Human nature is older than Christianity, than all the theologies, and is the child of none of them. They, indeed, are its offspring, and mark its steps of progress along the far-reaching roads of time. For the first time in the history of the human race, the need of a religion for this life and this world is being discussed in our own day and generation. Christianity was promulgated not as a kingdom of this world, but of a world to come. It came as a dream f future bliss in which those who were poor here should be rich there, in which those who were willing to bear persecution now in the name of their chief should be rewarded there. It appealed not to the brain, but to the heart. It was a religion not of thought, but of emotion. It grew not among the thinkers, but among the wayside plodders. And when, after three hundred years, it became the religion of the Roman Empire, it was not because it had converted the brains of Rome, but because a shrewd, fighting demagogue saw an opportunity to augment the force of his army by proclaiming himself a Christian. Then the mental activity of the Roman world was quenched, and the name of "Philosopher" became a sign for proscription and death. When Christianity became supreme, we had the "dark ages." But Christianity spread still better in the "dark." It went abroad upon the pikes and swords of conquering armies. Europe was Christianized by the sword. The heathen hordes of its wildernesses might forswear their sacred groves and altars, deny their strong Thor and mighty Woden, and accept Christ in baptism, or lose their heads; and it is matter of history that many of them chose martyrdom rather than apostasy.

The dark ages saw the first gleam of returning light flashing up from the hated infidel followers of Mahomet and the despised and persecuted Jews. As the intellectual activity of *anti*christian and *ir*religious heathen penetrated Europe, Christian rulers became infected with its fascinations; and in time Europe woke to the fact that the cultivation of ignorance, bigotry, and hate was not the will of God. But all mental growth was still circumscribed by theological conceptions. The arena of modern scientific investigation is marked all over with reminders of the battle that was waged between its champions and the leaders of Christianity. Little by little science demonstrated the truth of its positions, and inch by inch Christianity was forced to yield its claim of infallibility. The geology and astronomy of the Christianity of three hundred years ago were but little like the "science" that Christian theologians are busy "reconciling" with their "religion" of to-day.

Every new truth had to run a muck through Christian lands, and many a brave thinker lost his life in carrying his new thought to the world. But the torch of investigation was made of material older than theology, and harder to destroy. It often flickered, but never went clean out. At last, its heat sundered the ties of Church and State, and the human mind was free. Thenceforth, progress was rapid.

The growth of mental development has wrought all the grand changes that contrast the humanity of to-day with that of a barbarous past. And, with the splendid growth of mind, love of toleration, charity for other opinions than our own, has ripened to one of the very choicest fruits of civilization. To this is due the fact that science and scientific thought, so long opposed and persecuted by Christianity, has not in its day of triumph retaliated upon its persecutors. Industry, science, art, literature, are the legitimate fruits of mental activity that existed, grew, and spread largely, in spite of what must be called Christianity, though I would not wish to be understood as condemning Christianity for all time because at a past time it was too short-sighted to see that the fullest freedom of mind is necessary to the development of God's purpose in the destiny of humanity. That Christianity is to be found in its fullest splendor in countries where mental activity and civilization mark their highest water line is proof not that Christianity has civilized the world, but that the free and natural development of the faculties with which God has endowed mankind has civilized Christianity. If the mental development that has made our grand civilization had been accompanied by the same spirit of persecution that dwelt in the heart of Christianity when it held both the spiritual and temporal keys of the human household, when Church and State were one, and that one the Church, Christianity would have been driven from Europe long ago. It has been permitted to remain, and it has grown broader and better from contact with free minds. It has modified itself largely to suit the mental advance of the ages, and rejects to-day what a few centuries ago it defended with torture. And the time is sure to come when it will have ceased to be even the conception that fills Dr. Guard's mind to-day. Therefore, it is not necessary that the Monday lectureship should attempt to support Christianity by any misrepresentation of historical facts. The truth is best. Let us have that, or nothing. Do not drive us to despise Christianity by giving it a false defence. Allowed to grow with the growing mind of man, it may accomplish much. Put it upon the stilts of arrogant pretence, and it will fall into disrepute and ruin. In the day when Dr. Guard, in the fulfilment of his own conception of the destiny of the human soul, passes into the presence of his Saviour in heaven, he may be surprised to hear the founder of Christianity accuse him of bearing false witness against his kingdom on earth. And if he should then say, "Lord, when did I bear false witness to thy Church and thy Kingdom or to thee?" he may possibly hear the unwelcome reply, "Inasmuch as you did it to the least of these my children in Boston, you did it unto me."

POEMS. By Edwin Arnold. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

This little volume is a reprint of Mr. Arnold's earlier poems; and it will meet with grateful acceptance, though not perhaps with the remarkable success accorded to The Light of Asia. The principal poem in the book is "The Indian Song of Songs," a translation from the Sanskrit of the Gita Govinda, written by Jayadeva, 1150 A.D. It is one of the most popular poems in India to-day, not so much for its mystical meaning, which is its chief beauty, as for its ardent love-pictures. It is a Sanskrit idyl, representing under the parable of a human passion the soul in its relations with earthly and celestial beauty. Krishna, an incarnation of the god Vishnu, at once human and divine, is first seen attracted by the pleasures of the senses, personified by the shepherdesses in the wood.

> "Krishna, made for heavenly things,
> 'Mid those woodland singers sings;
> With those dancers dances featly,
> Gives back soft embraces sweetly.
> * * * * * * *
> And this shadowed earthly love
> In the twilight of the grove,
> Dance and song and soft caresses,
> Melting looks and tangled tresses,
> Jayadev the same hath writ,
> That ye might have gain of it,
> Sagely its deep sense conceiving
> And its inner light believing;
> How that Love, the mighty master,
> Lord of all the stars that cluster
> In the sky, swiftest and slowest,
> Lord of highest, Lord of lowest,
> Manifests himself to mortals,
> Winning them towards the portals
> Of his secret House, the gates
> Of that bright Paradise which waits
> The wise in love. Ah, human creatures!
> Even your phantasies are teachers.
> Mighty Love makes sweet in seeming
> Even Krishna's woodland dreaming;
> Mighty Love sways all alike
> From self to selfishness."

Krishna begins to discriminate, to perceive that he has lavished love, which is the inmost principle of the soul, on the sensual, the false, and transient. He is attracted by the spirit of intellectual and moral beauty, personified by Radha. Or, to use the imagery of the poem, Krishna thrones Radha in his heart as the only one who can really satisfy his aspirations. But not until the soul of its own accord becomes filled with the desire of true love does Radha grant to Krishna the full sight of her charms. The imagery of the poem is Oriental in its luxuriousness, and its glowing pictures are more like earthly passion than the intellectual yearning they are meant to symbolize. But, after repeated readings, its spiritual significance shines through clearly. And, even as a love-poem, its charm is undeniable. Its melodious versification delights the ear, its tender sweetness touches the heart.

Jayadev introduces the closing Sarga thus:—

> "So they met, and so they ended
> Pain and parting, being blended
> Life with life,—made one for ever
> In high love; and Jayadeva
> Hasteneth on to close the story
> Of their bridal grace and glory."

This Sarga is a striking illustration of the manner in which sensuous imagination mingles itself with the highest truth in Oriental thought. The song of the maidens reminds one of Tennyson's "Maud":—

"So follow! while the flowers break forth
In white and amber clusters,
At the breath of thy pure presence,
And the radiance of thy brow;
Oh, follow where the Asokas wave
Their sprays of gold and purple,
As if to beckon thee the way
That Krishna passed but now.
* * * * * * * * *
And loose thy jewelled girdle
A little, that its rubies
May tinkle softest music too,
And whisper thou art near;
Though now, if in the forest
Thou should'st bend one blade of Kusha
With silken touch of passing foot,
His heart would know and hear;
Would hear the wood-buds saying,
'It is Radha's foot that passes';
Would hear the wind sigh love-sick,
'It is Radha's fragrance, this';
Would hear thine own heart beating
Within thy panting bosom;
And know thee coming, coming,
His—ever,—ever—his."

Another charming poem in the volume is a translation from the Greek of Musæus, "Hero and Leander." Comparing the mellow tints of this poem to the morning glory of Homer, Mr. Symonds calls it "a day of sunlight in the November of Greek poetry." It is thoroughly Greek in its simplicity and unaffected natural feeling. Hero dwelt at Sestos. Leander lived at Abydos, and both were "exceeding fair stars of the two cities." Hero had a tower outside of the town, and prayed daily to Aphrodite and Eros that she might escape the sweet pains of love. But it happened that, when the festival of Adonis came round, she went forth to Aphrodite's temple, and met Leander face to face. The description of Hero's beauty is exquisite. I quote the closing lines:—

"Nathless her cheek was touched with tender dye
Such as new rose-buds have,—not white nor red,
But sunlit snow: in sooth, you would have said
She was all made of rose-leaves, she did show
So fair and fine under her thin gown's flow."

Others admired her beauty, but Leander felt that "he must have her or die." His eyes betrayed his secret; and she, too, felt love's power, revealing what she coyly sought to hide. The scene in the temple between the lovers is charming. There is no superfluous sentiment, but the plastic figures are animated; and we have a vivid picture of Hero's shrinking and Leander's passionate insistance, until at last the climax is reached. There is no suspicion of sensuality. Everything springs from the situation naturally, in the hands of this Greek artist. The rest of the story is told with simple directness. Since there is no other way for the lovers to meet, Leander protests that he will swim across from Abydos to Sestos, bidding Hero light a lamp on her tower to guide him through the gloom. Thus they meet many times. But finally winter came, and the sea grew stormy; and Hero love-impelled lit her lamp, and Leander was drowned. Morning came, cold and gray; and the sea washed up to the foot of her tower the dead body of Leander. Without a cry, she flung herself downward; and the two were not divided in death. Leigh Hunt sings:—

"I never think of poor Leander's fate,
And how he swam, and how his bride sat late,
And watched the dreadful dawning of the light,
But as I would of two that died last night,
So might they now have lived, and so have died,
The story's heart t me still beats against its side."

MEMOIR OF GOVERNOR ANDREW, WITH PERSONAL REMINISCENCES. By Peleg W. Chandler. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

The Memoir contained in this volume was prepared by Mr. Chandler for the Massachusetts Historical Society, an interval of twelve years elapsing between his appointment for the task and its fulfilment. Notwithstanding this abundance of time for preparation, the Memoir is much better in its spirit than in its literary form. It is truly remarkable for the lack of order and sequence with which it is written. It is made sufficiently plain, however, that a man was here of no ordinary force of character, and admirably qualified for the special work which fell to him as one of the three great "war-governors" of the North. "His ways," says Mr. Chandler, "were not the ways of politicians, his methods were not their methods; and he did not count much on their support, or fear the opposition of those who were governed by ideas of mere expediency in emergencies involving principles and requiring the earnest efforts and unselfish devotion of men who hoped for ultimate success by a firm reliance upon truth and justice. He looked with something like contempt and even abhorrence upon all make-shift attempts at compromise where the great interests of humanity were to be sacrificed to the pressing emergencies which are the refuge and final destruction of the weak and cowardly."

Following the Memoir are some seventy-five pages of "Reminiscences." Here the rambling method of Mr. Chandler's composition is not so disagreeable, and the revelation of the man is more satisfactory than in the more studied and dignified performance which has the place of honor in the book. A good deal is said of Governor Andrew's story-telling faculty, but the samples given are none of them first-rate. The best is the account of the little girl who, in trying to climb a peaked fence, fell and was caught and held by an under-garment. Giving a bachelor friend a thrilling account of the catastrophe, she ended, "I should certainly have lost my life but for Providence—and my drawers!"

The two hitherto unpublished orations are pleasant reading, but the "valedictory address" is the weightiest utterance that ever proceeded from the Governor's lips. It is a remarkable commentary on much of the political mismanagement of the last fourteen years in the reconstruction of the South, and reads very strangely in comparison with the furious declamation of Mr. Boutwell's last pronunciamento in the pages of the North American Review.

REMINISCENCES OF A JOURNALIST. By Charles T. Congdon. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1880.

In this book of nearly four hundred pages (price $1.50), a veteran journalist gives, in a delightful manner, what he remembers of some of the leading men and events during the last fifty years. These chapters were originally published, a year ago, in the New York Tribune, the paper with which Mr. Congdon has been connected for many years. As there published, they attracted much attention, and were often copied and commented on in the other public journals. At the request of the publisher, they have been printed in the present handsome form, with occasional additions. They are certainly worthy of this permanent preservation, for their delightful accounts of other days, their wise estimates of many public men, and their very valuable hints about the duties and trials of the newspaper editor.

Mr. Congdon has not attempted to write an autobiography, as most men would have done; but he has given his recollections and impressions concerning those matters coming within his knowledge which are of permanent importance. He describes New Bedford, his native town, as it was in boyhood, and the printing-office in which he worked as a boy. He writes then of the Unitarian church of that town, and of the famous preachers he heard there, including Emerson. In successive chapters, he traces the growth of political parties, and describes the men connected with them. There are also some captivating chapters on the literary men he has known. Nearly a dozen of the twenty-eight chapters are devoted to Mr. Greeley, the Tribune office and workers, and to the profession of journalism. On this last subject, Mr. Congdon gives some most excellent advice to young men desiring to enter the profession. His discussion of the merits of this new calling, its responsibilities and opportunities, is full of the wisdom of many years experience. This is one of those gossipy books about people everybody enjoys; while this one has the merit of telling very many things worth knowing.

CERTAIN MEN OF MARK: STUDIES OF LIVING CELEBRITIES. By George Makepeace Towle. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

Mr. Towle is a very bright and pleasant writer, though his style is not in all respects commendable. Especially bad is his habit of jumbling together a lot of adjectives, three are his favorite number, without regard to either euphony or climax. But he has something to say about each and every one of his eight celebrities. They are well chosen; the first four particularly, and John Bright, the seventh. The first four are Gladstone, Bismarck, Gambetta, Beaconsfield. Each picture in turn is set in a frame of personal reminiscence which is very effective. There is a brief summary of the man's career, and an estimate of his character also in each case. Mr. Towle is a good hero-worshipper, but he can be critical of his heroes. We have an idea that he is not overcritical in regard to picturesque details. It is not matter of fact to speak of the Austrian Emperor as going to Francis Deák's "garret." His garret was probably as good a room as the best hotel in Buda-Pesth could furnish. Nor did the Emperor press his honors on the great Hungarian statesman, as Mr. Towle narrates. He asked the Count Andrassy what he should do for Deák, and the Count answered, "For others you might do everything, for Deák nothing." But such aberrations are comparatively harmless. The book is very readable, and fills an empty niche. The chapters, beside those named already, are upon Castelar, Victor Hugo, and "Three Emperors,"—William, Francis Joseph, and Alexander II.

A GREAT BELL FOR ST. PAUL'S.—The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral have started a movement for obtaining a large bell, which shall be worthy of that edifice. The largest bell in the cathedral at present weighs little more than five tons; and the cathedral authorities desire one of ten or twelve tons' weight, such as many of the chief cathedrals on the Continent have. York Cathedral has a bell weighing eleven tons, and at Westminster there is one of thirteen and one-half tons. A bell of twelve tons' weight would cost about £2,500. Of this sum, the Dean and Chapter have already collected half; and they ask for public subscriptions to complete the amount.

THE MUSES.

Thus all day long till sunset they banqueted,
Nor failed then the equally distributed feast,
Nor the beauteous lyre, which Apollo wields,
Nor the Muses, who sang alternately with sweet voices.
—Homer.

Through all the long Olympian day,
In Homer's verse, they sing for aye,
With golden fillets round their hair,
Harmonia's unwed daughters fair.

With measured step and measured tone,
The hearts of gods they made to glow,
While earth and ocean stretched below
In storm and shine their festal joy,
And lyre-god's spell and nectar's flow
O'er sorrow, pain, and death up-buoy.
Polymnia immortal legends told,
Rose-crowned, with gleaming hoop of gold;
Urania nightly brooded o'er,
Apart and hushed, her astral lore;
While Clio on her scrolls sublime
The fasti kept of vanished time;
In groves and glens, bards prayed to thee
To grant them something of the spell
Which hovered round thy golden shell,
Lyric maid, Melpomenè!

The festal sisters all the time
Held not Olympian heights sublime.
When spread ambrosial night its shade,
Theophanies to man they made:
To Hesiod dreaming 'mong his flocks,
With winged and noiseless steps they came,
Illumining Bœotia's rocks.
Amid the dewy darkness lone,
Their voices rose in choral hymn;
While awed earth echoed every tone,
The awakened poet caught the flame
Of song thus in the mid ight dim.

Keeping unsoiled their sandals bright,
To their eternal home-tead then,
From earth, low-lying haunt of men,
The Muses soared with buoyant flight.
The Olympian revel rang again
With voices in alternate strain;
Bloomed Hebe's brow with violets bound,
While cups of nectar circled round;
And swept his chords the bright day long,
The golden-shafted King of Song.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 30, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for 1881 will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution :—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

HOW IT MAY BE PREVENTED.

We announced last week the contemplated sale of the Parker Memorial Hall in Boston and the loss of the property to its present uses. We wrote what we then printed without consultation with any of the proprietors of the building, except so far as we were authorized by one of them to state the fact. We wrote as we did solely from our individual interest that Parker's memory should suffer no degradation in Boston, and that the society which he founded and made famous should still preserve the continuity of his work.

Through the same interest, and on the same individual responsibility alone, we return to the subject. We trust that none of the proprietors will feel that we are intermeddling with what does not concern us. If there are any who so feel, we can only say that, when they built the Hall and publicly dedicated it to Theodore Parker's memory, they made it a matter of public concern, and specially invited the interest of all who hold Parker's life and work in grateful regard. Indeed, we must assume that there is not one of them who can now wish to alienate that interest or to do aught contrary to it; and that the sale of the building is contemplated solely because they do not at present see how honestly and usefully to keep it for the purposes intended. But, so long as the question of disposing of the Hall is an open one, we for our part cannot keep silent. If the liberal public allows the sale under the circumstances and for the reasons given, we believe that a flagrant wrong will be committed against Parker's memory. And we cannot think that the proprietors will go forward to complete the sale without first appealing to that public who share their interest in the building, to save them from the necessity of parting with it. The liberal public will not absolve them from the obligations they assumed, if they now act without offering in some way an opportunity to save Memorial Hall to the uses for which it was erected.

In order to prevent the consummation of the sale, as we understand the conditions of the problem, two things are essential. First, the building should be freed from the mortgage upon it. This amounts to forty thousand dollars. The sum seems a large one to collect by gratuitous donations, yet it is not an impossible one. It is, however, too large to collect, within a desirable time, by any ordinary plan of general small subscriptions. The need is for men and women who will give their thousands, and close this matter up in a week; for men and women on the spot who will say that Theodore Parker's memory shall not go a-begging in Boston. We believe that the present proprietors will meet such donors in a liberal and generous spirit; that they will be ready to do their part to save the property, devising a plan by which the new contributors shall be admitted as proprietors. Two days ought to suffice to do the business. There is wealth enough among the liberal thinkers in Boston and vicinity to do it, if the wealth can only be touched by a proud and generous sense of responsibility. Smaller donations, of course, need not be rejected; and, if the persons for the large contributions do not appear, then we hope an appeal will be made for any sums to Theodore Parker's friends wherever found, and that Boston will be gracefully asked to accept the memorial to its great preacher and philanthropist free from debt.

But a second requisite for permanently saving the Hall to the uses for which it was built is to revive the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, which occupies it on Sunday. Indeed, were this society in a flourishing condition, we suppose the question of a sale of the property would not be raised for a moment. So long as the Hall is wanted for the uses of the society, the debt would in some way be carried and the interest paid. But the society seems rapidly approaching dissolution. The history of the decline is a long story, and need not be entered upon now. The fact of the decline is now the imminent point to be considered. Cannot the decline be stayed? Cannot extinction be prevented? Cannot a new prosperity, new blood, be infused into the famous organization? Let the old friends of Parker in Boston, and his new admirers, and all who would be sorry to have this society go down, come together for an earnest conference, to determine how it shall be kept alive. We believe it can be done. New methods demanded by the exigencies of the new time must be grafted on the organization, a new membership invited and set to work, a new spirit infused into the old machinery. Why should not Boston have a Free Religious Society doing such work as Felix Adler is doing in New York? The weak condition of Free Religion in Boston, in respect to local organization, has long been a cause of reproach. There are numerous individual believers in it, but they have not learned how to come together in work. Matters have now come to an exigency which should arouse them to a sense of their public responsibility. They must move now, and courageously, if they would save anything.

Friends of Parker, and friends of Free Religion in Boston, rally together for the honor of his name and for a worthy practical representation of your ideas. Let the New Year begin with a new hope, and with an energetic act that shall insure the hope's fulfilment.

IF it were not for the gross injustice, which may have some possible practical effect, there would be something supremely ludicrous in the anti-Jewish movement in Prussia. A Berlin correspondent of the Nation points out that, "of forty-five millions of Germans, not more than half a million form the Jewish population." Yet the address which accompanies the petition to the government for abridging the civil privileges of the Jews describes the German Christians as in "thraldom" to the rule of the Jews. "The whole German people is represented as suffering under the dominion of the most overbearing intruder." One would suppose from the terms used that the Jews had established an iron oligarchy and reduced the forty-four and one-half millions of their Christian fellow-countrymen to serfdom. If a half million Jews have been able to effect this, then they have shown even more mental capacity than their intellectually bright and vigorous race has been credited with. Considering their numbers, they do furnish a large number of men for offices of public trust and responsibility, and they have great financial power. But we have yet to see any allegations showing that they have illegally abused any of their trusts or used their power for any end against the good of Germany. The persecution of them is as mean and cowardly as it is unjust.

BIGOTRY is not yet dead. It is reported that some of the Christian ministers in Pennsylvania refused to read Governor Hoyt's Thanksgiving proclamation from their pulpits, after he had changed the phrase "Christian Commonwealth" to "Commonwealth of freemen." Such ministers appear to think that no people have any political rights in this country except Evangelical Christians. Bigotry like this would openly persecute, if it had the opportunity. We would quite as lief that the administration of our government should go into the hands of the Roman Catholics as into the hands of such narrow-minded Protestants. But, if the people shall faithfully maintain the central principle of our free institutions, neither of these fates will be allowed.

THE Committee appointed at the Chicago Conference on State Secularization for preparing an address on the subject, to the people of the United States, have attended to that duty and issued an address, which is printed on an extra broadside of the Chicago Times, and occupies twelve and one-half closely printed columns of that paper. From the hasty glance we have been able to give it (for it has but just come to hand), we judge it to be an able document, elaborating in detail the complete argument for State Secularization in this country. It is too long to print at once in the Index, but we may be able to give it to our readers by and by in instalments. We hope its length will not deter people from reading it in the Times print of December 25.

IT is to be presumed that orthodox people as a class are not friendly to Sunday papers. At any rate, some have been very pronounced in their opposition to them. In the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Associations, it is common to leave out of their files those published on this day. The Chicago Alliance, the organ of Professor Swing, we notice has determined to strain a point in this matter. It advertises that hereafter that paper containing the sermons of Swing, Thomas, and Lorimer will be delivered in Chicago on Sunday afternoon, after morning service, to its subscribers. Evidently, much depends in such cases upon who is the publisher.

WE are glad to note by the advertisement of Lockwood, Brooks & Co., in our present issue, that a new edition of Mr. John Weiss' posthumously published book, The Immortal Life, is demanded, and will soon be supplied. The public interested in such themes are discovering that this is a book specially timely and of high value. It preserves Mr. Weiss' ripest thoughts on a favorite topic.

OUR good neighbor of the Investigator shows so much resentment at being entitled "Reverend" that we suspect he is not one, after all. Of course, genuine "Reverends" never lose temper. His usually calm spirit was so perturbed at seeing the copy of his own style that he appears entirely to have overlooked the logical point of our article.

THE EDUCATIONAL PROBLEM.

The many articles of recent appearance upon the subject of public education show that the force of facts which have been for some time known is beginning to be felt. The discussion has not begun too soon, and cannot go forward too rapidly; for the conflicting questions involved will require, we believe, a long time for solution. None of the contributions to the discussion which we have thus far seen consider more than a portion of the factors of the entire problem. It is best, perhaps, that this should be the case. The many distinct points involved can thus be presented with greater clearness. President Hayes, in his last message and in some recent speeches, calls for better education among the Indians and in the South, but fails to tell us what he means by education or how he would go to work. He suggests indeed some form of government appropriation, but fails to say in what manner it should be applied. Apparently, as is the case with many others, he recognizes the existence of a bad state of affairs, but really knows very little of the nature of the problems pertaining to it. That there may be good reasons for government provision for Indian education, we fully believe, aside from any question of particular kind of education, since the Indians are really wards of the nation, and exceptionally related to it; but we can scarcely conceive of anything more inherently mischievous, or more sure to be disastrous in result, than a system of national education, which seems to be hinted at by the President and is openly advocated by some writers.*

Town and State education, moreover, are everywhere badly complicated by the opposition of the Catholics to any kind of public education which they do not control. The seriousness of this special feature of the problem we do not think has been sufficiently considered. The opposition of the Catholics may ultimately overthrow altogether any system of public education. While we do not really look for this result, its possibility is near enough to demand grave attention, and it can be averted only by energetic measures.

Mr. Richard Grant White believes (North American Review for December) that our public school system is a deplorable failure. He states his conclusion more broadly, we believe, than the facts will justify, although many of his criticisms are undoubtedly correct. But he proposes no remedy worth considering. He would confine public education to those for whom it was first intended, the children of the poor, who should be instructed in the elements only of reading, writing, and arithmetic; but how they should be instructed he does not say, and does not appear to know. The bottom has fallen out of the present system: this he is certain about, and therefore desires as little of it as possible.

Mr. C. F. Adams, Jr., however (Harper's for November), while anticipating most of Mr. White's conclusions, though not affirming them so unqualifiedly, has considered positive remedies. He proposes revolutionary methods of teaching, but believes that it will take a generation to prepare teachers for these methods, and to prepare the public to accept the teachers. He does not discuss the limits or subjects of public instruction.

Professor Adler's contribution to the discussion (Index, December 2) is in substantial agreement with Mr. Adams' criticisms, so far as these go. But Professor Adler does not believe in waiting a whole generation for the general introduction of reform: he believes that a great deal may be done at once. And he adds to Mr. Adams' revolutionary methods of teaching a yet more revolutionary feature, that of industrial education. And his contribution to the discussion is backed up by an attempt to put his theories into practice, and to establish a model school. His experiment is confined to the children of workingmen; but we receive the impression (perhaps incorrectly) from his lecture that he would introduce the same system everywhere, if possible. What we should like to receive now from Professor Adler would be a clear statement of the extent to which he would carry his system. Should it be carried beyond elementary instruction? Should it be of universal application? Should it be supported by public funds? If this last question be answered in the affirmative, should a similar support be extended to Catholic schools, on the supposition that the consciences of the Catholic and of the professor have equal rights? These questions, we believe, fairly considered, would lead to some fundamental principles of education not yet stated, or at least which we have not yet seen stated.

No discussion, however, in our belief, can be fundamental which fails to recognize one fact which is ignored in all the above essays; namely, that there is a science of government as well as a science of education, and that the principles of the science of government have never yet in this country been correctly applied to the subject of public education. A mistake here, moreover, in the institution of any proposed reforms, may be productive of vast calamities. We should very much like to read on this point a frank presentation of the opinions of both Mr. Adams and Professor Adler; but we very greatly doubt if the opinions would be in accord.

NOTES OF SCIENCE.

SCARCELY a month passes without some alteration in our conceptions of the behavior of matter. For these changes, the allied labors of the chemist and physicist are chiefly responsible. A short time ago, for instance, Professor Carnelly printed a little paragraph, saying that numerous experiments had led him to the following conclusions. 1. "In order to convert a gas into a liquid, the temperature must be below a certain point, otherwise no amount of pressure is capable of liquefying the gas. 2. In order to convert a solid into a liquid, the pressure must be above a certain point, . . . otherwise no amount of heat will melt the substance." Admitting the correctness of this second conclusion, the possibility was foreseen of the existence of "solid ice at temperatures far above the ordinary melting-point"; and he subsequently succeeded in obtaining "solid ice at temperatures so high that it was impossible to touch it without burning one's self." We do not propose to describe the controversy initiated by these statements. It is not yet ended, and Professor Carnelly has not yet published the details of his experiments; but it seems to be generally conceded that we may hereafter speak of red-hot ice without perpetrating a very great "bull." Solids seem to need what Mr. Aitken calls a "free surface" in order to pass from one condition to another. "As to what the freezing, melting, and boiling points are when these free surfaces are absent, we have at present no knowledge whatever." Instances of this kind seem to show that we are just touching the skirts of knowledge, and should suggest a little modesty in the setting forth of our final theologies and absolute philosophies.

A VERY simple explanation seems to have been discovered at last for the mysterious phenomena of fascination, especially as illustrated in the charming of birds by snakes. A gentleman at Fontainebleau watched the operations of a snake, which by swinging its body to and fro was successfully fascinating a greenfinch. He rescued the bird at the last moment by driving away the snake; and the bird, which had fallen to the ground in spasms, subsequently recovered and was allowed to fly away. We quote the next few sentences: "Now, while following the motions of the snake and bird, I experienced a singular sensation. I felt giddy. A squeezing like an iron hoop pressed in my temples, and the ground seemed to me to be heaving up and down. In fact, the sensation was quite analogous to that experienced on a beginning of sea-sickness. From these facts, would it not seem probable that fascination is nothing more nor less than an extreme fatigue of the optic nerve, produced by a rapid gyratory motion of a shining object, and resulting in a nervous attack and a coma. Curiosity rivets at first the attention of the bird, unconscious of any danger; and, when giddiness warns him of his peril, it is too late." Of several attempted explanations of fascination recently published, this seems to be the most satisfactory.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Alcohol and Insanity.

THE rapid increase of insanity in recent years, requiring old asylum buildings to be enlarged and new ones constructed in many portions of our country' suggests inquiry concerning the cause or causes thereof. In a late able paper, read before the Connecticut Medical Society, upon "The Insane Diathesis," Dr. Henry P. Stearns, of Hartford, calls attention to the effects of alcohol upon the general system, and to the fact that "its primary effect is that of one of the active stimulants, both to the circulatory and nervous systems, and as such, when long and continuously used, must have a demoralizing effect upon these systems." He adds, with great significance, that, "while probably there is much less alcohol used among the more intelligent classes to-day than there was fifty years ago, we must bear in mind, first, that society to-day is reaping the harvest of its use fifty years ago in the form of a nervous system inclined to disease; and, second, that there is an increased use of it among the young, especially in all our large towns and cities." In corroboration of this view, he says: "Let any one pass through the principal streets and drinking-saloons of any of our large towns and cities, during an evening from eight to eleven o'clock, and I think he will be astonished, unless already familiar with the state of the case, at the number of young men and boys, from the age of sixteen to twenty-four, he will find engaged in drinking beer or wines, and enveloped in the fumes of tobacco." This timely admonition from a medical expert, concerning one of the most prolific causes of the modern increase of insanity, should be heard and pondered throughout the land.—National Temperance Advocate.

A Nervous People.

EXCELLENT medical authority asserts that the constant strain of business, added to the dryness of our climate, has so changed the constitution that it is impossible for us to do what our fathers did before us safely. "We are," says Dr. Beard, "ten degrees more sensitive to cold than they were," as the cases of sunstroke and heat prostration bear evidence. There is an immense increase in neuralgia, sick headache, hay-fever, nervous exhaustion, and especially in dyspepsia, in itself the potent source of a host of physical and mental irritants and distresses. Now, with such systems as we have, high-strung, nervous, and irritable, the use of stimulants cannot be otherwise than injurious. It is impossible to use them as they were used in the days gone by. There is hardly a man of middle age who does not remember that hospitality and a sideboard of wines and liquors were synonymous terms. Both men and women drank freely, and professional men and the clergy indulged in the same habit. It would be folly to say that what is a vice now was a virtue then, but it can be safely asserted that people did indulge then without the same injurious effects that follow the practice now. The predominant nervousness of the present time had not been developed. Our ancestors could drink freely, smoke extravagantly, indulge to excess in tea and coffee, and yet live to a serene old age. Now it is simply impossible. True, the traffic in ardent spirits has enormously increased, but so has the population. True, people yet drink to excess, but they do not do it with impunity. Circumstances have altered cases, and two-thirds of the present terrible effects flowing from intemperance are due to the changed physiological conditions of the human race, and especially in this country, where people are strung up to a tension that will no more allow a free use of strong drinks than a barn filled with straw will permit the introduction of fire.—Newark Advertiser.

The Composition of Dust.—Injurious to the Human System.—Factory Life.

THE composition of dust is far more complex than most imagine. Even as we find it in the country, when placed under the microscope or subjected to chemical tests, it is found to consist of various decaying as well as mineral substances, in a fine state of division. Beside the mechanical irritation of the particles, there is also that evil which arises from decay. When we come to add to this the still more complex material furnished in city or household or factory life, it is easy to see how breathing may be impeded or the apparatus be made to work under disadvantages. Smoke, for instance, is not merely injurious by the gases it may contain, but because of the noxious floating particles of which it is often the vehicle. The common household sweeping is illy endured by those of weak lungs, and, in the absence of active out-door exercise as a relief, is badly borne by many women. As we come to examine into the diseases of the wage classes or of factory life, it is found that some of the most serious and chronic impairments to health result from this cause. The constant exposure to the dust enfeebles the air vesicles, and often leads to deposits, which become a serious embarrassment later in life. In the case of millers, evidence of their vocation is often found in their lungs; and many a man can have his occupation determined by the mechanical particles in his lungs long years after he has retired from the trade of his early or middle life. We recently attended the proprietor of a drug mill, who, although he had left his work ten years before, in his sputa bore the marks of his business. It is well worth while, in the interest of health, to pay some attention to the protection of the breathing apparatus where there is necessary exposure to such causes of disease. Dust is too often dirt, and aerial sewerage or any form of aerial foulness gets into the system through the lungs as easily as do more palpable substances through the stomach. The lungs, as well as the stomach, receive and elaborate what is equivalent to food. Their structure is more delicate than that of the stomach, the access to the blood and to the life more direct. We must see to it that the solid and particulate matter of air is not taken or deposited to a disturbing extent, and that, if there are unavoidable exposures, we provide ourselves with methods of protection.—Exchange Paper.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

I accept Mr. Wasson's definition of Religion as "the sense of universal relation," meaning by that man's relation to outward nature, to all human nature, to the world of ideals and to the unknown. This seems to me the grand affirmation of modern radical thought. Too fundamental to be involved in theological discussions, it underlies all differences of sect and system. It is not Christian, it is not Buddhistic, it is not Confucian: it is free, natural, universal religion. It is a something native to the human soul, to all souls. It has nothing whatever to do with speculation. It is the central principle of all true action,—that which lifts the soul, inspires right conduct, recognizes back of what it can see a cause which it cannot see, and links mankind together in brotherhood and love. This is what the Free Religious movement, its original work of protest over, has come to mean to some of us. It is to us what the Church in its best forms and days has been to its most sincere devotees. Thus it happens that we have here and there a society organized in the name of Free Religion, and a very large number of people not attached to any organization who accept, and try to live, its philosophy.

Now, it has been more than reasonable, it has been inevitable, that just in proportion as this idea has taken possession of the human mind, dissatisfaction with old methods has followed. And, since a true parent is justly sensitive and critical concerning the way in which religion is presented to his children, this dissatisfaction has been nowhere so great as with the old system of Sunday-schools. The result is that we see children of radical parents, on the one hand, attending conservative Sunday-schools for the sake of the social opportunities offered and at the expense of their sound mental and moral development, and on the other hand staying at home and losing the educational influences of religious association. It is true that many think these influences greatly overrated. To such, the problem of methods for home religious culture on a radical basis must be a vital one, and certainly they will not claim to have solved it. While to such as accept the idea of adult religious organization, it may be truly said that not one argument can be made in its favor which does not apply with greater force to the young. So we may claim—may we not?—that the need of radical religious culture for the young in the home and school is a growing one, and must be met.

How shall we meet it? That is the practical question. The first step, without the right taking of which everything will go wrong, is to cut one's self absolutely free from all entanglements of sect and system. Go outside of them, not necessarily to antagonize them,—certainly not to antagonize them in the case of young children,—but for the sake of obtaining that something which is too broad for any system, even the Christian, to hold; namely, the Natural and the Universal.

Suppose now we start with the idea of religion as the sense of universal relation. The smallest child who can run through a field of clover, aye, even before he can leave his mother's arms, is struck with admiration and wonder at the waving grass, the pretty flowers, and the singing birds. That little soul is in an attitude of worship; and the grass, the flowers, and the birds are Nature's ministers to lead it up and on. Why should we not take this hint which every mother knows to be a fact, and follow it in our method of education? What does it mean? It means that the outward universe is the Bible for the primary department, so to speak, in a school of religion. It means that botany, zoology, geology, are the languages in which the Bible of Nature is written,—languages so simple that the youngest children take to them easily and eagerly. Now, it is possible to teach these sciences in such a way that they shall be mere anatomy, a dissecting of flowers and bugs, with but little philosophy of religion, or even of science in any worthy sense, involved. But if the central idea, the sense of universal relation, be maintained, what a sermon is every leaf and bug! So it seems to me that natural history forms a good skeleton upon and about which a successful teacher can place the flesh and blood of moral and spiritual truth. This for children, say from four to ten years of age.

From ten to fifteen years, biography, physiology, and literature offer every needed inducement, if we will only consent to use them. It is quite true that to many people physiology has little to do with religion. I know of nothing which has more to do with it. As vital to us as to those who are said to have read it in letters of gold on the walls of the Delphic Temple is the injunction "Know thyself." There can be no true living in the world of body or of mind until the human being understands himself. Knowledge of the physical organs, their use and abuse, is one of the foundation stones of all true living; and yet how little of such knowledge there is! If it be not already a necessary feature of religious teaching to impart this knowledge, is it not high time it was made so?

From fifteen upward, in some cases earlier, the study of the individual's relations to mankind, involving the ideas of universal brotherhood, charity, justice, the science of wealth, the science of society, the history of forms of government, and man's relation to the Universal or Unknown, involving a review of Fetichism, Nature-worship, Idolatry, Polytheism, Monotheism, and Atheism, may be taken up in almost endless variety of method to suit the tastes and age of the learners. And, without this latter work, no system of religious culture, whether in the home or the school, can begin to approach completeness. But it does not necessarily include theology, it does not recognize the use of the Christian Bible as the indispensable necessity. It seeks a basis as broad as humanity. It strives to express the "sense of universal relation."

Now, in a very crude way, I have just hinted at what seem to me the underlying principles of a system of radical religious culture. Does some one say, "You have left out religion and morality"? Not at all. I have left out the Christian religion and Christian morality in order to include what is greater than either, natural religion and natural morality. To-day, radicals, like conservatives, confound the two. Many of them find it impossible to conceive of religion freed from the old church conceptions. Hence they are not enthusiastic in the work of applying its principles to the young. But thanks to such thinkers as Max Müller and Matthew Arnold in the Old World, and Emerson, Wasson, and Weiss in the New, we are approaching a definition of the word commensurate with the greatness of the thing itself; and I can but feel that, when the men and women for whom free or natural religion has done so much realize that it is natural always, and therefore good for their children as well as for themselves, they will take generous and indeed aggressive interest in spreading its principles and perfecting its methods.

One of the great problems which the Free Religious movement is set to solve is the creation of a system of radical religious culture for the young. It may not be able to solve this problem at once. Certainly, it will never solve it, if it does not try. The attempt now made in these columns is a little "I'll try" effort. It makes no pretensions of profundity. Its only claim to public approval is the honesty of its motive in making a beginning. Must not all thoughtful affirmative radicals approve its spirit, and should they not lend a helping hand in the work it undertakes to do?

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin died in New York last Monday.

Mrs. Schliemann helps her husband in all his scientific labors, superintending excavations under his direction.

Prince Leopold told George Eliot recently that he had read Middlemarch nine times. He is certainly a bold marcher, if that is the case.

The appointment of Gen. O. O. Howard for Superintendent of West Point appears to meet with very general favor.

Abraham Lincoln's old Sangamon (Ill.) home is now desolate, and the resort of tramps and the viler sort of the town.

B. F. Underwood will speak at Troy, N.Y., January 9; Port Jervis, N.Y., the 11th; Chagrin Falls, Ohio, 13th and 14th; Alliance, Ohio, 16th; Beloit, Ohio, 17th.

Governor St. John, of Kansas, says that the forty thousand colored refugees in that State support themselves. But there is destitution among those now coming.

Young Frenchmen, in the opinion of Emile de Girardin, should study English and Spanish, because they are the languages of the future, and should give no time to either Latin or Greek.

George Eliot (Marian Evans) died suddenly last Wednesday week in London. She has done most effective work for rational ideas in religion; and in her line of fiction was almost without a peer in this generation.

President-elect Garfield, in a private letter to B. A. Hinsdale, of Hiram College, highly commends Rev. James Freeman Clarke's book entitled Ten Great Religions. General Garfield, in closing the note says, "I think we have taken too narrow views of religion."

Professor Watson, of the University of Wisconsin, was engaged just before his death in the experiment of gazing at the stars down cellar, on the principle that stars can be seen at noonday from the bottom of a deep well. He built his new observatory over a cellar twenty feet deep, into which the light of the heavenly bodies was to be thrown down a large tube by powerful reflectors on a neighboring hill.

The Rev. Lewis Barber was the most popular negro preacher in Georgia. He had a circuit of four congregations, with a membership of about three thousand persons, over whom his sway was absolute in both temporal and spiritual affairs. He died several months ago. Over the pulpit of his church in Lee County an effigy of cloth and straw, blackened with charcoal, has been placed to represent the dead pastor. This rude image is regarded with awe by the negroes, some of whom are said to bow before it in worship.

James Russell Lowell, according to the Cambridge Tribune, was, "as a young man, singularly handsome, and is still very fine-looking, with blue eyes and auburn hair and beard. He was engaged, when very young, to the beautiful Maria White, of Watertown, whom he married afterward,—a lovely, pale woman, with an immense genius as well as beauty. No more lovely or romantic idyl was ever written up by poets than this union. His best poems were written to Maria; and her poems, published after her death, revealed that she could indeed answer him in golden measures. She was also a woman of high artistic perceptions, and decorative art may be said to have taken its rise with her. She painted tables and clocks, and made all sorts of beautiful things out of dried leaves and grasses. She was very practical, too; and, as the poet was not rich, she made her own dresses, bonnets, and her children's clothes. It was not rare to see the beautiful woman, pale as the patron shepherdess of Paris, sewing and reading at the same time. A portrait of Maria Lowell, painted by Page, might well pass for the head of a mediæval saint."

Rowland Connor is after the Rev. J. McEldowney in the Saginaw Daily Courier with a sharp pen. Mr. McEldowney, who is the pastor of a Methodist church at Saginaw, recently preached upon "Faith and Unbelief" in that place, and said some very hard and unwarranted things of Liberals, both inside and outside the Church. Mr. Connor reviews the reverend gentleman's sermon at length in the paper above named, in a forcible and pointed manner. We quote from him on a single point: "Moreover, you misconceive entirely the work of modern criticism with reference to the Bible. No one supposes, as you assert, that the Bibles of other religions will drive out our Bible. But this one great service they have certainly done: they have enabled us the better to understand our own Bible, have shown in various ages the existence of similar aspirations, of similar prayers, similar endeavors to solve the mystery of sin, similar attempts to comprehend the nature and the ways of God, similar superstitions, and a similar following of great religious teachers. Some of the most devout Christian believers in the world are among the men to whom we are indebted for this new light. Is Saint-Hilaire an unbeliever or an infidel? Is Max Müller an infidel? Is Professor Whitney an unbeliever?"

Rev. J. A. Dobson, of Muncie, Ind., who has renounced Universalism for Orthodox Congregationalism, justifies his change on these grounds. He considers Universalism a pretext for atheism. This we suspect will be novel intelligence to the atheists. He says that there is no Christianity in the Universalist Church, and having been frozen out he has gone over to Orthodoxy to receive some warmth and fire; but even here we fear that he will find the fire is getting rather low, and what remains is more traditional belief than actual conviction. He states that there are over sixty organizations of the Universalists in Indiana, and none of them have regular services; over ninety in Ohio, and only ten have services every Sunday; and that this Church is dying out on account of its unbelief, and he had lost nine years of earnest labor in the Universalist fields, and he wished to atone for it by work in the Orthodox Church, where he thinks it may be more effective. From our stand-point, the difference between advanced Orthodoxy and stationary Universalism is so slight in these days that we cannot comprehend the reason for such a change on these grounds. Furthermore, when a person, in transferring his sympathies to another denomination, thus lays special stress on the signs of the declining outward prosperity of the one he is leaving, he renders himself open to the suspicion that he may be unconsciously or otherwise actuated by other motives than those he offers for the transition.

Burial Scandal.—The child of a Non-conformist, named Hoare, at Teddington, has been refused interment in the parish church-yard. The right claimed was under the new Burials Act; but the churchwarden, Mr. F. G. Thynne, informed the father that the church-yard was full, observing that there was no objection to the child being buried in the consecrated portion of the cemetery, which was virtually a part of the church-yard. Mr. Hoare has, under legal advice, served a fresh notice of burial. Should there be another refusal, it is said that a mandamus will be applied for to compel the vicar and church-wardens to allow the interment in the parish church-yard, the contention that it is full being denied.

The burial dispute at Teddington has been satisfactorily settled. The Rev. D. Ram, the vicar, who had been absent from home, returned last week, and had an interview with Bishop Sugden, of the Reformed Church of England, who was to have officiated at the funeral, and the father of the child. Mr. Ram, on hearing their statements, at once acknowledged that the law was on their side, and that the father had a legal right to have the child interred in the church-yard, but that he hoped he would meet his wishes as other parishioners had done, and have the body interred in the cemetery. The father insisted upon his right to have the body laid in the church-yard, whereupon the vicar said that he would concede it, that a new grave should be opened, and that no objection would be offered to the funeral taking place on the following afternoon. Mr. Ram also gave orders that the bell should be tolled, and every respect shown, as "though the parents had been the best church people in the parish." The funeral accordingly took place on the 21st inst.

M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu calls attention to the increase of infant mortality in France during the last thirty years. Between 1840 and 1849, the number of deaths of children below one year (of every 1,000 births) was 140; from 1850–59 it was 172; from 1860–69, it had increased to 175; and it rose during the last decade to 178. A striking feature in connection with this branch of social politics is the increase in the number of still-born children, and particularly in the case of illegitimates. Dr. Daremburg published recently in the Journal des Debats the following figures under the former head, showing that in 1839 there was 1 still-born child to every 35.8 births; in 1845, 1 to every 34.2; in 1855, 1 to every 22.6; in 1865, 1 to every 19.7; and in 1873, 1 to every 19.6; while among illegitimates the number of deaths had increased from 1 in 20 births in 1839 to 1 in 11 in 1873. Both Dr. Daremburg and M. Bertillon attribute this unsatisfactory state of things in a great measure to the increase of crime; and there is no doubt that infant mortality is largely affecting the decrease of population in France.—Pall Mall Budget.

Homes of the Whitechapel Poor.—At the meeting of the Whitechapel District Board of Works, Mr. Skidmore Wrack, sanitary inspector, reported that a complaint had been made at the Board's offices that pigs were being kept in a house, 186 Hanbury Street, Mile End, New Town. Upon inspecting the premises the same day, the officer found that three pigs had been kept in the first-floor room for some days, the place also being occupied by a man, his wife, and two children for living and sleeping. Two of the animals had died in the room shortly before the inspector's visit. The room was in a very filthy state, and a most offensive odor pervaded the whole house. Upon remonstrating with the man for keeping such animals in the room, he replied that a friend of his had made him a present of the three pigs, and that he had nowhere else to keep them. A still more extraordinary case was discovered on the same day in Lamb Street, Spitalfields. In the back garret of No. 27 in that street there were found a man, his wife, four children, the wife's mother, and a man lodger. All these persons lived and slept in the room, and in addition to them there were seven small birds and four pigeons. The place was, of course, in a very dirty and offensive condition. The owner told the inspector that he had served the occupier with notice to quit. In both cases, notices, under the Sanitary Act, were issued forthwith for the suppression of the nuisance and overcrowding and indecent occupation.

Selling Indecent Photographs.—Caroline Thoviste, 19 Leicester Square, news-agent, was charged with selling indecent photographs. One of the detective-sergeants from Scotland Yard said he had paid a number of visits to the shop of the prisoner, buying either a French newspaper or some photographs similar to specimens exhibited in the window of the establishment. After he had been several times at the place, he ventured to ask for some pictures "more from nature" than any he had already obtained. The prisoner said she expected soon two collections, one from Vienna, and another which was undergoing examination by the police in London. He called again, and asked if the Vienna collection had arrived. The prisoner then produced a parcel from her desk, and, saying that was it, sold him two indecent photographs, for which he paid 6s. To a remark that they were very dear, she replied that they were cheaper than any could be got elsewhere, and that she supplied shops. He bought some others, which she said she was allowed to sell. That day, he again went to the shop accompanied by several detectives with a search warrant, and in a back parlor they found the table covered with grossly obscene photographs of all sizes. The prisoner declared that she had just received them from a firm in Paris, and was examining them, but had sold none, and was determined to send them back as too bad for her trade. Some correspondence in French with persons desiring to be supplied with these wares was also discovered. Prisoner was remanded.

The Pope lately delivered a speech at a reception given by his Holiness on Sunday to the civil employés, some six hundred in number, of the late Pontifical Government, who, refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the King of Italy, have since 1870 been prisoners of the Vatican. Roman telegrams state that the speech has produced a profound sensation, for the language of his Holiness was as uncompromising as it was unexpected. He has now returned to the policy of Pius IX., and declared in plain and unmistakable terms that no compromise or modus vivendi can ever be possible between the Vatican and the Quirinal, unless the latter yields all that the former asks. In his speech, his Holiness energetically reaffirmed his right to the temporal power, and described the fête of September 20, in celebration of the entry of the Italian troops into Rome, as accursed. He complained of not being free, and said that the Head of the Church in the circumstances in which he was now placed could do little to combat the infidelity invading the world, and particularly Italy. The Pope concluded as follows: "From our words, you can fully understand, beloved children, how difficult and hard is the condition in which the Roman Pontiff has been placed by the revolution, and how vain are the flattering hopes of those who talk of the possibility of its being accepted on our part. Mindful always of our duties, and knowing what is required for the good of the Church and the dignity of the Roman Pontificate, we shall never acquiesce in the present condition of things; nor shall we cease, as we have never yet ceased, from calling for the restitution of all which by fraud and deceit has been taken from the Apostolic See."

GEORGE CHAINEY.

A Word to the Liberals of Western New York and Northern Pennsylvania.

George Chainey, the new recruit to Liberalism from the orthodox pulpit, is doing a grand work in Western New York and Northern Pennsylvania. During the last few days, he has lectured in Farmington, Macedon, Palmyra, Salamanca, Steamburg, and Randolph. Next week, he will speak in Bradford, Pa., Olian, N.Y., and Cara, Pa., two evenings in each place. Mr. Chainey would like to speak every evening during the next two months in some place in Western New York or Northern Pennsylvania. His terms are reasonable; and parties desiring his services are requested to correspond with the undersigned at once, so that arrangements can be made some time in advance that will save railroad expense. Mr. Chainey is an able and eloquent speaker, and admirably adapted to the work he has undertaken,—that of giving the people mental liberty. I hope my liberal friends in every town in the vicinity above named will immediately arrange for one or more of Mr. Chainey's lectures. Friends, let us now improve this opportunity of greatly accelerating the liberal movement in this section of country. H. L. Green.

Salamanca, N.Y.

Locke's philosophical conclusions have been largely superseded, because of a certain narrowness in his premises. But his method approached so near to that which is demanded by scientific philosophy to-day, and his influence on the thought of his times was so necessary and so excellent, that the following fine statement with which Professor Fowler closes his memoir of him in "English Men of Letters" is none too high praise:—

Far more important than their specific influence on other writers, or even on the development of the subjects with which they deal, has been the effect of Locke's writings on the history of progress and civilization. In an age of excitement and prejudice, he set men the example of thinking calmly and clearly. When philosophy was almost synonymous with the arid discussion of scholastic subtleties, he wrote so as to interest statesmen and men of the world. At a time when the chains of dogma were far tighter, and the penalties of attempting to loosen them far more stringent than it is now easy to conceive, he raised questions which stirred the very depths of human thought. And all this he did in a spirit so candid, so tolerant, so liberal, and so unselfish that he seemed to be writing not for his own party or his own times, but for the future of knowledge and of mankind. To sound every question to the bottom, never to allow our convictions to outstrip our evidence, to throw aside all prejudices and all interests in the pursuit of truth; but to hold the truth, when found, in all charity and with all consideration toward those who have been less fortunate than we,—these are the lessons which, faithfully transmitted through two centuries by those who had eyes to see and ears to hear, he has bequeathed to us and our posterity.

JESTINGS.

Darwin says, "Man, only, can whistle." Don't you believe it, men of science. Come to Cambridge, and we'll introduce you to a few prime whistlers of t'other sex.—Cambridge Chronicle.

"Good-morning, Patrick. You've got a new coat at last, but it seems to fit you rather too much." "Och, there's nothing surprising in that. Sure, I wasn't there when I was measured for it."

They met, they smiled, they wept, they loved,
He called her Jane, she called him Thomas:
A richer man rode down the lane,
And Tom brought suit for breach of promise.
—Steubenville Herald.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said an Irish manager to his audience of three, "as there is nobody here, I'll dismiss you all. The performance of this night will not be performed, but will be repeated to-morrow evening."

Send them to School.—A Galveston darkey has returned from a business trip to the interior of the State, very much disgusted. "Didn't you receive any offers to pick cotton?" asked a friend. "Yes, sich as dey was. A man offered me one-third ob de amount I picked, and when I looked at de field I saw for myself dat when it was all picked it wouldn't 'mount to one-third, so I left for home." "You was in luck dat he didn't fool yer." "You bet I was, Sandy. My refmetic is all what sabed me. I tell yer all, send yer childrens to school."

When a youthful genius was asked by the superintendent of the Sunday-school, "Who was the first man?" he at once showed that he had been trained in a political rather than a religious direction by answering, "George Washington, sir, who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." "No, no," cried the impatient superintendent. "Adam was the first man, of course." "Well," replied the thoughtful youth very slowly, as if quite unwilling to make the admission, "if you are speaking of foreigners, I suppose he was."

Miss Julia was induced to give a taste of her musical powers, and this is how she did it. She flirted up her panniers, coquettishly wiggle-waggled to the piano, and sang:—

"When the moo-hoon is mi-hildly bee-heaming
O'er the ca-halm and si-hi-lent se-e-e-e,
Its ra-dyunce so-hoftly stre-heam-ing,
Oh! ther-hen, oh, ther-hen,
I thee-hink
Hof thee-hee,
I thee-hink,
I thee-hink,
I thee-hink,
I thee-he-he-hehehehehe-hink hof thee-e-e-e.

Too Well Heeled.—Old Shokey, a peripatetic preacher, well known to California, is such an ardent believer in Scripture that he is ready to bet on any proposition which is laid down in the Bible. A few weeks ago, he visited the Lake, and stopped on Sunday at Glenbrook. Being nearly penniless, he determined to give an exhortation, and getting the use of a hall called the sinners together. His text was the marine episode, in which Jonah was taken in by a whale. "Now, my hearers, to the class of people who never look beyond the surface of things, this looks like a hard story to believe; but I know that is so, every word of it." He saw an incredulous look on the faces of a few of the hard cases in the front row, and, after pausing a moment, continued: "I'll bet any man in the crowd $100 coin up that I can prove every word of t. Does anybody respond?" He thrust his handi down in his trouser pocket, and leaned forward. No one took him up. He went on with his sermon, showing conclusively that the whale did all that was claimed of it, and then passed round the hat. "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord," he said as it went down the pew. "Lay up your treasures in heaven, where neither moths nor rust corrupt, nor thieves break in and steal," he remarked again, as he saw the hat coming back. It was handed to him empty, and he dismissed the audience with a hasty benediction. After the services, he met one of his hearers, and complained bitterly of the lack of coin and enthusiasm in the town. "We've got the enthusiasm here, Parson," said the man addressed; "but, when you bluffed us on a hundred dollar bet, some thought you must be a road agent, and the rest concluded that a man so well heeled didn't need any collection."—Carson (Nevada) Appeal.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

The Faith of Reason.

A SERIES OF DISCOURSES ON THE LEADING TOPICS OF RELIGION.

By John W. Chadwick,

Author of "The Bible of To-Day," "A Book of Poems," etc.

"Free, original, brave, manly speech is here; never prosy, always earnest, often curiously apt, and sometimes swelling with its theme into fervid eloquence. . . . When we consider their quality, we marvel; for what sermons of the day can compare with these in richness, force, and beauty?"—Rev. Dr. F. H. Hedge, in the Unitarian Review.

"In this externally negative theology, there is an earnestness, a trustfulness in truth and honesty, a fearlessness as to the results of patient and reverent thinking, which has more of the freshness and fragrance of genuine faith than half the orthodox apologies and sermons of the day."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Everywhere pervaded by a spirit of profound reflection."—New York Tribune.

"There is extraordinary vigor and scope of thought in the treatment of these themes."—Boston Transcript.

"They are packed full of bold, strong, original thought. Perhaps their most striking feature is their utter fearlessness. . . . We venture to say that no book of equal volume issued from the press for years contains more vigorous and searching thought on more momentous themes."—Chicago Saturday Evening Herald.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

MAN takes his law from the earth; the earth takes its law from heaven; heaven takes its law from reason; reason takes its law from what it is in itself. Virtue in its grandest aspect is neither more nor less than following reason.—Chinese.

WISDOM exalteth her children. Whoso giveth ear unto her shall judge nations. There is a shame that bringeth sin, and there is a shame which is glory and grace. Accept no person against thy soul, and let not reverence for any man cause thee to fall.—Hebrew.

SEEK not to divine by the measures of the earth nor by the dimensions of the sun. Dismiss the sounding course of the moon, for it perpetually runs through the forces of necessity. The advancing procession of stars is not for your sake. The wide-spread aërial wing of birds, and the sections and viscera of victims, are never true: all these are mere puerile sports, the foundation of fraud and mercantile religion. Fly from these, if you intend to open the paradise of piety, where virtue, wisdom, and equity are collected together. Explore the river of the soul, whence or in what order, having become a servant to the body, you may again rise to that order from which you flowed, uniting earthly work to sacred reason.—Persian.

THE mind is never right but when it is at peace within itself: the soul is in heaven even while it is in the flesh, if it be purged of its natural corruptions, and taken up with divine thoughts and contemplations.—Seneca.

THE truth of being and the truth of knowing is all one. A man is but what he knoweth. For truth prints goodness; and they be the clouds of error that descend in storms of passions and perturbations.—Bacon.

THE traveller crossing a desert is beguiled by the vision of a pool of water at a distance before him. Thirsting, parched, weary, instantly on seeing it a thrill of joy reanimates his frame: he marches on in triumph; he reaches the place, and finds that the pool is an illusion. The vision appears again. Again he takes up the toil of the march, again he is disappointed; once more he is tempted, once more he is encouraged. When at last he reaches the end of his journey, the golden city, safe and sound, he is grateful for the sweet illusion that enabled him to reach it by cheering his flagging spirits. The wells of water he imagined that he saw were illusive, but they fed the eternal fountain of courage in his heart. The vision has faded, the glory endures.—O. B. Frothingham.

DEEM me not blind to the magnificence of nature or the beauties of art, because I interpret their language differently from others. I thrill in the presence of the dawn of day, and exult in the glories of the setting sun. Whether the world wears her ebon and jewelled crown of night, or the day walks wonderingly forth over the face of nature, to me—

> "Not the lightest leaf but trembling teems
> With golden visions and romantic dreams."

> —G. J. Holyoake.

LET science demonstrate, philosophy harmonize, music melodize, poetry unitize until the great lyric shall reveal the central kingdom between the ideal and actual.—Mrs. F. O. Ilyzer.

> But more of reverence in us dwell;
> That mind and soul, according well,
> May make one music, as before,
> But vaster."

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE recent exhibition of Sparks and Weaver on the floor of Congress shows how little the ordinary self-restraint of a gentleman may be deemed essential sometimes to a candidate for the head of the national government.

THE Banner of Light assumes the credibility of the miracles of Lourdes. Thus, Spiritualism joins hands with Roman Catholic superstition. It is not difficult to decide on such evidence as to the validity of its claims to be a scientific and rationalistic movement.

GREECE is making active preparations to carry out by herself that part of the Berlin treaty which concerns the rectifying of her northern frontier, the great Powers having as yet given little attention to her grievance against Turkey. She is collecting an army of very respectable size on the border.

ONE thing which is helping to insure the stability of the present French Republic is the distribution of tracts among the peasantry, explaining in the simplest terms the principles of republican government and instructing the citizens in their civil rights and duties. This has been widely and systematically done, and evidently with good effect.

KANSAS has beaten even Maine in the matter of a "Prohibitory law" against intemperance. It has, by a popular vote, adopted an amendment to its constitution, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. A similar amendment is proposed in Missouri, but makes an exception in favor not only of scientific and medicinal, but sacramental purposes.

REV. LYMAN ABBOTT, associate editor of the Christian Union, believes that children may be "born into godliness"; that "there is just as much Scriptural authority for a doctrine of original Piety as for a doctrine of original Sin"; and he further says that these are "the convictions of a lifetime, wrought out by the experience of two generations." So does heresy grow.

PROFESSOR SIMON NEWCOMB is writing a series of articles for the New York Independent on "Modern Scientific Materialism." Professor Newcomb is a devoted student of material nature, but he does not think that any yet discovered laws of material phenomena are adequate to explain the action of mind. These articles promise to be a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject.

THERE will be three courses of popular lectures in progress at the Lowell Institute, one of the noblest of the institutions of Boston for the education of the people, next week. A course of twelve by the Rev. Edwin C. Bolles on "Historic London," a course of six on "Machinery and Modern Civilization," and the same number on "The History of Greek Sculpture." The two latter courses are already in operation.

THE Sunday School Times gives us the following: "Another of the evidences of sound conversion reported from heathendom, in the missionary magazines, is that of a little Siamese girl, who said, 'Since I began to love Jesus, I have not chewed nearly as much betel-nut as before.' It is not betel-nut, but tobacco, that American Christians are inclined to. There are a good many Christians in this country who chew more tobacco since they were converted than before. But this is not to be ascribed to the conversion."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Baltimore Sun describes a recent visit to Carlyle. The sage had on "a black velvet skull cap, which did not improve his appearance, and around his body had his favorite plaid shawl. 'I am not ill, I never was ill,' said he, in his emphatic and broad Scotch accent, somewhat pettishly, if not peevishly. 'I am only going — going — going — going!' And his eyes lost their grim fire of expression, his emphatic, rasping voice fell into a lower tone, and I sat silent before the only living man worthy of my silence, the only man when dead ever worthy of my loud admiration! The room was small, and the fire made the temperature oppressive, yet the icy manner of the 'Sage of Chelsea' relieved the atmospheric oppression on the lungs. I saw some few books around, chiefly in the German language. A small bust of William of Orange and one of Peter the Great were readily discernible, while an engraving or two of Scotch scenery made the rest of the ornamentation of the close and well-closed room. In taking my leave of the great old man, he said feebly, 'Go on, and work with all your will,— uproot error.' I shook the feeble and mittened hand, and left Thomas Carlyle, who in the flesh may soon leave us, but in the spirit will ever remain."

WE wish that more of the Evangelical journals would speak of the National Reform Association as does the Independent, and that the Independent would do it oftener. It is for them to check, in circles where more liberal publications never reach, the growing political mischief of that Association. The Independent says: "The purpose of the Association is to secure such amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will make it affirm the divine authority of the Christian religion, and of the Bible as the book that contains this religion upon the warrant of God. We believe in this authority, and in the Bible as being inspired by God, and, hence as "the infallible rule of faith and practice"; but we do not believe in incorporating these dogmas into the Constitution of the United States or into the constitution of any civil government. Their simple assertion in the Constitution would amount to nothing in any practical sense, unless Congress was authorized to make the assertion the basis of legislative action; and, if this power were granted, then Congress would be armed with power to interfere with the religious liberty of the people. We have all due respect for the gentlemen who are engaged in this movement for amending the Constitution: they are good men, meaning well; and yet we must say to them that, in our judgment, their zeal and labor are wholly misapplied."

The Anti-Jewish Agitation in Germany

AS

An Index of the Immorality of the Times.

By Prof. FELIX ADLER.

I have utilized, for the purposes of the discourse which I shall deliver before you to-day, the following material, copies of German papers, to wit: the Allgemeine Zeitung of Augsburg, the New Free Press of Vienna, and the Vossische Zeitung, also Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums. I have also read through a new book, by Dr. Dühring, formerly of the University of Berlin, entitled The Jewish Question (and nothing but the sense of the obligation I am under toward my audience would have induced me to finish that painful and repulsive reading); also several numbers of the Preussische Jahrbücher, a periodical edited by Professor Treitschke, of whom, as well as of Dr. Dühring, I shall have something to say in the course of my address to-day. Also I have used the stenographic report of the debates on the Jewish Question, which took place on the 21st and 22d of November last; and I have likewise, in one or two instances, drawn upon information from abroad, which has reached me through private but authentic channels.

I make this statement, contrary to custom, in relation to the material whereon I stand in my discourse of to-day, in order to convince you at the outset that it is no hasty opinion, founded upon mere scanty cable despatches from abroad, which I have to offer you to-day, but that it is a deliberate judgment, founded, so far as I am able to judge, upon all the principal material that is at present accessible. It is a matter of keen feeling with me that I am compelled at all to speak upon the subject. I deplore the day, and the conjunction of circumstances, which makes it necessary to speak. I had hoped, and many others I know with me, that the time would never again come when it would be necessary to reopen this discussion. What is more, I entertained at first a reluctance to speak, — a feeling, for reasons easily understood, as if it would be more becoming and more effective for others to take the floor in this matter. But, on second thoughts, it occurred to me that, if we deal with persecution in every form in which it raises its obnoxious head, why should we not deal with it in this form, which it has assumed for the time being; nay, when viewed in this light, it seemed to me a stern duty that we should not keep silence, but rather speak and do our share toward clearing public opinion, in a matter in which the confusion of fundamental moral principles is the cause of causes, the radical root of the evil.

I propose to discuss the anti-Jewish agitation in Germany, in the following manner: first, to give you some of the facts of the agitation,— what has been done, what is being attempted; secondly, to discuss the causes of the agitation; and, thirdly, to draw from thence our conclusions.

And, first, as to the facts. What has been done? Enough has been done; more has been done than those who saw this century ushered in would have believed it possible that this nineteenth century could witness now, in its eightieth year; now, grown hoary with the experience of liberty. There are some who are disposed to take the whole matter lightly, who believe that it is all a storm in a teapot. It is not a storm in a teapot, and those who say it is say so because they do not know the facts. If they knew the facts, they would think otherwise. Now, some of the facts are as follows: first, that an agitation has been going on for several years, aiming to exclude the Jews from a full enjoyment of their rights as citizens; then that this agitation has culminated in the presentation of a petition to Prince Bismarck, as Chancellor of the Empire, roundly demanding the following four points:—

I. That the immigration of foreign Jews into Germany be checked (a measure which would, for instance, limit the free entrance of American citizens of the Jewish race into Germany).

II. That Jews be debarred from holding positions of authority, and that their appointment as judges be placed under serious restriction.

III. That no Jewish teacher be permitted to instruct in public schools; it being deemed intolerable that Christian children should be instructed by the lips of teachers of the Jewish race.

IV. That a close surveillance over the Jewish population, by means of official statistics, be ordered to be kept again, as it formerly was.

The next fact is that this agitation is favored in an underhand way by the government. This is proved by the official utterances of the North German Gazette, the newspaper organ of the Chancellor, by the circumstance that the petition has been directed to be sent to government officers for circulation, and is known, in certain cases, to have been circulated by them; then, by the farther circumstance that the petition itself has received the prominent signatures of government officials, some of the lower and a few also of higher rank.

He who knows the bureaucratic spirit of Germany must conclude that these officials would not have affixed their signatures to such a petition, had they not had grounds for believing that the movement is honorably regarded in high quarters. Whenever an agitation is allowed to proceed so far, it must bear its natural fruit in practical life. The mediæval spirit that had been evoked has not been slow to show its consequences. In the town of Nuremberg, a petition to the government has been opened in the bookstore of the place, requesting that Jews be expelled beyond the city limits, and be compelled to live in a quarter of their own,—a new Ghetto therefore. In the city of Berlin, placards were posted on the walls, exciting to violence against the Jews; and the tardiness with which the police removed these posters, after ample time had been allowed them to do their work, is additional evidence of the complicity of the government in the whole movement. Among the most recent news is the announcement that Dr. Strassmann, for years President of the Municipal Council of Berlin, has failed of reëlection in his district. During the election, placards were put up in every corner, displaying, in large, flaring red letters, the words, "Elect no Jew," and signed "The Committee." Dr. Strassmann is a man of eminent services: he is, for instance, the head of a People's Bank, which is designed to protect them against usurers. He was elected in two other districts of the city, and his colleagues of the Council hastened to express their sense of the insult which had been hurled against their whole body in the person of its honored President. Among the most painful circumstances is the fact that the movement has made headway in certain of the literary circles,—nay, that it has in part received its impulse from such men as Dr. Dühring and Prof. Treitschke, of whom, as I have said, I shall speak to-day,—and that it has been largely propagated among the students of the two leading universities of Germany,—namely, Berlin and Leipzig. That the German universities, which have been regarded as the very nurseries of German idealism, and to which men of every nationality make their pilgrimage, as to the foremost temples of the science of modern times, should become the sanctuaries, not of the idea of brotherhood and of the valuation of each individual according to his moral qualities,—which is the only truthful basis of human intercourse,—but that these universities should become the fosterers of the most ignoble prejudices, the teachers of animosity between man and man,—that is indeed an experience for which we were not prepared, and of which I can only say that it overwhelms the spirit for the time being with sadness and gloom. German students of Berlin—a part of them, at least—have, under the leadership of Professor Treitschke, sent in their signatures to the petition, and added a special clause in which they say that, though they cannot at present take a practical share in the agitation, seeing that they are only students, yet do they encourage the German nation to go on in its present fight for Germanism as against Orientalism, and promise that, when they shall become men, they will continue the admirable tradition of race-hatred,—all this in stilted and pompous phrase, for the German scribbler understands as no one else does how to veil a hollow or even wicked thought in high-sounding, philosophical terminology. Even when he brutally strikes down his unoffending neighbor, he never fails to show the philosophical necessity of the assault.

It only remains to add that the petition to the Chancellor has been for two days, on the 21st and 22d of November, the subject of long and in part stormy debate in the German Parliament. To complete a survey of the principal facts as they now lie before us: the government encouraging a movement directed against the constitutional rights of a whole class of the citizens, and a class not unimportant to the welfare and prosperity of the German Fatherland; at least, a few eminent writers like Dühring and Treitschke, with a host of mere copyists at their elbow, fathering the movement in literature; and the students of the two most important of the German universities blindly taking up the watchword that is directed against liberty itself, and promising to continue in the future the same methods that are being adopted in the present.

And now as to the causes of this agitation. And, in the first place, as to the ostensible ringleader of the entire movement, the court-chaplain, Stöcker. With regard to him, we can be brief. The court-chaplain, Stöcker, represents a party which entitles itself the "Christian Socialist Party." I have it on very creditable authority that that party barely numbers in all three thousand members. The court-chaplain pretends to be moved with compassion for the condition of the working classes, and recommends the Christian spirit as a means of solving the social problem. The hollowness of his pretensions is evident from the fact that he is a court-chaplain, and that he boasts of acting in unison with the present policy of the German government,— a government which, if he had really the interest of the working classes at heart, he should be the first to combat; a government whose military policy weighs so heavily upon the necks of the people; a government whose absolutistic principles hold out a future the very reverse of promising or liberal to the laborers! The court-chaplain, Stöcker, has utterly disgraced himself in the eyes of all reflecting persons by his conduct on the 22d of November last, during the debate in Parliament. For he there uttered a blank falsehood, stating in the first instance that he did not sign the petition against the Jews, endeavoring to have it understood that he did not desire a curtailment of their constitutional rights. And presently, when he was met by the statement that his signature was actually published underneath the petition, he qualified what he had said by saying that he did not sign the petition when it was first issued, but signed it later on. He also brought general charges of corruption reflecting upon the character of those who had protested against the action of the Christian Socialists; but, when he was asked to substantiate his charges by mentioning names, he refused to do so. The court-chaplain, Stöcker, is a man who deals in falsehoods, and his position before the world itself is a falsehood. The court-chaplain, Stöcker, in one word, is only the figure-head of the movement. The real movement he does not represent. What, then, is the real movement, and what are its purposes?

I believe the real movement to be political, mainly, in its intentions. Jews are prominent members of the Liberal Party. This is natural. They were themselves oppressed. All the better instincts of their nature, as well as the commoner motives of self-interest, threw them into the ranks of the opposition. Now, within the last few years, a change has taken place in the policy of the Empire. The Chancellor, who for a time sought his support among the more liberal elements of the German people, saw fit to abandon these to their fate, and return to a more natural alliance with Conservatism. In order to insure the strength and success of the Conservative Party at the polls, it became necessary to bring the Liberal Party into discredit among the voters, and no means seemed more available or effective to this end than to excite the slumbering race-prejudice and religious prejudice of the community. Because prominent members of the Liberal Party are Jews, the whole party is now represented as a Jewish party; because editors of prominent Liberal journals are Jews, the whole Liberal press is denounced as a Jewish press, evidently with the intention of fixing a stigma upon Liberalism organized as a party and Liberalism represented by its newspapers. This intention is plain. The expressions, "Jewish Liberal press," "Jewish Liberal Party," are of such frequent occurrence that it is impossible to mistake their clear significance; and, that this is the true origin of the agitation, many of us surmised, and I, for one, indicated already a year ago from this platform. The most recent information that has reached us from Europe painfully confirms these first impressions. The whole body of thinking Liberals themselves feel that the blow is directed against them, and know that the great Chancellor must laugh with derision when he sees the success of his feint in rousing the fanaticism of the German people against one-eightieth part of the total population, in order, under the cover of the general tumult, to attack more securely the liberty of the people themselves.

The Representative Richter, in showing the actual falsehood of the statement that the Liberal press is governed by the Jews, and in their interest, exclaims: "No, gentlemen, the Jews are put forward as objects of the attack, but the Liberals are meant. Do you believe that we, the Liberals, do not feel this to be the case? Because they cannot fight down the principles of the Liberals, because they are powerless against these principles in the great cities, therefore t is that they call in race-hatred to their help, not only to fight against Judaism, but it is the desperate effort of Conservatism to hold itself above water; and it is intended to attack Liberalism itself by such measures as have been taken. Gentlemen, that is the real kernel of the matter." And, in the same direction, the representative, the distinguished Professor Virchow, calls attention to the fact that the opening of the anti-Semitic warfare was coincident with the renewed efforts of Conservatism to gain power in Prussia, and gives his reasons for supposing that the anti-Jewish journals are directly supported out of the so-called reptile-fund,—a fund which is under the control of the Chancellor,—and which is used to feed the literary reptiles,—the name is one in common use,—who insinuate his opinions into the press. But it is one thing to explain the origin of a movement, and another to explain its consequences. The movement was artificial in its origin. That is not only our judgment of the matter, who stand afar off, but it is the enlightened judgment of some of the most illustrious of modern Germans, who have in public protest condemned and stigmatized this dreary agitation as it deserves.

I have called the movement a serious one; for though, when viewed in one way, it seems like a political farce in which as you sometimes see a madman wildly beating upon himself, and imagining all the time that he is striking some one else, so the German people is wildly beating upon its own most precious liberties, and at the same time insanely laughing and saying, I am beating upon the Jew. Yet this farce, if farce it be, is a grim farce, and likely at any moment to turn into a tragedy, as it has begun to do in case of the desecration of Jewish graves, that is reported from a village in Upper Silesia. The movement was political in its motive, but it has called in to its aid the demons of race-hatred and religious hatred, that are not so easily turned back when they have once been aroused; and the most astounding and disheartening feature of all is that this race-hatred and religious hatred is not only cultivated among the multitude, from whom perhaps, as some think, nothing better can be expected, but that it is received with acclaim by students of the universities, and is sedulously fostered by men who have earned for themselves at least a considerable reputation for intellect and ability. There is Professor Heinrich Treitschke, eminent as a politician, as a writer, as an historian, who counts his admirers by thousands, an aristocrat by nature, a man of whom it is evident that he moves in the best society, a man who approaches every question with gloved hands. Let him stand for the high-toned disseminator of religious hatred. He is that, although he will deny it. He uses the courtier's phrase. He speaks of his friend So-and-so, of his good colleague So-and-so, mentioning a number of distinguished Jewish professors at various German universities. He also speaks with respect of Jewish artists and scholars. He says he would consider it sinful to forget that Felix Mendelssohn, Veit, Reiser, were Germans in the best sense of the word; and yet the entire animus of his bitter words is hostile to the race as such, and calculated to kindle passion as it has actually stirred up bad passion among those who read it. There are two points in these articles of Treitschke, concerning which so much has been said. The one is his claim that Jews ought to be very grateful to the Germans for being emancipated by them. The emancipation of the Jews in Germany is very recent. Treitschke says that he does not wish to take away from them their emancipation, but they ought to be very modest in using their rights. The reply to that is that the man who is modest in using one of the fundamental rights of humanity is a coward unworthy of the fellowship of man.

That political liberty and the free exercise thereof on the soil wherein one is rooted is a natural right, the German professor does not seem to know. Here, before this respected audience, before any American audience, it is unnecessary to refute his claim. We in America are liberal of the right of citizenship. We demand only a five years' residence in the country, and a declared desire to be a member of the nation, in order to extend the franchise and the glorious honor of citizenship to every one who so desires it; and others may perhaps be less liberal than we in this respect. But is it conceivable that a people should reside in a land for some fifteen centuries, say fifteen hundred years (as Jews have resided in Germany), and still be considered to have no title in the land, no right of citizenship upon its soil, no claim to be considered as part and parcel of Germany and Germany's nation? Is it said that they do not desire to be of the nation? That is against history. The Jews have ever been eager to identify themselves with the nations with which they lived, wherever they were admitted to fellowship even in the Middle Ages, as in Spain, and later on in Holland. And the recent history of Germany has proven the same. They were eager to be citizens of the German Fatherland. They demonstrated that, by shedding their blood like water upon the battle-fields of the Fatherland. They sacrificed their treasure willingly for its cause, as all other citizens did. And is now the very fact of their liberty again to be called in question? Is it demanded that they should show gratitude because they have at last received the rights which by nature belong to them? Would it not be far more natural, if such retrospective feelings were to be indulged in at all, that the Jews of Germany should feel indignation that their rights have so long been withheld from them? Professor Treitschke's views in this matter of the rights of citizenship are preposterous. Any child educated in the spirit of American institutions could rebuke them. And in like manner untenable is the second point to which I referred,—the claim, namely, that the German people is a Christian people, and the implied consequence that Jews therefore must either submit to become converts to Christianity,—a consummation which did not come about in all the dark darkness of mediæval ages, and which will not come about now at the invitation of Professor Treitschke,—or, if they will not do this, that they must consent to occupy an exceptional position, and see their equal rights as members of a commonwealth curtailed. Here also it is evident that Treitschke does not understand the idea of equality which is implied in the very nature of citizenship,—nay, the whole tenor of his writings shows that significantly enough. As for the allegation that the German people is a Christian people, I know not what connection such a statement has with this matter at all. For if by the term "Christian" Treitschke understands, as is sometimes done in general, humanitarian, noble, civilized, then there is no reason why the Jew should not join heartily with his Christian fellow-citizen, and stand with him on a perfect basis of equality; for his religion certainly lays no obstacle in the way of his humanity, and enjoins the principles of noble living to the same degree at least as Christianity does. But if by "Christian" Treitschke understands, as he evidently does, "Christian" in the dogmatic sense,—if only those are true Germans who are Christians in this dogmatic sense, then must he exclude from the list of Germans Lessing, Schiller, and Goethe, men whom he had hitherto supposed had some claim to be regarded as Germans, but who, whatever else they may have been, were certainly not Christians in the dogmatic sense; and he must in like manner exclude from the fellowship of Germans, as he would construct it, some of the best of the living Germans, great artists and men of letters, leading lights of science, men in whose veins rolls the truest heart's blood of German idealism, men whom Germany has held till now, and will long continue to hold, after men of the stamp of Treitschke shall have passed away, to be among the noblest expressions which the German genius has found.

The discrimination against religion, however, which Treitschke has indicated, has not been without effect; and Treitschke himself has become the adviser and leader of the students in their attempt to support the anti-Semitic agitation. If Treitschke has thus become—though perhaps in part unwillingly, unwillingly at least so far as the extreme consequence of his views have gone—the reorganizer of religious hatred, it has been left to another writer, Dr. Dühring, to become the especial patron of race-hatred, and to arouse it in so flagrant and flagitious a manner as not even to attempt a disguise for his malign intentions. Hear him:—

"The Jew creeps in wherever he finds or scents universal corruption, in order to utilize it for his own selfish, specifically corrupt purposes. The Jew is to be found in his own proper place, where he can become the parasite of an existing or beginning corruption: where he feels most comfortable in the flesh of the nations, there let people be on their guard whether the condition of things is sound. The principles of toleration and liberty have no application to the Jew, because he is by nature the incorporation of selfishness,—bad, and not by any possibility to be bettered." Whatever that is great and good and that is commonly ascribed to the Jew, Dühring simply passes it in review, and declares its worthlessness. Christianity itself is accustomed to regard the Old Testament as a part of its religion, necessary to the understanding of its nature. Dühring sees in the God of the Old Testament simply the tyrannical monopolist, simply the tyrannical master. The fact that the Deity is conceived of as Spirit, and tolerates no idols beside himself, is represented as monopoly. The relations of man to the Deity are represented as a servitude. Israel prostrates in abject servility before the tyrant in heaven, and claims in return to be the chief servant and the oppressor of other nations. It is forgotten that the Old Testament actually represents the relation between the people of Israel and their God in a totally different way: "Children shall ye be unto the Lord your God," is the precise utterance of the religion of the Old Testament in this direction; and, that God is not represented as a tyrant, every one, who knows anything at all about the spirit of the Old Testament, remembers; he is rather represented as the idea of virtue,—long-suffering, prone to kindness, of great mercy, and absolutely pure. All these profoundly moral sides of the Old Testament Dühring neglects, touches upon them with not a single word, because they would at a glance destroy the caricature of Judaism and the Jews, which it is his bad purpose to draw. Dühring goes on to say, and I quote his words: "Inhumanity and enmity against the rest of mankind have derived their support from the Old Testament, and, encouraged in this way, have been working in the human race for thousands of years." He brings the most ridiculous proofs in support of his fantastic assertions. That the apples of immortality in the Garden of Eden are denied to Adam is a proof of the jealous monotheistic character of the Hebrew God. As if this same legend of the apples of immortality, which are denied to man, were not also found in the great mythologies, and as if it were not really true that the apples of immortality are denied to man! The fact that Abraham prays God to save Sodom if there are fifty just persons in the city, and then proceeds in his demand to beg that the city will be saved if there are only forty and thirty and twenty and finally ten, is taken as a proof of the contemptible spirit of haggling, which has been the legacy of the Jewish race from the beginning, when, in very truth, the legend shows us the Hebrew patriarch praying to the stranger for the corrupt and utterly wicked, and seeking with all his power, out of pity and compassion, to avert their impending destruction. I give you this, not as important of itself, but as an instance of the fairness with which the whole charge is concocted. In speaking of Christ, also, the character of the author reveals itself. He is himself a radical of radicals, advanced and entirely beyond the positive religions which he wishes to see done away with, and yet he does not scruple to raise the vulgar, hooting cry of Christ-killer. "The Jews have crucified Christ! Even to-day this truth is unpleasant to them," he says; and he proceeds to pour vitriol into that old sore. In dwelling upon the character of Christ, two stand-points are possible,—either that of Christianity or that of modern philosophy. If you stand on the stand-point of the Christian and believe that Christ was the very God, must you not in decency show some respect for that people which, of all others, on the face of the earth, the Lord of heaven and earth selected to become incarnate in one of its members? Must not there have been some virtue in a race which was thus distinguished, according to your way of looking at it? And if you regard Christ from the modern stand-point of philosophy, simply as a man of extraordinary sweetness and graciousness, a man of such overflowing tenderness in act and expression, a man of so pure a spirit, of so great a heart, that the impression of his life and character has been the food whereon the hungry world has nourished its spiritual being now for eighteen hundred years, must you not show some respect for the race which produced such a man from its loins, such a fruit from its stem? Is it decent, is it allowable, that the character of that race should still be subject to the vilest traducings, because of the very greatness of him who was its noblest son? And as there is no respect for the religion, so also there is no respect for what is valuable and great in the services of the Jewish race in other directions. Even the illustrious figure of a Spinoza, which compels even a Dühring to show some signs of respect, is not safe against his indirect aspersion. He seeks to belittle the philosophical fame which he cannot wholly deny, and sums up with a perfidious assertion (perfidious, because such assertions can never be proved) that Spinoza became what he was, notwithstanding his Jewish origin, and not because of it. The services of Ricardo, Lassalle, and Marx in political economy, of Börne and Heine in literature, are in like manner aspersed. The name of Felix Mendelssohn, I believe, is not even mentioned. But even the name of Lessing, than which no other is perhaps so sacred to all the best spirits of modern Germany,—even Lessing, with whom opens the golden age, the classical age of German literature that culminated in Goethe,—even Lessing, whose image has long since been raised on so high a pedestal of fame that no Dühring can reach him, is at least made the object of impotent rage and reviling.

I will not offend your ears by repeating the assertions that are made of Lessing's works and character. Dühring speaks of Nathan the Wise as of a flat Jew piece. He says that Lessing's Emilia Galotti and other writings show that he was unacquainted with the nobler form of love, and that he applied to the actions of love only his Jew standard of base sensuality. Avarice and sensuality are leading characteristics of the Jews. Respect for what is great and fidelity are wanting in the Jewish character. One would think that they had displayed some respect for what is grand, and something of fidelity also, in the sacrifices which they brought, in the constancy with which they persevered, during the centuries of persecution. But perhaps, for the sort of grandeur which Dühring recommends, they may have little or no respect. We do not know, but we almost suspect that to be the case. "The Jew is purchasable," Dühring says, on page 90 of his book. "It is unnecessary to say a purchaseable Jew. The word 'Jew' itself suffices. He plays every rôle, and is ready for any business which brings him profit: that is true in politics as well as elsewhere." If the Jews participated in the movements for liberty throughout Europe, —and Dühring denies that they did so with honest intent,—one would think that a willingness to bear all the consequences of revolution, to risk property and life itself in behalf of the cause, ought to be sufficient to prove the honesty of the intent. Dühring himself cites recent instances where Jews have offered and devoted large sums for education in general, and especially for the education of the working classes,—in Berlin, for instance. Here also he is sure that sinister motives must have dictated the act; and, in his usual brusque and offensive phrase, he denies that the generous spirit was genuine. "The Jew in Parliament as a legislator is intent only upon furthering Jewish interests. As a journalist, he has the same intentions. As a merchant and banker, he is represented as the leech that sucks in the substance of the people. The Jews have not in them a fibre of real patriotism or love of freedom. In brief, they are an utterly vile race; and, in the interest of a nobler humanity and the highest culture, it is the duty of the nation to rid themselves of this companionship." You perceive the nobler humanity is here invoked, and culture! I am quoting the actual words. The whole book is full of the cry "nobler humanity and culture." You see it is a modern form which this old prejudice has assumed. The evil demons of religious hate are here only incidentally aroused to help along in the good work. It is only in races of the highest capacity that highest humanity can bloom. We Germans are a race of the highest capacity, and the Jews are not; hence the Jews must be done away with. Here is a syllogism for you, which Aristotle might delight in. If there were only not a fundamental principle of all morality left out in this beautiful syllogism,—namely, that to the highest humanity belongs, before all, a sense of sympathy with all mankind and of duty toward all men because they are men! And the race that has not that primary element of civilization in it, that fundamental canon of morality, of the duty which we owe to men as men, will never develop in its midst the highest humanity, be it never so far advanced in intellect or in art. And woe to the German race and to German civilization if the Dührings were allowed to speak for them!

But he has arrived at this conclusion,—this man Dühring, whose ability cannot be disputed, who was a teacher at the University when, ten years ago, with six hundred students around me, in a crowded lecture-room, I used to hear him discourse upon the highest themes of philosophy,—and it is absolutely heart-rending to think of it now,—this man has arrived at the conclusion that the Jewish race is a viler race, and must be banished as a corrupt and festering element out of the modern state. But how to banish them, that is the question! To drive them out of our own country, and inflict them upon other lands? No. The conscience of the modern philosopher is too tender: he is too much pervaded by the spirit of humanity to spread this plague of Judaism among other nations. To drive them back into Palestine and compel them to reconstruct their former state would only be to confer additional power upon them; for they would still continue to send out their colonies of emigrants into every land, and the possession of an own independent nationality at home would only strengthen the scattered members of the race, wherever they went. Nothing remains but one conclusion; and he draws that conclusion, he has the unspeakable audacity to draw that conclusion, and that conclusion is, in one word, the annihilation of the race, —their extermination. If the Jews complain of the wrong that was done them in the Middle Ages, Dühring also says, the measures that were undertaken against them in the Middle Ages were wrong, because they were not thorough enough: the Jews should not have been confined in Ghettos; they should not have been hunted down every now and then by their persecutors; they should have been blotted out entirely; they should not have been allowed to exist on the soil of a European land, the soil sacred to humanity and culture.

Imagine the German teacher of philosophy proclaiming such views! Imagine the following passage from his book, which I will read you, as spoken to a popular gathering! Why, it would turn such a gathering at once into a mob, and incite them to take up stones and firebrands, and murder and pillage the houses of those who had been thus pointed out to them as objects of their scorn. The following is the passage:—

"The Jew skull is certainly not the skull of a thinker. The Lord and his business take up, since the olden time, all the room in it, so far as it is not hollow. Elect self-conceit and a sort of insane idea of their greatness make the wind that blows among the thoughts of this little people. And, with such gifts as these, these nomads, these gypsies of Palestine, would sit down at our own tables as our guests and insult us; and that we, the German people, should have the patience to tolerate. So far as I am concerned, I have long given the Jews what they deserve. The Germans, it is true, are slow to move; but, when they do undertake a thing, they make thorough work of it. They first examine carefully where the seat of the epidemic is that is troubling them; but, when they have found that out, they do not scruple to use the most modern methods of disinfection. The most improved modern method of disinfection is racial extermination." You may turn with disgust from this hoarse croaking of hate. You may say, This can at best be only the malice of an individual that finds expression in such utterances. No. I must dwell upon these utterances, because I am compelled to believe that there is a connection between them and the petition which has lately been addressed to the German Chancellor, which has received many signatures, and which on the 21st and 22d of November was the subject of stormy debates in Parliament. On reading the petition and the book of Dühring's, and comparing them together, I find that the petition embodies the leading conclusions of Dühring's book; and I have discovered even similarities of expression which cannot be accidental. I have therefore been forced to the conclusion that I have found in Dühring's book the true source out of which that petition has come. And, in showing you the animus of him who is either the real author or the sponsor of the petition, I have uncovered to you the spirit that governs the whole movement. For, if Dühring demands the total extermination of the Jews as the ultimate desideratum, he has sense enough to perceive that the nation as a whole is not yet prepared for that degree of humanity and culture which he recommends; and so he formulates a series of preliminary demands, of which the most characteristic ones, in a modified form to suit the palate of the general reader, have been adopted into the petition. He demands the utter exclusion of Jews from the management of newspapers. They shall neither be proprietors nor editors of newspapers, nor connected with the editorial management in any way. The number of Jews allowed on the bench as judges and among the lawyers shall be strictly limited. In case the legal number is full, and any candidate presents himself for admission to the bar or for the preliminary examinations necessary to appointment in the judicial system of Germany, the said candidate, suspected of being a Jew, must be able to bring proofs from his pedigree that, for three generations back, his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were of pure stock. The number of Jews allowed to sit in the Legislature is also to be strictly limited. Even where Jewish judges are permitted, the German shall always have the right to decline to be brought up before such a judge, as this is only a due consideration to the natural feelings of the German; and, in certain cases, the testimony of Jews is to be declared invalid. The leading Jewish bankers are to be placed under government supervision; and trustees appointed by the government are to aid them in the management of their affairs, with the view, however, as is plainly stated, to the final confiscation of their wealth. No Jew is to be allowed to teach in any of the lower schools, or in any of the higher schools which are frequented by Christian pupils. And the German students of the university shall be taught to consider it as against their honor to have science served them by the representatives of a meaner race.

Lastly, the number of Jews allowed to live in any one place shall be restricted, the number of marriages in consequence be limited, and the population be forcibly decreased. All these, however, are only temporary measures, designed to prepare public opinion until the time will come when the ancient popular instincts that are slumbering now will awaken again, and it shall be left to a more energetic future to complete the emancipation from the Jews, which has thus been begun. What these ancient mediæval popular instincts are, we know; and what these words—"emancipation from the Jews"—mean, we have also been plainly informed. And all this, then, by a man who does not stand alone, but who either has influence enough, or who represents a sentiment to some extent, at least, prevailing in Germany, sufficiently well, to see his opinions embodied in a popular petition,—by a man whose contributions to political economy are considered valuable, who has been a teacher and is a writer on the history and theory of philosophy, and whose critical history of the general principles of mechanics has been crowned with the first prize by the University of Göttingen, in terms of the highest eulogium. And, when we consider furthermore that Heinrich von Treitschke has not hesitated to misuse his high position and reputation in order to help in the contemptible business of this agitation, there is a cry of dismay that rises from our hearts at this sight that reveals itself to us. To this pass, then, have you brought it, you men of consummate ability and high in intellect, that you make yourselves the panderers to the basest instincts of the multitude, that you find the theoretical formula for the coarsest passions that have ever inspired human malevolence. A cry over the neglected moral conditions of the times, that is the first impulse which the aspect of this agitation awakens in us. Here we have the Christian Treitschke on the one hand, and there we have the radical Dühring on the other, and both stand together on the same ground. The belief of the one has not helped him, the radicalism of the other has not hindered him. How could it? How can the mere holding of dogmatical views, without other helps, make men moral? How can radicalism on the other hand, how can logic, and the principles of mechanics, and political economy, and even the abstract knowledge of the theories of philosophy, make men moral? If these men, Dühring and Treitschke, had had a sound, moral culture in their childhood; if the fetichism of faith had not been invoked, which is insufficient; if as much direct attention had been paid to the development of their morality as to the development of their intellectual ability,—they would not now exhibit to the world the spectacle of confusion as to the first principles of all morality, causing others to share in their confusion. The need of wide and more arduous efforts at direct moral culture,—the conduct of the masses not only, the conduct of the most intellectual persons, who need such culture just as much,—who blunder and spread criminal views concerning the relations of man to man, without it,—makes that need plain. But there is another moral to be drawn from the movement itself. Here is the Jew, and here the Christian. To suppose that there is any natural repugnance between the two is absurd. A gentleman is a gentleman, the world over; and a gentleman is known of the gentlemen, wherever they meet. That there are certain qualities in certain members of the Jewish race which are objectionable is granted: that they are intrinsic in the race is denied. The wonder is that there are not more of these qualities. For more than a thousand years, the Jews have been the object of detestation and oppression unparalleled for its bitterness and persistency. From country to country, they were driven like wild animals; from every honorable pursuit, they were excluded, and yet money, money, was constantly demanded of them as the price for their existing at all. They have passed through these centuries of oppression; they have brought out with them certain moral qualities which seem to me inestimable,—a strong devotion to knowledge, intense domestic affections, a capability of quick and fervid enthusiasms, and, on the whole, industry and thrift.

These are the qualities that make of them good citizens, and valuable to the land that accepts them as its children. Coupled with these qualities are especially two that are often charged against them,—a certain sharpness in business dealings and an impertinent, self-asserting manner. But these qualities are but natural results of the long oppression that has preceded. And the wonder is not that these qualities exist; the wonder is that they are so quickly laid aside; the wonder is that, though the emancipation of the Jews of Germany hardly dates more than fifty years, so many of them have not only stripped off every outward sign of their previous degradation, but in the equipoise of manner as well as in the balance of mind are worthy to be ranked with the foremost of other races. There is a work of culture to be done on both sides. The Jews themselves must labor to free the uncultivated ones among them from those unwelcome peculiarities which they sometimes display. No matter who is responsible for them, that they exist is sufficient reason why they should be done away with. Social training, earnest efforts at education, are the best means of rooting out pertness of manner and undue self-assertion, and have already shown themselves so effective in this direction that there is the best reason for reposing confidence in their future salutary influence. The non-Jewish community on the other hand must learn one wholesome, moral lesson, must conquer in itself one immoral tendency in regard to this question. There is one great sin against morality at the root of all this prejudice in the forms which it commonly assumes, and that is the habit of attributing to every member of the race qualities which have been noticed in some members of the race. That hasty generalization, which in science becomes the source of errors, becomes in life the source of slander and calumniation. All men are prone to this habit. It is the true coarseness of natural instinct which here reveals itself, and which only a finer self-culture can overcome. The Turk looks upon all Christians with aversion, and will judge every individual Christian according to those specimens of degraded Christianity which he sees before him in the border-lands of his empire. The Germans sometimes speak of the Irish in the same unpardonable way, attributing to every member of the race certain qualities which they have noticed perhaps among the more degraded members of the Irish nationality; the Irish being similar to the Jews in this: that they also have been made the object of age-long persecution, that they also bear upon themselves the marks of oppression which by a twofold perfidy the children of the oppressors now use in argument against them. Whoever is guilty of this act of generalizing the qualities of some members of a race, attributing them to all, is guilty of an immoral judgment. For, only according to the qualities which the individual himself displays, have we a right to judge him; and, if we darken his image by the shadow of our own prejudices, we are oppressing his moral nature, and treading under foot his dignity as a human being.

As for the agitation in Germany, that will, we trust, collapse ere long. It is artificial, as we have shown, in its origin; and the best representatives of the German people are thoroughly ashamed of it. The Crown Prince of Germany has stigmatized the agitation in round language as a national disgrace. Leading members of the University of Berlin, of the Academy of Sciences, of the Municipal Council of the Capital, have issued a declaration in which they protest against the entire movement. "To make the individual fellow-citizen," they say, "suffer for differences of rites and religion is neither just nor noble. In unexpected manner, and to our deep shame, the race-hatred and fanaticism of the Middle Ages is again being called to life in different places of the Empire. The commandment of the law, as well as the commandment of honor, which enjoins that all Germans shall be equal in rights and duties, is broken. Like an epidemic pestilence, the revival of an old insane falsehood threatens to poison the good relations which have united Christians and Jews in the state, in the city, in society, and in the family. Yet is there time to oppose this confusion, and turn away from us national disgrace. Yet is there time, by the opposition of prudent men, to break the passion of the multitude, which has only been kindled by artificial means. Our summons is directed to the Christians of all parties, who believe religion to be the glad tidings of peace. Our summons is directed to all Germans who value the ideal legacies of their great princes, teachers, and poets, to defend, by public declaration and quiet reasoning, the common ground on which the national life of Germany rests,—respect for every form of religious conviction, the same rights, the same sunshine, the same recognition of capacity and faithful endeavor for the Christian and for the Jew." And so it is to be hoped that good will come out of evil; and so it is to be hoped that such emphatic declarations, that are the fruit of this agitation, will aid in once and forever clearing public opinion as to the principles involved, in once and forever branding him as an enemy of mankind who dares to sow the seeds of race-hatred or of religious hatred among his fellow-citizens. It is to be hoped that Christian and Jew will learn to understand each other better from mutual contact, and that that last affront which is offered to the oppressed—the pretence that emancipation is given them as a boon, the secret or avowed assumption that there is any condescension in social approaches—will be done away with. It is to be hoped that Christians and Jews will better and better understand each other, until at last the time shall come for all, as it has already come to-day for the more advanced, when the old sources of hate will be stopped up and the old causes of misunderstanding will be removed, and "the dead will at last be allowed to bury their dead;" when men and women will at last feel themselves as men and women, truly united in labor for mankind's common cause.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A NEW volume of essays by Huxley is soon to appear. Most of them have been published in various periodicals during the last few years.

MME. DE GIRARDIN says that the only reason she despairs of France is that it is the only nation she knows of where the men are better than the women.

SENATOR DAWES read a paper on "The Indian Question" before the Lee Literary Club on Thursday evening. In answer to a question regarding the Poncas, he stated that, having occupied their present reservation for three years, in his opinion, they had now made up their minds that they had better accept the government's offer and remain where they were.

THE services over the remains of Mrs. Cross (George Eliot) were conducted at London by Rev. Dr. Sadler, a Unitarian minister. Among those present were Herbert Spencer, Robert Browning, Sir Theodore Martin, George L. Dumaurier, artist, Edmund Yates, Thomas Woolner, R.A., and Rudolf Lehmann, artists. The grave of Mrs. Cross is near that of the late G. H. Lewes.

THE funeral of Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin took place at the Church of the Divine Paternity, a large audience being present. The galleries, organ-loft, and the space behind the pulpit were heavily draped in mourning. Back of the reading-desk was a tablet of white flowers upon which was the inscription, "He has risen." Under the desk was a large floral shield bearing the motto, "God is love." A large wreath of roses and lilies had upon it "Our Shepherd." Elaborate floral offerings were added from the Sunday-school. On the platform were the leading Evangelical clergymen of the city, and also Rev. Fathers Hecker and Coe, Rabbi Gottheil, Dr. Edward Beecher, and President Capen of Tufts College. The services were opened with prayer by President Capen, who also read selections from the Scriptures. Addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and Rev. Drs. Armitage and Pullman. The pall-bearers were George William Curtis, Dr. Austin Flint, Judge John R. Brady, Thomas Hicks, C. P. Huntington, Collector E. A. Merritt, George G. Lake, and Edward B. Fellows. The remains were taken to Greenwood for interment.

EPES SARGENT, whose name has long been associated with Spiritualism in this country, as one of its most prominent authors, died at his residence in Boston on Thursday night, December 30, of a cancer upon the tongue, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. Mr. Sargent took a thorough course in the Boston Latin School and entered Harvard College, where he studied for a short time, but did not graduate. He immediately engaged in literary labors, in which thenceforth he spent most of his life, and, as an author, compiler, and journalist, showed a versatile and facile capacity, without attaining extraordinary rank in either, or producing anything which is likely to make him remembered in literature. Apart from a better literary style, Mr. Sargent's writings on Spiritualism possess but little merit above those of their class. They exhibit the same feeble logic and strained and inconsequent reasoning peculiar to the works of spiritualist authors. The Springfield Republican, in concluding a notice of Mr. Sargent, justly observes, "Had he not been blinded by mental preoccupation, he could never have written Planchette, or the Despair of Science, or his last book, on the Scientific Basis of Spiritualism, both singularly shallow treatments of the extraordinary problems of psychologic power."

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

CHRISTMAS EVE, 1880.

No word, no sign, my days glide on,
O loyal soul, yet thou art gone;
And life—a blank and barren space—
Alone, yet smiling, I must face.

I want thee, need thee; I am weak;
I want thy kiss upon my cheek:
Canst thou forge', O tried and true,
The love that made this old world new?

Was not my soul absorbed in thine,
Lost, blended in one life divine?
Yet, lo! a black, mysterious tide
Between us stretches deep and wide.

Bewildered by the sense of loss,
Earth holds me fast,—I may not cross:
I only feel that thou art gone,
And still my days glide on, glide on.

Couldst thou but send some faintest sign
To claim my life and soul as thine,
'Twould be a breath from heaven above
To answer all this longing love.

Sometimes, 'tis true, my pulses beat
With sudden rapture, swift and sweet:
For one brief instant thou art nigh,
And then the vision passes by.

* * * * * *

But hearts may break, the sun shines on,— Shines on, dear love, yet thou art gone;
And still within its mocking light
I seek to hold my path aright.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 6, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for 1881, or any person who will pay for a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

OUR readers who once begin Mr. Adler's lecture on the anti-Jewish movement in Germany will not be deterred, we are sure, by its length from reading to the end. It is the most lucid statement of the matter we have anywhere seen, while his words burn with just indignation against the gross wrong. Portions of the lecture remind us of Theodore Parker's vigorous battles in Boston Music Hall against the old slave power.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

THE DEED DONE.

Simultaneously with the last issue of the Index, containing our article entitled "How it may be prevented," announcement was made, evidently by authority, in the Boston daily papers, that the proprietors of Parker Memorial Hall had sold the building to Mr. Rich, of the firm of Colby & Rich, publishers of the Banner of Light. Very likely the sale had been already made, or was practically made, when we wrote the article. Nevertheless, we are not sorry that we made our protest against the sale, even though we made it in the form of a vain appeal to prevent the sale. We can now only express our ineffective surprise that this important action should have been taken in such unseemly haste and secrecy, and add the hope that it is a condition of the sale that the name of the Hall shall be changed, and the tablet to Parker on the front wall of the building be removed. We must utter, too, our conviction that the proprietors have proved recreant to the public trust which they assumed for Parker's memory by making this sale without giving the liberal public a chance to help them to keep the building,—unless they have a project for using the proceeds for some other memorial to Mr. Parker, which may be equally good. We should be most glad to see some announcement of such a purpose, but as yet have seen or heard no hint of it. We are quite sure, however, that there are those among the proprietors in whose pockets any money received from the sale will burn until it finds its way out into some channel of public beneficence akin to the object for which the money was first given. Indeed, we are ready to believe that there is no one among them whose conscience will quietly permit a private use of his share of the proceeds. If they can only agree again to act together in some public way, they may do with the sum to be paid for the building, which is announced to be $75,000, something that shall quite as worthily represent and perpetuate Theodore Parker's work in Boston. That they will do this is now our petition and our hope.

THE LESSON OF IT.

There is a lesson involved in the sale of the Parker Memorial Building, and the probable early dissolution of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, which we trust Liberals everywhere will deeply ponder. The Society has agreed to relinquish its use of the Hall on the first of next March, and is likely then to pass out of existence. It is announced, it is true, in the apparently authorized statement concerning the sale, that the Society does not necessarily disband. But if, with the advantage of having a fine Hall for its uses free of rent, the Society has yet fallen to such low estate as to muster on Sunday little more than an array of empty benches, it is hardly likely to prosper better elsewhere or long to continue even the form of an organization. Indeed, it is not the loss of the Hall that is the cause of the breaking-up of the Society, but it is the loss of the Society that has caused the sale of the Hall.

As we said last week, so long as the Society had any use for the Hall and wanted it for its uses, the proprietors were under an obligation to keep it, and doubtless would have kept it. But why keep a building for a religious service to empty seats on Sunday morning? The ordinary audience had dwindled to such a feeble remnant that at once to expire were better than to keep up longer a flickering illusion of life. The only thing, we believe, that can possibly save the Society from a speedy and utter death is a thorough regeneration and reorganization with new purposes and methods, as we intimated last week. But we are not sure now that even this can save it; or that, now that its building is gone, it is worth while to try to save it. It is probable that the new purposes and methods can be more effectually secured in an absolutely new organization, that shall begin from the foundation on totally unencumbered ground.

We believe, indeed, that the future historian of the liberal religious movement in this country may see in this termination of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, and the consequent sale of Theodore Parker's monumental building, the necessary break in the continuity of institutions between Christianity and Free Religion. We believe he will note it as appropriately marking the close of the era of Transcendental Individualism; and we trust that he may as truthfully note it as marking the opening of a new era in the constructive and positive work of a religion which is not only individually rational and free, but socially coöperative and humanitarian.

The Twenty-eighth Congregational Society was created a generation ago, for the special purpose of giving Theodore Parker a hearing in Boston. It accomplished that purpose well and nobly. From the pulpit which it provided, Mr. Parker spoke to the whole country, and indeed to both hemispheres of the globe. When his voice was silenced by death, perhaps it would have been wiser if the Society had then disbanded, having fulfilled the mission for which it came into being. But, naturally, that course did not seem so clearly indicated then as it may to us now, looking back over the last twenty years.

The Society was founded on the basis of Christian and Puritan Congregationalism. Mr. Parker and his friends, though breaking from the authority of Christian revelation, and regarding Christianity only as a highly developed form of natural religion, yet did not wholly break from Christian institutions and traditions, nor from the Christian name. Mr. Parker was accustomed to define Christianity by the most essential teachings of Jesus in moral and spiritual things, leaving out of view his mental errors in doctrine; and this essential teaching of Jesus he regarded again as synonymous with "absolute religion"; and the primary truths of "absolute religion" he believed to be revealed by natural intuition in individual human consciousness. This was the outcome to which New England Transcendentalism had brought New England Unitarianism. Parker applied the Transcendental philosophy, which Emerson was putting into books and lectures, to the problems of theology and to practical ethics in pulpit instruction. He was the special spokesman of Transcendentalism in the pulpit. And Transcendentalism was a gospel of the liberty of individual reason. It proclaimed the fullest rights of reason. It proclaimed the fullest liberty for individual reason and conscience. But it also made these proclamations in the form of a gospel. It had uses for the preacher and prophet. It could make the old forms of Christian worship still serve its purposes. It believed in individual salvation through individual culture. And it would use the Christian form of Sunday service for enforcing the claims of reason and righteousness on the thought of individual hearers. If you went, therefore, into the Music Hall on Sunday morning, where the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society met in Parker's day, you did not find the programme of service different from the simple Congregational form in many churches. You heard the Bible read, a prayer offered, hymns of thanksgiving and petition sung, texts prefacing the sermon, a benediction pronounced: it was only in the sermon and the sentiments of the prayer that you would note a departure from the Christian Congregationalism of New England.

Under the influence of the Transcendental movement, helped by the nineteenth century type of persecution vouchsafed by the Unitarian denomination, other societies were formed in various places, as at Watertown, Barre, Worcester, and Lynn in Massachusetts, and, later, Mr. Frothingham's society in New York. There were others less noteworthy elsewhere. These societies were all similar in aim and method to the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society in Boston, and, like it, were based on Christian Congregationalism in form, though recognizing no special authority in the Christian religion. And like Parker's Society, too, they were organized by the personal efforts of, or to give a hearing to, particular preachers; and, when these preachers have left the societies, the societies have very soon ceased to exist. We believe there is not one of them in existence now. The Boston Twenty-eighth Congregational, the first on the ground, and in a sense parent of the rest,— though they were all intensely individual, and would hardly acknowledge even the relation of parentage to anybody or anything less than an individual Holy Ghost,— is the last to leave. It is about to give up its ghost, and only lingers for decent burial. We have not included in the above-named societies the Free Congregational Society at Florence, Mass.; for that, though taking the Congregational name, was organized from the start on a different basis. It severed itself in methods and form from Christian traditions, did not come into existence on the inspiration of any one speaker, and concentrated its efforts from the first very largely in coöperative works for social well-being. Nor do we here take into account certain societies of Unitarian name and antecedents which have become practically free and independent societies under their special preachers; for we cannot tell how largely the strength and continuance of such societies are due to the inherited momentum from their Christian ancestry. They are all living, more or less, on past traditions and methods. To-day, they may be absolutely free and undenominational. What they may be under a different preacher, next year, may be a question. The one point to which we call attention now is the historical fact that all the religious societies which were originated by the Transcendental movement, on the basis of Christian Congregationalism, are either absolutely dead or soon to die.

This is a pregnant fact with a weighty meaning. It is a fact to be pondered thoughtfully and gravely. To us, it means that Transcendentalism, however momentous and necessary was the mission it had to fulfil, and however ably and effectively it accomplished that mission, cannot do the work demanded of free rational religion to-day. It means that individualism in religion has come to the natural end of its career; that, though a Christian church may still flourish and serve many good uses, and rationalism may be a mighty agent in human society, that mongrel institution of religious worship, begotten of Transcendental Rationalism and Christian Congregationalism, has no power to perpetuate its kind. It means that a new era is here, that new methods must be employed, that new wine must be put into new bottles. It means, in fine, that the time has come when free and rational religion, if it is to be a power in human society, must begin to show a capacity and a will to create its own institutions; that, though free religious work may be honestly and legitimately and usefully done in societies of Christian origin and that still adhere to some of their Christian inheritances, rational and free religion must begin to let the world know that, having broken from Christian authority, it can get along independently of the forms of Christian tradition,— that it must make its own nest, hatch its own eggs, and henceforth count no progeny but its own.

ATHEISM IN COLLEGES.

Under the above caption, President John Bascom contributes to the North American Review for January an article which deserves the attention and respect of all fair-minded Liberals by its striking freedom from bigotry, narrowness, and intolerance. Although written from the stand-point of "faith," and orthodox faith at that, there is in it an elevation of tone, a catholicity of spirit, a candor and equity of treatment, which are quite too rare in the attempts of orthodox believers to handle such topics as the title above quoted indicates. Even an atheist may read it without offence, provided he himself is not more partisan than his critic. While not concealing his opinion that atheism tends ultimately to produce immorality in conduct, President Bascom expressly concedes that "it would be difficult, except hesitatingly in single cases, to refer any immorality in our American colleges to unbelief." By this concession, he administers a gentle but well-merited rebuke to the orthodox critics, who are so quick to attack Harvard, Cornell, or Michigan Universities with clamorous outcries against the practical "immorality" absurdly inferred from the unorthodox reputation they bear. It is to be hoped that this new and better example will be widely imitated.

But the article in question is noteworthy on other and more important grounds.

Candidly admitting (what indeed is a notorious fact) that "scepticism . . . is passing over England as a tidal wave of great breadth and force," President Bascom, while maintaining that "this unbelief has as yet met with more obstruction in America than in England, and cannot be said to have taken any large possession of the ruling thought among us," puts the question, "How far is this unbelief finding its way into American colleges?"

To answer this question, he points out that English philosophy, as taught by Locke, Hume, Hartley, Mill, and Spencer, has for centuries been essentially "a philosophy of sensationalism, materialism, scepticism, and agnosticism," and argues that "atheism is the necessary upshot of such a line of thought"; whereas, in American colleges, "the Scotch philosophy, as offered by Stewart and Hamilton, is more frequently taught than any other." He also finds that in England science has been enlisted in the service of the dominant national philosophy: "Such men as Tyndall and Huxley, with high claims in science and no claims in philosophy, have brought the strength of the one great intellectual movement of our age into the service of unbelief. This union of the feeblest of philosophies with a stalwart science has been the parentage of current scepticism." On the other hand, he finds that in America "the science of this country, in the hands of such men as Professors Gray, Dana, and Henry, has not generally added to itself a destructive speculation, prompting perpetual efforts at the solution of the ultimate problems of philosophy, the existence of matter and mind, their nature and dependence, with the theistic questions which accompany these inquiries."

It is really refreshing to see an orthodox apologist discovering that the hidden roots of scepticism are to be found in "science" and "philosophy" rather than in the "pure cussedness" of the unregenerate human heart or in the individual's depraved desire to shield his bad passions under a pretence of regard for good reasonings. Verily, the world is moving at last in earnest!

But it is still more refreshing to see so able and sincere a champion of Orthodoxy openly declaring that revelation is of no avail in this great battle concerning the existence or non-existence of spiritual realities, but that reason alone must be the decisive tribunal. On this supremely important point, it is worth while to quote at some length: —

"Philosophy is taught with moderate success in our colleges; and the final results of belief must depend largely on the form which it shall hereafter assume, and the force it shall display. If we secure vigorous life in this direction, we have nothing to fear; if we cannot, the gods themselves cannot help us. A profounder philosophy, a philosophy that takes root within itself, — this is the demand of higher education, as it is the demand of higher thought. . . . To deny philosophy is, under the deceptive appearance of agnosticism, to make way for one of the feeblest and most self-contradictory forms of philosophy, with the added evil that it does not know itself by, and is not known by, its true name. Philosophy is the only remedy for philosophy, the only remedy for scepticism, itself a philosophy. The appeal is to reason, and from this appeal there is no escape. Revelation affords no refuge. Dogma is no defence, but a portion of the danger rather. It will be felt by many that the evil stated in this form is vague, and the remedy still more so. Men love specifics, only their specifics turn out to be no specifics, and they are thrown back on the great current of events, flowing darkly on under general laws. This difficulty of unbelief, so far as it is a difficulty, is in men's thoughts; and there it must be encountered."

Glorious, noble words are these! If the Church should but catch the spirit of this brave believer, come out of its intrenchments of special claims and unjust privileges, and boldly meet the unbelievers on the ground of recognized equal rights in reason and in law, it might not indeed win the victory for its outworn creed, but it would at least win what it can never have behind those cowardly ramparts, — the hearty and unalloyed respect of the antagonists it cannot conquer.

The "Scotch philosophy" on which President

Bascom relies, however, as a permanent support for the "faith" of Orthodoxy, is discredited in advance, and forever. If the "tidal wave" of unbelief in Christianity has not yet swept over America, it is only because America is still very backward in philosophy, and feels little general interest in the profounder subjects of speculative inquiry. This backwardness, however, is only a result of the disproportionate attention hitherto demanded by the material development of a vast continent. The American mind is more and more becoming attracted to the fundamental problems of science and philosophy, and is yet destined, as I deeply believe, to cease its docile discipleship of imported foreign systems, and to evolve a native philosophy on the same universal, cosmopolitan basis upon which it has already founded its political institutions. Before many years shall have passed by, the "tidal wave" that President Bascom dreads will be sweeping with resistless force, not merely over American colleges, but over the entire American community.

Friends of a thorough-going philosophy, permanently grounded on the objective scientific method as opposed to the worn-out subjectivism of both the à priori and à posteriori schools of European philosophy, should not be too much discouraged by the fact that such amusing phenomena as the "Concord School of Philosophy" meet with popular deference and applause instead of good-natured smiles. Notwithstanding the ability of some of its promoters, that "School" is essentially an attempt to rehabilitate an already exploded Hegelianism, and to dress up America in the cast-off clothes of Germany. Better things than this are in store for the robust and keen American intellect. Whenever it gives itself in good earnest to the task of working out a philosophical synthesis inclusive of and commensurate with all possible applications of the scientific method, it will be guilty of as great innovations in philosophy as it has already been in government. And this day is rapidly approaching. Neither England, Scotland, nor Germany will long continue to lead the thought of America. The times are ripening for a vast and new revolution in philosophy, by which the subjectivism hitherto dominant in both the great divergent schools that date from Roscellinus and Descartes shall be supplanted by the objectivism of science, and by which the test of truth shall be found, not in logic alone, but in logic plus verification. The obscure beginnings of this revolution may be traced as far back as old Roger Bacon, but it can hardly come to full consciousness anywhere save in the New World, emancipated as this is from the cramping influence of a too profoundly venerated past.

But while the "tidal wave" of scepticism as to the essential doctrines of Christianity is certain, at no distant day, to sweep over America no less than England, I anticipate just as little as President Bascom that it will be a wave of atheism. Orthodoxy would be wiser than it is likely to be, if it should discern the necessity of sacrificing its Christianism to save its religion. The only hope of the permanence of spiritual beliefs evidently depends upon the successful accomplishment of the philosophical revolution above indicated. The future of the world's theistic belief, as President Bascom truly declares, depends on the future of philosophy; but he does not see that the future of philosophy depends on its ability to assimilate itself to the scientific method that is slowly but steadily conquering all domains of human thought. The reason why science has hitherto seemed to be growing atheistic is that philosophy has not yet learned to be scientific, or to coördinate the results of scientific discovery in higher and larger syntheses than those of the various special sciences. For this reason, scientific men generally despise all philosophers as mere "metaphysicians," incapable of comprehending either the method or the results of science; while they themselves are generally incapable of rising to the wider outlooks whence alone the unities of Nature can be discerned. Just so long as this breach between science and philosophy continues, science will tend as steadily towards atheism as "Scotch philosophy" tends towards superstition; both will tend towards a rationally theistic interpretation of Nature, when, and only when, they come to a mutual understanding and reconciliation on the basis of a universalized scientific method, and the coördination of all its results in a universalized philosophical synthesis. Until this reconciliation has been effected, not by compromise, but by mutual expansion and interpenetration, the "tidal wave" that is even now rolling from England into our American colleges and social circles and homes will be increasingly a wave of atheism. The "Scotch philosophy" which President Bascom considers at least a "temporary support to faith" will be as ineffective as Mrs. Partington's broom was against the Atlantic Ocean. Nothing short of the radical reconciliation of science and philosophy, now so unfortunately jealous of each other and pulling opposite ways, can ever again produce the conditions of a new era of general agreement respecting the deeper questions of human thought.

Believing the present estrangement of the two to be wholly unnatural and unnecessary, I also believe that their reconciliation will ultimately be effected; and then the truth, whatever it may be, will be likely to be solidly established in the minds of men. For one, I do not believe it will then be atheism; for atheism seems to me shallow and crude, unscientific and unphilosophical alike. But for the present no effectual barrier exists against the overflow of English atheism into American colleges; and the probability is great that President Bascom will himself discover this fact before long. Meanwhile the interests of truth abide unchanged, and will to the end enlist the ardent zeal of all fitted to comprehend and to feel their transcendent importance. In the hands of such as these we may safely confide those interests without fear. FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

P. S. — May I add a word respecting the Index itself? It has given me great pleasure to learn that my letter of a few weeks back was followed by numerous renewed subscriptions and some donations to the Index treasury; and, so far as these were prompted by that letter, I return my grateful thanks to my old friends who sent them. Let me seize this opportunity to urge the claims of the Index once more, and bespeak for it the most liberal support of all. It needs this support now, and at once; and I fervently hope that every one who stood by me will stand as faithfully by my successor. Every act of generous aid to the Index will be felt as a personal kindness to myself — exactly as much as if I were still its editor. Do not suffer the only journal that represents the noblest spirit of American liberalism to perish by the neglect of its own friends. Especially do I hope that the stockholders of the old Index Association will pay now what would have been the tenth assessment on their stock. This is the hour to show your sympathy for the old cause. Let me rejoice in proofs that you love that cause still. A.

THE Boston Advertiser, in a leading editorial article, devoted to the address issued by the committee of the Provisional Association for State Secularization, makes one mistake, which we see often enough in extremely partisan religious journals, but which we are surprised to see in a journal of the usual careful fairness of the Advertiser. In speaking of the obstacles which this secular movement has to overcome, it says that the founders of our republic "never contemplated, and they never thought of providing for a system of laws from which the idea of obligation to and dependence upon the moral government of the world was to be excluded." This is not quite so bad as some of the misrepresentations of secularism which we have seen in articles and reported speeches in the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, wherein it has been charged that the secularists wished to abolish all laws designed to support morality; but it would leave on the casual reader the same impression. Some of the prominent leaders in the movement for entire secularization of the State, doubtless, do not believe in a moral government of the world through a personal Infinite Lawgiver; that is, they do not believe in a theological basis of morality, and this is why they protest against theological beliefs being put into civil constitutions and laws. But they have no thought of a system of laws from which the idea of obligation to principles of natural morality is excluded. They would insist on natural morality as strongly as would their opponents. Under this misapprehension lest morality is to suffer, the Advertiser does not favor the objects which the address sets forth. It admits, however, that the writers have presented their case with "great moderation of temper" and with "diligent gleaning of the field."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

ANY one desiring to obtain a fair idea of the influence of modern science upon the theology of the sects can scarcely do better than to read the lecture of Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, delivered as the first of a new series of "Monday Lectures" in Boston, and printed in full in the Independent of December 16. It is scholarly and frank and manly, and assents to about all the conclusions of modern science that can possibly be assented to, without letting go all hold upon the supernaturalism of the Bible. In what way the Bishop manages to reconcile some of the admissions in his lecture with the authoritative creed of his Church is best known to himself, but is certainly a mystery to us. The pious Episcopalian, for instance, daily repeats, or should repeat, "We believe in the resurrection of the body"; but the Bishop says that there is, in his opinion, "no grosser form of materialism than that of the theological school, which teaches the doctrine of a final reconstruction of the animal body, a recomposition of the physical atoms disintegrated by the act of death." We agree with this presentation, and take no exception to his next assertion, that this is "a dogma which destroys the basis upon which the only satisfactory philosophical or scientific argument for immortality can be constructed; namely, the law of continuity." We desire to ask, however, on the supposition that the Bishop represents the present views of his sect, if, as a matter of historic fact, the writers of the creed did not mean the resurrection of the physical body; and if this question be answered in the affirmative (could it possibly be answered in any other way?) would it not be well for the Church candidly to admit a change of opinion, and to make a corresponding change in its creed?

BISHOP CLARK'S belief with regard to immortality appears to be identical with that of modern Spiritualism, as set forth in the work entitled After Dogmatic Theology, What? recently noticed in the Index. The spiritual body, as elaborately described in his lecture, that which gives form to the physical body, is composed of a tenuous ether, or some allied substance. He asserts the "necessity of some intermediate link between the body and the soul, in order to explain their mutual reaction," or "the existence of an intermediate substance of almost inconceivable tenuity, constituting a link or bond between the gross corporeal body and the spiritual substance commonly called the soul." He says also, in another part of the same lecture, "The old idea of the soul passing off into space, like a puff of empty nothingness, without form or substance, without any kind of organ or function,—still existing, but nowhere in particular,—is equivalent to annihilation." He logically follows out this idea of a tenuous and spiritual body (we should like to know, by the way, the precise point of tenuity at which matter becomes entitled to the epithet "spiritual") having organs and functions, and surviving the death of the physical body. He believes, therefore, in continuous progression after death, and that there will be in the other world something corresponding to what we here call natural science and art. "Altogether too much is said about the rest of heaven." "The eternal life may be one perpetual act of worship, but the worship will not be in a monotone," and so on. In all this, however, he only repeats, in dignified language, what has again and again been set forth by modern Spiritualism and by most Universalists.

We scarcely need to call attention to the abolition of all belief in any old-fashioned hell, or in the fall of man, or in the vicarious atonement, etc., which logically follows from the above presentation. These old dogmas, if held at all by the lecturer, can be held only by explaining away their original signification. Perhaps the most significant of all the Bishop's admissions, however, are these: that the light thrown upon the next stage of existence by the Scripture, is general and limited; that many passages once interpreted as referring to the next world undoubtedly refer only to this world; that we want to be at rest, so far as the fact that there is such a world is concerned; and that, in these days of sharp and ruthless historical criticism, it is very desirable to supplement and confirm the doctrines of the Bible by arguments drawn from other sources. There seems to be in these sentences a positive recognition of the fact that science and Biblical criticism are undermining the old foundations of Christian faith, and that already few reputable men of science would be willing to found any argument upon the authority of a Bible passage.

It is a little bit amusing, after reading the lecture through, to turn back and reread the opening sentences: "There is not much that is essentially new in the fundamental postulates of our modern philosophies. The immutability of matter, the law of evolution, the persistence of force, and the principle of natural selection, are all recognized in some form by ancient authors." But much can be forgiven to the intense yearning of a churchman for the support of ancient authority. As a legitimate inference from the spirit of the lecture as a whole, we are almost inclined to paraphrase a Scriptural passage, and to say that Bishop Clark is not only almost, but altogether, such as Free Religionists are, except some "tenuous" Episcopalian bonds.

R. C.

Professor Flint, in a late address to his divinity class at Edinburgh, gave them a definition of what constitutes a "divine call," which is the same for the ministry as for any other known avocation: "That man has a divine call to any office or place when, in an honest and a conscientious application of his reason to all the circumstances of the case, he perceives that in that office or place he can do most for God's glory." This is certainly a much more sensible conception in respect to a vocation than the one which has been entertained.

BOOK NOTICES.

Note.— It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the Free Religious Index, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

Sketches and Reminiscences of the Radical Club of Chestnut Street, Boston. Edited by Mrs. John T. Sargent, Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1880. $2.00.

The Radical Club has been in existence thirteen years, having been organized in 1867. It has, however, within that time changed its form of organization and even its name, being now known as the Chestnut Street Club, and having been in later years of the nature of private literary receptions. Its existence is due mainly to the Rev. John T. Sargent, a radical Unitarian clergyman, who was early compelled to resign his pastorate because he exchanged with Theodore Parker at the period when that great preacher was most dreaded in Boston. Mr. Sargent then left the pulpit, and found a quiet home in Chestnut Street. When the Free Religious Association was organized, a number of years later, a fresh impulse was given to freethought in religion. To meet certain social demands of this new movement, better than could the public meeting, Mr. Sargent invited the more radical of his friends to his home. At the first meeting there were thirty persons present. A regular organization was effected, with officers and a list of members. But this has fallen into disuse, and is now displaced. Latterly, the meetings have been summoned by personal invitation. The company has been select, and the exercises have been of an entirely informal character. An essay has usually been read by some one specially invited to do so, and it has been followed by a general conversation. For a number of years, Dr. Bartol, a near neighbor, alternated with Mr. and Mrs. Sargent in giving hospitality to the Club. Mrs. Sargent has done well to give this volume of reminiscences to the public. We should have been glad of a fuller account of the causes which led to the formation of the Club, and a little clearer insight into the details of its management; but the book is an exceedingly interesting one as it is. What would we not give for such an account of the Transcendental Club, and what was read and said at its meetings! The Radical Club is really a successor to the earlier one, and, though not so important, its influence has been wider, and its doings are worthy of this carefully prepared record. Since Mr. Sargent's death, a few years ago, his wife has continued the same genial hospitality. Under her management, the Club has increased in numbers and interest, giving no sign of decay or death, so often predicted.

This volume contains reports of fifty essays and the discussions which followed, accounts of five special meetings, and various letters and poems pertaining to the Club. A carefully prepared synopsis of each essay is given, and such reports of the discussions as could be made up from the newspaper accounts of the meetings, the journals of friends, aided by memory. In this way, a very clear idea is given of the doings of the Club. Many of the essays have been printed in books or elsewhere. These reports indicate that a very remarkable series of papers have been presented to the Club, and on a wide range of subjects. The first essay was by Mr. Emerson, that since printed as the "Sovereignty of Ethics." Four pages are here given, several of the paragraphs not having been printed with the remainder of the essay. The concluding paragraph may be remembered as that with which he concluded his second address before the Free Religious Association. This is the essay in which the Rev. Joseph Cook found evidence of Mr. Emerson's apostasy. The fact of its having been read to the Radical Club, and that the paragraphs here given were a portion of it when read in Boston, at least half a dozen times as an essay or lecture, pretty effectually disproves of the conclusions of Mr. Cook. Here, as so often before, Mr. Emerson gives expression to his faith in the universality and authority of the moral sentiment. "Christianity," he says, "strives against the sensual instincts of man: we hold it, therefore, in honor. So does Buddhism, and every high enthusiasm. Just so far as they have this power, they prevail." He says we measure all creeds by their civilizing power. Referring to the mythologies which accompany all religions, he says: "These cosmical statements occur in every nation, and in the several books of every nation. Every reader knows that almost every passage in our sacred books can be paralleled with a like sentiment from another book of a distant nation, and of such an age as to show it was not derived from ours." Speaking of how many minds are infatuated on the subject of religion, he uses this expressive sentence: "In a day not far off, these ridiculous attempts to patch the ecliptic of the universe with a piece of tin will come to an end." To the claim that the terrors of the old religion imposed wholesome checks on the minds of men, he answers that "the lives of the believers were broken by it, their minds obscured, and their moral sense injured." The last paragraph is this:—

"I look for the enlargement of that upper class in our society, composed of those who enjoy the luxury of a religion that does not degrade; who think it the highest worship to expect of Heaven the most and the best; who do not wonder that there was a Christ, but that there were not a thousand; who have conceived an infinite hope for mankind; and who believe that the history of Jesus is the history of every man, written large."

In this volume there are reports of six essays by John Weiss, five by Professor C. C. Everett, three by Professor Peirce, and two each by David A. Wasson, C. P. Cranch, C. A. Bartol, H. James, and Professor Alpheus Hyatt. Among those represented by but one essay are Mrs. Howe, Frothingham, Gannett, W. H. Channing, Linton, Sanborn, Higginson, Coquerel, Hedge, David A. Wells, A. M. Powell, Morse, S. Longfellow, Potter, Shaler, Hunt, Davidson, Fiske, Abbot, Howison, and Holmes. On one occasion, Cranch read a poem; and at other meetings, instead of the essay, various poetical contributions were read. On the last day of 1873, a reception was given to Mr. Emerson, and receptions were also given to Professor Tyndall and Dom Pedro. Commemorative meetings were held for Mr. Sargent and Charles Sumner. The range of subjects was somewhat wide, but principally included within the limits of religion, science, and society. The Club in religion represents Transcendentalism more than any other phase. The influence of science, however, is seen in the names of Fiske, Peirce, Shaler, Hunt, Hyatt, and Jeffries, and in such subjects as "Law," "Evolution," "Heredity," and "Darwinism." Such social questions as "Democracy," "Woman," "The People," "Economic Laws," and "Marriage," commanded the wisest treatment and much interest. Many phases of life, literature, morals, and art were also discussed. Indeed, it would be difficult anywhere to find such an able treatment of so many important subjects, and by so many men and women of culture and genius.

The discussions at these meetings were of quite as much interest as the essays. They were often witty, and almost always wise. When some conservative in theology was present, as Wendell Phillips or Calvin Stowe, there was a lively time and the sharpest of sparring. Many persons took part in these talks who did not read essays. Among them were Felix Adler, Alcott, Lord Amberley, General Armstrong, Bradlaugh, Chadwick, Mrs. Cheney, J. F. Clarke, Collyer, Garrison, Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Mott, Owen, Miss Peabody, Phillips, Schurz, and Whittier. The chief talkers were Bartol, Weiss, Emerson, Wasson, Higginson, Sargent, Phillips, Peirce, Channing, and Clarke. Nearly all shades of opinion in religion and philosophy were represented from time to time, and all spoke with freedom.

Many interesting personal incidents are related. At the Emerson reception, Bradlaugh said that Mr. Emerson's lecture on Self-reliance was copied by him when a young man, and to it he ascribed the first step in the career he had adopted. At the meeting in honor of Tyndall, he expressed great surprise that Emerson had not been invited to lecture before the Lowell Institute, and was astonished that any one in Boston could look down on him. In the course of the conversation, Tyndall said: "The first time I ever knew Waldo Emerson was when, years ago, a young man, I picked up on a stall a copy of his Nature. I read it with such delight, and I have never ceased to read it; and, if any one can be said to have given the impulse to my mind, it is Emerson. Whatever I have done, the world owes to him." For many years, John T. Sargent presided over the Club. A meeting of tender remembrance was held after his death, when the most sympathetic words of respect were spoken by his friends.

Mrs. Sargent deserves much credit for her share in this volume. It is well edited, and with a just appreciation of the importance of the sayings and doings of the Club. As a record of the Radical Club, and with the purpose of presenting to the public a just idea of its spirit and purpose, the plan here followed was the best, much better than to have given a few essays in full. Though everything here presented is fragmentary, and no adequate justice is done the essayists in many of these very brief reports, yet the greater number of subjects presented, and the gossipy vein running through the whole book, makes it a very good record of the Club. Many of those who have watched the doings of these people in Chestnut Street for many years, and read the newspaper reports of the meetings, will be glad to possess this volume. They will find much in its pages to interest them, much to quicken thought, and much to stimulate to a wider life activity. Here is a free congress of thought on the highest problems of the time; and every side of these questions is presented. In this record (of over four hundred pages), the significance and value of such an interchange of thought are clearly seen and amply justified.

FOUR O'CLOCKS. Poems by Helen Barron Bostwick. Philadelphia: E. Claxton & Co.

The dainty holiday volume which bears this daintier name contains much that ranks its author among the highest class of minor poets. Some of the poems are familiar to readers of the Index, as they were republished in this paper at different times. Others readers of the Atlantic and Scribner will be glad to greet again. Several of the poems show a good grasp of the rare power of human portraiture in verse, as for instance "The King's Picture," "Jealousy," "Drafted," "The Whole Story," and "Betsey destroys the Papers." A true lover of flowers is our "Four O'clock" poet, as one might know from her poems, were it not for their title. But, although showing that love of nature which all artist-souls feel, these verses deal more with the interior life of the heart than with the pomps and shows of the exterior universe. And this appreciation of human life, its motives, its desires, its possibilities, is pitched, in its expression, in the nineteenth century key. The free breath of our newer faith is its fragrance rather than the mediæval incense that perfumes so many poems. To be sure, the plaint of "Too Wise for Love" is a little betrayal of longing for other and better days for poets; but, in the main, these poems are, like so much of our greatest literary work, a more or less conscious expression of the new thought of our time. The standards of character hinted at are the widely ideal, not the narrowly sectarian. Our author is not even in her inspiration; the too familiar little rhyme set to music some time ago, "How the Gates came Ajar," ringing very shallow and immature beside the beautiful poem of "Who takes the Lily." Both poems deal with angelic and supernatural imagery; but the latter marks its author's higher, and the former her lower, if not lowest, tide of poetic conception and expression. The poem of subtlest meaning, and the one we should be inclined to place very high in rank, not only in relation to this author's work, but also in comparing her with others more widely known, is the exquisitely suggestive and finished "At the Wood's Edge." Any poet might be glad to have written so delicately perfect an exposition of one of life's sweetest sorrows. We welcome this little volume as more fully introducing us to a poet whose name will hereafter insure our reading of all verses bearing her name. Should some "evening primroses" ever appear from her garden, we should look for a still greater development of the unusual dramatic power found in some of these poems, and should hope for a few more such rare inspirations as "At the Wood's Edge."

THERE is nothing sensational in the January number of the International Review, but a calm and solid treatment of three public questions of great present interest, "State Support of Denominational Schools," "The Chinese Question," and "Ireland." The article on Ireland is the most lucid statement of the Irish question we have seen: it is by a competent hand, a member of the British Parliament. Horace Bushnell, Poe, and Gilbert Stuart are finished studies in speculative theology, biography, and art. The beginning of a translation of the Mahá-Bhárata, or Iliad of India, by Edwin Arnold, is the portion of this number of the International which will undoubtedly attract the widest interest. Mr. Arnold offers it to the American public with "all gratitude and attachment," doubtless in recognition of the hearty response acorded here to The Light of Asia, a poem which has been read not only in parlors, but workshops. We were sitting in a barber's chair the other day, when Sir Tonsor suddenly poised his shears and comb, and confounded us with the question, "What do you think of The Light of Asia?" On the whole, this translation promises to be more novel and interesting than anything we have received from Mr. Arnold.

THE children get the best of everything, nowadays. Messrs. D. Lothrop & Co. do their share in keeping up the standard of juvenile literature in every department, drawing into their service the best writers, designers, and engravers; and the result is that they produce magazines which may safely challenge comparison with any competitor on literary or artistic grounds. The Wide-Awake starts off for the new year with a brilliant array of stories, poems, pictures, and all the little odds and ends in which the young people delight. Babyland, which is intended for the smallest children, also presents an attractive array of good things, applying the adjective in any sense you please. Gray beards and flaxen curls will bend over and mix together, and the heads to which these respective capillary adjuncts belong will derive equal benefit and pleasure from the perusal of the magazines.

X.
THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.

"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." — MATT. v., 16.

1. Man's First Thoughts about God.

THE earliest gods of the most primitive races of men appear to have been their own deceased parents or ANCESTORS. The first social organization was the FAMILY. The FATHER, or head of the family, was its supreme, autocratic ruler. His will was the only recognized law.

The first of mankind were but little higher than brutish animals. The rule of the FATHER over his family was a rule of force rather than of love. His children, therefore, regarded him with awe and fear. After his death, they believed him to be still existing, and possessed of the same character. They offered sacrifices, and performed various rites and ceremonies, in order to appease his unseen spirit, and prevent it from doing them harm. When the ancestral spirit became a god, this DEITY was still regarded with awe and fear rather than affection.

NOTE.— Yet, since the family itself is an advance out of the condition of brutehood, and exhibits a higher form of affection, the origin of religion and the idea of GOD were by no means ignoble. They grew out of the worthiest and most unselfish feelings of which primitive man was capable.

2. Anthropomorphism.

Thus, the earlier races of men came to believe in ANTHROPOMORPHIC deities, or gods possessing the forms and characters of men. They represented them as arbitrary tyrants, governing mankind according to their caprice; as great, non-natural men, having like passions with human rulers, and therefore to be abjectly feared and obeyed.

At first, the gods were represented as possessing no moral qualities whatever. Afterwards, as man's moral nature grew, he bestowed these qualities upon his conception of the gods whom he worshipped. The early gods of China, Chaldea, Assyria, Phœnicia, Egypt, India, Greece, and Rome were anthropomorphic.

3. The Jewish Idea of God.

The earliest idea of GOD among the JEWS was also anthropomorphic. (See Amos i., 2, 8; vii., 3, 6, 15; viii., 1 ff.; ix., 1; Micah i., 3; Zech. viii., 2, 3, 6; Isa. vi., 1 ff.; Gen. ii., iii., 8–19, etc.) YAHWEH was represented as a stern, jealous, despotic Being, commanding the exclusive reverence of his "chosen people," visiting them with calamities when they disobeyed his commands, but assisting them to overcome their enemies when they were obedient. His character resembles that of an Oriental despot. It is relieved, however, by a quality usually wanting in the gods of the mythologies. The most pleasing service to him consists in the doing of RIGHTEOUSNESS. (Isa. xi., xxxii.; Amos v., etc.)

NOTE.—The Jewish idea of GOD became less crudely anthropomorphic and more spiritual and moral after the captivity, a fact doubtless due in part to the PERSIAN influence. The ZOROASTRIAN conception of AHURA-MAZDA was much loftier and more spiritual than the HEBREW idea of YAHWEH before the captivity.

4. Jesus' Idea of the Heavenly Father.

In the teaching of JESUS, the idea of GOD, though still anthropomorphic, becomes less harsh, severe, and despotic. YAHWEH becomes the "HEAVENLY FATHER" (Mark xi., 25, 26; Matt. v., 16, 45, 48; vi., 1; xii., 50; xxiii., 10; Luke x., 21, etc.), having a loving care over all his children; "making his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sending rain on the just and on the unjust." (Matt. v., 45, 46; Luke vi., 35.) He is MERCIFUL as well as just. (Luke vi., 36.) He is OMNISCIENT, knowing all our needs. (Matt. vi., 32.) He hears and answers prayer. (Mark xi., 24, 25; Matt. vi., 6; vii., 11.)

GOD is a UNITY, according to the current belief of the Jews. (Mark xi., 29; compare Deut. vi., 4.) He is greater than JESUS, since JESUS often beseeches him for favors. (Mark xiv., 36; Matt. xxvi., 39; Luke xxii., 42–44.) HE alone is PERFECT, and an example for all men to follow. (Mark x., 18; Matt. xix., 17; v., 48; Luke xviii., 19; vi., 36.) HE alone knows the time when the KINGDOM OF GOD shall appear. (Mark xiii., 30–32; Matt. xxiv., 34–36.) He designs the joys of the KINGDOM for the faithful few who do the works of RIGHTEOUSNESS (Matt. vi., 21–23; Luke xii., 32), and has appointed JESUS the MESSIAH or leader to bring about this reign of good on earth (Luke xxii., 29, 30).

Very tender and beautiful is JESUS' picture of the "HEAVENLY FATHER," though severe against all who reject his gospel of forgiveness and righteousness. (Mark xi., 26.) But is it wholly consistent with the scientific view of a universe governed by law? What do you understand by a "LAW OF NATURE"? Is there nothing but dead matter, blind force, and unintelligent law, or is the universal order an evidence of universal intelligence, or MIND? Do you think of GOD as personal or impersonal? Is he one with the universe, or a POWER above the universe? How does the GOD OF THEOLOGY differ from the GOD OF SCIENCE? What do you think of SPENCER'S conception of GOD as the UNKNOWABLE?

If the universe manifests a "POWER which makes for RIGHTEOUSNESS," BEAUTY, and ORDER; if evolution is its universal method of action, tending to greater and greater perfection; if MAN is the natural offspring of this INFINITE COSMIC LIFE,—is it not, after all, consistent with scientific thought to regard it as possessing something of the qualities of universal Fatherhood, Beneficence, and Love?

NOTE A.—The idea of GOD as the "HEAVENLY FATHER" seems to have originated among the Aryan peoples, and suggests the origin of all religion in Ancestor-Worship. One of the earliest names of GOD in Sanskrit literature is DYAUS-PITAR, the "Heaven-Father," who became the Greek Ζεύς-πατήρ and the Roman JUPITER. GOD is often called "FATHER" in the AVESTA, and a few times in the later writings of the OLD TESTAMENT.

NOTE B.—It is clear from the teachings of the first three GOSPELS that JESUS did not deem himself to be GOD, or the equal of GOD, or in any supernatural sense the son of GOD. He doubtless, however, regarded himself as an agent specially chosen to prepare his people for the coming KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

NOTE C.—In the Fourth Gospel, the common term "OUR FATHER" becomes "MY FATHER" (John ii., 16; v., 17, 43; viii., 19; x., 29, etc.), and a special and peculiar spiritual relationship to GOD is claimed. JESUS is no longer an ordinary man, but "the only begotten SON of GOD" (John i., 14; iii., 16, 18), the "incarnate WORD" (John 1 ff.) who "made all things" (John i., 13), and to whom all things and all judgments have been committed by the FATHER (John iii., 35;

2). God is quite withdrawn from the region of human sympathies, and "Jesus only" remains in his place.

General Questions.

1. How did the idea of God originate among men? 2. What was the character of the first gods? 3. How did the ceremonies of worship originate? 4. Had religion a noble or an ignoble origin? 5. What is anthropomorphism? 6. Did the early gods possess moral qualities? 7. What was the earliest Jewish idea of God? 8. How did it differ from the gods of the mythologies? 9. Under what influence was it spiritualized? 10. Describe Jesus' idea of God? 11. Did Jesus deem himself to be God or the equal of God? 12. What different idea do we find in the Fourth Gospel? 13. Where did the conception of the Heavenly Father originate?

FOREIGN.

The sultan has decreed that there shall be Arabic newspapers started at Mecca, Bagdad, and Aleppo.

The students of Berlin are preparing a statement to be addressed to the Rector of the University, protesting against the distribution by the students at the Göttingen University of the petition set on foot by Dr. Stöcker against the Jews.

Mrs. Dale has received through the Home Office a reply to a petition which she sent to the Queen, asking Her Majesty not to allow Mr. Dale to remain a prisoner for conscience' sake. Mrs. Dale is informed that her petition has been referred to the Secretary of State, who is unable to advise Her Majesty to interfere with the process of law.

Mr. Bradlaugh's defence to the action brought against him by Mr. Clarke for £500 penalty, for illegally voting in a division of the House, has just been delivered, and will be set down for trial during the present sittings; but, owing to arrears of business, it is not likely to be reached till after next Hilary sittings. Mr. Bradlaugh will conduct his case in court himself.

A laughable case was recently heard at Sheffield arising out of a charge preferred against an old woman, named Agnes Johnstone, of obtaining £5 8*s.* by subtle craft from Margaret Devaney. The prisoner is a fortune-teller, and one day she told Devaney that she could rule her planet, if she would give her some money, and would assist her in getting a fortune which was coming to her. Devaney gave her money at various times, until the amount at length reached £5 8*s.* During one of the interviews, at which more money was demanded, the prisoner said she had been with the fairies all night, that they had danced before her, and that she was working with the devil. She also said that the fortune was coming by the fairies, who would bring it underground. She was committed for twenty-one days.—Weekly Despatch.

We learn from the newspaper correspondents from Ballinrobe that the soldiers sent to protect the men from Ulster who volunteered to save Captain Boycott's crops were despatched to the scene of operations in advance of their tents and baggage, and that on their arrival they had to sleep on the bare ground, and had been twenty-four hours without food. That the men could keep up their spirit and do their duty without murmuring under such dismal circumstances is highly creditable to their discipline, but the needless hardships to which the troops were subjected is not equally creditable to the authorities who arranged the expedition. If a department under the control of women had ordered soldiers to march to a given place, and made no preparation for housing and feeding them on their arrival, men would have said at once that women were totally incompetent to manage public affairs, and might thence have deduced the inference that they were unfit to have the parliamentary franchise. But the feminine mind is less severely logical, and does not necessarily conclude that men are unfit to manage the commissariat or household department of an army because, on the occasion of the march to Ballinrobe, some man has blundered.—Woman's Suffrage Journal (Eng.).

JESTINGS.

A good-natured traveller fell asleep in a train, and was carried beyond his destination. "Pretty good joke, isn't it?" said a fellow-passenger. "Yes, but a little too far-fetched," was the rejoinder.

"I understand," said the Galveston recorder, "that you are a confirmed drunkard." "Dat's whar you is too soon, jedge. I a'n't been confirmed in no church yit, but de blue light Baptises is gibben Satan a heap ob worry about me."

An aged negro, the other day, was showing the scars of the wounds inflicted by the lash when he was a slave. "What a picture!" exclaimed a sympathizing looker-on. "Yes," responded the colored brother, "dat's de work ob de ole masters."

A Transcendental preacher took for his text, "Feed my lambs." As he came out of the church, a plain old farmer said to him, "That was a very good text; but you placed the hay so high in the rack that the lambs couldn't reach it, nor the old sheep either."

"Do you want to kill the child?" exclaimed a gentleman, as he saw a boy tip the baby out of the carriage on the walk. "No, not quite," replied the boy; "but, if I can get him to bawl loud enough, mother will take care of him while I go and wade in the ditch with Johnny Bracer."

THE IMMORTAL LIFE.

By John Weiss.

12mo. 256 pp., with Heliotype Portrait of the Author.

PRICE $1.50.

What the Critics say of this Book:

Mr. Weiss is a suggestive rather than a convincing writer. He lays no foundations, and builds no structures in whose shelter men can find rest; but he takes one to points of elevation whence noble views are possible, and in quick glances opens up the mysteries of the soul and its life. The essays do not all treat directly of immortality, but they have what Arnold calls the unity of tendency. They are full of side-lights on the great problem. Mr. Weiss regarded personality as a prime and fundamental element in the structure of things, and he believed in a "personal continuance" with a steadfast faith.—Christian Union.

This posthumous volume on the life of man immortal proves how deep was Weiss' faith in the sublimity of man's nature. It is worthy the perusal of every one who doubts or believes the principle of eternal personal life hereafter. We bespeak for this strong work a wide welcome among thoughtful persons. The pages are full of gems that might go far to swell a book of notable quotations on life, belief, emotion, faith, work, hope, and progress.—Boston Transcript.

In this age of scepticism, when almost everybody doubts and insists upon proof, this work cannot fail to be a great help to those whose visions are clouded by fears that the grave ends all, and that there is no spiritual existence beyond the dark valley.—Boston Herald.

"The Immortal Life," by John Weiss, has for its theme "The Idea of the Hereafter," and is a brave and beautiful presentation of the topic by one who was an evolutionist. The author has a rare combination of the dainty and rugged in his style, one moment striking a pick-axe into some stony foundation, and the next planting flowers on the debris he has gathered. Without apparent connection, the chapters of this volume do combine to prove a strong support for the hope of "personal continuance" in the future.—Independent Methodist (Baltimore).

The essays of the late John Weiss on Materialism, Development, etc., continue to excite wide discussion. His harmonizing of the principles of evolution with creation will find many followers. Even some prominent teachers of the truths of revelation accept, or at least omit to deny, that the facts and theories of an original creation and subsequent development do not conflict.—Indianapolis Journal.

Those who were attracted by Mr Weiss' genius when alive will find here its best representatives. Here is his mature thought, the last, best offerings of his experience, observation, and reflection. He was an evolutionist and a maintainer of immortality. He can be read with an increasing respect for human nature and a sincerer tribute to Deity.—Boston Commonwealth.

Mr. Weiss' great argument for a future existence is the nature of human personality. The argument probably will not convince persons with a strong natural tendency to disbelieve immortality; but it clearly proves that science has not yet, as many persons apprehend and some claim, given a negative decision on the old question of immortal life. The old faith still stands; and people may hold it with Mr. Weiss, and yet accept all the attested facts of recent science.—Index (Boston).

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

WE worship the universe of the true spirit, visible, invisible, and all that sustains the welfare of the good creation. We strive to think, to speak, to do only what of all actions may promote the two lives, the body and the mind. We worship the Wise One who formed and furthered the spirit of earth.—Zend-Avesta.

WISDOM is more moving than any motion: she passeth and goeth through all things by reason of her pureness. . . . She is more beautiful than the sun and above all the order of the stars: being compared with the light, she is found before it. . . . Wisdom reacheth from one end to another mightily, and sweetly doth she order all things.—Hebrew.

DO NOT suffer yourself to be hurried away by the impetuosity of your passions, but in all your pursuits have a regard to justice, and in all your speculations let truth be your aim. Whatever is agreeable and consonant to thy system, O Universe, is so to me. Nothing is either premature or too late, in my apprehension of things, which is seasonable to nature and conducive to the good of the whole.—Marcus Aurelius.

IT is not for him who accepts the spiritual interpretation of life and nature to affirm or fear any real antagonism between the world within us and the world without. . . . The work of nature displayed in all these forms of being is not merely analogous to the Divine Word: the work of nature is the Divine Word. —E. H. Chapin, D.D.

THERE can be little doubt, that the further science advances, the more extensively and consistently will all the phenomena of nature be represented by materialistic formulæ and symbols. But the man of science, who, forgetting the limits of philosophical inquiry, slides from these formulæ and symbols into what is commonly understood as materialism, seems to me to place himself on a level with the mathematician, who should mistake the x's and y's with which he works his problems for real entities,—and with this further disadvantage, as compared with the mathematician, that the blunders of the latter are of no practical consequence, while the errors of systematic materialism may paralyze the energies and destroy the beauty of a life.—T. H. Huxley.

HERBERT SPENCER recognizes the noumenon beneath the phenomenon; he feels the eternal behind the transitory; he shows happiness to be the result of obedience to a divine law of equality joined with liberty, which will be attained by the observance of justice and of that other virtue which consists in abstinence from a right that may injure another, and in doing cheerfully what contributes to another's happiness,—a virtue which he calls beneficence, and which, in Christian speech, goes by the name of charity. Finally, with the positivists, he admits the necessity of knowing the law in order to obey it; if, to use the language of one of these, he seeks nobleness of life in liberty, he finds the highest degree of liberty in obedience to the eternal law.—M. E. Cazelles.

TALK of science as being irreligious, atheistic! Science is creating a new idea of God. It is due to science that we have any conception at all of a living God. If we do not become atheists one of these days under the maddening effect of Protestantism, it will be due to science, because it is disabusing us of hideous illusions that tease and embarrass us, and putting us in the way of knowing how to reason about the things we see.—O. B. Frothingham.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IT is reported that some thirty girls at a corset factory at New Haven struck the other day for higher wages, saying they could make but thirty-six cents a day; but fifteen of them afterward went back to work at that starvation pittance.

THE Hebrew Review, of which the second number is just issued, is a quarterly published by the Rabbinical Literary Association, and promises to be a valuable periodical. This Association has been organized among the Jews in this country for the purpose of promoting scholarship and theological discussion. It is doing other efficient work for the progress of Judaism in the United States beside the publication of this Review. Its president is Dr. Max Lilienthal, of Cincinnati, who has appeared once or twice as a very acceptable speaker on the platform of the Free Religious Association.

THE following passage from a speech of General Garfield in Congress in 1874, which has been going the rounds of the papers of late, should put him in favor with all friends of State secularization: "The divorce between Church and State ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any State or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for, if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a church tax upon the whole community." When the doctrine gets into the White House, there is good reason to hope it may at no very distant date become adopted by the general government.

THE Christian at Work has been putting to the test the opinions of various clergymen as to whether miracles are to be expected in the exercise of Christian faith at the present day. The Rev. Dr. A. I. Gordon, of Boston, among others holds that the promise of signs following those that believe was for the church of all time. Dr. Howard Crosby's reply was after this remarkable fashion:—

> Miracles for 70 years in time of Moses and Joshua.
> Miracles for 70 years in time of Elijah and Elisha.
> Miracles for 70 years in time of Christ and apostles.
> No others.
> Miracles
> Are marks and evidences
> Of a new dispensation.

THE poor Chinamen seem destined to have a hard time in this country, wherever they are. There is always apparently a certain amount of the persecuting spirit among mankind on the lookout for a victim. Across the water, at present, it appears to be the Jews, the Roman Catholics, and the Ritualists, not to mention other species of proscription. The Chinamen seem singled out for such attentions in this country. The board of aldermen of Brooklyn, N.Y., distinguished themselves last week by an act of enlightened magnanimity of this sort. They passed an ordinance imposing a tax of five dollars a year upon every Chinese laundryman of the city. Of course, it is plain enough there is no plea in reason or justice for the enactment. It is simply an added specimen of the cruel race-hatred and mean injustice that beset the Chinamen upon the soil of our professed free republic.

THE Sunday laws still on the statute-book in Pennsylvania were enacted in 1794. Of course, they are not now in all respects strictly enforced. But they are quite oppressive to those citizens who keep their Sabbath according to the Mosaic decalogue, on the seventh day of the week. The Seventh-day Baptists, a sect quite numerous in the State, are taking measures for securing of the Legislature a modification of these laws; and the Jews, it is probable, will coöperate in the movement. Governor Hoyt, if we may judge from his ready response to the Jewish protest against the phrase "Christian Commonwealth," in his Thanksgiving proclamation, will favor the change. It is quite time that the Sunday laws generally were overhauled and amended. Apropos of Governor Hoyt's change in his Thanksgiving proclamation, some of the newspapers in the State, we are informed, either appear not to have heard of it, or else their consciences would not allow them to alter the text as originally printed; for newspapers frequently have consciences, though sometimes very queer ones.

THE Catholic Review began the new year with a leader entitled "The Sorrows of Leo XIII." It gives a most doleful picture of the difficulties which the Pope has had to encounter the past year. Belgium, "one of the most Catholic of countries," it says, "has ostentatiously insulted the Holy Father," and "set itself in direct antagonism to him." France it approaches "with sickness of heart." "It is pitiable to see the condition to which this great Catholic nation has been reduced." In Germany, "the Catholics groan as much as ever, and continue to suffer under the affliction of the Falk laws," with "no hope of a change for the better in the near future." As to Italy, "it were easier for the Pope to descend into the Catacombs or suffer swift and actual martyrdom than continue to be what he is, a discrowned monarch in his own capital, speaking with authority, yet as a stranger in his own land and city." Indeed, "all governments are more or less hostile to the Holy See, and eagerly watch every utterance that emanates from it to see if they cannot find some new pretext for persecution and contumely." The article, at its close, picks up a few crumbs of comfort, and throws them over to the Pope from "the steady advance and unfaltering loyalty of his children" in the United States and other lands not nominally Catholic, and bespeaks "the prayers of all Catholics as needed to strengthen and win guidance for the Holy Father in so lamentable a state of affairs." This point of "the prayers" puzzles us. If the Pope is "infallible" already in all his official judgments and actions as Pope, how are prayers to win any better guidance for him? Will the Review condescend to explain?

THE REIGN OF SECULARISM.

Discourse delivered in the North Parish Church, North Andover,

BY JOHN H. CLIFFORD.

For my present purpose, it is sufficient to fix upon one of the several definitions of secularism; and I take that which defines it as man's occupation with the phenomena and the business and interests of the material and the practical world, as opposed to his absorption in the spiritual or ideal world.

And thus I do not indicate any special school of thought or of politics. The Secularists, who might thus be indicated, are but an insignificant body of people, who, with other definite bodies, are almost lost in the vast current of human affairs, which holds its way undetermined, however influenced, by any of them or by them all. But the secularism of which I speak has its hold upon our age generally, and even upon the most pronounced religious organizations of the world. And, when I speak of its present reign, I mean that, by comparison with some other periods of history and with permanent moral ideals, our own age is swayed by the spirit and led by the tendency which it represents.

