charities cannot and do not ask. They are the result of their work, but not the work itself.

A LIBERAL SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

What sort of religious training can Liberals consistently bestow upon their children? A more important or more difficult question to decide is hardly to be found among all the problems which beset us, in this age of transition from the religion of dogmatic creeds to the religion of science and free investigation. Many parents, who have fought their way painfully out of the bondage of old superstitions, and who perceive how much of the superstitions yet survives even in the religious teaching of "liberal" churches, decline to send their children to any Sunday-school. But this is no real solution of the difficulty. The necessary contact with the current religious doctrines and prejudices of the community cannot fail to produce a deep impression upon the mind of a child, which only systematic counter-education can eradicate. No intelligent "Liberal," with profound conviction of the truth of his position, wishes to bestow upon his children the inheritance of the same mental struggles through which he has fought his way; nor does he desire them to accept, without inquiry, the dogmas of popular Orthodoxy. So the problem still presses for solution.

To some persons, "ethical culture" appears to be the way out of this difficulty. That is doubtless of chief importance, and all very well as far as it goes. Manifestly, no system of education is complete which does not comprehend practical instruction in rational ethics. But, in order that this may take root and grow, the mind must first be cleared of all survivals of supernaturalism and superstition. The "Thus saith the Lord" of popular theology must be superseded by the equally emphatic mandates of the universal moral law. The inadequacy and untruthfulness of the old reliance on authority, having its basis in an assumed supernatural revelation, must be shown, before a more rational teaching can be understandingly received.

We have in Brooklyn a Sunday-school devoted to instruction in rational religion; and it may be of interest to some of your readers to know something concerning its methods and the principles on which it is conducted. It is not claimed that it is a "model school" in all respects, or that its methods are above criticism; but I know that those chiefly interested in its welfare are conscientiously and devotedly working, to the end that its teaching may be consistent with rational views of religion and morality, and fruitful of wise and beneficent influences on the lives and characters of the children intrusted to their care.

In Rev. John W. Chadwick, the minister of the church, the late Mr. Charles P. Gerrish, Mr. Edwin M. Wheeler, and Mr. William Potts, the school has had a succession of conscientious and devoted superintendents. The labors of Mr. Potts during the past year have been constant and very effective, as is evident from the growth of the school in numbers, and from the greater interest manifested by teachers and scholars. He has prepared a series of admirable services for the opening exercises of the school, consisting of organ music, responsive reading, and singing, in which the entire school takes part. For this purpose, the school is divided into two sections, each with a leader, which in turn alternate with each other, and with the superintendent and his assistant in the readings. The adult class constitutes a choir, which has allotted to it a portion of the singing exercises, other parts of which are sung by the different classes or by the school in unison.

The teaching inculcated in this service is chiefly of an ethical character,—a recognition of the nobility of human nature, of the beauty and bountifulness manifested in the universe, and of the duty of all to think highly and live nobly, in accord with the law of righteousness which has its foundation in the constitution of society. The supernatural element is wholly eliminated from this service; yet a fine sense of all that is beautiful and worshipful in nature and our human life, of the divine manifested in ever-working and universal laws, elevates it from the region of crude and dry materialism, and renders it hopeful and bountiful with good inspiration. Formal prayer constitutes no part of this service; but a spirit of prayer, and of aspiration to the highest ideals of right living, breathes through every sentence and sings in every song. From a beautiful and appropriate "Autumn Service," prepared for the opening of the school in October, I make a few selections, by way of illustration. After an organ overture, and brief reading by the superintendent, the school sing:—

Choir:
Gladly we gather to the place of meeting,
Keeping our tryst, from far and far away;
Gladly we tender each a joyous greeting,
Looking the love that words may never say!
All:
Faithful and true! Ever faithful and true!

Class 2:
We from the mountains, from the breezy highlands,
Class 1:
We from the valleys where the streamlets glide,
Choir:
We from the salt waves, from the sea-girt islands,
Class 3:
We from the city's hot and turbid tide.
All:
Faithful and true! Ever faithful and true!

Choir:
While through our hearts the spirit ever pouring
Flows, a rich stream of faith and hope and love,
Hither we come, our thoughts toward heaven soaring,
Thrilling with life, that Life all life above!
All:
Faithful and true! Ever faithful and true!

All:
Now, linked in friendship's golden chain together,
Feeling the pulse that throbs Creation through,
May we be true, in bright or stormy weather,
To the Eternal, to each other true!
Faithful and true! Ever faithful and true!

After responsive reading and singing in recognition of the beauty and bounty of the season, the responses continue:—

Superintendent: The treasures of the earth are indeed beyond price: the joy of life is unspeakable: the aspirations of the soul are without limit.
Assistant: Behold, all the heavens are opened to our thought!
Superintendent: Let us then pledge ourselves anew.
Right: Inasmuch as we have drawn richly of the wine of life,
Left: Inasmuch as we have received largely from them that have gone before,
Right: Who have ploughed their furrows right manfully,
Left: Who have borne the heat and burden of their day,
Assistant: Who have filled, as it were, great storehouses with the fruit of their labors,—
Right: So that the earth is fairer,
Left: And the heavens are lovelier,
Assistant: Let us also bring our sheaves with us!
Superintendent: Let us not, alone, come empty-handed to the feast of the harvest home!

Any brief excerpt can but do injustice to the complete service. It will be seen that, although a service of Free Religion, it is by no means a service free from religion. The entire work of the school is based upon the belief that religion is in no way inconsistent with the most thorough rationalism, and that it is to be cherished and cultivated for the "lift" and comfort which it brings into life.

For three years past, the older classes have been studying Rev. Wm. C. Gannett's carefully prepared papers on the natural growth of the Hebrew Religion. Much excellent work has been done, by teachers and scholars; involving not merely the tracing of the dry, historical current of events, but a consideration also of the philosophy of evolution as applied to social and religious development, and the general subject of comparative religion. Evening meetings have been held, weekly or bi-weekly, by the teachers and some of the older pupils, wherein these topics have received fuller discussion than the Sunday hour would permit. Some very interesting and able papers have been written and read at these meetings.

This season, the entire school, except the younger classes, takes, as a basis for its study, the series of lessons on "The Origin and Growth of Christianity," now in course of publication in the Free Religious Index. In the classes, the freest and closest questioning of the various topics under consideration is always encouraged; the object of the instruction being not the inculcation of dogmas, even the dogmas of Liberalism, but rather to teach the pupil how to think, confident that through the freest use of his rational nature, and most sincere reliance on it, he can best work out his own salvation from all the ills of ignorance and superstition.

WITCHCRAFT OF NEW ENGLAND EXPLAINED BY MODERN SPIRITUALISM. By Allen Putnam, Esq. Boston: Colby & Rich. 1880.

The purpose of the writer is fully expressed in the title to his book. It is "not to write history, but to give new explanations of old events." He assumes the entire credibility of the testimony to the supernatural (or, to use his phrase, supermundane) origin and nature of witchcraft, and then proceeds to parallel these "old events" by the various phenomena of modern spiritualism. He only differs from Cotton Mather in that the latter ascribed witchcraft to the agency of the devil, while Mr. Putnam sees in it merely the manifestation of departed spirits. "Those who were accused of bewitching others were fountains from which invisible intelligences sometimes drew forth properties which aided them in gaining and keeping control of those whom they entranced or otherwise used." But it appears that departed spirits were not at all times the producing causes of these phenomena. Sometimes there went forth "auras" or "unwilled emanations that were naturally attracted to other sensitives, who perceived their source and pronounced it diabolical, because the influx was annoying." But, as a rule, if we understand our author, witchcraft was not produced by "auras," but by spirits. These were usually described as a black man, sometimes as an Indian, and once or twice as a tall white man with gray hair. The latter, in the opinion of the author, was the chief cause of the witchcraft horrors of 1692. Happily, we know who the rascal was. He was an ancient Egyptian. We know it, because he was good enough to come back and communicate the fact through a modern medium.

Not only did these mischief-makers appear in the form of man, but also in the image of dogs, cats, wolves, etc. This at first thought seems incredible, but nothing is impossible with spirits. Our author assures us that "facts are transpiring in the present age which indicate with much distinctness that a spirit can present the semblance of a spirit-beast or other spirit-object to the vision of many clairvoyants." If this happens now, why should it not have taken place two centuries ago? We confess we think it should.

The method of the author reminds us of the Scriptural exegesis once in vogue in pulpit discourse. The testimony concerning witchcraft is his Holy Scripture. He takes a page of it, and, commencing with the first part of the first verse, he proceeds to expound the chapter, "line upon line and precept upon precept," according to the "spiritualistic philosophy," with tedious iteration and profuseness. It never seems to occur to him to doubt the trustworthiness of the witnesses. When some person, perhaps a child of eight or ten, testifies that she saw the ghost of Sarah Good and said ghost pinched her and bit her, it is regarded as irrefragable proof of several things: (1) That the child was a clairvoyant; (2) That the ghost was a "spirit"; (3) That the spirit was the spirit of Sarah Good, though Sarah was still in the flesh. Then our author proceeds to tell us just how it was that Sarah's spirit got loose and performed such freaks. We are solemnly assured that the "spirit-fingers" did not nip, and the "spirit teeth" did not bite, the fleshly arm of the child: no, but the spirit-teeth bit the spirit-arm, which impression was communicated outward to the flesh. There can be no doubt of this, because there were the exact prints of Sarah's spirit-teeth on the little girl's arm of flesh, as testified to by her two hundred years ago. After this, we are somewhat surprised at the "Sadducean scepticism" of our author in regard to witches riding through the air on broomsticks. Why should he doubt it, since there are plenty of witnesses who saw them? But he assures us that it was not their physical, but their spiritual bodies that rode in that way. But how does he know that? Perhaps he reasoned that the sticks would have broken under the weight of the physical body. But not so, it seems to us, if the body was very small or the broomstick very large. Is it not better to assume either of these "conditions" than to question the sworn testimony of Margaret Jones or Ann Hibbins or Susanna Martin? To an unbeliever, the evidence adduced by our author to establish the "supermundane" origin and nature of witchcraft is not only inconclusive, but is surprisingly, not to say ridiculously, meagre. The witnesses were, for the most part, a band of hysterical girls, from ten to eighteen, some of whom, in after years, in tears and ashes, confessed that they were then the victims of a horrid delusion. We have the authority of Mr. Lecky for saying that the testimony to witchcraft in Europe was vast and overwhelming; but, unless Mr. Putnam can bring forward a more respectable array of witnesses than he has done, we must confess that modern spiritualism can find little authority or prestige in New England witchcraft. The most original chapter of our author is that wherein he attempts to explain the motives which actuated the spirits in bewitching, tormenting, and persecuting, even to the death, innocent men, women, and children. Their motive—think of it—"was probably to get access to dear ones left on earth, or some experimental or scientific impulse to test the power which a spirit could exercise over those incased in mortal forms." That was all. It hurt, of course, to be pressed to death, as was brave old Giles Corey; but then, in true Hopkinsian style, he should have felt willing to be damned for the glory of the spirits. But, alas! he did not know that the angels were "experimenting" with him or had anything to do with the tragedy. It has remained for Mr. Allen Putnam to discover that, and reveal it to the world. The presswork of the book is all that could be desired.

VERSES. By Susan Coolidge. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

In exquisite daintiness of white vellum-cloth and gold design and paper delicately toned, this little volume makes its appeal to our regard. In her "Prelude," the author disclaims all intention of writing a book of poems:—

> "Poems are heavenly things;
> And only souls with wings
> May reach them where they grow,
> May pluck and bear below,
> Feeding the nations thus
> With food all glorious.
> "Verses are not of these:
> They bloom on earthly trees,
> Poised on a low-hung stem,
> And those may gather them
> Who cannot fly to where
> The heavenly gardens are."

Verses, not poems then, are what Miss Coolidge has essayed to write: and she has written many that are very pure and sweet, and some that are so strong and fine that we should be quite willing to call them poems. The answer to the question "When?" is one of these. It is our oldest favorite, and we are hardly sorry that we find nothing in the book which pleases us more keenly. Another favorite we miss, the little dedication poem to the children's book, The New Year's Bargain. It was a pity to leave that out. The thought of death and of another life is over-prominent in these verses. But there is no disparagement of the present life, rather a warm appreciation of its blessedness. The Barcaroles, I., II., and III., show that the author has a dramatic vein, so rich that the wonder is she has not worked it more freely. The popular theology, in its more sentimental forms, is reflected here and there, but for the most part very modestly; and the reader should not be deterred by this element from the enjoyment of what is more characteristic.

CHRISTMAS DAY AND ALL THE YEAR. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

No one who makes the acquaintance of this collection of little stories from the Christian Register (Unitarian) for "boys and girls between the ages of eight and thirteen" will question, we are sure, their claim to the more permanent form in which they now appear. It is not to be supposed that all the stories for boys and girls in the Register are as good as these. If they were, we should like to commend it very heartily to parents everywhere for this feature alone. These are the rare flowers, we conclude, of its field, plucked because of some special charm from among numerous like attractions. Be this as it may, Mrs. Ames has fully justified her judgment and taste in the selection she has made. A very strange thing it may seem to some into whose hands this little volume may fall that, though published in a religious paper, they contain scarcely any of what many are accustomed to associate with the word. This is due to the fact, we suppose, that such persons are generally disposed to think that Unitarians have no religion. At the same time, no one who appreciates the pure and sweet imaginations of childhood, and prefers simple, winning, natural virtues to the spoiled conscience and artificial ones of traditional teaching so often manifest in books for the young, will regard this a deficiency in this instance. There are twenty-five sketches in all; and they include among their authors Susan Coolidge, Rev. George Axford (who is understood to be E. E. Hale, we believe), Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, Mary Bartol, Sarah C. Robinson, Mary C. Bartlett, and others, with several German translations. It contains an engraved frontispiece, and is a neatly printed and exceedingly tasteful volume.

THE Popular Science Monthly for December presents a trinity of excellence in the shape of articles from Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and Tyndall. The first continues his discourse upon the "Development of Political Institutions." The second gives an admirable review of the changing standards of education in ancient, mediæval, and modern Europe. The address under the title of "Science and Culture" was delivered at the dedication of Sir Josiah Mason's "Science College," at Birmingham, England. While this paper is a powerful plea for scientific study as a feature of modern education, it recognizes the desirableness of diversity. Professor Huxley says in the course of his argument, "An exclusively scientific training will bring about a mental twist as surely as an exclusively literary training." Professor Tyndall's paper is a Presidential address to the Sunday Society of Glasgow. Of the short articles, Hoffman's "Sketch of Professor Dumas" is the most interesting. "The August Meteors" is a carefully illustrated article by W. F. Denning. "The Migrations of Fishes" is full of attractive information: it is written by Dr. Heincke. "The Early Practice of Medicine by Women," from the pen of Professor H. C. Bolton, is statistical and valuable. "Indigestion," by T. L. Brunton, M.D., will be good reading for invalids and for those who would avoid becoming so. The number is of more than average value.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

COLUMBIA College has conferred the degree of LL.D. upon General Di Cesnola, the famous archæologist.

B. F. UNDERWOOD is coming East to spend the holidays, and may be addressed at his home in Thorndike, Mass.

JOHN B. GOUGH is lecturing in Pennsylvania and Ohio. Mary A. Livermore is also lecturing in Pennsylvania.

REV. JOSIAH HANSON, Harriet Beecher Stowe's original "Uncle Tom," is to have a new $2,500 church at Dresden, Ont.

ROWLAND CONNOR recently delivered a discourse on "The Moral Man of To-day," before the Michigan Unitarian Conference.

SENATOR BRUCE, in a recent speech at Memphis, to the colored people, advised them to practise economy, buy land, and educate their children.

WALTER C. WRIGHT, a son of Elizur Wright, is the business manager of the Fair for Abused Children now being held in this city, and proves a very efficient one.

MRS. MARY BRIGHT, widow of the late Mr. Jacob Bright, and stepmother of the Right Hon. J. Bright, M. P., died at her residence, Rose Hill, Rochdale, recently, at the age of ninety-four.

OLE BULL bequeathed to the Museum of Bergen, Norway, a number of the jewels, medals, and decorations given him in the course of his long professional career by kings, emperors, and other titled personages.

HENRY WARD BEECHER delivered an address, a few days since, at a Catholic fair in Brooklyn. The Beechers are erratic, but it must not be assumed from this that Henry is on the point of a summersault into the Roman camp.

COL. T. W. HIGGINSON is to deliver the oration at the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of Cambridge, Mass., on the 28th of December. Oliver Wendell Holmes will contribute a poem to the occasion.

WENDELL PHILLIPS still lectures on the Lost Arts, which has been one of his themes upon the lecture platform for the last thirty years. He does not appear, however, to have lost the art of rendering it very interesting as often as delivered.

FATHER KEMPEN, a Catholic priest of Cahoka, Mo., on a recent Sunday, shut up the church of that place, because a former parishioner, who had been excommunicated, refused to leave the premises. The affair has caused a good deal of excitement.

THE Philadelphia North American says: "John Bright appears to be almost too good a man to make a practical statesman. A country in which a political murder is being committed every other day is no place for the application of theoretically humanitarian principles."

N. K. FAIRBANKS, of Chicago, offers to be one of ten to subscribe $1,000,000 for a grand library building and opera-house, if the city will give Dearborn Park for a site. The building is to be presented to the city with the understanding that the revenues of the opera-house are to support the library.

A BALTIMORE colored lawyer, from Massachusetts, named Charles Taylor, was admitted to practice in the United States Courts there, but was refused admission to the State Court of Appeals, on the ground that the code of Maryland only extended this privilege to persons of white descent. He appealed to the Supreme Court.

DR. MARY WALKER may be eccentric, but she is no fool. On election day, she offered her vote in Oswego; and it was refused on account of her sex. A bystander remarked that, if Mary was allowed to vote, "they might as well dress up all their women-folks in men's clothes, and bring them down and vote them." To which Mary indignantly replied: "I don't wear men's clothes. I wear my own clothes." Exit the masculine voter.—Vineland Independent.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN'S society in Lynn is to have a fair the 11th, 12th, and 14th of February. Mr. Washburn is one of the most self-sacrificing, persevering, and deserving of the young radical speakers in the field, and is compelled to depend largely upon these annual fairs for the pecuniary resources to carry on his work. We know of nothing better that some of our more flourishing radical societies could do than to aid him in this effort, by contributions of money or articles which may prove equivalent for the tables of his prospective fair.

