
A WEEKLY PAPER,

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

VOLUME I. (New Series.)

BOSTON, MASS.:

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 TREMONT PLACE.

1880–1881.

Digitized by Google

CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

ESSAYS AND OTHER LEADING ARTICLES.

Our Fourth Anniversary, Felix Adler, Ph.D. ... 2
Free Religion as a Gospel, F. H. ... 18
Dinner to Francis E. Abbot ... 50
Soldiers' Memorial Sermon, Wm. J. Potter ... 62
Forever: Immortality, W. H. Boughton, Esq. ... 74
The Zoroastrian Influence on Judaism and Christianity. Lewis G. Janes ... 86
The Zoroastrian Influence on Judaism and Christianity (Concluded), Lewis G. Janes ... 98
Fichte, and the Emphasis of the Moral Ego, Mrs. C. K. Sherman ... 110
The Force behind Nature, Wm. B. Carpenter ... 122
Generation and Degeneration in Religion, Wm. J. Potter ... 134
Another Witness, F. H. ... 140
Concord School of Philosophy, Mrs. Ellen M. Mitchell ... 146
Morality and Religion, E. D. Stark, Esq ... 158
Three Phases of Free Religion, F. H. ... 163
Prison Ethics, Frederic A. Hinckley ... 170
Progress and Poverty, R. H. M. ... 182
Scientific Religion, Albert L. Leubuscher ... 194
Women's Congress, F. H ... 199
The "Genesis of the Deities," Wm. H. Spencer ... 206
Mr. F. E. Abbot's Retirement, B. R.; Is It So? W. G. B. ... 209
The Obligations of Liberal Faith, Wm. J. Potter ... 218
The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer, B. F. Underwood ... 230
The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer (Concluded), B. F. Underwood ... 242
Discourse in West Church, on Lydia Maria Child, C. A. Bartol, D.D. ... 254
The Workingman's School, Felix Adler, Ph.D ... 266
What is the Religion of Humanity? Moncure D. Conway, M.A. ... 278
Funeral Ceremonies for Karl Heinzen (Trans. from the German), Miss M. A. Hardaker ... 290
The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer, Van Buren Denslow, LL.D. ... 302
American Womanhood, Wm. J. Potter ... 314
The Anti-Jewish Agitation in Germany, Prof. Felix Adler, ... 326
The Reign of Secularism, John H. Clifford ... 338
The American Doctrine of State and Church, Rev. Chas. W. Wendte ... 350
The Sphinx; or, The Problem of Life, George Chainey ... 362
Words, W. H. Boughton ... 374
Protest of Chinese Bishops and Missionaries, London Times ... 386
Elements of Heroism, Wm. J. Potter ... 398
The Religion of our Literature, Edwin D. Mead ... 410
An Eternal Principle underlying the Diversities of Moral Judgment, Prof. Felix Adler ... 422
Farewell Discourse, S. B. Weston ... 434
Are we still Christians? John W. Chadwick ... 446
Theism and Materialism, Felix Adler, Ph.D. ... 458
The Great Debate, T. W. Curtis ... 470
The Plaint of Ireland, Newton M. Mann ... 482
Hypocrisy in English Religion, Edw. C. Towne ... 494
Letter from a Liberal to an Orthodox Mother, L ... 506
"Science and Spiritualism," Wm. Emmette Coleman ... 518
The Ascent of Life, Wm. J. Potter ... 530
The Function of Issuing Notes, Emily J. Leonard ... 542
English Secularism, Geo. Jacob Holyoake ... 554
Facts about Hegel, Frederic May Holland ... 566
Ideal and Personal Beauty, Wiley Britton ... 578
Fourteenth Annual Meeting ... 590, 602, 614, 626

EDITORIALS.

The Opportunity ... 6
The Testimonial to Mr. Abbot, D. H. C. ... 8
Is the Alphabet at Fault? ... 18
Enthusiasm: Is it out of Date? ... 30
Important Issues ... 42
Co-operative Colonization, D. H. C. ... 43
Science and Christianity ... 54
Five Points of Free Religion; Trustees of Free Religious Index. ... 66
The Fete of Liberty ... 67
The Unitarians in Camp ... 78
A Religious Panic, D. H. C. ... 79
Equality in Human Conditions; What are the Facts? D.H.C. ... 90
The "Seawanhaka" Disaster ... 91
Two Needs ... 102
Mr. Thos. Hughes; The Svornost; Sunday Excursion ... 103
The "Mistake" of Foreign Missions ... 114
Meeting of the American Association for the Advance of Science, D. H. C ... 116
The Good of Missions ... 126
Insincerity in the Pulpit, D. H. C. ... 127
Boston's Two Hundred and Fifty Years; Mr. Francis E. Abbot ... 138
The Speech of President Hayes ... 139
The Social Scientists at Saratoga, D. H. C. ... 140
Liberty under Law; Mr. Richard Grant White ... 150
The National Liberal League ... 162
Keeping the Commandments ... 163
Liberal League Objects; As Mr. Wakeman sees it ... 174
A Spiritualist Spasm ... 175
Scientists and Metaphysicians ... 186
A Christianized Constitution ... 198
Bearing False Witness; Lydia Maria Child; Postmaster General Maynard ... 210
Mrs. Child's Bequests; Spiritualism and Science ... 222
The Catholics and the Public Schools ... 234
The Late Episcopal Convention, D. H. C. ... 235
Notice to Subscribers; Lucretia Mott ... 246
The "Associated Charities," D. H. C. ... 247
F. R. A. Lecture Work; The Chicago Conference on State Secularization; The Sunday Question Abroad, D. H. C. ... 258
Pulpit Ethics ... 270
After Thanksgiving, D. H. C. ... 271
The Irrepressible Conflict ... 282
Christian Arrogance; "Pharisees" with a Difference ... 294
Shall the Deed be Done? Reasons for Co-öperation among Liberals ... 306
Falsehood in the Pulpit ... 307
How it may be Prevented ... 318
The Deed Done; The Lesson of It ... 330
Moral Obligations of Liberalism; Orthodox Congratulations ... 342
Additional Words on the Sale of Parker Memorial Hall ... 354
Mr. Johnson's Letter; A Difference in Mental Atmospheres, D. H. C. ... 366
Will Free Religion create a Church? ... 390
Comments on Mr. Johnson's Letter ... 391
The Line drawn again between Unitarianism and Free Religion ... 402
Our Lecture Bureau; "Sweet Bells jangled out of Tune," D. H. C ... 414
Dr. Hammond on Miracles; The Deed not Done ... 426
Further Words concerning Liberal Organizations ... 438
Northampton's New Legacy, D. H. C. ... 439
Interpretation of Wills and Creeds ... 450
Science on Sunday, D. H. C. ... 451
Christian or Not; Civil Service Reform ... 462
Wasted Power ... 474
Worth and Work ... 486
The Twenty-eighth Congregational Society and Articles of Faith; Religion in Schools, D. H. C. ... 498
A Law that needs Reform ... 510
The Present Status of Spiritualism; Sunday Lectures in Cincinnati ... 522
An Ecclesiastical Wave, D. H. C. ... 534
To the Friends of the Free Religious Index; Harvard College and its Chaplain ... 546
Different Conclusions, D. H. C. ... 547
The Approaching Annual Meeting ... 558
Anti-Religionists, D. H. C. ... 559
The New New Testament; Roscoe Conkling, D. H. C. ... 570
The Annual Convention; Anniversary Week, D. H. C. ... 582
The Law of Heredity ... 594
Fellowship in Freedom ... 606
Morality and the Science of Morality ... 618
A Corner-stone of Faith ... 630

SPECIAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

An Apologue, M. J. S.; Classics of Free Religion, No. I., J. A. ... 7
The Sadness of Unbelief, S. A. U.; Notes from the Field, B. F. U. ... 31
Our Library, No. I., F. M. H. ... 44
Are the Spirits Plagiarists? J. A.; The Religious Education of the Young, W. H. S. ... 67
A Note from Mr. Underwood ... 79
What shall Liberals teach their Children about God? W. H. S. ... 91
Letter from Mrs. Cheney; Our Library, No. II., F. M. H. ... 103
Punch and Judy, R. C ... 114
The Politics of Reformers, B. F. U. ... 115
Classics of Free Religion, No. II., J. A. ... 116
A Welcome Letter, O. B. Frothingham; What shall Liberals teach their Children about God? W. H. S ... 127
The Soul cornered at Last, J. A. ... 128
"Insincerity in the Pulpit," W. H. S. ... 139
Our Library, No. III., F. M. H ... 151
Consciousness considered as a Sense, D. S. Grandin, M.D. ... 159
The Revision of the Bible, E. D. C ... 187
The Light of Asia, W. H. S. ... 188
Some Lessons of the "Women's Congress," S. A. U. ... 199
The Anti-Reformers, C. D. B. M. ... 211
A Letter from Colorado, B. F. U. ... 213
Ingersoll and the Authorities on "Repeal," B. F. U. ... 223
Our Library, No. IV., F. M. H ... 224
Karl Heinzen, E. D. C. ... 259
An Old Voice heard again, F. E. Abbot ... 272
Our Library, No. V., F. M. H ... 283
Reminiscences of Lucretia Mott, C. D. B. M. ... 295
Texts and Bibles, M. J. Savage ... 307
The Educational Problem, R. C ... 319
Atheism in Colleges, F. E. Abbot ... 331
George Eliot's Marriage, E. D. C.; Our Sunday-schools, S. A. U. ... 343
The Anti-Jewish Mania in Germany, W. H. S. ... 335
Our Library, No. VI., F. M. H ... 367
Religious Culture of the Young, E. D. C ... 369
Parker Memorial Hall, E. D. C.; Helpful and Harmful Doubt, W. H. S. ... 379
Our Library, No. VII., F. M. H. ... 404
Col. Ingersoll and the Secular Association, B. F. U. ... 415
Unitarianism defined, John W. Chadwick ... 425
Channing-Parker Memorial, W. H. S.; Notes from the Field, B. F. U. ... 427
The Negative in Debate, B. F. U ... 437
Orthodox Apologetics, M. J. Savage ... 439
Will it Organize? C. D. B. M ... 451
The Scientific Theory of Morals, B. F. U.; Our Library, No. VIII., F. M. H ... 463
The Nihilists, F. M. H ... 465
Liberal Sunday-schools, E. D. C ... 474
Dr. Newman's Balaamic Theory, R. C. ... 475
Our Library, No. IX., F. M. H ... 487
Jesus and Christianity, John White Chadwick ... 499
In Memoriam, E. D. C ... 510
Alexander II., F. M. Holland; The Insolence of Arrogance, B. F. U.; Science Note, R. C. ... 511
A Suggested Basis of Union, R. C.; Our Library, No. X., F. M. H ... 523
Mrs. King's Principle of Nature, F. M. H.; Comstock's "Frauds Exposed," F. E. Abbot ... 535
"An Ecclesiastical Wave," M. J. Savage ... 547
The Western Unitarian Conference, R. C.; Notes from the West, C. D. B. M ... 559
Answers to Certain Questions, John W. Chadwick ... 571
European Evolution, Albert Warren Kelsey ... 571
State and Church in the United States, F. M. H ... 594
Our Library, No. XI., F. M. H ... 607
Theism and Pessimism, Felix Adler ... 618
Liberty in Unitarianism, W. H. S ... 630
The Moral of Œdipus, E. D. C ... 631
Practical Preaching, J. P. T ... 631

CONTRIBUTIONS.

Clement D. Newman, L. G. J. ... 19
The Limits of Philosophical Inquiry, Daniel Corey ... 59
Pantheistic Views, S. H. Morse ... 100
Liberal Orthodoxy in Brooklyn, J ... 106
Prosper Merimée, Ellen M. Mitchell ... 112
Mr. Weiss on Immortality and Evolution, W. M. S ... 136
Liberal Orthodoxy in Brooklyn, J ... 137
An Answer to Thinon's Question, Mary Stacy Withington ... 148
Dr. Tanner defended, Warren Griswold ... 161
Fichte's Idea of Marriage, Ellen M. Mitchell ... 173
Crumbling Corner-stones, C. K. W. ... 183
From an Occasional Correspondent, Geo. E. Baxter; The Lord's Prayer answered, C. H. H. ... 185
From England, E. C. T. ... 195, 292, 303
Liberal Movements in Brooklyn, J ... 202
The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism, Epes Sargent ... 219
Insincerity in the Unitarian Pulpit, Credens ... 231
Concerning Faith and Hope, C. K. W. ... 243
Catholics as Mayors, M. McGowin ... 250
"Insincerity in the Unitarian Pulpit," Francis; The Lord's Prayer, C. H. H. ... 257
State Rights, Henry Doty Maxon ... 260
"Insincerity in the Pulpit," R. H ... 268
A Spiritualist's Word, Wm. Emmette Coleman ... 281
A Liberal Sunday-school, L. G. J. ... 297
A Reason for not coöperating with Liberals, H. Clay Neville; Another Tribute to Karl Heinzen, Clara Neymann ... 304
Christmas, Jean Story ... 315
The "Monday Lectureship," Elsie, Radical ... 316, 339, 350, 364, 376, 387, 399, 411
Religious Culture of the Young, F. A. H. ... 320
George Eliot, M. A. H. ... 340
Some of the Reasons Why, G. W. S. ... 350
Science and Philosophy, W. H. Boughton ... 353
The Reformed Episcopal Church, Credens ... 363
"The Lesson of It,"—Another View, Samuel Johnson ... 364
A Letter to Mr. B. F. Underwood ... 365
Mechanical Invention as a Civilizer, G. W. C. ... 369
English Affairs, Literary and Political, Geo. Jacob Holyoake; The Pulpit in a False Position, R. H. ... 375
A Monument to Shelley, B. W. B. ... 376
The Birthday of Krishna, Wm. Emmette Coleman ... 377
The Schoolmaster, rs. the Priest ... 387
The "Free Churches" and Transcendentalism, Samuel Johnson; Reminiscence, C. K. W ... 388
Dr. James McCosh, B. W. B ... 399
Reply to William Emmette Coleman, Jean Story ... 400
Consciousness and Philosophy, A. N. Adams; Blasphemy in Delaware, ; A Visit to George Jacob Holyoake, E. H. Warren ... 412
Among the Americans, Geo. J. Holyoake ... 416
Karl Heinzen Memorial, J. A. Sprague ... 423
Is Free Religion in Rhode Island?  ... 424
Unitarianism Defined, John W. Chadwick ... 425
Among the Americans, Geo. J. Holyoake ... 429, 453
The "Old Societies" and the "New" again, Samuel Johnson ... 436
Sargent, Zoellner, and Spiritualism, ; Liberal Organization, David Newport ... 437
The Limits of the Decision in the Leicester Society Case, George A. Thayer; Another View of the Referees' Decision, J. E. Oliver ... 448
The Future of Theodore Parker's Society, M. A. H. ... 460
Washington and Jefferson, B. W. B.; Religious Creeds and Some Consequences, C. H. H. ... 461
Among the Americans, Geo. J. Holyoake ... 465, 488
Christianity: Mr. Chadwick's Definition of it, C. K. W. ... 472
A Word about Emerson, Geo. W. Cooke; Spirit and Organization, B. W. B. ... 473
The Legends of Krishna, Wm. Emmette Coleman ... 475
George Eliot's Marriage, T. W. Curtis; The Middlesex Institute, C.; Not "Christians," J. A. J. Wilcox; Answers to Questions, C. K. W. ... 484
Murder as a Method of Reform, D. A. Wasson; Mr. T. W. Curtis and the Meadville Theological School ... 495
The Leicester Case: a Question, J. S. Thomson ... 496
How to make Sunday Useful, C. K. W. ... 507
Robert Owen, Elizabeth Oakes Smith; The Value of the Whole Bible ... 508
Among the Americans, Geo. J. Holyoake ... 512, 525
From an Occasional Correspondent, Canadian; Letter from Lawrence, Kansas, Radical ... 513
Inuendo as a Method of Argument, Benj. R. Tucker; Another Word on the Christian Name, J. A. J. Wilcox ... 520
Russian Nihilism: What does it mean? Lewis G. Janes ... 531
A Question and a Word, Credens; Free Thinkers who lack Faith in their Principles, H. Clay Neville ... 532
Bibles, B. W. B. ... 555
Mr. Bowen answered, T. W. Curtis; Misuse of Words, Wm. H. Tillinghast ... 556
Dr. Stanley Hall on the Religious Situation in Germany and America, E. D. M. ... 543
Progress and Poverty, R. Hill; Basis of Union, Charles Ellis ... 544
A Fragment of the Religion of the Future, Imogene C. Fales. ... 567
"Belief in God," D. C.; Political vs. Intellectual Power, B. W. B. ... 568
Is Moses a Myth? Wm. Emmette Coleman ... 580
Carlyle and Poetry, Elizabeth Oakes Smith ... 581
Mr. Mead and the Christian Name, W. M. Salter ... 591
Mr. John White Chadwick's Answers reviewed, Carl H. Horsch ... 592
Liberal Newspapers, H. Clay Neville ... 593
The Corona and the Zodiacal Light, Wm. Emmette Coleman ... 596
Fragment of the Religion of the Future, No. II., Imogene C. Fales ... 605
Was it Well Done? Loring Moody ... 608
Messianic Theories, C. K. W.; "Is Moses a Myth?" B. W. B. ... 616
Religion, M. L. Holbrook, M.D. ... 617
From a Strolling Contributor, Charles Ellis ... 620
Reason vs. Superstition, B. W. Ball ... 628

Digitized by Google

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Another View of Liberal Newspapers, E. H. Bartlett..... 629
Divine Motherhood and Fatherhood, Franklin Smith..... 629
From our Canada Correspondent, *..... 33
From our Brooklyn Correspondent, J..... 64
From Occasional Correspondents..... 118
From our Montreal Correspondent, * 118
From Mrs. Dall on a Journey..... 165
From an American Lady in Paris, Rosa L. Segur..... 237
From our Regular Correspondent, Thinon..... 4
" " " " † 47
" " " " B..... 81
" " " " E. B 89
" " " " 129
" " " " Thinon..... 153
" " " " E. B..... 177
" " " " B..... 189
" " " " E. B..... 197
" " " " E. B..... 221
" " " " B..... 249
" " " " Thinon 261
" " " " B..... 274
" " " " E. B..... 286
" " " " Rosa L. Segur..... 346
" " " " Thinon..... 369
" " " " B..... 380
" " " " E. B..... 393
" " " " Rosa L. Segur..... 405
" " " " " " " 441
" " " " B..... 454
" " " " E. B..... 465
" " " " Rosa L. Segur..... 500
" " " " E. B 524
" " " " Rosa L. Segur..... 548
" " " " B..... 572
" " " " E. B..... 620
Bleicherode am Harz, Rosa L. Segur..... 609

BOOK NOTICES.