It must be admitted, in the name of history, that from the birth and spread of the Christian religion there has been a spirit abroad which, upon the whole, has ruled the great movements of the Western World through certain definite religious ideas. That spirit forced its way through the great Empire of Rome, penetrated into the German forests, compassed the most northern boundary of Europe, found a home in the Islands of Britain, and crossed the sea to build a new civilization upon the American continent. For five centuries, it was active in founding a system of dogmatic faith and organizing an ecclesiastical power, under whose control nation after nation was united, until its sceptre waved over one grand European monarchy, and its supreme representative became a King of kings on earth. Then, for six centuries more,—known as the Dark Ages, in which, nevertheless, the light of man was not extinguished, — this great power, amid varying outward fortunes in its struggles with the empires of the world, in its spiritual modes betook itself to the solitude of the cloister and the hermitage, spent itself in toils and vigils, in the self-imposed sufferings of penance, in the erection of temples, and in the unparalleled acts inspired by the sentiment of chivalry. That sentiment, doubtless, grew in great part out of the worship of the Virgin Mary, introduced into the Christian Church at a very early date, and gradually developed through many centuries. Much influence has always been attributed to what its opponents call Mariolatry. "The world," says Lecky, "is governed by its ideals; and seldom or never has there been one which has exercised a more profound and, on the whole, a more salutary influence than the mediæval conception of the Virgin. For the first time, woman was elevated to her rightful position;* and the sanctity of weakness was recognized, as well as the sanctity of sorrow. Woman rose, in the person of the Virgin Mother, into a new sphere, and became the object of a reverential homage of which antiquity had no conception. Love was idealized. Into a harsh and ignorant and benighted age, this ideal infused a conception of gentleness and of purity unknown to the proudest civilizations of the past. In the pages of living tenderness which many a monkish writer has left in honor of his celestial patron; in the millions who, in many lands and in many ages, have sought with no barren desire to mould their characters into her image; in those holy maidens who, for the love of Mary, have separated themselves from all the glories and pleasures of the world, to seek in fastings and vigils and humble charity to render themselves worthy of her benediction; in the new sense of honor, in the chivalrous respect, in the softening of manners, in the refinement of tastes displayed in all the walks of society,—in these and in many other ways, we detect its influence. All that was best in Europe clustered around it, and it is the origin of many of the purest elements of our civilization."

In all these activities and products of the sentiments, we see the working of a spirituality moving side by side with the secular power of those ages which built up the political system of Europe known as feudalism, with its civil ranks that may not unfitly be compared with the hierarchies of the Catholic Church.

Then, again, for six centuries more, beginning with the revival of learning, with which the Dark Ages closed, we have seen the same spiritual ideas, which have always lain at the foundation of the Christian system, operating in human society with unrivalled force; breaking in revolt, again and again, from the great ecclesiastical system which had grown up around them, bursting the Christian world asunder in the Reformation, revolutionizing political institutions by the destruction of feudalism in Europe and of monarchy in America, yet all the while remaining substantially identical in themselves, the very ideas upon which the Christian system, both as dogma and as sentiment, was founded.

It is not necessary to say that these ideas are altogether the best of which man is capable, nor that they will prove to be the final result which his spiritual development will reach. In fact, they have already been to some extent displaced, and very largely modified, by the progress of thought. But it must be said that, such as they are, they are, using the term in an historical sense, religious ideas,—that is, ideas which belong to the spiritual, as opposed to the merely material aspects of man's nature. Whether permanent or temporary, they have been of immeasurable influence in shaping the world's thought, in moulding its institutions, in giving character and form to its morality and its worship. To a great extent, they must be regarded as temporary. Their permanent elements may not always be easily distinguished from their transient; but we know that many of these have passed or are passing out of man's life. God, duty, immortality, the great objects of speculation, of faith, of endeavor, cannot be traced to their origin in any special system. But they are a part of all vital systems, however their conceptions may vary; and it is safe to say that, as they have survived the disappearance of many systems in the past, so they will continue in man's thought, though all present and all future systems may in their turn decay. But the special features of Christian dogma, the supernatural and authoritative aspects of the system, have long since disappeared from the most advanced religious conceptions, and are destined, if these conceptions be true, to be finally effaced from the religion of mankind. To make superstition and insincerity give way to truth is the chief aim of religious reform. Without the revival of learning which preceded Luther, there could not have come the revival of conscience which Luther and the Reformation represented. But a new learning and a renewed conscience must lead, as they did, to higher forms of thought and of morality than the old system contained. And these have been seen, in the various phases of rationalism and its accompanying moral conceptions, which have developed during the last few centuries, and especially during the last century of all. If the idealism of Christianity rests upon dogma, that of rationalism is based upon the human mind itself. The one seeks its proofs without, the other finds them within. But rationalism itself, like Christianity, is not only on the one hand an organ of certain ideals, but also, on the other hand, a system of positive methods. For we must make rationalism include the whole of that process of modern reasoning which is founded upon natural science. And just as institutional or ecclesiastical Christianity has always drawn the world away from the purely ideal elements of that faith, so that the churches have rested more upon a material than upon a spiritual basis, so the positive or scientific tendencies of rationalism for the present withdraw it from its ideals, and absorb it to some extent in the visible facts and external affairs of existence.

We need not then here exalt one, Christianity or rationalism, above the other. It is enough to show that the same thing happens to both in this division of their forces between the ideal and the practical, or between the spiritual and the material. And, far out beyond the direct range of either, the great mind of the modern world feels the same turning away of its attention from the unseen to the seen. And this tendency is so universally marked as to justify the characterization of this our age as an age of secularism, in the sense in which I have defined the term; an age, that is, in which the thought, the desire, the energies of men are turned with tremendous force to the solution of temporal questions, to the acquisition of temporal advantages, and to the working out of great temporal results. With peculiar emphasis, we may say, that men to-day exist in the finite world. And, by consequence, the infinite world becomes far-off and dim. Men's thoughts, their language, their aims, are largely not of the invisible, but of the visible. They look at the temporal, see it in clear outline, while the eternal recedes and is but faintly descried. Men set themselves now, as never before, to the conquest of this world. They are less concerned than ever before, at least during the last twenty centuries, about another world. They have less hope and less fear regarding the future. They have more pleasure and more immediate profit in the present. Their aspiration is loaded down with the weight of their earthly interests. The age of asceticism, of monasticism, is gone by. Instead of the cloister, we build the factory; and, instead of the sublime temple, we erect the magnificent warehouse. Too often, to the market-place the church is only a house of momentary retreat for the payment of that which custom and inherited sentiment still exact in the name of spiritual faith and hope. In this state, man's wings are clipped, that he may remain on the earth and attend to business. The discoveries and inventions of the last half-century, which covers that chief agent of material progress, the railway, have made man at once the master, and to a degree the slave, of the outward world and its resources.

But what if, in exchange for all this external wealth and power, he must for a time, in one sense, surrender his soul? This is the one great peril which, many think, now threatens the moral and spiritual life of the race. Every temptation to come down from the high ground of ideas and sentiments is presented to the man of to-day in the competitions offered by the vast and complex range of material enterprise and reward. The temporal invites him to forsake everything else, and embrace its low opportunities. Will he lose sight altogether of the eternal, so that return to it in "serener years" will be impossible? If so, then are the days of man's progress numbered. If so, life is no longer worth living. If so, the fountain of the spirit is become dry, hope were as well dead, and faith expires in an atmosphere of worldliness, along with the superstitions of the past.

But if otherwise, if through all this maze of outward things man still fixes an eye upon the everlasting realities which in all ages have recalled him from the lower pursuits of existence, which have led him even through shadows of death to new and higher life, then we may behold even this reign of secularism without the fear of its lasting triumph; we may hope for man's return once more to those great ideals which have ever brightened his darkest sky and made the night itself light about him.

It cannot be denied, I think, that the more pronounced forms of outward life to-day are, as I have said, secular rather than religious, material rather than spiritual. The time was when everything—the great events of history—gathered around the central power of organized religion. The supreme interests of men hung upon the decisions of ecclesiastical councils. The world of politics revolved, like a satellite about its sun, around the mightier world of spiritual authority. We have seen, by a rapid glance, how this relative importance has been changed. And we can hardly fail to realize the extent to which that change has advanced to-day. What power of organized religion can now control the destinies of the world, or even of a single important state? What convention of churches can arrest the attention of mankind? What ecclesiastical decisions can directly affect the affairs of empires, or command the obedience or even the sincere respect of great communities? The combined force of instituted religion is not enough, in any political crisis, to draw off the eyes of the world from temporal affairs. In every great country, the all-engrossing interests are those of politics and of business, and not those of any church. In our own country, the excitement of a presidential election absorbs entirely public attention. The gatherings of religious bodies make no perceptible impression upon the general mind. Their sayings and doings are received with a casual glance of amiable notice, and then forgotten. The meeting of large numbers of representatives of a denomination like the Unitarian, which, however small in numbers, has been confessedly great in its contributions to scholarship and reform, creates not a ripple in public thought, and barely obtains the most meagre mention in the secular press. And large-sounding as is the name of a Pan-Presbyterian Council, and although it represents, the world over, more than thirty millions of people, yet it scarcely makes a more perceptible impression upon the current of thought and affairs.

* We do not by any means agree that "woman was elevated to her rightful position" through this worship of Mary; but, still, it may be granted that, in the historical appreciation of woman, the sentiment which that worship represented marked a long step forward toward the modern recognition of her true place and function. To estimate the value of any advance toward this, we need only to compare the attitude of society toward woman to-day with the Laws of Manu or with the prohibitions of Paul and the practice of Christendom generally until quite recent times.

Religion, then, as an instituted force, becomes almost invisible in the presence of material and political interests. The world cares little for its creeds, its policies, its results. It pays no marked respect to its charities. It compels it to no martyrdoms. It neglects its history, is impatient of its formal claims, and no longer relies upon it for well-being here or hereafter.

But we need not deplore this state of things. We may rather rejoice at it. It does not bode evil to religion, it heralds good. Just as through the long labor of the Middle Ages man was freeing himself from ancient despotisms, ecclesiastical and political, and sowing the seeds of liberty whereof the fruits have been seen in the reformation of both religious and civil systems, in the steady progress of the human mind, and the gradual amelioration of social conditions, so now, in this continued declension of formal faiths, and in the lessening of their influence over mankind, we may see preparation for a still better outcome of human benefit. Nor need we dread any more the secularization of religion itself, for it denotes the same causes, and points to the same results. Never, perhaps, had organized religion a more worldly foundation than at the present time. Churches, for the most part, rest upon business interests, and are managed by business methods, often "run" by business tricks. In most cases, perhaps, the test of a minister's "usefulness" is not his power to instruct or to inspire or to console men and women, but his ability to attract numbers to his preaching. The ancient proverb was, "He that winneth souls is wise." But much of our modern thrift is born of the counting-house; and too often, with us, he that winneth bodies is wise, and the only fatal unwisdom is not to win them. The old prophet declared that "they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever." But do not they that turn many to the religious play-house, and to the payment of the bills, shine among the stars of our modern pulpit profession?

All this again, and all that it implies, indicates to what an extent the old forms of religion are being swept away by the spirit of material and worldly pursuits. Yet it is but the extreme and more vulgar token of the revolt of the modern mind against the forms of ancient authority, which is displayed more nobly in the fields of science, of literature, and of social advancement.

But how once more about the substance? Are we, after all, losing ideals? For the time being, perhaps we are. The masses of men are perhaps in a spiritual twilight, many of them in the profoundest gloom. Religion, the spiritual sentiment of man, is kept alive for the world, as in former ages of wide-spread spiritual apathy, by the insight and the moral constancy of its natural ministers, souls standing here and there as sentinels of truth, guarding for men the treasures they would thoughtlessly barter away. Such minds are our modern prophets. One such may counteract the influence of thousands. A biographical writer says of Mr. Emerson that, "while not aiming at the kind of work done by Herbert Spencer, for instance, he often gives in some single phrase an illumination that seems to extinguish Herbert Spencer's lights as a sunbeam makes gas-lamps superfluous." And we may regard as one of those extinguishing phrases Mr. Emerson's declaration that "we are too young by some ages yet to form a creed." And this as another: "There is a sublime and friendly Destiny by which the human race is guided—the race never dying, the individual never spared—to results affecting masses and ages."

In the midst, then, of this moral chaos, we may preserve at least this one hope: that, while the world is ever making and destroying its own creeds, man is all the time preparing himself for his fundamental and lasting faith, based upon the laws of the world, not upon the accidents of human existence and the puerilities of human ignorance,—the faith which shall lift him to a grand career on earth, which all the great moments of his history have foretold.

And the very hope of such a happy issue is equivalent to a present trust in man's surviving ideals. Dark Ages there may still be. Our own, in spite of all its flaring lights, may be one of them. But always there have been, always there will be, new epochs of brightness, in which man will advance one step nearer to his goal. If the former days were more religious than these, their religion is not suited to our wants. Hence, this partial reign of secularism, which makes men appear to be satisfied with the visible world. It is, on its better side, the knowing or unconscious search for the new and better faith which shall answer to the larger knowledge and the more capable practical energies of mankind.

For this reign of secularism is only partial and temporary, if, at least, ideals, however relatively they may change to human apprehension, are substantially constant to the soul. If for the time we appear to be going backward, it is only that we may advance again in the direction of true progress, and that upon a higher plane of life, to reach which this apparent ebb of the human mind is necessary, in order to its more powerful flow.

Out of all the mixed good and evil of this, our transition state, the world will come with its ideals based firmly upon newly learned facts. A better knowledge of the world will underlie the purer spiritual faith, and the higher religion of man will rest upon a truer physical and mental and social economy of the human race. In this course, man will learn better to understand his past, to use his present more wisely, to shape his future with more unerring instinct, and to build well for coming generations. In finding or making a new earth, he will realize his new heaven.

To take this trustful and hopeful attitude is to find ourselves at the side of the prophet in all ages. To carry this spirit of reverent trust and ardent expectation into the daily life is to help men powerfully, however insensibly, to the reality which is foreseen; to higher liberty through higher obedience; to deeper devotion; to loftier aims; to truer prosperity and sweeter peace, amid brighter faiths, better grounded hopes, and fuller realizations of our being's end.

The only danger for the individual is that he may not have or, having, may lose this hopeful view of existence, with its severe implication of personal duties; that he may drop by force of selfish motives, and the pressure of a degrading social tendency, to the level of low competitions for prizes not worth the struggle. And the aggregate of this individual danger makes the great social peril, before which so many of the most thoughtful men stand in fear to-day.

No superstitious grasping at absolete moralities or at antiquated religious catchwords can ward off this peril. But it can only be met, and successfully resisted, and triumphantly passed, by facing the actual situations of existence to-day with the fresh and dauntless powers of to-day's own spiritual insight and heroism; for on their side, as ever of old, fight all the forces of the moral world.

THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

The fourth of the series of Monday lectures was given on the 27th ult., by Rev. Mark Hopkins. His subject was "The Place of Conscience." The lecturer was evidently not very well satisfied with his lecture, for at its close he apologized and said: "It might indeed have been better, if I had taken but one subject. I should at least have avoided the architectural blunder of making the porch larger than the house." The "porch" to which he referred was a "prelude" on "Upbuilding versus Development," in which he attempted to ridicule the doctrine of evolution.

Taking the lecture proper at the author's own estimate of it, I wish to call attention to one or two points in his prelude. He says:—

"We find ourselves in the midst of an orderly universe. Everywhere around us we find unity in the midst of variety, giving us at once the principle of order and of beauty. . . . But this was not always so. It is equally the doctrine of science and of revelation that there was a time when chaos reigned, and when this planet was devoid of order and of life."

This statement, while apparently made in a spirit of candor, contains a good deal of the ordinary theological sophistry, intended to blind the eyes of the unwary. It is true that "we find ourselves in the midst of an orderly universe," and it is true that it is the "doctrine of revelation that there was a time when chaos reigned"; but, when he says it is "equally" true that it is "the doctrine of science," including purposely the scientific men who hold to the scientific doctrine of evolution, that "there was a time when chaos reigned," the statement is untrue. If it were true, then the doctrine of evolution would be the veriest farce, and would have even less to stand on than the fabled tortoise that bore up the universe. The doctrine of evolution logically necessitates the assumption that there never was a time when chaos reigned, or when law did not exist and operate throughout the material universe as thoroughly as it does to-day. Mr. Hopkins did not state the case fairly. He is too anxious to support his own doctrine of "revelation," which logically necessitates the assumption that there was a time when "chaos reigned." In order to introduce a creator and lawgiver, there must first appear a need of such a being. "Revelation" was never a measure of man's knowledge, but of his ignorance. In the long ago when it took for its resting-place the human mind, and despotically set itself down there to rule mankind in the name of God, but for the benefit of priests, there was no "science" in the world, or what there was was in the heads of the priests themselves, and was used only to confound and enslave their subjects. The doctrine that "chaos reigned" is a theological invention; and, however much it may be "reconciled" with the opinions of a portion of modern scientists, it must be repudiated by every consistent evolutionist.

There are but two positions in the discussion of the question raised in Mr. Hopkins' prelude. One is that of the theologian, the other is that of the evolutionist. The first is the conception that not only was there a time when chaos reigned, but a time when even chaos had not begun to reign, a time when there was nothing for chaos to reign over. Of course, order would have been quite out of order then, but such a state would be a very good place for a creator to begin. Hence, we find the theologian assuming that at that very point God did begin the work of creation. He created every thing out of nothing, and so is, in a double sense of the term, the author of all that is,—matter, law, order, growth, everything from least to greatest of all. The second position is that of the evolutionist who must maintain that, even though it is true that there was a time when the earth did not exist, a time even when our whole solar system existed only as "star-dust," yet there never could have been a time when the sum of the matter of the universe did not exist, and that it must have eternally possessed in itself all the possibilities of which it has been found to be capable, and therefore chaos never did reign,—never.

Mr. Hopkins occupies the first position, that of the theologian, and endeavors to prove that the doctrine of "development," or evolution, is nothing "but a trick of words." He incubates an egg, and uses the chicken as an argument to demonstrate the correctness of his position. He denies that "development" can possibly account for the chicken, and asserts that "growth" produces it from the albumen, and that the "growth" is under the direct agency of God. If Mark Twain had said this, the public would have understood that he was joking; but when Rev. Mark Hopkins says it with serious intent to cast discredit on the philosophy of Herbert Spencer,—but perhaps he was joking too. The subterfuge is too thin to hide the fact that what Mr. Hopkins means by "growth" is substantially what is meant by "development" in the doctrine of evolution as applied to the egg and the chick.

This question runs back to the following consideration. Did God create the universe out of nothing? The theologian boldly asserts that he did, and retires behind the Bible for defence. But we cannot admit the claim without doing violence to our judgment. And, as we can arrive at no knowledge without trusting our judgment, we must reject the assumption of the theologian as unwarrantable. If it is said that God created the universe out of existing material, then that must have been in existence eternally; and, as it would be impossible for the sum of matter constituting the material universe to exist in infinite space except under the same laws that govern and control it in infinite space now, God did not therefore create the laws of matter; and, as all that we can learn of the material universe bends the unbiassed mind toward the conviction that all forms of existence come and go, rise and fall, under impersonal, immutable laws that have their habitat in matter itself, it follows that there never was a time when "creation," according to Mr. Hopkins' conception, was necessary. And therefore development, or evolution, is so far the most correct philosophy that has been given concerning the existence of things. It does not destroy the reasonableness of this philosophy that its advocates do not yet know the whole. If the evolutionist is surrounded with mystery, if he finds the universe tantalizing him with sphinx-like face on every side, is the theologian really any wiser? Does the bald assumption that God "created the universe and all things therein out of nothing in the space of six days, and all very good," explain the secret of the stone and the star, the rose and the reason?

Modesty admonishes both evolutionist and theologian to take off their hats in the presence of the unknown, and admit the limits of their ability to speak either of or for the Infinite. We behold a universe of life and law. Of its secrets, we know but little. And yet we may realize that its subtle life, evading touch and sight, dwells in us, and that our grandest thoughts and aspirations are faint monitions of its nearness to us and of our sublime kinship with it, inspiring us with an ennobling faith in

> "One God, one law, one element,
> And one far-off divi e event,
> To which the whole universe moves," that almost infinitely surpasses the old theological conception of the God of the shop in which "creation" was manufactured at a given past time, and flung into space to run for the glorification of its maker and the condemnation of all who will not worship what they cannot believe. GEORGE ELIOT.

The death of George Eliot, which occurred on the evening of Wednesday, December 22, after a very brief and sudden illness, has occasioned the gathering up of the meagre information possessed by the public regarding her personal history, and has called forth a long series of fresh criticisms upon her works and of new estimates of her character. The eagerness of the public to know something final and reliable of the life of this remarkable woman has had but scant gratification.

She is known to have been born in Warwickshire in 1820; but the conflicting stories leave us in doubt whether her father was a bailiff or a clergyman. We know next to nothing of her youth or of her education. But we have some flashes of light thrown upon her path after her adoption by Dr. Chapman, editor of the Westminster Review,—an event which must have occurred when she was not far from twenty-three years of age. From this period, she lived at London, and drew a part of her culture from her association with the eminent men whom she met at the house of Dr. Chapman. Her studies at this period seem to have been incessant; and one of her teachers was Herbert Spencer, who could not have been far from her own age. The story of his offer of marriage to her has not the best authority, and must be taken with many grains of allowance. But the intellectual ferment that would be created by the association of two such minds must have been a lasting stimulus to both.

The nom de plume of George Eliot was not assumed until the publication of her first stories, Scenes from Clerical Life, in Blackwood's Magazine in 1857. Up to that time, she was known as Marian Evans, and had led a life of steady literary toil. She had acted as associate editor of the Westminster, and had been the close-working assistant of Dr. Chapman. Meanwhile, she had acquired the French, Italian, and German languages. She has shown her liking for the two latter by frequent quotations and chapter introductions in her later novels. Her very first book was a translation of Strauss' Life of Jesus, published in 1846. A second effort of the same kind was her English version of Feuerbach's Essence of Christianity, published in 1854.

Among the very few events of her personal history which have become widely known is her long association with Mr. George H. Lewes,—an association which began some eighteen years ago, and lasted until his death. The principal facts that have been learned are these: that Mr. Lewes could not enter into a legal union with Miss Evans, because his wife was still alive; that it was impossible for him to obtain a divorce from his wife, because English law prohibits divorce on the ground of voluntary desertion in case the fault has once been condoned; that Mr. Lewes was in the position of having once forgiven and accepted the return of an unfaithful wife; that the desertion had been repeated, thus leaving him without legal authority to marry; that he had become dependent on Miss Evans and asked for her companionship under these conditions; that the advice of a council of intimate friends confirmed them in their resolve to disregard the law; and that their union was apparently happy and satisfactory. On the 6th of May, 1880, Miss Evans was legally married for the first time to Mr. Walter C. Cross, a banker, who had been an intimate friend of Mr. Lewes, and who was some twenty years her junior. Such is the rather startling matrimonial record of the greatest of English novelists.

Worshippers of her genius have felt that her alliance with Mr. Lewes could hardly be let pass, unless their benevolent hands should weave for it some veil of charity and excuse. But this should seem a needless office, when we remember that Miss Evans had passed her fortieth year when she took this step, and that she did it after the most mature consideration. Many things seem to indicate that the act had in it for her something of the spirit of sacrifice which she has made to shine through the lives of her noblest women. Dorothea, Maggie Tulliver, and Romola are made to consider the need of others before their own happiness. It may be doubted whether Mr. Lewes, with his fine philosophical, critical, and scientific endowments, was, after all, a restful and an agreeable person in daily life. Margaret Fuller, who met him at a dinner-party at Carlyle's while he was still young, reports him as "shallow, flippant, and talkative." Other reports describe him as nervous, impetuous, and excitable. Possibly, George Eliot's act involved a deeper generosity than we imagine. At least, all her readers feel a faith in her which outruns knowledge. It is natural that we should crave a more intimate knowledge of the character of this exceptional woman. We may hardly hope for anything so complete as the "Autobiography" of Miss Martineau; but the material for a life of George Eliot must be extant in letters and in the memories of her friends. We cannot afford to lose the hidden record of such a life; and, though she might choose to keep so far in the background that no image of her face even has been given to us, we have a right to expect that the veil will now be lifted.

Her first literary success was Adam Bede, which appeared in 1859. It was followed in quick succession by others: The Mill on the Floss, in 1860; Silas Marner, in 1861; Romola, as a serial in the Cornhill Magazine, in 1863; Felix Holt, the Radical, in 1866; The Spanish Gypsy, a narrative poem, in 1868; Middlemarch, in 1871; The Legend of Jubal, in 1874; Daniel Deronda, in 1876; and The Impressions of Theophrastus Such, in 1879. The latter is difficult reading, and is little likely to be put into the travelling-satchel of one who has once slaked his curiosity regarding its contents.

George Eliot's true place in literature must be found in an estimate of her best work, the field of prose fiction. Her poetry displays insight, metaphysical keenness, and pathos; but its pictures of individuals are not drawn in such lines of light as are those of her prose. One primary trait, however, runs through both prose and poetry,—the exaltation of moral idealism to the highest place among motives. In her great characters, she always depends upon this for her strongest effects. The imperativeness of rectitude above everything else seems in her works like the dramatization of one of Kant's transcendent trinity of powers. Nor does she even leave us in the dark as to what the highest good may be. Her consummate art throws the highest light always upon one spot. Her poetry of ethics is the consecration of self to the good of others. In this, she never recedes a single inch. Never once does she allow one of her pictured men and women to buy a pennyweight of happiness at the price of others' suffering. The plague-spot in her repulsive characters is the constant endeavor to do this, to cheat the moral law. But the artist is on the alert that this shall not happen, and her brush paints in the agony of retribution in unfading colors. Much of the intensity of her stories is in the ingenuity which hapless victims of disobedience to the moral law display in trying to evade its penalties. But the restitution is never large enough to cover the debt. The retributive lightning never glances aside. It always strikes, smites, and destroys the sinful one.

Of the artistic truth of these delineations there can be no doubt. In actual life, selfishness prospers at times, and goes down to the grave without apparent regret. But we can see the truth of George Eliot's pictures. It would be impossible for such men and women as Bulstrode, Lydgate, Godfrey Cass, Tito, Arthur Donnithorne, Gwendolen, Maggie Tulliver, Dorothea, Romola, or Mrs. Transome, to make the mistakes which they are allowed to make, and be exposed to the after-conditions created for them by the artist, without the result of just such shame and suffering as their lives show. Here arises the element of fate which critics discover in George Eliot. It is the acme of pen-portraiture, and is possessed in an even greater degree by Goethe. It is the power of making the reader see how, under the circumstances, events must shape persons and persons events, by an inevitable sequence, as in Faust. This is true of few writers, most certainly not of George Sand, who fatigues us by her perpetual creativeness. We feel that her imagination must be fagged and jaded with the continuous expenditure of energy. Her characters never help one another by their irresistible power of contact.

It is in such conditions that we have an unpleasant sense of a prompter behind the scenes. George Eliot never fatigues us in this way. If her characters are tedious, like Mordecai, it is their own tediousness that we feel, and not that of the novelist. She shows us the exceeding hatefulness of the prostitution of intellect to selfishness. A large part of the intellectual activity of both Bulstrode and Tito is consumed in devices of concealment. Hetty has no thought but to evade detection.

It is worth noticing that George Eliot's loftiest and most intense characters are women, as Goethe's grandest delineations are of men. Deronda is the ideal man of her creations. In him, she tries to combine the intellectual greatness and high ambition of manhood with the sympathy and tenderness for the individual which characterizes her best women like Dorothea. But she does not well succeed. Deronda lacks force. He is hesitative and self-conscious. We turn from him to Gwendolen, who, with all her blind selfishness, has a richer and intenser nature than he. Opinion is still divided as to which of George Eliot's novels will remain her masterpiece. Middlemarch, however, counts the largest number of votes. Nevertheless, Adam Bede and The Mill on the Floss have admirers who prophesy that her future fame will rest upon these. The great reading public has never been quite able to excuse the infusion of Judaism which so deeply tinctures Daniel Deronda. This same public has always felt that George Eliot's title to fame was stronger than Dickens', without the exact ability to say why this was so. But the main adverse criticism of the former is doubtless the key to the preference. She has been accused of too exclusive an occupation with the inmost passions and hidden motives of men, but in her choice of subjects and method of treatment her power has lain. Dickens is busy with externals, with dress, manners, conversation, events. Moreover, his optimism is always uppermost. He is in too great a hurry to make everybody comfortable, to have roaring fires, hissing chestnuts, and mugs of cider in sight. George Eliot is too much in earnest with her characters to let them slide into easy conditions of living. She is resolved that, whatever else happens, the hidden processes of moral evolution shall be carried on in them; and she makes all external events contribute to the development of the individual. Thackeray follows her, at a long distance, in the power of showing the operation of external occurrences in producing psychological phenomena. The fault of novelists is that most of their characters are ready-made and dressed, and are simply moved across the stage. Few have the power of showing us how they become what they are. Goethe has this power, also, in a lesser degree, Auerbach; but no one has created for us such a gallery of powerful characters in process of moral and intellectual evolution as George Eliot. M. A. H.

MR. JAMES REDPATH said some rather unlovely things of the Rev. George H. Hepworth, the agent for the distribution in Ireland of the New York Herald relief fund, to an interviewer the other day. Not only does he in plain Anglo-Saxon call Mr. Hepworth a liar, but he also says that he has gained the title abroad of the "American flunkey." Mr. Hepworth has not yet been heard from concerning his views as to Mr. Redpath.

HISTORICAL SKETCHES OF ANDOVER (comprising the present towns of North Andover and Andover), Massachusetts. By Sarah Loring Bailey. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.

We have read this volume with the continued sense of a new departure in the treatment of what has now become a very prolific branch of historical study. The impression may be due partly to the originality and freshness of its materials and the unexpected breadth of their relations, and partly to its admirable spirit and method. But, beyond these qualities, the work is certainly in all essential respects a model of what local histories should be. Its author, while observing the proper limitations of her subject with invariable good sense and tact, and making no pretensions to the discussion of theological or literary controversies, has so skilfully wrought a well-sifted mass of personal and local data into an organic whole that no clew seems wanting to the full understanding of their bearings on private character and public progress. It would be impossible to acquire from much reading of the analytic and didactic sort anything like the real insight here afforded into the experience of men and women of all grades, functions, and conditions in the early times of New England, and the momentous events in which they were the actors.

The fine art of making details tell their own story and suggest their wider connections, with the least visible management on the part of the narrator, is the highest charm of historical composition. It is indeed a success, when the very dust heaps and dry bones of our local antiquities are made to put on personality, and report themselves as essential factors of what is best in the public archives, with equal significance for present problems and desires. Obviously, no slight amount of sympathetic insight and constructive faculty was required for such effects. The truth must have been told in a perfectly simple and objective way, and every characteristic fact and feature must have been pursued with a diligence possible only to labors of real love. Such praise may fairly be accorded to this trustworthy memorial of a typical New England town, whose part in American history has always been one of rare interest and honor, political, military, social, literary, and religious.

In giving her book the modest title of Historical Sketches, the author has therefore done scant justice to its quality and scope. It covers every important field of inquiry, and will satisfy every requirement for a long while to come. Owing to the destruction of ancient records and the absence of antiquarian zeal, the materials for a history of old Andover before its separation into two townships were well-nigh inaccessible. Little or nothing had been done in this field of work, so that one of the richest veins of our New England civilization had been left as unknown and unexplored as were the geological mysteries of its drift formation, described by a competent authority in the introductory chapter. The result of this state of things has been a surprising outcome of valuable information, which, if we are not mistaken, will be fully as new and interesting to the masters in this department of study as to the townspeople themselves.

Miss Bailey does not seem to have aimed at first at anything more extended than a memorial of some of the ancient homesteads of her native town, doubtless encouraged to this by the great interest manifested in her attractive sketches* of the old Bradstreet mansion of pre-Revolutionary fame. But she wisely yielded to the advice of friends to adapt the scope of her work to the amount of materials at her command, and fulfil what was no less than a duty to the widely spread and increasing interest in the records of our past. And so the life of more than two hundred years has been endowed with the same imaginative and real interest which was given to the old gubernatorial mansion, until every ancestral tree and hill and road and homestead in the beautiful old town has become a living part of the grander historic structure of American liberty and progress.

The narrative abounds in graphic descriptions of domestic and social customs, of real life and local scenery; and the interest of the reader is never allowed to flag, even amid the least enlivening details. No incident has been held insignificant, which could add a touch of reality and breadth to these pictures. Full extracts from private journals and documents, never before printed, and of every quality, throw the strong contrasts of old colonial life into startling relief. Here the people have written their own biography, inward and outward. The skilful grouping of these materials around great topics, such as the frontier life of the first settlers, the Indian wars, the witchcraft mania, the Revolutionary struggle, the development of religious ideas and institutions, gives dramatic variety to the treatment of character and experience. Nowhere have we seen the wilderness toils and sacrifices of our fathers portrayed more vividly and with so little of rhetorical commonplace. Nowhere have we been made to realize more fully the cost at which individual energy and consecration have wrought out the amazing social transformations effected within the last two centuries. There could hardly be a more attractive field for such study. We could easily show in almost any portion of this history a dozen graphic portraits of men and women representative of the noblest tendencies of their times, and quite as many of persons whose signal services have never been chronicled till now, but whose lives have been truly productive forces in their day.

Not less faithfully recorded are the vices and delusions incident to the formative stages of our history, even where they deface the record of names which are the objects of a just local pride. The parts borne by Andover men in expatriating the neutral French, and in some other less conspicuous cruelties, although illustrating the inevitable ferocity of those old colonial wars, are not judged wholly guiltless. But the darkest features of the time are so drawn as to suggest the lesson that a great step in social progress must be the resultant of every form of character and purpose. Surely, he is wisest who looks less closely at its crude and imperfect instruments than at the all-shaping spirit whose "motion is toiling in the gloom."

The author of this volume deserves special recognition in the Index for her catholicity towards every phase of honest opinion, and particularly for a constant emphasis, in explaining what is repugnant to our present ideals, upon more or less controlling social and psychological conditions. Notwithstanding its entire impartiality, however, the picture is in no sense ethically colorless, but inspired throughout by an enlightened sympathy with humanity, justice, and liberty.

The compact chapter on Andover's part in the witchcraft delusions contains the most suggestive account we have met with of the psychological causes of that most puzzling feature of the trials, the confession of unreal and monstrous crimes. We receive a vivid impression of the logical grounds of those dismal phenomena; of their startling contrasts of heroic fortitude and ignoble terror; of that resistless sense of Satanic power, overriding all social and religious respect, and striking wildly at the best and worst; of the insanity that flung pure and delicate women into prisons, to die daily deaths; and not less of those noble efforts of ministers and citizens of Andover for their release, which perhaps struck the first effective blow at the very heart of the delusion. It almost compensates us for the whole line of horrors, to appreciate the invincible sense and martyr courage of Martha Carrier, and the brave devotion of Francis Dane to the defence of the sufferers and the rights of reason and love.

With no less interest we follow the stages of the Revolution, through an admirably connected series of fresh details, biographical and civil. The lines which concentrated upon the decisive battles of the war are traced back to the fine threads of private toil and sacrifice, wherein alone republican manners permitted their origination. We see the growth of radical patriotism and nationality in the spirited little town, with its numerous stirring associations with the Revolutionary leaders; for Andover, always attractive to the lovers of delightful scenery and rural comfort, as well as of educational progress, was, in those stormy days, a noted centre of hospitality and shelter for men of mark, both from the advantages of its situation and the character of its leading citizens.

We welcome this book as fresh proof of woman's capacity in the more obscure and arduous paths of literary inquiry. Nor are we disappointed in expecting from the author diligent search for every creditable memorial of her sex, in the history of her native town. Andover has shown peculiar interest in the culture of women. Abbot Academy is stated to have been the first classical school established in the State for educating girls only, and Franklin Academy the first that admitted both girls and boys. Miss Bailey celebrates women who have endowed widely known institutions of learning in Andover, and others whose teaching was a long-remembered inspiration. Her most appreciative personal sketches are of these noble women, whom we have not space here even to enumerate. She has told us all she could of the home-martyrs of Colonial and Revolutionary days, and complains of the silence of the records in this line, where so much was certainly left out that deserved to live.

In this notice, we have not attempted to give an idea of the number and variety of topics, treated in minute detail. Of course, a somewhat larger space is allotted to the earlier times than to those literary and theological institutions with which the later history of Andover is so widely and honorably connected. But the treatment of these themes bears equal witness to the scrupulous fidelity and warm interest of the historian. The whole book is not only indispensable to the student of American civilization, and to every library interested in the collection of its materials, but an extremely interesting narrative for popular reading.

We will only add that this handsomely illustrated volume is issued from the Riverside Press in a style of taste and elegance which combine, with its other distinguishing features among works of the kind, to render it a highly appropriate present for intelligent readers. S. J.

*Printed in the Boston Advertiser some years since.

WE have lately received, through the kindness of Count Goblet d'Alviella, a copy of the Revue Belgique, also the catalogue of the publishing house of M. Muquardt of Brussels, and a pamphlet reprint from the Revue Belgique of a paper entitled Le Protestantisme Libéral by Count D'Alviella. The latter is an argument to prove that Liberal Protestantism is expansive enough to accept all the results of criticism and of scientific inquiry, and still remain the permanent religion of humanity. It gives abundant quotations from a work on this subject by M. Bost, published in 1865, and has some interesting comments upon the deistic London congregations in contrast with the Unitarians, and is favorable to the latter. The Revue Belgique has a good article regarding Bismarck by Max Sulzberger, and a good French translation of the German of Auerbach's Adam and Eve, with other readable matter.

THE successive issues of Our Little Ones, especially that for January, which came out early as a holiday number, more than fulfil its first promise, in the beautiful and suggestive illustrations that tell their own story in the most effective pictorial language.

POETRY.

COMPENSATION.

Why importune with ceaseless cry
The Power mysterious and unseen?
On its own strength the soul must lean,
On its own purposes rely.
The chosen instrument of Fate
Its destined office may not shirk
To call on Heaven, and idly wait
A place for work.

What I have sown that I must reap.
From ground where seed of tares is cast
I cannot gather wheat at last;
In vain to plead, in vain to weep.
With pity God may mark my sheaves,
But Law omnipotent doth reign;
And cannot change my withered leaves
To golden grain.

Whether I would, I must believe
That my entreaties nothing gain,
But what I toil for I obtain,
And what I give that I receive.
Full measure, pressed and running o'er,
Unto my soul shall be returned,
And rich or mean my future store
As I have earned.

Vain to stand idle crying, "Lord!"
Th' exalted good for which I burn
He gives me gracious leave to earn,—
After the labor the reward.
Why chide Him for unanswered prayers?
The blame is mine, and never His:
In fruit which rightful action bears,
His answer is.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 13, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for 1881, or any person who will pay for a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

OUR contributors must be patient if their articles do not appear so early as they may expect. We have had some excellent matter in type two or three weeks, waiting for room. The Index is not big enough for all that we want to print, and some articles that we would willingly publish have to be put aside entirely.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

MORAL OBLIGATIONS OF LIBERALISM.

Occasionally, we see the opinion expressed by some writer in the ranks of Liberalism that what society calls the moral law is only the belief of a certain class of society, and that it is no more obligatory upon those who do not so believe than is the theological creed of the same or any class of people. But here is a dangerous sophistry, by which some persons may be tempted to put on a cloak to conceal practical immorality. Liberalism cannot thus escape from the moral obligations that rest upon humanity at large. For in the laws of thought and the data of human experience by which Liberalism professes to be guided, and which it must take for guidance in order to make good its claim to rationality, is a surer basis for all the great moral obligations than the old theological theories can furnish. The moral law is not any theory of conduct which a special portion of the human race may entertain, and which others of the race may regard or disregard as they please; but it is a habit of conduct which experience has proved to be preservative of the highest interests of the race itself, and which has come to be obligatory because it is thus preservative. It is a habit of conduct which has acquired in the realm of human action a force kindred to that of the law of gravity in the material world: individuals may depart from it, not at their pleasure, but at their peril.

And liberal thinkers are under a special obligation to heed the requirements of morality,—in other words, to lead upright, pure, and noble lives,—on account of the fact that this obligation is the legitimate outcome of the human reason which they profess to take for the guidance of life. The devotees of religion of the old theological types profess and expect to be saved and made happy by something else. They look to the atoning righteousness of another being to cover their delinquencies. They have a religious faith which they expect is somehow to be set off against their moral shortcomings and shelter them in a safe refuge. But liberal thinkers have no such refuge. They must have a righteousness of their own, or they have nothing.

In past days, indeed, it has been the boast of Liberals that, though they did not have much of any religious creed, they had morality. It has been their glory that they would not hesitate to stand up, in respect to moral conduct, by the side of any number of church members and submit their lives for comparison to the impartial judgment of the world. Let them not cause it to be said that this glory is departing from them. In morality—in integrity, purity, benevolence, devotion to noble aims and pursuits—is their sheet-anchor. Let those have the so-called saving faiths who can or must. Let freethinkers abide still in the saving majesty of the moral deed.

And it is uprightness and purity and beneficence of life that the average common-sense of civilized man is coming more and more to honor. To that, the average unwarped human heart renders its homage, wherever found. It may be within the churches or it may be outside of them; it may be of orthodox faith or it may be heterodox; but, wherever it appears, it is the true life rather than the sound creed that is coming to win regard and power. The theologies may be growing obsolete, but the moral law remains unshaken; and there is to-day no better or mightier propagandism of one's beliefs or of one's denials than a stainless moral life.

ORTHODOX CONGRATULATIONS.

The Rev. Dr. Prime is disposed to be jubilant in the New York Observer over the present status of Orthodoxy and the signs of prosperity it has exhibited during the year just passed. It is pleasant to know that the Doctor can be satisfied on so easy terms. Especially does he find comfort in the number and importance of the Ecclesiastical Convocations held. It must be confessed that they have shown pretty convincing evidence of the existing power and strength of the orthodox faith; and yet in all of them there was no less positive proof of forces working without the creeds and systems which they represented, and within them too, that tend to their inevitable ultimate destruction.

The most animated discussions in these conventions were not distinctively the old-time ones, but those, as a general rule, evoked by the growing latitude of thought and sympathy in respect to religion,—what was pronounced the scepticism of the times.

And in even the most conservative of them there was a manifestation, feeble though it may have been, of restiveness under established restraints, and a desire to break through them and take a step forward in the direction of larger freedom and intellectual progress. The Doctor remarks, "Infidelity, scientific unbelief, milk-and-water religion (whatever that may be), have had no help in any of these conventions of the leaders in the several denominations, which is somewhat to thank God for." Of course, that depends very much upon what one considers occasion for such thankfulness. No doubt, the statement, in the main, however, is true, and, as the summary terms "infidelity," "scientific unbelief," etc., are unquestionably intended to designate every shade of unorthodox thought, so far as true, all the more to be regretted, since it serves to show the vastness of the work which Liberalism is called upon to perform, and the urgency for its performance.

The Robert Raikes Centennial and the John Wycliffe Semi-millennial are mentioned among the particularly gratifying events of the year. But the Sunday-school of Robert Raikes was quite another institution from that which has since been known by the name. The difference between the Sunday-school which he projected and the modern one was that Raikes laid the principal stress on what are called secular studies, and made the school almost wholly subservient to that end. The Church appropriated the suggestion, and converted it to the exclusive purpose of religious or theological instruction.

The spirit of Wycliffe's labors were in the line of rationalistic development, a protest against the ecclesiastical despotism of the time, and even more deserving of commemoration in this sense than any other. It was not a reactionary step, but a forward one. It represented thus, in a certain sense, the radicalism of his day, and with this view might be consistently celebrated by the avowed sceptic in respect to the claims as to the Bible itself. Dr. Prime triumphantly asks, in a hocus-pocus sort of way of putting things, not uncommon to the orthodox mode of argumentation, "What has infidelity done to make the world better and happier, compared with the works of Wycliffe and Raikes? Compare the influence of Voltaire and Paine on the progress of reason, liberty, and the rights of man, with the Bible and the Sunday-school, and you see in a moment that the Christian religion is the great emancipator of the mind of the human race."

Of course, the influence of Wycliffe and Raikes has been quite unlike that of Voltaire and Paine. They belonged to different orders of mind, and labored toward results that possessed but little analogy in their specific character. So far as the labors of Raikes and Wycliffe have tended to confirm and strengthen mankind in some of the theological conceptions cherished by Dr. Prime, their service to the world has been of a very poor quality, — indeed, it may safely be affirmed, has been pernicious instead of beneficial. To lead mankind out of these trammels, out of the supernatural ideas of the Bible, and their correlative conceptions entertained by Wycliffe and Raikes and Dr. Prime, is the great work which the freer and more rational intelligence of this age is struggling to achieve.

And it was in this direction that the whole influence of Voltaire and Paine tended. To deny that they have been among the most powerful "emancipators of the mind of the human race" from superstition and ecclesiastical and civil bondage, promoters of the personal liberty of the modern world, in which Dr. Prime shares and would not exchange for the less sceptical and rational times that have gone before, is to form a very inadequate estimate of those who have been its benefactors, and of the course of intellectual progress. Dr. Prime is exultant in view of the evidence "that this closing year has been preëminently marked by a set-back of scientific "infidelity, a revival of orthodox Christianity, and the invigoration of Evangelical religion."

There is reason to fear, we are sorry to say, that he has not overshot the mark in a portion of the above statement at least. There is much in the present aspect of Liberalism in this country, in the deplorable demoralization into which it has fallen during the last few years, as well as in a recent discouraging event in this city, to warrant the conclusion which it contains.

But, though such is the fact, there is at the same time much to awaken a new stimulus and hope in the situation. The experience through which Liberalism has passed has afforded it a most important lesson for the evolution of a grander success, and the exaltation and ennobling of the movement, than it could otherwise have attained. It knows itself better than ever before. It has a better comprehension of its true purposes and aims. It knows who are its most-to-be-dreaded foes, the tendencies and influences that conspire to give to it dignity, honor, and power; and those that conspire to its ignominy and ruin. It is thus prepared to build on a firmer and more enduring foundation. Shall the work be renewed, shall the battle in which so many noble spirits are still engaged go on with reanimated zeal and unconquerable devotion, or shall we supinely surrender the great principles, so strong in their appeals and so full of grand and inspiring realizations for humanity, because of the weakening of our lines, or that some waver, or the contest appears for the time to be going somewhat against us? GEORGE ELIOT'S MARRIAGE.

Several writers in the daily papers have spoken for or against the conduct of this distinguished woman in uniting herself to Mr. Lewes, who was separated, but not legally divorced from his first wife; yet it seems to me none of them have probed the subject very deeply or given any very helpful suggestions as to the true line of duty.

The great intellectual ability and high tone of Mrs. Lewes' writings should give her the benefit of a presumption in her favor that she sought to act wisely and conscientiously, but they do not otherwise affect the question.

The facts are simply these: That Mr. Lewes, having legally married a woman, had evidence of her infidelity to her marriage vows. This would have given him ground for divorce, had he not pardoned her fault and given her an opportunity to atone for it by loving fidelity. She sinned again; and he then separated from her entirely, but could not obtain legal divorce. He found in George Eliot a more congenial partner. She at length consented to become his wife, although the union could not be legalized. Here the whole question of marriage and divorce seems to be opened, and it has puzzled the wisest minds of Christendom for centuries. Charlotte Brontë, Dickens, Miss Mulock, have presented similar cases where the statute law forbids what reason and morality might well allow.

To class a relation so formed and carried out in perfect good faith, and legalized as soon as circumstances make it possible, with intentional inconstancy and lawlessness, seems to me confounding distinctions of right and wrong. Does the declaration of the marriage by a magistrate or a clergyman give it sanction, or is it the true purpose to live according to God's laws and to be faithful to pledges freely made? But there are meaning and value in the marriage laws, imperfect though they are; and they are intended to protect the weak and restrain the erring, and strengthen those who cannot be a law unto themselves.

Now, for the sake of the stability and respect for law in a free and well-ordered government, should not good citizens sacrifice their own happiness rather than disobey the statutes, when they do not actually violate their conscience? Such seems to me the question which these educated and moral people should ask themselves.

But the strangest thing is that all the condemnation is against Mrs. Lewes for disobeying a law which she had no part in making or consenting to, and no vote in altering, and not rather against the husband, who is supposed to be of the intelligent law-making power in the community, and to be a part of the authority which consecrates it. He had put himself out of the reach of divorce by a hasty or unwise confidence in his first wife: it is of him that we should expect a life-long atonement, if need be, and fidelity to a vow once made. If George Eliot was wrong, he was doubly so, not only to the law, but to the woman whom the law still held to be his wife; but she erred only toward a law which might be useful, but to which she had given neither sanction nor consent.

We may esteem her conduct unwise, and feel that she would have acted more nobly as well as more prudently to have remained content with a less intimate relation rather than set an example dangerous to society; but we cannot consent to brand the author of Romola as a wilful sinner against truth and purity. OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The interesting account given by L. G. J., in a late Index, of a Sunday-school in Brooklyn, N.Y., reminded me opportunely of a neglected intention which has haunted my mind for some time, but which the more pressing duties of every-day life have caused me to put off until the "more convenient season."

I remember hearing James Parton, in a short address at a Free Religious festival, speak in terms of rather strong condemnation of Sunday-schools in general, and as if his personal recollections of them were far from pleasant. While I listened, I mentally dissented from his conclusions.

As long as I was orthodox in opinion, which was until I had grown to womanhood, I had always been a Sunday-school scholar; and my attendance at Sunday-school was a source of pleasure, and even of a sort of culture. Therefore I believe in Sunday-schools, though not in orthodox Sunday-schools for the children of heterodox parents. So I rejoice at the attempts made here and there by liberal associations to keep up the old Sunday-school system on a more secular basis. The change from rigid inherited religious opinions to opinions more in consonance with scientific reason is a change demanding so much serious, mature thinking, is so little in accord with the enthusiasm and gayety of youth; while the majority of those who have reasoned themselves out of travelling in the old ruts of religious beliefs have been too deeply engaged with their own day-by-day struggle to clear the way for newly discovered truths in their own minds,— that so far the children, who in time must take their places in the world's work and thought, have been overlooked, forgotten, or at least sadly neglected.

Yet, here and there, a liberal society which, like that of Brooklyn, has got into a condition which promises permanence of organization, begins to show a disposition to remember the needs of the unformed minds in it, and to organize Sunday-schools that shall retain all that is best of the old forms, and which are designed to broaden instead of cramping the youthful mind. I am glad L. G. J. has set us the example of giving, through the Index, notes of the method and progress of such Sunday-schools; and I trust that we shall, from time to time, hear from others of the same kind, so that we may be able to compare the different methods used by different societies, and the results so far as known. For I opine that, since there is no regular organization yet among liberal societies, such Sunday-schools as have been established have been evolved out of the necessities of each society, and so must necessarily differ from each other in method, if not in purpose. So the Sunday-school of the future may yet be organized on some general plan which will embody in all the best of each.

Will not some one connected with the Parker Memorial Sunday-school give us, through the Index, the modus operandi of its meetings,— and so of any other Sunday-schools established on the basis of mental liberty? It was of the methods of the only Sunday-school of this kind that I have had opportunity to visit that I sat down to write, when I began this article.

When, some weeks ago, I visited the Sunday-school at Florence, Mass. (which has been already several times alluded to in these columns), I was so delighted with all I saw and heard that I fully intended to write at once my impressions in regard to its workings, with the hope of encouraging other societies to try the very successful Florence experiment.

The school holds its sessions in the lower part of Cosmian Hall from 10.30 A.M. till 12. The classes assemble informally in the large hall; and the preliminary order of exercises is very much like those described by L. G. J., of the Brooklyn society. Probably, the same book of selections is used by both societies. After music, reading by the superintendent, and responses from the audience, then music again, with congregational singing, the classes dispersed to their several recitation-rooms. Miss Elder, the polite and efficient superintendent, invited me to accompany her to the different class-rooms. One or two infant classes remained in the large hall. As the children in these were mere infants, I questioned one of the young lady teachers as to her methods with these. She related or read to them, each Sunday, some story or fact suited to their age and mental capacity, containing a good moral or significant truth, and the next Sunday tested their memory by making each one tell her what he or she remembered of the story, the moral, or the fact.

In one room, I found a class of girls and boys from ten to fourteen or fifteen years of age, writing on the blank pages of a book their own version of the same picture, which adorned the top of a page otherwise blank. This I thought a most excellent aid to composition, which might well be adopted in our day-schools. The teacher's business was to correct grammar, writing, and spelling. In another room, Mr. Arthur Hill was giving lessons in chemistry to a class of boys. Next, I visited a class of young girls studying German under an efficient teacher. Then we called on the "Shakspere class," which, Mr. Lilly told me, caused so much astonishment in Colonel Ingersoll's mind that he called his wife from another room to come and hear Mr. Lilly's own account of "a Sunday-school with a Shakspere class in it!" The play read the day I was there was "Othello"; and, during the short time I was able to be present, the reading went on uninterruptedly, the different members of the class, perhaps twenty or more young men and women, taking by turns the different characters of the play. But Miss Elder told me that the lady who led the class gave them instruction how to read the different parts in a proper spirit and tone: and, if points arose in the reading which suggested any new thought or any doubt as to its rendering, the reading gave way to its discussion. From this room, we passed into what is called the "adult class," which I was sorry to observe, for that day at least, was composed wholly of gentlemen. This class discusses questions of general interest on ethics, etc., and is conducted in easy conversational style, each one in the circle participating, keeping his seat, and making no effort at fine oratory as in the more pretentious lyceums. The talk that day, as near as I could judge, was on some point in the proper education of the young; and it was pleasant to observe the strong individuality of all the different speakers, as they expressed their opinion.

At some, to me unknown, signal, all the classes broke up and repaired again to the large hall. It seems that it is part of the routine of this Sunday-school to observe a "Memorial Sunday" in honor of any person recently deceased whom they deem worthy of the honor. My visit occurred soon after the death of Lydia Maria Child, and I was fortunate in being present on the "Memorial Sunday" devoted to her memory. On reassembling, a hymn was sung in some way bearing on the worth of such noble, self-forgetful lives; then characteristic words were read from her own works; articles in regard to her, biographical and critical, were read from the Index and other papers; then Messrs. Lilly and Ross gave, from their own recollection, personal reminiscences of Mrs. Child, who, it seems, was for some years a resident of Florence. After that there was a pleasant recitation by a tiny son of Rowland Connor; afterward, there was singing with music, and the Florence Sunday-school quietly adjourned.

Beside the "Memorial Sundays," there are various festivals celebrated by appropriate decorations, recitations, readings, and addresses; as, for instance, floral and autumnal festivals, and also the different holidays. Thus, the routine never grows tiresome; and the young mind is given impulse to thought in many directions, and the tastes and tendencies of all consulted. S. A. U.

We call special attention to our Paris correspondent's account of the execution of the decrees against the unauthorized religious orders in France, and of the reasons the French government had for adopting measures that to many outsiders seem not only harsh, but subversive of liberty of conscience. Our correspondent has unusual facilities for discerning the sentiments of the great middle class of citizenship in France, which is the main support of the Republic; and we venture the opinion that she has given a correct judgment on this difficult question. Mrs. Segur, by the way (though we publish her wish without her authority), would like to secure a position as correspondent for some secular journal which would give her fair remuneration. She is already correspondent of the Toledo Blade; is a cultivated American lady who has spent considerable time abroad, is conversant with the French and German languages, and is specially interested in all that pertains to the secular welfare of the common people. She expects to go to Germany in the course of the coming spring. We commend her to newspaper proprietors and editors, and shall be glad to put any of them into communication with her.

We have received a copy of an Act lately passed by the Legislature of South Carolina to incorporate the South Carolina Educational Association. The objects of this Association are stated to be "to promote and further the interests of education by establishment of schools, delivery of lectures, and otherwise, in the State of South Carolina." A board of twenty-five trustees have charge of the business of the Society. Among these names are those of several colored men formerly teachers under the New England Freedman's Aid Society, as well as that of the first superintendent of schools, Mr. Jillson. These facts seem to indicate that this Society is organized on a liberal basis, and is intended to promote the best welfare of all the people of the State. We shall be anxious to hear more of its methods and action; and, should these prove judicious, we trust the new Association will receive cordial sympathy and assistance from all interested in the welfare of our common country.

The "Old South" is saved, but the "Parker Memorial Meeting-house" is gone. There are some Liberals who helped to save the "Old South," who would have been even more ready to help to save the "Parker Memorial," if the proprietors of the latter had given them a chance.

Mrs. John Jacob Astor has founded a mission chapel in Nebraska, and fitted it out with a font that has a basin of solid silver. What a pity it is that a portion of the cost of this ostentatious offering at least could not have been spent in improving the comfort and condition of the occupants of the Astor tenement houses in New York!

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

A very commendable Boston enterprise is the Woman's Educational and Industrial Union, located at 157 Tremont Street. It has an excellent reading-room, and provides a resort for ladies in the city needing a place for rest and conversation. A committee answers all questions about public institutions, theatres, street-cars, physicians, etc., which out-of-town visitors may wish to ask. In the industrial department, all articles manufactured by women are received and sold. A very good work is being done in this way, by helping women to find the work they can do best. The protective department looks after the interests of working women, and aids them in securing their wages when it is refused by employers. There is also an employment department in which places are found for working women. Social entertainments are provided, the sick visited, while there are frequent lectures, and several classes in literature and other studies. Sunday meetings are held, the preachers being always women. The efficient superintendent is the only person receiving remuneration for her work, all the committees laboring gratuitously. The membership fee is one dollar a year, which sum secures all the privileges of the Union.

There is now on his way to this country one of the most prominent of the Russian Nihilists, who will take up his residence in Boston. He is known to fame by the pseudonym of Leo Hartmann, and has been obliged to flee from his own country because of his part in an attempt to take the Czar's life. A young man of fine culture and many accomplishments, he has led a very adventurous life. His coming is looked for with great enthusiasm by the communists of this country. A journal is to be started in Boston, to be called the Anarchist, and devoted to the advocacy of the principles he represents. His party, it seems, differ in some respects from the majority of the American socialists, accepting the idea of individuality instead of that of the commune. The principles of the Anarchists, as they call themselves, are thus summed up by the Boston Herald, from which we learn these facts about Hartmann: "Their principles are little known hereabouts, socialistic ideas being popularly supposed to be represented by what the anarchists term the 'authority socialists,' that is, those who propose to subordinate the individual utterly to society in the mass, prescribing for each person his place and conduct, leaving him no room for free action, but making him an involuntary part of a vast piece of social mechanism. This, the anarchists claim, would be a tyranny as bad as anything that now exists, if not worse; and they are as hostile to it as to the present order of things. The socialism of the anarchistic order prevails chiefly among the Latin and Slavonic races. They do not aim to bring about a social chaos, as their name might seem to imply. Anarchism, in their sense, means the exaltation of personality, the supremacy of the individual. To this they would subordinate all else. Love of mankind and faith in human nature are the basis of their principles. They would recognize to the utmost the freedom of individual action. Their controlling motives are to guide and impel rather than to direct and compel. They do not hold the communistic idea of the division of property, for they feel that that would be an infringement of individual right; but, recognizing the danger of the money power, they would take away its capacity for evil, and make impossible the accumulation of the vast fortunes in individual and corporative hands, which they feel to be the bane of the world. Their idea of individual work and deserts is summed up in the motto: 'From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs.' This is interpreted in its broad and comprehensive sense of the needs and ability of man as developed by the progress of the age in science and art.

"The aim of the anarchists is to abolish entirely all enacted law, and organize society on the basis of mutual agreement and consent, each individual to assume the part for which he is by nature fitted, and willingly to engage in the work of his choice. Under such circumstances, work would become not a toil, but a pleasure. Individuals would naturally be attracted into groups by mutual sympathy of temperament and work; and these groups would naturally assume the administration of affairs, each performing its individual function, like the different parts of a living organism. The anarchists point to the administration of the international postal union as a practical example of the workings of the principles of true communism, the union having been brought about by mutual agreement, without the supremacy of any enacted law, the sole impulse and controlling motive being the benefit of all concerned. So, they claim, will all the work of the world be performed under the prevalence of their principles, economically and efficiently, leaving all individuals leisure for the cultivation of their best impulses and the fulfilment of their fondest desires."

UNDER the title of Some Curious Schools, D. Lothrop & Co. have put into book form a series of articles printed during last year in Wide-Awake. Some of these papers are of special interest for their information about some of the industrial and reform schools of the country. A great deal is now being done for the instruction of poor children, and toward giving them a self-supporting education. Several remarkably successful efforts of this kind are here described, and among them the "Children's Art School" of New York and the Boston Whittling School. There are also several accounts of cooking and sewing schools, which have met with the most promising results. A flower school in one of the very worst quarters of New York is also described. There are several articles in the book about schools for the blind, deaf, and vicious, and our national schools for educating soldiers and sailors. What is known as the "Children's Hour" in New York is really a juvenile art school, where an hour each week is devoted to studies in sketching, painting, modelling, etc. The "Flower School" in New York is also a very successful charity, and is doing much good. It is both a day and a night school, where flowers are given as rewards and used as object-lessons. The account of the whittling or industrial schools of Boston may aid, as it ought, in starting many other similar schools. Miss Emma E. Brown, in her account of these schools, says that in them a thorough shop-course, which includes eight hundred and forty hours, is just about equal, in the amount of real knowledge it gives, to one of the old-time apprenticeships of several years. Now that the apprentice system is totally dead, there is a growing need of a careful industrial education for the boys of the land. Such an education would be the very best preventive of pauperism, and it would deter from a good deal of intemperance and crime.

UNDER the editorship of Mr. F. B. Sanborn, there has recently appeared the Proceedings of the Seventh Annual Conference of Charities, held in Cleveland during June and July of last year. It is the best publication which has yet appeared in this country devoted to the systematic care of the unfortunate members of society. The papers read are classified under the following heads: Penal and Prison Discipline, Insanity, Associated Charities, Delinquent Children, Causes and Prevention of Pauperism, Criminal Law, and Buildings for Dependants and Delinquents. It is safe to say that nowhere else can there be found so much valuable information and so much wisdom on these subjects as in this report. The papers are by the ablest men in the country, who have given special attention to the subjects of which they spoke. They are all up with the times, giving the latest conclusions and the best results of recent experiments. The reports of the delegates from the different States, and especially the address of General Brinkerhoff, the president, in regard to the penal and reform institutions of the country, in which he gives an account of what is being done in each State, show very clearly that there is the greatest need of agitation and reform. A few States have done noble things, and are steadily making improvements, but in most of the States the most barbarous and inadequate methods are in vogue. In Tennessee, "the poor are sold out and the prisoners are leased out." General Brinkerhoff, as well as many others, deprecated the tendency to political interference in the management of the State penal and charitable institutions. In one Western State, the most serious injury was done by a complete change in the officers of all these institutions. The folly of large and costly buildings was also enlarged upon, especially for insane asylums. In his address, the president said: "There is not a State in the Union where inexcusable extravagances of this kind have not been perpetrated. In every State there are large numbers of the insane, the epileptic, and the idiotic, who are either wholly deprived of public care, or else are driven into dens or corners in poorhouses or into cells in jails, where proper treatment is impossible, simply because our asylums have been built to make a show outside rather than to provide accommodations inside." The president also complained of the apathy of the churches in regard to charitable and reformatory work. He said: "I think the Conference will agree with me in the opinion that one of the obstacles of progress in our penal, reformatory, and benevolent institutions, is the apathy of the Christian churches, Christian ministers, and Christian people. They should remember that, practically, the poor, the afflicted, and the erring, for the most part, have gone into the care and custody of our public institutions; and if we, as Christians, are to have a part in helping them, we must work with and upon and through these institutions." The drift of thought concerning the care of pauper and criminal children was in favor of the family system, as securing more nearly than any other a substitute for a home and as being most thoroughly reformatory. Non-restraint was strongly urged for all but a very few of the most violent cases of insanity. Drs. Beard, Seguin, and others, were decidedly in favor of the utmost possible amount of liberty, and urged the abolition of all instruments of restraint and punishment from asylums. The new methods of charity also received much attention, and were generally commended. The papers on penal institutions reported much improvement in many of them, but there is almost everywhere a very great need of reform. The plan of indeterminate sentences was strongly favored by one speaker. There are thirty papers in this volume of three hundred and twenty-four pages. It is to be had of A. Williams & Co., Boston, probably for $1.50, though the price is nowhere given. The next meeting of this Conference will be held in Boston, beginning on the last Monday in July, and lasting for six days. G. W. C.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Have Radicals any common Principles on which to base Religious Instruction of Children?

Not long ago, a paper was read before a certain County Conference of "Unitarian and other Christian Churches," which urged very emphatically the need and practicability of definite religious teaching to children. The author of the paper included in that phrase, "definite religious teaching," a good deal of what more radical thinkers would call speculative theology. At the next Conference, the question was further discussed by those who queried whether Unitarians could agree sufficiently upon any definite views of God, Christ, immortality, the genesis of morals, and like fundamental points, to teach children authoritatively. The question of the duty of Unitarians, then, to give their children definite religious instruction, resolved itself into the deeper question, Have Unitarians any definite religious views which they may use as a foundation for such instruction? The feeling of many in the Conference above named seemed to be that there was no specific "body of doctrine" in the denomination which could be drawn upon for the culture of the young. If prominent Unitarians declare thus that the creed of their church is creedlessness, how much greater seems the difficulty of finding a common ground of essential belief among liberals too radical to be enclosed even in the Unitarian organization. And, surely, if no common ground of essential belief among radicals can be found, we can have no religious culture of the young on distinctively radical principles, especially in organized Sunday-schools.

Have then, we must seriously inquire, the extreme radicals (whose mental protest against the limitations of dogmatic statement finds its best expression in the Free Religious Association) any special theories of life, any uniform principles of action, any common forms of belief, which they can conscientiously impress upon their children's minds, as means of radical religious culture? So far as the writer knows, this question has never been thoroughly discussed at any large and influential meeting of radicals; but a question akin to it has been broached many times in the annual meetings of our Free Religious Association. A glance at one of these latter discussions will give us a clue to the feeling of two classes of radicals on this most vital of all questions. At the twelfth annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, a strong effort was made by a few members of the Association to infuse a more determined missionary zeal into the body. These enthusiasts represented that there was a great need in society for organized propagation of the new faith. But others thought that, "as a body, we had no principles to propagate": we were simply organized to give opportunity "for the free equal presentation of all views." So far in the history of rationalistic religion, the latter has been the prevailing view. The slight organizations of radicals in this country have been effected almost exclusively for one of two kindred purposes, both of them negative and non-constructive; namely, to furnish this free parliament of opinions on a national or local platform or to antagonize the political remnants of Church and State union.

Those radicals who have consented to string their intense individualism on the slender and unobtrusive thread of the Free Religious Association have, with very few exceptions, done so with the understanding that the chief, if not single, emphasis of that body's action should be placed on its assertion of the principles of personal freedom in religious thought and expression. Individual rights, not educational duties, this has been the rallying cry of these associated radicals. Now, this watchword of self-assertion, however necessary in some phases of all movements of reform, is a disintegrating force. The sense of obligation to others, rather than of defence of one's self, binds people together in united, aggressive, vigorous action. The, to me, exaggerated estimate of the importance of personal rights, which too often dwarfs that sense of universal obligation which should be its equal correlative, has paralyzed the right arm of rational religion in its representative organization. It has given some of its leaders an almost sickly sensitiveness to possible charges of sect-building in case of proposed aggressive movements. And, more than all, it has made the rank and file doubt, first, whether we have (not only "any principles to propagate"), but any principles to teach our own children, and, second, whether, if we do hold decided views, it is right to indoctrinate the child's mind with them.

The question, therefore, of radical religious culture of the young is indissolubly bound up in the larger question of which it is the most interior and vital part; namely, Have those rationalists who claim to have outgrown all limited systems and sects, and who decline to pronounce any shibboleth of special faith, even the attenuated and indefinite liberal Christianity of Unitarianism,—have those advanced prophets of the universal religion any distinct views which differentiate them into a recognized class of thinkers? I believe they have. I believe that to-day the Free Religious Association, despite its disavowal of any "creed," stands for a more consistent, positive, and clearly defined theory of religion than any other religious body in Christendom, except the Roman Catholic, of which it is the logical antithesis. I believe that the unorganized constituency of radicals behind the Free Religious Association—inside of Unitarian and other churches, or outside of all churchly influence—is fast coming to a position of precise, logical statement of the essentials of religion, to which all forms of Protestant Christianity have unconsciously contributed. But this positive, consistent belief, which is the real significant feature of rationalism (however hidden it may be by more superficial aspects), is not, of course, like the belief of special sects and restricted religions, a specific set of mental conceptions of life and its Source. It is not a dogmatic statement of opinion forced on all who would organize. That for which our great radical movement in religion stands is, in intellect, not a conclusion arrived at, but a method of study; is, in morals, not an assumption of infallible judgment of special acts, either by a written code or personal intuition, but a principle by which personal conduct may be adjusted in all cases to universal ends; is, in sentiment, not a roofed cathedral of a partial and pictured God, but the open hill-top of the Unnamed Ideal where the fresh winds ever fan the flame of our unquenchable aspirations.

Have we here no positive "principles to propagate," no vital, distinctive, imperative truths to teach our children? Our position in religious thought means for us, for our children, for the world around us, just what the modern scientific method in all other departments of investigation means. It means a revolution. It includes the mighty work of destructive criticism and negative attack, of the past and present, and also the constructive effort of the near future. What part of this abstract statement can be translated into the symbolic speech of childhood?

This must be determined largely by future experiment; but past experience in other fields of education shows us clearly some parts of it which cannot be given to the child in any form, while yet they constitute an essential basis for the teacher's work.

In the first place, negation and criticism have no place in the culture of the young in any department of knowledge. The child must always be taught what is rather than what is not; must always be inspired by the good, not warned by the bad example. This rules out of the curriculum of home or school training, in this department, during the earlier years, all speculative opinions, all doubtful matters of which we cannot say "I know" to the little questioner, all treatment of religions, or their founders, which provokes argument or suggests scepticism. Does not this eliminate not only the mass of theological instruction given in the orthodox Christian churches, but also all denial of that theology and all critical analysis of differing faiths?

In the second place, the object of the true teacher in all departments is to develop the original power of the child even more than to add to its store of knowledge. Therefore, we must beware how we overlay the child's mind with our personal conceptions of the Supreme Excellence, or Law, or our views of the future life, except in necessary response to direct question, when we should reply with the modesty due from those whose conceptions have changed, and may again. All our ideals and ideas of life which are not susceptible of concrete illustration, we should not voluntarily present to the child.

What then is left, after the intellectual groundwork of religious science and the higher sentiments of religious aspiration are expunged from our list of childish studies? That which the child must learn first, in order to acquire the proficiency which life demands, and which is only gained by constant repetition of instruction and practice from the tenderest years,—moral control. Here our work is in broad daylight. We need no subtleties of thought, no deep inquiries into causes and transmission of evil tendencies, paraded before the wondering child; although we do need in the teacher a thoroughness and breadth of training in these directions very rarely met with. We begin with the child's geography of the conscience at his own earliest point of conscious residence. He learns so early that his selfish wish is opposed by inanimate objects, by larger and older people, by contesting playmates, and we must give him the why. Why must he not lie? Why must he not steal? Why must he not be unkind? Why must he not be passionate? The law of equality of rights, of the universal good, can be illustrated in countless simple incidents of the child's daily life, in terms easily understood at the earliest years. The conditions of harmonious relations of individuals may be translated into the tongue of babes. I should place, then, definite moral training as the first step in the religious culture of the child (lightened perhaps by such pleasant and profitable wanderings in the outer world of nature as Mr. Hinckley suggests), but holding the child steadily to the study of actions, their motives, and their good or ill effects, all through the first fourteen or fifteen years of life. This instruction should be in an ascending and a widening series of interpretation of duty, from the relation of the child to his own home, his school, and playmates, to his future social, political, and industrial connections. Of course, this series would naturally divide itself into: first, the more interior duties of self-culture; and, second, the duties to others. The first branch would include the morality of the body as well as of the mind.

And all these graduating series of moral lessons, whether based on a text-book or simple talks on topics suggested, must be series of object-lessons, drawn within the range of the child's personal experience. At first, say until ten years of age, these could be trusted to the teacher's selection from known incidents of childish life and action. Afterward, when the wider and more external relations of life are considered, carefully prepared biographical sketches of characters specially illustrating the different public and private virtues would be of great use.

I have left no space for elaborate treatment of a possible system of moral instruction, following out these hints, even were I able to give it. But, as these first preliminary articles are designed to draw attention to the subject rather than to exhaust it, I shall close with a few questions.

Can children safely be left without definite religious instruction, any more than without definite mental drill? Is it not possible for all who accept the scientific method in religious inquiry to unite in a general system of moral training for the young, which, being based on known facts of experience, shall fortify them against evil influences, and give them the root basis of radical religion?

Can we radicals live in any organized forms of usefulness, except we train up our youth to apply our principles in the varied relations of life?

If radicals, during the last twenty years, had placed less exclusive emphasis on the "Freedom" and more on the "Character" and "Fellowship" of our faith, should we now be reading in scarlet, indignant shame how our hero-teacher, Parker, is dishonored in the city of his glorious toil?

ANNA GARLIN SPENCER.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, Dec. 10, 1880.

Excitement has passed away in connection with the execution of the decrees of March last in regard to the dispersion of the Jesuits and other unauthorized monastic communities in France. The government officials have executed the laws of the State in conformity with their oaths of office, and against stupendous impediments. The people of the United States, where Church and State have never been united, or only in a few exceptional points, can form no idea or opinion upon the gigantic evils which result to society from such a demoralizing union; and our journals, which, with well-meaning but ignorant zeal, censure the French Republic for what they term its "persecution of the Jesuits," are mistaken, and entirely misjudge the situation.

Nations, like individuals, will perish, if they ignore the first law of nature, self-preservation. It may be a selfish law; but that it is the law by which the peoples of the earth have arisen and flourished, and the neglect of which led to their decline and fall, must be conceded. No nation of Europe can exist as an independent nation to-day, if it submits its will to the retroactionary rule of the Jesuits, Trappists, Capuchins, and other monastic orders, designated as "unauthorized." These communities are just as much in open rebellion against their government in France as were the slave-holding oligarchy during our civil war; and the struggle will go on until either Church or State triumphs, or their complete separation is an accomplished fact.

These monastic orders insist upon having the education of youth wholly under their control. The first, the supreme law they inculcate in the minds and hearts of their pupils is "the Church is supreme," and that any "government acting without the consent or authority of the Church is no government which the children of the Church are bound to respect, and that the Church will absolve all who conspire against a government acting without its sanction." Imperial Prussia, monarchical and Catholic Austria, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium, long since enforced legislation for the disbandment of the Jesuits and other similar monastic orders. Republican France tolerated them longer than any Catholic country of continental Europe. But now her self-preservation has caused her to legislate for their dispersion.

The decrees of March last were published far and wide, and ample time has been given for the monastic orders designated to choose one of two alternatives,—divide their vast wealth and follow pursuits like other people, or remove their converts to countries willing to receive them. They did neither until the decrees were executed, but haughtily said: "We are the Supreme Power. We acknowledge no government unsanctioned by us." Now, they know that the government they refused to sanction has prevailed against their juggernaut, and that excommunication and anathema are powerless. The result will be free secular schools for all, and higher education for women.

Here, in Paris, the decrees were enforced without violent scenes, the monks being amenable to reason and argument, consequent upon superior intelligence. In the provinces there were disturbances, but not to the extent reported. At Tarascon, the monks were reënforced by several thousand boys and women, and shut themselves in their chapels, declaring their intention to perish before their altars. Three thousand soldiers surrounded the convent, refusing egress to the besieged, but inviting all who chose to take their exit at their pleasure. Finding, after three days prayers and fasting, that Heaven refused to interfere in their behalf, and that provisions were growing scarce, several hundred women left the convent in a body; and soon after their example was followed by all the besieged, even the monks, who contented themselves by excommunicating and anathematizing the government, its officials and soldiers.

As an example of French toleration and moderation, our friends who cry persecution at home may remember that, during our civil war, Union soldiers compelled rebels who were of the Episcopal faith to pray for the President of the United States; and if a rebel Episcopal priest had from his pulpit denounced, cursed, and anathematized the Union army, while its soldiers were within hearing distance, he would have heard arguments in some jail or fortress, instead of being permitted to depart to a country where his curses would be appreciated. The Republic of France compels no Church to pray for it. But it commands respect, and will enforce its laws.

An amusing scene occurred at the convent of Solesmes in one of the provinces. As the officers sent to enforce the decrees knocked at the convent, they were met by a very handsome young friar, who, upon learning their errand, said he was surprised at their ignorance. Did they not know that the Church is supreme, and, not having sanctioned the Republic of France, it was not a legal government, and had no divine power to enact laws or enforce them? After a short argument, the handsome young man and his superiors changed their views. At Lyons, the lamentable death of young Cladius Croc, who was stabbed to the heart by a young Jesuitical collegian for shouting, "Vive les décrets," would have precipitated similar tragedies, but for the vigilance of the government. Several provincial officials had not courage to execute the decrees, and resigned. Their places were immediately filled, and the execution of the laws was not arrested.

The French people earnestly desire secular education. The masses are as firmly wedded to the Catholic Church as their ancestors; and, while willing to have their children taught the tenets of their religion at certain times by the Church, they are making a strong fight for public schools, under wholly unsectarian teachers. They say: "We wish to imitate the common schools of the United States, except that we would go beyond them, and have no religious exercises whatever. At present, we have just one little Catholic prayer, a traditional custom, because our country has been Catholic for fifteen centuries. But it is not right, because Protestants, Israelites, and Freethinkers have the same right in the public schools as we; but we never expect them to pay the least attention to the service, not to rise or kneel, and they can study, if they choose. There is time enough to study religion on Sundays and feast days, and our children can learn it then under priestly instruction; but we will have none of it in our communal schools." They have no faith in coeducation of the sexes, but politely say to me: "It may answer for you Americans: you are a superior people; but it would demoralize us." The press recommend the engagement, as teachers of communal schools, of married couples, the husband to teach the boys, and the wife the girls. The employment of very young teachers is not sanctioned, persons of sound judgment, irreproachable character, as well as good scholarship, being chosen. Parents coöperate with teachers much more than we do in the West; and pupils are never encouraged at home, if remiss in their studies or disobedient in school.

The Workingmen's Congress, in session at Havre the last two weeks of November, excited much interest, and accomplished good work, notwithstanding the violent and impractical radicalism of some of its orators. Its inharmonious elements found it impossible to work together, and it resolved itself into three organizations. The ideas which divide Liberals in America are in full force here. Mademoiselle Michel, who recently returned from banishment to New Caledonia, made a violent apology for the Nihilists, and the republican press only said, "She has suffered much, much should be forgiven her." The more conservative elements called attention to existing abuses, and methods for their suppression were discussed.

Equal pay for equal work, and the elective franchise, were demanded for women; and more stringent legislation for the protection of children in the manufacturing districts. Nunneries were denounced, and the hope expressed that through agitation wealthy parents would not permit their daughters to assume monastic vows. It was alleged that only young women richly dowered are received in religious communities, which, possessing immense wealth, invested in interest-bearing securities, and being economically managed, can afford to monopolize the needlework of the nation, and underbid, and thereby so cheapen work, that the sewing-women of France are compelled to accept starvation wages; and, in consequence of this evil, national vice and immorality are greatly increased. In regard to all troubles between the State of France and its monastic orders, Americans should ever bear in mind, while passing judgment thereon, that the difficulties are not between Protestants and Catholics, or Freethinkers and Catholics, but between Catholics and Catholics, in a land which has been Catholic fifteen hundred years.

The churches are supported by the State. The latter claims the appointing power of bishops. The Pope objects to the appointers of the State, and will not confirm them; and in consequence several bishoprics are without a bishop, and the people are learning that the world moves just as well, and taxes are lighter. While the superstitious element of France is so great, Church and State cannot be divided. But the liberal cause is marching on to universal enlightenment. The radical element shocks the ultra-conservative, but tends to thought, which develops progress. Last month, Père Arnould, curé at Merber-le-Château, Belgium, being on his death-bed, asked civil burial. It was granted, the mayor and three thousand citizens attending the funeral, at which there were no religious rites or ceremonials. How often the conscience of the abbé must have rebelled against the meaningless rites tradition compelled him to repeat over the remains of others, when his honesty caused him to thus refuse them at his own burial! Yet his was the example of many excellent people of my acquaintance in full communion with orthodox churches, who have outgrown their beliefs, but who have not, like Abbé Arnould, the courage to admit the fact publicly, even in death.

While advanced ideas are thus active forces, the retroactionists are using every effort to keep alive traditional superstitions and to increase their power. In the furnished hotels, all letters for lodgers are left with the concièrge, or janitor, whose business it is to deliver them. Most of the buildings being seven stories high, and elevators being used only in the American quarter, it is something of a task to deliver five daily mails. Recently, our concièrge rushed into my room, her black eyes fairly sparkling with anger, as she rapidly ejaculated, "Eh bien, Madame, see what trouble the priests are making me." She held up a large number of notes, deeply bordered with black. I supposed them to be funeral invitations. They were printed, and, being unsealed, she had through curiosity opened one. It was an elegantly printed and inscribed invitation for a grand mass, with artistic music, at a fashionable church, for the repose of the soul of some friend of the sender's who had been dead a century. "Now, that spectacle," said she, "will cost a hundred or more francs: these people are the poor, proud kind, and need their money, and are doing this for mere show; and the priests have started the fashion to make money. I am a Catholic; but, if a hundred years of masses can't pray my friends out of purgatory, they will remain there, as far as I am concerned." And she groaningly wended her weary way skyward, up five long flights of stairs, wishing that a certain portly, rubicund priest might be in her place, and have a taste of her stair-climbing experience.

The workers of brass at ancient Ephesus, who proclaimed the glory of the Diana of the Ephesians, have their followers in modern Paris. The terra-cotta and plaster image-makers are strongly orthodox. An immensely great traffic is carried on here with the Catholic world in images of Christs, Madonnas, St. Johns, St. Josephs, Magdalens, and the whole army of saints, apostles, and martyrs. Some of the life-size images are colored in a most natural manner, and in form and features are a great improvement upon much of the mediæval statuary in old churches.

Freethinkers tell the people the truth, however, regardless of consequences. M. Clemenceau, a provincial deputy, in a public speech at Marseilles, said recently: "France expends three hundred million for education. Of this sum, sixty million is for public instruction, and two hundred and forty million to keep the nation under the yoke of ignorance and superstition, and the despotism of the clergy." Free evening schools in every quarter of Paris are doing good work this winter, being largely attended by workingmen, who receive instruction from the best teachers in the rudimentary educational branches and in specialties. Republican leaders are urging legislation for the higher education of women and the establishment of free universities for them, proclaiming that, as long as their education is under ecclesiastical control, the progress of general national enlightenment will be retarded.

IMPORTANT ART DISCOVERY.—The mayor of Athens telegraphs to the lord mayor of London that a magnificent and complete statue of Minerva Victorious, a masterpiece of Phidias, has just been discovered.

A PROJECT has been started for marking by some suitable monument the spot where the corpse of Shelley was burned in 1822, on the sea-coast near Viareggio. Some gentlemen belonging to his own college in Oxford University, whence he was summarily expelled in 1811, are taking the first steps in the matter.

THE funeral of Blanqui, the communist, took place at Paris, January 4. A procession of three thousand persons followed the remains to the cemetery, and an enormous crowd of spectators lined all the streets through which the procession passed. Funeral orations were delivered over the tomb. Louis E. Michel was one of the principal speakers, and after leaving the cemetery he received an ovation from the populace. Henri Rochefort attended the funeral, but quitted the cemetery before the speeches were delivered.

A FRESH ministerial crisis is threatened in France. The difficulty has arisen out of a debate in the Senate on the religious question. On Tuesday, a question was put to the government by M. Buffet about the removal of crucifixes from the elementary schools in Paris. He complained that this was done during school-hours, that several crucifixes fell on the floor, and that they were thrown pell-mell into a furniture van at the door. Teachers and pupils, he said, were shocked at this insult to their religion, and some of the latter remarked: "The good God is taken away. What is to be put in his place?" He would put the same question to the government. M. Jules Ferry said that the removal was effected for the purpose of thoroughly carrying out the secularization and completing the neutral character of the lay schools. All due respect was observed in executing the measure, and two police agents who violated their instructions were punished. After a somewhat stormy discussion, an order of the day was passed by 159 to 85, declaring that the Senate regretted the act which had given rise to the interpellation. M. Hérold, Prefect of the Seine, has tendered his resignation in consequence of the vote; and M. Jules Ferry, President of the Council, and M. Constans, Minister of the Interior, are stated to have declared that they will also resign.

THE IMMORTAL LIFE.

By John Weiss.

12mo. 255 pp., with Heliotype Portrait of the Author.

PRICE $1.50.

What the Critics say of this Book:

Mr. Weiss is a suggestive rather than a convincing writer. He lays no foundations, and builds no structures in whose shelter men can find rest; but he takes one to points of elevation whence noble views are possible, and in quick glances opens up the mysteries of the soul and its life. The essays do not all treat directly of immortality, but they have what Arnold calls the unity of tendency. They are full of side-lights on the great problem. Mr. Weiss regarded personality as a prime and fundamental element in the structure of things, and he believed in a "personal continuance" with a steadfast faith.—Christian Union.

This posthumous volume on the life of man immortal proves how deep was Weiss' faith in the sublimity of man's nature. It is worthy the perusal of every one who doubts or believes the principle of eternal personal life hereafter. We bespeak for this strong work a wide welcome among thoughtful persons. The pages are full of gems that might go far to swell a book of notable quotations on life, belief, emotion, faith, work, hope, and progress.—Boston Transcript.

In this age of scepticism, when almost everybody doubts and insists upon proof, this work cannot fail to be a great help to those whose visions are clouded by fears that the grave ends all, and that there is no spiritual existence beyond the dark valley.—Boston Herald.

"The Immortal Life," by John Weiss, has for its theme "The Idea of the Hereafter," and is a brave and beautiful presentation of the topic by one who was an evolutionist. The author has a rare combination of the dainty and rugged in his style, one moment striking a pick-axe into some stony foundation, and the next planting flowers on the débris he has gathered. Without apparent connection, the chapters of this volume do combine to prove a strong support for the hope of "personal continuance" in the future.—Independent Methodist (Baltimore).

The essays of the late John Weiss on Materialism, Development, etc., continue to excite wide discussion. His harmonizing of the principles of evolution with creation will find many followers. Even some prominent teachers of the truths of revelation accept, or at least omit to deny, that the facts and theories of an original creation and subsequent development do not conflict.—Indianapolis Journal.

Those who were attracted by Mr Weiss' genius when alive will find here its best representatives. Here is his mature thought, the last, best offerings of his experience, observation, and reflection. He was an evolutionist and a maintainer of immortality. He can be read with an increasing respect for human nature and a sincerer tribute to Deity.—Boston Commonwealth.

Mr. Weiss' great argument for a future existence is the nature of human personality. The argument probably will not convince persons with a strong natural tendency to disbelieve immortality; but it clearly proves that science has not yet, as many persons apprehend and some claim, given a negative decision on the old question of immortal life. The old faith still stands; and people may hold it with Mr. Weiss, and yet accept all the attested facts of recent science.—Index (Boston).

EDITOR,
WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

IT has never been the case that he who possessed genuine virtue could not influence others, nor that he who was not sincere could influence others. The principles of great men illuminate the universe.—Mencius.

THE worlds are not for him who worships not. . . . When thy mind shall have worked through the snares of illusion, thou wilt become indifferent to traditional belief. When thy mind, liberated from the Vedas, shall abide fixed in contemplation, thou shalt then attain to real worship. Thou shalt find it in due time spontaneously within thyself.—Hindu.

THE water falls on all creatures, herbs, bushes, trees; and each pumps up to its own leaf and blossom what it requires for its several end. So falls the reign of the Good Law upon the many-hearted world. The law is for millions; but it is one and alike beautiful to all: it is deliverance and repose.—Buddhist.

THE heavenly Father maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.—New Testament.

VIRTUE alone is productive of goodly fruits, which yield abundance, not only for the time being, but for the future, bringing blessings upon posterity. But sin is barren.—Talmud.

> I HOTLY strove to reach the race-course goal,
> When seeking God beyond myself to find.
> But now I see, since He was in my soul,
> The first impatient step left Him behind.
> —Alger's Oriental Poetry.

THE heavens do not send good haps in handfuls, but let us pick out our good by little, and with care, from out much bad, that still our little world may know its king.—Sir Philip Sidney.

HE that takes away reason to make way for revelation puts out the light of both, and does much the same as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes, the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.—Locke.

IT matters not how a man dies, but how he lives.—Dr. Johnson.

NATURE never deserts the wise and pure: no plot so narrow, be but nature there, no waste so vacant, but may well employ each faculty of sense, and keep the heart awake to love and beauty.—Coleridge.

IT is my firm conviction that man has only himself to blame, if his life appears to him at any time void of interest and of pleasure. Man may make life what he pleases, and give it as much worth, both for himself and others, as he has energy for. Over his moral and intellectual being, his sway is complete.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

THE best men are not those who have waited for chances, but who have taken them,—besieged the chance, conquered the chance, and made the chance their servitor.—E. H. Chapin.

WORSHIP is transcendent wonder: wonder for which there is no limit or measure, that is worship. To the primeval man all things and everything they saw exist beside them were an emblem of the God-like, of some God. We do not worship in that way now. But is it not reckoned still a merit, proof of what we call "a poetic nature," that we recognize how every object has a divine beauty in it, how every object is verily a window through which we may look into infinitude itself?—Thomas Carlyle.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE official returns of the census give for the United States fifty millions of people,—"good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over."

GOVERNOR LONG, in his annual message to the Legislature this year, has put himself squarely on the side of the advocates of the abolition of capital punishment. It is pretty clear, to say the least, that hanging is not a very efficacious remedy for making the world better.

THE "Union of American Hebrew Congregations" furnishes statistics of the Jews in the United States as follows: Jewish population, about 250,000; number of congregations, 278, with a membership of about 13,000; value of real estate and other property (synagogues, hospitals, cemeteries, etc.) owned by congregations and beneficent societies, about $7,000,000.

MR. GARFIELD should have no trouble about filling the office of minister to England. It is already filled by Mr. Lowell in the best possible way, and he should have no successor until he wants one. A London correspondent of a New York journal says, "No American minister has shown himself more uncompromisingly American, winning, nevertheless, great popularity among the best English people, with a wide and favorable reputation among all classes."

THE Evangelical journals on our exchange list are generally complaining of a dearth of revivals. We suspect the business of the country is too prosperous to allow time for the revivalistic spirit to get a hold anywhere. If "hard times" were to set in, a revival in the churches would probably soon follow. It is common, too, for a certain number of people, under the influence of those who labor for the good of souls, to get warm in religion in winter and grow cold in summer.

THE New York Independent is a stalwart advocate of the taxation of churches. It says in a recent issue: "There is a very large amount of church property in this country, and it is increasing every year; and much of it consists in extravagant church structures, costly far beyond any necessity that has a basis in utility, and owned by wealthy congregations. We have never seen any good reason why this property should not be put upon the assessor's list, and by a fair valuation made to share with other property in the tax-burdens of society. It is not public property any more than that of a bank corporation or that of a manufacturing company. It is private property, held, controlled, and owned by a religious corporation for its own purposes. The fact that the use of this property is beneficial to society is no reason for its exemption from taxation. We concede the fact, but deny the inference sought to be drawn from it. Nearly all private property is, in its use, beneficial to society; and yet this is not regarded as a good reason for exempting it from taxation. The reasoning is no better, when applied to church property."

THE following item appeared the other day in one of the daily papers: "'Life is too short for virtue,' Professor Felix Adler proclaims to the Society of Ethical Culture that hangs on Mr. Adler's lips. It is the opinion of the New York Graphic that most of the murderers hanged and criminals convicted and sentenced would doubtless agree with the professor in this dogma of his ethical culture." We do not know where the words which here profess to be quoted occur in Professor Adler's discourses, if indeed they occur in any of them in a sense that warrants the turn thus given to them against him. The simple name of his society, which it is safe to say is intended to indicate so far as possible its aim, should be sufficient to save him from the implication conveyed. It serves to illustrate the too common habit of newspapers putting into print and helping to keep in circulation any floating paragraph that may seize the eye concerning persons of public reputation, if it have a lively or taking character, even when there is a reasonable assurance that it falsifies and misrepresents them. If we are correctly informed, the New York Graphic of late years has been, if it is not now, edited by a Roman Catholic; and Roman Catholic editors have no more conscience in such matters than other Christians of the profession.

THERE was not much about the necessity of believing in a creed in a sermon preached recently on "Religious Doubt" by Henry Ward Beecher. "Let no man," he said, "count himself an infidel who believes that righteousness is the great end of human life, and who longs for a more perfect reduction of his will to obedience to his moral sense, for a clearer revelation of divine sympathy, and for the sun of love to shine more purely over all his life." In the same sermon, he told the following anecdote of his father, Dr. Lyman Beecher: "During a revival which took place in Boston, at an inquiry meeting of more than four hundred people, my father, in conducting the conversation, was assisted by a great many persons, among whom was a student from Andover; and my father heard this young theologue, who was talking with a young woman who professed that she believed, and whom he desired to test, which was all right enough, propound to her, finally, the old Hopkinsian question, 'Do you think, madam, that you would be willing to be damned for the glory of God?' She was somewhat startled; and my father, who was in the seat behind them, in his prompt and brusque way, said, 'What are you asking that woman?' He, with a meek consciousness of rectitude, said, 'I was asking her, Doctor, whether she would be willing to be damned for the glory of God.' Said my father, 'Would you, sir?' 'I hope so, sir.' 'Then you ought to be damned!'"

The American Doctrine of State and Church.

A Sermon preached at the First Congregational Unitarian Church in Cincinnati, Nov. 28, 1880.

BY REV. CHAS. W. WENDTE.

There are two institutions in human society whose adjustment of their mutual relations has been the source of more agitation and strife than any other known in history. They are the State and the Church. The story of European civilization for the past eighteen centuries is largely a record of the struggle between the religious and the political interest. In this New World, we are exceptionally and fortunately circumstanced in this respect. Our society is unfettered by the traditions and thraldoms of the past, while the great preponderance of Protestants among us secures us substantial unity of sentiment. This unity is only broken by the open or covert attacks made upon our American system of Church and State by its avowed enemies, and the unreasonable demands made by unenlightened Protestants upon the National Government for an especial recognition and encouragement of their religious views. These demand that the State forsake its impartial and tolerant attitude toward all religions and churches, and recognize some one among them; and that it continue those exemptions and prerogatives of the Church which we have inherited from the former union of Church and State among us, and which are not only opposed to the logic of a secular government, but are in themselves harmful to the higher interests of the nation. It is to prove the unwisdom and injustice of such a course on the part of our American clergy, and to show that the true interests of both religion and politics are best subserved by the separation of these two great institutions and the complete secularization of the State, that I proceed to inquire, "What are the relations which should exist between the Church and the State, and in how far does our American system fulfil them?"

The Theocracy.

In theory there are three principal relations which can exist between the civil and the ecclesiastical interests.

I. The first is that of the supremacy of the Church and the subordination of the State. This is called theocracy, because it declares God the Supreme Ruler of all, and that the Church is his appointed representative and vicegerent on earth. The classical example for it is the system of the papacy and the canon law of the Roman Catholic Church. Since the time of Gregory VII., the Church has taught that there can be no sovereign political authority, nor any independence for the individual, beyond the limits fixed by the ecclesiastical power.

The State has indeed a qualified independence within its sphere; but what that sphere is is determined by the Church, which thus becomes the ultimate authority in all questions of civil and political import. To quote the language of an American Roman Catholic Bishop: "The State is for the body, the Church for the soul. But the soul is superior to the body. Hence the Church is above the State." This reasoning is supported by appeals to the Scriptures, to tradition, and to other recognized sources of religious authority. The Church having thus the divine right to rule, it follows that its head, the Pope, is the sovereign of the world, and all civil governments must submit to his dictation.

Such, in substance, is the Roman Catholic or theocratic doctrine of Church and State, whose culmination and glorification we behold in the dogma of papal infallibility, which fitly crowns the edifice of priestly authority. True, in common practice the Church has often modified her demands. She has been compelled by the logic of necessity to recognize and treat with civil governments as equals. In the many earthly dilemmas in which the Church has found herself, she has from motives of self-preservation held her extreme theories somewhat in abeyance, and accepted the situation. But the doctrine of papal supremacy was not surrendered thereby. It was only suspended and kept in reserve, to be again advanced at a more favorable opportunity. Some may imagine that this theocratic doctrine of Church and State has had its day, and is not likely to reappear again as a force in modern society. But our own generation has seen it developed to its speculative extreme in the dogma of papal infallibility, a dogma which the Church did not dare to proclaim at the height of her power in the mediæval ages. In that extraordinary document, the Encyclical and Syllabus of the late Pius IX., nearly all the achievements which form the glory of modern society are indicted by name and condemned with the anathemas of the Church, and mankind enjoined, under penalty of all the terrors and disabilities at the command of the Roman See, to bend in penitence at the footstool of St. Peter. Says the Syllabus: "All advocates of free speech, all who maintain the liberty of the press, all who assert the liberty of conscience and of religious worship, let them be anathema."

Such is the doctrine of the Church of Rome as announced by its highest competent tribunal. It would be easy to find it echoed in many recent utterances of her clergy. It is only a few years since that Bishop Gilmour, of Cleveland, laid down in a pastoral letter to his diocese the Catholic philosophy of government in the following words: "Nationalities must be made subordinate to religion. We must learn that we are Catholics first and citizens next. Catholicism teaches that God is above man, the Church above the State." This is certainly explicit and emphatic enough. So Cardinal Newman, in his controversy with Mr. Gladstone, maintained that "no pledge from Catholics was of any value to which Rome was not a party." Apply this principle to our American political life, and it means simply this, —that no Roman Catholic citizen can rightly take an oath of allegiance without the consent of Rome, or, in other words, that Rome is a higher authority in American affairs than the Republic itself. It would be easy to multiply such testimonies by quoting the utterances of the minor clergy, and from the pages of Catholic books and newspapers. These all prove that the theocratic doctrine of the supremacy of the Church over the State, a doctrine opposed to the fundamental principles and working methods of our American Republic, is believed and upheld by a large, well-organized, and powerful body among us, and only awaits its opportunity to become an open and aggressive enemy to our free institutions.

I believe it to be highly improbable that, in a thinking age and a free land like ours, the Roman Catholic theory will ever again become the basis of any new order of society. Intelligent and liberty-loving America is not likely to adopt that which even monarch and priest ridden Europe is so universally rejecting. But, though it has little creative power left, it may yet exert a great disturbing influence in our young community as it does to-day in the Old World. All Europe is rent with discord and struggle, whose chief cause is the political pretensions of the Roman Church. In Germany, the New Empire is engaged in a death-grapple with the renaissance of the papal power, a foe not less dangerous to it than the French; for, though weaker, it is more insidious and persistent. France is to-day a scene of conflict which seriously menaces the stability of the young republic, and whose cause is the struggle of the Catholic clergy to maintain their control of public education. The same is true of Belgium, where, according to a recent traveller, there are two conventual establishments to every three parishes, and where the government, supported by the people, has at last wrested the popular education from the grasp of the clergy. In Italy, it is the fierce struggle between the temporal and the spiritual interest which delays the unification and proper development of the new kingdom; while Spain, although she has placed a religious freedom clause in her Constitution, at the instigation of the priesthood has practically annulled it, and refuses Protestant congregations their legal rights as worshippers.

So it is everywhere where the Church has sway; and so would it be here in America to-day, if she held the preponderance of power. What else is implied in the oath which every Roman Catholic bishop takes on his ordination: "So help me God and His Holy Gospels, heretics and schismatics I will to my utmost power persecute and wage war with." What this means, we may learn from the history of persecution in that Church, and from that recent and explicit declaration of the Papal Syllabus: "All are condemned who maintain that the Roman Church may not employ force." Should the opportunity come again to the Church, could there be any doubt as to who were the heretics and schismatics referred to, or that she would refuse to employ the terrors of the law as well as her spiritual authority to carry out her decrees?

The theocratic doctrine is not dead, but sleeping, and still contains within it the possibility of a vast and dangerous influence on our body politic. The general character and tendency of this theory are, however, so well known that I may pass to consider briefly a second legal relation which may exist between the civil and the ecclesiastical power; namely,

A Union of Church and State Under One Head.

The most perfect example of this system we find in Russia, where the Emperor is also the spiritual head of the Greek Church. In a modified form, this theory underlies the Established or State Church of England, and in a still more modified form the Privileged Evangelical Church of Germany, whose head, the Emperor, governs through a council or synod whose members he himself appoints. I cannot dwell on this system at present; nor is it necessary, for it is already on the wane, and may be considered as only an intermediate step between the theocracy of Rome and that entire separation of the Church from the State which is the characteristic doctrine of our American Republic.

The American Theory.

Let us examine this American theory more closely. The State we may define as social man organized for the purpose of civil government. The Church is social man organized for worship and religious nurture. Thus, in theory, each has its own peculiar functions, and is assigned a distinct sphere for their exercise. Each is to respect the other's right, and not to interfere with the other's operations. This is the theoretical, the ideal conception of the relations between Church and State; and this is generally conceived to be the American doctrine on this subject.

But this is a very mistaken view of their mutual relations, and by no means the one which actually obtains in American society. For there cannot be any such entire separation and yet coexistence of these two powers. In their practical working, Church and State constantly interfere with one another, and it is often very difficult to say what is the sphere of each. For example, the Church represents the spiritual interest; but she has temporal possessions which bring her within the laws and ordinances of the State. The Church, indeed, strenuously denies that the State has any right to interfere with her property arrangements, no matter how much they affect the welfare of the community. This is what the Roman Catholic Church says to-day to the American State, as she heaps up millions on millions of property exempt from taxation, held absolutely by one person, the bishop, and by him only as the representative of a foreign ruler; thus forming a continuous and dangerous monopoly in our midst. The American State will sooner or later have to interfere to regulate this great and growing evil, as the governments of Europe have regulated it; but the moment she attempts to do so the cry of the Church will be: "Hands off! You are transcending your sphere." The question then arises, Who is to determine what is the respective sphere of the Church and the State? "The Church," answers our Catholic friend. But then, on this supposition, the Church might accomplish any end, no matter how worldly or injurious to the community, by simply declaring it to be a spiritual necessity; and the State would be compelled to submit.

Now, our American principle of self-government teaches us to the contrary, and tells us that the Church must not only be separated from the State, but also in all temporal concerns must be subordinated to it.

Based upon the idea of the sovereign power of the people, the State, as the expression of that sovereignty, is the highest competent authority in American life. It follows, then, that the State cannot allow another power alongside of it, vested with superior or even equal right, and absolutely independent of its authority. The State is the supreme power in the land, and whatever disobeys its laws and so opposes the public interest and will must give way. To be sure, the State allows you and me a large measure of individual liberty. It grants certain definite privileges to the family also, and to other associations of men for specific purposes, but only so far as these do not oppose the public will and welfare. So the Church enjoys a certain independence in administering her temporal affairs; but whenever she oversteps the limits of her freedom and acts against the general good, or does anything to abridge the civil rights of the members of her own communion, then the State has a right to interfere and make her superior authority felt. On the other hand, in the sphere of purely speculative and spiritual interests the Church is sovereign and absolutely free. Here, the State acknowledges its limitations, and leaves the spiritual prerogatives of the Church unchallenged and unquestioned.

This is the true American doctrine then: in spiritual concerns, the absolute independence of the Church; in temporal affairs, the subordination of the Church to the State.

Not "the Church," but Churches.

Another leading and characteristic feature of the American system remains to be spoken of. Our American State does not know the church, or a church even, but only churches. In most European countries, side by side with the government, there is usually an established church, whose institutions are closely interwoven with the thought and life of the people. This being the case, the government cannot but recognize her claims, and make the best possible terms with her. But in these United States it is far different. We have no one established church, but only a multitude of scattered sects of greater or less pretension. The Roman Church is only a rival sect among the rest. These churches hold widely divergent views; each thinks itself right and the others wrong; each claims to be THE Church. No one among them is sufficiently powerful to overshadow the others. As a matter of simple justice and necessity, therefore, the American States must recognize no one church, but only churches. Presbyterian and Unitarian, Protestant and Catholic, Jew and Christian, the Mormon in Utah or Buddhist in San Francisco, are all recognized alike, and receive the same impartial treatment. The State does not investigate, it does not decide on all these conflicting claims to divine truth and right, it does not discriminate for or against any of them. It does not even know them in their religious character, but only in their private and corporate capacity. Their spiritual or traditional origin it has nothing to do with. It deals with them just as it would deal with a college, a benevolent society, a railroad corporation, or a bank. They exist under its laws, receive its protection, and are subject to its conditions. With their internal administration, the State will have nothing to do. It permits them to make such regulations for their own government as they please, be these papal or episcopal or congregational in form. Concerning this, it does not inquire: it only demands, first, that the churches shall not by overstepping their own canon laws abridge the ecclesiastical rights of their members; second, that no church shall enforce decrees which affect the civil rights of the citizen; and, third, that the teaching and practice of any church shall not contravene the laws of natural (not necessarily Christian) morality and injuriously affect the public order and welfare.

But, until they do thus conflict with her laws, the State leaves them in peace to work out their own salvation. Says Rev. T. B. Forbush, in his admirable discussion of this subject: "In the eye of the State, the churches are organizations for specific ends. Their statutes or charter define those ends. Beyond dealing justly with them and insisting that they shall deal justly with one another, she has no obligation, and should assume none."

Such is the general understanding in American society concerning the relation between the civil and the ecclesiastical power. Under this system, we have enjoyed a degree of political and religious liberty such as no other country on earth can boast, and which has made us, in large degree, the prosperous and powerful nation that we are. Under it, religion itself has increased, both in the purity of its contents and the scope of its influence. There is more vital religion in America to-day than in any other country under the sun; and this is chiefly owing to the benign influence of that secular State, which it is so much the fashion among a certain class of believers to denounce as "godless" and profane.

The enlightened faith and political sagacity of the fathers of the Republic, and our fortunate exemption from those traditions and thraldoms of the past which still retard our Old World neighbors, have made possible this improved relation between Church and State on American soil. To maintain this system, and hand it down unimpaired to posterity, should be our chief concern as citizens and as religious men and women. And since there still exist among us certain antiquated laws and customs which directly conflict with this American system, relics of the former union of the Church with the State, it should be a sacred duty to us to free our new society from them as speedily as possible, so that our practices may more closely conform to our principles, and the secularization of the State be fully carried out in all departments of our civic life.

I take it there is a general desire on the part of the community to do this. The only opposition to it comes from the Roman Catholic Hierarchy, whose motives have already been explained, and their coadjutors, the Protestant advocates of the divine and exceptional right of the Christian Church, as they understand it.

Protestant Opponents of the American Idea.

It is a strange and saddening spectacle to behold free and Protestant believers, who owe what religious rights they have mainly to this American principle, "a free Church in a free State," antagonizing and endangering that idea by their mistaken zeal for the churchly interest.

Such are they who demand that the State forsake its broad, tolerant, and purely secular position toward all religions and churches, and specially recognize and favor the Christian religion. By this, they mean, of course, Protestant Christianity and the Evangelical form of Protestant Christianity.

Such are the advocates of a religious or Christian amendment in the National Constitution, the defenders of the Bible in the public schools, the upholders of strict Sabbatarian laws, of a continued exemption of church property from taxation, and of other ecclesiastical features in our body politic.

But, instead of defending these existing anomalies in our civil society and making additional demands upon the government for recognition, the true American will support all measures looking to a more complete separation of these two great social institutions. Every consideration of wisdom and justice teaches us that the secularized State is the only form of civil polity adapted to the interests of our complex nationality.

The Christian Amendment.

One of the most prominent of these demands is that the nation insert the name of God, if not a formal recognition of Christianity, into our National Constitution. But surely this would not make the nation any more Christian, if public and private sentiment be not in accordance with it. The Southern Confederacy placed such a clause into their articles of federation; but, while their republic was based on human slavery, what was it but a solemn mockery? I take it, the true way for this people to show its Christianity is not to write its dogmas in their Constitution, but to exhibit its virtues in their public and private lives. Remember, too, that such an acknowledgment of God or Christ or Bible would amount to nothing in itself, would be a mere dead letter, unless made vital by a definition of it. That would be the next and necessary step. There is not a word, a sentence, a doctrine in our National Constitution, that is not subject to some interpretation and made an authority in our civil and political life. But, the moment you thus define the new amendment, you recognize some explicit form of religion in the land, and commit a flagrant injustice upon your fellow-citizens who do not share that form of belief. For who is to decide upon that interpretation? The majority, of course. Now, this majority is to-day an Orthodox Protestant one, and will be for a long time to come. But to give such a definition of the amendment would be to violate the consciences of the Catholic, the Jew, the Unitarian, and a vast number of religious Liberals and Freethinkers. They would not be slow to resist such an invasion of their personal rights; and thus this seemingly harmless Christian amendment in reality has in it the seeds of social strife, religious war, and a possible disruption of the Republic.

What blindness, what madness, then, possessed the Protestant advocates of such an amendment? Honest they no doubt are, but grievously unwise. If the proposed amendment should pass Congress by the requisite two-thirds majority, and receive a three-fourths vote in three-fourths of all the States, as is required, —a contingency most unlikely to occur in the present temper of the American people,—it would prove the most dangerous weapon against the Protestant religion that could be put into the hands of its opponents. The only real, practical benefits would accrue to the Roman Catholic, as the strongest ecclesiastical body. That Church would soon make an application of it which would cause these over-zealous Protestants to look with affright at the consequences of their folly.

The Bible in the Schools.

Another demand put forth by the Protestant opponents of the American doctrine of State and Church is for the retention of the Bible in the public schools. I need not dwell at any length on this special topic. Everything that could be said pro and contra upon it has been uttered over and over again. If, however, my premises are right, it follows as a matter of course that the Bible as a religious book is out of place in a civil institution like the public school. No frantic appeals from earnest but mistaken believers should ever decide a question so purely within the scope of intelligent consideration. A sufficient reason for its exclusion is to be found in the fact that the public reading of the Bible is a liturgical act, as much so in the public schools as in the public services of religion: it is read because, as the apostle says, it is "given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

Now, we have no right to introduce liturgical acts into a professedly secular institution, especially one supported by a tax levied indiscriminately on all. To read the Bible in the public schools is to inculcate religion there, and a particular form of religion as well. For there are at least two versions of the Bible, each of which is claimed by a distinctive Church as the only true and authorized one. From which will you read? From the Douay version? Then you recognize and inculcate Roman Catholic doctrine. From the King James' version? Then you have practically legalized the Protestant form of faith in the public schools. Or will you appeal to the majority to decide which version it shall be? Then you do what is still worse: you recognize the doctrine in American society that, in religious affairs, the minority has no rights which the majority is bound to respect,—a doctrine that has worked incalculable mischief in the religious history of the race, which has been the fruitful mother of uncharity, intolerance, and persecution, and which is directly at variance with the fundamental principles of Protestantism. Nay, more: you violate the consciences of a vast number of our citizens, compel them to acquiesce in and support schools which to a greater or less degree teach your special religious opinions, and subject the children of Catholic, Jewish, and Freethinking parents to influences which they are taught to believe harmful to their souls' welfare.

You may do this, if you have the power; but you cannot do it justly. You may vote down the Catholic, the Jew, the Rationalist; but you cannot reason them down. In retaining the Bible, you are only encouraging the Roman Catholic demand for a division of the public school funds, and justifying parochial and private schools for the education of Catholic youth. Both policy and justice demand, then, the prompt and total withdrawal of the Bible from all the public schools of America. If Protestant interests suffer thereby, so much the more shame to the Protestant Church. But let us not do evil that good may come. The only public school system possible or just in a community like ours, in which there is so much diversity of religious opinion, and in which all are taxed indiscriminately for its support, is one based on secular education, and from which all religious features are excluded.

Non-Taxation of Churches.

Another notable demand by the upholders of the divine right of the Church is for a continued exemption of all church property from taxation. This is not only wrong to the other interests of the community, which have to make up the deficiency, but also directly encourages both the sectarian rivalry and the luxury and ostentation of the churches, which are such serious obstacles to the progress of a true Christianity. Not far from where we are gathered this morning is a splendid and luxurious temple, the property of a few rich men, which they use but a few hours each week. The rest of the time it is given over to silence and emptiness,—handsome to look at, but otherwise as useless a piece of property as you will find in the whole city. Its cost was, perhaps, a quarter of a million of dollars; and if justly taxed, as it ought to be, it would place in our city treasury some five or six thousand dollars, or enough to furnish the suffering poor with fuel this hard winter. Now, why should we thus exempt these excellent gentlemen from paying for their private luxury in worshipping God, when the poor mechanic or laborer, who happens to own the roof over his head, however humble it may be, must come forward promptly and pay his tax upon it,—a tax larger because of this very exemption of church property?

But we need not look abroad for such illustrations

Our own structure, simple and unpretentious as it is, is also on the free list; and, when I remember this, I feel a sensible lowering of self-respect and respect for my congregation. Depend upon it, we shall never worship God in the true fashion until we bear our just share of the public burden, and so earn the protection we now enjoy without paying for it.

Of course, if the churches were taxed, a number of societies in our city would be compelled to break up. But that might be a public blessing rather than a calamity. There is a score of weak churches in Cincinnati to-day that ought to die. It would be a positive relief to their members if they were dead, and a real gain to the Christian cause. Perhaps, too, it would discourage the rash formation of new churches on mere personal or sectarian grounds, and prevent the spectacle, so often seen in our towns, of a dozen struggling and rival churches, with small, discouraged congregations and starving ministers, where two or three would suffice for all the needs of the community.

Consider, too, how rapidly the church property is increasing in this country. In Cincinnati, it amounts to something like eight or ten millions, which, if justly taxed, would maintain all the city charities, and half-pay for the public schools beside. In New York city, the single corporation of Trinity Church owns property valued at $25,000,000. According to the census of 1850, the amount of property held by the different religious denominations in the United States was $87,000,000. In 1860, only ten years after, it had doubled, and was returned at $171,000,000. In 1870, it had again doubled, amounting to $354,000,000. If this rate of increase be kept up till the end of the present century only, it would reach the enormous sum of $2,835,000,000. Will not our government soon have to take steps to restrict and regulate this dangerous monopoly,—a monopoly more threatening to our future peace as a nation than any other which afflicts us? Now, the best restriction upon it is to equitably tax all church property; and, in view of its enormous wealth, the demand of the Church for a continued exemption seems singularly immodest and unfair. The argument against the churches may be summed up in a few leading questions, which I quote from a Baptist paper:—

"Has civil society a right to give the public money outright to a religious or ecclesiastical body, to a missionary or tract society, or to a church? According to our American doctrine of Church and State, it has not.

"Then, secondly, Is there any difference between releasing one from a debt of $10, which he is bound to pay, and giving him $10? Is there any difference whatever between paying out money from the public treasury and remitting taxes that are coming into the public treasury?"

It is often said, in reply to this, that churches ought not to be taxed, because they yield no income. But the question of income does not enter into the reasons of taxation at all. A great many things yield no income, and yet are taxed,—wild lands, for instance, and other unproductive real property. A great many of our merchants to-day would like to be exempt from taxation on their unsold or depreciated stocks, from which they receive no returns.

But most commonly it is argued in behalf of the churches that there are many substantial benefits arising to the State from their existence, and this ought to be considered a fair exchange for their unpaid taxes. But the argument proves too much. Nearly all kinds of private property render important public service to the State. All private schools, for example; all art galleries, opera-houses, and music halls; all life insurance companies, railways, and banks,—might claim a similar exemption on the ground of public services rendered the State. The only honest and sensible way is for churches to bear their fair share of public taxation, as well as other corporations.

In the Old World, the property exempted from taxes often amounted to one-third or even one-half of the entire amount returned. At last, the evil became so unbearable that the governments took the matter in hand, and remedied it. Shall we maintain in free America a system which the monarchies of Europe have found impracticable and dangerous to the State?

Other Demands.

To the other demands made by an unwise Protestantism, I can only refer by name. Such are the religious tests for holding office, and even for jurors and witnesses, still found on the statute-books of some of the States, or which discriminate for or against the Church; the legal recognition of Sunday, not from motives of natural morality and civil expediency, but because of its supposed supernatural institution; the enforcement of oaths in the public courts, which to many are a violation of conscience, and to most a solemn farce; and the issue of Thanksgiving and similar proclamations by the President or Governors of States. For while such occasions of public praise and gratitude are fitting in the life of a people,—I wish we had more of them,—they should be left to the discretion and piety of the churches. As these find it possible to agree on an annual week of prayer, they might be equally harmonious in appointing a day of universal thanksgiving.

But all these minor reforms will receive their righteous disposal, when the mind and conscience of the nation are fully controlled by the sentiment of the secularized State. These changes must all be made gradually and peacefully. We have no autocrat among us. Public sentiment must first be educated to the proper degree, and then it will express itself at the polls. Education, reason, justice, humanity,—to these we appeal, and we are confident that ours shall at last be the victory.

THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

President McCosh on Development.

The fifth in the series of Monday Lectures was given January 4, by President James McCosh of Princeton College. If comparisons are in order, it is safe to say that this is the best lecture that has yet been given. The lecturer recognizes the fact that heresy is a power in the world, and feels the necessity of meeting it with something more than ridicule and sophistry.

The "Prelude" and the Lecture run together and make but one subject, the former merely stating in a general way what the lecturer understands to be some of the bad results in the belief of the doctrine of "Development," and the latter being an attempt "to put out of the way an obstacle which is hindering many from accepting the truth." The "obstacle" which Dr. McCosh would remove is the modern scientific doctrine of "Development," which is cherished by some and repelled by others, as supposed to be capable of carrying on nature without the need of God."

With much that the lecturer said about the actual mental and moral condition of many of those who stand outside the Orthodox Church, no thoughtful observer can differ. There is on every hand a great deal of talking and acting in the name of "mental freedom," "freethought," "religious liberty," "materialism," "evolution," etc., that is demoralizing in its influence, if not in its purpose. The livery of honesty is stolen to hide the designs of people, who serve no purpose above their own base lust and avarice. It is an undeniable fact that by just such creatures as these the whole cause of freethought in our country has been of late years most shamefully abused and injured. But Dr. McCosh should know, might know if he would take the trouble to observe, that the men and women who are making this character for freethought are not, never were, and never can be such as they who have framed and elaborated the Science of Development, or Evolution.

It would be as unjust to call Dr. McCosh a rascal because he, like the forger Winslow, is a Christian, as to condemn all evolutionists because some who misapply that name to themselves are dishonest. If a man's beliefs make his character, there is certainly as much evidence to be drawn from this source against Christianity as against any other sect or -ism in the world. And, if we are to judge of a philosophy by the character of its builders and advocates, we must certainly place Evolution fully as high as Christianity.

The fact is that the low tide of public morals is not confined to the sea of heresy alone, but is equally apparent in the ocean of Christian Orthodoxy; and it is to be accounted for, not by the existence and prevalence of the belief in the doctrine of Development, but by the decline and decay, if not fall, of the rigor of the orthodox doctrine of future punishment,—i.e., to a gradual desuetude of faith in the theological doctrine of the universe. Without attempting to state to what causes it is due, the fact is that public faith in doctrines that were all-powerful in the days of Calvin, Knox, and Edwards, is virtually dead. The "confession" of faith remains, but the "faith" has disappeared. Sects appear to cling to their old tenets, but only because they have not the moral courage to proclaim aloud their secret heresy. And they are restrained by the understanding that society objects to innovations, and will ostracise any opinion that is above the general level. Thus, the very Christian religion for which Dr. McCosh gives the efforts of his life becomes the fruitful source of hypocrisy and moral degradation.

In observing the prevalence and power of what they call "law" in nature, people have quietly lost faith in the doctrine that the universe is under the immediate direction and supervision of a God, who would punish eternally all who did not believe that something could be made out of nothing, or that three times one are one. The old doctrine of hell-fire has gone forever. And, if thousands of Christians yet believe in "future punishment," they solace themselves with the thought that they have only to die with the name of Jesus on their lips to secure an unquestionable admission to the court of heaven and its endless bliss. Dr. McCosh's system offers a premium to deceit, and morals weaken and men and women wallow in the mire, not because it is taught that natural law in its eternal activity in matter is a sufficient cause for things, not because there is a science and philosophy of evolution, but because the world of man has been taught that morality consisted of faith in theological doctrines, and because, having lost its faith in those doctrines, it has at the same time lost its morality.

And right here comes the grand purpose of the philosophy of evolution into action as the new savior of mankind. Faith in the old dogmas must go. Its decay cannot be arrested, not even with a "Monday Lectureship" in every city of the world. It disappears under the operation of this very law of development that Dr. McCosh is laboring to remove as an "obstacle." The process must of necessity be slow. The new faith and religion is obliged to work its way to preferment against the united efforts of parties whose power is not living truth, but dead dogmas. The science of evolution is not atheistic, or even agnostic, as Dr. McCosh declares. It is full to overflowing with devoutest reverence for the mysterious power that permeates the universe,

"As perfect in the hair as heart."

That sublime kinship which makes us each and all parts of the infinite whole whose law is eternal development from present toward better conditions, is a fact, the knowledge of which will, when it is once fully understood in all its beauty, grandeur, and power, take humanity out of the doubt, indifference, and moral stagnation into which it fell through the decay of the orthodox faith, and set it upon sublimer heights of vision than it has ever occupied before; will quicken in it finer mental and moral activities than it was ever possible for it to realize under a system of faith that virtually held the universe to be the sport of an intelligent mechanic, and the future of humanity to be dependent upon the caprice of a moral monster.

Dr. McCosh fully admits the fact of development in nature. He says also, "I hold that there is nothing irreligious in development." He differs from the evolutionist only in this,—that, while he holds it to be merely a means by which God acts, to the evolutionist it is the acting of God. The theologian places God outside of matter, and ascribes all its transformations to the agency of his will either by direct power of volition or indirectly through continuous law. The evolutionist places God throughout the material universe itself, and so makes every condition and transformation, as seen by us, only a glimpse of the universal and eternal activity of God. Evolutionists may not perhaps subscribe to this statement, but logically it is their true position. Eternal development without creation necessitates the potential existence of all that has been or will be manifested in that development; and therefore, theorize as we may, the mind settles back at length upon the conviction that God is "all in all."

He becomes the atheist who worships a God made with hands, or heads,—as, for instance, the mechanic of the Bible and so-called revelation. Science becomes the true expounder of the universal God, and man's relation thereto. When an able theologian admits the fact of development as a general method of nature, it is only a question of time and mental settlement, when the Bible will be made to harmonize thoroughly with the science of evolution. Then will men follow good for goodness' sake, and not to escape future torments. Then it will matter little whether men say, "We worship the infinite soul of things," or "We worship the infinite personal universe": everywhere shall fall the benediction of confidence and trust that all is well.

ELSIE, Radical.

For the Free Religious Index.

SOME OF THE REASONS WHY.

The cardinal causes for the loss of the Parker Memorial Hall to the purpose for which it was erected, and which has called out such earnest protest and regret in the columns of the Index, can be stated in a few words,—the want of money and of the helpful presence of men and women; not the one nor the other alone, but both. It may be that a society can for some time keep up quite a respectable external appearance, if only the treasury is kept healthy; but no earnest man or woman can look upon such an institution as, in the highest sense, a prosperous one. That the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, worshipping in the Parker Memorial Hall, has always labored under the embarrassment of which such wants are the cause must, in the opinion of the writer, have been known to every Free Religious man and woman in Boston and vicinity. Hence, the criticism in the Index, concerning haste on the part of the owners in regard to the sale of the building, we think reflects unjustly upon the few who have borne the burden, which the keeping of it thus far has imposed.

Many appeals have been made (to some of which the columns of the Index will bear witness) to all friends of Theodore Parker and the Free Religious movement to give the influence of their presence, if in no other way, to this enterprise, felt to be so important by the few, who were struggling for its existence. The question of finance, from the beginning, has been the skeleton which has claimed a prominent seat in all its councils, pointing its bony finger to the doubtful future of the society; and, if the obsequious contribution-box has not been made a more prominent feature in the service, it is not because help was not needed; and this should go to the credit of the few who have borne the responsibilities incurred in the constant service held from week to week. This society has made the effort to maintain, not only a free platform, but one from which could be heard the best discourses the world affords; and it has endeavored to do it without resorting to some of the appointments which fashion demands in churches to-day. That they have furnished the best thought in their service, we think cannot be questioned: that they have failed in the support needed furnishes to the mind of the writer a palpable reflection upon the motives for church-going to-day, even among those who profess to be Liberals,—a fact which all Free Religious movers should note, when taking council for the "next step" in radical movements, and should thank this society for what they have done to develop it. The causes which depress all other religious organizations have, to great extent, been felt by this. The masses refuse the most cordial invitations to listen to preaching without money and without price; they utterly refuse to take the same vehicles in which their fathers jolted, although a smoother road and a happier termination is assured them. And only those churches to-day are comfortably filled which provide other attractions than that of preaching,—attractions, if approved of, this society has not had the means to provide. In submitting to what is deemed the inevitable, we are sure the deepest regret experienced will be by those who have been counted helpers of this enterprise to this time; and, if that name is to be erased from the building which is no longer to commemorate Theodore Parker, it certainly will remain (to those who have had an internal view of its history) a memorial of the heroic effort of a few men and women to keep alive Parker's ideas and work. For twenty-two years, they have struggled, vainly hoping that reinforcements would arrive in season to put surrender out of the question. These reinforcements, it is felt, should have been vouchsafed, and would have been given, had the outside Free Religious element felt the responsibility equally with the few, who were endeavoring to do the work which they felt was bequeathed to them by their fallen leader.

But, while this little company, this forlorn hope, with tearful eyes, leave this (to them) sacred building, which they have watched through all its stages of completion, and around which cluster so many helpful associations, and which to some has indeed been a place of spiritual refuge, they do not leave with the feeling that their effort, even thus far, has been a failure. On the contrary, they believe that their helping to keep the fire burning (however feebly) upon the altar of freethought, during two decades of the most trying years of our country's experience, is indeed to have added something for the good of this generation, —a generation marked by its struggles to emancipate itself from the limitations and traditions of the past. And, if now the finger on the almost twentieth century dial points to other methods of work than those employed thus far, these few men and women hope that their effort will, at least, be one of the milestones to indicate the world's progress hitherto. SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

I think that the article of Francis E. Abbot in the Index of this date, entitled "Atheism in Colleges," is an invaluable contribution to freethought, and especially to clear thought. But its principal value is that it is timely, was never so much needed as now and here. The greatest service which the Index can render to the principles which it was established to foster would be the publication of that article in ten successive issues. For then the eleventh number would rise upon a sky unclouded by Scotch metaphysics. The disappearance of this Scotch mist would reveal the important fact that there is a difference between philosophy and science; and, just so soon as this fact shall be recognized, all words which deplore any "antagonism" between them, and long for "reconciliation," will scud away to deepen the gloom which hangs over Scotia. I hope Mr. Abbot will continue to point out that Scotch metaphysics bears about the same relation to philosophy that their Calvinism does to religion; that philosophy is the sweets gathered from the thousand flowers of science, and that there is no necessity for any "reconciliation" of the honey with the rose.

In his next letter to the Index, I hope he will emphasize the fact that "a universal scientific method" is for science only, and that "the coördination of all its results in a universalized philosophical synthesis" is for philosophy only,—that philosophy cannot be scientific, nor science philosophical; and that he will explain what he means by that "atheism" whose advent he would deplore,—what are its dangerous elements, and why they are dangerous.

I find myself wholly unable to resist the postscript to Mr. Abbot's letter, and therefore enclose a modest contribution. W. H. BOUGHTON.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

PROFESSOR E. S. MORSE is lecturing in the West, where he will remain until the middle of February.

MISS FRANCES POWER COBBE delivered to large audiences of ladies in London, last winter, four lectures on the "Duties of Woman," which have been revised and rewritten, and are soon to be issued in book form.

THE unquestioned admission of Mrs. Foster, a woman lawyer of Iowa, to the Indianapolis bar, is commented on by the papers of that city as showing the growing disposition to recognize the claims of women.

DR. JOHN DIXWELL has resigned the office of General Agent of the Massachusetts Society for Lost, Stolen, and Abused Children. The organization is to be merged in that known as the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

A CARD from Mr. B. F. Underwood, now in the West, informs us that his time is as crowded as usual at this season with lecture engagements. He speaks at Iowa City, Iowa, on the 21st, 22d, and 23d inst.; at Ames, Iowa, the 25th; and at Scranton, Iowa, the 26th. He will speak at different points of that State during the remainder of the month, and begin a course of lectures at Quincy, Ill., February 4.

REV. S. J. STEWART, who was called to the Unitarian Society of Bangor about one year since, has recently been engaged as their pastor by a unanimous vote of the parish, and we learn from the Commercial of that city that he is this week to have a convention, to be addressed by well-known advocates of the liberal faith, among whom we see the name of M. J. Savage of this city. Mr. Stewart, like Mr. Savage, is an accession to the Unitarians from the Orthodox pulpit.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S lecture, What must we do to be Saved? has been put into neat pamphlet form by the publisher of his works, C. P. Farrell, of Washington, D.C., and is for sale at the Index Office. It is his latest, and by many regarded the best of his lectures. There is not a dull or prosy line in it from beginning to end. It exhibits in a marked degree all his well-known characteristics, unusual animation of thought and exuberance of spirit, passages of striking eloquence, lively wit and humor, a fresh and telling way of putting things, and, even with certain qualifications, an irresistible force of argument.

MR. ARNOLD F. ZUELLING of this city delivered, in German, a lecture on "Bismarck" before the German members of the Young Men's Christian Association, on Wednesday evening, the 12th instant. He described the "Prince" as "bold, persistent, often unscrupulous, and so frank that his aims have ever been apparent, whether laboring for German unity or carrying forward his own ambitions for the chancellorship. That 'royalty is of the grace of God' is most thoroughly believed and acted upon by Bismarck. This naturally explains his opposition to the exercise of the papal pretensions on Prussian soil, and even the present Jewish agitation is in perfect harmony with this idea. Bismarck says, 'The Jews are unfit to carry out God's holy will on earth, hence they ought to be excluded from office of the State.' Bismarck is a born aristocrat, and has a contempt for the opinions and desires of the people." It would be well, it seems to us, if his humanity were equal to his piety.

MR. JOHN FISKE'S lectures on "The Historical Development of American Political Ideas," the first of which was given at the new building of the Long Island Historical Society, in Brooklyn, last night, and which will be continued on the 6th and 10th of January, are the same which were given last spring to brilliant audiences at the Royal Institution in London, and which Mr. Fiske is to give again later in the season at various places in England and on the Continent. They discuss "The Town Meeting," "The Federal Union," and "The Manifest Destiny of the English Race." Professor Huxley said to a friend last spring, after hearing the lecture on "The Federal Union," that it was the best thing he had ever heard at the Royal Institution; and the few who have listened to these lectures in this country, where they are new, describe them as the freshest and best statement of the way in which American ideas have been originated and developed that has yet been made, Mr. Fiske has been widely known as a disciple of Herbert Spencer; and, though one of the ablest graduates of Harvard during the last twenty years, has been practically excluded from his own university on account of his supposed religious position. He has been more recently recognized as the representative American agnostic, but it would be wrong to infer from this that he is not a religious man or that in any sense he takes issue with Christianity. Rather, he might be called one of our foremost religious thinkers, his chief difference from others arising from the fact that he has already met and attempted to solve the problems which present themselves to all intelligent people. He has grown rapidly in general appreciation during the last five years, and has shown singular ability in grasping and elucidating the fundamental ideas in American political history. His lectures are remarkable for their clearness of thought and for the fresh handling of what most people regard as interesting but heavy subjects. Mr. Fiske is now a regular contributor to the North American Review and the Atlantic Monthly, and has large literary undertakings on his hands, which will be pushed forward rapidly when his present lecturing tour is over. He is an easy speaker, has the fine conversational manner which was greatly admired in Dr. Tyndall, and knows better than most men how to put his learning in a nutshell.—New York Times, January 4.

THE PARKER MEMORIAL.

Because the world has grown apace
Since Theodore Parker died,
And his bold thoughts now flow with grace
From lips that once denied,

Shall I in sorrow hang my head
And mourn a faith's decay,
Grieve that the pulpit where he led
Has lost its special sway?

Where once alone he bravely trod,
A hundred, without ban,
Now preach the fatherhood of God,
The brotherhood of man.

Though with affection's tears that blind,
We miss that tender voice,
No vain regrets shall utterance find,
Nor less our souls rejoice.

Upon no building reared by hands
Rests his immortal fame,
For Freedom over all her lands
Perpetuates his name.

Humanity can never spare
His truth's pervasive spell,
But keeps the kernel in h·r care,
And leaves the outworn shell.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 20, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

ADDITIONAL WORDS ON THE SALE OF PARKER MEMORIAL HALL.

If an editor had unlimited space and time at his command in the treatment of themes on which he is called to speak, he might be able to make so dexterous a use of modifying phrases and qualifying provisos as to prevent his being misunderstood; and thus he might be spared the pain of bringing hurt to some sensitive souls on whom he never thought to cast any reproach. But, since he must needs do his work in very finite limits, it follows that his articles are very likely to suffer misinterpretation, especially on subjects which closely touch personal feelings. This, to some extent, has been our fate in what we have hitherto written on the sale of Parker Memorial Hall. We wish, therefore, to say now that three things were so firmly assumed in our own mind in what we have said on this matter that it did not occur to us as necessary to take time or room for expressing them.

First, we think that Theodore Parker's honorable fame is safe in the keeping of the world, and that it will not be perceptibly affected by anything done or not done concerning the Hall erected to his memory. It is not a question of adding to or detracting from Parker's renown or of perpetuating his renown, but a question of doing among ourselves, and for the cause of rational religion, something in harmony with that renown.

Second, it is not the present active members of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, and especially those who have struggled persistently and bravely for twenty years, and against great difficulties, to keep the society alive, and have stood by it to the end, and have only struck their flag at last in honorable tears,—it is not these who must bear the main responsibility for the low estate into which the society has fallen. Our lesson and our appeal were rather for the large class of Liberals in Boston, old and new, who had left this little band to uphold the standard alone.

Third, the fact of the early dissolution of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society—if, as seems most likely, it is to dissolve—and the fact that then all the independent religious societies that were organized by the Parker-Transcendental movement will have ceased to exist, do not prove that these societies had no mission to fulfil, or that they accomplished nothing, or that any other kind of societies could have come in their time to do their work. In truth, they and their preachers did a great work. They have educated half of the Unitarian churches and ministers up to their stand-point, and made it easy for freethinking preachers to speak their thought in many of the old pulpits, and print it in widely circulated religious journals. To note the remarkable fact that these societies have come to an end, and to comment upon this fact as bearing on the question of the kind of organization now demanded as the pioneer organization in religious progress, is not to impugn the judgment of any persons who formed and worked in those societies, nor to show ingratitude for the zeal, ability, and fidelity with which, often at great self-sacrifice, they did the work which was the pioneer religious work of their time. It was our hope, indeed, in what we said, to arouse something of the same noble zeal and self-sacrifice, to summon somewhat of the same ability, to the new tasks of this new time.

But, having now made these express statements of things for the most part silently assumed in what we have previously said on the subject, we must add that we cannot abate one jot nor tittle of our condemnation of the manner of the sale of the Parker Memorial Building. We say manner of the sale, because a sale under certain conditions might have been approved as expedient and wise. But the more we reflect on the way in which the Hall has been disposed of, the more amazed we are at the action. This was not an ordinary church-building, which, when no longer needed for its old uses, the proprietors are generally regarded as free to dispose of in any honorable way. This Hall was built as a special monument to the memory of Theodore Parker, and publicly dedicated to that object. As such, a large portion of the public were specially interested in it. If it be said that they did not show their interest by attending the meetings of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society there, the reply is that there were various reasons for that without concluding that the interest did not exist. Whatever the apparent apathy, this interest at least should have been appealed to. When the offer for purchase came, and the threatened dissolution of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society seemed to make the sale expedient, the proper course, and as it seems to us the only proper course for the proprietors, was to take that portion of the public specially interested in the building as a monument to Mr. Parker into their confidence,—to have called a meeting of his friends and admirers, laid the whole case before them, and taken counsel with them as to what must be done. And the first cause of our amazement is that they allowed the Yankee shrewdness of the would-be purchaser, in naming a short limit of time for accepting his offer, to tempt them to complete the bargain without any opportunity for such meeting or counsel.

It is very possible that the decision of such a meeting would have been that, under all the circumstances, it was wise to sell the building. But the discussions and counsels of such a meeting would doubtless have led to some united effort for transferring the memorial objects of the Hall in another direction, equally worthy of Parker and satisfactory to his friends. At least, such a meeting, with opportunity for foresight and deliberation, must surely have established certain conditions of the sale, as to a change in the name of the Hall and the removal of the memorial tablet, which have now been neglected. For, as we have now learned,—and this is the second cause of our amazement at the action of the proprietors,—the Hall has been sold without any conditions as to the uses to which it may be put and with no proviso for discontinuing its present name. The proprietors have sold the building, with the name and fame of Theodore Parker upon it, to a single private individual, to put to such uses as he pleases. They have sold the monument, dedicated and held by them in trust to Parker's memory, to become the private property of one man, and, as such, subject to all the possible uses, neglects, and degradations to which, in the course of financial exigencies, any piece of private estate in this country may fall.

But though this action seems to us little less than an enormity and a profanation, and honestly, without the shadow of any personal interest or prejudice, we can call it nothing else, yet we know that it does not appear in this light to those who have been the main actors in it; and we question not for a moment their motives. We recognize the discouragements under which they have labored, and appreciate the good work they have done in upholding a free platform so long and so faithfully. And, whatever any of us may be obliged to think of this transaction, it is now a deed accomplished, and is beyond recall. The question now in order is, What is the best thing next to be done to give free, rational, and humanitarian religion a worthy, organized representation in Boston? Shall not the exigency of affairs bring all together in earnest counsel for the solution of this question?

THE ANTI-JEWISH MANIA IN GERMANY.

It appears that the petitioners are praying for four things: "1. To cut off, if not entirely to prevent, the immigration of foreign Jews from Eastern Europe (especially Poland and Russia); 2. To exclude the Jews from, or at least limit their number in, offices pertaining to the judiciary; 3. Strictly to preserve the character of the Christian public school; 4. To order the taking again of statistics on the Jewish population." The address accompanying this petition, it is said, "depicts in the gloomiest colors the thraldom of the German Christians under the Jewish rule." The whole German people is represented as "suffering under the dominion of this overbearing intruder." And how many Germans are there in Germany? Forty-five millions. How many Jews? One-half million. That is, ninety people, on an average, are suffering by the "overbearance" and "thraldom" of one poor Jew. If the petitioners are sincere in their expressions of alarm, they must be a set of fanatical cowards. If they are not sincere, they are despicable hypocrites. In either case, they are guilty of the basest injustice.

It may be said that it is no more dishonorable for Germany to forbid the immigration of Jews from Poland and Russia than for America to inhibit the immigration of Chinese to California. But, without at all sympathizing with the anti-Chinese spirit in this country, we think the cases are not parallel. It is true that the Jews, like the Celestials, are aliens in race and in religion; and, in each case, we believe the immigrants are the poorest of their race. But the Chinese, for the most part, who land on our Pacific coast, do not come to make our country their home, are essentially adventurers, while the Jews who are immigrating to Germany come to be her adopted children,— to identify their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" with hers. That this is so, clearly appears from the second and third sections of the petition. They are not squatters upon the soil: they are citizens, in every respect. Not only are they adopted by the State as her own children, but more,—and there is the rub,— they are getting to be her "favorite sons." This is really the chief cause of the opposition to them. The Jews are not so much hated because of their alien blood and faith as they are envied because of their preëminence in every field in which they are rivals. From the position of an oppressed and despised people, notwithstanding all the opposition to them springing from racial and religious prejudices, they are rapidly rising, by the sheer force of intellectual energy, to the most commanding positions in trade, in banking, in education, and, more unpardonable than all, in politics. From a European correspondent of the Nation, we learn that, of the late Ministers of State, Friedenthal was a Jew; that Friedberg, the present Minister of Justice, is a Jew; Lucius, the present Minister of Agriculture, is a descendant of a Jew; and Bitter, the Secretary of the Treasury, belongs to a Jewish family. Now, this will never do! It was bad enough to be "Jewed" by the Israelite in trade, but to add to this outrage that of his "Jewing" our schools out of their finest scholars, and "Jewing" our State out of the most honorable and lucrative offices, while the followers of Christ are obliged to go hungry, is simply intolerable. They cannot believe that Christ ever intended that his disciples should be so persecuted for their — stupidity's sake. Hence, they seek, through petitions, to protect themselves against the "thraldom" of superior and successful talent. It is thus envy and jealousy of the Jews, by the mean and bigoted and narrow-minded among Christians, quite as much as race-hatred, that lies at the bottom of this movement.

That such anti-Jewish petitions should find support from numbers of the vulgar and ultra-conservatives might be expected; but that they should originate from Berlin, and be headed by an eminent professor in the university, and publicly championed by the Emperor's chaplain and the Protestant clergy generally, as well as the Catholics, is astounding every one who looked for liberty and justice in the land of Lessing and Humboldt and Goethe. It cannot but set every thoughtful American seriously to pondering whether the day may be far distant when a similar social epidemic shall arise in our own land. A very large number of the wealthiest and most respectable citizens of New York, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, and other large cities of our land, are Hebrews in blood and Jewish in faith. It is possible that ere long they may occupy the most conspicuous positions in our government. Who knows but then some of their fellow-citizens, actuated by race-hatred, religious fanaticism, and envy at their prosperity, may raise the banner of persecution here, as has been done in Germany? Of course, the day is past when Protestant clergymen, either in America or Europe, shall counsel with Martin Luther: (1) "That we should set fire to their synagogues and schools . . . for the glory of God and Christianity; (2) Burn all their houses, and lodge the people in stables like gypsies; (3) Burn all their prayer-books and Talmuds; (4) Forbid the rabbis, under pain of death, to give instruction; (5) Deny Jews the right of protection on the highways," etc. All this was two and a half centuries ago. We cannot believe that any clergymen, Protestant or Catholic, could now resort to such high-handed violence; but there are numbers of people in this country who would make our political rights dependent on a belief in "Christ and him crucified." There is now a movement in this country, which, if successful, would be a greater outrage on the liberty not only of every Jew, but upon every man whom the Church is pleased to call "infidel" or "atheist," than the wrong attempted upon the Jews in Germany.

Of course, every reader of the Index knows that I refer to the scheme of the party in this country that is advocating a "Christian" amendment to the United States Constitution. Their purpose is — to use their exact language — "to secure in the Constitution of the United States an acknowledgment of Almighty God as the Source of all power and authority in civil government; of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler of Nations, and his Revealed Will as Supreme Authority." We who do not believe that the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler of this nation any more than Lord Gautama Buddha or Master Confucius or Sage Socrates or any other person who has been dead eighteen hundred years, — who believe our rulers are living men elected by free men of this free country,— would be disfranchised or forced to profess a creed against which reason revolted. We may flatter ourselves that there is no danger that such an amendment shall be adopted. Perhaps so. But who would have predicted, six months ago, that such a strong anti-Jewish movement should have arisen in Germany? It would seem incredible, did we not know it to be a fact, that a movement in this country that would deprive of the rights of citizenship every man who would not bend the knee to the Christian Idol as the "Ruler of Nations" could receive the support of such men as President Seelye, of Amherst College, one of the Supreme Judges of Massachusetts, and a long list of Honorables and Reverends. What do these gentlemen mean, if not what they say, when they sign their names to a petition to disfranchise every non-Christian and freethinker? In view of what is now disgracing Germany, have we Americans not some cause of apprehension for our liberties? Whatever virtues Christianity has illustrated in the past, toleration has not been conspicuous in the list. We may not force the fight, but it may be well to sleep on our arms. "Vigilance is the price of liberty." W. H. S.

STATE SECULARIZATION.

It will be gratifying to all friends of State secularization to learn that an edition of seventy thousand copies of the Chicago Times of Decem ber 25, containing the address of the Provisional Secular Association, with a vigorous editorial indorsing it, was issued, and that the demand for the paper was such that the edition was exhausted and no copies could be had at the office after 12 o'clock that day.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean, the Cincinnati Commercial, and the Cleaveland Leader devoted two columns to the subject, approving the address and commending it to the favorable consideration of the public. A number of other leading dailies have given extracts from or called attention to the address, and indorsed it wholly or in part. These facts are given as some indication of the interest felt in the subject of State secularization. The strength of the sentiment is much greater than is generally believed, and it is steadily increasing. It is no longer confined to antichristians. It is scarcely affected by the difference or dissensions among members of the Liberal League regarding postal laws or other subjects. The reform is fast gaining favor with intelligent and fair-minded men, irrespective of religious beliefs; and its principles can hardly fail to be accepted soon as planks in the platforms of our political parties, and be ultimately incorporated into the constitutions of the States. They who desire an organization for State secularization on a basis that will limit the membership to anti-Christians, or, worse yet, to those who are in favor of repealing the postal laws against the transmission of obscene literature through the mails, have, it seems to me, but little appreciation of the strength and catholicity of this movement or understanding of the methods by which its success is to be achieved. B. F. U.

THE Atlantic Cable last Sunday brought the following welcome announcement from Berlin: "The Crown Prince, Frederick William, speaking at the Institution of Invalids to-day, decidedly condemned the anti-Jewish movement, and said he felt especially aggrieved because the movement was invading schools and universities. He could not conceive how intellectual men could support a movement which was to be condemned for its tendencies and its aims. He hoped the movement would soon die out, for it was impossible that such an unhealthy condition of affairs should continue." We have great respect for the old Emperor's wonderful physical vigor; but we cannot help cherishing the hope that nature will allow the liberal and sensible Crown Prince, who is already well on in years, a fair chance at sovereignty.

AT last, an office has been found for General Grant, which, it is said, he will accept. He has been elected President of the Commission for the World's Fair which New York is to have in 1883. Such an office is usually anything but a sinecure; and it is to be hoped that it has not been offered him nor that he has taken it with a view of making it a sinecure. He can do hard and honorable work in it, if he will,—work, too, not unworthy of his military genius. It is a position, if he genuinely undertakes its duties, well adapted to satisfy all the mental restlessness he has shown since he left the White House, and will securely anchor him for a considerable period.

THE dignity of English law, so long as England has an established church regulated by civil law, may demand the imprisonment of Messrs. Dale and Enraght, if they will not conform to the law against their ritualistic practices. But no man ought to be imprisoned for indulgence, more or less, in ecclesiastical millinery, however foolish the indulgence may seem. The remedy is ecclesiastical disestablishment and separation of Church and State.—Later news, received since this paragraph was put in type, says that the Court of Appeals has released both the cergymen on account of a defect in the writ on which they were imprisoned.

IN our long essay this week, Mr. Wendte, of Cincinnati, presents a clear and cogent argument for the genuine American theory of separation of Church and State. A report of the discourse has been printed in one of the Cincinnati papers, but we are enabled to give it to our readers entire from Mr. Wendte's own revised notes.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE idea of a science of society is yet so new that there is much confusion as to what that science teaches. Many of those who are interested in social science regard it merely as a systematic effort to develop charity. Probably, the greater share of those using the name mean only this, and would not appreciate the thought of a few, who believe there is a systematic development of mankind according to discoverable laws. There certainly can be no genuine science of society, unless there is such a development and such laws. All workers in this field, however, believe that society is to be improved by application of the laws of nature to human growth. Belief in providence and in the supernatural, as interfering agents in human affairs, must have pretty nearly died out before there can be any genuine interest in this subject; and the present growing interest in social science shows how well prepared we are to apply modern thought to the affairs of life. But we have said this much only to introduce a definition which comes from the Social Science Association of Illinois, and appears in an editorial in the Western Magazine: "Social science seeks to discover what great natural laws affect the growth and organization of society; to trace all social effects to their true causes; to gain a knowledge of the conditions that produce health or disease in the body politic, and by the application of this knowledge to strive to make better the condition of the whole human race. The social scientists believe that these great natural and moral forces are largely within the power of man to control."

Social science is, in reality, an effort practically to apply natural law and evolution in the advancement of mankind. It applies the new religious idea of growth and helpfulness to the development of a more perfect social order. This spirit is well characterized by this writer: "Everything that relates to the social welfare and happiness of man is the special subject of interest to the social scientist. Is a pestilence abroad in the city? While some appeal directly for aid to the supernatural power, the social scientist seeks to discover the broken law that breeds the pestilence, and causes desolation and death. He examines the sewers, and labors to have sewer-gas prevented; enters the dwellings of the poor and degraded, and commands that the free air and sunshine of heaven be admitted, and they come, bringing healing on their wings. Crime is rampant in certain districts, and the religionist prays that the spirit of God may be poured out and the people converted from sin. The social scientist goes into the districts; he tears down crowded and unhealthy tenements; he establishes schools; he makes accessible the comforts and conveniences of life; he employs the laborer, and pays him honestly and fairly. Crime diminishes; the people are elevated, and the social scientist ascribes the work to the Divine Spirit much more intelligently and devoutly than the man who merely prayed. This is the science of answering our own prayers: it is the revelation of good-will toward men that is shown by the discovery that the divine laws, like countless, all-potent agencies, surround us on every hand. Among them, we live and move and have our being; and, when we would accomplish certain results, we need only to understand and lay hold upon these mighty forces, and, lo! the power to remove mountains is in our own hands."

THE growing recognition of the importance of the laws of heredity to the welfare and happiness of mankind led a number of ladies and gentlemen to organize in Boston, on the 27th of November last, an "Institute of Heredity." Its objects are set forth in the following preamble to its constitution: "Believing that many of the moral and physical diseases which afflict humanity are congenital, and are transmitted from generation to generation, through ignorance and disregard of the natural laws of descent: therefore, for the purpose of acquiring and promulgating a knowledge of these laws, and urging such obedience to them as will bring posterity into mental and physical health and right moral action, and so eradicate much of the disease, vice, and crime with which civilized society is burdened, the undersigned hereby form ourselves into an association, to be known as the Institute of Heredity."

Among the officers, we see the names of Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Winslow, Mrs. Chandler, Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Gage, and other prominent persons, that ought to be a guarantee that the society proposes to do a good and pure work. There is much need that the laws of heredity should be more thoroughly investigated, and such as are well known brought to the knowledge of the people. It would seem to us that the work which an "Institute of Heredity" should at first undertake is one almost purely of investigation. The laws of heredity are not yet established. The works yet published on the subject do little more than present cases, and indicate a few of the most obvious lines of inheritance. The whole subject is largely in that period of empirical assumption, which can give little promise until it is left behind for the period of careful investigation and ascertainment of laws. We believe the subject is one of the greatest importance and of commanding interest, and for that very reason we would not have it taken up in any other spirit than that of true science and genuine philanthropy. A meeting of the Institute was held in Wesleyan Hall, Boston, January 6.

THE humanitarian tendencies of the present time are nowhere better shown than in the charity organization societies of our larger cities. Their object is to combine all the charitable societies of a city in a systematic and common effort to prevent beggary, relieve want, and assist the needy to help themselves. The best of results have attended all these movements. What is worthy of noting is that the best friends and the worst enemies of these societies are found among the clergy. The liberal and humanitarian men of all denominations have labored with zeal in their behalf, while the sectarian majority are either indifferent or opposed. At the recent annual meeting of the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity, the Rev. C. G. Ames, lately the editor of the Unitarian Christian Register, said that "the churches must choose, as the community must choose, between paying the expenses of keeping the poor in poverty by a lazy system of so-called relief, and paying the expenses of lifting them out of poverty by a careful ministry to their real needs,—between a method which speeds them toward permanent beggary, the almshouse, or the prison, and a method which slowly leads toward self-respect, self-support, and a full membership in the human family." He wisely objected to church charity as such; and he made this very sensible and wise suggestion, which we could hope would be much more widely regarded than we have any expectation it will be: "The teachers of religion should qualify themselves by observation and study for giving instruction in the principles of intelligent charity, the causes and prevention of pauperism, and the importance of more close and friendly relations between the prosperous and the depressed. These and similar subjects should be included in the curriculum of every theological seminary." He might also have suggested, what we will hint at here, that the Radicals of the country would be better employed in such work as this than in railing at the Orthodox about the unreasonableness of their doctrines. The humanitarian spirit is confined to no one body of men and women, and is very apt to ignore sectarian lines in proportion as it is genuine and hearty. Through it, far more can be done for the advancement of a true Liberalism than in any other manner whatever. The real philanthropist and humanitarian soon loses faith in his sect and in its theology, and he thus gains in depth of human interest and in power for human good. This is as true of the Radical as of the Orthodox, and all alike need to forget the spirit of controversy in the spirit of humanity. G. W. C.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

"Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the Law and the Prophets."—MATT. vii., 12. (Compare Luke vi., 31.)

1. The Origin of Society.

The original condition of men was doubtless but little removed from that of mere animal existence. In the struggle for life, each strove for personal mastery over his fellows. Conflict, destruction, and war were the rule: peace and mutual helpfulness were nowhere general.

The formation of the FAMILY was man's first step in his emergence out of brutehood. In the rude family life of primitive times, he first recognized himself as a social being, owing duties to others. From this imperfect beginning have grown every unselfish instinct and that wonderful CONSCIENCE, or moral sense, which underlies all the social relations that enter into our modern CIVILIZATION.

NOTE.—Talk about "INSTINCT." What is it? According to the philosophy of evolution, it is "the organized accumulation of inherited experiences."

2. The Development of the Social Impulse.

Under the early patriarchal constitution of society, the members of the same FAMILY, CLAN, or TRIBE, recognized certain duties of mutual helpfulness, while they regarded themselves as natural enemies of all other families or tribes, to whom, therefore, they owed no such duties. They strove to establish their own supremacy, and to secure their own comfort, at whatever expense of suffering or loss to those of different kinship or race. As societies enlarged, and clans and tribes united to form NATIONS, the conception of the duty of mutual helpfulness and moral obligation also broadened and strengthened.

NOTE.—Surviving race prejudices are thus traced back to the primitive barbaric conditions out of which they sprung. Is it not clear that these prejudices are inconsistent with an enlightened civilization? Should we not always strive to discourage and overcome them?

3. Social Obligations among the Jews.

The HEBREWS believed themselves to be the "chosen people" of YAHWEH; a race superior to all others, destined ultimately to obtain temporal supremacy, and to have their superiority recognized by the nations of the world. (Gen. xvii.; xxxv., 9–15; Deut. xi., 22–25, etc.) The legend of the conquest of CANAAN represents that they were commanded to "utterly destroy" the people who dwelt there before them, and to hold no communion with them. (Ex. xxiii., 27–33; Lev. xxvi., 7–12; Deut. vii., etc.) They were forbidden to intermarry with other nations. (Ezra ix., x.; Neh. xiii., 23–30, etc.) We are told that in the time of JESUS "the JEWS had no dealings with the SAMARITANS"; the latter having by intermarriage become a corrupt race. (John iv., 9; see also Luke x., 25–37.) The "GENTILES" or foreigners were universally despised; and the stricter JEWS of JUDEA, in contempt, termed the native district of JESUS."GALILEE of the Gentiles."

4. Jesus' Doctrine of the Brotherhood of Man.

JESUS taught that GOD was no respecter of persons, and that those who were least in this world would be first in the HEAVENLY KINGDOM. He taught that the best preparation for this coming reign of RIGHTEOUSNESS was the practical recognition NOW of the principle of brotherhood and equality among men. He set aside the Jewish tribal exclusiveness (Mark vii.; Luke x.; etc.), and declared the "GOLDEN RULE," which recognizes the right of every person to the same considerate regard and treatment which is claimed for one's self. He abrogated the old Jewish law of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and a life for a life," and counselled the forgiveness of enemies. (Matt. vi., 13; v., 23–26, 38–42; Luke vi., 38.) He even went further, and commanded LOVE for one's enemies, and the returning of good for evil. (Matt. v., 44–47; Luke vi., 27–35.) He exemplified his belief in human brotherhood and equality by associating chiefly with the poor and despised classes, the "publicans and sinners." (Mark ii., 15–22; Matt. ix., 10–17; Luke v., 29–39.) In short, he both preached and practised the principle of "GOOD-WILL TO ALL MEN," which is hardly yet practically recognized by any considerable community of people.

NOTE A.—The "GOLDEN RULE" was a precept probably known among the Jews of the time of JESUS, it having been previously announced by Rabbi HILLEL. It is also found among the teachings of CONFUCIUS, the Chinese sage (about 500 B.C.), and elsewhere, before this period. The principle of "overcoming evil with good" is a precept of the BUDDHIST scriptures, and of other ancient philosophers and religious teachers.

NOTE B.—The KINGDOM OF HEAVEN taught by JESUS was simply "a loving brotherhood of equal souls" (Savage). He established no church, no dogmatic creed or system of rites and ceremonies, as conditions of admission to this brotherhood, but declared only goodness, righteousness, and zealous service to be essential. (Mark xii., 28–34; Matt. v., 1–12, 20; Luke vi., 35, 44, 45.) There are some indications, however, that he outgrew the national exclusiveness peculiar to Judaism gradually, a mental process which would naturally be favored by his GALILEAN nativity and the rejection of his gospel by the JUDEAN Jews.

General Questions.

1. What was the primitive social condition of mankind? 2. How did society originate? 3. What is the foundation of conscience, or the moral sense? 4. Describe the social condition in patriarchal times? 5. How was the conception of the duty of mutual helpfulness broadened and strengthened? 6. Of what social conditions are existing race prejudices survivals? 7. What was the ancient Jewish conception of social obligations? 8. What was their attitude toward other nations? 9. Toward the SAMARITANS and Gentiles in JESUS' time? 10. What did JESUS teach concerning human brotherhood? 11. Can you repeat the "GOLDEN RULE"? 12. Was it original with JESUS? 13. How did JESUS regard the Jewish LAW? 14. How did he exemplify his doctrine of equality and brotherhood? 15. What was his conception of the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN?

To the Teacher.

Read in Savage's Talks about Jesus the lecture on "Jesus and the Church"; Renan's Life of Jesus, chapter xiv.; Clodd's Childhood of Religion and Childhood of the World. Read to the class some of the Buddhist precepts from the DHAMMAPADA. (See Müller's Science of Religion.)

Teachers of the younger classes may assign to each pupil some apt quotation from among the sayings of JESUS upon the subject treated in this paper, to be learned and recited at the Sunday's lesson, and serve as a basis for conversation.

BOOK NOTICES.

MAN'S MORAL NATURE. An Essay by Richard Maurice Bucke, M.D., Medical Superintendent of the Asylum for the Insane, London, Ontario. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Toronto, Ont.: Willing & Williamson. 1879.

This is, in many ways, a noteworthy book. The value of a book does not consist in the fact that you can accept it all, and swallow it off-hand, like a pill. The best man for one to associate with is he whose contact stimulates, rouses, and makes alive. So that book is good that makes one think, that starts into new flow the stagnant currents of the intellectual and emotional life. Both in method and style, this book is out of the common line. The chances are that few readers will accept it all; but nevertheless its perusal will do them more good than that of many which they would accept.