BISHOP ELDER, successor of Archbishop Purcell in the Cincinnati diocese, has surprised Catholics by refusing to allow the burial rites of the Church performed over the body of John C. Fiedelday, a prominent Catholic and Democratic politician. Fiedelday had requested that his body be buried in Spring Grove Cemetery, the leading Protestant burial-ground; and it was the intention of his family that the funeral take place in St. Xavier Church, Rev. Father Driscoll, an old friend of the deceased, officiating. Hearing this, Bishop Elder gave an order that no priest conduct the funeral or go near the late residence of the dead man, unless the body was buried in consecrated ground. Mrs. Fiedelday and her son, though devout Catholics, decided to adhere to the dead man's request; and Rev. J. Stanger, rector of Christ Church, was summoned and officiated at the funeral. Bishop Elder believes that the Church should be brought back under its former strict discipline.

JESTINGS.

A LADY need not be an athlete, though she jump at an offer.

THE one-cent postal-card will never quite take the place of the scented note-paper.

MANY preachers seek to impress their hearers with the fact that life is short, but forget it in their sermons.

AN editor who was told that his last article was as clear as mud said, "Well, that covers the ground, anyhow."

THE Houston News asks, "Where do the paragraphers go, when they die?" It is a very grave question, and we are not in the humor to answer it graphically or otherwise.

"SHON," said a Dutchman, "you may say what you please 'pout te neighbors. I have had te worst neighbors as never vas. Mine pigs and mine hens come home mit dere ears split, and todder day two of dem come home missing!"

IT was at a late quarterly meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Wisconsin that two clergymen were to present papers on the same day; and, the question of precedence having arisen, Mr. A. sprung to his feet, and said: "I think Brother B. ought to have the best place on the programme. He is an older man than I am. Besides, he is full of his subject." When the audience remembered that Brother B.'s subject was "The Devil," a cheerful smile seemed to beam around the assembly.

THE bridegroom of a Waukegan wedding was a Baptist, and the bride a Methodist. They had agreed that, immediately after the ceremony, they should decide by chance which should embrace the other's religion. The officiating clergyman declined to toss up a cent, partly because he would not countenance such a proceeding, and partly because, being a Methodist, he might be accused of fraud, if the bride won. The bride herself finally threw the coin, and lost. When she went to join the Baptists, however, they rejected her because she did not believe in close communion. That displeased the husband, and he went over with her to the Methodists.

The Boston Turnverein,

The oldest and most numerous German Society in this city, intends to hold a Fair from the 11th to the 18th of December next, for the purpose of raising part of the heavy load of indebtedness resting upon its building.

The Undersigned, a Committee consisting of persons who are NOT members of said Society, appeal to the public at large for assistance, on the ground that the BOSTON TURNVEREIN is an educational and charitable association; that for thirty years past, it has devoted itself to the mental and physical education, not alone of its members, but of a Germans of Boston and vicinity, whom it could reach; that thereby it has assisted to educate a class of citizens worthy of this city; that it has contributed its share to all public charities, besides assisting in the support of needy Germans, so that they should not become a burden upon public charity; that its usefulness is greatly hampered by this debt, and that it has never before appealed for aid.

Contributions in money, or articles to be sold at the Fair, will be gratefully received by either of the undersigned, or at the Turn-halle, No. 29 Middlesex Street. All proceeds of the Fair will be devoted to the reduction of the debt.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

THE NEW ENGLAND NEWSPAPER.

INDEPENDENT—NOT NEUTRAL.

[Established in 1824 by Samuel Bowles.]

The Weekly edition of THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN is a comprehensive and intelligent review of American life from week to week, taking due notice as well of all important events and movements elsewhere throughout the world. Its summaries of news are prepared with great care, special attention being given to the presentation of New England news. Its editorial articles discuss broadly and with independence a wide range of topics, political, social, literary, scientific, and ethical. Its correspondence is of unusually high character, embracing regular letters from Boston, New York, Washington, and other centres of interest in this country and abroad. Frequent stories and choice selections of original or quoted poetry lend variety to the paper and increase its attractiveness. Each number contains a column of religious intelligence. Agricultural matters are fully treated, particularly those that are local to New England, and market reports are published with special reference to the information of farmers. New Englanders both at home and abroad find THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN a valuable assistant and guide in maintaining their acquaintance with public affairs and their knowledge of the growth and condition of the older States of the Union.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined. . . . For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty Potentate, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace. . . . The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad therefor, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. . . . Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing; for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.—Hebrew.

OSIRIS is the oldest son of Time, and cousin of the Day; God of life and light, creator and sustainer of all things. He is called Lord of Life, the Everlasting Ruler, Manifester of Good, Revealer of Truth, full of goodness and truth. At his birth, on earth, a loud voice is said to have proclaimed, "The Lord of the World is born!" The source of seeds, he giveth all herbs and the abundance of the soil. His tenderness encircles our hearts; great is his love in all bosoms. Having finished his benevolent mission on earth, he descended into the region of the dead, ascended again to the celestial abodes, where he dwells as judge of the dead and dispenser of the rewards of immortality.—Egyptian.

KRISHNA created the earth, the air, and the sky, . . . himself of boundless power. By him, the dreadful darkness was pierced, that threatening ocean which abides. Know, he says, that Righteousness is my beloved first-born son, whose nature is to have compassion on all creatures. When all men live in wickedness, I, the unfailing, enter into various forms of flesh, as the ages pass away, and build up the bulwarks of righteousness.—Hindu.

THE most illustrious King, the Grand Being, who was born the exalted crown of the world, was moved by his vast compassion to endeavor to redeem all teachable beings, and lead them to the realm of happiness. The time having arrived for him to be born on earth as Buddha, he descended from the abode of angels. Then the earth trembled. A brilliant light shone among all worlds. The blind who desired to see saw. The deaf who desired to hear heard. The dumb recovered their speech. The cripples became straight. The prisoners were set free. The flames of hell were extinguished. All beings spoke kindly one to another. Flowers burst into bloom, and distilled the most delicious fragrance. And there was a mighty sound of music from the instruments of the angelic host.—Buddhist.

THE days were accomplished that Mary should be delivered. And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger. And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men.—Christian.

CURRENT TOPICS.

HOW MUCH we owe to the old pagan world for some of the pleasantest customs of these Christmas days! Not only are those of dispensing gifts and exchanging friendly congratulations borrowed from the Roman festivals of this season, but the habit of decorating with evergreen may also be traced to a Druidic origin. We wish our readers, all, "A merry Christmas!"

WE find the following in the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, which it cuts from an exchange: "The Supreme Court of Illinois, to which the case was appealed, has decided that the reading of the Bible in the public schools is a part of the instruction that must be observed like the rest of the regulations. In a township where the directors had ordered that fifteen minutes each morning should be devoted to reading the Bible, a Roman Catholic father ordered his son not to refrain from his other studies during that time, for which he was expelled from the school. The Supreme Court sustains the teacher for thus doing." We put the same question which the Statesman puts. Will some one of our Illinois readers who knows the facts of the case tell us if this is reported correctly?

"THE Relation of the Public Library to the Public Schools" is the title of an essay, now printed in pamphlet form, read at the meeting of the American Social Science Association last September, at Saratoga, by Mr. Samuel S. Green, Librarian of the Free Public Library of Worcester, Mass. It is a wise and suggestive essay based on facts of personal experience, and has a direct bearing on the problem of public education which is now eliciting so much thought and discussion. The purpose of the writer is to show how the Public Library may be used to help the teaching in the schools, and how the teachers may coöperate to help the scholars who are old enough to use the Library to a better selection of books than they are apt to make, if left wholly to themselves in making it.

HERE is an extract from the Pall Mall Gazette, which shows that Liberalism is not so wholly destructive in its work as some of its critics charge: "Sunday in France, instead of being universally given up to mere sensuous gratification or idleness, is devoted by vast numbers to some of the most laborious and philanthropic objects. Since the inauguration of the republic, a real apostolate of instruction may be said to have originated throughout the country; and le conférence populaire, or Sunday afternoon lecture, has become a regular thing in most of the large towns, though it has the strongest hold in Paris. This method of promoting intelligence was a part of the plan of popular education suggested by Condorcet, who realized that the time was at hand when Danton's famous formula would be thus changed on the lips of the true republican,—'De l'instruction, encore de l'instruction, toujours de l'instruction!'"

A NEW religious society has been organized at East Saginaw, Mich., where Mr. Rowland Connor has been speaking on Sundays the past three months, and has invited Mr. Connor to be its minister for one year. He has accepted the position. The platform of the society is a very broad one. The statement on which the organization is made is, "We whose names are hereto subscribed associate ourselves for the advancement of truth and justice and love"; and all persons are invited to membership "who desire to get good from us or to do good with us." The society, however, calls itself Unitarian. But, having adopted such a Free Religious basis, before its name is inserted in the denominational "Year Book," it will probably receive a catechism from the Boston head-quarters, asking it how it defines "Unitarian," and if it means also to call itself "Christian." We may add that the State Conference of Unitarians in Michigan has planted itself on substantially the same basis, and that Mr. Connor assented to the name of the society, which was adopted for local reasons, with the distinct understanding that he was outside of the National Conference, which has a very different platform.

THE Lowell Morning Times reprints with approval our recent paragraph on the need that the French government should find some way of suppressing the licentious literature now said to be so openly published and circulated in Paris. But the Times thinks to make a point against us by adding that "the people's morals are the result of the teachings of Christian truth, which that paper [the Index] seeks to undermine; that irreligion breeds immorality; and that the laws of Christianity, if properly obeyed, would promptly suppress immorality in all its forms, not only in France, but in our own land." But not so fast, good friend. We seek to undermine no truth of Christianity: we only antagonize the claim that Christianity is a special revelation which gives the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Nor do we seek to establish "irreligion," but rather a broader, more omnipresent religion; a religion free, unsectarian, and practically synonymous with reason, right, and love. Not only "the laws of Christianity," but the supremest moral principles of every great religion, "if properly obeyed, would promptly suppress immorality." It is commonly claimed by Christians that Christianity is the source, and has had in its keeping all the forces, of modern civilization. Yet it is in the domain of modern civilization that immorality most prevails. "Christian truth," which is claimed to have shaped the civilization, has not prevented nor "suppressed" the immorality. Suppose now we try truth, unlabelled by any sectarian name,—truth wherever found, which holds the law of both reason and righteousness; and let us call upon all good men and women everywhere, of whatever beliefs, to join forces in the work. This is what the Index is aiming at.

The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer.

A Reply to B. F. Underwood's Strictures on the Critique upon Spencer's Theory of Evolution published in "Modern Thinkers."

BY VAN BUREN DENSLOW, LL.D.

Mr. B. F. Underwood, in the Index of November 11 and 18, makes what professes to be a criticism of my critique in Modern Thinkers on Herbert Spencer's Theory of Evolution. I cannot find in Mr. Underwood's article the solid proofs of the assertion with which he peppers it throughout,—that I have done injustice to Herbert Spencer's theories,—though I find many evidences in Mr. Underwood's essay that I have grieved him in that form of mental bias which, without unkindness, might be designated as Spencer-worship. Other critics have made like grieved replies to my critiques on Swedenborg and Thomas Paine, but in each previous case they have unveiled their bias as men who had disqualified themselves for criticism by acts and professions of adoration. The only evidence I find of a like mental condition in Mr. Underwood is that his very just observations in behalf of the great and valuable philosophic work accomplished by Mr. Spencer, in which I fully sympathize, do not perform the function for which they seem to be adduced,—of proving my critique on Spencer to be either unjust or unkind. Mr. Underwood's proofs compare so ill with his charges as to leave him in the position of a prosecuting attorney, who in his opening speech declares the defendant to be a criminal, but whose witnesses merely testify that his toilet is not well made.

For instance, Mr. Underwood says: "Spencer's primary law of evolution is not, as Professor Denslow seems to think, change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, but the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion." Here we have what purports, according to Mr. Underwood, to be a fair and sufficient statement of that Law of Evolution whose validity forms the topic of criticism in the first half of my essay on Spencer. Now, whoever reads the following peppery complaints by Mr. Underwood will of course infer that in my definition of Spencer's theory of evolution the element of the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion is omitted. Mr. Underwood says:—

> No reader can obtain a correct general idea of Spencer's philosophy from the Professor's statement, in which he attempts to give it, "reduced to a nutshell." He has, however, the fairness to state that such an outline "must be imperfect, and may not escape being presumptuous." If the author had given the leading principles of Spencer's philosophy in the order of their importance, unobscured by the fancies of Fourier and the unrelated theories of others, meanwhile restraining his impatience to point out weaknesses until he had completed his outline, he might have given a summary which at least would not have misled the average reader or prejudiced him against an author who needs to be carefully read in order to be fully appreciated.

Bear in mind the half of my essay, which Mr. Underwood criticises, purports by its title to set forth only Mr. Spencer's "theory of evolution." This theory, Mr. Underwood thinks, is definable in a single line; namely, as the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion. By not so defining it, I have misled the average reader and prejudiced him against Spencer. By so defining it, I might have assuaged Underwood's grief and done Spencer full justice.

Now, these are the terms in which (Modern Thinkers, p. 212) the definition of Spencer's Law, of which Mr. Underwood so loudly complains, is expressed, namely:—

> Voluminous as have been Mr. Spencer's works in illustration of his system, they are all the mere application to the varied phenomena of cosmology (creation), biology (life), sociology (society), and psychology (mind) of the one supposed principle or law, that all the phenomena of the universe consist of an evolution, both in matter and in force, from the simpler forms and modes of action to the more complex, or from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous; which evolution is brought about through an ever-increasing differentiation of the parts or organs and specialization of functions, which differentiation and specialization are invited and compelled by the attractions of the environment, i.e., by the conditions which surround the organism or mode of action in question, and which constantly tend, by adapting the organism or mode of action to its environment, to educe higher and more diverse capabilities of action, and by perpetually widening and complicating the environment to develop or evolve a higher and more complex organism. This evolution is accompanied by a dissipation of motion and integration of matter, which continues until the organism or mode of action has parted with its excess of motive power. Then the environment reacts on the organism, overcomes the equilibrium previously existing between its capacity for motion and the demands thereon, and inflicts upon its parts such excess of motion as causes disintegration and dissolution. The entire operation is deduced from the persistence of force.

The whole of Underwood's definition of Spencer's Theory of Evolution—namely, that it involves a dissipation of motion and integration of matter—is contained in mine, along with so many other elements which are not contained in Underwood's as to show that, in the total definition as given by me, the total definition as given by Underwood is a mere spoke to the wheel, a mere tail to the fish. His definition sustains the same relation to mine as a subordinate part always must to the comprehensive whole.

Truly, if Mr. Underwood seeks to exhibit "some" of my fallacies, "and on the other hand to state some of Spencer's leading positions and principles," he must do better than to make "Spencer's leading positions" to be mere spokes in the comprehensive wheel of my fallacies. Spencer's "great principles" should not be so defined as to narrow down into the mere tail and fins for Mr. Denslow's fish; for there are fishes so electric that the critics who handle them once never survive the critical act.

Mr. Underwood says again, "How the integration of a number of diverse elements into one structure diminishes the weight of Spencer's claims, it is not easy to see." It would appear from this criticism that Mr. Underwood is in pursuit of something easy. Bringing out in logical completeness the syllogism on which his criticism rests, it reads thus:—

All objections to Spencer's version of the Theory of Evolution, to be philosophical, must be easy of apprehension.

Denslow's objection is not easy of apprehension. Therefore, it is not philosophical.

Mr. Underwood has not done us the justice to state what fact or point in our objection he does not apprehend. There may be some difficulty in making it more elementary than has been done in Modern Thinkers, but I will try. Suppose a philosopher should arise, who should assert that the efflux of the sun's light is the cause of all law, life, motion, growth, knowledge, and progress. Since, with reference to the question of light, only two conditions are predicable,—namely, a state of light and a state of darkness,—and all other conditions would be modifications of these two, any critic who should point out forms of law, life, motion, growth, knowledge, and progress, which were the result of the absence of the sun's light, would present not only a just but an easy objection to the previous statement.

With reference to knowledge, for instance, says the philosopher, "The presence of the sun's light reveals to us in detail all that we know of this world." "But," replies the critic, "the absence of the sun's light reveals to the human mind all that we know of other suns and worlds. Numerically, darkness reveals a thousand times as many worlds as light." We all recognize the criticism as just. The conflict between philosopher and critic is only the personified intellectual expression of a rhythmic succession of antagonistic properties or forces, both equally instructive and beneficent, which prevail everywhere in nature.

Goldziher and other students of comparative mythology hold that religions have divided on these forces, the earlier worshipping the gods of the night, the later and present those of the day.

Again, if a prophet arises who declares that all duty centres in love of others, as the supreme motive in character; if a critic follows, who points out that self-love is a far more essential and dominant force in promoting progress and true virtue than the love of others, and it is conceded that all love must be either ego-ist or altro-ist,—then the critic has made a just criticism, and, so far as the system of the prophet assumed to be comprehensive of all duty, the critic has dealt a destructive and fatal blow at the system of the prophet.

So if a botanist should assert that all vegetable growth points upward, resisting gravitation, and a critic should object that only stems point upward while roots strike downward in the line with gravitation, or if an ethnologist should say that all civilization was of white origin, while another should point to Hannibal, Euclid, the Egyptians, and the first Buddha, the points would be well made.

The principle that all motion is offset by rhythmic counter-motion, and hence that the highest and most permanent of all stabilities in the universe grows out of the successive and alternate occurrence of antagonistic instabilities, such as are exemplified in planetary, cometary, nebular, and stellar motion, is so clearly traced by Herbert Spencer as a law of physics, and so easily apprehended by Mr. Underwood in its physical aspects, that it seems remarkable that a rigid application of the same principle in the domain of thought should be deemed unjust to Spencer or difficult by Underwood. Yet, when applied to thought, it requires that the philosophical system of Herbert Spencer, like that of Thales or of Hegel, shall take its place simply as one of many "antagonistic instabilities," now temporarily revolving through the void of human speculation in aphelionic proximity to the warm sun of popular regard.