The Immortal Life; The Morals of Evolution; Life and Letters of Horace Bushnell..... 5
An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion 21
Delphic Days; The Faith of Reason..... 33
The Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews..... 46
Strange Stories; Rhine Roamings..... 64
Mind in the Lower Animals in Health and Disease..... 65
Fate of Republics..... 81
The Life and Writings of Henry Thomas Buckle..... 82
English Conferences of Ernest Renan; Ingersoll in Canada 88
Institute Essays; The Life, Speeches, and Public Services of Gen. James A. Garfield..... 112
Talks about Jesus..... 124
The Origin and Growth of Religion as illustrated in the Religion of Ancient Egypt..... 135
"Unity Clubs," or Mutual Improvement Societies in Town and Church; Immortality and our Employments Hereafter; The Vote Map..... 136
Reminiscences of Wm. Ellery Channing, D.D..... 149
Scotch Sermons..... 159
American Newspaper Directory..... 161
Hints of Home Reading; Ultima Thule..... 172
A Directory of Charitable and Benevolent Organizations of Boston 173
History of the English People..... 184
German Thought from the Seven Years' War to Goethe's Death; Substantialism, or Philosophy of Knowledge.... 196
The Christian Religion, or Thoughts for the Buddhists of Burmah..... 197
The English Poets; St. Aspenquid of Mt. Agamenticus..... 208
Revue des Deux Mondes; The Creation and the Early Developments of Society; Dramatic Idyls..... 220
The Real Presence..... 221
Fragments of Christian History; After Dogmatic Theology, What? Unity Hymns and Chorals for the Congregation and the Home 233
History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; Half a Century..... 244
Fugitive Slave Law Days..... 245
The Dramatic Works of Bayard Taylor..... 261
The Early History of Chas. Jas. Fox..... 269
The Life and Times of Goethe; Little Women; A Guernsey Lily; The Spell-bound Fiddler; Poems of the Life Beyond and Within..... 280
Witchcraft of New England explained by Modern Spiritualism; Verses; Christmas Day and All the Year..... 298
A Fool's Errand; Bricks without Straw..... 304
India; Motherhood; Eyes Right; What Darwin saw in his Voyage round the World in the Ship "Beagle"; The Story of the United States Navy for Boys..... 305
Poems..... 316
Memoir of Governor Andrew; Reminiscences of a Journalist; Certain Men of Mark 317
Sketches and Reminiscences of the Radical Club of Chestnut Street..... 333
Four O'clocks 334
Historical Sketches of Andover..... 341
Man's Moral Nature; Self-Culture..... 357
Modern Society; The Twelfth Annual Co-operative Congress; Education..... 358
History of Egypt; The Head of a Medusa..... 370
Unbeaten Tracks in Japan; Life of William Blake..... 382
History of the Christian Religion to A.D. 200..... 393
Studies in Song 394
Jean François Millet; The Hebrew Review..... 400
Public Rights and Corporate Rights 401
The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism..... 412
Gleanings in the Fields of Art; Eminent English Liberals.. 413
A Century of Dishonor; The Tehuantepec; Inter-Ocean Railroad..... 430
Shakespeare: His Mind and Art; Why I do not Believe; All Round the Year..... 442
The Duties of Women..... 448
Shakespeare's Dream; Pocket-Map of Boston; Browsing among Books..... 449
Life and Letters of John Howard Raymond..... 466
Illustrated Scientific News..... 467
English Philosophers 476
Eleventh Annual Report of the Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital; Four Feet, Wings, and Fins..... 477
Sanskrit and its Kindred Literatures; The King's Missive; The Easiest Way to Housekeeping..... 485
British Thoughts and Thinkers..... 496
The Platonist; Childhood's Appeal..... 497
Gaspard de Coligny..... 508
Belief in God; The Irish Land Question..... 509
The Past in the Present..... 520
How we Fed the Baby; Ploughed Under..... 521
Is Darwin Right? La Science sans Dieu..... 532
By the Tiber; The Tsar's Window; Young Folks' History of France; The Scientific News..... 533
Faith and Freedom; Alone to the Alone..... 549
Chinese Immigration 556
Farm Homes Indoors and Outdoors 557
Early Spring in Massachusetts..... 568
Christian Conception and Experience; The School of Life; Gypsies; Education..... 569
The Fine Arts in Italy 584
Henry the Eighth..... 585
History of Woman Suffrage; Emerson Birthday Book..... 598
Life of Voltaire..... 621
Joan of Arc, "the Maid"; Sordello..... 632
The North American Review..... 89, 101, 160, 220, 280, 401, 443, 509, 560, 598
The Modern Review..... 101, 413, 245, 521
The Unitarian Review..... 125, 197
The International Review, 173, 233, 269, 334, 413, 442, 557, 598
The Atlantic Monthly 136, 149, 208, 269, 370, 430, 497, 533, 598, 632
The Journal of Speculative Philosophy..... 125, 149
The Popular Science Monthly..... 160, 233, 298, 358, 394, 443, 497, 557, 598
The Catholic World..... 173, 221, 281, 443, 521, 557
Our Little Ones..... 221, 341, 443, 477, 533
Wide Awake 334, 394, 477, 598
The Revue de Belgique..... 341, 382, 509
The Sanitarian..... 632
The Art Amateur..... 633

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Miscellaneous Topics..... 9, 20, 33
Labor Strikes, F. H..... 45
Miscellaneous..... 69, 80
A Visiting Nurse's Duties..... 93
Arbitration in Labor Difficulties, F. H..... 105
Miscellaneous..... 117, 129
Chippings, S. H. M..... 141
Moral Education, F. H..... 153
Vacation Schools..... 164
Concerning Vivisection, C. K. W..... 177
Miscellaneous..... 189
Inebriety and its Cure, F. H..... 201
Miscellaneous..... 212
Women's Temperance Union, F. H..... 225
Treatment of Insanity, F. H..... 236
Miscellaneous..... 249
Political Education..... 260
The Indian Question, F. H..... 273
The Hampton Institute, F. H..... 296
State Regulation of Prostitution, F. H..... 309
Miscellaneous..... 320, 344, 356
Manifesto of the Brazilian Anti-Slavery Society, F. H..... 368
Miscellaneous, 380, 392, 405, 428, 440, 452, 475, 488, 500, 511
Prevention of Pauperism, F. H..... 524
Woman Suffrage in Italy..... 536, 548, 560
Miscellaneous 595
Miscellaneous 619

POETRY.

Dumb Poets, C. Aplin..... 46
To the Buddha, F. M. H..... 55
Freedom, F. Adler 65
The Dead Past, B. W. Ball..... 77
The One True Church, Lewis G. Janes..... 89
The Strangers, Jones Very..... 101
Quien Sabe? Ysolde de Quelsi..... 113
Do You Know? Helen Barron Bostwick..... 125
Nirvana, Geo. W. Chapman..... 137
The Earth and Man, B. W. Ball..... 149
In Twos, W. C. Gannett..... 161
Discipulus, H. T. C..... 173
Pan, B. W. Ball..... 185
Bohemian Love Song, Ellen M. Mitchell..... 197
Deferred, H. T. C..... 209
Byron and Shelley, B. W. Ball..... 221
The Heart of Carlyle, J. H. C..... 233
Life of Life, H. T. C..... 245
From Karl Heinzen, translated by Mrs. E. D. Cheney..... 257
Foreign Travel, B. W. Ball..... 281
An Evening with Weiss and Eichberg, John Albee; The True Friend, Ellen M. Mitchell..... 293
The Muses, B. W. Ball..... 317
Christmas Eve, Ellen M. Mitchell 329
Compensation, Annie L. Muzzey..... 341
The Parker Memorial, An Unrepentant Stockholder..... 353
Kaisersaal, H. T. C..... 365
The Dawn, John Albee..... 377
Fame and Obscurity, Horace L. Traubel..... 389
Carlyle, Q..... 401
Idols, B. W. Ball..... 425
Sonnet, George Martin..... 437
Bread of Life, H. T. Clark..... 449
The Changeless, Willard Pennington..... 461
The Treasure and the Hand; Self-Surprise, W. R. Alger.... 473
Holy Land, B. W. Ball..... 485
Qui Laborat Orat, Arthur Hugh Clough..... 497
Be True, Horatius Bonar..... 509
Song of the Truthseeker, Horace L. Traubel..... 521
Defeat, H. T. C..... 533
The Covenant of the Boers, Capt. C. W. Hall..... 545
Miracle, H. T. C..... 557
Agnosticism, B. W. B..... 569
Worship 581
Ode, Thomas Wentworth Higginson..... 593
Cleopatra, Abbie M. Gannett..... 605
San Terenzo, Andrew Lang..... 617
Infanta, Willard Pennington..... 629

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS ON FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP, AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

By Kate Gannett Wells.

I. Introduction..... 538
II. Freedom..... 561
III. Fellowship..... 585
IV. Character 609
V. Religion..... 633

LESSONS ON THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

By L. G. Janes.

I. The Messianic Dream..... 190
II. The Messianic Dream, concluded..... 202
III. Jesus and his Biographers 214
IV. Jesus and his Biographers, concluded..... 226
V. The Birth and Childhood of Jesus..... 237
VI. John the Baptist..... 250
VII. The Prophet of Nazareth..... 262
VIII. The Kingdom of God..... 285
IX. Teaching by Parables..... 309
X. The Fatherhood of God 334
XI. The Brotherhood of Man..... 356
XII. Society and Government..... 381
XIII. Poverty and Riches..... 406
XIV. Domestic Life..... 429
XV. Labor 453
XVI. Religious Observances 476
XVII. The Future Life..... 501
XVIII. The Method of Jesus..... 526
XIX. Miracles 550
XX. The Legend of the Resurrection..... 573

RELIGIOUS CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

By F. A. Hinckley.

The World we Live in, Studies I. and II..... 417
The World we Live in, Studies III. and IV..... 441
The World we Live in, Studies V. and VI..... 466
The World we Live in, Studies VII. and VIII..... 489
The World we Live in, Studies IX. and X..... 514

MISCELLANEOUS.

George Ripley, Brook Farm, Geo. Wm. Curtis..... 93
East Dennis Lecture Association, F. A. Hinckley..... 54
Free Congregational Society at Florence, Seth Hunt..... 55
Freethinkers' Association at New York..... 67
Society of Socialistic Freethinkers in France..... 67
Pilot vs. Congregationalist..... 91
The Supreme Court of Massachusetts 139
What Geo. J. Holyoake thinks of America..... 161
Remarkable Answer to Prayer..... 173
To whom it may Concern, Seth Hunt..... 200
Organization of a National Secular Association..... 213
Lucretia Mott..... 255
Funeral of Lucretia Mott; Dr. Edward Seguin..... 257
Boston "Associated Charities" Bulletins..... 297
Remembered Pictures..... 308
"Falsehood" 310
George Chainey, H. L. Green..... 322
Academic Freedom in America; A Matter of Interest to Ladies 358
Academic Freedom in America; A Matter of Interest to Ladies, A. M. B..... 358
The Leicester Trust Deed, Edward E. Hale..... 448
The Leicester Decision, C. C. Everett..... 460
An Educated Will..... 490
Lectures at Revere, J. S..... 525
Organization among Liberal Religionists, Mrs. Annie L. Diggs, 536
Work of the Cosmian Society, Florence..... 537
Has Mr. Emerson changed his Views? A. Bronson Alcott.... 547
To the Friends of the Free Religious Index 563
Address to the People of the United States..... 584
Fragments of Science 286
Religious Culture of the Young, A. R. Aldrich..... 596
The Eastern Question, Louise Suter..... 608
Vacation School 620

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Pages 9, 20, 32, 45, 68, 80, 92, 104, 117, 128, 141, 152, 164, 176, 188, 200, 225, 248, 272, 296, 308, 332, 392, 416, 440, 499, 583, 595, 632.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

Pages 5, 35, 47, 59, 70, 83, 89, 101, 118, 125, 142, 154, 166, 178, 185, 197, 209, 221, 233, 245, 263, 275, 281, 298, 310, 321, 329, 347, 353, 365, 377, 389, 401, 413, 425, 437, 449, 461, 477, 485, 497, 509, 521, 533, 551, 557, 569, 581, 593, 605, 622, 634.

FOREIGN.

Pages 21, 35, 47, 70, 82, 94, 107, 113, 130, 142, 154, 166, 178, 190, 214, 226, 238, 251, 262, 275, 286, 293, 310, 321, 335, 347, 359, 370, 383, 394, 407, 418, 431, 443, 455, 467, 478, 490, 502, 514, 526, 539, 545, 562, 574, 599, 611, 617, 634.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

Pages 11, 23, 35, 71, 83, 95, 119, 131, 143, 167, 203, 215, 239, 287, 418, 502, 610.

JESTINGS.

Pages 47, 70, 83, 95, 107, 119, 131, 142, 155, 167, 179, 191, 203, 215, 227, 239, 251, 263, 275, 287, 299, 311, 322, 335, 359, 371, 383, 395, 407, 419, 431, 443, 455, 467, 479, 491, 503, 515, 527, 539, 551, 562, 574, 586, 599, 611, 622, 634.

ANNUAL MEETING OF FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Pages 10, 14, 26, 38, 534, 546, 558, 570.

CURRENT TOPICS.

First page of every number.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

First page of every number.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. 12, OLD SERIES.—NO. 549.
VOL. 1, NEW SERIES.—NO. 1.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JULY 1, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

BE thy creed or prayers what they may, unless thou hast a little truth thou shalt not attain the path to happiness. He who possesses the truth is the twice-born.—Hindu.

GREAT is the truth, and stronger than all things. All the earth calleth upon the truth, and the heaven blesseth it: all works shake and tremble at it, and with it is no unrighteous thing. . . . It endureth and is always strong; it liveth and conquereth for evermore. With her there is no accepting of persons or rewards; but she doeth the things that are just, and refraineth from all unjust and wicked things. Neither in her judgment is any unrighteousness; and she is the strength, kingdom, power, and majesty of all ages.—Apocryphal Old Testament.

THE truth shall make you free.—New Testament.

INSTRUCT in knowledge! He who instructs reverences God; he who speaks of knowledge praises the Lord; who disputes about it engages in holy warfare; who seeks it adores the Most High; who spreads it dispenses alms to the ignorant; and who possesses it attains the veneration and good-will of all. . . . God created Reason, and it was the most beautiful thing in his creation; and God said to it, "I have not created anything better or more perfect or more beautiful than thou: blessings will come down on mankind on thy account, and they will be judged according to the use they make of thee."—Mohammed, or Mohammedan.

THE law of the soul, which we call reason, reigns with an absolute sway; its reproaches are ever uttered and repeated at what is wrong; it sets bounds to the folly of the most audacious. . . . It is this power that gives a uniformity to the opinions of men, the most opposed to each other in their natures. It is by this that men of all ages and countries are bound to an immovable centre, to which they are held by certain invariable laws which we call first principles. . . . They cannot esteem or despise anything according to their own arbitrary wills; they cannot force the eternal barriers of truth and justice.—Fénelon.

THE usefulest truths are plainest; and, while we keep to them, our differences cannot rise high.—William Penn.

IF you have broken away from the old creeds in pain at their want of human sympathy, repelled by the gross materiality of their opinions, do not weave the same fibre into your new opinions. Let the fulness of your spiritual life tend its own loom and fill it with the webb of faith.—John Weiss.

YE are not bound! The soul of things is sweet,
The heart of being is celestial rest;
Stronger than woe is will: that which was good
Doth pass to better,—best.

Before beginning and without an end,
As space eternal and as surety sure,
Is fixed a Power divine, which moves to good;
Only its laws endure.

This is its touch upon the blossomed rose,
The fashion of its hand shaped lotus leaves;
In dark soil and the silence of the seeds
The robe of Spring it weaves.

That is its painting on the glorious clouds,
And these its emeralds on the peacock's train;
It hath its stations in the stars; its slaves
In lightning, wind, and rain.

Out of the dark it wrought the heart of man,
Out of dull shells the pheasant's pencilled neck;
Ever at toil, it brings to loveliness
All ancient wrath and wreck.

—Edwin Arnold.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE COUNTRY is to be congratulated that, whichever of the two great parties succeeds in the coming Presidential election, the President will be a man of high personal character, who will be pretty sure to draw upright men around him, and make a clean administration. But whether the civilian or the soldier is to win the most votes, there is probably no sagacious political soothsayer who would be willing to commit himself at this moment to a very positive prophecy.

AMONG the minor incidents of the criminal catastrophe that befell the "Narragansett," there is a sad side to the following, which most religious newspapers will probably not see. Rev. Mr. Lockwood, the young Methodist minister of New York, who was drowned, was sitting in his state-room before the disaster, reading Paine's Age of Reason. On the fly-leaf, he took the precaution to write,—or could he, possibly, with a sudden alarm for his reputation, have written it after the collision?—"If I go down with this boat to-night, I should be ashamed to have this book found with me, were it not that I read it to refute its doctrines." What a commentary on the standard of mental liberty commonly allowed in the Christian Church, that a man should feel compelled to protect his reputation against inferences that might be drawn from his having in his possession a book advocating the rights of reason in religion! The time will come when no minister will be "ashamed" to be found, living or dead, with any book of genuine thought written by any earnest man.

A REPORTER of the New York Tribune has been interviewing revivalist Moody. Among other things, the latter says: "The religious interest at the South is rapidly increasing. The whole region is opening up splendidly. All the Southern people want now is to be let alone. From the residents of New Orleans, and several other Southern cities, I have received urgent invitations to pass next winter with them. I have not yet decided whether to go or not." This sounds very much like pro-slavery times. All that the South then wanted was "to be let alone." They were pious enough there,—sticklers for the Bible, and Sabbath observance, and the creeds of orthodoxy; but they wanted to be let alone of justice and equal rights. Now they are ready for Mr. Moody's type of religion; but it seems they still want to be let alone—of something. What is it? We suspect it is the same old thing, in a little different form, that used to frighten them so,—justice. Mr. Moody had better stop to reflect. Unless he can give them not what they wish, but what they need, he had better take them at their other word, and "let them alone."

HENRY WARD BEECHER says: "There is no real ground why a Jew and Gentile should not stand together, to-day, in the Christian Church. And this is my heresy; this is my departure from orthodoxy. I care nothing how a man comes to Christ, so that he gets there, and that is the only ground for entrance into this church. Christ is the end of every one that believeth; and, instead of disputes as to doctrines or churches, how much better is it that we should accept the spirit of the Epistles of the New Testament, conscious of our own weakness, our ignorant, unstable condition, conscious of our want of strength,—how much better that we should take hold together of Jesus Christ, the Savior of men, loving and accepting Him as our best teacher and guide!" As is apt to be the case when the Christian offers the terms, the Christian here gets the best of the bargain. He secures the confession of Christ as the Savior of the world. And, by not haggling over the details of the doctrinal price to be paid, Mr. Beecher only shows himself more worldly-wise than are the more orthodox brethren to whom he is heretic. But we question whether many Jews will now come into the Christian Church on even his terms. That confession of Christ as Messianic Savior is just what has always troubled them. And it troubles Gentiles, too. The only church in which Jew and Gentile and Christian can now "stand together" on equal terms is that of universal religion. When all three are ready to emerge from all their creed-enclosures and from their respective reservations of special authority each for his own faith, then can they join hands in equal fellowship, but not till then.