It is dedicated to Walt Whitman, as the man whom the author regards as having "the most exalted moral nature" of any one he has ever known. This, at the very outset, reveals the fact that the author's standard of morals is not "conventional." This he makes clear in other parts of his book, where he shows how some of the grandest characters in all history—like Jesus and Socrates—have been condemned by the narrow, conventional measurement of their time.

In the midst of so many infallibilities in religion and morals, the exceedingly modest attitude of the author strikes us, and placates us in advance. He says in his advertisement that "no conclusion in this book is considered by its author as absolute or even certain. The book is simply a record of the way things look to him." After that, we are ready to see how "things look to him" without any preceding combativeness stirred up in us by over-certainty on his part. He tells us how these problems forced themselves upon his attention from his earliest recollection—as is true of so many of us—until at last a thought sprung up, which, almost in spite of him, developed into this book. "It grew of its own accord," he says; "and now, if it cannot take care of itself, it can do as plenty of other thoughts have done,—it can die."

The table of contents will indicate the drift of the book. Chapter I. is named "Lines of Cleavage." Here he divides man off first from the external world, and then indicates which he considers as the natural lines of separation between the different parts and functions of his own nature.

Chapter II. is devoted to "The Moral Nature and its Limits." His fundamental divisions are into man's active nature, his intellectual nature, and his moral nature. Man's moral nature may and must manifest itself through his active nature; but yet it is distinct from it. For the same act may be good or bad according to circumstances. Morality is essentially feeling. Its chief functions are "love, hate, faith, fear." All good is in love and faith, all evil in hate and fear. Love and hate, faith and fear, are the great antitheses. Faith, it will be apparent, is with him not an intellectual belief, but a feeling of trust.

Chapter III., on "The Physical Basis of the Moral Nature," will be more likely to give the reader pause than any other part of the book. Here the physician shows himself. He attempts physically to locate the moral nature, and to prove that it is the chief function of "the Great Sympathetic" system of nerves. This is quite distinct from the "Cerebro-Spinal" system. He fortifies his theory not only from his medical stand-point, but from history and sociology as well. Whether one is convinced or not, his facts and reasonings are striking. We know of no reason in the nature of things why the moral nature should not be thus located as well as the intellectual. But whether or not he makes his point must be left to physiologists to decide.

In Chapter IV., he discusses the question as to whether the moral nature is "a fixed quantity," or whether it has grown. Here, he is substantially at one with all the modern writers who deal with the theme in the light of science.

Chapter V. is a history of the outlines and methods of moral development. The essence of this development he finds in the ever-increasing dominance and widening scope of love and faith or trust, and the ever-decreasing range and power of hate and fear. The great moral heroes of the world are thus the men with the greatest capacity for feeling. He finds this illustrated in reformers, in religious founders, in artists, and in social life. It is the man who feels most keenly who cares most for the welfare of men.

Chapter VI. is an "Inference" drawn from all the preceding discussion. In the first place, he infers from the history of man thus far that moral progress has not yet reached its limit, and that "it will continue in the future in substantially the same direction that it has pursued in the past." Then he goes on to show that man's active and intellectual natures have developed and advanced just in proportion as they have discovered and come into conformity with the real facts and laws of the universe. Modern civilization represents simply a better knowledge of the real nature of the world, and what it has always been ready to do for man. From this principle, it follows that man's moral progress also only represents a discovery of what was always in the nature of things. In other words, man becomes better just as fast as he learns to know and trust the universe, the laws of life, God. The decrease of hate and fear, and the increase of love and trust, have been justified. The inference is that a still farther advance in this direction will also be justified. "This then is the end, the conclusion of the whole matter: love all things, not because it is your duty to do so, but because all things are worthy of your love. Hate nothing. Fear nothing. Have absolute faith. Whoso will do this is wise: he is more than wise. he is happy."

SELF-CULTURE: PHYSICAL, INTELLECTUAL, MORAL, AND SPIRITUAL. A course of lectures by James Freeman Clarke. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1880.

This volume contains an introductory chapter on the training of children, and twenty-one lectures. It treats of the duty to grow, use of time, self-knowledge, use of money, methods of reading, and other educational subjects. It also has chapters on the education of the body, powers of observation, reflective powers, intuitional nature, imagination, conscience, affections, reverence, temper, courage, will, and hope. There is more sound sense and genuine wisdom in it than in any other volume known to us, devoted to this subject. Good as Blackie's book is, it does not equal this one in real value. Emile's books are not so original and comprehensive. Now and then, Mr. Clarke falls into the use of the cant phrases of religion, but he is usually so thoroughly sincere these occasional lapses may be excused. For the most part, he is thoroughly progressive. Indeed, he is far in advance of the times in his ideas about education. He condemns the common methods of education, says two dozen pages will contain all any one needs to learn of grammar, and warmly favors the natural methods of learning languages. The use of observation, the study of the sciences, the value of a manual training, he earnestly advocates. He is entirely awake to the value of physical training, the importance of sanitary education; and on these subjects he writes with both wisdom and discretion. He accepts the intuitional philosophy in the chapter on the culture of the intuitional nature; but he is no fanatic, sees the importance of the opposing methods, and strictly limits intuition by experience and reason. He has had unusually good opportunities of experience as to the value and the means of self-culture, has come in contact with some of the finest minds of our time, been himself a very diligent student, with a wide range of sympathies, and he has made an unusually valuable book. He fully comprehends his subject, and has shown a remarkably just sense of proportion in culture. He would have the whole man trained, and he gives to each faculty its due place and proportion. No better or sounder book of counsel could be put into the hands of a studious young person.

MODERN SOCIETY. By Julia Ward Howe.

A very tempting little book of eighty-eight pages is this of Mrs. Howe's, which has just been issued by Roberts Brothers. On opening it, we find that it can be cleft in twain like a pomegranate, forty-four pages being given to the consideration of "Modern Society" and the remaining forty-four to "Changes in American Society." The first lecture is cosmopolitan, and takes us to Cairo, London, and Paris. The second floats us down the stream of American history, and gives us panoramic glimpses of Theodore Parker, Margaret Fuller, and Hawthorne.

Taken altogether, the word excellence is the fitting one with which to characterize these lectures. Mrs. Howe writes better than any other American woman; and this book is a new testimony to the fact. Its sentences are a condensed philosophy, poetry, history, and criticism. Her good style shows no appearance of study. The content of her statements is more important than their form; and what we recall is that we have been reading good things, well said. There is a philosophic optimism in her way of looking at things, which communicates a like geniality to her readers. Unlike most women who have written on similar subjects, she gives us much fact and thought, and little sentiment. Sentiment is so cheap that it can be had at a nominal price in any market: we have to search for well-assorted facts and careful inferences.

We should say that the unstated characteristics of modern society, as given in the first lecture, were heterogeneousness and inter-diffusion. England, Russia, Italy, and the United States are jumbled together at an Egyptian table d'hôte. The picture is very clear, in spite of the many figures which are crowded on the small canvas. The problem of society, according to this woman-thinker, is "how to use its vast resources." "What shall Europe do with the ideas? What shall America do with the people?" she asks. But she does not worry us with Cassandra-like prophecies. If we have been good observers and reasoners, we incline to believe and accept what she says. Her great regret is the omnipotence of wealth and fashion. She sees danger of contamination to native manners and morals in the spread of the European travel-epidemic. Indeed, she sees, mentions, and hints so many true and interesting social aspects that to name them would be almost to reproduce her book.

Of the second lecture, "Changes in American Society," we should say that the title might almost have read "Improvement," etc., for it is a record of a half-century's progress. She forgets to name some important defects in our present condition. A good deal of her review is occupied with the history of reforms. Philanthropy is really a product of our political institutions, but Mrs. Howe does not give them credit for it. She has some apprehensions about our religious future, and names religion as a "permanent necessity of mankind." Some of us would put a different interpretation on some conspicuous facts, but her interpretation has the present advantage of a wider acceptance.

Whether the world is really making any moral advancement is one of her matters for discussion. She takes the optimistic affirmative. A closer scientific look might show her that advance and retrogression are both local; that some communities are undergoing purification, while others are deteriorating. In America, however, on the whole, the scale dips in favor of morality. We have all the juvenile diseases of a juvenile nation, but we are keeping a strict watch over our own sanitary condition. Mrs. Howe's book is the best delineation of national characteristics which we have seen, but it is not our ideal delineation of American character. This ideal lecture, however, has not yet been written.

IN the January number of the Popular Science Monthly, Herbert Spencer continues both his "Development of Political Institutions," under the division "Political Integrations," and the correction of "Criticisms." As we read, we realize that Mr. Spencer is not only a philosopher, but a philologist, and an innovator among linguists. As we are not learned enough to dispute his plea of the necessity of such innovation, we accept the fact under protest. Professor Tyndall gives another section of his paper on the "Sabbath," which does not seem quite so clear-cut as the first. "Physical Education," by Felix L. Oswald, M.D., is the first of a series which is announced to run through the year. The present number gives a treatment of Diet and promises admirably for the series. "Domestic Motors," by Charles M. Lungren, is continued and illustrated, under the division "Steam and Hot-air Engines." The latter are regarded as failures compared with steam-motors; but the best of them, the Ericsson and Roper, are fully described with accompanying cuts. "Æsthetic Evolution in Man," by Professor Grant Allen, is the most attractive paper in the number. It abounds in facts and suggestions, and turns attention to a neglected subject. Other articles are: "Indigestion a Cause of Nervous Depression," by T. L. Brunton, M.D.; "Examination of Thermometers at Yale Observatory," by Dr. L. Waldo; and "A Japanese Typhoon," by Professor Mendenhall.

THE TWELFTH ANNUAL CO-OPERATIVE CONGRESS, HELD AT NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, May 17, 18, and 19, 1880.—This is a verbatim report of the proceedings of the Congress, together with tables showing the state of coöperation in Great Britain in 1879, as compared with former years. Considering the great depression of trade in that country for the last few years, the progress is quite remarkable, and is very encouraging to the friends of the movement. It is quite evident from the report that the men who are leading the movement understand the subject perfectly, and are thoroughly in earnest.

IN the January-February number of Education, Miss E. P. Peabody describes Froebel's idea of personality. John D. Philbrick criticises Charles Francis Adams on our present educational methods. There are two papers on deaf mutes, and several other excellent contributions. A remarkably good steel portrait of Professor Wm. T. Harris also accompanies this number.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM IN AMERICA.

In a recent lecture upon Lessing's services in behalf of the cause of toleration, Mr. Edwin D. Mead spoke as follows upon the lack of academical freedom in America:—

"Academical freedom, in the large sense in which it is understood in Germany, can scarcely be said to exist in America at all. With a few noble exceptions, which will occur at once to everybody, our colleges are under the immediate control of some little 'doxy' or under the rule of some one man, who is almost as absolute in his little world as an Indian agent in his reservation.

"It is a simple truth that here in New England, to-day, the position of a teacher of philosophy, or even of Latin, depends, in many high places, upon a virtual subscription to the Westminster Confession or the Thirty-nine Articles. If there be dissent, it must be smothered. Our colleges are full of teachers whose places are secured only by silence or deadening diplomacy. In free America there are constant endeavors to muzzle science and to smother free inquiry, which remind us in their animus, if happily not in their methods, of the persecutions of Bruno and Galileo. The attempt to check the teaching of Darwinism, now recognized by almost every competent authority as a theory quite established and fundamental to science, is still a thing of every day occurrence. Men of the highest character and scholarship are expelled from theological chairs for questioning traditional notions about the date and authorship of certain books of the Old Testament, matters upon which it is quite impossible for men who are not special students to have any intelligent opinion whatever. If I am not misinformed, the learned scholar recently appointed to the Hebrew professorship at Harvard had an experience of precisely this sort, being ejected from his former position for disagreeing with certain trustees about some petty question in Isaiah or something belonging to the same category, and this, too, I believe, although his general orthodoxy was not questioned. It is both a glory and good fortune to Harvard that, in the appointment of this scholar,—a Baptist, I think,—she at once protests against a narrow bigotry, and, breaking her habit of giving her theological chairs to Unitarians only, arrays herself more firmly against sectarianism in education.

"Such things as these I tell of, all of you can parallel; and whoever would take the trouble to gather statistics would make a mournful and startling exhibit. I know a young man in Boston, who, not six months ago, was refused the professorship of philosophy in one of our new Western State universities, universities professedly and by law unsectarian, simply and confessedly on the ground that he held religious opinions which were unpopular. The president of the university, himself a gentleman of culture and of liberality, who personally regretted as much as anybody the condition of things which really exists, frankly admitted the man's superior fitness for the position, but would not venture to act in opposition to the strong sectarian spirit which is so critical and so noisy in university affairs, and apointed another man.

"I know an American who has studied for the last six years in Leipzig, and lives there to-day,—a man recognized by Abbott and Lightfoot and Westcott and Scrivener as their equal in anything that pertains to New Testament textual criticism, a man to whom the Germans intrusted the editing of Tischendorf's remains, and whom Professor Luthardt declares to be without his superior in Germany as a New Testament scholar, who has been invited to lecture in the University of Berlin itself, a man moreover whose general theological views are 'orthodox,' and yet whose life has been for years, in great part, a desperate struggle for existence, no American theological school being found—thick as American theological schools are, and full as they are of half scholars—willing to accept his services. On this man's desk lies a letter from one of the most eminent professors at Andover, a man large-hearted enough, be it said, to regret to say what he had to say, expressing the belief that it would be impossible for the man to obtain a position in any orthodox American seminary. The reason given was that many things had recently combined to bring about a tightening of the reins, and that the mere fact of the man's long residence in Germany and his familiar use of the methods universally current there would operate effectually against him.

"There was never an instance of a purer, a more disinterested, and self-sacrificing devotion to science than that afforded by this scholar's life during the last six years. America will blush by and by at her treatment of such men, as she begins to blush now—rereading the fine generalities of her boasted Declarations, and seeing that they do mean something—at her treatment of the Indians. She will learn, too, by and by, that freedom means much more than a right to vote, and why it is that so many of her best young men are getting in love with Germany and England. What wonder that so many of our students, of whom the great German universities are full, come home so sorrowfully and look back over the ocean so longingly? The great Frederick, in the midst of the absolutism of a hundred years ago, could say that everywhere, above all else, society must prize the man who seeks the truth and loves it. Democratic America can applaud her college presidents when they say that they want no men, and mean to have none, in their faculties, who do not believe or profess the doctrines of the popular theology, and, turning to her cotton and her wheat, can let her scholars starve in Germany or in London attics."

A MATTER OF INTEREST TO LADIES.

About two years ago, an article which appeared in the Index entitled a "New Enterprise," by Mrs. C. E. Streeter, attracted the attention of many of its progressive lady readers. Having been interested in the sanitary improvements made in clothing for women and children, I find, upon examination, the new corset waist, invented by Miss Bates, whose advertisement is in the Index referred to in the communication of Mrs. Streeter, a perfect substitute for corsets in general. Miss Bates is a live woman of thorough business qualifications, who, like all true inventors, is constantly improving the garments she makes. All her work is done in the most thorough and artistic manner. She has also the most comfortable and easy-fitting union flannel suits in the market. We cordially commend Miss Bates' improvements in ladies' clothing to those who have a personal interest in the matter.

FOREIGN.

A posthumous work by Sainte-Beuve has just been issued. It is a small roman, entitled Le Clou d'Or.

Madame Thiers, the widow of the late President of the French Republic, died on Saturday night, December 18, in her sister's arms. The deceased lady was born in 1808, and was the daughter of a rich banker in Provence. She was a woman of brilliant mind, greatly esteemed for her character, and most affectionately and helpfully devoted to her husband through all his career. Her funeral occurred in Paris the 22d ult., and was attended by a large number of persons. Among those present at the ceremonies were the ministers and principal members of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies.

Colleges for Women in Canada.—On a paper read before the Teachers' Association, Dr. Kemp stated that there are now ten ladies' colleges in the Dominion, beside those which ladies were allowed to attend, which were not devoted to the sex exclusively. In these different colleges, not less than one thousand ladies were receiving instruction, at an expenditure in the past of about $600,000. The pupils who attended the ladies' colleges were frequently desirous of becoming teachers, and these could not spare the time or meet the expense of a long course of study such as is demanded at the universities.

The Demonstration of Women recently held in the Colston Hall, Bristol, under the presidency of Mrs. Beddoe, was a worthy successor of the previous demonstrations in Manchester and London. The great hall was crowded from floor to ceiling with women of all degrees of social rank, including a very large number of working women; and an overflow meeting was held in the Arch room, in which Mrs. Lucas presided. The meeting was addressed by Mrs. Beddoe, Miss Emily Sturge, Miss Becker, Miss Hellena Richardson, Mrs. Oliver Scatcherd, Miss Downing, Miss Le Geyt, Miss Craigen, Miss Eliza Sturge, Mrs. Alfred Osler, Miss Jenner, and Miss Meyrick. A memorial to the prime minister was adopted, and a deputation appointed to present it.—Woman Suffrage Journal (Eng.).

Mr. Dale's self-imposed martyrdom is tempting his friends and admirers to use rather strong language. The Rev. H. Marriott, addressing a meeting at West Bromwich the other day, described as "idiotic, lunatical, and foolish" the decision against Mr. Dale, and declared that the lawyers and judges concerned in it were "a regular set of fools." "That abominable Public Worship Regulation Bill," he went on to say, "had come out of hell, and he could prove it. Those Low Church people wanted to teach the public that the clergy were not priests, that they had no power to give absolution after confession of sins, and that the Real Presence was not in the Sacrament; and this teaching that bill was intended to support. It was, therefore, plain that it was the Devil's work to destroy the Prayer-Book." Well done, Mr. Marriott! I know not which most to admire,—the overwhelming completeness of your syllogism or the Christian grace of your language.—London Weekly Despatch.

Mr. Bright and Glasgow University.—The following letter has been received by the President of the Glasgow University Liberal Club from Mr. Bright, accepting the office of Lord Rector: "Stratford-on-Avon, Nov. 22, 1880. Dear Sir,—I beg to thank you for your letter, informing me of my election to the office of Lord Rector of Glasgow University. I am much indebted to you and your friends for the high honor that has been paid me; but I cannot, I fear, reciprocate the enthusiasm of which you speak. If I am sensible of the kindness and good opinion of the students, and desire to rejoice in the success of your efforts, I am not less conscious that I have very little claim to the distinguished position in which I am placed. It is fortunate for me that the duties of the office to which you have called me, but to which I did not aspire, are light, and not immediately pressing. During its term, I shall hope to have an opportunity of presenting myself before your constituency, and of delivering the address which is expected from me. I can now only ask you, and those by whose support I have been elected, to accept my grateful thanks for the confidence they have placed in me.—I am, etc., John Bright."—Lloyd's Weekly.

A correspondent of the London Despatch, writing from Berlin, says: "It is natural the Jews should feel deeply the affront done them by a vulgar but highly influential minority. What they particularly resent is the behavior of Prince Bismarck and his ministerial subordinates. As it is probable that the present era, which in a way resembles the last few years of Frederick William IV., will go on for some time, it is only too easily understood why Jews should begin to think of imitating the example set them by their Christian countrymen in emigrating to America and other lands. Germany, in this matter, has entered upon a religious and moral revolution infinitely more serious than any of the political innovations recently achieved or begun. The confusion intervening between the disappearance of old notions and the advent of new ones is taken advantage of by wicked minds, who know no god but momentary success, to sow discord among the fermenting elements, and promote their own selfish interests in the present turbid and seething condition of society. The importance of the anti-Jewish agitation, as a symptom of the morbid and explosive state of the German mind, and of the altogether exceptional agencies at work, should attract the attention of the philosopher as well as of the statesman, historian, and diplomatist."

The London Weekly Despatch comments on the imprisonment of the Rev. Mr. Dale as follows: "So long as he belongs to the State Church, so long it is his bounden duty to conform his practices to the rules and ordinances of that Church, as interpreted by the constituted authorities. If he declines so to conform, and yet remains in the Church, he becomes, not a martyr for conscience' sake, but simply a commonplace breaker of the law, and is no more worthy of pity or admiration than any other criminal. The political horizon all around is lit up by the glare of burning questions. We want to know how security and peace are to be restored to the distracted fields of Ireland. We want to know how the spreading flame of war is to be extinguished in our South African Colonies. We want to know whether the war in Afghanistan is ever to be brought to a close. We want, above all things, to know if the Turk is to be coerced by Europe, or Europe to be coerced by the Turk. With such vast and dubious questions, demanding the most earnest consideration of all intelligent and public-spirited men, it is no use to demand our tears and indignation for the martyr of Holloway Prison. If he does not like martyrdom, let him extinguish his candles, and come out. The way is open to him. If, on the other hand, he does like martyrdom, why are we called upon to compassionate and admire him?"

JESTINGS.

The first animal mentioned in the Bible is a chahoss.

"Who was it that said that it is not good for man to be alone?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of his class. A bright boy answered, "Daniel, sir, when he was in the lion's den."

There are some things that are improved by long lying in bed,—for instance, the oyster. This suggests a new proverb: "Go to the bivalve, thou active man. Consider her ways, and grow fat."

If Adam had been created a boy instead of a full-grown man, he would have clubbed all the apples off from that tree before the serpent had a chance to get through the fence around the garden.

A Scotch boy interrogated his mother as follows: "Mither, wull we hae tea tae oor breakfast the morn?" "Aye, laddie, if we're spared." "An' if we're no spared, mither, will we only hae parritch, as usual?"

THE IMMORTAL LIFE.

By John Weiss.

12mo. 255 pp., with Heliotype Portrait of the Author.

PRICE $1.50.

What the Critics say of this Book:

Mr. Weiss is a suggestive rather than a convincing writer. He lays no foundations, and builds no structures in whose shelter men can find rest; but he takes one to points of elevation whence noble views are possible, and in quick glances opens up the mysteries of the soul and its life. The essays do not all treat directly of immortality, but they have what Arnold calls the unity of tendency. They are full of side-lights on the great problem. Mr. Weiss regarded personality as a prime and fundamental element in the structure of things, and he believed in a "personal continuance" with a steadfast faith.—Christian Union.

This posthumous volume on the life of man immortal proves how deep was Weiss' faith in the sublimity of man's nature. It is worthy the perusal of every one who doubts or believes the principle of eternal personal life hereafter. We bespeak for this strong work a wide welcome among thoughtful persons. The pages are full of gems that might go far to swell a book of notable quotations on life, belief, emotion, faith, work, hope, and progress.—Boston Transcript.

In this age of scepticism, when almost everybody doubts and insists upon proof, this work cannot fail to be a great help to those whose visions are clouded by fears that the grave ends all, and that there is no spiritual existence beyond the dark valley.—Boston Herald.

"The Immortal Life," by John Weiss, has for its theme "The Idea of the Hereafter," and is a brave and beautiful presentation of the topic by one who was an evolutionist. The author has a rare combination of the dainty and rugged in his style, one moment striking a pick-axe into some stony foundation, and the next planting flowers on the débris he has gathered. Without apparent connection, the chapters of this volume do combine to prove a strong support for the hope of "personal continuance" in the future.—Independent Methodist (Baltimore).

The essays of the late John Weiss on Materialism, Development, etc., continue to excite wide discussion. His harmonizing of the principles of evolution with creation will find many followers. Even some prominent teachers of the truths of revelation accept, or at least omit to deny, that the facts and theories of an original creation and subsequent development do not conflict.—Indianapolis Journal.

Those who were attracted by Mr Weiss' genius when alive will find here its best representatives. Here is his mature thought, the last, best offerings of his experience, observation, and reflection. He was an evolutionist and a maintainer of immortality. He can be read with an increasing respect for human nature and a sincerer tribute to Deity.—Boston Commonwealth.

Mr. Weiss' great argument for a future existence is the nature of human personality. The argument probably will not convince persons with a strong natural tendency to disbelieve immortality; but it clearly proves that science has not yet, as many persons apprehend and some claim, given a negative decision on the old question of immortal life. The old faith still stands; and people may hold it with Mr. Weiss, and yet accept all the attested facts of recent science.—Index (Boston).

The Faith of Reason.

A SERIES OF DISCOURSES ON THE LEADING TOPICS OF RELIGION.

By John W. Chadwick,

Author of "The Bible of To-Day," "A Book of Poems," etc.

"Free, original, brave, manly speech is here; never prosy, always earnest, often curiously apt, and sometimes swelling with its theme into fervid eloquence. . . . When we consider their quality, we marvel; for what sermons of the day can compare with these in richness, force, and beauty?"—Rev. Dr. F. H. Hedge, in the Unitarian Review.

"In this externally negative theology, there is an earnestness, a trustfulness in truth and honesty, a fearlessness as to the results of patient and reverent thinking, which has more of the freshness and fragrance of genuine faith than half the orthodox apologies and sermons of the day."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Everywhere pervaded by a spirit of profound reflection."—New York Tribune.

"There is extraordinary vigor and scope of thought in the treatment of these themes."—Boston Transcript.

"They are packed full of bold, strong, original thought. Perhaps their most striking feature is their utter fearlessness. . . . We venture to say that no book of equal volume issued from the press for years contains more vigorous and searching thought on more momentous themes."—Chicago Saturday Evening Herald.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

LET us be such as help the life of the future.—Zoroaster.

GOD hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being.—Paul.

ALL thinking beings have been made one for the other: they owe patience one toward another, for we have all one and the same nature. We are made for co peration, and to act against one another is contrary to nature. The good man remembers that every rational being is his kinsman.—Marcus Aurelius.

NEVER will I seek or receive private, individual salvation; never will I enter into final peace alone, but for ever and ever, and everywhere, I will live and strive for the universal redemption of every creature throughout all the worlds.—Buddhist Liturgy.

THE best way of worshipping God is in allaying the distress of the times, and improving the condition of mankind.—Abulfazi.

THERE is nothing on earth divine beside humanity. —Melanchthon.

TO FOUND the future in the highest sense, Humanity must be our ever-present end and aim: through the human is it that our heaviest ills are healed.—Goethe.

THE Universal Religion is necessarily destined to regulate human life, whether personal, domestic, or civil, by bringing them all into their true relations to Humanity.—Auguste Comte.

THE world as it is grows somewhat dim before my eyes, but the world that is to be looks brighter every day.—Harriet Martineau.

NO PILED-UP wealth, no social station, no throne, reaches as high as that spiritual plane upon which every human being stands by virtue of his humanity. —E. H. Chapin.

THE great change for which the secret religiousness of the age pines, and which it is sorely straightened until it can accomplish, is the deliberate adoption into "heavenly places" of this world, its faculties and affairs, just as God has made them, and man's unfaithfulness has not yet spoiled them.—James Martineau.

SECULARISM holds it to be the duty of every man to reserve a portion of his means and energies for the public service, and so to cultivate and cherish his powers, mental and physical, as to have them ever ready to perform service, as efficient as possible, to the well-being of humanity. No weakness, no passion, no wavering, should be found among those who are battling for human welfare, which such errors may fatally injure. Self-control, self-culture, self-sacrifice, are all essential to those who would serve that cause, and would not bring discredit upon their comrades in that service.—G. J. Holyoake.

THE great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.—F. E. Abbot.

IN countless, upward-striving waves,
The moon-drawn tide-wave strives;
In thousand far-transplanted grafts,
The parent fruit survives:
So in the new-born millions
The perfect Adam lives.

CURRENT TOPICS.

GAS and horse-cars in the streets of Jerusalem! This is among the most recent announcements of the progress of civilization.

THE Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the Roman Catholic Church, whose head-quarters are at Lyons in France, received last year for its work the sum of $1,200,000. Full three-quarters of this sum came from France.

THE churches of Auburn, Me., we learn are canvassing the city for the purpose of reaching strangers and those who do not attend public worship, and for the special object of promoting a religious interest. One worker is assigned to each district. This seems like putting the primitive command, "Go ye out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in," into practical execution.

THE latest defence of the "Sacred Sabbath" comes from the liquor-sellers in Washington. Because the clergymen of the city united in calling a temperance meeting on Sunday, for the special purpose of making a public protest against the liquor-saloons in the immediate vicinity of the government buildings, the saloon-keepers held a meeting and resolved, "That we denounce all such gatherings and assemblages for business or political purposes on the Sabbath day as unchristian, and as subversive of the time-honored custom among civilized people to observe the Lord's day with becoming meekness and charity." Of course, these rumsellers have such respect for the Christian Sabbath that they meekly close their shops and stop all business at midnight, or, perhaps, like the old Puritans, at sunset Saturday evening, and "observe the Lord's day" by going to church in a becoming manner with their families.

THE late Mr. N. C. Nash, of Boston, bequeathed $5,000 as a contribution to the erection of a statue of Theodore Parker. The executors of Mr. Nash's will have signified to the Boston Memorial Association that they will transfer the custody of this legacy to that Association on condition that it endeavor, by securing other contributions for the same purpose, "to erect the statue contemplated by Mr. Nash in some public place within the city of Boston." The Executive Committee of the Memorial Association have announced that they have accepted the trust, and they call upon "the public interested in the varied services and memory of Theodore Parker to aid in the object by such pecuniary contributions as may be deemed expedient." The cost of the proposed statue is estimated at $10,000 or $12,000. Henry H. Edes, Esq., Treasurer of the Memorial Association, at 87 Milk Street, Boston, will receive contributions.

THE New Religion, a bright liberal paper published at Norway, Me., in summarily referring to the work of the liberal churches the past year, thinks the Unitarians make the best showing. It says the Universalists have made little, if any, progress, which seems to go toward confirming what a recent writer affirmed in the Boston Herald in respect to the decline of the denomination. "They have lost," it states, "one of their ablest and most influential papers, The Star in the West, and quite a number of their ministers have sought the fellowship of other denominations. What little energy the Universalists have shown is in the struggle to maintain their educational institutions. No other denomination reports such general apathy and indifference and such feeble responses to its call for contributions. The Free Religious Association and the Liberal Leagues have made some little progress, but nothing equal to their opportunity."

WE have received two numbers of a publication called the Exodus, issued in this city in behalf of the interests of the colored refugees in Kansas. The Exodus is a campaign sheet in philanthropy. It presents in strong array the testimony of Governor St. John, Mrs. Comstock, and other equally well-informed persons, as to the urgent need of contributions for preventing bitter suffering among the colored people who are still flocking into Kansas from the South. The want is not so much among those who came a year or two years ago, and who have to large extent now become self-supporting, as among those who are just arriving. Articles of strong clothing as well as money are asked for: money to be sent to H. P. Kidder, Esq., 40 State Street, clothing to Garrison & Co., 137 Federal Street, this city. Exodus also gives some strong evidence of the "shot-gun rule," practised especially in Louisiana, which is driving out the negroes.

WE learn through a correspondent of the Boston Commonwealth, who appropriately signs himself "Shadows," that the purchase of the Parker Memorial Building by Mr. Rich, for the use of the Spiritualists, "was made by the advice and influence of Theodore Parker's spirit," and that all Parker's friends should be thankful that the building is going where it is, "for it will be in the hands of Theodore Parker more than it ever was before," and "the spirit of that great and good teacher will be consulted on matters pertaining to it." We are informed by the same authority, who assures us of his positive knowledge on this and the other points named, that "Theodore Parker has been the chairman for many years of the message department of the Banner of Light." As to the sale of the Hall, this announcement, of course, entirely settles the propriety of it—for some minds; but those of Mr. Parker's friends who specially appreciate his vigorous thought in his vigorous English, and have any knowledge of the page of spirit-messages printed weekly in the Banner of Light, can but deeply commiserate him on the unhappy fate of being put at the head of such a literary task. Let his Hall be sold, if it must, but do release Theodore Parker's soul from that purgatorial torment.

THE SPHINX;

— OR —

THE PROBLEM OF LIFE.

BY GEORGE CHAINEY.

The fable and image of the Sphinx are without doubt an image and fable of life.

The fable represents the Sphinx as sitting by the wayside propounding her riddle to those that passed; and, if they could not answer, she slew them. At length came Œdipus, who solved the enigma. Whereupon, the Sphinx drowned herself in the sea. The African image of the Sphinx is a lioness resting at full length, with a human head of great strength and beauty, with eyes of deep and wonderful meaning, as of a soul seeking to express itself through them, dumb with otherwise inarticulate yearnings. Like this Sphinx, is not life of womanly loveliness and tenderness, the face and bosom of a goddess, but ending in claws and the body of a lioness? In each of us lie these two possibilities. Shall the womanly tenderness or the leonine cruelty get the mastery in our souls? Shall the strength of the lioness nourish the life of affection and beauty, or shall these be outlawed by the cruelty of anger and hatred? Shall our path through life be that of a goddess dispensing life and blessing, or that of a fiend meting out death and destruction? Shall the love that flames in each womanly heart be but the type of the all-conquering passion, that shall wed our souls in holiest consecration and enthusiasm to humanity, or shall the cruelty and devouring wrath of every lioness robbed of her whelps, or lurking by the wayside in search of prey, symbolize the evil that shall mark our path?

The artist who brought together in one form these two types saw clearly into the secret of life, and, though unknown, deserves our highest reverence and gratitude. So also does Thomas Carlyle, who first interpreted this hidden meaning of the enigma. In crowning the Sphinx with the love and beauty of woman, we have preached for us the old, old gospel of love,—the gospel that is older than Jesus and the Golden Rule, older than Confucius and his one word Reciprocity; older even than he who thus in this expressive way sought to reveal it; spread forever as a curtain about our couch in the blue sky; gleaming to us from all the stars, the altar-lights before the Invisible; spread upon all the heights that invite man's soul to bathe in the hush of their solitude; blooming in each flower that nestles in jewelled glory in the valleys at their feet; thrilling in each yearning of the heart, beaming from every smile of gladness, resting on the palm of each friendly grasp: intoned in every word of real human sympathy, and giving blessing in all the deeds of human helpfulness. To what sublime heights of womanly tenderness and passion, flooding earth with divinest beauty and love, man can attain unto, are seen in such souls as those of Jesus, Buddha, and Florence Nightingale. To what depths of leonine, devouring cruelty, scattering fear and ruin on every hand, man can sink, are seen in Nero and Caligula and the like. Not so much that these are exceptional figures as typical, through the prominence of their lives, of all the rest of mankind. In each soul are these possible heights and depths. We are all ready to pronounce Nero an incarnate fiend. But there are those who walk our streets to-day, among our money kings, who are probably just as cruel. No words can paint the cruelty of a man who in this world of want, of anguish, of tears, of cold and hunger, of heart struggles with destiny, thinks only of his bonds and bank-stock. To such, in time, this selfishness shall reveal itself as the enraged lioness with hooks and claws. When those things upon which they now set such store fail them, there will come an overwhelming sense of what they lost in not following this other side of their nature. In like manner there are all about us thousands who, by persistent devotion to the good of others, have brought into dominion the womanly affection that brings comfort and rest to many a weary head.

This is the divine love which all the seeking ages have striven to find enthroned in the heavens, when we should look for it wherever love reigns, queen of passion and of strength. In bidding you think of the shining exemplars of this principle of love in the history of the race as more accidental in their prominent place than superior, I touch one of the greatest truths of life, that stands mirrored for us in all the face of nature. In the heavens above and around us, there are, it is true, planets and stars that shine brighter than others, and seem to be more nearly related to the destiny of our earth. But every star, however faint its light may be to us, is part of the glorious universe in which our own world rolls forth as a star in its mighty orbit. Among these stars that come and go from our sight as we gaze, because of the feebleness of the ray that comes within our vision, are suns that are the centres of mightier planetary systems than that of which our own earth is a part. Yea, hidden altogether from our sight, there are doubtless more suns and systems than all that come within our ken, that are yet, by that all-pervading law of gravitation, constantly influencing and being influenced by us. So these souls that shine with the superior splendor of love are stars whose orbits of activity are nearer to our vision. But still, as distant specks on the horizon are entirely unseen by us, so there are millions equally resplendent moving in their silent orbits, who are a part of that power that is leading us along the path of light and truth into the universal spirit and beauty of love. Would you fill your place in this celestial orbit? Then learn to think how you can minister to others, and help them to escape the lioness of pain and live the life of friendship and love; for all who are great here are those that serve. To them, life has been as earnest as it is to the true mother who sits by the bedside of her offspring raving in the delirium of fever. All human life is to them eloquently pleading for help, guidance, and love. Their hearts are wedded to humanity, and all life's joys are those that spring out of the happiness of others.

There is also in this Sphinx celestial beauty, which mean celestial order and pliancy to wisdom; and there are also a darkness, a ferocity and fatality, that are infernal. Shall our lives express this divine beauty and order, or shall they reveal the blind passion and fatality that control the beast? Shall divine reason and foresight reign in our lives, or mere sensual passion? Shall we, like a divine goddess, whose sceptre brings harmony out of chaos, light from darkness, rule beneficently our lower nature, or shall that lower nature trample all higher claims in the dust, and blindly rush with us over the precipice of ruin? Shall life be to us beautiful and harmonious, as the life of noblest woman, or shall it lead us like the lioness through dark and almost impenetrable jungles of confusion? Notice now that this goddess is half-imprisoned: the articulate, lovely, still encased in the inarticulate, chaotic. How true is it that life is to all of us, in some part of it, such an imprisonment, such a mingling of the expressible with what cannot be spoken! The more there is in any life that can be spoken to any one, the nearer are we delivered from our prison. But the more there is that must be dumb and silent, known to none but ourselves, the more are we still imprisoned in the animal. Free thought and free speech are the measurement of the world's civilization. Sincerity and frankness constitute the highest charm of personal character. Secretiveness and hypocrisy are akin, and belong to the brute side of human nature. We inherit them from the lioness lurking in secret ambush, waiting in silence for prey. The young man and young woman who have secrets that they cannot confide to their parents; the husband or wife who has confidences apart from the other; the merchant who confesses his unbelief to a freethinker, but smiles blandly upon the church member, and talks pious cant in order to secure his custom; the minister that thinks thoughts in his study that he dares not proclaim from his pulpit,—are ruled in these things by the inarticulate lioness. Let every one who is crouching in the darkness, stealing in any way from the light of day, remember the Sphinx and its riddle. Beauty, order, and intelligence do not thus shun the light. Beware, young woman, of any lover who dreads the light, who blushes for shame when other eyes witness his attentions. Beware, young man, of going to any place that needs to be hidden from your parents or from one still dearer. In each of us is this brute nature that needs to be subdued by intelligence, beauty, and love. Live then as though the eyes of all men were resting upon you. Fear not the condemnation of God, but of man. Fear not any distant theatrical spectacular judgment-day, but rather reverence the present time, each day, as a doomsday. Consecrate life to sincerity and the pursuit of all that is true, good, and beautiful, and existence, with all its daily struggles, shall yet be as a heavenly bride. Heed not this lesson, and life shall be a thing of teeth and claws, rending and devouring with fierce pain.

Another lesson of the Sphinx is found in the fact that the head represents the masculine strength and courage beneath the softer outlines of woman. It is clothed at once with majesty and beauty. The truly noble life is only reached when we combine in it the softness and tenderness of woman with the strength and majesty of man. Man and woman are one in a nobler sense than many dream. All that is best in either is possible to both. This is the secret of a true marriage,—that the woman strive to be strong and self-reliant, and the man to be gentle and affectionate; that each worship what is noble in the other, until the two streams of their lives mingle and flow onward together, a broad and majestic stream of blended strength and beauty.

Another lesson of the Sphinx is to be found in those dumbly speaking eyes of which I have already spoken. Behind them seems to sit the imprisoned goddess, pleading mutely but eloquently with each passer-by for deliverance. So does each man's soul plead with him for full liberty from animalism. Are not the eyes the real tell-tale windows of the soul? The man or woman who is ashamed of the company he or she keeps, avoids letting you look through those windows. No deception can put a blind on these. The haggard cheeks may be painted, the wasted body hidden by the tailor's and dressmaker's art; but, if life has been degraded to base uses, the fine spiritual lustre of truth and beauty has been taken from the eyes. Here blaze the fires of love and genius. In each true soul struggling in the world for victory, there is a great ideal of divine possibility that escapes all expression in words. The soul sees it, as it were, from afar. The gaze passes beyond the present into the boundless future. The clearer truth, the larger joys, the richer love, the greater courage, the brighter hope, and nobler communion with the wise and good are there, and they in some way reflect themselves back into the soul through the eyes.

Thus, the Sphinx sits by the wayside along which we pass, propounding to each of us its riddle; for, in all this that I have endeavored to express, the Sphinx is but the type of every man's life. Thus, we all must confront the problem of life with its antagonisms and varying possibilities, and out of its enigma of complications and contradictions produce for ourselves the solution, whether it be good or bad. If we solve the problem wrong, it will slay us; but, if we are wise to discern the true meaning, the enigma shall vanish, and the light of victory shall strew our path with the flowers of truth and love.

Tell me, What is the meaning of life? Do not I hear one answer, "There are so many different theories about it, I don't know which is right; so I will stay by what my parents did, and let the priest or minister be my guide"? Stay by that, if you please, but first be sure that it is right. You will never know what it is to live until you have convictions that you know are right, and to which you can give all your heart's enthusiasm. The thousands who have no opinions of their own, who live second-hand, credulously, on the creeds of their fathers, do not live. They are mere excrescences, fungi. They belong to some one else, as the branch belongs to the vine. They swell the sum of existence for Jesus or Luther or Wesley, but do not live themselves. They have answered the riddle wrong, and it has slain them. All our churches are peopled with such living corpses. Having a name to live and yet dead! A creed is a great slaughter-house.

Say, what thinkest thou, then, is the meaning of thy life? Do not I hear some one answer again: "I don't care about these things. I need food and clothing. The world owes me a living, and by hook or by crook I am going to have it"? But stay. That is the method of the beast in the jungle. Living thus, you will slay conscience, crush out the joy of love and bliss of humanity, and condemn yourselves to the darkness of falsehood. You have other wants beyond those of food and raiment. There is another side to existence, that demands that even hunger shall be subject to it. Beware! Life without order, truth, obedience to the everlasting laws of nature's right and justice, will be worse than death. Say, then, what is the answer? Do not I hear one answer again: "What is life for but to be happy? I will consecrate my life to joy and gladness. I will sing and dance and sport with the good things of the world, as the butterfly dances in the sunlight"? But stop again.

Digitized by Google

Happiness is desirable. It is in one sense the only good. But there is a right and a wrong way to seek it. You are not a butterfly, and cannot live its way and be happy. There is no happiness for man or woman that is not based on self-respect. Your life has its law, like that of the butterfly; and you shall never quaff its delicious nectar of joy until you have found out its laws, and obeyed them. True greatness of soul is more often a sublime sadness than a happiness. Tears and laughter flow forth together from the perfect life. Tragedy and comedy mingle in the heart of nature. He who finds out what life is, what its wondrous possibilities are, weeps that so many fail to learn its meaning. Joy is but the blossom of existence. You must care for the root and stem before its beauty and perfume come to reward your pains.

Say then, yet again, What is the answer to the riddle? Does not some one say, "To me, life means the saving of my soul from hell"? Wait, and let us look at that. Who told you that you had a soul to save? And, if you have, how do you know that is your business? Is it not a base fear that fills your eyes, instead of love of truth and right? Suppose there is such a heaven and hell as you claim. Then a soul that is deserving of going to hell, were it not for the pains of another soul, is too mean and small to be happy anywhere. It is the very dregs of selfishness that leads you to respond to such a degrading estimate of life. This idea that a man's business here is to save his soul is the teaching of the most fanatical and ignorant sectaries. Think of one's gaze being forever turned inward upon himself in dissection of the condition of his soul, saying, as he turns it over and over, like a baker a piece of dough, what are his feelings and motives in life,—am I right or am I wrong? shall I be saved or shall I be damned? Why, such a one is damned already. I know of no worse damnation than that which this kind of people are in. They suffer the perpetual torment of fear. They are condemned to the darkness of ignorance and stupidity. They are cursed with blindness to the fair beauty of the earth. They have never tasted the high joy of forgetting self in the universal good. Their view of life is so narrow and limited that they cannot see an inch beyond themselves, but sit silent and sad, gazing, like a Hindoo devotee, forever at their own navel. Some of this kind of people actually think themselves saints, when they are so befouled with their own selfishness that the very lust of the most degraded, who sin in good earnest and in self-forgetfulness, would wash them comparatively clean.

In all these and many other different ways, thousands answer this riddle wrong. Why? Because they are not in earnest. They have simply idly guessed at the answer, like children at play with riddles. In this fable of the Sphinx, there were many who answered wrong, but only one who answered right. Each one who lives must solve it for himself alone. There are no substitutions nor vicarious sacrifices in the innermost nature of things. There is no royal road to wisdom. Each one must climb its rugged steeps, heeding not the temptation to slumber in idle ease in the valley of ignorance or of pious humility. On the summit, many clad in immortal glory bid us be of good courage. Because they have won the height of fame, so also may we

> "Join the ch ir invisible
> Of those immortal dead who live again
> In minds made better by their presence: live
> In pulses stirred to generosity,
> In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
> For mi erable aims that end with self,
> In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
> And with their mild persistence u ge man's search
> To vaster issues."

How shall we do this? First, by being in earnest. Whoever confronts life with a bold and a stout heart, to make the best that can be made of it, is at once at the heart of the secret. All the failures are with those who are either cowardly or careless. The kingdom of life still suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. None but the brave who dare to take the citadel by storm triumph here. Without earnestness and courageous daring, life is a living death. With it, it is glorious and worth all things. Robert G. Ingersoll solved this riddle, when he said, "Give me the storm and tempest of thought and action rather than the dead calm of ignorance and faith. Banish me from Eden, when you will not first let me eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge." To the fearful and cowardly, life is an unending riddle and mystery. But to the brave heart who stops not to look for the broad and easy path when the way of duty is steep and narrow, the path lies straight before him. The moment one fronts life with courage, he sees straight through all the miserable shams, tricks, and delusions with which silly men and women deceive themselves and others. He sees at once that he has nothing whatever to do with all these fine-spun theories, theologies, and creeds about the unknowable. And, so leaving them to the blind leaders of the blind, he says: "My life to me is a present duty. What truth is in me, that will I obey. What right is before me, that will I do." In finding that he himself is a law unto himself, greater than all gods, churches, or creeds, he finds the truth that makes him free. As Matthew Arnold sings,—

> "With j y the stars perform their shining,
> And the sea its long moonèd silver roll;
> For self poised they live, nor pine with noting
> All he fever of some differing soul:
> Bounded by themselves and unregardful
> In what state God's other works may be,
> In their own tasks all their powers pouring,
> These attain the mighty life you see.
> O air-born voice, long since severely clear,
> A cry like thine in mine own heart I hear:
> Resolve to be thyself, and know that he > Who finds himself loses his misery."

Then be to the best thou knowest ever true. So shalt thou find thy duty, solve the riddle, answer the Sphinx, and lose all thy misery. No more wondering which is true of all the conflicting theories of religion. No more dulness and sleepiness in the performance of life's duties and worship. Your prayers will be to love, to think, to act. Our religion is our present conviction and opportunity, concerning which we have no doubt whatever.

No more putting first as our great concern the means of existence. The eternal right and truth is for us before all things. No more misery for fear we shall not be happy. No more miserable, anxious, inward self-dissection, trying to find out the condition of our own souls, like a morbid dyspeptic forever talking about his own stomach, but a healthy, vigorous activity of soul, doing with our might whatever our hands find to do, little caring what becomes of us, so that we but get something done that shall > "Make undying music in the world

> Breathing as beauteous order, that controls
> With growing sway the growing life of man."

The salvation of my soul, if I have one to be saved, is none of my business. But the life that now is shall be saved. Men and women about me, subject to hunger, cold, neglect, sickness, death, need all the thought and love I can give them. So to live is heaven. So to live is peace and joy. When all the mummeries, tricks, and machine-worship now called religion are swept away, along with all other refuges of lies, and men, looking earnestly into the solemn, dumbly eloquent, and majestically beautiful face of life, shall see that its meaning is to work in truth whatsoever we find to do, the Sphinx shall be no more; for this, To be to the best thou knowest ever true, is all the creed, religion, or God.

THE REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

BY CREDENS.

In a note in the Index of November 11, you speak of independency in Chicago, and at the same time suggest that Messrs. Cheney, Swing, and Thomas might unite and form an Independent Church. With regard to the last two of these, such a union is possible. But a union of these two with the first one is an utter impossibility. Your note falls into the common mistake about the Reformed Episcopal Church. Bishop Cummings, of Kentucky, seceded from the Protestant Episcopal Church, not because it was not liberal enough, but because it was too liberal with respect to forms. That is to say, it did not restrict its priests to the precise ceremonies and dress current among what are commonly called Low Churches, but allowed the use of forms and garments which have a High Church or ritualistic significance. Dr. Cheney (now bishop) seceded from the Protestant Episcopal Church on almost the same ground. He was however forced to it by the action of Bishop Whitehouse. The manly stand of these gentlemen, and their choice of hardship, rather than submit to any thing which they believed wrong, has given an incorrect impression in regard to their religious views. Since these also stand as representatives of the Reformed Episcopal Church, the same mistake is current about its doctrinal position. The Reformed Episcopal Church is a reaction from Broad Church doctrines no less than from High Church ceremonies.

One stepping into a Reformed Episcopal Church during a Sunday morning service, unless he were well informed on the subject, would not distinguish any difference between the service read and that of the Protestant Episcopal Church. If, however, he were trained in the Protestant Episcopal Church service, he would miss in that of the Reformed Episcopal Church the word "priest," and also the "absolution" pronounced by the priest in the service of the former. If he were to take the Prayer-Book of the Reformed Episcopal Church home, he would find that the lessons for the day were different from those of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He would notice several like changes.

Turning to the first pages of the Prayer-Book of the Reformed Episcopal Church, he would find this declaration: "This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity." Now this is apt to mislead, and seems to indicate a freedom from the control of the bishops: whereas, the fact is that the Protestant Episcopal Church does not hold more tenaciously to the Episcopacy than does the Reformed Episcopal Church. In the one case, we have bishops who claim to be in apostolic succession and a third order, while in the other (the Reformed Episcopal Church) we have bishops who claim to have apostolic succession, if any one has (and this is with the Reformed Episcopal Church no unimportant matter), and who are distinct in office from the presbyters. Now, to the non-Episcopalian, there is no difference here, and in fact it must to all be only a difference in words. In a word, so "very ancient and desirable" is this "church polity" that the Reformed Episcopal Church is just as likely to give up the Episcopacy as is the Protestant Episcopal Church; but not one whit more so.

When we come to the ceremonial part of the worship of the Reformed Episcopal Church, we find no more freedom in fact than in the old Episcopal Church. In the "Declaration of Principles," it is true the Reformed Episcopal Church declares that its Liturgy "shall not be imperative": nevertheless, in the churches it is imperative, and the canons of the Church make it obligatory that the morning service shall "invariably" be used. In the dress used by the minister during service there is no difference between that and the dress of the minister in the Protestant Episcopal Church. There may be a Reformed Episcopal Society, which is an exception; but this is the rule. Indeed, it is a noteworthy fact in the Reformed Church that, while the bishops claim to be only presbyters, they officiate when acting as bishops in robes the exact same as those of the bishops of the old Church. It is only a question of time when we will have a pronounced high churchmanship in the Reformed Episcopal Church, if indeed it is not there already.

We have little time to discuss the doctrines of the Reformed Episcopal Church. Too often it has been imagined that it is progressive in doctrine. It is the very opposite of this. If in ritual it is a protest against High Church ceremonies, in doctrine it is a sincere and earnest protest against the liberal drift of thought in our time. In doctrine, it almost out-Calvins Calvin. It is true that here and there a "liberal" man may be found in this Church, but the great number are Calvinists. A reference to the "course of study" prescribed for those entering its ministry or to "the Catechism" will plainly show this. In the "course of study," the bluest lights of Presbyterianism brightly shine. They are the stars of the first magnitude. In "the Catechism," we have almost a reproduction of the Westminster. It opens with the standard: "Question 1. What is the chief end of man? Answer. To glorify God, and enjoy him forever." We have the "three persons in the Godhead"; we have "the fall," which is "into one of sin and misery"; we have this "guilt of Adam's first sin" passing upon "all mankind," which makes us all "liable . . . to death itself and to the pains of hell forever"; we have Jesus, "the second person in the adorable Trinity," who "was and continueth to be God and man, in two distinct natures and one person, forever." In the same Catechism, we have the baldest kind of substitution: Jesus offers "up himself a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice and to reconcile us to God." The resurrection of Jesus, as taught by this Church, is a resurrection indeed; for it consists of his flesh and bones; and the devil is most personal. The word "Reformed" does not mean a reform to meet the wants of the day, but the word draws all its significance from the fact that the promoters of this Church desire to return to the church of the English Reformers of the time of Edward VI. It holds about the same relation to the Protestant Episcopal Church that the Old Catholics do to the Church of Rome.

"THE LESSON OF IT"—ANOTHER VIEW.

I have just read the editorial comments on the sale of the Parker Memorial building in this week's Index. There are points in the article with which I cannot agree; though it would be difficult to put my objections, or even to discover where to begin. Discussing the present attitude of many of my friends in these verbal interpretations and supposed substitutions of new issues for old ones would be unsatisfactory work; and I have neither time nor inclination for going into questions about the meaning of terms and the facts of local and personal history. "Radicalism" has seemed to me for some time to be drifting into the track of Jeremy Bentham and Stuart Mill; and both publicly and privately I have made my foolishly inadequate protests in behalf of what seems to me a higher and freer continuity of evolution. But doubtless it is even harder to explain one's self clearly in the present muddle of phraseology than to get a hearing or to convince one's neighbors. All I am disposed to do at this moment is to say personally, upon the first impulse from reading these comments on the progress of radical thought, that I do not comprehend the distinction drawn between societies such as mine at Lynn (1852-1870), which you call "Christian Congregational," "Transcendental Rationalist," of the "mongrel" species, etc., and the new societies based, or to be based, on "Free Religion." My own society, for one, never took the Christian name, nor any other, save that of an Independent Congregation. The term "Free Church" had reference, not to ecclesiastical relations, but to the free-seat system merely. I do not know that the Florence, Providence, or other "Free Religious" societies are anything else than this, except as having some kind of a verbal creed in the shape of those general liberties and purposes which we could very well do without formulating, putting our faith into our well-understood preaching and doing. I have spoken to most of the newer societies, and have found no such difference from the older as is now claimed to exist. They do not seem to me to be practically more cooperative or less individualist, except as being more numerous than their predecessors. They, too, will probably soon find, as some of them have already found, the necessity, as organized religious bodies, of personal centres, if they are to last even as long as one or two of the older free churches. They still adhere to inherited times and seasons of meeting, and even to Sunday-schools. All of which is well enough, nor should I be disposed to adduce it as proof of mongrel breed. But clearly the lines of continuity are not broken, even in their case, and are not likely to be.

So far, by the way, as "individualism" is concerned, there will always be differences among workers for the same substantial ends. It is hardly worth while to launch a crusade against "individualism," of which (as I understand the use of that word by our apostles of organization) there is none too much in our public or our private spheres. I am very far from denying the uses of organizations; but I am quite as far from regarding them as our chief reliance, or as the best channels for the highest forms of thought or conduct.

Quite as hard is it for me to follow our friend Abbot in his movement against "Transcendentalism," which Frothingham, Chadwick, and the Index writers generally have seconded. They seem to have identified this method of thought with Theodore Parker's opinions, or other particular phases of it, without much regard to its philosophical foundations or capabilities. These, I think, run a great ways beyond Mr. Parker or the present school of radicals, who suppose themselves to have escaped them. Probably none of us non-Christian evolutionists will be able to consign them to the past.

Personally, I am not conscious of having grown less radical or progressive, as regards religious ideas and institutions. The fact is altogether the other way. But, through all its manifest development into broader meanings and applications, the old Transcendental rationale of thought holds its own, for me, undisturbed. I can see in it neither supernaturalism, nor any other effete or damaged dogma, with which many are now confounding it. Nor could I have been, for instance, less thoroughly non-Christian in my belief than I now am, at the time of writing the essays on the "Worship of Jesus" and the "Foreclosure of Spiritual Unity" (printed long ago), with many others of like tenor, for the old Free Church of Lynn. Of course, these personal references will be understood to grow naturally out of the allusions to the position of our early free churches in the article now before me. So you will pardon the plentiful sprinkling of the ego.

In sum, I regard the danger of free radical thought from the intensely social and aggregative tendencies of the time, especially in America, to be that of ceasing to be a leader, and drifting into the popular phraseology; emptying terms of their historic and spiritual values, and finding a point d'appui in the general mind by apparent acceptance of its fixed prejudices, which ought rather to be removed. Having ridiculed Transcendentalism in its day, and now gathering no little contempt for purely individual and personal power, except in things desirable for material ends, very ill-informed multitudes are beginning to say of the radical, "Well, now he confesses that we were right." Obviously, I am not here speaking of intention on the part of leaders whose views of Transcendentalism are of course honest, and may perhaps be truer than mine, but of one practical result of their method. The truth will work itself clear from all our confusion. There are many names, the Christian, for instance, long dear to the wise and good, that we have surely forsaken forever. But let us the more firmly hold to the true currency of philosophical and spiritual thought, till we get it recognized and honored at its real value.

This is written, as I said, upon the spur. I hope it does not sound brusque. We cannot be far apart in faith and aim. I wish only to say that the new Mill and Spencer school of religious radicals have, in my judgment, mixed up terms and meanings a good deal, and that I cannot altogether accept their sweeping definitions and rejections.

Cordially yours, SAMUEL JOHNSON.

THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

The sixth of the Monday Lectures was given on the 10th inst., by Dr. Howard Crosby, Chancellor of the University of New York. His subject as announced was "A Calm View of the Temperance Question." If we judge by the agitation of the total abstinence pool, the effect of the lecture was anything but calm. For once in the history of the "lectureship," it may be truly said that something was done. This time came among them a man who evidently is aware that he is alive, and that this is a busy, practical world, and that society needs vital words upon vital subjects, come what may to theological dogmas.

The lecturer spent no part of his time tickling the bald heads of "eminent divines" with artful prelude of sophistical damnation issued in the name of God against heresy. He was full of his subject; and from beginning to end he treated his audience to a feast of reason and a flow of soul that they will not soon forget.

It would be impossible to give the excellence of the lecture without giving it entire, but a fair conception of it may perhaps be conveyed to the reader.

The speaker said there were two questions involved: first, "Will the plan of total abstinence be adopted?" secondly, "Ought it to be adopted?" The first question he considered prudential; the second, moral.

As a matter of prudence, whatever plan is acted upon for the promotion of temperance should be, first of all, practicable. He said:—

Reform lies in the domain of the expedient. It seeks to make society better; and, if it cannot raise society to the highest level, it will r ise it as high as it can. It will not prefer to let society wallow, bec use it cannot place it in an ideal Utopia. The most religious and conscientious man will be glad to see men leave off strife and discord, even if they do not act from the highest motives or attain to the heights of a genuine charity. His conscience will not be injured by their improved condition, however much he would like to see them still more enlightened....

He believed that great harm had been done to the genuine cause of temperance by a violent perversion of the word itself. It has been made synonymous with total abstinence, and everything but the fanaticism of that party was denounced as intemperance.

The word "temperance" has been stolen by the total abstinence party, and they are sailing under a false flag. Scriptures also are distorted to their use, and made to deceive all who accept them as the word of God. No chemist or chemical scholar would risk his reputation on the assertion that there ever was an unfermented wine in existence. No candid reader can doubt that the wine referred to in the Bible was intoxicating, and that Jesus drank intoxicating wine, if he drank any.

To meet this fatal blow to the total abstinence system in the minds of those who take the Bible as their guide, the advocates of the cause have invented a theory that is magnificent in its daring. It is no less than the division of the word "wine" by a Solomonian sword, so that the good and the bad shall each have a piece of it. Whenever wine is spoken of severely in Scripture, then it is fermented wine; and whenever it is spoken of in praise, or used by our Lord and his apostles, then it is unfermented wine. And if you ask these sages why they so divide the wine,—on what grounds they base this theory,—they bravely answer that our Saviour could not have drunk intoxicating wine, and God's word never could have praised such, and, therefore, their theory. They start with the begging of the whole question, and then on this thin air they build their castle.

The public will not submit to intimidation, and total abstinence has been urged by a system of denunciation worthy of the spirit of the Inquisition.

The world is apt to think that such conduct indicates a cause that cannot be sustained by reason, and the reaction is likely to be excessive. It is exactly that reaction which is now making the cause of rum and ruin more successful than ever. Men in their revolt from tyranny rush into licentious extremes; and however honest the tyranny may have been, or however true the cause it supported, it has only itself to blame for the harm it does.

In considering the moral phase of his subject, the lecturer said that independent thought had been so mobbed down by fanaticism that one who took the ground that total abstinence is immoral must expose himself to the assaults of slanderers. The press and the pulpit have both been "bulldozed" to a considerable extent by many "whose fanaticism despises argument and brooks no opposition." But he had no apology to make:—

In this address, I take no apologetic position. I carry the war into Africa. I have no contest with men, but with false principles. I assert that the total abstinence system is false in its philosophy, contrary to revealed religion, and harmful to the interests of our country. I charge upon this system the growth of drunkenness in our land, and a general demoralization among religious communities

The first moral error of the system is that it insists upon treating all as if they were drunkards. Because alcohol is bad for the drunkard, no one shall drink, is the argument. To this, he replies:—

Are the sick to be the norm of the well? Is the matter of diet to be regulated by the needs of the drunkard? Why not, then, by the needs of the dyspeptic? Ah! but (say they) it is to save you from becoming a drunkard. Well, is the logic anyway improved by this explanation? You would put me on a sick regimen to keep me from becoming sick! Because total abstinence is absolutely necessary to a drunkard's recovery, you would make it necessary to one who is not a drunkard.

The second moral error is the assumption that moderate drinking leads to drunkenness. This was characterized by the lecturer as an "atrocious dogma" that had become an axiom with the fanatics. They have put the moderate drinker in the place of the drunkard, and held him up to condemnation and scorn. "The drunkard is pitied and coddled, while the moderate drinker is scourged." This is a "moral jugglery" that is full of harm to the community, because it perverts judgment and throws moral distinctions into chaos. It is a Jesuitical trick intended to mislead the public by confusing their minds as to the real object of temperance.

A third moral error is lack of discrimination between things that differ. Every drink is condemned that contains alcohol, and the condemnation is equally true of all drinks:—

This assault upon common knowledge is a blunder that has the proportions of a crime. To say that certain drinks that are wholesome and beneficial are the same as certain drinks that are pernicious and destructive is a moral outrage which the whole community should indignantly repel.

The lecturer said that a fourth moral error of the total abstinence system was their assertion that all drinks containing alcohol were poison. He cites eminent authority to show that alcohol in small quantities is often beneficial, and that the wholesale denunciation of it in every form as a deadly poison to the human system is a false assumption.

A fifth moral objection was against the straight-jacket method of total abstinence. Instead of allowing one's individuality freedom to grow in strength, it was wrapped in the bands of a pledge which takes away from him his right to act according to his own conscience. The true reform must be made in the life. The pledge is merely an action on the surface.

The lecturer recommended in place of the total abstinence system one that should make a practical recognition of the difference between excess and moderation. It must be a manly system. The true principle of temperance must not be degraded by hocus-pocus of ribbons and child's play. He would exclude distilled liquors as common beverage, and regulate the use of vinous and malt liquors both by State and social means. He would limit the number of licensed sellers, put them under heavy bonds, and make it easy to gather evidence against violators of the law. He thinks that on a basis like this all temperate men and women could and would work in harmony for the cure of the evil of drunkenness.

The wild radicalism of the teetotallers is just what the rum-sellers and their advocates enjoy. They know that this absurd extravagance disintegrates the army of order and renders it powerless; that, so long as temperance is made to mean "total abstinence from everything that can intoxicate,' the great multitude of order-loving men will shrink from joining any temperance movement, and hence these wholesale destroyers of the race can go on in their nefarious work with impunity Now, what is needed is the union of all good men who desire to stop the fearful drunkenness of the land, with its attendant crimes and misery. That union never can be effected on the principles of the total abstinence propaganda. But it can be effected on the principles of truth and common-sense, and they who prevent this union by their tenacious adherence to a false and fanatical system are responsible before God and man for the spreading curse."

The lecture was delivered to the largest audience of the season at this course of lectures, and created an intense interest. The war was carried into Africa, and the Africans are already on the war-path.

The chairman of the committee in charge of the Monday lectures has already published a letter, in the Traveller of January 13, in which he disclaims all part in and sympathy with the lecture by Dr. Crosby. He says, "It is grateful to be able to say to the credit of the Christian and temperance sentiment of our city that the views evidently met with almost no sympathy from the audience." So much the worse for Christianity and the "temperance sentiment," say I. It is only one more proof that theology has no sympathy with the living present, and that, living in the vast graveyard of its own dead dogmas, it would compel mankind to chain itself to a corpse and worship a ghost of departed horrors.

All hail, brave Crosby! ELSIE, Radical.

A LETTER TO MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD.

FRACKVILLE, PA., Dec. 28, 1880.

Dear Sir,—You and I are not personally acquainted. Yet I am quite familiar with you through your writings. I have all your debates and tracts, and I read an article in the Index from your pen now and then. This is my apology for addressing you; and I hope that this familiarity with your writings and debates is sufficient to justify me to submit the following to your notice:—

In a certain place, the name of which I shall not mention now, there is a debating society.

The subjects in this society, so far, have not been on religious topics, but purely secular. The members of the society find great difficulty in fixing the proper scope, or the premises that the negative should take in the debates.

The two words Affirmative and Negative are well understood. The former means to build up, and the latter to tear down,—construction and destruction.

But the question arises, How extensive is the ground which the negative can claim? Some insist that the negative has the right to raise all the points that can be found unfavorable to the affirmative, even points which the affirmative speakers do not touch. One gentleman of this opinion expressed himself in this manner:—

"We will suppose that any given subject will admit of five points for argument, but, owing to inability or something else, the affirmative dwell on three points only. The negative then might take the floor, and refute one or two of these points, and leave the other one or two untouched, and that they then have a perfect liberty to raise the two points untouched by the affirmative, and to claim for these the same force in the debate as for any point that was given to them by the affirmative."

There are other members who think that the negative have no right to traverse any ground or touch any point that is not given to them by the affirmative, and that all the efforts the negative may make outside of this should fall to the ground, ineffectual. But they claim that the negative can affirm as well as deny, but that their affirmation must have a direct bearing against the points of the affirmative.

One of the gentlemen of this class expresses himself in this manner: "We will suppose that a prisoner before a court is charged with committing murder in a certain place at a certain hour. He would, if he could, defend himself by proving that he was in another place at that time.

"It is evident that he affirms here, but it is equally evident that his affirmation is no more nor less than to refute the charge against him. Therefore, although he affirms, he is still on the negative side."

Now, sir, I think that I have made myself understood. You, probably, will see further than I myself can express.

I beg of you to pay attention to this request, and give light on the question.

ONE OF THE MEMBERS.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

REV. DR. CROSBY, in his recent Monday lecture on Temperance, seems to have touched the minor key.

PROF. HUXLEY has been appointed inspector-general of the British fisheries, to succeed Francis T. Buckland.

MRS. JESSIE FREMONT has organized classes in history among the grown-up sons and daughters of poor settlers in Arizona.

IT is announced that Mrs. Carter, wife of Dr. Carter of Erie, Ohio, a sister of Colonel R. G. Ingersoll, died of apoplexy a few days since.

PROF. MAX MUELLER will give us this month a fresh handful of Chips from a German Workshop. They are good "chips" to feed the fires of thought.

THE Rev. G. W. Cutter, of Buffalo, preached a sermon Sunday, January 9th, at his church in that city on "The German Persecution of the Jews." The discourse was printed in full in the Buffalo Express.

PROF. JOHN FISKE, of Cambridge, is said to be writing an article for the North American Review, in which, it is said, he will dissect the teachings of Rev. Joseph Cook, and find a very small basis of scientific truth.

MRS. VAN COTT, the Evangelist, has stopped preaching, and gone into the patent medicine business. It is to be hoped that her remedies are an improvement on those she has been accustomed to dispense for spiritual ailments.

MR. GEORGE CHAINEY, late pastor of the Unitarian church of Evansville, Ind., is to lecture on "The Clergy" at the Music Hall in this city, Sunday evening, February 6. Mr. Chainey is glowingly commended by Colonel Ingersoll.

A SCHOOL friend of George Eliot says that, while Marian Evans was the plainest-looking girl and the poorest in the aristocratic Edinburgh school, she was universally respected as intellectually their superior. The school-girl of sixteen was of a sensitive and retiring disposition, and far before her companions as a writer of prose and verse as well as in her various studies.

THE will of the late Professor Watson of the university of Wisconsin, giving nearly all his money to a scientific society, and leaving his mother but $150 a year, is severely criticised by a brother at Sioux Falls, Dak., who says that their mother supported the professor by daily labor while he was studying at the Ann Arbor (Mich.) University, and now has nothing but her son's bequest for her support. If the above is true, it looks like an instance of less heart than brains.

MR. C. P. LATHROP'S paper on "Literary and Social Boston," in Harper's, has accomplished one desirable object for young authors at least,—that of getting it talked about. It is true that some of the comments that have appeared have been neither amiable nor complimentary. It would seem as though those who are offended at Mr. Lathrop's count of the stars in the Boston galaxy sustain so remote and doubtful a relation to it that they have litle cause for offence; while those who have such cause, if there are any, have too much good sense to let any one know they entertain such feelings.

IT would seem as though, if a preacher were particularly bright and promising in the Orthodox Church, he is pretty sure to become sooner or later affected with heresy. The Rev. Mr. Pearson, who has just resigned the pulpit which he has filled very successfully in Somerville, Mass., for the last nine years, on account of his loss of faith in the doctrine of the deity of Christ, and other tenets of the church over which he has been settled, is noted for his thoughtful and scholarly characteristics. In a letter of resignation, of admirable frankness and spirit, submitted to his congregation at the close of the morning service, Sunday, the 16th inst., he says: "I hope it may not be deemed presumptuous in me, friends, since I have been so long your pastor, to express the hope that many of you may come, sooner or later, to stand upon the same ground with myself. If so, it will but be in accord with that spirit of candor and intelligence which has perceptibly changed the whole character of preaching during the last generation, converted thousands of individuals to a more discerning faith, and brought scores of churches—notably, as Budington tells us, the transplanted church of 'Robinson in Plymouth, Higginson in Salem, John Cotton in Boston—to a system of belief different from that in which they were baptized, and for which they were nurtured by their pious founders.' "

KAISERSAAL.

Noiseless, without a hammer-stroke, or sound
Of plane or chisel, shall its turrets rise.
No trace of busy workman there be found;
No dust of toil that lies

Upon its silent floor, its soundless wall;
No mortal foot shall cross its threshold fair.
No lawn shall flower, no garden-bird shall call
Its mate through songful air.

No Eastern windows shall be widely flung
To catch the potent pulses of the day.
No feast be spread, no massive gate be swung
For guest who comes that way.

No storm shall beat, no lightning terror glance
Along its roof, no flame nor hurricane,
No earthquake shock, no flood of fate or chance,
Shall prove its bastions vain.

Where shall we seek this viewless dome which flings
Far-reaching, bodiless shadow over all?
In hearts of men who worship kingliest kings
Is the true Kaisersaal!

Forever sceptred, robed, and crowned, they reign,—
The men who cast their gauntlets to the world;
Who met the scorner's scorn with high disdain,
And back his slanders hurled.

The fearless ones who struck, with words of fire,
The shackles from the Ethiop's tortured limb,
And the fair halls of Truth, and Truth's desire,
Set widely free to him.

The men who die, a little child to save,
Battling with billows or the wreathing flame;
Who seek, in willing martyrdom, a grave;
Who fall, and leave no name!

Such hero-kings must dwell in Kaisersaal.
Such vibrant deeds the rolling world shall sway,
When powers and principalities shall fall,
And thrones have had their day. H. T. C.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JANUARY 27, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX: namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

MR. JOHNSON'S LETTER.

We give glad welcome to Mr. Samuel Johnson's letter, printed in another column of our present issue, in which he traverses some opinions of ours expressed in the article of January 6, on "The Lesson of It." Even if it were more difficult to justify those opinions than we believe it is, we should yet be happy to have given them utterance, if only thereby to have called forth Mr. Johnson's view. No person living is, we believe, more entitled to speak of the meaning of the Transcendental movement, especially as applied to religious problems, than Mr. Johnson. The special studies, experience, and work of his life have given him exceptional qualifications as a witness in its behalf. Hence, whatever he says of it is worthy of the utmost consideration. He counts himself an adherent of the Transcendental philosophy, yet does not give of it any narrow interpretation. In its religious applications, he has shown no special desire, not so much, it may be added, as did Theodore Parker, to identify it with any interpretation of Christianity. We do not think that he has been accustomed to say, certainly not in his later years, that Christianity, even as defined by the essential teachings of Jesus, is synonymous with absolute religion. During his very able and useful ministry of seventeen years in the "Free Church" at Lynn, he stood, we believe, throughout on the ground of "universal religion," recognizing none of the special religions as final and absolute. What Mr. Johnson has to say, therefore, of the Transcendental movement, and of its relations both backward to Christianity and forward to the Free Religious movement, deserves exceptional attention and study.

The chief point of objection which Mr. Johnson makes against the article he criticises is that he sees no such break in the continuity of institutions between Christianity and Free Religion as that which we pronounced to be necessary; nor does he think that such a break is consistent with the doctrine of evolution. Of course, in the primary forces of social evolution there is no such thing as an absolute break. The human race, at least, continues one. A break in the continuity of institutions is always relative,—a thing of more or less. When the "more" predominates, as in the separation of the American colonies from Great Britain and the exchange of monarchy for a republic, we have no difficulty in seeing the break, and we call it revolution. Nevertheless, there are underlying forces of evolution not broken even there. The American people did not and could not begin their national existence as if they were an absolutely new stock that had been created outright on the spot. It is a break of this kind which, as it seems to us, must necessarily come between Christianity and Free Religion, or—perhaps a more apposite illustration—like that which occurred in the institutions of religion when paganism in the Roman Empire gave place to Christianity. There is, in our opinion, quite as much difference to-day between the popular beliefs—nay, the essential faith—of Christianity and what is getting recognition as Free Religion as there was between Christianity and the old pagan beliefs. And it strikes us as only rational to suppose that this new phase of religious thought will not be satisfied with the old forms of Christian institution. If it can use them at all, it can only be just as Christianity used some of the pagan forms, by a most radical and even revolutionary transformation of them.

That we do not see as yet a break of this kind, do not see the difference of institutions on the two sides of the line, is a matter of course; for the break in institutions has not yet to any great extent actually occurred. We can only see tendencies toward, or just the beginnings of, the break. And only by tracing the drift of these as accurately as we can, and keeping the essential aim of the Free Religious movement in mind, can we catch a glimpse of the future of Free Religious institutions.

We shall return to this point in some later article. We regret that Mr. Johnson did not give his explanation of the fact that all the religious organizations growing out of the Transcendental movement have ceased to exist. We shall be more than willing to allow him room for this or any other point in the discussion of this vitally interesting problem.

A DIFFERENCE IN MENTAL ATMOSPHERES.

The Independent appears to have taxed its mental energies pretty heavily, in its issue of January 6, to make a show of wit and irony over the recent account in the Index of the Sunday-school of the Rev. Mr. Chadwick's church of Brooklyn, by a correspondent of that city. But it does not strike us that the effort is likely to be regarded, even by the partial readers of the journal referred to, as an eminent success, unless they are more easily satisfied with such performances than we had supposed, which is not improbable. Of course, Orthodoxy is not very promising soil for such products. Moreover, we suspect the subject did not prove a fortunate one. Still, we would advise our contemporary not to be discouraged, if it has ambition in the line of its late attempt, as seems evident. One can never tell what may come of feeble beginnings. Who knows but that there may be a budding humorist on the editorial staff of the Independent! Strange and unsuspected things happen in the sphere of psychological phenomena.

The Independent cannot see anything beautiful in the exercises of the Brooklyn Sunday-school, which is not wholly to be wondered at, in view of the religious conceptions which it represents as a champion of the orthodox faith and which influence its mental perceptions. It is to be presumed that if those exercises laid more emphasis upon the doctrines of the theological system from which many have escaped with much pain and suffering, and that tend to throw a dismal shadow over the natural exuberance of the spirit of childhood, they would be, in its eyes, more beautiful. People's tastes differ so. The absence of the supernatural is pronounced a lamentable deficiency in the exercises under consideration. On the other hand, we cannot but think that the skill and courage shown in this particular is their special excellence. It seems to us time that the instructors of youth should forego, for a period at least, teaching on the strength of antiquated texts and traditions their unsustained and airy imaginations for positive knowledge. If there is any relation in life that calls for a straightforward sincerity in dealing with others, it is in our intercourse with children. Now, in view of the fact that the tendency of advancing knowledge is to eliminate more and more the supernatural from human belief, the supernatural certainly as postulated in creeds, and to show its untenableness, there is no well-informed mind, conversant with modern knowledge and possessed of a quick conscience in respect to its relation to children, that will not hesitate to make supernaturalism a prominent part of its positive teaching to them; assured that otherwise it may be but imposing unverified and unverifiable hypotheses upon their trusting minds, which at a later day they may see to have no real basis to rest upon, and which may also prove a serious impediment to the vigorous and free development of their intelligence and character.

More especially will the force of this be recognized in regard to the typical teacher, with more zeal than knowledge, into whose hands the children of Sunday-schools are doomed to fall. Surely, the universe, with its infinite sights and sounds, order, beauty, and inspiration, with its impressive and varied lessons of life and experience, the joyous innocence, trust, and fresh susceptibilities of childhood, the wondrous disclosures of ever-developing science and knowledge, is not so destitute of significance or resources wherewith to instruct and quicken the human spirit that resort must be made to the ill-supported alternative of supernaturalism for enlightenment as to the nobility and meaning of our existence upon this planet.

If it be otherwise, then is our lot hapless indeed: all the more so, if there is nothing better left us to this end than what Orthodoxy offers.

Of course, it is to be remembered that the school of theology from which the Independent sprang, and to which, under a certain amount of indefiniteness and non-committalism, it still clings, counts all these things of little value.

According to the fundamental principles of its creed, all nature and human life are out of joint, and there can be no order or beauty anywhere but through supernatural aid and influence. Our critic pities the children in the Brooklyn Sunday-school; but it seems to us, if there are those upon whom its commiseration should be expended, it is those whom cruel fortune has doomed to be educated under the ideas of the system to which the Independent adheres, or which it has never yet shown sufficient independence to repudiate. Especially is this true, if we may trust the report a few days since, of a speech of a no less eminent Sunday-school worker than William E. Dodge, a superintendent for thirty years in New York, that Sunday-schools, as at present conducted, are in great danger of driving children away from the church instead of drawing them to it.

As one who has long dwelt in a dark place cannot readily appreciate the bright sunshine or clear sky when he beholds them, so we conclude the Independent's inability to recognize the superiority of the radical Sunday-school to the orthodox one is due to a difference of mental atmosphere.

It has been so long inured to the murky sky, the sulphurous fumes, and tangled logic of dogma and tradition, that even amid their retiring shreds and mists it has not yet recovered the power to perceive the brightness and beauty of more rational methods and conceptions. The light is too strong for its eyeballs. D. H. C.

Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, who was President Buchanan's Secretary of the Treasury, and a representative Southerner at Washington in the ante bellum days, has learned something by the war. He writes to the Christian Union, of the Future of the Negro in the South, in a spirit of justice and humanity, which, if carried into practice, is all that could be asked. He admits and maintains that upon the white people of the South rests the obligation to "liberate the negro from the thraldom of ignorance, and to elevate his moral character"; that there should be a friendly coöperation between the whites and the blacks by which the latter may permanently secure "all their political and industrial rights as equal citizens," learn "the discharge of their civil duties," and "grow as speedily as practicable, mentally, morally, and politically, to true manhood." This is all very well, and betokens progress. Nor have we any reason to doubt Mr. Cobb's personal sincerity. But through his article runs the thread of the proviso that all this will be done if the South is only let alone by the North, which reminds us rather unpleasantly of the old claim that the South would have gradually adopted emancipation, if it had not been for the rise of the abolition movement in the North. The truth is, the North emancipated the negro, and put the ballot in his hands; and not until the South has shown itself more in earnest than it has thus far to protect the negro in these rights can the North withdraw its interest in his welfare, or cease to use all legitimate moral and political means for holding the South to a fair treatment of him.

We still continue our offer of the Index for one year for $10 to any one who will send with that sum the address of four new subscribers. An old subscriber who recently responds to this offer, renewing his own subscription at the usual rate and sending four new ones, adds: "This is my contribution to the support of the Index, the earnest advocate of freethought and pure morality. May it never want a friend." If only a quarter of our subscribers were to do likewise, each adding four new names permanently to our list, the Index would be above beggary, and its future secure.

Let the Universalists count it an honor rather than a shame that they have no missionary for the conversion of the "heathen." The Universalist Review is trying to make them believe that it is a cause of reproach that they are behind other Christian denominations in this respect. But, if they will only expend the same zeal in efforts to redeem worse than "heathen" populations at home, posterity will not only pardon, but praise their neglect of the foreign missionary field.

The Irish agitation is not to be wholly for nought. The Irish people are going to get at least partial justice and corresponding relief from their burdens through Gladstone's administration; that is, if Parliament sustains the Premier, as it, without much doubt, will do.

The writer of the articles on the "Monday Lectureship" must be understood as speaking for himself, and not for the Index as a whole or editorially. Especially in his enthusiastic indorsement of Dr. Crosby on the Temperance problem should we dissent from him.

OUR LIBRARY.

VI. American Novelists.

In a book about Iceland there is said to be a chapter headed "Snakes," and containing only these words, "There are no snakes in Iceland." And it is characteristic of our novelists that none of them bring forward views so advanced as those of the British and French writers I have mentioned. We have no George Sand or Mrs. Linton, as we have no Swinburne. The reason probably is that the churches are so much stronger here than in Europe. I mean not merely more popular, but better endowed with such culture, tolerance, and philanthropy as Freethinkers treat with respect in any company. Orthodoxy, therefore, is not indignantly denounced, as in many British novels, but is calmly criticised with due allowance for every redeeming trait.

The author who has done the best work in this field is Dr. Holmes. His main aim, both in Elsie Venner and in The Guardian Angel, is to picture New England life, and advocate high culture united to manly vigor; but he incidentally does full justice to the popular theology. Elsie's own pastor is an example of the weakness into which Unitarianism has been brought by its tendency to compromise; but good, old Dr. Honeywood shows us the most harmless, though not the most consistent side of Orthodoxy. We should like to hear his sermon "On the Obligations of an Infinite Creator to a Finite Creature"; though we pity the people who need to be told that "a man with a crooked spine will never be called to account for not walking straight," or that a good father would not "put into a child's hands the title-deeds to all its future possessions and a bunch of matches." Better still is the physician, with his argument that the selfishness of little children is necessary for self-preservation, and that the range of responsibility is limited by hereditary moral tendencies, diseases, and defects of organization. "We are constantly seeing weakness where you see depravity," he tells the clergyman.

This novel was originally called The Professor's Story, and is in harmony with all he says at his Breakfast-table: for instance, that he does not know Truth is such an invalid that she can only take the air in a close carriage with a gentleman in a black coat on the box; and that the Church, in teaching total depravity, talks like a medical society who should assert that "All men's teeth are naturally in a state of total decay, and therefore no man can bite until every one of them is extracted, and a new set inserted according to the principles of dentistry adopted by this society."

One of the early chapters of The Guardian Angel shows the wickedness of a common practice legitimately based on this theory, and still advocated in newspapers and orthodox books,—that of trying to break a child's will at the first sign of disobedience. Neither the plot nor the setting of this story is as artistic as those of Elsie Venner, but the handling of Orthodoxy is masterly.

Myrtle Hazard flings down her hymn-book, and declares that she will not hear her aunt sing such words as the boys say in the streets. Byles Gridley says in his Thoughts on the Universe, "Protestantism means none of your business; but it is afraid of its own logic." The old doctor lays in an extra stock of valerian and assafœtida whenever there is a young minister 'round, for there's plenty of religious raving that is nothing but hysterics. And the Rev. Joseph Bellamy Stoker has his three sermons on the future in store for the great bulk of his fellow-townsmen, known as the sweating sermon, the fainting sermon, and the convulsion-fit sermon, from their various effects his habit of forking pretty much all the world but himself and his lot into the bad place with the devil's pitchfork, and then toasting his own cheese with it; and his practice of preaching cruel sermons in his pulpit, cold-blooded enough to freeze any mother's heart, if nature did not tell her he lied, and then smoothing it all over with the first good-looking young woman he can get to listen to him.

The Autocrat and The Poet at the Breakfast-Table I need not quote, though they have much to say worth quoting.

A somewhat humbler type of rural pietism is vividly though coarsely pictured by Whitcher and Eggleston. The latter's experience as "a callow circuit-preacher" enables him, in The End of the World, to show not only the ignorant extravagance of the Second Adventists, but all the narrow bigotry of the Methodists. These latter refuse to let their Cynthy Ann marry shrewd, honest Jones because he is a New Light, or Arian, and insist on his joining her church. But this he flatly refuses to do, telling her he is sure she is "too good a Christian to ask me to change for any such reason, knowin' I wouldn't be fit for you, if I did." He keeps looking for "a man that's got common-sense enough to salt his religion with"; and at last the presiding elder tells the local preacher, "It's my opinion that any member of your class would do better to marry a good, faithful, honest New Light than marry a hickory Methodist."

Whitcher's Widow Bedott Papers are full of such animated caricatures of the country sewing-circles, donation parties, and similar religious institutions, that the book has been dramatized with some success.

A more partial picture of our village Orthodoxy is given by Mitchell in Dr. Johns. The hero is a Connecticut minister's son, endowed with such high spirits, keen intellect, and religious enthusiasm that he is alternately attracted to his father's cold, hard creed, and repelled by it; and it is only after many wanderings that he dies at last in the shadow of the cross. There are good sketches of the deacon, who is always making bargains; of Aunt Eliza, "the impersonation of all good severities"; and of Parson Brunnem, that "heavy-minded, right-meaning man, utterly inaccessible to all the graces; a man to whom life was only a serious spiritual toil, and all human joy a vanity to be spurned, counting the fatigue of his hearers an oblation to spiritual truth, and staggering through life with a great burden of theologies on his back."

Another extreme type, the fashionable Episcopalian, with its fondness for show, dress, and flirtation, can scarcely be better sketched than it is in the chapter of Curtis' Potiphar Papers, appropriately headed "Our New Livery."

In the early chapters of Mrs. Stowe's Nina Gordon, first published under the title of Dred, the frivolity, self-indulgence, and laziness, which often call themselves religion, are exposed with a vigor which may have been one cause of this book's comparative unpopularity. The vivacious little heroine makes a particularly good point, when she answers the charge that she spends too much time on dress in this dying world with: "Why, Aunt Nesbit, yesterday you spent just two whole hours in thinking whether you should turn the breadths of your black silk dress upside down or downside up, and this was a dying world all the time. Now, I don't see that it is any better to think of black silk than it is of pink."

The great wickedness of upholding slavery because the Bible did is denounced with just severity in this book, and also in Uncle Tom's Cabin. How good use could be made of the Scriptures as weapons on the other side, we see in her Minister's Wooing, which is full of pictures of the religious life of New England just after the Revolutionary War. Mary Scudder is so stanch a Calvinist that she clings all the closer to her creed, when her lover is thought to have died unconverted, and his mother is made almost insane by despair, since she sees in his fate that of almost all mankind, except a mere remnant. Such sorrow only drives the gentle Mary up to such a height of mysticism that she insists on her obligation to fulfil her promise to marry her pastor, though she knows that her heart belongs to her young lover, who returns just before the marriage day, but has to plead in vain, until the doctor himself refuses to suffer such a martyrdom to false ideas of duty as religionists have usually been eager to sanction.

One of the most original passages is the heart-broken mother's saying: "I have thought of giving up the Bible itself. But what do I gain? Do I not see the same difficulty in Nature? I see everywhere a being whose main ends seem to be beneficent, but whose good purposes are worked out at a terrible expense of suffering. I see unflinching good order, general good-will, but no sympathy, no mercy. Storms, earthquakes, volcanoes, sickness, death, go on without regarding us. The doctor's dreadful system is, I confess, much like the laws of Nature, about what one might expect from them."

I have omitted her fear that this state of suffering may be eternal. Otherwise, her complaint is full of truth which disturbed Parker, and is said, at the time of the Lisbon earthquake to have driven Goethe almost into atheism.

A still darker view of the system we have nearly outgrown forms the background to Judd's Margaret, a book richly worthy of Darley's graceful illustrations. The girl herself is simply charming in her enthusiasm for our New England scenery, her superiority to the narrow Orthodoxy which makes her for a time dislike the very name of Jesus, her visions of his tenderness toward the children and the childlike, her constant striving after truth and goodness, and her grand schemes of philanthropy in later life. That so refined and gifted a child could spring up amid the coarseness, ignorance, and vice of her early home, is rather hard to believe, even when we know her parentage. Still we can each of us say, as Lowell does in his Fable for Critics:—

> "'Tis enough that I look
> On the author of Margaret, the first Yankee book,
> With the soul of Down East in't and things further East,
> As far as the threshold of morning, at least,
> Where awaits the fair dawn of the simple and true,
> Of the day that comes slowly to make all things new."

Our ablest novelist has brought in the gloom of early Puritanism for the background of his Scarlet Letter, and has also shown us in two of his Twice Told Tales, "The Maypole of Merrymount" and "The Gentle Boy," how terrible were the asceticism and intolerance which drove our forefathers to flee hither from the mirth of merry England and the freedom in worship of Holland. But Hawthorne has no keener sarcasm than he darts at Transcendentalism in his Celestial Railroad and Blithedale Romance. Miss Alcott, too, has shown us how this philosophy sows its "Wild Oats." Both these writers have also done us good service by giving places of honor to heroes and heroines with purely secular views of life. The same may be said of Bret Harte, Howells, and Henry James, Jr., the last indeed going so far as to make the interest of the Europeans centre in "an innocent Sabbath-breaker," who says frankly: "I don't care for the great questions. They are much beyond me."

But for the American novel which shall fully set forth our views we have still to look. How long need we look in vain?

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Manifesto of the Brazilian Anti-Slavery Society.

The title of this paper will surprise some of its readers, as the reception of the "manifesto" did the writer. Probably we are not alone in having supposed that, ten years back, the work of emancipation was accomplished in Brazil, or so heartily and successfully undertaken that its speedy accomplishment was assured, and the organization of an Anti-slavery Society at this late day mistimed and useless. Admirers of Whittier will remember his poem, written at an earlier date, even when the Brazilian Government first proposed the liberation of the slaves, in which he eulogizes the Emperor for the undertaking (and, certainly, for both his private and his public efforts for emancipation, Dom Pedro II. deserved the eulogy), and in which he declares so confidently:—

> "Yet a few days (God make them less), and slaves > Shall shame thy pride no more."

For the idea thus entertained and expressed there was given sufficient cause. The manifesto itself says that the act subsequently passed, having been "announced as the law of emancipation, gave rise to the belief, outside of the country, that Brazil had courageously liberated the million and a half of slaves which she still possessed."

But it seems that this belief went beyond the real fact. The original proposition for emancipation, laid by the Council of State before the Brazilian Parliament, was published in the Diario for April 9, 1867. It was probably instigated by the Emperor, who, some time previous, had introduced experimental emancipation on his own palace plantation. The proposal was for a prospective and conditional emancipation. All slavery should cease in the year 1900. The owners of slaves then held should be indemnified by the government. All children born after the passage and promulgation of the act should be free; but those educated in the house of their parents' master should serve the latter till they became twenty-one years of age. A court of emancipation should be established in each town, to enforce the act. A fixed amount should be set aside to provide for the indemnification, and an appropriation should be made for the annual purchase of a certain number. Such was the first proposition. Final legislative action was not had until Sept. 28, 1871, and then a modified bill was passed. This simply decreed that after that date no one should be born a slave in Brazil. It included the twenty-one years' servitude of the children of slaves educated in the house of the master, "thus giving slavery three-quarters of a century in which to disappear in the midst of the most terrible complications." Meanwhile, the power of the master over his slaves was in no measure limited or modified; and his property in them was guaranteed until the extinction of the last. All this was evidently, at the best, but the simplest beginning of the work of emancipation, only the promise of a possible something in the future rather than any present realization. An attempt seems to have been made, during the last summer, to expedite the work by some more effective and radical legislative action. The precise nature of the proposed action does not appear. But evidently it met with a disheartening failure. Either the Chamber of Deputies deliberately voted down the measure, or, as seems to be intimated, utterly refused it a hearing and dismissed the subject without discussion. This action, which took place on the 30th of August last, is regarded as deferring emancipation, tightening the chains of the slave, and giving him no hope but death.

Since that time, some of the earnest lovers of "freedom for the slave and for the country" have come together and organized the society whose name and appeal stand at the head of this article. Holding all shades of opinion as to the time and method of abolishing slavery, but agreeing in the purpose of abolition, they propose a full and free discussion of the subject before the people. They seek to arouse, unite, and direct public sentiment to the reversion of the recent action of the Parliament,—the reintroduction, consideration, and solution of the problem of slavery. Their avowed purpose, says the Rio News, is the "limitation of Brazilian slavery within some definite period, the acceleration of emancipation, and the amelioration of the present status of the slave." They begin their work with the issue of the manifesto, addressed "to the country," published in English and French, and extensively circulated. In this, they recognize the fact that from the first introduction of Africans into Brazil, three hundred years ago, slavery has been made the cornerstone of nationality, and has become so interwoven with the national life that, in the belief of many, the nation could not exist without it. Yet the idea of emancipation has never ceased to be cherished, especially since the attainment of national independence. Coincident with that event, a scheme of gradual emancipation was drawn up to give completeness to the national work. The "abolition tradition" has continued, and found occasional expression in individual efforts down to the initiated reform by the government in 1867, and the imperfect result reached in 1871; that action, even, being practically nullified through the resistance of the slaveholders and of a sympathetic or timid public sentiment. The address then portrays, in clear and unqualified language, the personal suffering and degradation and the corrupting social influence of slavery. It appeals to the Emperor to crown his long reign with the glory of emancipation. It calls upon the parties—conservative, liberal, republican—to withdraw their support from an institution banished by the whole world beside. It urges upon the rising generation the relinquishment of the idea of property in man and the advocacy of free and honorable labor. Finally, it places before the slave-holders the alternative of joint amicable effort with the State for an early emancipation of the slave, which may carry with it an equitable compensation to the master; or, by delay and opposition, provoking a final enforced liberation of the former without any compensating provision for the latter. Furthermore, it reminds them of the fact that the mass of the slave population is illegally held, having been introduced or being the offspring of those introduced into the country in violation of the law of 1831, prohibiting such importation.

The address is temperate, but earnest. Its spirit is patriotic, anxious to give Brazil a worthier place among the countries of the world. It claims to act in the interest of her progress, her credit, her moral and national unity. The society issuing it proposes to call a congress of abolitionists in August next, and to publish an abolition paper at an early day. We hope to hear further from the movement; wishing it speedy and complete success, and that Whittier's closing words for their country may be verified,

"One by one, he fiends of ancient wrong
Go out and leave thee free."

Mechanical Invention as a Civilizer.

A VERY suggestive lecture was recently given before the Lowell Institute of this city, by C. C. Coffin, on "Machinery and Modern Civilization." He defined civilization as the sum of our attainments in the use of materials and forces for the promotion of our physical, mental, and moral well-being. He especially treated of the growth of mechanical invention, and the great changes it has made in our modern life. He showed that almost every invention has been opposed on economic grounds, and how great the benefit, even to the laborer thrown for the moment out of employment, which has resulted from the introduction of labor-saving machinery. The Advertiser thus reports his account of the times when hand labor was common in all industries:—

The flagstone fireplace with no chimney, the rough table, the rush-strewn floor, the backless benches, the wooden plates, the horn spoons, and the absence of forks, were all mentioned as characteristics of the castles of the old barons. The homes of the poor were devoid of everything we esteem necessary for comfort. Life was mere drudgery, especially for women who were obliged to ply the spindle. Nowhere is there evidence of a spinning-wheel, till one was made in England in the age of Elizabeth. The first machine invented in England for improving the manufacture of textile fabrics was the stocking-frame, invented by William Lee in 1589. In 1555, the Bishop of Ely saw a sawmill in France, an invention unknown in England, where all sawing was done by hand. It is not a very long time since ship-planks were sawed by hand in Medford and East Boston. The bishop wrote a description of the mill; but it was a century before a mill was built in England, and then it was by a Dutch mechanic, who was obliged to take it down in consequence of the opposition of the pit-sawyers. Not till 1767 was the second sawmill built in England, and then it was demolished by a mob of sawyers, who said that it was taking the bread out of their mouths. At that time, hundreds of sawmills were in operation in this country. Not till the fourteenth century were windmills known. With the exception of a few mills driven by wind and water, for sawing and grinding, the human race, down to within a hundred years, was doomed to physical toil.

The vast development of mechanical invention, the almost marvellous increase in the use of machinery, and the growth of commerce, introduce new and most perplexing elements into the study of social science. We can see that in some directions they are working great changes in the life of mankind, while they promise to become the greatest of the civilizing agents of the immediate future. What their outcome will be, we cannot tell with definiteness. All these elements of our civilization are of such recent growth we have not as yet the data on which to base conjectures of the future. This indicates one of the difficulties under which social science labors as a science, and which must separate it from all the other sciences,—that man, as a social being, constantly advances to new and unexpected results. How has this element of machinery changed the conditions of civilization! The problem of labor, also, is one of vast proportions; and the results which its solution will bring none can as yet predict. But social science alone promises to furnish the answer to many a question which concerns the interests of man as a denizen of this world.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

WASHINGTON, D.C., Jan. 18, 1881.

No name fitter than that of "Lincoln" could be found for the hall in which to hold a memorial service in honor of Lucretia Mott. I sat on the platform this morning and looked over a crowded auditorium, and in the mingling parterre of faces picked out some noble and many notable ones. The strong feminine face, a little severe too in its force, of Mrs. Hayes, was quite marked. By her sat the wife of Bishop Simpson, "the old man eloquent" of the Methodist Church, showing a face of placid yet forceful beauty, the calm repose of ripened old age crowning it as a very mother in Israel. A short distance off, I saw the white-haired head, still fresh and young-looking, of General Birney, whose father's name was once an oriflamme to those politicians who loved liberty. The platform was both a picture and a poem: Mrs. Stanton, with her noble face and head, wreathed with its silver hair, reading in a voice still clear and mellow, though weakening a little into the piping treble of advancing years, exquisite words of eulogy, reminiscent of struggle and strife, of endeavor and work; Frederick Douglass, with his massive head and features that, like a cameo cut in onyx, stood out antique in mould from its strong frame of gray hair and close grizzly beard. Nobody can think of Douglas as the vulgar think of the negro. It is only as a man whose life embraced by genius and in tropical fervor had deepened and glowed until the skin deepened into bronze. On the other side were Robert Purvis, with skin kissed by the sun of his ancestral life into warm beauty, one of the most courtly and debonair gentlemen of his age; and Susan B. Anthony, with strong-lined face, simple in its directness, but losing yearly the severity which struggle can but bring. There is no public person I know who mellows so exquisitely as Susan. All around the platform, with its portrait of the wondrous woman who always bore her testimony in feminine sweetness, but without fear, faltering, or favor, in behalf of "truth for authority,"—her face, looking out from the dead gray of the photograph, still spoke in that lovely steadfastness of spiritual insight and harmony which has made her character and life a type of intellectual and moral beauty, a "thing of joy forever,"—around the platform were such faces as Phœbe Cozzens, May Wright Sewell, Ellen Sheldon, and others. Close by me sat one whose head and face recall the Duycinck portrait of Shakspeare, a former United States Senator; and next to him were the bearded features, still young in their outlook, in despite of fifty years of work and of sharp and sorrowing strife, of one who was of that band of correspondents that, in the early flush of manhood, with pen and rifle, with brain and courage, fought for freedom against slavery, and, in doing so, roused the North, and shaped the nation through their bold chronicling of the Free Struggle in Kansas. As my eye took in these and other faces, and my brain absorbed what was said and recalled, memory, weird master of life, brought back in wondrous outline the massive and dramatic purport of the past struggle which these voices and forms embody and enforce.

Just think of it! A review and eulogy of Lucretia Mott, by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, in the Hall of Lincoln, within sight of Arlington and its thirty thousand graves, with the vitalizing presence and voices of Frederick Douglass and Susan B. Anthony and Robert Purviss to make living links with the past, and then these others coming to the front, or already there! The vivacious speech of Phœbe Cozzens, the keen wit of Mrs. Sewell, the approving presence of the President's wife, with the hundreds of listening and approving faces that made up the pictures,—it was indeed an ensemble that conveyed in its details the grandest characteristics of American history. I think civilization, if it could have been embodied in one listening face, would have smiled in rapt benediction upon the gathering.

The annual meetings of the Woman Suffrage Associations are the principal stirrers of this pool. Washington, which probably contains, in a nebulous state, a larger amount of liberal thought and of personality influenced by it than any city except Boston within the United States, has in reality not a single organized effort to express such liberal thought and culture. The suffragists do stir the pool, do arouse some discussion, and break the monotony of political discussion and administrative polity. But that is all. There is not a single social centre around which has crystallized any visible and forceful expression of Free Religious activity. The Unitarian Society has become fashionable in its new environment, and cares as much as the "church for gentlemen," as I once heard the fashionable Episcopal Church called, to have its pews labelled by stencil-plates with names that bear the prefix of "Honorable." I saw that of the Nazarene glow in simple grandeur above these pews. Becoming fashionable, I fear its influence is becoming perfunctionary in character. At any rate, I find no obvious objective activity resulting from it.

There is nothing in the legislative field or that of broader politics as yet to need comment or special criticism. There is a change going on in the South. Material forces are fructifying in spiritual entities as they should always do, if genuine products of an industrial civilization. Napoleon once said of an army that it travelled on its commissariat. We may as well recognize the fact that civilization does the same. So the South is slowly passing from restoration, reconstruction, and reaction, into a regenerative epoch; and the first clear evidence, as is very natural, comes in the political field. Parties are breaking up, and the solid South breaks too. Was it Lydia Maria Child who once said, "God used instruments whom she would not touch with a ten-foot pole"? In the matter referred to, Chalmers of Mississippi is of more importance and perhaps more useful even than Bruce. Alvin Stewart is recorded to have once prayed in an anti-slavery meeting that the sinners and swearers might be brought to a realization of the evils of slavery, for he was sure that then the saints and the churches would follow. When the sinners are urgent for an enlargement of free schools, and demand an increase of educational opportunities for the "niggah" in particular, and "down South" in general, there is cause for rejoicing. Such is now the fact. It is to be hailed as a new proof of the value of free principles.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Practical Suggestions for Teachers and Parents.

The articles in the two numbers of the Index for December 30 and January 13 have treated the question of the religious education of the young very broadly and philosophically, so that it remains for me rather to assume the principles which they have laid down, and to come a little nearer, if possible, to the actual work which we should aim to accomplish. Unquestionably, there is a critical, if not a destructive, work to be done in regard to the old methods of religious training. But has not this work been too negative and sweeping? Do we not now need rather a reproductive criticism, which shall see what was good in the teachings of the Church and the Sunday-school, and insure the survival of the best in it, rather than a protest which shall destroy good and bad together?

It is not at all strange that radicals have felt that it was such an unspeakable blessing to be freed from the incubus of Calvinistic theology which rested upon them and their fathers that they have thought they had done enough for their children in bringing them up in the fresh air and sunshine, and letting natural religion have a fair chance for growth and life.

But, even on this side, there is still careful and good work to be done for the child. The old theology still exists and is active, and, with all our care, our children are liable to be exposed to influences which are skilfully managed so as to impress sensitive natures and lively imaginations. We ought to know what its real dangers are, and how to guard children from them.

Read in Judge Sewall's Diary the account of the sufferings which his daughter went through in her religious struggles, and see how powerless her noble father and excellent mother were to point out the true meaning of this mental torture. Ask any liberal physician to give his experience of the results of the religious excitements in producing not only immediate, but hereditary nervous disease, and enough will be given to show the importance of guarding children against such influences, not only by shutting them off from false teaching, but by giving them inward strength and faith which will render such doctrines as powerless over their minds as the superstitions of Greece or Rome.

We need a great deal of work in this direction which shall be preparatory, and assist the parent or teacher to know what the needs of the young soul really are.

But this is only prevention against evil from without: it is not really furnishing the young mind with the spiritual nourishment it needs and craves. This critical work needs to be done to help the teacher; but the teacher's direct influence upon the child should be rather affirmative than negative, and should help to develop his own nature rather than to impose limitations upon it.

Without attempting a thorough analysis of the religious sentiment, let us see what it is which we ought to aim at securing to the child by religious teaching. We want to give him a habit of mind which shall keep constantly in view great, universal principles, and wide relations to humanity instead of narrow, selfish considerations. As the child's first lesson in physical life is to become related to his surroundings, learning that he is not alone in the universe, but by sight and touch and hearing is connected with all around him, so his spiritual sense is to put him into relation with all other spirits and with the Universal Spirit. Goethe expresses this in his well-known and most suggestive statement of the "Three Reverences." With the more active consciousness of self, and the sense of self-reliance, must also be developed the dependence upon the higher powers, the mutual dependence of human beings upon each other, and even the dependence upon matter in its lower forms. But the child cannot receive this directly as science and philosophy, but must learn it through the medium of symbolism, through poetry and sentiment.

The observation and study of nature is a great means of religious teaching to a child. Nature is, as Goethe says, the garment by which God is seen; but this study must not be the mere analysis of nature, which is a needful step in science, but it must always keep the part in relation to the whole which, is the function of religion. It is only later in life that we would dissect the animal to see its exact type and form; but we would teach the child to love the bee and the butterfly, the cat and the squirrel, by a sympathetic observation of their lives and habits, and by so doing help him to recognize the order, beauty, and happiness of the universe.

Then we wish to form a spirit within the child which shall give him strength and comfort in the trials of life. Can we not all look back and see how much of this strength we gain from the experiences of lofty souls who have lived before us, the expression of whose thought and experience makes the sacred literatures of the world? How much of this is expressed in hymns which have become dear and familiar to us! When tempted to murmur at some trial laid upon us, do we not brace ourselves with that noble verse,—

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease?"

Or, in loneliness and sadness, do we not love to hum the sweet lines of the psalmist, "The Lord is my shepherd"? What a help is there in that single expression, "the valley of the shadow of death"!

Do we not owe it to our children to give to them these helps and soothing ministrations? But just as much are we bound to guard them against "There is a river filled with blood," or that selfish verse,

"I was not born as thousands are Where God was never known."

We must teach children in fables and parables, for so only can they receive spiritual food, even as they cannot make their daily bread of nitrogen and carbon; but we must remember Plato's caution, "to guard those who teach fables to the children," lest they give poisoned confectionery instead of honey distilled from fragrant flowers. Then, we must in the same broad, living way strengthen the moral nature, make the conscience healthy and vigorous, and the will firm, and yet an obedient servant, and not an arbitrary master.

A twofold work must be done in morals,—by the transcendental method, which appeals to the inward feeling of right, and by the utilitarian standard, which shows the justification of the inward law in its effects upon the well-being of humanity.

Both of these methods are religious, the one relating us to the centre,—to the inward feeling, to the spiritual motive,—and the other connecting us with the whole circle of life and humanity, and involving every question of individual and social ethics.

All these influences should help toward that spirit of love which is the name for a true relation to all that has being,—a love which is one with wisdom and justice, but is also warm and tender. Thus broadly sketched, the extent of the work is evident; but we can only hope to give hints and suggestions of detail and practical methods at first. We invite communication, criticism, and coöperation in it, both in fitting teachers and parents for their work and directly influencing children themselves.

The great means of instruction must be the fresh and pleasing presentation of old truths in the form of narrative and poetry, drawing from actual lives as far as possible. The child says, "I like a true story"; and, much as the fictitious tale of courage may stir the blood, the knowledge of the actual existence of the hero brings the lesson home to us. E. D. C.

HISTORY OF EGYPT. By Clara Erskine Clement. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

We have already had occasion to refer to the series of compendiums of history to which this volume belongs, in course of publication by the enterprising house whose name appears above. They possess in some particulars a unique character. Bound in handsome covers, profusely and fittingly illustrated, with beautiful paper and printing, they are not only exceedingly creditable specimens of book-making, but valuable contributions to the diffusion of popular knowledge in respect to the countries of wonder and antiquity to which they are devoted. The author of the present volume has already won for herself a place in successful authorship by A Handbook of Legendary and Mythological Art, and other works which she has given to the public of like research and scholarship. In tracing the course of the history of Egypt, she writes under the influence of an enlivened interest in its records through the fresh impressions of a preparatory sojourn and study among its remains as they appear to-day. The result is a succinct and graphic outline of this ancient civilization extended to the present time, that affords a convenient manual of reference and an excellent groundwork, alike for young and old, for more exhaustive reading in its direction in the future.

THE HEAD OF A MEDUSA. By George Fleming, author of Kismet and Mirage. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

The author of this story has given so much pleasure by her two previous novels Kismet and Mirage that she might very properly have come before the public wearing no disguise, especially as in her case the secret of her identity has been no secret from the first, while other writers of the "No Name Series" travel incognito even to this day. Putting off her anonymous mask, she now puts on a pseudonymous one, "George Fleming," the name of a character in Kismet. The pseudonym is one that will not require many stories of the power of the present one to make it highly honorable. It is deservedly so already. For The Head of a Medusa is a very beautiful, powerful story. It is finely conceived, and it is admirably and consistently developed. The style is equal to the conception and development. There are passages of remarkable force and striking beauty. Very seldom, almost never, is there a false note. A critic has declared the author of the book to be a mixture of Henry James, Jr., and of Ouida. But of Henry James, Jr., there is very little even in the character, Mr. Clifford Dix, who is supposed to represent him because "his books are impartially international," and he says that Boston is the literary junk-shop of Europe. The resemblance to Ouida consists in the intensity of the book, but the intensity is not Ouida's kind. The story is of one who "woke too late to find how bare the rock, how desolate, on which she had cast her precious freight." A profound idealist, she marries a man who is wholly different from her ideal conception of his character. For all its power and beauty, the book is an exceedingly painful one to read. It is one of a large class of pessimistic novels,—novels, that is, that depict the tragic side of life, and especially the tragic side of marriage. That two of the many characters in the book are happily married is a great relief.

THE February Atlantic contains its usual amount of good reading matter. Among the most important articles is one from Henry Hull, in which, after enumerating some of the various lines of trade and business that have experienced a marked revival in the past year, he says that the American shipping interest is the only one of importance that has not been benefited. In a commendatory article on "German Co-operative Credit-Unions," Richard T. Ely says: "The tendency of our times is to conduct all business on a large scale, and crush out the 'small man.'... The credit-unions aim at preserving the independent existence of as many of the poorer classes as possible." The success of the unions are proof that they supply an existing need. The first was started less than thirty years ago. In 1878 there were 1,841 of them in existence. In an interesting article, John Fiske begins an answer to his question "Who are the Aryans?" He says, "Whence those people originally came it would be idle to inquire, but we may fairly conclude that they first attained to something like world-historic importance in the highlands of Central Asia, somewhere about the sources of the Oxus and the Jaxartes." The name is derived from the occupation of the people, that of cultivators of the soil, and indicated a class of land-owners, who in time came to attribute to themselves a superiority to the tribes who were subjected to their rule and made to serve them. These people have spread widely over the world, and comprehend "the most dominant races known to history, Greeks and Romans, Slavs and Teutons, with the highly composite English." He thinks it not unlikely that in time "men of English speech will by and by have seized upon every part of the earth's surface not already covered by a well-established civilization, and will have converted them all into Aryan countries." Mr. Fiske closes his article with a hint that something more may be forthcoming as an exposition of the prehistoric culture of this lordly Aryan race to which we all belong. Other articles are Perley Poore's "Reminiscences of Washington," R. G. White's "In London Again," Wm. M. Rossetti's "Wives of the Poets,"—La Fontaine, Molière, Racine, Lessing, and Heine.

A NUMBER of land meetings have been prohibited in Ireland.

THE usual sermon to children in Westminster Abbey on Innocents' Day was preached by Dean Stanley to a large congregation.

A TERRIBLE accident occurred on Christmas day at the village of Saillagot, in Tarn et Garonne. The roof of the church fell in during vespers, and seven persons were killed and fifty severely injured.

THE tomb of Immanuel Kant at Königsberg will soon be decorated in a worthy manner. Upon a suitable pedestal, a marble bust of the great philosopher will be placed. The bust is the work of Prof. Siemering.

A COMMEMORATIVE tablet was recently placed at Besançon, on the house in which Victor Hugo was born. Victor Hugo, though unable to bear the excitement and fatigue of attending, sent a letter of thanks; and the proceedings were very enthusiastic.

MRS. O'BRIEN writes from Roserville, Ventnor, Isle of Wight, on Christmas eve: "In my garden here, I have in full bloom four different kinds of roses, veronicas of every shade, double stocks, French marguerites, cyclamens, scarlet geraniums, primroses, and violets in profusion."

AFTER a two days' trial, twelve persons have been condemned at Brussels to various terms of imprisonment, ranging from six years to one year, on charges arising out of the traffic in English girls for immoral purposes. Eight of the accused were men, and four women. As the case concerned English girls chiefly, an English solicitor watched the proceedings on behalf of the English Government.

THE Socialists are, it is reported, being attacked with great energy by the authorities in South Germany. It is feared that large and powerful secret societies with Socialist tendencies exist there. In Mayence, the house of a Socialist leader, Herr Leyendecker, has been thoroughly searched by the police; and many treasonable papers are said to have been discovered. A workmen's club or institution has been dissolved by the police in Mayence, and Frankfort is threatened with a state of siege.

A GREEK "MANIFESTO."– The following is from a document sent by "The Republican Greek Committee of 1880" to some of the resident Greeks of London: "To arms, Greeks! You who are heirs to the heroes of Marathon and Thermopylæ, arise as one man against not only the strangers who are without our gates, but also against those who are within. Greece for the Greeks; and no longer to be ruled by foreign nominees, subsidized by Russia, England, and France. Away with the Othos and Georges, and invoke the shade of those Greek patriots who in our time have died for Greek independence. Let us show to the world that we are worthy descendants of those who gave liberty, science, and intellectual culture to the world two thousand years ago. Arise, then, as one man, not only for Thessalia and Epirus, but also for every inch of Greek soil yet within the murderous grasp of the Ottoman. Be Europe with or against us, it matters not; for the aurora of universal freedom begins to dawn upon the world."

GARIBALDI'S letter to the Secolo calls attention in his usual style to one of the greatest evils attendant upon the system of universal military service. Of all the emigrants landing in New York, it is declared that "the most deformed, rickety, dirty, wretched, and thievish are the Italians." Too true, says Garibaldi, and why? Because the Royal Cuirassiers, the Royal Carabinieri, the soldiers of all arms, the gendarmes, the police and the monks, must all be picked men. The flower of the population being thus doomed to compulsory or voluntary celibacy, "what remains to propagate the Italian race? The narrow-chested, the rickety, the scrofulous, the deformed, the lame, and all that sort of people." Garibaldi only repeats the warning which Haeckel years ago addressed to the rulers of Germany, when he told them that the principle of universal military service might strengthen a nation for a time, but it insured its ultimate degeneracy by practically decreeing "the survival of the unfittest."—Pall Mall Budget.

THE anti-Jewish agitation in Prussia continues. Early on New Year's morning, the Unter den Linden and other streets were made the scenes of most unseemly violence. Large crowds of riotous merry-makers, mainly students, gathered before the chief café of the town, much frequented by the Jews, smashed the windows, and mobbed all the Jews whom they met. The police were comparatively helpless. Another café was invaded, and emptied of its Jewish customers. Large and stormy public meetings continue to be held. A large students' meeting took place on Monday to discuss the best means of extending the agitation. Deputations from the universities of Göttingen, Leipzig, Kiel, Rostock, and Halle were present. Fourteen hundred Berlin students, ten hundred and twenty-two Leipzig students, and numerous others, have already signed the anti-Jewish petition to Prince Bismarck. The agitator, Dr. Henrici, has been dismissed by the authorities from his post as schoolmaster.

A DISPUTE about burial-fees has led to some disgraceful scenes in Brightside churchyard, Sheffield. On Friday, January 7, a Mr. Fenn, who is a member of the Congregational chapel there, went to bury an infant child; but was met by a demand from the sexton for seven shillings as fees. This Mr. Fenn refused to pay, and the gates of the churchyard were then closed against him. After some altercation, he and two friends gained admission, when they found the sexton and his son filling up the grave. A trial of strength then took place, one party seeking to reopen it, and the others throwing back the earth as fast as it was cast out. Ultimately, the professional grave-diggers gained the mastery; and the parties retired, failing to gain an interview with the vicar, although he was seen looking through the vestry window. On Saturday, the struggle was renewed, Mr. Fenn going to the church-yard accompanied by several hundred persons. Some men proceeded to reopen the grave in which a child had been buried on the previous day. The sexton and his son tried to prevent this, when the crowd pushed them into the grave. After they were got out, the people held them back while the funeral service was conducted by a Congregational minister. The report adds that a collection was then made to provide for Fenn's expenses. From first to last, it is a scandalous story, which reflects discredit upon all concerned. The question of fees ought to be settled in some other way than by a pitched battle over an open grave, and a minister of any denomination should be ashamed of conducting a religious service commenced in such a manner.—Lloyd's Weekly.

JESTINGS.

A CONNECTICUT four-year-old, spying the gray hairs on her mother's head, said, "O mamma, you've got a lot of basting-thread in your hair."

THE people of Jamaica turned from the wreck of their homes, destroyed by the late high wind, and demanded of Boreas, "What d'you make a cyclone blow for now?" And Boreas answered with a whisper low, "By ginger, I don't know."

A BOY who had been engaged in a fight was reproved by his aunt, who told him he ought always to wait till the other boy "pitched upon him." "Well," exclaimed the little Cæsar, "but, if I wait for the other boy to begin, I'm afraid there won't be any fight."

A RURAL schoolmaster, coming out of the schoolhouse after the instructions in geography yesterday, said to the young schoolmistress who accompanied him, "Why do you preserve such a frigid aspect toward me, Sarah?" "Because I want torrid myself of you," was the temperate retort.

A GALVESTON poet came into the sanctum hurriedly, with a copy of the News in his hand, and going up to the editor remarked: "I did not notice my little poem on the 'Golden Tints of Expiring Autumn.' I suppose it was crowded out." "No: it was crowded in." "I don't see it." "Look in the waste basket. That's where it was crowded in."—Galveston News.

SECRETARY EVARTS tells an anecdote about John Marshall, who, when a fellow-passenger in a stage-coach exclaimed, "We are near the birthplace of Patrick Henry: how could he fail to be an orator when born amid this grand scenery?" replied, "Young man, this scenery has been here ever since Patrick Henry was born; but there have not been any more Patrick Henrys."

THE IMMORTAL LIFE.

By John Weiss.

12mo. 255 pp., with Heliotype Portrait of the Author.

PRICE $1.50.

What the Critics say of this Book:

Mr. Weiss is a suggestive rather than a convincing writer. He lays no foundations, and builds no structures in whose shelter men can find rest; but he takes one to points of elevation whence noble views are possible, and in quick glances opens up the mysteries of the soul and its life. The essays do not all treat directly of immortality, but they have what Arnold calls the unity of tendency. They are full of side-lights on the great problem. Mr. Weiss regarded personality as a prime and fundamental element in the structure of things, and he believed in a "personal continuance" with a steadfast faith.—Christian Union.

This posthumous volume on the life of man immortal proves how deep was Weiss' faith in the sublimity of man's nature. It is worthy the perusal of every one who doubts or believes the principle of eternal personal life hereafter. We bespeak for this strong work a wide welcome among thoughtful persons. The pages are full of gems that might go far to swell a book of notable quotations on life, belief, emotion, faith, work, hope, and progress.—Boston Transcript.

In this age of scepticism, when almost everybody doubts and insists upon proof, this work cannot fail to be a great help to those whose visions are clouded by fears that the grave ends all, and that there is no spiritual existence beyond the dark valley.—Boston Herald.

"The Immortal Life," by John Weiss, has for its theme "The Idea of the Hereafter," and is a brave and beautiful presentation of the topic by one who was an evolutionist. The author has a rare combination of the dainty and rugged in his style, one moment striking a pick-axe into some stony foundation, and the next planting flowers on the débris he has gathered. Without apparent connection, the chapters of this volume do combine to prove a strong support for the hope of "personal continuance" in the future.—Independent Methodist (Baltimore).

The essays of the late John Weiss on Materialism, Development, etc., continue to excite wide discussion. His harmonizing of the principles of evolution with creation will find many followers. Even some prominent teachers of the truths of revelation accept, or at least omit to deny, that the facts and theories of an original creation and subsequent development do not conflict.—Indianapolis Journal.

Those who were attracted by Mr Weiss' genius when alive will find here its best representatives. Here is his mature thought, the last, best offerings of his experience, observation, and reflection. He was an evolutionist and a maintainer of immortality. He can be read with an increasing respect for human nature and a sincerer tribute to Deity.—Boston Commonwealth.

Mr. Weiss' great argument for a future existence is the nature of human personality. The argument probably will not convince persons with a strong natural tendency to disbelieve immortality; but it clearly proves that science has not yet, as many persons apprehend and some claim, given a negative decision on the old question of immortal life. The old faith still stands; and people may hold it with Mr. Weiss, and yet accept all the attested facts of recent science.—Index (Boston).

The Faith of Reason.

A SERIES OF DISCOURSES ON THE LEADING TOPICS OF RELIGION.

By John W. Chadwick,

Author of "The Bible of To-Day," "A Book of Poems," etc.

"Free, original, brave, manly speech is here; never prosy, always earnest, often curiously apt, and sometimes swelling with its theme into fervid eloquence. . . . When we consider their quality, we marvel; for what sermons of the day can compare with these in richness, force, and beauty?"—Rev. Dr. F. H. Hedge, in the Unitarian Review.

"In this externally negative theology, there is an earnestness, a trustfulness in truth and honesty, a fearlessness as to the results of patient and reverent thinking, which has more of the freshness and fragrance of genuine faith than half the orthodox apologies and sermons of the day."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Everywhere pervaded by a spirit of profound reflection."—New York Tribune.

"There is extraordinary vigor and scope of thought in the treatment of these themes."—Boston Transcript.

"They are packed full of bold, strong, original thought. Perhaps their most striking feature is their utter fearlessness. . . . We venture to say that no book of equal volume issued from the press for years contains more vigorous and searching thought on more momentous themes."—Chicago Saturday Evening Herald.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 580.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 32.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1881.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

I AM that which has been, which is, which will be; and no one has yet lifted the veil that covers me.—Egyptian.

THOU, Lord, art one with Supreme Wisdom and with the lower wisdom. All knowledge is thy form. Thou art hidden, indescribable, without name, inconceivable. Thou art smaller than the smallest, and greater than the greatest. Seeming many, thou art one. All things are in thee, unknown, all-knowing.—Hindu.

THE reason which can be reasoned is not the Eternal Reason. The name which can be named is not the Eternal Name.—Chinese.

TOUCHING the Almighty, we cannot find him out: he is excellent in power, and in judgment, and in plenty of justice: he will not afflict.—Hebrew.

O THE depth of the riches, and of the wisdom, and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his purposes, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been made his counseller? or who first gave to him, and shall receive a return? From him, and through him, and to him are all things.—Christian.

WITH God are the keys of the secret things. No vision taketh him in; but he taketh in all vision.—Mohammedan.

I KNOW by myself how incomprehensible God is, seeing I cannot comprehend the parts of my own being.—St. Bernard.

GOD is the light which, never seen itself, makes all things visible, and clothes itself in colors. Thine eye feels not its ray, but thy heart feels its warmth.—Richter.

WE, too, would say God, if the moment we said God you would not pretend that you know all about him.—Matthew Arnold.

WE stand here at the limits of our knowledge: we gaze into an abyss we can fathom no further. But this much at least is certain,—that the personal image which meets our gaze there is but a reflection of the wondering spectator himself. If we always bore this in mind, there would be as little objection to the expression "God" as to that of the rising and the setting of the sun, where we are all the time quite conscious of the actual circumstances. . . . At any rate, that on which we feel ourselves entirely dependent is by no means merely a rude power to which we bow in mute resignation, but is at the same time both order and law, reason and goodness, to which we surrender ourselves in loving trust.—Strauss.

WE cannot think far in any direction without coming upon that which is more than all our knowledge, something that is and must be in itself unknown, not because it is uncertain, but because it is far too real for our superficial faculties. We cannot mark phenomena without thinking of substance. We cannot admire the ordered system of the universe without aspiring in imagination to law above law, until at the topmost height one inconceivable stream of force springs into a myriad channels of harmonious action. We cannot feel the world's heart beat in the ceaseless energy of living things without adoring an all-pervading Life. Yet substance, law, power, and life are only names of the unutterable; the last murmurs upon the lip when different paths of knowledge open on those measureless contemplations which command the worship of silence.—Picton.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IF, as reported, President Porter of Yale College has ever said that "Juniors in college frequently are evolutionists, but Seniors usually get over it," it only proves that even wise college Presidents can make very foolish remarks.

BY a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, a debt contracted on Sunday is not valid and cannot be collected, even though the debtor should afterward promise to pay it,—which, even if good law, is not good morality.

THE Bulletin Committee of the Associated Charities in Boston recommend to citizens to carry the tickets of the Society in their pockets, ready to be handed to street-beggars. By presenting these tickets at the office of "the Charities," those really deserving help will be cared for.

THE American Tract Society has issued a biography of Jesus, printed in Hebrew, for missionary work among the Jews. It is written by Alexander Meyrowitz, LL.D. Though closely following the story in the New Testament, it is not a literal translation. The parables are put into the form of Hebrew verse.

ONE of our contributors recently, in a book notice, related the incident of a barber who, while using the shears, startled him with some question about Arnold's Light of Asia, which the man of tonsorial art was reading. But a subscriber sends word that he has a barber who is ahead of the Light of Asia man,—one who broke out the other day with the inquiry whether he had read Haeckel's last work on the Evolution of Man; and our subscriber had to confess that the barber was ahead of him.

THE American Library Association promises an occasion of exceptional interest for its fourth general meeting, which is to be held in Washington next week. The Convention will occupy three entire days, and will include addresses from some of the most distinguished educators and persons engaged in library work in the country. We notice that the Convention is to be honored with a reception by President Hayes, and other courtesies of the capital will doubtless be extended to the members of this most important Association.

ROMAN CATHOLIC Bishop McQuaid, of Western New York, appears to have a foreboding that church property will be taxed in this country before very long. In a recent letter to his diocese, he refers to the matter as a threatening evil which the Church may have to meet; and he advises the parishes under his care to free themselves as speedily as possible from any debts they may be burdened with, so that, when the evil day of "church taxation" comes, they may be in a better condition to bear the new burden without the danger of losing any of their property.

REV. DR. MALLALIEU made the prayer in Tremont Temple previous to Wendell Phillips' reply to Chancellor Crosby's address on Temperance, and is reported to have prayed fervently that a baptism of common-sense might descend on "that Rip Van Winkle of the Temperance Reform," who spoke there two weeks before. Such a "prayer," it may be safely said, helped neither the temperance cause nor the cause of religion. If Dr. Mallalieu was burning with a caustic criticism of Chancellor Crosby, which that audience needed to hear, he should have been allowed a few minutes for speaking directly to it, manfashion, with his eyes open.

IT looks as if an attempt were to be made to prove that George Eliot recanted her sceptical opinions in the last year of her life. Her marriage with Mr. Cross was in a conservative church, and according to the ordinary Episcopal form. A Unitarian clergyman officiated at her burial, and no Comtist spoke. And now it seems that the book she last read was the Imitation of Christ, since a copy of it was found near her empty chair after her death. A correspondent of the Philadelphia Presbyterian, who speaks of this fact, adds, "It is supposed she was not so decided a Positivist as she was said to be."(!) Here, evidently, are all the elements working toward the claim that she died "a good Christian."

A FRIEND thinks that the Reverend Ritualist Knox-Little, whose opinions of woman, expressed in a Philadelphia lecture, are receiving the deserved castigations of the press, must have derived his views from the now disappearing barbarism of Japan; for Miss Bird, in her Unbeaten Tracks in Japan, reports a code there on the position of women closely resembling the ritualist preacher's,—namely, "the wife has no lord and master but her husband, therefore she must do his bidding and not repine. The rule which women must observe is obedience. . . . The wife must obey the husband in all that he orders her to do; and, when he is angry, she must not resist, but obey. All women shall think their husbands to be heaven, so they must not resist their husbands, and incur the punishment of heaven. Women shall always keep to their duty, rise early and work till late at night. She must not sleep during the day, and must not neglect her weaving, sewing, and spinning, and must not drink too much tea or wine. During festivals, she must first visit her husband's relatives in preference to her own, and, except her husband allow her, she shall not go out or give gifts to any one. The minds of women generally are as dark as night, and are more stupid than men. Women are stupid, therefore they must be humble and obedient to their husbands. In all stations of life, the wife must stand behind her husband. Though she may have done good deeds, she must not be vain of them. Though it be said she is bad, she shall not resist: she will continue to improve herself; and, when she comports herself wisely the intimacy between herself and her husband will be a happy one." On the whole we think this a little better than the Knox-Little code.

WORDS.

An Essay read before the Milton Club of Brooklyn, N.Y.

BY W. H. BOUGHTON.

"There is nothing more common," says Voltaire, "than to read and to converse to no purpose. In history, in morals, in law, in physic, and in divinity, be careful of equivocal terms." One of the ancients wrote a book to prove that there was no word which did not convey an ambiguous and uncertain meaning; and, if we possessed this lost work, it would probably furnish a curious commentary upon our dictionaries of synonymes. Whenever the same word is associated by the parties with different ideas, they may converse or controverse until the crack of doom. This, with a little obstinacy and some agility in shifting his ground, makes the fortune of an opponent. While one party is worried in disentangling a meaning, and the other is winding and unwinding about him with another, a word of the kind we have mentioned, carelessly or perversely slipped into an argument, may prolong it for a century or two. Vaugelas, who passed his life in the study of words, would not allow that the sense was to determine the meaning of words; "for," says he, "it is the business of words to explain the sense." Kant for a long while discovered in this way a facility of arguing without end. Throw out a word capable of fifty senses, and you raise fifty parties. Should some friend of peace enable the fifty to repose on one sense, that innocent word would lie in forgetfulness in the dictionary. Plato and Aristotle probably agreed much better than the opposite parties which they raised up imagined. Their difference was in the manner of expression rather than in the points discussed. The Nominalists and the Realists, who once filled the world with their brawls, and who from irregular words came to regular blows, could never comprehend their alternate nonsense,—whether, in employing general terms, words or names only are used, or whether there is in nature anything corresponding to what we mean by a general idea. The Nominalists only denied what no one in his senses would affirm, and the Realists only contended for what no one in his senses would deny. Do we flatter ourselves that the logomachies of the Nominalists and the Realists terminated with these scolding schoolmen? Leibnitz confused his philosophy by the terms sufficient reason (probably meaning cause). Even Locke, who has himself so admirably noticed "the abuse of words," has been charged with using vague and indefinite ones. He has sometimes employed the words reflection, mind, and spirit in so indefinite a way that they have confused his philosophy. Even the eagle eye of Newton grew dim in the obscurity of the language of Locke. We are astonished to discover that two such intellects should not comprehend the same ideas; for Newton wrote to Locke, "I beg your pardon for representing that you struck at the root of morality in a principle laid down in your book of Ideas, and that I took you for a Hobbist."

The removal of a solitary word may permit the light to shine upon a whole body of philosophy. "If we had called the infinite the indefinite," says Condillac, "by this small change of a word, we should have avoided the error of imagining that we have a positive [experiential] idea of infinity, from whence so many false reasonings have been carried on, not only by metaphysicians, but even by geometricians."

At the Council of Basle, for the convenience of the disputants, John de Secubia drew up a treatise of undeclined words, chiefly to determine the signification of the particles from, by, but, and except, which it seems were perpetually occasioning fresh disputes among the Hussites and the Bohemians.

In jurisprudence, much confusion has occurred in the uses of the term rights, yet the social union and human happiness are involved in the precision of the expression. In politics, great evils have resulted from abstract terms to which no ideas are affixed,—such as the equality of man, the sovereignty of the people, loyalty, reform, public opinion, liberty, and other abstract terms, which have excited the hatred or the ridicule of the vulgar.

Abstract ideas as sounds have been used as watchwords. And, as Locke says, "wisdom, glory, grace, etc., are words frequent enough in every man's mouth," but think of their embarrassment if asked to define them.

Referring to the mutability of the meaning of words, let us instance tyrant, parasite, and sophist, originally honorable distinctions, apology, impertinent, indifferent, extravagant, etc. Think of the confusion of ideas which has resulted from the common-sense of the Scotch metaphysicians. Think of the astonishment of the frugal Epicurus, if he could know that his word pleasure, intended by him merely to soften Stoic austerity, had been associated with his own name, and that Epicurean means gluttonous. Imagine him reading the line, "The fattest hog in Epicurus' sty."

A misnomer confuses all argument. Think of rents, riches, and value. Before entering upon a discussion with the metaphysician, let us first settle what he means by the nature of ideas,—with the politician, his notion of liberty and equality; with the theologian, what he considers orthodox; with the political economist, what he considers to be value and rent. By this means, we may avoid that perpetually recurring laxity or vagueness of words, which makes every writer or speaker complain of his predecessor, and attempt, sometimes not in the best temper, to define and to settle the signification of what the witty South calls "those rabble-charming words which carry so much wild fire wrapped up in them."

So far, I have taken largely and sometimes literally from the elder Disraeli; and, although this text is a long one, I think we may materially condense it, and conclude that it is impossible to say words to a half-dozen men and be certain that they all understand you alike. With "Words," then, for a text, let us indulge in a few reflections.

I.

Confusion of words leads to confusion of ideas; and this leads inevitably to want of sympathy with the earnest thoughts of others. Numerous illustrations of this fact, as related to the thoughtful opinions of intelligent people, will occur to every one. And a ludicrous instance of it, as related to absurd people, is furnished by the significant fact that, at the marriage of Caddy Jellyby, everybody had a philanthropic mission, but nobody with a mission cared a straw for anybody else's mission.

II.

We are told that the progress of science and scientific knowledge have revolutionized the modern world; and we hear no end of praise of the scientific method. This word, "science," is in a very nebulous condition. Not long ago, a paper was read before a large audience, entitled "The Scientific Test of Immortality." But there are no scientific tests of immortality; for, if there are, then by which of the sciences shall immortality be tested? Surely not by the methods of the only science which is purely abstract, not mathematically: it is hardly a question of quantitative soul. Surely not by the methods of any of the concrete sciences,—not, for instance, biologically, not sociologically, not chemically, and not psychologically. It cannot be treated psychologically any more than it can be treated astronomically. In a word, such subjects cannot be treated scientifically. It behooves us, then, to ascertain what science is. Let us try our hand at defining it.

Science is the unification of such superior knowledge as is conditioned proximately by experience; and is thus distinguished from so much of philosophy as consists in the unification of such supreme knowledge as is conditioned ultimately by experience. Science includes knowledge, but all knowledge is not science. Science is that superior kind of knowledge which has been generalized (and not merely particularized), systematized (and not merely arranged), and, above all, verified (and not merely assumed or preconceived).

III.

Notwithstanding the wrangles, the refinements, the pomposity, the arrogance, the intolerance, the choplogic, and the jargon of the scholastics, the theologians, and the metaphysicians, and notwithstanding the hasty generalizations, the crudities, and the speculations of even such minds as Plato and Aristotle, the charms of speculative thought are the most enduring attractions which the ages have left us. These charms are ever new. The witchery of the dreamer, the theorist, the idealist in all ages,—in a word, the men of ideas, however warped or however grotesque, are the names which live. No one who shall ever hear of Darwin can forget my Lord Monboddo. The glory of the military conquests of Greece and Rome have long since ceased to dazzle. Why? Because the dominant idea back of them was territorial acquisition. The Grecian statuary—and in a word, Grecian Art—have back of them no force which can propel them into the future, simply because they reached perfection. But there is a future for the Porch and the Groves of the Academy; for the ideas underlying these have by no means attained their majority: there is plenty of room for growth.

In other words, man will never cease to speculate, to be impatient of mystery, to reach out after the unknown. And, in order that he may intelligently strive for the gratification of this irrepressible longing of his soul, it would seem to be of the first importance that his means should be adapted to his ends; and, first and foremost of all his means, his implements and tools are words,—words which shall be definite enough to point to the idea seeking expression, and to no other, and elastic enough to expand as the idea expands. It is the failure of thinkers to agree upon fitting words to express abstract ideas which impedes progress in the direction of the highest ideals and reduces to a babel that which might be a sublime philosophy. Every science has its technical language, and this is one of the conditions of its progress; but a technical language for philosophy seems to be ignored even by philosophers, and the result is that each inquirer into the highest realms of thought invents a dialect and nomenclature of his own, to the bewilderment of his fellows and the confusion of ideas, his own first of all. For want of words, science is confounded with philosophy, philosophy is confounded with metaphysics and mental gymnastics, and all of them are left undefined.

Now, we have already defined science with scientific precision; and it will readily be seen that such necessary precision, necessary for science, is the very thing which prevents its employment in the efforts of the mind to attain that supreme knowledge which transcends the superior knowledge of science. What name, then, shall we give to that method by which we may reach supreme knowledge? Shall it be philosophy, or shall it be metaphysics or mental science or psychology or words? Such as share my preference for philosophy will also share my desire to know what that word means. Let us try to define it. Philosophy is the unification of the highest generalizations of the sciences. These are the factors of philosophy; the keys in the organ, which, awakened by an unskilful hand, send out a discordant blast, but at the touch of a Spencer swell forth the music of the spheres. Nor is the emotional alone involved. Involved is a good word; for the products of philosophy appeal first to the judgment, and are not accepted by the judgment unless the emotional is involved. Such as shall take the trouble to get a clear mental image of what philosophy is will never confound it with much that goes under the name of metaphysics; and these will never be misled by the flippant talk which we so often hear to the effect that we have nothing to do with abstractions in this life, because by the laws and conditions of thought we are confined to concrete matters. They will challenge such expressions as idealists, impractical dreamer, mere theorist, etc.; for they will not be long in finding out that philosophic subjects are of universal interest, that abstract treatment of philosophic subjects is abstract in form only, that such subjects must be abstractly formulated in order that they may be complete, in order that an idea of a subject as a whole may take possession of the mind, and, to this end, that such whole may be formulated in an expression of such widest generality as shall be inclusive of all its concrete aspects.

The efforts to limit our lives and our thoughts to the here and the now will fail, as they have always failed; and, in order that we may intelligently guide our thoughts in the reasonable quest of the higher and the better, we must so far recognize the eternal fitness of things that we shall understand and understandingly use the terms which we employ.

MAX MUKLLER has stirred up the endless dispute of thirty years ago over the proper Chinese synonyme for "God" by rendering "Ti" and "Shang-ti" by "God" in his new edition of Confucius. The fact appears to be that while the significance of these words, meaning "emperor" and "supreme emperor on high," fall far short of the idea conveyed by God, they come as near it as any Chinese word, unless, as has been done by some of the missionaries, a new word is invented.

ENGLISH AFFAIRS LITERARY AND POLITICAL.

The request which the Editor has done me the honor to make to me, that I would contribute an article to the Index, or make some report to it once a month, gave me more pleasure than will appear from my delay in fulfilling the promise I at once made to do so. Some articles which I undertook to write for an English paper, and of which advance proofs are supplied to the New York Tribune, entitled "Among the Americans," have occupied more time than I foresaw, although I do no more than tell the story of pleasant days in the United States as I told it at my own fireside on my return.

Now the New Year has come, which is regarded as the season of new resolutions, it has occurred to me to endeavor to act upon the old one I had made of writing you. The close of the past year had a sad interest imparted to it by the death of George Eliot. What was said of her when she produced her famous novel of tragical times in Italian life—namely, "that she drew Savonarola with all the strength of a man, Romola with all the tenderness of a woman"—indicated the supreme quality of genius which she possesses. Capacity of this kind is only united in a writer of a high order of power. George Eliot, like George Sand, took the name of a man, because she chose to show that women could write with that dispassionate strength and understanding which men alone were supposed to possess. But George Eliot, like Miss Martineau, was a perfectly womanly woman, and alike in mind and manners was free from any affectation of mannishness, always keeping pure the conscious graces of her own sex. In the opinion of great judges, like Professor Huxley, George Sand had a stronger grasp of the felicities of fiction in the facts of life than George Eliot. George Eliot pleaded magnificently for social freedom and toleration; while, as we all know, George Sand made a more intrepid and outspoken vindication thereof. Cervantes, Shakespeare, Walter Scott, George Sand, and George Eliot stand as five peerless names in the department of literature in which they worked. Most of the writers of fiction see the persons whom they introduce into their works. George Eliot saw their minds just as clearly, and identified them by their qualities, as though they were disembodied; and every reader knew them evermore. She had the dramatic imagination of Bunyan.

We would, had it been a matter of choice, have buried one of a genius so bright and humorous on a day of sunshine; but Wednesday, December 29, the day of her interment, was an evil-minded day, all mud and mist and rain, which, however, did not prevent a crowd of probably five hundred persons from assembling round her grave, among whom were some of the most eminent thinkers of England. She was laid in the lower portion of Highgate Cemetery, and, by choice, in unconsecrated ground. It was intended to bury her in the grave of George Henry Lewes, but a new grave adjoining his was finally chosen. There is no instance of two other persons being associated in life, so eminent in diversity of capacity as George Henry Lewes and George Eliot. Personally she was comely rather than beautiful, and her manner of conversation very sweet and dignified. In later years, age had given her quite a commanding and queenly look. When Garibaldi was last in England, we gave him what you call a "grand reception" at the Crystal Palace, where probably thirty thousand persons were present. George Eliot asked me to come and sit on the dais by her side, and tell her all about "the General," as we familiarly call Garibaldi, with whom I had often had personal and official communication. She understood, I need not say, the art of asking questions. George Henry Lewes, whom I first knew in the days when I was associated with the Leader newspaper (in which I wrote the "Ion" letters to which Mr. Wendell Phillips replied in the Melodeon), was the most intrepid thinker of that day, and to him I owed my first public association with men of letters. Herbert Spencer, Thornton Hunt (a man of wonderful intellectual courage), W. J. Linton, and others, were the principal writers upon it. It was then I first knew George Eliot. Three or four years ago, I travelled into Kent with Mr. Lewes. He induced the station-master to delay the train a few minutes that I might go down into the vale below, to speak with George Eliot, who had driven down to meet him. I had never seen her look so well. That was the last time I saw her. The day before I sailed for America, I received a letter from her, in which she spoke of a passage in my History of Coöperation, describing the "ruins of education of New Lanark," which she said had to her mind "a tragic impressiveness." In the same work, I had quoted some lines from the opening of her poem of Jubal, to which I had put the name of William Morris, the author of the Earthly Paradise. Having made a quotation from Morris in the same work, I had not noticed the error, being blind when the proofs went to the press. She said in a very pleasant way that Mr. Morris might not be gratified by having lines of hers imputed to him. It was a modest way of putting it. Mr. Morris would probably think the error a compliment.

At the burial of George Eliot, the Rev. Dr. Sadler, Unitarian minister, read a selected portion of the Burial Service over the body, and made a short oration, very gracefully expressed, on her character and writings. She used herself often to attend with Mr. Lewes the little Comtist Chapel, not far from the Foundling Hospital, where Dr. Congreve ministers. He and Mr. Frederic Harrison were at the burial; and it was expected one of them would have spoken, as there is much of Comtist political philosophy in George Eliot's writings. Three of the sons of Mr. Lewes were also present, and Mr. Herbert Spencer, Professor Huxley, Professor Tyndall, Edward F. S. Piggott (our examiner of plays), General Sir Garnet Wolseley, Mr. Browning the poet, Mr. Woolner, R.A., Mr. J. Knowles, editor of the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Moncure D. Conway, Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., Mr. Grant Duff, M.P., Lady Colville, Mr. Godfrey Turner, and other friends of the lost writer.

As the new year has now set down its feet on the great plain of time, perhaps I ought to make a brief summary of what in English eyes is the great gain of the past twelve months. The year 1880 has been one of those which Lord Macaulay would so well have described, showing in what an extraordinary way the political tenacity of the English people was proven. Some years ago, they placed in power a political party alien to all the hopes and interests which had been cherished by the nation for forty years. It had become the political conclusion of ordinary political philosophers that English nature had entirely changed, that the policy of democratic progress had been abandoned, that the diplomatic pursuits of peace had become ignoble in British eyes, and that the heart of the nation was turned in the direction of imperialism and aggressive war. It was commonly believed that social progress and industrial economy had come to be regarded as effeminating pursuits. The eloquence of our great tribunes of liberalism was thought to have lost all its inspiration. Mr. Gladstone's mighty orations were considered as wasted upon the desert air. Yet all the while the nation was the same as it had been before. Imperialism played its foreign and fantastic tricks among us. All at once the English people reasserted themselves. No visible sign of their action had gone before, which attracted the attention of ordinary observers. Yet in a day they swept away the disturbing, costly, and perilous rulers, whom they had suffered to reign over them, and 1880 gave us a Parliament of great promise, the like of which England has never known. Public affairs have been committed to Mr. Gladstone's sagacious and honest hands. The country has a majority of representatives more to its mind than any one expected to see for years to come; and, though Irish questions are more troublesome than they have hitherto been, they have been met with a dignity and forbearance formerly impossible, and real redress will certainly be accorded the Irish people, and afterward will follow similar redress for English evils. The real difficulty with the government is the English landlords, who seek to prevent redress in Ireland from fear that similar measures of redress will be demanded in England. This may be so, since improvement has stronger wings to fly with than heretofore.

As I conclude this communication, the Index for December 16 arrives, in which I see an article signed by Mr. Towne, which must have been written without that knowledge of English ecclesiastical facts known to most of us. In it, it is stated that "Mr. Stopford Brooke has allowed the long hypocrisy of his understood position to cease." The writer adds: "I do not for a moment say that this hypocrisy has prevented in the least Mr. Brooke manifesting, in many large and noble ways, entire honesty of mind and heart." The latter part of this sentence does not atone for the first. There cannot be "entire honesty of mind and heart," if he has been maintaining in the most solemn way "a long hypocrisy." In another sentence, it is said, "Mr. Brooke has gone on mouthing the name of Jesus." As one who has long known Mr. Brooke, and who has heard some of his noble and sincere sermons, I must say that this language is of the nature of an outrage. As a friend of Mr. Brooke, and as one who has long held his name in honor, I could not write to you after reading the words I have quoted, without assuring you that Mr. Towne is entirely mistaken. What views Mr. Brooke ought to hold, in Mr. Towne's opinion, is quite another question. But there can be no question that Mr. Brooke has always held what he has professed to hold. There is no ecclesiastic in any English pulpit who has given more conspicuous proofs of intellectual sincerity and religious courage than the Rev. Stopford Brooke.

THE PULPIT IN A FALSE POSITION.

Thank you for your article on "Pulpit Ethics." Our remarks on "Insincerity in the Pulpit" were not intended to apologize for ministerial dishonesty. If there is any virtue which we profoundly reverence and before which we take off our shoes, and our hat too, it is upright and downright fair dealing with our own souls and our fellow-men. And, if there is any enormous evil which we see in the churches as they are, it is the crushing out of this spirit of fair dealing in thousands of ministers, who in everything else are good and true men.

In what we said, therefore, we aimed simply to present the facts as they appeared to us. We admit that men who teach others should be brave and strong, and rise above the power of temptation. But neither history nor observation proves that clerical human nature is exempt from the common weakness of our lot. And for years our conviction has been gaining more and more strength that the position of a regularly hired minister of any religious society whatever is essentially a false position. We are not opposed, however, to preaching. We believe in holding up before men the highest ideals of human life, of pressing home to the heart and conscience the truths which will quicken and inspire. We recognize in the past the vast power of the pulpit for good. We believe that millions to-day are made stronger and better by it. And if the pulpit rested on a basis purely moral, recognizing human relations as first and foremost, it could exist perhaps without compromising the individual. But as the pulpit stands to-day, requiring conformity to usages and creeds which a dead past originated, requiring silence when plain speech would give serious offence, dependent upon heterogeneous elements,—radicals, conservatives, democrats, republicans, ignorant and intelligent,—in such a position, how can a man stand squarely on his own feet, look his congregation straight in the eye, and say out fearlessly all that he thinks and feels,—say out indeed all that is in his heart,—pray if he wants to pray or let it alone, read or not read Jewish scriptures as he may wish, deal out the truth whoever it hits or wounds,—lawyers, politicians, merchants, frivolous women or mean and shallow men,—how can he do this, and keep his congregation and get his salary?

The constantly recurring trials for heresy among Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians; the bitter intellectual struggles through which ministers are daily passing; the vigilant eye which congregations and ecclesiastical bodies keep upon the words of men who give the slightest indication of manliness and independence; the decreasing estimate in which ministers are generally held by thoughtful people; the suspicion that they tell but half the truth,—are all indications to our mind that the position of the pulpit is a false one. Are we right or wrong in this view? Personally, we like ministers. It is one of our greatest pleasures to associate with them. They are grand good fellows. And yet, when we look at all the conditions of their position, at their dependence, at the stern demands of usage, at the stern demands of creed, at the stern demands of political and social morality, and at the demands of caprice, taste, and ignorance which they must satisfy, we cannot but feel that their position is a false one.

And yet, if we are asked what we will substitute for the Church and the pulpit, we are unable to answer the question. We can see the efficiency which organization lends to any form of action for the good of men; and yet, when we think what might have been the condition of religious thought, and all thought to-day, had the human mind been free, we sometimes question whether far more evil than good has not been the result of church organizations and a hired, dependent ministry.

But would not society have gone to destruction without such a ministry? Has the pulpit then, we ask, taught the world, as a primary lesson, that the love of truth is one of the noblest virtues of the human mind? Has it made the pursuit of truth as truth one of the first duties of men and women? Is the world indebted to the pulpit for its deliverance from superstition, for its magnificent attainments in science, for its spirit of tolerance, or for the moralities of its literature, commerce, and politics?

Human nature has been greater than the preacher, and it has done more to reform the Church than the Church has ever done to reform the world.

The fly on the wheel, however, magnifies his importance. The carriage would stop but for his potent help. And if the morals of society were all surface phenomena, if they rested upon mere assent to the authority of written words, then perhaps the pulpit might claim that it is the mighty conservator of morals and savior of society.

But has morality such a superficial basis? Can all the physical phenomena of the universe be traced to the very heart of its molecules; and is that which is purest and divinest, last and best, is that all on the surface, and so uncertain, so fleeting, that pulpits only can save it from perishing? Is it not true that, in spite of pulpit influence, science is awakening throughout the world a reverence for truth, and a rectitude of mind to which theology is an absolute stranger? And why? Seek in the human soul for an answer. Doubt the human soul and you are the worst of sceptics. Out of it has come all that is true, all that is pure and beautiful and good in the past or in the present. And will the soil become poor, if you mow down the surface crop? Do you annihilate a force, when you change its direction? For ourselves, we have boundless confidence in soul force. It is as much a part of the universe as the law of gravitation. It is equally indestructible, and the operation of this force for truth and good is just as certain as the operation of any law of nature.

All this emphasis, then, which is placed on this or that ism, on this or that institution, as indispensable to the world's morality and the world's salvation, we utterly distrust. Biology reveals the significant fact that nature cephalizes, grows headward; and society reveals the fact that our higher life tends toward the heart and conscience. The golden rule is no accident. Moral laws and morality are not ephemeral, at the mercy of conservatives or radicals. Extinguish the sun, then you can silence the conscience.

A MONUMENT TO SHELLEY.

A paragraph is in circulation to the effect that a monument is to be erected on the Italian coast, near the Gulf of Spezzia, on the spot where the remains of Shelley were burned in 1822, commemorative of the poet. Students of Oxford, from which University he was expelled for atheism, are moving in the matter. This paragraph reminds one of the fact that Shelley, so far as his opinions were concerned, would not have been the alien in the England of to-day which he was in his own time; namely, in the early part of this century. We read of the tidal wave of atheism which is sweeping over England, and which is soon to overflow this country. In his attitude toward the Deity of history, tradition, and orthodoxy, Shelley was an atheist; for he felt that the universe was living and vital throughout, and not a dead mechanism merely, which was made once on a time and set in motion by an external power. He did not believe in a creation, but in an ever-existent, a dateless cosmos, pervaded, upheld, and animated by a Power for which there is no name, and which cannot be expressed in terms of beings like ourselves. That was the head and front of Shelley's atheism. It was a protest against the crude, barbarous, anthropomorphic conceptions of the past.

The sublimest thinkers who have ever lived have been of Shelley's religion, among others the gentle and profound Spinoza. The word that describes the belief of such men as Shelley is Pantheism. To a nature so lofty and unselfish as that of Shelley, the old-fashioned creeds, with their arbitrary, despotic, vindictive Deity, open to the same appeals from his worshippers as are mortal tyrants, and with their bribery of a heaven of insipid adulation and bliss and their bugbear of eternal torment, were inexpressibly revolting. To Shelley, the phenomena of the sensible world were pregnant with the divinest inspiration. His fine organization was a lyre, as it were, which constantly vibrated to every touch of nature in all its impulses and moods. His poetry was a ceaseless hymn and oblation to the beauty and sublimity of the sensible world. In Switzerland and Italy, he was steeped, as it were, in that sublimity and beauty. The religion of Shelley, then, is the religion of the chief scientists of to-day. It was the religion of Humboldt. The God of Shelley is the spiritus intus, or the animating principle of the ever-living, unbeginning, unending universe. His Deity was never quiescent or sunk in inertia. Eternal Space was always full of circling stars and constellations, was always throbbing with light and life. Shelley saw God in all natural phenomena, and thought of him, in the sublime language of Picton, as "the splendor of all things gathered into unity and expanded into infinite totality." In his wonderful juvenile poem, entitled "Queen Mab," he says, "There is no God!" But in a note he explains himself thus: "This negation must be understood solely to affect a Creative Deity. The hypothesis of a pervading spirit coeternal with the universe remains unshaken."

What peace and content would the science and thought and brightening prospects of humanity of to-day have brought to the spirit of Shelley! How would he have rejoiced at the great events of the last quarter of a century in both hemispheres. The unspeakable beauty of nature and the splendid possibilities of human life, rightly lived, according to the dictates of the sense of justice, truth, and beauty, which is innate in the soul, made Shelley regard the fleetingness and evanescence of our lives with inexpressible sadness and regret. He mourned that death was "the law of this so lovely world"! He sighed that nought with us may endure but mutability. Shelley was the John the Baptist, the forerunner of current freethought and free religion. In the sublime Hebrew phrase, he was literally "one sent"; while the majority of poets are merely melodious versifiers and more or less successful literary men, Shelley was an august prophet and vates. There is no dilettanteism in his verses. His poetry is throughout religious; that is, it is instinct with the spirit of awe which is awakened by the constant contemplation of the mystery and splendor of the universe. His "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty" is a pantheistic psalm:—

"The awful shadow of some unseen Power
Floats, though unseen, among us; visiting
This various world with as inconstant wing
As summer winds, that creep from flower to flower;
Like moonbeams that behind some piny mountain shower,
It visits with inconstant glance
Each human heart and countenance;
Like hues and harmonies of evening,
Like clouds in starlight widely spread,
Like memory of music fled,
Like aught, that for its grace may be
Dear, and yet dearer for its mystery."

Morally as well as mentally, Shelley belonged to the highest order of men. A brother poet, with whom his name is now associated, but who was his inferior in every respect, said that the world did not know how mild, how tolerant, how good he was. But I am writing in an age which requires no vindication of Shelley. He was one of the martyrs of liberty, whose name a more and more liberal posterity will not let die.

THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

The seventh Monday lecture was given by Rev. Geo. R. Crooks, D.D., of Drew Theological Seminary, the subject being "Old and New Theologies."

The lecturer began by saying, "The signs of a demand for a new theology are so many that he who runs may read them." But he did not mean that; for he was particular to say that there is no disposition "to abandon Scripture," and that "Scripture is the sole standard of appeal in matters of faith," i.e., in matters of theology.

Just as long as the "Scripture" is held to be a "revelation" of the will of God, and to be his infallible word, just so long will it be impossible to have a "new theology." There may be endless modifications of old theology, but the mark of the mythology of the Bible will be over and through it all. And that Dr. Crooks means this is seen by his statement that, "though we admit that theology is progressive, it does not follow that we are ready to forsake old faiths."

He makes another wild statement in saying: "All theology is progressive. It has advanced from delicate germs to its present stately growth." Theology is by its very nature conservative. It stands upon a supernatural basis, sustained by a supposed revelation of the will of God, to doubt which is to be condemned to eternal woe. As the human mind has expanded its capacities to think, people have grown away from theology, and the latter has been modified to save its life. Looking at the various systems, we can see that modifications have been improvements; and in this sense theology may be said to show progress, but not to have made it. The "delicate germs" have not been theological, but moral or mental or both. Theology was fixed and asphyxied and morally dead, when Jesus made his brave protest against it. It was so unprogressive that it crucified him. Then, in his name, after several centuries, theology, having been bathed and rebathed and soaked in blood of contending factions, in the name of God, crystallized itself in the shadow of the Roman armies, the same old rock of ages under a new name. The moss and slime of immorality gathered over it again; and here and there, now and then, a brave man, Jesus-like, protested against, and was burned at the stake or murdered in the dungeon, until finally the mental and moral agitation of the ages produced Luther, who made his protest at a time when there were friends enough to carry him through in safety. But here, again, a moral initiative is slowly transformed into a theological structure, which still houses the myths of revelation. Everywhere, theology comes in, not to push, but to retard progress. A moral protest is accompanied by mental activity that leads its friends away from myth and superstition. "Revelation" becomes shaky, and theology steps in to arrest mental development. What a "delicate germ" John Calvin was! And how divinely he nurtured the progressive soul of poor Servetus, whose only crime was that of being true to his own mind! In later times, Wesley was a moral protest; but his followers built a theological sarcophagus around him. Still later, Channing was another and grander protest; and he, too, has been cabined, cribbed, and confined in the tomb of theology.

But day by day, year by year, for many generations there have been forces at work that theology has been growing more and more powerless to control, the forces of the human mind. As long as all learning was confined to the makers of theology, it was no very difficult matter to control mankind; for, where it grew rebellious, a little murdering in the name of God had a very quieting effect. But at length thought projected itself upon types, humanity began to catch glimpses of a new meaning in life. Knowledge began to totter from chair to chair, from house to house, from country to country, from land to land. It filled the world with new inspiration and life. It stood in deadly peril at the hands of theology everywhere, but it stood up with the fearless front of a power that had a divine purpose to "Grow from more to more."

In all the annals of all the worlds, what grander epic than the story of the growth of the life and power of thought and of mind! Age after age, its way was marked with fire and sword, wielded in the name of God by the makers of theology. Its pathway is yet lined with the opposing forces of the same old power, but it is impotent to kill. Slander and libel are its only weapons now; and one day it will be found that they, too, have disappeared.