Now, let us see whether there is anything in my critique of Spencer's central and pivotal thought which should be otherwise than "easy to see," to a critic of Mr. Underwood's ready apprehension. I say (Modern Thinkers, p. 221):—

> Undoubtedly, Mr. Spencer has seized upon and eloquently elaborated one of the most comprehensive and brilliant generalizations of which the phenomena of physical, social, and intellectual science are capable. But, if it shall appear that each instance he adduces as an illustration of differentiation of the simple into the complex also illustrates a unification of previously differentiated and diverse elements into one simple and homogeneous entity or substance, is it quite clear that we have made any advance in our knowledge of the principles of universal science? Evidently, with reference to the one quality of homogeneity and heterogeneity, there can be but two changes possible. The first is the change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. Of this Mr. Spencer makes all action save dissolution to consist. The second is the change from the heterogeneous to the homogeneous, or the involving of previously differentiated and separate elements in the formation of some new and simple and homogeneous entity, which, if it occurs, should be called involution. It is the opposite of evolution, as evaporation is the opposite of precipitation. It antagonizes evolution as a mode of action in a more complete sense than does the dissolution which Mr. Spencer recognizes, because it is simultaneous in its action with evolution, instead of being successive and subsequent.

I then take several of the phenomena, such as germination in seeds, the organization of armies, the development of music, etc., which Mr. Spencer seizes upon to illustrate his law of change (in form and structure) from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, and I show that he might just as truthfully have used them to illustrate a law of exactly the opposite character; namely, a change (in substance and utilities) from the heterogeneous to the homogeneous. And, as these two changes are the only changes possible with reference to the single quality of heterogeneity and homogeneity, therefore Mr. Spencer's supposed law is not a law at all, but merely a classification of change, in terms which on their face leave only two aspects possible, in such a manner as to recognize one of these aspects and ignore the other. My criticism is either true or erroneous. It is quite immaterial whether it is easy or difficult. If true, it reduces the supposed law of evolution, as stated by Spencer, into a half-truth, a law of flux offset by another law of reflux, a one-sided statement whose contradiction is as pregnant with wisdom as itself. It is something far better than a trick of words, but yet something far short of a universal law.

Now, let us see whether my illustrations sustain my point. I say (Modern Thinkers, p. 222):—

> Take the more prominent of Mr. Spencer's illustrations. For instance, the bean seed, germinating, first throws upward into the air the two halves of the germinated bean in the form of temporary leaves, while the roots sustain it in the ground. Then it still further differentiates into vine, leaf, blossom, and ultimately the new fruit. There is a differentiation of the homogeneous into the heterogeneous, as to outward form. But why should Mr. Spencer's cognition of the phenomenon not extend to the simultaneous coition of the previously heterogeneous elements, speaking in agricultural phrase, of soil, moisture, sunlight, and warmth, or, speaking in chemical phrase, of nitrogen, carbon, water, light, and heat, to produce the homogeneous entity called a bean plant. Are not the three elements of soil, sunlight, and the carbonic acid gas as it exists in the atmosphere sufficiently heterogeneous? And does not a bean plant, when considered as a living individual in nature, possess a sufficient homogeneity in its substance, so that, when the former are united to form the latter, there is a blending of the heterogeneous into the homogeneous? . . . It is true the two changes do not relate to the same qualities. While Mr. Spencer is depicting a change in form from the simple to the complex, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, he is ignoring an equally striking change in mechanical substance,—from the heterogeneous to the homogeneous, and the production, out of marvellously unlike elements, of a new individual, which is certainly as unique in structure and function, as single as an organism, as it is diversified in form and details. The continued involution of heterogeneous substances into one new and at least mechanically homogeneous substance seems essential to the evolution of that substance from its homogeneous form when a seed into its heterogeneous form when a plant.

After applying the same process of elucidation to certain other illustrations used by Spencer,—e.g., an army, an opera, sects, occupations, etc.,—the critique continues as follows: "Now, we imagine that if Mr. Spencer had begun by saying that he had discovered a philosophic clue to all phenomena, and had announced it to be that all progress consists either in change from the more simple to the more complex, or in the reverse, or in both concurrently, it would hardly have been necessary for him to add 'or in neither of them,' to provoke a broad smile. We should have looked upon Mr. Spencer as the prince of humorists. . . . So probably had Mr. Spencer laid down, as his fundamental postulate, that all progress consists of the two concurrent processes,—of the involution of the heterogeneous into the homogeneous, and the evolution of the homogeneous into the heterogeneous,—and that every phenomenon which illustrates the one in form illustrates the other in substance, it is possible that his disciples would have begged to know what other modes of change than these two could by any possibility be predicated relative to the one attribute of heterogeneity." To this line of argument, Mr. Underwood makes this reply:—

That in the growth of the bean plant diverse elements are united in one structure is very evident; but the correctness of characterizing as a "homogeneous entity" a complex production, in which several elements united in different proportions have produced all the variety afforded by the root, vine, leaf, blossom, and fruit of a bean plant, is by no means apparent. On the contrary, a bean plant is, in substance as well as in form and activity, a very heterogeneous structure. The chemical differentiations produced in plants generally by rearrangements of the chemical elements and by modification of tissues and organs are well described by Spencer.

Yes! Spencer never tires of describing them for the purpose of pointing out one-half of the phenomenon,—namely, the change in form and structure from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous,—but never for the purpose of calling attention to the simultaneous concurrence of the heterogeneous elements which form the diet of the plant to produce the homogeneous plant itself, or to show that diversity of diet advances pari passu with structural diversity. While different portions of the bean plant have certain elements of unlikeness to each other, yet they have all an element of homogeneity. Stalk, root, flower, leaf, and fruit are all "bean plant," parts of one complete individuality, just as governor, magistrates, and people are all parts of one homogeneity of the State. The various parts of the human frame have a minor heterogeneity of structure and function, but they all have homogeneity in the fact that they are all alike "man;" as chop, liver, and bacon are all alike pork; or corolla, stamens, pistil, and calyx are all alike flower. This element of homogeneity they do not share in common with a rat-trap or a star, nor in any higher degree with the various forms of diet and sources of nutriment which are brought together by the processes of the animal economy to compose them.

Whatever obscurity there is in presenting either Spencer's theory or its antagonistic theory arises from the lack of philosophical accuracy inseparable from the two terms homogeneous and heterogeneous, from the fact that neither term indicates in what aspect the likeness or unlikeness is looked for. The Empress Josephine and a female elephant are "homogeneous,"—i.e., alike in kind,—if only the quality of sex is considered. A star at night and a fire-fly are homogeneous, if only the quality of luminosity is regarded. The dew and the ocean are homogeneous in the single element of liquidity. Some wag has found homogeneity between a certain order of moralists and a guide-board, in that both always point out the way, but never travel it. Terms so vague as "alike in kind" or "unlike in kind," without specifying the quality to which the likeness or unlikeness has reference, can have no philosophic accuracy and must therefore be scrutinized with the greatest care, or they will prove mere "will-o'-the-wisps."

Mr. Underwood thinks it an inconsistency that, while offering this criticism upon Spencer's formulation of the Theory of Evolution, I should in the article on Haeckel have regarded the latter as having demonstrated the doctrine of evolution. The two views do not antagonize in my own mind. Haeckel's work is confined, in its philosophic aspects, to the elucidation of the doctrine or fact that no scientific evidences exist of the necessity of any but non-purposive causes in the work of creation, including the evolution of life from matter, and of a great multiplicity of species from certain limited and spontaneously produced forms. He does not so formulate the process in words as to ignore involution while magnifying evolution, or as to present us with a flux which has not its rhythmic reflux. He does not provide for a continual passage from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous without showing how the heterogeneous gets back into the homogeneous. He does not lay down a formula which derives all life from the egg, without balancing it with another formula which causes all life to posit its potentialities in the egg. Haeckel is content to prove that supernatural causes are unnecessary in nature. Spencer aspires to prove that in the processes of nature there is a perpetual ascendency of diverging forces over converging forces, of centrifugalism over centripetalism, of differentiation over unitization, of heterogenesis over homogenesis. Mr. Underwood may believe with Mr. Spencer in this particular. Modern Thinkers simply calls attention to the fact that, if this be so, then, instead of the world being governed by a vibratory equilibrium between antagonistic forces, it is despotized over by a single force; namely, the law of change from the simple to the complex.

It is in the interest of this law that Mr. Spencer lays so much more stress upon the fact that each cause produces more than one effect, than upon the equally evident fact that no effect is produced without the convergence of more than one cause.

This has the unphilosophic effect of destroying the principle that all nature is governed by antagonistic forces, contending against each other in a rhythmic succession of temporary instabilities, whose aggregate vibrations or pulsations, during long periods, have the effect of producing permanent stability. The most important result, and I regard it as a most defective one, is that, when Mr. Spencer comes to treat in his Data of Ethics of the laws of human conduct, he falls into the old theological division of human conduct into "right" and "wrong," which logically ultimates in a division of mankind into saints and sinners, and of destinies into heaven and hell after some pattern. This is just as unphilosophical as it would be to describe a planet in its aphelion as righteous and in its perihelion as sinful, or as it was in Jesus to pronounce a tree that bore leaves as accursed because it did not bear figs.

As Mr. Underwood does not carry the discussion forward to Spencer's ethics, I will only say that the same philosophic error which is involved in Spencer's adulation of the forces which tend toward heterogeneity over those which tend toward homogeneity and unity is extended in his Data of Ethics into an equally misleading exaltation of the altruistic and dispersive in human character over the egoistic and concentrative. In this respect, his ethics are essentially religious and not philosophical.

GARIBALDI, as a mere politician, the London Times says, is nothing. His mind is full of vague, impracticable fancies, picked up at the feet of the wildest social theorists, and tossed about in a brain far too active for the patient solution of social and political problems. He is at the mercy of schemers and plotters, who trade on his vast influence for their own personal ends; and, if he were listened to seriously, he might soon throw away in council all that he has gained by the sword. But as a man of action he has more than once shown himself irresistible. His is the faith which overcomes obstacles by sheer force of will, coupled with singleness of purpose and with that strange magnetic influence over men which has shown itself so potent in all his enterprises.

FROM ENGLAND.

(Concluded from last week.)

When Mr. Gladstone lost his election at Oxford University, and turned to Lancashire, he declared at Manchester that he was "unmuzzled" by Oxford's rejection. It was true, though other muzzles remained, which disable the statesman in any matter touching royalty or religion. Mr. Brooke has endured the orthodox muzzle a long time; and he has the reward of inability now to free his faith, even though he free his lips. The English Church has many men in places of rank and revenue, who would have before now escaped into entire freedom, if no pains and penalties had threatened to follow. It is too much to say that their characters suffer; but it is not too much to say that their vision of holy truth suffers, and that far more than would otherwise be the case they see through a glass darkly. Their efforts to keep the false eyeglass in its place, and to see through words and phrases and conceptions which, they know well, can only distort and dim the truth, by way of a make-believe conformity to established and endowed and acceptable half-truth or error, are efforts which carry injury with them, however little they may bring dishonor,—injury to the spiritual eye and to knowledge of truth, if not injury to conscience and character.

It is for this reason almost a special providence that an apostle of atheism, reputed vulgar and disreputable, has successfully challenged the attention of the nation and the Church, and occasioned, not only in Parliament, but in a great Congress of the Church, an outspoken acknowledgment and protest, on behalf of a sect whose negation of the common faith still leaves them, in the bonds that are deepest, men and brethren.

The student of the genuine mind of Christ need not for a moment deny to agnostic, secularist, or atheist, the name and character of Christian. The whole matter turns on character, however it may be completed by confession; and the rule of the real mind of Christ was that character answers in place of confession, and that a divine secularism, or doing daily good among men, is a sufficient divinity to begin with, and the only divinity that we need be anxious to achieve. The moral virtues alone were the subjects of Christ's beatitudes; and only the moral commandments, without the theological and Sabbatical, did he lay down as essential to living divinely, the rule even for going on to perfection being not to get religion, but to spend all and be wholly spent in doing good. It was always the view of Christ that religion would come without our pains, if we duly kept the path of daily duty; and he would at once assume that a secularism humanly wise and faithful was the best beginning for coming afterward to the knowledge of God. An agnosticism which aimed to save the mind from gnostic conceit and dogmatism, and to hold the seeker for truth back to practical duty, would exactly meet his constant view. The atheism even which turned on getting rid of the false divinity of theological and ecclesiastical pretension, Christ would accept as a necessary clearing of the soil for the future growth of pure and undefiled religion, of which the part likeliest to fail, and of chief importance to be looked after, and the only foundation for a true knowledge of God, is just that morality and secular care for right which common religionists postpone to erring piety, and make difficult by injurious superstition.

The natural human mind and the free English mind, as I read human nature and English history, do not accept any sort of gnostic divinity, or pretension to really know God, but rather lay first and chief stress on character and action, and leave opinion of God and the future as practically secondary, as inevitably opinion only, however clearly and strongly held, and as most likely to come to perfection when perfectly free, not only as to variations, but as to refusal and denial. If ever atheism shall fade out, it will be when not only theism is just and rational, but when theists allow the full liberty of refusal and denial, and are content to be strenuous first and chiefly for the moral and humane side of life. As I more and more read the history of our own religion, in the light of the new learning, I see in Christ a thoroughly radical reformer, who took non-gnostic, humane, and free ground, antagonistic so absolutely to church and creed of his day that even his most zealous disciples did not know what to make of it, and took occasion by his death to put their own bushel over it, and to give out views contrary to his views, the flagrant wrong of which they thought he at least, so little did they know him, could not complain of, because the change raised him from a simple human teacher of love and trust to a "Lord Jesus Christ" of supernatural rank, authority, and nature, such as all Jewish and all heathen popular opinion would assume a master of divine things ought to be. I do not, however, think that religion can be widely and deeply alive without a profound opinion and conscience toward God and immortality. As a rule, the courage and confidence to pursue divine and eternal things will sooner or later come to healthy purity and power of mind; and those to whom such thought of God and such eternal hope come will be the prophets of human elevation, whether secular or spiritual.

At present, by far the worst atheists march under the flag of religion, with bishops and theological doctors for their captains. The Archbishop of Canterbury, whose salary the Index puts at $20,000, gets in fact $75,000 a year, as a bribe to preach up doctrines which he does not honestly believe, and to preach down "Theism," "Deism," "Secularism," "Agnosticism," and "Atheism," all of which are in some chief respect nearer the mind of Christ than the half-Jewish, half-heathen Gnosticism which Paul and his rivals in devised apostleship set on foot, which the Latin African Fathers built up into a great system of hardly mitigated heathenism, and which Luther, a crude barbarian in his fear of God and his ill thoughts of man and the world, had not pretended to reform when Henry VIII. and Elizabeth got the pope out of England, as Luther had got him out of Germany, without at all getting rid of, but rather keeping, in their darkest form, the Latin-African reading of Paul's theological contradictions of the mind of Christ. It is a curious fact that, as Protestantism borrowed the worst side of Catholic theology, so has English and Scotch dissent borrowed the worst side of Anglican theology, and gone off into abysses of vulgar superstition which only the lowest of the churchmen are found in. If half of England is more or less indifferent or hostile to religion, it is because a brutal superstition teaches devilism for divinity, and in large part teaches it more as make-believe than as honest belief. The three-headed, brimstone-breathing god of Augustinian, Calvinistic theology has been enough to make faith offensive; and not everybody has yet come to understand that an honest and a pure Christianity knows nothing of this monster. Both church and dissent are more at fault than Mr. Bradlaugh and his followers; and, when religion becomes rational and respectable, there will be some chance of an end to atheism, either disreputable or reputable. It would become so very fast, if faith were free and education were both free and adequate. Down to the present time, barbarism has still a wide hold on the common mind of England, and the better mind is bribed not to overthrow a barbarous creed. But the hour of reformation, not to say revolution, comes on apace; and no man can tell what to-morrow may not bring forth.

A REASON FOR NOT CO-OPERATING WITH LIBERALS.

With the decay of the Christian faith, will not the present moral code be necessarily changed? Who is prepared to say how much of our moral system has no religious basis? Who knows how much the idea of religious responsibility has determined the feeling of duty between man and man? Why is it that those who repudiate the moral law in theory are the same men and women who are found opposing Christianity? Has this fact no meaning worth considering? It is singular, on the theory that morality is wholly independent of religious belief, that all movements aiming at the overthrow of existing morality are led by avowed infidels. How does it happen that those destructive movements known as Nihilism, Socialism, and Communism are sustained by infidels alone? These are significant facts to me; and, if I were ten times more radical than I am, I should be forced to regard infidelity with suspicion. How can I co-operate with a party that has shown such heresy on the questions of practical morality as the so-called Liberals have done? Because I may disbelieve the Christian theology, that is no reason why I should affiliate with a party that is largely opposed to what I consider the moral foundations of society. The affirmative convictions which I hold in common with Christians, on the subject of practical righteousness, are a much stronger bond of union than the negative convictions which I share with infidels.

I think it is a question which every liberal-minded person should study now, whether, in the light of present events, what is known as Liberalism should be treated as a friend or an enemy to society. That question is in my mind and has been for some time; and, until it is decided, I cannot do otherwise than stand outside of the liberal movement. I am thoroughly tired of and disgusted with the destructive spirit of Liberalism, and until it shows more genius for constructive work I shall regard it with little sympathy. I have been trying for several years to find out what Liberalism means to do, and I am still in the dark. Is any one else in a similar condition?

ANOTHER TRIBUTE TO KARL HEINZEN.

Allow me to pay a few words of tribute to the memory of that noblest German, Karl Heinzen, who has quitted our earthly habitation, and whose bodily remains have found an everlasting rest at the beautiful cemetery at Forest Hills.