IN THE department where we propose to put on exhibition, as we gather them, such noteworthy examples of the modern survival of superstition as come to our knowledge, will be found an extract from the Christian at Work in opposition to opening the Metropolitan Art Museum in New York on Sunday. Of course, the principal argument with this Six-days-at-work Christian is the alleged special sacredness of the day, and this rests only on a superstition. But a special argument is also advanced, that the laboring population, in whose behalf the movement for the Sunday opening is made, have not sufficient culture to make any use of the opportunity. But this argument is refuted by the experience of the Art Museum in Boston, which for several years has been open gratuitously to the public on Sundays. It is largely the laboring classes, or those who could not take the opportunity on other days, who then visit the Museum. And among the influences which led the directors to assent to the suggestion of a Sunday opening was the fact reported by the Superintendent, that, when the new Trinity Church, which is close by, was in process of erection, a good many of the workmen were in the habit of spending a part of their hour's nooning on the free days in looking at the pictures and statuary in the galleries; and, after the institution was open on Sunday, some of these same men were observed there, dressed in their "best clothes" and their wives with them. The Sunday opening of the Boston Museum has been a success. The people for whose sake it was opened do appreciate it: they come, and are well behaved; and they go away the better for the contact with this higher intelligence and culture. Let the New York Museum do likewise.

Digitized by Google

For the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

OUR FOURTH ANNIVERSARY.

A Lecture before the Society for Ethical Culture, New York, Sunday, May 9, 1880.

BY FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

[Reported by MISS JENNIE TURNER.]

It has often been said that the task of reform is difficult, that the way is strewn with thorns, and that the trials which one encounters on it are painful and such as pierce the soul. The task is difficult, the way is thorny, the sword of reform is no child's toy to handle. But such considerations as these come only as an afterthought. To him who is enamoured of the hope of some great change, there is no choice but to follow in the path in which that hope beckons him. As, when you see the curtains aflame in a room where some dear person is asleep, you rush to seize them and tear down the burning shreds, and do not calculate that you are wounding your hands in so doing; as, when at night your child is suddenly seized with mortal sickness, you rush from the house barely shod, you go over sharp stones in dangerous places, and you heed it not and you know not, in your search for the physician and his remedies, that your feet are wounded and lacerated and bleeding. So when a great cause is endangered, so when you have thrown your soul into the work of warding off some great public evil, will you become charmed, as it were, even against the knowledge of the perils by which you are menaced and surrounded.

Necessity is laid on me to speak; yea, "Woe is me, if I preach not the gospel," said the Apostle Paul. And every one who has a gospel to preach, or believes he has, feels this same iron, this same golden necessity, laid upon him; and woe to him, if he preach not his gospel! And so there arises in this work a certain all-absorbing passion for an idea, a certain fatalistic confidence in the idea, and, as a part of it, an unbending, an unyielding assurance that the cause, such as it is, must eventually triumph. The common people call these men mad often, and believe that their reason has left them, and not without some good ground of suspicion from their low point of view; because, when you have risen to such a work, you have a confidence for which you can give no reason, which seems unreasonable, against reason. You believe in your work against all the terrible odds which you see against it, you believe in your work and in your duty to push that work, though the whole world protest against it, though all the prejudice of the great and the small be pitted against it; and, because you believe, you triumph; because this very belief is the instrument which causes the unheard-of change. And by some such confidence, and with some such belief, those were equipped who started out in the founding of this Society. It was no easy task which they attempted. It was a work full of difficulties, full of struggles, full of hardships. Four years ago one April evening, five gentlemen met in a private parlor in this city, to discuss the question of forming a new religious society. It was urged, on that occasion, that great numbers of men and women had been wholly alienated from the churches, and that no substitute had yet been offered them, which they could accept, for what they had lost. It was urged that there was a vast fallow field in which no efforts were made to cultivate the higher life; that no voice appealed to those who had left the old fold, calling to mind the eternal issues of life and death and the everlasting verities, upon which righteous conduct is founded; and that especially the very young were left totally without the instructions of moral culture.

Out of the discussions of that evening has grown the Society for Ethical Culture. A few weeks thereafter, on the fifteenth of May, a public meeting was called in Standard Hall, and then and there a formal organization was effected; and on this account we date our existence from the fifteenth of May of the centennial year, and on this account we are accustomed on each Sunday preceding each recurring Fifteenth of May to celebrate the day with anniversary reminiscences and festive commemoration.

The fourth year of our Society's work is closing: we stand at the close of it,—not as men who feel that they must thank the fate which overrules them and all that they have been allowed to come thus far,—not as men who heave a sigh of relief, saying, So long have we lived, apparently against all hope and against all the prognostications of our enemies; so long have we endured, in defiance of all the obstacles that were heaped against us. Not such is our feeling; but we stand at the end of our fourth year with a high sense of the necessity of our having continued so long, and of the necessity of our continuing longer. We feel that thus it had to come, that so it had been preordained in the necessity of things, that not to us as individuals, but to us as a part of this great movement of emancipation, success was assured from the outset,—this great movement of emancipation which is rolling on along new lines of departure to new goals of irresistible achievement. And so we stand to-day, at the end of the year, and look back once more, as is our wont, upon the past, to look forward thereafter toward the future and to what that will bring us.

There are a few points which I wish to note now,—that I believe that our Society has already accomplished somewhat, that it has already done some good in the community, that it has already signalized some benefits which will endure.

And, in the first place, our Society has helped to dispel the idea that there is any—even remote—inherent connection between Liberalism and Libertinism,—an idea which is not totally unfounded in the conduct of some of those who style themselves Liberals, and an idea, you may depend upon it, which is industriously circulated by those whose interest it is to perpetuate the dominant superstitions. For the opinion is spread abroad that of necessity freedom of religious belief must go hand in hand with moral laxity, that especially those are anxious to deny a state of future punishment who have most reason to hope that there may be no such state of future punishment, that especially those are interested in destroying the dominant faith who are in general unruly and violent spirits; of that class which gathered around Catiline, in the ancient Roman times, and which the great Roman orator has so drastically described,—men who are fond of new things, whatever they may be, seditious spirits, who desire revolution because they can only thrive in troubled waters. The Society for Ethical Culture has helped to dispel the idea that a liberal society must necessarily be composed of violent and unruly spirits, I say, because it is evident from the character of those who compose this Society that they have been led to it by no such desires; that they are in the main quiet men of business, men of the professions, conservative in spirit, who are accustomed to follow their own avocations without trenching upon the territory of others, without disturbing others in their belief; that they are especially families that have come together by this movement, and not individuals, as is generally the case in liberal societies; that the reason why they have come together is simply this,—because they say to the churches, not that we are less conservative in spirit than you are, but that your conservatism is not sufficiently conservative for us, that we desire perfect sincerity in religious teachings, that we distrust the sincerity of your teachings and the sincerity of many of your teachers, and that we demand a manlier morality than you can offer us.

And, in the second place, the Society has contributed to effect a permanent good in the community by maintaining, in the midst of many platforms and pulpits that are dedicated more or less to equivocation, an iron-clad platform here, from which compromise and palliation and paltering with the truth and the use of counterfeit words are excluded. Not that I lay particular stress on this, because such a platform is vital to every liberal movement and is a part of every liberal society; but there is a third point in which we may justly claim that the Society has advanced upon the policy hitherto pursued by the liberal leaders,—and that is in having inaugurated a policy of practical beneficence, in making Free Religion and philanthropy synonymous. For do you not know that this is the only obstacle that prevents the advance of Free Religion,—this generally current belief that, if freedom of religious opinion were to spread, charity would go under, that the world would once more be thrown upon its primitive selfishness, that the weak and the suffering would no longer be protected against the strong? And, therefore, it was of the greatest urgency to show that that is not the case. It was of the greatest urgency to show that this allegation, this imputation, is thoroughly untrue, to show that it is a libel upon human nature to suppose that men will only be good because they hope for reward or because they fear punishment: that, on the contrary, the nobler and the truer view is this,—that there is an intrinsic attraction in the good, and that there is a natural foulness surrounding the evil which repels every truly human heart.

And so we have begun already to act upon the consideration of these principles; and already you can perceive how justified this policy is! Would that it were the policy of the entire liberal movement in this country! Then we should advance more swiftly than we have done in the past; for the adoption of this policy in its beginnings has tended to reconcile public opinion. Already the tone of public sentiment has visibly changed toward this Society since the inception of its relief works; and it may be hoped that, with the continued application of these principles, the change in public sentiment will become still more profound, and men will become willing to hear what we have to say, and will at least be willing to tolerate what they call our vagaries, because they see the fruit of the tree, that it is good.

But the time has not come for complacency with regard to the past, when we consider how much larger and wider a work remains to be done in the future.

It is sometimes stated that the teachings which are here propounded are, after all, essentially the same which one hears in the advanced churches and temples,—that setting aside the form of expression, the mode of putting it, the ethics of this Society and the ethics of any liberal church or synagogue are exactly identical. And it is true that all the churches, and especially the liberal churches, insist upon the code of virtue and teach it from their pulpits and platforms; but the spirit of ecclesiasticism, the spirit of supernaturalism, is a drag upon morality, and is a narcotic influence poured over goodness wherever it may be found, however attenuated a supernaturalism may be preached. For the difference between these advanced churches and ourselves is this: that they have other means of grace, other means of redemption, other means of religious exercise, besides the exercise of virtue; to wit, prayer, ceremonial, ecstasy, and even convulsions. And you may perceive that these latter means are far easier than the practice of a temperate life and the exercise of the difficult virtues; these latter means are easily chosen in preference to the former; and so the effect of the teachings of supernaturalism, however attenuated a supernaturalism, I repeat, it may be, is to weaken the springs of virtue, is to divert the attention from virtue, as men know. And the difference between ourselves and them is not that we invent new virtues: the virtues remain the same, as old as the hills, from time immemorial until time everlasting; but the difference is this,—that we throw the whole weight of the religious life upon the practice of goodness, that we have no other mode of salvation except goodness, that we have no other mode of reaching the sublime heights of the divine except by practising the divine in our lives, and that alone is our redemption. And only then, when these views will become general, will men feel utterably miserable as they should, in the presence of human misery; only then will the sight of suffering be a goad, as it should be; only then, when they know that they have only this one life,—not to be boisterous in, not to be bestial in, but only this one life to be noble in,—only then will they so labor to make this life what it should be; only then will these thousand forms of evil which are now tolerated become to their minds intolerable henceforth; only then will they proceed, as under the sense of personal conviction, as if not a day were to be lost, at once to change this earth into the fair abiding-place it should be; only then will the waste places of the earth become as a garden. And now, if we believe that, this subtile difference, as it may appear at the outset, brings the vastest difference in results. In consequence of this change of attitude, of emphasis, begins a total change of life. Only then, when we know that we have taken away from the consciousness of men that silent, that subtle apology for wrong and for guilt which each one is so eager to take as a flattering unction to his heart,—that in the hereafter all things will be righted; only then, when we have placed men thoroughly upon the ground of the here,—if we feel that only in such a condition of things, only with such a consciousness prevalent in the world, can these great changes which we aspire to be effected,—in brief, if we feel that we have indeed a message of glad tidings to bring to the world, a message of glad tidings which means change from misery to happiness, change from shame to honor, from vice to virtue,—then, if we feel that indeed, should the spirit of propaganda that animated the early Christian Church begin to animate the members of liberal societies; and they should no longer feel that they have reason to thank the world if they are tolerated, but they should feel that they themselves have a mission, that they must insist, each one, so far as his influence may reach, to obtain for our principles a fair hearing,—to demand a fair hearing with the right that we have to demand it, because we feel that our principles are of the utmost consequence to the world. For that is all that we need to demand, and that the principle of deeds rather than creed needs to demand of the world,—a fair hearing; for there are thousands of our fellow-citizens to-day who are at heart with us, only that they do not know it, and if they could only be brought to hear the correct statement of our views, if this cloud of misunderstanding that is between them and us were removed, if they could be brought to listen to the true, to the real, to the sincere statement of that which we would desire, they would exclaim in amazement: "Why, this is not cynicism, this is not atheism, as has been represented to us. Why, these are the very views which we have held for years and years ourselves, these are the very sentiments which we have so often longed to express." And they would be with us, because they belong with us.

Digitized by Google

This, then, is the first task which every member of a liberal society can fulfil,—to believe himself commissioned to secure for our views a fair hearing.

And, in the second place, there is another point which must mark our policy in the future. If we want to build our work securely, we must not build on numbers only, but chiefly upon the internal value of that which we have to offer; and the only way in which we can make our society strong is by sinking our principles deep into the heart of the young. In our school-work, therefore, in the work of the Ethical School, we behold the true building up of this Society. There is our solid nucleus, there is the cement which will hold us together. And I ask any one of my hearers who remembers his or her Sunday-school education in the past to say whether it is not needful that the work of change should be pushed right here in the school. Who of us does not remember the disgust with which we turned from those dry instructions? Who of us does not ask with regret what benefit we derived, how much we have retained of those early teachings? Who of us can say that the problems of life have been made much easier by those early teachings? Where in the whole world, I ask,—where, as at the present day, when every branch of science is cultivated, when every branch of education is highly prosperous and flourishing,—where has even a single consistent attempt been yet made to give true moral education to the young? Why, we ourselves, who have devoted our years to the study of ethical principles in the abstract, when we came to teach the children in the concrete, found that we ourselves had to go over the whole work again, before we could attempt to teach the young. Nowhere have cases of conscience been properly worked up for ethical education, nowhere has the subtle casuistry of the heart, which we should all learn from infancy, been prepared for the purposes of a school; and very few here have any idea of the difficulty of such a task, though there be no difficulty in the principles themselves.

There are many persons who stand aghast at the idea of religious education for the young without dogmas: they themselves are perfectly willing to accept any convictions, however radical; but the bare mention of moral training for the children, without the received doctrines, seems to them simply monstrous. But we in this Society have determined to be truthful with ourselves and to deal truthful with the children. We have made up our minds that, come what will, under no pretence will we consent to teach them, even provisionally, as a kind of substitute, a first scaffolding for the future,—I say, under no pretence will we teach them, even provisionally, that which we ourselves do not believe. We do not feel at all alarmed or startled at the questions they are likely to ask, which so trouble many liberal parents: is it not well that the children should learn early what they will have to learn sooner or later, that there are many questions which no one can answer? And so, if they come to us and ask, How about the creation, and how about the beginning of the beginnings? we will answer them, Children, we do not know. And if they ask, How about the future of the human soul?—if their minds are sufficiently awakened to put that question,—How about the fate of the soul after death and beyond the grave? we will answer as consistently and as sincerely, Children, we do not know. And we are able to say to them so plainly and straightforwardly we do not know these things, because there are so many vital things which we do know; because we can tell the child, with perfect certainty and positiveness, that, when it does a sinful act, it becomes despicable in the sight of men and of the universe; that, when it does a virtuous act, it is raised in the scale of being; that, in proportion as it follows the mandate of goodness written in its own heart, does it come near to the purpose of the world and to the heart of things. And I tell you that it is to me a constant marvel how children drink in these principles with such ease, with such joy, with such openness: it is to me a source of constant wonder how easy it is to educate children in these views, how pure and how sure is the moral judgment of these young persons,—much purer and surer than that of persons much older than they are,—how like a clear crystal sheet of water is their heart in which a whole heaven of beautiful emotion is mirrored, how easy it is to teach the children the love of virtue for virtue's sake.

And, if I have said that the work is difficult, it is difficult because it is done single-handed, because nowhere is there any preparation made, because not a text-book has been written for this work, because nowhere is there a trained assistant to aid in this work, because the whole work of this new education must be raised up from the very foundation; and therefore the one great task which the Society must undertake, the one responsibility which rests upon us in the future, is the elaboration of such a text-book. And sometimes, when I reflect upon the chances of life,—upon the possibility which is open to every one, young or old, of being suddenly cut off and dismissed from his appointed duties,—I then feel strongly the wish that it might at least be granted me to remain so long in life until such a text-book is written; because I should feel that, when that text-book is prepared, then the whole liberal movement is safe; because, with such a text-book, and on such a text-book as a foundation, schools of ethical instruction might everywhere be erected throughout the United States and throughout the world; and around these schools societies would cluster, even if there were no leaders to guide and lead them on. The elaboration of a text-book, therefore, for ethical instruction, is the one further point of future policy which we are to consider.

And, in the third place, there is another point of duty, of policy, for the Society, to be considered. We must continue to give plain utterances concerning the public wrongs that exist, we must feel that we are here to fight for the kingdom of justice, to bring on the reign of truth; and it will not do, it will not answer, to think that we have satisfied our consciences, when we have levelled our shafts at abstract justice in the clouds somewhere, which hit no one and strike nothing. The mission of religion is against selfishness, against that spirit of selfishness which kills and bruises, which wounds others recklessly, so long as the injury of others is for the gain of the person himself. Do you hear the cries of unfortunate Ireland to-day? Do you ponder those almost incredible but yet too well-attested tales, that come to us from thence, of more than eight hundred thousand human beings in a civilized country famished for food? And the men themselves, barely seven thousand of them, who live on the toil of five millions, and have reduced them to utter pauperism, even now when famine and sickness stalk arm in arm through the island, refusing to offer up from their unjust gains,—giving either a miserable pittance which is an insult to the cause of charity, or giving not at all. There are some persons kindly by nature, who, when they hear human heartlessness branded, refuse to believe, and say, "This is exaggeration," and so are not moved to indignation, as they should be. If they want to see what a heartless thing human heartlessness can be, what a black thing human egotism can be, let them look at the conduct of the owners of the soil to-day in Ireland; and far be it from me to draw a direct parallel between the conduct of the possessing classes in Ireland and the conduct of the same classes in other parts of the world. The point I want to make first is that selfishness exists; is not a chimera of the brain, is a fact, and sometimes becomes a fiend. And the second point I want to make is to ask the question how these men become so cruel.

And the answer is twofold. It is absenteeism which, they tell us, is at fault in Ireland,—the fact that the men who oppress the poor are not there to see the results of their oppression, purposely remain away, do not want to see, because, if they did see, they feel themselves they could not be so merciless; and, in the second place, because they cling to this superficial abstraction of modern economists,—of some modern economists, let me add in justice,—that business and morality ought to have no connection, that business is business, and profit is profit, and is legitimate so long as it does not strike against any law of the Statute Book, and that they deny that profit becomes illegitimate when it is condemned by a higher, a moral law. And the modified evils which we see around us to-day,—not so bad as in Ireland, but still evil, still a curse to our civilization, still a blot upon our cities and our towns,—that modified evil which we see around us to-day is a consequence of the same causes which act in Ireland, only in modified forms, not so extravagantly, not so grossly, not so pointedly. It is here also essential absenteeism that, under the modern system of labor, the employer of labor does not concern himself with his employés, that he does not know, that he does not want to know, when evening comes, what becomes of those whom he has employed during the day, that he looks upon them—is forced, perhaps, by the condition of things at the present day, to look upon them—as mere hands, fragments of human beings, valuable up to the shoulder, but not down to the heart. And so this state of things has come about, which we deplore.