In the long, absolute reign of theology, the world of mind stood shrouded in the deep night of primal ignorance. Then supernaturalism thrust itself upon men from out the darkness on every hand. Then devils threatened and gods menaced and goblins grinned and ghosts gibbered all around, and the world waked and slept and walked and toiled in one long, unrelieved life of fear. But, as knowledge grew, the light and strength of its life rolled back the night of ignorance; and truth began to draw lines of distinction between supernatural and natural. Then began the conflict between theology and reason. Step by step, knowledge pushed her boundary lines further and further out, reclaiming or redeeming the miasmatic territory of superstition. As she enlarged her domain and won victory after victory, theology was forced to accept the situation, and adapt itself to the environments or die. It was the grand law of God, or the grand God of the material and mental universe, evolving the destiny of humanity. As this splendid development has proceeded, theology has proved its cunning by accepting conditions that it could not destroy, and then, after the fact, claiming the credit of making them. Steadily, knowledge has kept its onward and upward way, until it has become clear to the world that the supernatural must go. Step by step, theology has been driven forward, until at last it stands, old and young, Catholic and Protestant, Trinitarian and Unitarian, with its forces massing and combining for a final struggle, upon the shores of the vast continent of mental freedom. It stands, as in its infancy, upon the dogma of a written will of God, full, complete, and infallible. Be the struggle long or short, in the end it must, like the exorcised demons of the ancient story, go overboard, and leave this dear old world to be the home of a free and enlightened humanity, that will find God, not on far throne of fabled "world beyond," but deep-throbbing in the heart of the eternal Now.

In this contest, the gain is all on the side of development. Little by little, theology may be modified and adapted to modern thought and life, up to the point of a denial and rejection of the supernatural. Beyond that, it cannot go, without tearing up its foundation-stones. While there are "millions in it," that will not be done. Up to that point, however, it will come in time; and there it will remain. Unitarianism, perhaps, marks the ultimate modification of theology. To that, they may all come. But beyond that is the ever-broadening field of Rationalism, in which knowledge of the laws of the universe and the God of science becomes the source of an intelligent faith and a devout reverence, that shall fill the world of man with the blessing of a nobler, purer, sweeter religion than has ever yet been known.

Therefore, when Dr. Crooks objects to the results of evolution in the domain of thought, because of their antagonism to supernaturalism, because "they substitute the knowledge of law for the consciousness of redemption," and because they "carry us to the polar zone of thought, and leave us there 'to starve in ice,'" I can only see in his attitude the old theological prejudice against progressive thought. It is the old cry that came up against Unitarianism and Universalism, "They are too cold!" When the mind had taken up new positions in advance of them, they grew warmer; and the latest heresy it was that chilled the marrow of the faithful. If it were true that the scientific view of the universe and man's relation to it is too cold, one might retort that the theological view is altogether too hot! And the one objection would balance the other, with the preference in favor of the former, by so much as it is pleasanter to freeze to death than to be roasted alive.

But the doctor's objection is an imaginary one. Nowhere in the whole world of man could Dr. Crooks find more tender, true, and loving hearts, more devout reverence for the sublimity and grandeur of nature, more chaste and beautiful lives, than among those who, by their devout, sincere, and thorough study, have made this very condition of thought to which he objects. He complains that this system of thought and belief is so cold that it "can never dry a tear, never heal a heartache, never ease the consciousness of sin that we carry with us, never relieve the sense of guilt." If this were true, it would be because the new religion had lifted humanity to a plane of mental, moral, and spiritual development where tears should cease to flow and hearts forget to ache, and where the burden of "guilt," the hoary curse of total depravity, should fall from the shoulders of humanity as it straightened itself under the vigor and inspiration of the new life that must flow in upon us through the consciousness that we each and all are portions of the destiny of God himself,—a thought so grand and ennobling in itself that sin and sorrow die and disappear before it.

A last objection of the lecturer was that the new religion of modern times is too much given to "culture," which, he says, is "a gospel of selfishness." "The goal of culture is self-developed perfection: the goal of religion is the outgrowing of our imperfection through the vigor of one greater than we are imparted to us. The spirit of culture is independence: the spirit of religion is dependence." That is to say, Dr. Crooks, of Drew Theological Seminary, condemns the spirit that actuates men and women to improve, to elevate, to ennoble, to perfect themselves as devilish, and commends the laziness that would lie on its back, hugging its total depravity, sleeping in its consciousness of "guilt," waiting for a Redeemer to stretch his hand from the skies and lift it, in all its unworthiness, to the side of infinite perfection, as divine! There is not in all the world a more utterly selfish thing than the life of the average orthodox Christian, who serves the devil of his greed six days out of seven, and gives one day in the week ostensibly to the service of his theology, for the purpose of insuring unto himself a supposed life of eternal bliss beyond the grave. Nor can there be a belief more fatal to human progress than the theological doctrine, so dear to Dr. Crooks' heart, that eternal life and human happiness depend upon an unquestioning surrender of the human mind to the idea that faith in Christ will lift the believer to heaven, while faith in knowledge, the present God in the human soul, will drop him to hell. The present hope of the world is enhanced by the deepening conviction that the beggarly scheme of redemption by faith alone, through the atoning blood of the Lamb, is being slowly but surely displaced by the nobler religion of development.

THE BIRTHDAY OF KRISHNA.

To Jean Story :—

In the Free Religious Index of December 30, in an article by you on "Christmas," in naming the gods claimed to have been born on the 25th of December, Khrishna (that is, Krishna) is included. A careful search of all available Sanskrit literature and of the works of the principal Orientalists giving information thereupon, an examination of Vaidic, Epic, and Puránic writers, and of the writings of Max Müller, Weber, Wilson, Colebrooke, Cowell, Monier Williams, Lassen, Burnouf, Ritter, Robson, Whitney, Tiele, Coxe, Muir, S. Johnson, Haug, Lorinsee, Hall, etc., fails to reveal the slightest trace of any such date having been, in India, assigned to the birthday of the eighth avatára of Vishnu. On the contrary, wherever reference is made in Sanskrit literature to Krishna's birth, as in the Hari-vansa-parvan (or supplement to the great epic of India, the Mahá-Bhárata), the latter part of the Brahma-Purána, the tenth book of the Bhágavata-Purána, and the fifth book of the Vishnu-Purána, quite a different season of the year is named as his natal day. I would therefore inquire from what source was derived the statement that he was born December 25th?

I have a strong suspicion that the idea may have been derived from Kersey Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviours, a book whose almost every page teems with blunders, misstatements, and falsities, largely borrowed from that equally misleading and wildly extravagant production, Godfrey Higgins' Anacalypsis. Will you please indicate the source of your information, so the matter may be traced, and the truth be manifest?

PRESIDIO OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

W. H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass., will address next Sunday the East Dennis (Mass.) Sunday Lecture Association.

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin Street, is to issue in a few days a volume of Essays by Frances Power Cobbe, entitled The Duties of Women.

MR. F. A. HINCKLEY will give the introductory lecture in a course of Sunday evening lectures at Malden, Mass., arranged by the Free Religious Association, next Sunday.

TIME is bearing Mr. Whittier along in the seventies. He has just passed in a quiet way, at his home in Danvers, Mass., his seventy-third birthday. A new volume of his poems will shortly be published.

HERBERT SPENCER has contradicted the report that he had to do with the early education of George Eliot. His friendship with her, he says, did not commence until several years after her translation of Strauss' Life of Jesus.

IT is reported that Colonel Ingersoll has purchased the mansion and grounds occupied by the Americus Club during the golden days of the Tweed régime at Greenwich, Conn., and will transform it into a magnificent summer residence.

MR. EDWIN D. MEAD, who has resided for a long time in London and in the English universities, and who is well known as a student of English history and politics, delivered a very interesting and thoughtful lecture upon "The British Parliament" on Tuesday evening, January 25, at Union Hall in this city.

THE Caledonia Club of Boston celebrated the one hundred and twenty-second anniversary of Robert Burns' birth, Tuesday evening, January 25, with a concert, supper, and ball. Letters of regret were read from Governor Long, Mayor Prince, H. W. Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John G. Whittier, and others. Colonel T. W. Higginson made a speech in behalf of the Governor.

LUCRETIA MOTT'S birthday was remembered in Philadelphia Monday evening, January 18, a large number of persons assembling and recounting their impressions of her noble character, and narrating little anecdotes concerning her. Rev. C. G. Ames related how once, after he had made an address in public, she criticised adversely some of his statements or views. Kindly Mr. Mott said to him, "If she thinks thee wrong, thee better think it all over again."

MR. C. D. B. MILLS, one of the most honored representatives of the cause of reform and free religion in the country, and devoted and efficient laborers for many years in its interest, has been passing a few days in Boston, where a cordial welcome always awaits him. On Sunday last, he addressed a deeply interested audience, at the Parker Memorial in this city, on "How may the Mind apprehend God," and in the evening delivered a thoughtful and eloquent lecture at Revere, Mass., on "The Promise of Science for Humanity," the opening one in a course of lectures at that place, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association.

THE most touching legend in Mr. Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia is the parable of Kisa Gotami and her dead child. Competent scholars had said that the poem was a faithful presentation of the legendary life and teachings of Buddha; but there was at first much unanswered inquiry as to the source of the above legend, and some credited it to Mr. Arnold's own powers of invention. A young Sanskrit scholar, Mr. J. H. Thomson, at the university at Kiel, has found the original legend in the MS. of Buddhaghosha, in the library at Copenhagen. His translation and notes obtained for him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. [Somebody has evidently got things mixed in the above little story, which we find in some of our exchanges. The legend of Kisagotami is given in Buddhaghosha's Parables as translated from the Burmese by Captain T. Rogers, R.E., and printed in London in 1870; while The Light of Asia did not appear till 1879.—ED.]

THE DAWN.

How clear and how near to the youth
Shines the light in the spring-time;
Nearer it seems to him now,
Easier the way to its place,
Than when as a wanderer weary
He stands but a step from its splendor.
For the mountain looks near to the mountain;
And life begins on the summit,
But descends through the valley
Ere regains it another as high.
Joyful he sees it,
And onward eagerly presses,
Yet ever behind him,
Hovering, unseen, airily,
The God, who, to precipitate man,
Measures the way for his soul,
Seizes his radiant curls
As they stream through the wind of the night,
Turns him, doubtful, to right and to left,
Dooms him to trial and tears,
But leaves him, far off, in the distance,
The old, inextinguishable, beautiful light.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 3, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER,
Sec'y F. R. Association.

OF course, the Index offers a free parliament to those who take a different view of the sale of Parker Memorial Hall from what we have taken, as does Mrs. Cheney in our present number. As yet, however, we have not seen nor heard any arguments that have changed our own opinion of the matter, as we stated it in our last article, two weeks ago. And, if we do not continue the discussion on our part, it is only because there is now no practical object to be gained by it. With the fine tribute Mrs. Cheney pays to the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society for the successful accomplishment of the particular work which it really came into existence to do, we entirely agree, and have tried to say the same; but from her, as one of the attendants on Theodore Parker's ministry for many years, it comes with more force and with the flavor of a personal sentiment of gratitude.

APROPOS of the welcome communication of "R. H." in another column, we wish merely to say that it has often seemed to us that ministers would have less trouble in keeping their independence in the pulpit, if they would only assume their freedom, go ahead, speak out their minds, and make no fuss about it. Ministers are too apt to assume that their societies are going to antagonize their liberty, and so put themselves at the outset into a belligerent attitude; and then belligerent rights are apt to be declared on the other side, too. Of course there are churches that will not listen to anything more modern than the flood, or at least Ananias and Sapphira's lie. Of these, of course, liberty in the pulpit is not to be looked for. But, again, there are a good many societies, some of them called orthodox, too, that like pluck and courage and independence in their minister, even if they do not agree with what he says; and, if he exercises his freedom as a matter of course, as if nothing else were to be done or expected, they are very likely to sustain him in it. In other words, as Horace Greeley used to say of specie payments, "The way to resume is to resume," so, and with more force, "The way for a minister to get independence is to be independent."

WE hear of excellent things occurring in Professor Adler's Society in New York. The annual meeting of the society on Tuesday evening of last week, we learn, was one of unusual cheer and encouragement even in its hitherto prosperous experience. Its free kindergarten, industrial school, district nursing, and other activities, were reported to be in a very satisfactory condition. A year ago, the society leased a building at a convenient point of the city for these purposes, and as a centre of its operations. But such has been the increasing scope and character of its work that it has been becoming more and more evident that this addition to the facilities for carrying it on could not meet the growing demands of the society for any considerable time. It has been seen that there was already need of a larger and better adapted building for the objects indicated than the one at present in use. At the annual meeting above referred to, eighteen thousand dollars were raised for building purposes. It is proposed to build a school-house four stories in height (five floors). This will answer also for the home of the district nurses, an office for Professor Adler committee rooms, a large hall for annual meetings and receptions, and as a place where members of the society can call every day, and see each other. In other words, it is to be a society house, owned and to be used for the society, but principally for the school, kindergarten, workingman's school, ethical classes, etc. The Board of Trustees was appointed, a committee to call on the other members who were not present, and raise the requisite amount, fifty thousand dollars. Only about one-tenth of the male members were present, and this is doing exceedingly well for a beginning. The rest is expected to be raised soon. Great enthusiasm prevailed among those who were present.

THE annual meeting of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association last week appears to have been a very satisfactory occasion in all respects. The convention was held in Meionaon Hall, one of the smaller halls of this city, capable of holding probably about four hundred persons, and was well filled at each session. It began on Thursday evening, and included four sessions, closing Friday evening. Among the speakers were a large proportion of the best-known advocates of the cause in New England, with some acquisitions less familiar to the platform. The report of the Executive Committee, which was presented by Mrs. Lucy Stone, stated that Oregon and Wisconsin have granted school suffrage, Vermont and New York have also taken action, and other States have the matter under consideration. It was maintained that school suffrage had not yet had a fair chance to be tested, owing to the restrictions under which it is exercised. The good word of Gov. Long in behalf of the movement, in his recent message, was appreciatively referred to. A petition to the Massachusetts legislature was submitted and adopted, urging that the act granting school suffrage to women be amended; that, in towns, women be allowed to vote upon all matters relating to schools as well as on the school committee; that the poll-tax for women be reduced to one dollar, and that the officials instruct women that they are not called upon to give account of all their property, but only such as is subject to taxation; and also that the last day of registration for women should be October 4 instead of September 15. Among the resolutions passed was the following:—

Resolved, That in the death of Lydia Maria Child, of Lucretia Mott, and of Nathaniel White, the cause of woman suffrage has sustained heavy and grievous loss; that the memory of these saints of progress and reform deserves to be cherished and handed down by us to our children for lasting and grateful remembrance

Although the difficulties attendant upon the progress of the movement were duly recognized, a cheerful and hopeful spirit in respect to its future prevailed. There is but little doubt that woman's suffrage is destined to become incorporated into our civil system. But we must be prepared to wait for the result, and it is probable that it is better to wait rather than force it too rapidly.

HELPFUL AND HARMFUL DOUBT.

If the old religion looked upon and shunned doubt as the whisperings of the evil one, has not the new gospel gone to the other extreme, courting and glorifying doubt overmuch? We may believe with Mr. Buckle that all intellectual progress is accompanied with a degree of preliminary doubt; but it by no means follows, because progress is attended with doubt, that all doubt is attended with progress. If it be certain that one will never inquire into the truth of his convictions until he first begins to doubt their truth, and so eliminate possible error, it is also certain that one will never act earnestly upon his convictions until he ceases to doubt, and fully and firmly believes them to be true and good. The habit of doubting is like a two-edged sword: it cuts both ways. The thrust which cleaves error is in danger of piercing the very heart of truth, too, and leaving Faith and Hope dead. We are fully persuaded that, so far as the individual is concerned, there is not only doubt which blesses, but doubt which curses, because it paralyzes effort, and leads to moral, if not mental, degradation. As the mathematician cannot doubt the axioms of his science and solve his problems, so do we believe there are certain moral laws, certain religious principles, as true for us as the axioms of mathematics, which if one doubts so as to disobey, the color begins to fade from the cheek, the light from the eye, the hope from the heart, the joy from the life. When standing in presence of some terrible temptation, he who doubts is in danger, "who hesitates is lost." If I dare to doubt the law of universal gravitation and fling my weak body in defiance against it, it will crush my life; but just as surely, if I doubt the supreme authority of these "voices," so still and small within my soul, and dare to disobey their promptings toward the good, the beautiful, and true, I shall, sooner or later, feel, as it were, the hand of the Invisible descending in rebukings upon my wayward heart. Break that law within? Thou canst not break it, O man! In that struggle, it is the poor heart that always breaks at last. It seems to matter very little what theory of the genesis of morals one accepts. The truth is, there is a certain ideal moral law to which we owe allegiance and must adjust our lives, or find ourselves out of harmony with the universe. Happy for us if we can count the experience and judgment of the ages as of some value, nor think that our little selves can tip the scales against the world. But, if the experience of others can teach us nothing, our own experience shall teach us that the moral law, which we may well name the "Higher Law," is Lord and King.

Looking at the subject more from the standpoint of religion, one may say that certain kinds of doubt here are not only depressing to the spirits, but dangerous to morals. Of course, we know that one may doubt this or that particular idea of God,—the Jehovah of the Jews, the Allah of the Moslems, the idea of God cherished, perhaps, by most Christians,—God as "Spirit" overruling all, or God as the "Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness,"—one may doubt all these ideas of God, and, we think, be morally safe. But, if one does not have some supreme thought, which, like a perpetual Presence, binds his reverence and consecration; if, when doubt has demolished the old shrines, it leaves us in the midst of ashes and ruins, gives nought but broken idols, points out no ideal rising like a spirit above the wreck of forms, reveals no vision of what one may love, ought to love, hope for, struggle for in this world,—then we say that such doubt is a curse to man; for it tends to reduce life's activities to a selfish game of grab for material pleasures, and makes life not worth the living. That there is doubt which plunges some men into moral and spiritual atheism, an atheism compared with which intellectual scepticism is harmless, can hardly be questioned by one who walks with his eyes open nowadays. From such doubt as this, our country has most to fear. Better, a thousand times better, is that "faith," though it be saturated with superstition, which bows down before the son of the carpenter as the incarnate God, and, feebly as it may, tries to realize his spirit and virtues in its life, and obey his precepts as the infallible word of the Most High, than this doubt that palsies all faith in the redeeming power of the individual, that saps the life out of all enthusiasm for ideal aims, and, while itself mousing for material things, blindly trusts that the new god, "Evolution," will some way save the world from ignorance, selfishness, and sin. There is, of course, a "faith" that is an empty name, a hollow profession, a cheap passport to heaven through the merits of another. This kind of faith the world can dispense with, and there is much of it in the old religion; but there is also a faith that is a genuine gift of heaven, that baptizes with high resolves, that kindles enthusiasm for humanity, and consecrates the affections and the will to the highest and best. Any doubt that stabs this divine spirit is crucifying the world's Saviour; for it is this spirit, under one name or another, that is the animating spirit of all reform, the mainspring of all progress. It was said of Clarkson, the English abolitionist, that "never was there a man who discharged more completely the duty of hoping. As soon as he was satisfied that any measure ought to succeed, it was not possible to convince him that it could not succeed." The same might be said of our own Garrison. Their creed was,—

> "For right is right, since God is God;
> And right the day must win.
> To doubt would be disloyalty,
> To falter would be sin."

They did not doubt that right would win, and they won. So may we win, if doubt do not paralyze our hope and faith. W. H. S.

PARKER MEMORIAL HALL
—AND—
The Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society.

I cannot but regret many of the severe expressions used in regard to the late sale of the Parker Memorial Building. I do not see that any "dishonor" has been cast upon our great teacher, Theodore Parker. A fund was raised for a memorial to him; but it was not sufficient to pay for the building which it was desired to raise, not as an ornamental monument, but as a place in which many good things might be accomplished. There was ample opportunity for offerings to this fund at the time. The trustees thought themselves justified in mortgaging the building, in the belief and hope that, by the growth of the city, its halls and stores would be so much in demand as to make it a remunerative investment. This was a financial mistake, but who has not made such mistakes since 1873? Instead of rising in value, the estate has depreciated. It has been perfectly well known for years that such was the condition of things,—that the trustees with great difficulty paid the interest, and that the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, for whose use the hall was originally designed, have been yearly in danger of disbanding from want of support. They would probably have done so this spring, even if the building had not been sold.

Under these circumstances, the trustees thought it better to accept a bona fide offer for the building at a fair price than to incur the risks and unpleasantness of an auction sale. By the original terms of agreement, they can do nothing with the money but return to each of the original subscribers his proportion of the proceeds.

Here is a handsome sum of money, once given to the cause of Progress as represented by Theodore Parker. Is it not possible to present to these proprietors some object so important and so beneficial that they will be willing to rededicate it to the same cause in a new form? I believe that Theodore Parker would have felt a deep interest in a weekly journal devoted to the interests of Free Religion, and that he would have greatly wished to place it on such a basis that it could become scholarly and able as well as free and truthful. Such a paper I think the Free Religious Index, under its present editorship, may become, if it is furnished with adequate means; and I therefore sincerely hope that the subscribers to the Parker Memorial Fund will consider the propriety of turning their money into this channel. But they have an unquestionable right to do as seems to them best, and they are men whom we have full reason to trust to use it in any way which seems to them best fitted to carry on the great interests of humanity and progress.

And let me say one word about the so-called failure of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society. We are sorry to see anything which we have enjoyed and loved, still more anything which has been a means of spiritual and moral life and growth to us, given up. As Mme. de Staël says, "There is a sadness in doing anything for the last time." But it is a universal law that all things must pass away. Often, the best are the shortest-lived. The question is, Have they lived and done their work? The Twenty-eighth Congregational Society has done its work, and accomplished it perhaps more fully than any other organization of our day, not excepting the American Anti-Slavery Society. Organized to "give Theodore Parker a hearing in Boston," it not only gave him a hearing, but its members have lived to see his name honored by the very classes who refused him hearing and his principles generally accepted by the very denomination which cast him out.

Much of the work he attempted to do — such as the moral work for prisoners and drunkards, for the perishing classes—still needs to be done; but other hands are taking it up, and the Society have not seen how they could do it better as a separate organization than by uniting with their fellow-citizens. Old members have clung to the social reunion in the religious service on Sunday morning, but they have gradually lessened, and it has not appeared that the Society could offer anything which had the same charm for the younger people. Let them form their own ties, and be free to express themselves in their own way. So with a sigh of regret, as when we see the day fade away, though we know that another is coming, or as we watch out the last minutes of the Old Year, though we are ready to welcome the New with shouts of joy, or as we lay an aged and beloved friend to sleep in the sure hope of resurrection, shall I bid farewell to the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, profoundly thankful for all it has been to me and all it has done for the world, and confident that new agencies will arise to meet the needs of the new time. May all engaged in them be as faithful and true to right and progress as the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society has been! E. D. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

In September last, an International Convention of Instructors of the Deaf and Dumb was held in Milan. It very strangely favored the abandonment of the use of signs in teaching the deaf, and advocated the use of the lips in speech. It seems that the "pure speech method" is now adopted very largely in Europe, and that it is fast superseding all other methods. The sign method in this conference had only four advocates out of one hundred and sixty-four instructors present. In Education for January-February are two articles about this conference. In one, Dr. Gallaudet, of the National Deaf-Mute College, Washington, criticises the conference as of a partisan nature, and advocates the use of both the lip and sign methods. The other is by Miss Susannah E. Hale, of London, who writes with great enthusiasm in favor of the conclusions of the conference. The president of the conference, Abbé Farra, who is connected with the Italian Bureau of Instruction, and a prominent deaf-mute educator, said in his address: "Signs must be altogether abjured, though a few simple gestures may be allowed when the little child is first introduced to school life. In the schoolroom begins the redemption of the deaf-mute. He is waiting to be made into a man. Let him be taught to move his lips in speech, not his hands in signs. Of all movements for the expression of ideas, those of the lips are most perfect. Speech is addressed to the intellect, while gestures speak coarsely to the senses." By an almost unanimous vote, the conference declared "that the oral method ought to be preferred to that of signs for the education and instruction of the deaf and dumb."

The first annual report of the Associated Charities of Boston contains the address of Robert Treat Paine, Jr., given at the annual meeting. This organization has for its object the registration of pauperism and its prevention. It first of all seeks to ascertain for all benevolent persons and organizations the actual condition and needs of those applying for aid. It is "a clearing-house of relief. It gathers in by daily, weekly, or monthly returns, all reports of relief, and also all facts as to the condition, needs, and abilities of all members of the family; posts all this on cards, kept in alphabetical order in boxes, like the cards of a library." This registration is of the greatest value. Without it, the true work of charity in a large city can never be accomplished, which is the suppression of imposture, and self-help for all the worthy. Mr. Paine says that a judicious visitor to the poor will, "in a surprising proportion of cases, discern means to help a family into independence." To help the poor to help themselves is the main idea of this new method of dealing with pauperism. Those interested in this new method of charity, the chief principle of which can be applied anywhere, would do well to secure this report. We suppose it can be had by addressing Mr. Paine, the president, at 16 Pemberton Square, Boston, or at the Charity Building, Chardon Street.

In Fraser's Magazine, Dr. W. B. Richardson writes with great enthusiasm of woman as a sanitary reformer. He points out what the housewife might do to preserve the health of her family, and how important it is that she should have a competent knowledge of all the conditions and principles of health. The great importance of this knowledge he illustrates by saying that, "if woman only knew what foods were requisite to feed the bony framework while the living body is in the course of growth, and if she would act upon her knowledge, there would be hardly one deformed child left in the land in two or three generations." Woman should also know about the body and its functions, and how to keep it in health: she should know the sanitary conditions of a healthful house. Doubtless, it will be a long time before very many women will turn their attention to this kind of knowledge, but its need and its importance have already been fully enough demonstrated. Much of sickness and death can be prevented by compliance with the simple laws of health. Most diseases are preventable. Thousands of lives might each year be saved by sound living. Here is a work not only for women, but for the radical believer. It is an affirmative, a constructive work. It is a work of teaching mankind obedience to the laws of the universe. It will result in much of happiness to the world. The sting of death will be taken away when none die but of old age. The world's sorrows will be how much assuaged when unnecessary sickness and lassitude and deformity are prevented! Here is a work which may be undertaken with the zeal and devotion of the old religious devotees, and the desire to save the world from its pains and sorrows may become a true consecration. The true radical will enter upon this work of teaching the new way of life with an enthusiasm which will make him a real regenerator of human nature.

A theory of society rests fundamentally on a theory of the universe, and the causes of human development will be interpreted according to the philosophy one accepts. The idealist believes that great men are the inciting causes, while the positivist finds them in the "environment." The first theory has been accepted by Carlyle, Cousin, and Emerson. The best interpreters of the other are Comte, Buckle, and Spencer. This old subject of controversy has been brought again into notice by two articles in recent numbers of the Atlantic Monthly. In October, William James appeared with an essay on "Great Men, Great Thoughts, and the Environment," in which he maintains that great men are the real initiators of human progress. In the January number, John Fiske replies to Mr. James, under the title of "Sociology and Hero-worship," and defends the theory that the environment is the leading incentive to development. It may at once be noted in regard to these articles that they do not defend the extreme position on either side, but each writer concedes much to the opposing theory. James does not go the length of Carlyle in favor of great men, nor does Fiske follow Buckle in attributing all progress to the influence of the material universe. James maintains that the student of sociology must accept geniuses as data, as Darwin accepts his spontaneous variations, and that society becomes modified "in an entirely original and peculiar way" by the great man it adopts. He says the mutations of society are in main due directly or indirectly to the acts or the example of individuals whose genius is of such a nature as to be assimilative by it. The other main influence is the great man's social environment, which accepts or rejects him. The great man is produced by physiological forces, which are as yet entirely unknown as to their method of action. Mr. James says that the social, political, geographical, and to a great extent anthropological conditions have just as much and just as little to do with the development of the great man as the condition of the crater of Vesuvius has to do with the flickering of the gas by which he writes. In his reply, Mr. Fiske defends Spencer, and shows that he recognizes the influence of individuals in the growth of society, and says that the great movements in human history, as the early career of Mohammedanism, require a psychological and not a physical explanation. He points out the fact that sociology is concerned with institutions rather than with individuals, and with those broad and general movements in society which seem to spring out of some fundamental cause. In this discussion, we believe there is quite as much truth on one side as on the other, and that both the environment and the genius are fundamental to the progress of mankind. The causes of development in part spring from the relations of man to the universe, and in part from those subtle psychological causes which no thinker—certainly not Herbert Spencer—has as yet adequately interpreted. Such men as Spencer and Fiske are quite right in saying there is an order and method in human history, but they lay rather too much stress on the purely material conditions of that progress. On the other hand, such men as James fail to perceive how great the effect upon man, which arises from the invariable order of nature, and from the surrounding conditions favorable to civilization. This problem is not merely theoretical and speculative, for it has much to do with our efforts for the improvement of mankind. It is evident that, unless there is a method and order in the progress of the race, nothing can be done to ameliorate and improve it; and we must fall back on "conversion," or some inward revelation. Yet James and Fiske agree in this,—that there is a science of society, and that society can be systematically improved.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

Notes of Progress in Science, Literature, and Art in the West.

Having been in attendance upon the annual meeting of the "Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, Arts, and Letters," held in the capitol building at Madison the present week, my thought, quite naturally, turns to the subject I have chosen, on which to string a few epistolary notes.

The prosperity of a city or State is indicated by the attention which intellectual efforts and pursuits receive. The degrees of culture in a community mark the successive stages of the struggle for existence, from the privations of pioneer life to the satisfying results of secured competence.

Thirty years' residence in Wisconsin has given me an opportunity to trace the growth, not only of its villages and cities, but of the intelligence and culture of its inhabitants. Life in the Far West, as Wisconsin was known twenty years ago, meant deprivation of many of the comforts and most of the luxuries of an advanced civilization, that are so grateful and even necessary to the physical well-being. It meant also deprivation of an intellectual regimen, equally grateful and necessary to the mental well-being.

The fine arts, science, and literature have each been represented in occasional expressions of originality and genius; but the lack of encouragement that such talent and also various educational efforts have received has arisen simply from the fact that they appeared in the too early stages of the material development of the State. Wealth and leisure are essential factors in the promotion of literature and the fine arts; and these have come to us slowly, meeting continually the obstructive elements consequent upon recent civilization. Many of these hindrances have now been overcome. At this beginning of a new year, we find our newspaper press heralding an era of prosperity eclipsing all past experience in the West. It is gratifying to be able to substantiate the statements of the press concerning that invariable index, which points toward intellectual culture as proof of prosperity. Throughout the West there are seen significant evidences of progress in the various departments of science, art, and literature. There is a wholesome interest manifest in all educational efforts in these directions. Twenty years ago, we depended for our mental pabulum upon such few books as we could afford; upon magazine literature, which was very limited in scope, as compared with that of the present; upon the local press, which has steadily and vastly improved in all directions since then; and upon occasional lectures given on our Western platforms by shining lights of literature, who hailed from the hallowed ground of Concord, Cambridge, and other cultured regions in the vicinity of Boston.

The West owes a special debt of gratitude to the men and women who traversed the lecture field in those days. Their lectures were the feasts that refreshed the hungry intellect of the work-a-day people, who must needs delve in very practical ways for bread and butter to sustain the physical nature rather than in the lore of the ages for mental nourishment.

That the lecture field is no longer fruitful, financially or otherwise, in the West, is due to the fact that our needs for intellectual food are amply supplied in other ways. Railways have networked even the remote regions of the North-west with the best of Eastern culture; and the teeming press scatters its productions of every kind, to meet every intellectual refinement in every town and city.

Beside this, there are in nearly every town or village various associations, societies, and clubs, whose objects are mutual assistance in the pursuit of science, arts, and literature. The scope and effort of such organizations are well set forth in the columns of Unity, the publication edited in Chicago by J. Ll. Jones, W. C. Gannett, H. M. Simmons, and other well-known liberal preachers. One department of Unity is devoted to this phase of social helpfulness and intellectual coöperation represented by various literary and educational clubs. This department contains a directory with a list of such clubs, their names, localities, etc., with suggestive hints of methods of study. The outline and programme of work in many of the Western clubs indicate thorough and well-concentrated efforts, ranging from the fine arts to social science and they are proving sources of incalculable benefit to individuals and to communities. The growth of these clubs is at present rapid. It would be hardly possible to name all there are in Milwaukee alone. Their studies include the lighter literature, combined with elocutionary effort, and also the deeper researches of scientific pursuit, with education in music and other fine arts.

We have, for instance, the "Progress Club," which was instituted for social benefits, and includes music, the drama, and rhetorical and elocutionary exercises. This club has now one of the finest and most commodious halls in the West, and is flourishing and useful in its way. On the other extreme, we have a "Popular Science Society," which has steadily held its own way for the past four years, increasing in numbers and usefulness year by year. As its name indicates, this society presents to the public, by means of lectures, social science, sanitation, hygiene, and kindred topics that are of vital importance to the physical and ethical well-being of the community. These lectures are of a popular and intelligible character, such as can be received and applied by the average man or woman who cannot compass the time for individual reading and research on these all-important subjects. This society is officered by both ladies and gentlemen, and ladies of known ability in any specialty are welcomed to its platform. The meetings are held in the parlors of the Plankinton House; and the lectures are followed by discussion of a free and informal character, of the nature of a parlor conversation. Papers of rare value have been contributed to this society, and it can be noted as one of the most effective organizations for the promotion of an advanced type of intellectual culture.

The "Fortnightly Club" is an older and more conservative organization. It is a picked society with a membership limited to sixty gentlemen, who meet for mutual pleasure and profit, and read papers, followed by discussion upon any and every topic, not excepting theology. It is radical in the free expression of opinion, but conservative in the rigid exclusion of women from membership. This club has latterly been courteous enough to extend to ladies an invitation to attend the meetings, listen to the papers, and join, if they please, in the discussion. This courtesy is, however, regarded in the light of the old-time chivalry by the ladies of Milwaukee, and not as a recognition of their ability or of the rank they now take in science, art, and literature. Therefore, they do not respond to the gallant invitation of the club very generally or very cordially.

Our city is indebted to the German element for the promotion of a high order of music. The German musical society for twenty-five years or over has presented finely executed classical music to the public, and has met with appreciation and proved an educator in the community.

Art has received a notable impulse through various educationary efforts. An art and science class, under the direction of Prof. Farrar of the Milwaukee College, has studied with much zeal and satisfactory results. Prof. James Macalister, superintendent of public schools, during the two years he was out of this office, gave courses of lectures upon art, that were of a popular character and well received, stimulating a study of fine arts among the ladies of Milwaukee. This introductory work has been supplemented by a course of art instruction that is acknowledged to be of the highest order existing in this country. Mrs. C. D. Adsit of this city entered upon the third year of her work with classes numbering one hundred and fifty ladies. The curriculum of study is comprehensive, the appliances for the illustration of lectures complete, and the results are of the most satisfactory nature, tending to correct the china and pottery craze and familiarize students with the highest works of art, and thoroughly imbue them with a knowledge of the history of the origin and development of art and an appreciation of beautiful, artistic forms.

While we may not approve of the devotion of women wholly to art, when such vital and urgent issues are pressing from all sides, inviting their efforts in social and sanitary reform, still, art pursued as under Mrs. Adsit's instruction has an elevating and refining influence upon the mind and character of a large number of women, whom it rescues from the dominion of trivial and selfish enjoyments. And it may create an appetite for study, that, growing by what it feeds upon, may afterward hunger for stronger intellectual sustenance.

The Academy of Sciences, Arts, and Letters, was organized in the year 1870. Its general objects are to encourage investigation and disseminate correct views in the various departments of science, literature, and the arts. Among its specific objects are the following: "researches and investigations in the various departments of the material, metaphysical, ethical, ethnological, and social sciences"; "the advancement of the useful arts through the application of science and by the encouragement of original invention."

The Academy at its eleventh annual meeting, just held, finds its affairs in a flourishing condition financially; and it is steadily gaining in membership and usefulness. The ablest men in science, art, and literature in the State are brought together in these meetings; and the proceedings, as published, contain valuable contributions in their several departments. Occasionally there are held, beside the annual meeting at the capital, summer migratory meetings. At one of these summer meetings held in Milwaukee, a number of ladies were elected members, "the society acting," as was said by the President, Dr. Hoy, "on the broad principle that science and letters have neither country, color, nor sex. The straight-jacket of superstition and bigotry no longer cramps and cripples investigation in any department of knowledge."

The breadth of this organization is typical of the spirit of the West. Although we are in the early stages of intellectual culture, there is here a soil rich and prolific. Nature has been most generous to us; and the expanse of prairie, forest, and lake, will influence the culture as well as the religion of the West. Where there is plenty of room for liberty of thought and freedom of expression, the truest culture will obtain. It will not be cramped nor lop-sided. The beginnings of our growth indicate the comprehensiveness of the ultimate Western culture. The steps of progress in sciences, arts, and letters, have the steady ring of health; and each cycle is rounded out by a fulness that covers the possibilities of the true end of education, "complete living." SOCIETY AND GOVERNMENT.

"And Jesus answering said unto them, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. And they marvelled at him."—MARK xii., 17. (Compare Matt. xxii., 21; Luke xx., 25.)

1. The Primitive Community.

One of the earliest indications of man's progress out of brutehood and barbarism was his recognition, in some degree, of the rights of his fellow-men to the possession of PROPERTY. "Might makes right" was the aboriginal law. Originally, man retained by force whatever he could seize and hold. In the early nomadic period, he roved from place to place, claiming no permanent right to the soil, and recognizing no such right in others.

As FAMILIES united to form CLANS and TRIBES, and husbandry succeeded the pastoral or nomadic condition, habitations became more permanent, and men began to claim the right to property in land. This was first vested in the FAMILY, and afterward in the TRIBE or NATION; the earliest form of established society thus constituting a sort of COMMUNITY, of which the patriarch, chief, or king was the recognized autocratic ruler. This primitive communistic phase of society preceded all recognition of individual rights.

2. The Jewish Theocracy.

The earliest PATRIARCHAL form of government among the Jews was succeeded by a THEOCRACY. Under the priestly dispensation, YAHWEH was recognized as the supreme lawgiver and king. (Ex. xxxvii.–xl.; Ps. x., 16; xxiv., 7–10; xlvii., 7; Isa. xxxiii., 22; xliii., 15; Jer. x., 10; xlvi., 18, etc.) The priests and earthly rulers were merely his agents or ministers, whose duty it was to see that his will was executed, and to subordinate their desires to his. (Ps. xlv., 4 ff.).

As in the origin of religion, under the PATRIARCHAL system, Government and Religion were united; but the temporal power was now conceived as emanating directly from GOD himself, and the priesthood, as his representatives, exercised much of the authority formerly possessed by the PATRIARCH, or father of the family. (Lev. i., 5, ff.; compare Gen. viii., 20, 21; I. Sam. vii., 9; II. Sam. xxiv., 25; I. Kings xviii., 36–38, etc.)

NOTE A.—THEOCRACY: "The state governed by the immediate direction of GOD." Out of this conception of GOD as the only rightful ruler, and of the church or priesthood as his ministers or agents, grew the dogma of "the divine right of kings," against which our PURITAN ancestors successfully protested. What is your opinion of this dogma? What CHRISTIAN churches hold it to-day? Is not a THEOCRACY necessarily intolerant? Is government of divine or human origin? Is there any sanctity in law or official station, apart from the inherent justice and equity of the law and its administrators? Ought we to obey a law which violates individual rights: e.g., the Fugitive Slave Law? Ought people in official station to be regarded as the rulers or the servants of the people? What do you think of the idea of "Popular Sovereignty"? Have the majority any better right to oppress an individual than a single tyrant or king?

NOTE B.—The Kingdom of SAUL, DAVID, and SOLOMON, and their successors in JUDAH and ISRAEL, midway between the patriarchal system and the priestly Theocracy, was essentially theocratic. The king was regarded as YAHWEH'S "anointed" servant or chief. The period of priestly supremacy came later, after the captivity.

3. The Ideal Society of Jesus.

The KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, taught by JESUS, was to be a perfect Communistic Theocracy, with GOD, the "HEAVENLY FATHER," as King, ruling by the "higher law" of LOVE in the hearts of his children and subjects. The Jewish "LAW" was indeed to be fulfilled (Matt. v., 17–20); but its complete fulfilment would substitute the voluntary homage and obedience of the heart for the formal observance of the letter. (Mark vii., 1, 23; xii., 28–33; Matt. vi., 1–5, 16–18; vii., 12, 21; xv., 7–9, 10–20; xxii., 34–40.)

JESUS appears to have counselled his followers to prepare for this coming KINGDOM by adopting a different mode of life from that of the surrounding society, free from pretence and formality; thus forming an ideal Community, devoted solely to preparation for the future life of blessedness. (Mark viii., 34–37; x., 28–31; Matt. vi., 33; x., etc.)

4. Jesus' Attitude toward the Existing Society.

Unlike JUDAS OF GALILEE and the party of the ZEALOTS (Kanaim), JESUS appears to have counselled no resistance to the Roman Government, but passive obedience and submission until the coming of the HEAVENLY KINGDOM. (See the Lesson's text, also Matt. xxvi., 52; and references in Lesson viii., sect. 3.)

Unlike JOHN THE BAPTIST and his disciples and the ESSENES, he did not separate himself from the masses of the people or adopt the habits of an ascetic. (Mark ii., 18–20; Matt. ix., 14–17; Luke vii., 33, 34.) He mingled freely with all classes, wherever he was welcomed, and endeavored thus to enlist their sympathy and lead them to accept his gospel of REPENTANCE and RIGHTEOUSNESS. (Mark ii., 16, 17; Matt. ix., 9–13; Luke v., 27–32; vii., 36–50; xiv., 7–24.)

NOTE.—COMPETITION, COMMUNISM, CO-OPERATION: define them. What part have these different social ideals played in the civilization of the world? Which method characterized the earliest and most barbarous state of society? By what was it next succeeded? Which enters most largely into our modern social and business life? Upon what principle do you think the ideal society of the future will rest? Does COMMUNISM, even when democratic in its organization, sufficiently respect the individual? What do you think of CO-OPERATION as a remedy for the evils and contentions incident to our present competitive systems?

Talk about LAND MONOPOLY, and AGRARIANISM. Has man a natural right to monopolize more land than he can personally occupy and cultivate? Does the soil, like light and air, belong to all people in common? Has GOVERNMENT a right to interfere in order to prevent land monopoly? What do you know about the recent disturbances in IRELAND?

General Questions.

1. How did the idea of property originate? 2. Did the first men possess property in land? 3. Was land first owned by individuals, or by communities? 4. How was the primitive community organized? 5. What form of government succeeded the patriarchal community among the JEWS? 6. Describe the Jewish THEOCRACY. 7. What was JESUS' ideal of a perfect society? 8. What did he counsel his followers to do? 9. What was his attitude toward existing government? 10. Why did he counsel submission to the ROMAN power? 11. Wherein did he differ from JOHN THE BAPTIST and his disciples? 12. Was JESUS an ascetic?

To the Teacher.

For an interesting account of the primitive community, read "Early Social Life" and "The Village Community" (chapters vi., vii.), in Keary's Dawn of History; also Spencer's Sociology. For account of early CHRISTIAN communities, read Milman's History of Christianity, Book II., chapter iv.

UNBEATEN TRACKS IN JAPAN. An account of travels upon horseback in the interior, including visits to the aborigines of Yezo and the shrines of Nikkô and Isé. By Isabella L. Bird, author of A Lady's Travels in the Rocky Mountains, etc. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1880.

Many books have been written on Japan, and some of them have been profoundly interesting and instructive. But Miss Bird has written a book from which the value and the charm of other books makes no deduction. This is partly because she had the wit to make "unbeaten tracks" her aim in travelling and her subject in writing. But it is also because she brings to her task a gift for seeing things through her own eyes, and a skill for recording them in plain and simple fashion. Her book would have been attractive, if she had only gone over the old paths. It is much more attractive now that it covers so much ground unvisited before by people taking notes. The women of our generation have worn with ample grace the mantle which fell from the shoulders of Harriet Martineau. Her Eastern Life was one of the first successful books of travel written by a woman. Our recent literature blossoms thick with women's books of travel, and no better have been written than the best of them. Miss Bird's will rank with these. This book is her third important venture. She brought to the travels upon which it is based a power of observation trained by her journey through the Rocky Mountains and Six Months in the Sandwich Islands.

In the spring of 1878, she was obliged to leave home in order to recruit her health by means which had proved serviceable before. The attractions of Japan for her were less those of its climate than of its novelty for a European. She found the climate worse than she anticipated, exceptionally rainy even for Japan at the season of her travels. She found the country less provocative of rapture than of study, but to her study it yielded up a larger return than she anticipated.

She does not pretend to have written "a book upon Japan," but only an account of her own travels and certain conclusions based on these. Those new to the subject would do well to read some succinct account of the Empire, its geography and history, before reading her volumes. From Nikkô northwards, her journey was altogether off the beaten track. Here she came in contact with the Japanese as yet unaffected by European influences. She saw them at short range in their habitual occupations, skilful to make allowance for the refractions of her various media of information; and, having checked her notes as far as possible by those of other careful observers, she can be trusted as a faithful informant in regard to everything that came within her range of observation. The aggregate of her journeys was fourteen hundred miles. A few hundred of these were in Yezo, the most northern of the four principal islands (thirty-eight hundred is the accepted number of them all), the remainder were in Nippon. If the reader is disposed to think that here was no adequate basis of observation when we consider that the area of the Empire is one hundred and forty-seven thousand square miles (against two hundred and sixty-five thousand of the old-time estimates), and that the population is thirty-four million, it must be remembered that beyond the range of European and American influence the life of the Japanese is exceedingly homogeneous. The book is written in the form of letters to a sister, who has not survived to see their publication. The letters are supplemented by an admirable chapter on Japanese public affairs. In this chapter, we have a generous estimate of what has been accomplished by the government in its endeavor to introduce a new political and social and commercial order into the life of the nation. Without being blind to incidental dangers and defects, Miss Bird is confident that a good work has been already accomplished, and that it will go on. The charges of superficiality and imitativeness she repels with warmth and with apparent justice. Herself an earnest Christian woman, with a predilection for primitive Christianity, and a dislike amounting almost to contempt for the nominal Christianity of the present time, she is by no means hopeful in regard to the spread of Christianity in Japan, and her statistics more than confirm her gravest fears. And still she bates no jot of insistence that the Christians of Europe and America ought to do a hundred times as much as they are doing for the propagation of their faith. She notes the fact that Christianity is insinuating itself as a life more rapidly than as a creed. It is permissible to doubt whether the Christianity which is thus spreading is of the New Testament type. Scepticism and materialism seem to her the greatest obstacles, and "English philosophy" she imagines tends to bite-in these defects, and still further retard the spread of Christianity. The Japanese mind, of the more cultivated order, shows a remarkable ability for assimilating the philosophy of Darwin and Huxley, Spencer and Mill.

One of the most interesting episodes of Miss Bird's travels was her encounter with an English-speaking Buddhist dignitary of the highest rank. He was a man of quite remarkable intelligence, a member of the Monto sect, the Protestant Buddhists of Japan, founded by Shinran in 1262. This sect protest against celibacy, penance, monasteries, nunneries, fasting, pilgrimages, and the reading of the Scriptures in an unknown tongue. Holding that the family is the source and example of purity, Shinran married a wealthy lady of Kiyôto, and founded a married priesthood. The Monto sect is not one of the largest Buddhist sects of Japan, but it is one of the most powerful; and it is full of life and energy, bending itself with equal earnestness to reform Buddhism and to oppose Christianity. It is erecting new college buildings in Kiyôto at the present time, splendidly equipped. With Akamatz, a priest of this sect, Miss Bird had a long and interesting conversation. Strangely enough, considering our common views of Buddhism, he insisted on immortality as an essential feature of Buddhism; and yet he contemplated immortality with horror as a series of transmigrations, the escape from which is Nirvana, "absence of ideas and of the consciousness of the absence of ideas." He was strongly opposed to the "English philosophy," dreading it for Japan much more than Christianity. His views concerning the tendencies of religious thought in England were very similar to those of Mr. Mallock.

Miss Bird has many a good word for Buddhism in the course of her letters. Its tenderness for man and beast appealed to her very powerfully. Of the Japanese women, she gives a favorable account, not of their personal appearance, but of their gentleness and kindliness. Evidently, in Japanese marriage, the man and the woman are one, as in English law; and that one is the man. The affection of parents for their children she found remarkable for its purity and sweetness. The children are marvels of obedience. They never cry! But they are solemn-looking little creatures, seeming prematurely old. Japan is not remarkable for "Oriental magnificence," but Miss Bird found some interiors that were exquisitely beautiful. On the other hand, among the poorer classes she found a maximum of dirt. She found the love of flowers to be a beautiful trait of the Japanese, and their skill in arranging much greater than that of the English florists.

Within the limits of our notice, it is quite impossible to give any adequate idea of the contents of Miss Bird's two large volumes. We can assure our readers that, if they will go directly to these, they will experience much of the pleasure which Miss Bird had upon her journey without any of its inconvenience.

LIFE OF WILLIAM BLAKE. With Selections from his Poems and other Writings. Illustrated from Blake's own Works. By Alexander Gilchrist. A new and enlarged edition, with additional Letters and a Memoir of the Author. 2 vols., 8vo. $15.00. London: Macmillan & Co. 1880.

Those of us who knew Mrs. Gilchrist during her recent visit to this country will be glad to see that she has just published a second edition of a book, which is not only an artistic and a literary treasure, but a monument of wifely love. Only eight chapters of the thirty-nine were in print when her husband died in 1861, but the widow carried on the work and brought out the first edition in 1863. She has now inserted thirty-four letters from Blake to Hayley, Cowper's biographer, and several other epistles hitherto unpublished, and also added an essay by Smetham, first published in the London Quarterly Review, a charming memoir of her husband by herself, and a number of new illustrations, including several taken from Scribner, a Hamlet on his knees before the ghost, views of Blake's cottage, work-room, and death-room, two new portraits by him of his wife, his own portrait by Phillips. The whole number now amounts to a hundred, and among them are new photographs of what the Encyclopædia Britannica calls his "splendid series" of twenty-one designs, entitled Inventions to the Book of Job. "The grandeur of the theme is duly reflected in the simple and sublime images of the artist's design, and in the presence of those plates we are made to feel the power of the artist over the expressional resources of human form, as well as his sympathy with the imaginative significance of his subject," adds this high authority, which also says that some of Blake's early poems "deserve to take rank with the best things of the kind in our literature." Much of Blake's work, both in art and in letters, is too fantastic and mystical for general favor; but his independence and originality certainly deserve to be recognized by us, as they have been by Mrs. Jameson, Swinburne, and Charles Towle, the last of whom looked on him "as one of the most extraordinary persons of the age." No one can doubt this who remembers the poem beginning or this called "Orthodoxy":—

> Nor is it possible to thought

WE have to acknowledge the reception of the December number of the Revue de Belgique. Its leading article is "The Last Presidential Election and Electoral Customs of the United States," by Count Goblet D'Alviella. The essay rehearses our political frailties in a spirit of mild criticism. The proceedings of the convention which nominated Garfield are faithfully delineated, and General Arthur's shortcomings are made known without reserve. There is something amusing, as well as humiliating, in reading in a foreign periodical and in a strange language the enumeration of misdemeanors in our great public officers. However assiduous foreign journals may be in this respect, they cannot equal our own press in the dissemination of like information. The Revue has also a society story for Christmas, translated from the German by Marguerite Van de Wiele, an article by Max Sulzberger entitled "Anti-Judaism in Germany." It is a vigorous attempt to overthrow prejudice against the entrance of Jews into every department of State, education, and art. Camille Lemonnier continues a story entitled "Thérèse Monique"; and Adolphe Prins discusses the subject of "Crime in the Light of Modern Science." The latter paper objects to the materialistic method of accounting for crime entirely by heredity and kindred causes.

FOREIGN.

THE University of Berlin has now more than four thousand students, the largest number ever yet reached by any German University.

THE trial of Parnell and the other land leaguers for rebellious utterances, which has been in progress at Dublin, terminated in a disagreement of the jury.

THE French Government is to establish in Egypt a school of Egyptology which will be directed by M. Maspen, now professor of Egyptology in the College of France. This creation will be the third school established abroad at the expense of the French Budget. The two others are one at Rome and the other at Athens.

MR. GLADSTONE has received a deputation of electors of Midlothian, at whose request the right honorable gentleman promised to present to Parliament a petition in favor of the bill for legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Owing to the pressure of Irish affairs, however, the Premier was unable to make any definite pledges in regard to legislation for either England or Scotland.

PRISONERS for deb in Scotland were the first to feel the benefit of the Acts of Parliament which came into force with the new year. Directly after the clock struck twelve on Friday night, they were all liberated, under the bill promoted by Dr. Cameron. A crowd had assembled at the gates of Glasgow prison; and as twenty-five men and two women came forth, carrying with them their beds and bedding, they were greeted with cheers.

THE rejoicings occasioned by the visit of the King and Queen of Italy to Palermo were somewhat checked by a serious accident which occurred there on Monday, December 10. Through the pressure of a throng of people who were ascending the staircase to the gallery in the church of St. Catherine, the balustrade gave way, and a number of persons were precipitated to the floor of the church. No one was killed; but fifteen persons were injured, some very seriously.

THE Intransigeant, a Paris paper, recently published three important letters, emanating, it is alleged, from the Russian revolutionary committee and addressed to Rochefort, Karl Marx, and Leon Hartmann. The committee asserts that the nihilists are fighting for the sovereignty of the Russian people. It invites the moral cooperation of Rochefort, and appeals to Europe and America for funds to enable it to carry on the struggle. The letter to Hartmann authorizes that active firebrand to open permanent agencies both in Europe and America for receiving subscriptions.

MR. BRIGHT, in reply to a letter forwarded by the Lord Provost of Aberdeen, asking him if, in the event of his attendance at Balmoral as Minister to the Queen, he would accept the freedom of the city, has written that he does not expect to be in the north this year, and that he, therefore, cannot accept the honor proposed to be conferred upon him. A deputation of Rochdale anti-vaccinators waited upon Mr. Bright with reference to the arrest of a factory operative named Robert Tweedale, who was lodged in jail for the non-payment of a fine of £1 and costs, which was inflicted upon him in consequence of his not having had his child vaccinated. The man, who was out of work, lived just opposite Mr. Bright's house. Mr. Bright expressed his regret at the occurrence, and his disapproval of harsh measures being enforced against those who had conscientious objections to vaccination.

THE Berlin Municipal Council are determined to leave no doubt of their sympathies in the Jewish question. Beside reëlecting a Jew, Dr. Strassmann, to be their president by a majority of ninety-seven out of one hundred and twenty, they have embodied in their congratulatory address to the Emperor on the occasion of the New Year an allusion which is quite unmistakable: "With our beloved Imperial Lord," so run the words, "we recognize that only in the harmonious co peration of all the elements of that national life which ought to rise superior to the distinctions of creed, the warfare of opinion, and the mere outward opposition of chance circumstances, can the goal be reached which includes the welfare of individuals in the welfare of the whole." The Emperor's reply, which reechoes this hope in slightly modified language, is under the circumstances all that could be wished, and rather more than might have been expected.

A DEPUTATION of members of Parliament and representatives of the municipal and other governing bodies of Manchester and Salford on Thursday, December 13, waited upon the Home Secretary to urge the necessity of legislation relative to the treatment of juvenile offenders. Sir W. Harcourt, in reply, congratulated the deputation on the good work they had in hand, and assured them of his desire to bring in a measure at the earliest possible period. He concurred with one of the members that pauperism and crime should always be kept distinct, and that criminal children should therefore not be sent to workhouses. In any legislation which might take place on the subject, he said it was desirable that the responsibility of the parent should be kept in view. While not desiring to express any distinct opinion on the question of sending them to schools, he did not think that previous imprisonment in the case of young children under twelve could be advantageous.

JESTINGS.

A SEEDY-LOOKING man applied to a Galveston candidate for ten dollars. He said a few friends of the candidate wanted to make preparation already to celebrate his election. "But suppose I am defeated?" "Well, then, we can use the money in celebrating your not being elected. We are not particular as long as we celebrate."—Galveston News.

A WESTERN subscriber sends us the following, as a veritable incident in one of the ward schools of his city. The teacher was dilating to a class (under what branch of study does not appear) on the grand influence Moody and Sankey were having. "Who else is there that draws such crowds?" he asked. "Colonel Ingersoll," was the dampening reply of a young radical in the class.

A GOOD story was told some years ago of a Galveston colored congregation, whose pastor had bucked off the Sunday-school funds at monte. He was duly tried, and the verdict was: "De Rev. Amindab Bledso am acquitted ob de sin ob gamblin', pervided he pays de money back by next Sunday night. In de mean time, de members ob dis congregashun is warned again playin' keards wid Brudder Bledso."

HE opened the door cautiously, and poking his head in, in a suggestive sort of way, as if there were more to follow, inquired, "Is this the editorial rinktum?" "The what, my friend?" "Is this the rinktum, sinktum, sanctum, or some such place, where the editors live?" "This is the editorial room,—yes, sir. Come in." "No, I guess I won't come in. I wanted to see what a rinktum was like, that's all. Looks like our garret, only wuss. Good-day."

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

Lecture by

Rev. GEORGE CHAINEY,

Ex-Methodist and Ex-Unitarian Minister.

Subject: "THE CLERGY."

Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL says:—

"Mr. Chainey is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whited sepulchre of superstition. His lecture on 'The Clergy' ought to be delivered in every pulpit of the United States."

Admission 50 cts. Seats can be reserved at Box Office without extra charge.

Doors open at 7; lecture at 8.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

GLORIOUS is the fruit of good labors; and the root of wisdom shall never fall away.—Hebrew.

VIRTUE has no need of penances, nor a pure heart of washing in the Ganges, nor a true man of human protection, nor magnanimity of any ornament, nor the wise any treasure but wisdom. He who has given himself to virtue, and felt the joy of obedience to duty, will give up life, but not his purpose.—Hindu.

THOUGHTFUL heed is the way of immortality, indolence of death. Attack vigorously what is to be done: a careless pilgrim only scatters the dust of his passions more widely. Master thyself: so mayst thou teach others and easily tame them, after having tamed thyself; for self is hardest to tame.—Buddhist.

DEVOUT men are the title and inscription of the Book of the Law. They are the demonstration of all the truths, the solution of all the mysteries. Their outward life bears us to the path of obedience, their hidden life wins us to self-denial. They began their career before the ages, and they work for eternity.—Arabic.

WHOMSOEVER you choose to obey as a master, his bondsmen ye are, whether of sin whose fruit is death, or of obedience whose fruit is righteousness.—Christian.

THE lower world is subject to the sway of the upper world. . . . There is a band who know and do good, without practising austerities, and who investigate the real nature of things by the guidance of reason.—Persian.

THE sovereign good of man is a mind that subjects all things to itself, and is itself subject to nothing. Such a man's pleasures are modest and reserved, and it may be a question whether he goes to heaven or heaven comes to him.—Seneca.

BOETHIUS saith, "It is of sin that we do not love that which is best." What is in truth the noblest and best of all things should be also the dearest of all things, and that for no other cause than that it is the noblest and best.—Theologia Germanica.

THE situation that has not its duty, its ideal, was never yet occupied by man. Yes, here, in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable Actual, wherein thou even now standest, here or nowhere is thy ideal. Work it out therefore, and, working, believe, live, be free.—Carlyle.

IN the economy of God, no effort, however small, put forth for the right cause, fails of its effect. No voice, however feeble, lifted up for truth, ever dies amid the confused noises of time. Through discords of sin and sorrow, pain and wrong, it rises in deathless melody, whose notes of wailing are hereafter to be changed to those of triumph, as they blend with the Great Harmony of a reconciled universe.—J. G. Whittier.

IT is the business of a merely animal existence to sleep and feed. It is the privilege and glory of man that he may rise to Alpine heights of knowledge, higher and yet higher, at each ascent gaining a wider prospect of truth, and entering thereby into a clearer and better appreciation of the undying beauty of a virtuous life.—Henry C. Pedder.

HAVE good-will
To all that lives, letting unkindness die,
And greed and wrath; so that your lives be made
Like soft airs passing by.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THERE is an attempt being made at Jerusalem to find the tomb of Herod the Great. Perhaps, when it is found, an attempt will be made to reconstruct his history. A good deal may be said in favor of King Herod. His memory, at least, ought to be washed of the blood of all those innocents.

THE last number of the Irish World, published in New York, bristles all over with rhetorical bayonets against the English Government. Its London correspondent says, for one thing: "The time has come at last for justifiably putting out upon the high seas a couple or three Irish-American 'Alabamas.' And the means are in the hands of the Irishmen of the United States."

GOOD things out of Nazareth. It is announced that "through the efforts of Dr. Keane, the Roman Catholic bishop of Richmond, Va., nearly every Catholic liquor-dealer in that city has signed a pledge not to sell on Sunday. Father Andran, of Jeffersonville, Ind., who recently took a bold stand in favor of the education of colored children in the parochial schools of the Catholic Church, has also begun a vigorous war in the interest of total abstinence."

THE Independent assumes that Dr. Sadler, who officiated at George Eliot's funeral, was a representative of the Agnostics in England, and hence wonders how he could have said what he did on immortality, and used otherwise so much theistic and Christian phraseology. But Dr. Sadler is a Unitarian preacher; and the wonder is why he alone should have been summoned to speak and the Agnostics, who were present in force as friends, should all have been silent.

THE Ladies' Union, of East Dennis, Mass., recently gave a festival for the benefit of the Sunday Lecture Association of that place, which brought them for this object the sum of $170. The Lecture Association, according to its articles of agreement, is a union of "citizens of East Dennis and vicinity," desirous of "the advantages of associate effort for our advancement in truth and goodness, and for the promotion of general intelligence, good morals, and liberal sentiments."

ACCORDING to a correspondent of the Independent, Rev. C. F. Thwing, the average number of readers who availed themselves of the privilege of the open Reading-room on Sunday in the Boston Public Library in the year 1879–80 was five hundred and thirty-seven. "The readers are mainly men; and, judging from their appearance, those whose daily work would forbid their use of the reading-room on other days, except perhaps in the evening." The same writer says that the number of Sunday visitors at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts (which has been large from the time of the first Sunday opening) has of late greatly increased, "approaching on certain Sundays to no less than four thousand." The visitors on Sunday embrace people of every social standing, though the large majority are from "the masses."

THE British House of Commons has virtually declared Ireland in a state of revolution by adopting revolutionary measures to put an end to the disorder. The Coercion Bill suspends the writ of habeas corpus, and puts other extraordinary powers in the hands of the administration. And, in order to get a chance to pass the bill, the House by a large majority vote, embracing the Tories as well as Gladstone's followers, has taken away the old parliamentary right of unlimited discussion, whereby the home rulers seemed determined to obstruct all legislation in the matter. It is a pity that the Land Reform Bill, which is promised as the real remedy for the Irish troubles, could not have been introduced at the same time with the Coercion Bill. That the latter bill is necessary, however, seems evident from the fact that such a stanch, political reformer and uncompromising friend of the people as John Bright has given his adhesion to it.

THOMAS CARLYLE is dead. Last Saturday morning at his home in Chelsea, London, his longings for the end were answered. For eighty-five years, his Scotch robustness of body had served his fervid spirit. By his death, the most heroic force in English literature for the last hundred years is extinguished. He was a master of English speech, yet a master whom it was fatal for any disciple to attempt to imitate. He followed no rules of language, but made his own by his incomparable genius. His style was like the man,—rugged, virile, yet picturesque and poetic in its strength. He wrote poems in prose. And his life has been a poem,—a poem tragic in its intensity of sentiment, though having few of the outward elements of tragedy; for externally his years were singularly placid, and his activities confined to a narrow circle in space. The tragic element was all inward, in his own nature and in his views of human society. A hero-worshipper, he was himself a hero. And against all the shams, insincerities, hypocrisies, and smooth pretences of society, whether in church or parlor or State, he took the heroic attitude of indignant and scornful rebuke. In his philosophy, he was an extreme individualist, and carried his theory unflinchingly to its consistent conclusions. He had no faith in the masses of mankind, no faith in the average judgment of a community as a safe basis of government. He believed only in individuals. Hence, he pronounced clearly and vigorously, against the whole tendency of his time, for a strong government by the few ablest men. Yet his practical influence has not been on the side of pessimistic despair, but a stimulus to the noblest endeavors for ameliorating human conditions, and for the "everlasting yea" of righteousness as the only law of individual and national survival. And his private life, as upright and downright in robust honesty, as pure and sincere and honorable as his public literary work, enforced the same lesson. In both his private and public career, he was a moral censor; and as such has been among England's and the world's greatest benefactors.

Protest of Chinese Bishops and Missionaries

Against the Translation of "The Sacred Books of the East,"

WITH MAX MUELLER'S REPLY.

[From the London Times.]

The Bishop of Victoria has sent the following letter, signed by more than twenty of the Protestant missionaries in China, to Professor Max Müller, as editor of The Sacred Books of the East:—

"SHANGHAI, CHINA, June 25, 1880.

"Sir,—We, the undersigned missionaries laboring among the Chinese, have had brought under our notice the volume on the Chinese religion which forms one of the series you are editing under the general title of The Sacred Books of the East.

"We fully agree with your prefatory statement,—'that much of the value and utility of the series must depend on the absence of any color borrowed from theory or prejudice,' and we therefore deplore the fact that in the important volume alluded to there has been, as we conceive, a forgetfulness of the principle laid down at the outset. We refer to the meaning which throughout this book has been attached to the term 'Shang-ti,' so frequently found in the Chinese classics.

"You can be no stranger to the fact that a controversy has long existed among Chinese scholars as to who or what is meant by the term or title 'Shang-ti.' Some hold that it designates the God of the Christian Scriptures, while others feel themselves utterly unable to accept it in any such sense. Whatever may be the rights of this question, the controversy is a great fact, and ought not to be ignored. It arose, as is well known, among the early Roman Catholic missionaries in China; and a like contention exists at the present day among the different Protestant missionaries. It cannot be said that there has been any lack of scholarship in the discussion of this question. Both views have been well represented from time to time, first among Roman Catholic missionaries, and latterly among Protestant missionaries, by men whose Chinese as well as general scholarship is undoubted. We need but mention the names of the early Jesuit missionaries, Matteo Ricci on one side, and Longobardi on the other, and the Protestant missionaries, Dr. Medhurst, Dr. Legge, Dr. Edkins, and Dr. Chalmers on one side, and Bishop Boone, Dr. Bridgman, and Dr. Williams on the other. To the last three should be added, though of the Greek Church, the distinguished name of the late Archimandrite Palladius, so well known as one of the most profound Chinese scholars.

"Considering, then, that the question has been agitated among all classes of Christian missionaries for nearly three hundred years, our complaint is that in a book containing a translation of the Chinese classics intended for English readers, and brought out with your imprimatur, the term 'Shang-ti' has been not translated, as it might have been, by such a phrase as 'Supreme Ruler' or 'Supreme Emperor,' or 'Ruler (or Emperor) on high,' or transferred, as has been done indeed in some passages of the same book, with the term 'Ti,' in either of which cases no fault could have been found, but interpreted as the God of revelation,—the view which the eminent translator, Dr. Legge, so strenuously advocated while in China as a missionary. That is, he sets forth his own private view by substituting 'God' for 'Shang-ti' wherever it occurs in the classics; whereas, this interpretation of the term has been denied by persons as thoroughly qualified as himself to form a judgment on the subject. His reaffirmation of his reasons for this view in the addition to the preface made in the present volume does not make his interpretation of 'Shang-ti' any the less a serious departure from the principle laid down in your preface.

"Morever, this is not merely a literary, it is a missionary question. Many who have read or will read the book exercise a strong influence from England and other countries, directly or indirectly, on Christian missions in China; and it is exceedingly important that their minds should be kept free from prejudice on one side or the other, seeing they have no means of examining or determining upon the question for themselves. Such a book as Dr. Legge's is to them, so long as the controversy is undecided, simply misleading.

"We respectfully urge that, in editing it, the balance between the two parties in a difficult and still open contention should have been held with a steady hand, and express our regret that the book referred to, though brought out with the statement of so admirable a principle, of avoidance of all coloring, is nevertheless of a distinctly partisan character, inasmuch as by its interpretation of 'Shang-ti' it is the exponent of the view of a very small number even of those who prefer to use 'Shang-ti' to make known the true God to the Chinese; for, of those who use the term, very few agree with Dr. Legge in the opinion that 'Shang-ti' of the Chinese classics is the same as 'Jehovah' of the Christian Scriptures.

"It is on this account that we venture to address you. Were you less enlightened and liberal than you are, we might conclude by asking you to pardon us for addressing you; but we do not do so, as we are assured that your fearless and uncompromising love of truth will induce you to hail with satisfaction any suggestion which may remove from a volume with your name on the title-page the faintest trace of one-sidedness.

"We have the honor to be, sir, your faithful and obedient servants,

"To Professor Max Müller, M.A."

Professor Max Müller has returned the following answer:—

"Gentlemen,—I have taken some time to consider what answer I should return to the letter which you addressed to me as editor of The Sacred Books of the East, and in which you complain that, in the translation of the Shu-king and Shih-king, by Professor Legge, the names Ti and Shang-ti should have been rendered by 'God.' You call my attention to the controversy which has been carried on for three hundred years, and is still kept up to the present day among the missionaries in China, as to what is the nearest equivalent to be found in the Chinese language for expressing God. You remind me that Ti and Shang-ti were rejected by papal authority, and have been accepted among Protestant missionaries by one party only, and you remark that even those who, in rendering the Scriptures into Chinese, are willing, in the absence of a better name, to accept Ti or Shang-ti for God, would shrink from translating these terms by God when they occur in the writings of Confucius. As Professor Legge, during his long stay in China, has been one of the most strenuous defenders of the name Shang-ti as the best rendering of God in Chinese, you complain that he should have taken advantage of his position, as one of my fellow-workers in the translation of The Sacred Books of the East, and have translated Shang-ti, whenever it occurs in the Shu-king and Shih-king, by God, expressing, at the same time, his conviction that 'the Ti and Shang-ti of the Chinese classics is God, our God, the true God.' You also blame me, as editor of The Sacred Books of the East, for not having held with a steady hand the balance between the two parties in a difficult and still open contention, particularly as I had promised that these translations, offered to the public under the auspices of the University of Oxford, should be complete, trustworthy, and readable; and you call on me to repair the injustice which has been done to those who differ from Dr. Legge in his views on the true meaning of the words Ti and Shang-ti.

"Allow me to state, in reply to your letter, that, so far as the so-called 'Term Question' is concerned, I had, nearly thirty years ago (Edinburgh Review, October, 1852), expressed my conviction that it would be impossible to find in Chinese a more adequate rendering of God than Shang-ti. On that point, therefore, I could hardly claim now to be an impartial judge.

"But this, as you yourselves admit, is not really the question which concerns the translator or the editor of The Sacred Books of the East. The question on which, with the assistance of my learned friend, Dr. Legge, I was called upon to form an opinion when examining his translation of the Shu-king and Shih-king, forming the third volume of my series, was whether Ti and Shang-ti, when they occur in Chinese, should be rendered in English by God. On this point, I readily admit, it is by no means easy to give a decisive answer. In fact, I can well understand why many missionaries in China should have hesitated to identify the Shang-ti of the Confucians with the God they come to preach; and all I can do is to try to explain to you why, in spite of all objections, I myself agree with Dr. Legge in accepting Shang-ti, when it occurs in the ancient Scriptures of the Chinese, as a name intended for the true God.

"There are, perhaps, passages in the sacred texts of the Chinese in which Shang-ti is spoken of in what we should call mythological language,—language, in our opinion, inapplicable to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. But does it follow, therefore, that the Chinese, when they formed the name of Shang-ti, did not mean the true God, or that the best among them had never had any idea of the true God? You know far better than I do that there must be in the prayers and creeds of all religions a compromise between the language of the wise and the foolish, the old and the young, and that the sacred texts of no nation, not even of those of Jews and Christians, are entirely free from childlike, helpless, poetical, and what are called mythological expressions. There is, perhaps, no better name for God than Father, and there are few religions in which that name has not been used; yet, in order to render that name applicable to God, we must take out of it almost everything it implies in ordinary usage. Our own word God was borrowed by our ancestors from heathen temples; and the names for God used by the Romanic nations come from deus, Sanskrit deva, which deva is a mere derivation of div, the sky.

"And, if we are not to translate Shang-ti by God, what are we to do? You would not say that the Chinese alone, of all nations on earth, had never any word for God at all; for you yourselves say that they deified the sky, and how could people deify the sky or anything else without possessing an idea and a word for deity?

"You suggest that either the name Shang-ti should have been left untranslated, or that it should have been rendered by Supreme Ruler. If the first expedient had been adopted, all readers unacquainted with Chinese would have taken Shang-ti for a proper name, such as Jupiter; while Dr. Legge, whose Chinese scholarship you do not call in question, states that it 'never became with the people a proper name like the Zeus of the Greeks.' (Preface, p. xxv.) If, on the contrary, Shang-ti had been rendered by Supreme Ruler, as was done by Medhurst, or by le Seigneur and le Souverain Maitre, as was done by Gaubil, would these expressions have evoked in the minds of European readers any conception different from that of God, the true God?

"How could missionaries in China, if they are willing to translate Shang-ti by Supreme Ruler, continue to represent Him as a false God, or, at all events, as not quite true? Are there any who still believe in the actual existence of false gods, or of gods not quite true? Do they believe that Bel or Jupiter or Varuna or Shang-ti were so many individual beings existing by the side of Jehovah? They were, if you like, false or, at least, imperfect names of God, but never the names of false or imperfect gods.

"I have tried to show in all my writings on language, mythology, and religion, and more especially in my Hibbert lecture 'On the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India,' how we ought to read in the manifold names of the Deity, preserved to us in the ancient languages of the world, the gradual growth of human thought and human language in their endeavor to find better and better names for what after all admits of no name. What an ancient Christian martyr said, ὁ θεὸς ὄνομα οὐκ ἔχει, 'God has no name,' is true, in one sense; but, from an historical point of view, we should, I think, be equally right if we called God πολλῶν ὀνομάτων μορφὴ μία, 'of many names the one person.'

"Some of these names may seem to us very objectionable, but not all; and I confess I could never help admiring the bold language of an ancient Sanskrit poet who introduces Bhagavat, his own supreme God, saying, 'Even those who worship idols worship me.'

"If we are so hard on the Chinese, and tell them that their word Shang-ti cannot be used as the name of the true God, because it is used synonymously with Thian, which means the sky, what shall we say when they point to such verses in the New Testament as Luke xv., 21, 'I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son'? And, if we are offended by every anthropomorphic expression in the sacred writings of non-Christian races, how is it that we can bear so well with the language of the Old Testament, in reading of 'the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day'? Do the words of Dante,

> 'Per questo la Scrittura condescende
> A vostra facultate, e piedi e mano
> Attribuisce a Dio, et altro intende,' apply to our Scriptures only? Should we not apply them even in a far more generous spirit to the scriptures of the Chinese, the Hindoos, the Persians, the Mohammedans? It was, I need hardly tell you, one of the chief objects for which I undertook the publication of The Sacred Books of the East, to show, as St. Augustine said, that there is no religion without some truth in it, and particularly to make missionaries see that, hidden beneath a fearful amount of rubbish, and worse than rubbish, there are grains of gold to be found in every book that has once been called sacred by human lips. Nothing, I confess, has rejoiced me so much as when I heard the other day an excellent missionary tell me, 'You have shown us that the heathen religions are not the work of the devil; and you have taught us to look first of all for what the heathen religions share with us in common, and to make that the foundation of our labor.' Surely, the name for God in Chinese, or in any other language, unless it is simply intolerable, should be treated by missionaries with the greatest reverence. Let them slowly and gently cut down the rank growth of mythology that has choked so many of the names of God; but let them be careful lest, in tearing up the roots, they kill the stem on which alone their new grafts can live and thrive. Let them follow, in fact, in the footsteps of the boldest and greatest missionary the world has ever seen, who at Athens did not break the altar of the unknown God, but said, 'Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.'

"These are, in a few words, the reasons which made me not only approve of Professor Legge's translation of 'Shang-ti,' when it occurs in the Shu-king and Shih-king, by 'God,' but sincerely rejoice at it. Nor do I think that, in adopting the course we thought right to adopt, either he or I took an unfair advantage of those who, on conscientious grounds, differ from us. If this translation of 'Shang-ti' by 'God' had been inserted in The Sacred Books of the East, without any warning to the reader, I should plead guilty for myself; and I could well understand in that case the remonstrances of those who all their lives have been opposing Dr. Legge in his views on Chinese religion. But when there is in the preface, from page twenty-three to twenty-nine, a clear explanation of the reasons which induced Dr. Legge to render 'Shang-ti' by 'God,' when the translations of that name proposed by other Chinese scholars are clearly set forth and examined, and when the translator is prepared to take upon himself the full responsibility of that rendering which he personally considers the only true one, surely there is no solid foundation for the charge of mala fides, either against Dr. Legge or against myself. I need hardly say therefore, in conclusion, that it would be a great satisfaction to myself, and, I have no doubt, to Dr. Legge also, if after having read my explanations, and the pamphlet which Dr. Legge has addressed to me ('Letter to Professor F. Max Müller, chiefly on the translation into English of the Chinese terms Ti and Shang-ti,' by James Legge, Professor of the Chinese Language in the University of Oxford, Trübner, 1880), and which by this time has no doubt reached you, you should think it right to withdraw the charges which you have brought against us.

"I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant, F. Max Mueller."

"The first time I ever knew Emerson," says Mr. Tyndall, as reported in the "Radical Club" volume, "was when, years ago, a young man, I picked up in a stall a copy of his Nature. I read it with such delight, and I have never ceased to read it; and, if any one can be said to have given the impulse to my mind, it is Emerson. Whatever I have done the world owes to him."

THE SCHOOLMASTER vs. THE PRIEST.

A French writer says the schoolmaster means a republic and the priest royalty. That is a correct statement of the case, so far as France is concerned. Beyond a doubt, France is under bonds to secularize education on pain of a constant danger of relapse into monarchy or Cæsarism. France was one of the great European countries in which the Reformation was finally rejected, and as a consequence her people remained illiterate and priest-led. Edmond Scherer, in an article on the French Republic and the Catholic Church says: "The weight of an unsolved question seems to lie on those European States, which three centuries ago shut themselves up against spiritual emancipation. They have to break off in their turn with theocracy, and to disengage themselves from the trammels of a dead tradition. The nineteenth century will complete the work of the sixteenth, and the nations which are unable to accomplish that revolution will fall into the rear of civilization." It looks now as though Spain was to remain unrevolutionized, and to sink more and more into barbaric impotence and moral and mental imbecility, despite the influence of her single great modern man, Castelar. But, as for France, the schoolmaster is evidently going to win as against the priest. It has been a long struggle, that of freedom in France against the firm of King, Priest & Co.,—a struggle of almost a hundred years; and the end is not yet. The old French revolutionists were logical, but too violent. No inveterate institution can be uprooted in an instant. Popular intelligence and free government cannot exist in a country which is under the influence of a priesthood. That is what the old French revolutionists instinctively felt, and the sequel in France has proved that they were right. The English and American press, from the stand-point of countries not under priestly control, censured the suppression of the religious orders, who claimed to be Heaven-appointed teachers of the youth of France. The censure was unfair and without ground to stand upon. "How," asks Edmond Scherer, "could a country like France, having its democratic institutions to protect and its rank to keep in the competition of free and progressive nations,—how could it, without giving up its civilization, its dignity, its power, leave the education of its youth to the care of men whose educational principles are made up of fanaticism, sanctimoniousness, and self-abasement, of bitterness and hollowness, tending with express purpose to the destruction of all self-reliance and manliness, accounting as sin all that we hold as chief virtues,—the right and duty of private judgment, the liberty of creed, the toleration of error, the questioning of authority, the resistance to arbitrary power?" Systems of State education have hitherto been restricted to Protestant communities, but such systems are going to prevail in all countries which keep abreast of current civilization. The prerogative of self-government, which will soon be exercised by all civilized people, requires that education and intelligence be universally diffused. This fact is everywhere becoming transparent as noonday. The masses of mankind are taking a new departure, are succeeding to duties and responsibilities hitherto discharged for them by kings and aristocracies. As for this country, or that part of it which has always been a free, republican community, it has been the land of the schoolmaster and "schoolmarm" from the start. Its school-districts have been its most important political divisions, the very seminaries or seed-grounds of popular intelligence and popular liberty, which have moved pari passu, as the inseparable correlates of each other. Those who have the temerity to assail our American common-school system will find that they are smiting the bed-rock of our institutions, whether they be laymen or priests. Flippant essayists, anxious for notoriety, have selected it as a conspicuous topic for the exercise and display of their hypercritical ability. But, beyond getting themselves talked about a little, they have achieved nothing. As for parochial schools, they can no more run a successful opposition to the common school than could old-fashioned stage-coaches against railroad trains. The schoolmaster is going to maintain his wonted supremacy in this country against all comers; and, as for the American "schoolmarm," her usefulness is generally supplemented by a personal charm, that makes her secure in her great office, for great it is. In fact, the schoolmaster and schoolmistress are the living columns and caryatides of our republic. Edmond About, writing in defence of the movement against clerical teaching in France, before the law had been enforced against the Jesuits, said: "It is in the name of liberty that people now seek to shield the implacable enemies of every French liberty from an application of the law. It is because we are living under a republic that the Jesuits, after having striven hard to strangle it, crave permission to inoculate the rising generation with their hatred of it; and they get people to plead their cause (in England and this country) in articles every line of which is rank with hatred of the republic."

THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

The eighth in the course of Monday lectures was given by Rev. Samuel W. Dike, of Royalton, Vermont. The subject was "Facts as to Divorce in New England."

The lecturer gave many statistics in connection with his subject, from which the following is summarized. In Maine, 478 divorces were granted in the year 1878; in New Hampshire, 241; in Vermont, 197; in Massachusetts, 600; in Connecticut, 401; in Rhode Island, 196: total, 2,113. The ratio of divorces, in proportion to the population, is said to be larger than it was in France at the time of the Revolution.

In four of these New England States, the Catholic marriages were 27 per cent. of the whole. There being but few or no divorces among them, the ratio of divorces to marriages among the Protestants in Massachusetts was 1 to 15; in Vermont, 1 to 13; in Rhode Island, 1 to 9; and in Connecticut, less than 1 to 8.

Of the Western States, the lecturer could not speak with fulness, as statistics had not been gathered to any considerable extent there. But he said Chicago is not so bad as Hartford and New Haven, the ratio in Chicago being 1 to 12. In St. Louis, 430 divorce cases were tried in 1879, and 205 divorces were granted there in 1880. In Ohio, the ratio had been as 1 to 25 for many years, but is now 1 to 18. The worst portion of the West is the "Western Reserve" in Ohio, a country settled by New England people, mainly from Connecticut. There, the ratio of divorces to marriages in 1878 was 1 to 11. The farming communities also showed a worse status than the cities. In Ashtabula County the ratio was 1 to 8, and in Lake County 1 to 7. The birth-rate was found to be lowest where the divorce rate is highest.

In connection with the increase of divorce in Massachusetts, the lecturer gave statistics of that State, as reported by its Bureau of Statistics, showing that, in the last twenty years, population has increased 50 per cent.; while the highest increase of marriage was 32 per cent., and in 1879 it was only 11 per cent. over 1860. All crime has increased two-fifths as fast as the population. Singling out "fornication and lewdness" as having a more immediate connection with his subject, he shows that for the entire State—

> Each of these two offences of a licentious nature has steadily increased in each quinquennial period of the twenty years since 1860, until convictions for every one of them, with a solitary exception, have more than doubled in twenty years, while convictions for that one have risen from 16 to 28. The totals are, for each five years: 1860-1864, 719; 1865-1869, 851; 1870-1874, 1,164; 1875-1879, 1,972. Note the per cent. of increase from period to period, -18½, 37, 70. While, then, crime generally has increased 20.4 per cent., the population 50 per cent., this class of crime has increased 174 per cent., or eight times as fast as crime in general, and more than three faster than the population, and with accelerating rate.

To this he adds the farther statistical fact that the number of illegitimate children born in Massachusetts in the same period of time has increased from 8 in 1,000 to 17 in 1,000, and that the increase has been greatest in the last six years. As far as he has been able to examine into the matter, he finds that the same thing is true of other States.

Beside consulting statistics, he wrote over one hundred letters to judges, attorney-generals, police officers, many practising physicians, and a "few clergymen," requesting the results of their observations. From the responses, he gathered seventy-five letters suitable for classification. They cover one hundred towns and cities, and give the opinions of a large number of people who were consulted in their preparation. The result of his investigation in this direction he gives as follows:—

> In three-fourths of the localities reporting on this point, licentiousness is said to be increasing. In nearly as many the destruction of unborn life goes on as fast, or faster, than ever. Physicians are very emphatic on this point, and many speak with great indignation of the wicked practices of some church members. In one-half the places, licentiousness and drinking are found together; while one-quarter report more licentious than intemperate persons in their communities. Nearly all find the increase among the native population, while several call attention to the recent increase among people of foreign birth, and especially their descendants in the second generation. Some alarming things are said by a few of the mischiefs wrought in shops, and especially by commercial travellers. Very few report an improved public conscience, or stricter punishment of vice and its crimes, while on no point do I find so near an approach to unanimity as in the opinion that the public conscience is dormant, and that these offences are punished less frequently than formerly.

Mr. Dike does not say that divorce is the cause of licentiousness, but he thinks he has shown that the two evils are increasing together. Of the "second object of marriage, the giving of offspring to the world," he says that the Massachusetts family fell from an average of 4.69 in 1865 to 4.60 in 1875. The ratio of annual marriages to the population "has fallen in twenty years from a higher figure than reported in any European country to the level of Austria, and lower than in any country except Sweden." He considers the birth rate of the native New England stock far lower than that of any country in Europe. And he intimates that there are "certain losses of the maternal functions well known to physicians, which are considered by them as exceedingly significant." Altogether, he thinks the outlook for the future is not very encouraging, and that Castle Garden and the South—that is, foreigners and negroes—will control the country.

As to who are divorced, he says "nearly all divorces occur outside of our Christian congregations, and generally among people noted neither for intelligence nor virtue." He thinks that divorce is "one form of social disease appearing in a highly-bred people like those of the New England type," and is the result perhaps of overbreeding. I infer from his last two opinions above quoted that there are not many "highly-bred people" in "our Christian congregations" where there are so few divorces. He thinks divorce is a New England idea, and is found most prevalent among New England people. It is significant, he thinks, that in the last twenty years divorce and separation have doubled in New England, in England and Wales, France and Belgium.

This is, indeed, significant, and points perhaps to something that Mr. Dike has not yet discovered. But his lecture had many good points, and is well-deserving of a careful perusal. Our civilization can boast of nothing superior to the true home as it is found under the monogamic system of marriage. And society should ponder well this fatal increase of peril to its existence that is creeping in with licentiousness and drunkenness. These are among the chief causes of the increase of divorce, in my opinion. And these in turn are the inevitable result of the wild life of excitement into which the people of Western Europe and the New World have been born for many generations. Our civilization, fine as it is, is very one-sided. The leading motive in life has been avarice. Intellect has been developed in the interest of avarice, in the main. Selfishness has held the reins. Add to this the fact that, while intellectual development has made immense advances, moral culture has been held in abeyance by the fatal bigotry of the theological fraternity; that is, has been subjected to the domination of dogmas that intellect has outgrown. The consequence has been that the masses in the last two or three generations have lost their faith in "morals," so called. They have made up their minds that the theological doctrine of the universe is false, and that they are running no risks of future punishment in doing as they please. Follow this thought out, and you will come to just such an immoral condition of society as Mr. Dike deplores to-day. And all of us who have the well-being of our race at heart must deplore it with him. But his Church will not change things. It must be done by a power nearer the throne of knowledge and law. I wish I had more room to continue. Will the Monday Lecture Committee give me one of their hours? ELSIE, Radical.

REMINISCENCE.

The papers report the death, on Jan. 17, in Washington, of Peter P. Pitchlyn, delegate from the Choctaw nation, aged seventy-five. He had been brought in contact with every President of the United States since the administration of President Jackson, with business pertaining to his people.

This name recalls to my mind a correspondence in the Independent of Dec. 6, 1860, and subsequent numbers, respecting a murder committed by a Choctaw woman, Mrs. Harkins, said to be a daughter of P. P. Pitchlyn, and undoubtedly member of a church under the pastoral care of Rev. Cyrus Byington, then a missionary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The husband of Mrs. Harkins had been killed by one of her slaves. He, being tortured to extort confession, declared that Lucy, another of the slaves of Mrs. Harkins (and a member of the same church with her), was his instigator. She also was tortured, and then, notwithstanding her denial of the charge, was burned alive with the body of the actual murderer, who had escaped this fate by drowning himself. This took place on the first Sunday of January, 1859; but it was so effectually "kept dark" by the pastor of the church, and the other members of the Choctaw Mission, that the public had no knowledge of it until late in 1860, when attention was called to it by Rev. S. C. Bartlett, of Chicago, who made persistent but unavailing efforts to have the perpetrator of these horrors called to account, at least by the mission church, which ranked her as a Christian, if not by the civil authority. The missionary pastor, after keeping silence for a long time, wrote a letter refusing information or explanation; and Rev. Selah B. Treat, Secretary of the Board, wrote for that body that "we received no information respecting the burning of slaves in the Choctaw nation while the Choctaw Mission was connected with the Board." Mr. Bartlett, however, received an anonymous letter from some one sympathizing with the slave-holding members of the mission church, which gave the following suggestion as to the quiescence in this matter, not only of the minister and the church, but of the civil authority: "It should be borne in mind that the national authorities would not molest a Pitchlyn, their standing in the nation being such that to hold them amenable to law would require as much courage in the Territory as it would now [1861] for a native of South Carolina to arrest J. Davis for treason."

It is no doubt true, as Mr. Treat says, writing Oct. 27, 1860, that Rev. Mr. Byington made no report to the American Board of the burning alive of one of his church members by another, and the continuance of that other in "good and regular standing." These are not the matters selected for publication in the Missionary Herald. It is, however, a curious coincidence that the Board's Prudential Committee say, in their remarks immediately preceding their vote recording the discontinuance of the Choctaw Mission (Annual Report for 1859), "They have felt themselves greatly embarrassed by facts and considerations which they cannot properly submit to the public eye." How they got rid of their embarrassments, the readers of the Missionary Herald were never informed; but, shortly after the slave-burning, the Board accepted the resignation of their missionary Byington, and recommended him as a faithful Christian minister to the Presbyterian Board of Missions, whose service he immediately entered. THE "FREE CHURCHES" AND TRANSCENDENTALISM.

My dear Mr. Potter:—

We appear to be entirely in accord as to the necessity of substantial historical continuity between Christianity and "Free Religion." Only I should put more emphasis on the primary and philosophical meaning of this fact than you do, even while you assent to it. But the question raised in your notice of my letter is not the one which I suggested. I declared my inability to see why a religious society formed as mine was at Lynn, about thirty years since, should deserve titles indicating a merely half-way acceptance of freedom in religion, any more than the later societies which have proceeded, or are yet to proceed, from a certain positive organized movement under this name. While fairly granting my claims as to my own society, you seem to intimate that we may differ somewhat as to the permanence of Christian institutions. This can hardly be left on my part without explanation. What I believe is not only that Christianity as an institutional religion is destined to be wholly transformed into the better way of Universal Religion, but that it has already been so transformed, in the instances of independent congregations, both present and past, all of whom have alike made use of such inherited forms as they found susceptible of freedom and growth. The fact of a religious "revolution" is not in question. My point is whether, as many seem to assume, this "revolution," or evolution, be it of longer or shorter duration, was opened, or takes its main step of advance, in certain free organizations of very recent date; or whether, on the other hand, these last societies stand under precisely the same conditions of unbroken continuity as the earlier, especially as regards the use of such means as have not yet lost their uses for free minds. I choose the latter alternative, and am confident that we shall here too be in accord. The difference therefore can only be one of emphasis, as between those who are seeking substantially the same ends: yours, I think, resting more on the present importance of definite forms of organization, mine on that of the growth of a true philosophy of thought and belief in the individual mind.

When you ask, further, how I explain the fact that the older churches "growing out of the Transcendental movement" have come to an end, I must answer somewhat more at length. Leaving aside the obvious element of personal and local circumstances, I would say then, first, that I know of no religious societies, whether old or new, distinctively founded on this "movement," by which of course we mean the Transcendental Idea. Speaking for my own, I define it simply as a union of independent men and women for untrammelled inquiry and advancement, moral, social, and spiritual. I do not understand that any new basis of religious union has been substituted for this in later radical work. If this is Transcendental,—and I think it has at least a good deal to do with that and every other true way,—then both past and present unions of the kind fall alike within that noble category of thought. But their distinctive basis is not in fact Transcendentalism, nor any other philosophy of mind.

As I understand the Transcendental Idea, it is not the ground of special religious organizations: it is the rationale of mental movement, the self-affirmation of mind concerning its own necessary forms and processes, as the organic methods of all sane-thinking, the fundamental conditions of all experience. It considers mind, in its essential functions, as the active (not passive) internal force, to which all empirical phenomena appeal, and by which they are liftedasve themselves into ideas and laws. It not only accepts every fact of experimental science, allows every form of honest doubt concerning the contents of its own ideal forms, and hails all progressive reconstruction of beliefs: it is itself the necessary ground, the inevitable condition of every such fresh experience. Of course, it is possible to confound it with a spurious and eccentric individualism; with the crude notion of "innate ideas" ready formed and incapable of change; with a supposed special faculty, supernatural or natural, of absolute and final vision. It is possible to give the term "intuition" in this way a limited meaning, wholly unwarranted by true Transcendental principles or methods. It is easy to deny (as much recent physical research tends to do) everything but phenomenal detail and sweeping trains of sensations, experiences without an experiencer; to reject the necessity of mental foundations and conditions, cosmical or individual, infinite or finite, altogether. It is quite possible, in other words, to be unconscious of the conditions of human thought, because one is absorbed in its external objects only; just as one who should think only of the things he sees, not at all of how he sees them, might come to deny that he has eyes in his own head. Of the consequences, ethical, social, spiritual, of such negations, or of the results which follow on their opposites, there is no call to speak here.* On the other hand, Transcendentalism, if we must use the term, is the recognition, more or less clearly, of the primal conditions of thought and experience aforesaid. It is therefore an error to confound it with a special school or a special movement, or to give it no higher than a local or temporary function. Yet this is the treatment which it seems to be now receiving at "radical" hands.

My first answer then to the question just stated is that, as no religious society can be found distinctively based upon the Transcendental Idea, so no such body either is now, or is likely to be, based on the positive denial of that idea; and so we have here no data for

* The writer has endeavored to present these in an extended article on Transcendentalism, printed in The Radical Review (not the Radical), edited by Mr. Tucker, in the year 1877.

explaining comparative longevities. The second is that it remains to be seen how many of the new societies, or of those yet to be formed on similar foundations, will live as long as Theodore Parker's society, or even as my own; or what Transcendentalists may not have to do with future ones.

But, after all, these data would settle nothing on the main question. I should deny that the truth of an idea is to be judged from the duration of special organizations which may come and go under its name. Why should not the principle require frequent disintegrations and reconstructions, even under new titles, while remaining in itself unchanged? I used to tell my hearers (if I may be forgiven for another self-reference) that my purpose was to help them as individuals toward becoming each a church to himself; and that, in all needful combination for moral or spiritual ends, we were bound to drop every organized method or form as soon as we outgrew its uses. A very simple truism, we might say; but it seems to be as important as ever not to leave it out of view, in testing ideas by the temporary institutions that may flow from them. There is, then, no way in which I can draw the line of demarcation proposed between those free churches that have come to an end and those that still exist or are forming. Whatever theological or philosophical differences there may be among them, the self-conscious Transcendental Idea is not in their history, to be shut off to one or the other side of a given period of time. There was fully as much difference between the older societies in this respect as there can now be between any of the new ones and that which has perhaps just ended its long historic career by the unfortunate sale of the Parker Memorial Building. It was purely a matter of individual advancement on the stages of progress, and so it will remain.

Your recognition of what I attempted to do in the earlier day is in accordance with your perfect liberality and candor. I thank you for holding me worthy to represent the Transcendental philosophy, though pretending to no such fitness as you so generously award me. No new statement that I could make on that subject would convey my views more clearly than those already made by me in various forms, and without much impression, so far as I can judge, on the present phase of the radical mind.

Cordially yours, SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Mrs. Spencer's subject was "Roman Catholicism and Free Religion." She will repeat this lecture in the course at Malden next Sunday evening.

ALEXANDER AGASSIZ, Curator of the Museum of Natural History at Cambridge, Mass., is described as a bright, intelligent, busy man, easily approached, something more than a man of science, abounding in liveliness, interested in all that interests humanity, but too much occupied with special work ever to be idle.

REV. W. J. MILLS, at a prayer-meeting in Reading, Penn., for editors and newspaper publishers, remarked that it was a rare thing to hear prayers offered for the press, and yet he did not know anything that needed God's blessing so much. The editors of the Index sympathize with this sentiment, and meekly trust they were not forgotten on the occasion.

GOV. LONG wants to take conscience as his only standard in the temperance movement. One great trouble with the world is that too many people have done the same thing. The following of the promptings of a conscience, uncontrolled by reason, has been the cause of an untold amount of folly, misery, and crime. One of the most recent instances was the murder of a little girl at Pocasset in the name of conscience.

REV. DR. ORVILLE DEWEY says of Ole Bull: "He was a man of high thinking and of a profoundly religious nature, which did not take a precisely Christian form, either our own or any other. I remember that once, when I was representing to him the duty of forgiveness and love of enemies, enforcing it by the sayings of Jesus, he cried out, 'But if I love my enemies, what then shall I do for my friends?'"

WHEN Theodore Parker preached at the Music Hall, writes the Boston correspondent of the Hingham Journal, he made one Sunday morning a remarkably touching prayer. In it, he depicted with graphic power the situation of a person afflicted with some cherished sin which he found himself powerless to resist. "That's just my case!" shouted out an emphatic voice in the gallery, to the surprise of everybody but the imperturbable speaker.

PROF. F. W. NEWMAN, speaking of vaccination, says: "I have seen an infant miserably perishing from erysipelas induced by the surgeon's puncture, and the mother wasted by watching day and night over the babe's agonies." Regarding a law making vaccination compulsory, he affirms: "As an Englishman and a man of common-sense, I deplore and denounce this tyrannical, this usurping law. To forbid perfect health, as the law does, I hold to be beyond the legitimate power of any legislature."

THE colored republicans of Nashville, Tenn., have appointed a delegation to urge the claims of John M. Langston upon General Garfield to a place in his cabinet. If Mr. Langston has qualifications that entitle him to preëminent consideration for the position sought, we sincerely hope he may obtain it, but simply for these reasons, and not because he happens to be a colored person, which is as foolish as to rest his claim on the fact that he is taller or shorter than another competitor.

A GENTLEMAN tells of meeting the Rev. E. E. Hale one day in a horse-car, when he had with him a volume upon heredity. "A very fascinating subject," Mr. Hale remarked, after glancing at the title. "I remember getting into a discussion upon it with Emerson once. I had been reading a good deal in that line at the time, and was full of it; and I recollect that he closed the talk by saying impressively, 'And yet, in spite of all deductions of the laws of heredity, there is only one Weimar.'"

DR. McCOSH of Princeton thinks that Prof. Dana, Principal Dawson, and Prof. Guyot are better qualified than any others to represent science at the present day. This looks a little like the theological bias. All the persons mentioned are counted, from something they have said or written at some time, on the orthodox side of the conflict between science and theology. It is quite likely that those who are as competent to judge of the matter as Dr. McCosh would give a different opinion upon this point.

THIRTY distinguished citizens of Shelbyville, Ind., clergymen, physicians, lawyers, the mayor, and postmaster of the city, made the following proclamation of their opinion concerning a distinguished Jewess: "To whom it may concern: We, the undersigned, without hesitation or reservation, do hereby most cordially recommend Miss Carrie Levinson, of Shelby County, as a well-educated, thoroughly qualified, worthy and suitable person for the position of State Librarian, and it is our desire that our Legislature shall elevate her to that position."

GEORGE ELIOT'S work, says the Pall Mall Gazette, sprung from the reality and depth of her interest in human life. It was this noble concern in the strangely woven destinies of men and women, in the irony of character, in the tragi-comedy of circumstance, which gave to her conversation a nobility and impressiveness which will remain among the cherished memories of all who enjoyed it. The glow of the eye, the melodious earnestness of the voice, the sympathy of accord added a charm of their own. The beneficence of her spirit was untainted by any element of the sentimental. From that, she was preserved both by a vigorous and alert sense of humor and still more by a reasoned knowledge of the chain of inexorable forces which make human beings and human life what they are.

MR. BRONSON MURRAY, one of the best representatives of Spiritualism in the country, and a regular attendant of the lectures of Prof. Adler in New York, writes as follows to the Religio-Philosophical Journal concerning some criticism upon the Professor which has been made in that paper: "Men in Adler's position have laid down certain rules of reasoning from established facts within their knowledge. From these facts, as admitted by them, they reason. Whatever they cannot reach by reasoning from those facts, they characterize as irrational. To them it is so. Spiritualism and its phenomena are not included in the list of their acknowledged facts. Therefore, to them there is no proof of immortality, and to them and by them it may well be said to be an irrational idea. Take away spirit phenomena as a basis, and what evidence which can be called rational proof has the world ever had of immortality? None whatever. The deluded Christian hugs to his soul a tradition of 1880 years ago. He rests his conviction of immortality upon the reputed say-so of a Jew, born about that time, and of his asserted resurrection as handed down in print, through translations from and through several languages. Is that rational proof? Clearly not. Prof. Adler is doing a good work, far better than any Spiritualist of my acquaintance. Not an hour of the day or night, free from his personal necessities, but is used for a practical good to the human race, and most disinterestedly. That he has not given to spiritual phenomena an exhaustive examination is not discreditable to him. In the absence of a conviction based upon such investigation, he may well call immortality an irrational idea. Who by mere process of reason ever did demonstrate it? No one!"

THE GRAVE OF CARLYLE.—"There," said the sexton, while moving along, as he pointed out a flagstone bearing two names, one of which was but a few years old, "there is Mrs. Carlyle's grave." "The wife of Thomas Carlyle?" I inquired. "Ay," he said, "ay, ay. And Mr. Carlyle comes here from London now and then to see the grave. He is a gaunt, shaggy, weird kind of old man, looking very old the last time he was here." "He is eighty-six now," said I. "Ay," he repeated, "eighty-six, and comes here to this grave all the way from London." I told the sexton that Carlyle was a great man, the greatest man of the age in books, and that his name was known all over the world; but the sexton thought there were other great men lying near at hand, though I told him their fame did not reach beyond the graveyard, and brought him back to talk of Carlyle. "Mr. Carlyle himself," said the grave-digger, "is to be brought here to be buried with his wife, ay. He comes here lonesome and alone, when he visits the wife's grave. His niece keeps him company to the gate; but he leaves her there, and she stays there for him. The last time he was here, I got a sight of him, and he was bowed down under his white hairs; and he took his way up by that ruined wall of the old cathedral, and round there and in here by the gateway, and he tottered up here to this spot." Softly spake the grave-digger, and paused. Softer still, in the broad dialect of the Lothians, he proceeded: "And he stood here awhile in the grass, and then he kneeled down and stayed on his knees at the grave; then he bent over, and I saw him kiss the ground,—ay, he kissed it again and again, and he kept kneeling, and it was a long time before he rose and tottered out of the cathedral, and wandered through the graveyard to the gate, where his niece stood waiting for him."

FAME AND OBSCURITY.

Let not the mighty, proud ones on the peak
Call their poor scorn down to the vale below:
'Tis not the victim only who is weak,
The Samsons build oft on a coward's blow.

Grand are not they all, who have sought and risen.
The valley's oak doth shame the pine above;
The summit's not e'er free, the plain a prison;
And some who climb, below have left their love.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 10, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WILL FREE RELIGION CREATE A CHURCH?

For brevity, we put the question in this form. And yet, before it can be intelligently answered, we must explain what is meant in it by the word "church." For, if it were to be asked whether what is called "Free Religion" is likely to produce an institution of the character of the Christian Church, only of different name, we should at once answer in the negative. But, if the question be whether "Free Religion" is likely to produce an institution corresponding to the Christian Church, —that is, some specific form of organization standing to the essential thought and aim of "Free Religion" in the same relation that the Christian Church stands to the essential thought and aim of Christianity,—we should want time to think about it. It is with this latter meaning that we put the question.

In this shape, we believe that not a few liberal thinkers are at present earnestly revolving the question in their own minds,—thinkers who no longer feel themselves at home amid the associations and forms or in the spiritual atmosphere of the old Church, and who yet believe that the Church, with all its faults, has served to keep alive sentiments and aspirations that the world will not safely let die, and who are asking whether on the basis of perfect freedom of thought, and in entire accordance with rational and scientific methods of thought and action, some institution will not spring up which shall do for these sentiments and aspirations in the modern world what the Church has done or attempted and failed to do hitherto. These persons feel, perhaps, that they have faculties and tastes for working in such an institution. They may have fitted themselves for service in the old Church, and yet cannot get acclimated there. They want more freedom, more naturalness. They long for opportunity to do a similar kind of work, but on a different basis, with different methods and aims. And, hence, they are searching the spiritual tendencies and tides of the time for answer to their question, with no little of personal anxiety, because in the answer may be involved the fulfilment of their own personal hopes, the problem of their own personal career.

It would doubtless, in the present state of things, savor of presumption to affirm positively that such an institution is to spring up, and on ground entirely outside of the existing systems of religion. There may be tendencies from which we may infer, with more or less of probability, the coming of such an organic expression of freethought in religion. But the well-evolved facts are as yet too few to furnish basis for a positive assurance of opinion. There is one thing, however, which may be said with certainty: freethought in religion is transforming the existing systems of religious institutions, so far as it gets access to them; and we may say, therefore, that this is one way in which free rational thought is creating the Church of the Future; it is doing it by re-creating the Church of the Past. It is investing old forms of institution with new meanings and putting them to new practical uses. This kind of transformation of the outward organism of religion has always gone on under the influence of advancing thought. Even when one faith has displaced another, no inconsiderable part of the institutions and forms of the old faith have been adopted into the new, and put to the service of new ideas and purposes. And, at the present day, it is evident that, at least in the Protestant churches of Christendom, the creeds are being quite rapidly transformed in the direction of more liberal ideas, and also that the churches pay much more attention than formerly to works of practical humanity. A similar change is in progress in the religion of Judaism, and also to some extent in Mohammedanism and religions further East: all the religions that come into contact with the rational thought of the day are feeling more or less the effect of it.

And an argument of no little strength may be framed to show that this is the only way in which rational thought in religion is likely to create the Church of the Future. It may be urged that religious liberalism, outside of the churches, has hitherto shown no capacity to create institutions of its own,—that its mission has been to make over and gradually liberalize the Church itself; that, further, such powerful and enduring institutions as the Church have their roots in sentiments rather than in reason, and that what reason does is to clarify and elevate the sentiments and emancipate them from superstitions, but that it cannot take their place as a creative force; and, still further, that the people who must be looked for to sustain and do the work of the coming Liberal Church of humanity are not people in whom the rational or critical faculty is chiefly dominant, but those in whom, however active their thought, the sentiments are at least equally active: and this latter class of people, it is claimed—the class in whom the religious sentiments are efficient motives of conduct—are rather in the churches than outside of them. For these reasons, it may be argued, rationalistic thought that has gone outside of the churches is not likely to create any religious institutions of its own, but will only by its reflex action reform and adapt to modern ideas the religious institutions already existing. And there are persons in full sympathy with modern rationalistic thought, who, whether they believe or not that this is the only way for creating the rational Church of the Future, can yet themselves work more effectively in the midst of existing institutions than outside of them. So long as their opinions are in no way compromised, and they can maintain their mental independence and keep a clear conscience, by all means let them stay there and do their work. But let them beware of the subtle temptations to mental and moral compromise incident to their position.

But it is not our belief that this is the only way in which liberal thought is to discharge its responsibility for the coming institutions of religion. There is a great multitude of people who, under the influence of modern rationalistic thought, have broken utterly away from all existing religious institutions, and can no longer find satisfaction in them either mentally or morally,—people to whom any of the ordinary forms of religious "worship" suggest no idea but one of superstition, for whose ear the singing of hymns of praise and thanksgiving to a personal Deity has no meaning, and to whom, as we once heard a most scholarly and philanthropic gentleman say, the prayer is "an offence." There are, doubtless, a good many blatant, crude, narrow-minded, coarse-grained, and rough-mannered people of this way of thinking; and so there are people of this type in the churches. But there are also a good many cultivated, keenly intelligent, benevolent, and every way excellent people, who are of this way of thinking. And this class appears to be increasing every year. They are a class for whom the existing Church even in its most liberal form answers no need; and yet they are interested, or might easily become so, in all questions and activities that pertain to the well-being of mankind. Has not this class of people something to contribute toward the creation of institutions that are to take the place of the Church in the community,—something direct and positive beside their indirect and critical influence?

Certain signs, we think, begin to be manifest that this question not only ought to be, but will be, answered in the affirmative. There are indications that this class of people are becoming weary of the stage of mere discussion and criticism; that they are outgrowing the merely negative position; that they are feeling after something positive and constructive, something upon which they can themselves live and work, and which they can offer for sustenance and guidance to their children. Negations are good in their way and for their purpose, but they are not food either for the mind or the heart; and, unless the negation lead to an affirmation larger and stronger than that which it denies, it might as well have never been made. What the "Society for Ethical Culture" (to take an example from a great city) is doing in New York, what the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., is doing in a country village, indicate, perhaps, in a tentative way the form of organization which the Liberalism that is outside of existing religious institutions may take for its constructive work. Certainly, here are two very suggestive examples that may be most profitably studied by any of this class of Liberals who are thinking of organization.

There is one thing which will doubtless be avoided. This type of Liberalism, having broken wholly both with the essential faith and with the institutions of the old forms of religion, will not commit the error of shaping the new forms after the pattern of the old. It will develop forms naturally shaped by its own idea.

The old forms of religious service in Christianity, for instance, are based on two prominent ideas of which they assume the truth: first, the worship of a personal Deity, who, as sovereign, is pleased with the adoration and gratitude of his people, and who hears and answers their prayers; second, the salvation of his people from threatened destruction through certain means which religion has revealed, and the Church specially preserves and furnishes to each generation. However much these two ideas may be transformed and concealed under a liberal interpretation of theology, they nevertheless exist as the vital origin and root of every form of religious service in a Christian Church,—worship of a personal God, and salvation of the soul or personal reward to the soul from this act of worship. But the central thought, the essential belief of this advanced type of Liberalism, contravenes both of these two ideas; and, hence, it cannot logically or with any vital power adopt any form of service founded upon them. What, then, does it put in the place of these ideas? In place of the conception of worship, it puts the Pursuit of the Moral Ideal; and, in place of the salvation or personal benefit of the individual soul from worship, it puts the Promotion of the Welfare of Humanity. And the forms of institution which it will adopt, keeping consistently on its own ground, must be based on these ideas. When these two conceptions shall have become practical, living enthusiasms, then will Liberalism become creative, and do its full part toward erecting the coming Church.

COMMENTS ON MR. JOHNSON'S LETTER.

Mr. Johnson responds to our invitation, and gives a second letter, which we gladly print in our present issue. There are two or three points in it on which it seems necessary for us to speak, in order to keep clear our own position.

Mr. Johnson says that he knows of "no religious societies, whether old or new, distinctively founded on this movement, by which of course we mean the Transcendental Idea." To this phrase, "of course," we should have to demur. We do not know any societies founded distinctively and expressly on the "Transcendental Idea," nor have we so maintained. That Idea is a philosophical one, which is generally assumed to have originated with Kant. But the Transcendental "movement," of which we have been speaking, was that fresh awakening and activity of the "Idea" which came in New England with the importation of German literature and philosophy fifty years ago. This "movement" was complex. One direction that it took was the application of the "Idea" to religious questions, both speculative and practical. This phase of the movement, especially, greatly agitated Unitarianism; and of this phase Theodore Parker was the most conspicuous representative. We have always supposed therefore, and must still believe, that the religious societies in question, which, like Parker's, were in the main offshoots from Unitarianism, were one of the results of this agitation. If they did not thus have their origin in the Transcendental "movement," whence and why did they come?

Again, Mr. Johnson sees no essential difference between these older societies that have passed away and the new ones that may be forming. This is a point not easy to meet, because the new societies are as yet so few and so incompletely formed. They are yet inchoate. But what the difference may be would perhaps become evident to one accustomed to Theodore Parker's Sunday service, who should now go on a Sunday morning to hear Felix Adler in Chickering Hall, New York. At the Music Hall, in Mr. Parker's day, one used to hear the singing of hymns addressed to a personal God, prayer to a personal God, the reading of Scripture (though not for its authority), and a benediction; in short, the usual form of a Christian Congregational service. (And with the other societies the form was about the same.) At Chickering Hall, with Mr. Adler on the platform, one would hear no singing of hymns, but only music that might be called secular, though of a high order and of an elevating moral character; no prayer nor any of the modern substitutes for it; no reading of Scriptures nor benediction. Yet we venture to say that what he would hear would make upon him so deep an impression, would so stir him to pure aspirings and noble consecrations, that he would have no hesitation in calling it religious. He would remember, too, that Mr. Parker's society, as a society, did almost nothing in practical philanthropy, though its members as individuals may have been, and many certainly were, alive to all good works. But he would find Mr. Adler's society making organized activity for educational and philanthropic objects a central feature of its existence. So much for difference in form.

It is true, as Mr. Johnson says, that it remains to be seen how many of the new societies that may be formed will last so long as these older ones. How long they will last will depend on their ability to create needed institutions as well as to nourish and circulate ideas, and on the elasticity of the institutions in order that they may be adapted to human wants for a considerable period of time. And here is the real point of difference, probably, between those of Mr. Johnson's way of thinking and those of us who think that Liberalism needs, and possibly may now create, some more efficient form of organization. When Mr. Johnson says that he used to tell his society that his "purpose was to help them as individuals toward becoming each a church to himself," he indicates, we think, what was the central "idea" of the transcendental philosophy as applied to religion, and discloses the controlling spirit and purpose of these older religious societies, whether or not they distinctively recognized it in their statements of organization. And the purpose has been so successfully accomplished that each individual member, apparently, has become a church to himself, and the organizations have gone. That may have been a very good work to accomplish. We think it was in its time a needed work. But now the question comes, Have not these churches of one member — this atomic Liberalism that is outside of all ecclesiastical organizations, and has fully secured and may be trusted to preserve its rights of individual freedom —some obligations toward society which can only be discharged by social combination? If this question be answered in the affirmative, then we admit the burden is upon those who so answer to present the mode of combination. This may not yet be wholly possible. But we think it may be safely said that the directive purpose of the organization which shall meet this new demand will not be to make each individual a church to himself, but, without interfering with the mental liberty of individuals, to bind individuals into a strong, mutually sustaining brotherhood, for strengthening the highest sanctities of morality and actively ameliorating the conditions of human existence.

Mr. S. B. Weston, a graduate of the Harvard Divinity School in 1879, has been for nearly a year and a half the minister of the Second Congregational Society (Unitarian) in Leicester, Mass. Mr. Weston is in full sympathy with the ideas and aims represented by the Free Religious Association, and has been perfectly frank in the expression of his views; and the society with only one or two exceptions appear to have been entirely satisfied with his position in this respect. But the society is a small one; and the financial support of the minister is derived in part from a fund which was bequeathed by a former member toward the support of a preacher, "so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Unitarian." The trustees of this fund, after certain sermons of Mr. Weston given last spring, thought that he did not meet this condition of the will. The society thought that he did. The matter at one time was near being brought into the State courts. But finally both parties agreed to submit it to a committee of representative Unitarians and abide by their decision. This committee have acted, and have just given their judgment—unanimously, as we understand—in favor of the trustees' withholding from the society the income of the fund; that is, that Mr. Weston does not "faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known as Unitarian." We shall give next week a more complete account of this new and interesting case of defining and bounding Unitarianism.

THE "Howell Cobb" of Georgia, who has been writing letters to the New York Christian Union on the Negro question, is not the Howell Cobb who was Buchanan's Secretary of the Treasury, as by a slip of memory we blundered two weeks ago into saying. A Georgia subscriber recalls to our mind that the latter dropped dead in a New York hotel several years ago. Nor do we suppose it is even the ghost of the ex-Secretary who has written the letters.

MR. GEORGE CHAINEY will deliver a lecture at Paine Hall, next Sunday afternoon, at 2.30 P.M., upon "Our Work as Liberals," with the view toward regular Sunday meetings in the interest of Liberalism at that place. This subject will be considered at the close of Mr. Chainey's lecture next Sunday.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

A REMARKABLE application of the principle of evolution seems to be nearing the point of confirmation. In 1867, Sir Benjamin Brodie, in a lecture on "Ideal Chemistry," made a suggestion which we condense as follows: "We may conceive that in remote time, or in remote space, there did exist formerly, or do exist now, certain simpler forms of matter than we find on the surface of our globe. We may conceive that in remote ages the temperature of matter was much higher than it is now, and that these other things then existed in the state of perfect gases, uncombined. We may then conceive that the temperature began to fall, and these things to combine with one another and to enter into new forms of existence, appropriate to the circumstances in which they were placed. We may further conceive that, as the temperature went on falling, certain forms of matter became more permanent and more stable, to the exclusion of other forms. We have evidence on the surface of our globe of the permanence of certain forms of matter to the exclusion of others. We may conceive of this process of the lowering of the temperatures going on, so that these substances, when once formed, could never be decomposed. You would then have something of the present system of things." These suppositions did not meet with a very cordial reception. Perhaps they were a little too "ideal" for the regular worker in chemistry. But, for several years past, Mr. Lockyer has been urging them with the accompaniment of strong evidence; and some recent evidence from spectroscopic observations seems to be conclusive of their essential correctness. Professor Armstrong, in a communication to Nature, believes that we have distinct proof of a progressive development of the chemical elements, and that it will be within the power of the physicist of the future to build up a theory of elemental evolution not inferior in interest to the doctrine of organic evolution. We doubt if Darwin himself, twenty-two years ago, so much as dreamed of such a thing as the "natural selection" of the chemical elements.

IN a recent lecture before the Zoölogical Society of London, "On the Application of the Laws of Evolution to the Arrangement of the Vertebrata, and more particularly of the Mammalia," Professor Huxley mentioned some significant facts with regard to the Equidæ, and then said: "With regard to the interpretation of these facts, two hypotheses, and only two, appear to be imaginable. The one assumes that these successive forms of equine animals have come into existence independently of one another: the other assumes that they are the result of the gradual modification undergone by the successive members of a continuous line of ancestry. As I am not aware that any zoölogist maintains the first hypothesis, I do not feel called upon to discuss it." Professor Huxley must be acquainted with the opinions of the leading zoölogists of every country in the world, and we may safely assume therefore that the great army of zoölogists of to-day contains not a single man of ability who is a recognized defender of the old hypothesis of special creation. We call attention to this fact for the purpose of remarking that clergymen were once representatives of the best cultivation of their day, but that a vast majority of them in this country are to-day proclaiming their belief in a theology which is altogether inconsistent with the universally accepted principles of a most important science.

WHEN the Jesuits first visited China, the resemblances between their own religious rites and those of the Buddhists filled them with astonishment; and they were able to conceive of only two possible explanations of the wonderful similarity: one, that the Buddhist rites were perpetuations of some of the teachings of St. Thomas, who was supposed to have visited China during his missionary travels; the other, that the devil had designedly furnished the Buddhist priests with a travesty of the sacred rites of Christianity. The story of the Jesuits' perplexity came unsummoned to our minds recently, as we turned the pages of the "Middle Kingdom" of Williams, and found a prayer of the Emperor of China, in which he respectfully requested "Imperial Heaven" to send more rain to the neighborhood of Peking, because he (the emperor) had redressed those wrongs of his subjects which had obliged "Imperial Heaven" to afflict the land with drought. When we first read this very Christian prayer for rain, expressed in absurd Chinese phraseology, we might have been driven into a perplexity like that of the Jesuits, had we not felt sure that no one but the devil could possibly have produced so complete a burlesque upon the philosophy of the prayers for rain in some of our own liturgies; in that, for instance, now used by the Unitarians of King's Chapel, in Boston. A prominent member of this chapel remarked in our hearing, recently, that he always skipped that particular prayer. We suggest that he print the Chinese emperor's prayer as a tract for circulation among his fellow-worshippers. If he will do so, we venture to predict that his minister will soon be left to read that prayer alone. Can there be a more perfect theological anachronism than a modern Unitarian prayer for rain? We are willing to offer a Chinese chromo for the most successful answer to this inquiry. R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Hot Coffee as a Missionary Agent.

A New York Tribune reporter, several weeks since, gave an interesting account of a very practical kind of missionary work on Sunday among the poorest people in the lower streets of New York city. Omitting a portion of his introductory matter, we reprint his story here: —

Walking down South Street, just opposite the Roosevelt Street Ferry, in front of a big warehouse, the reporter saw a large crowd assembled around a fine-looking, portly man with silvery hair, who was earnestly addressing them. The audience was of the humblest class,—out at the knees and elbows, with battered hats and worn-out shoes. There were women as well as men in the crowd, and not a few little children were among the grown people. All kept excellent order. Some, who came apparently with the intention of interrupting or insulting the speaker, soon hushed their voices, dropped their profane banterings, and became quiet listeners. The man had power over the crowd, and he knew it, and exercised it. The sermon he preached was one to encourage men who are at the bottom. The simple, tenderly spoken words were such as were adapted to raise the poor listener above himself; to excite in him an ambition to better his condition; to be somebody; to drop his vices and put virtues in their place; to stop despairing and begin to hope; to cease quarrelling with one another, and to cultivate kindness, forbearance, and charity instead.

But the meeting was not all sermon. A handsome little wagon was brought up, with a tall coffee-urn and a large hamper of bread. Men from the crowd were selected by the speaker to fill and pass around cups of steaming, hot coffee and slices of the fresh, light bread. There were twelve coffee cups and saucers, which were filled and emptied again and again, until the supply of both coffee and bread was exhausted. It was a sight worth seeing when the poverty-pinched crowd drew up about the urn and wagon of bread. Some of the people ate voraciously, as if they were almost starving: others came up timidly, as if half-ashamed to accept the charity; but all were encouraged by the preacher in a blunt, homely way to go up and be helped and make themselves at home, and the result was that the people went forward freely and accepted the bounty in the kindly spirit in which it was offered.

When the preacher moved away to the Fulton Ferry to go home, the crowd followed him affectionately. He spoke to many of the people, and shook them by the hand, asking them how they were succeeding at their work, how the wife and children were now, showing a warm interest in each poor creature's affairs. To some, he gave money; to others, advice. There were a number of requests for assistance. Some of them were answered. One man asked for a few cents to buy something to eat. "No: I can't give you any money,—your breath smells of whiskey,—but I will buy you something to eat." But the man seemed to forget his "starving condition," and slunk away out of sight in the crowd.

The reporter asked the practical preacher if he would explain his system of work, how it began, how long it had been going on, and how it was supported. "Certainly, I will be glad to tell you all about our 'idea.' My name is John W. Keunion, and I have been engaged in this work for five years. In fact, to-day is the fifth anniversary of the day I began this sort of thing. I started it originally, by assisting the Rev. Dr. Remington, of Brooklyn, in holding several meetings for the benefit of the poor people. Soon, however, I began holding meetings of my own, and added the idea of distributing food to the poor people I came in contact with. I have held meetings in various parts of the city: for instance, at No. 15 State Street, Castle Garden, Tompkins Square, Jackson Square, at Water and Dover Streets, there opposite the Roosevelt Ferry, and at other places in the city. I shall stay, however, where you saw me to-day during the winter. I have been assisted often by clergymen of various churches, mostly by Episcopal clergymen. I am a member of the Episcopal Church myself."

"And how are these meetings supported? Who pays for the coffee and bread?"

"A few prominent gentlemen in New York, who do not wish their names made public, are supplying the money; and I am glad to do the work. A number of Episcopal clergymen are among my patrons, and they take a great deal of interest in the work. Each Sunday, we give away ten gallons of coffee and thirty pounds of bread: that makes about one hundred and twenty cups of coffee and enough bread to give some with each cup. We employ no servants, but the people themselves distribute the things and wash the cups. Our urn and cart are kept in the Union Ferry house by kind permission of the company. We have had our coffee-urn and hamper for three weeks. Before that, we used to furnish the people with soup and bread from some restaurant near by; but with our new system we can do a great deal more for the money we spend, satisfy more people, and satisfy them better.

"And now I'll tell you how I came to adopt this idea of preaching to and feeding the people at the same time. I believe in a practical demonstration of the glorious gospel, and I renounce the idea of preaching to empty stomachs,—talking to men about 'the bread of heaven' and 'the water of life,' while they need physical sustenance, bodily bread,—before they are in condition to accept spiritual food. A mistake is often made, too, I think, in asking men to give up drinking strong liquors and in persecuting them to make them do it, and at the same time offering them no stimulating substitute. We cannot compel men to be temperate or sober or total abstainers by any force: no reformatory can release the unfortunate drunkard from his thirst; but by kindness, persuasion, and material aid, we may often win his affection, so that he will listen to us respectfully, and after a while may be led to take our advice and struggle against his destroying appetite.

"The coffee-cart idea has been grandly systematized in England among temperance organizations there of a true, honorable, and practical character, by societies of the Church of England, and by people benevolently inclined. It is doing splendid work there, too.

"The people we aim to reach are those beyond the reach of the churches,—the ragged, the dirty, the outcasts; those who would never enter a church of their own accord, and who would not be asked to enter in all their rags and filth. My congregation includes every member of suffering humanity who will come: worthy and unworthy alike, all will be welcome to a cup of our coffee and some of our bread; and I try to say a few kindly words to them which they are also welcome to, if they will take them, but they can do as they please about that. I never condemn any of the people before me, or tell them that they are ignorant and lazy and shiftless, and are to blame for their low condition. I do not believe in that. I only try to encourage them, to get them to begin to develop their own manhood. I never preach denunciation; and I say more about heaven than hell, and more about the brightness of life than its shadows.

"And as to the results,—well, many of these people come to me for advice, and I try to advise them conscientiously. I have obtained situations for many of them, who have since proven themselves worthy of the trust reposed in them. I really want to do the people good. That is my life-work. I am made happy by every good result that comes, happier than I can tell you. No one knows what can be done among the poor in the way of leading them upward and giving their lives a purpose until he tries this missionary work. And would to God many more would try it!"

THERE seems to be considerable certainty of another strike at Fall River on an extensive scale. The weavers' union, under the heading "Let Justice be Done," has issued the following call for a meeting next Friday night: "Fellow-workers,—It is our duty to attend, as the business of the meeting is far too important to be acted upon by a few members. Let every one be present, and let us have a full and free discussion of all measures submitted to the meeting. It is time that some positive action is taken to obtain an advance of wages. There is not at present in the hands of the manufacturers a stock of goods equal to two weeks' production. The price it is selling at is one that gives a good profit. The mills are now paying exorbitant dividends; and it is but just that, as we have had more than our share of the hard times, we shall have a share in the present prosperity. Let every operative prepare to demand his rights, and an advance from the present starvation rates of wages. We hope that it may be obtained peacefully, but obtain it we must. Per order of committee. (Signed) J. H. STAFFORD, Secretary."

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 15, 1881.

The Ponchatoula Gazette, Robert Benefield, editor, has published several articles denunciatory of the repudiation policy of the Catholic Bishop Leroy of the diocese of New Orleans. It asserts the claims of his creditors in Tangipahoa parish alone amount to $3000, and urges the Bishop to give up the idea of going to Europe next summer, retrench his superfluous expenses, and pay the honest citizens of Tangipahoa. It calls upon the Morning Star, leading Catholic journal of the diocese, to "join with us in denouncing reverend scourges who, relying on their sacred office, would bring scalding tears to the eyes and sorrow and distress into the hearths and hearts of so many too confiding families, who, having escaped the ravages of war and failure of banks, saved a little, and loaned that little (their all) to these degenerate sons of the Church because of the Church."

It would appear from this that Archbishop Purcell is not alone in the repudiation policy, and his church is profiting by the dishonesty of its servant in Louisiana.

The introduction of Spanish and Portuguese peasants to labor on the plantations is well under way. Between three hundred and four hundred have been imported, and have given satisfaction to employers to date. A Methodist, in a communication to the Christian Advocate of this city, calls attention to the fact that about one-half of the white population of Louisiana comes from the Latin races, speak a foreign tongue, and are devoted to the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church. The Acadians, he says, have never emerged from the customs and habits of their class in France, and are as thriftless as their forefathers. They rarely aspire above subordinate positions in business, and are faithful propagandists of Romanism. Comparing their condition with the more robust Anglo-Saxon immigrants of the Great West, the correspondent deplores "the movement now going on to colonize among us pauper classes of these effete (Latin) races." While as free religionists and hopeful republicans, we may not share in the gloomy apprehensions of this orthodox brother, it cannot be denied that the rapid accession to Roman Catholic numbers will probably have an important bearing on the public school system, by increasing the number of its antagonists.

The fact that over one-half of the whites of Louisiana are Roman Catholics accounts, in a great measure, for the almost complete annihilation of the public school system, and the singular apathy of the press and people on the subject. The Constitutional Convention of 1879 first abolished the office of State Superintendent of public education, but subsequently reconsidered that action, giving to the occupant a nominal salary and power for supervision, which renders it ineffective as a stimulating agency. A very earnest State Superintendent was defeated for reëlection; and a president of a country college, who has not ceased the duties of that position, was chosen his successor. The one mill State tax, if all collected, would yield only twenty-five cents per annum for each child of school age; and, owing to constitutional limitation of the rate of taxation, local authorities can do but little in the way of supplementing this with special levies. In addition, the poll-tax was designed to go to the school treasurers of the parishes in which collected, and a stringent law made the poll-tax a perpetual lien on property; yet tax-collectors have generally disregarded this legislative act, and the schools have been closed in many parishes for want of funds, and teachers have gone unpaid for months. To conciliate half a dozen negro politicians, as an evening daily well says, $10,000 a year is appropriated from the depleted State fund for a so-called colored university, "leaving the teachers of common schools of both races without pay and in indigence." A few public-spirited journals have made proper appeals; but, as there is no remedy save by constitutional amendment for this condition of affairs, the outlook is not promising. E. B.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION TO A.D. 200. By C. B. Waite, A.M. Published. Chicago: C. V. Waite & Co.

The above is heralded in the publisher's notice as "one of the most important books of the present century, . . . the result of years of laborious investigation in a field which has heretofore been passed over very lightly." The author, C. B. Waite, of Chicago, is an able and a prominent lawyer, who for the past four years has spent the greater portion of his time in Washington, where, aided by the opportunities afforded in the National Library, he has pursued the studies which have led to the writing and publication of his remarkable work. Mr. Waite set about his task from the stand-point of neither the believer nor unbeliever, and impelled only by the healthy and intelligent curiosity of one accustomed to weigh evidence for himself. His book, which has been aptly characterized a "lawyer's brief," is a model of clear, concise statement. Seldom is it one reads a book so uncompromisingly honest, and withal so modest in its general tone. The reader's attention is not obtruded upon either by the author or his opinions, but constantly directed to the subject under consideration, and the sources of information and authority which he draws from. With its admirable arrangement of chapter headings, including dates, subjects, etc., and the accompanying list of Christian writers chronologically arranged, together with its copious notes and references, it is likely to become one of the most valuable reference books we have on this subject; though we cannot but wish the general index were a trifle more complete, and regret as we wonder at the absence of names like Kuenen and his associate authors among the references.

Mr. Waite's theories of the New Testament canon and the doctrines it contains correspond so closely to those set forth in Kuenen's Religion of Israel and The Bible for Learners that they offer nothing novel or startling to one informed in the latest results of German Biblical criticism; but its great merit lies in the fact that it offers no mere say-so of its own for the reader's unquestioned acceptance, but substantiates every proposition with numerous citations from the works of dead and living authors, whom, thus directed, we may consult for ourselves.

The first two centuries of the Christian era are divided into six periods, concerning which we will make brief mention in due order. The first is "the Apostolic age," from 30 to 80 A.D. The subject here treated is "The Lost Gospels" of Paul and Peter, and the oracles or sayings of Christ attributed to Matthew. Mr. Waite concurs with Ewald on the authenticity of the early Pauline gospel. Of the gospel of Peter and the oracles, much less is known,—so little, in fact, that their existence is almost purely legendary; yet they or the traditions concerning them were without doubt the germs of the Gospels of Mark and Matthew, as Paul's was the germ of Luke's. Neither of these contained any reference whatever to the miraculous birth, the miracles, or the resurrection of Christ. Paul believed in the spiritual resurrection, and the bestowal of miraculous powers by the risen Christ through the Holy Spirit; but there is nothing to show that he had ever heard of Jesus as a miracle-worker.

The second period is that of "the Apostolic Fathers," 80 to 120 A.D., none of whose writings evince any knowledge of these doctrines or of the canonical Gospels. The remainder of the history of this period is taken up with an account of the lost Gospels, which affords much curious and instructive reading, but which we have not space to linger over. An account follows of the age of miracles, in which a complete history is given of Apollonius of Tyana, Simon Magus, and the miracles of the fathers of the Church. Here, and in the history of the New Testament miracles, we may see in what a very natural and human manner the belief in miracles arises.

The third period is that of the three apocryphal Gospels, the Protevangelian, the Gospel of the Infancy, and the Acts of Pilate. Here we have reached the most interesting and important part of the work. After relating at some length the history of these Gospels, careful comparisons are instituted between them and the present canonical writings of the New Testament, showing a startling similarity between the rejected manuscripts and the present authoritative version. Copious extracts are also given from the story of Krishna, and the Persian legend respecting the Zoroastrian prophecies of the magi and the star. The conclusion reached is that the doctrine of Christ's birth, the visit of the adoring shepherds and the wise men of the East, was the result of slow accretion and interpolation from both native and foreign sources. The author pauses to take note of the adverse criticism which this view has already given rise to, and to reply to his objectors on the way.

The fourth period, 143 to 170 A.D., is further entitled "Forty Years of Christian Writers." Here, the law of accretion is again illustrated; and several pages are devoted to a comparison of the Gospels of Marcion and Luke. Carefully estimating the new words and additional verses in Luke, the "strength of the argument" is as two hundred and thirty to one that Marcion was written first. The changes made are in accord with the spirit of the age; and these methods of accretion and interpolation, however blameworthy, are neither wholly unnatural nor difficult to understand, especially in an age when people depended so much upon oral tradition, and every third and fourth man believed himself an inspired teacher. In this review of the early Christian writers, we are confronted with the remarkable fact that no one of them makes any mention of the present version of the Christian Scriptures, or of the evangelists as the authors of Gospels.

The fifth period, from 170 to 185 A.D., is characterized as that of "The Four Canonical Gospels." External and internal evidence agree in the testimony that these Gospels were not known before 170 A.D. No manuscripts are now in existence dating further back than the fourth century, and no evidence exists of any autograph manuscript ever having been known. We have the testimony of Origen that the canonical Gospels were selected from a mass of other writings. The evidence furnished in the study of the Gospels in a group show that "as a history the Gospels are fragmentary, incoherent, and far from harmonious." With regard to the origin of the synoptics, the author thinks Eichhorn's theory of a single document, made use of by the three gospellers, a reasonable one, as it recognizes the working of the law of accretion. Schleiermacher's view that Luke's was the principal Gospel, the author coincides with, believing the proper order to be Luke, Mark, John, Matthew. Concerning the character of the Gospels, Mr. Waite quotes approvingly from Mr. Sunderland's little book, What is the Bible? where he speaks of them as "the work of editors, . . . compilations, mosaics."

The sixth and last period is from 185 to 200 A.D. Short accounts are given of the writers of this period, and the rise of the Catholic Church. At this time, "the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, with most of the other New Testament writings, were coming into circulation." Summing up his work, the author says that, owing to the dearth of material, and the credulity, superstition, and ignorance of these writers upon whom we must depend for information, only "the framework of the orthodox religion of the second century" can be constructed. "The complete and living form of Christianity is wanting."

In the appendix, Mr. Waite records his dissent from the conclusions of those critics who doubt the historical identity of the man Jesus, and mentions Paul, Josephus, and Tacitus as reliable witnesses in this matter. Paul's Epistles are "utterly unexplainable and incomprehensible" on any other basis. Josephus speaks of "the brother of Jesus who was called Christ," in a passage believed to be entirely authentic; and Tacitus mentions the death of Christus by Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius. Mr. Waite is no destructionist, and he lays no iconoclastic hand on the vital truths of religion, nor even upon the essential principles of Christianity. His studies seem to have brought him to about the same view of the Bible as that held by the large mass of liberal Christians. He has been content to prove the incredibility of the main tenets of modern orthodoxy, without going into the deeper questions respecting the nature and mission of Christianity as one among others of the world's great systems of religious faith.

STUDIES IN SONG. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. New York: R. Worthington. 1880. $1.75.

This book is dedicated to Mrs. Lynn Linton, the author of Joshua Davidson. The longest of the fourteen poems is written in memory of Walter Savage Landor, and is full of notices of his works. Particularly charming are the description of sea-weed in "Off Shore," and the poem on a child, entitled "Six Years Old." The series of pictures of Nero called "The Emperor's Progress," the eulogium on Mazzini, and the "Translation of the Grand Chorus of Birds in Aristophanes" are also not to be overlooked. It is rather curious that a writer whose style is usually somewhat profuse and florid, though always very musical, should show such poverty of titles as to publish a series of books called Songs before Sunrise, Songs of the Spring Tide, Songs and Ballads, Studies in Song, Essays and Studies, and A Study of Shakespeare. It is so difficult to distinguish these books that we may now call attention to the fact that his most radical poems are in the two first volumes mentioned, and his keenest literary criticism is in the two last. No one else has written of Shakespeare with such originality and at the same time such eloquence, as no one has enshrined so advanced ideas about religion in such melodious poetry.

THE Popular Science Monthly for February has a full line of the appropriate scientific merchandise. Herbert Spencer's papers on Political Institutions are continued in a fourth section, entitled "Political Differentiation." He carries his massive system of induction into the explanation of the origin of such social distinctions as those between the sexes, slaves, and masters, military and agricultural classes, and nobles and freemen. E. B. Tylor's "Origin of the Plough and Wheel-Carriage," with its simple illustrations, is a most attractive paper. The common plough is traced back to the sharp-pointed stick of primitive tribes, and upward through its modifications by Mexicans and Egyptians, to something of its modern perfection. F. L. Oswald gives another paper on "Physical Education," in which he talks of diet in a somewhat dictatorial tone, reminding one of a cheap lecture from an itinerant physician. Eliza A. Youman's illustrated article calls attention to Darwin's new work on the "Movements of Plants." We can almost follow in it the loops, curves, triangles, and ellipses which these wonderful little organisms describe in their growth. Lester F. Ward's "Evolution of the Chemical Elements" gives some of the recent philosophical speculations of chemists. According to these, we may regard all elements and combinations as varying conditions of one primeval substance. Charles M. Lungren writes again of "Domestic Motors," S. P. Thompson of the "Optical Illusions of Motion," and Professor Carhart of "Atmospheric Electricity."

THE boys and girls who impatiently wait the arrival of Wide-Awake are not likely to open the number of the current month with any loss of their usual delight. The frontispiece, "The Roman Boy's Spoils," shows fine artistic conception and touch, and, with its accompanying poem, possesses a suggestiveness that is calculated to put the boys of to-day in sympathy with those of the old classic time. There is also a profusion of choice and pleasing pictures scattered through the number, illustrating in a striking way the queer fancies and charming stories in prose and rhyme which it contains, that are sure to entertain the mind of childhood. Among the names of well-known contributors occur those of Edward Everett Hale, Mrs. A. M. Diaz, Clara Doty Bates, Arthur Gilman, Margaret J. Preston, and others of equal favor with the readers of this exquisite little magazine, even if less famous. In addition to the prizes already offered by the publishers for stories written by the subscribers to Wide-Awake, they have added as a regular feature a series of three prizes in each issue to those who succeed in entangling its tangles of enigmas and puzzles. They also offer four prizes for the best specimens of white and black drawings. The present number also contains "A Lullaby" (a song for little girls to sing to their dolls), words and music by Louis C. Elson. Babyland is a no less happy adaptation to a younger class of children. The price is but fifty cents a year, and, with its little bits of stories, amusing verses, and captivating pictures, is sure to gladden any household it enters.

FOREIGN.

M. CIPRIANI, an Italian Socialist, who was arrested for creating a disturbance at the Saint-Lazare Station on the day when Louise Michel arrived from London, has been expelled from France. The decree of expulsion was suspended to allow of his undergoing a term of inprisonment previous to his departure. He has left Paris for Geneva.

AN attempt has been made to burn Crail parish church. The guilty person, having collected the Bibles into a heap, set fire to them, so as to kindle the pews. The attempt, however, failed; the only damage done being the burning of some leaves of the Bibles and the charring of the panels of the seats. This church was built in the reign of David I., and is intimately connected with the spread of the Reformation in Scotland.

THE attachment of the Irish peasant to the soil appears to be limited to the soil of his native country. According to some official returns published by a contemporary the other morning, out of every thousand Irish immigrants in the United States only eighty, or less than ten per cent., betake themselves to agriculture. The remaining nine hundred and twenty settle in great cities, the factory towns, and the mining districts. Hence, of the seven million Catholics of America, an overwhelming majority is to be found not on the land, but in the urban districts. These figures, which are probably approximately correct, seem to indicate that the land hunger of the Celt is due rather to the lack of other means of earning his bread than to any preference for agriculture.—Pall Mall Budget.

A LETTER written partly in red and partly in black ink, and "embellished" with skulls, cross-bones, and coffin, has been received by Superintendent Wilcox, of the Birmingham police force. It reads as follows: "Blood. William Wilcox, you had better put police on the track. Mr. Bradlaugh will by some unknown hand be put to death. The fire in hell is wriggling about in its great frenzy to burn his wicked body to ashes. . . . If he does not repent soon, it will be too late. Many bullets are being moulded to penetrate the head of the detestable atheist. This is from one who knows you. The hand which wields this will have no part in the plot against that damnable Bradlaugh, but you be on the alert. You shall see what you shall see. When I saw you, it was in Sheffield. Blood—Death. Yours, RICHARD J. S."

THE trial at Kolapore of the twenty-seven persons charged with "levying war against the Empress" is being continued before the political officer. According to the evidence, some of the Brahmins implicated were to work certain charms in the temples, and, upon orders given by the leaders, a body of men were to attack the Europeans while attending service in the church. The plans of the ringleaders were a strange medley,—sensible in some respects, but curiously foolish in many of the details. They had arranged to cut the telegraph wires, and to protect from loot some buried treasure which the Brahmins expected to find by means of their charms. A man was obtained to personate the deposed Rajah on his alleged return from exile. As the incantations to find the buried treasure failed, dacoities were substituted in order to raise money. An accident twice averted a massacre of Europeans. There is no leader of mark engaged in the affair.

THE OATH QUESTION.—Again has the practice of taking oaths before witnesses are allowed to testify in our courts come up for discussion. In the Magistrates' Court in Wellington, a plaintiff was objected to as a witness, as he was said to be an "atheist." The other side retorted that the defendant was also an unbeliever. The magistrate said he thought people should be allowed to testify as they pleased. A reference was made to our Evidence Amendment Act, which permits any one who cannot or will not be sworn to declare instead. Ultimately, however, the plaintiff said he was not an atheist, though the defendant's conduct had almost made him one; and he took the oath. Now, why all this swearing? Is there one person in fifty that the taking of an oath prevents from stating what is untrue? We doubt it. The present penalty of perjury is a far better deterrent from false swearing than the probable future punishment for a false oath. Really, it is time oaths were abolished. They are a record of an unenlightened and superstitious age.—The Echo, Otago, New Zealand.

THE hearing of the charge against Mrs. Susan Wills Fletcher, Spiritualist, of obtaining by fraud a quantity of jewelry and other property from Mrs. Hart-Davis, was resumed at Bow Street on Tuesday. The prosecutrix gave evidence at considerable length of many interviews with the prisoner and her husband, at which pretended messages were given her from her dead mother. The substance of these messages was written down at the time by the prosecutrix, and was read in court. The prosecutrix said she left her husband, and went to live with Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher. They were to make a triad, "Sister Bertie" representing Work, "Brother Willie" Wisdom, and she Love. This was to be a trinity of harmony. In consequence of the messages she received through the Fletchers, she gave up to them jewelry of the value of between £3,000 and £4,000, her mother's wardrobe, valued at about £6,000, and made a will and executed a deed of gift in their favor. She afterwards went with the Fletchers to America, where they tried to shake her off. The case was adjourned till January 7, the prisoners being admitted to bail.—Pall Mall Budget, December 24.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Commission of the Free Church Assembly, consisting of all members of the last Assembly, was lately held at Edinburgh to consider the articles by Professor Robertson Smith published since the judgment of the last Assembly on the professor. A strong whip had been issued by both parties, and there was a large attendance. A report was submitted by a committee, to whom the case had been referred, which asserted that the whole tendency of Professor Smith's articles was to throw the Old Testament history into confusion, and at least to weaken.

if not to destroy, the very foundation on which New Testament doctrine is built. The committee accordingly recommend the Commission to take steps for making it evident that the Free Church cannot sanction this kind of teaching, and for urging the General Assembly to declare to her people and to other churches that she cannot sanction the ideas suggested by it. The minority of the committee dissented from the finding, chiefly on the ground that there had been avowedly no attempt to make sure of the true meaning of what Professor Smith said, but only to report the supposed natural effect of the statements on ordinary readers. Professor Smith having been heard in his defence, in the course of which he protested against the irregularity of the present proceedings, a long discussion took place, and ultimately it was agreed by 270 to 202 to approve the report of the committee, and to "instruct Professor Smith to abstain from teaching his class during the ensuing session, leaving the whole question as to his status and position in the Free Church to the determination of the General Assembly."

MR. BRADLAUGH AND M. LAISANT.—Mr. Bradlaugh has received a challenge to fight from M. Laisant, a French Deputy, whom he has mortally offended. The cartel was formally presented to the honorable member for Northampton through MM. Pelletan and Guillot. These gentlemen desired Mr. Bradlaugh to appoint seconds, and to indicate where he was to be found. "What 'twas all about" it is hardly necessary to inquire. In such matters, the merits of the case count for almost nothing. It is the incidents, and not the casus belli, that are important. M. Laisant for some reason, or want of reason, is pleased to stigmatize Mr. Bradlaugh as a "false democrat" and "a Prussian spy." These be hard words, but the member for Northampton is accustomed to hard words,—nay, he seems to thrive on them. Names, however opprobrious, break no bones. Still, considering the efforts that Mr. Bradlaugh made to help the Republic in her hour of need, the personal risks he ran, and the hearty thanks tendered him by the Tours Government for his disinterested exertions, it does seem a little gratuitous on the part of M. Laisant to indulge in such strong language. If our stalwart compatriot had been named the "Rev. Charles Bradlaugh," that would have been about as appropriate as to call him a "Prussian spy." Howbeit, the fiery Deputy is ready to make good his words at the sword's point; but Mr. Bradlaugh is not. Replying to MM. Pelletan and Guillot, he simply declined to have anything to do with them. His quarrel was with M. Laisant, and M. Laisant would find him at such and such a hotel in Paris whenever it suited his (Mr. Bradlaugh's) convenience to be there. Let the Deputy molest the honorable member, and the honorable member would probably select as a suitable weapon of defence the toe of his boot. This was what Mr. Bradlaugh doubtless meant, though he did not say it in so many words. And no rational being can doubt that he was right. The laws of honor, as understood on this side of the Channel, did not require that he should "go out" with M. Laisant, or any other Continental fire-eater. Duelling is a barbarous anachronism which has survived too long in France, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Bradlaugh's rational treatment of M. Laisant will do something to abate the nuisance.—Weekly Despatch.

JESTINGS.

A COUNTER-IRRITANT is described as a woman who is forever shopping and never finds anything she wants.

THE Shroud is the cheerful name of a newspaper devoted to the undertaking interest. It is full of grave remarks.

"HE'S an honest young man," said the saloon-keeper, with an approving smile: "he sold his vote to pay his whiskey bill."

TEACHER: "Peter, you are such a bad boy that you are not fit to sit in the company of good boys on the bench. Come up here and sit by me, sir."

SOMETHING in Boston displeased Brother Sankey. He says, "The Bostonians have a great deal better opinion of themselves than the Lord has of them."

THE Austin (Nev.) Herald says: "We are sorely in need of a preacher, but we don't want any cheap trash. We want a good, muscular Christian, who can snatch sinners by the scruff of the neck, and drag them howling up the plane of righteousness; one who will not drink more than he can hold, and will not copy after Beecher further than to steal his sermons. Such a man will get a right smart lay-out here. If he can play the fiddle for the regular weekly dance, it will augment his salary somewhat."

"PRISONER at the bar," said the judge to the man on trial for murder, "is there anything you wish to say before sentence is passed upon you?" "Judge," replied the prisoner, solemnly, "judge, there has been altogether too much said already. I knew all along somebody would get hurt, if these people didn't keep their mouths shut. It might as well be me, perhaps, as anybody else. Drive on, judge, and give us as little sentiment as you can get along on. I can stand hanging, but I hate gush!"

SWEET CONSCIOUSNESS OF DUTY PERFORMED.—The other day, over at the Alamenda baths, a timid and retiring-looking man waited until the superintendent was disengaged, and then said to him: "I do hate to give you any trouble, but have you a long stick or pole of any kind you could lend me?" "No, sir: I told you so ten minutes ago," snapped the over-driven official. "So you did," replied the man; "but I thought I'd just ask once more. I guess I've done my duty in the matter. Don't you think so?" "What matter? What on earth are you talking about?" "Why, you see, my mother-in-law dived off down there at the deep end about half an hour ago, and as she hadn't come up yet I thought I'd like to tell my wife that I had sorter jabbed round on the bottom for her awhile anyway; but, if I can't, why, I suppose I can't, that's all." And pensively writing her address on a tag, to be tied to the old lady when she came up, the conscientious man walked thoughtfully away.—San Francisco Post.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. No. 2—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

A MAN is devout when his mind is regulated within himself, and he is exempt from lust and every inordinate desire. He delighteth in his own soul. He becometh acquainted with that boundless pleasure which is far more worthy of the understanding than that which ariseth from the senses; depending upon which the mind moveth not from its principles; which having obtained, he respecteth no other acquisition so great as it. It is to be obtained by resolution, by the man who knoweth his own mind. Wheresoever the unsteady mind roameth, he should subdue it, bring it back, and place it in his own breast. Supreme happiness attendeth the man whose mind is thus at peace. Endued with this devotion, and looking on all things alike, he beholdeth the supreme soul in all things and all things in the supreme soul.—Hindu.

I KNOW that one must watch incessantly over himself; that Heaven has an intelligence which nothing escapes, and that its decrees are without appeal. I know that it regards all things; that it enters into all; that it is present incessantly to all. Heaven penetrates to the depth of all hearts, as daybreak illumines the darkest room. We should strive to reflect its light, as two instruments in full accord respond to one another.—Chinese.

FREEDOM and slavery are merely names of virtue and vice; and both these are matters of will. But neither of them belongs to things in which will has no share. But Fortune is accustomed to dispose at her pleasure of the body, and those things relating to the body, in which will has no share. For no one is a slave whose will is free. Fortune is an evil chain to the body, and vice to the soul. For he whose body is unbound and whose soul is chained is a slave. On the contrary, he whose body is chained, and his soul unbound, is free.—Epictetus.

THOUGH our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.—Paul.

THE unconquerable thirst for knowledge, for wide views, for a comprehension of the Order and Beauty of creation as a whole,—this it is that has driven them [naturalists] into solitudes and deserts, and compelled them to bend every energy, at cost of utmost sacrifice, to the work of interpreting the secrets of nature. Truth! Truth has been the Divinity they have worshipped. The great men of science, so far from caring for the body, have cheerfully worn it out in daily and nightly study, have condemned it to exposure, fatigue, suffering, coarse raiment and scanty fare, and have died in poverty, that the soul might live in the light of Truth. How many such glorious martyrs have left their record in the history of science!—Wm. Ellery Channing.

ONCE in our lives we all have to choose. More or less we have all felt once the same emotions. We have not always been what the professions make of us. Nature made us men, and she surrenders not her children without a struggle. . . . The soul of man is not a thing which comes and goes, is builded and decays like the elemental frame in which it is set to dwell, but a very living force, a very energy of God's organic Will, which rules and moulds this universe. —J. A. Froude.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE gifts of Mrs. Valeria G. Stone, of Malden, Mass., to various educational, religious, and charitable institutions have reached the sum of $1,793,292; and this, it is announced, is the limit, Mrs. Stone having reserved from her estate only enough to allow her an adequate personal income for the remainder of her life. The gifts have all gone to institutions that are more or less Evangelical.

IT is said that the American Bible Society cannot print the revised version of the New Testament without violating its constitution, which declares that the Society shall print according to the edition of 1611, without any changes whatever. The revised version is now expected to arrive from England any day; and the orthodox religious journals generally appear to be preparing the way for a favorable reception of it, especially those of liberal proclivities.

THE meeting of sympathy for Ireland last Friday at Faneuil Hall drew an immense audience. The occasion was one of great enthusiasm. Mayor Prince presided, and stirring and eloquent speeches were delivered by him, Wendell Phillips, General Butler, Rev. Dr. Miner, and others. A series of strong resolutions were submitted by John Boyle O'Reilly, editor of the Boston Pilot, and cordial letters read from Governor Long, Colonel Higginson, Speaker Noyes, and others.

WE noticed, at the time of the Chicago Conference for forming a new association for secularization of the State, that Colonel Ingersoll was not present, though his name headed the call for the meeting. It now transpires that he does not have full sympathy with the movement, and has withdrawn from it; or, rather, as the Religio-Philosophical Journal announces, he "has informed the committee on correspondence that the use of his name in the formation of the Association was against his protest." The committee on correspondence were not informed, it is said, of this protest until after they had issued their address, which was printed in the Chicago Times Christmas day. Now, an explanation is in order from the committee who sent out the call for the Conference. The Religio-Philosophical Journal says that "Colonel Ingersoll bases his withdrawal on the desire to be untrammelled by organizations and to stand alone, his experience with a previous organization not having been satisfactory." The Journal then philosophizes very resignedly on his departure, arguing that as Mr. Ingersoll's special mission is to destroy the Church, while the Secularization Society is hoping to draw to its membership many members of the churches with the single purpose of separating Church and State, it may be better for the movement that he should not be prominently connected with it. The argument may be good; but, nevertheless, we do not expect to see many church members flocking in to take his place.

IN announcing the catastrophe of the falling-in of the roof of the New York Central Railroad dépôt at Buffalo, the head-lines of some of the dailies had it, "Passengers miraculously saved!" In looking down the column for the kind of miracle, it proved to be of a very natural sort. "The Eastern express, filled with passengers, which had been standing on the track that was buried under the ruins, had been gone only five minutes." But, of course, it had not been sent out by spiritual warning ahead of its time. "Another express due from the West about that time was several hours late." Kept back by a special Providence? No, by the heavy snow,—the same snow that caused the roof to fall. "There were unusually few people in the dépôt at the time." Supernaturally told to stay away? No, again: there being no trains about to come in or to go out, except one small one of not much account, there was nothing to call the people to that portion of the building. But perhaps it may be thought that Divine Providence timed the fall of the roof just at that moment when there were so few people on the spot to be crushed. If so, then the same power, it would seem, might have made the miracle a complete and well-rounded one, and have somehow saved the few helpless passengers that had, unwarned, taken their seats in the single train there "of not much account," as well as the two or three officials of the road that were caught under the falling mass. On the whole, the evidence for a "miraculous escape" is not strong. It looks as if the crash came just at the moment when the burdened roof became too heavy for the physical supports that were meant, but were inadequate, to uphold it, and that no spiritual power had retarded or hastened that inevitable moment one instant. Had that moment arrived when the Eastern express with "its mass of living freight" was waiting on the track, the crash would have come all the same, only the catastrophe have been a hundred times more awful. And we trust that the telegraphic announcement of a "miracle," and the entirely accidental fact that few persons were killed compared with the number that might have been horribly mangled and crushed to death a few minutes earlier, will not have the effect to prevent a rigid responsibility for the disaster being placed upon the railroad company. Engineering science is competent to build a roof equal to sustaining any weight of snow that will fall in the latitude of the New York Central Railroad. It was known, moreover, that this roof had been weakened by the removal of some of its supports where a junction had been made with a new portion of the dépôt. To allow even the possibility, therefore, of such an accident, is an act of criminal negligence,—especially on the part of such a powerful and experienced corporation as the New York Central,—and the act should be indicted as such.

ELEMENTS OF HEROISM.

A Discourse delivered before the First Congregational Society, New Bedford.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

In this time, which, compared with previous eras since the beginning of modern civilization, may well be called an age of luxury, is it possible that the heroic quality of character should find so much room for development as in former periods of history? This question presents my subject to-day.

On first thought, the question is most likely to be answered in the negative. There is a general feeling that luxury in itself is enervating, and that heroism can only exist amid conditions of life that are narrow and rough, and where the obstacles to be encountered are many. And this feeling rests on a large generalization of experience, as well as on the natural conclusion of reason in regard to the things best calculated to produce that strength of character which may be called heroic. The story of Hannibal's soldiers, strong and victorious while contending with the hardships of a march over the Alps, but weakened to the condition of defeat by the luxury of their winter quarters in the rich city of Capua, not only points the moral of many a lesson in virtue, but has many forms of illustration in actual life. Emerson truly says in his fine essay on Heroism, which young people especially cannot read too often: "The heroic soul does not sell its justice and its nobleness. It does not ask to dine nicely and to sleep warm. The essence of greatness is the perception that virtue is enough. Poverty is its ornament. It does not need plenty, and can very well abide its loss." And again: "Every heroic act measures itself by its contempt of some external good. . . . Self-trust is the essence of heroism. It is the state of the soul at war, and its ultimate objects are the last defiance of falsehood and wrong, and the power to bear all that can be inflicted by evil agents. . . . Its jest is the littleness of common life. That false prudence which dotes on health and wealth is the butt and merriment of heroism." And in accordance with these sentiments, which are felt to be grounded in truth, it is queried whether our age, so full of external good, can offer such a field for heroic character as was offered in ancient times.

Look at it mentally, it is said. How scholars and intellectual men once had to toil and contrive and endure for the sake of their achievements,—in the days when printing was unknown, and all books were laboriously executed in manuscript, and the scholar that wanted one had to copy it by hand or pay for the copying, and of libraries there were few and only in the most favored cities, and schools were rare, and knowledge circulated but slowly, and the acquisition of it was, indeed, a tedious and toilsome ascent! And, even for a long period after the art of printing came, it was an expensive art, and a book was a costly luxury which a scholar could rarely secure except by purchase, and could rarely purchase except by privation and self-sacrifice in other directions. And compare that time with the present, when the press is teeming with books of all kinds, and the cry of many people has become that they are drugs rather than luxuries, and the public library makes them accessible to a whole community, and the school is brought into the neighborhood of every family, and the newspaper makes knowledge the common property of all.

Or look at the same question in its moral and social aspects. In the olden time, when society was in close contact with barbarism, heroic behavior in the defence of one's rights, or of virtue, or of woman, was a necessity. The chivalrous soul was never wanting opportunity for chivalrous deed. But, as society has become civilized and refined, it seems as if life had become prosaic too; and, except on the frontier where it still touches the primitive simplicity of the savage, it is complained that it offers little room for the moral knight-errantry that, though out of date, is still attractive to the heroic quality that is native to the youthful heart.