His intense love of liberty and justice made him an exile from his own country more than thirty years ago. He found shelter, a glad welcome, and arduous work on the hospitable shores of our republic. He showed his thankfulness by true and untiring devotion to her internal prosperity; and, though he did not write in the language of his adopted country, he was a better, a truer citizen of this republic than is to be found prominent in either political party of to-day. In fact, he was too true, too honest, too upright a man to become famous and renowned while living. He was unpopular, because he had not a conservative vein within his whole being. But if a man is to be judged by what he aims and strives at rather than by his immediate success, then surely there was no greater man than Karl Heinzen. He was in fact a pioneer in every department of human improvement. The greatness and universality of his character, his iron will, his unapproachable radicalism, his scrupulous honesty, made him unpopular with politicians and with the masses, who are influenced more readily by suavity, cunning, trickery, and nice phrases than by open criticism, by clearness of diction, by avowed principle, and by honest and upright dealing. Mr. Heinzen was not a man of compromise. Clear, logical, precise, and concise in his thoughts and utterances, he would not swerve an inch from the position he had once taken. There was no yielding in his nature, no bending to circumstances: he would stand upright, defend and fight for his conviction until the last; he would not surrender the stronghold of truth and veracity, but sooner perish than make one concession to his enemy. Tyranny and despotism he fought incessantly in whatever form or shape they appeared. He pursued them with a vehemence and an ardor which caused him to be feared by those who had chosen a crooked path. If strong and intense in his hatred toward wrong, he was equally strong and intense in his love for truth, right, and justice. His long life was an earnest, conscientious devotion to principles which are the groundwork of a better and purer humanity.

He was an idealist, one of the purest kind, always forgetting self in the contemplation of the ideal object he had in view. Unlike the youth—in Schiller's beautiful and significant poem, "The Veiled Picture at Sais"—who shuddered and swooned when at last the veil was withdrawn from the mysterious picture and truth stood before him in all her majesty, unveiled mystery and splendor, Karl Heinzen did not shrink back before the glaring vision: he faced the truth, he bowed to her, he embraced her, and did his utmost to establish her reign upon earth. He was gigantic in figure, gigantic in character, gigantic in thought, a genuine Teuton, a descendant of those German knights whose courage and bravery could never be daunted. But his knighthood was of a nobler mould: he fought for principles, for the sacred rights of humanity, for the establishment of order and peace among men. "Let Nature send a Hero-soul," says Carlyle, "in no age is it other than possible that he may be shaped into a poet." Karl Heinzen was a poet. He had tasted the essence of life, he had felt the inwardness of being. His poems are deep, true, and powerful, like the man. Like every true, manly man, he loved and reverenced woman, and of him it is true what Tacitus tells us about the Germanii, he felt and recognized the divinity in woman's nature. His appreciation of woman's finer organization did not blind his sense of justice. He supported and advocated woman's claim to equal justice and independence for thirty years in his books, his pamphlets, his speeches, and in his weekly paper. Several of his pamphlets are translated into English. His Six Letters addressed to a pious man are clear and convincing.

He did not believe in a hereafter. He found no time for thankless, fruitless speculation; but, when sickness came and prevented him from farther work, his only desire was to die, to rest forever. He had done his work wholly and fully: he was not afraid of what would come; nay, he had a firm faith that his disciples would finish the work which he had begun. And so they will. The political organization which he has called into life will prosper: its members will complete the war for political reform and regeneration which he has so nobly and ably devised. The Lessons of a Century, a pamphlet of Karl Heinzen, translated from the German by a friend of the author, sets forth the political dangers, which are now upon us. The corrupting influence of the great power of our Presidents, and other institutional errors in our government, are clearly and forcibly put forth, and their remedies given. No unselfish, thoughtful reader, no clear-headed thinker, no close observer of facts, will fail to see the truth and strength of Mr. Heinzen's argument. Though the American people are slow, very slow indeed to see the dangers which beset the future of our republic, the time will come when they must see it, when they must withdraw their attention from mere money-making, and study The Lessons of a Century. In the mean time, the little band of German radicals will spare no pains, no sacrifice, to realize the reforms of their beloved originator. They will pay true homage and gratitude to him, and to their adopted country, in realizing the ideas which moved his heart and soul. They can honor his memory only by showing the same devotion, the same unselfishness, the same love which he so cheerfully and ardently bestowed upon the work of political regeneration. Though Karl Heinzen has gone from us, let his spirit be ever in the midst of us.

BOOK NOTICES.

Note.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the Free Religious Index, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

1. A Fool's Errand. By One of the Fools. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert. 1880. pp. 361.
2. The same, reprinted, with the addition of Part II. The Invisible Empire: a concise review of the epoch upon which the tale is based. By Albion W. Tourgee, late Judge of the Superior Court of North Carolina. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert. 1880. pp. 521.
3. Bricks without Straw. 1880. pp. 521. Same author and publishers.

In our judgment, Judge Tourgee, by the publication of these three books, has done a work not less important to the future welfare of the United States than that done by General Grant in the suppression of the Southern Rebellion. We say this deliberately, yet confidently; though the victory by arms had immediate and conspicuous operation, while the course of effective reconstruction, by the method indicated in these books, will require decades of years, perhaps many of them, for its accomplishment. Nevertheless, it is unquestionable that the only course of national policy adequate for the removal of the evils that caused the Rebellion has been distinctly formulated by this author, and set forth in a manner so attractive and convincing as to compel the attention of hundreds of thousands, North and South, to the theory in question, and the facts upon which it rests. Many individuals, no doubt, have clearly seen the same truths; but no one before Judge Tourgee has so published and disseminated them as to show to large masses of men the necessity of a new national policy, and to supply the clearness and depth of conviction needed for its inauguration. We have now to see whether Republicans, so negligent of their duties to the nation and the freedmen in the past, will now use their present political ascendency to begin this work, or whether a new party must be formed to apply itself to this chief duty of the present generation.

The first of the books above named, A Fool's Errand, is, in substance, the record of an attempt, by a man with Northern ideas and convictions, to establish his family in the South, after the war, with the hope of helping toward and enjoying the benefits of an improved state of society there. He expected that such improvement would naturally and inevitably follow the abolition of slavery and the enfranchisement of the freedmen; and he frankly calls himself "One of the Fools" for so doing, because intelligent recognition of what Southern society is, and of the causes which have been moulding it for a century past, should have shown him that such fraternization of South with North at that time was not reasonably to be expected.

The object of the book is to show precisely what those influences are which have wrought, during the last half-century, to produce the characteristics which we all recognize as belonging to Southern gentlemen,—to that class of Southern gentlemen which still rules the South, and which formerly ruled the whole country; an oligarchy dictating the policy of a nominal republic. These influences are described by Judge Tourgee with great clearness and great force, yet with wonderful moderation of language, and even a systematic understatement of his case. He depends for producing conviction, not upon isolated facts of special enormity, but upon known and unmistakable features of Southern life, social, political, and religious. And he gives the key to our present difficulties in the fact, hitherto understood by very few people at the North, that when, after the war, many of the Southern leaders and people agreed to "accept the situation," they understood and meant by that phrase something entirely different from what was understood and meant by the Northern leaders and people. For an explanation, which our author makes clear as daylight, of how the South was perfectly honest in holding such a position, our readers must consult the book itself.

"The Invisible Empire," forming Part II. of the second book above named, is a documentary corroboration of the reality of the acts of illegal violence described in Part I. as committed by upholders of the Southern idea against the colored people, and against those whites, native or Northern, who gave them sympathy or aid. It will be remembered by readers of Uncle Tom's Cabin that, when certain organs of Southern feeling pronounced that work false and libellous, Mrs. Stowe published a "Key" to it, showing from authentic historical documents, including much testimony from slave-holders themselves, that she had ample authority for everything there stated. In like manner, Judge Tourgee has here fortified himself by quotation of a small number of the milder cases of violence from the Report of the Joint Congressional Committee on the Ku Klux Conspiracy, an inquiry embracing thirteen closely printed octavo volumes, and chiefly concerned with events transpiring in the four years previous to 1872. Here is ample reference to names, dates, volume, and page of the work above named, besides letters of public functionaries from other sources, and extracts from well-known Southern newspapers, sufficient to prove the author's case in any court of justice.

The third book above mentioned, Bricks without Straw, is prefaced by a witty parable purporting to be translated from a recently discovered Egyptian papyrus-roll. In this, the king's jester is represented to have laughed when Pharaoh gave the well-known order that the Hebrew slaves should deliver the accustomed tale of bricks after their supply of straw was stopped. The angry king demanded a reason for this laughter; and the jester explained that such an order would work damage to the king himself, since the structures to be built of those bricks could not be firm or enduring. In like manner, the author forcibly shows a national reconstruction, to be permanent and beneficial, imperatively requires mutual understanding, and coöperation, at once intelligent and friendly, between the two parties concerned in effecting it. If North and South work at cross-purposes, even honest intention on the part of both will not accomplish a good result; but our author further shows that the two classes now engaged in our great governmental experiment are actually working at cross-purposes, desiring and seeking ends not only different from, but opposite to each other. He makes it clear that our troubles must continue as long as this opposition of aim and effort continues; and he designates the one only course of administrative policy which will suffice, if faithfully and perseveringly tried, to remedy the evil.

No fairer or more truly sympathetic interpreter of Southern feeling than Judge Tourgee could be desired by any Southron who has learned respect for the rights of human beings, and who desires that the law should recognize and impartially enforce them. Of course, those who wish to perpetuate the old rule of caste, and to hold colored men and women as permanently subordinate to the white race, will censure the books we have been noticing, and will complain of some of their statements. A writer in Appletons' Journal for December has already done this, taking up for criticism the declaration that such outrages as the Ku Klux perpetrated would have been tolerated "in no other nation and no other state of society." The expression is certainly extravagant; and Mr. C. H. Jones proves it so, by citing in reply the persecution of Prudence Crandall in 1834, for teaching a colored school in Canterbury, Connecticut. It must be conceded that, in the course of these three volumes, their author has used one expression too sweeping in extent. In mitigation of damages, it may be said that such acts as those of the Canterbury people were rare and exceptional in the North; that all the Northern outrages of that sort were due to fraternization with slaveholders in support of slavery; that even in Connecticut Miss Crandall was not stripped and flogged; and that, in a country calling itself civilized and Christian, numerous and atrocious outrages in all the Confederate States, continued all the years between 1868 and 1878, can get little palliation from the existence of a milder case of Northern violence in 1834.

The large sale which all these books have attained is not to be wondered at, since their interest is fully commensurate with their value. C. K. W.

India. By Fannie Roper Feudge. With one hundred illustrations. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

The plan of the series of volumes to which this belongs is a very excellent one. It is to furnish uniform entertaining histories for young people of those countries which, though of great interest, receive but little full or systematic attention in the ordinary line of such studies. The editorial charge of the work is intrusted to Arthur Gilman, which may be regarded a fitting guarantee it will be well performed. Of this series, Egypt and India have already been published. The present volume is devoted to India. From time immemorial, this far-distant land of the Orient has been associated with wonder and romance. Its fathomless and mystic antiquity, imposing and diversified natural aspect, marvellous architecture and art, the far-famed, glowing tales of the splendors of its luxury and wealth of tradition and fable, the striking and picturesque character of the life of its swarming population, the immobility of its civil customs and society, and correspondent well-nigh immobility of its religion, with their direct connection with the most advanced civilizations and tongues of modern time, impart to it a profound and fascinating interest. The present compendium crowds a great deal of information into a comparatively small compass. Perhaps this may be considered as carried almost too far for the class of readers for whom it is intended. But the objection will be raised only by those who prefer entertainment to instruction, in neither of which, however, it will be found wanting. It contains a description of the natural characteristics of India, its political divisions, government, and social customs, an outline of its history, some account of its literature and religion, the Christian missions upon its soil, and a summary view of the present condition and prospects of the country. Like all the books of D. Lothrop & Co., it is elegantly and artistically published, printed in clear type on fine smooth-surfaced paper, with numerous and attractive illustrations.

Motherhood. A Poem. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1881.

The titles of some of the chapters of this poem, as "The Hail Mary," "The Prophecy," and the stanzas on the Madonnas, remind one of the crowning glory of the Catholic Church, the worship of the Madonna; but this volume contains no supernatural dogma or false sentimentalism. The poems are breathings out of a mother's heart full of joy and pride in the glory and blessing of her new relation. They are simple, fresh, and sweet, full of tender reverence, and with touches of playfulness and fancy. They tend to awaken a deep and holy feeling for motherhood, and this is a lesson everywhere needed.

The volume is prettily illustrated and bound in holiday style, and would be an appropriate Christmas gift to any young mother. E. D. C.

Eyes Right. A Bachelor's Talk with his Boys. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

We have here another of D. Lothrop & Co.'s beautiful holiday juveniles. It is not only beautiful inside and out, from cover to cover, but full of instruction concerning simple, every-day things, conveyed in an ingenious and delightful way. Eyes Right is the chosen title for lessons in the elements of science. The "Bachelor's Talks" embrace conversations about the magnet, electricity, fire, snow, stones, light, plants, animals, the moon, etc., and are well calculated to enlist and hold the attention. It is intended for quite young minds, and, though published by a house whose books tend to have an orthodox cast, is not in the present instance damaged by theology of any sort.

What Darwin saw in his Voyage round the World in the Ship "Beagle." New York: Harper & Brothers.

This book, as we happen to know, was not so much made as it was developed by the necessities of a household where children were growing up with active and inquiring minds. It seemed best to the father that his children should go to head-quarters for their knowledge of natural history and related topics; and so, with the consent of Mr. Darwin, he made a volume of excerpts from the Voyage of the Ship Beagle, a book which many find the most interesting that Mr. Darwin has yet written. Since its completion, he has warmly approved of the execution of the present work. And well he may; for the work which love inspired and wisdom guided has been admirably done. The material is classified, and the contents of the book are such that the older members of a family will find it equally profitable for themselves and for the younger members of the household. Indeed, some portions of the book are beyond the comprehension of children of average intelligence. We cannot recommend this book too warmly to those in search of books for their children that shall at the same time interest and instruct, especially when so many books are written that deliberately misrepresent the facts of natural history and the relations of natural phenomena, which are vastly more wonderful than any lies that Jules Verne and his imitators can tell us. The book abounds in excellent illustrations; and a superb wood-cut portrait of Mr. Darwin shows a face which compares very favorably with Thomas Carlyle's, to say the least. The comparison is justified by Carlyle's contemptible slur on Mr. Darwin's personal appearance.

The Story of the United States Navy for Boys. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1881.

We have not forgotten the enjoyment which we ourselves had in Mr. Lossing's records of patriotism and heroism when we were boys and one does not have to go far into the present volume to find out that his pen has lost nothing of its former cunning. His present work is, however, too much condensed to show him at his best. Mr. Lossing has evidently spared no pains to make his book correct in every particular. It has been submitted to the navy department at Washington, and cordially approved. Beginning with the issue of the first commission by the Continental Congress, to Captain Broughton of Marblehead, Sept. 2, 1775, the story is continued to the most recent times; and there are supplementary chapters upon naval training, engines of destruction, and so on. "There is a great deal more pleasure," says Mr. Lossing, "in telling the story of the peaceful and beneficent labors of our navy than in relating its dealing with the enemies of our country"; but Mr. Lossing's literary career is an amusing commentary on this assertion. He has certainly written a book which every boy enlisting in the American navy ought to have in his chest, and which other boys can read without any harm and no little enjoyment.

Juliet Corson has charge of a cooking school in New York city, in a house which has been taken by an association of women for the purpose of training young girls in all branches of domestic service. They are to remain in the school one year, are clothed, and receive a small compensation at the end of that time, when they are to be provided with good places in families.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 23, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

SHALL THE DEED BE DONE?

We have just learned that the proprietors of the Parker Memorial Hall in this city have received an offer for the purchase of the building, and that they are actually considering the proposition, with the probabilities in favor of its acceptance. The mortgage on the property, and the low condition of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, for whose special uses the Hall was erected, are the reasons for this action. But, whatever the reasons, the necessity of the act, if it be a necessity, is none the less cause for the deepest mortification. This Hall was built to perpetuate the memory and work of Theodore Parker. His name is inscribed on its walls. To divert it to any other uses, to let it pass from the hands of those who are its special guardians, is like taking down a monument. Are there not gratitude, pride, faith, public spirit enough left among the Liberals of Boston and Massachusetts to avert this disgrace? Where are the men trained under Mr. Parker's stalwart thought who will now come to the rescue of his name? A generation ago there was a little band of men who "resolved that Theodore Parker shall be heard in Boston." Has that generation of heroes left no descendants? Are there no men and women who will now resolve that Theodore Parker's monument shall not be taken down in Boston nor the guardianship of it go to alien hands? Friends of Parker, act with prompt energy and liberality to prevent the consummation of this deed, or forever hide your heads in shame!

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

By a recent vote of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, the Sub-committee on Publications were instructed to take active measures toward calling attention to the above subject, and securing, if possible, its thorough discussion with a view to giving practical aid to parents and teachers. To this end, they have arranged with the editor of the Index for the publication in fortnightly instalments of such original and selected matter as they may deem useful for this purpose. The first three contributions will be from the Committee. We now earnestly invite attention to the subject, and solicit communications giving practical suggestions or detailing personal experience in the line of radical religious culture in the home or school. In view of the fact that our space is limited and that the design is to offer the most condensed and widely applicable assistance possible, the Committee reserve the right of strict editorial supervision of matter received. All communications should be addressed to the Chairman, Providence, R.I.

REASONS FOR CO-OPERATION AMONG LIBERALS.

In another column, we print a communication from an old contributor to the Index, Mr. Neville, which perhaps voices the sentiments of no inconsiderable number of liberal thinkers at the present day. Mr. Neville, at least, puts questions which are suggestive of thought,—though, to our mind, they are not at all so unanswerable as his tone in putting them seems to imply.

That the decay of Christian faith is to effect for morality "a change of base" is, we believe, true; and, as such an operation in military movements is always attended with more or less of danger, so will this change of moral base involve somewhat of peril to society. But shall we therefore say the change is not to be made? It is as impossible, we answer, that the change should not come with the necessary progress of thought, as it is often impossible that an army should keep its old base of supplies and at the same time advance to occupy new territory. The only question to be asked in both cases is, not whether the movement shall be made, but how it shall be made most safely. If we understand Mr. Neville, he is too timorous to make the movement, and thinks it safer to remain in the old camp, even if his fellow-soldiers shall all leave it, and he shall be left behind to fraternize with the enemy. Such liberal thinkers seem to us simply to lack the courage of their convictions, or else not yet to have thought themselves into clear convictions. Those who see, as Mr. Neville seems to see, that the theological base of ethics is no longer tenable, have, in our view, no right to be lingering there; for thus they increase the very danger they fear. They should already, with the rest of the liberal army, be taking possession of a new position, or out as scouts reconnoitring for a new position, if one be not already discovered.