And, in the second place, that further fallacy which we also hear from all sides is that business is business and profit is profit, and that men do not want to hear moral treatises concerning their business; and that they shall hear the moral view of business,—this is the duty of the public teachers of religion,—and I care not a farthing for all your humanities, for all your divinities, unless they can be brought down to the level of these gross, grim facts of evil and of wrong. For if there is any one great duty of ethics—and the children in the school will tell you—which is one of the chief duties, it is the duty which mental superiors owe to mental inferiors; and that means that those who are able and educated and wise should not use their ability and their education, in order to press down still further those who are uneducated and ignorant, but, on the contrary, should use their advantages as much as possible to lessen the distance between the two classes of society, so that it shall not come about as things are now that a shout of derision is raised when some foolish scheme of improving the condition of the people is presented, when some wild man with hare-brained notions presents his panacea for the sudden cure of all our ills,—that a shout of derision rises, and the public prints resound with laughter, with mockery and jeers and scorn: they point at it, and say, See, this is the way they want to help themselves! And the moral of it is that things cannot be helped,—let them alone! And I ask, To whom is it a reproach, when some such foolish, wild, revolutionary schemes are broached? Is it a reproach to these poor men, who have worked ten hours in the day, and who come home hungry and worn out and fatigued? Do you suppose in such a condition they have the time, they have the energy, to read books and to think the thoughts that would really improve their condition? And is it not the first duty of the better educated, instead of deriding their folly, rather to help them above their folly, to think for them, to discuss with all possible art and knowledge the proper means that would help the poor? And how, if you close your platforms against such discussions? I say, It cannot be done. These questions cannot, and shall not, be excluded from our platforms; for, whatever others may do, we cannot do it. For the religion of others may subsist without such discussions and such work as this: other religions may subsist and be founded on power, on antiquity, on wealth, on the fear they excite, on the hopes they hold out; but our religion rests on the righteousness of its cause, on that alone, and the cause of humanity is our cause. And we as individuals, and we as a society, have signed our own death-warrant the moment that we desert that cause.

And so in the last place, as a measure of future policy, is the application of these principles practically in our minds, and in those works which we have begun to organize. It is not true, it is slander, to say that the views which we have here brought forward have in any way tended to rouse class against class or breathe the spirit of violence. Not such is our tendency. Do us the justice to judge of our principles, not by the results,—because those are meagre at best,—but by the efforts toward results which you see us make. Is it demagogism that these views of social improvement have led to? Is it violence? Is it the madness of revolt and insurrection? You know well that it is not so. It is schools for the poor to which these views have led us, it is the work of mercy as organized in our nursing department to which they have led; and so these works must be continued as the outcome and as the token and as the pledge of what our real principles are, and we must crown them each year with new additions, in order to show the work of the year,—because by crowning these works we will eventually crown the principles which we have undertaken to defend. And so I say it, not in the spirit of vain-glory, believe me, but in order to meet those who so constantly speak of negativism, and hold it that we have nothing to substitute for what we have taken away, that we are not constructive, but destructive, the enemies of society and the enemies of real faith. We say: See! Is it an inimical spirit, is it the spirit of hate, is it the spirit of enmity which you behold in this Society? Has there not been developed from the first, on the other hand, an almost too eager spirit to engage in works of human love? The Society was not yet a year old, when its first charity school, the kindergarten, was undertaken; we were not yet strong enough in means to defray our most necessary expenses, when the district nursing department was undertaken; and recently when the ground was offered us, with a generous sum to begin a building fund for this Society, for the purpose of building a permanent hall and a mansion for the Society, by which it might be known and appear in the community, we refused that offer and said: Not now, not yet. Our charity school is too small: its accommodations are strained to the utmost by the crowd of applicants. In two years, we must build; and then we will build a church after a new fashion in this city. We will build, not a new religious clubhouse in this city, but we will build a grand school for the children of the poor that we have accepted as our wards; and that will be our real temple, and that will be the sanctuary in which we choose to worship.

Digitized by Google

And so we have glorious aims to look forward to, an inexhaustible work ahead; and so we turn back, as the year ends, once more to the year that is past, and bid it adieu.

It has been a prosperous year for us. It has brought us new undertakings; it has opened up to us new avenues of influence; it has brought us its most welcome gift, new friends. But, if it has given us new friends, it has also taken away from us old friends whom we could ill afford to lose.

This is May. The spring is breathing its perfumes over all the earth. Waken the voices in the forest! Laughs every brook in sequestered grove! Spring the blossoms on tree and bush! Fills the human heart with gladness! Throbs the human soul with love! But also quivers the heart with pain, fill the eyes with blinding tears, throbs the soul with unsatisfied and never-to-be-satisfied longings in the May month. For every natural thing wakens from its sleep, and every natural thing starts up into resurrected life; but there are those who sleep so well and so deeply that they do not waken in the May month. Peace, unquiet heart! Be still, restless soul! Bow to the great laws that are wise and just. Learn resignation in the May month.

And as it is the piety of the living to keep green the memory of the dead, so let us also, before we part for the year, remember in piety those whom we as a society have lost, and keep green their memory.

We recall them once more by the names by which they were known among the living, and honor them in quiet and peaceful remembrance. We recall the name of Leopold Loewenstein, a man of stanch principles and unstained integrity, who was struck down in the prime of his years, who was honored by his friends and deeply and truly loved. A heavy loss is his to those who have survived him.

We recall with regret and respect the name of Emanuel Boas, a sincere friend of this movement, a man of strong sense and of kindly heart, to whom death came at the last as a relief, relieving him from the yoke of pain which he was weary to bear longer. The community has reason to deplore his loss: he lives on in the remembrance of near and dear ones.

We recall the name of E. E. Barnum, a man of uncommon sympathy with the suffering, the trusted secretary of the Colonization Society of this city, one with us heartily, who devoted his time and his services cheerfully to the advancement of the good.

We remember with profound sympathy the blow which has struck a family closely affiliated with us in our work, in the loss of Dr. Samuel Hahn, a most noble-minded, straightforward man, a brave physician who died in the harness, and of whom it may be said that he sacrificed his life for his profession.

And now we recall at the last our latest, freshest, heaviest loss, and dwell for a moment on the name of Joseph Seligman, and linger once more, with pained reluctance to leave it, over the memory of our dear President. I leave this hall in thought. I stand out by a recent hillock in the beautiful cemetery where he lies buried. Beyond glistens the Bay afar off; around everything is still,—the unbroken calm of a Sabbath morning rests there,—only the nodding flowers, only the soft sighing of the wind as it gently passes over the grave, mark rather than disturb the quiet. Peacefully he slumbers now. Yet we had hoped it might have been otherwise. Yet we had hoped that at least once more, knowing his impending fate, he might be with us to-day on this last Sunday of the year; and he also had planned to be with us to-day, and help us close. We cannot properly honor him. We cannot tell to you, as we have attempted to tell once before in public, how stanch were his virtues as displayed in our midst, how high we must esteem him because of the boldness and the consistency with which he espoused a cause that was by no means a popular cause, how he braved the displeasure of many in allying himself with us, how he remained true to the truth because he knew it to be true. He was indeed a faithful friend, in the fullest and best and truest sense of the word, to this Society. Numerous and manifold and urgent as were often his engagements, no one was so punctual as he, no one so consistently performed even the slightest committee service to which he was appointed. He watched and presided over the business of this Society, and every one could see with what loving cheerfulness he did it. He maintained his interest in our cause even in the last days of his failing health, when far away from us in Southern Florida; and he maintained his interest in our cause and he glorified our principles even when the hand of the pale king had already called him off to the realms beyond the tomb.

And so let us also not only stand and with vain regret deplore his loss, but let us glorify our principles all the more in his honor. Let us seek to emulate his interest, let us follow his example, and let us illustrate the same fidelity to the cause of freedom that he illustrated, and redouble our efforts, and so honor him; for the time has gone by when the loss of any one man, however dear to us, however helpful, could impede, or can or shall impede, our march of progress. We bend with tears over the fallen soldier, but we dare not pause. On! on! we are called. Over the gap, close the ranks and march on in serried column, shoulder to shoulder, each man doing his duty at his post, and let us fight the good and the great fight that is appointed us. Let us so labor that no human life may seem indispensable to these institutions which we have founded. Let us vow to-day that we will so deeply fix and implant the principles of ethical culture in this community that they will strike everlasting root there, and that from them will grow up a tree of liberty in whose shade many generations will find protection, and that distant generations will still have reason to proclaim with joy and ardor and unquenchable hope, as we proclaim to-day, the watchword of liberty,—the watchword, Ethical Culture!

Amusing Scene in a Church.—A correspondent writes to the Aberdeen Free Press: "An amusing scene occurred the other Sunday in a parish church not twenty miles from Fraserburgh. Among the hearers was an individual who earns a livelihood by selling vegetables. During the sermon, he fell asleep. He had not been long in this condition before he drifted into the land of dreams, and, imagining doubtless that he was plying his daily vocation, he shouted, 'Rhubarb, rhubarb, rhubarb!' The effect of this announcement upon the congregation may be imagined. It is not expected that the vender of vegetables will again be found napping in church."

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

New York, June 20, 1880.

The press of New York, as now conducted, seems to me, an old journalist, peculiarly indifferent to many of the vital needs of the people around them. Once in a while, the editorial writers content themselves, usually in a Sunday morning edition, with a pretty piece of writing like that found in one daily of this date, on "The Clergyman Abroad," which is more notable for the anxiety it displays that the party alluded to should have a good time during the summer season than for any other characteristic. Indeed, I have been constrained to think, in perusing, that the writer has probably taken his revenge in this way for the dreary sermons he has, under his good wife's influence, been compelled to endure. In a quiet way, it is a half-column shout of "Give us a rest." For one, I am willing even that Theologus should rest. Mr. Adler's rule is a good one,—good in the needed rest to and freshening of body and brain which his regular four months' vacation affords to himself; and good also in the spirit of sacrifice to which his society is trained. And few persons who do not "know how it is" themselves can comprehend the privation that follows, to a lonely man or woman in this great city, who cannot eat husks any longer, and finds withheld his or her weekly feast of secular righteousness,—the lessons of equity, love, and humanity,—so regularly given in Chickering Hall on Sunday morning, for eight months in the year.

There is absolutely nothing but the ceaseless flow of human feet, the hot streets that grow more sweltering year by year, and the blue arch overhead that seems molten in its wondrous azure these June days. There is not a reading room, not a picture gallery, not a museum, not a lecture hall, for science and reason, not one open in all this island upon this seventh day. All we can congratulate ourselves upon is that some of us can get to the sea,—even though, on the accessible shore, the blare of the brazen instruments arise and the ceaseless sluff of the moving multitude make discordant the riddle of the mighty sphinx, that tosses restlessly at our feet. But we are over a million strong on this island; and, if one-tenth of the whole can get out to the free toss of the waves, it is indeed a blessing. But what of the remainder, the 90 per cent., so large a proportion of which is stewed up in those brick holocausts called tenement houses, and poisoned with all the mephitic horrors of the city's crowded purlieus? Our great press fails daily in the work it might so well do in bringing before the community the social, sanitary, and economic evils that press upon the mass of the community,—evils that are not evaded by the well-to-do and indifferent, however clever and selfish be the efforts they may make to do so.

Take for an example the tenement-house system, which is fast rendering the Island of Manhattan the seat of the most uninviting city in all the world-wide zone where the English speech is familiar. The unswept streets, the bad drainage, the miles of street without a patch of green to make interlacing shadows where the fierce sun beats on the hot pavement, and then the horrible roar and rattle of the elevated railroads,—the greatest of conveniences for the up-towners, but a nuisance of the worst diablerie for all who live by or near them,—what does our city press do to correct the correctible horrors of such a city life? Literally nothing. Those who, pointing out such crimes become embittered thereby are sneered at as "Communists," derided as "infidels," and denounced for incapacity to understand that most dismal of "dismal sciences" which the willing literary servants of Great Britain have wrought out for fetters to the many under the name of political economy.

My occupation daily leads me past Trinity Church, whose tall spire points Wall Street, not to heaven,—oh, no!—but to success. Why is it no one dares in the public press to call strenuous attention to what a good man, an Episcopal clergyman of high repute, now deceased, once denounced as "a great crime." I mean the $60,000,000 of valuable property owned in this city by the corporation known as Trinity Church? In all soberness, it may well be asked what is done with the great income of this great estate, that can justify public policy in permitting such dangerous ownership of property? Some one can tell, but who?

What is there that might not be accomplished, if this vast property could be used directly and wisely for the amelioration of—say the sanitary horrors alone that are endured by the poor people who inhabit this great city? If the income of $60,000,000 were put in the hands of a council of wise scientists and administrators charged only with the work of ameliorating the sanitary condition of the poorest indwellers of this city, it strikes me that in one decade there would be such a lessening of drunkenness, lust, and of at least the smaller vices and crimes, as to save, in the security of life and the expense of civic administration, sufficient to return all that had been expended. I know one thing that could be done that would, in these hot days, enormously benefit the whole island; and that would be to cause the removal of all the buildings from Battery Square, at the foot of Broadway, and so also clear across that end of the island, until the little oasis in which Castle Garden now stands should be extended along and over the end of Manhattan. The opening of that space to the strong, saline breezes from the Bay, the Narrows, and the Atlantic, would enormously add to the salubrity of the city. It would be healthful and inspiring.

Digitized by Google

The right to suggest such a disposition of this great estate is not the right of communism: it is rather that growing out of altruism,—other selfism,—which must become more and more the law of social order and growth. In England, society long since fought out this question of religious corporations; and it will, at some not-far-distant day, also fight out, on the side of popular and general liberty, that other question of an Established Church, with its valuation of £90,000,000 in realty to dispose of. The sturdy Anglo-Saxon sense, which in the end controls English affairs, will not allow of disestablishment without disendowment. Here, on the contrary, we do not legally establish; we permit the growth and endowment of organized institutionalism, which the sturdy democratic sense of an Episcopal clergyman could see to be, in a material sense, a great crime. Think what a great public and free library might be built; what a superb technical and industrial school-system could be founded; what models of dwellings could be created; what ground could be bought for open, park-like spaces; what a great economic museum—an institution much needed among us—could be established; what art galleries endowed, and all, too, from an estate which it is easy to see, apart from a sectarian view, is in reality wasted! The Trinity Church estate ought to be the property of the people. THINON.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE IMMORTAL LIFE. By John Weiss. Boston: Lockwood, Brooks & Co.

Mr. Weiss could have left no more happy memorial to his friends than this little volume entitled The Immortal Life. It was his last work, receiving almost the finishing touches from his own hand before disease robbed that hand of its cunning. And it contains his latest and ripest thoughts on a favorite theme, —the sifted accumulation, we may say, of his thought on this theme during his latest years. The book, too, is the finest specimen of his intellectual and literary genius. To any one who used to hear Mr. Weiss speak, especially to any who may have had the good fortune to hear him deliver some of these very papers, in the parlor or on the platform, the pages will seem to bring back the wonderful presence of the man, and the sentences will be charged with the vital electric power of his magical intonations thrilling through them. He has so impressed his soul on the body of these words as to make them a supplementary witness of the truth of his doctrine.

It has been objected that the title of the book is a misnomer, since a casual reader, taking it up and expecting to find a series of connected chapters treating in order the familiar evidences, pro and con, concerning a future life for man beyond the grave, might be disappointed. But the criticism is very superficial, showing that such a reader has not grasped the central idea which lay in Mr. Weiss' mind. When Mr. Weiss speaks of the immortal life, he does not mean a section of existence divided from man's present form of being by the line of the grave, but a kind of life that has become organized in human beings here and now, and can never more lose its identity. His great argument for a future existence is the nature of human personality. And every chapter in the book bears on this argument. Every chapter is an attempt to set forth some phase of the central thesis,—that in personality is something which did not originate with the material conditions of life, does not depend for its existence upon them, and cannot therefore pass away because of their dissolution. The book is a plea, in fact, for the indestructibility of man's mental and moral nature against the argument of materialism, and on this ground bases the faith, to use Mr. Weiss' own familiar phrase, in "personal continuance."

Mr. Weiss accepted without shrinking everything that science could bring him bearing on the theme. He accepted the theory of evolution. He marshalled the scientific facts in all their strength, and loved to show how most of the old theological systems went down before them; but, having exhibited them in full array and at the height of their power, he turns, after the conflict, to point out how the great fact of soul personality survives untouched, and will, for aught that has yet been proved, survive the body's death.

The argument, probably, will not convince persons with a strong natural tendency to disbelieve immortality; nor can it be claimed to be a positive demonstration. But it at least clearly proves that science has not yet, as many persons apprehend and some claim, given a negative decision on the old question of immortal life. The old faith still stands; and people may hold it, with Mr. Weiss, and yet accept all the attested facts of recent science. Mr. Weiss' book, perhaps, will not satisfy those whose faith in immortality is largely sentimental; but it is full of thought for thinkers.

THE MORALS OF EVOLUTION. By M. J. Savage, author of the Religion of Evolution, etc. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

We have here a dozen of the sermons that have been published by Mr. Savage in a pamphlet series during the current year, brought together into a handsome volume of 191 pages. And they well deserve the honor of this more permanent shape after having done good service in the other. The book is dedicated, by permission, to Herbert Spencer; and this is well, for to Herbert Spencer more than to any other writer are we indebted for the line of thought which Mr. Savage has developed in these discourses. But let any one who has read Mr. Spencer's Data of Ethics and his other writings bearing upon this subject read Mr. Savage's book, and he will see that Mr. Savage has thoroughly assimilated his master's thought. This is the more evident, as Mr. Savage's sermons were not written, but are printed from the reports of a stenographer, with hardly more, we understand, than a few verbal corrections. "You may do it extempore, for it is nothing but roaring," was not written of this sort of discourse. It shows a wonderful power of systematic elaboration,—a power that would have been impossible but for the author's being completely master of his theme. Herbert Spencer may well permit Mr. Savage to dedicate his book to him; for he has popularized his Data of Ethics in a truly wonderful manner, without falsifying them in any least particular. He has warmed and vivified their dry and formal presentation. He has clothed it with poetry, and adorned it with many apt and charming illustrations.

Yet the philosophy of this book is what Thomas Carlyle succinctly designates as the "pig philosophy" of human life. Here is the Utilitarian gospel of morality. But it is Utilitarianism conceived more grandly than it could be until the doctrine of evolution came to its aid. The practical outcome is considerably higher than that of the opposing system, as represented by Thomas Carlyle. Here is no worship of brute strength, successful usurpation, and so on.