Or look at religion. The time was when to take the Christian name was to confess one's self an alien to the State and an outcast from society. It was to brave every form of opposition and malice and persecution. It was to face the dungeon, the rack, the stake, or the living martyrdom of the world's aversion and contempt. It was to bear the odium of the most unpopular cause, to put on the badge of infamy, and to court a contest with fashion and custom which called forth all the inner strength of the heroic character. Or, later, when some new view of Christianity appeared; when Protestantism came and was hunted down by Romanism with force; when Puritanism and Independency came, and were driven across the ocean in exile to these inhospitable shores,—then again were times that called for and created the heroic blood. But see Christianity, Catholic and Protestant alike, to-day as it exists among us at least, and what opportunity for heroism does the confession of it offer? Compare our Pilgrim Fathers landing on Plymouth rock in the bleak December, to face a winter in a strange wilderness three thousand miles from home and friends, and to contend with a savage foe for possession of the soil, and actually facing disease and starvation and death, before they could found their little colony in behalf of religious freedom,—compare this picture with the descendants of these Pilgrims in their costly and luxuriant churches all over the country in peaceable possession of their religion to-day, or meeting on the 22d of December in elegant banqueting-halls, with all the different viands of all seasons and climes before them, and all the comforts around them that civilization has invented, to celebrate by speech their forefathers' deeds. The two pictures show us the whole vast distance and difference between a religious belief which, from its very conditions, enforces heroic conduct and a religious belief which, from having become the accepted and popular custom, rather stands in the way of heroism than elicits it. When religion appeals to and demands the heroic in man, as it so often has done in human history, then it gains a right to the application of Emerson's phrase, "the luxury of a religion that does not degrade." But, when religion has won to itself possession of the wealth and luxuries of this world, then it is in danger of sinking to their level; and its enervating influences may have to be resisted in order that the genuinely heroic elements of character may not be smothered in the very abundance of the successes which they have achieved, as Hannibal's army was ruined by the ease and indulgence which its heroic and laborious conquests had made possible.

Yet we are not, from these comparisons, to leap to the conclusion that the days of heroism are past, or that this quality of behavior is necessarily dependent on certain social conditions which the very progress of civilization is abolishing. I suspect that every age has rather looked back to some previous epoch for its standard of heroic conduct than taken for it any contemporary measure. No age is precisely the hero to itself as it is to its posterity. For, first, it is one of the qualities of the most genuine heroism that the people who really are doing its deeds have little thought that they are doing them; and, second, the deeds and characters that made some past age so grand are the main things that are remembered, and are crowded together in the perspective of the years between them and us, so that they fill the entire range of vision, while the many things that were very ordinary and prosaic, corresponding exactly with the ordinary and prosaic and unheroic drudgery that seems to occupy the days of most people now, have passed away both from memory and tradition. Thus it is that we get our idea of what are called the "heroic ages" in the past. The unheroic elements have been sifted out through the intervening years; and a few great heroic facts and persons, really belonging perhaps to many generations, remain to stamp the era. Sometimes, legend has doubtless put the heroic deeds of a whole people and of many generations of such deeds upon some one notable character. The myth of Hercules was probably such a creation. And if the art of printing were now to be lost, and all existing books and records were to be destroyed, and the history of this country since the Pilgrims came to Plymouth Bay were to be intrusted henceforth to oral tradition alone, probably, ages hence, to our distant posterity, these two and a half centuries would be crowded into one heroic drama, in which the old conflicts with the Indians and the Revolutionary War and the war against slavery would seem but acts of one struggle, and Brewster and Standish and George Washington and Abraham Lincoln would appear on the stage of events together, and carry off the chief honors of all that the centuries have accomplished.

But this illustrative glance at our country's history shows us that, even in our short career of two and a half centuries, we have had at least three eras that the judicial historian would call heroic, both because of the purpose that animated them and the deeds in which the purpose was fulfilled; and one of these eras was within the memory of those who are hardly yet men and women. And yet, before our late war, there were those who, as now, were sighing that the days of heroism were no more. The demands of the war undeceived them, and showed that there are men and women, living to-day in this modern world, who are capable of heroism every whit as exalted and noble as that which shines with such splendor in the ancient story of Sparta or Rome. And the heroism was not all in the blaze and glory of the battle-field. Some of it, much of it, was at home and in the hospital and hidden in the secrets of women's hearts; and much of it was in the long conflict of social tendencies and ideas that preceded the conflict of arms; and not a little of it was in that despised race for whose wrongs the war came, and in the triumph of whose rights victory was won. Indeed, I know not where in all history can be found finer examples of heroism than are recorded in a book published a few years since, an octavo of nearly eight hundred pages, giving an account of some of the most noteworthy escapes of fugitive slaves by the under-ground railroad from their house of bondage. The courage, patience, endurance of hardships and privations, persistency, sufferings serenely borne, of these men and women fleeing from masters and from professional slave-hunters, seem almost incredible, even when we know that the prize of the struggle was liberty. So long as such things can be, the age of heroism is not past.

And such examples prove that every race as well as every age has its heroes,—that heroism is a human quality, and not the accompaniment and product of any one religion or civilization. Given the conditions, inward and outward, and it appears. Its forms and phases will differ; but it is a quality of character that always discloses itself by the involuntary homage that it draws, and in substance it is the same the world over. There have been heroes of royal blood, and there have been heroes born of the humblest of the people. The great and saintly soul whose advent on earth Christendom has celebrated with joyous memories the past week was of peasant stock. Yet a nobler heroism has seldom been witnessed in human flesh. It is no legend, however, that all heroes are of divine lineage on one side. More than in common mortals does the divine energy display itself and act through them. The Greeks were accustomed to believe that their ancient heroes had been deified after death for their great services on earth. This belief bore testimony to the divine heroism of the human life. Christianity, in the popular creed, has deified its founder for the same secret reason. Jesus, born of peasant blood, was accepted as Messiah or King, and then as God,—not because of any kingly prerogatives or even of outward wonders accomplished, but because of the grand royalty of his life. So Buddha, born a prince and heir to a crown, sacrificed it all that he might become simply a religious reformer and teacher; and the people saw the divinity of that act, too,—saw in it a finer royalty than the wearing of a crown could bestow, and declared him, too, a god in the flesh. In later history, the Roman Catholics have shown the same tendency. They elevate human beings whose lives have been spent in eminent religious service to saintship after death, and then render to them divine homage. The root of the traditional usage, into whatever of corruption and evil belief it may have grown, is doubtless the idea that superior virtue, or that quality of character which we may call heroic, is a divine power; that it is God himself working in and through the human faculties.

The conditions of heroism, then, are inward rather than outward. The outward circumstances may change; but, if the inner heroic quality exist, it will not fail to find ample opportunity for exercise. To it, no age nor country nor career is a necessary condition; while, if this spiritual quality be wanting, no epoch, country, nor career, can possibly produce the hero. The real heroes of our civil war were not always those who had complained of their previous lot in life as prosaic and inane. The really heroic souls found and recognized the necessary conditions; while many a one who went from ennui and lassitude into the war, hoping that the heroic days of stories and books had come back at last, yet having no faculty to make them heroic, went through the war, finding it only commonplace prose and drudgery from beginning to end. They longed for adventure, but found themselves under a severer discipline than they had ever known before. The dreamed-of romance of the battle-field had sunk for them into machine-work; and, instead of the gallant knights riding with brave mien to the defence of the imperilled right, they seemed to themselves mere puppets moved by some command as stern as Fate, and with a motive as hidden. Not being able to find the heroic in the ordinary conditions and rules of military service, they found it not at all; and they failed to find it because it was not, to begin with, in their own souls.

And, if heroism be a quality of soul rather than a special kind of outward career, then it does not necessarily require a public and conspicuous field of service. "The grandest of heroic deeds," says Richter, "are those which are performed within four walls and in domestic privacy." The great events, the times of public peril, the struggles in defence of country or of justice, the epochs of new religions, when men are called to seal their courage with their suffering and their blood,—these necessarily bring into conspicuous light the secret heroisms of many souls; but, unless these same heroic qualities had long existed and been working in the secret of men's thoughts and conduct, the great events and eras, the birth-throes of juster governments and purer religions, had never come. It was the unseen but mighty fidelity of many secret hearts to truth and right that brought the great heroic epochs and made the heroic ages and nations, of which we now read in the most brilliant pages of human history.

And the opportunity for such fidelity (and in this fidelity to truth and right against great odds lies the very essence of heroism) is never wanting. The heroic soul will make its opportunities, if they do not come of themselves. The outward shape which heroism will take will differ according to the times and people and changing conditions of civilization; and in some eras there is necessarily more of public heroism than in others. And with us, since the war, this quality has retired more to its private citadels: as, indeed, during the war, and in all such epochs, much of the most genuine heroism was in privacy. If our particular time seems to offer no chance for the special kind of heroic behavior that has made other times memorable, it none the less brings opportunities specially its own. The scholar in the olden time had, it is true, to contend with the most formidable obstacles to his intellectual aspirations, from the scarcity and costliness of books, from the labor of making them, from the paucity of schools, and from the difficulties in the way of circulating knowledge; and only those who had the true heroic stuff within them became, under these circumstances, scholars and intellectual leaders. But the same class of minds to-day meet obstacles quite as great. The very multiplicity of books, the vastness of libraries, the enormous extent of knowledge in every department of learning, the numbers and ready intercourse of scholars with each other,—these, while they increase the facilities for acquisition, have so increased also the necessary amount of acquisition, and elevated the standard of literary attainment, that only by the most heroic purpose and most persistent industry can the goal be reached. Nor is it always those to whom all these facilities are freely open who have the scholar's taste and faculty. Quite as often the mental aspiration is born in some lowly lot, and has to contend with poverty and the necessities of hard physical labor before it can even secure the use of these facilities. Every college in America and many a seminary for young women can boast of these self-denying, hard-working, and really heroic aspirants for mental culture.

So in the sphere of social and moral heroism. The days of knight-errantry are past, but not the days for chivalrous deeds. The opportunities have changed in form, not in substance. If this is an age of great temptations, as is generally asserted, an age when public and private virtue is perilously assailed, then is it an age correspondingly great in opportunities. Out of the very abundance of its possessions, out of the very vigor of its material enterprise and the wealth of its material comforts, spring its special temptations. And here, in resisting these temptations, in turning them from enticements to a more material plane of living and to self-indulgence into a discipline and culture of character in its finer moral and spiritual aspects, is the field of opportunity.

Nor is fidelity to the demands of these occasions wanting. What qualities of heroism are often displayed on the very field of the material enterprise of the age, among both the inventors and the doers! He is a hero who in spite of all obstacles keeps faithful to his post of duty and to his ideal purpose. And how this great quality sometimes blossoms out in the stormy atmosphere of physical peril, as in the pilot, the brakeman, the shipmaster, the engineer, who steadfast to their tasks go down to death themselves to save their fellow-men from destruction! So in many a home, in the midst of wealth and in the midst of poverty, among our neighbors to-day as well as in stories of people far off in space and time, we may find the noble souls, those who live to bless others by denying themselves, those who persistently sacrifice the gratification of lower desires and appetites, that they may achieve their own high ideal aim in life or do a kindness to another struggling soul. As long as the world has evils to conquer, it offers opportunity for the hero's vocation; and, wherever a soul bravely struggles with evil, there is the hero.

DR. JAMES McCOSH.

Dr. James McCosh, of Princeton College, is a metaphysician and theologian of the Scotch School. With the exception of Hume, most of the Scotch thinkers have been Calvinists and believers in what is called "revealed truth," a sort of select, aristocratic kind of truth above that discoverable by man's rational faculties. The Mosaic cosmogony, for instance, is revealed truth, in which Dr. McCosh believes as well as in the old God of history and tradition. Still, he is willing to admit that development is not an irreligious process; and he is proud, in his declining years, to defend the action of God in producing the world through development. This is very handsome conduct on the part of Dr. McCosh, but no more than might be expected from so eminent a metaphysician and theologian. Dr. McCosh also admits that the intellectual life of the world of to-day is stronger than at any previous age, and that the feelings have taken a larger expansion. Still, he believes by preference in the notions and traditions of a remote and barbarous Asiatic past. He is the enemy of modern science and modern thought, as are a majority of our college presidents. After the creation-myth of Genesis has been shown by Assyriologists to have been current for ages in the Mesopotamian region of Asia before the so-called Semitic liberator Moses is represented as living, and to be entitled to precisely the same weight to which similar myths of our North American Indians and other primitive tribes are entitled,—nay, after it has been shown that Moses himself is a myth, like the British King Arthur and the Trojan Æneas,—we have McCosh quoting Genesis as an infallible authority as to the origin of the human species. The Greek myth about the creation of the first man and woman is far more poetical than the Assyrian myth on the subject, which is preserved in the old Hebrew document called Genesis. If we were going to adopt one or the other as an article of faith, we should give the preference to the story of Prometheus and Pandora, which is even now available for dramatic and spectacular purposes. The Greek Titan was a nobler artist and moulder in clay than the Hebrew tribal God. Both wrought in the same material. We are sorry to say that the Greek mythologists were as ungallant as the Oriental in representing that the creation of woman brought sin, disease, and death into the world, when, really, the world would have been intolerable without her. And a man who seriously believes in one of these old barbaric fables, as a true account of what is called creation, is at the head of a so-called institution of learning in the United States, in this era of Humboldt, Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall!

But, though Dr. McCosh is compelled to treat modern science with a certain degree of deference even before an audience of sectarians of his own creed, still he is cheered in his old age by the prospect of a theological reaction, which will cause Humboldt's Cosmos and Newton's Principia and Darwin's Origin of Species to be at a discount in comparison with the Mosaic cosmogony. "We have had our darkest hour," we theologians, says Dr. McCosh. By "darkest hour," this Scotch-Irish metaphysician and bigot from Belfast means the period in which the colossal wrong of American slavery was wiped out, and in which the British masses have been provided with a system of popular education, and in which the people of France, after a struggle of a century with priestcraft and kingcraft, have finally emerged upon the high social and political plane of free, popular self-government, with the prospect of the speedy establishment of a system of State education throughout France, uncontrolled by priests. By "darkest hour," the President of Princeton College means the period in which Italy has been unified, and achieved its deliverance from foreign oppressors, and in which the infallible Pope has been brought down from his ecclesiastical stilts to the condition and status of a mere high-priest without any civil authority whatever longer to tyrannize over the people of the region formerly known in political geography as "The States of the Church." This period has been the darkest hour of the Newmans and Mannings and McCoshes, it seems. But to the human race at large, and especially to the mass of thoughtful people everywhere, who are optimists on the subject of the prospects of humanity in this world as well as in the hereafter, it has been a truly festal period, a time of triumph and jubilation. But the end is not yet. We are inclined to think that Dr. McCosh is mistaken in thinking that he and such as he have had their darkest hour. We are inclined to think that a still darker period is impending over the theologians, and that Dr. McCosh, old as he is, will live to see it; to wit, the period in which the long and mind-crushing alliance between Church and State over the whole area of Old World Christendom will be dissolved, and the iniquitous law of primogeniture and caste, and the hereditary monopoly of land, office, and executive and legislative power by privileged classes in Europe will be, like American slavery, among the things that have been, to the long sorrow of mankind, but which shall be no longer. THE "MONDAY LECTURESHIP."

The ninth Monday lecture was given by Rev. J. B. Thomas, D.D., his subject being "Significance of the Historic Element in Scripture."

The lecturer treated his hearers in the outset to a dish of sophistical soup made out of an imaginary rabbit, said soup being drugged, apparently, with a view to producing mental trabismus.

An analysis of this dish reveals the doctor inveighing against the scientific method of reasoning, because, as he says, it insists upon having "a fact instead of a phenomenon" as "the basis of a logical induction." The doctor represents himself as having made up his mind to have the rabbit soup, and that at that point of the proceeding a "scientific method"-ist said to him, "'First catch your hare.'" But he replies that if he should catch him, skin him, soak him in salt and water all night, and stew him down properly and season him to taste, he, the doctor, would not then be any nearer to a fact, because he might go still further, and reduce his rabbit to its chemical constituents, and so lose him entirely. So he comes to the Monday lectureship, and says: "It is better to accept the phenomenal hare as sufficient basis either of soup or logic than to destroy it in quest of the reality." And so he concludes, in this style of argument, that in treating of the historic element in the Bible we may have plenty of good theological soup, if we are only content to use phenomenal game, but—and there he stops. I will finish his argument by giving the other half of the logical conclusion: "But if we analyze the phenomenal in the Bible in search of facts, to prove what we claim for it, we are likely to destroy the whole, and so go hungry; i.e., lose our 'bread and butter' here, and lose our souls hereafter."

This is a fair sample of Dr. Thomas' reasoning all through. Here is another instance. He says: "Inspiration is a question not of fact, but of theory. It cannot be observed, but must be inferred." And therefore, he would argue, because we infer it, it must be a fact. If "inspiration," meaning, as Dr. Thomas does, the plenary inspiration of the Bible, is a theory,—and I fully believe that it is nothing more,—by what right does he dare to condemn one man's inference as wrong and adulate another man's inference as right? He can defend his position only by assuming that the All-wise has chosen him as a "mejum," and inflated him with sufficient wit to detect, among thousands of inferences, that one alone which fully expresses the wisdom and will of God, all the others being fraudulent. And, when he makes that assumption, I must again apply his own logic to himself, and insist that his own inspiration is not a matter of fact, but of theory only; and therefore we can never determine either as to the Bible or as to himself what is the truth in regard to their claim of inspiration. And here is where that question rests, and where it must remain, in a state of stable equilibrium. The inspiration of the Bible is only a theory! And until we receive directly from God himself demonstrative evidence that he can and does inspire bookmakers now with knowledge and wisdom that infinitely transcend the average comprehension of mortals and measure the mind of the Infinite, we cannot be logically convinced that he may have done so in the past.

But, if it is claimed that he does inspire men to-day, I will grant it, and insist on the hypothesis that God is all-perfect and all-wise, that he must inspire men, if at all, for the purpose of revealing his will for the good of mankind, and to that end must select and use the best and the wisest among men as his instruments of communication; and that, therefore, our men and women who give us the soul of beauty in poetry and prose, as Tennyson and George Eliot have done; who give us dazzling jewels of thought, as Emerson has done through the long years of a beautiful life; who give us an actual, not a theoretical or legendary knowledge of the earth on which we live and of the system of worlds to which our globe belongs, as Lyell and Herschel, Humboldt and Proctor have done; who have unfolded before our wondering eyes so many of the long-locked secrets of organic and inorganic life all around us, as Faraday and Tyndall and Darwin have done; who have gathered up the warp and woof of history and tradition, and woven for us a web of knowledge of the past of our race, as Müller and Lubbock and others have done; who have given us all the grand inventions by which industry and "business" have made civilization grow more in the one hundred years just past than it had done in the thousand years preceding; who have given us public schools, literature, and the present world-wide diffusion of useful knowledge,—I insist that God would select such men as these as his mediums of communication,—these, and not the bigoted priesthoods who have, all through the ages when our race was struggling upward out of the dark cellar of primal ignorance into the open day and the bright sunlight of knowledge and liberty, ever stood, shovel in hand, to throw dirt in our eyes as we approached the light, or to club us into subjection to their ownership and control, and that these, the true "chosen of God," inspired to bless the world, have filled the soul of growing humanity with the beauty and life and light of the indwelling God of the Universe, who was not published for the first and last time in barbaric Hebrew, bound in calf, and laid away under lock and key four thousand years ago, but who is ever and forever the inspiration and soul of the living present! So that after Dr. Thomas goes on through his proof that it is right to use all sorts of pettifogging—for that is what it amounts to—to make out his case for the Bible as an authentic, inspired, and infallible book, I lay down his lecture, and say to myself that it would make no difference to me if he could honestly prove that the Bible was all that he dishonestly claims it to be; for I find in my own soul a higher authority to turn from the crude, incomplete, musty, mouldy mouthings of infantile humanity, and through the fuller-grown avenues of my own mind take fresh inspiration from the glowing soul of a God who encompasses me about as with an atmosphere in which I live, move, and have my being NOW.

Why will these men so insist upon misrepresenting things? By what logic can it be made to appear that a lie told in the name of God is better than a truth uttered in the name of humanity? The question of the inspiration, of the infallibility, of the authenticity, of the historic and the *un*scientific merits of the Bible have all been discussed over and over, and thoroughly settled on all points against it as it is put forward by Rev. J. B. Thomas. That he ignores all this does but little credit to himself. That he imagines that people do not know it reveals, on his part, a low estimate of his hearers and readers. The only effect of such a defence of the Bible is to make intelligent people despise, not only the book, but the theological system that so holds and uses it. Common-sense and common honesty and a reasonable deference to the ability of the people to distinguish between truth and theological sophistry would be excellent ingredients to mix, ten parts to one, with the substance of most of the Monday lectures. ELSIE, Radical.

REPLY TO WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

Although commentators on mythology are undecided as to whether India borrowed its myths from Egypt or Egypt borrowed its myths from India, yet all agree that the secret doctrine of both these nations, and also that of their northern neighbors, presents itself under the double form of a theogonic and cosmological system. It is impossible to ascertain the precise day or season when their deities became transformed, or incarnated, as the founders of their respective nationalities and systems of religious worship. Being purely mythical as such, the earthly advent of these demigods, like their national birth, is of course undatable. The assumed dates are simply what historians, after ages of disputation, have decided to disagree upon. Their only theogonic value consists in showing conclusively the mythologic origin of our modern systems of religious worship. It is purely the cosmological significance of the times of their advent that presents any interest to modern cosmologists. Our authority in determining this significance, which indicates the cardinal point in the heavens then accepted as the earth's position at the birth of the year, —then calculated from the sun's turning-point at the winter solstice,—is mostly found in Lemprière's classical dictionary, as remodelled by Rev. Charles Anthon, which is accepted as standard authority in all our higher institutions of learning.

Lemprière remarks the striking resemblance between the labors of Hercules, Apollo, Osiris, and Bacchus, the sons of Jupiter, and those of Krishna in India, and intimates clearly his opinion that all alike represent the pervading and procreative power of the sun's rays on our planet. In the article on "Indian Mythology," we are told that "the fundamental idea of the Hindoo religion, that of metamorphoses and transformations, is exemplified in the Avatars. The Avatars are transformations of Vishnu, and are interesting as an extremely rich cycle of mythology. These transformations fill up the Indian Yugs, which compose a certain series of periods intended to effect a junction with God (the Supreme Anubis), and comprising four million three hundred and twenty thousand years." By accepting the two solstitial and the two equinoctial points in the heavens through which the earth passes in its annual cycle, and through which the earth's solstices and equinoxes pass during their revolution, as the correspondents of like points through which the solar system passes during its complete revolution around its sun, we find that these four divisions of time amount to seventeen million two hundred and eighty thousand years which approximates the estimate of modern astronomers, eighteen million years. By supposing that the ten Avatars or transformations of Vishnu occurred at the termination of these successive divisions of time, which are prototypal of the earth's seasonal changes, we obtain a clew to the far deeper insight of our golden-age ancestors than that possessed by modern astronomers, as regards the principles involved in the revolution of the heavenly bodies and the genesis of nature's ever-varying forms of life. These lessons are as elevating as they are intricate. They are the flowers and fruitage of mythology.

While excusing myself in the matter of dates, I confess a grave error in the article referred to. In describing the passage of the earth through the nine signs from the overshadowing of Virgo at the vernal equinox, I carelessly wrote the word sun. It should have been, "After the earth has passed through the six signs of the lower or southern heavens, and through three signs of the upper or northern heavens to its greatest destination north, the sun becomes apparently motionless for three days."

I have never read either of the books you refer to.

JEAN FRANÇOIS MILLET, PEASANT AND PAINTER. Translated by Helena DeKay from the French of Alfred Sensier. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co.

A series of articles which have been printing for some months past in Scribner's Magazine are here somewhat expanded, and brought together in a beautiful volume with many wood-cuts, illustrative of Millet's most characteristic work. As the most complete account of Millet that has yet been written, the work of Sensier in its English dress deserves perpetuation in this elegant and substantial shape. More critical biographies may follow; but they cannot proceed from individuals more passionately devoted to the artist than his friend Sensier, or possessed of ampler materials for the execution of their work. Sensier was perhaps too passionately in love with Millet to estimate him from the critic's point of view. But his was an intelligent and manly admiration, and the book which he did not live to finish is replete with interest. Another hand, guided by sympathy as perfect as could be desired, by admiration for both Millet and his friend, has brought his work to a successful termination.

Whatever is denied to Millet, an individuality must be conceded to him as marked as that of Michel Angelo or Rembrandt or Turner. As Rembrandt was "the painter of beggars," Millet was "the painter of peasants," but from a profounder sentiment of pity for the hardness of their lot. To go to Millet alone for an impression of French peasant-life would be a proceeding fraught with serious danger. We must believe that it had elements of joyousness and gayety which somehow failed to impress themselves upon his mind. He had the predilection of Rembrandt for painting what he saw just as he saw it. And what he saw was the hardness and the dreariness of peasant-life. If the result was beauty, it was beauty of a very different sort from that of Raphael and Correggio. It may be doubted if Schiller, who contended that in every work of art pain should be triumphed over, would have been satisfied with Millet's art. But the great artist puts the definitions of the critics all to shame. Millet is worth hundreds of painters of mere outward beauty. He is more truly a Christian artist than any Raphael or Angelico, if the compassion of Jesus for the poor is at all significant of Christianity; for he, too, had this compassion, and expressed it in a hundred various forms.

That which is most characteristic of Millet was of slow development. Enamoured of Michel Angelo and Correggio, he was a passionate lover of the nude in art. The splendor of the human body was his favorite theme. His life had been of strange vicissitudes. He had been once reduced to painting signs for a living. His prospects were brightening just a little when he heard himself spoken of as one who painted nothing but nakedness. Cut to the quick, he went home and told his wife that, if she could submit to sterner poverty, he would strike out in a new direction, he would be the painter of peasants. The noble wife agreed to bear her part. This was in 1849, when Millet was already thirty-five years old. From this point onward he had a definite ideal,—to paint men and women earning their bread in the sweat of their brow. This, which is represented as a curse in the Old Testament, he apprehended and represented so in the main, it seems to me. His old woodcutter, bent and crushed beneath the weight of his burden, is typical of the entire range of his later art. And there is little danger that this aspect of the labor-question will be too clearly seen or too often painted.

After his new departure, Millet's previous reputation counted for next to nothing. He had to make a new reputation. It was up-hill work. Any of us could have bought his pictures then, pictures which now are worth their weight in gold. But he did not die until he had been crowned, though not with such a wreath as has been woven for him since he passed away. Sensier, his biographer, fought with him and for him as valiantly as Ruskin for Turner; and there was much greater need. He, too, had his reward. A pleasant feature of his book is the considerable amount in it taken from Millet's letters and journals. These, almost equally with his pictures, reveal the poetry of his nature.

THE HEBREW REVIEW. Published by the Rabbinical Literary Association of America. Cincinnati, Ohio: Block & Co. Vols. I. and II. 1880–81.

All those who wish to inform themselves about "Modern Judaism" will find in the Hebrew Review the desired source of information. Outside of the Jewish community, only a few, perhaps, are aware of the fact that "Modern Judaism," a child of the nineteenth century, differs vastly from ancient or mediæval Judaism. People, and especially church members and their pastors, generally think that Judaism of to-day is essentially the same as it was eighteen hundred years ago, at the time of Christ; and they are astonished if they are told that the Israelites of to-day neither believe in miracles, as told in the Bible, nor in its prophecies; that they neither expect the advent of a Messiah nor have the least desire of returning to Palestine and rebuilding Jerusalem. In perusing the Hebrew Review, they would learn that Modern Judaism, though a positive religion, starts with free research, follows up the track of science, and aims at humanitarianism. Like every other positive religion, it suffers in our age of transition from the struggles which always precede the establishment of new ideas; but it allows itself to be carried with the tide, and does not foolishly attempt to make the impossible possible.

The Hebrew Review is a manifestation of these struggles. The careful reader will find that the endeavor to establish a firm foothold in the religious chaos of to-day is the key-note of every essay contained in it. Drs. Wise, Lilienthal, and Kohler, among the most learned of American rabbis, concede that the religious views of old will not do any longer for our time, that something new and better must be created; and they attempt to show how a new ground for the new structure might be obtained.

The Hebrew Review contains a number of scholarly, well written articles, which alone will amply pay for the trouble of reading; but, as the most noteworthy articles, we recommend to the reader: 1. "The Salutatory," by Dr. Lilienthal; 2. "The Law," by Dr. Isaac M. Wise; and 3. "Ancient and Modern Judaism," by Dr. Kohler.

1. "The Salutatory" introduces the reader into the history and the aims of the Rabbinical Literary Association. Dr. Lilienthal, its president, a veteran in the Jewish pulpit, a clear scholar, a man of eminent intelligence, is wide-awake to the wants and needs of our time. His eloquent address, in which he laid out the work of the Association, is written in masterly style, and will not fail to interest the reader.

2. "The Law," by Dr. Isaac M. Wise, is an essay worthy to be added to the numerous publications issued by this prolific and indefatigable writer. He argues that the decalogue, when taken from the old building, would prove a corner-stone strong enough to carry the weight of a new structure. His arguments have been attacked by his erudite colleagues as non-theological, but not one of them has yet produced a theory of more practical value.

3. The essay, "Ancient and Modern Judaism," by Dr. Kohler, attempts to solve the same question. Brilliantly, the author describes how the religious soil has been undermined in course of the last fifty years by our progress in science and by the wonderful discoveries of our age, how Bible critics have torn away from Scripture the nimbus of divinity, and have conceded to the formerly Sacred Book only a place among other historical or literary treasures: he continues by arguing the necessity of reorganizing the whole religious system, and concludes with several suggestions to that effect.

The next volumes of the Hebrew Review, due April and July, respectively, will probably bring the views of other prominent rabbis concerning this highly interesting question.

THE North American Review for February introduces General Grant to the public in the rôle of magazine writer, in which character he lends his name and influence to the Nicaragua Canal project. His article is a plain and business-like statement of the advantages of the undertaking as a commercial and industrial enterprise, sure, the General thinks, to be accomplished, if not by ourselves, by some one of our rivals in power and influence. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes contributes a bright and healthy essay on "The Pulpit and the Pew," saying many things which need to be said, and recalling some curious characteristics of the early New England clergy. He tells, but does not vouch for, the story of David Osgood, "the shaggy-browed old minister of Medford," who ventured to say that in his judgment not more than one soul in two thousand would be saved. It so happened that the population of Medford was then just two thousand. So, meeting some of his parishioners one day, he was informed they had been discussing who would probably be the fortunate one, and that they were divided in opinion between the minister and one of his deacons. The Rev. Josiah Dwight, of Woodstock, Conn., seems to have been quite an eccentric genius in his way. Some of his brother clergymen, having taken offence at his droll expressions from the pulpit, waited upon him to remonstrate against this undignified, not to say evil custom. He received their criticisms with meekness and promised reform, but in prayer at parting, after returning thanks for the brotherly visit and admonition, "hoped that they might so hitch their horses on earth that they should never kick in the stables of everlasting salvation." The article is very good reading, both for its fun and its sober sense. It is especially valuable as the word of an intelligent mind from the pews warning the church that "many of its professed creeds imperatively demand revision" in order that they may be made consistent not only with science, but with "the instincts of childhood, the affections of maternity, the intuitions of poets, the contagious humanity of philanthropists,—in short, with human nature and the advance of civilization."

The article from the pen of Judge Tourgee, entitled "Aaron's Rod in Politics," is a thoughtful plea for education at the national expense and under national supervision, where, as at the South, great illiteracy prevails, and threatens the peace and security of the nation. Those who have read A Fool's Errand and Bricks without Straw—and, if there are any who have not, they should do so at once—will hardly need to be urged to read this profoundly philosophical view of the Southern disease and its only possible remedy.

James Freeman Clarke has a contribution in answer to the question, "Did Shakespeare write Bacon's Works?" in which he takes the ground that Shakespeare and Bacon were two distinct authors, each doing a pretty big man's work, but claiming that, if compelled to accept a common authorship for the Shakespearian drama and the Baconian philosophy, there are good reasons for preferring Shakespeare to Bacon.

Senator Morgan has an article on "Partisanship in the Supreme Court," Désiré Charnay contributes Part VI. of "The Ruins of Central America," and the number closes with a deeply interesting chapter on "The Poetry of the Future," by Walt Whitman.

PUBLIC RIGHTS AND CORPORATE RIGHTS.—This small pamphlet issued by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, containing the report of their committee, extracts from a decision of the United States Supreme Court, and the recent notable letter of Hon. J. S. Black on the powers and duties of carriers of inter-State commerce, and especially of railroads, sets forth many of the impositions upon the public, said to be practised by large corporations beyond their legal powers and in violation of the duties they owe to the governments and people of the States and nation. The argument of Judge Black seems to be supported by the authorities cited, and shows that railroads are subject to legislative regulation, like other private property clothed with a public interest. It is claimed that railroads are public highways, and corporations are entitled only to a fair profit on the capital they have actually invested to fit the ways for use; and that rates of freight and fares may be limited to this object by the government. The abuses mentioned, of watering stock, overcharging for carriage of goods and passengers, bribery at elections, etc., indicate reasons for the statement made some years ago, that "after the abolition of slavery the next great danger to republican government is the lawless tyranny of aggregated wealth." This pamphlet can be had on application to the Secretary of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY has a productive pen. It is announced that he will furnish the volume on "Berkeley" for the "English Men of Letters' Series."

JOHN BRIGHT says that what he has been ineffectually preaching to English farmers for forty years, American competition is now very rapidly teaching them.

REV. HEBER NEWTON, a prominent New York Episcopal clergyman, preached a recent sermon urging that libraries be opened to the public Sundays, and asked his congregation to sign a petition on the subject.

THE recent burning of the library of Mommsen, the great German historian and scholar, has elicited substantial sympathy for him. It is said that he has already received over $25,000 by private subscriptions to aid him in repairing his loss.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD has just closed a course of three lectures at the Opera House in Quincy, Ill., where he attracted large audiences, including many of the leading citizens of the place and some of the clergy. The Quincy Daily Whig has printed Mr. Underwood's lectures, as delivered on each occasion, entire.

AT the opening of the February term of the criminal court in Wilmington, Del., last week, Chief Justice Comegys, in charging the grand jury, called their attention to the recent address of Colonel Ingersoll in that city, saying it was blasphemous, and was worthy of the attention of the jury as coming under the law of blasphemy. It would not be strange if the judge's impression of the Colonel's capacity in this line should be strengthened, if the latter takes occasion to express his feelings as to the accusation.

REV. C. B. FERRY, the Unitarian minister at Northampton, Mass., is working with zeal and effect for the opening on Sunday of the library of that town. It is here that Jonathan Edwards preached his red-hot Orthodoxy, and so effectually burned over this section of New England that hardly anything else has been able to take root since in the soil. But an impulse has been given to more liberal thought and a higher enlightenment—through the influence of Cosmian Hall at Florence—in the town during the last twenty years, which is shown in the present movement.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian Register thus refers to one of whom all intelligence at this time is of particular interest to the Index readers: "The many friends of Rev. O. B. Frothingham will doubtless be glad to hear some word of him in his long European pilgrimage. He and Mrs. Frothingham have been wintering in Sam Remo, in the Riviera, a place made famous by that delightful romance, Dr. Antonio. There appears to have been no marked change in his physical condition, and it is probable that he will return home in the spring or early in the fall. All who know Mr. Frothingham are positive that he would joyfully resume his life-work, were it in his power."

MISS ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, in a recent letter, writes as follows in regard to Woman's Suffrage: "So far as I understand the municipal suffrage plan, it is the next thing for us women. Hundreds of women will vote on sharply-defined moral questions, like the liquor problem, who would not move for anything else. It is true that the self-respect of women was not met by the limited school bill. A more just and generous opportunity will meet a just and generous response. I, for one, sympathized with the reluctance of women to play beggar-maid to that little Cophetua. . . . If De Tocqueville was right in attributing the 'singular prosperity and growing strength of the American people mainly to the superiority of their women,' it is time that the Commonwealth availed itself more directly of the reserve forces and sources of such superiority. . . . I earnestly desire to see a more rational basis for the political future of our sex, which is as sure to develop as the dawn to follow the dark. I have never faltered for an hour either in this wish or this assurance."

Prometheus, who once brought the gift of fire,
Unchained arises; mighty Thor is fled,
And he, the peer of both, who gave, as bread
To earthly kindred, hope and high desire,
Eagle-winged thoughts that evermore aspire,
Strength snatched whence strict Olympus rears its head;
Who, like the Thunder-god that cravens dread,
Smote listlessness;—he, too, hath mounted higher
With Titan steps, to an immortal seat
On some white mountain, kingly solitude,
Unchanging, broad, majestic, calm, complete;
Where rests he, war-worn, seamed with many scars,
Above men's commonplace commotions rude,
In life triumphant, lonely with the stars!

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 17, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

THE LINE DRAWN AGAIN BETWEEN UNITARIANISM AND FREE RELIGION.

We gave last week, in a brief paragraph, the main points of the controversy that has arisen between the Second Congregational Society (Unitarian) of Leicester, Mass., and the trustees of a fund the income of which was to be paid over to the society on certain conditions named by the testator of the fund in his will. But the case is an interesting and instructive one; and the decision of it has a much broader application than to this particular controversy. It really draws another boundary line for Unitarianism. It is quite worth while, therefore, to give the history of it more in detail. It has been said of late, in some quarters, that there is no essential difference between Unitarianism and Free Religion; that, however it may have been fourteen years ago when the Free Religious Association was coming into existence, Unitarianism has now so far advanced as to concede all the liberty that the Free Religious Association claims, and hence has made the existence of the latter unnecessary. The radical wing of Unitarianism has doubtless increased in these fourteen years. Particularly has Western Unitarianism become strongly impregnated with Free Religious ideas. But, in this Leicester controversy, it will be seen that here in the East a representative commission of Unitarians—not the less a fairly representative body of recognized Unitarians because acting only in their individual capacity—has drawn a very distinct line of demarcation between Unitarianism and Free Religion. And this is the story of it, according to the authentic sources of information that have been put into our hands.

Mr. Isaac Southgate, a former member of the Leicester society, was the giver of the fund which has furnished the real occasion of the controversy. His will is dated March 8, 1859, and was admitted to probate Jan. 1, 1861. In it, after defining the fund and naming the trustees to whose custody he bequeathed it "for the sole use, benefit, and support of the Second Unitarian Society in Leicester, called Unitarian," he declared, "This fund is intended by me to firmly establish the Religious Society in Leicester aforesaid; and the income thereof I wish paid to its minister as aforesaid, so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Unitarian. And whenever said society shall maintain as its pastor, for the space of six months, a man who is not identified with the faith herein mentioned, this fund shall be forfeited by said society, and shall be paid to the American Unitarian Association, as hereinafter provided." This part of the will which we have quoted is the only part that contains any doctrinal conditions as governing the bequest. There are other sentences exhortatory rather than directive, intended evidently more for the society than the trustees, with reference to the importance of keeping "the existing isms of the day" out of the pulpit and of not allowing any "discordant, ultra foreign views" to be introduced into the pulpit or society, if they would continue in peace and prosperity. The testator instances the question of negro slavery as one of these "isms" of which the society had already had "sad experience."

As a matter of fact, the society appears to have been for a number of years quite harmonious in the direction of the more radical phase of Unitarianism. Its late ministers have been decidedly of "the left wing." A year ago last summer, Mr. S. B. Weston, a graduate that year from the Harvard Divinity School, accepted a call to become its minister. Before receiving the call, he had spoken four Sundays for the society, freely expressing his views; and there seems to have been a common understanding between him and the society as to his position. He was from the first more in sympathy with the principles of Free Religion than with any denominational Unitarianism. Mr. Weston is no rough iconoclast. He is winning and gentle in manner, and reverent and tender in his pulpit speech. All went on harmoniously for a number of months. Last spring, Mr. Weston gave a series of discourses, that brought out his views somewhat more systematically, perhaps, than he had had opportunity for stating them previously. After the third of these discourses was given, the subject of which was "Unitarianism," Mr. Samuel May, a member of the society and one of the trustees of the Southgate fund, made a public protest against the views expressed in the discourse. On the following Sunday, Mr. Weston spoke on "Free Religion," and at the close, referring to the possible difference of opinion between the society and himself on such topics, put his resignation of the pulpit in their hands. This was on May 23. On June 10, the society held a meeting, and voted not to accept his resignation; the vote being, we believe, nearly unanimous. Whereupon, Mr. Weston withdrew his resignation.

The trustees then notified the society that they did not regard Mr. Weston's preaching as meeting the conditions of the Southgate will, and that they could not pay over the income (about $800 a year) for the support of the pulpit. The society, as a whole, did not agree with this view of the trustees, and talked of appealing to the courts. But the expense attending such a litigation as well as a distaste for it prevented them. Finally, it was agreed last October, on both sides, to submit the matter in dispute to the Council of the National Unitarian Conference. The question to be presented to the Council was drawn up as follows: "Do the views preached by Mr. Samuel B. Weston before the Second Congregational Society of Leicester, as its minister, meet the requirements of Mr. Southgate's will, so as to entitle said society to receive the income of the Southgate fund for his support?" The society were to have six of Mr. Weston's discourses printed in pamphlet form for the use of the Council, including the sentiments against which the protest had been made; also a printed copy of the section of Mr. Southgate's will pertaining to the bequest.

To this proposition, the National Council in due time replied through their chairman, Rev. G. Reynolds, of Concord, Mass., that, "as a Council, they decline to serve as a Committee of Reference, feeling that by so doing they might establish a precedent which would be a source of trouble to them or their successors, and doubting beside whether it is wise for the Council officially to put itself on record in the decision of such a matter." The chairman, however, announced in the same communication that all the members of the Council, within five hundred miles, were "willing to serve in their private capacity on two conditions: first, that the committee of the society and the board of trustees shall each choose on their part some gentleman residing in Boston or the vicinity to add to such a committee; second, that both parties shall bind themselves to abide by the decision of the committee so made up."

This modification of their proposal was accepted by the society and the trustees, and the Committee of Reference thus constituted was as follows: Rev. G. Reynolds of Concord, Mass., Rev. Messrs. Geo. A. Thayer, E. E. Hale, D.D., and Rush R. Shippen of Boston, Miss Elizabeth P. Channing of Milton, Mass., Hon. Carroll D. Wright of Reading, Mass., William B. Weeden, Esq., of Providence, R.I., Hon. E. R. Hoar of Concord, Mass., and Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D., Dean of the Harvard Divinity School, Cambridge. The two latter were chosen respectively by the trustees and the society. It may be added that several Western members of the Council of the Unitarian National Conference were not on this committee.

The six discourses printed for examination by this Committee of Reference are entitled "The Divinity and Character of Jesus," "The Bible," "Unitarianism," "Free Religion," "Christianity and the New Religion," and "The Christian and Free Religious Positions." In these sermons, Mr. Weston takes no doubtful position. He stands squarely on the ground of natural religion as against supernaturalism; of historical evolution as against any doctrine of special revelation; of universal religion as against the special authority of any one form of faith; of freethought and free fellowship in religion, on the basis of a moral purpose, as against any partition walls of creed or sect. The last of the six discourses closes as follows: "I call myself, then, in plain, unequivocal terms, a 'Free Religionist.' I stand for that basis of religious fellowship which will admit a Unitarian, a Christian, a Mohammedan, an Atheist, or a Jew, provided that their one, supreme purpose is to build up the kingdom of truth and righteousness and love in the world." He does not call himself a Christian, because he believes that "to be a Christian rightfully implies, among other things, the acceptance of certain Christian doctrines," which he cannot accept. He does not call himself a denominational Unitarian, because he thinks that, since the organization of the National Conference, denominational Unitarianism "means, among other things, 'disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ.'" Yet he holds that, so far as his "views of God are concerned, they may be rightly claimed as Unitarian"; and he recognizes the fact that there are a good many preachers among the Unitarians who seem to him to preach essentially the same views that he does, who yet call themselves both Unitarians and Christians. "Except in the mere matter of names," he says, "I consider that I stand on the same platform as the liberal wing of that body."

But, looking at the terms of the will, it would not seem as if the referees would have had to consider all of Mr. Weston's views on theological questions or on affiliations of religious fellowship, but solely, if they adopted a strict and literal interpretation of the will, his views with reference to God. Mr. Southgate declared it to be his wish that the income of his bequest should be paid to the society's preacher "so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known as Unitarian." In the next sentence, he added, it is true, that the fund was to be forfeited if the society should maintain as pastor for six months "a man who is not identified with the faith herein mentioned." But this, by fair construction, refers back to the special Unitarian faith concerning God just specified. The primary question with the committee must, therefore, have been, What are Mr. Weston's "views of God," and are they the "broad and generous" ones known as Unitarian? And we can easily understand that the first part of this question would not give them so much trouble as the second part. For Mr. Weston, in several passages of the discourses, is quite explicit as to his views of Deity. In the first of them, he says: "The great fundamental truth of any sound philosophy of life is that there is an Infinite Power, an Eternal Life, permeating and animating the wide universe of suns and stars and living worlds. We who are finite are awed before the Infinite. The little unit everywhere feels a dependence upon the great Unity." Again, in the sermon on "The Bible," he says: "I do not regard God as a supermundane being, who now and then reveals himself to humanity by special divine acts. I regard the Divine Being rather as the Universal Life that is constantly revealed in nature and in every human soul." In the discourse on "Free Religion," he affirms: "It matters very little what name we give to the Infinite and Eternal. Sufficient to us it is that it gives us this beautiful, orderly world, and the thoughts, the feelings, and the aspirations of men." "I believe," he says again, "in the Power that makes for righteousness," and that it is "governed by eternal laws." "I do not regard God as a personal, supermundane being." "I believe in the unity and intelligibility of this living, throbbing universe"; "in the unity and the universality of the all-animating Life."

There are other passages to the same effect, showing that Mr. Weston's view of God may be pretty clearly defined as a spiritual Pantheism which just escapes being Theism. Now, we admit that it could have been no easy task for the referees to decide whether this view may be regarded as among the "broad and generous views of God which are known by the name 'Unitarian.'" Remembering Dr. Rufus P. Stebbins' view, and probably Dr. Peabody's, they might have decided quite promptly in the negative. But, remembering Dr. Hedge's view, or Mr. Savage's, or Mr. Chadwick's, or Professor, J. H. Allen's,—not to name many others or to come within the limits of their own circle,—they must have hesitated in some embarrassment and perplexity before answering no. And yet, if they decided the main question proposed to them on this pivotal point of the will, they must have come to the conclusion that these views of Mr. Weston concerning God are not "known by the name Unitarian," and should exclude from the Unitarian fellowship. For the answer which they have returned is as follows:—

H. O. Smith and others, Committee of the Second Congregational Society of Leicester, Mass.

Abraham Firth and others, Trustees under the will of Isaac Southgate.

Gentlemen,—We, the undersigned, to whom you submitted the question,—"Do the views preached by Mr. Samuel B. Weston before said society, as its minister, meet the requirements of said will, so as to entitle said society to receive the income of the aforesaid fund for his support?"—having carefully considered the question, are of the opinion that the views preached by Mr. Weston do not meet the requirements of said will so as to entitle said society to receive the income of the aforesaid fund for his support. This decision is signed by all the referees; and, considering the different phases and shades of theological opinion which the signatures represent, it must be conceded to have great weight, as expressing the average judgment of the Unitarian body as to the bounds of the denomination.

For the members of the society who, having the traditional feeling that Unitarianism meant pure character and liberty for honest thought more emphatically than anything else, and who were looking with a good deal of confidence for a different decision, we can but express our sympathy. Without the aid of the fund, their pecuniary resources are insufficient to support a minister; and so they must part with the preacher of their choice. It would have been some satisfaction to them if the committee of reference had given with the decision their reasons for jt. And it seems to us that this was fairly due to them, and all the more for the fact that they had bound themselves to abide by the decision. Now, they must necessarily have a feeling that they are compelled to submit to an authority without knowing the reasons why. Had they carried their case to the civil courts, they would at least have had with the judgment the reasons of the court for it. And it is very probable that, if such men as Judge Hoar and Professor Everett had made a statement of the argument which led them to put their signatures to the decision, the argument might have convinced members of the society of the justice of the decision, who now remain unconvinced. Of course, it was much easier for the nine referees to unite in a decision than to unite in the reasons for it. Nevertheless, the difficulty of the task should not have deterred from the attempt. To give a judgment without the reasons on which it was based was not to treat the parties interested with either proper mental or moral respect.

It would, moreover, be an excellent thing in the interests of theological discussion, enlightening the eyes and clearing the perceptions of a good many people on several knotty problems, speculative and practical, if the nine members of this committee should give to the public their respective lines of reasoning,—their views of the interpretation of wills, their views of Mr. Southgate's will, their definitions of the faith "known as Unitarian," their ideas of the points where Mr. Weston goes beyond or falls short of this faith,—the whole argument, in fact, that led them up to the conclusion that, with Mr. Weston as preacher, the Leicester society is not legally entitled to the benefit of the Southgate legacy.

But, whatever the reasons for it, the decision has its chief importance for the public in this,—that it sets another goal, to go beyond which is to go outside of Unitarian fellowship. It restricts, for those of the Unitarian household, liberty of thought. It declares that certain views, though they may be proclaimed within Unitarian borders, are not to be recognized as of Unitarian blood and name. It says to the young man earnestly seeking the way of truth, "Inquire," but prescribes to him "the convictions at which he must stop"; and so it gives what Dr. Channing even in his day warned against, "the shadow for the substance of freedom."

An old and esteemed subscriber, who was stirred to enthusiastic admiration of Chancellor Crosby's Temperance Lecture by "Elsie's" report of it in our columns, calls us to account for our few lines disclaiming its sentiments, and thinks it due to our readers that we show, if we can, why we believe Dr. Crosby's logic illogical. For traversing Dr. Crosby's entire argument, we have neither space nor time. With much that he says, especially on the narrowness and bigotry of some of the temperance reformers, we sympathize. We would lay down no cast-iron creed in moral reform more than in religion, nor refuse the name of reformers to all who do not pronounce our shibboleth. But we think we can intimate in brief terms our chief reason for believing that Dr. Crosby has not found the solution of the temperance problem. The most important part of his lecture, and that which gives it its special character, is the half in which he attempts to prove that the "total abstinence system" ought not to be adopted, and sets forth the counter doctrine that moderate drinking of fermented alcoholic liquors is the normal principle of action. He allows for individual abstinence, if individual conscience so command (though it ought not so to command, if Dr. Crosby's principle is correct), and for cases where a diseased appetite may make abstinence necessary to self-control. But, for man in a normal healthy condition, he maintains that the lighter forms of alcoholic beverages are a legitimate article of regular diet,—a food. Now, this is a scientific question. The authorities as yet are divided upon it. But the great preponderance of the highest scientific opinion at the present day points to the conclusion that alcohol in all forms is to be treated not as an article of diet, but as a medical drug. Dr. Crosby brings forward a very meagre array of scientific authorities for his position,—nothing compared with the array that might be marshalled on the other side. This corner-stone of his whole argument is, in fact, the least substantiated part of it. His logic, therefore, for us,—who ask for the verdict of science, and care nothing for his sharp Bible argument,—is an inverted pyramid, toppling on its apex.

Much credit is due Colonel Higginson for his efforts in the Legislature this winter to rid our statute-books of some of their vestiges of religious bigotry and intolerance. We refer particularly to the laws in respect to blasphemy and the eligibility of atheists to testify in courts. Although these endeavors have suffered defeats for the present, Colonel Higginson is entitled none the less to praise for his exertion in their directions. It would be strange if Massachusetts at this late period has yet to go through a process of education before it can reach the point of seeing the justice of the proposed amendments.

The German Turners of this city are to hold a memorial observance on Washington's birthday, in honor of the late Carl Heinzen. Mr. John Koch, chairman of the committee of arrangements, will preside; and addresses will be made by Wendell Phillips, Robert Reitzel of Washington, and Mrs. Clara Neymann of New York. The singing section of the Boston Turnverein will contribute a selection from Mr. Heinzen's works, the solos being taken by Mr. Henry Meyer. The occasion promises to be highly interesting.

The friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

VII. Emerson as a Moralist.

Whatever American literature may lack, we have one author who has spoken to the conscience as no one else has done, and whose life is as noble as his books,—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

All his essays may be called by the title of that recently published in the North American Review, "The Sovereignty of Ethics." Start where he may, he never fails to reach, substantially, the same conclusion: "All the victories of religion belong to the moral sentiment. The progress of religion is steadily to its identity with morals. Free institutions are only the means, morality is the object of government. All high beauty has a moral element. No scholar without the heroic mind. The foundation of culture as of character is at last the moral sentiment. Its atmosphere is a region of grandeur which reduces all material magnificence to toys. This wonderful sentiment is the fountain of intellect. Civilization depends on morality. The highest platform of eloquence is the moral sentiment."

Through every labyrinth of thought runs this golden clew; and, as we follow it, we meet impressive appeals to all the virtues, especially justice and truth. Then we find many shrewd hints, like: "The law of the table is Beauty, a respect to the common soul of all the guests. Everything is unseasonable which is private to two or three. Never name sickness: even if you could trust yourself on that perilous topic, beware of unmuzzling a valetudinarian. I honor health as the first muse, and sleep as the condition of health."

His most characteristic maxim is this:—

> "Love's hearts are faithful, but not fond,
> Bound for the just, but not beyond;
> And they serve men austerely;
> After their own genius, clearly,
> Without a false humility:
> For this is love's nobility,—
> Not to scatter bread and gold,
> Goods and raiment bought and sold;
> But to hold fast his simple sense,
> And speak the speech of innocence,
> And with hand and body and blood
> To make his bosom counsel good.
> For he that feeds men serveth few:
> He serves all, who dares be true."

The foundation of his ethics is his faith that every man has his own teaching from within which is leading him in a new path, his individual bias, which he must obey, and by which he rightly develops and attains his legitimate power. Every mind has a new compass, which points always to that man's proper path with more or less variation from every other soul's. In morals, this is conscience; in intellect, genius. (See Letters and Social Aims, pp. 274, 275.) Hence, he says again and again: "Wild liberty breeds iron conscience. In self-trust, all the virtues are comprehended." Thus, each soul contains a tribunal, which gives not only decisions, but rewards and punishments. The grand doctrine, fully unfolded in the essay on "Compensation," that the soul is her own judge, underlies all his reasoning. "You cannot do wrong without suffering wrong. So much benevolence as a man hath, so much life hath he.

> "'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
> When for the truth he ought to die.'"

Surely, we must all believe this, for our own experience reveals it daily. We know that the soul has this judicial power; and how she obtains it is less important. Emerson holds that the tribunal in the individual is merely the mouthpiece of the universal law manifest in all nature, the Over-Soul, or universal mind identical in all men, the breath of will that blows eternally through the universe of souls in the direction of the right and necessary, the universal soul within or behind our individual life, wherein, as in the firmament, justice, truth, love, and freedom arise and shine. The new philosophy, already prevalent among men of science, admits the existence of this inner light on our duties, but ascribes it to earthly experience rather than to heavenly inspiration, so as to make conscience not so much a mysterious revelation as a most precious inheritance. There is nothing in this view of conscience to prevent our revering it as sacredly as Emerson does, and believing with him that it has power enough ultimately to guide all souls aright. If there is any defect in his lofty teachings, it is that of not bidding us respect our neighbor's conscience as well as our own, and recognize in public opinion the utterance of the universal moral sentiment, the result of all life and thought. Days of superstition and despotism have indeed suffered the foolish and wicked to make their wishes far too prominent; but the wise and good have always found some attention, and in this age of liberty and light they exercise their rightful sway. There are very few people, who can honestly say with Emerson, "We can easily come up to the standard of goodness in society." Happy are they who do not find it very difficult! Few there are who are not made better by having public opinion urge them on and lift them up.

Of course, we should take care to see whether our neighbor's opinion is a fresh discovery or an outgrown relic. We can prize such social institutions as have truth and promise all the better for rejecting such as are mere survivals of the gloom and error of the past. Government and society, schools and colleges, philanthropic associations, the family,—these should be all the more sacred to us for agreeing with what Emerson has said of the Church, and is known still to think:—

"Whoso would be a man must be a non-conformist. The objection of conforming to usages that have become dead to you is that it scatters your force. The relations of the soul to the divine spirit are so pure that it is profane to seek to interpose helps. As men's prayers are a disease of the will, so are their creeds a disease of the intellect. Why drag this dead weight of a Sunday-school over the whole Christendom? The word "miracle" as pronounced by Christian churches gives a false impression: it is monster. The soul has no dates, nor rites, nor persons, nor specialties, nor men. The soul knows only the soul. God offers to every mind its choice between truth and repose. Swedenborg failed by attaching himself to the Christian symbol instead of the moral sentiment, which carries innumerable Christianities in its bosom. There is no vice that has not skulked behind the false religions. Here are know-nothing religions, or churches that proscribe intellect; sectatory religions, slave-holding and slave-trading religions; and even in the decent populations idolatries wherein the whiteness of the ritual covers scarlet indulgence. They who come to the old shrines find apes and players rustling the old garments. When you came to read the liturgy to a modern congregation, it was almost absurd in its unfitness, and suggested a masquerade of old costumes. When the hierarchy is afraid of science and education, there is nothing left but to quit a church which is no longer one. Religion must always be a crab fruit. It cannot be grafted, and preserve its wild beauty. The narrow sectarian cannot read astronomy with impunity. The creeds of his church shrivel like dried leaves at the door of the observatory. Good men find the churches to be in the interest and pay of the devil. I fear that what is called religion, but is perhaps pew-holding, not obeys, but conceals the moral sentiment. The mind of this age has fallen away from theology to morals. I conceive it an advance."

Honor to him who, alike throughout his writings and throughout his life, has maintained the Sovereignty of Ethics!

Let me add that, while all his works are in perfect harmony, his most characteristic utterances are to be found in five books, of which the last appeared in 1850; namely, the two series of Essays, the first volume of Poems, the Miscellanies, and Representative Men. He who has these has Emerson, though the later volumes are valuable as illustrations and introductions.

Perhaps the most valuable of his later essays are two which are still buried in the North American,—that on the "Sovereignty of Ethics" in the number for May and June, 1878, and one on "Character," never reprinted, in the number for April, 1866. Nothing would better serve high culture and pure morality than the publication of these two articles, together with The Preacher, The Fortunes of the Republic, already out of print, and his contributions to the Dial and various books, in more accessible form. In the next number I shall give some translations on Emerson from French and German critics.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

From its thirteenth annual report, we learn that the Freedman's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church is doing an extensive educational work in the South. It spends about $100,000 yearly, and has given aid to twenty colleges and schools during the past year. In these schools there are eighty teachers and about 2,500 pupils. The society has undoubtedly done a most efficient work among the colored people, directing its efforts mainly to the preparation of teachers for the common schools. It is now giving more heed to the wants of the poor whites, and is enlarging its work with that object in view.

Prof. Felix Adler's address on "The Workingman's School," a discourse before the Ethical Society, was printed in the Index only a few months ago. It is now printed in pamphlet form by the society, and is accompanied with reports of the teachers of the Free Kindergarten and the Workingmen's School. The Free Kindergarten, started in one of the worst localities in New York city, in January, 1878, has proven a very great success. Beginning with only eight children, it has been obliged to move to a larger place, which is now crowded. It has a normal class, which provides free instruction, the pupils giving their services to the Kindergarten for a year in consideration of the training they receive. The Kindergarten takes children from the ages of three to seven. The Workingmen's School was started a year ago, with the view of continuing the same kind of training with these children after they had passed through the Kindergarten. This school attempts to apply the results of science in a more efficient training of children, teaching them to observe, experiment, and reason. It discards the old artificial methods of instruction, and adopts those which are natural; in fact, carries the kindergarten ideas into school education. To this, it adds a systematic mechanical training. It teaches no trade, but the principles on which all trades rest,—the use of tools and mechanical skill. According to the report of the principal, this school is an attempt "to institute a reform in education in the following two ways. First, we begin, he says, industrial instruction at the very earliest age possible. Already, in our kindergarten, we lay the foundation for the system of work instruction that is to follow. In the school proper, then, we seek to bridge over the interval lying between the preparatory kindergarten training and the specialized instruction of the technical school, utilizing the school age itself for the development of industrial ability. This, however, is only one characteristic feature of our institution. The other, and the capital one, is that we seek to combine industrial instruction organically with the ordinary branches of instruction, thus using it, not only for the material purpose of creating skill, but also ideally as a factor of mind education. To our knowledge, such an application of work instruction has nowhere as yet been attempted, either abroad or in this country." This work of Prof. Adler's interests us very greatly. It is a step in the right direction. We could wish there were many more such societies as his at work in the country, and in as helpful a spirit. His is the sort of radicalism which has power in it, and is of the kind we most need to cultivate now. The Society of Ethical Culture is a most noteworthy example of what can be done in the way of constructive work. The theologic straws of Liberalism have been whipped quite enough: it is time another sort of work was taken in hand by those whose chief faith is in humanity.

During the past summer, George M. Beard, M.D., of New York, made a careful study of the insane asylums of Europe. In a paper before the National Association for the Protection of the Insane, he gave the results of his studies there. This was printed in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, and now appears as a pamphlet. His conclusions are worthy of the most serious attention, as they point out the most radical changes which have been made in the treatment of the insane. In England and Scotland, he found that all classes of the insane, even those privately treated, were under government supervision; and he favors this arrangement. He thinks Great Britain ahead of all other nations in the care of these unfortunates, while Scotland is in advance of England and Ireland. "It may be positively affirmed," he says, "that on the average the insane in Scotch asylums are better treated than in any other country," while Germany and France follow next in order. He finds in the best European asylums that mechanical restraint is almost wholly discarded, and that labor is introduced in its place. The doors of the asylums are no longer fastened, and the largest liberty is given the patients. All but a small per cent. of the insane are given some kind of work to perform. "The extent to which labor is employed seems incredible; and cross-examinations were constantly needed in order to convince me that not only working, cooking, cleaning, and the immense farm work on the grounds, but also various trades, were carried on by the inmates, the patients of the asylums." Concerning the abandonment of restraint, he says that the general principle of discarding it, or employing it only in a small percentage of cases, "is not only universal in the best asylums of England, but is growing into favor everywhere in Europe. Among the most thoughtful, scholarly, and advanced men, especially the younger men, both in England and on the Continent, it is no longer a question, but an established principle beyond discussion." In the best asylums, the insane are treated much like children; and for the great majority there is permitted the freedom of childhood, with its constant watchful care and oversight. Dr. Beard says, "The experiment of carrying on a lunatic asylum with unlocked doors, dispensing almost entirely with bolts and bars, is one of the most interesting and important of all the scientific advances that have been made in the treatment of the insane." The best asylums in Europe are no longer enormous buildings, but a collection of cottages or houses. Many advantages are expected from the use of smaller buildings, beside that of greatly reducing their cost. Dr. Beard thinks the most satisfactory of the European results will be adopted in this country, and the first need is the creation of a mixed board of government commissioners in each State. He says, "The superiority of Europe is organization. In individual effort in certain directions, America is equal to or superior to any European country. In the treatment of the insane outside of the asylums, by general practitioners and students of the nervous system, there has probably been as much advance in this country as abroad; and especially in the treatment of various morbid states of the nervous system that often lead to insanity there has been nowhere such satisfactory progress as here. This is the philosophical method of combating insanity: treating the insane before they are insane; arresting candidates for lunacy before they have stepped on the threshold of the asylum." It is very encouraging, indeed, that the old barbarities with which the insane were treated are being so entirely removed. This is a conspicuous sign of the times,—that the spirit of humanity is becoming everywhere so predominant and powerful.

G. W. C.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, Jan. 17, 1881.

The demonstrations made by the Collectivists and all denominations of Communists at the funeral of Blanqui, on the eve of the elections, caused fear that the republican party might suffer defeat, and that the election of a majority of Communist deputies would endanger the present peace and prosperity of the French Republic. The result of the elections both in Paris and the provinces is a complete triumph of the conservative republican party. The republican press generally advised the political friends of Blanqui to avoid sensational display, and not to unfurl the red flag over the last remains of the old patriot, who had labored more than half a century for the cause of liberty, speaking kindly of his virtues and the services he had rendered his country, notwithstanding his extremely radical views. Blanqui was editor-in-chief of the journal Ni Dieu, Ni Maître; and, in consequence of the peculiar position he had held so many years, it was impossible that his funeral should have been an uneventful one. He himself preferred that it should be simple and inexpensive, in conformity with the manner in which he had lived, and the style in harmony with the manners and customs of the people, the champion of whose rights he had been.

In this great metropolis of pomp and magnificence, the "Convoy," or funeral arrangements, were designated as of the "fifth class." It was said that Rochefort issued cards of invitation to all Socialist and Liberal organizations, of an inflammatory nature; and that nothing was neglected calculated to create a great demonstration. Blanqui lived on the right bank of the Seine, but was buried in Père-la-Chaise or the cemetery of the east, although his family had no vault there, and Montparnasse is the burial-place nearest to the locality where he died. It was asserted that Père-la-Chaise was chosen on account of its distance, the greater length of time it would require for the funeral procession to reach it, and the opportunity afforded of passing through a large portion of Paris. Three hundred Socialist, Workingmen's, and Freethought organizations were represented at the funeral, each member wearing a button-hole bouquet of scarlet immortelles, and each society bearing aloft its banner with device setting forth its name and cause, many of which were touchingly expressive of friendship, reverence, and love. Fully thirty thousand persons followed the remains on foot from Boulevard d'Italie, across the bridge of Austerlitz, to Place Bastile. As the procession reached this historic square, where the old prison which had crushed so many brilliant and freedom-loving souls, and caused their light to go out in darkness, had stood for centuries, and where now the magnificent column Juliet stands, to commemorate the destruction of the Bastile, and the memory of the revolutionary heroes of 1830, many thousands who were awaiting the funeral cortége there, joined it. Order was for a little time broken by cries of "Vive Blanqui!" "Vive Rochefort!" "Vive la Révolution Sociale." The detachment of police who attended the procession were utterly powerless to preserve order, but its spirit was among the people; and in a short time, the regular line of march was again taken up, and continued without interruption to the gates of Père-la-Chaise, where, the crowd dividing, thirty thousand persons stood on each side of the great gate, as the hearse and the chief mourners passed within. The paths in the cemetery are so very narrow, and the marble tombs are so near together, that comparatively few could enter to hear the funeral orations which were given in Place Casimir Perrier, near the statue of that hero, where the remains of Blanqui were placed in a temporary vault. Some little disorder occurred here in consequence of the crowd and the fainting of several persons. Some of the funeral orations were of an excitable nature. Still, the great majority of that dense assemblage were calm, collected, intelligent, thoughtful persons, who by their composed manner made a deep impression.

The republican press generally spoke of the Blanqui funeral as an affirmation of the triumph of the revolutionary principle. Be that as it may, this ultra-radical element, which may be designated as the outgrowth of the Jacobins of the first revolution, excitable and unreliable and illy balanced as it may be, is not without its uses in the present political condition of France. By constant agitation, social abuses and wrongs are at length righted; and that these still exist is shown by the large and powerful organizations, in working order, who combat them. France needs them less now than in her days of monarchy and imperialism; but, when she needs them no longer, they will cease to exist. That the third republic has the confidence of the nation is shown by the elections of the 9th inst. The Retroactionist vote was considerably increased in Paris, because the clergy seized upon the demonstrations of the Blanqui funeral to cry revolution and anarchy, thereby gaining two seats in the house of deputies. The Communistic vote was 31,367 and the Retroactionary vote 42,657. The republican vote throughout the provinces was largely in the majority. The municipal council of Nimes is for the first time republican. Lyons, Rennes, Angers, Louviers, and Briançon report large republican gains, which is also true of the countries bordering on Spain.

On the 10th inst., three hundred and eleven pardoned Communists, banished to New Caledonia in 1871, returned to Paris. They were received with great rejoicings by their friends. Many of them show the effects of severe suffering, and others have unhappily fallen victims to intemperance, while some few have not aged perceptibly during their long exile. The wife of one of the exiles was anxiously seeking her husband amid the crowd at the dépôt. As he replied to his name, she at first doubted his identity, but when convinced fainted away. The change in his appearance had been terrible, and sorrow and disappointment thereat caused her to have a long succession of fainting-fits.

In previous letters to the press, allusion has been made to the strong opposition of a large proportion of the French nation to "religious congregations," as they designate all monkeries and nunneries. The truth is, France is weary of their yoke, weary of laboring for their support; and, when an American seeks to counsel charity toward them, the quick reply is: "We will export all our nuns and monks to America, madam. You may have them and welcome. France has no use for them." The recent address of Deputy Brisson in the Chambre des Députés illustrates something of the feeling of France toward these monastic communities. In 1849, their estimated wealth was 49,000,000 francs. In 1879, it had reached the gigantic sum of 421,000,000. "The question," said M. Brisson, "is how did these congregations gain all this money? I will illustrate one way." He then rehearsed the rules of monastic communities, whereby all the wealth of those who become members is voluntarily given to the convent, and literally passes from the possession of its owner. For this, life support is guaranteed, with several exceptions, one of which is that, if for any reason whatsoever it shall be deemed needful to expel any member, such expulsion may take place by a majority of a three-fourths vote of the community, but that the wealth which any expelled member deeded to the convent, or any part thereof, shall in no case be returned to any expelled member, and the latter shall have no claim for support upon the community so expelling him or her. After reading the text of the statutes of which the above is a synopsis, M. Brisson said they formed a portion of the code of the convent of Zélatrices de l'Eucharistie, and showed a case in point, that of Mademoiselle Herbert, which illustrates the workings of such conventual rules, and the manner by which such institutions amass their enormous wealth.

Mademoiselle Herbert was the possessor of a fortune of 2,000,000 francs. The Sisters were very kind to her; and she became a nun, with all that term implies. Her elegant house and garden in Paris, her valuable property in Montrouge, her house in Blanc (Indre), and her ready money passed into the possession of the Superior of the convent of the Eucharist. Presently, the deluded girl became insane,—it was said that her mind had never been strong,—and when her insanity was pronounced incurable, and she became a burden to the community, she was heartlessly driven from its shelter; and not one centime of her 2,000,000 francs returned to her, because these very holy Sisters "could not harbor the insane," and she became a burden upon the State, like its veriest pauper. Is it a wonder that intelligent France, learning daily in the school of humanity and justice, should, in the evening of the nineteenth century, declare she has no use for convents?

In this country where Christianity has flourished for fifteen centuries, and in this metropolis where its observances are as active as in any Simon-pure Christian country of the world, no more attention is paid to the Israelite Sabbath than as though no fourth commandment exists in the Decalogue. The Catholic churches are always open for service, and are usually better attended on Sunday than week-days, especially by people whose wealth gives them command of their time. For the working-classes, those gaining their bread in the great corporate industries, either by hand or brain, there is no rest on Sunday. In workingmen's organizations, the question of one day of rest in the week is receiving much agitation. It is justly and truly argued that the laborers of England and America accomplish as much work in six days as their French colleagues in seven, and that one day of general cessation from labor would alike benefit employer and employé. The best dramas and operas are given on Sunday, and museums and art-galleries are shown to their best advantage on that day. The sun shines as benignly, the rain nourishes the earth, and the French people are as blessed as any I have seen where Sunday laws prevail. According to the faith of many well-meaning people, it would be in order for the Almighty to manifest displeasure at the desecration of the seventh day of the week. However, no sign of it appears; and, strange to relate, in Paris, with its two million permanent residents and its one million transient inhabitants, there is less drunkenness and disorder on Sunday, and there are less arrests by the police courts for breaking the peace, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, than in many cities where the Jewish Sabbath is a legal institution.

The weather has been very cold since the 6th inst. Although the temperature is only a few degrees below the freezing point, the air is keen and too bracing for pulmonary or bronchial invalids, who are obliged to seek the warmer climes of Nice. For the first time this season, the parks present a wintry aspect, with frozen ground and light snows.

The circular of the Premier, M. Bartholemew Saint-Hilliare, addressed to the cabinet of Berlin, regarding the settlement of the Turco-Grecian troubles by arbitration, is a most able and statesmanlike document, which is attracting the attention of the humanity-and-peace-loving people of Europe. The fears of the writer that, if open hostilities begin between Greece and Turkey in the spring, they may lead to a general European war, are believed to be well founded; and if the cabinets of Europe do not or cannot bring about a peaceful settlement, just to both parties, by arbitration, it will not be the fault of France.

Although France has, at this time, five thousand professional artists in the departments of sculpture and painting, the number of pupils who are studying these arts with a view to following them professionally is constantly increasing. At the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, nine hundred and thirty-seven students are enrolled. Aside from these, many are pursuing art studies under private tuition. ROSA L. SEGUR.

1. The Accumulation of Property.

During the early nomadic or patriarchal period of society, there is but little accumulation of PERSONAL PROPERTY. The FAMILY or TRIBE, dwelling in tents, and wandering from place to place, can retain only such possessions as can easily be carried with them. Simple barter is their only method of purchase and sale. The first PROPERTY of any considerable value consists of flocks and herds; whence we derive one of our common terms relating to money or value. (PECUNIARY, from L. pecus, "cattle.")

When the agricultural period arrives, and habitations become more permanent, personal property of other kinds rapidly accumulates. With the establishment of CITIES, and the division of society into diversified occupations and trades, the primitive system of barter is superseded by the use of some convenient medium of exchange and measure of value. To be generally accepted, this medium, which we call MONEY, must itself possess value.

NOTE.—GOLD and SILVER, from their concentration, their general stability, with relation to supply and demand, and the ease with which they can be coined and stamped, constitute the best measures of value, and the most convenient mediums of exchange. As they can be conveniently stored and preserved, they are sometimes hoarded and withdrawn from circulation. When, therefore, is money of the greatest value in a community,—when it remains idle, or when it is in active circulation? What do you understand by "an honest dollar"? What is the meaning of "INTEREST" and "USURY"? Is it right for the capitalist to receive interest on money loaned? What was the JEWISH law regarding usury? (Deut. xxiii., 19, 20; Ex. xxii., 25; Lev. xxv., 35-37; Neh. v., 7, 10; Ps. xv., 5; Prov. xxviii., 8; Isa. xxiv., 2; Ezek. xviii., 8, 13, 17; xxii., 12.)

2. Poverty and Riches as Regarded by the Jews.

The long conflicts of the JEWS with foreign enemies, the destruction and spoliation of their cities and their TEMPLE, and the period of lawless violence during the reign of HEROD, seem to have given rise among them to two diverse ways of regarding PROPERTY. The masses of the people, and the aristocratic classes, became very frugal and saving, and careful to obtain the greatest possible advantage in bargain and trade.

Certain religious enthusiasts, on the contrary, taught that it was wrong to accumulate property, and that all in excess of one's personal needs should be given to the poor. (See Bab. Talmud, tract Baba bathra, 11, a, etc.) In the JERUSALEM TALMUD, we read that Rabbi JESHOBEB, who lived about the time of JESUS, gave away all his property to the poor. His contemporary, Rabbi GAMALIEL, a distinguished Jewish teacher, reproved him for this act. (Jer. Talmud, tract Peah, 15, b.)

Later, at the beginning of the second century of our era, so generally did this improvident mania prevail, that a convention of rabbis was held at USHA, a town of upper GALILEE, which decreed that he who wished to give his property to the poor must not be allowed to bestow more than one-fifth of all he possessed. (Bab. Talmud, tract Kethuboth, 50, a; Arachin, 28, a.) GALILEE seems to have been the region where this mania was most prevalent. (Renan's Life of Jesus, p. 169, ff.)

NOTE.—Many passages in the OLD TESTAMENT, which condemn riches and exalt poverty, stimulated and encouraged the belief in the virtue of improvidence. (See Deut. xv., 7–11; I. Sam. ii., 7, 8; Amos ii., 6; Is. xiv., 32; xxix., 19; Ps. xxv., 9; xxxvii., 11; lxii., 4; lxiv., 33; cviii., 7, 8, etc.) The apocryphal Book of ENOCH contains the most powerful maledictions against the rich. (Enoch xlvi., 4-8; xcix., 13, 14.)

3. Influence of the Messianic Expectation.

This contempt for RICHES was greatly stimulated by the current belief in the speedy coming of the MESSIANIC KINGDOM. (See Renan's Life of Jesus, p. 176, ff.) As this world was soon to perish, the labor of amassing riches was thought to be wholly useless. All efforts should be applied to preparation for the coming KINGDOM OF GOD, where peace and plenty would always prevail. In the TALMUD and in the works of PHILO, the ALEXANDRIAN Jew, are remarkable descriptions of this HEAVENLY KINGDOM. Fruits of enormous size and delicious flavor would grow spontaneously everywhere, and wild beasts would lose their ferocity and become the servants of man.

Sects like the ESSENES and disciples of JOHN THE BAPTIST despised riches, commanded almsgiving and the equal distribution of property, and taught that the poor would enjoy special privileges in the future life. (Luke iii., 10-14; Josephus, Wars of the Jews, II., viii., and the works of Philo.)

NOTE.—A common SEMITIC proverb declared, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of GOD." This saying was not only repeated by JESUS (Matt. xix., 24; Mark x., 25; Luke xviii., 25), but it is found also in the TALMUD (Bab. Talmud, tract Berakoth, 55, b; Baba metsi a, 38, b), and in the KORAN (Sura vii., 38).

4. Jesus' Doctrine of the Blessedness of Poverty.

JESUS, believing in the speedy coming of the MESSIANIC KINGDOM, appears to have taught that only the poor could inherit its joys. He illustrated this conception in the parable of the "Wedding Feast." (Matt. xxii., 1-10; compare Luke xiv., 12-14.) He pronounced blessings upon the poor and hungry (Luke vi., 20, 21), and woes upon the rich (Luke vi., 24, 25). He commanded his disciples to "lend, hoping for nothing in return." (Luke vi., 34.) He forbade them to "lay up treasures upon earth" (Matt. vi., 19), and declared the impossibility of serving both GOD and Mammon (Matt. vi., 24).

He bade them "take no thought of the morrow" (Matt. vi., 25-34), but live from day to day like the lilies of the field, "which toil not." He ordered them to make no provision for their journeys, but to solicit alms everywhere among those who would receive them. (Matt. x., 9-15.) He pictured the rich man in Hades, suffering the torments of fiery torture, while the poor man, LAZARUS, was safe in the arms of ABRAHAM. (Luke xvi., 19-31.) To the poor especially, he brought the gospel of salvation. (Matt. xi., 5.)

NOTE A.—This exaltation of improvidence has, by the common consent of mankind, been set aside as impracticable, Utopian, and opposed to the enlightenment, progress, and civilization of the world. It may, however, help to counteract the selfish and miserly love of riches, which is always to be condemned, while the faithful worker, though poor, is worthy of all respect. It must not be forgotten that this erroneous teaching of JESUS grew naturally out of the current mistaken expectation of the speedy coming of the MESSIANIC KINGDOM. The religious mendicancy of the early and middle Christian ages was based upon these NEW TESTAMENT doctrines. Talk about the effect of inherited riches on character. Are not riches a trust, to be held and used for the good of humanity? What do you think of AGUR'S prayer? (Prov. xxx., 8, 9.)

NOTE B.—The EBIONITES (from Ebionim, "the poor"), a very early sect of Jewish CHRISTIANS, claiming to number among themselves the descendants of the family of JESUS, accepted these doctrines; and the name "EBION," "poor," became synonymous with "saint," or "friend of GOD." In later times, they were regarded by the Gentile CHRISTIANS as heretics; and a pretended heresiarch or leader, EBION, was invented to explain their designation.

General Questions.

1. How was property regarded during the patriarchal period? 2. What valuable property was first accumulated? 3. What was the earliest method of purchase and sale? 4. What is money? 5. Must money possess intrinsic value? 6. What are the most convenient mediums of exchange? 7. How were poverty and riches regarded by the JEWS? 8. What does the OLD TESTAMENT say of the blessedness of poverty? 9. How did the Messianic expectation influence the growth of this belief? 10. What were the teachings of JOHN THE BAPTIST and the ESSENES? 11. What common SEMITIC proverb embodies this current belief? 12. What did JESUS teach respecting poverty and riches? 13. How is his teaching on this subject practically regarded? 14. Who were the EBIONITES, and what did they believe?

FOREIGN.

THE late storm in England of wind and snow was attended not only with colder weather than had been experienced in that country for twenty years, but also with great damage to property and considerable loss of life.

M. LAISANT writes in the Petit Parisien: "Mr. Bradlaugh had insulted me. He refused me all reparation. He now claims the formation of a jury of honor commissioned to declare whether I was right or wrong in calling him a Prussian spy. Mr. Bradlaugh is a mere farceur. He knows quite well that I have never called him a Prussian spy. On this as on the other points, he lies. I hand him over to public contempt."

THE ANTI-JEWISH AGITATION IN PRUSSIA.—A meeting of workingmen which was to have been held on the evening of January 20, at Berlin, to protest against the proceedings of Dr. Henrici, the anti-Semitic agitator, and to discuss the attitude to be observed by the workingmen in regard to this question, was prohibited by the police in virtue of the Anti-Socialist Law. The Progressists have, it is stated, resolved to question the Government as to the legality of this proceeding.

CERTAIN members of a religious order formerly residing in France have settled themselves lately in a remote district in the County of Sussex, at a place called Cowfold, and have hired a quantity of land, with the intention of starting a distillery for the production of the celebrated Chartreuse liqueur. The secret which gives the peculiar and exquisite flavor to this liqueur has been preserved for generations intact by a certain body of Carthusian friars; and it is the inheritors of this secret who have now established themselves in England, and hope to realize a large profit for their order by the production in this country of an article on which a duty is levied.

ABOUT two thousand students of the Berlin University assembled on Tuesday night to celebrate the tenth anniversary of German unity. The Rector of the University took occasion to exhort the students to abandon their petty animosities, and especially their unworthy antipathy to the Jews. This speech caused such confusion that Professor Mommsen, who then attempted to address the excited crowd, could not be heard. The meeting broke up in disorder, and ended with many challenges to fight between Christian and Jewish students. One Jew, a member of the university, received twenty challenges from his Christian colleagues, and will have to fight the duels in succession.

REV. MESSRS. DALE AND ENRAGHT are once more free as the wild goose, thanks to the glorious uncertainties of the law, or, rather, to the absurd negligence of those who undertake to set the cumbrous machine in motion. We shall now see whether the consciences of these clergymen will urge them on to disregard Lord Penzance's inhibition by farther ministrations in their parish churches. Should they feel compelled to do this as a matter of duty, we advise their opponents to let them alone. Since it is acknowledged that their congregations are as Ritualistic as the clergymen, why, in the name of toleration and quietness, should their hobby be made a matter of heartburning and prosecution?—Secular Review.

ACCORDING to statements, unofficial, but apparently authentic, the revisers of the New Testament have made alterations which will excite some consternation and not a little regret among all those who are familiar with the authorized version. In the Lord's Prayer, the concluding petition, "Deliver us from evil," is changed into "Deliver us from the evil one." Half a dozen of the most familiar texts in the New Testament will disappear altogether. The question "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" is metamorphosed into "What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own life?" "Hades" is substituted for "hell" in two well-known passages. The inscription on the altar "to the unknown God" will read "to an unknown God." Apart from these textual alterations and omissions, the revisers have abolished the division into chapters and verses, and printed the new version in paragraphs.—Pall Mall Gazett.

JESTINGS.

BE thankful you are poor: you will not have the trouble of crawling out from under a heavy monument on the resurrection morning.—Somerville Journal.

SCENE IN A COLLEGE.—Professor: "Who will see Mr. B. before next Monday?" Lady student (hesitating and blushing): "I shall see him Sunday night, probably."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER (reprovingly): "Boys, do you know what day this is?" Street Boy: "Hi, fellers! Here's a cove as don't know what day this is! I guess he's been out all night!"

"NOW, SAMMY, tell me, have you read the story of Joseph?" "Oh, yes, uncle." "Well, then, what wrong did they do when they sold their brother?" "They sold him too cheap, I think."

AN Irishman, who was very near-sighted, about to fight a duel, insisted that he should stand six paces nearer to his antagonist than the other did to him; and they were both to fire at the same time.

A BRIGHT little girl, who had successfully spelled the word "that," was asked by her teacher what would remain after the "t" had been taken away. "The dirty cups and saucers," was the reply.

"WHAT is your father's occupation?" asked the teacher of a new scholar. "Mum?" "What does he do for a living?" "Oh, he bets on thur elections, I guess. Marm told him last night that's all he'd done for a month."—Boston Transcript.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philauthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

SOUL of the soul! Neither thought nor reason comprehends thy essence, and no one knows thy attributes. The prophets themselves sink in the dust of thy road. Although intellect exists by thee, has it yet ever found the path of thy existence? O thou who art in the interior and in the exterior of the soul! thou art and thou art not that which I say.—Persian.

MEN attain the joy of heaven in their human form: they attain beatitude. These are absorbed with the desire for good conduct; they are free from all impediments; they are pure. When the intellect is pure as well as the heart, to it the region of the Deity becomes visible.—Hindu.

THE mind of the superior man is conversant with righteousness, the mind of the mean with gain. They who know the truth are not equal to those who love it, nor they who love it to those who delight in it. I long to see one who loves virtue as he loves beauty.—Confucius.

THE Way that can be spoken is not the Eternal Way. The Name that can be named is not the Eternal Name. Nameless, the Way is the source of heaven and earth. Named, it is the mother of all beings. He that is free from selfish desires shall behold it in the spirit; he that is possessed by passions, in the outward form alone. And those two are one in substance, though differing in name; depth and the depth of depths: the entrance to all spiritual life.—Lao-tse.

IF riches be a possession to be desired in this life, what is richer than wisdom, that worketh all things? And if a man love righteousness, her labors are virtues; for she teacheth temperance and prudence, justice and fortitude, which are such things as men can have nothing more profitable in their life.—Wisdom of Solomon.

IT is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rich in providence, stern upon the poles of truth.—Bacon.

THE ideas as well as children of our youth often die before us; and our minds represent to us those tombs to which we are approaching, where, though the brass and marble remain, yet the inscriptions are effaced by time and the imagery moulders away. The pictures drawn in our minds are laid on in fading colors, and, if not sometimes refreshed, vanish and disappear.—Locke.

THE imagination of man has not lost its power or forgotten its function since it performed the prodigious task of enthroning its hope by the side of the godhead. It is adequate to new and healthier performance. A world of fresh materials lies before it; new heavens display their glories; a new earth offers opportunity and prospect; a new humanity presents its varieties of good and evil. New beauties gladden the open vision, new glories fascinate the kindling hope. The regions of possibility, so far from being exhausted, have but begun to disclose their treasures. The realities of to-day surpass the ideals of yesterday. Art has a new birth. Poetry has a new birth. Philosophy teems with new births. These all look forward with confident expectation. Why should Religion, which has built up more grandeurs than any of them, turn her back to the new day, confess her creative power exhausted, and creep back to the images of her own idolatry?—O. B. Frothingham.

NO SACRIFICE to heaven, no help from heaven:
That runs through all the faiths of all the world.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AND now it is reported that a new national bank is being organized in New York, of which General Grant is to be President. So, if all reports are true, though a "Third Term" cannot be secured for him in the White House, he is at least to have three Presidencies thrust upon him at once.

AN English paper says that "more money is spent in Great Britain and Ireland in two days for intoxicating drinks than is given in a year for the cause of missions, Protestant and Catholic." It is also said that the Queen of Madagascar is much troubled by the fact that since her people became Christians they have become more addicted to intemperance.

THE relatives of Mrs. Lydia Maria Child propose to publish a selection from her private letters. Any person having such letters is requested to communicate with Mrs. S. E. Sewall, Woman's Journal office, No. 5 Park Street, Boston, Mass., or with Miss Abby B. Francis, No. 21 North Avenue, Cambridge, Mass. All letters loaned will be carefully returned. We may add the hope that the book will have a memoir of Mrs. Child.

AN energetic and systematic effort has been made in the Legislature of Maryland this winter to amend the Sunday laws. Numerously signed petitions for such amendment were presented, followed by able arguments for the measure, and the introduction of a reform bill. But it failed of securing a constitutional majority. The end, however, is not yet. If only the old Sunday laws on the statute-books in most of the States were strictly enforced, there would be a popular uprising against them that could not be resisted; and many who now oppose their abolition would then be among the foremost in demanding a change.

SEVERAL Evangelical journals that come under our eye are discussing, with evident signs of alarm, the falling off in the attendance at churches in recent years. It seems that it is not only in liberal denominations, but in all Protestant denominations, that this complaint is made. On the first Sunday of last October, a pleasant day, some statistics were gathered in New York. The sixteen most popular Protestant churches of the city, with sittings for 20,000 people, only had on that day 10,500 persons in their aggregate congregations. We wish that some of these Evangelical journals would candidly consider the question, how much the progressive thought of the day has to do with this fact.

THE Vineland Independent is evidently somewhat sceptical in regard to revivals. These are some of its reflections, among others, upon this subject in one of its recent issues: "The Church is partially responsible for the distrust of the populace toward the revival. Business men and those who look at things religious through common-sense, and not sentimental glasses, fancy they discover something in the prevalent revival methods which does not smack altogether of salvation, or the judgment to come. They think they discover, in the revival, as ordinarily conducted, a purely mechanical effort to magnify a sectarian Zion, and add to the roll of church members. If the modern revival could be baptized with a little more of the spirit which implies moral regeneration as well as a dogmatic assent to the creed and the confessional, the work would prosper more, and be accompanied by an observable blessing."

THE Christian Register, referring to our review of the difficulty between the Second Congregational Society in Leicester and the trustees of the Southgate will, and quoting from the latter part of our article, adds: "We hasten to assure our neighbor that the decision of the committee refers simply and solely to the case of the Leicester Society. It is not a definition of Unitarian doctrine, and no restriction of Unitarian liberty. . . . It is the will of Mr. Southgate that decided the matter, and not the will of the committee." With all deference to our pleasant neighbor, we must say that he dodges the question. If Mr. Southgate had declared in his will that the income of his fund was to be paid to the minister so long as he preaches in accordance with the religious views of the society, then it would be correct to say that "the decision of the committee refers simply and solely to that society," though, probably in such case, the decision would have been different. But what Mr. Southgate did say was that the fund was to go to the support of the minister "so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Unitarian." According to the clause we have put in italics, what the committee had to do was to compare Mr. Weston's views of God with certain views known as Unitarian; and, to do this, they had to come to some common "definition of Unitarian doctrine." And this, we submit, gives to their decision a much wider bearing than the confines of the Leicester Society. The will of Mr. Southgate did not decide the matter, except through the judgment of the referees as to what is the faith concerning God known as Unitarian. Is there one standard of what is known as Unitarianism for Boston or Brooklyn or Wisconsin, and another standard for Leicester? If the referees believed that what is known as Unitarianism rightfully admits anywhere such views of God as Mr. Weston preaches, then they have done a great injustice to the Leicester Society. We prefer to think that they conscientiously believe that Unitarianism everywhere is a defined doctrine, not allowing liberty of opinion beyond a certain range. If the Register believes that Unitarianism does not restrict liberty nor define doctrine, ought it not to contest the committee's decision? The Leicester Society is certainly entitled to the benefit of all the liberty that the faith "known by the name Unitarian" will anywhere permit.

The Religion of our Literature.

CARLYLE AND EMERSON.

BY EDWIN D. MEAD.

In the introduction to his History of Rationalism, Mr. Lecky, discussing the manner in which changes in the tone and habit of public thought are wrought and new ideas gradually master society, observes sagaciously that it is in our higher literature that the new impulses given by philosophic thought first make themselves seen and felt, that the higher literature communicates the new ideas to the more popular writers, and the impress of the master-minds thus becomes clearly visible in the writings of multitudes who are totally unacquainted with their works. This is very true. The poets, the essayists, the story-tellers, the critics, the editors, who are read daily and hourly, these really do more to shape the religious thought of the age than the distinctively religious writers, and their works are the truest index to the spirit of the present and the truest prophecy of coming things.

How is it, then, with our literature to-day? What is the religion of our literature? Orthodoxy itself has answered the question. Mr. McCrie's book on the Religion of our Literature deserves credit at least for its clear recognition of a great fact. A new religious spirit, says Mr. McCrie, warningly, has already permeated all our higher literature. This new thought "discards miracle or lays no stress upon it: it discards everything which does not accord with its own experience and with the inner moral sense; it slights all the distinctive doctrines of our theology. Recommended by its fascinating form, exciting no alarm, this new religion is penetrating all society, undisturbed by our sound theologians," who forget that genius and imagination are the mightiest of all influences, and that literature, pioneer alike of false and true, had, in the centuries before the Reformation, completely honey-combed the system which Luther's mighty hammer crushed. To illustrate his point, our author first examines the writings of Carlyle, the great fountain-head of bad waters, and then, as writers exerting a universal influence and well-typifying the new religious spirit, Browning and Tennyson, Longfellow, George Eliot, and George MacDonald.

Against MacDonald, he would scarcely have deemed it necessary to sound the trumpet of alarm, had MacDonald stood alone in broaching the insidious heresies which fill his books; but the whole air is full of the same heresies, our poets and novelists all infected. George Eliot's novels are seen to be attempts to undermine Evangelical religion. Tennyson and Browning are found to be permeated through and through with the most dangerous rationalism. But it is chiefly upon Carlyle that Mr. McCrie pours out the vials of his wrath. "Carlyle's religious notions have been adopted by many men distinguished for genius, if not for solid judgment," so he concludes his long essay, "and it seemed desirable to refute what has been thought worthy of so much embellishment. When one sees the monstrous positions that have been held by this writer, he cannot but perceive what a gigantic genius he must possess to have made his writings so plausible that even Evangelical men have cherished, and cherish, the belief that he has contributed to advance the cause of religion."

What is now the religion of the great thinker whom Orthodoxy's champion thus puts at the head of his black list? Carlyle's gospel is a gospel of sincerity and of the divinity of things. To his sincere eye, the formulas of the traditional theology appear as old clothes, which the world has to cast off. To his sense of the divinity of the universe, the presence of God in all nature and history, his "natural supernaturalism," the old notion of miracle appears violent, provincial, and irreligious. "The very things that were once indispensable furtherances," he says, "become obstructions, and need to be shaken off and left behind us." The mind is ever growing, the synthesis of yesterday is seen to be partial to-day, yesterday's belief has ever got to be resolved into something larger. Truth, in the words of Schiller, never is, but is always becoming. The old Churches are dead: they do not give expression to the real, living faith of the present, and they cannot be brought to life again. "Do what you can with them," says Carlyle, "nay, quit not the burnt ruins of them, while you find there is still gold to be dug there. But, on the whole, do not think you can, by logical alchemy, distil astral spirits from them, or, if you could, that said astral spirits or defunct logical phantasms could serve you in anything." No subtlest hocus-pocus, he says, will long avail to make men credit the incredible, and the attempt in matters of religion is a terribly dangerous one. The death-stab, he says, has been given to modern superstition. "That horrid incubus is passing away. The last agonies may endure for decades or for centuries; but it carries the iron in its heart, and will not vex the world any more." That with superstition religion is also passing away is a foolish fear. Religion cannot pass away. "The burning of a little straw may hide the stars of the sky; but the stars are there, and will reappear."

Men ask for a religion, says Carlyle, as for a kind of Morrison's Pill, which they have only to swallow once and all will be well. But there has no such article been made. "He that has a soul unasphyxied will never want a religion: he that has a soul asphyxied, reduced to a succedaneum for salt, will never find any religion, though you rose from the dead to preach him one." "To say truth," observes Carlyle elsewhere, "it is chiefly profitable in these unspeakable days to keep silence about religion. Thou needest no new religion, nor art thou like to get any. Thou hast already more 'religion' than thou makest use of. This day, thou knowest ten commanded duties, seest in thy mind ten things which should be done for one that thou doest. Do one of them: this of itself will show thee ten others that can and shall be done. 'But my future fate?' Yes, thy future fate, indeed? Thy future fate, while thou makest it the chief question, seems to me—extremely questionable." "The mystery of the Infinite," he says in another place, "is a mystery which, through all ages, we shall only read here a line of, there another line of. Do we not already know that the name of the Infinite is Good, is God? Here on earth we are as soldiers fighting in a foreign land, that understand not the plan of the campaign, and have no need to understand it, seeing well what is at our hand to be done. Let us do it like soldiers, with submission, with courage, with a heroic joy."

Religion will always provide instruments enough for its work. Liturgies, catechisms, credos, and articles may successively moulder, but new and efficient forms are ever springing into life. The newspaper is the pulpit of to-day: books are our bishops. The writers of newspapers, pamphlets, poems, books, these, says Carlyle, are the real working effective Church of a modern country. "Nay, not only our preaching, but even our worship, is not it, too, accomplished by means of printed books? The noble sentiment which a gifted soul has clothed for us in melodious words, which brings melody into our hearts, is not this essentially, if we will understand it, of the nature of worship?"

The whole universe, to Carlyle, is instinct with the life of God. Of all modern writers, he has spoken with the most impassioned earnestness against all mechanical and materialistic theories of the world. To know that the soul of things is God, that is man's highest wisdom, "not merely to submit to Necessity,—Necessity will make him submit,—but to know and believe well that the stern thing which Necessity has ordered is the wisest, the best, the thing wanted there." "A man is right and invincible, virtuous and on the road toward sure conquest, precisely while he joins himself to the great deep Law of the World, in spite of all superficial laws, temporary appearances, profit and loss calculations." "Love not pleasure: love God. This," says Carlyle, "is the Everlasting Yea, wherein all contradiction is solved; wherein whoso walks and works it is well with him."

It were interesting to pass in similar review the works of our other leading writers. But, however interesting, such an examination is not, for our present purpose, necessary. Few will question for a moment our author's proposition, that our best literature has entirely swung away from the old theology. But many will regret that he, and such as he, while so clearly perceiving the great fact, cannot appropriate nor even apprehend its true significance.

> "The miracle fades out of history,
> But faith and wonder and the primal earth
> Are born into the world with every man."

These lines from Lowell's "Cathedral" express as perfectly as it is possible to express the nature of the religious feeling which has taken possession of our best literature. Our literature is not less religious, but more religious far, than it was a century ago or half a century ago. Miracle fades out only because the sacredness and wonder of everything become more deeply felt, and miracle is seen to be intrusive and undignified. Unnatural supernaturalism gives way, but only that the "natural supernaturalism" which Carlyle speaks of, a greater wonder, a greater reverence, a more solemn awe in presence of the universe, may take its place.

How is it with our own Emerson? "There is no man living," says Lowell, "to whom, as a writer, so many of us feel so great an indebtedness for ennobling impulses. . . . Many of us are grateful to him for what we feel to be most valuable in our culture. . . . Emerson awakened us, saved us from the body of this death." What now does Emerson say on the points which engage us here? What does he say of Christ? "Jesus Christ belonged to the true race of prophets. He saw with open eye the mystery of the soul. Drawn by its severe harmony, ravished with its beauty, he lived in it, and had his being there. Alone in all history, he estimated the greatness of man. One man was true to what was in you and me. He saw that God incarnates himself in man, and evermore goes forth anew to take possession of his world. He said, in this sublime emotion: 'I am divine. Through me, God acts; through me, speaks. Would you see God, see me; or see thee when thou also thinkest as I now think.' But what a distortion did his doctrine and memory suffer in the same and after ages. No doctrine of the Reason will bear to be taught by the Understanding. The Understanding caught this high chant from the poet's lips, and said in the next age: 'This was Jehovah come down out of heaven. I will kill you, if you say he was a man.' The idioms of his language have usurped the place of his truth; and churches are not built on his principles, but on his tropes. Christianity became a mythus, as the poetic teaching of Greece and of Egypt before. He spoke of miracles; for he felt that man's life was a miracle, and all that man doth, and he knew that his daily miracle shines as the character ascends. But the word Miracle, as pronounced by Christian Churches, is Monster. It is not one with the blowing clover and the falling rain." Of the Church, he says, further on in this famous address to the Harvard Divinity School: "It is time that the ill-suppressed murmur of all thoughtful men against the famine of our churches should be heard through the sleep of indolence and over the din of routine. . . . The prayers and even the dogmas of our churches are like the zodiac of Denderah and the astronomical monuments of the Hindoos, wholly insulated from anything now extant in the life and business of the people. . . . With whatever exceptions, tradition characterizes the preaching of this country, it comes out of the memory, and not out of the soul." "There will be a new church," he says elsewhere, "founded on moral science, at first cold and naked, a babe in the manger again, the algebra and mathematics of ethical law, the church of men to come, without shawms or psaltery or sackbut; but it will have heaven and earth for its beams and rafters, science for symbol and illustration: it will fast enough, gather beauty, music, picture, poetry. Was never Stoicism so stern and exigent as this shall be. It shall send man home to his central solitude, shame these social, supplicating manners, and make him know that much of the time he must have himself to his friend. He shall expect no coöperation, he shall walk with no companion. The nameless thought, the nameless power, the super-personal heart, he shall repose alone on that. He needs only his own verdict. No good fame can help, no bad fame can hurt him. The Laws are his consolers, the good Laws themselves are alive, they know if we have kept them, they animate him with the leading of great duty and an endless horizon."

Compare with this Emerson's words to-day, the lecture on "The Preacher," delivered, like the famous address of 1838, before the Harvard Divinity School. In all that Emerson has written in these forty years, there is nothing which touches so nearly as this lecture on "The Preacher" the same themes as those to which that epoch-making address was devoted, and the spirit and the stand-point are precisely the same. The one address, like the other, is a protest against the formalism and traditionalism of the old religion, and a call to come up to a higher spiritual life, a fresher, purer faith in the soul and God.

The venerable and beautiful traditions in which we were educated, says Emerson, in this latest utterance, are losing their hold on human belief, day by day. The old forms rattle. It is such a time as that when the Roman Church broke into Protestant and Catholic, or when Paganism broke into Christian and Pagan. The statements of Cudworth, More, and Bunyan, have grown as fabulous as Dante's Inferno. "We are in transition from the worship of the fathers, which enshrined the law in a private and personal history, to a worship which recognizes the true eternity of the law, its presence to you and me, its equal energy in what is called brute nature as in what is called sacred history. The next age will behold God in the ethical laws,—as mankind begins to see them in this age, self-equal, self-executing, instantaneous, and self-affirmed, needing no voucher, no prophet, and no miracle beside their own irresistibility,—and will regard natural history, private fortunes, and politics, not for themselves as we have done, but as illustrations of those laws, of that beatitude and love."

There has been much foolish talk of late, in certain quarters of the globe, about Emerson growing conservative in his old age and repudiating the philosophy of his strong manhood. "Concord is shaking hands with Andover,"—that was the form it took a year ago, the reductio ad absurdum. Concord has always been ready to shake hands with Andover, and has always seen all religions as honest struggles to express the same great truths which philosophy puts in their universality. The real change that has come about is in the growth, in the common religious world, of kindness and reverence for Emerson. The best and sufficient reply to all these wild insinuations about Emerson's recantations is this lecture on "The Preacher." If Orthodoxy dubs as conservatism the assertion of society's need of the Sabbath and of the preacher, the assertion that the life of Jesus marks an era in human history, that successive creeds and churches have answered real needs and exerted influences for good which almost dwarf the perversions and the superstitions which have followed in their train, that the soul which is without God in the world is in a frightful solitude,—if these truisms be now labelled conservatism, then, indeed, have standards changed, and the world has rolled far on in forty years. Conservative or not, these are the same truths which form the warp and woof of the Harvard Address of 1838, which frightened the Orthodoxy of that day, and the Unitarianism as well, like the crack of doom. These, too, are the same truths which have filled all Emerson's writings from first to last; and, to everybody who has eyes to see and a heart to understand, this is plain enough. To couple reaction with the name of Emerson is like calling Carlyle orthodox, because, forsooth, he has spoken of the beauty of the Lord's Prayer.

Mr. Mead, speaking at Providence the 6th inst., of Stopford Brooke's withdrawal from the English Church, as a great triumph of sincerity, said this additional word of Carlyle: "Our fittest theme to-day were he of whom our hearts are full as we come together, the great prophet of sincerity to our generation. For a great prophet has ceased to speak; and it is with solemn feelings that men must meet to-day, who have true and real things at heart. There has been in this century no prophet more truly inspired of God and none who has put more wholesome thought and energy into men than Thomas Carlyle. He stands with our own Emerson, these two above all others. His heart less full than Emerson's of sweetness and light, his philosophy not so many-sided, his conception of humanity less catholic, his expression certainly narrower, his hatred of unreality was, if possible, more intense, his denunciation of wickedness in high places more unsparing, his gospel of repentance more intense and passionate. Dislike his political theories as much as we may, and dislike his tropes and his terminology as we may, these are very little things in this great life, and by and by is time enough to say what need be said of them. What was bad in his politics carried its own antidote with it, and was the exaggeration of a principle which men are in much danger of forgetting in this day of professional philanthropy. What was false in his style was like the knots of monstrous muscles on the legs of Michel Angelo's prophets, the wantonnesses which revealed excess of power. Without these things there were no Michel Angelo and no Carlyle. But remember we to-day only the great Elijah, the great John Baptist, who came into an age of sham and scepticism, of Pharisaism and Sadducism, of Ahapism and Baal worship, of mean utilitarianism and all little things, and launched into the midst of it from the great heart that stirred within him the thunderbolts of wrath and stern rebuke, awakening men to wholesome discontent and holy hatred of their empty lives, and to the knowledge that Eternity and God are more than empty names."

The tenth and last of the Monday lectures was given by Rev. John Cotton Smith, D.D., of New York. Subject, "The Theistic Basis of Evolution."

In a general but thoroughly sympathetic way, Dr. Smith stated the theory of evolution, and then argued that, as between those who advocated a continuous evolution running back through all past time and including "every minutest change that has taken place in the phenomenal universe," and those who hold that there has been a partial evolution interrupted here and there by an immediate creative act of God to impart to phenomena something which did not before exist, the theory of continuous and universal evolution is a "very great" gain for theism over the old theory of special creation. He says:—

> There is something exceedingly crude in the hypothesis of an interrupted process of development, as if God needed to display himself by arresting the orderly sequence of phenomena, and beginning, as it were, anew, or as if God were remedying defects which he had discovered in his method, and were starting once more with the benefit of acquired experience. . . . The point which we have thus far reached seems then to be this, that the hypothesis of a universal and all-comprehending process of evolution is a gain for theism, if it can be established. It brings the agency of God in nature into harmony with all the higher conceptions to which the best philosophy has given rise. It removes the embarrassments which are sure to attend any effort to make an act of special and immediate creation cognizable by the mind, and it invests the whole relation of God to the phenomenal universe with new dignity and grandeur. It has been claimed by some of the disciples of positive science that the enlarged knowledge of nature which each generation gains is gradually displacing the idea of any personal agency in the world of nature. Let me tell you what it is really doing. It is displacing what I call untheistic conceptions of nature, which substituted the agency of inferior supernatural powers in the place of the agency of God. Under its influence, the "fair humanities," as Coleridge calls them, of the old religion, have vanished. The supernatural beings in forests, in valleys, by the sides of streams, the fairies of mediæval superstition, the great angels of the spheres of whom Kepler dreamed, are known no more. What has come in their place? Are we surrounded by a mere unideal phenomenal universe, which has grown out of no thought, no all-comprehending plan? No, a thousand times no! For if there is this universal, all-comprehending law of evolution, then there is a stupendous plan of the universe, and the great power which sways the world touches nature at every moment of time and at every point in space. The progress of science is banishing the false supernatural, but only that "God may to us be all in all."
> It is something then to be hailed with joy, if it shall be found that science has made this contribution to a more rational conception of the universe in which a nobler theism is necessarily involved. We are not disposed to sit down quietly under the verdict that it is still unproven. We rejoice to be moved forward by the impulse of a grand anticipation, and we yield ourselves to the enthusiasm which forecasts this great vindication of the highest rational relation of God to nature and man.

This is so clearly, so unequivocally, an acceptance and avowal of the modern doctrine of evolution that I take delight in giving the lecturer's own language at length. He supports himself as an evolutionist by Messrs. John Fiske, Asa Gray, Charles Darwin, and Prof. Marsh, and is even so enthusiastic as to speak of "Mr. Darwin's marvellously complete and exhaustive consideration of the subject of the Descent of Man." He considers it as certain that in time evolution will be regarded as a universal law, and thinks that all objections to it, if examined, will only tend to establish the law more firmly.

But, while he makes this vast concession to the triumph of modern thought, he evidently wants it to be understood that his Orthodoxy is simon-pure. He accepts evolution because it seems to him more reasonable to suppose that God would start phenomena in the "beginning of time," with every subsequent change potentially impressed upon the original mass, than that he would stop things occasionally to make improvements. He admits continuous, universal evolution, and then claims that it proves the existence and character of God more satisfactorily than the theological theory of the universe can possibly do it. (Soon we will have "eminent divines" claiming, not only that evolution is the only true doctrine of the universe, but that Christianity discovered and developed the philosophy.) He uses Spencer's phrases, "Unknown Cause" and "The Unknowable" as conclusive evidence that he (Dr. Smith) is not only correct in his reasoning, but that even men who attempt a philosophy of atheism are compelled to admit an "Unknown Cause," which he interprets as the God whom he and his Christian brethren worship, and whose "will" is done up for general use, or disuse, rather, in the Bible.

Dr. Smith is a very liberal man, undoubtedly. But, with all due respect, he is not a very brave man. One who can see and understand the theory of evolution as clearly as he does ought not to stop where he does. It is hard to avoid the suspicion that his intellectual timidity is due to his dread of the avalanche of Christian hatred and persecution that would be shaken down upon him, were he to follow "evolution" to its logical conclusion. His position that there is just as much "creation" involved in a continuous evolution "from the beginning of time" as in a special act of creation at every point of time and in every differentiation is only a subterfuge to hide the logic of evolution and quiet the fears of the faithful, as it seems to me. The doctrine of evolution will not for a moment admit of any such conclusion. It recognizes no "beginning" of time, and cannot. Either the sum of the material universe has always existed, or it has been created. On the hypothesis that existence has been endless, evolution is the true philosophy of the universe On the hypothesis that there was a time when there was nothing but nothing, not even God, for there would have been neither time nor space in which he might exist, the long prevalent theological theory of "creation" was a very fair guess in the dark. If Dr. Smith has honestly expressed his mind in this lecture, he has discarded the theological theory and accepted that of evolution; and therefore he is logically, and in consequence morally, bound to go further. He is misrepresenting Mr. Spencer, and such men as he, when he attempts to make them admit the personality and character of God. As it is impossible to reach the end of an endless line, so is it impossible to know all of an endless past or future. In this sense, then, must ever remain the unknown and unknowable. They may and must grow less and less in the equally endless development of knowledge that is before humanity as its manifest destiny; but, as the infinite can never be measured, so can it never be comprehended. But just so long will it be necessary for honest philosophers to admit that behind or in and through all there exists a power that escapes them and defies a "last analysis"; and that "Unknown" the whole world should be at liberty to call "God" or not, as it chooses. Dr. Smith creates for his own exercise an antagonistic, agnostic, atheistic bedtick or "man of straw," and then dusts and demolishes the thing to the delight of his orthodox hearers. But that is child's play, and unworthy of a staid "divine." He knows that agnosticism is not atheism. He knows that Spencer and Darwin are not atheists. He knows that the arguments for atheism do not necessarily enter into the elucidation of the sublime doctrine of evolution at all. The true agnostic is one who says: "I do not know, and do not believe that I can know God"; but he does not say, "There is no God!" That kind of talk is the counterpart of the orthodox bigotry that says, "I know all about God; and you'll be damned, if you don't believe as I tell you!" Both positions are illogical and wrong. The only honest, modest, true, and tenable ground is that of the man who admits, as the evolutionist does, that there is a persistent force, a permanent reality, an inscrutable mystery, an unknown and unknowable power behind or in phenomena that we cannot comprehend, and there leaves it, and waits and works patiently and in trust for more light and vaster knowledge. Starting from that point, men and women may clothe that unknown with all the attributes possible to their imagination, and call it "God" and worship it. To the mind that is devout, reverential, religious, that feels the glow of spiritual inspiration, that power becomes the Universal Soul, filling not only all time and space, but also all things in time and space. Thus the whole universe becomes the body and being of the infinite God, and we each and all rise to kinship in the eternal and immortal

CONSCIOUSNESS AND PHILOSOPHY.

I observe that great use is made of consciousness as a source or instrument of knowledge, particularly supersensible knowledge which transcends experience and all ordinary and rational verification. My good grandmother knows, from her feeling, that her conversion to religion forty years ago is infallibly correct. Rev. M. J. Savage knows, because he feels, loves, hopes, aspires, not simply that feeling, loving, hoping, and aspiring exist, but that outside of all material forms there is eternal, infinite, omnipotent life; that we are bound to suppose personal life apart from human life. That we perceive and feel, or experience the operations of power in motion in connection with matter and organic life, is unquestionably true; but how does consciousness go outside of personal experience, and teach that which does not and cannot come of experience?

It is claimed, for example, that consciousness "is the root of all certainty or knowledge"; that the phenomenalist maxim to put nothing (mentally) in the universe beyond what we find there is demonstrated by Berkeleian idealism to be untenable. And, of course, from this view it follows that nothing can be proved to exist in itself or objectively, but only that we think of them as existing. The phenomenalist point of view—to wit, that what we find out by research is fact, and conformity with this the test of truth—is discarded by the idealist, he claiming that the order of things is not existence first, and human knowledge derived or correlated, but consciousness of self first, "involving or implying the existence of what is known." But the idealist is driven to admit that what exists is prior to and independent of the knowing subject. "The knowableness of things," he says, "is a part, and the most important part, of their reality or essential being." He allows that we know things because there are things to be known, which are knowable. Is not the idealist position inconsistent with itself? What is there so talismanic or supernatural in consciousness as to enable it to go back of and beyond logical, scientific demonstration, as the writer whom I have quoted asserts we must do? Is not this going beyond the realm of modest science, and asserting dogmatically what the non-ego is and is not, both illogical and vicious in philosophy? I hope to hear more from our old friend, the former editor of the Index.

BLASPHEMY IN DELAWARE.

It is notorious that the whipping-post still survives in the sovereign but small State of Delaware. Remembering the fact, we are not surprised at reading the following item of news in the daily press. Chief Justice Comegys, in charging the grand jury at Wilmington, Del., recently, called their attention to the address of Colonel Ingersoll in that city, saying it was blasphemous, and was worthy of the attention of the jury as coming under the law of blasphemy. It is well-known that the Turks are enthusiastic theists, and prompt at their prayers. While they honor God, they are ready, upon the slightest provocation, to outrage humanity in the most ruffianly manner. The famous Tartar, Tamerlane, who slaughtered the entire population of Damascus, and made a pyramid of the skulls of his victims, was a pious theist, and devout and prayerful according to the tenets of his faith. The Spanish inquisitors were pious men, and ready to torture to death anybody accused of blasphemy. The planter class of our Southern States were always believers in doctrinal Christianity and rigidly orthodox, although they were always ready to apply Lynch law to defenceless strangers from the North who were suspected of abolitionism. Ruffianism and Orthodoxy have always gone hand in hand in the South. The ruffianly class of our great Northern cities were all signed with the sign of the cross soon after birth, and thus made children of Mother Church. This fact, however, did not prevent an immense fraction of them becoming burglars, highwaymen, drunkards, fraudulent voters, shoulder-hitters, and constant occupants of prison-cells. The mass of the believers in certain forms of Christianity are, as a rule, apt to be unsavory in their persons as well as unreliable so far as morality is concerned. Their religion is a mere ritual, a magic rite, which miraculously wipes out the score of their peccadillos and crimes by what is called priestly absolution, which operates as a bounty on crime at the same time that it fills the purse of the priest. This is a fact which sooner or later will attract the attention of legislators. A class who levy an immense revenue on offenders through a pretended power of granting to them absolution and pardon undoubtedly encourage crime and a lax morality. But I am straying from the subject of "blasphemy," which is such a serious offence in pious Delaware. The wonder is that there is not an ecclesiastical court flourishing in that minute commonwealth. Blasphemy is an ecclesiastical rather than a civil offence. A judicial mossback like Judge Comegys would undoubtedly do his best to vindicate Orthodoxy against Colonel Ingersoll. But, after all, an inquisitorial tribunal would seem to be the sort of institution to vindicate the outraged civilization of Delaware against such an offender.

A VISIT TO GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

It was with pleasure that in taking up my most welcome weekly visitor, the Index of February 3, I noticed the signature of George Jacob Holyoake. You may be assured I read his article on "English Affairs" with interest. To my mind there are but few men who have devoted their lives more earnestly to the interest of humanity than Mr. Holyoake. With much the same feeling as that expressed by the Rev. M. J. Savage relative to a recent interview with Herbert Spencer, which he counted his happiest experience in London, I recall a similar interview with this champion of Coöperation.

It came about in this wise. I had become interested in the man through his earlier contributions to the Index, of which I have been a careful reader since its first issue in 1870. While spending a few days in London during the summer of 1877, I determined to seek him out. I had previously called upon Mr. and Mrs. M. D. Conway at their pleasant home on the Surry side of the Thames, in a fine old mansion designated as "Hamlet House," built, as Mr. Conway informed me, "before the American Republic was born." Mr. Conway kindly gave me directions for finding Mr. Holyoake, whose apartments were at No. 22 Essex Street.

This, as I found, was quite near to where I had taken rooms (No. 15 Norfolk Street) during my stay in the city.

Taking my little boy of six years by the hand, we walked, late one afternoon, to the place designated, and were happy to find Mr. Holyoake at home. We were shown at once to his room by an attendant, where, surrounded on all sides by books and papers, we found the now distinguished secular writer engaged at the time in eating his simple evening repast. He gave us a most hearty reception, and entered at once into earnest conversation on American affairs, in which he had always taken great interest. General Grant, who was at the time in London, he thought had brought Republicanism into disrepute by sustaining the "Carpet-Bag" system at the South. Wendell Phillips, to whom he had dedicated one of his books, he counted among his warm friends. F. E. Abbot was also mentioned. In speaking of the two political parties in England, he expressed himself as fully in sympathy with the Liberals.

Gladstone was his favorite man. "Thanks to him," he said, "England would not shed one drop of blood over the Eastern question." In reply to my queries regarding his religious views, he expressed himself as inclined to deal mainly with material things, making the best possible use of time and opportunities. He would make no quarrel with those who chose to give themselves to spirituality. He also referred to the then recent event, the death of Miss Harriet Martineau, and gave me some interesting facts regarding her life. The half-hour or more spent with him I count as one of my most happy experiences.

Before taking leave, he called the attention of my son, who had been a quiet listener, to the grand view of the river at a point between Blackfriars and Waterloo Bridges, which was to be had from one window in his apartments. He actually lifted the little fellow in his arms to point out the different objects of interest, and among other things took from a closet near at hand a simple apparatus to be used in case of necessity as a fire-escape. This consisted of a chain made of steel rings, six or eight inches in diameter, one end of which being made fast to some object in the building, the other reaching to the ground, formed an easy and safe means of descent. Thus was shown on the part of this man of letters a readiness to apply himself to the work of pleasing and instructing the young. Another item of interest which I gathered during the interview was the fact that the famous Dr. Johnson had his club-room in the same block, at what is now No. 13 Essex Street. In conclusion, allow me to express the hope that the readers of the Index may often be favored with contributions from the pen of Mr. Holyoake, and that he may long be spared to enjoy the fruits of his labor.

THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF SPIRITUALISM. By Epes Sargent. Boston: Colby & Rich. 1881. Price $1.50.

TRANSCENDENTAL PHYSICS. An Account of Experimental Investigations from the Scientific Treatises of Johann Carl Friedrich Zöllner, translated by Charles Carleton Massey, of Lincoln's Inn, London. Boston: Colby & Rich. 1881. Price $1.50.

These are two of the very best defences of Spiritualism which have ever been given to the public. They are widely different, and yet they well supplement each other.

Epes Sargent was a literary worker of long experience and skill. He was a master of the art of putting things according to the prevailing newspaper methods, a zealous pleader; and he has made a readable book. It is strongly partisan, full of sectarian prejudice; for he could not see clearly outside of the limits of Spiritualism. He quotes everybody who furnishes a single word in favor of Spiritualism, and he attacks everybody who says a word against it. On the whole, however, it is the calmest, best tempered, and fairest statement of the claims of Spiritualism we remember ever to have read. We doubt if it convinces a single person opposed to the belief in spirit communications, but any one wishing to know the claims made for Spiritualism by its best advocates cannot do better than read this book.

Zöllner's book has interested us much. The experiments made by this Leipzig professor of astronomy, with the aid of Slade, and three or four of his fellow-professors, are certainly very remarkable. In whatever manner they may be viewed, they are of a character to attract attention. Apparently, the utmost pains were taken to guard against deception by a company of well-trained physical investigators, and their conclusion was one of strong faith in Spiritualism. Zöllner's attempt to account for these strange phenomena by the theory of a fourth dimension of space, which he supposes the spirits to make use of, neither adds to nor detracts from his experiments. The most remarkable of these experiments was the passage of one substance through another, as when two wooden rings were put on the standard of a small stand in a few moments' time. To the present writer, these strange things are neither matters of importance nor a proof of Spiritualism. If it is proven they take place without the conscious effort of those present, it does not by any means follow that they are the work of spirits. The writers of both these books are far too credulous. On the other hand, the objection offered by certain scientific writers, that Spiritualism overthrows the order of natural laws, we think to be puerile and worthless. If all Zöllner's experiments were genuine, not the result of trickery, we cannot see that they are at all opposed to the laws of nature. This were to suppose all the laws of nature perfectly well known in every possible form, the assumption of which knowledge is an evident piece of scientific dogmatism unworthy of any true investigator.

The present writer does not think any amount of physical evidence sufficient to establish the claim of Spiritualism. Astounding as were the manifestations of power had by Zöllner in his experiments, they ought not to convince us, if we were absolutely certain there was no trickery about them. The only evidence worthy of genuine attention must be intellectual or moral; and here it is that Spiritualism is almost totally wanting. It has not produced even a sentence above mediocrity claiming to come from spirits. The written communications received by Zöllner were of the most ordinary character. The assertion in these books, that we would not accept truths above our own present level of thought, does not at all cover this objection; for none of their pretended communications reach nearly to the height of the best literary and scientific thought of to-day. Intellectually, it is far better to depend on one's own brain than on the spirits. These and the many other objections we might offer to Spiritualism need not be dwelt upon here. Our day demands evidence, and Spiritualism must present satisfactory proofs, or we cannot accept it. As well as these books present their case, coming as they do from able men, they do not convince us, and simply because the evidence is not sufficient. If we are to believe one faith, we prefer the old-fashioned way; but when evidence is to be offered that commonsense, reason, and science can take hold of, we have a right to demand that it shall be entirely satisfactory. We are not inclined to think Zöllner was deceived by trickery, but we do claim the evidence is not sufficient to prove those remarkable things were done by spirits.

GLEANINGS IN THE FIELDS OF ART (Lee & Shepard, Boston,) is the suggestive title of a collection of essays by Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, of an æsthetic, historical, biographical, and critical character. One has but to read a simple chapter in this book,—say the first one, which deals with art in the abstract,—to discover that its author is a thinker, and one who, not from distrust in her own powers, but with the manifest desire to arrive at the truth, has read and studied the writings of other thinkers. The spirit which breathes from every page is in strong contrast to that which has always appeared to animate Ruskin. He is nothing, if not pugnacious, and is never happier than when decrying his opponents or those with whom he is not in sympathy. Mrs. Cheney, on the other hand, quotes from those with whose opinions she does not agree, but always in a manner which shows respect, if not deference, for their judgment or views. A tolerant feeling is also perceptible in the expression of her individual opinions. By no means wanting in positiveness, her conclusions are reached by logical processes, and her likes and dislikes are accounted for by theories which are notable for their consistency and perspicuity. We do not hesitate to say that some of these opinions are not shared by ourselves. We are inclined to believe, for instance, that the finical French art has had a practical value. The attention to details, especially in textures, though carried to ridiculous extremes, has had the effect to invite attention to the importance of accurate expression. In other words, one wants to know, when looking at a representation of an object, to which kingdom it belongs. Is it a rock, or a cow, or a tree, or what is it? These queries we have had to answer or ask when before pictures by artists, who have been called masters, numberless times. Now, although the puzzle to be solved relates to a mere accessory, without which the picture might perhaps be quite as interesting, the question comes up, Why not make it so plain that no one stops to inquire? In other words, may not all details be at once faithfully and unobtrusively portrayed? Mrs. Cheney, in fact, admits the necessity of truthfulness. But the point which we wish to make is that the extravagant vagaries of the pre-Raphaelite and realistic painters have made it apparent to artists, amateurs, and connoisseurs,—or to some of them, at least,—that art and nature may amicably labor in the same field in the cultivation of suggestion and expression. Mrs. Cheney's book may be profitably read by all art students, whichever way their inclinations may lead them. The extent and variety of the topics discussed will be best learned from the table of contents, which is as follows: "Art," "Greek Art," "Early Christian Art," "Byzantine Art," "Restoration of Art in Italy," "Michel Angelo," "The Poems of Michel Angelo," "Spanish Art," "French Art," "Albert Dürer," "Old German Art," "American Art," "English Art," "David Scott," "Contemporaneous Art."

EMINENT ENGLISH LIBERALS. Davidson. Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co.

This is a collection of sketches of eminent English Radicals, in and out of Parliament, originally contributed to the London Weekly Despatch. Their chief merit, to use the author's own words, consists in this, that they have not been written to order, but express, as nearly as possible, the sentiments of the writer regarding twenty-four representative Radicals, with most of whom he is personally acquainted. We may add that the writer himself shows a clear head and a keen appreciation of the work he has undertaken. The chapters on Gladstone, Bright, Fawcett, Chamberlain, and Bradlaugh in Parliament, and on Morley, Arch, Spurgeon, Conway, and Freeman out of Parliament, will prove to be especially interesting to American readers, and any one of them once read will ensure the reading of all the rest.

In general, too much cannot be said in commendation of such a collection of easily read notices of public men about whom all intelligent people ought to know something, but will know next to nothing, unless the requisite knowledge is presented in just this way. Within the means of those not blessed with much of this world's goods, this little book should be upon the centre-table in every home, where it can be taken up in odd moments, and serve to make familiar to young and old the men whose lives are to shape in no small degree the future of England and the world.

THE Modern Review for January, 1881.—Mr. J. Estlin Carpenter's name is ample proof that any article to which it is attached is carefully and wisely written. In the present instance is the "Prophecies of Isaiah." Graecia Redivia, by E. M. Geldart, is an exceedingly cheerful presentation of the possibilities of modern Greece. Mr. George Henslow is a man of many titular appendages, but he does not write on "Final Causes" with any methodical skill or decent apprehensiveness. Herbert New writes of John Milton in an interesting manner. Rev. J. Page Hopps asks with some indignation, "What would the Atheists have?" but his answer to this question is not in any way remarkable. "Facts and Fancies about Faust," by H. Schütz Wilson, is one of many articles that carry over into modern literature those idealizing tendencies which have made the Hebrew and early Christian Scriptures appear so different from what they really are. J. Allanson Picton writes of the "Eclectic Use of the Gospel Narratives," arguing, successfully, it seems to us, that the best in the gospel narratives is most nearly related to the real Jesus. There is a symposium on church subscription, in which Messrs. Crosskey, Voysey, and Sarson take part. Mr. Sarson's plea for subscription is dreadfully immoral. Said Thomas Carlyle, "What is incredible to thee thou shalt not at thy soul's peril attempt to believe." Say "pretend," and it would be every whit as true. A number of admirable book-notices written by various hands are appended to the longer articles.

IN the International Review for February, John T. Morse, Jr., has a very good account of John Quincy Adams. There is a sharp criticism of Froude's defence of Henry VIII., Zola's theories about novel-writing are presented by T. S. Perry, while there is a fair biography of Hans Andersen. A very good article is that by J. M. Hubbard on fiction in the public libraries, taking just and strong grounds against it. There is a very thin review of Tennyson's new volume, and discussions of the tariff question and our mercantile marine.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

ANNA DICKINSON, it is said, will soon reappear upon the stage.

PROFESSOR DARWIN, though past seventy and confined to his bed, continues to prosecute his researches. He is said to be an inveterate reader.

MISS IDA LEWIS rescued two men from drowning off Newport Harbor lately. Seventeen lives have been saved by the heroine of Lime Rock light.

MR. KONG KI CHIN, an educational commissioner at Hartford, has written a book of some nine hundred pages, comparing English and Chinese idioms, and it is shortly to be published.

MR. F. M. HOLLAND has written a little book, which will have a special interest to the admirers of Robert Browning, and which G. P. Putnam's Sons are to publish. It is a study of Browning's Sordello.

HARRIET HOSMER has given up art altogether, and is living in London, trying to solve the problem of perpetual motion. A New England school education, one would have supposed, ought to have been sufficient to save her from such folly.

GAMBETTA, the other day, in addressing the university students in Paris, declared Auguste Comte the greatest thinker of the age, and went on to congratulate his hearers on having abandoned the spiritual view of things for positive science.

REV. JAMES M. LUDDEN, of Saint John's Catholic Church, at Utica, N.Y., has created a sensation by refusing to administer the last sacraments to the dying Charles Brennan, because Brennan's father refused to hire a pew in Saint John's Church.

REV. CHARLES VOYSEY announces that the sum of £2,200 has been subscribed toward the Building Fund of the Theistic Church which his society is to have in London. This is a tenth part of what will be required. £1,000 pounds have been subscribed within a short period, and the society is encouraged that its appeal will be successful.

"MONCURE D. CONWAY," says the Commonwealth, "was one of the few Americans who were in close intimacy with Carlyle. They were for several years in the habit of walking together twice a week. After their walks, Mr. Conway would carefully write down Carlyle's conversation; and these notes will soon be published in book form."

WALTER PAINE, the Fall River manufacturer and defaulter, is reported to be living at present in Montreal, where he has succeeded in raising stock to the amount of $100,000 for a new mill, which is to be built forthwith. It is also stated that Mr. Paine has made application for admission into one of the Baptist churches of that city, and has related his experience of Christian life. It is evident that our Canadian brethren must give Mr. Paine the credit of possessing the American faculty known as "push."

ACCORDING to the quotation below from a private letter of Rev. Phillips Brooks, he is very much less of a rationalist than Mr. Conway in writing of him lately represented. "To me," says Mr. Brooks, "the incarnation and the miracles which Christ Jesus is said to have wrought seem to be sublimely reasonable, and contradicted by no knowledge of man or of the world which God has given us. I believe that they are true historically and most natural philosophically." That, it would seem, should put to rest all questions as to Mr. Brooks upon this point.

REV. W. H. MILBURN, the celebrated blind preacher, gave a lecture at the Lowell Institute last Friday evening on "Recollections of Carlyle." Carlyle appears to have been very hospitable to visitors, especially to those from America. It is quite probable what each got from him depended much upon what he brought. Mr. Milburn does not seem to have received very much else in his interviews than a small modicum of shrewd and quaint discourse in an almost absorbing amount of inveterate and old-fashioned Scotch Presbyterianism. Perhaps this is a faithful representation of what any one would have got from the great master thinker. But it tends to make him shrink into a different personage than that of the ideal we have cherished.

MR. S. B. WESTON, who has been forced to sever his ministerial relation to the Unitarian society at Leicester on account of his Free Religious position, preached his farewell sermon Sunday, Feb. 13, to an overflowing congregation, including numerous representatives from the other churches of the village. The pulpit was beautifully decorated with flowers, which combined with other tokens upon the occasion to indicate the general regret in parting from one whose conscientious devotion to his work had been so well attested, and the cordial friendship which had subsisted between him and his society as well as the community. These feelings found farther expression in a social farewell of the friends of Mr. Weston in Leicester, on the following Tuesday evening, at which he was made the unexpected recipient of a handsome sum of money (in addition to the payment of his salary in full) and a warm testimonial letter of regard. The society, though not all agreeing with Mr. Weston's views, appear to be almost unanimous in favor of having him for their minister, if they were only able to support a preacher without the aid of the fund. There is one clause of Mr. Southgate's will in which he says that his "sole purpose" in leaving the fund is "to sustain, strengthen, and build up the society." Mr. Weston's brief ministry seems to have well met this condition, and if the referees had felt free to be guided by this clause of the will rather than by the theological condition, their decision might have been reversed. Mr. Weston addressed the Sunday "Lecture Association" at East Dennis, Mass., last Sunday.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 24, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in o her words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution :—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

WM. J. POTTER,
Sec'y F. R. Association.

OUR LECTURE BUREAU.

At last, the lecture work of the Free Religious Association, according to the plan stated in the above standing notice, seems to have been fairly inaugurated. It has taken some time to start it, and as yet it is of modest proportions. But the beginning that has been made is the entering wedge from which large results are possible, if the enterprise is only followed up with wise earnestness. There are three courses of lectures now in operation under the auspices of the Association,—at Revere and Malden and East Dennis, Massachusetts. Each of these courses consists of four lectures. The local interest in them, we learn, has increased as the courses have advanced; and possibly, in cases where the interest warrants, they may be continued beyond the four at first provided. The lecturers who have done and are doing this work, these being at first the most accessible as also well qualified for it, are Messrs. C. D. B. Mills, W. H. Spencer, F. A. Hinckley, L. K. Washburn, S. B. Weston, and Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, with one lecture by the Secretary of the Association. Other lecturers, as Mr. M. J. Savage, Colonel Higginson, and Prof. E. S. Morse, have signified their willingness to speak in these or similar courses, when free from the pressure of present engagements. And new courses will probably be opened in other places, when these are finished. Mr. C. D. B. Mills is also authorized, in connection with his own personal lecturing tours in the Middle and Western States, to give lectures on the terms of the Free Religious Association plan in places where he thinks some permanent result may be effected, but the people have not as yet the pecuniary means required for making a beginning.

Of course, one object of these lectures is the spread of liberal and rational ideas in religion; and the lecturers, even more of course, are left free to present their own individual thought in their own way, since it is one of the fundamental principles of the Free Religious Association that no speaker on its platforms anywhere speaks for any opinions but his own. But special effort has also been made to appoint the lectures in places where the soil is already in a measure prepared for the ideas, and a desire is manifest, or may easily become so, to put the ideas to local work in some form of organization. And this object, we trust, will not be lost sight of in the towns where these lectures are given. The plan is intended as in some sense a test of the capacity of the Liberalism which is outside of churches for self-organization for ends of moral and social benefit. Let those who come together for hearing these lectures put to themselves the question whether they cannot in some way, by some simple bond, which shall in no way bind their opinions or limit their inquiries, keep together for the moral and social improvement of the communities where they live. Let them ask themselves what are the things in their own neighborhood that most need to be done, in order not only that thought may be free, but that moral culture may be advanced, surrounding evils alleviated, and their towns made pleasanter, safer, and more healthful places of residence. If they are in the country, and can do nothing more, they can at least set out shade trees by the road-side, and start a simple system of village improvements. If they are in large towns or cities, and have the moral sensitiveness and earnestness that Liberalism should especially have, they can but find ways and means for combined beneficence as ample as the need.

"SWEET BELLS JANGLED OUT OF TUNE."

There is much concern apparent in respect to the consequences of what are called the sceptical and materialistic tendencies of our time. Christianity has been defined as, in its essential nature, "the enthusiasm of humanity"; and it is thought that the renunciation of its historic beliefs, now going on under the influence of scientific progress, forebodes the loss of high spiritual aims and the increase of personal selfishness. But the groundlessness of these apprehensions is shown in the fact that there never was a time when humanitarian effort and philanthropy were more varied in their forms nor more active than at present.

It is further observable that a considerable portion of those who are most distinguished for their zeal and sacrifices in these directions belong to the more radical wing of the Church, if they are not wholly outside its pale.

The growing interest in the insane which has of late been manifested is in the line of these reflections. It makes one shudder to read such accounts of the hospitals of less than a hundred years ago as that contained in Bailly's report of those in Paris in Arago's Biographies, of the indiscriminate way in which the sick and diseased were huddled together in these places, and the rude and inconsiderate mode of their general administration. And this applies also to the methods of dealing with the insane, even in the most civilized countries, up to comparatively recent time. The progress of science and enlightenment is infusing a finer humanity and devising a more intelligent system of regulation into the conduct of such institutions.

Insanity is no longer attributed to the possession of evil spirits, nor is it considered a sign of the judgment of heaven upon the afflicted one, as formerly, and not so very long ago, but as a pathological condition of mind which calls for the exercise of the most tender and benevolent sympathy, scientific and natural treatment.

A very important gathering of persons to consider the subject here referred to, in this spirit, was called on Saturday evening, February 12, at the residence of Mrs. Fenno Tudor, of this city. While it was freely conceded that there had been a great and very rapid improvement in the conduct of insane asylums, and particularly in New England, so that, under the existing system, the verdict of competent inspectors is, according to the statement of the Governor, that they seem to be almost faultless, it was maintained the present system itself needs important changes, inasmuch as gross abuses are possible under it, as is made evident to the public from time to time, and the whole subject demands more direct and intelligent consideration than it is accustomed to receive.

It was through the influence of such convictions as these, which have been gaining force, of late years, among those who have to deal with this class of cases, in the medical profession, and persons of thoughtful and philanthropic tendencies, that the National Association for the Protection of the Insane and the Prevention of Insanity was organized last summer, at Cleveland, Ohio.

The reception at Mrs. Tudor's was under the auspices of this Association, and designed to promote a local interest in its objects. The attendance included Governor Long, General N. P. Banks, Mr. Frank Sanborn, distinguished for his interest in social science; Robert Treat Paine, Jr., a prominent member of the Board of Associated Charities of this city; Dr. Nathan Allen, whose statistics and studies in relation to population, vitality, and special classes of disease have given him eminent reputation; Dr. Edward Cole, Superintendent of the McLean Insane Asylum, at Somerville, Mass.; and a number of persons of equal note in connection with asylums for the insane, or as physicians, with a considerable representation of ladies, among whom were Mrs. E. D. Cheney, Mrs. A. M. Diaz, and others associated with reform and practical benevolence.

The venerable Hon. Samuel E. Sewall presided over the meeting, which was opened by an address from General Banks, in which he alluded to the custom that formerly prevailed in New England of farming out, as it was called, the poor and the insane, and traced, in a general way, the development of the present system, advocating a better classification of the insane, and giving point to this plea by an illustration drawn from his own experience, showing the necessity for such separation and specific care. At the close of his remarks, General Banks read an appreciative and complimentary address to Governor Long, "for his far-sighted and progressive ideas concerning the care of the insane," expressed in his recent message, signed by the officers of the Association and some twenty-five ladies and gentlemen in different parts of the country. We quote here a portion of the address which appears to us too valuable, in respect to some of its points, to be omitted here:—

When your Excellency, speaking of institutions, says, "It must never be forgotten that the sole persons whose rights are in danger of being overlooked, or whose interests are the one ultimate consideration, are the inmates themselves," adding that "the one vital thing is inspection and full exposure to the public eye," you express truths that can only be questioned by our sensitive pride, or by self-interest at variance with humanity and public spirit. Your recommendation of a more intelligent classification of the insane, which shall separate the criminal and the epileptic insane from the ordinary forms of insanity, and place the recent insane in proper hospitals for active treatment, and the chronic harmless insane under more homelike and economical surroundings, and four other suggestions concerning needless restraint, a modification in the form of buildings, and varied measures for the varying classes of the insane, must commend themselves to the good judgment of every enlightened citizen.

Governor Long followed, and responded with modest grace to the compliment thus paid him, briefly reiterating and emphasizing the views which he had advanced, and that had met with so much favor. A letter was read by Mr. Sanborn from Dr. H. B. Wilbur, Superintendent of the State Asylum for Idiots, Syracuse, N.Y., the president of the Association, in which he stated that there are sixty thousand insane persons in the United States, and that ninety per cent. are incurable, and that there are probably as large a number supported at the public charge. The ratio of the insane to the general population is constantly increasing. Dr. Wilbur enumerates, among the causes of insanity, the crowded population of great cities, the weakening of family ties (so that the dependent are often shaken off as a burden, who might be cared for at home), and the greater tendency to nervous diseases incident to our civilization. Insanity depends upon predisposing rather than exciting causes.

A letter from Dr. Joseph Parish, an eminent authority in Philadelphia, read by Dr. Fisher of South Boston, recommended the establishment of intermediate asylums for those in the incipient stages of insanity, it being held by him that the person affected may, under such circumstances, often be restored. Dr. Nathan Allen believed that in the effort for such restoration it was necessary, first of all, to seek the cause of the malady. He thought ill-health was one of the most fruitful causes of insanity. Intemperance is another, as well as one of the most difficult ones to deal with. There should be hospitals for those who are rendered insane through intemperance. In a letter from Dr. A. Reynolds, Superintendent of the Iowa Insane Asylum, the position was taken that the marriage of all who have been at any time insane, epileptic, or inebriate, should be prohibited by law. Dr. J. M. Kenniston, of Cambridgeport, thought that, in addition to the causes of insanity already referred to, should be named among the more prolific the reading of flashy literature and Spiritualism. His investigations had led him to the conclusion that those associated with Spiritualism were very largely persons under the influence of nervous affections. Other interesting and important papers and remarks were offered by Dr. Walter Channing of this city, Dr. Fisher of the Insane Asylum of South Boston, Dr. Hiram Corson of the Pennsylvania State Insane Asylum, Dr. Hall of Wisconsin, Dr. M. D. Gundy of Maryland, Dr. Temens of Michigan, Dr. Shaw of New York, and others.

But we have already considerably overrun the space intended when we sat down to this article, and can only add, in our hurry to get it to the printers at a late moment, that our own interest in the occasion we have thus cursorily reported, as well as the importance of the subject, must serve for our excuse, if it be needed. COLONEL INGERSOLL AND THE SECULAR ASSOCIATION.

A paragraph in the Index of February 17 seems to call for a brief statement.

If I have been rightly informed, Colonel Ingersoll proposed and inaugurated the movement which led to the formation of the Provisional Secular Association. His name headed the call for the Conference held in the parlors of the Grand Pacific Hotel, Chicago, Nov. 15, 1880. In October, I received from Mr. H. L. Green letters asking me to co perate with Colonel Ingersoll and others, and assuring me that the Colonel, although unable to do much for the movement before the election, would give it his special attention and aid after that event. His presence at the Conference was confidently expected by all who attended. Mr. Chainey, who had recently come from Washington where he had talked with Mr. Ingersoll, received from him the assurance (so he informed me) that he would meet him at the Conference; and he expressed surprise and disappointment at his absence. But it seems Mr. Ingersoll had decided—just when I cannot state, but evidently some time after the Presidential election—not to attend the Conference and not to have anything to do with the movement. If I mistake not, Mr. Green told me at the Conference that he had a private letter from the Colonel, stating that he would not serve as president of the organization to be formed. This was an indication to me that the association could not rely upon help from him, and I questioned the wisdom of adding his name to the finance committee; but others thought he would not object to serving in that capacity, and he was made chairman of that committee.

His course seems not to have been influenced by anything that the Conference did or did not do. The reason of his withdrawal, quoted in the Index,—"a desire to be untrammelled by organizations and to stand alone, his experience with a previous organization not having been satisfactory,"—must have occurred to him before he headed the call for a conference. He probably had other reasons for withdrawing from a movement he had started,—reasons he may not care to give, and any inquiry into which he might regard as an impertinence.

Colonel Ingersoll's prominence naturally makes very desirable his support of a recently organized movement, with the inception of which his name was publicly identified; but something has been accomplished, and yet more may be, without his assistance and in spite of his desertion. It is a profound satisfaction to believe, as I do, that whatever course individuals, influenced by personal considerations, may see fit to pursue, or whatever becomes even of organizations formed from time to time by self-sacrificing, hopeful men and women to advance this reform, it is now so strong and gaining so rapidly in strength and public favor that its triumph is assured. I will add, however, that the interest which has been manifested in the proceedings of the sixty persons who met in a hotel parlor in Chicago, and the stimulus given by that meeting to the discussion of State secularization in the influential journals of the country, are quite sufficient to justify the Committee on Correspondence and Organization in issuing, at no very distant date, a call for another convention, with a view to a permanent and a larger and more effective organization. B. F. U.

[We are glad to have Mr. Underwood's statement. Our paragraph, however, had no reference to the Committee on Correspondence appointed by the Chicago Conference, but to the Committee who sent out the circulars calling that Conference.—Ed.]

An explanation is due to our readers for our failure to keep the promise that we would print one of Mr. Adler's lectures each month during the season of their delivery. We have done all that was possible on our part to make the promise good, and therefore wish to state on behalf of Mr. Adler, as well as ourselves, that circumstances unforeseen when he assented to the promise have absolutely prevented him, on his part, from strictly adhering to it. His peculiar method of preparing his lectures,—only writing them out in part beforehand, and then, though having the matter carefully laid out in his thought, speaking wholly without a manuscript, and, even if a stenographic report be taken as he speaks, not permitting it to go to the printer without his own elaborate revision,—this makes the labor of getting a lecture ready for the press almost as much as the writing of it out in the first place would be. And during these last months Mr. Adler has not been in a condition to assume any additional labor. The continued and at times critical illness of his wife, and the increasing cares brought upon him by the manifold demands of his society, have used up his strength to the very verge of endurance. Our readers, therefore, who by the few lectures of his we have printed have had their appetite whetted for more, must exercise patience, and beyond all things hope that he will not push his powers to so severe a strain as to snap irreparably the sinews of health. We trust that next week we may be able to give his lecture of last Sunday, though we do not dare absolutely to promise it. It was to be on the topic,—"The Eternal Principle of Morality, and its Various Transformations through the Ages,"—the first of a series on the Foundations of Morality. Nothing would please us more than to give to the public through our columns this whole timely discussion by him of such a theme; but we can only hold out a hope for some of the series.

LITTLE DELAWARE, as we have already announced, has gone to the rescue of Omnipotence against Colonel Ingersoll's attacks. This is what Judge Comegys said to the grand jury: "This city, not long ago, was used as a theatre for the promulgation of sentiments at war with the religion of the Bible. Blasphemous language was used, near where we are assembled, by an audacious disciple of the defamers of revealed religion, for the purpose of exposing its doctrine to contempt and ridicule; and, to what some consider the reproach of the people of this city, no man stepped forward to call him to account for his defiance of the law of the State. I say to you that the law of this State is against the insulting of God by reproachful or derogatory language or expressions, and exciting the passions of the people by treating their religion with contempt. . . . We respect free speech, and shall protect it when the public peace shall not be disturbed by it, or is not in danger of being so; but we shall not consent to allow the privilege to be used, if we can help it, to the dishonor of the God of Jew and Gentile, Hebrew and Christian, in whose existence and omnipotence the people of this State believe, and whom they fear and also trust, or in the revilement or reproach of Christ, or the disparagement of the religion he taught."

OUR contributor, F. M. H., writes: "Those who wish to understand Emerson's views of philosophy would do well to study Schelling's system, which is fully described by Lewes, Bowen, Schwegler, the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, etc., and which exerted great influence over Cousin and Coleridge."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

HAVING occasion not long since to consult Gray's School and Field Book of Botany, we were considerably surprised at coming across the following paragraph in the "Lesson" on "Species and Kinds": "All the descendants from the same stock therefore compose one species. And it was from our observing that the several sorts of plants or animals steadily reproduce themselves . . . that the idea of species originated. So we are led to conclude that the Creator established a definite number of species at the beginning, which have continued by propagation, each after its kind." Now, we have no hesitation whatever in saying that Professor Gray does not believe this passage as it stands. It contains a remnant of his old views, held in common with many naturalists before the principle of natural selection was established on its present basis. And we call attention to this paragraph: first, as an example of the gross carelessness with which some of our most honored men will allow their names to remain appended to the expression of beliefs which they have ceased to hold; and, second, as an illustration of the method by which children's minds are perverted by the theology which is unnecessarily injected into the text-books of our public schools. Gray's botanies are deservedly standard works; but neither Professor Gray nor his publishers, Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., do themselves any credit in thus propagating false views for a purpose which we can only conjecture to be the saving of the expense of a new stereotype plate. The book we quote from was printed in 1877, eighteen years after the publication of the Origin of Species.

SCIENCE is certainly doing a great deal for the salvation of men's bodies, however little concern it may seem to have for their souls. It has lately taken hold of the long notorious fogs of London, which are known to occasion or to greatly aggravate various forms of disease, the death rate always rising rapidly during their continuance. Coal gas, which has been without doubt one of the most efficient causes of their mischief, may now be practically dispensed with. Mr. W. D. Scott Moncrief proposes a plan, which is in brief this: That the gas companies, instead of taking, as now, ten thousand cubic feet of gas from each ton of coal, take only one-third of this amount, passing three times the amount of coal through the retort. The results would be that the community would have twenty-four-candle gas instead of sixteen-candle gas: the gas companies would have double their present quantity of by-products, —tar and ammoniacal liquids,—and would have for sale also a fuel making a cheerful and smokeless fire, and giving out twenty per cent. more heat than common coal. The comments upon this scheme have been numerous and favorable; and Mr. Moncrief has since announced its practical success as tried by one of the gas companies. In the same line of improvement, Dr. Siemens, whose name is well known, has invented a grate for the smokeless consumption of gas and coke. This is also a practical success, and many persons are now exulting in the prospect of a "smokeless London."

A "SMOKELESS LONDON" may be within the limits of the possible; but, since Mr. Moncrief's plan was first proposed, a discovery has been made, which seems to leave but little hope of a fogless London. The discovery is so remarkable that Nature, contrary to custom, calls the special attention of its readers to it, as recorded in a paper recently read by Mr. John Aitken before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, on the subject of "Dust, Fogs, and Clouds." The main fact discovered by Mr. Aitken is that dust is always the germ of which fogs and clouds are the developed phenomena, or, in other words, that the vapor of water never becomes visible unless each minute globule is condensed about a particle of dust. Steam admitted to a receiver filled with common air gives the usual cloudy form of condensation, but, when admitted to a receiver filled with filtered air, no condensation whatever appears. The air remains supersaturated and perfectly transparent. We have not space to describe Mr. Aitken's experiments, but the conclusions are: "(1) that whenever water vapor condenses in the atmosphere it always does so on some solid nucleus; (2) that dust-particles in the air form the nuclei on which the vapor condenses; (3) that if there was no dust there would be no fogs, no clouds, no mists, and probably no rain, and that the supersaturated air would convert every object on the surface of the earth into a condenser on which it would deposit; (4) our breath when it becomes visible on a cold morning, and every puff of steam as it escapes into the air, show the impure and dusty condition of our atmosphere." The word "dust" in this connection does not refer to what is usually called dust, but to infinitesimally small and invisible particles; and to this dust anything which breaks up matter into small particles contributes a share. All the products of heat and combustion, therefore, contribute to this fog-producing dust. Substances vary in their power of producing fog. Common salt and sulphur were the most active substances experimented with. The vapors of other substances than water were tested, and found to obey the same rule: cloud condensation would take place only in the presence of nuclei on which to deposit. Mr. Aitken's discovery is one of those exceedingly fertile discoveries which are sure to be the forerunners of many others of great practical moment. The discovery opens up new lines of inquiry in meteorology and in several other sciences. We may conclude this paragraph with the words of Nature: "We have said enough to show that the paper is one of interest, not only to the physicist and the meteorologist, but also (and perhaps even specially) to the physiologist and the sanitarian"; and, we may add, to the Free Religionist, because making necessary a change in the form of expression, at least, of a considerable amount of popular theology.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

Famous Preachers.

When I was in Hamilton, the first city in Canada you reach after leaving Niagara, the Mayor had kindly come down to the Grand Hotel to take me to visit the Fair. As I stepped into his carriage, he said, "That is the Rev. Mr. Beecher sitting in the shade at your door." Thereupon I said, "I must go and speak to him." In the angle of the portico sat a gentleman reading a newspaper: he was dressed in black, and wearing a wide-brimmed white felt hat that served to intercept stray rays of the fierce sun on the letter-press. Approaching him, I said, "Mr. Beecher, eighteen years ago, you told me that when I was next near to you I was to come to you, and not write to you. This is the first time since, that I have had the opportunity of seeing you. How do you do?" He rose, looked at me with his dark, bright eyes, and shaking hands with me very cordially said, "I am delighted to see you; but who are you?" I answered, "Mr. Holyoake, of London." "Are you," he said, "George Jacob Holyoake?" Upon answering, "Yes," I found I had no reason to regret the abruptness with which I had introduced myself. He desired me when next I returned to New York to let him know my address, as he wished to have a morning conversation with me. Some weeks later, being again in New York, I sent him the information, but no reply or visit followed. One Sunday morning, I went over the water to hear him preach in his church at Brooklyn. The church was very crowded; and when my friend who accompanied me mentioned to one of the officers of the church that I was a stranger from London, and desirous of hearing the famous preacher, a convenient seat was found, or made for me.

While we were singing, I looked over the hymn, in which were the following lines:—

> "Let Heaven begin the solemn word,
> And send it dreadful down to hell."

It was a hymn of Dr. Watts. If I remember rightly, these were among the lines we sung. I wondered how a man of Mr. Beecher's cultivated taste could admit lines so painful and discordant to appear in a hymn-book of his church. The solemn words of religion ought not to be "dreadful"; and, if they were "dreadful," there must be enough of misery in hell without sending them there. Mr. Beecher's discourse, like all he delivers, was very remarkable. With the greater part, I could entirely coincide. It contained a vivid description of the scantiness of the general records of Christianity, so far as it was promulgated by the Scriptural founder. Christ had written nothing himself. Those who professed to record what he said were themselves mostly illiterate. No stenography existed in Judea. Though we are told the world would not contain all the books if his sayings were fully reported, we have but a comparatively brief record of them: we cannot, therefore, fully judge of their beauty, completeness, or variety. Through whose hands the apostolic records have passed, what changes they sustained, what interpolations they have suffered, no man can tell. It was impossible not to be impressed in favor of Christianity preached with this manly candor.

The discourse was founded upon a text where Christ takes leave of his disciples, promising to communicate with them on another occasion fuller particulars of his mission. His crucifixion following, a fuller communication was never made. Hence, argued the preacher, we know not all that really was in the mind of Christ. After mentioning two cardinal subjects upon which Christ would have undoubtedly spoken, had his life been prolonged, the preacher came to the third. All along he had spoken in an undertone, low and clear, which penetrated to every part of the chapel, then breaking into his familiar loudness and finished emphasis of tone, and looking down to where I sat, he said, "The third subject upon which Christ would have spoken, foreseeing, as he must have done, the future needs of society, would have been Coöperation." I was startled at the communication. I had heard that Mr. Beecher had a quick eye to perceive and identify strangers in his congregation. He certainly could not have known that I should be there; and, if his introduction of cooperation was a coincidence, it was remarkable, and, if designed after becoming aware of my being there, it was a masterpiece of facility of resource. What he said was expressed as an inseparable part of narration, which was delivered throughout with unerring, unhesitating precision. His language, manner, and action were more finished than when I heard him in Exeter Hall in the days of the civil war. His preaching is entirely that of a gentleman as well as an orator; and from what I read of lectures of his delivered elsewhere, while I was in the States, I judge that his reputation depended, not only upon his excellence as a speaker, but upon the boldness and originality of idea found more or less in every address. There are other preachers in America who preach with perhaps equal brilliance; but I heard of no one who speaks so frequently with such sustained newness of thought. What he said upon coöperation, as a new element promising to instil more morality into commercial life, showed a complete comprehension of its character. The sacrament followed the morning service on that day; and, as I could not be a communicant, I left, as my presence there could only have implied a curiosity inconsistent with the spirit of the ceremony. As a hearer in the church, I was, as it were, a natural guest of the congregation, while only those of a common conviction could be properly present at a communion service. Otherwise, I should have remained, for the sake of speaking with Mr. Beecher again at the close. Anyhow, I caused information to reach him that day of the hours I should be happy to see him at the Hoffmann House, or when I could call upon him at Brooklyn Heights, if that was more convenient to him; but Mr. Beecher made no sign. A few weeks later, being again at Boston, I mentioned to Wendell Phillips the circumstance. "Oh," he said, "that is just like Beecher. A friend of his, who had been in Europe, met with some choice ecclesiastical engravings, which he believed it would give Mr. Beecher great pleasure to possess. They were of some value, and after he had had them mounted he sent them to him. Months elapsed, and he had no acknowledgment of them. At length, he sent a note, saying he did not desire to trouble Mr. Beecher to write a letter to him, but he should be glad of just a word by which he might know that the parcel had not miscarried. No answer arrived. One day, some three months later, the presenter of the engravings was passing down the Lexington Avenue, at a point where the streets cross at right angles: a gentleman, rapidly walking, came in collision with him, who, prodding him on the breast, said, 'I got your parcel,' and darted on. It was Mr. Beecher, and that was his acknowledgment." Mr. Phillips said Mr. Beecher was a busy man, upon whom so many public and private duties were pressed that his desire to serve the many often deprived him of the opportunity, which would be very pleasant to him, of showing courtesy to individuals.

Though we never met more, Mr. Beecher sent me a very genial letter on my leaving America, which, being characteristic of the writer, I may cite here:—

BROOKLYN, N.Y., 124 Columbia Heights.

Dear Sir,—I did want to see you, and set several days to call; but the pressure of home duties obliterated every arrangement I had made, and you will go home leaving me only two snatches of a sight of you.

You will leave a good impression behind you. I admire your prudence and your good spirit, and am deeply interested in the cause that you have so much at heart. The egg once hatched can never get back to egg again. The workingmen of the world can never get back to what are called the "good old days." They must go forward. In finding the path, the pioneers will make many circuits, and track back again a good many times. While my mind naturally has led me to think more of the intellectual and moral elevation of the common people than of their commercial and industrial necessities, I have not been unmindful of these other things, and have rejoiced to see such experiments made as those which you narrate. In every feasible plan for the enlargement of the great under mass of men, I am with you heart and hand.

I hope the sea may deal gently with you. May He "who hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, who sitteth King upon the flood," preserve you, and let you see prosperity for all the rest of your days.

Very cordially yours,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

It is clear from this letter that Mr. Beecher remembered seeing me at Hamilton, Ontario, and in Brooklyn Church. The "prudence" referred to was merely that of keeping the subject of coöperation clear of other things. This was simply my duty. It is a main condition of advocacy not to let the subject get confused in the public mind with any other subject. For a new idea to be distinctly apprehended, it must be seen many times, always seen distinctly, and seen by itself.

Rev. Robert Collyer, well regarded in England as in America, is of commanding stature, and has what in an Englishman is always to be admired—when found—confidence without arrogance. Dr. Bartol, in describing Dr. Channing, the famous Boston preacher, stated his weight to be about a hundred pounds. If oratory goes by weight, Mr. Collyer holds no mean rank. When Dr. Channing, the slender, gave out the line of the hymn,

"Angel, roll that stone away," the congregation thought they heard it rumbling on its way. If Mr. Collyer gave out the line, they would really have heard it move, there is such genial authority in his voice. When the deputation from a spacious church in New York came to Chicago to invite Mr. Collyer to be their minister, they had but one misgiving,—"would his voice fill the place." "If that is all," said the preacher, "I shall do, for my voice is cramped in Chicago." His voice would reach across a prairie. If John the Baptist spoke with his pleasant power, I do not wonder that the desert was crowded with hearers. Strong sense borne on a strong voice is influential speaking. When weighty sense sets out on a weak voice, it falls to the ground before it reaches half the hearers. At Mr. Collyer's church, in New York, I met the Poughkeepsie seer, Andrew Jackson Davis. I never met a seer in the flesh before, and was surprised to find that he was graceful, pleasant, and human. I congratulated him on the advantage he had over all of us in having the secrets of two worlds at his disposal.