Figure aside, if Mr. Neville no longer really believes that the moral law was given by supernatural authority on Mt. Sinai and in the Christian revelation, by what line of ethical reasoning can he bring himself to act in practical morals as if he so believed? Sincerity is the very root of ethics. And one of the greatest moral dangers of our time comes from the fact that so many who have really lost faith in the old theological basis of morality are yet staying half-heartedly in the old spot, with no real moral convictions at all. If Mr. Neville has not lost this faith,—and on this point we may allow considerable doubt,—then he is rightly there. But if he has let this old faith go at the demands of his radical thought, then by what right can he stand aloof from his fellow-thinkers and thus try to escape the moral responsibilities of his thought? Is it not as much his duty as the duty of others who so think, to set to work to show what Liberalism means to do and can do on its own ground? There is much, it is true, in Liberalism itself that needs to be amended and purified. At some of its developments, we do not wonder there should be moral shrinking and disgust. But the amendment is not to come by timidly retreating into the old theological sanctuary and hiding from the need. It is only to come by our resolutely putting our thought and our deed to the task of a better moral instruction.

Yet Liberalism is not to be weighted with all the excesses that occur under its name. The outrages of "Nihilism" and "Communism" are the reaction of struggling humanity against the abuses of the human mind and the crimes against human rights that have been perpetrated in the name of the State with the sanction of religion. All the greater therefore is the necessity to set forth the principles of religion and morality utterly severed from this old basis of ecclesiastical authority, which has been the fruitful source of so many oppressions and wrongs. Nor is it to be admitted that all the amendment and purification needed are on the side of Liberalism, and that good moral company is only to be found in the churches. The exposures of dishonesty and immorality of various sorts that have most startled public attention in these recent years have been concerning men who have generally been church members, or at least adherents of the churches. This is not said to excuse any moral defect among Liberals, for Liberalism should have a higher moral standard than the churches: it is said simply in the interest of truth and justice, and to show that we do not necessarily get into a safe moral circle by standing "outside of the liberal movement."

What is needed is that all who feel, like Mr. Neville, the preëminent necessity of giving to Liberalism a moral aim, should stand clearly and firmly to their convictions, and work zealously together to impress those convictions on the liberal movement. And if it be asked, What is the ethical basis for constructive liberal work, the moral foundation which is to take the place of the old theological basis of morality? the answer of a host of radical modern thinkers is ready, It is the equity that naturally inheres between man and man in all social relations. This is a principle which, though illustrated in the history of the religions, is independent of all theories of supernatural revelation and of all theology; a principle rooted logically in the nature of things and as irrefragable as a law of mathematics. And when it is asked, Where is the "constructive work" of Liberalism? the inquirer might be pointed to what not a few individual Liberals are actually doing for the improvement of human society, while others among their fellows are still but dreaming or are spending their energies in criticising.

FALSEHOOD IN THE PULPIT.

[Extract from a lecture in Chickering Hall, New York, Dec. 12, by FELIX ADLER, Ph.D.]

There are, indeed, grand chapters of the Bible, words that ring into our hearts like the tones of some mighty bell sounding from its steeple over a city's roofs; grand truths, sublime in their conception and classical in their expression, such as no literature has ever surpassed. And the heart rises in enthusiasm to these truths, and the soul expands under their influence. But even these truths are soiled by the company in which they are found. What right have you to take these truths and lay them, together with all the rubbish that is found in the Bible, on a pulpit in a church, and write over both in common the word holy, when so much that is underneath the word, within the gilt-edged leaves, is unholy? Why do even the most liberal preachers content themselves with an occasional hint, saying, "This part of the Bible is mythical, and this is not entirely to be believed," and yet allow the cloak of sanctity to cover, as it were, the whole; and yet do not dare to state roundly what the results of Biblical criticism are, that "the Bible is man's handiwork through and through, and some parts of it are utterly to be condemned, and we have no right to hold it up in toto for your reverence; and the idea of anything superhuman attaching to it, of any truth being revealed therein which was not inscribed in the human heart, the possession of the human spirit before, is no longer tenable." The clergymen who hold these opinions do not utter them. The clergymen also who have accepted the views of science so far as no longer to believe in any interference with nature, but only look upon God as a higher power somehow ruling in the world, do not give their congregations clearly to understand that such have come to be their views. They equivocate in their pulpits.

And now we urge that religion does not assist in fighting against falsehood as it ought, because it is itself suspected of an alliance with the prince of falsehood. For the ministers believe themselves to be actuated by proper motives, doubtless,—motives of consideration for the condition of the people who are not yet ripe enough for liberal views, who require to be led up slowly, and so on, as the phrases go. And perhaps the people are not ripe. Sometimes, in the history of the world, a rupture must be made; sometimes, the knife must be applied, in order to save vital parts; and we must then trust to the healing powers of nature in time to close up the wound. But, even if the people are not ripe enough to be liberal themselves, they are mature enough to suspect the liberalism of their ministers. They know that their ministers are intelligent men; they know that intelligent men everywhere tend toward more radical opinions; they do not believe that their religious leaders hold those simple orthodox views which they seem to uphold in their pulpits.

And so the sincerity of those who are to be teachers of sincerity is deeply suspected. And that is the direst evil which ministers can inflict, a far greater evil than any too hasty forward movement might bring with it. For either the congregation are hypocrites and only wish religion to be kept up for social form's sake, or as convenient show to curb the masses (and then the congregation look upon their minister as their fellow-hypocrite, as the master hypocrite among them all); in or the congregation, though they doubt at heart, wish to believe these things, wish to believe that they believe; and then they suspect you, their fellow-minister, of also doubting at heart, and only trying to make yourself and them believe that you believe. And, in either case, they will withdraw from you their confidence. They will treat you with all outward shows of respect; they will call you "reverend," but they will not give you reverence; they will invite you to their social gatherings and appoint the first place for you there; they will call you to their weddings and to their funerals; they will consider you as one of the necessary, indispensable public falsehoods of the time, but they will not give you that power over their feelings, over their souls, which by virtue of your office you ought to have. Only he can work on and into the lives of his fellow-men, of whom they believe that down to the bottom of his heart he is sincere. Only he who will utter the whole truth as he knows it, and be restrained by no temporal consideration, can call up in men their better natures and redeem the world from the sway of falsehood.

And so let us at least, in the liberal society which we have founded, and which we trust will be the mother of many like it, make sincerity our foundation; and let us labor to make sincerity the foundation of all liberalism. For that let us stand, for that let us plead. And, if we do not honor God enough, as some say, let us at least show that we know how to honor her who has been named, in beautiful metaphor, the first-born daughter of God, the immaculate, the divine Truth.

TEXTS AND BIBLES.

Some one in the Index recently expressed the wish that Mr. Savage would tell why he takes texts for his sermons. It hadn't occurred to me before that any one would care whether I did or not. But, finding that they do, I am perfectly willing to confess. The reason I use texts is—pardon the Hibernicism—that I don't use them, except when I happen to feel like it, and find one that suits me. And I presume no intelligent reader of the Index would think of denying any man's right to use a text, when he pleases. And, when I do use one, I am quite willing to take it from any other book than the Bible, provided I find one that serves me as well. I am not one of those Liberals who believe that any book is good except the Bible, and any religion noble except Christianity. Bibles and religions must all stand on their own feet in the modern world. And, provided any man grows in the stature of his goodness, we need not care what he feeds on.

The using or not using a text need not be taken as a test of orthodoxy or rationalism. For preaching from texts I suppose to be a "modern innovation," even in the Church. And, in the old days, it was quite common to take a whole paragraph or chapter instead of a single verse, and preach what men called "expository" sermons. An old minister recommended this method to beginners in extemporizing, because he said that then, "when you got persecuted in one text, you could flee into another."

For some years now, I use texts only a part of the time, counting it a part of my freedom to do as seems best in the matter.

But this leads me to say a word on the Bible as compared with other Scriptures,—with Conway's Anthology for instance,—for pulpit use. I cannot use the others very much, and yet I have no objection to their use. The teaching in most parts is quite as good. And I find in the Bible very much that I cannot use. But still I use the Bible much more than anything else. Why? Compare the Anthology for a moment, and see.

1. One trouble may be in the translation. It seems, in the main, cumbrous and stiff. It doesn't flow and ripple along the channel of familiar speech as the Bible does. Much of it is stilted. It is not quite so bad as the substitution of "My chalice exuberates" in place of the Psalmist's "My cup runneth over"; but this exaggeration may show what I mean.

2. But the most serious obstacle to the use of other Scriptures lies in the fact that the manners customs, habits of thought, etc., are unfamiliar. Constant explanation is needed to bring the thought home to the people. I am aware that the manners and customs of the Jews are quite as foreign to our Occidental ways, but through ages of Bible use they have become domesticated in our Western World.

I look forward to a time when I may use more of the Bible rather than less. I pass over much of the New Testament now, lest I may be misunderstood. But when the Bible is recognized as what it really is, and one may read a story of miracle for the core of it without being supposed to indorse the husk, then we shall indeed be emancipated. We ought to be able to refer to a New Testament myth as freely as to a Hindu or Roman one, and that without stopping to explain that we do not believe in its literal truth. This time will come. I am doing what I can to hasten it.

Now, dear Index, I haven't time to prolong this note. I want to close by wishing you, if it is not too early, "A happy New Year!" I believe you are doing a good and needed work. I sincerely hope you may "live long and prosper." I shall hope, by and by, to have something worth saying through your columns, and, what is quite as important, find time to say it.

Sincerely, M. J. SAVAGE.

REMEMBERED PICTURES.

A correspondent kindly sends us the following extract from a private letter from one of the band of friends who were present at the funeral of Lydia Maria Child,—our correspondent rightly thinking that our readers would like to share the memory of the natural picture so fittingly described:—

The day of Mrs. Child's funeral was one never to be forgotten, with its changing lights and shadows and brilliant autumn hues, followed by a brief, sparkling, summer-like shower, and crowned by two magnificent rainbows, which spanned the horizon just at the moment when the little band of devoted friends laid away all that was mortal of their dear one in the quiet resting-place which she had chosen and loved. It thus seemed as if Nature sought to pay a last tribute to one who had loved so well the least of Nature's charms; to a clearer feeling of which her glowing words have helped many a soul less gifted than her own with poetic insight.

We cannot forbear giving also to the readers of the Index a portion of our friendly correspondent's own letter, wherein a visit made by herself and husband last spring to Lucretia Mott is described. She will pardon the liberty we take for the pleasure of our readers:—

The last time we were in Lucretia Mott's sweet and gracious presence was in her own lovely country home in the opening spring; a picture ever to be remembered as she sat in the low easy-chair of her library, the table covered with books, a vase of flowers beside her, the soft drabs of dress and shawl, and the delicate Quaker cap so sweetly harmonizing with the cordial friendliness of her greeting. Her recollection and grateful mention of slight kindnesses shown her by us many years ago was remarkable in a woman of eighty-seven, whose mind had been filled with so many weighty interests. Not less so was it to find her at this age absorbed in Samuel Johnson's China, of which, as well as of his India, she spoke with warm admiration, and was glad to have our late information concerning their author, to whose pulpit she had been several times welcomed in past years. She showed us the four generations of her family in a picture where they were taken together, and we felt that ancestor and descendants might well be proud of one another. Such lives as hers will hold sway beyond their own generation,—

"Until the world is wrought
To sympathy, with hopes and fears it he ded not."

THE Rising Faith, a liberal Unitarian paper published in Manchester, N.H., vigorously and justly protests against the sensational methods that are now degrading very much of the Evangelical Sunday-school work to the point where healthy minds can only look upon it with contempt. The editor says: "We feel called upon to enter our most emphatic protest against a considerable part of the sayings and doings of noted Sunday-school workers at the annual convention of the New Hampshire Sunday School Association, which was held in this city a few days ago. We speak more particularly of the 'chalk talks' of the ignorant and sensational advent preacher, A. A. Waite, and the speeches and performances generally of the musical man of the convention, Prof. W. F. Sherwin. There was much to find fault with, also, on the score of bigotry and false doctrine in the addresses of Rev. J. S. Ostrander, Rev. C. E. Harrington, and others. In fact, the conception of the Bible, which prevailed at this convention, and the methods of its interpretation, which were presented as models, were in direct contravention of nearly all the best results of modern scholarship, as they are now accepted and held to by the more enlightened portion of the orthodox ministers and churches. The worst thing, however, at this convention was the element of flippancy and harlequinism that was introduced into it by the two professionals named above, Sherwin and Waite. No serious impression, certainly, of the sacredness and value of religious things could be made upon the minds of children by the exercises which these men conducted; while even to look at the pictures which Mr. Waite put with so much skill and rapidity of drawing upon the blackboard would immediately plunge a susceptible child into hell-fire, and keep it there until the impression which it produced upon its sensitive mind could be removed."

THE New York Herald, from which we reprint the condensed report of Professor Adler's discourse in another column, says editorially of the same: "An abstract of an admirable discourse on lying will be found in another column. As lying is the most prominent and highly esteemed of business virtues, it deserves more thought than the public generally gives it." Last Sunday, the subject of Mr. Adler's lecture was the present persecution of the Jews in Prussia. The Herald gives an abstract of it, but we hope to print the lecture entire. On the same day, as a cable despatch says, "A meeting of two thousand persons was held in Berlin, at which resolutions were passed in favor of the suppression of liberty to the Jews, and to return no liberal to parliament who will not promise to vote for such suppression and to buy nothing from Jewish shops or firms."

THE family of Lucretia Mott have given public notice that they are preparing her biography. They would be glad, for this purpose, to have the originals or copies of any of her letters, which will be returned, if so requested. Such letters may be sent through the Post Office to Maria Mott Davis, Oak Lane, Station A, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE authority of the Queen's government in Ireland appears to be nearly displaced by the decrees of the Land League which the people themselves enforce. The Queen, it is said, has personally urged upon Gladstone energetic coercion; and recent despatches speak of "a bloody Christmas as probable."

OF the tributes to Karl Heinzen in last week's Index, the translation of the biographical sketch should have been attributed to Miss Hardaker, and the translations from the Washington paper to Miss Sprague.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

WE referred, in last week's Index, to Professor Huxley's demurrer to some of the speculative inferences drawn by Sir Wyville Thomson from the results of the voyage of the "Challenger." A far more decided criticism has also been made upon one of these inferences by the eminent naturalist, Mr. Charles Darwin, who goes so far as to say that Sir Wyville Thomson "does not understand the principle of natural selection," as explained by Mr. Wallace and himself. The particular sentence criticised is the following: "The character of the abyssal fauna refuses to give the least support to the theory which refers the evolution of species to extreme variation, guided only by natural selection." "This," says Mr. Darwin, "is a standard of criticism not uncommonly reached by theologians and metaphysicians, when they write on scientific subjects, but is something new as coming from a naturalist." The offensive words are only and extreme variation; and we repeat Mr. Darwin's criticism here, because these words indicate the sources of the commonest mistakes made by "theologians and metaphysicians" and many other persons when speaking about, or writing upon, the evolution of species. No one should suppose that the evolution of species depends only on natural selection. With reference to the other point mentioned, Mr. Darwin says, "If Sir Wyville Thomson were to visit the yard of a breeder, and saw all his cattle or sheep almost absolutely true, that is, closely similar, he would exclaim, 'Sir, I see here no extreme variation, nor can I find any support to the belief that you have followed the principle of selection in the breeding of your animals!' From what I formerly saw of breeders, I have no doubt that the man thus rebuked would have smiled and said not a word. If he had afterward told the story to other breeders, I greatly fear that they would have used emphatic but irreverent language about naturalists."

AN amusing typographical error occurred in Professor Huxley's notice of the "Challenger" publications. He was represented as saying that "the deep-sea fauna presents us with many forms which are the dried and but little modified descendants of Tertiary and Mesozoic species." Upon this he comments thus: "As few things can be much wetter than the inhabitants of the ocean abysses, this opinion seems to be, to say the least, eccentric. But "dried" should have been printed "direct," which was the word denoted by my graphic symbols."

While upon this subject, it is but fair to say that Sir Wyville Thomson has replied with considerable apparent success to one of Professor Huxley's criticisms. The point at issue, however, would require too much space to be stated here. The notice and reply are both in Nature.

MR. S. TOLVER PRESTON published, several months ago, a very brief article on Evolution and Female Education, which was more important than its modest length would lead a careless reader to suspect. It was important because by purely physical methods he reaches conclusions with regard to female education similar to those previously reached by John Stuart Mill by abstract methods of reasoning, and thus the results of the two methods confirm one another. He quotes Mr. Darwin, "It is indeed fortunate that the law of the equal transmission of characters to both sexes prevails with mammals, otherwise it is probable that man would have become as superior in mental endowment to woman as the peacock is in ornamental plumage to the peahen," and adds that this puts the education of woman in a new light. "For the above deduction, grounded on the evidence of natural science, would indicate clearly that man, by opposing the intellectual advance of woman for countless generations, has enormously hindered his own advance,—by inheritance." Man has hindered woman's performance of her natural share in the work of brain development, has therefore been compelled by nature to do the work for her; and valuable brain tissue which might have been man's to-day, as a fair reward of intellectual labor, has gone over by the laws of inheritance to the female side to fill up the gap artificially created by man's own stupidity. Any existing mental inferiority on the part of woman, therefore, so far from being an argument against female education, ought to be regarded as the strongest reason the other way. The race might have been elevated far above its present status, had woman been able to contribute her fair share to the common stock of brain development. It is possible, Mr. Preston believes, that the present less stability of the female intellect may be naturally due to the brain qualities being gained mainly by inheritance instead of by hard practice, as in the case of man's brain attributes. SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

State Regulation of Prostitution.