The sermons are twelve in number. The first discusses the much-bruited question, "Is Life worth living?" The answer is a strong affirmative, with reasons shown. The second discusses Morality and Religion in the past, showing their separateness of origin and also that the debt of religion to morality has been greater than that of morality to religion, as is generally insisted. "The Origin of Goodness" is next considered. It is shown to be in free obedience to the laws of universal life. The chapter on "The Nature of Goodness" brings us to the heart of the matter. Goodness is that which is useful in conduct, that which tends to happiness. The objections to this doctrine are frankly met, and, to our mind, effectually answered. A favorite objection is that the sense of obligation finds no place in a Utilitarian scheme of morals. To this objection, Mr. Savage devotes a separate chapter; and, when he is through, the wonder is that this objection has ever seemed so strong. But it must be remembered that it is at this point that the doctrine of evolution has been especially corroborative of the Utilitarian theory of morals. It is not permitted us to follow Mr. Savage with any adequate comment through the remaining chapters of his book. Every one is radiant with vitality. He has an eye for every aspect of his theme. He brings to every one a homely sense. Take for examples the chapters on the "Relativity of Duty," and those on "Real and Conventional Virtues and Vices." Chapter X., on the ethics of Opinion, is an admirable statement. Add to the sermons in this volume the series of Talks about Jesus which Mr. Savage is now publishing, and it may be doubted if any other pulpit in America has been the fountain-head of such a generous stream of thought. Happy the people who are privileged to hear such simple and straightforward truth as this from week to week, and those to whom the printed page brings it in better shape for serious challenge and suggestive meditation!

LIFE AND LETTERS OF HORACE BUSHNELL. New York: Harper & Brothers.

We have not been able to give this book the reading that it deserves; nor the thorough reading which it should have, in order to be impartially judged. But we have read in it enough to know much more than we did before of Dr. Bushnell's fine elements of personal character, and of the honest intellectual processes by which he came to his theological conclusions,—conclusions which in his own day, and not many years ago, were deemed heretical by many Orthodox judges, but which have had a great effect in moulding the new Orthodoxy of to-day. There was something too mystical in Dr. Bushnell's theology to suit present conditions of thought; yet it made him, perhaps, all the better as an interpreter and translator of the old creed into more modern and believable shape, since the very mysticism often concealed the dangerous departure from the old landmarks.

Perhaps some one of our writers will return to this book again, and give a more adequate representation of Dr. Bushnell's theological position and of his services to progressive Orthodoxy. The book has been lovingly and yet conscientiously prepared by his daghter, Mary Bushnell Cheney, with some aid in parts of it from her sister, and from Rev. Dr. Parker, of Hartford.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

COL. HIGGINSON'S Young Folks' History of the United States has been well translated into French, and published in Paris, being the first complete history of our country in that language.

A JAPANESE novel is being translated for publication in this country, by a young Japanese recently graduated from the Harvard Law School. It will be illustrated with Japanese drawings.

MISS M. A. HARDAKER addressed the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., Sunday, June 20. Miss Hardaker has a courageous and well-written article, upon the other side of the woman question, entitled the "Ethics of Sex," in the July North American.

PROF. ASCOLI, of Milan, will soon publish his essay on the Hebrew inscriptions at Venora in Calabria, giving the history of the Jewish epigraphical monuments down to the twelfth century. These are believed to be the earliest Hebrew inscriptions found in Europe, and are expected to prove of the highest importance to students.

IT is said that when Mr. Emerson was recently reading his essay on the future of America to a small audience, he happened to say "the" instead of "this" country. His daughter Ellen interrupted him. "Father," she said, "it is this country." A smile crept over the face of the Concord philosopher as he replied, "Well, this country is the country."

REV. ROBERT COLLYER was invited to deliver the baccalaureate sermon before the graduates of the College of the City of New York two Sundays ago. Why it was not delivered awaits a satisfactory explanation, to Mr. Collyer at least. It looks a little as though some one was alarmed at the prospect of such countenance of the liberal preacher; though later it is said it is all owing to the impecuniosity of the graduating class, who could not raise money enough to pay the choir. Well, poverty is better than bigotry!

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 1, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

WE can hardly hope that all our friends will like the change of name for THE INDEX. Even radicals are sometimes conservative, and like the old names for the things they love. But it seemed best to indicate the change of fortune that has befallen the paper, and also to get a name that would define itself to strangers. It was very desirable, too, to keep the honorable prestige of the old name. And so, at the risk of making too long a title, we decided on "FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX," which tells of what it is the index to those who do not know it already; while, doubtless, among the familiars of our own household it will still be, for short simplicity, THE INDEX.

THIS issue of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will be sent, as will two or three succeeding numbers, to every member of the Free Religious Association whose address is known, whether a subscriber to the paper or not. The special reason for this is that the report of the annual meeting of the Association is to be published in them, and all members of the Association are entitled to that. But it is hoped also that all members who are not subscribers, after seeing these numbers, will decide that they cannot do without the paper, and will send the three dollars requisite for a year's subscription. Now that the INDEX is the recognized voice of the Association, it may be properly expected that the members of the Association in particular will give it a generous support. It behooves them also to know what their "voice" is saying.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	$10.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary F. R. A.

PERSONAL NOTICE.

All personal communications for F. E. Abbot should be hereafter addressed to him at "Lake View Avenue, Cambridge, Mass."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The office of the Free Religious Association and INDEX has been removed to No. 3 Tremont Place (just in the rear of the Tremont House), where members and friends of the Association and patrons of the paper will find a pleasant room and cordial welcome. Mr. David H. Clark, besides being assistant editor of the INDEX, has been appointed General Agent of the Association, under the plan for which money has been raised in response to the circular issued last December, and will have charge of the office and of all business there. All communications pertaining to the business of the Association or of the INDEX should be addressed to "Free Religious Association, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass." Communications intended for the editor will reach him more directly, if addressed to him personally at New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y F.R.A.

THE OPPORTUNITY.

With this number, THE INDEX, as its readers have already been made aware, passes into the hands of the Free Religious Association, and under new editorial management. The Free Religious Association assumes the financial responsibility for the continued publication, and in a sense the paper becomes its organ. Nevertheless, the editor is left entirely untrammelled, not only in the expression of his own opinions, but in the general conduct of the paper. The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to be edited by him, and not by a Committee. He will gladly receive suggestions, he will duly listen to advice; but, after the suggestions and advice are weighed, he will follow his own judgment. On no other terms was the editorial management of the paper offered to us; on none other could we have accepted it. And only on these terms, we may add, has the Free Religious Association any right to have an organ. According to its constitution, "Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone." Therefore no writer here, editorial or other, will attempt to speak for the Association; nor the Association, collectively considered, be held responsible for any opinions expressed in these columns; nor is any individual member responsible, unless he himself be the writer. The editor will, of course, endeavor to make the paper serve the aims and principles of the Association: he will, to the best of his ability, so conduct it as to make it an exponent of those principles in all their philosophical breadth and variety of practical phase; but it must necessarily be according to his own understanding of the Association and its principles. The only remedy for this editorial independence, if it fail to satisfy the legitimate constituency of the paper, is removal from office.

And we wish to begin our labors here by a most cordial expression of thanks to the suspended Index Association for putting into the hands of the Free Religious Association this opportunity for a weekly journal. The action not only was a mark of confidence, but it was generous in kind. THE INDEX property, though—owing to the near expiration of the stock-subscriptions and the non-payment of many of them for several years—approaching a financial crisis, yet, considered in its mail-list, the good-will going with the transfer, the probable balance of several hundred dollars in the treasury, the bound back volumes, the collection of tracts, the furnishing and all other appurtenances of the office, was of no inconsiderable pecuniary value. Yet far greater than any pecuniary measure of value was the opportunity, won by ten and a half years of hard labor,—and labor of a superior intellectual character. And here the thanks are due, almost exclusively, to the late editor, Mr. Abbot, who, to all practical intents and purposes, has been THE INDEX and the Index Association. All the results of these years of hard pioneer work,—the hearing secured, the public opinion prepared, the public respect won, the highway laid out on which after-comers may travel more easily,—all these he now freely and magnanimously gives to the Free Religious Association. And, in so doing, he transmits to that Association an opportunity which it would take long and arduous efforts to reach, if the attempt for it were to be made de novo.

And what is that opportunity? It is to use that special agency of the nineteenth century, the printing-press and the newspaper, for the spread of the broad and rational principles of Free Religion. It is to continue the work which THE INDEX has so bravely and vigorously begun,—not necessarily by the same methods (it is a part of the generosity of the gift that this is neither asked nor expected), but toward the same end,—the enthronement of reason in religion, the overthrow of superstition, the establishment of Truth, Righteousness, and Love as the triune power and expression of natural religion in human society; and to do it, if not always by the same methods, as nearly as possible in the same spirit of uncompromising fidelity to conviction and of impartial justice to friend and foe. THE INDEX does not take down its banner. Rather, if it be possible, do we hope for aid to so carry the old flag that it may be seen and accepted by a wider multitude of people. Even though, as published by the Free Religious Association, it is no longer the organ of the "American Liberal Union," and the familiar platform and names of officers of the latter society, successor to the National Liberal League of America, now disappear, yet it is not to be inferred from this fact that the paper will not continue to advocate the secularization of the State. And especially should we deprecate the opinion, if anybody holds it, that the change of administration betokens any reversal of the position which THE INDEX has so strenuously taken in the last two years on certain questions of public and social morality. Not always able to see the danger so imminent as it has appeared to Mr. Abbot, yet his ground on these questions has been our own; and if, as he predicts, we shall soon see from the exposed position of our editorial chair the same portents, then most surely our voice will be heard uttering the same warnings.

But our editorial work must be judged by its results week by week rather than by any programme that might be laid down in advance. We enter upon it making no promises, offering no pledges, except faithfulness to our own convictions and a sincere desire to make our convictions square with truth.

We fully believe, however, in the opportunity; and hope to help others so to see it before a twelvemonth shall have elapsed, that this new departure for THE INDEX shall be no longer an experiment, but an assured success. We say frankly, however, that at present it is an experiment; and an experiment which, in order to succeed, will demand hard work from a few and generous financial support from many. But, if we of liberal, rationalistic views have any genuine faith in our own convictions, it is work and generosity that will find their reward in solid benefit to mankind. For ourself, we are not among the pessimists, who are getting so fashionable to-day, and who utter such woful jeremiades over the various social evils threatening mankind that it seems absolutely futile to try to resist the baleful, overwhelming tide; nor are we among the easy-going, complacent optimists, who think that the world is all right and has always been, and that nothing that any individual men or women can do or forbear to do can make any possible difference in the result. Of the two classes, we hardly know which is the more harmful. The pessimist has convictions, but he has no motive to use them. The optimist, from his habit of regarding one thing as equally good with another in respect to the result, is in danger of losing all convictions as well as any motive for putting them to use. Leaving optimist and pessimist to neutralize each other, we are of those who hold that the world is not so wholly bad that it is useless to try to improve it, nor so good but that it can be made a great deal better. We believe that the world as it is, our human part of it, is not a finished world, and that man rises to the imperial dignity of his nature when, becoming conscious of the creative plan, he sets to work to complete the world in accordance with it. For this reason, believing that what has come to be understood under the phrase Free Religion is a message needed by mankind today, we have set our hands to this new task. Other hands, other brains, are ready to aid us, but they must be paid. To pay them, we need money,—money by donations, money from new subscribers. Who will thus come to our side, and help us to uphold this banner of "Light, Liberty, and Right"?

Digitized by Google

We have added another motto to the paper, adopting for the purpose the favorite sentiment of one of the most venerable and venerated Vice-Presidents of the Free Religious Association, Lucretia Mott,—"Truth for authority, not authority for truth." This form of statement, which has been a favorite one with Mrs. Mott for many years, and which she uttered at the close of an address on the platform of the Association at its third annual meeting, very tersely expresses the primary point of difference between the Free Religious Association and all the older and ordinary types of religious organization. These take for authority, which they set over what the human mind is to believe as true, some ecclesiastical creed or book or prophet, or church or pope or Christ. The Free Religious Association rejects all these as authority, save so far as they utter what on other grounds can be received as true; and what is to be believed as true is a question to be determined always by the nature and laws of human intelligence. Mrs. Mott gives an interesting reminiscence of the origin of the sentiment with her. She writes,—I quote from a letter by herself to a grandson,—"Some few years after 'the separation' [she refers to the separation among the Quakers between the Hicksites and the Orthodox], Nicholas Hallock was at our Yearly Meeting with a minute of unity; and, when answering the queries, he objected to the Scriptures being called Holy, which led to some opposition, and a claim of authority for the Bible, when he remarked that he 'preferred Truth for authority.' I did not hear him, but as reported to me I was led to adopt it as a motto. In so far, it may be called original."

We had hoped to have a biographical sketch of Mrs. Mott for this number of our paper, but failed to secure it. We are sure that there are many liberals of the younger generation, to whom Lucretia Mott is mainly a venerated and saintly name, who would like to know more of the life of the woman who has made this name both so familiar and so revered, and who at eighty-seven years still keeps her youthful interest in every good cause of spiritual liberty and moral and social reform.

AN APOLOGUE.

Many years ago, out of the best materials that were then at hand, a barbaric man built himself a hut. He made it as snug and weather-proof as he could, thatching it with palm-leaves and patching its crevices with mud that soon became hard and dry in the sun. When it was completed, he found its cool shade a very pleasant refuge from the hot sun; and, as the winter came on, it was equally grateful as a defence against storms and cold. Its floor was of the primitive earth; and in one corner there bubbled up a tiny spring, at whose waters he quenched his thirst. By long labor, he gathered an extensive store of roots and nuts, enough to supply his simple wants for an almost indefinite time. When he heard the wild beasts without, he only looked well to the fastening of his door, and rejoiced in his sense of safety. The air of his hut was wholesome enough to sustain life; and a chink in the wall—which he had accidentally omitted to close—let in a feeble ray of light, which was sufficient for his not over-intellectual life.

At the end of a long and comfortable winter in his hut, a strange fancy came into his head. He took up the notion that in a hut like his was the only proper and safe place for a man to live. The water from his little spring was the only wholesome water to drink. The air which he had caught and fenced in with his four walls was the only pure and invigorating air on the face of the earth. His tiny ray of light, which the crack in the wall let in, was the only light in the world by which things could be correctly seen. The wild beasts could never be killed off or subdued; and so there was no safety for any but those who were fenced in. He had horrible dreams of the dangers without; and these he took for "revelations" to confirm him in his opinions. He began to wonder how he had ever managed to live before his hut was built; and he pitied, from the bottom of his heart, those who had to drink the streams and breathe the air and live in the sunshine outside. At last, he came to regard himself as divinely favored; and he assumed the name of "saint,"—that is, one selected, set apart, or peculiarly chosen.

Whenever he got a whiff of the outside air, he noticed that it lacked the peculiar odor and quality of that which he had fenced in and was accustomed to breathe. And, concluding that the air of his hut was the only air that was "sacred" and pure, he took measures the more tightly to close every crevice that let in the "worldly" air from without. And one day, when his door was blown open by accident, the flood of light almost blinded him. This convinced him completely that nobody could see out of doors; and he trembled with fear lest his accustomed views of things should be entirely lost. He therefore put extra fastenings on his door, and gave renewed thanks for the one little ray that revealed the familiar outlines of what had become to him all he wanted to know of the world.

After a time, other men came along that way. And, when they learned the strange life that this hermit led, they tried to induce him to open his door and come out to them, into what they called "the great and beautiful world." But he was only horrified at the proposal; and, in his turn, he tried, with the utmost earnestness, to persuade them that their only safe way was to build themselves huts like his own. In air-tight jars and bottles, he offered to furnish them specimens of his own sacred air and water and light. He said that they could thus infect and sanctify their own huts, and so link themselves by "apostolical succession" to the "odor of sanctity," the "dim, religious light," and the "holy water" of his own antiquity.

They told him they could see outside where they already were: but he said, he was sure it was only a delusion, the false glamour of some deceptive spirit; for nobody could really see except by the ray of light that came, like his, through a crevice in the wall. They said that they could breathe perfectly well out of doors, and that all the air he had in his hut came from out of doors originally; but he replied that the "natural" lungs—which were not used to the air of his hut—were diseased and depraved, and so were no proper authority on the subject of fresh air. Only the nostrils of the initiated, he said, could tell holy air when they sniffed it. They further said that the water of the outside streams was clear and limpid, and that they had even discovered that the source of his own spring was there outside; but he declared vehemently that he knew they were deluded by some enemy of souls. His spring, he said, sprung up where once the foot of an angel had trodden. And, besides, no water was holy that had not been a good while in the dark, that did not have a mysterious origin, and that had not been used for the daily ablutions of a saint like himself.

When they declined his advice to build themselves huts like his, and said that the whole world was God's house, and they had concluded to "risk it" out under the wide sky, he most sincerely mourned over them. He talked about people's being so deluded as to live "all out-of-doors"; and he felt privately sure that an earthquake would swallow them up, or that the lightning would strike them for the impiety of rejecting his overtures.

But they only smiled, and said: "Let him alone in his hut. He is so used to it now that it would only distress him to tear it down. But, as for us, all God's sunlight is none too much for our seeing, all his air is none too much for our lungs, and all his showers and rivers and seas we will drink of, sail over, and glory in." M. J. S.

CLASSICS OF FREE RELIGION.

John Milton.

I.

In the series of articles under the above caption, it is proposed to pass in brief review the representative men whose lives and work have been concerned in the effort to liberate the human mind from its errors of opinion and practice respecting God and Man. They will be continued from time to time, according to the interest of the reader and the resources of the writer.

No partisan claim is attempted to be set up for the names selected; but wherever one is found that, by pen or tongue or action, made surer and clearer the foundations of truth and life, to his we shall attach ourselves as disciples rather than seek to inscribe it upon our walls.

Free thought can very well do without authority and tradition; or, if it accept them, it teaches their uses as a light to the feet, not a pack upon the back. It as distinctly teaches us to guard against even itself, lest we fall into a narrow self-conceit, which is the characteristic of some who break away from the old. A fetter is nothing less a fetter, because one has himself made and fastened it. Free thought is for a sail sometimes, sometimes a rudder, never an anchor. In spiritual matters, those who follow this discipline will discover plentiful ample harbors and pleasant retreats; those on the open sea, safety and hope in the midst of adventures. In this spirit and under the guidance of these principles, we come to John Milton; and first to the observation of him as a lover of freedom in civil government, in domestic and intellectual problems; and in a second number we shall consider his position and ideas in relation to religious and sectarian institutions.