Rev. Robert Collyer was one of the few ministers who felt that it was his duty to protest against slavery, come what might. He told the deacons of his congregation of his intent, who prayed him to reconsider it, as he would "burst up the church." He answered like an Anglo-American, "Then it has got to burst." He entered his pulpit in Chicago, and began his protesting sermon. The war was coming then, but had not broken out. He had not spoken long before he observed a commotion at the end of the church. The hearers were conversing from pew to pew. The buzzing voices travelled near to him. He thought the church was about to "burst up" before he had made his protest, when, seeing that he was ignorant of the cause of the commotion, a hearer leaped up, and called out that the "Southerners had fired upon Fort Sumter." That was the news that had set the worshippers on fire. All the church leaped up with inconceivable emotion. "Then," said the brave preacher, "I shall take a new text,—'Let him who has no sword sell his garment, and buy one.' " Then all the church went mad,—Mr. Collyer said he was as mad as any of them,—and the choir sung "Yankee Doodle."

The church witnessed a similar scene for several Sundays. The churches were freed in a night from the yoke of slavery, and religion has been sweeter in America ever since. Not only the almighty dollar was forgotten, but every family in the North, in the highest class as well as the humblest, gave a father or a son to die in the noblest war ever waged for freedom. Englishmen must have an imperishable respect for America, which made these sacrifices for a generous sentiment. They fought for the freedom of a race which could not requite them, whom they did not like, and whose management would bring untold trouble upon them for years to come. But they would no longer bear the shame of holding human beings in slavery.

One of the remarkable preachers of New York is Dr. Felix Adler, who was some time professor at Cornell University. His father was an eminent Rabbi; but his son, Dr. Felix, while retaining all the passion and fervor of the Jewish faith, no longer insists upon its ceremonials, but rather upon the moral holiness of life. He is the founder of a church of Ethical Culture, which meets in the Chickering Hall, New York. The congregation includes a large proportion of Jews; and at the morning service, at which I was present, there were one thousand to fifteen hundred persons assembled. The platform had no assistance from art, which it wanted. But the preacher soon caused you to forget that. Professor Adler is a slender, middle-statured gentleman, apparently thirty or thirty-five years of age, with a glistening eye and sleepy features, denoting rather latent passion than languor. His voice is pleasant, with a sincere tone. Stepping toward the front, but not in the centre of the copious stage of Chickering Hall, without altar, book, or note, he spoke for an hour with eloquence and enthusiasm, which held everybody in attention. I never heard a discourse anywhere like his as to ideas. His argument set forth that the church believed in morality, not because God required it, but because humanity needed it; not because it might be rewarded hereafter, but because the reward of right-doing was here, and because the neglect of it followed every man like the shadow of an evil spirit, from which there was no escape. The love of God and the hope of future life were graces of conviction. God has not set his bow in the clouds more palpably than he has set the sign of morality in every house, in every street. Men may disbelieve the priests, but they cannot disbelieve their own daily experience. The gods had not left morality dependent upon the rise and fall of churches. The philosopher was a greater teacher of morality than the theologian. Since the death of my friend, the Rev. Thomas Binney, who taught men "how to make the best of both worlds," I have heard from no pulpit arguments like those of Dr. Adler. The church of culture and morality proves itself to be one of charity and enthusiasm. One of the congregation, Mr. Joseph Seligman, had just given ten thousand dollars for promoting the kindergarten and industrial schools of the church, which have great repute.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these with great freedom, and not of necessity at all. THE WORLD WE LIVE IN.

THE MINERAL KINGDOM.
THE VEGETABLE KINGDOM.
THE ANIMAL KINGDOM. (Except man.)
MAN.

Study 1.—Introductory.

The Wonders of Creation.

What kind of a world do we live in?

What happens in the spring? In the summer? In the autumn? In the winter?

What may we see in all seasons of the year?

Is there anything we see which has no use?

Does everything have a history?

Who was it who said, "Knowledge is power"?

[Bacon.]

What did Solomon say about the strength of the wise man?

[Proverbs xxiv., 5.]

What do these sayings mean to us?

Do we always know what we say we know?

Give an example of that kind.

Can we see any end to what we may learn?

Digitized by Google

Did any one ever know everything?
Can any one ever know everything?
What did Sir Isaac Newton say of what he knew?

[I have only picked up a few pebbles on the beach of the infinite ocean of Truth.]

What is a book?
Are all books made of paper?
What did Shakespeare say about that?

[As You Like It. Act ii., Scene 1.]

What did he mean by these lines?
What, then, is the great book we are about to study?

SELECTIONS.

To him who in the love of Nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language.—Bryant.

The commonest things in the world are adorned, not with ornaments which are put on, but with beauty which grows out of their substance, which affects their form and shines through every lineament.—Parker.

He who knows what sweets and virtues are in the ground, the waters, the plants, the heavens, and how to come at these enchantments, is the rich and royal man.—Emerson.

Go forth under the open sky, and list
To Nature's teachings.—Bryant.

One touch of Nature makes the whole world kin.
—Shakespeare.

All are needed by each one,
Nothing is fair or good alone.—Emerson.

Suggestions to Leader.—Master the thought of the study yourself. Encourage the children to form their own ideas about the world and its processes: do not impose yours upon them. Show them the value of history and the difference between real and superficial knowledge. Let each member of the group commit one of the selections, and be careful to explain their meaning in every case. Also encourage the children to select for themselves something bearing upon the subject of the study.

Study 2.—The Mineral Kingdom.

Text-book, Geology, Science Primer Series.

Stones, and What they tell us.

Articles 15–31 inclusive.

Specimens: Sandstone, Granite, Chalk, Felspar, Mica, and Quartz.

How many kinds of books are there?
What is the important part of a book?
How should we classify books?
What, then, is a Principle of Classification concerning books?
Where did Shakespeare say we could find sermons?
And these are a part of what great book?
Are there many kinds of stones?
How will our Principle of Classification apply to stones?
Is it easy to read the contents of stones?
What is this?

[Show each of the children the piece of Sandstone, and have them describe it, each in his own way.]

Is this Sandstone made up of large or small grains?
What shape are the grains?
If we scrape off a little of the surface, what do we find these grains to be?

[Illustrate practically.]

How do these grains lie together?
Is Sandstone always of the same color?
What usually gives it its color?
Sandstone, then, is what?
Here is another stone: what is this?

[Show the piece of Granite, and have the children tell the difference between it and the Sandstone.]

Does the Granite contain any rounded grains?
What does it contain?

[Show here the separate specimens of Felspar, Mica, and Quartz. Also help the children to find them in the Granite.]

Do the crystals in Granite occur in regular order?
Granite, then, is what?
What kind of a stone is this?

[Show the piece of Chalk, calling out the views of the children as before. If possible, secure the use of a powerful magnifying-glass for this examination. If impossible to do that, the picture on page 13 of the Geology will do very well.]

How does Chalk seem to differ from Sandstone and Granite?
How does it really differ?
Where does it get its grains?
How, then, may Chalk be described?
And Sandstone, Granite, and Chalk are examples of what?
So that the sermons which the stones preach tell us what?
What do they say to us of order and law in Nature?
How do they indicate intelligent design?

SELECTIONS.

In the universe, all is done according to law, by the regular and orderly action of the forces thereof.—Parker.

Order is the law of all intelligent existence.—Blakie.

Some objects please our eyes
Which out of Nature's common order rise,
The shapeless rock, or hanging precipice.—Pope.

Nothing in Nature, much less conscious being,
Was e'er created solely for itself.—Young.

Nature, through all her works in great degree,
Borrows a blessing from variety.—Churchill.

Nor chaos-like together crushed and bruis'd,
But, as the world, harmoniously confus'd,
Where order in variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, all agree.—Pope.

Suggestions to Leader.—Master the thought of the study, and encourage the children to do the same, as before and always. It is very important to have the specimens. Perhaps you and your children can collect some of them. The others can be had at Natural History stores at very slight expense. Let each member of the group commit one of the selections as before, and be careful that all understand their meaning and their application to the study.

FOREIGN.

THE Roman Academy of Sciences has awarded half of the King Humbert Prize, now awarded for the first time, to the German astronomer, Dr. Wilhelm Tempel, director of the Acetri Observatory of Florence, for his observation on nebulæ.

WRITING to a gentleman at Failsworth, who complained that a clergyman compelled a Non-conformist to bury his child in an obscure portion of the churchyard, the Judge-Advocate-General says that the clergyman has acted contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the Burials Act, and adds that, if clergymen do not mind, the management of churchyards will be taken out of their hands.

JOHN DUNCAN, a poor Aberdeen weaver, has presented to the University of Aberdeen his herbarium of nearly twelve hundred British plants, gathered by him all over the country, from Northumberland to Banff, while acting as a harvest laborer. The story of Duncan was told in Good Words for 1878 by William Jolly. And now it would seem that the poor and intelligent weaver is so reduced in circumstances as to be compelled to accept parochial relief.—Nature.

A DESPATCH to the Pall Mall Gazette of January 21 says: "A banquet was given last night to M. Gambetta by the wine-shop keepers of the Temple Quartier of Paris, about a thousand persons sitting down to table. The President of the Chamber said that the municipal elections proved that the Democracy was master of itself. It was the Democracy that had made the Republic, and the elections for the Senate and Chamber would likewise end in a triumph for the Democracy, the Republic, and the Fatherland."

THE simplest post-office in the world is in Magellan Straits, and has been established there for some years past. It consists of a small cask, which is chained to the rock of the extreme cape in the straits, opposite Tierra del Fuego. Each passing ship sends a boat to open the cask, and to take letters out and place others into it. The post-office is self-acting therefore: it is under the protection of the navies of all nations, and up to the present there is not one case to report in which any abuse of privileges it affords has taken place.—Nature.

REMODELLED regulations have been issued for the elementary schools in France. They forbid corporal punishment, and provide that the wish of the father shall always be consulted as to participation in religious instruction; that children shall not be sent to church for catechism or service, except out of class hours; that the teacher shall not be bound to take them or watch over them there; that Sundays and Thursdays shall be holidays; and that punishments shall consist of bad marks, reprimand, partial privation of recreation, detention after school-hours, and temporary exclusion, not exceeding two days.

A NEW society has been formed in Paris, under the auspices of such well-known democratic leaders and writers as Paul Bert, Victor Poussin, Schölcher, Gagneur, and others for the prosecution of the "Kulturkampf." One object of the society will be to lend assistance to all members of the clergy or religious bodies who, having ceased to believe in the doctrines thereof, and having no stain on their character, wish to recommence life as civilians. Another object of the society is to secure a civil interment to all dying persons who may desire it, in spite of family opposition. The main object of the society, however, is not to assist ex-abbés and ex-curés to console the dying, but to diffuse intellectual light among the living by means of lectures, cheap issues of philosophical and scientific works, reunions of schools and schoolmasters, etc. It also proposes to establish social festivals on a magnificent scale in commemoration of the various acts and events of civic life. The diffusion of culture pur et simple by means of the fine arts is to form an important feature in its operations. Cohesions to the new society, called "L'Union démocratique de Propagande anticléricale," are pouring in from all parts of France. —Pall Mall Budget.

THE London Weekly Despatch recently contained this item: "Disgraceful Disclosures.—Farther revelations have been made at the Croydon Petty Sessions concerning the way that the laboring poor are living. The discoveries arose out of an assault case, in which the prisoners, named Ward, were sent to jail for twenty-one days' hard labor. The prisoners, prosecutor and his wife, and three children, all lived in one room or compartment, in a building known as Mr. Still's Huts, at Addington. The building in question was divided into compartments, the internal measurements of which are 13 feet 9 inches by 10 feet, and the height from the floor to the roof is 6 feet 3 inches. At the time the assault took place there were living in these six pens or compartments no less than fifty persons (twenty-nine adults and twenty-one children, some of whom were fourteen and fifteen years of age). There was thus an average of about eight persons in each of these compartments. No means of ventilation whatever were provided, and light was only let in by means of certain glass tiles in the roof. The floor of the pens was made of concrete, upon which straw was laid down to answer the purposes of a bed. The cooking was performed in a common department; and the refuse of the families dwelling in them was thrown outside the compartments, where it lay. Mr. Still's foreman admitted that the building had been put up for the express purpose of accommodating laboring people working on the farm. The magistrates expressed surprise that the sanitary authorities had allowed this state of things to exist; and the chairman said that the work of philanthropists was to a large extent thrown away, because they did not take sufficient interest in the way in which people were allowed to live. The matter of these huts is receiving the attention of the sanitary authorities, whose officer has prepared a report for submission to them at their next meeting."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

The Bible.

[Dwight L. Moody, before the Illinois State Sunday School Convention.]

I WANT to open the subject this morning by saying that we have but one Bible. The impression among a great many people, at the present time, is that we have two Bibles,—what is called the Old Testament and the New. I am annoyed sometimes to hear intelligent Christians say that they believe in the contents of the New Testament, but don't believe in the teachings of the Old. There is an impression abroad that the Old Testament has passed out of date,—that it was good for the antediluvians, good for the Mosaic dispensation, but that the New Testament has superseded it, and that it is good for history only, and poor at that, in a good many points it is not reliable,—that it is not authentic. Now, I want to say that the Old Testament and the New go together, that they are one book.... All Scripture is given by inspiration, not part of it. When Paul wrote about the scriptures, he had reference to the Old Testament. "All scripture," says Paul, "is given by inspration of God." He believed in the Old Testament. Now, you will find, by reading the New Testament carefully, that our Lord quotes from twenty-two books of the Old Testament. There are thirty-nine books in the Old Testament, and our Lord quotes from twenty-two of them. In Matthew there are nearly one hundred passages that refer to the Old Testament. Nineteen books are quoted from in Matthew alone .... Now there is another class of people who tell us that the first five books of the Bible are not true, they are not authentic, and all that. Now, you will find the Master quoting from Deuteronomy perhaps as much as from any other book. Deuteronomy and Isaiah seem to be the two favorite books that he quotes from. In Matthew, eighteen times he refers to Deuteronomy, twenty times he refers to the prophecy of Isaiah. From the prophecy of Daniel there are fourteen quotations. From the Book of Exodus there are fourteen quotations. Our Master quotes from the Psalms sixteen times. When he had that conflict with Satan, he quoted twice from Deuteronomy and once from the Psalms. When he wanted to overcome Satan, he said, "It is written." What we want is to follow in the footsteps of our Master; and, when we are attacked by these infidels and sceptics, we must meet them with, "Thus saith the Lord." That will settle it. I tell you, this one sentence, "Thus saith the Lord," is worth more than all the traditions of the fathers. It is not what the Church teaches to-day, nor what our forefathers taught, but what is the word of God. That is what we want. Very often I have heard men say, "You don't believe in the flood, do you?" Yes, I believe in the flood. I was going to preach about Noah one time, and a man came to me and said, "Why, you are not going to preach on that old story of the flood?" "Yes." "Why, you don't believe that, do you?" "Oh, yes." "Well," said he, "I thought we had got beyond that. That is a fable." "Well," said I, "you believe in the New Testament, don't you?" Said he, "Yes, I believe in the New Testament." "Well, in the New Testament the Lord says, 'As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the coming of the Son of man.' The Son of God put his seal to that very thing. If you throw out the flood, you throw out the whole Book of Genesis." Another man said, "You don't believe in the story of the destruction of Sodom, do you?" "Oh, yes. It says in the New Testament, 'As it was in the days of Lot, so shall it be in the coming of the Son of man.' And the Son of God has put his seal to that very narrative." Another man said, "You don't believe in the story of Lot's wife, do you?" "Oh, yes. I believe in that, because the Master said, 'Remember Lot's wife.'"—Exchange paper.

JESTINGS.

Two Freshmen in the library, discussing English literature: First Freshman: "Do you like Dickens' stories?" Second Freshman: "Oh, yes. Those I've read. Especially Pickwick and Oliver Optic." First Freshman: "Yes, Oliver Optic is a good book."

Doctor: "Oh, there you are, Smith! How's the wife?" Farmer: "Wuss, I'm afeared, sir." Doctor: "Indeed! Is she wandering?" Farmer: "No, no: she's sensible. That's what I'm afeared of. I never knowed her so sensible. She's onnaturally sensible."

A Jerseyman, who attended prayer-meeting with his daughter, felt compelled to rise up and remark: "I want to be good and go to heaven: but, if those fellers don't stop winking at Mary, there will be a good deal of prancing around here the first thing they know."

While the very young daughter of a country clergyman was playing in the garden one day, a stranger came along, and inquired if her father was at home. "No," she replied; "but my mother is in the house, and she will pray with you, you poor miserable sinner!"

An old lady from New Bedford visited Boston recently, for the first time, and, while viewing the attractions of the Public Garden, was pointed out the bronze statue of Charles Sumner. "Well, I declare," the old lady remarked, "I never knew Sumner was a colored man before."

It is mighty embarrassing to a man who has some religious friends staying with him to have his dog, which has been very quiet during week-days, begin right after breakfast Sunday to run to the gun in the corner and then to his master, and wag his tail, and then run back to the gun again.

Yesterday morning, the Rev. Willis offered the Lord's Prayer in the Nevada senate. When he had finished, Doolin leaned over to Hammond, and remarked: "He stole that prayer, and I'll bet on it. I heard the same ideas expressed at Eureka at a funeral over two years ago."—Carson City Appeal.

This is the way a young lady Sabbath-school teacher in a New England town exhorted her class of boys: "Now, children, if you'll be good children,—read your Bible, say your prayers, go to church, and never say naughty words,—you'll go to heaven, and that will be perfectly splendid. But if you are not good children,—if you don't read your Bible and say your prayers and go to church, and if you do say naughty words,—you'll go to hell, and that will be perfectly ridiculous."—Rutland Herald.

A promising youth of five rather mature summers was saying his prayers. The little fellow had set up beyond his usual bed hour to see a procession, with its flaming torches and loud huzzas, go by. It was his custom to say the little prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep," and then to add, "God bless mamma and papa," etc. On this particular evening, his ears and heart were full of what he had seen and heard, but he managed to get through with "Now I lay me" with perfect propriety. Having omitted the rest of the prayer, his mother said chidingly, "Willie, haven't you forgot something?" "Oh, yes, mamma," he replied. Then bending his head in reverential attitude, he cried out: "Hurrah for God! Amen."

Two weeks since, a proposition to illuminate Paradise Hall, the meeting-place of the Detroit Limekiln Club, was discussed, and held over to await facts and figures promised by Brother Gardner. He now announced that he was ready to say a few words. "It seems to me," he began, "dat de mo' light we git in dis hall, de wuss our furnchur will look to us. In dis subdued light, we kin sort o' hide our feet, our old cloze, an' de bald spots on our heads. Dar's sunthin' 'bout de smell ob kerosene ile that exhilarates us, an' we know dat de cost o' lightin' up am only twenty-one cents per meetin'. We has bought de lamps, have four gallons of ile in stock, an' any change now would put us to a smart loss. De time fur puttin' in de 'lectrick light hasn' arove yet, an' I must place my weto on any furder purceedin's."—Detroit Free Press.

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

"What is best in the whole book is that she founds her teaching for women so strongly in the deepest and simplest moral principles that her thoughts come with a force and breadth which win for them at once a respectful hearing."—London Spectator.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE only liberty that is valuable is a liberty connected with order; that not only exists along with order and virtue, but which cannot exist at all without them. It inheres in good and steady government as in its substance and vital principle.—Burke.

GOVERNMENT cannot make a law: it can only pronounce that which was the law before its organization; namely, the moral result of the imperishable relations of things.—Shelley.

IF you think it right to differ from the times, and to make a stand for any valuable point of morals, do it, however rustic, however antiquated, however pedantic it may appear; do it, not for insolence, but seriously, as a man who wore a soul of his own in his bosom, and did not wait till it was breathed into him by the breath of fashion.—Sydney Smith.

THE fate that man must accept is but the real law of his own nature, whereby it is in accord with the universal life. It is thus not only consistent with freedom, but coincident with it. . . . Liberty itself can be found only in knowing essential good to be the moving force of his own spiritual being. This unity is the true self: in this is personality; therefore it is spontaneity, joy, health, success. The fate that abolishes individual caprice is the seal of freedom. Hence the inspiration that comes in self-abandonment to an idea or a duty. It identifies our fate with our freedom. All great aspiration brings the sense of destiny, because it frees from inward conflict, from the resistance of finite caprice to infinite good; and, in this deep natural alliance and harmony of forces, the doubts and fears are dissolved.—Samuel Johnson.

FRIENDS, this is the last time we shall meet this year. This is the last Sunday of the year. Behind us lie years by centuries, centuries of centuries; years of toil, of suffering, of sorrow unspeakable; years of heroism, fortitude, self-denial; years of bitter conflict with evil; years of mistakes and recovery from mistakes. We stand at the edge, the last hour of the world's advance. Before us reach the years by centuries, centuries of centuries: not an hour of it all is yet spent; not an evil deed sullies one of the golden moments. They are all uncounted and uncorrupted. O you young men, O you young women who stand upon the threshold of this great future, so unspeakably great, I pray you take to your heart not the old obsolete terror which can only crush and weaken you, but that fine spirit of simplicity, sincerity, faith, hope, aspiration, which shall, as far as you are concerned, prevent shame and disgrace from desecrating the year that is to open in so few days. Remember your minds, respect your hearts, strike no blow at your honor. Reverence the majesty of your free will, revere conscience, stand with bended head before your soul. Be not tempted by success of any kind, by opulence or happiness, to become indifferent spectators of life's pageant, or inactive members of a living society. Preserve your faith in ideas, your confidence in principles; for out of these all human greatness proceeds. Remember that humanity is far enough yet from its emancipation. A terrible weight of inertia, from idleness, stupor, ease, opulence, weighs down the energies of those most highly gifted with opportunity. Fashion enthralls. Wealth represses. Not till mind attains its supremacy over circumstance will Liberty display its full genius, and demonstrate its title to be called the friend of virtue.—O. B. Frothingham.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IN Mohammedan countries, pilgrimages are made to Mecca; but in this country they have set of late toward Mentor.

WHEN the Christian Register says, referring to the decision of the referees in the case of the Leicester society, "There is just as much Unitarian liberty left after this decision as there used to be," it is not necessary to suppose it to mean that Unitarian liberty is now complete.

OUR usually vigorous contributor, "W. H. S.," takes a rather rose-colored view of the millennial era, when Unitarianism and Free Religion shall lie down together in peace in a Channing-Parker Memorial Building in Boston. The signs of it do not strike us as particularly promising just now.

THE movement to retain Mr. George Chainey as permanent lecturer in Paine Hall, Boston, bids fair, we understand, to be successful. Mr. Elizur Wright, as Treasurer, publishes a notice in the Investigator, asking for contributions from the friends of Universal Mental Liberty in the city to secure a financial guarantee of the project for the present year.

THE Bulletin Committee for the Boston "Associated Charities" calls the attention of all visitors among the poor, who are working on the plan of that organization, to the importance of attending the weekly conferences of the visitors. The object of the conference is not only to dispose of special cases, but to talk over ways and means; and the larger company each ward or district can bring together every week, the more likely is the whole work to grow in value.

MR. ROWLAND CONNOR has been giving a course of lectures at East Saginaw, Mich., on the Ethnic Religions, which in one respect, at least, was unique. Not only were all the Scriptural readings in connection with each lecture chosen from the religion which was the subject for the evening, but the hymns sung, and readings from the pulpit with responses from the choir, were also so selected. Even the benediction was given in a form found in the old religions of which the lecturer had been speaking. And this in a church that is "known by the name Unitarian"!

A YOUNG reader asks the editor of the New York Tribune "why it is that many very good people, who consider it wrong to take a Sunday newspaper, will spend the afternoon of that day in reading the every-day departments of religious newspapers,—such as the book notices, stories, foreign letters, art reviews, agricultural and scientific paragraphs, even the advertisements. Also, why they invariably select their religious newspapers when trying to read themselves to sleep on Sunday afternoon." And he receives this cruel reply: "Inquisitiveness is one of the most dangerous tendencies of a depraved and fallen human nature. There are several authentic instances on record of condemned criminals confessing at the foot of the gallows that the beginning of evil with them was the hour when, from morbid curiosity, they first asked their fathers why they put on their best clothes on Sunday and then swore more than on any other day of the week."

THE Washington correspondent of the Brooklyn Eagle interviewed Colonel Ingersoll the other day concerning his threatened indictment in Delaware for blasphemy. With many other things, the Colonel said that "the result of the action of Delaware will be: first, to liberalize all other States; and, second, finally to liberalize Delaware itself. In many of the States, they have the same idiotic kind of laws as those found in Delaware, with the exception of those blessed institutions for the spread of the gospel, known as the pillory and the whipping-post. There is a law in Maine by which a man can be put into the penitentiary for denying the providence of God and the day of judgment. There are similar laws in most of the New England States. One can be imprisoned in Maryland for a like offence. In North Carolina, no man can hold office that has not a certain religious belief; and so in several other of the Southern States. In half the States of this Union, if my wife and children should be murdered before my eyes, I would not be allowed in a court of justice to tell who the murderer was."

THERE is a movement among the Jews in this country to form a synod. The idea has the support of many of the Reform Jews, like Rabbis Wise and Kohler. But the Chicago Jewish Advance opposes the movement. In the course of a vigorous article against it, the Advance says: "No synod could act more unanimously than the American rabbins did in denouncing the Society for Ethical Culture and its founder. Did this unanimity of action help the matter? Not in the least. The society is a flourishing institution; and, for aught we know, there is a large field open for similar societies in every numerous Jewish community in America. There are men of abilities and knowledge in the Jewish pulpit who will be certain to find support and co-operation, if they should think it necessary to alienate themselves from a synod-creed, provided such a thing comes into existence. And, if the leaders of an opposition are beyond the control of ecclesiastic organizations, how much more so are the independent supporters of such oppositions. Did or could the Emanuel congregation do aught against the supporters of Prof. Felix Adler? Suppose that congregation were to expel the Seligmans and others of its members who established the Society for Ethical Culture, it would only injure its own interests. Beside this, public opinion would be roused against it, as a corporation of prejudiced and narrow-minded people; and the supporters of the Society for Ethical Culture would carry the laurels of martyrdom beside those of social usefulness."

An Eternal Principle Underlying the Diversities of Moral Judgment.

A Lecture delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture, at Chickering Hall, New York City, Feb. 20, 1881.

BY PROF. FELIX ADLER.

The great need of the times is to refresh in men the conviction that an eternal principle underlies all morality. The morality that is founded on mere utility does not avail to support the soul in the great trials of life, nor to explain the deeper phenomena of our moral nature. The morality that is founded on sympathy fails to protect us against the temptations of secret sin. The basis of morality must be recognized to be, even as the basis of all science and of æsthetics, in the very constitution of our nature.

There are those who wonder that we should speak of getting religious inspiration out of mere morality. They wonder in this wise, because they have flat, inadequate conceptions of what morality is. Wide as the east is separated from the west, the system which founds morality on utility or sympathy is separated from that which founds it upon the principle of highest reason. And while the former system is sterile, and leaves the world depopulated of its noblest enthusiasms, the latter, we believe, is already pregnant with a new birth in religion, and is destined hereafter to become the joyful mother of unexampled ideals. We need at the present day to enforce the conviction that the being moral is an end in itself. Just as the working out of harmonious proportions in clay or marble is ennobling, and no one asks any more, when beauty has been created, what is the use thereof, but beauty is its own legitimation, so the working out of harmonious proportions in the relations between mankind is an end in itself, and becomes the source of satisfactions without limit and without price. Just as the rose-garden draws the day down into itself, and the light of heaven shines again in the color of its flowers, so in morality do we draw the heaven down into our nature, and the light of the eternities shines in every moral deed. And because I believe the conviction that an eternal principle underlies all the manifold moral laws to be so necessary; because I believe it requisite for the salvation of our lives that men should learn to be moral, not because it is useful, not because it is wisely selfish, not because it is kind, not because it is refined to be moral, but that they should be made to feel anew that they ought to bow themselves before the absolute mandates of the awful judge within their hearts, therefore it seems to me so very important that we should seek to remove the objections that are urged against the sublimity and majesty of morality. And, among these objections, the actual diversities of moral judgment in different ages and among different peoples is one of the most important. To a consideration of these diversities of judgment, therefore, we shall address ourselves to-day.

Stealing has been considered among some of the nations of antiquity a trivial offence, if an offence at all. Among the Spartans, it appears the thief was punished because of the clumsiness that led to the detection rather than because of the evil intention that led to the offence. Among various primitive tribes, also, lax judgments in regard to the culpability of theft are to be met with. We are not justified, however, in concluding from this that the conscience is divided against itself in regard to the culpability of theft. Let us only bear in mind the fact of primitive communism. It has now been made reasonably certain by the researches of modern investigators that human society was originally organized on the communistic plan. Communism does not owe its origin, as many suppose, to the dreams of modern radical socialists, but is a fact of history, one of the most ancient facts of history. Originally, when men's wants were comparatively few and simple, and the bond of connection between the different members of a tribe almost as close as that which now exists between the different members of one and the same family, individuals were willing to hold what they had in common, and share the fruits of their labor among all. Now, among the ancient Spartans, we are told that a modified form of communism did prevail,—that bands of men were leagued together, having common interests, common ambitions, common occupations, a common table. And among the primitive races, also, we know that nothing was more frequent than that companies of a few dozens or of fifty or of a hundred or of two hundred human beings dwelt and roved together in the most intimate companionship. But what can be more natural than that persons who had barely passed out of the stage of primitive communism should look upon offences against property with a lenient eye?

The fact that in certain parts of the world children kill their parents when they have reached a certain age is adduced as showing that the conscience of those peoples, among whom such practices prevail, must be different from ours. In the Vindhya Mountains, the children kill their parents when they become old and decrepit. From Africa, the following account of a native funeral is given us. An English traveller was invited by one of the chiefs to attend the funeral of his mother. On coming to the place of rendezvous, the Englishman found the procession in waiting, but looked in vain for the body of the dead. The procession started, and still no sign of the dead body was to be seen. At last, unable further to restrain his curiosity, the Englishman asked the chief where and when they would meet the corpse of his mother. The chief, in astonishment, pointed to an old woman who was hobbling along in the midst of the procession. When they arrived at the place of burial, this old woman advanced, the noose was adjusted around her neck, and she prepared for strangulation. The European, shocked at this horrible rite, protested that he would not permit its consummation in his presence. A tumult ensued; and among those who were most decided in their denunciations of the interference was the old mother herself, who protested that she was now ready to die and was unwilling to bear the burdens of old age, and that from no one had she a better right to ask the last service than from her own son. And this explains to us the meaning of a custom which, at first sight, seems to outrage every feeling of reverence and duty toward parents. Among a barbarian tribe who frequently suffer from scarcity of food, and whose habits are often migratory, old age is attended with countless sufferings and evils, from which a voluntary release is sought; and it is deemed an act of piety on the part of the children to relieve of their burdens the infirm parents who are unwilling further to bear their ills.

If, in these instances, the diversity of moral judgment is due to difference of circumstances, in the great majority of instances the anomalies of conscience are explicable in another way. That there are elements in our nature hostile to and incongruous with morality every one knows. Now, it is the enemy within the human breast that often does violence to conscience, paralyzes the moral nature in part, limits the freedom of its action, checks its impulses, and adulterates its utterances. Not, then, that morality itself is vacillating, or that the conscience is divided against itself: but the inimical elements in the human heart are responsible for the abnormities of moral manifestation. Among these elements, I mention three particularly,—self-assertion, religious superstition, and class-interest. To judge of the influence of self-conceit, we need only recall the instance of the Fijians, among whom the causal connection between self-conceit and the approbation of cruelty becomes very clear. Among the Fiji Islanders, cruelty seems to be regarded, not as something to be condemned, but as a matter of pride. The recklessness of human life exhibited by them is startling. When the chief builds himself a new canoe, he causes ten of his subjects to be slain, and washes the deck with their blood. He also paves the way to the water's edge with human beings, using them as rollers. One of the highest titles among the Fijian chiefs is the Depopulator of Islands, the Waster of Districts. It was customary among the Fijians, as in other parts of the world, to kill the wives at the death of the husband, in order that the ghost of the dead man might be attended by the ghosts of his wives in the other world. In proportion to the dignity of the chief is the number of persons who are slain at his death. A Fijian chief, when he heard that five of his wives would be killed at his death, said that he died content. And yet we do not find the Fijians to be the wild beasts that we would expect after such descriptions. On the contrary, the Fijians are a fastidious people. They are very fond of flowers, especially fragrant flowers. They scent their persons with perfumes. They are observant of etiquettes, and possessed of great social tact. They are a very hospitable people. There is, I believe, a "stranger's house" in every village. They are very precise with respect to the relation between the sexes. Even a man and wife are not allowed to remain under the same roof after sundown, they consider it improper that births should occur at shorter intervals than three years, and they look with contempt and reprobation upon the Europeans for their greater laxness in this regard. Above all, however, they are an inordinately vain people. Among their public functionaries, the hair-dresser occupies an important position. The chiefs sometimes spend hours every day in arranging an elaborate head-dress. It is this self-conceit, then, which explains their cruelty. It is chief-like to steal, they say. A chief who does not, from time to time, rob his subjects of their possessions, is not considered a very great chief. So, also, it is chief-like to kill, not so much because of the pleasure which is taken in the act of slaughter as, rather, because the power of the chief becomes evident in his ability to decide over the life and death of his subjects; and his own greatness is mirrored in their injuries. Nor are we justified in looking at the barbarian Fijians with utter contempt, so long as there is still what is called "hero-worship" in our own civilized communities, so long as we also, nations of the civilized world, burn incense before the great conquerors, the great slayers of their fellowmen, who exhibit the same recklessness of human life in order to achieve the ends of power and ambition, only that where the Fijian chief kills ten they slay ten thousand.

In the same way, the fact that lying and treachery are highly praised among some primitive tribes is not due to the belief that lying and treachery are themselves right, but rather the moral nature is for the time submerged, the claims of virtue are for the time lost out of sight; and only the astuteness of the successful liar and deceiver is considered, whereby, using fox-like cunning in place of mere brute force, he is enabled to achieve the mastery over his fellow-men. Here, also, the analogy in the manners of civilized peoples is not wanting. For lying and treachery have their admirers among us as well, provided, always, they be successful in lying and treachery. And what, pray, is that smartness of which we hear so much said in business circles in many cases but falsehood and deceit joined to shrewdness in calculation of means to ends?

The second element of human nature which has succeeded in partly paralyzing morality and limiting its utterances in certain directions is religious superstition. I cannot here attempt to show the manifold ways in which superstition has tended to deteriorate character. Let me indicate only one of the broadest and most glaring facts in this connection,—I mean human sacrifice. That any one should commit murder is horrifying. Yet, in the case of ordinary murder, it is possible to make some excuses,—to suppose that the deed was done in the white heat of passion or under the influence perhaps of strong and protracted provocation. But to think of organized murder, of public murder, of murder as the foundation on which a polity is built, of high state officials specially designated to superintend public murder,—that seems at first to pass human comprehension, and to argue that nations among whom such things are possible must have a different conscience from ours, cannot surely have the same moral nature that we have.

And yet we find public human sacrifice not among utterly savage races, but among nations already considerably advanced on the path of civilization. Among the ancient Phœnicians, who were the carriers of the world's commerce, we know that certain of the noblest youths were annually sacrificed to the stern deity of the State. In the Bible, we find the horrible forms of Moloch-worship referred to. Among the Carthaginians, we learn of the same outrageous custom. But chiefly among the ancient Mexicans was the religious rite of human sacrifice developed, and concerning them and their practices we have detailed accounts in the narratives of the Spanish historians.* Many were the temples and the idols of ancient Mexico, and great the ceremony observed in the service of the gods. Four times a day, the priesthood gathered around the altar, summoned by the doleful blasts of horns at daybreak, noon, sundown, and midnight, to burn incense at the sacred shrine. Hymns were sung in the temples, mythological paintings adorned them. But the chief rite of the religion was the rite of human sacrifice. In the great temple of the City of Mexico, whose court-yard was capable of holding ten thousand persons, there was a green pyramidal stone, on which the human victim was placed. Then the priest advanced, and, having ripped open the breast with a sacred stone, tore out the heart of the victim, and held it still palpitating toward the sun. Thereupon, he threw it at the feet of the idol; then, raising it again, inserted it with a golden spoon into the monstrous idol's mouth. Also the lips of the idol and the cornices of the doors were painted with the victim's blood. It has been estimated that twenty-five hundred such human sacrifices were annually brought in to the temples of Mexico. Nor is it to be supposed that the native ferocity of the Mexican priests led them to such practices. The Mexicans were a people by no means devoid of the sense of moral obligation. They would not tolerate adultery in their midst. Drunkenness they considered a crime, and reprobated it in the severest terms. Nor did the priests spare themselves, while inflicting such suffering upon others. They also mortified their flesh and indulged in long fasts, and underwent heavy penances; and every night, after the midnight convocation, they were accustomed to scourge themselves as the Christian hermits did in the olden time, and drew blood from their bodies in order to appease the angry divinities whom they believed to dwell above the clouds. It was superstition that led them to these inhuman rites, that caused the protesting voice of virtue and of pity to be stifled within them.

And are we to condemn the Mexicans only, the semi-barbarians? Do we not meet with the same terrible facts among nations also that boast of being civilized, and, in the case of a religion that vaunts itself to be the great civilizing agent of the world? Did not the Inquisition bring human sacrifices, thousands of human sacrifices, on the public plazas of Spain, in the name of religion, among circumstances not less horrible though less excusable than in the case of the Mexicans? And is not the same lesson to be learned even to-day? Does not the doctrine of eternal damnation, which is preached, while we are here assembled this morning, in the great majority of churches, wide throughout Christendom, show in the clearest manner how the natural teachings of conscience are overborne by the tyrannical influence of superstition? The doctrine of eternal damnation involves the infliction of never-ending pain. Would it be fair to infer that those who hold that doctrine believe that the infliction of pain is right? Are not the same persons who hold that doctrine members of societies for the prevention of cruelty to children, and even of societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals, because they cannot even tolerate the idea that the dumb brute should be made to suffer? And yet, in religion, the sensibility of their consciences seems to be paralyzed. Does not this show clearly enough that it is not the moral mandate which is uncertain, but that the influence of superstition is such as to prevent the application of otherwise assured principles of morality in certain directions? The doctrine of eternal damnation implies punishment disproportionate to the offence. Now, to-morrow, if in any of our courts a judge were to pronounce sentence of fifty years' imprisonment, say for petit larceny, the members of the churches would be the first to cry out against such an injustice, and fill the newspapers with their denunciations, and vex the public ear with protests against such severity. And yet they believe that an eternal Judge will condemn human beings not only for fifty years, not only for a thousand years, not only for a million years, but for all eternity, because of offences against the mere technicalities of religion. The doctrine of eternal damnation involves punishment for opinions. But the same members of the churches, who hold that doctrine, if the leader of a political faction were to be prosecuted because of his opinions, would be most eager to stop such proceedings, and would assert truthfully enough that opinions ought not to be punished.

And the last element that I will mention as exercising a restricting influence upon the free manifestation of morality is class interest. We have seen among the aristocracy of the Southern slave-holders that these aristocrats could be very kind toward each other, very courteous and gracious toward the women of their own set, very hospitable, very generous toward those whom they believed to be their equals. All of which did not prevent them from laying the lash upon the back of the slave, and committing those infamies with which the name of slavery will be associated until the end of time. And, if there was some semblance of excuse in this case, if the slave-holder could point to the color of the black man's skin, and say, Behold Nature herself has stamped this one to be my inferior, yet that this was an excuse merely, and not the reason, we comprehend, when we behold that the white man is capable of the same unscrupulous oppression of his white brother-man, where the selfish spirit of class interest prompts him. The cries of Ireland, sent up from the depths of her misery, smite upon our ear. The cries of Ireland, that has for centuries pleaded in vain for the redress of her great grievances, fill every feeling heart to-day with tearful sympathy. Do you believe that there is any doubt in the oppressive Irish landlord's mind as to the right and wrong of the case? Do you think the Irish landlord does not know that to lose one's home is bitter? Do you think the Irish landlord, when he evicts his tenant, does not know that the winter winds are cold and keen, and that Death is abroad on the bleak hills? Do you think he does not know that rack-rent implies the enforced improvidence and ignorance and starvation of the people, that he does not know when he exacts additional payment for every improvement of the soil,—thus making the tenant's very effort at self-elevation the means of compassing his utter abasement,—that all this is against common fairness, that the ordinary sense of justice protests against such conduct? Pshaw! What does the Irish landlord care for justice? He wants income: let justice take care of itself.

And yet—and this is the point toward which our whole discourse moves—there is, even in the tyrant and the oppressor, a knowledge of right and wrong. There is that within his heart which must respond, if only the appeal for conscience be made earnestly enough, mightily enough. There is something vast and deep in human nature, the tendency of the lesser being to go out toward the larger being, the tendency of the lesser being to draw the larger being into itself. This is the movement that underlies all morality. The individual accepts the laws of the family, and makes them his own. This is the beginning of morality. He accepts the laws of the nation, of the profession whereof he is a member, of the whole of humanity. Lastly, his soul goes out and seeks to grasp the laws of universal reason, and make them its own. And that is the height of morality. Intellect sheds its light upon what those laws are. Circumstance hinders or enhances the development in various ways. But the fundamental process is still the same,—the rising of the lesser toward the larger being, and so on, through stage after stage, unto the absolute reason, the crowning ideal.

Let us not, then, despair of human destiny. The history of the world does show us magnificent promise of progress. Gradually, the nobler nature within us breaks through its bonds, and the divinity within throws off its disguises. Three things, however, are preëminently necessary, in order to advance the work of moral progress.

The power of self-conceit must be overthrown. The desire for self-assertion can never be extirpated from the human breast. Let it, then, be transformed and transfigured into something better than itself. Let men be taught—and all the energies of moral teaching should be directed to this end—no more to consider themselves high in proportion as they depress others, no more to see the mirror of their greatness in the injury which they inflict upon others, but rather in the happiness which they confer, and so achieve their good in the general good, and so grow in the growth of the world.

The power of superstition must, at last, be utterly excluded and banished from the human heart. That phantom, black with crime and red with blood, must be cast down from its throne at whatever cost. Men must be taught that there is no power in the world superior to morality, that there is no power that can override the dictates of conscience, that there is no power which can be worshipped outside of the moral life.

And, lastly, the idea of privilege must be extinguished. The prerogatives of the aristocracy of birth must cease. The prerogatives of the aristocracy of wealth must cease. Men must bend their haughty selfishness and learn to respect in every human being the humanity that is in each, and grant to all the same rights to happiness and to the development of faculty. Then will the dayspring of morality arise on earth; then will it become evident that the essence of truth is truth in all ages, that the substance of justice remains justice unaltered and unalterable, and that righteousness is righteousness, world without end.

KARL HEINZEN MEMORIAL.

The liberal Germans of Boston and vicinity celebrated on February 22 the seventy-second anniversary of the birth of their great leader, Karl Heinzen, who died Nov. 12, 1880. Soon after his death, at a mass meeting of German radicals in Boston, it was decided to hold a memorial service in the Turn-Halle on February 22, Mr. Heinzen's birthday falling on the same day as that of the Father of our Republic.

The hall was beautifully decorated, German and American flags draping the entire wall back of the platform, except where a portrait of Mr. Heinzen of more than life-size hung, framed in with calla-lilies and roses. Excellent singing by the choral band of the Turners was interspersed with the addresses, and the whole exercises were a worthy memorial of the deceased leader.

Mr. J. Koch, chairman of the committee, in a few heartfelt and most appropriate words, stated what kind of man they had met to honor; and how, with mingled sadness and gratitude, they paid this tribute to one who "shone like a diamond even among precious stones,"—to the bold champion, for whose sharp criticism no one was too high or powerful, and for whose fraternal sympathy no human being needing it was too low or degraded.

Mr. K. Edelheim, of Philadelphia, removing an American flag, then displayed a beautiful mural crown resting on a purple velvet cushion, and with fitting words, in behalf of the German Free Religious Society of that city, presented the crown to the family of Mr. Heinzen. "To him who warred all his life against crown-wearers, 'by the grace of God,' might justly be given this Roman crown, modelled after that of the Roman Republic, which, by solemn vote, she bestowed only on some citizen whom she would distinguish for some great deed."

The crown was an exquisite piece of workmanship, unique in its design, and bore the inscription, "From the German Free Religious Society of Philadelphia. Karl Heinzen, the champion of freedom, truth, and right."

Mrs. Clara Neymann, of New York, was the first speaker, as the chairman said it was fitting that woman, for whose rights the deceased had been so unwearied a champion, should pay the first tribute.

We can give here but a slight sketch of her appreciative address:—

This national holiday will have for us Germans a double significance from this time forward. We celebrate this day the memory of Karl Heinzen, the most German of Germans, the most Radical of radicals, the man of the broadest humanities.

These two men, Washington and Heinzen, had points of character where they touched, making them kindred as great workers for humanity. The character of Washington, from the circumstances, exhibited itself in the patriotism of the general and statesman. Heinzen's, debarred from fully unfolding in his own land, became broader in this, embracing all mankind in his aspirations and sympathies. He, too, was the great warrior; but his weapon was the pen, with which he dealt unsparing blows where hypocrisy, falsehood, superstition, or oppression in any form was to be combated.

Slavery, black or white, he fought in his youth in Germany, France, England, and afterward in this country of his adoption. The human being as such, set free from the privations and limitations of its surroundings, stood higher to his thought than all traditions. The combat for this realization he carried on for more than twenty-five years in the Pionier, with a consistency unparalleled among his co-workers, and in a more condensed form in his essays and lectures,—a precious legacy for us to rightly value and diffuse both in English and German, for the benefit of our contemporaries and their posterity.

Freedom was with him no youthful dream, no mere flush of enthusiasm: it was an inward conviction, it was a part of his very being; it was the result of his sharp, penetrating insight into human nature and its needs for development.

What Mr. Heinzen felt were the causes of the failure of the Revolution of 1848 in Germany still operate here. The same want of judgment, of comprehensiveness of views, of practicality, is too often displayed in this country by Germans; and with these is often associated indifference, that despicable enemy of every kind of mental progress or moral advancement. Where among us Germans is to be found a similar example of the noblest self-sacrifice, utter self-forgetfulness, as Heinzen displayed through his whole severely tried life?

The intellectual education of to-day is deficient in a moral basis, without which there can be no lasting growth. Knowledge may point out and prepare the road to happiness: virtue, supreme morality alone, can create an enduring habitation for it. Even among us Germans, the ideal is being pressed into the background. Money-worship is taking the place of king-worship of former times. Here even, in the Republic, we bow the knee before it, and morality and intellect stoop to do its bidding. "It is the spirit of trade," said Heinzen, "the spirit of the usurer, which dominates our whole life, which, with its demoralizing, reactionary influence, has been transferred to every department of political life. In this atmosphere of trade, the government of the Republic has become a traffic like all others. The politicians have become bargainers like the merchants, and make their calculations with principles as do the latter with figures. They add, subtract, and divide principles like numbers, but the multiplying they seem to avoid. If whole principles do not suit for the bargain, they halve or even quarter them, and call that a compromise."

Had Heinzen spoken and written in the English language, had he worked among Americans as among the Germans, he would have won during his lifetime the recognition and respect which even his bitterest enemies among the Germans accord him to-day. His marvellous insight into human nature, intense interest in all social movements, profound knowledge of the history of this country's political developments, and ardent love of democratic principles, would have procured him recognition as a power, although he might not have allied himself fully with any ruling party.

The defects in the American government which he saw did not dishearten him as they did so many other emigrants whom the Revolution of 1848 brought to our shores; but they rather spurred him on to work for a country which, in spite of these deficiencies, offered greater opportunities for freedom, for grander human development, intellectual, political, and moral, than any country on the globe.

In Schiller's Fall of Troy, Cassandra says, "What is decreed must come: what we apprehend must be our doom." But let us say: "No, it need not come: it is for us to keep watch and ward at Freedom's tower. Let us seize the best instruments at hand, and so steer our course toward the ideal of a State such as Heinzen has imaged for us in his True Democracy." Heinzen was the first German journalist, the only German writer of importance, who entered the field for woman's cause; and, in spite of all obstacles, he contended for the full rights of woman as a human being, and therefore the equal of man as such. He believed that in a free State only could a human being develop his faculties: this belief was to him a scientific fact; and, reasoning thus, he placed man and woman on the same step, and showed thus that man can only reach the fulness of a man's powers when the woman, thinking and acting freely herself, stands beside him, each aiding the other.

Heinzen was not a man of many words. The Germans he accused of using fine words and neglecting action. Let us remove from ourselves this reproach of lack of significance and weight in national affairs by one political act each year which shall bear our stamp, and shall be the carrying into action of some one of the principles of him whose name we this day commemorate. Thus, each 22d of February shall show a better memorial of him by some grand forward step taken by us Germans in this land of his and our adoption.

As Washington is called the Father of the Republic, so let us on this day remind ourselves that we may rightfully call Karl Heinzen the founder of a truer democracy, as he was the first to draw attention to some of those defects in the American system which had their rise in monarchical principles and traditions.

At the close of the preceding address, Wendell Phillips was introduced, amid loud applause. He commenced by thanking the Germans for the opportunity thus given him to bear testimony to the character of this great intellectual leader. In the troublous times of the war, he had made Mr. Heinzen's acquaintance, and valued him highly. I never met him on the streets, said he, without a feeling of the highest respect; and this respect I paid to the rare, almost unexampled courage of the man. It is a peculiar trait in human nature, exhibited by every race which has come to these shores, that few persons who suffer wrong, and feel keenly what is their right, are willing, when they have the opportunity, to share their rights with others, to acknowledge their equal claim to them. The English Puritans came to a wilderness wholly for the sake of the right to worship God as they desired; and, as soon as they could incorporate institutions, they refused this right to others. The Irishman, fleeing from centuries of oppression under English extortion, breathes the free air of America, expands under it into a full manhood, and denies these rights to the negro and the Chinaman. The German with all his enthusiasm for liberal institutions, for which he has suffered imprisonment at home or has abandoned the Fatherland to seek the realization of his ideas here, is yet seldom willing to share rights fully with others. We are having now a notable example of this in a Cabinet minister, who shows how even an enlightened German fails to guide his actions by the eternal principles of right and wrong, and seeks rather excuses in policy and shrewd compromises. Mr. Heinzen in this respect stands almost alone among the emigrants to these shores. His idea of human right had no limitation. His respect for the rights of a human being as such was not to be shaken.

He was by profession a journalist; and, when he arrived in America, journalism was just beginning to take that place in the world which it has ever since held, as a great power. Journalism is the road, entering upon which with suitable equipment, a man finds no limit set as to the influence which may be exerted there under intelligent guidance. Heinzen knew this. His extraordinary ability was prized here. The temptation to use this talent to gain reputation, money, power, at a time when, a poor emigrant, he lacked all these, and was certain of acquiring them, was great; yet all these he laid calmly aside for the sake of the eternal principle of right, of freedom. He espoused the detested slave-cause at a time when to do so meant poverty, desertion of fellow-countrymen, scorn, persecution even.

Thus he acted in every cause. What seemed to him the right, after the most unsparing search for the truth, he upheld, no matter at what cost. During the war, feeling that, through ignorance or timidity on the part of Lincoln's government, precious treasures and lives were being wasted, he was foremost among a few leading men who proposed the nomination of Fremont for the presidency. We had many private meetings and much correspondence with leading men in New York. I shall never forget some of those conversations with Mr. Heinzen. He was so far-seeing and sagacious. He was so ingenious in contriving, his judgment was so penetrating. He showed such wise forecasting of all possible events, such provision in case of defeat. All this impressed me with his greatness as a leader of men, if only certain conditions could have been removed.

One other characteristic he had, belonging only to truly great men. There was a kind of serenity and dignity about him, as of one sure of the right in the course which he took, in the principles which he stated. He was far in advance of other minds; but he was sure, in his trust in human nature, that all others would come, must come, to the same point with himself. He could wait. Few, possessing equal mental ability, are able also to do this.

The greatest courage is to dare to be wholly consistent. This courage Heinzen showed, when a little yielding, so little as would have been readily pardoned on the ground of good common-sense, would have gained him popularity, fame, money, power. He remained true to himself.

It is possible that in our great North-West he might have found a wider appreciative audience, as regarded his religious convictions; but I think there was here in New England, despite the more rigid views and perhaps narrower outlook, a kind of strict honesty in principle, less compromising for party purposes, which made New England atmosphere, on the whole, more congenial to him than what the West could have offered, of more direct sympathy with his religious views. Like my friend William Lloyd Garrison, who was also his friend, each worked for principle. What does the world give of material comfort to its greatest minds? Garrison's paper could never support his family, hardly sustained itself. Friends were continually obliged to come to its support; and, when the cause was gained, down went the Liberator. Plain living and rich thinking were their enforced methods of life, not the rich, luxurious living which makes cowards in thought and action.

So, too, the Pionier dropped from Heinzen's hands, but not because his work was accomplished. Garrison was more fortunate in seeing the fruition of his labors. Heinzen could not, because his were broader, deeper, higher, embracing all humanity's work in every sphere of progress. Universal human rights,—he stopped short of nothing less.

Mr. R. Reitzel, of Washington, desired to pay also his tribute. Heinzen was to him a whole man, who from his very earliest days showed an energy, a determination, the spirit of defence of what he deemed his right. His love for his mother whom he lost young was an intense passion. A boy of only four years, as he stood beside her grave looking down upon the coffin just lowered to its place, some adult bystander pushed him aside; and he, to defend what he deemed his right, indignantly bit into the intruder's hand. In his school-days, we see the same intolerance of subjection, the same opposition to authority, often unjustifiable of course in the immature boy. He muffled the seminary bell, he led bands of mutinous pupils, and even cudgelled a despotic tutor. At college, his untamable spirit brought him constantly into difficulties, and he was finally suspended. The testimonial sent home to his father noticed, however, the remarkable originality in the compositions of the unruly youth. Released from college, the love of adventure carried him to Java in a Hollandish regiment. Returning to Europe after a year of fearful disappointment, penniless, he gave up the chance for a trip of exploration through Africa, rather than break a promise given his father not to dispose of his watch, a paternal gift. He remained faithful to his given word. Then came woman's love to the youth, and for her sake he bowed his neck under the fearful yoke of Prussian official life. What those eight years must have been to a man of Heinzen's temperament! One can hardly conceive of Heinzen as a Prussian official. To all the pettiness of an excise-officer's work, he stooped his great powers, until the strain became intolerable, and he was forced to flee a despotism become unendurable. This ardent hatred of oppression, this love of humanity, this abhorrence of meanness or compromise, was ever displayed in all the lands through which he was pursued. How he took up the cudgel here in America against the corruption, the vulgarity, the venality of the German press, as he found it, is well known by those who felt the lash of his whip and who trembled at his very name, yet who secretly read and admired the productions of a mind which they outwardly affected to despise and ridicule. But, though the lips are closed and the pen laid aside, the principles he advocated shall be our eternal guides, his admonitions our ceaseless warning. The best memorial we can keep is to inscribe them on our banner, and swear anew fealty to them with each returning 22d of February. J. A. SPRAGUE.

IS FREE RELIGION RELIGION IN RHODE ISLAND?

The Free Religious Society of Providence has again petitioned the General Assembly of Rhode Island, asking for such legislation as shall place beyond doubt the right of its resident minister to join parties in marriage. The following report, taken from the Providence newspapers, will prove of general interest:—

The committee on the judiciary of the House of Representatives met in the House chamber, Monday, February 21, to consider sundry matters now pending before them. A hearing was first given to the matter of amending the marriage laws. The proposed bill is one prepared by the Rev. Mr. Woodbury, and introduced in the House by Mr. Eames, of Providence, February 8. The bill provides that no persons shall be married without having previously obtained a certificate from the town clerk, stating that the persons are eligible to the matrimonial contract, also whether the persons are divorced. The bill also provides that any society professing to meet for religious purposes, and incorporated for such purposes, and sustaining a minister publicly ordained, according to its own customs and usages, shall be considered as belonging to a religious denomination within the meaning of the statute, and its minister shall have the right to join parties in marriage, conferred by this statute upon the regularly ordained ministers of such religious denominations. Rev. Augustus Woodbury, Unitarian, Rev. D. H. Greer, Episcopal, Rev. Geo. Harris, Orthodox, and F. A. Hinckley, Free Religious, appeared in behalf of the bill. After the first section had been duly considered, Mr. Woodbury took up the second section of the bill concerning ministers of "societies professing to meet for religious purposes," etc., saying that this section was intended to confer the right of marrying upon Rev. Mr. Hinckley, of the Free Religious Society. This matter was considered at the ministers' meeting which had been held, and all were in favor of it. Mr. Hinckley is a minister of an organized society, which, if it is not already chartered, will be, and which meets for religious purposes. The people of his society come to him to be married, preferring to be married by him; but under the present law he cannot marry them, and they are obliged to go to somebody else. He should have this right. It is impossible at this time, and especially in Rhode Island, to define the word "religious"; but there are certain underlying principles which are common to all societies.

Chairman Sheffield, of the committee, said he thought religion must include worship, and he failed to see that the Free Religious Society worshipped anything.

Mr. Hinckley, replying, said: "As individuals we have all shades and degrees of liberal opinion, but as a society we have a distinct element of worship. All sane minds recognize a Power over and above us. We claim," said he, "that the one great essential principle is recognized when we recognize this Power, though we do not recognize it in the same manner as do other denominations."

MR. LAPHAM.—What do you worship?

MR. HINCKLEY.—I am perfectly willing to tell you what I worship; but I think it is without the province of the State to define what men shall or may worship.

MR. LAPHAM.—I understood you to say the other day that you did not recognize God, Christ, or the Bible.

MR. HINCKLEY.—What I did say was that we could not recognize God, Christ, or the Bible as the creeds do: we do recognize a Power over and above the human.

MR. LAPHAM.—That which you call a Power is what other people call God?

MR. HINCKLEY.—Now, you begin to define. The moment you do that, you find irreconcilable differences in the churches as well as out of them.

Rev. Mr. Harris said the ministers were in favor of Mr. Hinckley's having this right. If the Legislature objected, it would be more orthodox than the clergymen.

Rev. Mr. Greer hoped the privileges which he and others enjoyed, under the statute, would be extended to their brother minister, Mr. Hinckley.

The committee promised to take the matter into consideration and report to the House.

This hearing was a very vital one in the history of this struggle, as marking the attitude of the leading ministers of the city, representing three different denominations, who came forward, entirely of their own impulse, in this very handsome defence of religious freedom.

UNITARIANISM DEFINED?

To the Editor of the Free Religious Index:—

I have read with interest your article on Mr. Weston, of Leicester, and the action of the Unitarian Committee on his case. But I have written an interrogation point after the "Unitarianism Defined," with which I have headed my letter, because I do not think the committee in question has defined Unitarianism or that it has tried to do so. It could not, if it tried; but it has not even tried. The question before it was of Mr. Weston's right to receive Mr. Southgate's money. It has answered this question in the negative. Why, I do not know, for it has given no reason. But, I presume its reason was that Mr. Weston's "broad and generous views of God" would not have been recognized as Unitarian by Mr. Southgate, when he made his will. I cannot doubt that several members of the committee, who consider themselves good Unitarians, would have voted in just the same way, if the question had been about themselves instead of about Mr. Weston; for I am sure that two or three of them are in substantial agreement with Mr. Weston in his religious opinions. I cannot doubt that if I had myself been in Mr. Weston's place, though I am still more than willing to call myself, and to be called, Unitarian and Christian, the vote would have been the same.

At the same time, I can by no means think the vote was just, because I am informed on excellent authority that Mr. Southgate was a man of progressive spirit, who, if he had lived, would probably have cordially assented to Mr. Weston's presentation of religious matters. In law, this fact might not avail; but in equity, it seems to me, it should have been decisive in Mr. Weston's favor.

In the absence of all evidence, I do not think that it is fair for any of us to assume that Mr. Weston's unwillingness to call himself a Christian was dominant and controlling. I trust sincerely it was not. Still, calling myself a Christian because I am in the historic order of Christianity (if I were in the Buddhist historic order, I would still call myself a Buddhist), I should feel myself to be no less a Unitarian, if I could not call myself a Christian, because Unitarianism as a principle means the supremacy of reason and complete religious liberty, and hence transcends Christianity considered as a system of doctrine. I know the famous "Year-Book Controversy" decided this the other way. But that controversy was not final, even for the American Unitarian Association. Its decision will one day be reversed. But, even if it should not be, Unitarianism is not coëxtensive with the American Unitarian Association. It is a larger fact.

I have read Mr. Weston's sermons with admiration of their intelligence and candor. If his "broad and generous views of God" are not "known as Unitarian," the more's the pity. I am still glad to recognize them as substantially my own, and to hail in Mr. Weston a fellow-worker from whom no technical difference can separate me in the least degree. In his sense of the word, I am not a Christian; in my sense of the word, he is still Christian. And both of us I am sure are more Unitarian than it was possible for the Unitarians of an earlier time to be, because the Unitarianism of modern science and philosophy has been omnipresent. I cannot doubt that his ability and earnestness will soon secure for him another field of work; but the case of the Leicester people, so suddenly obliged to give up the man of their choice, under whose preaching they were so prosperous and happy, is hard indeed. Yours truly,

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 21, 1881.

[We cannot agree with Mr. Chadwick's point that the referees probably decided as they did, because they thought the views of Mr. Weston "would not have been recognized as Unitarian by Mr. Southgate, when he made his will"; and, therefore, that they neither made nor attempted any general definition of Unitarianism. If the question of what Mr. Southgate regarded as Unitarianism had been before them, they certainly ought to have sought evidence concerning his views beyond the meagre utterances of his will, and doubtless would have done so. But nothing, as we understand, was before them in evidence, except the will itself and Mr. Weston's printed sermons. And, by the conditions of the question presented to them and the terms of the will, they were to decide whether Mr. Weston's views, particularly his views concerning God, were in accordance with those "known by the name Unitarian." Known by whom? Not, certainly, by Mr. Southgate alone, or the Leicester society alone, but generally by anybody in the community in a position to know. And, on this question, the committee decided, not that Unitarianism is recognized as a principle which "means the supremacy of reason and complete religious liberty," but a certain system of doctrines that excludes certain other doctrines, even though the latter may be "broad and generous,"—that would, for instance, probably exclude Mr. Chadwick's doctrines concerning God as well as Mr. Weston's.—ED.]

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MISS M. A. HARDAKER will lecture in Malden next Sunday evening.

GOV. LONG has appointed a day of fast. Does the Governor intend to fast?

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD is on his way eastward. He will speak to the Liberal Association at Albany, N.Y., on the afternoon and evening of March 6.

MR. GEORGE CHAINEY feels encouraged by his liberal movement at Paine Hall in this city. His subject next Sunday is "Minot Savage's Talks about God."

REV. SILAS FARRINGTON, a liberal Unitarian preacher who has been settled in England for some years, expects to sail in June for a three months' visit to this country among old friends.

THE death of Senator Carpenter removes from public life one of the most conspicuous and brilliant men of the country, capable also, with a more careful use of his powers, of much greater results than he accomplished.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE'S recent course of lectures before his people at the Church of the Unity in this city upon "Belief in God" are soon to be published in a book, with this title. Arrangements have also been effected with Trübner & Co. for their republication in London, where Mr. Savage has a growing reputation as well as in this country. Copies of this and all of Mr. Savage's works may be obtained through this office.

REV. DR. R. H. STORRS, of Brooklyn, N.Y., is delivering a course of ten lectures before the Lowell Institute, upon the "Divine Origin and Growth of Christianity." Of course, these lectures discuss this subject according to the exclusively orthodox way of contemplating history and the great event and its influences which are passed under review. Would it not now be a gracious and most becoming thing for the Lowell Institute to arrange for another season, if it is not possible for this, a course of lectures from the Free Religious stand-point, from such an equipped and dispassionate scholar as Samuel Johnson?

IT is evident that the people of East Saginaw, Mich., have discovered that Mr. Rowland Connor is among them, as generally happens wherever he devotes himself to public speaking. The Daily Courier of that place thus refers to his work there in its issue of February 22: "Fully seven hundred people assembled at the Academy of Music Sunday night to listen to Rev. Rowland Connor's lecture on 'The Sympathies of Religion.' The reverend gentleman spoke for over one hour, and commanded the closest attention throughout from the vast audience, who at the close would gladly have had him continue. Mr. Connor is a gentleman of eloquence and force, and with each recurring lecture draws such an addition to his audience, which, if it continues, must eventually necessitate the erection of a building with a greater holding capacity. The subject for the next Sunday's discourse was 'The True and the False in the World's Religions.' The singing by the choir was of an excellent order."

On legless feet as base next stood
Shape wrought of stone or cedar wood,
Half-organic: o'er it wove
A verdurous roof the sacred grove.
Breathed dædal Art its magic spell;
And in my-tic, perfumed cell,
Carven fair of marble white,
On a throne sat Aphrodite;
Locks of Zeus ambrosial rolled,
Wrought in ivory and gold;
Hunted Artemis in stone;
Pallas loomed o'er sea and land,
Warder of the Attic strand;
And with silver bow in hand
Python-slayer Phœbus shone.
Carving semblances of life,
Chisel waged with nature strife,
Made the Parian block express
Ideal might and loveliness,
Beauty of a mould more fair
Than ever breathed the earth's gross air.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 3, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

THE DEED NOT DONE.

We have the very great pleasure of announcing that the Parker Memorial Building is not sold. According to the terms of the sale as arranged two months ago, the purchaser (Mr. Rich, of the firm Colby & Rich, publishers of the Banner of Light) was to pay $10,000 at once, and the balance in full, $65,000, on or before the 1st of March, the $10,000 to be forfeited unless the balance should be paid at that time. The $10,000 were paid as agreed; but Mr. Rich has now informed the proprietors that he cannot complete the purchase. Since the contract was made, it has transpired that the money for the purchase was to be provided chiefly by one gentleman, a former attendant on Theodore Parker's ministry in the Music Hall. This gentleman, after an absence from Boston for a number of years, in which he seems to have acquired a handsome fortune, has lately returned to make his home in this city. Soon after his return, learning that Parker Memorial Hall might be sold, he conceived the idea of securing it for the use of the Spiritualists, having himself become convinced of the truth of their theory, though holding it evidently in a broad-minded way. It was he who furnished the $10,000 that were paid over to the proprietors in cash, and who was to pay the larger part of the remainder. But, since the contract was made, he has come to the conclusion, looking at all sides of the question more thoroughly, that the hall had better remain in the hands of the old proprietors. He has therefore withdrawn his gifts from the Spiritualists, and transferred them in part to the present owners toward lifting the mortgage on the building. For this purpose, he gives the $10.000 already paid to them, and $15,000 more; and also donates the organ which he had ordered to be built for the hall, and which is still to be placed in it at his expense. This generous action will reduce the debt to so manageable a sum that the proprietors will doubtless take action at once for liquidating the whole. As a consequence of all this, the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society still lives! And not only has it a right to hope for continued, but for larger life. Let the Liberals of Boston now rally to its support, with a response worthy of their noble benefactor, who prefers to be known by his deed rather than by his name.

F. R. A. LECTURE WORK.

In pursuance of the plan of enlarging the active work of the Free Religious Association, for which a fund of about two thousand dollars was raised last spring, the Executive Committee of the Association at a recent meeting adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, with a view to greater possible activity in the work of disseminating the principles of the Free Religious Association, the General Agent is hereby instructed, under the direction of the office committee, to arrange for courses of lectures in localities where they may be desired, provided the local friends will at least furnish hall and audience and pay all travelling expenses. And the committee are hereby authorized to draw upon the treasurer for a sum not exceeding four hundred dollars for this purpose.

Acting upon this resolution, and in accordance with the plan proposed and accepted at the last annual meeting, the Committee have made arrangements by which they are now prepared to respond to calls for lecturers. It is supposed that these lectures will be on Sunday, and it is desired that there should be at least four in a place; but exceptions to these conditions may be admitted. Applications or letters of inquiry are to be addressed to Mr. D. H. Clark, General Agent of the Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

DR. HAMMOND ON MIRACLES.

The International Review for March contains an article by Dr. William A. Hammond on "The Scientific Aspects of Modern Miracles," which every reader of the Index may heartily enjoy. We do not suppose that even Dr. Hammond would claim that it contains anything new in either science or philosophy; but in clear and vigorous English, it lays bare the folly of Dr. Tyng and other Episcopalian clergymen, who have recently confessed their belief in the miracles of Lourdes and Knock. Dr. Hammond gives a brief account of the Lourdes phenomena, proves their complete agreement with analogous phenomena which were long ago naturally explained, gives some amusing and instructive facts concerning his own experiments with the water of Lourdes and with Aqua Crotonis drawn fresh from the faucet in New York city, and manages incidentally to say some things which will make the orthodox subscribers of the International open their eyes and adjust their spectacles for another look.

We quote two or three significant passages: "The belief in miracles is only another mode of expressing ignorance." "The water of Lourdes has never . . . produced an eversion of an ingrowing toe-nail." "Its whole history is the old story which pervades medical literature from end to end, and which will be told again and again in some form or other so long as women become hysterical, ecclesiastics desire churches built, or ignorance prevails among the laity." "The writer is willing to go as far as the farthest to support the validity of 'faith cures,' but he knows, as well as he knows anything, that it is not a matter of the slightest consequence what the thing is in which faith is put, whether it be a piece of the rope with which a murderer was hung, or powdered snakes and lizards, or the dried blood of a witch, or the moss grown from a dead man's skull, or (and we say it with due reverence) prayer to God, or even to the devil. . . . It makes no difference, one is just as efficacious as the other." The International is published by the very orthodox publishing house of A. S. Barnes & Co.; and, if we remember aright, was first issued with the announcement that it would contain nothing in opposition to the currently received tenets of Orthodoxy. Against the encouraging fact, however, of the appearance of so radical an article in this Review, must be put the fact that Mr. Lassere's book, Notre Dame de Lourdes, from which Dr. Hammond extracts his description, had reached a seventy-fourth edition in 1874, and had been honored by Pius IX. with a special pastoral letter to the author. The votaries of superstition are still in an immense majority. If a little more scientific light were let into pulpits to save such influential preachers as Dr. Tyng from giving the weight of their names to confirm the superstitions, the majority might be much sooner shifted to the other side.

HERE is a voice from Western Unitarianism, called forth from Unity by the Eastern decision in the Leicester case: "We patiently wait the day when Unitarians will gladly recognize as their own all devout and truth-seeking souls that are willing and anxious to partake of their fellowship. It is for Unitarians to make character, and not theological phrasings, the test of fellowship; and those only are to be left out who desire it by their own election. Any Year-Book compiled on a narrower spirit than this will continue to be an offence to the Christ-like inclusiveness of this fellowship, and a reproach to the great word it bears." Of the same decision, the Independent says, "This does not seem to us a bigoted exercise of judgment," but adds: "Even Unitarians, however 'broad and generous' their views, must draw the line somewhere; and it is not unreasonable to make it exclude those who ostentatiously reject Christianity." Is the use of the word "ostentatiously" here meant to imply that one who rejects Christianity, but does not openly say so, may be included in Unitarian fellowship? The Congregationalist, after giving a statement of the case, says, "This decision is likely to be of more than local interest to the denomination, as an answer more nearly official, perhaps, than any other which has been pronounced to the question, 'What is Unitarianism?'" All of these journals evidently think that the referees' decision is not limited "simply and solely to the case of the Leicester society."

WE have received another communication from Mr. Samuel Johnson with reference to matters that have been in discussion between himself and us, which we desired to give to our readers this week; but, in the press of material, it has to go over till our next issue.

WE shall print next week Mr. S. B. Weston's farewell discourse to the Society at Leicester.

MISAPPREHENDED.

I do not know who A. N. Adams is. But, if I may judge from his article on "Consciousness and Philosophy," in the Index for February 24, I know him quite as well as he knows me. If there is any one thing I have most emphatically not either taught or believed, ever since any part of the public knew or cared anything about it, it is just the position he attributes to me. My sermons have been published weekly for nearly five years, and neither in them nor in any one of my books can such a position be found. Such statements as his tend to make one profoundly sceptical as to the use of attempting to propagate one's opinions. For, if a man of education and ability enough to write for a newspaper misunderstands and misrepresents in this fashion, what can you expect of the common run of listeners?

The passage in his article that calls for this remark is this: "My good grandmother knows from her feeling that her conversion to religion forty years ago is infallibly correct. Rev. M. J. Savage knows, because he feels, loves, hopes, aspires, not simply that feeling, loving, hoping, and aspiring exist, but that outside of all material forms there is eternal, infinite, omnipotent life; that we are bound to suppose personal life apart from human life."

Now, this passage is not a very long one; but the ability, such as it is, of my critic, manifests itself in the fact that he has succeeded in packing into it three separate and distinct misstatements. I will pick them up in reverse order, beginning at the end of the quotation.

1. He makes it appear that I use the word personal in its ordinary and popular sense, and so represents me as saying about God what I did not say. For I, elaborately and at length, defined my use of the word.

2. He makes me assert the existence of an eternal, infinite, and omnipotent life "outside of all material forms." I did no such thing.

3. He represents me as saying that feeling may be adequate proof as to the nature of objective facts. This is not true. What I did was this: In the use of the scientific method, I treated a class of feelings as facts,—which they obviously are, as much as are rocks and fossils,—and from them inferred certain things as their most natural explanation.

If the positions I took need defence, this is no time to enter upon it. It will be time enough to do that when my critic states my position and takes exception to it. He has done neither as yet.

His "good grandmother" may have been lamentably at fault in her logic. But, if so, her descendant certainly illustrates the scientific law of "heredity"; though, in this case, without the tendency toward "variation." M. J. SAVAGE.

CHANNING-PARKER MEMORIAL.

The Unity, which most of the readers of the Index know as a bright, liberal fortnightly, published in Chicago, under the patronage of those who are getting to be distinguished as "Western Unitarians," shows that its name is no misnomer by a hearty appeal to the friends of Channing and Parker respectively to unite in building a Channing-Parker Memorial. "Channing and Parker together," says Unity, "name the movement to which we belong. Channing and Parker together should be reverenced by those engaged in it. They did not coincide; but they do better, they supplement each other. The old quarrel between their followers should be forgotten, even in Boston. The day has already come when, in every building representing Channing's works, the name and face and works of Parker should be conspicuously honored. Even so with Channing in any building representing Parker. The American Unitarian Association has never kept for sale, we think, a work of Theodore Parker. The old hurt rankles deep, and this ungenerousness is its result; this disingenuousness, we almost write, for it is a refusal to give official place and sanction to the honor openly and abundantly expressed by most individual Unitarians. The American Unitarian Association has yet to learn to be noble in this matter. It is but a little thing to keep a friend's picture from the wall, his book from your shelf; but the ostracism may have much meaning. It is but a little thing to place them there, but the placing may mean even so great a thing as forgiveness and regret and simple justice."

"There ought to be," continues Unity, "in Boston a Channing and Parker Memorial Building. That only will represent Unitarianism. One building, and not two. One honor shared, and not divided. . . . Whoever and whatever joins the Channing and Parker element of the body, in openly acknowledged union, will be held as blessed by the Liberals of nineteen hundred. It would make both parties better, the radical as well as the conservative and the conservative as well as the radical, to assert thus to each other and the world their central oneness. The courage of the act before a world that would surely cry, 'I told you so,' would be animating. The effort it might cost each party to cast away old prejudices and turn from the surface to the substance of their faith would be spiritualizing. And, perhaps, no way to reach this happy end would be so graceful and effective as to simply join, in one Memorial Building, the two names, Channing, Parker. Is our courage great enough? Are our prejudices small enough? If so, we almost think the money waits?"

For one I heartily second the motion of our Western colaborer.

At the last National Conference of Unitarians in Saratoga, an association was formed, one of whose express objects is to raise money for the erection of a "Channing Memorial Building in Boston." It is designed to serve the double purpose of a memorial in honor of Channing, and also a home and workhouse, where his followers and friends may labor for the dissemination of those religious ideas which are so intimately associated with his name. It is understood that the Unitarians could utilize such a building as offices for the Christian Register, the Unitarian Review, their Sunday-school papers and other publications, and also for their business and ministerial meetings. But the Free Religious Association also has need of a similar building for its purposes. Its organ, the Index, is tired of "boarding round." It wants a place where it can plant a vine and fig-tree, that it can call sweet home, and to whose ample hearth it can welcome its friends from far and near. We need a room for business and social meetings, and a hall for our lecturers in Boston. Now is this proposition of unity altogether impracticable? Why cannot the Unitarians and Free Religionists, in the name of Channing and Parker, unite their efforts, and erect a Channing-Parker Memorial, that will serve all our practical needs, and at the same time do honor to each of these great names, and more,—unite in educational, reformatory, and philanthropic work those whose aims are essentially identical. Names should not divide those whose aims would unite. W. H. S.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I spoke one Sunday recently for the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I., of which Mr. Frederic Hinckley is the resident speaker. The organization is, I think, well sustained and lectures are well attended. It is doing a good work. Mr. Hinckley is a gentleman of ability, and seems to be thoroughly imbued with "the enthusiasm of humanity." He is radical and earnest, and liberal societies will do well to invite him to address them.

At Providence, I met comrades of former days, with whom I shared the dangers and hardships of a soldier's life, when the States of the North and those of the South, now at peace, were "belligerent, discordant, and drenched in fraternal blood." It was pleasant to talk over scenes through which we had passed nearly twenty years ago, but the pleasure was not untinged with melancholy recollections.

At Troy, I found many Liberals and good audiences; but the liberal organization is feeble. The city has a large, comparatively unprogressive Catholic element, and a very corrupt municipal government, against which the entire liberal element is arrayed and working by political methods. While in the city, I had the pleasure of hearing Mr. C. B. Lynn, a Spiritualist, whose discourse was sensible and well received.

At Port Jervis (where I debated several evenings with Rev. William I. Gill about a year ago), I found Liberals numerous, well organized, and active. At Alliance, Ohio, I gave two Sunday lectures in a church recently built by seceders from the Disciple (Campbellite) Church of that city. The new society is encouraged and assisted by all classes of Liberals. The platform is free; and my lectures, although radical, gave so little offence that I was requested to address the society again the first opportunity. The audiences were the largest and finest I ever addressed in that city, where I have spoken many times the past ten years. I lectured one evening at Beloit, Ohio, a small place, but in which are many intelligent and sterling Freethinkers.

Whitehall, Ill., I regard as one of the most liberal towns in the West. All the leading men are Freethinkers. I have spoken there every year since 1875, and always to intelligent and appreciative audiences. Peru, Ill., is another community of the same sort. Arrangements for recent lectures I gave in that city were made chiefly by Mr. Joseph Even, a gentleman who is deeply interested in the progress of liberal principles, and who has made original contributions to science, several species of extinct forms which he discovered now bearing his name in standard scientific works. Peru is made up largely of Germans, and is a very intelligent community.

At Galesburg, Ill., I gave two lectures. In that city are a Universalist college and church. There is also a Congregationalist college. Which of the two institutions is the most orthodox I am not able to say; but the latter is probably the most progressive. Universalists, as an organized body, have evidently finished their work of reform; and the sooner they mingle with the other sects, the better. At Sandwich, Ill., I gave a course of lectures, which were something new for that community, although many Liberals are there, and among them leading men of the place.

At Plano, Ill., I had an hour's conversation with Joseph Smith, son of the founder and martyr of Mormonism, and president of the sect of Mormons known as the "Josephites," who number about fifteen thousand, with branches in many parts of the world, and missionaries zealously at work in this country and Europe making converts every year. Joseph Smith preaches for the society at Plano, and edits, in the interests of his sect, a paper which has a circulation of three thousand. He is a modest, unpretentious gentleman, of fair ability and education, and is much respected by his fellow-citizens for his unblemished character and personal worth. He has no sympathy with polygamy, and regards the Mormonism of Utah as a perversion of the primitive faith, and Brigham Young as a usurper and an impostor. Of his sincerity, there is no doubt. Pointing to a portrait of his father, which hung on the wall of his office, he asked, "Does that look like the face of a religious impostor?" He kindly invited me to accompany him to his home and dine with him, but I was obliged to decline. William Smith, a brother of Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, still lives, and resides at Elkader, Ia., where I met him a few years ago. He firmly believes his brother was an inspired prophet, and gives a minute and an interesting account of his life up to the time of his tragic death. The history of Mormonism is very instructive and suggestive to the student of religious literature.

At Quincy, Ill., I gave three lectures to the largest audiences I ever addressed in that city. The daily press gave very fair and good reports of all the lectures. The German and American liberal element in Quincy is large. While in the city, I passed several hours with Mr. J. Vila Blake, the Unitarian minister, and heard one of his discourses, which was a production of rare beauty and eloquence. Mr. Blake is a man of generous culture, of broad views, and the most kind and catholic spirit. He spoke about three years, I think, for the Parker Society in Boston. He wished me to occupy his pulpit, from which I spoke to his congregation two years ago; but the arrangements which had been made for my lectures at the Opera House would not permit. The work he is doing in Quincy cannot be too highly praised.

At Iowa City, Ia., I gave a course of lectures. The arrangements were made by Professor Philbrick of the Iowa State University, and other professors of that institution; and the lectures were well attended. I spoke in that city two years ago. The growth of liberal sentiment, in the short time that had elapsed, was quite perceptible.

At Ames, Ia., where I speak frequently, I had large audiences. When I first visited that city, ten years ago, President Welch of the State Agricultural College thought it his duty to endeavor to counteract the influence of my lectures by giving discourses against Darwinism and Evolution. Now, he is a strong supporter of Darwinism. Darwin's Origin of Species and Spencer's Data of Ethics are used as text-books in the college of which he is still the president. Nearly all the professors in the college are evolutionists, and several of them have evinced considerable interest in the recent lectures I have given there. But my letter is already quite long enough, and I will reserve farther notes of my travels for another letter; adding only that everywhere I see indications of the growth of liberal thought, although the progress seems to be along the line of existing institutions and systems rather than in the formation of new organizations.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

One of the most valuable weekly journals published in this country is the Sanitary Engineer of New York. It is only partially professional in its character, but contains much matter on sanitary and health subjects, of value to all owners of houses. It discusses in a very able manner all subjects connected with sanitary science. It is very vigorous in its condemnation of poor work that causes disease. The practical information it contains every week would prevent much sickness; and the subjects it discusses are coming to have a very great importance in the eyes of all intelligent people. Health depends largely on physical causes, so that sanitary knowledge and practice are quite as important as hygiene. Of late, the sanitary condition of cities has risen into great importance, and unusual attention is given to public health measures. This is as it should be; and such a journal is performing a real public service in spreading abroad genuine information on all these subjects.

In the February number of the International Review, Mr. James M. Hubbard writes of "Fiction and Public Libraries." He gives statistics showing the vast number of novels which are drawn out of the public libraries every year. He maintains it is a great mistake to furnish such reading in unlimited amounts to the public. He objects to it on the ground that novel-reading is amusement only, and that the city cannot furnish people with gratuitous amusements. Mr. Hubbard is right in this position; for novel-reading serves no good purpose, such as needs careful fostering. Schools are maintained by the State because they make better citizens; and it is eminently proper that knowledge should be diffused through free public libraries. When, however, it comes to pass that seventy per cent. of the books read from those libraries are works of fiction, it becomes a serious problem if the whole business of dispensing that kind of literature in that way should not be stopped at once. The evil of indiscriminate charity has at last become apparent to a goodly number of thoughtful people. Is it not quite as much an evil to furnish books for amusement only to everybody who may choose to read them? While every possible aid should be furnished to those seeking knowledge, it may be questioned whether a positive injury is not being done to the public by inviting it to an indiscriminate, intellectual dissipation. Mr. Hubbard justly says that "it would be an absurd waste of money, to say the least, if the city, instead of establishing soup-kitchens to which the needy could come in times of great want, should open extensive restaurants in various quarters, at which all, rich and poor together, should receive free, not merely plain and wholesome food, but all kinds of highly seasoned and injurious dishes. Yet wherein does this differ from placing for the public use, in different parts of the city, large collections of novels and stories, good and bad, some wholesome and some with a "peculiar flavoring"? This is only another instance of how pitifully mistaken are indiscriminate efforts to benefit mankind.

In the March North American Review, Dorman B. Eaton contrasts the management of the insane asylums of England with those of this country, greatly to the discredit of the latter. He shows that our asylums have no proper checks upon their management, so that the superintendent and trustees have things in their own hands. The superintendent is an autocrat, is really responsible to nobody, and can do quite as he pleases, until his outrages are such as to be impossible of concealment. In England, on the other hand, every inmate and every portion of the asylums are regularly visited by competent inspectors; and the whole work is constantly subject to the most careful supervision. There is great need of reforms in this country in the care of the insane, without doubt; and the subject needs the thorough discussion it is now receiving.

Prof. Adler's Society of Ethical Culture maintains a system of free nursing for the poor. It supports two competent nurses, whose work is directed by the physicians of two of the city dispensaries. These ladies nurse the sick, care for their rooms, furnish clothing and food when necessary, and earnestly devote themselves to the conquering of disease. The physicians praise their devotion, and testify to the great importance of their work. The society has given nearly $2,000 the past year to this work, and a large number of its members seem to be interested in it. This work of nursing is supplemented by the labors of a relief committee, who furnish assistance to the nurses, send visitors to the sick, and provide all necessary articles for their comfort and recovery. In the very interesting printed report of this work, Prof. Adler says it is carried on thoroughly in the secular spirit. What he says on this point is of interest: "We do not care for the future salvation of our patients. We come to build them up for the present world, in which they are to live. We look upon them simply as human beings who are in need, and help them as human beings. We started from the proposition that there is no difference between Catholic pneumonia and Protestant pneumonia and Jewish pneumonia and Infidel pneumonia,—if a man has pneumonia at all, he deserves to be healed; that there is no difference between Catholic suffering or Protestant suffering or Jewish suffering or Infidel suffering in any form,—if a man suffers at all, he deserves to be relieved. Accordingly, it will be found in our statistics that the great majority of our patients have not been persons who agreed with us in our radical opinions on matters of religion,—we believe there was not one among our patients who shared our views in this respect,—but, rather, persons having religious convictions diametrically opposed to ours. We care not for that. All that we desire to be assured of is that the relief which our nurses bring is really needed, and of that we have the amplest assurance." G. W. C.

TO THE LIBERAL PUBLIC.

Dear Friends,—I owe you the profound gratitude of my heart for the interest many of you have taken in my utterances since I left the service of theology. I have been too much occupied in the struggle of life to answer all the personal letters that have come to me. Let me thank you for your words of cheer, admiration, and earnest sympathy. I desire to spend the balance of my days in working for the perfect enfranchisement of the human mind. I have undertaken to deliver a regular weekly lecture in Paine Memorial Hall, Boston. I should like, as far as possible, to have you all members of my parish. Will you join it?

My plan to allow you to do this is to publish my lectures in regular weekly numbers. I cannot, however, do this until I have subscribers enough to pay the printer's bill. Will all who will take a weekly copy of my lecture, at one dollar a year, please drop me a postal card to that effect? The money can be sent as soon as convenient on the receipt of the first lecture. If every one who reads this notice will immediately become a subscriber, I shall be made very happy.

Yours for liberty or death,

George Chainey.

Address, No. 3 Union Park, Boston, Mass.

At the Bow Street police-court on January 29, Susan Wills Fletcher again surrendered to her bail to answer the charge of having been concerned with her husband in unlawfully obtaining a quantity of jewelry, lace, and other property, by means of false pretences, from Mrs. J. T. Hart-Davis. The evidence for the prosecution was brought to a close; and, in adjourning the case until the 11th of February, the magistrate expressed his intention of sending it for trial, the prosecutrix being bound over in £1,000 to appear at the Central Criminal Court. One of the witnesses, Mr. James Maddocks, a house-decorator, who said he was introduced to the Fletchers in England by his brother-in-law, caused much amusement by his account of his share in one of their séances. He said that he took for the Fletchers a bottle of phosphorescent oil. He was introduced as a sceptical gentleman, and was allowed to sit between them. When the lights were put out, he wound up for the Fletchers a musical-box, touched the people with a pasteboard speaking-tube and a candle, helped to move the table about, put a coal-scuttle upon it, and produced lights by means of the oil; while Mrs. Fletcher did the same with the phosphorus from matches. In doing so, she dropped some of the matches; and he trod upon one of them which ignited, and for a moment he thought he should be recognized. One of the persons, however, took him for the spirit of her departed uncle. The people present were highly satisfied with the séance, and when it was over Mr. Fletcher asked him his opinion. The witness replied that he never thought people could be such fools. The witness described another séance of a similar character.—Pall Mall Budget.

Miss Ada Heather Bigg has just taken the Joseph Hume scholarship for political economy at University College, London. Its pecuniary value is sixty pounds. This is the first time this scholarship has been taken by a lady.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

Co-operation in the New World.

The reader has already seen some description of the meeting at the Cooper Institute, New York, which was the most important meeting on co-operation in which I was concerned. It was there I first met Rev. Robert Collyer, who presided. The address I delivered was reprinted in many papers, and in the Worker, in which it occupied nine columns. Professor Raymond stated they had commenced the Cooper Union Lectures for the year earlier than usual, as I was about to return to England, and they wished to commence with an address on co-operation. Mr. Thomas Ainge Devyr, of the Irish World, who was on the platform, was the first to advocate in Ireland that doctrine of Land Reform which has since occupied so much public attention. About 1858, three years before the slave war broke out in America, he sent me, from New York, a printed statement of the causes whose operations would end in war. It was a perfect political prophecy. Mr. Devyr raised some question at the Cooper Union as to its administration, when Mr. Peter Cooper, the founder, arose, handed to me his overcoat, and, advancing to the front, spoke in a clear, frank voice, and without digression, vindicating his management by statistical facts which showed an accurate memory. "We educate," he said, "two thousand people here; and now I am building a new story for the purpose of affording education to one thousand more. But I am glad," he added, "to hear suggestions which may enable me to make the place more useful. As I grow older, I hope to profit by sound advice (if I get it). I am only now in my eighty-ninth year." Thus pleasantly the practical patriarch of New York closed the discussion. He bears a striking resemblance to Sir Josiah Mason, of Birmingham, who is but five years his junior, and who has equally distinguished himself by discerning educational munificence. Mr. Cooper told me that his mother's house, in her earlier years, was barricaded against the attack of Indians in New York, which carries the memory a long way back.

The author of Our Visit to Hindostan relates that at Ulwar the political agent wished to plant an avenue of trees on either side of the road in front of the shops, for the purpose of giving shade, and had decided to put in peepul trees, which are considered sacred by the Hindoos; but the bunniahs, or native shopkeepers, one and all, declared that, if this were done, they would not take the shops, and, when pressed for a reason, replied it was because they could not tell untruths or swear falsely under their shade, adding, "And how can we carry on business otherwise?" The force of this argument seems to have been acknowledged, as the point was yielded, and other trees were planted instead. This was the moral of my lecture. I contended that co-operators could permit the peepul to be planted before their stores, as they could do business under their shade, having no taste and no interest in telling "untruths" or "swearing falsely" in business. Co-operative inspiration is that which Wendell Phillips has defined in his oration on Garrison: it is character. Co-operation is not merely a search for dollars: it is a search for honesty and equity in trade. How can a man worship the good God of honesty in his church, who has been cheating all the week over his counter or in his counting-house? Next, I endeavored to make clear the distinction between co-operation and State socialism. The adventures which befell me in consequence will be found in another chapter.

The Oneida Community no entreaty induced me to go near. My main reason was that a visit from me would have been in the papers, and it would have been thought at once that co-operation was some form of communism. It was my duty to take care that co-operation should be seen as a distinct thing. The communist may be a co-operator, but the co-operator may not be a communist. Of all forms of communism in America, I least liked Oneidaism, with its special sexual theory which nobody can explain. While I was there, Mr. J. H. Noyes, the leader of this society, announced what he called a "change of platform." He had given up, he said, the practice of "complex marriages," in deference to the public sentiment "evidently rising against it." Public sentiment always rose against it. He stated that their society would in future take Paul's platform, which permits marriage, but allows celibacy. It was stated privately that Mr. Noyes' son, who was a physician, refused to subject his wife to "complex marriage," and that this was the cause of its abandonment. If the devisor of Oneidaism was convinced that complex marriage was wrong, it was manly to relinquish it. Since, however, he admitted that he did not renounce the belief in his principle, the abandonment of it was, therefore, indefensible. The Mormons behaved with more courage and consistency, and refused to follow Mr. Noyes' example, saying, "Why should we abandon our position, unless we are convinced we are in error?"

Since leaving America, I have received many reports of public meetings, held in New York and elsewhere, to introduce co-operation on the English plan. There appears no prejudice against any scheme which is good, whatever country it may originate in. There would be more English features introduced into both America and Canada than there are, "were it not," as an intelligent observer told me in Ottawa, "that many Englishmen come over there filled with bitterness toward their own country, which tends to discourage the introduction of improvements on the English plan. Nevertheless, co-operation has certainly won many friends. Articles upon it, or reports concerning it, continually appear in the American papers. The idea of a wholesale agency supplying genuine articles to the stores seemed to most persons one worth realizing. Mr. A. R. Foote and the Rev. Dr. Rylance, of New York, have commenced to create a wholesale agency there. Everything in America seems to be adulterated: the certainty that it will be, if it can be, seems to be taken for granted. If co-operation takes root and changes this, it will amount to the commercial re-education of the people.

Roughly speaking, no commodity can be trusted. Quinine pills are not real, candles are short of weight, and silk short of the yard. Indeed, if stores were opened on the English plan,—of genuineness of quantity and quality,—they would be distrusted. The public would suspect any store which proposed to treat them honestly. They would think that somewhere the snake of interest lay concealed. Yet there is reason to think that this distrust will be overcome, for there is no difficulty which discourages an American when he has fairly made up his mind that the thing he has in hand ought to be "put through." If the people do resolve upon association, they mean it; and one or more of the active associates bear the name of "organizing members." This term has been introduced into England now, but in America they have long had the actual person. In New York, the gentleman who is one of the foremost in co-operative advocacy, Mr. Allan R. Foote, has a genius for organization. He has written and published a scheme of a wholesale society and of co-operative stores, and written co-operative pamphlets, which are interesting, brief, and wise in expression, as well as business-like. The following are some of the sentences he prints as mottoes in his small books of "Co-operative Laws":—

1. To grow rich, earn money fairly. 2. Spend less than you earn. 3. Hold on to the difference. The first requires muscle; the second, self-denial; the third, brains.

The competition of the individual system is for every man to see how much money he can divert into his own pocket from the pockets of those who labor for him. The only competition possible in commercial co-operation is to see which store will put and keep the most money into the pockets of those who support it.

If any man counsels you that you can gain wealth any other way except by working and saving, he is your enemy.

If a man owns a sovereign, he is a sovereign to that extent. If a man owes a sovereign, he is a slave to that extent.

These are maxims worthy of consideration elsewhere than in America, and the ideas expressed have never been put better anywhere. "Lectures on Social Questions," including Competition, Communism, Co-operation, and the Relations of Christianity to Socialism, are a series of the luminous discourses delivered by Rev. Dr. J. H. Rylance in St. Mark's Church, New York, which would be read with great interest in England.

The custom of a store is called the "patronage" of it. It is odd that independent self-helping Americans should retain a word which is so distasteful and disused under our "effete monarchy." In Mr. Foote's rules, it is provided that "two and one-half per cent. of the surplus accruing shall be expended by the directors in such manner as in their judgment shall best serve the purpose of recreation and education of members." Before this clause was drawn, you had to look all about America to find a single society which made provision for education. This arises partly because Americans have more education about their cities than any other country, and partly because they do not know that, of the social education necessary for industrial concert, they have none.

Mr. Charles H. White invited me to New Harmony, Ind. He told me that the old co-operators first formed a library there forty-two years ago, which was commenced with less than one hundred volumes, and has now four thousand. The land and the old library were given by Mr. William Macguire. The library tenement has been rebuilt, at a cost of more than $6,000. A community, founded by Rapp, residing at Economy, near Pittsburg, assisted them by a contribution of $3,000. Dr. Richard Owen arranged a collection of minerals and objects in natural history in the large room of the society, devoted to lectures and discussions.

At the close of a night's voyage from New York, I arrived at Watuppa, on the east of Quequechan. Watuppa is the Indian name for "the place of boats," and Quequechan signifies "falling water." Its modern name is Fall River, the largest cotton manufacturing centre in America, running nearly a million and a half of spindles. I spoke twice at Fall River; and at the Narragansett Hotel I met for the first time a real Russian Nihilist,—a lady, wondrously restless and vehement.

The Fall River Working Men's Co-operative Association occupies an entire block, consisting of several shop fronts. Very few stores in England look more imposing. Stores in America seem mostly to have been begun by two or three enterprising persons, who find the money to build the place and trust to the public coming to deal there. Beginning, as we do in England, with a few small shareholders, and increasing the premises and business as new members are induced to join, and looking forward to the education of the neighborhood around it for increase of members and purchasing success, is a plan quite unknown in America. Wondering whether this arose from the impetuosity of the people, I found it was partly due to this, but mainly to the laws affecting co-operation, which prevent the formation of stores on our plan. Yet in a country so unfettered as America no one would expect industrial impediments. On the contrary, there are complications in the air. The Act passed in 1867, for the purpose of legalizing co-operative and industrial unions, proposed that a capital of £1,000 must be found before commencing. I pointed out that this law rendered co-operation impossible on the English plan, since poor men, who most needed co-operation, could never commence it. However, when I pointed out that co-operation was legally impossible there as we conducted it, steps were at once taken to obtain a new law. Mr. Strahan, a very able counsellor of New York, and a brother of the editor of the Contemporary Review in England, kindly undertook to make a draft of the Act required. The one thing wanted in America to insure the success of co-operation is the art of "making haste slowly," which the new law will enable them to do.

DOMESTIC LIFE.

"And they brought young children to him, that he should touch them. . . . And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them."—MARK x., 13-16. Compare Matt. xix., 13-15; Luke xviii., 15.

1. The Origin of the Family.

The PERMANENT FAMILY RELATION is a distinguishing characteristic between MAN and the brute creation. This relation appears to have resulted from the weakness and helplessness of the human infant. The young of most animals instinctively provide and care for themselves, in many ways, from the day of their birth. A young child, on the contrary, is for a long time wholly dependent on parental watchfulness and protection.

This prolongation of the period of helpless infancy continually necessitates the performance of offices of love and affectionate care. The greater continuity of relationship between parent and child, thus engendered, finally results in developing a permanent capacity and desire for UNSELFISH AFFECTION, out of what was at first a mere temporary animal instinct.

NOTE.—The germs of more permanent affection are seen in the regard of certain animals for each other, and especially of certain domestic animals for man. But we nowhere find among animals anything corresponding fully to the human family. Most animals mate only for a single season, and regard their offspring as strangers, after they reach maturity. Domestic animals easily transfer their affection from one master to another.

2. The Domestic Relation among the Jews.

The obligations of the FAMILY RELATION were always regarded as inviolably sacred by the Jewish LAW. (See Ex. xx., 12, 14, 17; xxi., 15; compare Deut. v., 16, 18, 21, etc.) During the period of the BABYLONIAN captivity, this feeling was, doubtless, greatly strengthened by the calamities which drew the exiles closer together, and made the HOME the centre of worship and instruction, as well as of the ordinary domestic duties.

There is abundant evidence, however, that the high ideal of social obligations, manifested in later JUDAISM, was gradually developed out of a condition of primitive barbarism. (See Book of the Covenant, Ex. xxi.–xxiii., 19, etc.) In this respect, the history and experience of the JEWS were not different from those of all other peoples.

NOTE A.—Religion originally grew out of the family relation, and JUDAISM has always been peculiarly a family religion. So sacred did the JEWS deem marriage that they often used it as a symbol of the relation of YAHWEH to his people. He is termed the husband or "spouse" of ISRAEL.

The polygamy of the period of the PATRIARCHS and early KINGS, though not expressly forbidden in the BIBLE, was never customary among the masses of the people. In recent times, the JEWS have discountenanced it, even when it was recognized by the nations among whom they dwelt.

Talk with the older classes.—POLYGAMY: What do you think of the survival of this "relic of barbarism" among the MORMONS of UTAH? Ought it to be abolished by governmental interference? Would its forcible abolition be inconsistent with the principle of religious freedom to which our government is pledged? Ought the plea of religious sanction to prevent the prohibition of practices which the enlightened judgment of civilized nations regards as immoral or wrong,—e.g., human sacrifice, HINDOO Suttceism, and polygamy?

NOTE B.—The JEWS have always honored and respected woman; and many women, as REBEKAH, MIRIAM, DEBORAH, RUTH, and HANNAH, are held up as examples of true womanhood in the OLD TESTAMENT.

Ought not woman always to be treated as the equal of man? Has man any right to define or limit her privileges or occupations? Ought not woman to be permitted to hold and inherit property, and in a government of the people to vote and hold office on the same terms with man? What do you think of the rightfulness and practicability of WOMAN SUFFRAGE?

3. The Family Relation as Regarded by Jesus.

JESUS never married. Unlike the ESSENES, however, he expressly recognized the sacredness and permanence of the marriage relation; forbidding divorce except in extreme cases, and the marriage of divorced people. (Mark x., 2–12; Matt. xix., 3–9; compare Matt. v., 27, 28, 31, 32.) He appears to have entered into friendly and social relations with families who accepted his teaching, and welcomed his occasional visits. (Mark xi., 15–22; xiv., 3–9; Matt. ix., 10–17; xxvi., 6–9; Luke v., 29–39; vii., 36–50; x., 38–42; John xi., 1–7, 35–37; xii., 2–8.)

Yet he declared that after the resurrection there would be "neither marrying nor giving in marriage." (Mark xii., 18–25; Matt. xxii., 23–30; Luke xx., 27–36.) His belief in the speedy advent of the KINGDOM OF GOD doubtless restrained him from forming family ties, and from explicitly commending marriage to his disciples. He taught them to forsake father and mother, husband and wife, to follow him, and prepare for the approaching DAY OF JUDGMENT (Mark x., 29, 30; Matt. viii., 19–22; x., 34–38; xix., 29, 30; Luke ix., 57–62; xiv., 25, 26; xviii., 29, 30), and declared that his true disciples were his nearest relatives rather than his own father, mother, brothers, and sisters. (Mark iii., 31–35; Matt. xii., 46–50; Luke viii., 19–21.) He appears to have received little sympathy or support from his immediate relatives, and to have associated little with them. (Mark vi., 1–6; Matt. xiii., 54–58; Luke ii., 41–50; iv., 16–31.)

4. His Love for Little Children.

The love of JESUS for little children sufficiently indicates that he was no ascetic, but that his avoidance of family ties was due to other reasons. He received and blessed children who were brought to him, declaring, "Of such is the KINGDOM OF GOD." (Mark x., 13, 14, 16; Matt. xix., 13–15; Luke xviii., 15, 16.) He said: "Whosoever shall not receive the KINGDOM OF GOD as a little child, he shall not enter therein" (Mark x., 15; Luke xviii., 17), and "Whosoever receiveth one of such children in my name, receiveth me." (Mark ix., 33–37; Matt. xviii., 1–5; Luke ix., 46–48.) He commanded his disciples, "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones." (Matt. xviii., 10.) He appears to have regarded children as representatives of that purity and simplicity of character, and that sincerity of faith and trust, which he deemed essential to the members of the ideal brotherhood of the HEAVENLY KINGDOM.

General Questions.

1. How did the family originate? 2. How did infantile helplessness develop man's affectional nature? 3. Does the family relation exist among animals? 4. How do the JEWS regard the domestic relation? 5. Did they cherish this high ideal in more primitive times? 6. Of what religious relation was marriage regarded as the symbol? 7. How has woman been regarded by the JEWS? 8. What did JESUS teach respecting marriage? 9. Why did he not form family ties? 10. How did he regard divorce? 11. What did he say about marriage in the KINGDOM OF HEAVEN? 12. How did he speak of little children?

To the Teacher.

Read the stories of REBEKAH, MIRIAM, RUTH, DEBORAH, and HANNAH, in the OLD TESTAMENT.

For Jewish views of marriage and domestic life, read Rabbi GEIGER'S Judaism and its History, Lecture IV., pp. 77–86; and Prof. FELIX ADLER'S Creed and Deed, Lecture on "The Religious Conservatism of Women," and article on "Reformed Judaism," pp. 304–306.

Upon the general question of the social position of woman, read The Subjection of Woman, by JOHN STUART MILL.

A CENTURY OF DISHONOR. By H. H., author of Verses and Bits of Travel, etc. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Mrs. Jackson, who has been content to please, delight, and inspire us hitherto with her charming sketches and her exquisite poems, has now ascended to the seat of judgment, and has delivered an opinion on the wrongs of the Indian tribes, to which every intelligent citizen of the United States should give abundant heed. Her book is a sketch of the United States government's dealings with some of the Indian tribes. Here is no piece of sentimentalism, but a record of facts, some of them hard and dry, some almost too hard for our belief. Yet we have every reason to believe that Mrs. Jackson has endeavored to keep her statement entirely within the lines of sober truthfulness. It is indeed "a century of dishonor" that she has written down. Through all this century, the nation has been continually telling the Indian, as poor Joe is told in the novel, to "move on." Through all this century, the Indian has been robbed and cheated, and our national compacts with him have been broken again. We have had a giant's strength, and we have used it like a giant.

Mrs. Jackson reckons from two hundred and fifty thousand to three hundred thousand Indians in the United States. The reader will be astonished at Prof. Seelye's estimate that there are about as many now as on the arrival of the first Europeans. If this be so, it is not so certain as we have imagined that the tendency of the Indians to die out is unmistakable. But, were it so, this would not alter the morality of our national relations to the Indian tribes. Of these there are today nearly or quite three hundred represented in the total Indian population. And there is hardly one of these three hundred tribes that has not a chapter of its own in our century of dishonor.

It would be a great misfortune if the controversy at present going on concerning the Poncas should obscure the larger aspects of the case in our national legislature. The disposition of Secretary Schurz has seemed to the writer of this notice so favorable to the Indians that it strikes him as a great misfortune that he should be made to appear as positively inimical to their rights. Whatever mistakes he has committed, and whatever of undue irritation he has manifested under the criticism of Mrs. Jackson, Gov. Long, and Mr. Dawes, and others, the main question now before the country is whether "possession in severalty," i.e., an individual title, will not do more than anything else to prevent a repetition of the wrongs that have been so far committed. To unite with Mr. Schurz, or with his successor, if he is like minded, in his endeavor to bring this about, would seem the part of wisdom, wherever it can be done without breaking any previous contract. But the first duty of the government is to keep religiously all contracts that have been already made.

THE TEHUANTEPEC INTER-OCEAN RAILROAD. By Alex. D. Anderson. New York and Chicago: A. S. Barnes & Co.

This pamphlet presents a summary of leading facts regarding the advantages of this route to commerce generally and especially to American commerce. The historical notes give many useful references to the sources of information about the region through which the road passes. The geographical position of this isthmus is more favorable to the commerce of the United States than any other of the proposed inter-ocean routes, being on the Gulf of Mexico, opposite the mouth of the Mississippi River, and on account of the position of Cuba and adjacent islands, no further from our Atlantic cities than the other routes. In going to our Pacific States, a long sailing distance would be saved on the west side. It seems also that considerable distance would be saved in each of several of the voyages of foreign commerce. The harbors at the termini are safe, ample, and commodious. Another chief advantage claimed for this route over others is that it passes through a part of Mexico that is known to be a wholesome and productive country, and this is certainly well worth consideration.

Much has already been done toward the construction of this road, and the work is progressing. The disadvantage of this route is its length of about one hundred and seventy miles, or three and a half times the length of the Panama Railroad. This will make the total cost of construction large, although the grades are very favorable. The highest point reached in crossing the interior mountains has an altitude of only seven hundred and seventy feet above the sea. This railroad could probably compete very successfully with the Panama Railroad, and would be completed at an early day, were it not that public attention in both Europe and America is now fixed upon other modes of transit between the oceans. The passage of vessel and cargo intact from ocean to ocean would have great commercial and economical advantages over any railroad transit which requires a double shifting of cargo and often a double chartering of vessels. The two well-known canal schemes have now much favor; and this method of transit is likely to prevail in the near future, unless Captain Eads' plan of carrying over ship and cargo by rail shall supersede all other means of connecting the oceans. If sufficient strength and power of operative machinery can be made practicable, that plan may yet solve this problem of the ages.

THE March Atlantic has three continuations,—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps "Friends: a Duet"; Henry James' "Portrait of a Lady"; and William M. Rossetti's "The Wives of Poets." The latter brings the domestic annals of genius down to and beyond mediæval England, beginning the present paper with Spenser, and ending it with Blake, a poet whose wife could only make her mark in the parish register. Shakspeare's stinted justice in bequeathing to his wife only his "second-best bed" is explained to the credit of the great dramatist. Mr. James' "Lady" impresses us as a very non-committal young woman, chiefly engaged in drawing other people out. It is evident that the artist is using his canvas to paint a group instead of a single portrait, and that he is not a first-class painter. Miss Phelps' story, which confines itself to two characters, is better. The picture of Reliance Strong, with her face pressed against the purple rock in her struggle, is a fine artistic scene. Mr. H. D. Lloyd tries to alarm us by his "Story of a Great Monopoly," which tells of the buying up of railroads and legislatures by the Standard Oil Company of New York. If his picture be not exaggerated, it is a very depressing one. It may be best that money should be king in the United States, but the proof is wanting. "New York Theatres" is anonymous, but contains plenty of information on other points. Grant Allen's "Genesis of Genius" makes a stand for Herbert Spencer and for the evolution of individual life from heredity and environment, instead of by freaks and felicitous accidents. Richard Grant White's "Random Recollections of England" are very refreshing reading. We should rejoice if every traveller could serve up such palatable tidbits of experience. "The Eleventh Hour" by Katharine Carrington, is a very intense little picture, giving a whole life in a few strokes. We are as well acquainted with Miss Lydia Bennett from these half-dozen pages, as if we had walked by her side for a lifetime. We may object to the subject, but we cannot quarrel with the workmanship. The poetry of the number is below the average, but the Contributors' Club is as sparkling as usual.

FOREIGN.

THE Catholics have got hold of the Hon. Mr. Fitzclarence by conversion. He is the younger son of the Earl of Munster, who is said to be the natural son of William IV.—Unitarian Herald (Manchester).

THE Servian Skuptschina has unanimously passed a resolution in favor of closing all the monasteries in Servia, and the Minister of Public Worship promised to prepare a bill in that sense. He stated at the same time that the proposed measure would necessitate a modification of the constitution.

THE Company appointed for the Revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament finished their sixty-seventh session on the 28th ult., at the Jerusalem chamber. Twelve members attended. The second revision of the historical books was completed, and the revision of Proverbs was continued, as far as xxiv., 14.

A MEETING of the Socialist Workmen's Society, which was convened by two artisans for the discussion of the Jewish question, was held at Berlin on Tuesday evening, February 8. After some very stormy scenes, caused by the conduct of a number of Social Democrats who were present, the police were obliged to interfere, and the meeting was dispersed.

THE Pope in an address to the cardinals on the 20th, in reply to their congratulations on the anniversary of his election to the pontificate, expressed regret at the renewed attacks and the insults heaped upon the Church in nearly all parts of the world: therefore, an extraordinary jubilee would be inaugurated this year throughout Christendom for the purpose of imploring the Almighty to bestow better times upon the Church.

THE return of outrages in Ireland, occurring between the 1st and 30th of November, shows that two hundred and eighty were committed in Munster, one hundred and eighty-two in Connaught, fifty-eight in Leinster, and forty-one in Ulster. The return cannot be said to have been "doctored": on the contrary, it seem to have been hastily compiled. Thus there is but one case of murder, while the vast bulk of the "outrages" consists of three hundred and thirty-three cases of intimidation by threatening letters.

MUCH excitement was caused throughout Ireland, Sunday, February 6, by the simultaneous posting all over the country of a proclamation, issued "by order of the Irish National Directory." The document, which was everywhere torn down by the police, warned the people, in view of coercion, to abstain from "premature resistance." The document says the salvation of the people lies in the achievement of national independence alone, but the time to strike has not yet come; and it exhorts them, until the hour of action arrives, to let their attitude be one of calm resolve, self-sacrifice, and unshaken confidence in the final triumph of their cause. No clew has been discovered as to the persons by whom the proclamation was posted. It was at first regarded as a hoax; but it is now attributed to the Fenian organization, who are thought to be jealous of the power of the Land League. The proclamation has also been posted on the walls in some towns in the north of England,—at Widnes, North Shields, Oldham, and Dewsbury. In London itself, printed copies were distributed on Sunday, and a copy has been sent to Mr. Forster.

MR. DAVITT addressed a meeting at Borris, County Carlow, recently, and made a violent attack upon the government for introducing the Coercion Bills. He said, amid the cheers of the meeting: "We see the philanthropic Gladstone and the humane and liberty-loving John Bright and the chief slanderer of Ireland, Mr. Outrage Forster, falling back upon police rule, prisons, and coercion, in order to sustain a system which is a blasphemy on the providence of God, an outrage on reason, a crime against humanity, and which has been the scourge of Ireland." He exhorted his hearers to look upon the Coercion Bill as a challenge to every manly Irishman to stand by the Land League, and thus to show that the day has gone by forever in Ireland when any oppressive Ministry could frighten the people, or prevent them from working out their social and political amelioration. Mr. Davitt has sent a letter to a Dublin newspaper to say that there is no truth in a statement that he purposes leaving Ireland when the "Protection for Life and Property Bill" is passed. Mr. Davitt says, "Until I am conscious of having committed some act which would discredit me with the people of Ireland, or show me guilty of a crime against the public weal, I intend to remain in the country and accept the consequences of my words and acts in the Land League movement."

JESTINGS.

A MINISTER at Ayr, Scotland, recently introduced the following petition into his Sunday prayer: "O Lord, bless the Established Church, and the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian Church, and all the other churches. Thou knowest the various nicknames, Lord, by which they are called: bless them all."

THREE little boys on Sunday were stopped on the street by an elderly gentleman, who, perceiving that they had bats and balls with them, asked one of their number this question: "Boy, can you tell me where all naughty boys go who play ball on Sunday?" "Over back of Johnson's dam!" the youngster replied.

AN old gentleman at the West End, who has recently married his third wife, was met yesterday by a friend, who, after wishing him a Happy New Year, inquired how he was pleased with his bride. "Well," was the deliberate answer, "I don't know as she's so handsome as Susan or so spry as Kate, but she'll do for a change!"

HE stood with his back against the door of a street-car. Every one else had a seat, and he anxiously watched each face for symptoms of getting out for over three miles. It grew wearisome, and finally he shifted his weight from one foot to the other, and exclaimed, "By me soul! have none o' yees any homes to get out to?"

"A book which will surely leave its mark on the thought of this generation and the life of the next."

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

Selections from Carlyle.

OUR being is made up of Light and Darkness, the Light resting on the Darkness and balancing it; everywhere there is Dualism, Equipoise; a perpetual Contradiction dwells in us: "Where shall I place myself to escape my own shadow?" Consider it well, Metaphysics is the attempt of the mind to rise above the mind. Hopeless struggle, for the wisest as for the foolishest! What strength of sinew, or athletic skill, will enable the stoutest athlete to fold his own body in his arms, and, by lifting, lift up himself? The Irish Saint swam the Channel by "carrying his head in his teeth"; but the feat has never been imitated.

DETACHED, separated! I say there is no such separation: nothing hitherto was ever stranded, cast aside; but all, were it only a withered leaf, works together with all; is borne forward on the bottomless, shoreless flood of Action, and lives through perpetual metamorphoses. The withered leaf is not dead and lost; there are Forces in it and around it, though working in inverse order; else how could it rot? Despise not the rag from which man makes Paper, or the litter from which the earth makes Corn. Rightly viewed, no meanest object is insignificant; all objects are as windows, through which the philosophic eye looks into infinitude itself.

SPEECH is of Time. Silence is of Eternity.

ALAS, the vulgarest vulgar, I often find, are not those in ragged coats at this day; but those in fine, superfine, and superfinest; the more is the pity!

THE word Free-thinker no longer means the Denier or Caviller, but the Believer, or the ready to believe.

MY friend, all speech and rumor is short-lived, foolish, and untrue. Genuine WORK alone, what thou workest faithfully, that is eternal as the Almighty Founder and World-builder himself. Stand thou by that; and let Fame and the rest of it go prating.

TO THE better order of minds, any mad joy of Denial has long since ceased: the problem is not now to deny, but to ascertain and perform.

UNDERSTAND always that the end of man is an action, not a thought. Endeavor incessantly, with all the strength that is in you, to ascertain what—there where you are, there as you are—you can do in this world; and upon that bend your whole faculties; regarding all reveries, feelings, singular thoughts, moods, etc., as worth nothing whatever, except as they bear on that, and will help you toward that.

IN a valiant suffering for others, not in a slothful making others suffer for us, did nobleness ever lie. The chief of men is he who stands in the van of men; fronting the peril which frightens back all others; which if it be not vanquished, will devour the others. Every noble crown is, and on earth will forever be, a crown of thorns.

GIVE us, O give us the man that sings at his work! Be his occupation what it may, he is equal to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness. He will do more in the same time, he will do it better, he will persevere longer. One is scarcely sensible of fatigue whilst he marches to music. The very stars are said to make harmony as they revolve in their spheres. Wondrous is the strength of cheerfulness, altogether past calculation its powers of endurance. Efforts, to be permanently useful, must be uniformly joyous,—a spirit all sunshine,—graceful from very gladness, beautiful because bright.

CURRENT TOPICS.

WE are now in the season of Lent, which means sometimes that what is lent to the Lord is to be paid, with interest, in the opposite direction.

THE administration of President Hayes will be remembered with gratitude for its great financial achievements, and for the moral purity and cleanliness it infused into the social atmosphere around it.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S Cabinet is not equal to his Inaugural. Both in ability and weight of character, it falls below that of President Hayes. He has evidently thought too much of reconciling the factions of the Republican party. If he had gone ahead, and, on the platform of his Inaugural Address, put the strongest cabinet possible, without reference to the ruling chiefs, the country would have supported him, and the factions would have had to follow.

REV. EDWARD E. HALE, one of the referees in the Leicester-Society case, has a letter on the matter in last week's Christian Register, which we have tried to make room for, but cannot this week. If we understand Mr. Hale, he intimates that the referees had to decide by what Mr. Southgate meant by the Unitarian faith and not by their own ideas of it. His letter is of great interest, as being the only thing in the nature of a reason for the decision that has thus far come to the public from those who made it. But we will not prejudge the letter for our readers.

THE Liberal League of Ithaca, N.Y., changed its name last autumn to the Radical Club. Under its new name, it appears to have been doing the past season an admirable work in the discussion of important questions. The Weekly Ithacan says it is "one of the most vigorous and intellectual organizations in the place. True to its name, it discusses and probes to the very root and foundation of every subject which it deems of sufficient importance to consider, and is not afraid to acknowledge the truth when found." The Ithacan publishes, in full, an excellent paper recently read before the Club, by Prof. James Johonnot, on "Needed Reforms in our Public Schools."

IN the last year or two, we have noticed a marked improvement in the literature of obituary resolutions on the point of referring to the deceased as having been removed by Divine Providence. But, in the recent annual report of the Boston and Albany Railroad Directors, a resolution concerning the late President of the road begins in the old customary way, "Whereas, by the dispensation of Divine Providence, death has removed," etc. As Mr. Lincoln, the President, was killed, it will be remembered, at New London last summer by an accident which forethought and care might have easily prevented, the application in this case seems, to say the least, specially inappropriate. Why not have said truly, "Whereas, by the want of human providence, death has suddenly taken our President from us"?

HON. CARL SCHURZ is to have a dinner in Boston, by the invitation of a large number of its most distinguished citizens. We are glad of it. With the utmost sympathy for the Poncas, and speaking in their behalf in our columns, we have yet for some time felt that the animosity with which many of their special advocates here in Massachusetts were assailing Mr. Schurz was becoming an outrage against decency. We can assure them that their rancor has reacted against their own cause. Whatever mistakes the ex-Secretary of the Interior may have made in the administration of his difficult office, which on the whole he has conducted with distinguished ability and success, it is not probable that in his four years of executive duty he has descended from his high ideal of statesmanship to the position, as some of his assailants would seem to believe, of a common thief and murderer.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S Inaugural Address appears to have given very general satisfaction. It is a much more vigorous production than was his letter accepting the nomination. That was a disappointment. This is worthy of the man. Though satisfying "stalwart" Republicans by what is said on the Southern question, the address also, by its frankness and force, by its recognition of the autonomy of the States, and by a certain manly tone of fraternal sympathy that pervades it, has been well received by many of the Southern journals. There are some sentences in it that recall Abraham Lincoln's first Inaugural, as many of the newspapers have noted. It was a stroke of logic as well as rhetoric by which the President opened with a reference to the adoption of the articles of Confederation among the Colonies a century and three days previous, and then passed on by a few rapid sentences to indicate that this Confederacy of States, being found on trial too weak for the service required of it, gave way to "a National Union founded directly upon the will of the people." The two points made most prominent in the address are the necessity of protecting the right of every voter to a free ballot and the necessity of educating the voter. The South is appealed to to join hands with the North in a reconciling policy for attaining these two conditions of peaceful and prosperous government. The present Republican doctrines on the public credit, the currency question, and the fostering of home-industries, are restated. Civil service reform is spoken of with approval, but the chief responsibility for accomplishing it is put upon Congress. And, finally, there is a paragraph on religious freedom, in which the Mormon Church is vigorously attacked for interfering with religious freedom in the territory of Utah and setting the national authority at defiance, as well as offending, by the practice of polygamy, the moral sense of mankind. The new President thinks it the duty of Congress, while strictly respecting religious convictions, to legislate for putting an end to this anomaly.

FAREWELL DISCOURSE

Before the Second Congregational Society of Leicester, Mass., Feb. 13, 1881.

BY S. B. WESTON.

Friends, the task of writing this discourse was not a pleasant one. It was not pleasant to think that I was preparing my last words for you. For, though my stay among you has been short, yet many little ties bind me strongly to you; and it is with much reluctance that I am to leave you to pursue my work in other fields of labor. That is always a sad hour when warm social ties are broken; but, in breaking ours, we are doing only what thousands of others have had to do. Indeed, sooner or later, these ties must be broken by every one; for, even if we do not separate from our friends or they from us while living, yet death, the inevitable separator, at last comes and takes from us our nearest and dearest friends. But, though we separate either while living or at death, yet we do not necessarily separate in spirit. Tender ties live in tender memories; and so, though I am to take my leave of you, I shall carry you with me in memory, I shall be with you in spirit.

It seems but proper, friends, that in this, my last discourse before this society, I should review somewhat my short ministry among you and the causes that have led to its termination.

I tried to have a clear understanding with you in beginning my work, and I wish to have a clear understanding with you in leaving it. Not that there is or has been any misunderstanding between us. On the contrary, I feel sure that we have understood each other. I, to be sure, have not known what all your individual views were upon all the special questions of religion; but I have felt this, that, despite any differences of views there might be, we were united in the essentials of religion, in mutual good feeling, and in working for the highest and best interests of this society. But as I leave you under very peculiar circumstances, under circumstances which have a deep significance in relation to the Unitarian body, and under circumstances which must affect more or less both your future and my own, I wish to speak to you to-day of what these circumstances are. I wish to speak, moreover, of both your position and mine, concerning which there have been some false reports; not reports that were intentionally false, but somehow things often get strangely distorted in passing from mouth to mouth. I have no apologies to make for the position I have taken, and I am sure you have none to make for yours. I only desire that the facts should be understood rather than misunderstood, and by those facts I am willing to be judged, so far as they concern me; and you need not fear to be judged by them, so far as they concern you. In the controversy between you and the trustees of the Southgate fund concerning my preaching, there has been no double dealing of any kind that I am aware of. Everything has been done openly and above board. The same may be said of the relations between you and me. I have been perfectly frank with you, and I believe you have been so with me.

I have often been criticised for expressing my views so freely and without any gloss. Some of my well-meaning friends have told me that if I would keep back some of my radical opinions, if I would use more policy, and observe customs which had so much meaning to the more conservative, even if they did have little or no meaning to me, then I should stir up no opposition, things would go along more smoothly and pleasantly, and I should do much more good in my work. In regard to the first two results from such a course, I should agree with them, but not in regard to the last. I believe that the only way to do the greatest amount of good in the pulpit is for the one who occupies it to be perfectly true to himself. I should say to every preacher: "Satisfy your own reason and conscience, whether you satisfy your people or not. Be absolutely sincere. Do not use words in one sense which you know they use in quite another, and do not pretend to have a belief in anything which you really have not." I believe in policy, friends; but I believe that the highest and best policy is to tell the simple, straightforward truth. Especially is this the true and only policy for a teacher of morals. Alas for the soul of that preacher who adopts any other! Alas for the pulpit when divinity students—yes, and preachers, too—will argue, as I have heard them both, that a man in the pulpit ought not to express his latest and deepest and most radical thought.

You who heard my candidating discourses will bear witness that I came here under no false colors. My sympathy with rationalism was clearly and fully expressed. You understood, at least one of the trustees of the Southgate fund, who was the chairman of your prudential committee, understood, that I belonged to no church and had never belonged to any; that I did not come from the Unitarian body, but was willing to work with that body, if my views met with acceptance in it. I knew that there were Unitarian ministers who were fearless advocates of rationalism; and I had good reasons to believe, especially by your inviting me to become your minister, that you sympathized with such preaching yourselves. By the position you have taken in the controversy with the trustees, concerning my preaching, it has been shown that I was in this belief correct. I do not mean to say by this that you, either individually or collectively, agree with me in all my views. This is not to be supposed for a moment. Let it be distinctly understood, for instance, that you would not all agree with me in my definition of Christianity.

Some of you would define it about as you would define the word "religion," and with your definition would call yourselves Christians. I define it differently, and with my definition cannot take upon myself the Christian name. As a society, you have never, by any formal action, taken a non-Christian position, although, if you were to take action in regard to a basis of fellowship, I believe you would not adopt such a one as would shut out from you any earnest seeker after truth, be he Christian or non-Christian, be he rationalist or Jew. You will remember that, in accepting your invitation to me to become your minister, I made the provision that if at the end of four months my preaching did not generally satisfy the society I was to be notified, and my engagement with you would cease. With this understanding and with the understanding that there were no conditions whatever upon your pulpit, I began my work with you a year ago last September, so that if I were to remain with you two more Sundays I should have been with you just a year and a half. Our work, as many of you thought, went on very prosperously from month to month. Considering your fewness, there was a good attendance at our Sunday services. If I was sometimes discouraged with your numbers, it was partly because I made ideal calculations rather than looked at the actual facts. We soon established our Sunday afternoon class for the study of the different religions, our periodical club, and our social gatherings. We had two very pleasant memorial services,—one to Washington, one to Channing. All this was before any trouble began. About the middle of April, however, the chairman of the prudential committee told me, privately, that he must resign his position, as he felt that by holding it under my preaching he was compromising his own position. His criticism was that I did not preach "Christ" enough, and did not hold up Christianity as the absolute and perfect religion. I knew that there was one other person in the society whom my views did not satisfy, and the knowledge of it was a source of considerable discomfort. I thought, possibly, there might be others who were not satisfied with my preaching; and I finally decided that the best way of settling the question would be to offer you, sooner or later, my resignation. May 16, as you know, I was publicly criticised after the services for the views I had just expressed in a discourse upon "Unitarianism."

I then decided to offer you my resignation the next Sunday, in accordance with the intention I had already formed. When you held your meeting to act upon that resignation, only three voted to accept it; and I consequently thought it my duty to remain with you, especially as I was urged privately by so many to do so. Then came up the issue between you as a society and the trustees of the Southgate fund in regard to my preaching. The money was left for Unitarian preaching. Did my views meet that condition? No, said the trustees. Yes, said you. With the trustees, it was not a question of mere names; for one of the trustees knew when I first came here that nominally I was not a Unitarian. Unitarianism was what the will required; and Unitarianism meant, they said, Christianity, and I did not preach Christianity. If the trustees were right in their definition of Unitarianism, then it was not only their right, but their duty, to withhold the fund. You, however, did not think they were right. I did not think they were right. Their definition would have been true enough thirty years ago, but it seemed to me that it was not a definition that covered the full length and breadth of Unitarianism to-day. Besides, Mr. Southgate was known to be very liberal for his time, and a bitter opponent of Orthodoxy. This is the general testimony of those who knew him well. He may have called himself a "Christian," as no doubt he did, for no one thought at that time of denying the name; and, when the name was denied to the Unitarians by the Evangelical churches, we are told that Mr. Southgate, like others, was indignant at the denial. But the question of Christian or non-Christian was a very different thing then from what it is now. There is nothing in Mr. Southgate's will showing that he wished his money to be used for Unitarianism in any sectarian sense. And that fact, together with the fact of his own liberal position, would prove the contrary. His special interest was to "sustain, strengthen, and build up" this society. "This," he says, "is the sole purpose for which I left this fund."

In the light of these facts, and in the light of what is meant by Unitarianism in the West and in many pulpits in the East, the position you took was a perfectly warrantable one. Having differed with the trustees in regard to my preaching meeting the conditions of the will, you proposed to submit the question to a competent committee of Unitarians to decide. At first, your proposition was refused; but, when you finally proposed to leave the matter to the Council of the National Unitarian Conference, the trustees agreed to your proposition. As a Council, they refused to act; but seven of the ten composing the Council would act in their private capacity, provided two new names should be added and their decision be made final. The proposition of the Council was accepted, the two names added, and after nine weeks for consideration the decision came that my preaching did not meet the requirements of Mr. Southgate's will; in other words, the committee, which was virtually the Council of the National Unitarian Conference, decided that I did not preach Unitarianism.

Our case, friends, was a fair test of the Unitarian position at the present time. The question was put to what the Congregationalist of last week rightfully calls "high Unitarian authorities," and the decision involves, as the Congregationalist adds, "a somewhat distinctive definition of Unitarianism," though it is a negative one. A few years ago, the Unitarian Association dropped from its official list of ministers the name of William J. Potter, because he took a non-Christian position. In view of repeated acts of this kind, Unitarianism cannot be regarded as standing for freedom and rationalism in religion. Now, this is just what the Free Religious Association does stand for; and it is the only logical position in religion this side of Roman Catholicism,—either absolute reliance upon authority or absolute reliance upon reason. There is no middle ground logically. The Catholic Church says, "Do not reason about religious matters, accept the dictates of the pope and priest." Free Religion says, "Reason upon any and all questions, and follow the results of your reason and the dictates of your conscience." Let the world choose which it will, I choose Free Religion. If Unitarianism is not so broad as Free Religion, it certainly is not broad enough for me.

Let me tell you briefly, friends, what Free Religion is; for this is a comparatively new name, and one that is greatly misunderstood. Christianity, you know, pretends to be based upon a special, supernatural revelation. It pretends to have unfolded the mysteries, to know all about God and the future. Jesus is believed to have brought the revelation, and hence his authority in the Christian Church. The Bible is believed to be the divine record of that revelation, and hence its authority among all Christians. Free Religion, on the other hand, claims that true religion is a product of the natural reason and conscience of humanity. Free Religion says that Jesus was a man; and, though it would honor all good men, it would not worship even the best of them. Free Religion does not make the discipleship of any human being the basis and condition of its religious fellowship. It rather makes its basis of fellowship those broad and universal principles which include what is good and true in the teachings of all men and all religions. People never have agreed, and probably never will agree, in their ideas of God and the future, or in their estimation of the merits of the world's great teachers or as to the comparative value of different books. But men agree and always have agreed that truth is better than falsehood, good better than evil, love better than hate; and hence Free Religion says, Let us make the principles of truth, right, and love the bonds that are to unite us together. Truth, right, and love,—those are the grand objects for which the human soul should strive. Yes, says Christianity, but the only means of gaining those objects, the only way of salvation, is through Christ. Yes, says Buddhism, but the only means of gaining those objects, the only way of salvation, is by accepting the religion of Buddha. The world has made a great mistake in exalting means above ends. This or that person, this or that form, has been insisted upon by the teachers of religion; as if not to accept it, though the end were otherwise gained, were itself damnation. I recognize the full importance that attaches to means; but, if you earnestly desire to get upon the opposite bank of a river, whether you walk on a bridge, or row, or sail across, is of very little importance, compared to the fact of your reaching your destination. Some means, however, are safer and better and quicker than others. And so Free Religion offers what it considers to be the truest and best means; namely, the scientific method. This method, applied to mind and heart and body, is your safest and surest guide through life. The scientific method is simply human reasoning. This reasoning applied to Christianity will find much in it that is noble and true and helpful. It will find too, as I believe,—and I say it with deliberation, and without wishing to wound the feelings of any one who may hear me,—it will find that there is more or less in Christianity that is altogether false. Do not understand me to say that the principles as taught upon the Sermon on the Mount are false. Do not understand me to imply aught against the character of Jesus. I mean simply what I say, that Christianity as it has historically manifested itself,—and in its ecclesiastical expression to-day, teaches much that the laws of human reasoning must pronounce untrue.

I hope I have made clear to you the fact that Free Religion stands for the religion of naturalism and rationalism, while the whole structure of Christianity is based upon a system of supernaturalism. But I cannot dwell longer upon this point. Unitarianism, it seems, stops just short of rationalism, or Free Religion, by limiting its membership to "disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ," to use their own words. I had thought that that condition was a dead letter in the Constitution of the National Conference, but I have now learned by my own experience that it is not so dead as I had supposed. Of course, the Unitarian body is at perfect liberty to take whatever position it wishes to; but it ought not to profess freedom and at the same time deny it; it ought not to claim to be a Christian body while at the same time it rejects the essential doctrines of Christianity. By the decision of the committee in this present controversy, your rights and freedom as a society have been abridged. There is not the least question in my mind concerning that. Although never having taken a non-Christian position by any formal vote, you wished to have a non-Christian minister in your pulpit; but being a small society, dependent on a fund given for the support of Unitarian preaching, those who have control of the fund come in and say that you cannot have the minister of your choice, one who preaches rationalism, —and had, for that matter, ever since he first stepped into your pulpit,—and, on appealing to the leaders and chief officers of the Unitarian body, the verdict of those who hold the fund is sustained. The action of the committee cannot be excused on the ground of ignorance of all the facts. They well knew that they were undertaking an important decision; and it was their duty to acquaint themselves with the facts, which they could have done most easily. The truth is that their action in this case was a deliberate assertion that Unitarianism does not take that broad and rational view of religion which constitutes Free Religion. Thus, it seems to me, must their verdict be read; and, unless there is some protest against the decision among Unitarians themselves, thus it will be read. A more direct question as to what is and what is not Unitarianism could not have been put to them. Was their decision a true one? Is there, as the trustees hold, a radical difference between the views I preach and Unitarianism? I should like very much to have the opinion of liberal Unitarians upon this point.

I wish now to make a brief summary of some of the views which have been at the basis of all my preaching, and which I am most sure will not be unfamiliar to you who have heard me.

In the first place, I would speak of my views of Christianity; for upon this point more than upon any other I am most liable to be misunderstood. I define Christianity as a system which includes among other things certain ideas of supernaturalism. Above all, Christianity recognizes the supernatural authority of Jesus. But as I regard Jesus as strictly a human being, and recognize his authority in no other sense than I recognize the authority of the individual members of the Unitarian Committee of Reference, I cannot logically or conscientiously call myself a Christian. But, though I take a non-Christian position, I have never in this pulpit or anywhere said that I did not regard Jesus as a great religious teacher, and as a man of the loftiest character. I have rather affirmed these things of him, and I have said that many of the truths he taught were the universal moral truths of man,—most, if not all, of them known before his time, but never before so clearly and forcibly expressed. I might say almost the same things, however, of Gautama and Socrates. The moral and practical side of Christianity I believe in with all my heart, and I believe in the moral and practical side of every religion. What was great and noble in Jesus I admire, as I admire what is great and noble in all men. But when you ask me to accept Christianity as the absolute religion, and Jesus as the absolutely perfect man, you have got to a point where I cannot go with you. "But do you think," I seem to hear some of you ask, "that Jesus had any real faults?" My friends, perfection does not consist simply in the absence of defects. It includes the possession of every virtue, the development of every faculty there is in man. While upon this subject of Christianity, let me quote from a letter I received from a Unitarian clergyman outside of Massachusetts only last Friday.

He says: "I cannot agree with you about the word Christian. . . . I hold Jesus as a man, as Buddha, etc., that the Old and New Testaments are on the same footing as the Zend-Avesta, etc., and yet I feel myself most deeply to be a Christian. To me, Christ (the term) means anointed. Many in the Old Testament are spoken of as Messiahs. Now cannot God the Father have anointed you and me for work? If so, are we not Christians? Indeed, if Jesus of Nazareth was a Christian, so am I and so are you." Verily, this is a new way of defining the word "Christian." It would give us a Christianity, whether we have a Jesus or not. A religion which has centred around the person of Jesus for eighteen hundred years will not be changed by any such vague and fanciful definition as my correspondent suggests. But I must pass on to the summary of my views upon other vital points, which I promise you will be much briefer.

I believe in the Universal outside of myself, call it Nature, call it God, if you please. I, for one, have perfect trust in the Infinite and Eternal. I look to it as the author of my being, and feel that it holds the seal of my destiny. I stand in awe before the order and wisdom and beauty which I see, every day of my life, manifested in this universe in which I live. I have perfect faith in the outcome of the eternal laws and the eternal verities. Whatever that outcome will be, I feel that it will be for the best. Again, I believe in man, in the essential worth and dignity and grandeur of human nature. I believe in human progress, in the development by exercise of the cunning of the hand, of the sympathies of the heart, of the faculties of the mind.

I believe in reason, in conscience, and in affection, as the natural and true guides of the human soul. In following them, we shall oftentimes err; but, if we keep faithful to them, we shall soon be led into the true path.

Finally, friends, I believe that truth, righteousness, and love, here and now, should be the grand object of all our striving. To know the truth, to do the right, and to have generous and noble sentiments,—these are the fulfilling of the law.

The aim of my preaching has been positive, not negative; although I should feel ashamed, holding such views as I do, if I had not done some negative work. Positive preaching is of vital importance; but when one believes that the majority of people hold false and superstitious notions in regard to Sunday, in regard to the Bible, in regard to Jesus, it is his solemn and sacred duty, if he stands in the pulpit, to raise his voice against those notions, and present what seems to him to be the truer ones. A preacher may not be so popular in doing that; but he will be approved by his own conscience, and that is worth more than the approval of the whole world. I have endeavored, in my short ministry among you, first to awaken thought, and second to awaken a deeper sense of the sacredness and obligations of the moral law. That I have succeeded somewhat in the first of these objects, I have had many kind and pleasing testimonies. How well I have succeeded in the second object, your own lives must prove. But, because it has been decided that I do not preach Unitarian views, I must leave you, and take up my work in a new and as yet unknown field. I shall leave you, friends, with the best wishes and with the deepest interest in your future welfare. I hope you may not long remain without a settled minister, who will be far more helpful to you than I have been. But let me urge you, when you find your minister, to join hands with him in work. Only let every one be as earnest and faithful as some of you have been, and you cannot fail to be a living and growing society, you cannot fail to be a power for good in this community. Your society will not grow, it will not live even, unless you give to it your constant attention. You never can be coolly indifferent to its interests, and have it succeed. You cannot expect to have that enthusiasm which comes from numbers, but you can have that enthusiasm which comes from working for grand purposes; and, if you have that, it will not matter whether there are five or five hundred of you, you will not fail to have a living and useful society.

But, friends, I must hasten to a close. My discourse is already much longer than any I have given you before; but, as these are my last words to you, you will perhaps pardon the number.

I cannot close without thanking you for the kind and liberal support you have given me. I wish to thank you who have so faithfully helped me in all my undertakings, and especially those of you who seconded and aided my efforts to establish a Sunday class, for the study of the different religions. I sincerely hope that that work may go on, that the plans we have been making to increase its interest may be carried out. My personal and social relations with you have been most pleasant, and not only with you, but with the members of the Orthodox Society, and with the people in the town generally. I shall always retain an interest in Leicester as the place of my first practical labors. I carry away with me many pleasant recollections and some valuable experience. I am painfully conscious of the defects of my work among you, especially for the last nine months. But as during this time there has been this controversy going on, in which both you and I have been deeply interested, I must ask of you to throw over this period a mantle of charity. Some may blame me for not having withdrawn when the controversy first began, and thus to have prevented all this trouble; but, as you so warmly stood by me when my views were opposed, I was bound to stand by you when a question arose in which your own rights were involved. I felt it my duty to stay until the matter was settled, and was even advised to do so by Unitarian clergymen themselves. The question, however, has been finally settled, and in such a way that I must leave this society, whether it be against your own wishes or mine.

And now, dear friends, before I say my last word, that word which has been pronounced so many thousand times with so much sadness, let me speak of a much deeper grief than the farewell word between you and me. A kind and dear and loving friend lies dead in one of our homes. One who has been for many years a constant worker in this society, who has been one of my warmest supporters, and who was deeply interested in the outcome of this controversy, —she will be with you no more. That you will greatly miss her needs not be said. If I were to remain here, there is none of you who would miss her more than I. Since I have been with you, she has been a constant attendant of these meetings in all kinds of weather, whenever her health did not absolutely prevent. And she oftentimes made much sacrifice to be here. Long before I knew there was an Index or a Free Religious Association, she took the paper and sympathized with the Association. She was a reader and an appreciator of the writings of Emerson and Frothingham and Chadwick and Wasson and Weiss. She would often call my attention to some of their writings which she had read. In a note to me one day last summer, she said, "If I have any gift, it is appreciation"; and she quoted this sentence from Weiss, "I think the gift of appreciation is as divine as the distinction of being appreciated." She not only had the gift of appreciation, but she had the distinction of being appreciated by every one who knew her. Friends, I sympathize with you most deeply in her loss. I sympathize most of all with the family which needs her companionship and counsels. But, though dead, yet will the memory of what she was live in their and our hearts. Clouds now and then gather above our heads, and a gloom spreads about us, but from those clouds come down drops of rain to refresh the parched earth. So it is with the clouds of human sorrow. From them, we learn to appreciate more deeply what we have. We learn, above all, to appreciate life and character. Let us then resolve, in this sad hour of personal bereavement, that while we live we will live well, and with the Infinite and Eternal Power be the rest. Friends, one and all, I bid you farewell.

THE "OLD SOCIETIES" AND THE "NEW" AGAIN.

Dear Mr. Potter:—

I dislike to prolong a discussion which seems likely to multiply misunderstandings. But it seems desirable to answer certain questions, and correct one or two references, contained in your last comments on my second letter,—points on which we do not wish to be misconceived by our readers. Please accept all I shall say as meant, like your own comments, in a thoroughly cordial and impersonal spirit.

In disavowing that by societies "growing out of the Transcendental movement" your reference was to the Transcendental idea, or philosophy, you make an admission which I have never before seen intimated in the Index, though I have often felt that it was extremely desirable that it should be made. The Index has been fruitful for a long time in repudiations of Transcendentalism as such. Without explanation, it would hardly be imagined that the name signified anything else than what you have called the "movement." Nor can I think that any reader of the prevailing habit among leading radicals, in speaking of Transcendentalism, of calling it a half-way step, a star now set, a school outgrown, good and needed in its day, but now belonging to the past, could fail to infer that no other "religious application" of it was possible than that made by Emerson, Parker, and others many years ago; and that certain new religious organizations on a "coöperative" basis have now superseded its uses. Even if you do not mean this, there are numbers of your readers who have supposed that this was the position of the Index on the subject, and who needed the admission by a thinker like yourself in its columns that the idea may properly be distinguished from the "movement." Under the above circumstances, I regard myself as justified in assuming in my last letter that you had made no distinction of the kind, and were holding Transcendentalism as such responsible for the (supposed) limitations of the movement. Now, however, the way may seem open to the recognition of that philosophy as an inexhaustible principle of intellectual and religious progress.

The latter portion of the comments, however, seems to nullify the distinction thus drawn, and indicate that you share the common opinion that Transcendental philosophy, in its relation to religion, is nothing else than a root of atomism. It was precisely this popular prejudice, as I must call it, against which I wished to protest, in replying to your original criticism on the early free societies. It does not yet appear to me that my protest has been proved unnecessary or unjust.

You ask whence came these older societies, if not from the Transcendental movement. I might reply by asking whence came the present free societies, if not from the liberty of the older ones. I do not see that in either case progress would be proved by these solutions alone. Concerning the latter, it would still be the question whether increasing strictness or force of organization has a good or bad influence on the quality of religious and moral, or even intellectual, conceptions in their members. But I prefer to reply that the old free societies did not grow, wholly or even chiefly, out of the Transcendental movement, but out of a great revival of free inquiry and moral conviction which was leavening the community in those days with aspirations that no such special application of philosophy to religion as you have referred to could cover or explain. They did not, I must beg leave to suggest, spring from the example of Parker, nor from the philosophy of Emerson, nor from the logic of Brownson. That these were without influence in this direction, no one would pretend. But that they were to be regarded as other than portions of a great renaissance of American principles and demands is, to my mind, equally inconsistent with a broad view of the phenomena of the time. If I were to explain my own movement at Lynn, I should with more justice point to the anti-slavery struggle as its leading inspiration, that splendid school of freedom, philosophy, and brotherhood. I am very sure that in my personal history the Transcendental movement was but one among many forces, both outward and inward, which went to determine my religious method. Nor would it be right to assume that others, who formed free societies or ministered to them had an essentially different experience. My recollections testify that we were all alike stirred by great public necessities and the calls of outraged humanity to contend against creeds, churches, forms, and political institutions that resisted these, and in every way that was possible for us to set up truer homes for the free spirit of the age.

Furthermore, it is not according to historical fact to regard these societies as without coöperative action as societies. It would hardly surprise me if some one well acquainted with the history of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston in its best days should take my friend to task for charging it with doing "almost nothing, as a society, for practical philanthropy." I do not believe there was one of this class of congregations, thus disparaged, but had its well-recognized methods of good work in such ways as were then available, especially such as were dependent on the constantly recurring demands of the anti-slavery conflict and the Civil War; not one but had in its own body commissions or organizations for practical efficiencies, educational or social. It is not right to call these "individual" merely, since they depended on the inspiration of the common life of the society, and were often, perhaps usually, called by its name. And the spontaneity with which this was usually done, as occasions arose, seems to me of far more value than any results of a prescribed creed of association or fixed construction of labors can be, whatever advantage the latter method may have in a mechanical point of view.

It is equally erroneous to ascribe any (supposed) lack of coöperative purpose to the Transcendental movement. I cannot comprehend such a charge against a movement to whose auspices was certainly due the existence of Fourierite associations in America. Of its more conspicuous leaders, Mr. Emerson rejected organizations; Mr. Parker spent his life in their labors; Dr. Furness has ministered for half a century to a single religious society; Mr. J. F. Clarke nearly as long, to his Free Church in Boston; and Mr. A. B. Alcott has all his life been seeking communion on a conversational basis between congenial minds, to succeed at last in organizing a "School of Philosophy." More diverse views of speculation and practice than these men have held, it is not easy to find in the history of recent freethought. Yet all these, if any in America, grew up in the line of the Transcendental movement. I need not illustrate further. Nothing, I think, can be more obvious than that the philosophy of that movement was far from involving a refusal to accept the unities of practical brotherhood, or to aid in effecting them. I am especially surprised to find Prof. Adler's Society for Ethical Culture brought to illustrate that superior form of coöperative action which we are to expect from the new non-transcendental movement. Is, then, this highly efficient combination a "Free Religious" organization? Whatever spiritual effect the earnestness and ability of its independent leader may have on his hearers, I understand him as distinctly repudiating the idea that "religion" is the basis of his association. That what he terms "Ethics" should come under the head of religion may be reasonable enough for you or me; but his positive repudiation of the name should, I think, prevent the use of his case, in inquiries like the present, to prove the progress of Free Religious organizations. Yet you illustrate the difference of forms to be looked for in the new societies from those of the older ones, by the absence of prayers addressed to a personal God, of Scripture reading, of hymns, and of a benediction in the services of Mr. Adler. Are we to infer that in the coming free societies these forms are to be dispensed with? Or is it meant that we of the older churches, on the other hand, were sticklers for these prescribed forms? I know of at least one preacher who was not. I never knew the time when I did not in my own service read freely from the poetry and scriptures of the extra-Biblical world, or cared for "texts," or in hymn or prayer made appeals that were other than simple aspirations to ideal good, or failed to recognize an *im*personality, beyond all the symbols of lyric or invocative speech, of which all speech fails to supply an adequate symbol. That I should now prefer dispensing altogether with most, or all, of these forms, may or may not show progress; but it does not alter the fact that in the old free churches there was not necessarily any superstitious adherence to them, certainly not as "Christian" forms.

But there were also associations in those days on as secular a basis as Mr. Adler's, where speakers made their Sunday service as simple or as irregular as they chose, and where we were often forced by sturdy questioners to give reasons for the faith that was in us. The Leyden Hall meeting in Plymouth, and various centres of the anti-slavery gospel, of a more or less fixed and continuous character, although not properly "free churches," were instances showing what freedom as to forms then existed in the social atmosphere. But more than this. The interest now centred in a speaker like Prof. Adler, without any religious accessories, had its analogue even in the old free churches themselves, where it was always in order to welcome purely secular ways of using the hour of service, from the prophets of reform, in days when such prophets were in the heat of the greatest moral warfare of the age.

If the coming societies for giving help to those multitudes who are becoming dissatisfied with the churches are to drop the name of religion, if they are to be simply "organized activities for educational and philanthropic objects," I for one hold that there is to be free scope for their method also in the coming day. Whether they are, on this ground, an advance on the older free churches, remains to be settled. But they cannot substantiate this claim by representing the latter as Transcendentalist, or as having but a half-way freedom. For one, I should make no more objection to them than to charitable mechanic associations or sanitary committees in time of Civil War. And this I say, of course, with serious respect and cordial appreciation.

The real question to which these explanations tend is not whether such specific forms of organization are good or bad, but whether emphasis on them rather than on individual independence and moral and spiritual self-sustainment, even to the extent of deprecating these when not organized, be wisely helpful to the progress of freedom, or to hospitality toward the higher forms of thought and purpose. For one, I believe that it is not thus helpful; that it is no more so to-day than it was a quarter of a century ago; that, in fact, in the present heady drift toward "experiential" philosophies, mechanical combinations, and numerical tests and competitions, there is at least as much reason as there ever was for that full emphasis on real personality and its unmortgaged power, which can now hardly get hearing at all.

I wish in this matter to be fully understood. I cannot allow the impression given by your last comments, that I am carping at the new organizations, and even at organization itself. I welcome them gladly, as I do every effort at the expression and establishment of free principles. Was I not myself associated with a very open independent congregation for nearly twenty years? It seems to me a brave and good work to institute the new ones, and I would be the last to discourage it. I have only objected to any extravagant claim in their behalf, and to the common practice of depreciating, not merely previous works and ways, but nobly significant terms, which have not yet yielded up their spirit, and are not likely to do so.

In making of my statement that I sought to help "each to become a church to himself," an illustration of what you call the "atomic liberalism" of the philosophy which I defend, you do great injustice to my meaning as well as to the spirit of the time of which I spoke. If you had quoted the end of my sentence as well as the beginning, it would have been evident that I intended no such self-adequacy as should be mere self-sufficiency, or exclude combinations for moral or religious purposes, so long as the individual remained free to drop every organization which had outgrown its uses. Do not the free societies of the present also propose to make men and women capable of such independent thought and action? If not, they are pernicious forms of the merely mechanical tendencies of actual politics and religion. Nor did I adduce my own purpose as the basis of the free societies generally, whether Transcendental or not. I used it to illustrate a wholly different point: namely, my own opinion that an idea may require frequent changes in its forms of concrete action in order that it may itself remain unharmed; so that its vitality is not to be judged by the greater or less longevity of any of these special forms. In fact, I spoke of no man's method but my own. If the older societies, as a whole, have gone by, it is not owing to any such teaching, but to the natural course of things, which will certainly deal in like manner with every existing one at no distant season, unless it be like the old sectarian churches, artificially prolonged by traditional forms and vested interests, or permanent creeds and ecclesiastical associations. If indeed some organizing principle, wholly new to our freethought, could be shown to lie at their root, then it might be otherwise. But this, so far as I see, has not been done.

If to hold these views is "atomism," then I am content to be called an atomist, though really failing to see in myself any spiritual analogy with the physical systems of Democritus or Dalton. But if the penalty of working in one's own sphere and way, and declining to exalt the new combinations as proving all others obsolete, though they are simply carrying out, with unimportant differences of form, the process that has been going on for a period rife in thoughtful, free and honest work, is that he shall be regarded as indifferent to the progress of human brotherhood, I shall hardly consent, either for myself or the numerous class that is of my way of thinking, to submit to the charge. Ever sincerely yours,

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

SARGENT, ZOELLNER, AND SPIRITUALISM.

I do not write as a Spiritualist; for I am not one, and I never have been. I may however be converted, by the way in which the alleged facts of Spiritualism are treated by reviewers. I wish to call attention to two or three things in the Index notice of the recent books of Sargent and Zöllner, hoping that the reviewer will tell us just what he means.

I heartily agree with him in seeing no ground for the common saying that Spiritualism is inconsistent with the scientific order of natural law. If intelligent beings exist,—in a "fourth dimension of space," or anywhere else, invisible to us,—I fail to see how their moving a table is any more an interference with natural law than my doing the same thing would be.

But the one sentence of the reviewer that stopped me with astonishment was this: "To the present writer, these strange things are neither matters of importance nor a proof of Spiritualism." They may not be a proof of Spiritualism; but it does seem to me they are matters of importance, if true. If true, these facts certainly lead out into an unexplored region of the universe full of wonder and interest, which it is at least rash to say will not pay for investigation. Why may not this department of nature be as well worth knowing as the interior of Africa or the north pole?

One more point the reviewer fails to treat clearly. He says he "does not think any amount of physical evidence sufficient to establish the claim of Spiritualism." In this, I agree with him perfectly. I have always said that the only convincing proof would be the manifestation of intelligence, and of an intelligence proved to be other than that of the medium or of those sitting with him. But, after stating this principle, the reviewer goes on, and changes entirely the ground of his objection; and he does it without appearing to be conscious of what he has done. Instead of objecting that the evidence is physical, he seems to admit that there is also evidence that is intellectual: only he says it is worthless, because it is of an inferior quality.

Now, this latter may be a valid objection; but it is not identical with the first. It is quite conceivable, on the spiritualistic hypothesis, that the spirits have deteriorated in mental capacity, in which case, as Huxley says, it becomes a new and forcible argument against suicide,—a reason for staying in this sensible world as long as possible. Or, again, it may be only an indication of unknown difficulty in the method of communication.

But the main point, to my mind, is here. Is there any valid proof that intelligence, other than that of the medium and sitters, is manifested? If there is, does not this prove the spiritualistic claim, without any regard to the quality of that intelligence? If I stand at one end of a telegraph wire and receive a message, this message may be puerile or badly spelled; but is not the proof conclusive that a conscious intelligence of some kind is at the other end? I see no present way of escape from this inference.

Now glance at two or three claimed facts. A slate is prepared and held under the table; and, after it is fixed in position, Slade asks Prof. Zöllner to say what he would like to have written. He replies,—the name just then, for the first time, flashing into his mind,—"Littrow, Astronomer." He hears the pencil writing, and the name appears. If this is true, nothing but intelligent agency can explain it. Sargent tells of preparing two slates with his own hand,—slates bought by himself and that the medium had never touched. He puts a bit of pencil between them, fastens them together, and a lady, living in his family, carries them across the room and places them on a table. After a few minutes, the same lady brings them back to him: he opens them and finds an intelligible message from a dead friend. The medium was twenty-two feet from the table on which the slates were placed; and, from the time when Sargent prepared them till they were returned to him, he, the medium, had not been near them nor touched them.

I myself have had experiences similar to this last.

Now, one or other of the following hypotheses must be accepted:—

1. The witnesses lie; or
2. The mediums deceive the sitters; or
3. Both medium and sitter are the dupes of some unexplained phenomena; or
4. These things are the work of invisible, intelligent beings.

It seems to me that, both for the sake of the wondrous nature of the claimed facts, and for the sake of the thousands who are believing in Spiritualism, these things are important enough to be investigated and decided on.

As to the above four points, let us briefly say: The first one we cannot accept, the witnesses are too many and too respectable. The second one, so far as Zöllner is concerned, the reviewer abandons. The third one might be easily accepted, if only all the phenomena were merely physical. But the manifestation of intelligence is hard to explain on that theory. Meantime, I have one or two facts on hand that, not being a Spiritualist, I do not know what to do with. The treatment they receive at the hands of your reviewer seems to me far from satisfactory. I am anxious that he or some one else should tell me if these supposed facts are facts; if not, wherein the fallacy lies; or, if they are facts, what to do with them.

THE NEGATIVE IN DEBATE.

The following is respectfully submitted in answer to the inquiry of "One of the Members" of a debating society, who, through the Index, recently asked for my views on the point mentioned.

The first work of the negative, in a debate, is to reply to the arguments advanced by the affirmative. If any of the arguments are deemed too weak to need refutation, they may be passed unnoticed. Having disposed of the reasoning or sophistry of the affirmative to his own satisfaction, the respondent is at liberty to introduce any evidence he thinks will be effective in support of the negative. He may confine himself simply to showing that the facts and arguments brought forward fail to establish the proposition in favor of which they have been adduced, or he may go further and prove, if he can, that the proposition is false, and that the truth is with the negative. In the closing speech of a debate, no new subject-matter should be introduced.

LIBERAL ORGANIZATION.

In the organization of the Free Church, I would suggest as a mode what Professor Huxley calls the "silent sort," such a form as Lucretia Mott practised in communion during her long life. The question of ministry is herein solved at once (which "R. H." recently raised in the Index), for a Free Church should have a free ministry.

Pythagoras taught "golden silence." Let "two or three" or a multitude of free souls thus meet together who are tired, as thou hast said in thy editorial of the 10th inst., of "mere discussion and criticism," of mere negation, and see if they cannot find the law of "golden silence." This mystery will be revealed to the earnest seeker.

We have such a Free Religion of which Lucretia Mott was an able minister, in which rationalism and inspiration go hand in hand. Seven yearly meetings are there of such in the United States and Canada.

Why not help us with the free faith which "is not the slave of text and legend"? The faith which we profess is most admirably set forth in Whittier's recent poem, under the heads of "Requirement, Help, and Utterance." I hope that this poem will be reproduced in the Index. May it help us to become members one of another as a church!

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. S. B. WESTON will speak at Revere, Mass., next Sunday evening on "The Need of Earnestness."

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD will lecture at Port Jervis, N.Y., Sunday, March 13; at Shenandoah, Pa., March 15, 16, and 17.

MR. GEORGE B. EMERSON, who has been for more than half a century identified with the cause of education, as a teacher and in various ways, died a few days since.

THE Minister of Public Instruction in France has ordered Mr. Herbert Spencer's work on Education to be printed and distributed gratuitously throughout the Republic.

LIEUTENANT SCHWATKA states that in his long and arduous sledge journey of over three thousand miles in the arctic regions, with the thermometer sometimes sixty degrees below zero, not a single drop of spirituous liquor was drunk.

"REMINISCENCES OF CARLYLE," including sketches of his father, Edward Irving Jeffrey, and Mrs. Carlyle, prepared by Mr. Carlyle himself and entrusted to Mr. James Anthony Froude, already in print, is rather a notable example of book enterprise.

GEORGE CLARK, the original George Harris of Uncle Tom's Cabin, is living in Oberlin, Ohio,—a kindly, jovial octoroon of sixty-six years. He says that the original Uncle Tom is Sam Pete, who still lives, at an advanced age, in Dawn Township, Canada.