WE received, some time since, the letters addressed to the Second International Congress on the above subject by the New York Committee of the Federation and by the President of the Moral Education Society in Washington. We have a waited reports of the Congress itself before noting them. We have since received these through the courtesy of Mr. Aaron M. Powell and Mrs. C. C. Hussey, of New York. The second session of the "British, Continental, and General Federation for the Abolition of State Regulation of Prostitution" was held in Genoa, Italy, September 27 to October 4. Like the first Congress, at Geneva in 1877, it was attended by about five hundred delegates, representing most of the countries of Europe. America, which had several delegates in person at the former Congress, was present only by correspondence at this. Beside the regular delegates, the general meeting of October 3 was attended by an immense crowd of people, thronging the large square fronting the theatre in which the delegates had been assembled, consummating their discussions in a series of resolutions affirming their convictions and purposes. The crowd was largely composed of representatives from the Workingmen's Associations from all parts of Italy, joined to similar associations of Genoa. These Workingmen's Associations seem to have taken special interest in the discussions of this as also of the former Congress; and, as the resolutions were read to them from the balcony outside the theatre, they were received with universal and enthusiastic applause. The resolutions reaffirmed, substantially, the declaration of principles set forth three years ago, making some special applications of them. The members assert their unalterable determination "to work for the abolition of the laws and regulations now in force, which, by sanctioning prostitution, make it a recognized institution." They declare that "everything relating to prostitution must be made subject to the common law of each country," that "all legal guarantees of personal liberty must be made equal for the two sexes," that legislation must not "provide for or tolerate any official registration of prostitutes, or any official recognition of prostitution as the status of a social class," nor "sanction any violation of the rights possessed by every woman over her own person." Furthermore, they declare their conviction that the "sanitary regulation of prostitution, and the medical examination of women involved in it," are inefficient for the protection of the public health, and, failing to secure their object, while at the same time "grossly violating the common law in the person of woman," should be abolished.

OUR special interest in the action of the Congress, and in the general European movement which it represents, lies in the existence of the following facts among us. Though the system of regulation does not obtain in the United States, there are men of some prominence in medical and sanitary societies, who more or less openly advocate it. Though a bill establishing it, once furtively passed in the city council of St. Louis, was, after several years, repealed, on the earnest and indignant protest of some of its best citizens, yet its reënactment has been since attempted, but without success. Though bills have been introduced into several State legislatures and city governments, and after vigilant and determined opposition defeated, yet the advocates of the measure are ready to renew the attempt, and under cover of some general resolve, half-concealing the real purpose, gain their end. Only constant watchfulness will prevent this. Among the most effective instruments that may be employed in this work of prevention is the diffusion of information upon this European movement, this uprising of the cultured and elevated moral sense, manly honor, and womanly purity, against the system so long prevalent on the continent, and a few years ago partially and deceptively introduced into England. To show, as has been done clearly and powerfully, how the system of regulation undertakes to give man impunity in sin and makes woman the suffering victim; what gross inequality and injustice marks its dealings with the two; what abuse it is susceptible of and has actually occasioned; how it demoralizes the community in which it obtains, by accustoming them to the presence of a permitted and protected class of prostitutes; how, under its administration, prostitution has kept on increasing; and how even that which has been and is claimed as its sure and most desired result, namely, the limitation of contagious disease, has entirely failed,—all this, taken in connection with the fact of an ever-strengthening organized effort for the abolition of the system, cannot fail of effect in deterring or defeating the occasional attempts at its establishment among us. As the letter of the New York Committee, after describing past attempts and present dangers, well says, "International influence, in modern times much more than formerly, has become a powerful factor for good or ill in all civilized countries. . . . The movements for the introduction here of State regulated vice were of European origin, and the future preservation of America from the degradation which it involves will be indirectly one of the beneficent results of repeal and abolition in Great Britain and on the Continent.

THE letter from the President of the Washington Society acknowledges yet more explicitly the help which has been received from friends abroad, individually and collectively, and welcomes their continued coöperation in withstanding the farther attempts to be made for regulation. Then, characteristically with its far-sighted purpose of moral prevention, it calls attention to the society's work of "investigating the causes which underlie all this moral corruption," of concentrating effort upon "curing these evils, instead of suppressing or controlling them, by disseminating knowledge in regard to physical life, and an education in the laws of heredity, and thus aid in the growth of purity through this process of evolution," and then closes by invoking their continued fraternal relations, after the repeal of past unjust legislation has been effected, in the joint "endeavor to so cultivate the moral sense of humanity that the race will be elevated above perverted and sensual indulgence." F. H.

"THE ALPHA," the organ of the Moral Education Society, Washington, D.C., appears, enlarged to sixteen pages. It is making the same brave stand as ever for social purity, wise parentage, and a higher moral culture. Its December number records, among other good and practical measures, the organization of a Washington Froebel Society, for the study and application of Froebel's principles of education, and the establishment of free kindergartens for the benefit of poor and neglected children. Two of these had been already opened in distant parts of the capital. Such schools, for the more favored children of those in good circumstances, have been in existence there for some years. But these are the first, I think, in that city, which may claim the character which the good German woman who first started the system would have given to them all: namely, that of educational and civilizing missionaries. TEACHING BY PARABLES.

"All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable spake he not unto them."—MATT. xiii., 34. (Compare Mark iv., 33, 34.)

1. The Parable Defined.

PARABLE (from Greek, παραβάλλειν, "to throw beside; to compare"): A parable is a fable or "allegorical representation of something real in life or nature, from which a moral is drawn for instruction." It is a figurative discourse, in which the principal subject is described or illustrated by another subject resembling it in some of its circumstances or conditions. The intentions of the speaker or writer in regard to the principal subject are left to be inferred from their likeness to the circumstances of his parable.

This indirect mode of instruction has often been adopted by the great religious teachers of the East. There are parables in the OLD TESTAMENT (see Judges ix., II. Sam. xii.), and among the discourses of the Jewish rabbis in the TALMUD. RENAN says, "We find in the BUDDHIST books parables of exactly the same tone as the Gospel parables." (Life of Jesus, p. 169.)

NOTE.—Read to the class one of "BUDDHAGHOSA'S parables," e.g., the story of KESAGOTAMI, from Conway's Sacred Anthology, p. 390, or its poetical paraphrase by Rev. John W. Chadwick in his Book of Poems. Also the Old Testament parables, "The Trees Choosing a King" (Judges ix.), and "The Poor Man and his Lamb" (II. Samuel xii.).

2. The Parables of Jesus.

Teaching by parable was the favorite method of JESUS, in presenting his doctrine to the multitude. Our Lesson's text declares that he taught publicly only in this manner. The Second Gospel adds. "When they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples."

Aware, apparently, that many were not prepared to receive his teaching, he sought in this way to win those whose kindred thought could penetrate to the secret of his allegories, while others would not be repelled, as they might be by a harsher and more literal statement.

(Read the Parable of the Sower, Mark iv., 1–25. Compare Matt. xiii., 1–23; Luke viii., 4–18.)

The parables of JESUS are simple and uniform in style, and sufficiently individual and unique to identify them as the product of a single mind; though doubtless some of them may have been modified slightly in transmission. They manifest the same peculiarities of style and thought, though reported by three different writers. This tends to prove that they are not inventions of the Evangelists, but have been fairly reported, from traditions that are, in the main, trustworthy.

NOTE A.—The Germs of some of the most beautiful of JESUS' parables are found in the old Jewish literature: but they have been expanded and impressed with his genius and personality, so that they now present all the peculiarities of his thought and style.

NOTE B.—In the discourses of JESUS as reported in the Fourth Gospel, we find no parables. In thought and style, they are totally unlike all the sayings of JESUS reported in the Synoptical Gospels. In the latter, the Kingdom of God is chiefly taught and glorified; while, in the Fourth Gospel, JESUS is constantly made to exalt and glorify himself. The Synoptical writers evidently present the truest report of his teachings.

3. The Kingdom of Heaven described in Parables.

Many of the parables of JESUS were devoted to the presentation of his doctrine of the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. He thus taught that the preparation for the coming KINGDOM was an inward process, and not merely external obedience to the precepts of the LAW (Mark iv., 14–20); that its acceptance by a few humble believers would ultimately result in the salvation of many (Mark iv., 30–32; Matt. xiii., 31, 32, 33); that the faithful few would be preferred to the many who rejected his warnings (Mark iv., 26–29; Matt. xiii., 24–30; 36–43; 47–50); that all else was as nothing compared with the importance of "seeking first the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN and its righteousness" (Matt. xiii., 44–46); that the poor and despised would be preferred in the KINGDOM to the wealthy and great (Matt. xxi., 28–32; Luke xv., 1–7; 8–10; 11–32); that even late repentance would secure all the rewards of the KINGDOM, in which the first would often be last, and the last first (Matt. xx., 1–16); and that he who labored most faithfully should be abundantly rewarded, while he who perceived the truth, without laboring to spread it, would be punished. (Luke xix., 11–28.)

In the parables of the "Wicked Husbandmen" (Mark xii., 1–12; Matt. xxi., 33–46; Luke xx., 9–19), and the "Marriage of the King's Son" (Matt. xxii., 1–14), he reproves the Chief Priests and Pharisees for neglecting to warn and prepare the people for the coming of the KINGDOM, and for their persecution of JOHN THE BAPTIST, and himself; and declares that the power shall be taken out of their hands and bestowed upon the despised "publicans and sinners," who gave heed to his word.

NOTE.—Only the parables of the Sower, the Mustard Seed, and the Wicked Husbandmen, are contained in the TRIPLE TRADITION, though doubtless others were derived from sources as authentic.

General Questions.

1. What is a Parable? 2. What great religious teachers have taught in parables? 3. Can you relate one of BUDDHA'S parables? 4. To whom did JESUS speak in parables? 5. Why did he adopt this method? 6. Can you give the Parable of the Sower, and explain it? 7. What are the leading characteristics of JESUS' parables? 8. How are the discourses of JESUS reported in the Fourth Gospel? 9. How does this affect the historical value of that book? 10. How did JESUS explain his doctrine of the KINGDOM OF GOD? 11. Explain the parable of the Mustard Seed? (Mark iv., 30-32.) 12. The Tares? (Matt., xiii.) 13. The Lost Sheep? (Luke xv.) 14. The Prodigal Son? (Luke xv.) 15. The Laborers in the Vineyard? (Matt., xx.) 16. The Wicked Husbandmen? (Mark xii.)

To the Teacher.

Read in Savage's Talks about Jesus, the Lecture on his Public Life (the paragraph, pp. 78, 79, might be read to the class). Also Milman's History of Christianity, Vol. I., p. 231

Assign a parable to each scholar a week in advance, to be repeated and explained during the lesson. Explain the parables yourself, and try to separate their local and special meanings from the more general and universal. Show what they meant when they were spoken, and what lessons they inculcate which are good for all time, for us, here, and to-day. There is material here for interesting conversation during two or three Sundays' Lessons.

"FALSEHOOD."

How Deception must be Fought.

In Chickering Hall, Professor Felix Adler addressed the Society for Ethical Culture on the subject of "Falsehood." The spirit of falsehood, said the Professor, is powerful in the political world. You have recently heard its manifold utterances from the political platform. The spirit of falsehood is powerful in the press. It leads the unscrupulous journalist to sacrifice both facts and character when they stand in the way of his purposes. The spirit of falsehood is powerful in banking-houses, in the gin-shops, and in the stores of the wine-merchants. It is powerful in the retail shops and in the wholesale establishments. It is powerful in the best society. To combat the spirit of falsehood, we need to direct the education of children especially to the analysis of their own motives. Falsehood is most dangerous, not when it leads to the deception of others, but when it leads to self-deception. Very few of us are exempt from the fault of attempting to cover up the secret, selfish springs of our actions, and justifying them by better motives than were really had. Self-deception goes so far that many men live on for years in the pursuit of base objects, cloaking their conduct all the while by ascribing to themselves some disinterested intention. The politician in search of office deludes himself into the belief that he is furthering the interests of his party. The officer of a charitable society, whose real aim is the gratification of personal vanity or the obtaining of power, deludes himself into the belief that he is laboring for the cause of benevolence. Even in our very ideals there is a source of falsehood. When a strong sensuous nature co-exists with moral idealism,—and the two do go together at times in the same individual,—and when the lower nature has triumphed, the better self is so horrified at beholding the degradation of self that it seeks to wrench the guilty deed from its proper interpretation and to palliate and to excuse it, and so the testimony of the inner life is wholly falsified and confused. We need to cultivate the art of analyzing our motives and of distinguishing between the real springs of our actions and those semblances with which we are in the habit of mystifying our conscience.

Falsehood in Business.

But of what avail is it to teach truthfulness, if the avocations of life compel the practice of falsehood? Herbert Spencer, speaking of England, said that the law of the trade seemed to be to cheat and be cheated, and from many quarters we have the sentiment echoed that business interests and strict integrity do not go together; that the strictly honest man in business must go to the wall. And, if this were so, then it were better for the children of business men to be sent to teachers who will teach them the art of lying with good effect rather than to teachers who will awaken their consciences. But we believe the maxim is at bottom a false one. We believe that the system of unlimited competition under which the hand of every man is against that of his brother will eventually be driven out of business, as it has been driven out of other departments in life. And, if that seems far off, the question must be put, Can nothing be done in the interval to check at least the grosser forms of commercial falsehood, to prevent the spread of the disease of dishonesty? A union of merchants is earnestly to be desired, who will brand such forms of deceit as are known to them, who will frankly discuss the questions that come up under the head of commercial morality, and who will instruct their own consciences and those of others according to a higher standard. The code of honor which such an association of merchants in high standing would lay down, while it might not be generally accepted, would serve to uphold many who are disposed to do what is right, and would exert its beneficial influence in the purification of public opinion. Similar associations would be of service in the professions; for in each of them peculiar moral questions come up, which do not come up in the others, and the discussion and consideration of which is a matter of prime importance for preserving a high standard of integrity among the members of these professions. If we conceive the members of such associations united at times in order to consider and discuss these moral questions which concern them all alike, simply as men and women,—such questions as the right relation of the sexes to each other in marriage and outside of marriage, the question of benevolence, and the question of the relation of finite man to the infinite,—we should then have the idea of a society for moral culture such as we hope for.

Falsehood in the Pulpit.

There is a third auxiliary to which we have a right to look in the struggle against falsehood; that is, religion. The reason why religion does not more effectually aid in the fight against falsehood is because it is itself suspected of falsehood. People believe the clergy to be more liberal than they avow. Even the common people hear of the spread of scientific theories, and have vague notions that the critical study of the Bible has threatened the old foundations of faith. Some of the men and the women in the pews desire only that religion be kept up as a social form or as a curb upon the passions of the masses, and these care not greatly for the sincerity of the pulpit. Others do care, but even among them the damaging fear is spreading that the whole truth is not spoken in the sacred places. This spectre of suspicion that rises between the pulpit and the people paralyzes the power of the teachers of religion over the hearts of the people and over their lives. It is fervently to be desired that the leaders of religion will cast away from them all other considerations, and state the extent to which their views have been affected by modern theories fully and frankly. The greatest evil they can inflict upon the times is to allow the suspicion of their insincerity to go on growing. Even a too rapid advance in the direction of liberalism would not be so great an evil as this. The people will allow him only to work a radical reform in their actual lives of whom they believe that his utterances are transparent to the very convictions of his soul.—New York Herald.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JUDGE TOURGEE, author of the Fool's Errand, etc., it is reported, is to enter the lecture field.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD will address the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I., next Sunday.

PROFESSOR GRAY, of telephonic fame, has accepted the chair of Dynamic Electricity at Oberlin College.

DOM PEDRO, the Emperor of Brazil, has translated a number of Whittier's poems into the Portuguese language.

IT is said that Longfellow's "Excelsior" was inspired by a letter from Charles Sumner, full of lofty sentiments.

KING KALAKAUA, of the Sandwich Islands, is reported to have expressed an intention of soon revisiting this country.

THE English section of the Socialistic Labor Party of Philadelphia have passed resolutions of respect to the memory of Lucretia Mott.

RICHTER, in his new life of the artist Leonardo da Vinci, says that only ten paintings by him of undisputed genuineness are known to exist.

DR. MARY J. SAFFORD lectures on Thursday of this week before the Ladies' Physiological Institute of Boston on "The Influence of the Mind on the Body."

IT was stated in the Index of last week that Walter C. Wright was the business manager of the Fair for Abused Children. Mr. Wright, though active in promoting the interest of the enterprise in various ways, was in fact, we learn, the business manager only of the paper entitled Childhood's Appeal published by the fair.

MR. A. BRONSON ALCOTT has no faith in the opinions of the ancient disciplinarians of New England. "I hold," said he, the other day, "that the man who cannot govern children, or men either, by moral means, by the power of his eye, the charm of his manners, the resources of his intelligence, is not worthy to control his fellow-creatures."

MR. THOMAS S. HALL, inventor of the automatic electric railway signals bearing his name, and in use on many of the railways of this country, died at Hartford, Conn., December 1, at the age of fifty-two years. Mr. Hall was a man of great force and persistence, and his inventions have done much to diminish the hazards of railway travel.

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON, of New York, who has been so munificent in her charities, says: "I have given during the last sixteen years for benevolent purposes some $600,000. The most of this has been used to encourage idleness, corruption, and crime. I am now determined to assist 'God's worthy poor, who are willing and striving to do something to make mankind richer and better morally, intellectually, scientifically, or mechanically.'"

MRS. HORACE MANN, widow of the veteran educationist, who closed his useful career more than twenty years ago, is still engaged in promoting those interests which her husband held so dear. She is now busy translating the reports of the International Congress at Brussels, particularly all that refers to the improved kindergarten methods of Europe, for the next volume of Dr. Barnard's American Journal of Education. She has also translated a large part of the Reports of School Hygiene.

MRS. MARY THATCHER HIGGINSON, the wife of Col. T. W. Higginson, prepared for the Fair of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children one of the most remarkable collections of autographs extant. It includes almost every American author; pages from the works of many English ones, such as Lord Jeffreys, Wilkie Collins, Froude, the Rossettis; actors of the eminence of Ristori; statesmen like the Adamses and Patrick Henry, Sumner, Everett, and the chief among those living; artists like William Hunt and La Farge; and people of science, like Agassiz, Silliman, and Maria Mitchell.

FOREIGN.

A WORK of Voltaire's, entitled Le Sottisier, has recently been printed for the first time. It has remained among the books bought by the Empress Catherine from Mme. Denis.

THE manager of the Toulouse Triboulet has been condemned to pay twelve thousand francs damages to the French Minister of the Interior and six thousand francs to the Prefect of Toulouse on account of the libels published in that paper.

DURING the lecture of the Professor of Philosophy at the University of Berlin on the 31st ult., a great tumult arose in the room, owing to the Professor's opposition to the anti-Jewish agitation. The disturbance reached such a pitch that the lecture had to be suspended.