Digitized by Google

The influences of Milton's early life were of two kinds, not often found together then or later,—Puritan and æsthetic. His father, well-born and highly educated, had become, during the early religious controversies, a Puritan, and in consequence had been disinherited. He sought his own fortune then in London, where his house became the resort of scholars and musicians. Study and music surrounded Milton's infancy and youth. His father was an accomplished musician and composer. "Old York," one of his compositions, still maintains its popularity in Protestant churches. In Milton's finest Latin poem, Ad Patrem, he elegantly alludes to the allied tastes of himself and his father. Two lines condensed and translated from several will illustrate the connection:—

> One art father and son alike pursue:
> That music owns, and this the muse's due.

It is not unlikely, therefore, that Milton early imbibed, in that twofold influence, something which enlarged his mind with the double light of the highest intellectual and moral atmosphere. And culture became the counterpoise to a narrow, provisional belief. The breadth of his attainments, his purified vision, restrained him at all periods from the bigotry of his sect and the weaknesses of his party; while, on the other hand, the enthusiasm of new ideas, and the noble virtues always, at their first advent, engendered, kindled in him a pure and constantly mounting flame that neither public defect nor his own misfortunes could extinguish. He "obeyed the voice at eve obeyed at morn." There is no more sublime record among men than that which is written of Milton at fifty years of age, after twenty years of struggle for every right now dearest to the heart of man, defeated at every point, but, undespairing, retiring to compose the epic of our tongue.

His reading, of Plato, and especially the history of the ancient republics, had made him an idealist in politics; and this was strengthened by his delight in the lofty characters of imaginative literature. He desired a model State, and neither Parliament, Commonwealth, nor Protectorate suited with his dream of a free and glorious people. Nevertheless, he kept for his pen his more impracticable ideas, and labored with zeal for the best civil polity then attainable. Milton in party uniform is not the most encouraging figure; but ever and anon he discloses a garment which from youth up he never changed. He comprehended all parties and sects; and, although he often championed the interests of his own, he never forgets to insist upon the most absolute freedom for conscience and speech. "I have determined," he says, "to lay up as the best treasure and solace of a good old age, if God vouchsafe it to me, the honest liberty of free speech from my youth."

In what manner he kept this promise, when the occasions came for defending a free press, for sustaining England's policy before Europe in her experiment of a reformed government and church, the English race has incorporated into the most precious chapters of its civil history. In whatever direction one studies Milton's career, he finds him a reformer, never resting long in any conclusion, constant and consistent only in a passion for free inquiry. This led him from royalty to republicanism, from Aristotle's Poetic Art to the following of nature, from the Bible to reason, from three gods to one, from ritualism to interior communion, from creeds to living, from an intended priest to a "blameless silence," and from going to church to staying at home.

In him may be seen an example of a great mind, moving by regular and natural steps out of traditions and conventions, unagitated by censure or applause, into the liberties of untramelled thinking and reasoning. The accusation that the faith of his later contradicted his earlier years, and that indeed it was never consistent, is the touch-stone of his critics hitherto. It tries them all, and does not accept their proffered leniency as an equivalent for justice.

There is a single reservation only to the extent of his advanced principles. Everywhere, in prose and verse, he assigns the conventional place, and the traditional reasons for that place, to woman. He was a reformer in all education except for her. He is reported as having said that one tongue was enough for a woman. Yet he paid to a lady one of the two or three finest compliments any ever has received. Rights, however, are demanded, not compliments. Softly, ladies, we are nearly done admiring; and soon the last obstacle will be removed, and we can spare you to yourselves. But let us not seek Milton's answer to a question, to a demand, in his time not yet made. Without this, and many others there is still in Milton's life and writings a manifold adaptation to our times. No man of our race embodies so much that is instructive and inspiring to those seeking higher ideals and wider thoughts. J. A.

THE TESTIMONIAL TO MR. ABBOT.

There have been, for some weeks, quiet intimations of a parting tribute in prospect to Mr. Abbot on his retirement from the INDEX, expressive of appreciation of his services to the cause of liberalism and regard for his intellectual ability and personal character.

The proposal met at once with cordial interest and favor. It seemed very fitting that the noble devotion to his convictions which he has exhibited through evil and good report, the valor, vigor, and self-forgetfulness with which he has enunciated and defended great principles of truth and righteousness, should receive some such mark of recognition, as he withdraws from the strife and lays aside his armor.

As the time approached when these labors were to close, the inspiring influence which he had so long exerted through the colum s of the INDEX to cease, and the intellectual fellowship thus shared with its readers to be broken, the value of his work, as is too often the case in like instances, began to be realized more vividly, and regret to deepen at the thought of his leaving it.

Under these circumstances, the farewell testimonial to him, last Friday evening, at Young's Hotel in this city, could not fail to be one of unusual interest and sincerity. It showed how wide and deep has been the sense of his fine mental qualities and the loftiness and purity of his aims. It was a demonstration of which any man might well be proud. Indeed, in some particulars, it was almost without a parallel in our recollection. It is seldom that so young a man, of so marked an intellectual individuality, is the recipient of such abundant honors from veteran thinkers and reformers of world-wide reputation. It was all the more remarkable in view of the fact that many of those by whom they were rendered were not in full accord with Mr. Abbot's position and work, but associated with ideas and modes of effort with which he is at variance, and has been accustomed to sharply criticise and assail.

Among those who were present or sent letters of regret because of absence were persons of various shades of thought,—some straight, out-and-out infidels and some Christians. A considerable number were Unitarian ministers with whom he had been in intimate fellowship in early life in the Divinity School or the ministry, and from whom he long since parted to pursue a divergent path.

At six o'clock, the parlors of Young's were thrown open, and friendly greetings and sympathetic converse circulated among the gathering assembly, composed of persons from various localities, some of whom had endured the excessive heat of several hours' travel to be present. At about eight, the company proceeded to the dining-room, and took places at the table. It is well known that the cuisine of Young's is famous among those who relish the good things of this life, and the menu presented on this occasion appeared to justify its reputation.

The absence of the Rev. Mr. Savage, who had been expected to preside, but was unable to do so, owing to his departure for Europe, caused much regret; but his place was most fortunately supplied by Mr. Charles G. Ames, editor of the Christian Register. Those who are familiar with Mr. Ames' hearty sympathies, and vivacious and sparkling mental characteristics, can readily conceive how smoothly and happily everything must have glided on to the conclusion, under his direction as master of ceremonies. His introductory speech at the close of the feast was as good as it could be, and set all hearts in full vibration with the spirit of the occasion. The remarks of Mr. Abbot, that followed, were manly and dignified, and evinced the absolute sincerity of his nature and the disinterestedness of his purposes. Although deeply sensible of the kindness and friendship which the compliment of the evening manifested, he said he should feel disappointed and unworthy of it, did he not believe that it bore a more important significance,—if he did not regard it as a plaudit upon his efforts to vindicate Liberalism from any necessary connection with foulness and indecency, to show that it is compatible with purity and morality.

As a complete report of the proceedings is hereafter to appear in the INDEX, we do not feel ourselves called upon to give them more than this passing notice now, and to observe that they were in all respects an eminent success. D. H. C.

WE LEARN, just as we are going to press, that blanks are being sent to the various Liberal Leagues of the country, for which the signatures of their Directors are asked, to authorize O. B. Frothingham, Mrs. E. L. Rose, A. C. Bristol, D. M. Bennett, A. L. Rawson, and several others less known to fame, to represent the Leagues at the Brussels Congress of Free Thinkers this summer.

It is safe to say that Mr. Frothingham's, name at least, has been used in this circular without his consent or knowledge. The Liberal League at Meriden, Conn., has returned, we are informed, the following reply, which we commend to the consideration of other Leagues receiving the circular:—

We, the undersigned officers of the Meriden Liberal League, particularly object to D. M. Bennett and A. L. Rawson as delegates to the Brussels Congress, and we know too little of the other delegates recommended, O. B. Frothingham excepted, to select them as our representatives.

DURING a recent freshet, a reporter telegraphed to another at the scene of action, "Send me full particulars of the flood." The answer came, "You will find them in Genesis."

CASH RECEIPTS OF THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 26.

F. A. Greene, $13.20; Hopson & Sherman, $7.60; George F. Upton, $7.50; Jonas Smith, $10.00; W. J. Birchard, $1.00; John M. Ramsey, $8.00; L. S. Fechelmer, $6.00; J. A. Chanter, $1.00; E. V. Smith, $1.00; John A. Nestle, $3.74; Mary J. Copeland, $2.25; American News Company, $3.88; Wm. C. French, $2.20; New England News Company, $2.60; M. A. Shepard, $3.00; Henry Field, $6.40; J. D. En-ign, $1.20; L. T. Converse, $4.40; Dr. Erich, $3.20; Richard Moorhead, $1.00; Edward F. Greene, $1.43; Mrs. E. Sargeant, $2.00; Mrs. Pauline O. Cook, $3.20; S. Brooke, $9.60; Harrison Bliss, $3.25; John Cooper, $1.00; Lee & Shepard, $0.85; D. E. Ware, $39.60.

Digitized by Google

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

We learn from the Nation of the invention of a new word,—hierography,— which is to be studied (not the word, but the thing signified) by a new bi-monthly, published at Paris, the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions. This publication is to treat in connection two studies hitherto commonly separated; namely, those called by preference comparative mythology and those which belong to Biblical criticism. In other words, the Review will apply to the monuments which reveal the religious history of Judaism and the sources of Christianity the same weights and measures that are applied without hesitation or protest to the religions of India and Egypt. There has long been need of a good publication of this kind. We have studied what are known as ethnic religions with a certain degree of impartiality: there has been at least a genuine desire to get at their historic facts, their philosophies, and the secret of their sway over the minds of their believers; but, as soon as the most "advanced" Christian touches Judaism or Christianity, his courage seems to fail, or he is unable to rid himself of the prejudices of race, or early education, or the influence of his religious surroundings; and our information regarding these two religions becomes discolored or distorted. The new Review has an almost unoccupied field before it, and may be wished a successful career.

A fresh illustration of the growing sensitiveness of sectarian leaders with regard to deserved imputations of ignorance of scientific studies, as well as a recognition of the growing importance of the relations between Science and Religion, is furnished by the Rev. R. Heber Newton, of the Anthon Memorial Church of New York City, who spoke recently, on a Sunday morning, before his sermon, upon the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church. "There is," he said, "an effort being made to increase the endowment fund of this seminary. 'I want to advise the members of this church not to give any money for this object. My reason for doing this is not a factious opposition to this seminary. I have a great interest in it, but not in the education which it gives at present. The education given there now is that of the past. It is of the pre-reformation character. There is a lack of generous scholarship. . . . I met the president of Annandale College, which is one of the principal feeders of the seminary, the other day; and he told me that the natural sciences were not taught at that college. The seminary is conducted on principles just about as illiberal. It would be better to have the seminary razed to the ground and abolished altogether than to have it fill the church with the men it does now." These are bold words from an Episcopal minister. The members of the faculty of the arraigned seminary have been interviewed by reporters, and attempt of course to lessen the force of Mr. Newton's criticisms; but their attempts are exceedingly feeble, and are confined chiefly to declaring that the seminary is not a "high church" institution. The affair has given to lookers-on an interesting view of the kind of education which some Episcopalians regard as sufficient for their clergymen. The statement remains undisputed that the natural sciences are not taught in the college which is the principal feeder of their principal theological seminary, and in this last of course they are wholly ignored. Fortunately, the denomination has its Newtons, as well as its mediæval colleges and seminaries.

An analogous illustration of the present undefined position of the religious sects—with a very different and more hopeful outlook, however—is given in a discussion which took place at the last commencement of the Yale Theological Seminary. The subject related to a proposed revision of the creed of the Orthodox Congregational Church; and some of the utterances seem almost to mark an epoch in the history of this denomination. One minister argued that a revision of the creed is impossible to-day, because the Church is not yet ready to say what it believes with regard to evolution, or the origin of species, or the authenticity of the Pentateuch. Another thought that, instead of attempting to write out a new and satisfactory creed of the things believed, it would be better to draw up a list of the things not believable. Dr. Bacon was willing to adopt a new creed, but only on condition that it be revised every few years,—say once in nine years. And Dr. Porter, Yale's President, thought that every church should have its own creed, to be changed with the settlement of each new pastor. What is the world coming to? If we could believe that some of these utterances were fairly representative of the spirit of the majority of the members of the Orthodox Congregational Church to-day, we should be inclined to advise the Free Religious Association to disband at once, or to propose a union with the Orthodox Church; for nothing can be more "free" than the logical inferences from some of these positions.

In melancholy contrast with the apparent spirit of the above discussion was the tone of the Baccalaureate Sermon of the Rev. Dr. Peabody at Harvard College. It seems to have been (we judge only from the Boston Journal's report) an exhortation to have faith in "a realm of being superior to the outward world," and in Jesus Christ "as the revealer of that world." "I apprehend," he is reported as saying, "that the progress and effects of what is commonly termed natural science have shaken and undermined, in the minds of many, the foundations of that faith. But there is much less ground for the apprehension than is commonly supposed. The few agnostics who have distinguished themselves in the advanced science of our time are conspicuous as exceptions to their class, rather than specimens of it. You may search in vain in Darwin's books for an utterance hostile to religious faith, and in our own university the Professor who has borne equal pace with Darwin has deemed it his highest blessedness that he is a disciple of Jesus Christ." Putting aside several serious criticisms which might justly be made upon the assertions of this passage, we call attention only to the unworthy implications to be found in it, as, for instance, that the possibility of one's belief in agnosticism might be affected by a counting of noses, or that natural science should not be allowed to undermine our faith as long as Professor Gray is a disciple of Jesus Christ. The sermon appears to assume that Science and Religion are enemies, and that belief in or pursuit of the former necessitates or involves great danger of living upon a low "sphere." The students are begged not to fall into any current of sceptical thought, but—and here again is an unworthy implication—to take counsel of their "higher nature," of their "moral and spiritual needs," as though scientific or sceptical men do not take counsel of their higher natures, but persistently ignore their moral and spiritual needs.

R. C.

A JERSEY correspondent says the reports which have lately been circulated relative to the purchase of property in that island as an asylum for Jesuits, on their approaching expulsion from France, are now confirmed. An agreement has been entered into for the purchase by the Jesuits of the Imperial Hotel, and arrangements are being made for giving possession at an early date.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE SOCIETY which is called the Associated Charities of Boston, shows the direction in which modern charity is tending in Western Europe and the United States. As features of this tendency may be mentioned: the aiming at one system under which all branches of charity can do their work best; the endeavor, under one system, to bring always larger numbers of the rich into relation with the poor; the apportioning of the work of charity in smaller fields to each visitor or benefactor, so that it may be easy for each to do a little well, and that help may not be wasted; and the idea that, by thus apportioning and concentrating the work, the important element of friendly interest may be developed, and may lead to sympathy, encouragement, and elevation.

The details vary in different places. In Boston, which has always been noted for its charities, there is one detail of the general system which is hardly to be found so much developed elsewhere. In order to classify cases asking help in such a way as to allow of the best selection and distribution, a general registration on cards has been found necessary. This registration has been a gradual growth here; but at last all the information attainable has been united in one bureau. Registration, more or less similar, has been adopted in other American cities; but it is said none such yet exists in London. Boston has always differed from other cities in having a larger number of charities. These numerous societies have worked independently of each other until now. Efforts have before been made to associate them, but it seems the time was not ripe. Now a successful beginning of getting the charities associated has come. This union may yet find a way for a single system of work, each charity in its own field supplementing others, and each doing its work better.

The first effort of those who have been active in the present organization was made as long ago as 1875, when the Coöperative Society of Visitors among the Poor started the friendly visiting of four cases by each visitor on the Elberfeld system, which had succeeded in Germany. This was on a small scale, and was to try only one element of the present Associated Charities, into which it has now been partly absorbed. The next movement was that for universal registration in 1876 and 1877, which succeeded as far as it went, but needed more general support and more extended sources of supply. This was adopted by and is now a part of the Associated Charities, so called. Finally, in March, 1878, the first meeting of the present movers was called to frame a plan fit for Boston, and founded on Miss Octavia Hill's four years' successful work in London, and on other partly similar systems elsewhere, as in Germantown and Buffalo.

The success attained so far should be encouraging to those who planned the Associated Charities. While it is not wholly a new or original plan, and while it has some imperfections, it has great capacities for good, and for development in the direction found best. Its growth in one full winter of trial has proved its many merits, and may be the means of helping its imperfections. It has been already the means of bringing together for information and advice those who before had worked in the same field, but never met. It has gradually covered the whole city excepting Charlestown and Brighton, and has brought into coöperation almost all the societies giving out-door relief. Probably four-fifths of this relief given by these societies is now registered, not for public inspection, but only for private authorized inquiry as to individual cases. Visitors of all the out-door societies assist the work of the District Conferences.

Digitized by Google

The number of Associated Charities' visitors, in all the wards, is over five hundred. They visit, all together, over one thousand families, and have from one to three or four cases each, which they are actually visiting, and many more which are no longer visited regularly. They visit in a friendly way once a week or less frequently, and report to the conference for advice. For help in money or orders, the former sources are relied on; but the work of existing agencies is aided and concentrated by the work of the Associated Charities.

In some cases, new charity givers are called for, for the reason that the Associated Charities is only an organizing and visiting agency, and not a relief society itself. New or enlarged industrial agencies and training schools of various kinds are often found necessary, and by working under one system they are made the more effective.

But, for givers or workers, there seems abundant opportunity for wise and systematic help in the Associated Charities of Boston.

The needs of the Associated Charities in accordance with the plan will be always more visitors, and a sufficient sum of money assured for each year to pay for administration expenses, which must be considerable, but which are found in other cities to be well spent. Economy will be necessary in so districting the city or combining conferences as to get the most efficient work at the least expense.

Accurate statistics of the work cannot yet be stated, but are preparing for the annual meeting in the fall. The work and its cost can then be fairly judged.

THE MASSACHUSETTS SOCIETY for the University Education of Women, in this the third year of its existence, has a most hopeful and encouraging record to show. It counts among its members many of the women in the State who are most heartily interested in the efforts making for higher and better education, and all are energetically working in a practical way to collect funds to assist young women pursuing, or desiring to pursue, collegiate courses of study. Since the Association was incorporated, fifteen students have been assisted, the majority of whom would have been forced to relinquish their plans for study, had not this society offered them substantial help and encouragement. At the monthly parlor meetings, held each year during the winter and spring, interesting and valuable papers have been read and addresses delivered by prominent educators and others interested in educational progress. The ladies of this society hope to aid in supplying the great need for permanent scholarships for young women. The opportunities for higher education are many and varied and widening each year, but there are comparatively few among the many young women of talent longing to make use of these advantages, who have the necessary funds at their command. A little kindly aid, judiciously given, will often second efforts toward self-support which would otherwise prove futile, and it is the giving of sympathy and encouragement as well as moneyed aid that has made the work of these ladies so attractive and interesting. We rejoice to see that the claim of this class of students, so long unrecognized, is beginning to receive the attention it merits; and we trust that the hearty support this society has already received carries with it the promise of enlarged work for the future, and the near fulfilment of the practical ends it has in view.