CAPTAIN JOHN C. LUSCOMB, a veteran shipmaster, died a few days since in his eighty-third year. He was second officer of the America, Captain J. Dewing, in 1823, which brought Rev. Photius Fisk to Salem, and was probably the last survivor of the crew of that brig. He for many years commanded vessels in the African trade.

THE death of Mrs. Elizabeth K. Churchill, who died at her home in Providence, R.I., last Monday, will cause a painful surprise to those who were familiar with her name and work. Mrs. Churchill has been for years one of the most persistent, earnest, and capable of the distinguished women associated with the suffrage movement and other social reforms in New England. In addition to her special labors in these directions as lecturer and writer, she also regularly pursued the vocation of a journalist in connection with one of the Providence dailies.

SONNET.

TO G. I. AT STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

The leaf you plucked from Shakespeare's garden plot,
And sent me, my most estimable friend,
The voyage of the salt sea injured not;
Green as it grew upon its native spot,
It nestled 'mid the kindly words you penned.
The poet's genius, free from flaw or blot,
In which Melpomene found naught to mend,
My fancy with this leaflet loves to blend;
But, though with care I guard it all my days,
In fret of time 'twill fade and fall away,
Like hope, once fresh, will crumble to decay.
Not so our Dramatist's perennial bays;
Not so the bloom and sunshine of his Plays,
Rejoicing in their immortality.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 10, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

SPECIAL PREMIUM.

Every NEW subscriber to the Index for 1881, or any person who will obtain a new subscriber, will receive a volume entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion, containing a collection of essays by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Samuel Johnson, Francis E. Abbot, John Weiss, Samuel Longfellow, W. J. Potter, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, on various aspects of Free Religion, most of them delivered on the platform of the Free Religious Association; with extracts from the annual reports of the Association, and speeches and addresses by Lucretia Mott, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, C. D. B. Mills, Julia Ward Howe, C. A. Bartol, and other distinguished speakers at the various conventions of the Association. The book contains over four hundred pages, and is handsomely bound in blue, brown, or green cambric covers. Retail price $1.50.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

FURTHER WORDS CONCERNING LIBERAL ORGANIZATIONS.

We call the attention of our readers to Mr. Samuel Johnson's third letter on the subject of "Liberal Organizations, Old and New," given in this week's Index. He sent a private note with the communication, apologizing for its length, and even for asking any farther space at all for continuing the discussion; and also requesting us, if he has "said anything that seems unfair or needlessly insistent," to "leave it out." But there is no occasion for his apology, and certainly we have had no thought of using his generous permission to strike out anything from what he has written. We share, however, the regret he likewise expresses privately that the matter has taken the form of a discussion between himself and us; for probably both he and we could express our views more clearly and profitably on the main question, were it not for this necessity of reply and counter-reply on special points of the argument,—a kind of discussion that is always apt to lead away from and obscure the main question. In this case, the main question, as we understand it, is, What, if any, is the natural form of specific institution or organization that the religious Liberalism which is outside of all existing ecclesiastical institutions requires? It was for its bearing on this question that we instanced (in our article of January 6, which led to this discussion) the fact of the decay and dissolution of the cluster of religious societies which were formed more or less directly under the influence of the Transcendental movement. Let us now, as briefly as possible, bring the discussion back to this point from which it started.

The fact that these societies have ceased to be remains, unless the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, Boston, is to be excepted; and this is the fact of central importance. It is a fact which on its face would seem to indicate that these societies are not such as can meet the present conditions of the unchurched liberal religious thought. They do not themselves appear longer to satisfy or to be needed by the very class of people they have helped to create. In seeking for the causes of the dissolution of the societies in question, there seemed to our thought to be two general causes more prominent than any others: first, that the Transcendental movement under which the societies came into existence led to a philosophy of religion too individualistic to sustain effective religious organization; second, that the forms of service adopted by the societies were patterned too closely after the forms of worship in the Christian churches whose authority had been discarded. These, to our view, being the chief reasons why these societies had come to a natural end, our logical inference was that any new societies about to be organized to meet the present demands of Liberalism would not be based on Transcendental individualism, nor continue the same forms of public service. And subsequently we endeavored to point out what some of the differences might be.

Now, in saying this, we had no thought of uttering anything in "disparagement" of the work of the older societies, nor in "depreciation" of the mission accomplished by the Transcendental movement. Much less did we dream of bringing any charge against the valiant souls who were in the thick of that movement as "indifferent to the progress of human brotherhood." We deeply regret if our language was so defective as to leave with any reader the impression of such a charge. To us, it does not seem to carry such implication. We owe too much in our personal education to the leaders in that movement and to the movement itself to speak of it or them in anything but terms of high and honest appreciation for what they have done, both for the progress of thought and for humanity. If any of us to-day, who have or who think we have any different philosophy to work with, shall fulfil our part as well, great will be our good fortune. We are disposed, too, to accept, at least in a measure, Mr. Johnson's statement that these older religious societies came in part out of the anti-slavery struggle, as a protest against the silence of the churches on that test question of the humanity of the day; and also that the Transcendental movement was only one element in that grand awakening of thought and conscience which came in this country forty and fifty years ago, and which he well calls the "renaissance of American principles and demands." We would also not only admit, but emphasize, the fact that the individual members of these societies were usually alive to all good works, and that the societies themselves, wherever they had any strong foothold, even though not acting in their collective capacity, were a strong bulwark for human rights. And we are also entirely willing to recognize the fact, stated by Mr. Johnson, that they were ready on occasion to lay aside their regular form of service, in order to give opportunity for some earnest prophet of moral reform to plead the cause of humanity on a purely secular basis. But all this does not affect the fact that these societies did have in general a regular form of service (though not, as we have repeatedly said, superstitiously observed), which was inherited from Christian Congregationalism, and was formed essentially on the Christian idea of worship. It is a case, indeed, where the exceptions, made as Mr. Johnson states, prove the rule. Nor, because other influences, like the anti-slavery sentiment, helped to produce these societies, does it any the less remain true that in the main they were in their religious philosophy Transcendentalist; and, as such, they tended to produce extreme individualism in thought and practice. The moral exigencies of the time, particularly the anti-slavery struggle, worked against this tendency, and necessitated certain effective forms of coöperation for a special object. But, these exigencies past, the individualistic tendency has developed to its natural culmination,—dissolution of the organic forms in which it first found expression.

In view of the evident fact of the dissolution of these forms, not only religious, but socialistic, it rather astonishes us to find Mr. Johnson arguing for the organizing capacity of the Transcendental movement. His illustrations strike us as specially unhappy, and proving more nearly the reverse. But passing this over, though it particularly tempts reply, we come to a point which astonishes us still more,— namely, that Mr. Adler's society should be excluded from the list of those that are furnishing the pattern of a new form of liberal organization, because of its "repudiation of the name" religion. This objection is made on such purely technical grounds that it not only astonished, but amazed us, as we read. We do not understand that Mr. Adler and his society at all repudiate the idea of religion. He certainly frequently uses the word (if that be necessary), and constantly illustrates the idea. The name of the society was chosen to emphasize the supreme sovereignty of the ethical principle in religion. Unitarianism has been of late drawing a boundary line of fellowship around all who will call themselves by a particular name. The Free Religious fellowship, we trust, will always be defined by aims, not names. So far as the Free Religious Association is concerned, this point is settled by the second article of its Constitution, which says that "nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief." We cannot therefore assent to the argument that Mr. Adler's society should be excluded from consideration on this question because of its name. Rather would we offer it as the best model yet shown of the kind of organization that is adapted to the unchurched religious Liberalism in large cities.

Mr. Johnson thinks that, in quoting his statement that he sought in his ministry to help "each to become a church to himself," we did injustice to his meaning by not quoting further. It was solely for brevity's sake, and not because it weakened our point, that we omitted his added clause "that, in all needful combinations for moral or spiritual ends, we were bound to drop every organized method or form as soon as we outgrew its uses." The addition would, in fact, have strengthened our argument. The organized methods and forms of these societies have so generally been dropped, we may fairly suppose their uses have been outgrown. Mr. Johnson intimates that he might himself now "prefer dispensing altogether with most or all" of certain forms used in his Sunday service at Lynn. The question, we repeat therefore, now is whether the religious Liberalism that has outgrown the old forms and dropped out of all organizations has grown up to the organization of any new forms; whether the churches of one member shall crystallize into any now "needful combination for moral or spiritual ends."

NORTHAMPTON'S NEW LEGACY.

Northampton, Mass., on the Connecticut River, which numbers, inclusive of its several distinct villages, about ten thousand population, counts among the older towns of the State. It is also one of exceptional wealth and beauty. It has had from time to time, in addition to these circumstances, a good many things in its experience, not always of a pleasant nature, to call it into notice, and now appears to stand a better chance for permanent renown than any community of its class in the country. Its association with the name and fame of Jonathan Edwards who here, for twenty years and more, dealt "damnation round the land," and where an "Edwards Church" perpetuates his memory, has long given it a special advantage in this respect.

Passing over its stupendous bank-robbery of a year or two since, one of the biggest and most successfully executed, perhaps, in the annals of crime in the United States, and the expensive and long drawn-out trial and legal complications that have succeeded, we may briefly note that Northampton contains within its bounds Smith College, though very orthodox, the rival of the best female colleges of the country, beside a number of extensive and flourishing manufactories,—the Nonotuck Silk Company, the Florence Sewing Machine Works,—and last, but not least, the Free Congregational Society, with its spacious and imposing building, known as Cosmian Hall in the same village. But it has just become the recipient of a piece of good fortune which bids fair to eclipse all that has up to this time contributed to its distinction, and whose influence in the direction of freethought and progressive enlightenment is likely to be far more powerful than its eminent theologian's has been, to bind the minds of his posterity to old religious theories and traditions.

A few days ago, Northampton woke up one morning to find that it was not only famous, but the heir to an immense benefaction. It was published that an aged and somewhat recluse fellow-townsman, but little known to the general public beyond an occasional reference to him as a person of great wealth and intellectual and studious habits, whose death had just occurred, had been laying up for it good things of which it had little dreamed, and destined to give to his name a long perpetuity of remembrance.

Thirty years before, it appears Judge Charles E. Forbes, the person referred to, had withdrawn from the active practice of the law, in which he early won reputation and his legal title, and since then had led a retired life, devoted chiefly to the literary pursuits above indicated. By his will, it was disclosed that almost the entire amount of his estate had been left to the founding of a free public library for the town, thus putting it in possession of one of the richest endowed libraries of the country, and exceeding that of any outside of the great cities. By the provisions of the bequest, $50,000 is to be expended in the erection of a suitable library building, the income of $20,000 is to go toward meeting its current expenses, and of $150,000 for the purchase of books. It also stipulates that, unless the terms of the legacy are accepted, it shall be transferred to Harvard College for the founding of a library of works for advanced study in science.

There are some features in connection with this munificent legacy that are peculiar. One of these is the entire absence of any reference to a superior library of thirteen thousand volumes, with a substantial building for its use, erected at even a greater cost than that which the will contemplates, already in existence in the town. Another is the specification that no clergyman is to be allowed to be a member of the board of trustees, and the exclusion of all books of a sectarian religious character.

The following quotation from this document will show his feelings bearing upon these points:—

After specially commending scientific and historical works, the will reads: "Histories of different religions may find an appropriate place in this department. It has been ascertained that there are between two and three thousand different systems of religion in existence. But, as a general rule, these are the inventions of cunning men, or the vagaries of semi-lunatics, speaking boldly and impudently in the name of God, of whose decrees and purposes they know as little as their most ignorant victims. It is wealth and power on the part of the prophet, ignorance and poverty on the part of the disciples. It has been my aim to place within reach of the inhabitants of a town in which I have long lived, and pleasantly, the means of learning, if they are so disposed to learn, the marvellous development of modern thought, and to enable them to judge of the destiny of the race on scientific evidence rather than metaphysical evidence alone. The importance of the education of the people cannot be overrated. It will be found the most efficient, if not the only protection, against the increase of a foreign superstition, whose swarms of priests, Jesuits, monks, ministers, and agents are let loose upon us, and engaged in the unholy work of enslaving the minds of the multitude, and moulding them into instruments of priestly power, a power built upon the remains of ancient paganism, and sustained in one particular at least by gross fetichism, a power growing out of a monstrous perversion of the precepts and example of the founder of Christianity, by which poverty, lowliness, and self-abnegation are forced to mean worldly grandeur, enormous wealth, a palace, absolution, and an earthly crown. As the contrast, so the antagonism must always remain between enlightened free men and the progeny of the purple and scarlet-clad mother. Let it be deeply engraven in the mind that no strictly Roman Catholic ever was or ever can be a free country."

With what faithfulness these wishes will be respected, the future will reveal. Unfortunately, the orthodox conscience has not always proved itself very scrupulous in such instances, when, in the course of time, it has been able to acquire an influence in the administration of bequests of the character. The Stephen Girard case is one in point, where his well-known and expressed desires in respect to Orthodoxy and the clergy have been wantonly overriden; and prayers and the singing of hymns of the Moody and Sankey type are a part of the daily exercise of the institution which the accumulations of his life founded. D. H. C.

ORTHODOX APOLOGETICS.

Dr. Storrs' Lowell Lectures.

The state to which the orthodox apologist has become reduced almost disarms attack, and makes one feel that it rather calls for pity and compassion. And were it not for the glamour of great names, and that uncritical people are impressed with rhetoric and words, it would hardly be worth while to treat at all of the work of Dr. Storrs. And, even as it is, we shall hardly take the trouble to do more than call attention to a few positions, and indicate something of their significance. Our remarks will be based on the Advertiser's report of the first two lectures.

1. He undertakes to defend Christianity as of "divine origin"; and yet he omits the somewhat important matter of defining what this Christianity is that he proposes to champion. He apparently includes under it four different things, that, first and last, have found it rather difficult to live at peace with one another. Catholicism is included, though the branch of the Church to which the Doctor belongs has generally regarded this as "Babylon," "Mother of Harlots," "Antichrist," and other things quite as unsavory. Unitarianism is included; though, on all controversial occasions, its representatives are plainly told they are "not Christians." Modern science and general civilization are apparently assumed to be a part of the great Christian movement. It is quietly overlooked that the head of the largest part of Christendom has pronounced all this to be "godless." And, more ingenious than ingenuous, all the good of the modern world is taken for granted as a result and confirmation of the Christian scheme. How large a part of this the Church has fought against, and how inconsistent it is with the plain intent of the New Testament,—this is all quietly ignored. Of course, he includes the branch of the Church to which he belongs.

2. A curious and of course unconscious contradiction deserves a word of comment. Near the beginning of his first lecture, he declares the need of such a course, because "the world is growing superior to religion, as it is growing less sensitive to its mandates." In the second lecture, his two main arguments to prove his position are the new and grander idea of God that prevails in the modern world, and the fact that self-surrender, self-sacrifice, or the spirit of humanity, so largely characterize it. His argument is needed, because the world is growing worse; and Christianity is divine, because the world is growing better. One of these positions may be good; but, since they are flatly contradictory, we can hardly allow the good Doctor the unchallenged use of both of them.

Two farther remarks seem natural. If the world is growing better, has a grander conception both of God and man, it is only what Evolution asserts, expects, and accounts for. It is difficult to see why Christianity should have any exclusive use of such accommodating arguments.

If, however, as many believe, and as the Doctor seems to believe when it suits his immediate purpose, the world is becoming worse, is it quite clear that what it needs is a larger dose of the medicine that, after nearly nineteen hundred years of trial, has left the patient in a declining condition? If the "world is growing superior to religion, and less sensitive to its mandates," what is the natural inference? According to Dr. Storrs, God himself came down to earth nearly two thousand years ago, for the express purpose of setting up his kingdom, and announcing that this kingdom was "at hand." By the supposition, this is the omnipotent and all-wise God, knowing what is best, and able to work whatever results he pleases. He has done his best for two thousand years. And now comes one of his accredited messengers to tell us that what little, if anything, has been accomplished, is so nearly a failure that an elaborate course of lectures is needed to prove that this same almighty God has had anything to do with it at all. Can absurdity go further than this?

3. The Doctor expressly admits that his position is not capable of demonstration. This, of course, does not say it is not true; for many things may be true and not yet capable of demonstration. But the ground he does take calls for severe words. It is quite common on the part of the pulpit and religious newspapers; and even there its conceit and discourtesy are painfully apparent. But, when brought to a platform and made a part of what ought to be serious and rational discussion, it is simply insufferable impudence. If this seems severe language, we ask the candid reader to reflect as to whether the year-long assumption of Orthodox holiness and consequent infallibility be not insulting enough to call for it. He tells us that his main argument is a moral one, and can only be appreciated by good people. At the same time, the traditional creed of his Church declares that only the "converted" are possessed of goodness, and a spiritual sense that is able to discern spiritual things. If, then, his arguments are good only for an "assembly of saints," why does he bring them into the open forum of the world? But this claim is simple insolence, and unworthy of a strong man. If you are good, you will see as I do; if you do not see as I do, you are not good. This may be good to build conceit on, but is hardly solid foundation for a religion that appeals to the nineteenth-century world.

Of course, it is true that a man must be in sympathy with moral truth, as well as beauty in art or literature, before he can appreciate its power. But it is amazing that a man of Dr. Storrs' character and position should present such considerations as proof that certain historic events took place hundreds of years ago.

4. The Doctor proposes to prove that a certain body of literature called the New Testament is of "divine origin." The indefiniteness with which Liberals are constantly charged is beautifully apparent here. Any theist will admit that they are of "divine origin," only he will hardly confine the divine origination within such narrow limits. All questions of criticism as to authenticity and contents are waived one side. The proof (?) is found in the general good results of Christianity.

Now, it is a nice question of historic criticism — of the existence of which the Doctor shows no appreciation — as to how large a part of the good in the modern world is due to Christianity, and how much has been brought about by other forces? But, granting that the world is much better to-day than it was eighteen hundred years ago, what do the facts prove? A skillful organizer can marshall them to the support of a good many different propositions. But any man who believes in evolution, or human progress in any form, finds them falling easily and naturally into their places. They are only a part of the natural order of the world, — and is not this natural order of "divine origin"? They are just what would be expected. And to offer the natural results of the growth and expansion of the human mind, the moral results of the world's experience, and the physical results of the world's gradual conquest on the part of man,— to offer these as proof of the actual happening of unnatural events nearly two thousand years ago, and for which there are no modern or living witnesses, seems a curious display of theological prejudice.

When one of the strongest men of the American Orthodox Church comes, in the rôle of a modern Paul to the "modern Athens," and has no grander message than this, we will address him as the ancient Athenians did the ancient Paul, "We will hear thee again of this matter,"—but not until you have something better to say.

SOIENCE AND RELIGION.

A VERY popular Unitarian minister, offering a prayer recently at the installation of his successor, made use of the following language: "O God, we pray thee to save our young brother from the heartache, and from the headache, and from the stomach-ache!" We expressed our willingness recently to award a Chinese chromo to the discoverer of a theological anachronism equal to a modern Unitarian prayer for rain. We think it is found already in this modern Unitarian prayer for deliverance from the stomach-ache. The "young brother" who was thus absurdly prayed for had the good sense to say at a subsequent meeting that he believed in obedience to the laws of health as the only effectual preventive of headaches and stomach-aches; and, indeed, we suppose that the "old brother" believes about the same. His indulgence in buffoonery was owing, doubtless, to the supposed necessity of saying something original and quaint, for the latter of which he has acquired a well-earned reputation. Dr. Mallalieu in a recent "temperance" prayer, compared Dr. Crosby to Rip Van Winkle; and, apropos of this performance, a writer in the Boston Herald, at the close of a really brilliant editorial, represents one of the undevout as saying: "If I have any unsavory stage allusion to fling at the head of a given clergyman, lawyer, or doctor, I prefer to out with it first hand to my mates, and not to the Lord. None too much reverence have I at the best. May the little I can compass at least preserve me from impiously calling upon the Eternal to laugh at my poor jokes, indorse my malicious bigotry, and come down with a round of divine applause at my success in splitting the ears of the groundlings." There is farce enough already in the most solemn Evangelical pulpit utterances to justify the sharpest criticism of any indulgence in this sort of eccentricity on the part of any pretender to a more enlightened theology. We have given the incident, moreover, as an illustration of the little attention paid by some noted ministers to the duty of squaring their religious expressions by their scientific knowledge.

THE clearest presentation we have yet seen of the theory of the evolution of the chemical elements is by Lester F. Ward, in a paper read before the Philosophical Society of Washington, and printed in the Popular Science Monthly for February. The paper is unusually suggestive. The supposition that the original nebulous mass need not have been in an incandescent state is one which we do not remember having met with before, but which seems to follow logically from Mr. Ward's representation. Light and heat are themselves results of evolution. "Nebulæ must therefore possess a long history, of which neither the telescope nor the spectroscope can furnish any record,— the pre-luminous period." "Matter, in its cosmical history, . . . assumes a great variety of forms, and resolves itself into numerous specifically distinct molecular aggregates. The different substances which we know on our planet are the result of the cohesion into homogeneous masses of these different aggregates, all the constituent units of any one of these masses consisting of the same species of molecular aggregate." The use of the word "species" in this connection is peculiarly suggestive. Mr. Ward of course admits of no break in the process of development from the primary form of matter, which may be supposed to have existed in or before the non-luminous period of the nebulæ, through the chemical elements which now exist in our own and in other worlds, through the inorganic compounds with which we are acquainted to the highly complex and unstable molecules of organic compounds. We commend the article to our readers, believing that no one can read it understandingly without reaching the conclusion that the human race is yet too young and knows too little to dare to write its theological creed.

MR. F. W. PUTNAM gives the weight of his authority to the theory of the great antiquity of man in America; believing, even, that he was probably of autochthonous origin. The Californian Indian of three hundred years ago was probably the result of development by contact of tribe with tribe through an immense period of time. The primitive American stock "is probably to be found now in its purest continuation in the Innuit." This last conclusion which Mr. Putnam reaches from the study of the Indians of the Pacific coast is identical with that arrived at from other studies of the Indian remains of the Atlantic coast. In California, human remains and works of man are now found in the gravel under beds of volcanic material, associated with the remains of extinct animals.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in a paper before the Linnean Society, adduces additional facts in confirmation of his previously expressed belief that ants possess some power of communication; though some attempts made by using the telephone to ascertain if the communication was made by sound failed of satisfactory results. That they possess some method of communication, however, seems to be an established fact. He shows, also, that they recognize and enter into amicable relations with relatives of the same species, even when these relatives have attained mature age without being previously seen, although strangers of the same species and of the same age were immediately killed,— a remarkable power of discrimination. Extraordinary intelligence is also displayed by a species of ant which collects the eggs of aphides in the autumn, carefully shelters them for six months in its nest, and in the spring carries the young aphides back again to the same plant from which the eggs were previously taken. The aphides, as is well known, supply the ants with their honey. The old injunction to "Go to the ant, consider her ways, and be wise," has not yet lost its verbal force, although the teacher who first gave it never dreamed even of a mental philosophy, much less of the new psychology which a study of facts analogous to these above mentioned has made necessary.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

IN an able address delivered in New York before the school superintendents of the country, Mr. W. T. Harris discussed the work of our common schools. He said they could not take the place or do the work of the home, church, or state. He spoke specially of the value of the common school as a means of culture to the moral nature, and said it checked crime as well as developed good citizens. His words are worthy of a place here, for we believe his conclusions are entirely correct: "Over and over again, in school reports have been published the investigations of our school superintendents and students of social science into the statistics of penitentiaries and reform schools. The statistics on this subject agree in all substantial points, no matter when gathered or where. The report of Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, of this city, as chairman of a committee on education, appointed by the Council of Political Reform to report upon compulsory education in 1873, is a type of the best of these reports. It is found that the small percentage of illiterates in our population furnishes a very large percentage of the criminals. To the one who is familiar with the public school, it is unnecessary for me to call attention to the constant and effective moral training that goes on perpetually in the well-disciplined school.

"The pupil is first and foremost taught to be regular and punctual, to be cleanly in person and polite to his fellows, obedient to his teachers. He is taught to be silent and industrious, attentive and critical in his mental habits. To sum up all these in one word, he is taught to subordinate his capricious will and inclinations to the reasonable conditions under which he may combine with his fellow-men, and share in their labors and in the fruits of their labors. The great advantage of school instruction in morality lies in the fact that the pupil is made to do and practise these fundamental moral acts of self-control, and is not merely lectured about them or exhorted to do them, and left to his own caprice. In the school, these moral habits must be practised, or the institution cannot go on. What wonder, then, that those who have attended school, even for the short period required to learn to read and write, are found to be ten times less likely to reach the jail and prison than those who are entirely illiterate?"

THE last Bulletin from Boston's "Associated Charities" makes some excellent suggestions, and speaks of the great demand for labor, thus:—

It is hereby earnestly urged and requested that the daily newspapers be taken at every ward office. Columns containing applications for labor to be cut out every morning, and posted on a bulletin board for the use of agent and visitors. Thus the private want may meet the public demand. Every kind of labor is in demand, the demand is greater than the supply: therefore, if the poor are out of work, it is either because they have no friend to put them where they are wanted, or that they are incapable of doing anything. The newspapers, combined with private efforts of visitors and agents, can always succeed, if time and care be given in placing those who can and will work. The class of the incapables must be subdivided: first, into those who are defective, including the sick and aged; second, into those who are ignorant. The first require benevolent assistance, but the percentage of these is small compared with the large body of our population demanding relief. The second must have Industrial Education to fit them for the demand for labor constantly unsupplied. We trust the friends of the poor in Boston will observe the needs of the poor, as now understood, ask for no more sewing-circles or relief of like nature. We need schools, cooking, sewing-machine, housework, or kitchen-garden schools, carpentry, printing, and laundry work, kindergartens, and the like. Nothing repays so poorly as sewing by women who cannot sew; and, although some relief of this nature has been and is necessary as a stepping-stone, the amount of money spent in this direction has been so large as to prevent progress.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, Feb. 11, 1881.

Three weeks of snowy, wintry weather in January gave a most dismal aspect to this metropolis, whose genial climate is one of its great attractions. The temperature never fell lower than twenty-six degrees above zero; but the melting snows caused slush, and created a chilly, humid atmosphere, very trying to pulmonary and bronchial invalids. Snow has fallen here but two years in the last ten, and the Parisians hope not to receive another visitation from it for years to come. Rainy weather, similar to that of April in Northern latitudes, has succeeded, rendering light fires necessary. To Americans suffering from nervous prostration consequent upon climatic and other causes, the salubrious climate of Paris possesses healing powers not found in more southerly and therefore more debilitating localities. The air is, however, too sharp and bracing for pulmonary sufferers, though, strange to say, the rainy season causes no rheumatism. Strangers, sojourning here during these snowy, rainy days, find in the museums and art galleries of the Louvre and Luxembourg a perpetual source of delight. Centrally located, easy of access, cheery with light and warmth, their hospitable doors are open certain days of the week and always upon Sunday, inviting prince and beggar, peasant and bourgeois, and strangers from all quarters of the earth to enter, and without money and without price to study, copy, or contemplate the priceless treasures of ancient, mediæval, and modern art here gathered and preserved with scrupulous care. The nervous, careworn American, whom ambition has spurred on to overwork of brain and body, until at middle life both are enfeebled, finds a delightful resting-place in the museums and art galleries of Paris. The art works of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, and of the peoples who derived civilization from and succeeded them, tell the story of the lives of the generations who appeared and passed away during the last three thousand years of the earth's existence, and preach a most instructive sermon of human progression.

The granite statuary, gigantic in size, shown in the museums of Egyptian sculpture, conveys no idea of beauty to the modern eye. Its durability excites wonder; but as one compares the great, hideous Sphinx, with its vast semi-human, semi-beastly proportions, and the sculptured forms on bas-relief supposed to have been carved in the reign of Nectanebo, with the statuary of modern masters in the galleries of the Luxembourg, three thousand years of growth and progress seem not too long a period to have intervened between the time the former and latter were hewn in stone and marble. The ancient paintings teach the same story of progression. Masterly in form, feature, and color as many of them are, with all due reverence for the minds which conceived and the hands which gave them shape and form on canvas, they are not superior to later works. Interesting studies they are, as expressive of the best work of their kind, in their time. But, after passing hours in studying the works of the ancient masters in the Louvre, it is a perfect delight to spend a day amid the paintings by modern masters at the Luxembourg. Rosa Bonheur's team of beautiful oxen ploughing in the green fields under a sunny sky, Eugène Isabey's marine views, Courbet's sea views and shipwrecks, Bougereau's "Bath of Aurora," the harvest scenes of Breton, and many others, show that painting both in design and execution has progressed, although art in modern times does not receive that fostering care from kings and princes, which was its exclusive privilege formerly.

While the republic and its government does not please the great majority of the rulers of the Catholic Church, the victory gained at the last elections has brought acquiescence to the "powers that be." Many of the curés in the provinces favor the republic, and sometimes one has the courage to publish the fact. On the eve of the elections, Curé Montardit, of Ariége, openly declared himself in favor of the republic, saying, "The truth is, monarchy in all its forms has lost its hold on the people, and the Democratic Republic is daily gaining." The great republican gains at the elections proved the truth of his words. In educational matters, the government is continually aiming to promote progress. Efforts to engraft manual education in connection with intellectual in the common schools are now in active operation; and the experiment will be made on a small scale, and, if successful, be engrafted upon all the secondary schools, which correspond to our grammar schools. Thoroughness in all the rudimentary branches is sought; and, as far as I can learn, no foreign language is taught at the expense of the State. The opposition which efforts to establish higher grades of study for women meets is often amusing, the Retroactionists believing it nothing short of sacrilege to enlarge the sphere of woman's educational opportunities. Recently, they bitterly opposed teaching young girls physiology; and a writer in one of the leading journals, writing in favor of higher education for women, said he had never approved of giving women political rights, and thought their sphere should always lie within the boundaries of the family circle, but he really could not understand why a woman should be a worse wife or mother because she was taught the laws which govern health and life.

The great number of prizes, premiums, decorations, medals, etc., bestowed almost daily in intellectual, industrial, military, and scientific France, strikes the undemonstrative American as childish, but appears to have the tendency to foster ambition and develop progress here. In all the public schools and in medical colleges and art schools, prizes are given; and they often create jealousy and ill-feeling. In the hospitals, prizes are also to be given to the most successful practitioners; and the names of saints, by which different wards have been known, are to be erased, and those of eminent physicians and surgeons to supplant them. "Lay nursing," if I may be allowed the term, is preferred in all the public hospitals to "clerical nursing," and, so far as is possible, the former is superseding the latter.

A lively scene occurred at one of the Railway Dépôts at Lyons recently. A discontented young nun of that city tied her sheets together and made her escape thereby from the third story of a convent, whose monastic vows she had assumed for life. She ran to the dépôt, reaching it breathless, and implored the officials to aid her in leaving in a train about starting. This they did, locking her in one of the cars. Before the train left, however, the Lady Superior of the convent reached the dépôt, and demanded that the fugitive be restored to her. The officials refused to interfere; and, finding force of no avail, the lady tried persuasion. "You will surely lose your soul, you will surely be damned, if you go," said she. "I shall surely lose my soul in your convent," replied the fugitive, as the train moved from the dépôt. Whether the young nun was compelled to return, I did not learn, though probably not, since, under the new régime, ecclesiastical power cannot employ compulsion.

Having always believed that the people of the United States are the most tolerant and enlightened in the world, I was severely shocked, some time ago, by being informed by the editor of a woman's rights journal "that we are a nation of intolerant bigots." Thinking I had misunderstood, I asked her to repeat what she had said; and the words fell clearly and distinctly: "You are a nation of intolerant bigots, because you are ruled by Protestantism; and you can progress no further in the cause of woman's enfranchisement, you are bound by superstition. When we Catholics see light, we embrace it and are free, while you Protestants receive a glimmer which contents you." It was in vain that I assured her our general enlightenment is greater than that of France, though, individually, we cannot boast of as many learned scholars or such excellent institutions of learning as France, with her older civilization; and that, though women are, legally and politically speaking, in a condition of serfdom and subjection, we have made far greater advances toward equality than any country of Europe except England. But she insisted that we were a nation of intolerant bigots, and began to illustrate in such very rapid French that my knowledge of the language was insufficient to hold farther argument with her; and in leaving her came the reflection that she was the only rude, impolite person I had met in Paris. I had forgotten the occurrence until it was recalled to my mind by an article in the Index of January 20, under the title of "Academic Freedom in America," wherein it was clearly shown that American colleges and universities are sometimes deprived of the instruction which the most cultured minds can give, because these minds are not in harmony with the popular theology. Then came the thought that the candid and not over-polite Frenchwoman had some foundation for her assertion.

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these with great freedom, and not of necessity at all. Sedimentary Rocks.

Articles 43–76 inclusive.

Specimens: Conglomerate or Pudding Stone, Sandstone, and Shale.

We have learned what about stones?

We have found that they may be divided into how many groups?

These we might call what?

But what other names have already been applied to them?

What do we mean by rock?

What happens if we put some gravel into a glass of water?

This layer at the bottom is called what?
What then is Sediment?
And what are Sedimentary Rocks?
What is this?

[Show specimen Conglomerate.]

How is it composed?
Were these round stones separated and left in a loose heap, what would you call them?
Conglomerate then is what?
What is this?

[Show specimen Sandstone.]

It consists of what?
What then is Sandstone?
What is this?

[Show specimen Shale.]

If we scrape a little of this into a tumbler of water, what happens?

[Illustrate practically.]

Shale therefore is what?
What is the difference between Gravel and Sand?
How can that be shown?
What shall we learn about it by following the course of a brook from a mountain-top into the meadows below?
What makes the stones grow smaller as the brook flows on?
Does the same thing take place in the channel of every stream, and along the shores of every sea?
Sand and gravel then are what?
And what have the sand on the shore and the rocks on the mountains to do with each other?
What has the water to do with both?
What is a human relation?
What does this lesson show about relations in outward Nature?

SELECTIONS.

What a reserve of power lies in the ground under our feet, in the silent throat of every bird, in the scale-clad buds on oak and apple-tree.—Parker.

When we look at the uses of things, and see the relation even of the homeliest and ugliest of these to the world about us, there is a certain beauty investing even things which are most unattractive to the mortal eye.—Parker.

From Nature's chain, whatever link you strike,
Tenth or ten thousandth breaks the chain alike.
—Pope.

Universal Nature, through her vast
And crowded whole, repeats one note.—Emerson.

The world is witness continually to power, to never failing law, to mind that is everywhere.—Parker.

Think naught a trifle, though it small appear:
Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles life.—Young.

Suggestions to Leader.—Explain, in connection with the first selection, the power involved in converting the large pieces of rock to gravel, sand, and mud. Show, in connection with the second, the value of mud and the beauty of its relation to other things in Nature. Let the third, fourth, and fifth selections express the thread of universal relation as shown in the lesson; and the sixth the value of little things, the grains of sediment in the world of matter, the grains of thought and love in the world of man.

Articles 77-117 inclusive.

Specimens: Shale containing fossil fern and Shale containing animal remains.

We have found that Sedimentary Rocks are made of what?
And where do these come from?
How shall we now learn the way in which these materials have been converted into solid stone?
In what kind of water was our specimen of Conglomerate made?
In what our Sandstone?
In what our Shale?
What will happen in a pool at the foot of a gently sloping roadway, if left undisturbed?
What will a section of this show?

Where may this same process be seen on a larger scale?
If we could draw off the water from the Lake of Geneva, what should we find?
What goes on at the bottom of the sea?
Thus we find out what about the sea deposits laid down under water?

[See Figure 11, Page 42.]

This arrangement is called what?
How is mud converted into stone?
How is sand converted into stone?
Are these processes always going on?
What are sometimes found in Sedimentary Rocks?
What is this?

[Show specimen Shale containing fossil fern.]

How do we know that this was once a plant?
How did it get inside a solid stone?
What is this?

[Show specimen Shale containing animal remains.]

How does it happen that these shells, etc., are imbedded in solid stone?
What can we see in the little pools of water left upon a rocky beach, when the tide has gone out?
How do these correspond with what is found upon the floor of the ocean?
Has the same thing been going on in the past?
So that Sedimentary Rocks are often full of what?
Any such relic of plant or animal imbedded in rock is called what?
In studying about this class of rocks, we have learned first what about them?
And, second, we have read a new chapter in what?

SELECTIONS.

How old is the material world, and yet forever fresh and young!—Parker.

When you consult the record of the earth itself, you find that the six days' miracle of the poets are millions of years' work of the divine forces of the universe.—Parker.

That pebble is older than Adam!
Secrets it hath to tell:
These rocks—they cry out history,
Could I but listen well.—Gannett.

Time tinges the scarred mountain side with beauty, and paints every rock that the ocean leans against with exquisite colors that charm the eye.—Parker.

The world was built in order,
And the atoms march in tune.—Emerson.

The mountain-sap, the shells, the sea,
All spheres, all stones, our helpers be.—Emerson.

Suggestions to Leader.—You can buy specimens of Shale with fossil ferns, and animal remains, such as shells, for a small sum. Let the first four selections express the age of the earth as shown in the study, the fifth the universal reign of law and order, the sixth the fact that these natural objects teach us lessons in history and morals.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

SHAKSPERE: HIS MIND AND ART. By Edward Dowden, LL.D. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Mr. Dowden is the author of the admirable Shakspere primer that was published a few years ago in a series of literature primers. The original English edition of the present work was written before the primer, but it is now for the first time published in this country. It is an admirable book, the most admirable book upon Shakspere that has come under our notice; and we do not forget how excellent is Mr. Hudson's Shakspere's Life, Art, and Characters, and Mr. White's Life and Genius of Shakspere. Mr. Hudson's book has the advantage of Mr. Dowden's of being much fuller in its treatment of the plays; and both Mr. Hudson and Mr. White have attempted, with more or less success, to show us what manner of concrete life Shakspere's was, and what were the facts of his career. The two agree in many things, but differ radically in the matter of Shakspere's leaving his second-best bed to his wife. A Parthian arrow, says Mr. White. A bit of homely tenderness, says Mr. Hudson; and let us hope that he is right. Mr. Dowden does not attempt to construct the outward life of Shakspere; but, having by various critical methods arrived at tolerable certainty as regards the chronology of the plays and poems, he traces through them an intellectual and a moral development. His success in this attempt is very plausible, to say the least. And Mr. Dowden brings to his task what many Shakspere critics do not, a rich and noble style, abounding, when this is needed, in sensuous beauty, and, when these are needed, in phrases of penetrating spiritual import. He has an admirable introductory chapter on Shakspere and the Elizabethan Age. In his second chapter, he traces in a general way the growth of Shakspere's mind and art; and in four chapters following, as also in the last, he illustrates his theory by studies of the different plays. Chapter VII., on the Humor of Shakspere, is episodical, but contributes its quota to the general drift of the book. We hoped to find in this chapter some reference to Mr. Weiss' Wit, Humor, and Shakspere, but have not done so. No better supplement to Mr. Dowden's treatment of Shakspere's humor can be found. Mr. Dowden is deeply and, as it seems to us, justly convinced of the positiveness, the non-supernaturalness, of Shakspere's mind and art. Without any forcing of the note, the greatest poet has "become as one of us," a fellow-traveller on "the earthward pilgrimage."

WHY I DO NOT BELIEVE. By Augustus Jacobson. pp. 279. Chicago: Belford, Clarke & Co. 1881.

The reader of this little book soon finds the meaning of the imperfect title to be, Why I do not believe the prevailing theology. The author makes minute examination of many of the self-contradictions and other marks of fallibility found in the Bible, and makes no secret of his belief that many of the wonderful things related there have been deliberately invented. Many of the reasons he gives for dissent are good, and much of the criticism he makes, both upon Scripture and Orthodox dogma, is sound; but a certain violence and contemptuousness of expression throughout the work tend to neutralize the good it contains. There is more sarcasm than persuasiveness about it.

ALL ROUND THE YEAR. Verses from Sky Farm, with which are included the thirty poems issued in illustrated form in the volume entitled In Berkshire with the Wild Flowers. By Elaine Goodale and Dora Read Goodale. Illustrated. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 182 Fifth Avenue. 1881.

This volume is particularly interesting, because it shows that Dora is fast outstripping her sister, and manifesting such originality of conception and boldness in execution as are likely to give her a high place among our poets. The last half of the volume is mainly hers. Particularly good are her "Fragment," "Earth and Sky" and "The Whippoorwill and the Poet," in which we are told that the man who would see more than the bird does must not only look at sky and mountain, but must live "In the thirst of the city, the heat of the town.

And the desperate longing behind."

THE INTERNATIONAL REVIEW. Editors, John T. Morse, Jr., and Henry Cabot Lodge. Publishers, A. S. Barnes & Co., New York.

Under its present management, this Review has gained a definiteness of purpose and breadth of range which raise it to the first rank among periodicals of its class. The present number, March, contains timely and valuable articles. The first, by Edward Atkinson, on "The Solid South," gives a hopeful view of present conditions in the Southern States, showing how the semi-barbarous, social life of slavery times, which was the outgrowth of the "Bourbon idea that it is the function of the privileged few to govern the many," is becoming civilized by the development of industrial skill, and enterprise in the masses.

Henry Adams discusses suggestively "Modern Public Debts," showing that our financiers, in their "extended employment of national credit," are bringing on a new state of affairs unknown before 1850. Two articles on Irish conditions will be read with lively interest, one by Leonard Courtney, M.P., the newly made under-Secretary in the Home Office, being the conclusion of his impartial and intelligent account of the lamentable state of Ireland. Mr. Courtney shows conclusively that, whatever political and external conditions may contribute to the distress of the Irish peasantry, the fact that large masses of people are trying to live on small "holdings" of poor land, which, if they were owned by the peasants, would not furnish sustenance to their enormous families, constitutes the underlying evil. Mr. Justin McCarthy, in his discussion of "The Irish Land Question," takes strong ground in favor of present measures protective of the tenant farmers against the rapacity of landlords and leading toward a "peasant proprietary" in Ireland. He pictures in dark colors those evils of the Irish tenants which are due to other causes than their own improvidence or the physical conditions spoken of by Mr. Courtney. Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge gives a pleasant and discriminating review of Trevelyan's "Early Days of Fox." Mr. William F. Apthorp contributes a critical sketch of Offenbach. The article of most especial interest to Index readers is that of Dr. William A. Hammond on "The Scientific Relations of Modern Miracles." In this article is shown the physical causes for "miraculous" cures of disease. The "expectant attention" of the patient is sufficient in certain types of nervous malady to effect a "faith" cure.

THE North American Review for March presents a varied and useful collection of essays. The article by Bishop A. C. Coxe on "Theology in the Public Schools" is one which all radicals will do well to read, though none will accept its conclusions. The Bishop, to use his own language, regards the Bible as the base of all our social and moral ideas, and not, in any sense, as the text-book of a formal creed. He quotes the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania and Chancellor Kent as to New York to the effect that our system of government rests upon Christianity, and approvingly gives Kent's opinion that "whatever strikes at the root of Christianity tends manifestly to the dissolution of civil government." The conclusion arrived at is that the Bible should be retained in the public school as a text-book of morality.

Dorman B. Eaton contributes a valuable article on "Despotism in Lunatic Asylums." Students of social science have long felt the dangers connected with our treatment of the insane. Mr. Eaton states these clearly and fairly. He says, "The late investigation of the New York asylum for insane convicts disclosed facts that would disgrace Turkey,—filth, vermin, contagious disease, food hardly less fatal than starvation itself," etc. This may be an exceptionally severe case, probably is, but there can be no question that the management of insane asylums is open to grave criticism. The most essential step toward reform, it is claimed, is to open all asylums, public and private alike, to inspection and reports by an independent board, after the British model.

John Fiske's severe criticism of Joseph Cook will be regarded as a good relish, and the title he gives him as eminently fitting and just. The other essays are "The Isthmian Ship Railway," by James B. Eads; "The Effects of Negro Suffrage," by Judge H. H. Chalmers; "The Success of the Free School System," by John D. Philbrick; "The Political Attitude of the Mormons," by Judge C. C. Goodwin; and "Recent Publications in Physics," by Professor A. W. Wright.

THE Popular Science Monthly for March is more readable than the previous number. The series on "Physical Education" is continued in a rather high-keyed tone of criticism. "Municipal Nuisances" is full of unpleasant fragrances. "Cerebral Localization" is an effort to lay out the ground of a new phrenology, by H. De Varigny. "A Piece of Coal" is the title of a very good paper, by R. S. Calvin. "Lingering Barbarism," by Carl Vogt, a translation from the German, pleads for science instead of the classics, and extols Sir Joshua Mason's philanthropy. "The Legal Position of Married Women," by Anna Garlin Spencer, is a very close cut and statistical paper, more valuable for its careful compilation of facts than for its philosophy. "Rock Weathering" is a delightful treatise on a neglected subject, by Professor Geike. "The State as an Educator," by H. H. Wilson, lifts a finger of warning at our State governments, as tending to repress individuality by imposing rigid uniformity in education. It points us to China and Germany as examples of this stultifying uniformity, and thinks our system of instruction a rock ahead. "The Morals of Luxury" is a sprightly translation. According to its ethics, we should abundantly produce those things that everybody needs, in order to keep them cheap. There is an excellent sketch and portrait of Professor Benjamin Peirce in the number, and among the literary notices a fine review of Professor Semper's new book on Animal Life.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD for March is a very readable number, containing several articles of general interest. The first is an account of the obelisks, and of the New York obelisk in particular, by General Di Cesnola. Then follows a very good notice of a new Irish poet, Alfred Perceval Graves, a singer of no mean merit, if the account of him here given is to be accepted. The next article criticises Bastian's book on the Brain as an Organ of Mind with a good deal of spirit and skill. There is also an account of a passage in the early life of Petrarch, well written and interesting. This number contains the usual variety of other articles. In the book notices, a new work on the Koran is criticised. Mahomet is pronounced "a designing, ambitious man, who dealt in duplicity from the very beginning"; and the hope is expressed that his book and religion will be nothing more in the future than a literary curiosity.

IT seems to be the determination of the publishers of Wide-Awake that every number shall be as good as the preceding. Certainly, at least, they are very uniform in their attractiveness and excellence. The March number confirms this conclusion. We know a little boy, of nine years of age, whose opinion we have consulted on this point, and he declares, with a good deal of emphasis, that it is "splendid." Apart from the amusing and pretty poems, entertaining stories and their plentiful accompaniment of pictures, there are two instructive articles in regard to the Indians: one by Mrs. Theodora Jenness, entitled "Some Indian Schools"; and the other by Rev. E. E. Hale, the third of his "To-day" series of talks, which is this time about the Poncas, whose cause the author has ardently espoused.

OUR LITTLE ONES presents a charming full-page illustration appropriate to the month, and another of the "Little Artist who paints in the cold night hours," beside the usual profusion of picture lessons.

FOREIGN.

M. MILLER has just presented to the Louvre a curious marble tablet, discovered by him in Thessaly in 1863, and inscribed with the names of the victors in the public games held at Larissa while Thessaly was under the sway of Rome.

A CURIOUS case has arisen by the refusal of the States of Guernsey to sanction the registration of the Burials Act. The Channel Islands, as our readers may remember, were expressly included within the operation of the Act, and thus something very like a conflicting jurisdiction has to be settled. The authorities of Guernsey consider the assent of their local Assembly necessary even to the validity of an Act of Parliament. However this matter may be settled, we hope it will not lead to a violent over-riding of local rights.—Secular Review.

RUMORS from the Vatican go to show that the contributions of the faithful are falling off. There can be no doubt that, so far as the Peter s Pence collections are concerned, this is the case. The whole sum collected in 1880 is short of £120,000, while in 1879 it amounted to £160,000. It cannot be doubted that the Peter's Pence collections form a very good gauge of the power of the Roman Catholic Church over the mass of the people; and it is not surprising to find that the remarkable decrease in the revenue of 1880 has produced something like consternation at Rome.

A SPECIAL meeting of the members of the Sunday Society was held recently at Conduit Street, Dr. Corfield presiding, to reconsider the position of the society in regard to its action in Parliament. The chairman explained that the intention of bringing forward in the House of Commons a resolution in favor of the opening on Sundays of public museums and galleries had been abandoned in consequence of the great pressure of business in that House, but that it had been determined that the resolution should be proposed in the House of Lords, Lord Dunraven having expressed his willingness to proceed with it. A resolution approving this proposal was adopted.

HENRY LLEWELLYN, alias John Brown, described as an "Evangelist," was recently charged at the Chester city police-court with bigamy. The prisoner was married in 1865 at the parish church of Quinton, Worcestershire, to a woman named Davies. Some two years afterward, he deserted his wife. Nothing more was heard of him until March last, when he appeared as an "Evangelist" at a Primitive Methodist chapel near Dudley, Staffordshire. Llewellyn called himself "John Brown, the Converted Clown," and was accompanied by a woman whom he represented to be his wife. His first wife, who was still living in the neighborhood, recognized him; and the trustees of the chapel at which the "Converted Clown" was officiating thereupon turned him out of the pulpit.

THE spirit which inspires the Falk laws in Germany and the suppression of the religious orders in France finds freer scope for its manifestation in the Republic of Guatemala. By Guatemalan law, every Jesuit caught on Guatemalan soil is punishable by death; and this decree is no brutum fulmen, as the latest news from Honduras only too plainly proves. The Rev. Father Gilliet, a Jesuit priest of extraordinary eloquence and learning, who commanded universal respect in the British colony of Honduras, visited Guatemala for his health. No sooner had he crossed the frontier than he was arrested, marched barefoot one hundred miles across the mountains to the capital, where he was shot by order of the President in the public square. The excitement in Belize was intense. In future, Jesuit fathers traveling for their health will do well to give Guatemala a wide berth.—Pall Mall Budget.

JESTINGS.

IN one of the Parisian papers, the New York World finds this item: "Well, what do you think of X.'s new five-act tragedy?" "Hum! There were five of us in our box, not bad judges of a play as judges go, and we all agreed that one act should have been omitted." "Indeed! Which act?" "Well, no two of us agreed on that point."

"WHAT," asked a Galveston Sunday-school teacher, "is that invisible power that prevents the wicked man from sleeping, and causes him to toss about upon his pillow; and what should he do to enjoy that peace that passeth understanding?" "Sew up the hole in the musquito-bar," was the prompt answer from the bad boy at the foot of the class.

MINISTER to Rory: "Why weren't you at the kirk on Sunday?" Rory: "I was at Mr. Dunlop's kirk." Minister: "I don't like your running about the strange kirks in that way. Not that I object tae yer hearing Mr. Dunlop: but I'm shure ye wadna like yer ain sheep straying away into strange pastures." Rory: "I wadna care a grain, sir, if it were better grass."—Judy.

AT a Canadian hotel lately, a terrible screaming was heard to proceed from the bath-room. A servant burst open the door, and soon found that Sara Bernhardt had pulled out the plug from the waste water-pipe, and had slipped in. With a presence of mind known only in northern countries, the maid got a button-hook and pulled her out again, much to the joy of her many ardent admirers.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HE whose mind and life are free from deceit has a dwelling in the hearts of all men. He who speaks the truth with all his heart is superior to those who make gifts and practise austerities. Truth will lead to every virtue. Purity of body comes by water, purity of mind by truthfulness.—Hindu.

TO HONOR your father and mother is better than to serve the gods of heaven.—Buddhist.

BENEVOLENCE is the tranquil habitation of man, and righteousness is his straight path. Alas for them who leave the tranquil dwelling empty, and do not reside in it, and who abandon the right path, and do not pursue it! The path of duty lies in what is near, and men seek it in what is remote.—Mencius (China).

VIRTUE is the nursing-mother of all human pleasures: who, in rendering them just, renders them also pure and permanent; in moderating them, keeps them in breath and appetite; in interdicting those which she herself refuses, whets our desires to those that she allows; and, like a kind and liberal mother, abundantly allows all that nature requires, even to satiety, if not to lassitude.—Socrates.

IF thou hast done harm to any one, be it ever so little, consider it as much: if thou hast done him a favor, be it ever so great, consider it as little. Has thy neighbor shown thee kindness, do not undervalue it; and has he caused thee an injury, do not overrate it.—Talmud.

IF thou wishest to see thy faults clearly, lie for a moment in ambush for thyself, as if thou didst not know thee.—Persian.

LET love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good. Be kindly-affectioned one to another with brotherly love, in honor preferring one another.—Paul.

TRUE joy is a serene and sober motion; and they are miserably out that take laughing for rejoicing: the seat of it is within, and there is no cheerfulness like the resolutions of a brave mind that has fortune under its feet.—Seneca.

I AM more afraid of my own heart than of the Pope and all his cardinals. I have within me the great pope, self.—Luther.

GOD is better served in resisting a temptation to evil than in many formal prayers.—William Penn.

EVERY man, however good he may be, has a yet better man dwelling in him, which is properly himself, but to whom, nevertheless, he is often unfaithful. It is to this interior and less mutable being that we should attach ourselves, not to the changeable everyday man.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

LIBERTY is a principle: its community is its security, its exclusiveness is its doom.—Kossuth.

RITUALS, Liturgies, Credos, Sinai Thunder: I know more or less the history of these; the rise, progress, decline and fall of these. Can thunder from all the thirty-two azimuths, repeated daily for centuries of years, make God's Laws more godlike to me? Brother, No. Perhaps I am grown to be a man now; and do not need the thunder and the terror any longer! Perhaps I am above being frightened; perhaps it is not Fear, but Reverence alone, that shall now lead me!

THUS, every day and every night,
Extol I man's lot and fate;
For, ever, as he wills the right,
Is he beautiful and great.

—Goethe.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE old saying that the government of Russia is an absolute despotism, tempered by assassination, still has its truth. The Czar Alexander, after several times narrowly escaping murderous plots, was killed last Sunday by the bursting of a bomb thrown at him in a public street of St. Petersburg. He began his reign well, adopting a liberal policy, and will be remembered for his great act of emancipating the serfs. But latterly his course has been politically retrogressive and morally scandalous.

THERE promises to be a very large emigration from Germany to this country the present spring. Whole districts, it is said, are likely to lose the best part of their farming population. And the imperial government at Berlin is anxiously inquiring how it can prevent the exodus. Most of these people have their destination fixed before they leave their old homes. They are going to locate on the rich lands of the West and South-west, and soon they will be thriving citizens and an active part of our nationality.

ALL through the past season, travellers from the West coming to Boston by the Hoosac Tunnel route have been put to great inconvenience by the train not being permitted on Sunday to come further East than North Adams. This was because of the law on the Massachusetts statute-book forbidding travel on Sunday except for necessity or charity. To be sure, other railroads run trains on Sunday. But the State is owner in the Tunnel, and it could not violate its own laws by allowing trains to run through it. At first, this was allowed; but Sabbatarian bigotry saw its chance, and remonstrated to the Executive of the State, who then could do no less than obey the law. A bill has now been introduced into the Legislature, repealing the Sunday law with regard to travel so far as railroads are concerned; and it is likely to pass, though a number of Evangelical ministers have just waked up to oppose it.

A FALL RIVER correspondent writes that "a foreign lady among us, who is making a study of American educational matters, asks why your contributor was 'startled' at finding a working-man who had read The Light of Asia; also if it is a statement of an unusual fact that another working-man had read Haeckel's Evolution of Man." We do not suppose it to be a very "unusual fact" for working-men of certain grades to be readers of such books; though, as a general rule, it would probably be safe to say that, when people mount barbers' chairs (both cases spoken of were barbers), they do not ordinarily expect to be called upon to discuss science or literature with their tonsorial attendants. Of The Light of Asia there has been an immense cheap edition sold in this country, which must have gone largely among working-people. And the influence such a book must have theologically raises a question of no little interest.

IN the last Christian Register, Mr. S. B. Weston has a reply to Rev. Mr. Hale's letter of the preceding week, which we reprint to-day. He says for one thing: "Having heard considerable of Mr. Southgate from his personal friends, I feel it my duty to modify the impression given of him by Mr. Hale in his letter in the last Register. I have been informed by Mr. Southgate's contemporaries that he was a man of very liberal religious views; and several have expressed the opinion that, were he living, he would have been one of my warm supporters. More could be said on this point to the same effect." And, further on, Mr. Weston states clearly the two horns of the dilemma, one of which the referees had to choose, thus: "If Unitarianism means Unitarian Christianity, if a Unitarian must be a disciple of 'the Lord Jesus Christ,' then it seems to me that the decision of the committee was the only one that could have been made. But if Unitarianism is as broad as the platform of the Michigan Conference; if it is 'larger than Christianity,' as Mr. Jones says in the Unity; if it means 'the supremacy of reason and complete religious liberty,' as Mr. Chadwick says in the Index, —then it seems to me their decision ought to have been in favor of the Leicester society."

MR. F. A. HINCKLEY gave on Sunday, March 6, a very vigorous discourse before the Free Religious Society in Providence on "Homeless Children: How they are Cared for in Rhode Island." The Providence Press prints the discourse entire. It is as practical as vigorous, being intended to bear directly on the legalized system by which Rhode Island cares for vagrant and vicious children in its borders. But its lessons have a wider application than the limits of that State. Mr. Hinckley sums up his main points thus: "My protest is a threefold one. I protest against the custom of placing innocent children in the poor-house and the Reform School, I protest against associating the Reform School with the penal institutions of the State, and I protest against the exclusion of women from the board or boards of control. In like manner, my demand has a threefold character. I ask for the creation of a State Industrial or Public School for Dependent Children, separated in every respect from penal influences and surroundings, and under the joint control of men and women; I ask that the action looking to the removal of the Reform School to the State farm be undone, and that the projected schools, one for boys, the other for girls, be placed in suitable locations by themselves and properly graded; and I ask for a decree that henceforth the Board of Charities and Corrections shall be composed in part of women. And all this in the name of one central principle, the educational, refining, purifying influences of the home. The absence of these creates vagrancy and vice and crime. Their presence, if anything, will prevent in part and reform in part what their absence has created."

ARE WE STILL CHRISTIANS?

A SERMON BY JOHN W. CHADWICK.

If I were asked to name the critic who, in my opinion, has done more than any other to advance our knowledge of the New Testament and of the life and character of Jesus, I should without a moment's hesitation answer David Friedrich Strauss. The popular, and even the clerical, misconception of this man's critical method and result is most remarkable. But no. This is hardly the right way of putting it. The popular misconception is based upon the clerical. If the ministers of religion had not abused their opportunity, if they had taken the trouble to read Strauss's books before denouncing him, the popular misconception would have been impossible. But, in the Unitarian Review, I have read would-be refutations of Strauss, of which the only possible explanation was that the writers had evolved their idea of Strauss from their own inner consciousness without reading Strauss at all. Certainly, if they had read him understandingly (and Strauss is never difficult to understand), they could not argue against him in favor of the actual existence of Jesus, seeing that the actual existence of Jesus was never denied by Strauss, explicitly or implicitly. The object of his famous "mythical theory," of which so much has been written, was not to show that Jesus was himself a mythical being, but to show that various mythical elements had overgrown his actual personality. This actual personality he has endeavored to disengage from its mythical surroundings, and the result is a consistent portraiture of Jesus, which those who are most afraid of believing too much can safely accept as that which remains of Jesus when criticism has done its worst upon the records. In saying, as I did at the beginning, that Strauss has done more than any other critic to advance our knowledge of the New Testament and of the life and character of Jesus, I did not mean to indicate that his results were the most valuable to which we have attained. His highest value consists in his initiation of a new order of criticism, more vigorous and searching than anything which had preceded it. Orthodoxy cannot be too grateful to him; for her defenders, accepting Strauss's challenge, have improved a hundred-fold on all their previous presentations of the life and character of Jesus. Others, not orthodox, have added to and taken from the work of Strauss in various degrees. The human Jesus has fared better in this contest than the theological Christ. Of the latter there is simply nothing left, and of the former nothing about which we can be dogmatic. Nothing is absolutely certain, but some things are much more probable than others.

But all of this is what the Boston lectureship would call a "prelude" to the matter which I have immediately in hand. Strauss's last book, published not long before his death, was called The Old Faith and the New. The first question which he asked in this book was, "Are we still Christians?" and the second, "Have we still a religion?" The second of these questions he answered in the affirmative. So have we also answered it. But how about the other question, "Are we still Christians?" "My conviction is," says Strauss, "if we would not evade difficulties or put forced constructions upon them, if we would have our yea, yea, and our nay, nay,—in short, if we would speak as honest, upright men,—we must acknowledge we are no longer Christians." This has a manly ring; and, were the case exactly as he puts it here, there would be nothing left for us but to go outside the camp with him, bearing his reproach. If we cannot still call ourselves Christians without evading difficulties or putting forced constructions upon them, then we will not call ourselves Christians. Our yea shall be yea, and our nay, nay. We, too, will speak as honest, upright men. One thing is certain: that, if we are obliged to go outside the camp, we shall find ourselves in good company. Not to speak of saints and heroes of the ancient world,—of Socrates and Plato, of Epictetus and Aurelius,—there will be many there, the hem of whose garments we shall hardly dare to touch. There will be that great Spinoza, of whom you heard from Mr. Adler such an entrancing story a few nights ago. There will be men and women whom we ourselves have honored and revered, who have rejected for themselves the Christian name. One other thing is certain: that we can be Christians in no sense which cuts us off from these brave men and true. If there be any line of distinction, it must not be a line of separation. It must be a line which we can cross as easily as a ship crosses the equator.

But when we ask the question, "Are we still Christians?" who are the "we"? Certainly, by this first person plural, we do not mean to include the general population of the Christian world. To ask "Are we still Christians?" is not to ask, Has Christianity had its day? There are those who ask this question, and who answer it in the affirmative without a moment's hesitation. But none of you, I trust, are of the number of those who indulge in this distinguished folly. Some of you may think that you have reached a point where the word "Christian" does not define you any longer; but none of you, I trust, are such flies upon the wheel as to imagine that Christianity is dependent upon you for its continuance. Certain it is that many of the most enlightened of our contemporaries prefer to have it understood that they are not Christians. And we may expect, I think, that the number of these will continue to augment. But, nevertheless, some form of Christianity, I doubt not, is destined to be the prevailing religion of the most highly civilized portions of mankind for many centuries to come. Macaulay's brilliant fancy, best known of all the many he produced, was that the Roman Catholic Church "may still exist in undiminished vigor, when some traveller from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's." This is sufficiently absurd. The Roman Catholic Church of Leo XIII. compared with that of Hildebrand and Innocent III. does not suggest the thought of undiminished vigor. Granted, the utter ruin of the temporal power implies no corresponding ruin of the spiritual. But it implies a dreadful falling off. If the Roman Church could still oblige the civil power to torture heretics, she would not hesitate to use her power; and, in such a case, it is absurd to imagine that there would be just as many heretics as there are now. I dare not flatter myself that I should be just as outspoken under such circumstances as I am to-day. Again, it is intelligence that rules the world. To-day, the Roman Church is the declared enemy of intelligence. For the great intellectual and moral forces of the modern world, she has only anathemas. It is her policy to mass the ignorance upon her side. But, though the perpetuity of the Roman Church may thus be effected, its abdication of all claim to shape the fortunes of the civilized world is equally assured.

In Protestant Christendom, the organization is so much less complete that the process of disintegration is much more rapid. But let no one flatter himself that Protestant Christendom has not in itself the elements of long continuance. There is no such knot-grass as a religion: there is nothing else that is so hard to kill. Remember that the last pagan temple did not fall in Italy till five hundred years after the death of Jesus. Protestant Christianity is capable of various transformations which will delay the inevitable day of its extinction, if such a day be indeed inevitable.

"Are we still Christians?" therefore, does not mean, Is Christianity a religion of the past? But, if not all Christians, who then are included in the "we"? I answer, All of those who regard reason and science as the ultimate tests of all religious truth, and who (measuring them by these tests) do not find any traces of a special revelation in any church or book or individual person. The "we" of my question includes all those who regard the Church as a purely natural and human institution, Jesus as a purely natural and human person, the Bible as a purely natural and human book. It may be, therefore, that among my customary hearers there are some who do not find themselves included by my "we." I trust that it is so. I should be very sorry to have our little company composed entirely of persons holding in common the same opinions. As I am glad to know that there are some among you who think that I believe too much, so I am glad to know that there are others who think that I believe too little, but who, nevertheless, are drawn hither from Sunday to Sunday because they like the air of freedom and truth-seeking which pervades the place, and our subordination of all speculative concerns to the interests of the moral order.

Are we still Christians? It depends.

If the word "Christianity" had but one meaning, it would be much easier to answer Strauss's question than it is now. But the word "Christianity" has several meanings; and no one has a right to single out some particular one, and say that this, and this only, is the right meaning. A very common method in such difficulties is to go back to the original meaning of the word, and insist that the present meaning of the word must be in strict accordance with that. But the adoption of this principle would land us in all manner of absurdity. There is not a day of our lives in the course of which we do not use hundreds of words in a sense quite different from that which they originally had. Can we not speak of the heavens without being held to the belief that they were heaved into their present shape, or of the firmament without being held to the belief that it is literally beaten out, or of Thursday without becoming worshippers of Thor, or of Wednesday without becoming worshippers of Woden? It is not origin and derivation, but use, that decides the right meaning of words. And therefore I think that it is quite beside the mark to argue that we are not Christians, because originally a Christian meant one who accepted Jesus as the Jewish Christ, or Messiah. We do not so accept him, therefore we are not Christians, it is said. But the word "Christ" itself had a great many meanings. There was no fixed, unalterable standard of Messiahship by which Jesus could be tested and his claim disproved. There were as many ideas of the Messiah as there were separate prophets and rabbis. The idea of Jesus was quite peculiar to himself. *In his own sense of the word, he was the Messiah, the Christ. And therefore if all are Christians who believe that Jesus was the Messiah,—his own idea being accepted as the test,—and there can be no good reason shown why any other should be preferred, every good critic would be a Christian, though he were at the same time a Mohammedan or a Buddhist. Here then we have a reductio ad absurdum. But, even if there had been a single definite Messianic ideal to which Jesus did not correspond, this would be no sufficient reason for declaring ourselves not Christians. It would have been in Jerusalem in the year 35 A.D. or in Antioch in the year 50, but the words "Christian" and "Christianity" have come to have quite other meanings in our time from those they had at first.

One of the meanings of the word "Christianity" is thus set forth by a recognized orthodox authority of the present time: Christianity is "that religion which teaches that man is alienated from the great Being who made him in consequence of an original and hereditary enfeeblement; that he has thereby lost the power of fulfilling, and even of thoroughly knowing, his duty upon earth and of preparing for the life to come; and that deliverance from this condition, a reopening of the sources of pardon, of virtue, and of life, has been made by the advent of God in human form to this lower world,—by the life and death, the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ."

Now, it would simplify matters a great deal, if we could accept this definition of Christianity as a perfectly true one. Then we should know at once that we are not Christians. Then we should hasten to repudiate the name. At one of our conventions, Mr. Ames said that he didn't spend much time in trying to prove himself a Christian, but if anybody else called him a Christian he didn't resent it. He should resent it, and he would, if Christianity had only the one meaning which I have quoted. But, if this were its only meaning, the acknowledged founder of Christianity would not himself be a Christian. Edwards, Calvin, Augustine, advocated this scheme of salvation, while Jesus himself was as innocent of it as of the nebular hypothesis. But any definition of Christianity which excludes its founder is manifestly insufficient. It may define a certain phase of Christianity. But Christianity in its totality must be something more inclusive. We may not deny the Christian name to those who regard Christianity as coëxtensive with the Calvinistic system of theology; but we must deny that these are the only Christians in the world, and make it plain as possible that, if we are still Christians, we are not, in their sense of the word.

It has been argued that the Roman Catholic religion is the most perfect representative of the Christian type, and this not more strenuously by Romanists than by some Free Religionists, bent on saddling Christianity with the responsibility of the Roman Catholic religion. Now, I have not the slightest inclination to deny, as many do, that the Roman Catholic religion is a form of Christianity. But to hold Christianity responsible for it is one thing, and to hold the Christianity of Jesus responsible for it is quite another. For it has been truly said that, if one were to ideally construct a form of religion as different as possible from the religion of Jesus, it would probably bear a very close resemblance to Roman Catholicism. But was not this developed by an orderly process of evolution from the Christianity of Jesus? No doubt it was. But it was not developed in a vacuum. It was developed amid the ruins of the Roman Empire, amid the exigencies of a new era in the civilization of the world. Roman Catholicism is not the oak whose acorn was the devout heart of Jesus. No figure could be more misleading. It is the turbid river whose pure mountain source was the devout heart of Jesus. But, since it rose in that sequestered spot, what rushing torrents and what sluggish streams have brought their contributions to its growing bulk! And one might as well refuse to be called a man, because humanity is made up of so many diverse elements, as to refuse the Christian name because so many diverse elements have blended with the life and influence of the man of Nazareth to make Christianity what it was in the days of Hildebrand and Innocent, and what it is to-day.

* Keim's Jesus of Nazara is the best proof of this.

Men say, The outcome of the Christianity of Jesus was the Christianity of Innocent III., and therefore so much the worse for us if we are Christians. But did the evolution stop at Innocent III., or has it been proceeding ever since? And, if it has been proceeding ever since, when did it cease to be Christian? With Channing? But Channing's thought was orthodox for full three centuries after the death of Jesus. If Christian then, why not still Christian? With Theodore Parker? But the Christology of the early Church was humanitarian before it was anything else. I cannot see what right we have to cut the line of evolution at any point, and say, Beyond this it is not Christian. If Roman Catholicism is Christian, because it was evolved from primitive Christianity, rational religion is equally Christian as being equally evolved from primitive Christianity without a gap at any point of the development.

Christianity, as I apprehend it, is not a dogma, but a continuous life; and what constitutes a man a Christian is that he shall be a factor in this life, acted upon by its influence and reacting upon them. There is no question, then, whether a man should be a Christian: there is only a question whether a man is one, and this is merely a question of fact. It determines nothing in regard to a man's character. Here is this particular "stream of tendency." It rose in Judea eighteen hundred years ago. It has overflowed the whole of Europe and parts of Asia, Africa, and North and South America. I call that man a Christian whom this "stream of tendency" has borne along upon its flashing tide. In theory, he may prefer Buddhism, as Henry Thoreau affected to when he talked about "my Buddha," and naïvely added, "But I like your Jesus too." But the Buddhism of such a man is very superficial in comparison with his Christianity. This is bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. It is wrought into the entire substance of his being. For one act or thought that is determined by his conscious Buddhism, a thousand acts and thoughts are determined by his unconscious Christianity. Mr. Emerson has drunk deep of Greek and Roman wells, and has drunk the Eastern Soma, too; but six generations of New England ministers in his veins have, I fancy, a more compulsory effect upon his thought and character than anything which he has got from Plato or Aurelius or the Dhammapada.

This definition of a Christian as one whose fortunes have been implicated in the "stream of tendency" which we call historic Christianity will impress some of you, no doubt, as a definition by the inferior limit. Why! you will say, this definition is that of the statisticians, when they say there are so many Mohammedans, so many Jews, so many Buddhists, so many Christians in the world. I grant that it is only this. But I deny that in being this it is an unimportant definition. We are told these various millions of Christians, Buddhists, and so on, are only nominal Christians and Buddhists. Not so. Much of the Christianity which thinks itself real is much more nominal than this. It is a very real matter whether a man has been in the Christian or in the Buddhist "stream of tendency." We need not stop here to decide what Buddhism allied with European populations would have been, or what Christianity would have been if it had been allied with Eastern populations. Probably the Buddhism would have been very much like what we now call Christianity, and the Christianity very much like what we now call Buddhism. But, as a matter of fact, the Buddhist "stream of tendency" has been the stream of futile meditation, and the Christian "stream of tendency" has been the stream of freedom, progress, civilization.

Again, it may be that some of you will think my definition proves too much. It does not allow a man to decide for himself whether he is a Christian or not. Mr. Abbot, for example, has taken a world of pains to prove that he is not a Christian, that he is not merely a non-Christian, but an anti-Christian; and, lo, my definition says to him, as Jacob to the wrestling angel, "I will not let thee go." He is implicated in the great "stream of tendency" whose mountain source was the pure heart of Jesus. It has taken eighteen centuries of Christianity—primitive, papal, and protestant—to evolve the rational religion of to-day. For the rational religionist to repudiate Christianity is for a man to kick over the ladder by which he has ascended to his present altitude. But why not kick it over? He does not wish to go back. No, he does not wish to go back in reality; but he does wish, or he ought to wish, to go back in thought,—to recognize the line of his ascent, and, above all, to honor him whose earnest life initiated a higher order in the moral world.

But, whether the rational religionist recognizes or fails to recognize his Christian antecedents, they remain. It has taken eighteen centuries of historic Christianity to make him what he is. However anti-Christian he may consciously be, he is unconsciously Christian.

It may be that some of you conceive that my definition of Christianity does worse than include those who are at pains to prove themselves not Christians. It includes the dangerous classes of society. It includes the men of vice and crime. There is no doubt of it. Consider Christianity not as a dogma, not as a Church, but as a civilization, and the whole is equal to the sum of all its parts. The men of whom we spoke sarcastically as "Christian statesmen" were this without the sarcasm. The convicts at Blackwell's Island and Sing Sing are Christian convicts. Did poor Tweed say that he had "no religion"? But Christianity interpreted as a civilization must include him also. Worse even than he have sat upon the papal throne. Christianity is a stupendous fact. It has scope enough for the vices of an Alexander VI., for the cruelties of an Alva or a Torquemada. You say, So much the worse for Christianity. But no. Human nature being as it is, it must needs be that offences come. Worse would have come, if there had been no Christianity. Imagine, if you can, the morals of the Roman Empire going from bad to worse, from Cæsar's time to Alexander VI. And they were going from bad to worse until Christianity introduced another order and a new ideal. We talk of "the dark ages," not merely, as some one has said, "because we are in the dark about them." They were dark enough. But even then there was "a light shining in darkness," the light of Christianity. It shone dimly enough, but it did shine.

I am aware that by insisting on what I may call the statistician's view of Christianity, I run the risk of seeming to be somewhat of a special pleader. This is my only means, it may be said, of saving myself from a negative conclusion. Either Christianity is Christian civilization, or the rational religionist is not a Christian. Yes, these are the alternatives; but they are alternatives of fact, and not of honor or dishonor. As a matter of fact, we are still Christians. But, on this account, we claim no honors or immunities. Our beliefs and conduct remain precisely as they were before. If they would otherwise be reprehensible, the fact of our inclusion by the limits of a Christian civilization does not make them anything else.

The disposition is in many quarters to make some sort of exemplary relation between the individual and the man Jesus the test of Christianity. The disposition is not wise; but, if it were, the rational religionist would be as easily able to vindicate his Christian standing as any Roman Catholic or Protestant religionist. As easily? It is too generously put. For if the Romanist or Evangelical Protestant would vindicate his Christian standing, the more independent his tests of the actual personality of Jesus, the better it will be for his case. Ideally construct, as I have said, a system of belief and worship as different as possible from that of Jesus, and it would probably bear a very close resemblance to the system of the Roman Catholic Church. Jesus of Nazareth was equally innocent of its doctrines and its sacraments. And so, too, of the doctrines and the sacraments of the Calvinistic Protestant. If Jesus could come back to earth, as the millenarians anticipate, and could read the Institutes of Calvin, do you think it would ever occur to him that they were intended as an exposition of his religion? I warrant you it never would. Not because I desire for myself the prestige of his great name, but because it is a simple fact, I dare affirm that there is more community between the religious attitude of Jesus and that of the most thorough-going rational religionist than between his attitude and that of any Romanist or Calvinist. And here in one respect, at least, there is, or ought to be, a sense of personal relationship established between the rational religionist and Jesus of Nazareth. It ought to be the part of rational religion to duly honor every man who has contended for a higher truth and nobler service among men, and disengage every such person from the entanglements of bigotry and superstition. And surely never has any other stood in so much need as Jesus of disengagement from false reverence and foolish misconception. I hold that it is unspeakably contemptible for those who are so glad to honor the great names of other leaders and reformers to abandon Jesus, noblest and best of all, to the belittling distortions of the popular theology. We are shamed, if we do this, by the old Gothic chief who said, when he first heard the story of the crucifixion, "If I had been there with my spearsmen, it would not have happened." We are shamed by the story of one who stood before Rubens' great picture, the "Descent from the Cross," so much impressed that he forgot it was a picture he was looking on. "Come," said his friends, "let us be going." "Not till they get him down," said he. "Come," say my rationalist friends some times, as we stand before the spectacle of Jesus crucified afresh by theological stupidity and sectarian zeal. "Come," they say, "let us be going." "Not till we get him down," say I. It is the duty of rational religion, a duty which it cannot shirk without incurring its own self-contempt, to vindicate the fame of Jesus from the hideous distortions of the popular theology. It is the shame of rational religion that it is so often less ready to do justice to the founder of Christianity than to the founder of Buddhism, or Confucius or Zoroaster or Mohammed. Let him be approached with the same generous disposition that we bring to the appreciation of his spiritual kin, and he will take his place among them as the most grandly moulded of them all.

I do not think that there is any doubt of this. I know the sturdy sense of Socrates, the ethical wisdom of Confucius, the lofty spirituality of Zoroaster, the overflowing tenderness of Sakya Mouni; but, if we could clear our minds of every preconception, I cannot doubt that the young carpenter of Nazareth, the son of Joseph and Mary, would seem to us easily first of this illustrious band. But I set no value upon these comparisons. Virtue disdains these yard-stick measurements. There are those who seem to think that, if it should turn out that Buddha was a greater soul than Jesus, then we should have to effect a transfer of our reverence from the Jewish to the Eastern saint. Not so. For Christianity, our "stream of tendency," had its source, not in the devout heart of Buddha, but in that of Jesus, so far as we can rightly speak of sources where there is nowhere any absolute beginning. Grant that the essential values, the abiding forces, implicated in the life of Jesus, were identical with those implicated in the lives of all the other founders, what then? He is the fountain-head of our particular "stream of tendency." Therefore, to him belongs our special reverence. There is here no invidious distinction. The special reverence of the Buddhist belongs equally to the founder of his faith; and, if he is wise, he will allow no Christian missionary to transfer it to another. It has never seemed astonishing to me that the converts made by Christian missionaries in India and China are, generally, the least self-respecting of the population. The native religions furnish ample scope for the most generous expansion of the soul.

We have thus an objective and a subjective definition of Christianity. Objectively, it is the "stream of tendency" which, rising in the devout experience of Jesus, has since been augmented by a thousand and ten thousand tributary streams of various force and volume and transparency. Subjectively, it is our loyal and loving recognition of the relation of this "stream of tendency," in which our lives are so profoundly implicated, with its fountain-head. In the objective sense, Christianity is as wide as Christian civilization. It includes orthodox and heterodox, good and bad. In the subjective sense, it is coëxtensive with the recognition of the imposing part which fell to Jesus in the evolution of the moral order of the world.

Perhaps you think that definitions which define so little are but a poor reward for such a weary search. But it is because the definition we have found defines so little, because it is so broad, that we accept it joyfully. Henceforth there can be no quarrelling among us as to who are Christians and who are not. Objectively, we are all Christians. Subjectively, there is much more variety. The degrees are various in which we recognize the spiritual function of Jesus. But the difference through which they range is not a moral difference. It is mainly a difference of temperament. Some are responsive to personal forces, and some to ideas. Emerson says, "The soul knows no persons." To such a one, all persons are but instruments in an ideal hand. We shall not quarrel, then, over our subjective Christianity. If our own temperament is strongly personal, we shall do our best to infuse into others a generous and loving loyalty to the great Christian founder, but we shall not expect from all the enthusiasm that we seek; and, if our temperament is strongly ideal, we shall be as tolerant as possible of those who find in hero-worship a continual delight and excitation.

To sum up. Things being as they are, the question "Are we still Christians?" is not nearly so important as some others. We are still Christians, if Christianity is Christian civilization; but, so defined, the word no longer differentiates the individual members of a Christian community. It only differentiates Christian communities from others. So stands the matter objectively, and subjectively temperament is largely decisive.

But, if the difference between men in Christian communities as Christian and non-Christian is not such as to make these terms the proper rallying cries of hostile factions, are such communities reduced hereby to a dead level of indifference? Do not believe it. Within these bounds of Christian uniformity there is room for the most various degrees of intelligence and virtue to display themselves. Because, by force of circumstances, all men are Christians who inherit the Christian tradition, it does not follow that all Christians are equally commendable. Alexander VI. and Savonarola were both Christians, but the difference in their characters was not less on this account. The Duke of Alva and William the Silent were equally Christians, but they were very different men. And the difference in men is the essential difference, the difference in character; in purity and honesty, in industry and helpfulness, in open-mindedness, in candor and sincerity. The Christian tradition as a whole seems to me more favorable to character than any other. But, if you have not the character, the tradition will not save you. If you have not the character, the tradition is your condemnation.

A truce, then, to these counter affirmations and denials of the Christian name! But let the trumpet sound a fresh advance of homely virtues on the wavering ranks of folly, ignorance, and sin.

THE LIMITS OF THE DECISION IN THE LEICESTER-SOCIETY CASE.

The general public, whose privilege it has not been to read the documents in the case of the trustees of the will of Isaac Southgate against the Second Congregational Society of Leicester, Mass., may have a necessary light thrown upon the perplexities which the discussions in the Index have raised as to the ground of the decision of the referees against the parish, by a study of the extracts given below from Mr. Weston's sermons and Mr. Southgate's will.

To at least one of the referees there seemed no need of inquiring what Mr. Southgate would think about the relations of Unitarianism and Free Religion, were he living; for, wisely or foolishly, he chose to speak of the Unitarianism to which he left his money as liberal Christianity. The minister of Leicester had been no less plain in saying that he was not a liberal Christian Unitarian.

With the most hearty respect for the candor, the intellectual ability, and the moral integrity of that minister, as they were shown in the sermons submitted to us, but with no less regard for what I consider the canons of common honesty in the administration of trust funds, I cannot see how the referees could help coming to their decision, upon the grounds that a bequest should be carried out as the testator commanded it to be, interpreting his words in their common signification.

GEORGE A. THAYER.

SOUTH BOSTON, March 7, 1881.

From Mr. Weston's Sermons.

I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not call myself a denominational Unitarian. . . . In one sense of the word, in the special sense of recognizing the unity of all things, I could call myself a Unitarian; but in the sense in which the word is commonly or even historically understood,—namely, as implying one who holds also to Christianity,—in that sense I cannot call myself a Unitarian. . . .

I call myself, then, in plain, unequivocal terms, a Free Religionist. I stand for that basis of religious fellowship which will admit a Unitarian, a Christian, a Mohammedan, an atheist, or a Jew, provided that their one supreme purpose is to build up the kingdom of truth and righteousness and love in the world.

From the Will of Isaac Southgate.

. . . The net income of all which to be appropriated for the sole use, benefit, and support of the Second Congregational Society in said Leicester called Unitarian, and for no other purpose, except as hereinafter provided for.

. . . This fund is intended by me to firmly establish the religious society in Leicester, aforesaid; and the income thereof I wish paid to its minister aforesaid, so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Unitarian. And whenever said society shall maintain as its pastor, for the space of six months, a man who is not identified with the faith herein mentioned, this fund shall be forfeited by said society, and shall be paid to the American Unitarian Association, as hereinafter provided. And if the said fund for any of the reasons herein named shall be forfeited by said society, then and immediately thereafter I hereby direct my said trustees or their successors to pay over the same in full, after deducting therefrom all reasonable and necessary expenses, to the American Unitarian Association, and also to convey to the president thereof, for the benefit of said Association, all the real estate, if any, which may be vested in them as trustees.

My wish is that the said Association shall appropriate $2,000 of the gift, if received, to their permanent book fund, and the balance thereof in such manner as its officers shall deem best for the promotion of the good cause of liberal Christianity. I hereby direct my said trustees, the survivors and survivor of them, to select their own successors, and that said successors be well known as Unitarian in their religious opinions; but, if for any reasons vacancies in their board shall exist, which for a space of three months they fail to fill, then my wish is that the Judge of Probate for the County of Worcester, upon the petition of any person who may feel an interest in them, shall be and hereby is empowered to appoint to the first vacancy the pastor of the Second Congregational Society of Worcester, for the time being, and the second vacancy, the president of the American Unitarian Association. Feeling as I do a great interest in the peace, prosperity, and continuance of said society, and the views and doctrines it inculcates, have thought proper to leave this fund for its support, by the aid of which said society can be easily and respectably sustained, and their members increased, if the members thereof will strive to keep peace within their borders. And to this end they must not permit the existing isms of the day to be introduced into their house of worship, to be discussed or agitated in any form. The various views and delicate feelings entertained on these subjects, and particularly that of Negro Slavery, are such that no society can live and prosper where they are tolerated or allowed to interfere with the services of public worship. Of the truth of this we have had sad experience in our own Society. But the evil is extensive; in and of themselves, in proper places, it is right and just these subjects should have a fair hearing, but when they mingle they destroy. I do not wish or propose to trench on the feelings or right of any one. I act in good faith in the premises, and my only desire is to sustain, strengthen, and build up said society. This is the sole purpose for which I left this fund; and I hope and trust it will be so managed as to conduce to the good and well-being of the same, and not suffer any discordant, ultra-foreign views to be introduced into their body, nor allow their church or pulpit to be so occupied as to disturb the peace and good-fellowship of its members.

THE LEICESTER TRUST DEED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I am surprised and sorry to learn that the decision of a board of referees as to the meaning of Mr. Isaac Southgate's will has been supposed in some quarters to be their definition of Unitarianism or of the duties of a preacher.

I was one of those referees, and venture to write to you to say that the real question before us was the question as to what Mr. Southgate meant or said he meant. We had then to decide whether Mr. Weston was such a preacher as Mr. Southgate's money was to pay. Mr. Weston left no difficulty as to his position or opinions. His statements are perfectly frank. He is alive, and can tell what he means. But Mr. Southgate is dead, and has left a trust, defined in terms chosen by himself, which must be construed to mean what they say, without any reference to him for explanation.

The Unitarian church at Leicester, therefore, if it accept Mr. Southgate's money, is hampered with an iron-clad and unchangeable creed, and this a creed drawn up under a condition of things such as does not exist now. I know no other Unitarian church so hampered. And the position of the church in Leicester and of Mr. Weston is entirely exceptional for this reason.

In any other of our churches, Mr. Weston could have preached a thousand years, if they liked to hear him. True, he says in so many words, "I do not call myself a Unitarian." But he showed to my satisfaction that he preached "those broad and generous views of God which we know by the name Unitarian." I have tried hard to persuade myself that, under this clause in Mr. Southgate's will, he could be retained, though it is clear enough that Mr. Southgate himself would have turned in his grave, if he could, at the suggestion. But the whole will makes it clear that Mr. Southgate meant just what he said, that the preacher shall be "identified with the faith herein mentioned." This faith is mentioned in half a dozen ways. It is called "the good cause of liberal Christianity." He regards his gift as continuing the church he founded and endows. Now, he did not mean by this to admit into that pulpit what Mr. Weston describes as "a Unitarian, a Christian, a Mohammedan, an atheist, or a Jew, providing their one purpose is to build up the kingdom of truth in the world."

Oddly enough, the same sort of question has just come before the Vice-Chancellor in England, a perfect Gallio in indifference. It was a Calvinistic trust deed. Eleven trustees were on one side, and ten trustees and the minister on the other. The Vice-Chancellor, who must have abominated the Calvinism of the deed, decided for the stiff eleven as against the more lax ten. He had to decide so. Respectfully yours,

EDWARD E. HALE.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE REFEREES' DECISION.

Although I quite agree with you that, with all its noble tendencies and work, the Unitarian denomination is not yet so completely emancipated from the bondage of creed as to make the Free Religious Association needless, yet I cannot quite see a fresh proof of the fact in the recent interpretation of the Southgate will. Since the will does not provide for the minister's support "so long as he shall preach those views which shall be known as Unitarian," nor (what would be equivalent) "so long as he preaches," etc., but "so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Unitarian,"—does not the change of tense indicate Mr. Southgate's intention to restrict the word Unitarian to the sense that was most common in his own day?

ITHACA, N.Y. J. E. OLIVER.

[Our wary correspondent is a professor, and much more careful with his tenses than we suspect Mr. Southgate to have been. We believe that Mr. Southgate's principal "intention" was to do his best to consign Orthodoxy, in all its moods and tenses, to eternal perdition,—which, if all we hear of him is correct, he was accustomed at times to do with a very emphatic imperative.—ED.]

BOOK NOTICES.

THE DUTIES OF WOMEN. A course of lectures by Frances Power Cobbe. (Authorized edition.) Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1881. Price $1.00.

Since Margaret Fuller's Woman in the Nineteenth Century, we do not know that there has been a better book written for women, by a woman, than this by the English disciple of Theodore Parker. It is a course of six lectures, delivered last winter in London, and later in Clifton. It is vigorous, practical, marked by strong good sense, and by a very earnest desire for the real elevation of woman. Miss Cobbe is a zealous advocate of woman's rights, and believes in the ballot for her own sex. But she regards the moral culture of women as of vastly more importance than their political elevation. She deprecates every tendency to let go a high aim of moral development, detests "free love," and condemns severely the tendency to "fastness" she sees among the English advocates of a larger freedom for women. While she would have women gain larger political opportunities, she even more largely believes in the effort to secure genuine culture. In these lectures, she writes of the duties of women, to themselves, to their families, and to society. In the introductory lecture, she discusses the importance of the elevation of woman, and then defines her own stand-point in treating woman's duties. She earnestly maintains the ideas of her Intuitive Morals, accepts theism as the basis of all moral truth, and makes duty the chief thought in human culture. Perhaps the chief conception of her system of morals is that "the only reward of a right action is to have done right; the only reward of duty is to have done our duty; the only reward of obedience to God is to have obeyed Him, and to have the better hope of obeying Him for evermore." Those familiar with Miss Cobbe's wholesome and bracing books know how sincerely she writes on some of these great themes, with what conviction and simplicity she appeals to the best in the human soul. She has lost none of her power in this book, especially in the first lecture, when she writes of the moral aims which should guide women. In the second lecture, she discusses personal duty, and finds it includes five great moral principles,—chastity, temperance, veracity, courage, and vindication of rightful liberty. She says these personal duties are of supreme importance, and are always to hold the first place. They are never to be neglected or repressed, whatever else may clash with them. On veracity, she lays great stress, says it is never to be put aside for any reason whatever. This whole lecture is very good, clear, judicious, and wise. In the third lecture, social duties are treated, those of mother, daughters, sisters, etc. Lecture fourth brings us to duties of contract, especially those assumed in marriage, and socially those required of friends. She totally rejects the idea of obedience to the husband, and finds the true marriage in a "mutual engagement of exclusive fidelity of each to each." The duties of the housewife Miss Cobbe regards as very important, and says, "If we cannot perform these well, if we are not orderly enough, clear-headed enough, powerful enough, in short, to fulfil this immemorial function of our sex well and thoroughly, it is somewhat foolish of us to expect to be allowed to share in the great housekeeping of the State." The fifth lecture treats of the duties of women as members of society. She is very severe against the petty deceptions of women, the conventional attempts to appear what they are not, and says, "The day in which women renounce all these basenesses, and learn to resent the imputation of them as a mortal insult, will be a better day for us than the one which sees our political emancipation." The sixth and last of these valuable lectures is on Woman as a Citizen of the State. The thought Miss Cobbe here presents is that "we are bound to do all we can to promote the virtue and happiness of our fellow men and women, and therefore we must accept and seize every instrument of power, every vote, every influence which we can obtain, to enable us to promote virtue and happiness." She believes in woman's political emancipation, that women ought to seek it, chiefly because it will give them a greater means of doing good. She looks at the subject all through on the humanitarian, the benevolent side. She vigorously urges all women who can to enter upon this crusade for equal rights, and she dwells upon the importance of women preparing for the support of themselves, for self-dependence. She wisely says, however: "When it comes to the question of married women, during the years wherein they frequently become mothers, devoting themselves to any considerable extent, either to earning money for their families or performing gratuitous out-door public service, I must say my opinion is different. . . . She serves the community in the very best and highest way it is possible to do, by giving birth to healthy children, whose physical strength has not been defrauded, and to whose moral and mental nurture she can give the whole of her thoughts. This is her function, public and private at once,—the profession which she has adopted. No higher can be found; and, in my judgment, it is a misfortune to all concerned, when a woman is drawn to add to that great 'profession of a matron' any other systematic work." Yet Miss Cobbe says the women she has known, whose lives have been given to literature and reform, have been, without exception, the best and most zealous of housekeepers.

We should like to see this book, in the very neat and attractive form given it by the American publisher, widely circulated in this country. Its rare wisdom, calm, judicious advice, and wide comprehension of the duties and influences of women are just now greatly needed among us. It is calculated to do great good, and to put the woman's movement on the only true basis a great moral reform ought to occupy.

SHAKESPEARE'S DREAM, AND OTHER POEMS. By William Leighton, author of The Sons of Godwin, Change, etc. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1881.

The longest of these poems represents the dramatist as haunted after his return to Stratford by his own creations, who are successively ushered in by dream-spirits in songs which often have much beauty. For instance, Richard III. is summoned:

> "That the puppet may publish a lesson
> As broad as the infinite plan:
> That the glory of kingship is nothing,
> But Love is the crowning of man."

All the characters seem to have risen morally, so that this king's victims return to assist his reformation, and Portia does her best to console and soften Shylock. The softening process is too apt to efface the individuality, however; and Caliban loses his coarseness, Richard his fierceness, and Mercutio much of his sprightliness in Mr. Leighton's gentle hands. This poem shows some critical ability, and so does the "Ode to Shakespeare." "Youth and Age" gives a charming picture of an old oak, the veteran of six hundred years, under which

> "The little, laughing maiden sits,
> With sunlight in her hair"

The versification is generally smooth, but there are some bad lines, like that which misplaces the accent of marvellous. Not only the contents, but the appearance, of the volume, fit it admirably for a gift-book.

WE acknowledge the receipt of a new Pocket Map of Boston, arranged upon Baedeker's plan for European maps, and issued by T. Marsh & Co., 919 Washington Street. It is well printed, and there are no indistinct spots. It is in plain black and white, which contributes to clearness. Its lists of principal buildings are correct, but amusing, from the fact that Parker Memorial is put down among theatres and halls and the Old South among museums. Certain churches are indicated, as Clarke's, Hale's, and Bartol's; while Mr. Savage's is disposed of with the single word "Unity." We learn from this map that Boston has a statue to Aristides and another to Columbus, and we marvel where they are. We find them to be in Division F., 4, which we conclude means that they are in the State House.

BROWSING AMONG BOOKS. By Abba Goold Woolson. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

This is a pleasant little volume of collected sketches, the first of which gives the book its title. The style is, like all of Mrs. Woolson's writing, clear and elegant, and the little papers would furnish wholesome and attractive employment for any chance hour.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. KATE GANNETT WELLS gives a lecture at Wesleyan Hall in this city, on Thursday of this week, on "Industrial Education."

THE Harvard students are to bring out the Greek play, "Œdipus Tyrannus," the third week in May, and three performances will be given.

REV. C. W. WENDTE, of Cincinnati, recently criticised severely the school board of that city, and has since been elected one of its members. That is a "reward of merit" that is honorable to all concerned.

MR. EDWIN D. MEAD gave, March 4, the third lecture, in a course of three lectures by different speakers, before the Harvard Philosophical Club of Cambridge, Mass. Mr. Mead's theme was "The Philosophy of Carlyle," and its treatment evinced very careful preparation, and a thorough and critical study of the writings of the great author.

GEO. CHAINEY is to speak next Sunday on "The Nature and Decline of Unitarianism." Mr. Chainey's proposition to put his discourses in print appears to be meeting with much favor. The first of the series is to be on "Karl Heinzen and his Work," and will be issued this week. Others are to follow as delivered. Orders may be sent to the author, 3 Union Park. Boston.

A NUMBER of colored men in Virginia have formed a league, pledging each other not to hire themselves to white farmers, the object being to compel the land-owners to let them land on shares. It is doubtful if they better their condition much by thus drawing the color line; but the desire to work for themselves is commendable, and shows an encouraging degree of self-reliance.

DR. HERMAN WENDELL, one of the most distinguished horticulturists of the country, died at Hazlewood-on-the Hudson recently, at the age of seventy years. Dr. Wendell was for several years President of the State Horticultural Society and Vice-President of the State Agricultural Society. His orchard contained from eight to ten thousand fruit-trees, every one planted by his own hand.

CARLYLE'S laugh was described as "portentous, open-mouthed, deep-lunged, and prolonged, ending mostly in a shout of triumph, and seldom quite glad or kindly. The bony hands clutched the table, meanwhile, with a muscular grip; and the laugh was likely to be followed by a torrent of speech, that bore down everything before it. Woe to the man who ventured to gainsay him when in that humor."

MR. GEORGE W. COOKE contemplates publishing in September, through the house of James R. Osgood & Co., a work which is likely to attract considerable attention. It will be entitled Ralph Waldo Emerson: His Life, Writings, and Philosophy. Mr. Cooke has long been a sympathetic and devoted student of the great author whose writings have so instructed and inspired this generation; and the analysis of his genius, estimate of his rank among the world's great thinkers, and exposition of his philosophy proposed, we feel assured, will be found interesting and helpful.

COMING from such a person as Prof. John Fiske, the criticism of Rev. Joseph Cook in the last North American, entitled "Modern Charlatanism," is probably the most damaging attention of that kind which the celebrated divine has yet received. All the points which Mr. Fiske makes against the clerical prestidigitator, who has so captivated zealous orthodox people, desirous of routing modern science and philosophy, of late years, by his feats of professed logic and learning, have been more or less clearly recognized by thousands. But it is reassuring to have them thus stated by one who has the right to speak with authority.

A WRITER in the last number of the Woman's Journal pays a high tribute to Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer and her discourse at the Parker Memorial, Sunday before last, upon "A Radical Church." The article concludes with this passage: "When the ministers of free thought shall put into their sermons help for practical every-day living, when the exceeding frailty of our nature is recognized, and the masses shall be told how to subject the lower nature to the higher, in the plain, simple way that alone can reach them, then shall Radicalism have a heart that shall reach out and sympathize with lower humanity, and win unto itself followers that can never be reached by the head alone."

THE Baroness Burdett-Coutts, says an Englishman who knows her well, is remarkable both for vitality and energy, which are said to be extraordinary. When she is perfectly well, she defeats her age by a dozen years. She is a good horsewoman, and is still fond of exercise; and she walks with an elasticity which many a younger woman might envy. Her capacity for business has long been known; and, though her benevolence is boundless, no begging impostor could ever hope to outwit her. She has all the shrewdness of the Charity Organization Society, without the callous cynicism which makes that body nothing more than a system of police. Her knowledge of politics and politicians extends over half a century; and, as she can write as well as speak with no little grace and pungency, a book of her recollections should have greater interest than anything of the kind which has been published for many years.

A WASHINGTON correspondent of the Sunday Herald thus refers to the causes that contributed to the death of Senator Carpenter. Senator Matthew Carpenter's life, which he literally threw away, has come to a sudden end. Twenty cigars a day and the various other excesses in which a man of his temperament was predestined to indulge were quite too much for the store of vitality, which must have been very large to begin with. He was a man who had drawn with reckless freedom on the resources with which nature endowed him, and who burned his candle at both ends of the wick. He spent in twenty-five years the strength and vitality which ought to have lasted for fifty, and carried him up to the age of threescore and ten. Perhaps the greatest of all his excesses was excess of work. He loved the profession of the law, and loved it far more than anything else, and was, therefore, not the mere slave of his passions, as the newspapers have sometimes represented him. It was always hard to get him away from his law-office, in which he spent four-fifths of his time when he was attending the sessions of the Senate. Last summer, for instance, he remained here through all the long, hot season, attending closely to his legal business, and taking no vacation.

POETRY.

BREAD OF LIFE.

A dreamer on the highway, with veiled eyes,
Seeking that inward light
Whereby he thought to make men great and wise,
Missed from his outward sight

A halting beggar crouching in the sun,
Dwarfed, starving, sparely clad.
"If mind of man with mind of God be one;
If truth divine be had

"In contemplation; if the seeking soul,
Stamping its passions down,
Can reach, like stainless Buddha, Buddha's goal,
Nirvanâ!—this the crown,

"The be-all, end-all! If"—(in musings lost,
He went his way). The sun
Sank chill, the city glimmered into frost,
The beggar moaned; and one,

Plain, poor, untaught, to meet the sufferer's need,
Gave from his scanty store,
As he passed by. Which, in his out-lived creed,
Honored the Buddha more?

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 17, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

A CALL FOR HELP IN BEHALF OF THE PARKER MEMORIAL.

The recent proposed sale of the Parker Memorial Meeting-house of Boston not having been consummated, the Hall remains where it properly should, in the hands virtually of the society of which Theodore Parker was the minister during the last fifteen years of his life. The debt upon the building, through the recent contribution of $25,000 from a devoted friend, has been reduced to a little less than $20,000.

The undersigned are appointed a committee by the corporation managing the affairs of the building, to solicit subscriptions sufficient to cancel this debt.

Each $100 contributed entitles the contributor to one share of stock in the building, and a voice in the management of its affairs.

We would invite those who are able, to contribute at least $100. Those desiring to donate a smaller amount, we would invite to contribute in the name of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston or of the Free Religious Association, in order that each $100 of subscriptions may be put into a share of stock in the building. We appeal to the friends everywhere to contribute to the maintenance of a pulpit and platform in the interest of Free Religion.

Subscriptions may be sent to A. A. Burrage, 74 Franklin Street, Boston, Treasurer of the Parker Memorial Meeting-house, or to John C. Haynes, 451 Washington Street, Boston, Treasurer of this Committee.

INTERPRETATION OF WILLS AND CREEDS.

The recent decision in the Leicester-Society and Southgate-Will case brings up, with fresh interest, the whole and really very important question of the interpretation of wills whereby trust-funds have been given for certain objects with theological conditions. The definiteness of law and the indefiniteness of theology are sometimes brought by such wills into painful conflict; and the question is, Which shall yield to the other in order best to accomplish the intention of the testator?

In the case of Mr. Southgate's will, not only is this conflict apparent, but it is increased by the special indefiniteness which inheres historically in the phrase "Unitarian faith,"—the phrase that, in general terms, he made use of to define the conditions of his bequest. Had he given his money to an Episcopal church or a Presbyterian society, he could, with comparative clearness, have conditioned the legacy by the "Prayer-Book" or the authorized creed of the Synod. It is true, changes are sometimes made even in the Episcopal Book of Common Prayer, and it is not impossible that in the lapse of time, say after two or three centuries, the Presbyterian creed may be amended by the Synod; and then the question might be raised whether the society claiming the benefit of the legacy could receive it, unless said society continued to use the old prayer-book or the old creed that happened to be in use in the testator's day. But, in denominations of such fixity of creed or ritual, it is evident that questions concerning bequests with denominational theological conditions attached must be much more easy to settle than in a denomination like the Unitarian, which has professed to have no common creed, and claims to allow entire freedom of thought, and does in fact include a great variety of theological belief in its borders. Mr. Southgate gave his money for the Leicester society to pay to its minister "so long as he shall faithfully preach those broad and generous views of God which are known by the name Unitarian," the fund to be forfeited if the society should maintain as pastor for six months a man "not identified with the faith herein mentioned," i.e., the faith known as Unitarian. The questions therefore immediately arise, What are those broad and generous views of God known by the name Unitarian? and what is it to be identified or not identified with the Unitarian faith herein mentioned?—questions, it must be conceded, which have their difficulties; for the testator did not intimate by what standard or test the "views" or "faith" known as Unitarian were to be determined.

Two of the nine referees to whom the Leicester-Will case was submitted for decision, Rev. E. E. Hale and Rev. Geo. A. Thayer, give in our present issue the reasons for their respective parts of that decision. Mr. Hale, in the letter to which we referred last week, and which we reprint from the Christian Register, uses, indeed, in his second paragraph the plural pronoun, as if he would speak for others as well as himself; yet we do not suppose he meant to convey the impression that he was authorized to give any opinions but his own. Mr. Thayer, in a communication prepared for the Index, makes a very lucid presentment of the reasons for his own action. His arrangement of the terms of the will and quotations from Mr. Weston's sermons side by side puts into special relief one argument which we have seen from the first might be a very cogent one with many minds; namely, Mr. Southgate's expressed confidence in organized Unitarianism, which Mr. Weston as explicitly disavows. Evidently, Mr. Hale and Mr. Thayer were both impressed by this as the ruling feature of the case, and were essentially in agreement in acting upon it. It being patent to them at once that Mr. Weston does not identify himself by the name Unitarian or Christian, it seemed only a short, straight cut to the decision that he could not be one whom Mr. Southgate, twenty-two years ago, could have regarded as "identified with the faith" which he called "Unitarian," and which once in his will, as if it were an equivalent phrase, he mentioned as "the good cause of liberal Christianity."

But, though this short cut leaves one side what seems to us the pivotal point of the will, and escapes the necessity of deciding whether Mr. Weston preached or not "those broad and generous views of God known by the name Unitarian," it introduces perplexities peculiarly its own. Let it be admitted that the only question necessary to ask was whether Mr. Weston would have been regarded by Mr. Southgate as identified with the faith which he (Mr. Southgate) called Unitarian. Then the questions would follow, What was the faith which Mr. Southgate called Unitarian? and what did he mean by a person being identified therewith? And these questions cannot be answered except by seeking other evidence than the will affords of Mr. Southgate's opinions. Is it so sure that it would be a correct decision to say off-hand that identification with the Unitarian faith, in order to meet his views, must be identification with denominational organized Unitarianism? There have been Unitarians, so known popularly and so correctly classed theologically (as Mr. Weston is), who have declined to be identified denominationally as Unitarians. Dr. Bartol holds this position to-day, as his predecessor, Dr. Lowell, did before him. Dr. Channing was near to holding the same position, and came the nearer to it the longer he lived. Others might be named. If any of these had been preachers for the Leicester society, would Mr. Southgate have been likely in his lifetime to oppose them because not identified with the Unitarian faith, or would the trustees of his will, for this reason, have moved against them, and the referees have upheld their decision? And, again, is it not possible—yes, even probable—that Mr. Southgate, in using the term "Unitarian faith," did not have any very fixed theological beliefs in mind, but a certain style of belief and preaching that opposed the irrational and morally horrible system of Orthodoxy,—that he meant by it the benevolence of God, the dignity of human nature, the right of free inquiry, and character of more importance than creed? Is it not possible that, though he used the phrase "liberal Christian" as a matter of course, he would have yet readily assented to such definition of the word "Christian" as he might have read in some of the older Unitarian writers, that even those who gave no outward assent to Christ and did not call themselves by his name, if they were of pure hearts and lives and devout aspirations, were to be counted in the fellowship of his church? The truth is, there is a strict and there is a liberal mode of interpreting what is meant by the phrase "Unitarian faith" and of being "identified" with that faith; and Mr. Hale and Mr. Thayer, while claiming for themselves, as we understand them, to follow the liberal mode, have decided that Mr. Southgate must have followed the strict mode,—a decision, however, for which the will alone does not appear to us to offer adequate facts.

Mr. Hale says that the Leicester society, if it accept Mr. Southgate's money, "is hampered by an iron-clad and unchangeable creed." Was it, then, Mr. Southgate's intention (which this mode of interpreting his will professes strictly to follow) to impose on the society an unalterable creed? He made his will before the organization of the National Unitarian Conference; and is it not quite possible that he had a measure of the old-fashioned Unitarian aversion to creeds? And, especially, if he had so much confidence in Unitarian faith and in Unitarian organization as embodying the faith, as his will appears to testify, would he not, to use Mr. Hale's expression, have turned in his grave if he could, at the suggestion that the one society he cherished should be burdened with an iron-clad creed, with which "no other Unitarian church is hampered"? Moreover, what could be the source of this "iron-clad and unchangeable creed" but the Unitarian faith which Mr. Southgate believed was represented in the organized Unitarianism of his time? Was that faith ever believed by Mr. Southgate (or any one else in fine) to be absolutely unalterable? We do not answer these questions; but we think they are questions that should have been asked and answered, very definitely, before the responsibility was taken of deciding that Mr. Southgate's will has had the effect of imposing an unchangeable creed on the Leicester society. Also, before Mr. Hale presses his alleged parallel of the recent decision by the Vice-Chancellor of England in the case of a Calvinistic trust-deed, we think he should consider whether he is ready to admit that "Unitarian faith" signifies, or has ever signified, a system of theology as fixed and unprogressive as Calvinism has been claimed to be.

We have been drawn again into the details of this case further than we intended. Our main purpose, at this time, was to gather from it a moral on the general interpretation of wills which establish trust-funds on theological conditions. The moral may be stated thus: The time must come when a dead man's hand will not be allowed to write the creed of a living church, nor dictate the convictions of a theological seminary, nor tempt the consciences of its students. If a man intrust his money by will to the uses of a denominational faith, the money may legitimately go to serve whatsoever objects or doctrines that denominational faith may, by natural process of development, grow to embrace, no matter what may have been the man's own views of the faith. If he condition his bequest by certain specific dogmas, such conditions must be observed — until the general enlightenment of the community outgrows the dogmas. Then the common-sense of the law will find a way for rightfully emancipating the enslaved fund for the uses of emancipated mind. No will, for instance, ought to be permitted to-day to uphold the doctrine of witchcraft nor the Ptolemaic theory of the earth and sun, nor, many centuries longer, certain theological dogmas that might be named.

SCIENCE ON SUNDAY.

One of the most encouraging and hopeful signs of genuine vitality and promise in connection with the Parker Memorial Society is the interest which has been developed there, during the past year, in solid intellectual pursuits. Very little, if anything, has been said of this, except in a private way; and yet so important and decided has been what we refer to that it seems to afford an additional reason why this free society, with its noble antecedents, should be perpetuated, as well as an indication that there may be opening before it a more distinct and advanced sphere of influence. The impetus in this direction is to be credited, in some degree, to the Rev. Dr. Dudley, its late pastor. During his ministry, a class was formed and conducted by him, under the auspices of the society, for the study of philosophy. Special attention was given to that of Herbert Spencer, and excellent results attained. On Mr. Dudley's resignation of the pastorate of the society, the class found itself without a leader; and, as there was a good deal of scientific interest among the members, it was proposed to reorganize it and, for the present at least, make science the principal aim. It is now known as "The Parker Memorial Class for Scientific and Philosophical Study." At first, its sessions consisted of the reading and discussion of popular scientific essays. But, in order to secure more thorough and systematic work, the subjects and plan of study have been put in charge of a standing committee appointed for the purpose.

The study for the last three months has been "Human Physiology," in which pursuit there has been a steady and earnest interest and growth of membership. The class has been fortunate in having Miss M. A. Hardaker, who has enjoyed exceptional educational advantages, and possesses a special penchant in the direction of science, for a leader and demonstrator, with the assistance of some members of correspondent attainments and predilections.

The black-board, diagrams, and other auxiliaries, so far as practicable, have been brought into requisition; and, though Dalton has been the principal text-book, the works of Draper, Huxley, Carpenter, Maudsley, Bain, Claude Bernard, and others, have been continually consulted and referred to. The president of the class is Mr. John C. Haynes, the secretary Miss E. Agnes Burke. It now numbers about forty members, and the roll is continually extending. The time of meeting is at half-past twelve every Sunday. The sessions last one hour. Visitors are always welcome.

The favorable turn which the affairs of the Parker Memorial have recently taken has served to give the class renewed and more ambitious hopes for its future. The programme of work now before it embraces the following subjects: Lessons from Tyndall, Principles of Matter and Motion, Sound, Heat, Light, Electricity, Correlation, and Conservation of Forces. These will be taken up in their order, and probably carry the class forward to the summer vacation. As an aid to the general objects above indicated, it is proposed now to raise a certain sum of money for the purchase of books and apparatus, and to meet like incidental expenses. We are happy to add that a very good beginning has already been made toward this end. But not only does the class contemplate an increased acquaintance with science among its members, but also an effort to popularize it beyond their circle so far as this may be effected. With this purpose in view, it is looking forward to courses of lectures, designed to convey in a simple way instruction in science to the people, from competent exponents. This it hopes another season may witness in successful operation at the Parker Memorial Hall.

THE six discourses of Mr. S. B. Weston, upon which the committee based their judgment in the Leicester case in respect to the preacher's qualification to represent Unitarianism, have been put into a pamphlet, and may be obtained of H. O. Smith, Leicester, Mass., or at the Index office.

THE series of papers entitled "Among the Americans" which Mr. George Jacob Holyoake commenced to write for an English journal, and which have been read with much interest in this country, so far as they have been known, have been transferred to us. Advanced proofs at first were supplied to the New York Tribune, where portions, as space permitted, have appeared. The pressure of public affairs in that journal not permitting the editor to continue to quote them, permission was generously given to the author to transfer them to any other journal. Mr. Holyoake selected the Index, which has so many readers for whom he has personal knowledge or regard; and since that time advanced proofs have been sent to the Index exclusively, and will continue to be sent until the completion of the series, it being left to us to publish such passages as we judge the curiosity of our readers may desire to see, or our space permit us to insert.

WILL IT ORGANIZE?

The Index has lately spoken, and well to the purpose, of the question of the organizing power of Liberalism, its capacity of casting the thought it stands for into the form of institutions that shall be for the elevation, the enlargement, and final deliverance of man. Can it give us anything that shall supply for society the need that the Church is here professedly to answer? It is a great question of immense practical moment, and yet one that it is exceedingly difficult at this stage to solve.

Such institution awaits a fulness of time, a ripeness of the mind, a growth not only in intellectual, but in spiritual attainment, that few comparatively have yet reached. The positive worships we see, adoration, invocation of personal Deity, and special observance directed to him, to Jesus, and the Bible, can only be surrendered and superseded when men and women have well outgrown the intense realism, which, most pronounced in savage or barbaric life, still attaches strongly to all who live almost wholly in the realm of the sensuous. In all ages, the mind has asked, Show us the Father, and has seemed to feel that it had no God, except it might reach a Deity it could in concept at least see and know, and come into personal relations with. Through all Christendom, the idea of God is still well-nigh as realistic and limitary as with the savage tribes of past or present. In the Catholic Church, the worship is intensely objective and spectacular, indeed could hardly be other, and meet the felt need of the worshipper. The good Catholic must have a God he can know, one that has organs, habitation in place, etc., one to be reached by prayer and offering. He must have his veritable flesh and blood Christ, Almighty Saviour to believe in, to atone for him, his divine Book, institution, etc., to rest in. You take these away from him as objects of worship, and he is bereaved indeed: "Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I left?"

It is much so with the Protestant. There has been some amelioration and expansion, a larger intelligence has done something for him; but he is well-nigh as realistic and sensuous in his religious conception as his Catholic brother. He has reduced somewhat the number of the idols, but he worships in the same fane. Through the advance of general intelligence, there has been marked amelioration in all the Protestant sects, notably the more liberal, especially the Unitarian; and the conception of God is finer, more spiritual, growing to this day by day. And yet, so far as I can see, in no case has there been escape from this toil: the worship offered is personal and thoroughly objective in all their churches. While the general mind continues in this condition, there will be no prevailing acceptance of any new order, either in form of organization or conduct of public service.

This, however, does not affect the case for pronounced and outstanding liberals. It is for them to determine what they may and should do. There are many minds that have grown away, or are fast growing, from the anthorpomorphic ideas. They have left behind the old personal conception of Deity, under whose influence they had their rearing. They have not therefore necessarily left reverence, a worship, an adoration of the highest for the human soul. Their spirit may, at times does, sing its reverence and its trust in the sovereign Truth, Beauty, Excellence. It goes out in love toward all the manifestations of the Supreme in Nature, in the living Universe. With deepest interest, with smitten awe, it contemplates the interpenetration of finite and infinite, the mystery, the wondrous symbolism that speaks in all this world of time.

It is natural that such a soul should go out to worship; that, when it contemplates the wealth, the inspiring power of its newly felt and found ideas, it should wish to embody the thought, to celebrate, to proclaim and commend it to others, should wish to mingle, to kindle and be kindled by other like souls. And these can be found, though they should be few in number, everywhere.

I make no doubt this will effect a radical revolution in the present type of organization and mode of service. The object will be different, and the method also, in good degree. The celebration will be of the Moral Ideal and the overarching Presence of Life, its beauty and its mystery: the ritual will be consideration, earnest thought, and steady work for humanity. Especially, the immediate practical questions,—questions in regard to the diseases, physical and social, and the crippling and defeats thereby, the poverty, the vice, the sorrow and sin, the maladjustments and unrest,—these will be studied and essayed far more thoroughly and fruitfully than the Church has ever attempted. Not merely alleviation, but treatment and cure will be the motto.

I think this church may begin in the formation of little clubs or bands of earnest men and women in every town where they may be found, for mutual improvement, for enlightenment and quickening. There is much already accessible of great value, in the sacred literature of the different races, in the poetic thought, the gnomic wisdom of the ages past and in the present, in the books of science in our own time, and the illumination they shed now on man and his relations to the living world. There can always be reading of the best things, and conversation upon them, papers prepared,—an excellent work for many reasons,—and music. Pythagoras, says the historian, was wont to sing to the harp hymns from Thales, from Hesiod, and from Homer, both before he went to sleep and as soon as he waked, "that his mind might be continually seasoned with Divinity." The power of music for refreshment and quickening will never be spent.

And there can be lessons of wisdom drawn for the young, from apologue, from proverb, from history. The old mythologies, nursery tales, and folklore are to be utilized, and made of great value for the instructing of the youthful mind. They pique and incite, opening the eyes as, perhaps, nothing else can. All this named above may be made exceedingly interesting and improving to all. And then, from time to time, the living voice from abroad may be secured of some good expositor of the truths of the new faith.

While there is much, very much, lying unappropriated for the requirement of our time, there remains yet a world of work to be done to bring the best things in attractive and winsome form before the public mind. This new enlargement will call for a new literature, and the call should receive prompt and liberal response. The old enclosures have been broken down and left behind, and wants unfelt hitherto are to be met. We wish to know what all of religious history has to say of the great saints of the world. A work that should present to us Confucius, Lao-tsze, Buddha, Zoroaster, Jesus, Pythagoras, each in his several merit and best quality, marking also the limitations,—yes, and going beyond these to other royal saints and sages as well,—would be of great service. We should have a goodly number of faces for our picture-gallery, and could study and use them all helpfully. In the brave, ceaseless endeavor and conflict of the soul for self-mastery, the perfect possession, it is probable that nowhere in the West is so inspiring a record furnished as India affords. The legend of Buddha, in this regard, is full of quickening power.

For another thing, the redaction of the proverbs, the signal gnomic wisdom of all the races East and West, setting the best side by side of each other, tracing often the parallelism, the unity, and the diversity, would be a valuable benefaction. We should have here a Vade-mecum for the mind, daily bread for all the year and the years. This, with well-chosen anecdotes of royal souls, showing their methods, their talismans, would be Scripture unsurpassed and unsurpassable. The volume would never be closed, for new sentences are being written for it every day.

The mythologies of the world also open a chapter exceedingly rich, and upon whose study we have scarcely yet entered. In this chapter, we have both the strength and the weakness of the human mind, its conquest and also its defeat. Every shred of this history is precious, is sacred. An intelligent, a clear and luminous work on this subject, giving the deep-lying facts, and bringing all to the popular apprehension, is a desideratum that, it is to be hoped, will soon be supplied. A poetic beauty will be revealed here, of which the best informed among us has as yet but slight perception. We shall find in this realm language struggling and wrestling with its problem, failing, yet succeeding. We shall gather fruitful hints of the method of intimating to the limited thought of man the unseen. We shall see that poetry alone bears the royal prerogative: it alone has that true splendor of expression that qualifies it in some degree to speak the name ineffable, to describe the indescribable.

Surely there is enough for incitement and quickening to fresh effort in what we have, abundance also for encouragement and support in the assured certainty of what is quickly to come. Let us see whether Free Religion has vitality enough to produce anything. C. D. B. M.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

In the Atlantic Monthly for March, the discussion on the causes of human progress, already mentioned, is continued by an article from the pen of Grant Allen, on "The Genesis of Genius." He replies to William James, and follows much the same line of thought as that presented by John Fiske, though he is more emphatic and less guarded in his statements. This sentence is a good instance of his ideas, when, speaking of men of genius, he says: "The individual characters, in their totality, are wholly created by external circumstances." The external circumstances, however, includes not only the physical environment, but heredity, the influence of the past, and all human institutions and ideas of whatever kind. He lays considerable stress on the influence of the common people in the development of civilization, and claims that the genius can do little, unless he works substantially in the direction the people desire to go. "The genius," he says, "is only a step or two above the other men of his race and time. His peculiarity is that he possesses in some one department a few more elements of mind than most other people, his contemporaries; that he combines in himself a certain larger number of mind factors, all or nearly all of which are to be generally found in other people, but which are not to be found in any one person in the same combination."

There is to be found in the January number of the London Quarterly Review a very suggestive article on the employment of women in government service. It seems that in most of the leading countries of Europe, as well as in the United States, women are more or less employed in the government telegraph offices as well as in post-offices. In Switzerland and Austria, they are employed in both places and very successfully. Women of all ranks in society engage in these duties. In Italy and Russia, women are employed in telegraph offices, and in post-offices in the Netherlands. In France, they are to be found in one of the government bureaus, in the Bank of France, in the educational department, and elsewhere. In England, a considerable number of women are employed in the telegraph and post-offices. The larger portion of the article is taken up with a discussion of how women of the higher classes may support themselves. In all these countries except Switzerland, most of the women who engage in these pursuits are from the lower or middle classes, and the author seems very anxious to find some place where "ladies" may be employed without contact with those beneath them. Only in republican Switzerland and the United States has this problem been settled by disregarding rank and letting all labor together. We believe this is the only practical solution that will be perfectly satisfactory. In most of these countries, the women undergo a careful examination, receive very poor wages, and do their work in a satisfactory manner. The experiment has in no instance proven a failure, and has been almost without exception a complete success. When women are employed in the same offices with men and boys, the effect on the latter has always been beneficial. In Switzerland, the government has congratulated the country on the success of this experiment. In Austria, the women are said to be remarkable for their attention to duty, and for their faithfulness. This question of employment for women will, we believe, come to be one of more and more importance. It is desirable that all employments should be freely open to women as to men, in which they can attain success. The wages should also be the same for the same work done. Women should be permitted to become self-dependent, and girls should be trained to a life of self-reliance. But most of all is needed that homekeeping should be regarded as a profession, that the home-maker be treated as a wage-earner, and that she should not be required to ask of her "lord" for the money she spends.

The Institute of Heredity sends forth an appeal for aid in its work of disseminating information on the vastly important subject with which it deals. It calls attention to the State aid now given in the education of great numbers of misborn unfortunates, and says it has become important that we should "devote more of our labor and means to such methods of popular education as will result in removing the cause of these evils, and in bringing future generations into existence under such conditions of moral and physical health as will make them altogether self-sustaining and useful members of society. During many years, this question has been considered, and there has been going on a silent preparation for this work; and this movement has been organized in the earnest hope and expectation of meeting many, if not all, the requirements in the case." Considering the importance which science now attributes to heredity, the objects of this society seem to be most commendable. There is no doubt the laws of healthy birth are being constantly violated, causing much of human defect and misery. A right birth at first makes a "new birth" unnecessary.

The first annual report of the Associated Charities of Cincinnati gives a very promising account of the work done there. A good organization has been effected, and the foundations laid for efficient work in the future. In speaking of the objects of such an organization, the report justly says that the Associated Charities "fulfils to the various relief agencies and benevolent agencies similar functions to those which the clearing-house and mercantile agency fulfil toward our financial classes. Its chief aim is not to afford direct relief from its own funds, but to be the medium between the existing charities and the poor. It offers the latter, in its district offices, so many centrally located bureaus, where they can make known their wants to a sympathetic listener, receive the thorough investigation which every honest applicant courts, be advised as to the existing sources of relief in their case (and assisted to obtain it), aided by employment whenever practicable, called on at frequent intervals by the friendly visitors of the society, and made self-supporting as soon as may be. To the existing relief agencies of our city, it offers a common ground for counsel and coöperation, aids them to discover overlapping, prevents them from being imposed on by fraudulent beggars, and makes them more prompt and efficient in the work of relief. To the householder, it offers its gratuitous services in the investigation and disposal of cases, saving them a deal of time, money, and self-reproach." G. W. C.

LABOR.

"The laborer is worthy of his hire."—LUKE x., 7.

1. Labor as regarded by the Hebrew Nomads.

The second account of the CREATION in Genesis, to which is added the legend of the Temptation and Fall of Man (Gen. ii., 4,–iii., 24), represents labor and death to be penalties imposed upon man for ADAM'S disobedience. The command to labor is a curse instead of a blessing. This legend was apparently derived from older BABYLONIAN records, where it has recently been discovered, identical, in its main features, with the HEBREW story. It reflects truly the characteristics of the early nomadic period.

The contempt and dislike for manual labor peculiar to nomadic peoples is also manifested in the stories of CAIN and ABEL (Gen. iv., 1-24), and JACOB and ESAU. (Gen. xxv., 27–34; xxvii.) Art and industry are condemned in the person of TUBAL-CAIN; and the architect and builder are pronounced sacrilegious in the legend of the Tower of BABEL. (Gen. xi., 1–9.)

NOTE.—Two distinct and contradictory accounts of the CREATION are easily distinguished in the early chapters of GENESIS (Gen. i.–ii., 3; and Gen. ii., 4–25.) The first in order is, according to KUENEN, OORT, and other liberal critics, chronologically the latest in composition. DEAN STANLEY admits that these legends "differ at nearly every point of time and circumstance." (Address at the funeral of Sir CHARLES LYELL.) They are distinguished by the use of the name "ELOHIM" for GOD in the first account, and "YAHWEH" in the second. Both are manifestly wholly unhistorical.

2. Later Hebrew Recognition of the Dignity of Labor.

HEBREW writers representing a later period in their history, after they devoted themselves to agriculture, and settled in permanent habitations, view labor in quite another light, deeming it honorable, and regarding the laboring man as worthy of respect. The first account of the CREATION represents that GOD (ELOHIM) himself worked six days, and rested on the seventh. (Gen. ii., 2.) Many passages in Proverbs, and other OLD TESTAMENT books, affirm the dignity and honorableness of labor and the evil of slothfulness. (Deut. v., 13; Prov. vi., 6–11; x., 4, 5; xii., 27; xiii., 4, 11, 23; xiv., 23; xviii., 9; xix., 15; xx., 4, 13; xxi., 25; xxiv., 30–34; Eccl. v., 12, 18; x., 18.)

SLAVERY among the JEWS was modified by the provision of the LAW requiring the release of HEBREW bondsmen every seventh year (Deut. xv., 12), and other regulations provided for their protection against the cruelty and oppression of their masters. (Deut. xv., 13, 14; Ex. xxi., 2, 3, 20, 26, 27, etc.)

In the earliest account of the institution of the SABBATH, it is said to have been established as a day of rest for laboring men, servants, and cattle. (Ex. xxiii., 12.)

NOTE A.—SLAVERY: Upon this recognition of slavery in the OLD TESTAMENT, its advocates in AMERICA, prior to its legal abolition, based their claim that it was a "divine institution," sanctioned and approved by the BIBLE.

The HEBREW laws, however, did not establish slavery, but simply recognized a long-existing custom, aiming to ameliorate the condition of the bondsmen.

SLAVERY originated in a barbarous condition of society, and was, in its inception, an advance in the direction of greater humanity,—the enslavement of captives taken in war having been originally substituted for their massacre, a universal custom among the most barbarous tribes. In civilized communities, SLAVERY must be deemed wholly an evil,—a "relic of barbarism,"—now, happily, fast becoming extinct.

NOTE B.—THE SABBATH: The earliest HEBREW recognition of the SABBATH is found in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. xxiii., 12), an early fragment of the PENTATEUCH. The Deuteronomist, a later writer, announces a different reason for the keeping of the seventh day, connecting it with the Exodus from EGYPT. (Deut. v., 15.) The author of the Book of Origins, writing still later, bases the command upon the alleged fact that GOD (ELOHIM) rested on the seventh day, after the CREATION. (Gen. ii., 3; Ex. xx., 11.) The HEBREWS, doubtless, derived this institution from the CHALDEANS, among whom it appears to have been recognized before the time of ABRAHAM. (See KUENEN, SMITH'S Chaldean Account of Genesis, and SAYCE'S Records of the Past.)

3. Jesus and the Laboring Men.

The special work of JESUS having been to preach the GOSPEL and bring men to repentance, there is little in his teaching referring directly to the ordinary labors of life. The disciples and their master appear to have constituted a sort of community, keeping their money in a common fund, of which one of their number was the custodian.

In the parable of The Laborers in the Vineyard, and elsewhere, JESUS recognized the necessity and honorableness of labor. He declared that "the laborer is worthy of his hire"; a principle which, if given a universal application, is inconsistent with involuntary servitude. He himself followed the trade of a carpenter in early life, and several of his disciples were laboring men. He sympathized with the toiling poor, promising them rest and comfort in the HEAVENLY KINGDOM. (Matt. xi., 28.)

NOTE.—Read to the class LONGFELLOW'S Psalm of Life.

Talk about LABOR and COMPENSATION. What is the effect of the division of labor upon the condition of the laborer? Are all kinds of USEFUL LABOR equally honorable? If so, why should not all faithful laborers be equally remunerated?

CAPITAL and LABOR. What is Capital? Are the laborer's wages paid out of capital, or directly from the product of his labor? What do you think of the principle of Trades' Unions? Will they benefit the laborer? Ought the hours of labor to be limited by law? How can the conflict between Capital and Labor be avoided? How would CO-OPERATION influence the laborer's condition,—a system wherein he should share directly in the profits of his labor, instead of receiving a stated salary? How are wage-labor and slavery related?

General Questions.

1. How is labor regarded by nomadic peoples? 2. How is it represented in the earliest HEBREW legends? 3. In the earliest story of the CREATION? 4. What are the teachings of later HEBREW writers? 5. How does the Jewish LAW treat Slavery? 6. How did slavery originate? 7. By whom was it deemed a "divine institution"? 8. Why was the SABBATH instituted? 9. What different reasons are given among HEBREW writers for observing the Seventh Day? 10. Did the SABBATH originate among the JEWS? 11. What did JESUS say respecting labor? 12. Why did he say so little about it? 13. What did he promise the "weary and heavy-laden"?

To the Teacher.

Read CARLYLE'S noble tribute to labor, and EMERSON'S essay on "Success." Read also the chapter on The Jews in Michelet's Bible of Humanity, and Henry George's Progress and Poverty. Let each of the class learn one of the paragraphs on "WORK" in Mrs. Child's Aspirations of the World.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

My intention was to visit North Alabama; but Memphis lay close there, where the yellow fever was active, and, as I did not feel I wanted the yellow fever, I never went nearer Memphis than St. Louis. Several persons who knew the district well, and who had resided there, spoke to me favorably of it. I learned, on British official authority, that there are large districts of Alabama where labor is scarce compared with other parts of America. The State of Alabama contains but one million of population, though there is land enough to support ten millions. The colored people have not learned to live under independent industrial conditions. Like the English laborer, when feudalism was abolished, the habit of being kept still clings to them; and being in debt is not the same trouble to many colored men as it is to white men as a rule, though it must be owned that there are white men in many countries who are not much troubled about it either. It is also objected that the colored men cannot be depended upon to remain in their situations, and will leave the plantation when most needed, which occurs at times among workmen not colored. A rising mining town named Birmingham exists in North Alabama. For many years past, a great many miners have settled there from England and Wales, and are doing well and developing the richest of the coal lands. With prudence, any one can keep himself in Alabama; but, without prudence, it cannot be done. The prudence consists in avoiding undue exposure after dark. The Germans have learned to do it. They have founded a colony in this neighborhood. The Germans get along well in this State, and there are large numbers of them. The hill country of Alabama bears the name of the "Land of Rest." Consul Cridland reports that "the climate of this district or colony is said to be very healthy, and to this fact is attributed much of its rapid growth and success. Good water abounds, and the site is seven hundred and two feet above the level of the sea. Epidemics are unknown, and fevers rare. The summers are not oppressive, nights cool, the winter short and mild. Snow seldom falls, and when it does quickly disappears. New settlers, mostly German, continue to arrive daily; and the population is steadily increasing, also in prosperity. The officials of the South and North Alabama Railroad are warm friends of the colony, and do all in their power to encourage immigration."

They make things plain in America. The New York Herald published a page containing a series of broad, black lines, showing the comparative length of sixty-eight of the States and Territories of America and the principal countries of Europe, omitting Russia and Alaska. The longest line of all was that of Texas, containing thirty-four thousand more square miles than the Austrian Empire. A glance at this page of the Herald shows the relative size of the sixty-eight countries at once.

The Canadian maps given me by the Hon. Mr. Pope are remarkable for their picturesque distinctness. A quarto pamphlet of Manitoba and north-west territories is filled with copious wood-cut illustrations, singularly clear, conveying the sense of coolness and clearness of the air; while the American wood-cuts, in many instances, reproduce the effect of heat and sunlight, so that, when I look upon the engravings of places which I saw, the atmospheric associations under which I saw them return again to the mind. A writer describing Winnipeg says: "It possesses an excellent daily newspaper, the Manitoba Free Press. A club-house is regarded as a luxury in the Far West, and a newspaper is held to be a luxury of life." Thus intelligence is the first thought of these new settlements. Mr. James Samuelson, an English barrister (brother of the English M.P. for Banbury), whom I met in Boston, has since published a small book of useful information for intending emigrants, both precise and informing.

In Canada, considerable practical thought is given to forms of coöperation unknown in England. One was a plan by Mr. F. P. M'Kelcan, of the nature of an industrial federation of towns and villages, with a view to obtain, at a central office, a continuous record of persons of all professions in any town wanting employment, or who are themselves wanted or not wanted in it, so that emigrants arriving can learn at once where to go or what places to avoid. A person advertised in the Montreal Witness for a musical teacher for his family and for a housemaid. The answers received showed that there were two thousand music-teachers in Canada more than were at that time wanted, while there was not a single housemaid to be had. Mr. M'Kelcan's plan is of the nature of a Co-operative Labor Exchange. I had opportunity of conversing with Mr. M'Kelcan, and found him a man of good practical judgment.

Whether Canada derives the inspiration of equality from its adjacency to America, or whether its spirit of civil liberty is indigenous, I was unable, during my pleasant acquaintance with that country, to determine. That there were gracious ways in the land I could see; for instance, when the Canadian Hanlan—a brilliant oarsman—beat Elliott on the Tyne, the Marquis of Lorne telegraphed to Hanlan his congratulations. This was a very handsome thing to do. . . . As an Englishman, I was interested in what related to the Marquis of Lorne in Canada. Before he went out, he published a volume of poems, superior to anything Lord Byron published at his age. The English are a mysterious people in the eyes of Americans. We treat the aristocracy in politics with a deference Americans contemn, while in literature we treat them with a severity that Americans would not display. If the Marquis of Lorne was a pitman or a weaver, he would be ranked higher as a poet than he is, being a peer.

One afternoon in Ottawa I had the honor to receive, at the Russell House, a deputation from the Ottawa Progressive Society. It was the first formal deputation I had received. I am afraid I did not acquit myself with the dignity a visit of that kind demanded, but the interview was to me a very pleasant one. The same is true in both particulars of a deputation which I met at the Union Dépôt, Toronto. Among them was Mr. Belford, of the great publishing house of that city, and Mr. A. L. Jury, representing the Toronto Coöperative Association, and also representatives from the Toronto Philosophical Society. The time at my disposal did not enable me to visit the city. I had been in it in the early morning a few days before, when I insisted upon walking into the streets that I might have palpable assurance of treading on the soil of Toronto.

Canada is a much more pleasant and habitable country than Englishmen imagine at home. The cold is definite in its nature, limited in its period of operation, and is to be combated by exercise, and the contest conduces to health. There is great warmth in the summer season and almost perpetual brightness in the cold time. I was assured that the clear and brilliant days to be spent among the snow afford an exhilaration unknown in England. I found many emigrants from the old country, who thought they would not like to live in England or Scotland after their experience there. It was professed to me that the fogs of New Brunswick are superior to ours, since they give no colds. But of the superiority of their fogs I can give no opinion, as I did not try them. When Mr. George Iles, of the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, afterward visited me in London, at the Christmas of 1879, I often heard him say that in the winter weeks he spent in London he experienced more discomfort from cold than he ever did in Canada. It was a new thing for me to find in Ottawa that the Liberals were in favor of what we understand as "personal government," while the Conservative party were opposed to it. On that question, I was a Conservative in Ottawa. Thus Canada was a country in which I could change my party without changing my principles. Lord Dufferin, when Governor-General of Canada, said at a dinner given to him at Toronto: "For many years past, I have been a strong advocate for emigration in the interests of the British population. I believe that emigration is a benefit both to those who go and to those that remain, at the same time that it is the most effectual and legitimate weapon with which labor can contend with capital." These are the wisest words (save as I think those which coöperation has to utter) that any man of eminence has said upon the policy of labor.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MILWAUKEE, Feb. 23, 1881.

The subject of State secularization has been given a local prominence the present winter, and awakened public sentiment to a degree of interest.

The question of religious instruction in the reform and industrial schools of this State and city has been raised, and investigations have been made with regard to the religious management of these schools. An effort was made, early in the winter, by a member of the Board of Managers of the Reform School for Boys at Waukesha, Wis., to introduce special religious services for the children of Catholic parents, that they might be instructed in the forms and ceremonies of that church. Other members of the board opposed it, and prepared certain by-laws and regulations that would provide for religious instruction, but in a general way. The latter argued that ministers of all denominations might put in the same claim to be allowed to conduct special religious services after their own manner and creeds, which would subject the superintendent and assistants to annoyance, and would result in more harm than good. An argument in favor of the first proposition was to the effect that, while there was a difference in the creeds of the various Evangelical denominations, still the form of worship was much the same; while the Catholic religion is entirely different and exclusive, and its forms and ceremonies cannot be imparted to all classes of believers. The matter, I believe, was amicably adjusted, but will be sure to come up again and again, in one form or another, just as long as any sectarian teaching and observances obtain in these schools.

The Catholic Citizen introduced a newspaper controversy, that has been carried on to a considerable extent, concerning the Industrial School for Girls in this city. An editorial appeared in that journal, called forth by a rumored report that an agent of the Industrial School was about to make a thorough canvass of the State for the purpose of obtaining the custody of all homeless and neglected children, without question of creed or sect. The rumor was without foundation, no doubt; but it gave the Citizen a chance to air its views, and, through the war it raised, the community had a chance to see the matter in its true light.

The Citizen took the position that the homeless and neglected children of the Catholic faith should be committed to the Catholic asylums, and Protestant children to Protestant asylums, and held that it would be a great wrong to commit Protestant children to a Catholic or even to a purely secular asylum when there were Protestant industrial schools willing to receive them without any additional tax to the State. The reply in behalf of the Industrial School contained the following statements: namely, that the school was organized in conformity with the requirements of law; that they must receive all the children committed or sent under its provisions, or be found guilty of a violation of the statute; that it had no more right to question, as a condition, the religious faith of a child or of its parents or guardians than it would have of the nationality or color. An explanation was also made in this communication, that the Catholic children of the school had been taken to Roman Catholic services, whenever it was possible to do so.

The quarrel seems to have arisen from the fact of certain appropriations made by the State and county to the Industrial School. This school occupies a somewhat questionable attitude toward the State, being neither a purely private charity nor a State institution. It was organized by a number of charitable Milwaukee ladies, who carried on their reformatory work for several years without assistance from the State. Now, however, they occupy grounds and buildings, the appropriation of both State and city. This public property is granted for the use of the school; but the right has been reserved to take it into the possession of the State, whenever in the judgment of the legislature it shall not be satisfactorily used for the purpose intended.

The Catholic side of the quarrel claimed that this school should be placed on the same footing with other private asylums doing the same work, and that the governor of the State should show no partiality in calling upon the legislature for appropriations, that the bounty of the State should be bestowed upon all or none. They claim that this is a greater expense to the State than other asylums subserving the same purpose. The property that is given to this school, rent free, is valued at $30,000, and is virtually an annual gift from the State, on which the people pay a yearly tax of over $2,000. While this school receives two and a half dollars per week from the counties for the care of needy children, the "House of the Good Shepherd," Catholic, receives but two dollars, and was built wholly at private expense, and never has received an appropriation from the State; simply charging two dollars per week for the board of the children.

Looking at the subject impartially, it seems as if the Catholic side had the best of the argument, and good ground for complaint. The reformatory work done at the Industrial School is valuable to the State in preventing crime; and the State is wise to increase the facilities for extending this work. Still, any partiality in favor of a Protestant institution over a Catholic institution is unjust. The quarrel rests on this injustice. There can be no satisfactory adjustment of such difficulties, while the religious question is tolerated in these or any other schools. Freedom from sectarian influence alone can regulate the standard of equity between the State and its reformatory and penal institutions.

The public attention has been aroused by the local prominence of these questions, and already some action has been taken by our County Board of Supervisors. A thorough investigation has recently been made of all reformatory institutions in the county, by a committee who presented their report to the board a few weeks since. This report is long, fully describing the sanitary, pedagogic, and religious management of each institution. The Catholic schools are reported, as we might expect, "decidedly sectarian in all their teachings." "The others profess to be non-sectarian, but they cannot be said not to inculcate the doctrines of a particular religion." The committee recommend "that all schools controlled or patronized by the State or county be entirely free from sectarian teachings."

This report of the investigating committee, it is expected, will cause a bitter fight between the secular and sectarian factions. It is not at all probable that any farther step will be taken, at present, to free these schools from sectarianism; but it is a satisfaction to know that we have one supervisor who understands the subject of secularization of schools, and who possesses the courage to present such a report to the board, well knowing what would follow. But the more bitter the factional fight, the nearer will the truth come to the people that there is legislative injustice in the taxation of the people for the promotion of denominational religious instruction, and in granting special favors to any particular religion or school. These glaring inconsistencies, once grasped by the public mind with sufficient grip to institute a correction of existing evils, will lead the way to the final separation of Church and State.

The managers of the Industrial School for girls regard the report of the committee of supervisors as fair to them in the main, but disprove the statement that the school is conducted on sectarian principles. The books used in the institution, they represent, "are entirely secular, and the religious teaching is conducted on a broad plan." This breadth can be determined by an extract from the report of the superintendent for 1879: "The religious and moral lessons given to these pupils are carefully prepared, and used to meet their special needs. On Sunday, we have two services in our pleasant school-rooms,—the morning Sabbath school and the afternoon services of singing, prayer, reading of the Scriptures, and afterwards of some suitable sermon or book. Family prayers are attended at morning and evening, and thanks are returned at meals."

It would be somewhat interesting to know what the managers understand by the terms "sectarian" and "secular."

The Catholic view of the report is somewhat clearer. The President of the St. Francis Boys' Home, in an open letter to the Board of Supervisors, is evidently on the scent of the real aim and meaning of the report. He writes: "The spirit and tendency of the document are evident from its closing sentences. Every one will see that the last sentence, sweeping away every superstitious, i.e., religious, teaching and restraint, caps the climax of Mr. Sercombe's hopes. The gentleman must have a fearful dread of any and every religious teaching and restraint, or else he could not have committed himself to such a Utopian hope." And toward the realization of this "Utopian hope," let us say to this reverend Catholic president, all these controversies are tending.

The tax-payers of the city have also been stirring up secularization indirectly, while indulging in their annual squeal at the payment of disproportionate taxes. The discussions, as reported by the press, of their open sessions, savor of the ridiculous, picayunish ignorance often gaining a hearing to air the most absurd suggestions concerning remedial efforts to relieve tax-payers. Fortunately there is too much intelligence in our community to let these absurdities override any reasonable solution of taxation difficulties.

At a recent meeting of the Tax-payers' League, a letter was read from a member of the Assembly representing the first ward, in which attention was called to an act for the repeal of exemption laws, and to the fact that the League had overlooked this important element in taxation, in their meetings. An amendment to the Constitution was to be introduced in the Assembly this winter, similar to the one of last year, subjecting all property to taxation with the exception of places of burial of the dead, and that the League could do good service by indorsing it.

This, of course, called forth the usual discussion. It was urged, on the one hand, that it was only right that every institution except State and municipal burial-places should be taxed, and that this was practically carrying out the principles enunciated by the government; namely, the division of Church and State. On the other hand, it was argued that this committee had nothing to do with State affairs, and could not interfere in a matter which lay entirely with the State. This latter position was refuted by the remark that the League was aiming to lessen taxation and increase the means of revenue. The committee finally concurred in the following resolution, which has been introduced in the Assembly now in session at Madison:—

Resolved, By the Assembly, the Senate concurring, that article 8, section 1, of the Constitution be amended so as to read as follows: "The rule of taxation shall be uniform, and taxes shall be levied upon all property in this State except that owned exclusively by the United States, by this State, or any county, city, town, village, or school district, and places set apart and in actual use for the burial of the dead."

This amended bill bids fair to receive thoughtful consideration, at least from the legislative body; and there is a prevailing opinion that it will pass. If it should, Wisconsin may be congratulated upon initiating, in popular parlance, a "boom" in secularization.

The German Emperor has accepted Dr. Schliemann's offer of the Trojan relics, which were lately exhibited at South Kensington; and they are to be assigned a department in the new Ethnological Museum in Berlin.

The London Weekly Despatch of February 27 contained the following telegram: "Lady Students at Cambridge.— Cambridge, Thursday Night. The voting in Cambridge University Senate to-day upon the proposal to admit lady students to the Tripos examinations has caused the greatest interest, many members of the senate coming a considerable distance to vote. The proposal was carried by three hundred and ninety-eight to thirty-two, the announcement of which was received with much cheering."

A series of etchings of Mr. Carlyle have, the Athenæum says, for some time been in process of execution by Mr. Howard Helmick. They are reproductions of authentic and unpublished portraits and sketches in the possession of the philosopher's family; and, covering a period of about fifty years, they show him in the more intimate aspects of his home life,—at ease in his garden and at work in his study. These etchings, which are six in number, will be immediately issued by the Etchers' Society.

The centenary of the death of Lessing has been celebrated in Germany. Most of the papers had articles on the centenary. The liberal and ministerial press describes Lessing as a patriot and the emancipator of the poetic genius of Germany. The conservative press express their appreciation of his worth as a literary critic, but regret his rationalism. The ultramontane press ignores the anniversary. The Jewish papers extol him as the apostle of tolerance: the anti-Jewish journals, on the contrary, decry him as a false saint whom the Jews have introduced into the German calendar.

On Tuesday night, a great demonstration of women took place in the Birmingham Town Hall, in support of Mr. Hugh Mason's resolution in favor of the extension of parliamentary franchise to female householders, and to promote a memorial to the Government. The chair was taken by Mrs. H. W. Croskey. There was a large attendance, and an overflow meeting had to be held, presided over by Mrs. R. W. Dale. The following resolution was passed: "That there are over five thousand rate-payers in the kingdom deprived of the power of voting for the election of members of Parliament, on the sole ground that they are women; that the exclusion is directly opposed to the fundamental principle of representative government, and therefore unjust toward such rate-payers; and that the exclusion of women rate-payers from parliamentary voting deprives women of the free expression of opinion which is the only guarantee for liberty in the State."—Weekly Despatch, Feb. 27.

A protest on behalf of the London Positivist Society, signed by Professor Beesly, has been issued against the Transvaal war. It asserts that the original annexation was soon admitted by all except the handful of persons who were responsible for it to have been a flagrant injustice, and that the only reason that has any semblance of morality which has been advanced for maintaining the annexation is that the Boers are a minority of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, and that we are bound to remain in the interest of the native races. But justice would be satisfied by recognizing the independence of the Boers in the districts they really occupy, and forbidding them to encroach any further on the native tribes. The real motive for maintaining the annexation was the immoral and fatal maxim that our prestige requires us never to draw back from any enterprise, however ill-advised and unjust; but the frank confession that one has been in the wrong is no more degrading to a nation than to an individual.—Pall Mall Budget.

Mr. Parnell has addressed the following letter to the secretary of the Clara Land League: "Dear Sir,— In my speech at Clara on Sunday, I recommended tenants who were about to be evicted to call in their neighbors a few days before the eviction and plough up the ground. Since then, my attention has been directed to the fact, of which I was in ignorance, that a tenant ploughing up his land under such circumstances might be held to be guilty of a crime under one of the many barbarous, cruel, and exceptional Acts passed by landlord legislatures in days gone by for the maintenance of landlords' iniquity, and subjected to penal servitude for seven years. While I am perfectly willing to accept the consequence of my own acts in this movement, I have always carefully abstained from recommending others to break the law. Feeling that the counsel given by me at your meeting might lead to such results, it is my duty at this the earliest opportunity, and in the most public manner, to withdraw the advice given as to ploughing the land, as I cannot justify any action against the criminal law, however iniquitous that law may be. Yours truly, Chas. S. Parnell."

JESTINGS.

The man who receives and changes a counterfeit bill returns good for evil.

A little boy came to his mother recently, and said, "Mother, I should think that if I was of dust I would get muddy inside whenever I drink."

A Northern paper claims that an alderman has been injured by the accidental discharge of his duty. These accidents are very rare.—New Orleans Picayune.

"An Open Letter to His Majesty the Devil" is the title of a pamphlet written by an Illinois man, who cannot wait for death to place him in communication with the party addressed.

"As false as a churchyard epitaph" could not be said of the one inscribed on a freestone slab at New London, which reads, "What sort of man he was the resurrection morning will reveal."

The latest scientific version of the old aphorism is given by a writer in the Quarterly Review: "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we shall be carbolic acid, water, and ammonia."

There is a great deal of natural tact in children. When a little one was asked by her proud mother to read her last composition to the minister, she began, "The cow is the most useful animal in the world," and then, remembering the minister's presence, added, "except religion."

"Isn't it awful cold?" queried Smith, as he met Jones on the car the other day. "Terrible, terrible." "Any of your water-pipes freeze up?" "Worse than that." "How?" "Had three barrels of potatoes frozen as hard as stones. I'll lose every one of them." "Oh, no, you won't. Just head 'em up, and send 'em to some charitable institution, and no one will know but what they froze while en route. It's a golden opportunity you shouldn't neglect."

Parson Cantable is one of the most absent-minded men we know. At a funeral the other day, after going through with the usual exercises for such cases made and provided, and while the bereaved circle was sighing and weeping, and the head mourners were completely overcome by his harrowing eloquence, he sank gracefully into his chair with the announcement, "The usual collection will now be taken." Even the head of the head mourners fairly snickered.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

THE Law is for millions; but it is one, and it is alike beautiful to all.—Buddhist.

HEAVEN is a palace with many doors, and each one may enter in his own way.—Hindu.

RELIGIONS are many and different; but reason is one. We are all brethren.—Chinese.

EACH prophet that appears is not to be opposed to his predecessors, nor yet complacently to exalt his law.... O God! whatever road I take joins the highway that leads to thee.—Parsi.

GOD is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.... He that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?—New Testament.

THE East and the West belongeth to God: therefore, whichever way ye turn, there is the face of God.... He is our Lord and your Lord. We have our works, and you have your works; and unto him we are sincerely devoted.—Koran.

IF thou art a Mussulman, go stay with the Franks; if a Christian, join the Jews; if a Shiah, mix with the schismatics: whatever thy religion, associate with men of opposite persuasions. If in hearing their discourses thou art not in the least moved, but canst mix with them freely, thou hast attained peace, and art a master of creation.—Sufi: Persian.

THE universe is but one great city, full of beloved ones divine and human, by nature endeared to each other.—Epictetus.

ONE article of our faith then is that Christ is the first begotten of God, and we have already proved him to be the very Logos (or universal reason), of which mankind are all partakers; and therefore those who live according to the Logos are Christians, notwithstanding they may pass with you for atheists; such among the Greeks were Socrates, Heraclitus, and the like.... They who have made or make the Logos or Reason the rule of their actions are Christians, and men without fear and trembling.—Justin Martyr.

WHAT is now called the Christian religion has existed among the ancients, and was not absent from the beginning of the human race until Christ came in the flesh: from which time the true religion, which existed already, began to be called Christian.—St. Augustine.

FROM the beginning of the world there have always been among the heathens higher and rarer people, of greater and more exalted understanding, more excellent diligence and skill in all arts, than among Christians, or the people of God.—Luther.

THE commerce of ideas in the human race does not work by books or by direct teaching only. Jesus did not even know the name of Buddha, Zoroaster, or Plato: he had read no Greek book, no Buddhist soutra, and yet there is in him more than one element which, without his knowledge, came from Buddhism, from Parseeism, or from the wisdom of the Greeks. All this is done through secret channels and by that species of sympathy which exists between various divisions of humanity. The great man, on the one hand, receives all things from his time; on the other, he masters his time.—Renan.

TO THE true believer, truth, wherever it appears, is welcome; nor will any doctrine seem the less true or the less precious, because it was seen, not only by Moses or Christ, but likewise by Buddha or Lao-tse.—Max Müller.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IT is calculated that at the lowest estimate of the population there is one Christian missionary in China to every million of inhabitants in the country.

IT looks as if the old Massachusetts Sunday laws would have to give way to railroad enterprise so far as to permit trains on Sunday. The Legislature, while it is about it, might as well repeal the whole of the absurd and constantly violated travel section, which is practically obsolete, and yet is sometimes sprung into operation in a way to work great injustice.

IN 1838, Frederick Douglass was a slave in Maryland. In September of that year, he fled from bondage to find freedom in the North. On March 4, 1881, the same Frederick Douglass, as Marshal of the District of Columbia, headed the procession of judges, senators, diplomats, and other distinguished personages, with President Hayes and President-elect Garfield next following him, from the Senate Chamber to the eastern portico of the Capitol for the inauguration of President Garfield. Between these two facts, what a history is held, of which they tell the tale!

HORRIBLE as is the crime of assassination, whether it occur in a republic or in a monarchy, we are not among those who expend all our sympathies on the side of the Russian government on account of the murder of the Czar. We do not forget that Russia, in spite of the progress under the late Czar, is still a cruel oppressor of the people, and uses modes of punishment that madden to the fury of despair; and this terrible deed was the frenzied act of a people struggling for their trampled rights. Of course, it may for a time hurt more than help their cause; but people in that condition do not reason.

DENOMINATIONAL hospitals are getting to be quite common in New York. There is an Episcopal hospital, a Presbyterian one, and others of different sects, we believe. And now a distinguished Methodist has just left a large sum for one of his persuasion. Whether it is assumed that there is a special efficacy in the respective creed, in such instances, as compared with others, to cure the ills that flesh is heir to, as is claimed in regard to those of the spirit, does not appear. But, if the chief end of hospitals is the care and cure of the sick and diseased, it would seem there is reason for the presumption. The matter is of a good deal of moment to the class just referred to.

ANOTHER member of the committee in the Leicester case has given his reasons for the decision, Professor Everett, of the Harvard Divinity School. We reprint in to-day's issue his statement from the Christian Register. It will be noticed that Professor Everett based his vote against the society, not only on the ground that Mr. Weston was not identified with the "Unitarian faith," but because his views of God, as expressed in the sermons submitted to the referees, are not such as are "known by the name Unitarian." He meets the question squarely by the declaration that Mr. Weston's views of God are Pantheistic, and that Unitarian views of God are distinctly Theistic. We wish Professor Everett had explained more clearly why this is not to touch the question of "fellowship or of ecclesiastical recognition." If "views of God known as Unitarian" can include Pantheism anywhere, why not at Leicester?

IN a late issue, we spoke of some signs of improvement in the literature of obituary resolutions to the effect of throwing less responsibility upon Divine Providence. But the "improvement," at least in respect to a similar kind of resolutions, does not appear to have reached the Baptist society at Chicago, which recently lost its church by fire. The society has passed a resolution on the matter, which begins thus: "Whereas it has pleased Almighty God to destroy our church-building by an incendiary." We get this fact from Chicago's Unity, which makes a comment we indorse: "There is something wrong about God, or else the church folks are not quite right about it." P.S.—Since writing the above, we notice that the official announcement of the Czar's assassination was made by the government in St. Petersburg as follows: "God's will has been done. At 3.25 o'clock this (Sunday) afternoon, the Almighty called the Emperor to himself." This clearly implicates the Almighty in the assassination.

THE New York Independent is usually right on all questions pertaining to the relations between Church and State, as in the following: "The Legislature of Massachusetts recently refused to modify the law of that State relating to witnesses who are not believers in any religion. The law reads thus: 'Every person not a believer in any religion shall be required to testify truly under the pains and penalties of perjury; and the evidence of such person's disbelief in the existence of God may be received to affect his credibility as a witness.' Mr. Higginson's bill proposed to repeal that part of the statute which we have placed in Italics. The Legislature refused to pass the bill, and hence this part of the statute remains.... Our plan would be to subject every witness to the civil pains and penalties of perjury, and attack the credibility of his testimony in a court of justice, if at all, only by proving his general character as to truth and veracity, without reference to his religious belief or his want of religious belief. This strikes us as more in harmony with the general theory upon which our political institutions are founded. It is not fair, speaking in the purely civil sense, to select the creed of an atheist as the subject-matter of proof for the purpose of affecting the credibility of his testimony. If he has a bad character for truth and veracity, let that be shown; but let his religious or irreligious creed alone."

THEISM AND MATERIALISM.

A Lecture delivered before the Society for Ethical Culture, on Sunday, March 6, 1881, at Chickering Hall, New York.

BY FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

It has become the custom in certain circles to speak of materialism, the philosophy which adopts matter as the fundamental principle for the explanation of the universe, with contempt and anger as the "philosophy of dirt." The feelings of mankind instinctively revolt against any system which threatens to lower the dignity of man, and to place him on the same level with the baser things which he treads under foot. Hence, the mechanical theory which materialism offers in explanation of human thought, feeling, and conduct, the reduction of man to a mere machine which it seems to imply, has evoked great bitterness, and called forth the rebellious protests of all who beheld their spiritual aspirations threatened, and the sanctuary of their spiritual nature violated. The course of my remarks will show that I, too, consider the position of the materialist an untenable one, and that I find ample reason why human beings should be unsatisfied with so limiting, so dwarfing, and in the end so hopeless a conception of the universe. Yet I would carefully be understood as declining to join in the vulgar hue and cry against the materialists. I have no indiscriminate invectives to hurl against the thinkers who have been led to that particular system, however little the system may recommend itself to my mind as sound or reasonable. I believe that a considerable degree of morality is at least reconcilable with the theory of materialism. While, practically speaking and apart from theories, we all know of not a few materialists whose lives are certainly as amiable, as virtuous, as truthful, and as tenderly good as the lives of those whose opinions are of the most idealistic type. In brief, I would here also emphasize the sentiment that we must learn to distinguish between an opinion and him who holds it, and that, while we are at perfect liberty to war with the one, we should be very careful indeed how we reflect upon the character of the other.

In speaking, then, of the materialism of to-day, it will behoove us at the outset to discriminate sharply between two kinds of materialism which are radically distinct; namely, the scientific materialism and the dogmatic materialism. Scientific materialism is that which says: The assumption that matter and force explain everything is a necessary hypothesis for the understanding of nature. It is a necessary hypothesis, true, but still an hypothesis only. Given matter and force, or atoms and the motion, and we must be able to construct the whole material universe. The dogmatic materialist says: Matter and force are not only hypothetically assumed to explain everything, but they actually do explain everything. There is naught in the whole wide and deep universe but the play and interaction of vibrating atoms. The difference between the two stand-points is enormous, though in popular discussions the two are too often confounded together. The obligations which the modern world is under toward scientific materialism can hardly be sufficiently recognized. All the achievements of science which have illustrated and ennobled the recent centuries have been gained by the adoption of the principle of scientific materialism as the basis of investigation. I may here say, since it is my purpose to-day to compare the two systems of theism and materialism one with the other, and gain a clearer insight into each by the comparison, that scientific materialism is opposed to the admission of theism so far as the explanation of nature is concerned. I do not say that a certain species of theism is not consistent with scientific materialism. On the contrary, it is. But that is a species of theism far off, remote from popular conceptions, a faint, prophetic glimpse of God as the ideal of the world,—be it enough to say here, the idea of a God who does not interfere in the order of nature. But the popular, the tangible conceptions are of a God who does interfere in nature, who interferes all the time; and against such an interfering God the position of scientific materialism is negative, exclusive, avowedly hostile.