ST. PETERSBURG.—A Jewish theatre has been opened at St. Petersburg by M. Goldfaden, a Jewish actor, who gained considerable reputation at Moscow. The theatre opened with an opera called "The Fanatic," M. Goldfaden being the author of the libretto. All the performers will be of the Jewish persuasion. The only other Jewish theatre in Europe is at Bucharest, and it is under the same direction.

MR. DILLON, speaking at a land meeting at Clonmel, lately said, after a fierce denunciation of Irish landlords, that they should steadily pursue their policy, and if the government prosecuted them other men would take the places of those who were prosecuted until the whole of Ireland was put in gaol. For his part, he believed that, in spite both of the government and the landlords, they would have the rents reduced, and the people would hold the land in Tipperary.

At a meeting of the North Staffordshire branch of the English Church Union on Saturday, November 20, a resolution was passed, protesting against the imprisonment of Mr. Dale for having obeyed the law of his Church and realm in preference to the so-called law of the Privy Council and Lord Penzance. The meeting further offered him their heartfelt thanks and sympathy in the noble stand which, they stated, he is making for the defence of the rights of the English Church.

A publican applied at the Manchester Police Court on Tuesday morning for an extension of hours on November 5, for a supper in connection with a "swearing club." The stipendiary asked what that was. The applicant explained that fines were imposed for swearing on the Sabbath, and out of these the supper was paid for. Mr. Headlam expressed surprise that the fines should be so enormous as to be sufficient to defray the cost of the repast. The applicant said there was something short, and they made that up. Mr. Headlam declined to grant an extension.

Persecution of Jews in Morocco.—Despite the energetic remonstrances of representatives of the European powers and of the United States, the persecution of the Jews continues in Morocco. It is thought that several Jews have been murdered at Tale, Rabat, and Tetuan. The Moorish government, on the other hand, is punctiliously carrying out the rules laid down at the recent convention, limiting the number of Jewish subjects to whom it extends special protection. The insubordination of the Arabs and the Riff pirates continues, and the Sultan's authority is set entirely at defiance in many outside towns.

Mobbing Mr. Bradlaugh.—Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., was recently to have delivered a lecture at Exeter on "Land Laws and the House of Lords"; but in the afternoon some of his committee apprehended a breach of the peace, and acting on this the deputy mayor requested Mr. Bradlaugh not to hold the meeting, warning him that, if he did so, he would be held responsible for any injurious results that might happen. Mr. Bradlaugh replied, expressing disgust that any such information should have been sworn, but abstained from taking any part in the meeting. When this announcement was made, the hall was filled by a noisy audience, which for a long time continued shouting for Mr. Bradlaugh. At last, it was promised that their money should be returned: and the audience left for Mr. Bradlaugh's hotel, some of them forcing their way into his room, and the remainder creating a great disturbance in the street. At ten o'clock, Mr. Bradlaugh left for the railway station, when an attempt was made to upset the cab; but he reached the station safely, and left by the mail-train.—Lloyd's Weekly.

"Lloyd's Weekly" gives the following account of the imprisonment of Rev. Pelham Dale, High Church Ritualist, whose case has recently attracted wide attention: "The Church of St. Vedast has been closed, the notice appearing on the door, 'In consequence of the rector of this parish, the Rev. Thomas Pelham Dale, M.A., being confined in prison for conscience' sake, there will be no service in this church until farther notice.' It appeared that on Saturday evening the tipstaff of the court waited on the reverend gentleman at his residence in Ladbroke-gardens, Notting-hill, and served him with a copy of the sentence of the judgment pronounced against him in the Court of Arches by the dean, Lord Penzance. This was about half-past seven o'clock; and Mr. Dale, having remarked that he was taken somewhat by surprise, made a formal protest against the legality of the sentence, but said he would not give the official any trouble. A cab was then called, and the reverend gentleman, accompanied by the tipstaff, was taken to Holloway City Prison, where he is now incarcerated. He is confined in the right wing of the gaol, on the ground floor, two rooms being assigned to him, and a small fire allowed. This and the gas have to be extinguished at half-past eight o'clock at night, and at six o'clock in the morning he is expected to rise. His friends are allowed to supply him with food, but no spirits or tobacco are permitted within the prison. He is, however, already on the sick list, and under the doctor's care, as he is suffering from general debility and an abscess in the right hand. On Sunday, as no communication is permitted with the outside world, he was compelled to accept prison fare. In the afternoon of Sunday, the Bishop of London's legal secretary, Mr. Lee, visited the church and saw one of the churchwardens; but Mr. Dale had carefully locked up the sacred building. In the evening, the Rev. G. Acland, of the grammar school, Kensington, attended to conduct the service, but failed to gain admission."

JESTINGS.

Johnny lost his knife. After searching through his one pocket without success, he exclaimed, "Oh, dear! I wish I had another pocket: it might be in that."

"I am a Methodist," pleaded a prisoner before a police judge the other day. "All right, then," said the judge: "we'll put you on probation," which by interpretation is he was held for trial.

An old toper excused himself recently before the Rockhampton Bench by stating that "his feet gave way." Of course, his head hadn't anything to do with it. The Rockhampton people now say, "Take care of your head, and your feet will take care of themselves."

An eccentric, pious man of Plympton, Ore., has built a house on posts forty feet high. His neighbors say he elevated himself that he might be nearer heaven. His real purpose was to be above and beyond the book agent, lightning-rod man, and politician.

It takes an English vicar to quote Scripture in advertising for a maid of all work. Witness the following from the Telegraph: "Wanted, a good general servant, able to cook. Aged about 22. 'One who fears God.'—Nehemiah v., 15. Wages £12. Good character and references. Young housemaid and man kept. —T., Attleborough vicarage, Nuneaton."

The Lord's Prayer, worked in worsted and prettily framed, was the ground of action in a case called for trial in Troy a few days ago. The contestants proved to be mother and daughter; and each assumed to be the legal owner of the disputed work of art, which was finally awarded to the girl, with the gentle admonition that she should study it carefully.

A Galveston clergyman was talking to a male parent about the latter's little boy Johnny. Said the fond father: "He is the cutest little cuss you ever saw. He can swear like a trooper, chews tobacco, ties tin pans to dogs' tails, and—" "Does he attend school?" "Why, parson, he is too young for that, you know: he is not far enough advanced."—Galveston News.

What's the use—what on earth, we say, is the use—of talking about art culture in San Francisco, when it is an open secret that a certain rich mining man recently sent to Florence for a copy of the Venus of Milo, and, when the statue was delivered, actually sued the Central Pacific Railroad Company for mutilating a work of art, and, what is more, recovered large damages?

"Isn't it lovely, Mr. Robinson," said Miss Fitzjoy, as she daintily held up her skirts from the morning dew, "to see the handiwork of nature in the ripening of the crops? The sun and rain combine to give us the fruitage of the soil"— "Yes, ma'm, and the market-men combine to cheat us out of the value of it. Why, green corn ain't bringing nothing, potatoes don't pay for digging, and you've got to give apples away."—New Haven Register.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HUMANITY is the equity of the heart.—Confucius.

THERE is but one temple in the world, and that is the body of man. Nothing is holier than this high form. Bending before men is a reverence done to this revelation in the flesh. We touch heaven when we lay our hand on a human body.—Novalis.

OUR humanity were a poor thing but for the divinity that stirs within us.—Bacon.

THE rational (human) world is to be considered as a great immortal individual, which unceasingly works out the necessary, and thereby is ever raised to be master over the accidental.—Goethe.

THE poet hears a voice, he sees a beckoning. Then he is apprised, with wonder, what herds of demons hem him in. He can no more rest: he says, with the painter, "By God it is in me, and must go forth of me." He pursues a beauty, half-seen, which flies before him.—R. W. Emerson.

NOT a true life really dies; not a true thought, word, or deed is wasted; not a true being ceases to be. Each lives in the future, as it lived in the present, in ever-widening circles and ever-multiplying force. It is an awful but an ennobling thought. It is one to strike like a trumpet on the ear of every living soul, and to stir him to energy and virtue like a battle-cry. It speaks to him, and says, not, "You are soon to put on immortality," but, "You are immortal." It says, not, "Your life on earth is fleeting," but, "Your life on earth shall live forever,"—live forever, but in a finer, purer way, with all that is poor and mean in it passing into oblivion, and all that is solid and humane in it deepening in power; with none of its material side, of its vacillating side, of its eristic side, surviving, but only its goodness and its truth embodied in the permanent influence of our race. It may be that it will not be a life of sensation or of consciousness; but it is not less truly life for that, since all that makes the soul great will work continually, and in ever new and grander ways.—Frederic Harrison.

NOT yet, at this age of the world, is the divine child born, except in symbol and dream. Not yet is he born in the heart of his own worshippers. No human organization serves yet for his perfect cradle. Only here and there the materials for his manger are collected in some association that pities the outcast, honors labor, rescues brute animals from cruelty, or seeks to level the irregularities of human conditions. But the idea is abroad, the sentiment is awakened, the desire is kindled, and will bring about its own fulfilment. The unisons of faith have been sounded. The unisons of charity will be voiced ere long. Leigh Hunt, standing with his friend Shelley in the cathedral at Pisa, remarked, as the organ was playing, and the crowds were kneeling on the floor, that a truly divine religion might yet be established, if charity were really made the principle of it, instead of faith. His friend murmured, "AMEN."—O. B. Frothingham.

MAN is his own star; and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man
Commands all light, all influence, all fate;
Nothing to him falls early or too late:
Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IT is said that Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, who found himself two years ago in debt to numerous members of his diocese to the amount of about $4,000,000, has not yet been able to pay anything to the creditors, many of whom were poor people who had intrusted all their savings to him. The only consolation they have is that it is invested in "the Church."

AN anxious Sunday-school superintendent in the South, whose prayers have been criticised by the teachers, writes to the Sunday School Times to find out how long he ought to pray at the opening of his school. He says he does not pray more than five minutes, and finds it difficult to crowd all that he wants to say into that time. The Times answers that he prays too long.

WHILE numerous liberal objects are going a-begging and seem likely to go down for the want of a few thousand dollars, Mr. Moody has only to hold out his purse for the missionary purposes he has in mind, and it is at once filled. He has but just started a school for girls at Northfield, Mass., his native town, and seen it in successful operation, when he announces the plan of a similar school for boys, with $50,000 already given, and in hand for the enterprise.

THE "Society to Encourage Studies at Home," projected a few years since by some prominent and cultivated ladies of Boston, for the purpose of affording aid and counsel to young women (in any part of the country) who may desire to pursue certain courses of study by themselves, has been attended with such success and evidence of usefulness that it has very naturally suggested the formation of a "Young Men's Society for Home Study." The latter includes Messrs. Samuel Eliot, Arthur Gilman, Samuel S. Green, John Hay, O. W. Holmes, W. D. Howells, H. W. Longfellow, W. B. Rogers, Lloyd P. Smith, Charles Dudley Warner, and Justin Winsor on its advisory committee. Mr. Fred Gardner, of Cambridge, Mass., is its secretary. It embraces a lending library of the more expensive and inaccessible books. A public appeal is made for funds to form the nucleus of such a library. A programme of studies in the four courses of American and English history, English literature, German literature, natural science (botany, zoölogy, geology), and mathematics, with the society's rules, etc., can be had on application to the Secretary.

THE Presbyterian of Philadelphia, a recent welcome addition to our list of exchanges, is evidently not prepared to welcome the new translation of the Bible. It thinks that the committee have made a great mistake in not announcing from time to time such important changes in the text as they propose to make. This would have brought the emendations under discussion, and "the public would have put their verdict upon them, and this would have ended controversy; for it is not possible for any translation to live in defiance of public opinion, no matter how the scholarly may decide." But we should think that those people who believe that the Bible came as a direct literal message from God would want the message exactly as it was. Can it be, after all, that they prefer their own familiar version of the Bible, though it be false, to a revised version which is proved to be more true to the original record? If so, then we fear the ministers have been teaching the people to love a certain form of words rather than truth. When the Presbyterian says, "There is an inner sense that rejects [amendments of the text] from its own consciousness and for reasons satisfactory to itself," it looks as if somebody beside rationalists and Free Religious folk was placing human consciousness and reason above the Bible. We may add, by the way, that the Presbyterian is one of the liveliest papers we have read for some time.

THE Christian Statesman of Philadelphia scents danger and strikes the note of alarm, because, on the occasion of Mr. Garfield's recent private journey to Washington, "it was Colonel Ingersoll, with a single companion, who was waiting to receive him, and in company with whom he was driven to his Washington residence." It says that this was a sight "not pleasant to observe," but adds the hope that the President-elect was not privy to the dark plot. It says: "A charitable regard for the incoming President, which will not be dispelled until a contrary conviction is forced upon us, suggests the hope that this most conspicuous enemy of the Christian religion was thrusting himself on Mr. Garfield, and is not yet, nor ever will be, the chosen confidant and most intimate unofficial adviser of the Chief Magistrate of the nation. We are not dictating to the President-elect in the matter of his personal friendships. But we know well the effort which Mr. Ingersoll will make to influence the next administration in the direction of secularism. And we desire that Mr. Garfield shall know betimes the seriousness of the conflict which any concession to these demands would precipitate upon the nation." What makes this matter, we may add, still more unpleasant to observe, is that we are entirely in the dark as to who was the "single companion" with Mr. Ingersoll. The name not being vouchsafed to the public, we are left free to conjecture that it was somebody whose company would do no credit to Mr. Garfield. Indeed, since the Christian newspapers assure us that Colonel Ingersoll keeps company with nobody better than himself, it was doubtless somebody much worse than himself; and perhaps even the arch-enemy of mankind, in whose personal entity the Statesman probably believes. The country awaits in breathless anxiety until the name of the "single companion" who conspired with Colonel Ingersoll to "thrust himself on Mr. Garfield" is divulged.

AMERICAN WOMANHOOD.

Discourse Delivered at New Bedford, Nov. 14, 1880.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

Our voluntarily exiled countryman, Mr. Henry James, Jr., has apparently set himself to the task, in his recent fictions, of painting his conception of the American girl of the period. To those who have read his books, I need not say that his picture is not a flattering one, and that, if true, it augurs ill for the coming American woman. Mr. James might say in reply that he has been concerned only to paint one type of the American young woman,—a type that he alleges is often met with in European travels: the young woman, or girl in the latter part of her "teens," who has evidently brought the family abroad, though very likely the father has to leave the family and return home to his business. The young woman is just out of a fashionable boarding-school, and has brought the family abroad for the purpose of finishing her education. The family appears to have unlimited resources of money, and uses money with that conspicuousness which betokens sudden accession of wealth, without the knowledge how to use wealth in the genuine culture and refinements of life. The young lady has a veneering of culture, is ambitious to be thought cultured, and expects to complete her culture in a few rapid lessons by foreign travel. Of anything pertaining to the solid acquisitions of human wisdom, she is profoundly ignorant. In things concerning which most foreign girls of her age know little or nothing, such as social relations and demands, she is well versed, and can teach her commonplace but ambitious mother, who has not had her opportunities. But most conspicuous of all is her practice of social unreserve and independence, which has become quite a habit of American girls, but to which the ideas and customs that prevail in good society abroad are all averse. And, in depicting this type of young woman, Mr. James might add that his purpose is the praiseworthy missionary one of so holding it up to contempt, and portraying the dangerous quicksands in its path, as to improve the character of his countrywomen. To which the rejoinder might be ready that even the earnestness of a social missionary zeal cannot excuse a gross injustice; and that Mr. James might easily find if he would, even in foreign travels, a better type of the American girl than that he is so fond of portraying; and that, in the interest both of truth and of the improvement of womanhood, he should set forth this nobler type of young woman which may be and has been attained in his native land.

But this question of what Mr. James has done or not done or ought to have done is not what I propose to discuss here. I have referred to him simply to introduce my topic. One thing is evident: that the freedom of our American institutions has developed new ideas and new customs with regard to not only the position of woman, but the training of the girl for womanhood. Our free public schools in which boys and girls are educated together, and which in this regard the private schools have frequently copied; the freedom of social and neighborly life among us; the abolition, under the new and, so to speak, aboriginal conditions of life in this country, of many of the traditions and restraints belonging to the old civilizations of Europe,—these have been moulding a different national ideal of womanhood than that which has prevailed on the other side of the Atlantic. Individual freedom and equality with man—this, without any regard to the technical reform called the Woman's Rights' movement or the special aim of securing woman suffrage—has become the ideal, if not the practical status, of the American woman. The laws, it is true, are not yet equal for both sexes; civil privileges and responsibilities are not yet equal. But in these there is a greater approach to equality than in European countries; and in respect to all social customs, those traditional and inherited habits which have the force of laws, woman in this country enjoys an immense advantage over her sisters in the European nations. In Germany, Americans are always astonished at the comparatively menial domestic position which the wife holds toward her husband. And in England even the statute law (unless it has been changed within a very few years, of which I have not heard) allows a husband to imprison his wife, if he can show to a court that he has adequate reason for doing so; and it is not long ago that the Queen's Bench, in accordance with this law, actually remanded a woman, brought before the judges by habeas corpus, back to the custody of her husband for imprisonment in his own way for some "misdemeanor" of which she had been guilty. Such are the still vital relics existing in such countries of advanced civilization as England and Germany, of the primitive savage notion that woman was man's slave. There are some relics of this old ancestral condition still extant among us; but we have got much further away from them in our laws, and still more in our customs, than have the old countries of Europe. The newness of our nationality, so far removed from actual contact with foreign traditions, has done much for us in this regard. The freedom of our institutions has done still more. The Declaration of equal Independence, made by our fathers a century ago, has been applied to woman as well as to man; and the drift is toward giving her legal and civil as well as social equality with him.

Now, this freer and more independent position of the American woman is reflected upon the American girl. It begins in fact naturally when the girl begins to become the woman; and actually it often begins considerably sooner than that. So that there is a precocity in freedom and independence among American girls which is hazardous. There is a precocity of social life for young people among us that needs to be restrained rather than encouraged. That is, liberty always brings perils, which need not follow, which can be averted, but which must be watched and guarded against in order that they may be averted.