THE Bristol Operatives' Liberal Association have passed a resolution approving the appointment of Lord Ripon, because it demonstrates a leading principle of Liberalism,—that a man's religious views should not disqualify him for any public appointment.

ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, MAY 27 AND 28, 1880.

NOTE.—Instead of the pamphlet issued in previous years, the Annual Report of the Free Religious Association is to be printed in successive numbers of THE INDEX.

The thirteenth annual meeting of the Free Religious Association opened in Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, with the usual session for business, Thursday evening, May 27, 1880, being called to order at 8 o'clock by the President, Felix Adler. The record of the last meeting was read by the Secretary and accepted.

The Treasurer presented his report as follows:—

RECEIPTS.

1879.
May 29.	Balance on hand received from R. P. Hallowell, former Treasurer	$51.06
May 30.	Membership fees and donations collected at convention meetings	183 30
June 2.	Membership fees, donations, and receipts from sale of refreshments and flowers at Festival on evening of May 30, received from C. H. Codman, Treasurer of Festival Committee	237.84
1880.
May 27.	Membership fees and donations received during the year by the Treasurer direct, and through W. J. Potter, H. P. Hyde, David H. Clark, Hannah E. Stevenson, and others	1,233.22
	Collections by Felix Adler and D. H. Clark in New York city and vicinity, less the expenses of Mr. Clark	822.00
	From Index Association, for sale of reports	29.30
	" " " " " " tracts..	14.34
	Total	$2,571.08

DISBURSEMENTS.

1880.
May 27.	Rent of Young Men's Christian Union Hall ($78), and Parker Memorial Hall ($25), for Convention and Festival, 1879	$103.00
	James Dooling; Jones, McDuffee & Stratton; and others, for various expenses in connection with said Festival	42.89
	Advertising expenses	29.38
	Cochrane & Sampson, for printing	227.57
	J. M. W. Yerrinton, for reporting	41.25
	Index Association, for clerk's services	100.00
	Postage-stamps, stamped wrappers, envelopes, and lithogram for circulars, and expenses of clerk-hire for sending out circulars	101.57
	Book purchased of Index Association	1.00
	Total	$646.66
	Balance on hand May 27, 1880	$1,924.42

JOHN C. HAYNES, Treasurer.

BOSTON, May 27, 1880.

Voted, That the Treasurer's report be accepted.

The President stated that by vote of the meeting last year no committee was named for the nomination of officers this year; and he would therefore ask the meeting to initiate action for the election of officers, which the constitution only directed should be by ballot. Mr. A. W. Stevens offered a package of printed ballots for the convenience of members, in behalf of Mr. T. W. Higginson, who was unable to be present, the names on the list being the same as the officers of the last year. Mrs. S. B. Otis also presented a ballot, the same as last year, with the exception of Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer in place of Mr. F. E. Abbot as a director.

Voted, That Messrs. F. A. Hinckley and A. W. Stevens be a committee to distribute these and any other ballots that individual members may have to offer, and then collect and assort the votes.

Mr. Abbot asked the members to vote for the ticket that omitted his name, as it was his intention (which he had already expressed) not to serve again as director, and he should have to decline, if elected. Mr. D. H. Clark suggested that, in view of the large number of new members recently added to the Association in New York, it would be well to have another member of the Executive Committee in that city; and he presented to the consideration of voters the name of Edward Lauterbach as the tenth director, which the constitution allows.

Before the vote was declared, the Report of the Executive Committee was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

THIRTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Our thirteenth year has been a year of preparations. We have held no conventions since the last annual meeting, sustained no courses of lectures, nor issued any publications excepting the pamphlet containing the last Annual Report. But the whole attention of the Executive Committee has been devoted to preparing the way for two new enterprises, which, if carried into successful operation, will give the Free Religious Association a wider influence than it has yet possessed. These enterprises have demanded the most thoughtful consideration as well as the husbanding of all our pecuniary resources for their use when inaugurated; and hence, though the things we have done in former years might have been done again, it was thought best to suspend activity in those directions,—at least temporarily,—and thus save means for the larger and more systematic work to follow; for these enterprises, though two, are yet parts of one general plan.

One of these new enterprises, though in a general way commended to the Association by the Report of the Executive Committee, was instituted by the action of the last annual meeting itself. After some discussion of the matter at that meeting, which did not develop, however, entire unanimity of opinion, the following resolution was passed without dissent:—

"That in view of the present imperative need of more active exertion in behalf of the principles of Free Religion, looking to a wider and more effective presentation of these to the general mind, there be a committee appointed, consisting of three persons, to be designated by the chair, who shall mature and present for its consideration to the Executive Committee of this Association a carefully prepared plan, designed to initiate and carry forward measures that shall be adapted to meet this requirement."

The Committee appointed under this vote, consisting of Messrs. C. D. B. Mills, David H. Clark, and Seth Hunt, were ready to report by midsummer; but the members of the Executive Committee were at that time scattered, and it was not deemed judicious to have the Report presented until a full attendance could be obtained, which was not until the latter part of September. The Report was then presented by one of the members of the Committee, Mr. Clark, in person, and, after some preliminary discussion, was referred to a Sub-committee for more special consideration, with instructions to prepare and present at a subsequent meeting such definite plan of action as should seem to them judicious.

The Report of Messrs. Mills, Clark, and Hunt has been printed in THE INDEX, and its substance is perhaps well known to members of the Association generally. Suffice it to state here that it earnestly recommended a more effective organization and a large increase of activity on the part of the Association in three directions: first, the encouragement and aid of local Free Religious Societies, together with the formation of local Free Religious Sunday-schools; second, the selection and employment of lecturers and platform speakers, with a view to holding more frequent conventions, and the systematic institution of lectures in behalf of the principles of Free Religion throughout the country; third, the enlargement of our instrumentality of publication, particular mention being made of the need of manuals and books for use in instruction of the young and "the support of a journal that should be a fitting exponent of our principles." In order that the work in these three departments might be more effectively organized, the report further recommended that a more convenient and efficient central office be established, with a general agent who, subject to a committee or board, of the Association, should be the working-man in the practical conduct of these new activities.

The Sub-committee to whom this Report was referred gave it most earnest thought. No hasty action was or could be taken by them in so important a matter, or by the Executive Committee. A considerable difference of opinion was developed (as previously at the annual meeting, when the subject was first broached), especially on the point of how far the Association could go, consistently with its constitution and principles, in extending help toward the formation of local societies. Ultimately, however, after a careful comparison of views and an endeavor to reconcile in some working-plan the views of all, the Executive Committee were nearly unanimous in making the statement which was sent out the latter part of last November to members and friends of the Association, with an appeal for funds. Though this document has been widely circulated, it may be well to put on record in this report, the special practical measures it proposed, which were as follows:—

1st. The enlargement of the work of our Office, with view to bringing the Association into more direct and active communication with the liberal religious sentiment of the country. This enlargement will necessitate a removal of the office to more commodious and consequently more expensive quarters.

2d. The appointment of a General Agent (at a salary not to exceed, at the outset, the rate of $1,000 per annum), who shall have charge of the office with these duties. He will do whatever work is now done by our agent there in the sale and distribution of our publications, and the receiving of names and fees for membership; enter into correspondence with friends of the Association; gather and preserve such statistics and other information as may be of use in our work; make arrangements for lecturers as specified in the subsequent section; and furnish, as occasion may offer, information and suggestion to persons anywhere desiring to form local societies on the general basis of this Association.

Digitized by Google

3d. The use of the Central Office as a Lecture Bureau Agency in the interest of the Free Religious movement, through which local associations may secure speakers and liberal views may be more widely spread; and to this end lecturers, carefully selected by the unanimous action of the Executive Committee (the only tests being irreproachable moral reputation and intellectual fitness), will be invited to go to places where the General Agent may find for them a hearing.

As a part of this plan, an efficient Committee will have special and constant supervision of the office work, subject to the approval and direction of the Executive Committee. To this Office Committee, the General Agent will be responsible, and to it will look for suggestion, counsel, and direction in his work.

In addition to these measures, though not necessarily dependent upon them, it has also been voted that the Standing Committee on Publications take into consideration the demand which already exists, and is likely to increase, for lesson papers and text-books on comparative religion, practical ethics, and social science, for use in home instruction of the young and in liberal Sunday-schools, and that this Committee report to the Executive Committee for further action the most feasible plan for meeting this demand, if, in their judgment, any plan can be devised.

The Committee voted that at least two thousand dollars should be received, in response to the appeal for funds to carry this plan into operation, before it would be safe to enter upon it. In the mailing and distribution of the appeal, it was found necessary to secure compensated assistance, and Mr. D. H. Clark was engaged for this service at a very reasonable salary. After the necessary work was done in Boston, at the suggestion of the President of the Association, Mr. Clark went to New York, and has been personally canvassing among the liberals of that city and vicinity for the same object. But as the greater number of the contributions came in the form of ordinary membership fees ($1.00) or patrons' fees ($5.00),—this latter class of members having been established in accordance with a suggestion made at the last annual meeting,—the raising of the required sum has been slow, and, if we were to deduct the expense attending the collection, has barely yet been reached. But, when we remember that a large part of this amount has been contributed in a single city, New York, the success is very encouraging, especially as showing what might be done by a like personal canvass in other cities. Incidental, too, to this canvass, we have the advantage of having obtained a large number of new members, who, it is hoped, will remain to the benefit of the Association in future years. The funds requisite for carrying the proposed plan into effect having been so recently reached, or nearly reached, there has been no time as yet to begin operations; and perhaps it is just as well that a beginning has been thus necessarily delayed, for in the mean time opportunity for another form of work has come to us, which is soon to be entered upon, and the two can be favorably combined and inaugurated together. And this brings us to the second enterprise (referred to in the beginning of this Report), which we have had under consideration, and which it has been decided to adopt. This is nothing less than the publication of a weekly paper. It is evident that some of the practical conditions attending this second enterprise may be advantageously combined with those of the first; as, for instance, the office, and probably the services of a General Agent.

This enterprise of undertaking the publication of a paper was brought to the attention of the Committee by a communication received early in the present year from the Directors of the Index Association, stating that it was proposed to close the affairs of that Association by the 1st of July next, and offering to transfer to the Free Religious Association the publication of THE INDEX,—the offer including its mail-list, goodwill, whatsoever cash surplus might be in its treasury at time of transfer, and all other property belonging to it,—and the sole condition asked being that the Free Religious Association should assume the unexpired obligations to subscribers and advertisers. It was expected and understood, of course, that the publication would be continued in the interests of Free Religion. Giving the matter full consideration, it appeared to your Committee that it would be a waste of an excellent opportunity not to accept this gratuitous and generous offer. THE INDEX subscription list, though not now large enough to pay all the costs of the paper, including salary of editor, is yet a good one, and can doubtless be increased. The paper has won for itself an honorable field, which it would be difficult to win again, if it were now to be abandoned. Mr. Abbot, who has devoted his great ability to it for ten and a half years, will now irrevocably retire to other pursuits, and the publication must either pass to other hands or cease. Excepting the obligations on unexpired subscriptions and advertisements above referred to, there will be no debts; and in all probability there will be a balance of several hundred dollars of cash in the treasury, together with a fair prospect that a considerable number of its stockholders will voluntarily and generously pay to the Free Religious Association, for the continued issue of the paper, the tenth and last stock assessment which would be called for next October by the Index Association, should it continue to exist. Under all the circumstances, if it is advisable on general principles for the Free Religious Association to publish a paper at all, this has seemed to the Committee an opportunity for it that ought to be embraced. And there appears to them no good reason why the Association should not have a journal of its own,—a publication which, through the pens of a large number of its prominent members, shall faithfully represent the variety of thought and the manifold phases of reforms included in the wide sweep of the Free Religious movement. The Committee have therefore voted to accept the offer made by the Index Association, and undertake the responsibility which it imposes.

To arrange the practical details has been a matter of no little difficulty, but the problem is now in a fair way for solution. For better security, it is proposed that the property shall be held and financially managed by a Board of seven Trustees, to be appointed by the Free Religious Association and to be incorporated under the General Statute of Massachusetts,—four of the seven Trustees to be members of the Executive Committee, and after the first appointment only one of the Trustees to be elected annually. The Committee have been legally advised that this is a legal and practicable procedure. As the selection of these Trustees is a matter of great importance, and will also require, doubtless, previous consultation with the nominees, it is recommended that the appointment of them be referred to the Executive Committee that will be elected at this annual meeting. Perhaps, too, it will be wisest to leave the selection of the member who is to be chosen each year to the Executive Committee of the year.

The entire editorial responsibility and control of the paper, at least for the first year, will be assumed by the present Secretary of the Association, who will have an efficient assistant in the office for many of the practical details of the work, and be aided by an able corps of contributors. But, in order that this project may be inaugurated successfully and the Free Religious Association have a weekly journal that shall worthily represent its principles and work, large financial resources are needed; and the Committee have ventured, notwithstanding their recent appeal for funds for the other enterprise, to prepare a second appeal, which will be immediately sent out, asking for contributions specially for this object.

Thus, friends and fellow-workers in this cause, we present to you the two enterprises, the plans and preparations for which have absorbed our attention as a committee the past year. Whether they shall be much more than plans and preparations will depend not only on the wisdom and zeal of those who shall have the practical conduct of them, but also very largely on the pecuniary liberality with which they are started. If successful, they will work admirably together, and will support and strengthen each other in increasing ratio. And, unless we have greatly overestimated the sympathy and generosity of our widespread constituency, the next annual meeting will see these two enterprises far on the road to successful realization, and, through them, our Association, which some have feared was settling into inactivity and others have been clinging to for its ideal possibilities, lifted to a new era of practical power and usefulness.

Voted, That the report be accepted and the subject-matter of it be open for discussion.

Mr. G. W. Park moved,

"That the portion of the Report of the Executive Committee relating to the publication of a weekly paper be referred to the Executive Committee elected this evening, with instructions to carry out the enterprise substantially as recommended, and with power to arrange all the details thereof."

The motion was adopted without dissent.

The President spoke at some length of the importance of the new movement for a journal, and of the necessity of a generous support of it in order to insure success.

The Committee on the Ballot then reported the following list of officers as elected nearly unanimously:

President, Felix Adler.
Vice-Presidents, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Octavius B. Frothingham, Lydia Maria Child, George W. Curtis, Frederick Schünemann-Pott, Edward L. Youmans, George Hoadly, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Nathaniel Holmes, Rowland G. Hazard, Bernhard Felsenthal.
Secretary, William J. Potter.
Assistant-Secretary, Hannah E. Stevenson.
Treasurer, John C. Haynes.
Directors, Ednah D. Cheney, William C. Gannett, Richard P. Hallowell, Frederick A. Hinckley, Helen M. Ireson, Charles D. B. Mills, Rebecca N. Buffum, Minot J. Savage, Anna Garlin Spencer, Edward Lauterbach.

The President stated that it had been intended to present at this meeting an amendment to the Constitution, inserting the word National in the name of the Association, so that it should be "The National Free Religious Association,"—thereby making the name correspond with the intention and preventing some misunderstanding. By an oversight, however, the constitutional requirement of previous published notice had not been given, and therefore the change could not now be made,—unless, as he had been advised, it could be done by unanimous consent. The objection was made that, though the change was desirable, it would be a bad precedent to make it in the way suggested as possible, and the proposition was left to take its usual course.

The Chair asked if the meeting would take any action with regard to a Nominating Committee for next year. Mr. W. H. Spencer moved that the Chair appoint such a committee. The Chair thought this to be objectionable in view of the fact that he was one of the present officers, and said he must decline to appoint. Mr. Spencer then moved that the Chair name a committee to retire now and report a Nominating Committee for next year. Adopted, and Mr. W. H. Spencer, Mrs. S. B. Otis, and Mr. Seth Hunt were appointed. This committee reported the names of Mr. A. W. Stevens, Mr. G. W. Park, and Mrs. Harriet W. Sewall, which the meeting adopted. Adjourned till Friday, 10.30 A.M.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

A CLERGYMAN, advertised as specially versed in scientific knowledge, speaks thus on the "Problem of Creation" before a Young Men's Christian Association in Massachusetts: "In God's image was the first man made, and God pronounced the work good; and, to be his companion and the mother of all living, Eve was placed at his side. They were created at full and perfect maturity, doubtless equalling the maturity of twenty-five or thirty years. Had Moses written that they were ushered into the world as infants, cared for by monkey parents or even by angels, the account would be transparently fabulous. On the hand that held the Mosaic pen rested another hand that guided it aright. The account as it stands seems reasonable."

THE Christian at Work opposes the opening of the Metropolitan Art Museum in New York on Sunday: "The plea on behalf of workingmen is idle. How many of these—if day laborers are meant—could appreciate what the Museum contains? If a higher class is intended, how many of these are unable to get an occasional half-holiday? It is the working classes whose interest it is most directly to stand by the Sabbath. Let the barrier of sacredness be broken down, and they will soon find that they have no rest day. The working week will contain seven days, and for these no more money will be paid than for six. The Museum, excellent as it is in many respects, is in no sense a religious concern, and the visitor to its stores is engaged in a secular occupation. Now we insist that no man, no set of men, have a right to invite their fellows to violate sacred time. The plea that many of these might do the same thing in a worse way has no validity. We may not do evil that good may come. We may not ask men to do a lesser wrong, in order to keep them from doing a greater wrong. We say then, No opening of museums or libraries on God's day."

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 13 Insertions, . . .	10c.	per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . .	8c.	" "
" 26 " 51 " . . .	6c.	" "
" 52 " . . .	5c.	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free [illegible] Tracts.

I. TAXATION O[illegible] PROPERTY, by James Part[illegible]ten, 30 cts.; one hundred,

II. THE BIBLE AND SC[illegible]hn Weiss.

III. THE SYMPATHY OF [illegible] by T. W. Higginson. Enlar[illegible]n.

IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, [illegible]odore Parker. Never before pu[illegible]shed.

V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)

VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9) can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass

A Brain and Nerve Food.

VITALIZED PHOSPHATES.

This differs from all other Tonics because it is composed of the Vital or Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox Brain and Wheat Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 200,000 packages. It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease or overwork.

☞For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
666 Sixth Avenue, New York,
and 137 A Strand, London.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." — LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 550.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 2.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JULY 8, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

AS SPEECH is common to all names, the eye to all perception of things, and to all actions an agent, so for all souls is there identity of spiritual essence. That is their Brahma.—Hindu.

YOU are a distinct portion of the essence of God, and contain a certain part of him in yourself. Why, then, are you ignorant of your noble birth? Why do not you consider whence you came? Why do not you remember, when you are eating, who you are who eat, and whom you feed? When you are in the company of women, when you are conversing, when you are exercising, when you are disputing, do not you know that it is the Divine you feed, the Divine you exercise? You carry a god about with you. . . . Do you suppose I mean some god without you of gold or silver? It is within yourself that you carry him; and you do not observe that you profane him by impure thoughts and unclean actions.—Epictetus.

NO MAN hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us.—New Testament.