And that such must be the position of scientific materialism in relation to the popular theism becomes evident, when we consider the conditions under which scientific results have been achieved, under which alone they are achievable. The basis of all science is the assumption of an invariable order in the universe. Unless there is inexorable law, unless the same conditions are always followed by the same result, the possibility of any explanation of nature ceases: the scientist might as well fold his hands, and give up investigation altogether. Only the certainty that nature is constant allows us to calculate from one of her ascertained actions to others, and so to expand the sphere of knowledge in every direction, and to add link after link to the chain of discoveries. It is evident, however, that if a single link could be proved untrustworthy, if in a single instance, the same conditions being given, nature did not repeat the same results, the whole chain would fall to the ground, and the entire basis of calculation would be withdrawn from under our feet. The search of the natural scientist, then, is directed solely toward causes, because, whenever the real causes are found, the effects must follow; and he has nothing to do with purposes. Every purpose introduced into the explanation of nature is a cross-purpose. Plainly, the supposition of a God who can prevent the effect from following its cause, in order to achieve certain purposes of his own, gives the lie to the whole principle of causation, and makes any such thing as consistent, natural science impossible. It is against the conception, therefore, of supernatural interference, and in favor of the conception of an invariable and eternal order, that science in self-preservation was compelled to fight; and accordingly we find in the various departments of human knowledge that the success achieved was proportional to the exclusion of the idea of divine interference, and that the beginnings of a truly scientific explanation only became possible after that religious spectre had been banished.

This was the case in astronomy, in geology, biology, and indeed in every branch of science. In astronomy, the notion that God has distinguished the earth to fulfil a higher purpose than the other planets and stars caused men for generations to cling to the geocentric theory of the universe, and made them stubbornly unwilling to accept the heliocentric, even after it had been proved by Copernicus. In geology, the same notion concerning the grander designs of which our earth is to be the theatre caused men to favor the conception that God himself had called it into existence in the six days of the Hebrew cosmogony. And it was not until very recent days that the vastness of geological epochs began to dawn upon the human understanding; and, even then, every inch of ground over which geology advanced had to be won against the deadly opposition of fanaticised theologians. And so, in biology, the belief that God created the different types of life by the fiat of his will contented men's feeble questionings. Indeed, here we come upon one of the most painful effects of the popular theology. For, upon its assumptions, an explanation of nature is not only impossible, but it is not even sought. It is enough—God has arranged everything: no better answer than that is required. And so it was not until modern times that men began to address themselves more earnestly to the problems of biology; and Darwin's theory has opened the way, at least to the understanding of how, under natural conditions and without supernatural interference, the higher forms of life may have been developed from the lower.

And so scientific materialism points out that the principle of cosmos in the world depends upon the unbroken connection between cause and effect; and that the unbroken connection between cause and effect depends upon the assumption of a mechanical theory of the universe; and that the mechanical theory of the universe is, therefore, the beginning of all science. Yet, if scientific materialism excludes God-belief from the scientific region, it does not therefore deny that there may be, nay, that there must be, an ultra-scientific region which our human faculties are unable to penetrate, and where higher and truer knowledge than we possess is doubtless concealed. The possibility is plainly conceded by the scientific materialist that, in the course of time, intellectual organs may be developed as far transcending ours as ours transcend those of the wallowing reptile of antediluvian times. To such an intelligence, many secrets might be revealed which are hidden from us, many clouds dispelled which shroud our vision, and depths of wisdom unbarred which to us are sealed. The human intellect is crippled, and matter and force are the two crutches with which it walks in the pursuit of knowledge. But it is possible to conceive of an intelligence which shall be not crippled, but perfect, which shall not stoop, but walk erect. Such an intelligence would also cast these crutches from it, and move with a freedom and celerity toward the ends of knowledge which is to us unimaginable. Fixed, however, and certain it is, in the eyes of scientific materialism, that so long as we have nothing better than the intellectual organs which we now possess, and in so far as we aspire to explain that which to our human understanding is inexplicable in the universe, we must even content ourselves to accept matter and force as our fundamental, our only assumptions. The distinctive feature of materialism, therefore, consists in the care with which it marks off the scientific and the ultra-scientific regions. So far as science extends, the materialistic hypothesis extends. But that hypothesis does not cover the ultimate reality. There is a region to which science does not extend, and will never extend. In that region, the principle of materialism also ceases to have any validity whatsoever.

Having thus characterized the position of scientific materialism, to which, perhaps, the most eminent of modern scientists have given in their adherence, and which we laymen in science are simply bound to accept, let us consider now the position of dogmatic materialism, which presents itself to us in a very different aspect,—I may say at once in an altogether unfavorable aspect.

The dogmatic materialism differs from the scientific in taking that as a fact which the other assumes as a necessary hypothesis. The dogmatic materialist believes that he covers the ground, when he says matter and force; that he has virtually solved the world-problem; that, though he may not perhaps be able to follow the tree of existence in all its branches and up to the crown, he has found the root out of which the universal existence grows, and that root is energized matter. Now, the position of the dogmatic materialist would be an unexceptionable one, if he did not unfortunately fail in two very important particulars. For, in the first place, the dogmatic materialist fails to explain mind; and, in the second place, he fails to explain matter. And, for one who starts with the assumption that he can explain every thing, to fail in explaining both mind and matter is, to say the least, a serious omission. The materialist fails to explain mind: he does signally fail to do that. All the manifold and patient investigations into the structure and action of the brain have not brought us one jot nearer to the solution of the problem, what mind is. Hasty or superficial writers speak with great assurance in these matters, it is true, and there is no end to what has been proved according to them; and I believe Büchner is quoted as saying, in connection with certain experiments in vivisection, where a part of the brain was cut away by the anatomist, that the anatomist in question had sliced off one piece of "the soul" after another. But such expressions, hastily put forth, and hastily caught up by half-educated people, convey a totally erroneous impression, and are intrinsically false. It is instructive to compare with them the far different utterances of men of the greatest eminence in natural science, whose contributions to our exact knowledge have given them a world-wide reputation. Take, for instance, the opinion of the celebrated physiologist, Dubois-Reymond, expressed in his address on the Limits of our Knowledge of Nature. The most accurate knowledge of the brain, he maintains, would reveal to us only the material conditions under which mental action comes about; but how the mental is generated out of the material would be as unexplicable as ever. Nay, this is a subject, he asserts, which we can never hope to clear up. However far science may progress, the true nature of the mind will forever remain concealed. "What thinkable connection," he says, "exists between certain motions of certain atoms in my brain, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the primal, undefinable, undeniable facts, 'I feel pain,' 'I feel pleasure,' etc.? Nor is it possible to understand how, out of the acting together of atoms, consciousness should arise. Even if I should conceive the atoms themselves to be already equipped with consciousness, I should not thereby have explained consciousness in general, nor would the unity of consciousness in the individual thereby become clearer."

In the same direction, Tyndall expresses himself in the most decisive and unmistakable language. "The relation of physics to consciousness," he says, "being thus invariable, it follows that, given the state of the brain, the corresponding thought or feeling might be inferred; or, given the thought or feeling, the corresponding state of the brain might be inferred. But how inferred? It would be at the bottom not a logical inference at all, but one of empirical association. You may reply that many of the inferences of science are of this character, as the inference that an electric current of a given direction will deflect the magnetic needle in a definite way. But the case differs in this, that the passage from the current to the needle, if not demonstrable, is thinkable, and that we entertain no doubt as to the final mechanical solution of the problem. But the passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable. We have no answer to the question, Are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness? The chasm between the two classes of phenomena remains intellectually impassable." These are words which ought to carry weight with them. They come not from those who are opposed to the advance of science, but from the foremost representatives of radical science,—from those who stand upon the heights of science. They come not from those who have any theological predilections of their own to cherish, but from men who are heart and head opposed to theology, but whose opinions fall with crushing force upon the dogmatic materialism as well as upon dogmatic theology. For materialism and theology are respectively obverse sides of the same medal, and both commit the same mistake, only in opposite directions. Both are dogmatic,—that is to say, both profess to know concerning the ultimate reality of things, only that they seek their principles at contrary poles. Theology says, I know mind is the source of everything. Materialism says, I know matter is the source of everything. The wiser insight of the present age remands them both to silence, and says: Neither of you knows: the ultimate reality is shrouded from both of you alike. You have each made the same mistake of seeking to express the Infinite in terms of the finite.

There have been curious attempts, indeed, to solve the problem of the connection of mind and brain; but these display their crudity at the first glance. Thus, the difficulty has been sought to be circumvented by mapping out the brain in different districts, and assigning a certain division of mental action to each. But it has been well observed that this would only multiply the difficulty. For, suppose we had forty such parts, then we should have forty little minds distributed over the brain, instead of one large mind; and the difficulty of understanding how mental action arises in each part would be as great as it was before.

And, again, it has been sought to circumvent the difficulty by asserting that the connection of thought and emotion with the brain is not more recondite, more obscure of meaning, than the connection of fragrance with the flower or musical quality with waves of air: so that the mental might appear to be, as it were, the fragrance of the material; the thought, the music of the brain. But how little help we derive from these metaphors, so far as they can be said to have any meaning at all, becomes clear when we remember that there is no fragrance to a flower, save as we, by our unifying sensation, perceive it; that there is no musical quality in the waves of air, save as we, through our hearing, construct it. It is very true, therefore, that the connection of mind with matter is not more difficult of explanation than that of musical quality with waves of air, simply because musical quality is an illustration of mental action. And the baffling character of the problem by which we are perplexed becomes most apparent in the case where a superficial analogy seems to have removed every difficulty. But these are matters requiring careful and quiet pondering, for which a public discourse hardly gives occasion. And many other considerations, looking in the same direction, might here be adduced; but let us keep our attention firmly fixed on the main point on which everything hinges,—namely, the inexplicable character of the fact of consciousness. A stone may be hot and a human being may be hot; but it is one thing to be hot, and another to feel that one is hot. You may answer that the stone has no fine and complicated nervous system, no delicate electric wires, as it were, that lead from without inward, no cerebral organ in which these impressions give rise to molecular groupings or movements of atoms. But I ask you, What is gained if we follow the message along the electric current of the nerves, and if we observe, were that possible, the molecular groupings which it causes in a brain? Those molecular groupings, those movements of atoms, do not explain to me the sensation, "I feel hot." Between such a movement of material particles in my brain and my feeling of heat there is a gulf that is not bridged over: there is a link missing, and we seek in vain to establish a connection. Or again, to quote the supposition of an author whom we have cited above, if a right-spiral movement occurs in the brain every time there is a feeling of love in a human being, yet does such a right-spiral movement in the brain not explain the nature of love. The immensity and depth of the problem become apparent when any such direct explanation is attempted to be offered. Only so long as everything is vague and general, so long as it is said that *some*how mind is the result of matter, do men rest satisfied with such explanations. But as soon as you come with such detailed explanations, as soon as you say your feeling of love is a right-spiral motion in the brain, every one feels the insufficiency of that; every one feels, who knows what love is, that the nature of his love has not been explained by saying a right-spiral motion in the brain. I, a human mind, a human soul, aspire; I think, I yearn for the highest; I love. No theory of machine-like action of the brain can ever explain to me those facts of my inward experience, which yet are as sure as any facts of outward experience. The problem of what mind is, is left by the materialist where he found it, and where it is likely to remain forever unsolved.

But, if the materialist cannot explain what mind is, he fails altogether to explain to us even what matter is. The philosophy of matter—the philosophy which maintains that by matter everything can be explained—leaves that unexplained by which everything is to be explained. Here the whole system utterly breaks down, and the foundations of the dogma of materialism are seen to be built on mind. I have already explained to you that the materialist is guilty of the same error as the theist, only in an opposite direction. You will remember the deduction of a first cause, to which I have referred on various occasions. There is this present series of causes and effects before us: the mind goes back from effect to cause, and from that cause to a farther cause, and so to a cause behind that, and to a cause still behind that, and so on and on, until we grow dizzy with this whirl and maze of causes, and say, breathless, we must put a stop somewhere, and therefore exclaim arbitrarily, This is first cause, and beyond this we will not go, and here we will drive in the pier to which we will fasten the whole order of existence. But, after we have said first cause, and have obtained rest for a while, presently the old questioning spirit reasserts itself irresistibly within us, and says, Everything that exists must have a cause which produced it: if, therefore, the first cause exists, it must have had a cause that produced it, a cause, therefore, of the first cause, and still a cause of that, and still a cause of that, and so the dizzy whirl begins anew, and there is no end, until at last the mind sinks back exhausted, and confesses that to drive a nail into the blue sky and call it first cause is inconceivable; and that an endless chain of causes and effects which is attached nowhere is also inconceivable; that we cannot understand how there should ever have been a beginning, and we cannot understand that there should have been no beginning; that, in a word, our category of cause and effect is inadequate to explain the origin of things; that we have here come to the verge of an abyss where we cannot make one step further, where the unfathomable mystery of things spreads in nebulous profundity before us.

Now, I would point out that the mistake which the materialist makes with respect to matter is the same as the theist makes with respect to cause. For we know sufficiently well what cause and effect are for all the practical purposes of life; but, when we come to analyze the idea of cause to its depths, we find that it is insufficient to explain the origin of the universe. And so we know what matter is. There is no doubt in our minds at all as to what matter is. We know all about it, so far as we need to know for all the purposes of life. But, when we come to analyze the idea of matter to its fine elements, we find that it escapes under our fingers in the analysis, and that it also is totally inadequate to explain the constitution of nature. For the very idea of matter implies divisibility. This you will concede. Every material particle, in so far as it is a material particle, occupies space; and whatever occupies space can be divided into parts. For this reason, it is impossible to represent a mathematical point to the eye. For a mathematical point—a mere abstraction of the mind it is, and nothing more—is supposed to be indivisible. But the faintest mark which you can draw with chalk upon the blackboard were capable of million-fold division, if we had instruments fine enough for the purpose. The very nature, then, of that which is really material, implies divisibility. Now look at this desk behind me. It could plainly be divided without much difficulty into a hundred parts; and, if I were to take one of those hundred parts, I could divide that into a hundred parts; and, if I were to take a hundredth part of a hundredth, I could divide that into a hundred parts; and, if I were to take a hundredth of the hundredth of the hundredth, I could still proceed with my subdivision. And I should feel myself compelled to go on subdividing, even after I had been forced to call in the help of the microscope in order to see what I was doing; and, even beyond that where no microscope would be strong enough to show me the parts, I should still feel that the farther subdivision must go on, until the materialist says, "Hold, there must be a stop somewhere: we must fix upon some part, and call it atom, the indivisible, and say beyond this the subdivision must not be carried." And for the moment I am grateful, and say: Yes, I am glad I can stop here. Let the atom be to me that out of which all matter is constructed. But in the next moment it occurs to me that that out of which everything material is built up must be itself material: the atom, therefore, must be material. But, if it is material, then it must be divisible; for, as we have seen, divisibility is one of the inseparable properties of all matter. And so the old process begins over again; and I ask, as I asked above, What is the cause of the first cause? so now, What are the divisions of "the indivisible"? And so I go on dividing and subdividing, until the matter in hand becomes finer and finer, until it passes beyond my senses, until it passes beyond my imagination, and at last I arrive at the necessity of an infinite subdivision, which implies a reduction to zero; and thus I am led to the instructive conclusion that matter, or everything, is composed of an infinite accumulation of nothings.

And if any one asks me, How is it possible to speak in this manner of the atom, at a time when the atomic theory in the hands of the chemist is achieving its most splendid triumphs? I answer, Let the chemist go on in his path of discovery with the help of the atomic hypothesis: no layman will be immodest enough or absurd enough to say what the chemist may assume and what he may not. But to suppose that the atoms of chemistry are the same as the primary atoms of which philosophy speaks, for which philosophy seeks, is a mistake often made, but which rests on idle delusion. And, of the provisional character of the atomic hypothesis, no one, indeed, seems to be better aware than eminent chemists themselves, as is indicated by the fact that leading men of that science have, in modern times, regarded the atom as a mere centre of energy, thus disproving it of all materiality whatsoever.

I want to protest to-day against those on both sides who say they know. I want to insist that the materialist makes the same mistake as his brother dogmatist, the theologian. The materialist leads us to matter as the foundation of the universe; but below that foundation we have a sub-foundation, which is nothing. Materialism, therefore, leads us to nothing: it does lead to nothing in every way.

The positive value of this critical conclusion will be shown in future discourses. Especially in the interest of morality is the critical view of the greatest importance. Matter, tangible things, are discovered to be unreal, while the true objectivity of the outward world is guaranteed to us by the laws that act in nature. Perhaps we shall find that the idea of law is also at the bottom of an assured moral system.

A MEETING of Radical members has been held in the Conference Room of the British House of Commons, with a view of making arrangements for an agitation throughout the provinces against the continuance of the Transvaal war. Sir Wilfrid Lawson presided. It was decided to hold public meetings in the large towns of England and Scotland, beginning with Birmingham; and, in addition to this, a memorial will be got up for presentation to the Prime Minister, reminding him of his Midlothian speeches on this subject, and calling upon him to carry those speeches into effect at the present juncture.

THE FUTURE OF THEODORE PARKER'S SOCIETY.

We find a convenient text for some reflections upon this subject in a sentence from the last issue of the Boston Commonwealth. The sentence reads thus: "What the society needs more than anything else is an able, sympathetic, and devoted minister." We have been an interested observer of the condition and tendencies of this society for the past two years, and feel certain that, whatever else can be affirmed of them, it cannot be said that, as a society, they need or wish for a permanent pastor. Indeed, nothing can be affirmed of them as a whole. They decline to be disposed of as a unit of force. Freedom of thought and individual diversity is the most marked trait among them. Some of them, however, are in emphatic agreement with the theory of the Commonwealth.

Among those who advocate the pastorate plan, we have heard only one name suggested as likely to fulfil the difficult conditions, that of Rev. O. B. Frothingham. He is at a distance, however, and otherwise occupied. Nor is there any likelihood that he will have the opportunity of declining such an invitation; and, if our reasoning with regard to the society be correct, it is equally improbable that any other preacher, great or small, will have such an opportunity. The society is much too afraid of tying its own hands and surrendering its priceless individualism to fetter itself with a settled clergyman. It is doubtful whether the radical religionists of Boston can be coaxed out of their comfortable homes to listen regularly to any Sunday ministration; but, if any one could lure them out, it would undoubtedly be Mr. Frothingham.

Mr. Parker's society has always depended upon the quality of its pulpit exercises to attract attendance. It has never taken up philanthropy as a business, and the Sunday-school idea is a rather recent growth in it. In Mr. Parker's own day, the pulpit work sufficed. He told people so much which they did not know, and gave them so much of his own radiant intellectual and moral fervor, that they could dispense with the appliances which a man of less power would have made necessary. Since his time, the organization which he created has gradually fallen away, until the burdens of work and expense have fallen upon a few of his loyal disciples. Of these, some of the most keen-sighted and practical regard the continuance of the organization as useless. We incline to agree with these, because the expensive experiments of the past few years show that there is no market for such articles as they have put before the public; and yet they have had the best that they could command from far and near. The conclusion seems unavoidable that the ultra-radicals of Boston find metal more attractive in their newspapers and magazines.

The Twenty-Eighth seems, indeed, to occupy that border-land between individualism and organization which makes any concerted action very difficult. They stand for the vanishing point of religious organization,—too emancipated intellectually to care for any revival fervor, and too well contented with their present development to care to keep abreast of the great intellectual current in the world outside. A small fraction of them do endeavor to keep pace with the scientific thought which is fast carrying the world away from the church. The society's lease of life most surely depends on its ability to put the latest scientific and philosophical knowledge before the people. Even then, it will have the press to compete with; and people cannot be blamed for buying their information at the cheapest market. In fact, they ought to do so.

We see no reason why a religious society should continue to pay large amounts of money for the accomplishment of insignificant results, and this is what the people of the Parker Memorial have long been doing. According to the best evidence which we can collect, the amount of edification and information which this people have gained for several years from their pulpit has been exceedingly small. But, according to this same reliable evidence, the real tie which has bound them together has been the memory of their great leader and their hearty affection for each other. The desire to see each other would perhaps have been powerful enough to bring them together on Sunday, had there been no sermon as a rallying point; and we suspect that, if some who have officiated in the pulpit could have read the hearts of their listeners, they would have found there less delight in their eloquence than in the anticipation of greeting and comparing notes with old comrades after the session should be over.

Now, since this society has been furnished with so many gratuitous suggestions from outsiders as to ways and means of carrying on its work, it will not be surprised or displeased at receiving still more. If, then, as it appears, the desire for social intercourse is the strongest motive which brings these people together, that end can certainly be secured in a less expensive way than the present one. There are better sermons in print than the most of those which have been delivered before this society for years past. It has been paying a high price for an inferior article. If it should appoint a competent committee from itself (say to be in power for three months) to select from our first-class religious literature, both English and American, the most appropriate matter, it could have such matter read from its platform by a well-trained reader, and secure a more satisfactory service than by the present itinerant plan. We undertake to say that such a reader could be procured for five dollars a Sunday. It is not necessary that he or she be a professional elocutionist, and we hope that it would not be so. The Florence society selects readers from its own ranks, and, I believe, their services are gratuitous. More reliable work, however, could be obtained for the sum just named. The literature would be easily obtainable, and most of it need not be bought.

Such a plan would perhaps enable the society to carry more easily its newly adopted Sunday-school enterprise, and to maintain its adult class for scientific and philosophical study. We dislike to see money spent to no purpose, although it may not be our own money.

It would seem that the Parker Memorial Hall might be fitly dedicated to the purpose which lived in the heart of the man whom it commemorates. This purpose, if we have read the man aright, was the advancement of the human race in all directions,—moral, social, and intellectual. He set no limit to human development, but would have been the first to strike his tent and march on. We are of those who think he would have incorporated into his thought all the new scientific truth which has come since his day. Our reason for this conviction is of the best: he did keep up with the knowledge of his own day, and was always at the front. Is there any reason for believing that he would have lagged behind?

If the Twenty-Eighth Society should vote to discontinue its religious services, it could still use the building for the general purpose of human progress and inaugurate a new philanthropy upon a business basis. The public seem willing to pay for two things,—to be entertained and to be instructed. The new work which we suggest would be instruction. There is a vast amount of knowledge in the world which the present adult generation has just missed, because this knowledge had not reached the schools in their day. We mean that knowledge which goes by the name of scientific truth. There is a dense ignorance of such truth among people who are called cultured. The possession of such truth would snap the fetters which the Church still keeps upon the minds of men. We know no happiness so great and no good so well worth striving for as absolute intellectual freedom,—at least, we have a right to possess all the facts; and less favored human beings have a right to expect instruction at our hands. If we are to spend money, let us spend it for absolute scientific knowledge, and not for vague speculations. Opinions have always been cheap; for they have always been plentifully manufactured, and much in excess of the demand. I do not pay a man to tell me what he believes; but I will walk miles to hear what he knows.

Common people, mechanics and artisans, are athirst for the kind of information of which I speak. Such people are not in the churches: they crave heartier food than they find there. There must be some thousands of such in and around Boston, who would welcome popular scientific instruction. They would pay for it, if its cost were very low. Very large audiences of working-men are gathered in this way in every English city.

There must be a considerable number of scientific men in this country competent to do such work, though the popularization of science is a nice and difficult task. The men could be found, if a place were made for them; and the audiences would gather round the men. But the work would need careful and conscientious supervision. If Theodore Parker's society chooses to make itself the medium of such an endeavor, it can renew its lease of life, and feel that its building stands for something in the great city.

Like any other business, such a one would need an investment. We fix this necessary sinking fund at one thousand dollars. Possibly, some of it would return: possibly, none of it. But such an enterprise should pay for itself when once started, otherwise it should be abandoned. A business which will not pay its current expenses must be a mistake. We see no insuperable obstacles in the way of carrying out such a plan, although the Twenty-Eighth Society may perhaps see nothing in the suggestion, except one more of the many impracticable things which have been recommended to it.

THE LEICESTER DECISION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In response to Mr. Weston's request in the last Register, I will state the reasons which led me to vote as I did in regard to the "Leicester Case." The will, I saw, could be considered under two aspects; namely, as to its obvious intent and as to its express requirements.

1st. The obvious intent of the will appeared to me to be to establish a distinctively Unitarian ministry. Mr. Weston could not be held to occupy a distinctively Unitarian position, both because he disclaims the name Unitarian "in any denominational sense" and because he disclaims the name Christian; the action of both the American Unitarian Association and the National Conference having settled the question (if it needed settlement) as to the Christian character of the Unitarian body. Mr. Weston's argument that his position as minister of a Unitarian parish determined his own denominational position may hold good so far as other relations are concerned, but not when the question is as to the man whom the parish shall appoint to be its minister.

2d. The only express requirement of the will to be considered here is the direction that the minister of the society should preach "those broad and generous views of God known as Unitarian." This phrase I understand to mean the views of God known as Unitarian, which views the testator considered to be "broad and generous."

There was no statement in the sermons submitted to the committee that went beyond the views known as pantheistic. "Pantheism almost verging toward Theism" was, if I recall the phrase correctly, the description given of the theology of the sermons by the Free Religious Index. The Unitarian fellowship is very broad and unquestioning, but this does not affect the fact that the Unitarian body is recognized as the representative of certain fundamental forms of belief. The most important of these is that which is distinguished from Pantheism and Atheism by the name Theism. I do not mean that there was anything in the sermons opposed to Theism. Paul uses phrases which, if they stood alone, would be Pantheistic. In the sermons, such phrases remain without qualification or complement.

Mr. Chadwick, in a letter to the Free Religious Index, states that he recognizes the views of Mr. Weston as substantially his own. But Mr. Chadwick* elsewhere implies that in his view "mind and thought, will and love, all personal words," though "not exact expressions for that which cannot be expressed," are "the least inadequate symbols that we have, or can have, of the Infinite Power," and insists even that "personality is a far better symbol than impersonality of the inexpressible fact." He not only recognizes such terms, he uses them, evidently feeling that, though imperfect, they stand for real relations between the soul and God; and thus his discourse concerning God naturally culminates in a prayer. From all that is said in the Leicester sermons, I should suppose that the life of a plant might be as good a symbol of the Divine as any other; and, if there be in them the bud that might naturally flower into a prayer, I have failed to find it. I make this comparison to avoid, if possible, any misunderstanding of my meaning, when I say that the views of God expressed in the sermons differ from those known as Unitarian, just as Pantheism differs from Theism. On every ground, then, I felt obliged to vote as I did. It will be noticed that the question was not one as to fellowship or of ecclesiastical recognition. It was simply whether the writer of certain sermons submitted to the committee should receive money under a certain will, which was also submitted to it; and it was a question to be decided according to the law and the evidence.

WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON.

Jefferson was in entire sympathy with the French revolutionary thinkers who inaugurated the great Republican Movement in Europe at the close of the eighteenth century, which had and has for its object the overthrow of kings and priests and nobilities. He was a philosophic radical of the school of Voltaire and Rousseau; in other words, an enemy of the established Church and State system which still lingers in Europe. He was one of the few Americans of his era of a literary and philosophic turn. He was a writer and thinker, a freethinker in religion and a liberal in politics, so that, if living at this hour, he would be delighted beyond measure by the triumphs of freethought, science, and liberalism, which are among the chief phenomena of this period. Jefferson, in his opinions, was decidedly an eighteenth century Frenchman. But, on the other hand, Washington was what he was by birth, a large English land-owner,—colonial, to be sure, but still of the regular Anglo-Saxon conservative type, a Virginia thane, as it were. He was, in his simplicity, straightforwardness, and uprightness of character, sublime. He was in no sense an idealist or theorist. There was not a drop of socialistic blood in his veins. He was not a democrat of the French type at all. His grandeur was moral, and not intellectual. He was a churchman and an aristocrat in his bearing and surroundings. The aspect of his estate at Mount Vernon leaves no sort of doubt in the mind of the visitor as to what manner of man he was socially and politically. His gravity of manner at his receptions in Philadelphia when he was President was indeed "eminent," and at the present time would have provoked ridicule, as wooden. His hands were clasped behind him according to tradition, in token that he would not submit to any hand-shaking from his guests and fellow-citizens. To borrow a line of Milton:—

"He kingly from his state inclined not."

A stately bow was his gesture of recognition. Such was Washington, a gentleman of the old school, disdaining to court popularity by suppleness of manners and conversational pleasantry. He never even smiled. Sundry of our self-styled friends of the people, who are now flourishing, would have been regarded by the pater patriae as the lowest social and political scum, as they are. Of course Washington and Jefferson were not at accord. Jefferson and Franklin were intellectual men, philosophers and doctrinaires. But let not the self-styled Democratic party of to-day lay the unction to their souls that Jefferson, if he were living now, would be of their number. As it has been said that Christ was not a Christian, as the Orthodox interpret his doctrines, so Thomas Jefferson, if living, would not be a Jefferson Democrat, would acknowledge no accord with the most unmoral and unintellectual political organization that ever existed in any country. The Democratic party of this country, as it calls itself, is an ultramontane party, and would so be regarded in Europe. It is distinctly committed to the support of the Roman Church and its hierarchy, the open enemies of liberty throughout the world. No: Thomas Jefferson, the disciple of Rousseau and Voltaire, would scorn, if alive, any connection with our current democracy, and refuse them the use of his name.

RELIGIOUS CREEDS AND SOME CONSEQUENCES.

With satisfaction and pleasure, we read such timely and logical criticism as we find in Mr. M. J. Savage's article, "Orthodox Apologetics." We are surprised and grieved that such intelligent and well-educated men as Dr. Storrs can make such "curious and of course unconscious contradictions" (or, perhaps, speculations), as Mr. Savage proves; but, if we find similar contradictions among those brethren of humanity who are nearer our reason, the surprise and grief are certainly greater.

When the bad news came from Syracuse, N.Y., in October, 1866, that a majority of Unitarian ministers had submitted to the Unitarian creed, it was a sad disappointment to all those who thought that Unitarians, and especially their generally well-educated pastors, were compelled by their development of reason and logic to live and act outside of creeds.

What have been the consequences of that Unitarian stricture or speculation?

1. Those who really believe in the Messiahship of Jesus can now no more agree with the Unitarian idea of the Lordship of Jesus than they have generally agreed with "Unitarian Christianity."

2. It has created such discord as we had in Dover, N.H., 1868, where an earnest, honest, faithful, scholarly Unitarian minister and the majority of the members of his society were drawn into a lawsuit, and expelled from their church by an inconsistent, bigoted injunction,—a manifesto which no rational persons in Christendom, the judges who manufactured it included, can consistently and conscientiously respect, believe, or carry out, any more than they do the blue laws, and which, if conscientiously and honestly enforced, would compel the majority of Protestant ministers to refrain from preaching in that church.

3. Many persons manifest by their conversations, lectures, and writing that they are more liberal than the creeds; but they still use them for church and clerical association speculations, and try to make believe that they are the essence of their piety.

Free men and women of republican America, your independence proves that you cannot acknowledge or sincerely believe in the Messiahship or Lordship of Jesus. If you strive to maintain the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, you cannot allow any man, dead or living, to be your absolute spiritual ruler or master. If all intelligent persons will, under all circumstances, as they are called upon, tell what they do know and what they do not know, what they do believe and what they do not believe, and act up honestly to their knowledge and faith, true science and true religion will have better chance to develop, and we will be a secular and free nation indeed.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

EX-SECRETARY SCHURZ dined in Boston this week.

GEORGE CHAINEY's lecture at Paine Hall next Sunday will be "A Study of Ingersoll."

COLONEL T. W. HIGGINSON, it is announced, will represent Massachusetts officially at the Cowpens, S.C., centennial clebration.

B. F. UNDERWOOD is soon to visit the Canadians. He lectures at Montreal March 31 and April 1, 2, 3. Thence he will journey westward.

REV. DR. GOTTHEIL, a liberal Jewish rabbi of New York, occupied the pulpit of the Rev. Mr. Chadwick in Brooklyn, N.Y., Sunday, March 13.

W. D. HOWELLS is henceforth to be a publisher as well as an author. He has become a member of the Boston book firm of James R. Osgood & Co.

DR. CHARLES F. FOLSOM, of the National Board of Health, has accepted the invitation to edit the Massachusetts State Registration Report for the coming year.

THERE will be much regret and sympathy among those who know of the good deeds of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson to learn that she has been compelled, in consequence of sudden prostration, to suspend her benevolent labors for a time.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE'S recent statement of his religious belief in the pulpit, which was prompted by conflicting representations current in respect to his opinions, has been published under the title of "My Creed" in Unity Pulpit, the weekly issue of his sermons.

MISS HATTIE DEUL, of Iowa City, has abstained from food for twenty-five days and from speech for three years as a religious duty. It is a pity she cannot see that to partake of the necessary sustenance for life and to make the natural use of one's faculties are a religious duty.

T. B. ALDRICH was invited to a complimentary dinner in New York, the other day, by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., the publishers of the Atlantic, whose editorship he has assumed. It was one of those dinners when, even of the best, the company is better than the attractions of the table.

THE Astors, it is reported, own $200,000,000 worth of city property in New York, but find it so hard to get along that they are compelled to announce to their tenants an advance of ten per cent. on rents May 1, which has suddenly made all the other landlords feel that it is necessary for them to resort to the same expedient to make both ends meet. Poor fellows, how hard it must be to be thus straitened in one's circumstances!

S. B. WESTON was the preacher at the Parker Memorial last Sunday, and greatly interested those who heard him by a finely written and impressive discourse upon "The Need of Earnestness in the Free Religious Work." It gives us pleasure to announce in this connection that Mr. Weston has been invited to become the superintendent of the Sunday-school of this society, which has been in a state of suspense for a period, and is now revived with new enthusiasm and more encouraging auspices.

GEORGE ELIOT, it is said, was the most careful and accurate of authors. Her beautifully written manuscript, says one who knew her well, was free from blur or erasure, and, with every letter delicately and distinctly finished, was only the outward and visible sign of the inward labor which she had taken to work out her ideas. She had rarely much to correct in her proof-sheets. Her grasp of business was not less striking than her literary power, and her shrewdness and foresight were such as are seldom to be met with.

J. HYATT SMITH, the Brooklyn Baptist minister and congressman, discovers that a portion of his church questions whether God and Mammon can be successfully served at the same time. At a recent secret church meeting, Pastor Smith assured his flock that Congress would not keep him away from them any serious length of time. It being charged that he was a Universalist, Mr. Smith confessed that he did not accept the doctrine of eternal damnation, asked pardon if he had offended anybody, and all but twenty of those present voted confidence in their leader.—Springfield Republican.

REV. L. K. WASHBURN, who has been the preacher to a liberal society at Lynn, Mass., for the last two or three years, has resigned that position. Mr. Washburn is noted for his zeal and energy in the Free Religious cause, and attracted large congregations at Lynn, as is always the case where he is the speaker. It is therefore much to be regretted that he has been led to take the step above referred to. Mr. Washburn has a special interest in missionary work in behalf of the Free Religious movement, to which he would prefer for a time to give his chief attention. We commend him to societies that are looking for speakers.

THE CHANGELESS.

Always still the ancient que-tion,
Love and vanity and nought,
And the fragment of a rainbow
In the clouded sky of thought.

Always still the pretty promise
Of a better, brighter day,
Smiling on the old endeavor,
With its small ambition's play.

While aneath a restless fever,
Wars the little savage will,
With the petty hurts that sting us
And the doom of harms that kill.

And a bitter tide of being
Rushes on its torrent way,
From the savage heart that pulses
Under nature's pagan clay.

And we sell our truth for thistles,
And for veils of many dyes;
Drugging still our hearts to dulness,
With a coated creed of lies.

But the roses and the lilies
Live beneath the drifted snow,
Whether wrong be real or seeming,
Whether loving kills or no.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 24, 1881.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in o her words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

A CALL FOR HELP IN BEHALF OF THE PARKER MEMORIAL.

The recent proposed sale of the Parker Memorial Meeting-house of Boston not having been consummated, the Hall remains where it properly should, in the hands virtually of the society of which Theodore Parker was the minister during the last fifteen years of his life. The debt upon the building, through the recent contribution of $25,000 from a devoted friend, has been reduced to a little less than $20,000.

The undersigned are appointed a committee by the corporation managing the affairs of the building, to solicit subscriptions sufficient to cancel this debt.

Each $100 contributed entitles the contributor to one share of stock in the building, and a voice in the management of its affairs.

We would invite those who are able, to contribute at least $100. Those desiring to donate a smaller amount, we would invite to contribute in the name of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston or of the Free Religious Association, in order that each $100 of subscriptions may be put into a share of stock in the building. We appeal to the friends everywhere to contribute to the maintenance of a pulpit and platform in the interest of Free Religion.

Subscriptions may be sent to A. A. Burrage, 74 Franklin Street, Boston, Treasurer of the Parker Memorial Meeting-house, or to John C. Haynes, 451 Washington Street, Boston, Treasurer of this Committee.

N.B.—Papers interested in this call are invited to publish it.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

CHRISTIAN OR NOT.

We are sure that many of our readers will have read with special interest Mr. Chadwick's discourse, printed in our last number, on the question, "Are we still Christians?" It is a question that keeps coming to the front of discussion, and that presents itself every year to a new circle of freethinking minds with a demand for a personal decision. Mr. Chadwick gives in this discourse, very clearly and frankly, the answer that defines his own position. The question, of course, as stated by him, concerns only those who have been born and bred in the Christian religion; but it intimately concerns that constantly increasing number of those born and bred in the Christian religion, who have come to the conclusion that all religions are of natural origin, and that Christianity has no claims to any special authority beyond other religions. The ground taken by Mr. Chadwick is that all who have been born and bred in the Christian section of the world, as distinguished from the section of any other religion, have a right to the Christian name. They are implicated in a certain "stream of tendency," known as historic Christianity, which has, to a certain extent, shaped their thought and become a part of their very being. It may not have made them moral nor religious in a spiritual sense, but it has made them different from the adherents of other religions; and, on the strength of this difference, they may not only rightfully call themselves Christians, but they are Christians in spite of themselves, and cannot get away from the fact, however they may choose to name themselves.

This argument has a certain plausibility; and when to it is added the claim (which, however, we do not understand Mr. Chadwick to lay any stress upon) that Christianity, though of natural origin like all other religions, has been practically the best of the religions, and that Jesus, though only one in a group of natural prophets of religion, is yet the head of the group, it is an argument that doubtless satisfies not a few liberal minds in the advanced Christian sects. But, to our thought, the argument is not at all satisfactory. It was pressed upon us when personally we gave up the Christian name, but it did not convince. We first became suspicious of the argument when we found that there were those born and bred in other faiths, as the Jewish, the Mohammedan, the Hindu, who had now come to the same liberal, rationalistic interpretation of their respective religions. These persons, in all the essentials of religious opinion, were now on the same ground with us who were of Christian antecedents. Why should a name keep these groups of fellow-thinkers apart? Or why should those coming from other faiths take the name "Christian" more than that we of Christian lineage should take the name "Jew" or "Buddhist," or any other one of these ancestral names? If it be answered that each group is to keep its old name simply to indicate historical descent, while they might come together in present religious fellowship under a new name, that is one thing which may have its uses to the student of religion in its relation to ethnology. But it does not appear to be the thing which Mr. Chadwick has in mind.

Moreover, this argument, which is sometimes succinctly stated thus, "We are Christians by the fact of birth, just as we are Americans," is unsound because of defect in the parallelism. Not all we who make up the American people to-day are American by birth. By the fact of national birth and early education some of us are Germans, some English, some Irish, some French, etc. Migration has not changed this fact of national genealogy, nor whatever sentiment of grateful association may be involved in that fact; but it has changed both the fact and the name of national allegiance. These Germans, English, Irish, French citizens, though for a time keeping their old names to indicate their origin, are yet, by virtue of their absorption into this new nationality, all Americans. And the sooner this assimilation to the fundamental principles of American government and citizenship takes place, the better for them and for the nation.

But the strongest argument against Mr. Chadwick's position may be made, we think, on religious grounds. He would define the adherents of the religions just as the statistician does. This is well enough for the statistician, the method of whose procedure is well understood. But it is a method, of course, that empties the religious names of all the deepest and most vital meanings that have been put into them by those who have used them with faith in their spiritual efficacy. When the religious teacher has used the word "Christian," for instance, to denote his own faith, he has always, whatever may have been his special type of theology, meant to signify his highest ideal of human attainment on earth. He has believed "Christian" to mean the way, above all, between man and God. If to a religious teacher the word "Christian" has ceased to have this meaning, even in a liberal form of interpretation; if it has come to mean to him only that inheritance by blood and birth which connects him with a certain part of the population of the earth,—then it seems to us the time has come for him to drop the use of it in his religious relations and teachings altogether. If he employs the word in his ordinary religious usage, his statistical sense of it will not be so understood, unless he explains it. If he only mean by it the statistician's sense, he may use it as the statistician does; but we see not how he can use it otherwise honestly. Practically we understand Mr. Chadwick in his own usage does drop it except as defined in this discourse. But his theory, we think, has the general effect of keeping the word in a semi-religious use after all religious meaning has gone out of it.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

The leading advocates of the civil service movement bear testimony to their appreciation of the worth of organization to overcome the support of wrong principles as well as to promote right ones. They have accordingly taken the first steps toward the exercise of a wider and more potent influence in the direction of their aims, through the mode of operation above hinted at, by the formation of the Civil Service Reform Association. The President of the Association is Geo. W. Curtis; and among its vice-presidents are Benj. W. Bristow, Howard Potter, Roswald Hitchcock, Oswald Ottendorfer, and other distinguished persons. The secretary is Richard L. Dugdale; and of those who sustain official relations to it are Henry W. Bellows, Dorman B. Eaton, E. L. Godkin, Horace White, and others of the most noted and earnest representatives of the cause.

It is proposed to stimulate and encourage a network of branch societies all over the country to aid in distributing documents and circulating petitions, to bring into active operation the wide-spread desire of the people for this administrative reform, and to bring sharply to the attention of Congress that the public are in earnest in the matter. Already such societies have been formed in Brooklyn, N.Y., and Cambridge, Mass., and others are being formed in a number of the principal cities.

To assist in the furtherance of its objects, the Association has issued two pamphlets, which it is intended shall be followed by others.

The first of these illustrates the evils of the spoils system, and points out some practical remedies. The second pamphlet counsels the formation of branch societies, to promote the reform, and to aid in taking the civil service of the government out of politics, and put it on a business basis.

A printed petition has been prepared, which will be forwarded to applicants from any part of the United States who are willing to solicit signatures, the purpose being to aid the passage of the proposed bills, or to secure some acceptable substitute. Those desiring the documents of the Association can obtain them by addressing the secretary, R. L. Dugdale, 79 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Among the spring announcements of publications by G. P. Putnam's Sons is a book by Mr. John Albee entitled The Literary Art: A Conversation. The book consists substantially of two Lectures which Mr. Albee gave last summer at the Concord School of Philosophy, and which attracted the special interest of his hearers. It will be a duodecimo., at the price of $1.00. Mr. Albee is now at St. Louis, giving a course of lectures on the Growth of the English Language and Literature.

THE SCIENTIFIC THEORY OF MORALS.

Col. T. W. Higginson, referring to Miss Frances Power Cobbe, in the Woman's Journal, says: "Her ablest work, Intuitive Morals, was written just when the Transcendental period, so called, began to wane, and has rather gone out of sight with that ebbing tide: when the tide turns, as I am sure it will, against what is now called the 'scientific' theory of morals, it is certain that this remarkable book will have the justice it deserves. It is pleasant to see that Miss Cobbe still reaffirms her faith in the intuitive side of the argument, and still protests against reducing the sense of right and wrong to a mere deduction from experience."

The advocates of the "scientific theory of morals" maintain that man has learned, through many centuries of experience, that some actions conduce to human happiness, that others cause unhappiness. One class of actions is called right, and the other wrong. Whatever, on the whole, promotes the well-being of man, is right; and whatever, on the whole, militates against it, is wrong. The only criterion by which we can ultimately decide what acts are wrong is the effect they produce for or against human happiness. Hence, utility is the test of virtue and goodness. To those who object that mere sensual gratification is erected by the advocates of this theory into a standard of virtues, it is sufficient to remark, in the language of Mill, that "it is not they, but their accusers, who represent human nature in a degrading light, since the accusation supposes human beings to be capable of no pleasures except those of which swine are capable." The useful comprehends with other components the pleasurable, the ornamental, the beautiful,— art, poetry, music, love, as well as mechanical inventions and industrial pursuits. Our ideas of duty become more correct with advancing culture, because it enables us to understand more fully our relations to one another and to the external world, and to perceive the results of certain lines of actions, of certain courses of conduct, by which we learn what is involved in those general principles and precepts that have descended from the early and comparatively unadvanced periods of human history.

Pleasure "is a feeling which we seek to bring into consciousness and retain there," and pain "is a feeling we seek to get out of consciousness and to keep out." As a consequence, "if the states of consciousness which a creature endeavors to maintain are correlatives of injurious actions, and if the states of consciousness which it endeavors to expel are the correlatives of beneficial actions, it must quickly disappear through persistence in the injurious and avoidance of the beneficial." In more simple words, were it possible for a race of animals to seek pleasure in injurious actions, and to avoid beneficial actions as painful, such a race could not fail, under the law of natural selection, to become extinct at once. It is equally certain that under this law no race could come into existence. It is reasonable to conclude, then, since morals have had a development, and are no arbitrary creation, that our knowledge and practice of virtue — the sum total of feelings and acts that conduce to our well-being — have been attained by the desire for human happiness. The objections urged against this view seem to me to be of a superficial character.

Experience has taught that some acts, which are pleasurable for the moment, are ruinous in the end; that others, which are painful for the time, are ultimately a source of great happiness. It has also taught that acts, which may be a source of pleasure to the individual, if he can enjoy it without reference to others, may be against the happiness of the community, which, in tribal and much more in civilized life, is the main consideration. "And bearing in mind," as John Fiske observes, "that the community which primevally comprised only the little tribe has by long-continued social integration come to comprise the entire human race, we have the ultimate theorem of the utilitarian philosophy, as properly understood, that actions morally right are those which are beneficial to humanity, while actions morally wrong are those which are detrimental to humanity."

But this is not all. Man has a moral sense, which is as certainly and directly hurt by what he believes to be a wrong act as the tactile sense is hurt by the sting of a bee. This moral sense is undoubtedly a priori in the individual, but nevertheless acquired by the race. Ancestral experiences, intellectual and moral, have become organized in man as aptitudes and intuitions. Herbert Spencer expressed a profound psychological truth when he wrote, some years ago, as follows: "I believe that the experiences of utility, organized and consolidated through all past generations of the human race, have been producing corresponding modifications, which, by continuous transmission and accumulation, have become in us certain faculties of moral intuitions, certain emotions responding to right and wrong conduct, which have no apparent basis in the individual experience of utility." How primitive conceptions of right and wrong could have been acquired, how the sentiments and emotions implied by the word ought could have arisen, is shown by Darwin in that able and suggestive chapter on the moral sentiments in The Descent of Man; and how the moral sense has been acquired and ingrained in the mind has been clearly shown by Spencer and Lewes in their profound and brilliant works.

A study of the moral sense shows it is the highly complex product of human culture. Although it has become intuitive in man, it is an unavoidable implication of the whole philosophy of evolution, that it is ultimately experiential in its nature; that, although it precedes the experience of the individual of to-day, it has its basis, and its explanation is found, in the experience of the race. The thoughts, feelings, and actions of the past come to us as a legacy, a birthright in the tendencies and intuitions with which we are born.

> "All experience past became > Consolidate in mind and frame."

This conception reconciles the experiential and transcendental schools, and unites and forms them into one, excluding the element of error each contains, and recognizing and emphasizing the truth common to both. Works like Miss Cobbe's Intuitive Morals, although they have served a useful purpose in pointing out errors in the sensational school of philosophy, have had their day, so far as they represent and defend the transcendentalism of the past. Evolution and transcendentalism are utterly irreconcilable. The truth of either, once established, implies the falsity of the other.

While the moral sense has become developed and organized in civilized man, leading him to approve and condemn with the quickness of lightning, to feel shame and remorse or self-approbation, without stopping to think of the results of each particular act, yet it does not tell us what is right or what is wrong, our conceptions of which depend upon the instruction we have received, and the influences that have been brought to bear in our individual education. But this moral sense intuitively approves what we believe right, and condemns what we believe wrong. False principles and imperfect moral codes gradually give way to those more true and better adapted to man's welfare, in proportion as he becomes acquainted with the laws of his being and the highly complex relations which he sustains, in a social state, to his fellow-beings. Happiness, the happiness of the race, is seen to be the greatest good. Our sympathies become broadened, and our benevolence extended with enlightenment. Our thoughts and efforts are no longer confined to ourselves, our family, our community, or our country. We are satisfied only with justice to the whole race, and desire the freedom and prosperity of our fellowmen in every clime.

This is a statement, although a brief and very imperfect statement, of the "scientific theory of morals," which reduces "the sense of right and wrong," as Col. Higginson says, "to a mere deduction from experience." It has been gaining ground steadily for centuries; and, as it rests upon an impregnable foundation, it is not likely to give way to an a priori theory of morals which belongs to the system of supernaturalism, and which has been on the decline as the methods and conceptions of science have been adopted.

VIII.—Foreign Views of Emerson.

Emile Montegut in the Revue des Deux Mondes for Aug. 1, 1847, calls Emerson, in view of his easy circumstances, his habits of observation, and his scepticism, a Protestant Montaigne, and adds that—

"He gathers all the materials of a philosophy, without succeeding in reducing it to a system. Each of his essays abounds in details and observations; but, under this apparent disorder, we find harmony, as we close the chapter. This unity is the result of the author's character. He does not write to show sagacity or knowledge: it is not his imagination or his thoughts, but his character, which he gives us. The day will come when the philosopher in him will be lost in the moralist.

"As a writer, he belongs with Carlyle and Heine,— to those rare spirits who have the eloquence not of continuous thought, but of instinct. It comes only in flashes, but these succeed each other incessantly. Emerson's thoughts carry him on at random, but there is nothing dangerous in his abandonment. The American moralist never loses sight of his goal, nor of the course he is traversing. He reaches eloquence without our expecting it. As soon as he attains a certain height, he stops and remains in the middle between heaven and earth, his philosophy avoiding alike the inconveniences of mysticism and the commonplaces of ordinary moralizing.

"His feelings toward nature have more of sympathy than of passion. The European reader who opens this volume cannot at first help being surprised. All the philosophers, both ancient and modern, are cited pell-mell, as if they expressed the same opinion. Sceptics and mystics, rationalists and pantheists,—Schelling, Oken, Spinoza, Plato, Kant, Swedenborg, Coleridge, meet on the same page. In this land of democracy, all thinkers appear brothers. This chaos gives to European views a deceptive appearance of unity. For Emerson, distance seems to efface differences.

"There is scarcely more than one question discussed in Emerson's writings,—What will be the effect on man's personality? The development, the education, the rights of the individual, and his legitimate influence on society, there is all the Emersonian philosophy. On the whole, the principle is excellent; and Emerson is bound to choose it for three reasons, first his personal views, second the religious situation of the United States, and third the government. First, he is a man of no party, no church, no system of views recognized in America: his opinions are all personal and individual. The second reason, which leads him to raise the individual above society, is the religious situation. Is there a religion in America which brings the masses together? No, none. Protestantism, decomposing into a crowd of sects, tends to develop religions which are held only by a few individuals; but its spirit is a bond which binds all souls together, leaving to each individual his own opinion about theology, as various perfumes may burn in the same sacrifice. This is Emerson's ideal. The third reason is the government itself of the United States. All Emerson's tendencies are certainly very democratic. One might thus be astonished at this philosophy created for the good of the individual. But reflect! Amid this mob of interests, passions, and contradictions, where shall we let our eyes rest steadily? Amid this whirlwind, what basis for a philosophy? Emerson looks at the agitations and fluctuations of the multitude, and writes for the individual.

"He says, 'Believe in thyself.' Nothing is more sacred than the integrity of our own soul. Our vocabulary has no 'ifs' or 'buts.' It has only 'yes' and 'no': the 'yes' should never hesitate, the 'no' never turn back.

"Confidence in one's self, then, is the foundation of Emerson's morality. To reach this confidence, two qualities are necessary, non-conformity and non-persistency. Do not fear to shock the prejudices of the world, and its pretensions to know your duty better than you do. Be like that friend of Rousseau, who kept saying, 'I am responsible only for myself.' And do not fear to appear to yourself inconsistent. To wish to be always self-consistent is to be willing to use sophistry to bind what is to what has been.

"What is the faculty which gives self-confidence? According to Emerson, it is instinct, or spontaneity, not a force that directs, but a wave that bears along. Faith in the power of spontaneity is the key to all his theories.

"Thereby, each man arrives at an individual revelation. Is this mysticism or pantheism? It borders on both. But the mysticism of Emerson is purely Protestant. That of Romanism is the effect of divine grace, not the reward of human virtue. It is far from noise and crowds, in a cell or a solitude, that the soul rises into ecstasy and grace descends from on high. Emerson would have the individual march amid the crowd, and fulfil his duties; since it is only through them that he can touch the Infinite.

"For Emerson, instinct and spontaneity are the divine faculties, the true relations of man to God. These strange and blind faculties play a leading part in his philosophy, which thus loses much of the harshness of Puritanism. Life becomes all heroism, while Puritanism makes it an immolation.

"What we cannot approve is that Emerson would have the individual let alone to develop his own intellect; and, to do that, he is bidden to trust in his own instinct. But instinct will always be as ready to follow evil as good, until education has polished the manners and enlightened the intellect. Instinct touches all extremes. Originally, it is the groundwork of our nature, a real chaos into which the passions, vices, virtues, and mental faculties are thrown pell-mell.

"Instinct and spontaneity, says Emerson, are the faculties which lead to God. It is He who acts in us, and in whom we will and think. We are falling into mysticism, but Emerson stops on the brink. The visits of God, the inspiration of individuals, are the rewards given to the pure and true soul which does her duty, without troubling herself about the ways of the world. The Catholic mysticism seeks for love, and the Protestant for truth. It is this Protestant mysticism which inspires Emerson.

"This doctrine of the Over-Soul is pantheism in full flood. But with Emerson the individual draws all the universe to himself, whereas in other systems he is swallowed up by it. Thus, each individual becomes an epitome of humanity, a complete encyclopædia of events. History is only biography. One has merely to study himself to learn the laws that rule mankind. Such individualism suppresses time and space, and destroys history. The race should assert its rights.

"What is the sanction of Emerson's philosophy? The reward, as we have seen, is individual inspiration; and the punishment is compensation. The soul should be the image of perfect order. We should establish the harmony of all the faculties, the symphony of thought. If we develop one faculty to the detriment of others, we are punished by seeing only parts of things, and not the whole. The chastisement and the fault grow on the same twig. It is the soul which rewards and punishes the individual.

"As a protest in favor of the individual, it is desirable that this philosophy should prevail in Europe; but it has more than a local value. The ambition of the wise man should be to live amid nature without being carried away by her, as were the ancients, amid society without separating from it, as did Montaigne. Emerson has known this ambition, and he awakes it in us by his writings. Posterity will never forget that he has given us a new ideal of wisdom."

In the number for Aug. 15, 1850, Montegut compares The Representative Men with Carlyle's Heroes, Hero-worship, etc., which latter book he thinks superior in grandeur of characters.

"Emerson," he says, "is at once sceptic and mystic. Woe to him who in our age is not both at once! Rightly understood, scepticism is not hesitation about all truth. It is not a disease of the soul: it is a weapon of the intellect. The more we believe, the more we need scepticism to protect our faith.

"It is confidence in the supreme ideal and the eternal order of the world, faith in the stability and permanence of the invisible, which rules this book of Emerson. Carlyle is angry with the age. Emerson is full of calm. He speaks in 1848 as he would have done in 1840, and sacrifices nothing to the moment, but talks about Plato and Swedenborg when the world has ears only for Proudhon and Louis Blanc. He praises Montaigne's scepticism, as if he were not talking to an age which boasts that its philosophies are absolute under every test.

"His great man is one who renders us most exalted services, which are easy for him, but would be impossible for any one else; and it is this impossibility which makes his grandeur. This easy greatness belongs to the classic hero and the modern man of genius, but this is not what Carlyle calls heroism. This theory of easy grandeur is almost irreconcilable with Christianity, which would not have the soul calm, but troubled and agitated, like the Saviour's, seeking after a perfection which suffers no repose. Yet, in thus making the hero depend only on himself and on invisible Nature, Emerson at least preserves the rights of human dignity.

"In this book, Emerson attaches himself especially to men of literary genius, and loves to look on them as representatives of the different intellectual forces of the human mind, while he seeks the secret point of affinity in which all these various gifts unite to form the unity of man's spirit. But, in spite of this almost exclusive fondness for genius, Emerson does not fall into any fetichism of intellectualism. For him, intellect is only the mirror which reflects conscience.

"Who should take the first place, the great thinker or the man of action? Emerson leans toward the former, Carlyle to the latter.

"Emerson's portraits of Goethe and Bonaparte touch us most nearly. The latter is finely drawn, and without any flattery. Goethe is rather severely berated. His too exclusive love of culture and his egoism are blamed. They have often been. But Goethe has done modern thought a service which atones for all his defects. He came at the end of an age when everything was dried up, and he made the world blossom out everywhere into life."

In the Revue for Nov. 15, 1856, is a third article by the same author, which is little more than a summary of English Traits, though occasionally there is a line or two of criticism like this:—

"The sagacious and subtle Emerson has not escaped the danger of observing too minutely. His book abounds in fine thoughts, and in details which are almost all true and have been sought by him in the depths of the English soul, but which are only details. The main question, Why is England what she is, and in virtue of what quality? What does she represent in the world?—this question, the only one which can give unity to all these ingenious details, is everywhere felt, but it is nowhere formulated."

Among Herman Grimm's New Essays on Art and Literature (Berlin, 1865) is one on "Ralph Waldo Emerson," of which portions are translated in O. B. Frothingham's Transcendentalism. The following passages also are worth notice:—

"Read how he describes a gentleman in the essay on 'Manners.' I can imagine no more perfect ideal of manly character. The free American republican, who bows before nothing but his own will and the glory of the German race, lays down the conditions under which an aristocratic society may be possible, necessary, and beautiful. He does not speak of what is called fashionable, but of the nature of a cultivated man in the historic sense,—of those men whom the events of the time bring plainly to the head of the community. Whether birth, money, tact, or superiority of intellect has elevated them, there they stand, the true aristocrats of to-day.

"Yet he sees every appearance in connection with the highest idea, and looks not only on the poet, prophet, and conqueror as the instruments of providence, but also on the hewer of wood and pounder of stone, the humblest laborer, as the possessor of a necessary place of his own; for greatness and heroism depend on the way in which each one finishes what he chooses for himself out of the countless duties of life. Emerson gives the true theory of contentment, which to-day seems lost. Now, when everything seems to be in dissolution, he states the law by which the new crystal will be formed. He shows how all familiar barriers must fall, because they check development; and how the full power of our race will come to light.

"I have thought that the reader must see this, and that his sentences must strike like the ball of a pistol which is held close to the mark.

"Nothing has cost me so much labor as the attempt really to translate some of his writings into German. He does not write, he seems to speak. At first, we see no plan or order; and we look in wonder for the inner connection of these sentences, which all stand side by side so jaggedly and strangely, and yet form so firmly interlocked a chain. Soon we discover the fidelity to laws with which he develops these thoughts, and the soundness of his conclusions. This fidelity is not that of an espalier tree, with its branches checked or forced by the gardener, but that of a healthy beech, whose growth separates and spreads itself in seeming lawlessness, but at last the loveliest of domes is complete, and not the smallest twig is wrong or useless in its place." THE NIHILISTS.

How can I condemn them without also condemning Brutus and William Tell, Judith and Charlotte Corday, Mazzini and John Brown? Must I cease to honor Garibaldi, Kossuth, Kosciuszko, Cromwell, Hampden, the heroes of '76, and all who have believed that resistance to tyrants is obedience to God? Surely, the Czar was a tyrant who kept down liberty of the press and freedom of speech systematically, and made it impossible for his subjects to interfere with him, except by murder. He forced them to choose between submission and assassination. I cannot blame those who laid down their lives in seeking to serve liberty in the only way which was open. I am glad that better ways than theirs are open to us. But I can neither blame nor praise them for taking that. I appeal to the future. If that decides that they have really served liberty, then shall they be honored by all who love her. F. M. H.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, March 2, 1881.

Nearly two years ago, Emile François, a white man, for marrying a quadroon woman, was convicted in Austin, and received the severest sentence under the Texas criminal code for the offence,—five years in the penitentiary. Ex-Judge C. T. Garland, attorney for François, appealed from the decision of the lower court to the Court of Appeals, where the judgment was affirmed, and his client was transferred from jail to the penitentiary. Application was then made to Judge Duval, of the United States District Court, for a writ of habeas corpus; and it was denied. An appeal was taken to the United States Circuit Court (Judges Bradley and Woods), which has just announced its decision, reversing that of Judge Duval, declaring the law under which François was convicted unconstitutional because in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment, and requiring the State of Texas to surrender him to the Federal courts, to be set at liberty. As a correspondent well puts it, a legal struggle of two years' duration has established the principle that the white man has the same rights under the law as the black man, in the vital matter of punishment. A State can no longer make it a felony for white fathers to marry the mothers of their colored children. François, the victim of a State's attempt to nullify Federal law, is deeply attached to his wife and step-children, and proposes to bring suit for damages against State officials. His attorney conducted the case without pay, and was subjected to some newspaper abuse and ostracism: he is, therefore, to be congratulated for his legal triumph in a humane effort.

Mardi-Gras, or Shrove Tuesday, is a legal holiday in Louisiana. The numerous Catholics of the diocese are the prime movers in its celebration, and the men of commerce contribute their tens of thousands of dollars to keep up parades that attract visitors to New Orleans. Gorgeous tableaux and grotesque maskers, representing the grave and the gay, the virtuous and the obscene, are presented to assembled thousands. This year, the Boston Lancers, Charlestown Cadets, detachments of the 71st and 74th New York Militia, and the Spaulding Guards of Buffalo participated in the reception of the Latin King "Rex." The Governors of four States, Chief Justices of two, and an ex-Vice-President were on hand, with a liberal supply of fine ladies and gentlemen from over half the States of the Union. Streets were thronged, hotels crowded, and an impromptu "accommodation bureau" distributed twenty-five hundred guests to private residences. There were sisters and cousins and aunts from the country; and, what is rather creditable, good humor was universal, few pickpockets were heard from, and no serious accidents were reported. The cheap railroad fares bring at this time visitors who come to see the people and the country and Eads' jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi. Mardi-Gras night, numerous ball-rooms are filled with masked belles and the demi-monde. It may well be doubted whether the carnival season contributes to a well-ordered society. There is abundant reason to believe that opportunities are increased for the indulgence of vice. And in contemplating these gaudy pageants, with their doubtful returns in either money or morals, and the poorly paid teachers of a meagre number of schools in this great metropolis, one must deplore the love of folly and the neglect of wisdom, as shown by contrast. But let the winds blow, the floods come, an epidemic decimate the inhabitants, New Orleans will adhere to her Mardi-Gras, and be vain of the appellation "The Paris of America." E. B.

AMONG THE AMERICANS.

Until I went to America, I had no proper idea what my personal appearance was. The Kansas City Times thought me "to be about sixty years of age, of medium height, blue gray eyes, with side whiskers [which I never had], and hair which has been touched by the finger of time," which was true. The Index described me as a "venerable" author. The Boston Post regarded me as "being between fifty-five and sixty years of age, of medium height, and well proportioned, hair, moustache, and imperial almost white, firm set mouth, small, gray, and very piercing eyes." The Boston Herald found I had "snow-white hair, a chin-beard, and in looks and manners much resembling ex-Governor Rice." When I afterwards met the ex-Governor at the Christian Union, I was perplexed, not knowing which was which. The Boston Daily Advertiser regarded me as "of medium height, well formed, and of good weight." Weight, I observed, is somehow an element of rhetoric in the American mind. The Cincinnati Daily Gazette described me as looking older than I was, but, however, having the appearance of robust age, with calm demeanor and quiet voice. The Philadelphia Times began its report of my address in St. George's Hall thus: "Bearing, but not bending under, the weight of seventy years. Notwithstanding his age, he seems as fresh, physically, as a well-preserved man of fifty or fifty-five years." One reporter thought me, when excited, "a little inclined to stammer." A Florence writer said he thought, as a speaker, I was "off-hand, but refined in the choice of words." I cease the citation of these descriptions, which will be less interesting to the reader than to the writer, and because the amusement arose from the contrast with other qualities assigned to me which it is not my place to quote. No doubt my speaking at times was pretty much like stammering, since I always think it respectful to an audience to cast about to find the proper word, instead of throwing at their heads the first that comes to hand, although it may be an unfitting one; it being in my opinion a less waste of time to an audience to hear nothing than to hear the wrong thing. As Lord Chancellor Campbell used to say, "It is better to go to a house where they give you bad wine than where you have to listen to a bad dialect." In America, I had to speak, like Mark Antony, "right on," but not with his success, because I did not expect to speak at all; and except at a few times, when I did not think of the audience or the place, and thought only of the subject, I do not believe I did deserve the credit that was given to me by hospitable critics. It is not possible to any, except orators by nature, to speak always as they would wish; but it is possible to any one to say exactly what he ought to say, if he has the courage, which the late Earl Russell had, of trusting to the audience to tolerate defects of manner in consideration of the fair intention of the matter.

One day, I paid a visit, with two friends, to New Rochelle, to explore the lands voted by Congress, in the last century, to a famous Englishman, Thomas Paine, whose political writings had so signally promoted the Independence of the United States. No other Englishman ever achieved like distinction. In his own country, Paine ranked with Junius and Burke as a foremost political writer dealing with principles of government. In America, his pen accomplished almost as much as the sword of Washington. In Paris, he was the wisest counsellor of the Revolution. In England, his liberty was in jeopardy; in America, his life was imperilled; in France, he was condemned to death. I found his beautiful estate entire and unchanged. I walked on the terrace where he meditated, and sat in the room in which he died, where objects of interest remain upon which he last looked. No Englishman ever rendered services so splendid to three nations, or was so ill requited in all.

Like others, I had heard it said that Americans in Europe gave observers the idea of a decaying race. That must be because many being invalids come to Europe for change of climate, others because they have lost fibre in attaining fortune to enable them to travel. Instead of being all attenuated, I found men and women of vigor and solidity of frame very general. I asked Dr. Oliver, of Boston, whom I found to be a philosophic physician, what, in his opinion, were the physical prospects of the race. He thought that three generations, or a hundred years, were needful to acclimatize a European family to the new country; that is, supposing they do not conform to rational conditions of life there.

An English traveller will to the end of time be astonished at the simplicity, precision, and security of the express system by which luggage in America is transmitted. In England, the care of luggage is a very serious operation for the traveller. You are required to see yourself that it is put into the van, and it does not at all follow then that it will remain there. At the first junction, you may see it on the platform again, or the van itself may be detached and sent to another part of the country, and you are told you should have looked after it. In America, a civil, quiet person appears, who asks you where you will have your luggage sent to; and he gives you a metal ticket with the name of that place, and you leave the station and proceed unencumbered on your journey. Days or even weeks after, probably three thousand miles from the place you last lost sight of your portmanteaus and their precious contents, the train stops at a prairie station, when there issues from an official ranch in a wood, or some unnoticed dépôt in the rocks, a baggage-master, who has upon his arm the corresponding check to that which you have in your purse, and your luggage is there exactly as when you last saw it.

Another thing surprising to me was the artistic facility with which letters were produced on placards and signs. Shopkeepers had a black-board at their door, upon which they wrote with chalk the particulars of their commodities. Near the Tribune buildings, New York, a man would come out of the shop and write up the quality and price of his oysters. The words were written with such graphic beauty, freedom, and rapidity that the board was worth buying and framing and hanging up among your pictures.

Chautauqua Lake is a famous place for the congregation of prophets. It is a general campaigning quarter for propagandists of the other world and of this. The shore is covered with tents of speculation and of practice. The ardent take their wives and families there, and spend their annual vacation time between the pleasures of the lake and the progress of principles. The bright lake is eighteen miles long, and requires a steamer to cross it, so that there is ample space for airing the most advanced ideas. It lies in a corner of New York State, some five hundred miles or more from the city. Those who go to convention there have in view to put forth their ideas of things in general, and generally do it. For myself, I could listen to all subjects, but did not want to listen to them all at once. There were, however, a good many persons there who seemed able to do it. I was surprised to find the Liberal Convention I attended a great "pow-wow," with no definite plan of procedure such as would be observed in England. As I arrived early at the lake, I drew up the following resolutions, as the reporters had nothing to report:—

We the undersigned, having arrived at Chautauqua Lake a day before everybody else, do resolve ourselves into a Primary Convention, setting forth the following objects:—

1. That the President of the Convention be requested to define its objects, and state them as briefly as possible.

2. That as many of the speakers be requested to speak, if possible, to those points.

3. That each speaker be allowed reasonable time for denouncing everybody and everything, and afterwards it is hoped that every one will proceed to business.

4. That, if more imputation be desired by any speakers, the proprietor of the hotel shall be requested to set apart a Howling Room, to which all such persons shall retire, attended by as many reporters as can be induced to accompany them.

5. That it is not intended here to disparage imputations or irrelevancies, which are always entertaining if well done, but to prevent the time of the Convention being consumed upon persons instead of principles.

6. That clear notice be given to speakers that this is not a convention for the discussion of every subject under the sun, but of those only proposed from the chair.

These resolutions were signed by G. J. Holyoake, L. Masquerier, H. J. Thomas, H. L. Green. Of course, they were directed against those whom Col. Ingersoll happily calls "the Fool Friends of Progress," who hang about clerical as well as lay associations, who create enemies by wanton imputations, and render good principles ridiculous by eccentricity of advocacy. The resolutions were printed in the Bradford Era, the chief paper in those parts, and were considered to have been useful to the Convention, which, unlike American conventions in general, had nothing in common save the unity of miscellaneousness, with the right of imputation to be used with or without discretion. The President could not state a definite plan of procedure or questions of debate, for he had never thought of them, and he could not invent any; for he had the inaugural address in his pocket, not only written, but printed, and bound up in book form. And, to do justice to the versatility of his knowledge, the address related to most things which have ever been mooted in this world. The reader must not suppose that there were not wise men and wise women at the Chautauqua Convention because mention has been made here mainly of the other sort. At the town of Bolton, in England, I saw lately an announcement at a good-looking chapel that a sermon would be preached by the "Shaggy Prophet." I saw no "Shaggy Prophet" at the Chautauqua Convention.

Note.—The specimen studies here given and such others as may follow them are but imperfect hints of what some one wiser than the author will in time accomplish. They are put largely in the form of questions, simply as a convenient and effective way of suggesting connected thought; but of course an intelligent leader will use these with great freedom, and not of necessity at all. Organic Rocks.

Articles 132-142 and 153-160 inclusive.

Specimens: Coal, Fossil Fern and Fossil Shells or Crinoids in Limestone or Clay.

How do plants and animals move, live, and grow?
What, then, is an organism?
And what are Organic Rocks?
Why do we call them Organic?
What is this?
[Show piece of Coal.]
What can you see about the formation of it?
How is Coal found?
[See Figure 37, page 103, Geology.]
What will a perpendicular section of a Coal Pit show?
[See Figure 18, page 59, Geology.]
What sort of a bed does the coal seam usually lie on?
What do we find in this bed?
What do these facts suggest?
Can we find traces of plants in Coal?
Where can we find them?
What is this?
[Show sample fossil fern. See also Figure 19, page 61, Geology.]
This is an example of what?
Where are the best examples of the way in which rocks are formed from the remains of animals?
How were these discovered?
What are they called?
What do minute specks of Ooze show under the microscope?
[See Figure 22, page 68, Geology.]
How many of these graceful forms are there at the bottom of the ocean?
What becomes of them as time passes on?
So that, thousands of feet below the waves, what is happening?
What did we find Chalk was made of?
Where is Chalk formed?
How do we know that?
[See Figure 23, page 70, Geology.]
Are remains of animals found in other rocks than Chalk?
What is this?
[Show specimen Fossilized Shells, etc., in Limestone or Clay. Also see Figure 24, page 71, Geology.]
Where did this come from?
All the little fragments in it were once what?
Where do we find these fossils besides at the bottom of the sea?
What does that show?
What is found in the Alps?
So that where Ice and Snow now are was once what?
How do such facts as these make us feel about the universe?

SELECTIONS.

The past is writ in characters
Of rock and fire and scroll,
The building in the coral sea,
The planting of the coal.—Emerson.

Every piece of coal, every bit of iron, was a prophecy of steam-engines and steamships, if men had only the wit to read the oracle.—Parker.

See dying vegetables life sustain,
And, life dissolving, vegetate again.—Pope.

Her tokens of renewing care
Hath Nature scattered everywhere.—Whittier.

Nature ever faithful is
To such as trust her faithfulness.

All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood;
All partial evil, universal good.—Pope.

Suggestions to Leader.—You can easily find a piece of common hard coal which will show the layers, and the specimens of fossils can be bought for a very small sum. In connection with the third selection, show how the vegetable growth passes into the coal, the coal into fire and heat, and the heat, in various forms, contributes to the sustaining of life. With the closing selections, show the necessity for the long range view, in order to see through chance direction, through discord, harmony, etc.

Igneous Rocks.

Articles 163-175 inclusive.

Specimens: Lava, Pumice, Granite.

What two classes of rocks have we now learned about?
These are made of what?
In what other way are rocks made?
These are called what?
Are these as easily found as the other kinds?
What is a Volcano?
What do Volcanos cast up?
Where do these come from?
What happens to the Lava?
What to the loose Ashes and Stones?
How is the Lava made up?
How the beds of Ashes?
What two groups of Igneous Rocks do these represent?
What kind of a rock is this?
[Show specimen Lava. Also see Figure 25, page 76, Geology.]
Where did this come from?
What makes the holes in the specimen in Figure 25?
In what condition is Lava, when it issues from a Volcano?
How much do the streams of Lava vary in size?
After they have cooled, what can be found on and beneath their surface?
What can you tell about Fingal's Cave?
[See Cyclopædia.]
What about the Giant's Causeway?
[See Cyclopædia.]
What is this?
[Show specimen Granite.]
What kind of a rock is it?
Does Granite come to the surface like Lava to cool?
What reason have we to suppose that Granite was ever in a fluid or pasty state?
What is this?
[Show sample Pumice.]
Where did it come from?
What does Figure 29, page 83, show?
Among the ruins of what old Roman city are such layers of Tuff found now?
[See Cyclopædia, article on Pompeii.]
How do they happen to be there?
Henceforth what will Granite tell us of the old and unseen forces of Nature?
And all Igneous Rocks teach us what?

SELECTIONS.

The mountains seem to have been built for the human race, as at once their schools and their cathedrals.—Ruskin.

The rock stands forth in its white and rugged mystery, as if its peak had been born out of the blue sky. —Ruskin.

Self-kindled, every atom glows,
And hints the future which it owes.—Emerson.

The centre-fire heaves underneath the earth,
And the earth changes like a human face.

All is rocks at random thrown,
Black waves, bare crags, and banks of stone,
As if were here denied
The summer sun, the spring's sweet dew,
That clothe with many a varied hue
The bleakest mountain-side.

The life that veins and girdles the noblest mountain on the earth is shallow to the play of vital energies within a human frame.

No mountain can Measure with a perfect man.—Starr King.

Suggestions to Leader.—A specimen of Volcanic Tuff, like that in Figure 29, would be the best example of Fragmental Igneous Rock; but Pumice is more common, and with the picture in the book will answer. Let one of the group study up the Giant's Causeway, another Fingal's Cave, and still another Pompeii; each one reporting on his special topic to the full group, when the lesson is reached.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN HOWARD RAYMOND. Edited by his eldest daughter, with portrait on steel. New York: Fords, Howard & Hurlburt. 1881.

We have here the record of a "life worth living," and, consequently, a record worth reading by every one who can appreciate exalted and generous purposes combined with executive ability to put these purposes into noble practical results. It has the special merit of bringing us very near the real man, showing his interior character, the animating principles of his life. He was a man of profound religious convictions, of the Christian and Evangelical sort, but one who held his convictions in a spirit of candor and charity, that, to a very great extent, freed him from exclusiveness and dogmatism. Of a genial disposition, sympathetic nature, keen sense of justice, clear moral discernment, and elevated aims, it is no wonder that he so impressed himself on his family, pupils, and friends, that their letters, which form a large part of the volume, unite to speak of him in the most loving and reverential way. First undertaking the study of law, after his "religious awakening" he turned his attention to the ministry, into which, however, he never regularly entered, being soon drawn aside to the educational work to which, in various forms, his subsequent life was so enthusiastically and so effectively devoted. Yet he frequently preached in connection with, or in occasional addition to, his special work. To the deep impression produced in the former case, his pupils earnestly testify. Concerning the latter, an incident which occurred at Rochester is very suggestive. Miss Elizabeth Peabody, who was visiting at the house where Professor Raymond boarded, along with W. H. Channing and others, and who had enjoyed an evening and a morning table talk with the professor and the rest, upon having it subsequently proposed to her to go and hear him preach, broke forth, "Preach! Is that man a minister?" To which Channing instantly replied in ringing tones, "That minister is a man, which is more." This was in the old Fugitive Slave Law days, when, in sermon and speech and talk, Professor Raymond sided unequivocally with the abolitionists in their abhorrence of the attempt to make the North a hunting-ground of slavery, and in their antagonism to slavery itself as unchristian and inhuman. Later, in visiting Europe with Henry Ward Beecher during the Civil War, he was frankly and indignantly outspoken to the sympathizers with the Southern confederacy.

His chief work was, however, educational. In this, forty-four years of his life were passed. During the first half of this period, he was connected with the Hamilton Baptist Theological Seminary and the Rochester University. His life at Rochester brought him into friendly contact with Emerson, Channing, Curtis, Higginson, Garrison, Douglass, and their fellow-workers. In 1855, he was called to the Presidency of the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute. With admirable judgment and tact, he harmonized and guided the counsels of the officers, new to the institution and to each other, and shaped the working details of the school. The crowning result was the establishment over the school—of five to seven hundred boys, from ten to eighteen years of age—of a moral government, without resort to corporal punishment, a condition of things which still continues. His last and best work, and that to which about one-third of the volume is devoted, was the service he rendered to Vassar College, to whose Presidency he was appointed in 1864, and which he held to his death in 1878. In intimate sympathy with its founder and his purposes, he became, from the first, the leading and inspiring spirit, selecting its teachers, arranging its studies, directing its mental and moral discipline, with clear discernment and persistent urging of the Higher Education which the institution should furnish, so that it might be for young women what the best colleges are for young men. To this purpose, he gave himself without stint, and wore himself out in the long, successful, and well-requited service. Uniform testimony is borne, alike by officers and students, to his indefatigable efforts, his absorbing devotion, his high moral purpose, his deep convictions, and to the patient fairness and impartial justice which characterized his dealings with all.

We welcome a new exchange in the Illustrated Scientific News, published monthly in New York. The present March number leads off with an elaborate illustrated sketch of Capt. Eads' plan for a great ship-railway, which shall connect the Atlantic with the Pacific, via Panama or Tehuantepec. It is argued that the plan of building such a great road for the transportation of ships with their cargoes would be but an extension of the common maritime railway, on which ships are moved a few hundred feet, and that its cost would be about fifty millions,— probably not more than half the expense of a canal. Mexico has already offered the land, harbors, right of way, etc.; but the United States is expected to furnish the fifty millions. It is a great enterprise, and well set forth in the article mentioned. The News is full of other bright things, and looks like a respectable competitor of the Scientific American.

The Art Amateur for March contains the usual large variety of articles relating to art in its various forms of painting, sculpture, design, and music. The Boston correspondent writes concerning the recent exhibition at the Art Club, and touches on the "clique" which has ruled, or attempted to rule, art matters in Boston. If his statements and comments may be accepted, the race of artists in Boston is being rapidly diminished by immigration to New York, and the culture and taste of Boston connoisseurs are only delusions. Besides the illustrations and designs for the use of those who have become afflicted with the prevailing decorative mania, there is a liberal selection of airs and choruses from "Billee Taylor," the latest comic operetta. Published by Montague Marks, 23 Union Square, New York.

FOREIGN.

A movement has been commenced for the purpose of celebrating in a fitting manner the fiftieth anniversary of the passing of the Reform Act of 1832 in England.

The Duke of Cambridge will preside at the annual dinner of the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress, which is to be held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on March 23.

The authorities of the Oxford and Cambridge University Presses announce that the publication of the revised version of the New Testament will take place about the middle of May.

An examination has taken place at Brussels of the railway employés, in order to test their eyes. More than one-twentieth of them have been found defective, and consequently will be discharged as being unable to fulfil their functions with a sufficient security for travelers.

Questions of ritual are, it is stated, dividing the clergy of the diocese of Winchester into two well-marked camps. Three hundred of the High Church clergy recently sent a memorial to the Bishop, stating that the immediate need of the Church is a tolerant recognition of divergent ritualistic practice. Eighty-six clergymen of the Evangelical party have now presented a counter-memorial, urging that there has been too much toleration in this direction, and that what is wanted is "more loyal obedience to the bishops." To this, the Bishop sends a guarded reply, deprecating prosecutions that lead to imprisonment, but admitting that, if the clergy had been more dutiful to their bishops, "none of these unhappy proceedings" would have been possible.

The old story of death-bed repentance has just received a new reading. The other Sunday, we are told that the Rev. John Hugh Morgan, of Liverpool, when preaching at the Wesleyan Chapel, Whalley Range, Manchester, read it thus: A person who had sat under a Unitarian minister was at the point of death. The Unitarian pastor was sent for; but, strange to say, he could neither pray nor give the least spiritual consolation. Thereupon, the Unitarian minister was so dissatisfied with his own condition that he turned his back on Unitarianism. We should like to have the details of this case from Mr. Morgan, so that we could verify them. We suspect he has been dealing in "Old Wives' Fables," or possibly this is an old hash re-dished up.—Unitarian Herald.

Rada Bay, a Russo-Hindoo lady, who has long been supplying the Moscow Gazette with Indian letters intensely hostile to the British Government, tells in her last epistle an extraordinary story about subterranean passages at Djadjmon, near Cawnpore, supposed to be entirely unknown to the English people. The lady was taken there in the summer of 1879 by an Indian patriot named Gulab Singh, or Takur, who profited by the opportunity for extolling the death of Lakshmi Bay, the cousin of Nana Sahib, near the gates of Gwalior. On leaving her guide, the lady asked permission to publish what she had seen, at the risk of directing English attention to these important caverns. Gulab Singh willingly accorded the request. The English, as he puts it, will be either too proud to look for these secret recesses, or else too stupid to find them.—Lloyd's Weekly.

Victor Hugo's seventy-ninth birthday (he was born on Feb. 26, 1802) was celebrated in Paris on Sunday by a great popular demonstration. A procession of deputations from Paris and the provinces passed his house in the Avenue d'Eylau, and cheered him enthusiastically. The deputations were joined by large crowds, the number being variously estimated at from one hundred thousand to three hundred thousand. Addresses were presented by the Paris Municipality and other bodies, to which M. Hugo replied; and afterward a great musical and literary festival was held in the Trocadéro, at which M. Louis Blanc presided. At night there was a Victor Hugo concert at the Conservatoire, and at many of the theatres verses were recited in his honor. On Saturday night there was a special performance at the Gaité, after ten years' interval, of the drama of "Lucretia Borgia," in which Mme. Favart appeared in the part of Lucretia. Victor Hugo, in the Rappel, thanks "the admirable and generous French people" for the demonstration, "which will be the best day of his life, and for which he will cherish to his latest hour an inexpressible gratitude."—Pall Mall Budget, March 4.

JESTINGS.

Two men went a-fishing, and on their return were asked as to their success. "Oh," said one of them, "we had about the same measure of fortune. Brown brought home a perch, and I a pole."

A fashionable young lady was seen blacking her brother's boots the other morning, and the next day she helped to do family washing. It is thought she is fitting herself to become the wife of an Italian count. —Puck.

A Milwaukee clergyman, asking a correction in a published report of one of his sermons, remarks: "I do not mind so much being taken for a heretic, but seriously object to anything which will condemn me as a lunatic."

Wishing to pay his friend a compliment, a gentleman remarked, "I hear you have a very industrious wife." "Yes," replied the friend with a melancholy smile, "she is never idle. She always finds something for me to do."

Valid Excuses.—Landlord: "Now, Pat, you're well enough off. Surely, you've no valid excuses for not paying the rent." Tenant: "Ah, sure, yer honor, but it's a poor widdy'd man that I am, wid me crippled ould mother to rear!"—English Paper.

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE holy man must not be covetous or revengeful or foolish; and he must be versed in the four virtuous inclinations, which are: desiring for all living things the same happiness which one seeks for one's self; training the mind in compassion toward all living things, desiring that they may escape all sorrows either in hell or in other existences, just as a man who sees his friend ill desires nothing so much as his recovery; taking pleasure in all living things, just as playmates are glad when they see one another; and keeping the mind balanced and impartial, with no affection for one more than another.—Buddha.

THERE is no greater delight than to be conscious of right within us. If one strive to treat others as he would be treated by them, he shall not fail to come near the perfect life. Every duty is a charge, but the charge of one's self is the root of all others.—Mencius.

WHO can deservedly be called a conqueror? He who conquers his rancorous passions, and endeavors to turn his enemy into a friend.—Rabbi Nathan.

IF thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go away; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.—Jesus.

A BENEFICENT person is like a fountain watering the earth and spreading fertility: it is therefore more delightful and more honorable to give than receive.—Epicurus.

NOTHING can work me damage except myself: the harm that I sustain I carry about with me, and never am a real sufferer but by my own fault.—St. Bernard.

VIRTUE and true goodness, righteousness and equity, are things truly noble and excellent, lovely and venerable in themselves.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

BENEVOLENCE is a duty. He who frequently practises it, and sees his benevolent intentions realized, at length comes really to love him to whom he has done good. When, therefore, it is said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," it is not meant, thou shalt love him first, and do good to him in consequence of that love; but, thou shalt do good to thy neighbor, and this thy beneficence will engender in thee that love to mankind which is the fulness and consummation of the inclination to do good.—Emmanuel Kant.

WHEN the majestic form of Truth approaches, it is easier for a disingenuous mind to start aside into a thicket till she is past, and then reappearing say, "It was not Truth," than to meet her and bow and obey. —John Foster.

IT is in the determination to obey the truth and to follow wherever she may lead that the genuine love of truth consists.—Archbishop Whately.

ALL true glory rests,
All praise of safety, and all happiness,
Upon the moral law. Egyptian Thebes,
Tyre by the margin of the sounding waves,
Palmyra central in the desert, fell!
And the arts died by which they had been raised.
Call Archimedes from his buried tomb
Upon the plains of vanished Syracuse,
And feelingly the sage shall make report
How insecure, how baseless in itself,
Is that philosophy whose sway is framed
For mere material instruments, how weak
Those arts and high inventions, if unpropped
By virtue. —Wordsworth.

CURRENT TOPICS.

ANOTHER earnest soul, struggling for freedom and for opportunity to work for human benefit, repulsed from Unitarian fellowship! Read the story in our long essay to-day.

ACCORDING to the estimates of the eminent German geographers, Messrs. Behm and Wagner, the total population of the earth is now 1,455,923,000; and the increase is nearly one million every month.

THE acquittal of young Kalloch, the other day, in San Francisco, shows how easily the criminal there, under certain conditions, may go "unwhipt of justice." It cannot fail to discourage the friends of law and order on that coast.

THERE is to be no extra session of Congress, and the country is happy. It is a singular commentary on the success of our republican institutions that the people, in these latter years, feel their interests to be safest when the very representatives they have chosen as legislators are not legislating.

SOME of the daily journals are speaking of the abandonment of Candahar by the British army, and of the terms of peace offered to the Boers by which their territorial rights are respected, as humiliating to the British government. But, as the British had never the least shadow of a right in the land of the Boers or of the Afghans, Gladstone's administration, instead of being humiliated, is rather to be congratulated on possessing the moral courage to retrace a wrong step,—a virtue not frequent in a strong nation.

THE Pope has discovered that an extensive traffic is carried on in relics of saints and martyrs, a large share of which find a market in this country. He has accordingly put in operation stringent measures to stop the business. It is not a new one, but has always flourished in the Church more or less. It is a matter which its dignitaries, however, have hitherto troubled themselves but little about. But the nineteenth century compels the Pope to take a stand in regard to it that he would not have been obliged to take a few centuries earlier. Thus, the times and the manners change even in the Roman Church with the courses of the suns.

THE New York Children's Aid Society, which transplants neglected children from the streets of that city to good homes in the West, is one of the best philanthropies of the country. It is entirely unsectarian in its aims; yet the Catholic Review calls it a Protestant proselyter, and scents a danger in it. It says: "The Catholic Church has lost, and is still losing, through the efforts of the Protestant Children's Aid Society, thousands of children who should be members of its fold. This so-called Aid Society, which is nothing but a proselytizing machine, annually sends West thousands of Catholic children. They are given to none but farmers who are Protestants, and they soon lose under the teaching of their Protestant masters the true faith." We hope this result follows, though it is not the aim. We do not believe that the Society object to Catholic farmers, if they find their homes equally good.

AN interesting and important case concerning the taxation of church property has just been decided by the Supreme Court of New Hampshire. The Legislature of that State in 1879 passed a law which provides "that all property, whether real or personal, owned by any church association or corporation, used exclusively for a place of worship, not exceeding ten thousand dollars in value, shall be exempt from taxation; and all such associations or corporations owning church property, whether real or personal, in excess of ten thousand dollars in value, shall be taxed at the same rates as other property for the total valuation of such excess." One of the churches in the city of Manchester taxed under this law brought suit against the city to recover the tax on the ground that the law is both unconstitutional and of the nature of a violation of contract. The court has given a strong decision sustaining the law and dismissing the case. This was probably tried as a test case, and will settle the law for all churches in that State.

IN the last Christian Register, Mr. Abraham Firth, the Chairman of the Trustees of the Southgate Will in the Leicester Case, makes his statement. Of course, he agrees with the decision of the referees. But he vigorously takes Rev. E. E. Hale to task for saying that the Leicester society, by reason of the will, has "an iron-clad creed" such as "no other Unitarian church" has. Mr. Firth declares that the Leicester church has the breadth and freedom and the limitations that belong to all Unitarian Christian churches, and it has no other." The italics here are ours. He thanks Messrs. Everett and Thayer for their statements. But so far as they rested their decision on the condition that the preacher must be denominationally identified with the Unitarian faith (and this, from what we have heard, appears to have been the strongest point in the minds of the referees generally), does not Mr. Firth rather "give them away," when he adds that he does "not believe that any earnest preacher of 'liberal Christianity,' even if he did not take the name of Unitarian, if he were chosen by the society as its minister, would fail to receive the income of the fund"? Again, the italics are ours. He intimates that there may be ministers in "Evangelical pulpits" liberal enough for the purpose. Mr. Firth says that his two colleagues had not seen his statement, but he knows that they are in agreement with him. From this, it would appear that the trustees withheld the fund from Mr. Weston, not primarily because he was not identified with the Unitarian denomination, but because they did not consider that his theology met the terms of the will. It would also seem that they are willing to make the terms of the will quite elastic in the Evangelical direction, but not in the direction toward which the majority of the society appear disposed to move.

THE GREAT DEBATE.

A Picture of the Present Phase of the Struggle between the Old and the New Faith.

BY T. W. CURTIS.

To give vent to any personal grievance is not my aim, nor to treat the reader to an essay learned or abstruse. But the elements of personal history and earnest thought will be found blended together and balancing each other. Though I am compelled to speak of myself, my utterances I trust will hint of no wish or design other than the vindication of the cause of truth. For I am persuaded that my individual experience has more than a private significance, in as much as it illustrates the nature of that controversy between Tradition and Reason, the old and the new, that threatens a crisis in the world's affairs, by generating a new consciousness in the race, causing it to wake as it were from a dream.

The Unitarians have two Theological Schools in this country. The one at Meadville, Pa., I entered in the fall of 1876, expecting to go into the Unitarian ministry. My knowledge of Unitarianism was limited to a perusal of a few of its works, Bartol's Radical Problems being among the number. Liberal Christianity imparted to me a spiritual faith built on the intuitions of the soul, with God and immortality for its postulates. In one sense, I adored Jesus of Nazareth, but never dreamed of becoming his follower or taking the name "Christian." In this school's catalogue, it is stated that "no doctrinal test shall ever be made a condition of enjoying any of the opportunities of instruction, except a belief in the divine origin of Christianity." So I went thither to have my faith simplified and strengthened, and to equip myself for the ministry.

But, as I advanced in my studies, I became profoundly impressed with the lack, in the Unitarianism of this period, of adaptation to American civilization and the moral nature of man. A new discovery it was to learn that the Scriptures were the basis of the Unitarian faith; and that while rejecting a part, explaining away a still greater portion, it applied to the balance various methods of interpretation with no approach to uniformity of result in issues great or simple. The resurrection was the pivotal truth of the New Testament to one, unhistoric to another, and of no moment to a third. All that savored of the supernatural would be mercilessly scorned by one, and felt to be the sinews of gospel truth by another. The professors, within hearing of each other's voices, gave directly opposite interpretations to passages of Scripture, to Christ's own words. And students, all believing in "the divine origin of Christianity," were yet Presbyterian, Methodist, Christian, Universalist, and Unitarian. Christ was not God, but treated as if he were. Man was Christ's brother, but treated as if he were not. Man was a son of God, his nature progressive; while inspiration was a thing of the past, and the Christian ideal the summation of all excellence. The Bible, allowed and shown to be fallible, was yet an authority; while Reason was under ban because of its fallibility. Science was praised in general terms, but its method contemned and its results ignored. God's personality was but feebly affirmed, and immortality spoken of in the subjunctive mood. And when one frankly confessed any lack of assurance regarding the personality of God, he at once incurred ill-repute; and yet the keystone of the theologic structure was the dictum of the Hamiltonian philosophy, that the Infinite is the unconditioned of which the mind can form no definite conception. Professing definiteness and simplicity, Unitarianism was yet made up of opposing theories, clashing sentiments that must accustom the tongue to evasion and give congestive chills to the soul. I am aware it is the faith of the brightest and most gifted intellects America has produced. Its communicants are, as a rule, of the cultured and well-to-do in society. But the gospel's peculiar boast is that it is fitted for the poor, the illiterate, and the outcast. The answer is of course, "Times have changed." Though Unitarianism is the faith of those possessed of affluent gifts and fine parts, it is not sure of giving to the soul its true self-poise and manly dignity; for in not a few instances its preachers swing back and forth from Rationalism to Orthodoxy, and some of its leading spirits have passed over to Romanism or agnosticism, clearing the intervening space at a bound. With an abundance of learning, and faith in man for one of its cardinal tenets, its position is that of neutrality or suspense, in the initial stages of reform, both philanthropic and philosophic. Instead of facing the evils of the world with a resolute will, it disguises them with optimistic fancies; instead of recognizing the difficulties of life's problems, discourages attempts at their mastery, by saying to the intellect, "Take heed lest thou fall." With no real doctrinal basis, it yet assumes to have a formula of belief, and, while pointing to Christ as our examplar, will not fellowship the Christ spirit, unless labelled with the name Christian. Professing to be of the spirit and not the letter, it commits itself boldly to neither, availing itself of both by turns for controversial or partisan ends.

These were the views I could not escape, and which I frankly avowed before the close of the third year, when I was to graduate. In a world where compromise, equivocation, and apathy reigned, to be true to the little light one had seemed the only true plan of salvation. When I resolved to square my conduct by my highest perceptions of right, with no more parleying with theories of expediency, a new sense of personal responsibility came to me like a revelation. Honesty seemed to have the weighty contents of a creed, and to be of more prime importance than any question of theology, culture, friendship, or salary; and but to comply with its simple behests seemed to be the highest service to humanity or God, and to have in it crucifixions, pain, and glory. "Be not hasty," "act wisely," "wait until you get out of the woods," said the tempter. But this misnamed "wisdom" was to me the curse of curses, that anaconda of worldliness in whose toils man's religious nature was helplessly writhing. Not within so much as without college walls did these evils loom up before my sight. I freely and gladly acknowledge the existence in the school, in its president, among its faculty and students, of capacity and integrity and kind-heartedness. But it was as plain to me as the day that society's ideals were false and low, because its religion was pitched in a wholly false key.

My thoughts crystallized into a few principles, which appeared to offer common standing ground for all who were conscious that the old foundations were loosening, and that new realms of thought were opening before man's vision; who believed that a fresh co-ordination of truth was demanded, while the piety of ages was to be condensed into moral aim and endeavor. I transcribe these principles here:—

Man.

I. We affirm man's right to free inquiry, his natural love of Truth, and his capacity for the discovery and practice of it.

Reality.

II. Truth, Justice, and Love are the abiding Reality.

Perfection.

III. Thought, Aspiration, and Endeavor tend to Perfection, Freedom, and Happiness, which are one.

Voices.

IV. We believe in the glory and divinity of all Records that tell of a forward aim and a virtuous deed; in the sacredness of all utterances that voice the needs and aspirations of Humanity.

Authority.

V. Our highest authority is the awakened Conscience, inspired by the convergence of all lines of thought in the Living Present, which some call the voice of REASON, and others the voice of GOD.

Religion.

VI. Trust in the highest revealed in man's better nature and loftier moods, coupled with the effort to render that ideal actual, is Religion.

Right.

VII. On Devotion to the Right hinge the destinies of mankind.

Responsibility.

VIII. Society is an organism; to purify its life currents is the duty of every man and woman.

Progress.

IX. Lights and Helps increase as time moves on; and after-ages will work in a deeper mine, and ascend a higher mount of vision.

Immortality.

X. A noble life is more suggestive than aught else of man's kinship with the Infinite.

Corollary.

State secularization and formation of Ethical Societies.

These principles seemed more affirmative and inspiring than any of the dogmas of the Church, whose typical one is man's fallen, impotent state, which taints Christianity in its most liberal form. These principles express, I believe, the inner spirit, the true ideal of the liberal cause, and are the basis of all action, in Church or State, that is reformatory or upward tending. I was satisfied they were the life of Unitarianism, in as far as it was a distinct movement. And I believed Unitarianism's fear or hatred of Rationalism to be a proof of its lapse from that high moral and spiritual aim that constituted it the vanguard of the world's religious emancipation. I was equally convinced that Liberalism's crude temper and abortive measures were largely due to the timid, halting conservatism of liberal Christianity, which enticed to its standard many brave thinkers and actors, who bound themselves to a life-long apprenticeship to Ecclesiasticism's astute and recondite modes of warfare, which may have the Holy Ghost for their prompter, but possess not a very strong current of human sympathy or courageous purpose.

Scarcely a week before Commencement Day, it was officially announced to me that the Faculty had decided I could take no part in the graduating exercises for not having appeared at some of the examinations. So this was given out as the reason for my exclusion from the honors of graduation. The complaint was based on a technicality which would have been made to apply to no one whose belief was of the prescribed pattern. As to devotion to study and the amount of work done, I yield the palm to no graduate of the three years of my residence there. The following petition was entirely voluntary on the part of the signers, one being a teacher of the class in Hebrew, one the assistant librarian, one the superintendent of the Sunday-school, and one a graduate of that year, and all men of mature years and high standing in the school; and, with a single exception, all differed from me in my belief.

To the Board of Instruction of the Meadville Theological School:—

GENTLEMEN,—We, the undersigned, students of the Meadville Theological School, on hearing that the Board of Instruction have resolved to debar Mr. T. W. Curtis from any participation in the graduating exercises of the year, naturally feel the deepest sympathy with him in his painful situation.

We believe that Mr. Curtis has been, on the whole, a faithful student for three years, and that he has only failed to present himself at some of the final examinations through an inadequate sense of their importance, and owing to his having engaged himself in lecturing and other work during the latter part of the present year, in order to provide himself with some support in view of his leaving the school.

Since other students, who have only partially fulfilled the course of study laid down by the Board of Instruction, have nevertheless been allowed to read an essay on Commencement Day, and have publicly received certificates for the course of study taken by them, we respectfully request the Board of Instruction to grant the same privilege to Mr. Curtis.

We, all of us, have the greatest respect for Mr. Curtis, both for his moral worth as a man and his marked ability as a student; and we cannot help feeling that the penalty which the Board of Instruction have imposed on him for the mistake he has made is such as he by no means deserves, being, as we fear it will be considered by all who know the school, nothing short of a public disgrace.

Believing that the Board of Instruction only wish to act justly in this matter, we do not offer this as a protest against their resolution, but only as a request that the Board should be kind enough to consider whether they cannot modify their decision.

JOHN TREVOR.

I undertook to organize a Radical Liberal Society in Meadville, the first time such an attempt was ever made there, and met with a response from some as true and worthy people as can anywhere be found, among whom I am proud to include the names of Joseph York and Almina F. Rhodes. Some of the foremost citizens of the place, whose coöperation was expected, were daunted by the cry of "infidelity." The action of the Faculty had stigmatized me as an unbeliever or infidel. This charge will be met by the rehearsal of certain facts or incidents, which, however, have a bearing on the entire question at issue, and so are an essential part of my narrative.

Tyrannical measures were employed to make me bend to the caprice of others. A suggestion was made in the form of advice, and advice so urgent as to seem like a request, that prayer be closed with the formula "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." This it was simply impossible for me to do, as I had declared in a sermon my resolution never to make use of the name of Christ in any connection not proper to those of other of the world's saints and heroes. Another request was made. On New Year's morning of the last term, I read Tennyson's verses when conducting the chapel exercises,—"Ring out Wild Bells":—

"Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow:
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

"Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be."

And I remember breathing a prayer, burdened with the wish that we might come to know how our task was a double one, making it our duty to unlearn as well as to learn. After this, a request was made, and made obligatory, giving it the complexion of a command, that the students would use in the chapel exercise no book but the Bible. This restriction was unknown in the school for many years, if not from its foundation. Students were allowed to read selections from any author they chose. When my turn came, the request was not obeyed. I began by reading Principle IV., "I believe in the glory and divinity of all records that tell of a forward aim or a virtuous deed, and in the sacredness of all utterances that voice the needs and aspirations of humanity," and followed this with an extract from Channing on the evils of conformity.

The Platform of Principles already referred to was first written on a blackboard for a conference theme, and was received with an almost universal murmur of dissent. One speaker thought the Love of God and Man a much simpler creed. True, I replied, if such a creed were anywhere known. Nowhere on the round globe, in this nineteenth century of the Christian era, is there a Christian church that conditions its fellowship on terms so simple, though it was said that on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. Dogma has not only obscured and perverted the terms God and Man and even Love, but has well-nigh emptied them of all meaning. The Principles are these two commandments passed through the prism of the understanding.

In a recitation in Locke, the class were catechized on "fundamental verities." This naturally brought up the question of the authority of Scripture. I gave it as my belief that religious verities were not, and never, in this day, should be made dependent on Scripture for their proof. The professor observed that the people were accustomed to seek them in that way. I thought the method false. He regarded it as convenient, if not the only practicable one. Still, I felt it my duty not to follow it. But who, then, he asked, are you going to get to help you? God, I answered.

One day in class I asked the professor the meaning of the phrase, "the divine origin of Christianity," a belief in which was the only test of admission to the school. He could not say what was its signification when first placed there, but thought it would receive a liberal interpretation to-day. An ex-Catholic priest being present, who seemed keenly alive to the importance of the inquiry, arched his eyebrows significantly, as if he thought the answer no less mysterious than the phrase itself, and wondered how much it was like the old trick of the mother Church to seem to answer a question by not answering it. My inquiry stopped here, though I might have asked: "What do the words 'divine' and 'Christianity' mean now, professor? If it be said any one can give what meaning he pleases to these words, how can they serve the purpose of a test? Is not the manner in which they are used anything but 'divine,' or, to speak more intelligibly, anything but just and moral?" And still the ghost of an answer would have been forthcoming, and nothing settled with any certainty, perhaps, excepting that the interrogator was void of "Christian" faith and humility.

The use of the Bible was the subject for a conference meeting attended by Faculty and students. The Rev. J. T. Bixby was present, pastor of the Unitarian church, which requires of its converts "to accept the New Testament Scriptures as their authority in matters of faith." The remarks made were fraught with hints of the absurdity or impiety of using any other book than the Bible in religious services. The leader of the meeting and one or two others uttered some very liberal sentiments. I spoke in substance as follows:—

The view so generally expressed surprises me greatly. I see in it neither reason nor piety. It may be consistent enough with the Orthodox belief, but out of keeping with the Unitarian, from which standpoint it is nothing less than fetichism. Do you see no incongruity between the use of the Bible in the manner urged, and the commentary given on it in the adjoining room, which proves it one of the most fallible books, crammed with errors of every description? Do you not have to use a polyglot to get at the meaning of a single verse? And how rarely is it any two persons are even then agreed? Does the Bible not divide mankind into sects? Is it not the shelter of superstitions numberless? Of what crime has it not been the excuse or sanction? See in this group of persons within my hearing the lines of separation it draws, that forestall argument, obstruct sympathy, and caricature devotion! We are one. Can we not feel it? Who denies that we are brothers? Not the heart or understanding. But the moment you appeal to Bible texts, we are foes, eternally separate. I yield to none in reverence for the good contained in the Bible. I may commune as deeply, if not so often, with the noble spirit that breathes through many parts of it. But, after all, the spirit is not separable from the letter, never was, never will be, by the mass of worshippers. Nor is that the worst. The Bible has many spirits as it has many Christs; and some of those spirits are devils, which the centuries have not yet succeeded in casting out. One spirit, one Christ only? What is the answer History gives? Suppose the true Christ, or Jesus of Nazareth rather, were to enter our city to-day, would we hail him as "The King of Glory"? No, though we have his picture on our walls and his praises on our lips. But get at this better spirit, then what? Is it not the spirit of Justice and Love, that asks not leave of authority or custom to be, but speaks and acts from a divine necessity, or a commandment from within? Is it not the spirit that existed before the Bible was, and is found where the Bible is not? Said Zoroaster, "He who chooses the right and shuns the base has the Eternal for his friend, brother, and father." This spirit, I believe, bids man declare his independence of the Book, by practical demonstrations that there are other sources of inspiration, other marks of wisdom and goodness. And we know it. Shall we tell the people so? Oh, yes! But how? We want in the pulpit to-day less theory and more principle, less of Scripture phrase and more manhood. The secret of the preacher's art is by example giving force to precept. Few of us believe in vicarious atonement, except as all share in the act as well as in its benefits. And, if we would not have the people lean on a Saviour, the preacher must not lean on a book. Else character will never be formed, and man will be a weakling, a parasite, a slave to the end of time. Religion is not a short cut to heaven, the road is long, the summits are many. Whatever power started or cheers us on our way, we know we are brought every step of it on our own legs. This hugging of the Book seems to me one of the subtlest forms of infidelity. Do we believe in the living God? Then why leap over the heads of so many centuries in search of the divine? Are these eighteen centuries a blank? Is man a cipher? I believe in the existence of Soul. And I believe it better to show by living examples of what the soul is capable than to prove there was a Christ, or that there is a God. Show us the article. That is the best, the only proof of divinity. To know it is to possess it. If God is not in you, the voice of the Eternal can never be heard or obeyed. Reason is man's authority; conscience, his guide; experience, the school of the prophets; the collective wisdom and virtue of the race, the image of the Perfect, the only clew to the science or mystery of Being. And now I want to submit another question. How can our faith be made to rest on Scripture texts, if the professor's learned criticisms have any weight with us? This moment, the Bible, we say, is the rock of our salvation; and we are made to believe that, as the fabled pair who walked in Eden, we may behold above the smile of the Eternal, and beneath the bloom of the amaranth! But the scene is changed. The Bible is being discussed; and we find ourselves afloat on an iceberg, amid blinding mists and a heaving sea. I cannot feel the respect which perhaps I ought to feel for the man whose exegesis, if accepted, would make us all radicals or sceptics, yet who, when we are commanded to read from no book but the Bible, listens unmoved, without the raising of a finger or the winking of an eyelash. Things cannot remain so always, and how are they to be changed?

This "speech," as it was called, was relished by some and not by others. The friendlier comment, however, seemed to imply that what I had said might have been true, but was not wise. But, if the speech had any significance, I thought it was just this,—that Truth was wisdom, the highest wisdom. I felt that more good than harm would follow from stripping off at times all disguise, and having the reality appear, however abrupt or great the transition.

When I thought of organizing a Society in Meadville, I called on the pastor of the Unitarian church, and expressed to him my belief that his congregation would be better suited, and his influence greatly extended, if his church were planted on a more liberal basis, and also stated that I felt sure a majority would vote for a change; and I then promised him an increase at once of at least twenty new members. No, he replied, there is a circle of Christianity outside of which we cannot go. Wishing to know what that circle was, he replied it was left to each individual to define for himself.

A short time previous to this call on the pastor, the superintendent of the Unitarian Sunday School, entering into the spirit of the new movement, was compelled on conscientious grounds to resign. Being himself a very successful teacher, and the school being large and instructors scarce (and perhaps for some other reason as well), he was desired to remain, and was told that his change of views need not disturb his relations with the school. He was of a different mind. He was a student and on the high road to promotion, but, as it appears, cared more for honor than for honors.

The following is an extract from a letter addressed me by a former attendant on the Unitarian church. It is of recent date, and contains a report concerning myself that has some basis of fact, but carries with it a meaning that is false:—

I am told that you asked to be admitted to the Theological School again, and was refused. I am vexed with you for doing such a thing. Could you after your bold defiance hope for favor. I am sorry; and, since you could be nothing but a radical of the sternest type, why did you desire it? Savonarola recanted; but, when his tortures ceased, he declared it was only through fear of pain. I believe that many thought your position right in the main, and grand; and I am grieved to think what they will now think. The Unitarians are tolerated and spoken kindly of now, because they are willing to compromise for fear of losing a foothold on the stand where men work to elevate their fellows. And indeed it does seem as if the end might justify the means, did we not reflect that no falsehood can be disseminated for good. Unitarianism, in seeking for absolute truth, has found too much. It disables its ministers. They stand in their shaky pulpits, preaching Christ and the Bible, and reciting miracles, when—well, it seems to me a wearying, sickening state of things, and hopeless, did I not believe that in the long run truth must inevitably assert itself. I have little heart to attend church. If I could believe that those who preach believe, I should feel more like listening to them. Pardon my sincerity," etc.

Sincerity needs never to be pardoned. Its place is at the centre of the royal group of heavenly virtues. My correspondence with the president of the school I will give in full, but preface first with a few words. The Unitarian ministers I met during my visit East did not seem disposed to admit that Unitarianism, in any part of its administration, curtailed the freedom of any one. In the sanctum of the Christian Register (the Unitarian organ), a definition of Christianity was given,—the sense of right and wrong, the love of good, —which I never before heard even faintly whispered. All this was simply bewildering. Besides, I found current among some of my former acquaintances an account of my battle at Meadville that was quite out of keeping with the facts, making it appear more like a personal quarrel than a debate on essential truths. So I resolved to make another and last attempt to have the real issues between the school and myself, which I believed to be the pith of the religious controversies of our time, made clear, and put into bold relief. I then wrote to President Livermore, disavowing personal animosities, expressing quite other feelings rather, and repeating briefly those truths to which my allegiance was due, along with an intimation that I was even more than ever anxious for a closer fellowship with those who had these simple aims uppermost in their minds and hearts. What was said about "re-entering the school" will be seen in the letter. I also spoke of a change of method, but not, as I trust it will appear, of the surrender of an iota of principle:—

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., April 18, 1880.

President A. A. Livermore:—

It is nearly a year since I last saw you. The first five months were passed in Meadville and vicinity. My task has not been a very simple one,—lecturing, organizing societies, and issuing a monthly journal. The difficulty of last spring naturally stopped communication between us, and seems to have tended to a rapid, if not complete, estrangement; for three years' attendance at school could not but beget intimate relations between Faculty and students. I, of course, have my theory of the differences that arose between the school and myself; but, though it was my duty to voice them at whatever cost, I was far from unconscious that there were agreements as deep and abiding, though at the time not more sacred.

You know the realities on which my faith rested, however rude their utterance; and their ascendency is even greater than formerly. I believe that God is light, love, and life; and that is my religion, whose aim is to indoctrinate man with this one truth; though I have stronger sympathy with the agnostic than with the preacher whose life is sundered from his creed.

To yourself and the Faculty generally, every student must in time become conscious of a deep debt of gratitude; and I appear to have signally failed in making this manifest. One of my strongest desires is to effect a readjustment of these personal relations.

I have met with more success than I had looked for; but the toil and anxiety have also been greater. It is a hard struggle when one's appeal is uniform,—union for constructive work. There is much that is warring and uncouth in the element with which I have had to deal; yet my conviction gains steadily that no goodness is beyond recall, and that brotherhood must be preached and lived. But a change of method seems to me best. I need companionship in my work.

I have not made up my mind whether it would not be well for me, as I am about to return to Meadville (providing permission were given), to finish the review of studies omitted last year. Should like to hear from you, if this communication has any interest for you, and you have any suggestions to make. Most respectfully,

T. W. CURTIS.

MEADVILLE, PA., April 27, 1880.

My dear Mr. Curtis:—

Your favor of late date is received. Certainly, we always retain an affectionate interest in the young men who have been under our instruction. We follow them wherever they go; and, however far we may think they wander from right and truth, we still remember how many are the temptations which beset them, and how wild are the speculations, as in the old French Revolution, which are abroad, and which they must meet and overcome or be overcome by them.

I am happy to learn by your letter that you have become convinced of the need and value of union and cooperation. All our works as Unitarians or Liberals have been more or less marred and hindered by an extreme and intolerant Individualism. Even Mr. Abbot has come to recognize that "the Consensus of the Competent," whatever that may be, is indispensable to the search for and application of the truth.

As to your suggestion, rather hinted than stated, of returning here and studying for examination, the Board of Instruction, when the matter was laid before them, declined to reopen the issues of last spring. This they regard as better for you and better for them. As long as neither party has apparently changed its ground in any important respect, the attempt of reconsideration would only be a loss, and not a gain. When you come to Meadville, call and see me, and I can more fully explain to you all these matters. In the mean time, I hope you may find some congenial sphere of duty and labor.

Very truly yours, A. A. LIVERMORE.

Is there any recantation in my letter? Not a syllable. President Livermore's reply testifies as much,—"as long as neither party has changed its ground in any important respect." It is unwittingly implied or openly confessed that the difference between us was of the kind evidenced by my narrative, and which I have claimed and they have denied,—an heretical tendency of faith on my part. This is plain from the whole tenor of the reply to my letter. "However far we may think they wander from right and truth," hints (how very gently!) at my wide divergence from Unitarian belief. Under these circumstances, I agree with President Livermore that "it would be useless to reopen the issues of last spring." An article written about the time of the correspondence, for a Unitarian journal, on the "Objects and Aims" of the Meadville Theological School, is almost as full of Christ as a Catholic Breviary. It was because my vows were plighted to humanity and to the right that "any attempt at reconsideration would be a loss, and not a gain." If the privilege of formal graduation had been allowed me, it would have been a lowering of the flag bearing the Christian-test-oath inscription of "the divine origin of Christianity," and substituting for it Light, Liberty, Right, or putting it in words that do not mean anything, everything, and nothing.

I had no need of a certificate, as there is nothing to prevent my entering the pulpit any day but the proper guarantee of the preacher's freedom. The societies I have organized are beginnings. Time will be required for them to develop to the point where systematic work can be taken up.

Said George W. Curtis at a Unitarian festival in Boston, "Unitarianism's creed is liberty." He might have said, Its boast is that it has no creed. Rev. J. H. Allen, of Harvard, puts it in this wise, "Unitarians have always regarded creeds as unchristian and mischievous." The Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, tells us that "the Universalist and Christian Churches are founded on the written word, and the Unitarian on the eternal word that can never be stereotyped." History confronts these gentlemen with a far different story. Why, does not the platform of the National Unitarian Conference contain these words?—"We reaffirm our allegiance to the gospel of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Master, and invite all to our fellowship who wish to become followers of Christ." Is it not true that Channing's definition of the term Liberal Christian is the Unitarian creed? "One who repels all tests of Christian character and fellowship but the words of Jesus Christ and his inspired apostles." This may appear very clear and simple to some; but it has all the essentials of a creed, excepting I should say those very qualities of clearness and simplicity. Says Bartol: "If nothing be true, why was a trumpet ever blown? I was planted in the Church, and uphold the Christian standard." Now, what certainty is there in that sound? Is the fault with our ears or with the trumpet?

Notice the guarded and hesitating manner in which the recent able editor of the Christian Register, Mr. Ames, expresses himself: "The time may come—we hope and toil for it—when all whose ruling principle is love of the Lord and the neighbor," etc.,—the rest may be easily guessed. What is meant by "the Lord"? Christ or God, or either, or both? Is it meant that those whose ruling principle now is love of God and Man (that is, pure Theism) are outside of his communion? The inference seems plain, and is certainly justified by facts. Even James Martineau hedges that way, giving the sanction of his great name to this retrograde theory. What of Parker, Newman, Cobbe, Abbot, Potter, Conway, Towne, and others, whose name is legion, and who are found among all ranks, in all conditions of life? Western Unitarianism invites all to its standard "who desire to aid in building up the Kingdom of God." Whether this is a movement in the right direction depends on the spirit that animates it. One whom we understand to be prominent in its councils publishes a pamphlet, entitled "Christ or the Creeds." It will never do. A Creedal Christ is the Christian Creed. The spiritual instinct takes quick alarm when beckoned toward affiliation with those who treat it with contempt; and that instinct is the sense of right and wrong, the love of good. It has attained its majority, and rests no longer on Scripture proof or ceremonial rite. Thought, affection, will, are elemental forces that have the universe at their back. He who believes that Truth, Justice, and Love are the inspiring and formative principles of human life and conduct is a fit candidate for the pulpit. I am glad to learn that the following test is favored by Minot J. Savage: "Those who believe in Truth and Duty, and are trying to organize these into the lives of men."

Emerson is reported saying, "Why not give the most favorable interpretation to Christianity?" Because every interpretation yet given has been supposed the most favorable. Emerson's own would be ridiculed by every professed Christian. Nay, the very use of the word "favorable" in such a connection is an affront to Christianity. Had Emerson through his life acted on his own suggestion, he would to-day not have been Emerson. Let Christ be ever so perfect, his words ever so true, it does not become man to be the follower of any one but the Impersonal Reason. I ask, why not give the most "favorable interpretation," to God's or man's nature, which would not keep him forever bound to a name or a book? But I suspect Emerson has been misquoted, or that he has misquoted himself,—just as I believe that Abbot's words are misinterpreted by President Livermore, and that the author of the Consensus of the Competent came near sacrificing a principle to a formula,—the principle of freedom and right, whose chosen apostle Francis Abbot has certainly been. I do not question the existence of the Consensus of the Competent; but the all-important question is, How are its judgments and decisions to take effect? The democratic principle is coming more and more to prevail in Church and State. Because intelligence is spreading fast, and manhood's glory wakes on the brow of the masses, the toiling, low-born millions.

"Make no more giants, God,
But elevate the world at once,"

is the prayer of every spirit abreast of the times. It is mortifying to hear radicals (theistic or agnostic) echoing the cant of Orthodoxy of the feebleness and impotence of human reason. The court of commonsense tries all. The tendency is less and less toward a hierarchy of service, and more and more toward mutuality and equality.

I am not opposed to creeds: the only question is, Are they honest, are they true? A creed is but an outline of general truths or universal principles, tested and verified by experience. Felix Adler is right in saying as a matter of emphasis, "Deeds, not creeds"; but the better, truer form of expression is, Let principles shine through facts. The Free Religious Association has its creed. "The practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature," means something. Can an orthodox Christian stand on this platform? Not unless it be possible to serve two masters. He would be welcomed of course, but as a subject of any of the monarchies of Europe would be welcomed to our shores.

The spirit of the movement is the placing of the emphasis on the Here and the Now, as the method of interrogating the Infinite; and the love of and devotion to the human, as the readiest and truest means of access to the Divine. Be not a contemner of creeds; but be not caught within the magic circle of that wizard of the mind, sentimental vagueness,—the hierophant of liberal Christianity. And fear not to know that to believe really and truly in the fathomless Godhead with which we are surrounded is "atheistical," and that to rest all worth on the adamantine base of manhood is to place one's self outside the pale of Christianity.

CHRISTIANITY: MR. CHADWICK'S DEFINITION OF IT.

Mr. Chadwick's sermon, entitled "Are we still Christians?" in the Index of March 17, is a valuable contribution toward accuracy in the idea of what Christianity is. He represents it to be that "stream of tendency" which, flowing from the heart of Jesus, and illustrated in his life, has descended with constantly widening influence to our own time, and has been a main factor in freedom, progress, and civilization, as well as in religion, thus entitling its author to special reverence among religious teachers.

Heartily conceding that this language justly describes the stream of tendency that really proceeded from Jesus, and his just preëminence among the founders of religions, I wish we might have from so competent a critic as Mr. Chadwick an answer to this farther question: Did not the stream of tendency proceeding from Jesus receive such addition or modification from Paul as to make what is now popularly accepted as Christianity referable rather to him than to Jesus?

It has been customary among commentators to characterize as "Pauline" certain of the New Testament writings of later date than the Epistles of Paul. If the doctrine formulated in the creeds and preached in the pulpits of nine-tenths of the churches called Christian should express its origin in its name, would not that name be Paulism rather than Jesuism? Did not the thing now recognized as Christianity both in the Church and the world proceed rather from Paul than from Jesus?

The essence, the core, of Paul's theology and religion, seem to me to be expressed in his oft repeated formula, "the Lord Jesus Christ." He, a Jew and a Pharisee, of course meant by "the Christ" just what his Hebrew prophets meant; namely, a deliverer and a ruler. The expectations of those who first called Jesus "Son of David" and "King of Israel" had been disappointed by his crucifixion; but Paul still claimed him as the Christ, because (as he elaborately explains to the Thessalonians and the Corinthians) he confidently expected a second coming of Jesus in the clouds, to be a ruler and deliverer, armed with supernatural power and exercising absolute authority, and all this within Paul's lifetime. The writer of the Acts of the Apostles (long afterward) continued the use of Paul's favorite expression, "the Lord Jesus Christ"; and the various Christian Churches have continued its use in creed, sermon, and prayer to the present day. Moreover, in a vast majority of those Churches, nothing would sooner stamp a member as heterodox and apostate than a refusal to recognize Jesus as the Christ, or to accept him as rightfully ruler and Lord. I conclude, therefore, that such recognition and such acceptance are essential and specially characteristic parts of Christianity.

The Gospels represent that Jesus, after long solicitation by his disciples and apostles, first admitted that he was the Messiah, and afterward clearly claimed that dignity; and Mr. Chadwick, seeming to allow the correctness of this representation, assumes that he accepted Messiahship "in his own sense of the word," a sense "quite peculiar to himself," and thus different from the original one.

Such a claim as this really made by Jesus would carry great weight with it. If we could believe the orthodox assumption that those Gospels were written by inspiration of God, giving us the words of Jesus precisely as they were uttered, the matter would be very plain. But not only is this assumption proved unfounded and indefensible, but the critical research of the last forty years has thrown serious doubt upon the claims heretofore made in regard to the date and authorship of those narratives. The inquiries of Davidson in England, of Kuenen in Holland, and of Mr. Charles B. Waite in this country, conducted independently of each other, seem to make it doubtful whether either of those Gospels was written by any contemporary of Jesus, and of course very doubtful whether either his words or his meaning have always been correctly recorded.

Doubts like these will seem shocking to devotees of the orthodox creed and traditions, to whom the corroboration of them by farther research would appear to involve utter loss of the Sermon on the Mount and the Golden Rule. But the rationalist will understand that what we recognize as just and true, as noble and soul-inspiring, in the reported words of Jesus, will retain those qualities, and will remain our assured possession, whatever may be decided respecting the vehicle by which they come to us. Moreover, if the later criticism should prove correct, one real difficulty in regard to Jesus would be removed, since we might fairly attribute to errors in the record, rather than to Jesus himself, some of the mistakes which the Gospels represent him to have made: such as the declaration that Moses wrote of him; the reference to the Pentateuch and the Psalms as containing allusions to him; the allusion to an assumed statement of the Hebrew scriptures that he should be raised from the dead the third day; and predictions on his own account,—first, that he should lie three days and three nights in the earth, and afterward that he should come again in the clouds, with power and great glory, during the lifetime of those who heard him. That all these were mistakes is now certain. Thinking highly, as I do, of the wisdom as well as the goodness of Jesus, I should welcome any evidence fairly showing that neither these, nor the claim of Messiahship, were his mistakes.

It seems an unfortunate feature in Mr. Chadwick's definition of Christianity that it assigns to one who thinks so clearly and who speaks and writes with such logical precision as Francis E. Abbot a place which that gentleman distinctly and systematically repudiates. There are plenty of people too little introspective, and with too little mental development, rightly to appreciate their own position, either intellectually or spiritually. But Mr. Abbot is of a very different class.

Mr. Chadwick, I think, speaks too strongly when he says that "it is not origin and derivation, but use, that decides the right meaning of words." Both these factors should be considered in determining the right meaning. Sometimes one is predominant, sometimes the other. The most satisfactory cases are where popular use coincides with the appropriate derivative meaning. But it is also certain that many words are grossly misused in common speech and writing. We frequently hear the most ludicrous misapplication of the epithets "splendid," "magnificent," "perfectly lovely." The words "blasphemy," "blasphemer," "infidel," "atheist," are applied incorrectly far oftener than correctly in popular language. The word "freethinker," highly honorable by derivation, has become a vituperative epithet through pertinacious misuse. The word "restive" is generally used, even by practised writers, in a sense not only different from, but opposite to, its dictionary meaning. What I wish is that intelligent people, who appreciate the importance of accuracy in language, should make an effort to attain it in speech and writing, especially upon subjects so important and so much discussed as Christianity.

A WORD ABOUT EMERSON.

I was much interested in what was said about Emerson in the Index of February 24. As Mr. F. M. Holland suggests, the key to Emerson's thought is to be found in Schelling. Yet I do not think he was much indebted to that philosopher, except as his system was diluted through Coleridge. In fact, Emerson received the foundations of his thinking from the very same sources where Schelling obtained his leading ideas, in the Neo-Platonists and from the German mystics before the Reformation. Emerson early read Plotinus and Proclus, and everywhere the influence of their thought is to be seen in his pages. That influence may be seen in his Nature more distinctly than elsewhere. Soon after leaving the pulpit, he was reading Eckhart, Tauler, and Boehme, the great German mystics. Eckhart has been called the father of German thinking, and he is so more truly than any other. In him, both Schelling and Hegel found the beginning of their systems. In these three men, Emerson found the superstructure of his thinking. To the later philosophers, Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, I do not think he was very largely indebted. I am inclined to think the key to Emerson will be found in Eckhart. Yet it must not be forgotten that he has been wide-reaching in his absorption of the ideas of others, but, more than that, that he is largely an original thinker. He belongs undoubtedly in that line of thinkers who have followed down from Plato through the Neo-Platonists, Plotinus, Proclus, Eckhart, Tauler, Boehme, Schelling, Coleridge, and Alcott; but he is wider-minded than any of these men, and has built on this foundation, with materials gathered from many sources, an edifice of his own designing.

I was glad to read Mr. Mead's article, and remember how much I liked it a year ago, when it formed a portion of one of his lectures in Wesleyan Hall. I am sure there has been no change in Mr. Emerson's religious sentiments. His own neighbors at Concord scout the idea so much as to think it quite beneath recognition by a denial.

It occurs to me, in this connection, that those who criticise the philosophy of Emerson and Carlyle quite overlook our debt to those men. There are two methods of judging of a philosophy,—either as to its ability to stand the tests of experiment, logic, and reason, or as to the influence it has exerted in the world. By the last method, the intuitive or German philosophy does not come off so far short as some of its critics would have us think. The quickening, liberalizing power of this method of thought is everywhere felt in our century. Let any one read Hildebrand's lectures on "German Thought," who would know how deep and wide-reaching are the results of that method. In some of the best directions, the scientific method cannot show results that will at all compare with it. It has been one of the most fruitful movements the world has ever known. What it has accomplished ought to secure it a just recognition, and I am decidedly inclined to think that what it has accomplished is quite proof enough that it has not been superseded by the scientific method.

SPIRIT AND ORGANIZATION.

The doctrine that man is a spirit served by organs is as old as reflective thought, and is a probable and reasonable statement. Shakespeare says we are such stuff as dreams are made of, and our little life is rounded with a sleep. And any one who has ever dropped a sounding line into the depths of his own nature or exercised much self-introspection,

> "Becoming aware of his life's flow
> And hearing its winding murmur," will accept Shakespeare's diction as literally true. The primitive thinkers, or philosophers, as they modestly styled themselves, not pretending to win, but only to woo truth, upon subjecting the sensible world to the scrutiny of their reflective thought, pronounced it merely an appearance, solid-seeming as it looks and feels. They saw that to persons differently endowed in the matter of senses, or with an additional sense or senses, it would be no longer the world which it seems to be to us, constituted as we are at present, but quite another affair. The doctrine that we are essentially spirits is not a doctrine of yesterday, first announced by our soi-disant Spiritualists. It is as old, as we have said, as reflective thought. Power is an all-inclusive word in the universe, covering both mind and matter; and all force or power is in the last analysis spiritual. Light is strictly a spiritual fact of consciousness, for the vibrating ether is not luminous. Light, sound, odors, tastes, exist nowhere except in ourselves; for, in the sublime phrase of Lewes, "Nature, in her insentient solitude, is eternal darkness and eternal silence." The above proposition now goes without saying in this age of a dynamical philosophy of matter. Even extension itself is subjective. Matter is the pliant garment of spirit, which is constantly woven "in the roaring loom of Time." What is matter? Mill answers, "A human sensation." Not that we are all-in-all, because there is a Power, not ourselves, constantly interacting with our inner self, and thus producing the phenomenal world which environs us. Mill says our feelings and thoughts are the only things which we directly know to be real. Matter is a mere assumption to account for our sensations. Instead of the world containing us, it is being constantly created by us in connection with the eternal animating Power, for which or whom there is no name. Thus is modern thought, so far from being materialistic, as the theological reactionists affirm, idealizing matter, and thus > "Melts things which are to things which seem,

> And solid nature to a dream."

As the mountains, the cloud-bearing Alps and Andes, are in geological perspective attenuated into undulating vapor and fire-mist, so the science and thought of this century idealize matter into a vibratory force or power. Spiritualism, then, is not a word that can be degraded by charlatans or appropriated by them. It is a word of the sublimest import. Death, which Mill defines to be a mere cessation of the stimulus of the sensible world, makes us ghosts pure and simple, or clothes us with a more subtile, pervasive, and beautiful corporeity. But I do not propose to speculate upon "the land of souls," as Byron calls it, or "the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns," as a greater than Byron denominates it. Thither we all migrate, sooner or later, and migrate to stay. The migration is evidently not much of a journey. It is simply a change of corporeal costume. There is no occasion for a return to this sphere. The vulgar ghost belief is a morbid, subjective affair. Nervous disease and enthusiasm easily enable their subjects to see ghosts both sleeping and waking. A man who persistently outrages his nervous system by drunkenness and debauchery will, sooner or later, be brought to a bodily and mental condition in which he can realize Dante's Inferno, and find it no mere imagination of a great poet. Thus is nervous disease itself, whether the result of criminal self-abuse or not, a terrible witness to the supremacy of spirit over organization. In the light, then, of current physiology and psychology, the human body is literally a breathing-house, not made with hands, as Coleridge calls it, exactly adapted to the temporal and temporary use of the spirit or "inner man," who peers through its eyes as windows, makes the hands the executive organs of his will, the tongue the exponent of his thoughts, and ears and nostrils the avenues of distinct classes of sensations, pleasurable or otherwise. Brain, lungs, stomach, heart, and bowels are all organs of spirit, each with a special significance and function. The brain is as supreme in position as it is in function, it being the capital or crown of the corporeal shaft, and the chosen seat, with its intricate nerve-labyrinths, of the mind or regulative faculty, which is enthroned in it as in a citadel. The lungs give buoyancy, animation, and locomotiveness. The great Swedenborgian psycho-physiologist, Wilkinson, likens them to a balloon tethered in the chest. He says: "The breathing lungs are the barometer that indicate the peace or the power or the storm of the soul; the heart is the animal man himself; hearing is a new-born palace of the air, whose shakes are music and whose winds are speech. And the eye, round like the world and rolling on its axis, communes afresh with the whole possessions of light, and sees all, from the sun to the landscape, in the gloss of that glory which is an image of the truth."

THE cruelty of the Coercion Act is that it places two hundred thousand tenants, with holdings under ten acres, at the mercy of the landlords, who may evict them without compensation whenever they please; for, of course, one good harvest is not enough to enable arrears to be paid up which were caused by several bad ones. Already the landlords are gloating over their vengeance, and announcing that, now they have the government to protect them, they will act with energy,—or, in other words, turn thousands out of their homes to starve, as Mr. Gladstone said last year, on the road.—London Truth.

THE TREASURE AND THE HAND.

When I dive in the sea and return with no pearl,
As, all dripping, I come once again to the strand,
No complaint at the covetous sea do I hurl;
For I know that the blame is alone in my hand.
An abundance of pearls overspread the deep sand,
But an unlucky fortune has blinded my hand.
Over riches unsounded the bright billows curl,
And no curse but a blessing upon them I swirl.
Oh, I never will stand with the arrogant band
Who their fingers at Fate still conceitedly twirl.
Lord of Fate! let a smile from thy features unfurl,
And remove the unfortunate luck of my hand!

SELF-SURPRISE.

If thou wouldst know thyself as thou art known by God alone,
Conceive thyself as wholly to thyself unknown:
Then for thy secret traits in silent ambush lie,
And see what starts when strong temptations travel by.

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 31, 1881

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE friends of the Index can render us an important service in our efforts to increase its circulation, if they will kindly send us the addresses of persons anywhere who are likely to be interested in the paper. We will cheerfully send specimen numbers to such names.

AN association has been organized in Chicago, called the Colegrove Book Company, which is hereafter to undertake the publication of Unity, and will secure for it a better financial basis. We congratulate this liberal organ of "Western Unitarianism" on its improved prospects. The same company is also to publish Little Unity, which, being translated, means Unity for Little Folks.

WE must again remind our contributors of the limitations of our columns, and of the necessity of brevity. We have discovered a new meaning in the old saying, "Art is long." Judging from a pile of communications in our editorial drawer, for which each week we in vain seek room to print, it means the art of writing for newspapers. Patience, friends. Some of your productions will come at last, though, perhaps, in some cases curtailed of their fair proportions; and some of them may, alas! have become obsolete before there is any chance for them. Let us whisper a secret in your ear. If you want to see your article soon, make it short. Of course, you will make it good.

THE Western Unitarian Sunday School Society (office at 75 Madison Street, Chicago) has published a programme of an Easter service, arranged by Rev. Samuel Longfellow. It consists of selections for reading, hymns, and music, and, like all of Mr. Longfellow's work, is characterized by spiritual refinement, simplicity, and reverence. In doctrine, it is theistic, but not theologically Christian. The key-note of its thought is the renewal of life in nature and man, but it has nothing to say of the Christian legend of the resurrection of Jesus. Though meant specially for Sunday-schools, it would not be out of place in assemblies of older people. The Western society that publishes will furnish it at the rate of $2.50 for one hundred copies.

WASTED POWER.

We find in some of our Evangelical exchanges the statements that somewhat more than a million copies of the Bible are printed in the English language every year; that it has been translated into two hundred and twenty-six different languages and dialects; and that it is estimated there must be one hundred and fifty-four millions of copies in circulation throughout the world. By this calculation, the printing-press is producing more than three thousand English Bibles every day,—not counting the Sundays, when even the manufacture of Bibles has to stop. These figures furnish food for reflection.

We wish we had by us the means of making a correct estimate of the cost of these Bibles in money. Suppose we put it at only one dollar a copy, meaning by that the average cost of the manufacture of each Bible, Old and New Testament together, of all the many editions and sizes,—a sum, probably, much below the actual average. Even this would make the large sum of more than one million dollars spent annually in the production of Bibles in the English language alone. But what the actual cost may be is not the fact of chief importance in the point we wish now to make, which is this: Whatever the cost of producing this million of Bibles every year, it may be reduced to one one-hundreth part of itself without any loss, but rather benefit, to mankind; and the entire power physical and mental now expended in this business of Bible-manufacturing may be profitably reduced in the same proportion. The reasoning by which we arrive at this clear conclusion is in this manner.

The portions of the Bible, taking Old and New Testaments together, which are of real value for moral and spiritual use, are not more than one one-hundredth part of the whole. Even those people who read the Bible because they believe it given by special inspiration from God, if they read with true spiritual discernment and for spiritual profit, read only a comparatively small part of it. Now, if these portions were selected and printed in a volume by themselves, we should have all that is requisite for general circulation. We may concede, even from the most liberal point of view, that all the rest of the Bible may have a certain value to the archæologist and the historian. Though having little value as history, it may yet be valuable to history, especially to the history of religious development. And hence editions of the Bible in complete form would still be needed in general libraries and for the uses of scholarship. But, for general use, a little book, small enough to be carried conveniently in one's pocket, and yet printed in good type, would contain everything essential for moral instruction from the whole Bible.

And we venture to believe such a volume would get more readers, certainly more edified readers, than the Bible now gets. Of what possible use is it to read the Bible chapter after chapter in order, as is frequently done as a matter of duty, in families and churches and by individuals privately? Much of the time thus spent is simply wasted. Nay, it is worse than wasted; for the people do it with an idea of performing a religious duty, when there may be no religion nor benefit in the act whatever. We were once in a large boarding-school for boys where the Bible was publicly read in this way, morning and evening, in the assembled school. Nothing was omitted, not even the genealogies nor the driest chapters of Chronicles nor the bloodiest of Judges, nor the parts that to-day would be expurgated from all books intended to be read in the family circle. The exercise, we firmly believe, not only did no good, but did positive harm. We were taught to believe that this throughout was God's book, not to be questioned in any part or particular. And yet our hearts and consciences, if they acted at all, could not help questioning many things that we heard read from it. It was simply the superstition about the book as containing a special message from the heavens that kept up this irrational way of reading it, chapter after chapter, verse after verse, from Genesis to Revelation. Every part was alike held to be sacred, and read with the same unreasoning solemnity, and the same lack of moral and spiritual discrimination.

And the same superstitious belief about the Bible keeps up the printing of it entire, from first of Genesis to last of Revelation, at the rate of three thousand copies a day in the English tongue alone. Ninety-nine hundredths of each of these three thousand books, issued daily from the printing-press consist of matter that has no more bearing on humanity's moral and spiritual needs in this century than has a thousand years old Chinese Geography. Think of the enormous expenditure of time and labor and money thus wasted in the printing and multiplying of this vast mass of outgrown primitive literature! This theory of the Bible makes it, in fact, an idol, a fetich; and it is manufactured as such. But idols and fetiches can be made at much less cost. And it is quite time that the highest civilization of the world should have advanced beyond the idea that it is necessary for the salvation of mankind to reprint, by the million copies every year, every book and chapter and verse of the King James version of the Bible. If it is a question, not of fetich, but of moral and spiritual benefit, then from the same materials, for a hundredth part of the outlay, a better Bible could be made.

LIBERAL SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The subject of Sunday-school instruction seems to be arousing new interest in the liberal minds of the community. The excessive abuse of dogmatic theological instruction of the young created such a prejudice against these schools as led the last generation of liberals to dispense with them altogether. Mr. Emerson asked, "Why drag the dead weight of the Sunday-school?" and we mostly concluded to let it alone.

But, in the progress of time, we see that the religious nature must have food and guidance, and that, if we do not provide it for our children, they will get it elsewhere, and such as we do not wish them to have; and, as we rightly demand only secular instruction in the compulsory public school system, we must seek other means to furnish the young with what they require.

Without going more fully into the subject now, I wish to call attention to the lesson papers in the Index, which are being prepared to help teachers. It is extremely difficult to find a sufficient number of wise and experienced teachers for our schools. The young and inexperienced need a text to guide and help them. Mr. Janes' lessons furnish help to understanding the historical side of religion and its development in life; while Mr. Hinckley, by his admirable scientific lessons, is bringing up the other side, the relation to nature. These are good beginnings and preparations; but, in the Sunday-school, we ask that science shall be taught religiously,—that is, not alone as nature seen by the intellect, but as emblematic of spiritual truths. Yet, as Mr. Hinckley suggests by his questions, these thoughts should rather be awakened in the child's mind than given to him. So, too, the Sunday-school has not done its work, unless the great fact of Law in the Material World leads to the recognition of the Moral Law, the great principle of Duty.

Professor Hall is said to have commented upon the danger of leaving the instruction of religion in such inexperienced hands as is done in America. Any one willing to take a class in Sunday-school can do so, and hear the catechism or the lessons in a text-book; but really to make the school what a noble worker said lately one liberal Sunday-school had been to her, "an awakening into active moral life," requires the rarest and noblest qualities in a teacher. We are glad to find that our young people are hungering and thirsting for religious knowledge. Let us try to give them bread, not stone. E. D. C.

DR. NEWMAN'S BALAAMIC THEORY.

The Rev. Dr. J. P. Newman, widely known at one time as President Grant's minister, then as Chaplain of the United States Senate, subsequently Inspector of Consuls, etc., and now, we believe, pastor of a Methodist society in New York City, delivered a sermon to "an immense congregation" in Music Hall, Cincinnati, last May, on the comparative antiquity of the sacred books of the great religions of the world. The sermon is unique. Its fervid—we scarcely like to say bombastic—Methodist rhetoric brought down the house in repeated rounds of applause, and it has since been reprinted and commended as a "masterly discourse." We read the sermon with unusual interest, and can honestly commend it, if not as a masterly production, yet as thoroughly enjoyable reading,—enjoyable, that is, by any one who has a taste for opera bouffé, and who does not suffer from over-acute religious sensibilities. Newman concedes that the Bible is going to have a hard time; that the publication of the coming translations of the sacred books of the East will lead to quotations from them, and comparisons between them and the Bible. He admits, moreover, that in these books are to be found nearly all the fundamental doctrines of the Bible. He admits also that Confucius, Sakya-Muni, and others, including Plato and Socrates, have received a measure of the divine illumination; and that we must admit inspiration outside of the narrow circle of the Hebrew prophets and apostles. But he guards himself, he says: only the writers of the Bible have received "credentials" worthy our intelligent faith, although he apparently forgets to tell us anything of the nature of these supposed "credentials."

After these significant admissions, he lays down his main proposition, which is that "Moses has a clear margin of about three hundred years beyond the oldest of the writers of these other books." He assumes that, "if there is any fact that is fixed in the history of the world, it is this: that one thousand five hundred years before Christ Moses lived, that Moses wrote, that he wrote the Pentateuch, and that the Pentateuch has come down to us in all its integrity."

Having proved to his own satisfaction (by a rigid suppression of all unpleasant historic facts, and of all the results of modern Biblical criticism) that Moses has the "clear margin" above mentioned, his next task is to show in what way the "powerful truths" of the Pentateuch were propagated to the ends of the earth. And it is here that Dr. Newman's peculiar genius is exhibited in full strength. After speaking vaguely of the origin of the Hindus, of Hebrew colonies in China, of the extent of Solomon's kingdom, of the travels of Jewish merchants, etc., and giving the impression that in some way these things were related to and helped his argument, he refers to Zoroaster and Balaam as residents of neighboring lands, and asserts triumphantly that Balaam knew Moses, that Balaam saw the Pentateuch, and that Balaam therefore stands forth as the divinely appointed channel by which the stream proceeding from the Pentateuch, "the source of all the sweet promises that gladden the soul," was conducted to an expectant world.

No one, of course, can be so dead to every feeling of appreciation of the audaciously sublime as to ask for Dr. Newman's authority for the statements that Balaam knew Moses and that Balaam saw the Pentateuch. Genius of this kind is its own authority. And we know that nothing but what a very respectable journal calls "pure cussedness" could induce any one to be malicious enough to suggest that, according to the legend, the angel of the Lord told Balaam that, if his ass had not turned out of the way, he would have slain the soothsayer with a sword; and, therefore, a strict logical completion of this theory might require the credit of the world's salvation to be awarded to the keen insight of Balaam's ass. We purposely refrain from any attempt to improve or to comment upon this original Balaamic theory, and have written this brief account of it only to do what little we can to insure to Newman's brilliant discovery the measure of immortality which it surely deserves. SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

A new thing under the sun, so far as we know, has just been inaugurated in New York. It is nothing less important than a "School for Plumbers," just opened in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. It starts off with eighty-five pupils, and bids fair to be in every way a success. In view of the sanitary importance of good plumbing, and the evils attending poor work, we consider this a movement in the right direction, that should be imitated in every city.

We are glad to see that the State of Indiana, which has been somewhat backward in its benevolent enterprises, gives some promise of redeeming its character in this respect. A bill has been introduced into the Legislature to create a State Board of Health, and another provides for a State Board of Charities. In his inaugural address, the governor suggested the creation of a Board of Charities. Efforts are also making toward the regulation of the practice of medicine. A strong movement is on foot to provide a school for the seven hundred pauper children of the State, all of whom are now in the county poor-houses. All these movements show there are right-minded and right-hearted people in Indiana; but we believe none of these efforts have as yet been successful. It will take much agitation, in such a State, to secure these improvements; but persistent agitation will at last have its reward. One has but to encounter the deep-set apathy and bigotry in regard to such reforms, in a State like Indiana, to realize how great the need there is yet for benevolent work of a practical sort. Seven hundred children in pauper houses! What other comment is needed in regard to the humanitarian spirit of a great State, which permits such an evil within its borders? G. W. C.

The Christian Register contains this notice of a retiring professor at Cambridge, who has long been known, not only as one of the most learned and eminent ministers of the Unitarian denomination, but also distinguished in the literature of the country as an accomplished writer and thinker: "It is nine years since Dr. Hedge removed from his parish at Brookline to take the Chair of German at Cambridge. With the completion of his present course of lectures on German Literature, of which he is an acknowledged master, his connection with the University will cease, much to the regret of officers and students. A distinguished Professor of High German in Jena has been invited to succeed him, but has declined."

THE LEGENDS OF KRISHNA.

In response to my query as to the authority for the 25th of December being the birthday of Krishna, Jean Story refers me to Lemprière's Classical Dictionary,—not that that work names that day as the natal day of the Hindu god, but, since it indicates a resemblance between the deeds ascribed to Krishna and those related of Hercules, Apollo, and other solar deities, it was inferentially posited that his birthday would coincide with that of the other solar divinities. While it is true that that date has been assigned as the birthday of some of the various personifications of the solar mythos, yet all the sun-gods are not represented as being born thereupon. The appropriateness of the selection of that day therefor is apparent, still such selection was not universal. The 25th of December being the day when the first perceptible lengthening of the day obtains, the day when the increased power of the solar rays first became apparent, after their gradual diminution through the autumnal months, culminating in their greatest decrease upon the 21st of December,—mythically denominated the death of the sun-god,—it was natural and fitting, in the language of nature-worship, that the twenty-fifth should be hailed as the day upon which the sun-god was annually reborn into renewed vigor and glory.

While one or two generations back Lemprière's Bibliotheca Classica was a standard work of reference, of late years, of course, it has been superseded largely by other and newer classical dictionaries. It was first published as far back as 1788, its author having died in 1824; and, even with Mr. Anthon's revision, it remains in many particulars antiquated and incomplete. Anthon's Classical Dictionary is much superior to it, while in England, as Chambers' Encyclopædia tells us, it "ceased to possess any intrinsic value after the publication of the magnificent classical dictionaries edited by Dr. William Smith." "The rising generation is forgetting" the name of Lemprière, "and it will soon become vox et præterea nihil," the same authority informs us.

When Lemprière wrote, very little was known, comparatively, of Hindu literature and mythology; and the hieroglyphics of Egypt and the cuneiform inscriptions of Babylonia had not been deciphered: hence, the many errors and misleading propositions in his and other works of the last two or three generations. Comparative mythology was in a crude and ill-digested condition till within the last generation of scholars, while comparative philology is entirely the outbirth of the nineteenth century. Previous to the time of Schlegel, the latter can scarcely be said to have had an existence. The resemblances between the mythologies of India and Egypt are not so extensive nor so striking as at first supposed: indeed, in many respects they are more apparent than real, consisting of superficial analogies rather than actual identity; while other supposed resemblances, due to the imperfect state of our knowedge a few years back, are now, in the light of present-day scholarship, known to have been entirely unreal, without existence in fact.

Hindu literature gives no countenance to the statement that Krishna was born December 25: on the contrary, the Pauranik writings, the only works referring to its date, state that his birth occurred on the eighth day of the month Bhádra (August-September). The anniversary of his birth is celebrated in India on this day as a great festival (Monier Williams' Indian Wisdom, p. 334). If Krishna be regarded as a sun-god, still no trace exists in India of such a date as the modern Christmas having been assigned as his day of birth. It is possible that the date really given for his birth may have some connection with the nature-worship of India, but so far I have been unable to trace it.

It is by no means certain that Krishna is a solar deity: indeed, I think the preponderance of Orientalists regard him a warrior of the Yádava race, deified in after years by the Bráhmans. Some authorities, however, look upon him as a myth. Dr. Tiele thinks him "the hidden sun-god of the night, always connected in the Epos with the light Arjuna, the visible sun-god"; and J. Talboys Wheeler says that the stories concerning Krishna in the Mahá-Bhárata, in which he figures as a prince and warrior, have no direct connection with the narrative, and are later interpretations. There is no doubt that the stories of the later exploits of Krishna in that poem are additions to the original narrative, but that all the accounts of his connection with the Pándavas in the great Bhárata war are subsequent interpretations admits of great doubt. Scholars, then, are divided upon the question of Krishna's identity,—one section regarding him as an historical character, a popular Indian hero, deified long after his death; while the other think him one of the nature-gods of ancient India, a night-god (Krishna means, in Sanskrit, black or dark blue), subsequently transformed into an earthly hero, prince, and warrior. The popular misconceptions concerning Krishna, he being regarded as a religious teacher and reformer, akin in spirit to Jesus and Buddha, have their origin in the zealous efforts of certain uncritical and (it may be said) unscrupulous opponents of Christianity to have the world believe that the history and legends of Jesus the Christ are borrowed from the life of Krishna. Hindu literature completely negatives the idea of Krishna being really or ideally a religious teacher or reformer; and the asserted parallels between Christ and Krishna (often either ignorantly or designedly misspelled Christna or Cristna) exist, for the most part, but in the imaginations of those describing them. In the Bhagavad-Gitá (that is "Holy Poem"), a comparatively modern production, it is true Krishna, in his character of an incarnation of Vishnu, or rather as Vishnu himself, is made to indulge in a long philosophical disquisition upon theological and mythological subjects; but this work has really little or no connection with the popular Krishna cultus, the author having simply used the personality of Krishna as a mouthpiece for the expression of his peculiar philosophical conceptions. He belonged to the eclectic school of Indian philosophy, and wrote the Bhagavad to reconcile the conflicting views of different philosophical systems of his country, which he did by attempting to graft the Sankhya and Yoga doctrines upon those of the Vedánta. To gain currency for his work, it was attributed to Krishna. The life of Krishna, however, as found in the Purá-nas and the Mahá-Bhárata, lends no countenance to the proposition that he ever acted as a teacher or reformer in religion, licentiousness and other immorality staining his entire life.

RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCES.

"And he said unto them, The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath."—MARK ii., 27, 28.

1. Jesus and the Sects.

In his doctrine of the future life, the resurrection, and speedy coming of the KINGDOM OF GOD, JESUS more nearly resembled the PHARISEES than either of the other JEWISH sects. The ESSENES, with whom he has sometimes erroneously been identified, are nowhere mentioned in the NEW TESTAMENT.

In his contempt for the mere formalities of outward observance (Matt. xv., 1–20; xxiii., 1–33; Mark vii., 1–23; Luke xi., 37–54), he differed widely from both these sects; while he was still further removed in his doctrines and in his life from the conservative sect of the SADDUCEES, who rejected the belief in a resurrection and life after death, and believed "neither in angels nor spirits." (Acts xxiii., 8; compare Mark xii., 18; Matt. xxii., 23.)

The disciples of JESUS were of the common people, who generally accepted the PHARISAIC doctrines. He associated familiarly with some members of this sect, visiting them, and sitting at meat with them. (Luke vii., 36; xi., 37.) Yet his stern denunciation of their hypocrisies and formalities brought him often in conflict with them, and made them his enemies. They are represented as tempting him often, and seeking his destruction, while he baffled their shrewd questions by his wise and ingenious replies. (Matt. ix., 11; xii., 2; xv., 1–9; xvi., 1–6; xix., 3–9; etc.) He rebuked them for testing his prophetic mission by demanding miraculous signs and wonders (Mark viii., 10–12; Matt. xii., 38, 39; xvi., 1–4; Luke xi., 16, 29, 30), and declared RIGHTEOUS LIVING to be the only true and saving test. (Matt. v., 20.)

NOTE.—SECTS, SECTARIANISM: What is the origin and meaning of the word "SECT"? Why are Protestant CHRISTIANS divided into so many sects, while the Catholics are united? What is the nature of the fundamental differences between the sects? What do you think of the Protestant doctrine of "the right of private judgment"? Is not RATIONALISM the logical outcome of this doctrine?

UNITARIANISM: Is it a sect, based upon a dogma (say of "the Lordship of JESUS"), excluding those who disbelieve in this dogma? Or is it a rational movement, universal in its scope, and consistent with absolute mental freedom? Which of these ideas does the name represent to YOU?

ROME and REASON: Are not all the different Christian sects simply way stations on the road from Catholicism to Rationalism? How does Rationalism abolish the sectarian spirit? What is the meaning of FREE RELIGION?

2. Sabbath Observance.

JESUS differed widely from all the Jewish sects, and from the LAW itself, in regard to the strict religious observance of the SABBATH. He nowhere recognizes one day as more holy than another. He declared it right to heal the sick, to carry burdens, to pluck ears of corn, and to do other works on the SABBATH, contrary to the teaching of the Jews. (Mark ii., 23–26; iii., 1–6; Matt. xii., 1–7, 9–14; Luke vi., 1–4, 6–11; xiv., 1–6; John v., 5–16; ix., 1–14.) He affirmed the superiority of MAN to the LAW, saying, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath."

In enumerating the essential commandments to the young man who inquired, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" he nowhere mentions the commandment to keep the Sabbath day. (Mark x., 17–20; Matt. xix., 16–21; Luke xviii., 18–21.) Doubtless, he would have agreed that it was a wise and salutary custom to set apart one day in seven for rest, and for thought upon subjects apart from the ordinary labors of life; but he appears to have rejected all claims for the special sanctity of the SABBATH, as did the older HEBREW prophets. (Isa. i., 13–17; Amos v., 21.) According to the FOURTH GOSPEL, he also denied the legend that GOD rested on the seventh day, after having labored six days in creating the world, saying, "My Father worketh HITHERTO, and I work." (John v., 17.)

NOTE.—The religious observance of SUNDAY, or the first day of the week, is nowhere suggested or authorized in the NEW TESTAMENT. This custom grew out of the usage of the early CHRISTIANS, subsequent to the time of JESUS, who frequently met on this day for social and religious purposes. When the legend of the resurrection took form, it was believed that JESUS rose from the dead on this day. Its final adoption and legal sanction by the Church was a contribution from Pagan ROME, where the worship of JESUS, and the symbolism of the resurrection, naturally supplanted the ritual and worship of the SUN-GOD, to whom this day was previously dedicated. The PURITAN custom of identifying this day with the Jewish Sabbath is of comparatively recent origin.

Ought not all days to be deemed EQUALLY SACRED, too holy for the doing of any unjust or unkindly deed? Yet is not the regular day of rest a rational and beneficent institution for hard-working people? What do you know of the "SUNDAY laws" of Massachusetts and other States? Ought they to be repealed? Ought not libraries and other useful public institutions to be kept open on SUNDAY?

3. Prayer.

JESUS taught his disciples that whatsoever they should ask of the HEAVENLY FATHER in faith would be granted them, even though it were the removal of a mountain. (Mark xi., 23–26.) He appears, however, to have condemned the practice of praying aloud in the SYNAGOGUES, or in other public places, and to have forbidden the use of "vain repetitions" and "much speaking." (Matt. vi., 5–8.) He commanded complete seclusion and secrecy in praying (Matt. vi., 6); and this was apparently in accordance with his own practice. (Matt. xxvi., 36, 39, 42, 44; Mark vi., 46; xiv., 32, 35, 39; Luke xviii., 13; xxii., 41.) The form of prayer which he commended to his disciples voices simply the natural desires of men for daily sustenance, the forgiveness of trespasses or debts, and deliverance from temptation; while it recognizes the sacredness of the thought of GOD, the HEAVENLY FATHER, and pleads for the speedy advent of his KINGDOM on the earth. (Matt. vi., 9–3; compare Luke xi., 1–4; Mark xi., 24–26.)

NOTE.—Consider JESUS' idea of prayer. Is it consistent with the conception of a UNIVERSE governed by law? Can we rationally pray for bread, expecting any answer save through natural sources of supply? Is it reasonable to pray for rain or fair weather, or any deviation from the ordinary working of NATURAL LAWS? If these laws are simply GOD'S method of working, would not such a prayer be not only irrational, but sacrilegious? Is there any escape from the result of trespasses against these laws?

What sort of PRAYER, then, remains to the rational believer? Does not the prayer of aspiration, hope, and trust still remain? May not prayer be offered as an act of worship,—an offering to DEITY rather than a vain supplication for favors?

Would you, with JESUS, reject all formal and public prayers? Is not the helpfulness of prayer to the individual the best test of its value? Are not all men naturally prayerful? Can we reason away this instinctive longing for better things? Can an ATHEIST pray? Is not every noble aspiration, hope, and devout wish a prayer? What do you think of Professor TYNDALL'S "prayer gauge" proposition?

General Questions.

1. With what Jewish sect was JESUS in closest agreement? 2. Wherein did he differ from the PHARISEES? 3. The ESSENES? 4. The SADDUCEES? 5. With which sect did he most associate? 6. Why did he denounce the Jewish sects? 7. Are there any "Scribes and Pharisees" among us? 8. How did JESUS regard Sabbath observance? 9. What did he say of the legend that GOD rested on the seventh day after creating the world? 10. What did JESUS teach regarding prayer? 11. Did he approve of formal or public prayers? 12. What is "the LORD'S PRAYER"? 13. Can you tell how the ordinary version of this prayer is modified in the new translation of the NEW TESTAMENT?

To the Teacher.

Read the little pamphlet "On a Foundation for a Religion," published by GEO. H. ELLIS, Boston; also The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, published by the Free Religious Association; and lectures on "The Best Use of Sunday," by Rev. JOHN W. CHADWICK and Rev. M. J. SAVAGE.

Read also the sermons on "Prayer" in CHADWICK'S Faith of Reason and SAVAGE'S Religion of Evolution.