And the peril to young womanhood which follows the precocious social independence and freedom that American custom has granted, is not merely the moral danger immediately involved to womanly virtue,—the danger which to foreigners is the most obvious,—but it is the danger of educating girlhood to a comparatively low aim in life. The precocious stimulus of the social sentiments produces an unwholesome development of what may be called the external-social as distinguished from the domestic-social phases of life. There comes a fevered strain after social excitements and dissipations; discontent with the quieter, every-day satisfactions of home ensues; and ambition for the peculiarly feminine triumphs in the mixed circles of society becomes the controlling aim. These are the dangers that attend the larger social freedom which is permitted to girls in this country,—dangers to be best dealt with by wisely turning the liberty into more healthful channels, and so conquering them at their source. For, on the other hand, this liberty may be directed into available opportunity for broader and higher development. The American woman to-day has not to fit herself for merely a social or domestic position; or, fitting herself for something more, she may yet bring to that position, if events shall make that her chief place, a nobler aim than it has been wont to possess. With the larger freedom, larger opportunities for the activity and growth of her faculties are opening to her. The learned professions, so called, are all of them leaving at least their doors ajar, so that she may enter if she will, even if they do not welcome her. Many kinds of industry, heretofore closed against her, are now inviting the deft facility of her hands, the quickness and accuracy of her wits. Literature is rapidly becoming her province. The teacher's desk she almost monopolizes. Colleges are one after another inviting her entrance, where she shows herself the equal of the young men in scholarly capacity. Philanthropy is learning that she has special gifts for its ministrations, executive as well as sympathetic and inspiring; and places of philanthropic responsibility and trust, both private and public, are seeking her official services. On the platform, she competes with male orators in drawing audiences, and, no longer much helped by the curiosity to hear a woman speak in public, wins a hearing by the power of her eloquence or the wisdom and virtue of her thought. And therefore, though to sit worthily at the head of a household, and to wield all the mighty influences potent to control human destiny involved in that position, must still be the central seat of woman's throne and sovereignty, her aim in life may be immeasurably broadened and heightened by these new opportunities, and her power fitly to order and inspire the home, the centre of her sovereignty, may be vastly increased and ennobled by the wider outlook and the larger knowledge which the fitting of herself for these other responsibilities and services would necessarily bring. To enlarge and elevate one's aim in life, if it only be earnestly pursued, is to secure the education, the discipline, the growth and strengthening of character, adequate to the fulfilment of the aim. And then, even though all the special objects sought may not be reached in detail, that grandest object of all is reached,—the formation of strong, firmly centred, nobly guided character, which impresses its power on all human life around, purifies and invigorates the social atmosphere, and lifts all aims and causes with which it comes in contact to nobler achievement.

And some such position of influence and authority as this hints to me the conditions of the ideal American womanhood. I say American womanhood rather than simply womanhood, because, as I have pointed out, woman's career begins here with a larger liberty than elsewhere, and must needs develop, by the conditions of liberty, to a different, if not a larger opportunity. It is a liberty which, rightly used, will lead not to self-indulgence, not to mere gratification of social ambition, but to service,—and to service for the public good. In other words, the ideal American womanhood, so far from being immured within the four walls of a private dwelling, with no responsibilities nor interests extending beyond, will render back to those free institutions, which have given the basis and conditions of this womanhood, a fair equivalent in some kind of service that shall help better to shape those institutions themselves to the high uses of which they are capable.

Nor, in saying this, do I mean that woman in general will be extensively engaged in public official duties, nor engaged in any way so as to bring detriment upon the central genuine interests of the home. I believe, indeed, that in the coming time of the ideal womanhood woman will vote, not alone for school committees, but equally with man, on all questions that concern the well-being of society. But her vote will be only an incident in her public service, not the main feature of it. The ideal woman will read the political newspaper, and fully inform herself on pending political issues and matters of legislation. But the political newspaper will not be, as it is with too many male voters, her sole or chief reading. When competent and summoned by her fellow-citizens, she will undertake the duties of public office. But this need not remove her from her home duties more than the performance of similar duties by men takes them utterly away from their business; and, even when woman renders this service, it will not be her chief service to the public. Some women there may be, who, by special gifts, will be peculiarly fitted to discharge certain public functions, especially such offices as have a philanthropic object and specially concern the moral and social improvement of the community; and in such public services these exceptional women, who may not have much adaptation of temperament to purely domestic life or on whom no special domestic obligations longer rest, may find an honorable and useful career, from which sex should not preclude them. All this I allow and expect to come to pass.

Yet, with regard to the service to be rendered by woman in general to the public welfare and for the better sustenance of the free institutions under which she lives, I do not believe that the highest or chief form of it will be rendered by her holding of public office, nor by her voting, nor by her taking a special and active interest in a political campaign or in matters of legislation, though she may do, and the ideal woman will do, with intelligent interest all of these things; but, with regard to woman in general, the highest service, even when she is most enlightened and most public-spirited, which she can render to the State, will be through her potent sway from that central seat of her sovereignty, the home. The more she is enlightened, the more thoroughly she informs herself of public concerns, the more actively interested she becomes in practical questions of public welfare, the more intelligently she appreciates the political issues of her time, and the more ardently she desires to throw her influence into the scale for all measures of public order and righteousness,—that is, the nearer she approaches the goal of ideal womanhood (I am speaking now, remember, of woman in general, not of the exceptional women above referred to who may render an exceptional form of service),—the nearer woman in general comes to her ideal of womanhood and seizes the points of her real opportunity, the more will she incline, after faithfully discharging all the new public duties which the coming time will devolve upon her, to look to her home resources for the chief elements of her public power. Learning through her wider experience of public affairs what injustices exist on the statute-book and how heedless of the claims of justice even modern legislators are apt to be, she will turn with redoubled ardor to plant in the minds of those future voters who are now children under her roof ineradicable principles of right. Seeing through her new interest in the well-being of society what corruption and dishonesty prevail in politics and in the business world, she will come back from the polls or from the marts of trade to feel with increased intensity the sacred obligation and the inestimable privilege of applying all her motherly energies to educating at least one family to an incorruptible honesty. Discovering in her philanthropic services, private and public, that the one vice which causes more wretchedness and crime than any other is intemperance, while thankful and faithful to cast her vote and speak her word so as best to check this great evil, she will yet be more thankful that, by faithfulness in precept and example, she can instil principles of temperance into her children's minds, which shall effectually resist all the temptations of appetite. Finding that akin to this evil of intemperance is the evil of impurity,—the sin that not more surely destroys the virtue and reputation of the woman than it consumes the manliness of the man, the sin that casts its baleful shadow over all grades of society, that catches legislators in its snares, and carries its allurements even into the sanctuaries of religion,—returning back, our coming ideal woman, almost in despair, from her public efforts against this vice, she enters her own home with a deeper prayer and a more consecrated purpose effectually to guard in her sons' and daughters' hearts the first well-springs against this most dishonoring and suicidal of all vices. Seeing, in fine, that all the vices and all the crimes which disturb and imperil the order of society may be traced back to some home or the want of a home, she resolves that at least one home shall be a nursery of honest and virtuous citizenship. She has learned as the best lesson of all her new political knowledge that the home is the central citadel of free institutions; that, in a government emanating from the people, it is the homes that make the government; that the strength and prosperity of our national republic, which is only the co-perative aggregate of the homes of the land, depend upon the ability of the homes to educate good citizens.

And what the homes shall be depends, of course, upon both sides of their double-headed sovereignty; but it depends more on the wife and mother. Nature has made her the special priestess at this shrine. The future citizenship of the republic, the men and women who a generation hence are to determine its destiny, is in the shaping hands to-day of the young motherhood of the land. The mothers feed the coming republic from the breasts of their own life. They have the training of the first impulses of the coming voters. Our ideal woman will prize the ballot which the masculine voters at last will have conceded to her, thereby resigning the last vestige of the primitive epoch when woman was man's slave,—she will prize and use it for the beneficent power it will put into her hands. But she will prize more the sacred opportunity, which is hers by nature, of determining to justice and temperance and public honor and virtue the ballots of the coming generation. At the polls, depositing her own ballot, she is one citizen among many. It will count, so let her deposit it. But at the shrine of motherhood, bearing in her arms, training by her heart and brain, the future citizenship of the republic, she is more than Queen, and sways the destinies of her country. Whatever new responsibilities and services the better equipped woman of the future may assume for the welfare of the community around her, she will find, whether she be mother or only wife or sister or maiden aunt, that the home is still the base of all her supplies and resources, the central foundation of her supremest authority, and alike the fruitful source and conserving sustenance of all cultures and philanthropies, of all sound legislation, of all public and private virtue.

I began this discourse with the thought that I might speak, perhaps, somewhat at length of two illustrious American women who have died within the last month, and whose characters and careers, in their different yet harmonious ways, would exemplify the main point of my argument. I refer to Lydia Maria Child and Lucretia Mott. It is the memory of their example of womanhood that has inspired the course of my thought all through, and this may be a better testimony to the worth of their characters than anything I could write of the details of their daily living. It is rare that a nation is called to part with two women of such distinction and of such beneficent public influence in so short a space of time. Their names have been household words in our land for two generations. Both of them were preëminently philanthropists, devoted, consecrated from early life to every good cause involving the advancement of human rights, the amelioration of human existence. They were among the first to give themselves in this country to the service of the slave through joining the derided and assaulted cause of the abolitionists,—laying in their prime upon that altar the popularly attractive gifts already insuring a growing fame. And in that cause they never faltered nor tired nor swerved, whatever allurements might brightly promise or obstacles dismay, until victory was won. To the cause of peace, the interests of temperance, the elevation of woman, the promotion of theological and religious reform, they were also alike devoted. Indeed, you could name no object of interest to human progress, of concern for removing or alleviating any ills burdening mankind, which did not have the sympathies of their hearts and enlist the service of their brains. In religious thought, they stood among the pioneers. The one born of New England Puritanism, the other of Quakerism, while keeping the good in their inheritance, they advanced upon their birthright, stopped at the half-way house of no sectarian fellowship, and came in their last years to be known as representatives of Free Religion; though Mrs. Mott, however heretical she was deemed, had never lost her membership or rights as preacher in the Society of Friends. Both of them possessing remarkably clear intellect, quick and sagacious of thought as of heart, and working for the same objects and side by side in the same causes, they yet worked, according to their adaptability of talent and temperament, in very different ways,—the one, rarely writing anything for publication, by her persuasive voice in public speech; the other, shrinking from all public platforms and public places, by her equally persuasive and industrious pen. And yet these two women, beginning the consecration of themselves to public service, in their respective ways, even while in their girlhood, and continuing faithful to that consecration through a public service, the one of sixty, the other of seventy years,—dying at seventy-eight and eighty-eight,—never forgot, never neglected, never dishonored, the central duties and virtues of the home. Rather did they bring to them new honor. With Puritan and Quakerly fidelity, simplicity, exactness, temperance, moderation, did they order their households, and adorn them with the graces of loving-kindness and the beauty of holiness. So truly womanly were they that no one ever thought of charging that they "unsexed" themselves by their public services. They found no antagonism, no diverging, conflicting interests, between their private and their public duties. Rather did the two combine in a beautiful and mutually supporting harmony. The home was the vital centre whence went out the hallowing and benignant influences of all their public work, the hearth-stone where the live coals were gathered and kept aglow that were sent out on their winged words to fire the public heart with a deeper enthusiasm for righteousness. And from their public interests, their active sympathies and participations in philanthropic movements, there came back into their homes a loftier aim, a broader charity, and a more consecrated purpose to preserve all the home virtues and sanctities.

Long, therefore, may the names of these two women be household words in our American homes,—Lydia Maria Child and Lucretia Mott. Greatly has their native land been blessed by their long and well-filled years. Among the few foremost of all our American women must we place them for the contribution they have made by their example to the coming ideal of American womanhood.

A MAN in a prayer-meeting at Great Springs, Ga., declared that he was ready to die, and awaited the summons with impatience. He had barely uttered the sentiment, when a bullet crashed through the window and grazed his ear. A neighbor whom he had sued for debt had taken him at his word. He hastily hid himself under a bench.

CHRISTMAS.

We would not, and could not if we would, lessen the world-wide interest manifested from prehistoric ages in this day of common rejoicing, the day when the Sun of Heaven begins its annual return northward after the winter solstice. It matters not what national tradition, secular or religious, the day may be assumed to commemorate, whether it be the anniversary of the miraculous birth of Osiris, or that of Hercules or Bacchus or Adonis, or Mithra or Khrishna, or the Christ child, it is nature's ever-welcome guarantee of another seed-time and harvest. The wherefore that all these demi-gods had the same natal day, corresponding to our Christmas, is because they all had the same virgin mother, the constellation Virgo. Owing to the precession of the equinoxes, the constellation Virgo is now in the autumnal equinoctial sign. And, as it extends over more than forty-five degrees of the zodiac belt, it has been within the limits of this sign for about twenty-five hundred years. During all these years, the earth has always been on a direct line between the sun and some portion of this constellation at every vernal equinox. This overshadowing of the Celestial Virgin by the sun's vernal rays was the annual procreation of the sun's son, their common offspring on the earth. After the sun has passed through the six signs of the lower or southern heavens, and through three signs of the upper or northern heavens to its greatest declination north, it becomes apparently motionless for three days. This, to our pagan ancestors, was a time of fearful suspense. They not only feared the sun was leaving the earth during its prolonged declination; but, when it stood still, they mourned its death. The morning of the day when its first movement northward changed their mourning into feasting was celebrated by all nations as the anniversary of the accouchment of the Celestial Virgin. Hence, the resurrection of their god Sol from his annual death at the end of the winter solstice was simultaneous with the birth of his earthly son, the "man-child." But this infant representative of the sun's procreative power within the earth's northern hemisphere is always hidden until the vernal equinox, when the earth is again at the autumnal equinox. Here, on the celestial atlas, we find the son of the winged virgin, the immortal Hercules, who with one hand is dealing a death-blow upon the head of the great red dragon, the symbol of cold; while with the other he is dragging away the dog Cerberus, the symbol of darkness, thereby forcing the cold and darkness of winter from the northern heavens into the southern heavens, in order to maintain astronomic justice within the earth's northern and southern hemispheres.

However necessary the seasonal labors of this mediator during the earth's infancy, when mankind assumed that it was cradled in the "great deep" as incapable of self-provision as a human infant, and believed that the sun was obliged to make the entire circuit of the heavens, a journey of about two hundred and eighty millions of miles, daily, as well as annually, during which it must needs pass through the "underworld or infernal regions" in the lower heavens, over which the great serpent Hydra, whose deadly wound from the club of Hercules had become healed, presided with fiery opposition, these labors evidently ended when humanity attained a more mature plane of thought. The fact that the earth now attains its needed quota of light and darkness, of heat and cold, by its own axial rotations and revolutions around the sun, is a significant hint that its human inhabitants should depend on their own self-provisional powers rather than on heavenly or miraculous aids. Although the sun is the most glorious and most beneficent object known or knowable, and its annual return northward promises the greatest boon vouchsafed to man, yet it is in no way profited by either adoration or sacrifice. The radiation of its heat and light is as much a necessity of its nature as their reception is to the nature of its terrestrial offspring. This is equally true of each more remote ancestral sun, and of each ideal of its creative power. But our fellow-beings cannot only be benefited, but ourselves enriched, by opening the mines of love within our pent-up hearts, the truly enjoyable fruits of which multiply in the ratio of their reciprocal impartation and reception. And no more appropriate day can be selected on which to bestow gifts or exchange mementoes than on our long-cherished and time-honored anniversary, Merry Christmas.

THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

As an opposing force is driven back in the field, it is common to throw up new ramparts and walls of defence in which to repeat and renew attack upon the enemy. The "Monday Lectureship" is one of the latest resorts of this nature of the orthodox camp in New England for the defence of "the faith once delivered to the saints," and still complacently supposed in their special keeping. Its origin was as follows: In the winter of 1876-77, Dwight L. Moody conducted his popular revival, and Joseph Cook began a course of Monday lectures in Boston. Though equally stalwart champions of Orthodoxy, they were men of quite different mental characteristics and attainments, and naturally attracted as unlike classes of hearers. Both were aided in their work by the money and influence of the entire orthodox force of the city. The Moody excitement had spent its force by the return of spring, and like other passing events of the season was soon forgotten, by the general public at least. Mr. Cook's would have shared a similar fate but for the fact that he renewed his lectures in the autumn, and continued them through the winter as well as the succeeding one. Mr. Cook dashed before the public of Boston with an audacious air of self-assurance, scholastic display and pretence, which for the time produced a somewhat dazzling effect. He stood by his guns, and fired heavy charges of what was intended to pass for scientific Orthodoxy at the citadel of unorthodox science and Liberalism. But it did not yield, and he retired to Europe. The Monday lectureship has not however been abandoned. This season the general plan and purpose is the same as heretofore; but the lectures are by different persons, selected from among the ablest representatives of Orthodoxy of the country. The third lecture of the present course was delivered by the Rev. Thomas Guard (Methodist), of Baltimore, December 20. The subject was "Christianity and the Mental Activity of the Age." Dr. Guard said: "The fact of the mental activity of the age is a patent one, and he endeavored to convince his hearers that Christianity was the patentee; in other words, the cause of this activity. In lands where to-day its [Christianity's] activity is the highest, the lives of men are the noblest and most humanitarian. Japan has become thoughtful in the highest sense where Christianity has entered. China is breaking up and becoming a trouble even to the Pacific coast, because Christianity has entered; and Christ is recognized in Calcutta by the Deists and the founder of a new type of religion, who, with Renan, finds himself fascinated by the character and teachings of Christ. It is so to-day. If we want to find out in what lands science has passed muster, in what lands it is most eminent and most carefully scrutinized, if we want to find out the lands where art is most developed, where commerce is most enterprising, where there are the riches of art, glorious conservatories of music, then we shall visit the lands in which Christianity has found a place, and to whose people it has been transmitting its influence from generation to generation."

This may be "orthodox," but is it correct? From Christian missionaries of the East comes the discouraging wail that Christianity can do nothing with the heathen there, because native scholars come back from Europe and report that at home Christianity is honey-combed with heresy, and is rapidly dissolving under the rays of the sun of this "mental activity." The "Board of Foreign Missions" exists chiefly as a charitable bureau for the benefit of the board of its "foreign" missionaries.

What, then, is the secret of mental activity and human progress?

Necessity is the old, old mother of invention. Human need is the instigator of human improvement. Mind grows, because man wants. Abolish hunger, and the vast machinery of industry will cease to move. Strike from human nature the love of the beautiful, and art will die. Wipe from the human brain the faculty of imagination, and there will be no more scientific investigation.