HE whose heart is pure and good, who is mild, persevering, simple, and plain, who considers every creature as his friend, and who loves every soul as his own, who behaves uniformly to every one with kindness and love, who wishes to do good, and has abandoned vanity,—in his heart resides the Lord of Life.—Hindu.

THE knowledge of the Vision of Good is a divine silence, and the rest of all the senses. Shining steadfastly on and round about the mind, it enlighteneth all the soul, and changeth it wholly into the essence of God. For it is possible for the soul to be deified, if it contemplate the beauty of the Good. He who can truly be called man is a divine being, and not to be confounded with any brute man living on the earth. Man is a mortal god. He leaveth not the earth, and yet dwelleth above, so great is the greatness of his nature.—Egyptian.

INEFFABLE is the union of man and God in every act of the soul. The simplest person, who in his integrity worships God, becomes God; yet forever and ever the influx of this better and universal self is new and unsearchable. It inspires awe and astonishment. . . . When we have broken our god of tradition, and ceased from our god of rhetoric, then may God fire the heart with his presence. It is the doubling of the heart itself, nay, the infinite enlargement of the heart with a power of growth to a new infinity on every side. It inspires in man an infallible trust. He has not the conviction, but the sight that the best is the true, and may in that thought easily dismiss all particular uncertainties and fears, and adjourn to the sure revelation of time the solution of his private riddles. He is sure that his welfare is dear to the heart of being. In the presence of law to his mind, he is overflowed with a reliance so universal that it sweeps away all cherished hopes and the most stable projects of mortal condition in its flood. He believes that he cannot escape from his good. The things that are really for thee gravitate to thee. . . . And this, because the heart in thee is the heart of all; not a valve, not a wall, not an intersection is there anywhere in nature, but one blood rolls uninterruptedly an endless circulation through all men, as the water of the globe is all one sea, and, truly seen, its tide is one.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

IT is reported that a Catholic merchant of Australia died some time ago, leaving by his will seven thousand dollars to the Church "to deliver his soul from purgatory." But the executor of the will has the shrewdness of a Yankee: he adopts the C. O. D. principle, and refuses to pay the legacy until proof shall be furnished that the soul of the dead merchant has been really delivered.

DR. CARL HORSCH, of Dover, N.H., communicates the following: "In my remarks at the testimonial to Francis E. Abbot, I referred to it as a holy supper of the nineteenth century, because it is my conviction that God sanctions our efforts to pursue the paths of progress and evolution as those which lead us nearer to him. I do not know another man who points out so honestly and logically as Mr Abbot the great truth that the nearer we are to reason in our thought and conduct, the more fittingly we may say, 'Nearer, our God, to Thee'; and to those who realize this, and are accustomed to such a view, the event was indeed a Holy Supper."

THERE were two notable discourses in Cambridge last week, both in the direction of a large religious liberty, if we may judge by the newspaper reports. One was Rev. J. H. Allen's discourse before the Alumni of the Divinity School, entitled "The Gospel of Liberalism," and very broadly conceived; and the other Rev. Dr. Storrs' Oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society. The latter comes in a pretty full report in the daily press, but without a title. But it appears to have been an able and eloquent plea, and, if the report in the Advertiser is correct, on broad and philosophical grounds, for the rightful supremacy of man's mental and spiritual nature over any physical basis of existence.

PREMIER GLADSTONE, in the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh to Parliament, has won a victory for his Liberal ministry, and for liberty of religious opinion at the same time. On the first meeting in the Bradlaugh case, the House of Commons voted by a majority of forty-five to exclude him from his seat, unless he would take the oath,—which, as professed atheist, he could not conscientiously do. On this vote, the ministry had not, however, adopted it as a government question. A motion to rescind having been made, Mr. Gladstone announced that the ministry would accept the issue; and, on the day named for the motion, the Liberal party rallied to his support, and gave a majority of fifty-four for rescinding the former vote, and for admission of Bradlaugh on his "affirmation." It was also voted to make the precedent a standing rule.

THE expulsion of the Jesuits from France began, according to the law, on the 1st of July. The Order does not submit graciously, but makes all the resistance possible without resorting to open violence. It is deeply to be regretted that the French Republic has felt itself obliged to resort to this extreme measure. Freedom of religious opinion, whatever the opinion may be, extreme Catholic or extreme Liberal, is a necessary condition of a free State. But then it is to be remembered, in explanation of the course of the French government, that the Jesuits in France are not purely a religious body. The Order is also a military organization, and one that has had, too, a large influence, through its regular machinery, in French politics. It owns supreme allegiance, military and political as well as spiritual, to a power without the State, the sovereignty of the General of the Order. Nor did the French Assembly — for the government is only carrying out a decree passed by a large majority in the popular branch of the Legislature — decree the expulsion unconditionally. There was the alternative of submission to certain laws as loyal and peaceable citizens; and these laws the Assembly regarded as necessary to the safety of the State.

PRINCETON COLLEGE has been visited by a very severe and fatal epidemic, in the form of malarial fever. Forty students have been sick, and five have died; and such a panic has naturally ensued among the others and their parents that the college has been closed a month before the usual vacation season. We have been looking to see if the religious newspapers would not have something to say about this sad calamity being a special visitation of Divine Providence. To be sure, the College holds that form of theology which the Almighty is commonly supposed in Christendom to be most pleased with; and hence it is more difficult for the class of religious papers likely to make such a comment to find a motive for the "visitation" than it would have been, if it had been any heretical college that had suffered the affliction. If Harvard, Antioch, or Cornell had been compelled for such cause to close their doors, we may be pretty sure that somewhere a religious newspaper would have been found quick to point the lesson that thereby the Lord intended to show his displeasure toward the unsoundness of the creed there dispensed to the students. Will such newspaper now follow its own logic, and ask if the Lord has become displeased with the theology of Princeton? Probably not; and therefore there may be a chance to get a hearing for what is really the voice of the Lord in the case. This has been given, not by a body of theologians, but by an expert in matters of drainage and plumbing, sent to the College by the publishers of the Sanitary Engineer of New York. He was allowed full liberty for investigation, and found the unmistakable cause of the calamity in poisoned wells used by the students, and the poisoned atmosphere of their bed-rooms; and the poison, in both cases, was traced directly to the drainage, which was in a most defective and loathsome condition. The "Divine visitation" came, therefore, as the result of broken natural law; and the "voice of the Lord" to be heard therein was a plain Learn and sacredly keep nature's laws.

Digitized by Google

ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

(Continued.)

FRIDAY, May 28, 1880.

The morning session of the Association was called to order at half-past ten o'clock in Parker Memorial Hall, by the President, Professor Felix Adler, who spoke as follows:—

I have the honor, ladies and gentlemen, to open the Thirteenth Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association. As you are aware, in the popular superstition, the number 13 is supposed to be ominous of death; and one or two years ago, before we had yet quite reached the age of thirteen, it was believed by some of the friends of the Association, and heartily believed by some who were not its friends, that the Association was about to perish prematurely. Let the Thirteenth Annual Convention prove, not only the fallacy of superstition in general, as we always try to prove on these platforms, but let it prove in particular the fallacy of this one superstition. Let it be a sign not of decay and approaching dissolution, but let it convince our friends, and show to our foes, the abundance of vitality that still remains, and more than ever remains in the Free Religious movement and in the Free Religious Association.

I bid you a cordial welcome to our hall this morning, and shall not detain you with any lengthy preliminary remarks, but shall content myself with simply introducing to you now our first speaker,—or, rather, I should not say "introduce," because he requires no introduction at my hands to any Boston or any American audience. I present to you our excellent coworker, our admirable leader, the editor for many years of the one foremost Free Religious journal of the country. I present to you Mr. Francis E. Abbot, who will read a paper upon the subject, "What does Free Religion offer as the Guide of Life?"

[Unfortunately for the connection of our report, Mr. Abbot's essay was printed in the last number of THE INDEX issued by him, June 24. It is printed there as originally prepared for a philosophical Club; while the preparatory remarks adapting it to this Convention were printed as editorial in THE INDEX of June 3.—W. J. P.]

The SECRETARY.—It has been thought desirable to announce the remainder of the programme for this morning in advance, that the audience may know precisely what intellectual viands are to be set before them. As announced in the notice for the meeting, after the essay it is proposed that the discussion should take this more general form: "The steps in the development of religious liberty in this country,—the step represented by Dr. Channing, the step represented by Theodore Parker, and the step next." On the platform, we have the gentlemen who are to speak for those several steps: Mr. William H. Channing, Mr. William R. Alger, and the President of the Association, Professor Adler, who will speak for the step next. An hour and a half remains before the time for adjournment, and these three gentlemen are expected to divide that time amicably between them; and perhaps there will then be a few moments left for a few words of benediction from our honored friend, Dr. Bartol, who is none the less welcome for being a volunteer on our platform this morning.

The PRESIDENT.—It gives me pleasure to introduce to you WILLIAM H. CHANNING, to speak for the step taken in religious progress by his illustrious uncle, Dr. William Ellery Channing.

Address of Rev. William H. Channing.

Dear friends, I never accepted this invitation, and, if you will excuse me, Mr. President, I will not keep it. I was asked to come here this morning and speak upon this whole question, as I thought,—upon which, the Spirits helping me, I will speak. It is "Channing, Parker, and the Step Next"; and what I have chiefly to speak of is the Step Next. [Laughter.]

Now, in the first place, I wish to give my testimony of heartiest honor for the frankness of his confession, for the clearness and simplicity of his statement, for the heroic manliness of my dear friend,—if he will pardon me for saying so, my dear young friend, Francis E. Abbot. I doubt very much if there is one in this assembly who enters more profoundly with sympathy into the closing passage of that discourse than do I. It was clear enough to us that he was lifting the veil there from his own sanctum; and there he finds his fountain of living water, his illumination, his influence of peace. God bless him, and make him faithful, and lead him up from glory to glory into the fulness of everlasting day.

Now I say one thing more. Not only do I accept the man Francis Abbot, and honor him, and, though we have not known each other well, heartily love him, yet he must permit me intellectually to say that he exceeded here to-day, very distinctly, his own limits. He presented to us the scientific method, and presented it to us as if the scientific method was something new, and his, and as if that were the step next. Dear Brother Abbot, it is exactly what Egypt tried to solve, exactly what China tried to solve, exactly what India tried to solve, exactly what Greece and Rome tried to solve. It stands for the reason of man seeking to account for the spiritual experiences of man. And at every single age where man has developed, and in the measure of his development, has come such a period, in which he has announced that, intellectually, as a reasoner, he must take the measure of, and in some way enter into, the sources of, and so apprehend and fashion in its outflowing, that mystery of life which lies behind the intellect, which is the Reason of the reason, which is the Conscience of the conscience, which is the Heart of hearts. Did you listen all the way through to the address? This is exactly what our dear friend did not tell. He showed us everywhere that there must be such a Heart of hearts in this universe, though he did not name it. He showed us everywhere that there must be such a Mind of mind. He did not name it. He showed us everywhere there must be such a Conscience of consciences. He did not name it. He called it the Cosmos. Why, dear Brother Abbot, you did not satisfy yourself. You could not have done it. It is not scientific. Behind the problem of such a statement as that comes the demand to know, and not to rest in the unknown,—to know what that reason is which is the reason of our reason, what that intellect is that is the intellect of our intellect, what that heart is that is the heart of our hearts. And his answer was a heroic, earnest, aspiring search for it. I tell you, dear Brother Abbot, if you go on in that way, before you have done with it you will be a Christian once more. [Laughter.] Dear Brother Abbot, don't think you told me anything new. I am going to tell you that I knew it even before you were born. There is nothing new in it at all. It is just as old as humanity. The only question is what form it is going to have to-day. Now the form it is going to have to-day is the scientific form; and, believing in the development of humanity, he told us to revert to that,—beyond the subjective, to the universal. I accept it with all my heart and soul. It is exactly that reason of humanity, that heart of humanity, as he calls it, which is much more than the heart of the heart. It is the will of humanity, and the executive power of humanity. Dear Brother Abbot, your science is not good, even in your definition of man. Your threefold definition of man does not solve the problem, and does not fill it, as we understand it now. What you call heart is the innermost will, and it is the sovereign principle, has always been recognized as the sovereign principle. It is not sentiment, and it is not the heart. The heart and sentiment are but the outflowings of it. It is the Will of wills, of which this universe is a very fresh manifestation. And just what you feel as the spring of life, which you cannot exhaust and cannot explain, is that infusion of the Will of wills which quickens you throughout, and makes you to will and to work according to its good pleasure. And that is the innermost of all. There is no name we have ever reached for it yet; and I don't believe any in after ages will ever go beyond it,—The Parent of parents, the Spirit of spirits, the overruling Lord of souls; that Being of beings, who manifested himself as the Word of his Wisdom in his Beloved Son.

And now, once again, my dear Brother Abbot said,—and I saw perfectly well why he wanted to put it so, and why he would like to have it stay put, but it will not "stay put,"—that is the difficulty,—how neatly he tucked away William Ellery Channing under that name of "Neo-Christianity"! But he was not there, and he never will be. Everything that Mr. Abbot said this morning was just as well known to Channing when he was a young man, on the banks of the James, at Richmond, as it is known to Mr. Abbot to-day. It was the thought that was always in him, from the very first; namely, to seek religious unity. And, after all his searching, he found it nowhere else, and no man ever will find it anywhere else, but in the living God, and in communion with the living God.

What was this Neo-Christianity that our brother was speaking of? I will tell you. Now don't think I am speaking subjectively. Don't think I am speaking imaginatively. I am speaking historically, and simply as a witness of William Ellery Channing. I will tell you. It was in this sense "New Christianity," that he knew perfectly well that Christianity, so far from being about to arise under a new type, had passed beyond the sunrise, and was half-way up to the heavens. But he knew it needed a new era of humanity to enter into what was the secret of the Father and the Son. That was what he was longing for all his days, and he sought it through this very centre of Unity,—a universal unity. And he found it—just where Francis Abbot will find it, if he goes on—in "man made one with God." He believed there was a glory to shine out through that Beloved Son, that would enter into humanity. He believed that it was not by accident that he came, but that he came out of the ages; that it was not by accident that he came, but that he came by appointment, to that people who, outwardly so coarse, and brutal even, were inwardly so quickened by this life, which was to them so mysterious, which is to us so mysterious,—the ever-fresh influx of the Spirit of spirits. They did not know that holy name. They scarcely dared to utter it. They kept it secret, because it was so infinitely great. If I stood in the place of your President, I would feel that it was the honor, glory, and privilege of my life—standing as an Israelite, and proud of my lineage—to interpret the latent power in the life of Israel by that glorious Sun of the morning, Jesus, whom we call Christ. And, if I were in Mr. Adler's place, instead of standing out of the Christian circle, I would stand just at the heart of the Christian circle, and, by the authority of the light of the Israel that was in me, I would interpret him, just as he always has been interpreted by those who have learned the innermost secret of his being.

Channing believed in the life of man centred in God, and God forever coming into man and glorifying and transfiguring it and making it heavenly-minded. If that is what you mean, Brother Adler and Brother Abbot, by Channing's "Neo-Christianity," that he had. Come on, and show us yourselves what it means. Exhaust it. As yet you have never entered into it. When Conway said to William Furness, "Come out of Christianity," "My dear fellow," says he, "that is just what I have been trying all my life to get into. It is the light of my life."

Now what is before us,—the "Next Step"? It is to see that the very science of sciences is just what was revealed, not as a thought, but as a fact, in the life of man glorified by inflowing and indwelling God,—"divinized" man, transfigured man, glorified man. You and I have never begun distantly to enter into that great doctrine yet. There is the secret that Science is to interpret to us; and it will never interpret it to us by its negations. It will only interpret it to us by unfolding what is the innermost law of our own life, which is "our wills made one with the Infinite Will."

Now look at Jesus once more. Only look at him in the light of modern science, longing to name the unnamable, longing to know the unknowable, longing to affirm the ineffable. Just see with what simplicity, with what firmness, with what strength of consciousness he declares it himself! He lived there in Judea as a person authorized from the infinite Person, speaking with the Reason that is the universal reason, speaking with the humanity that is the universal humanity, representing in himself just what he saw when he took a little child upon his knee. No: the authority of Christ is—just what I said the other day—his impersonal personality. It is because he is a man arrived at just that point to know what man stands for upon this earth. It is because he is the affirmed Word of the Infinite Wisdom, the very essence of which is that indwelling will of the loving Father.

That is what Channing stood for. And now it is universal; and the form which it took to him has thoroughly renewed human society, after the universal and unitary form. The man speaking now is the man who most shared his private confidence. That blessed man did me the honor, as my highest privilege on this earth, to pour into my willing ear his hopes of the future, and tell me exactly what he hoped for was this ideal of a perfected society, according to the type of universal unity, which my friend has tried to sketch to us this morning, and has failed in sketching,—just because he limits himself, and does not enter into the innermost thought, there, of the life of God as revealed in the everlasting Son. Would I had the power to work a moral miracle upon all these dear friends! I would take them, with all their splendid intellect, with all their heroism, and I would baptize them anew,—christen them anew. I would say: "Dear brothers, you have forgotten your birthright. It is all given to you,—this glorified form of God n man,—given long ago, has been flooding the earth ever since, rising nearer and nearer high heaven. And now you are going to begin all over again. Why, my dear brothers, don't you see that we are in it? Don't you see that it is all unfolding? Don't you see that the best blood of your life, that is beating in your hearts and tingling in your veins, is just this life-blood of 'the Father in the Son'? You think you are outside of the Church. It is all a delusion. What I have to say to you is that you are rather truant, rather foolish. But come back."

Digitized by Google

That is my reason for being here to-day. One of my friends said, "What in the world are you going to the Free Religious Convention for to-day?" I replied: "It is just where I belong. I never belonged to anything else. If they don't know and value their privileges, why, God help me to unfold them." [Applause.] I came here to make a sacrifice this morning. It is a brave thing in me to do it. Many of you will say in your hearts: "What an old fogy that is! What an old dreamer among shadows!" Now Channing, speaking to an assembly like this, thankful, joyful, trustful, says, "I am proud that I was born under the light of life that is illuminating the nations,—through the Beloved Son, made one with the Father and with universal humanity." And here, in this Free Religious Association, I say to you, as if that dear Prophet of Nazareth were here to hear me say it, "Be all of you sons of the Father, daughters of the Father, in that spirit of real religious liberty in which he would have you live." He would recognize you as being of his company, whether you recognized him or not as your leader. It is the Universal Reason, the Universal Will, and the Universal Humanity that speaks through him. What this age is longing for is a religion that is as substantial as this universe. Francis Abbot told you one sublime truth in regard to the tendencies of science to-day. Science is putting away that distinction between matter and spirit, which has been a bugbear to us through life. But how is it doing it? Not by materializing spirit. No, no. Now the authority I am going to give is not my own. It is Herbert Spencer's. He says to me, Don't we all see that what we are coming to is the doctrine of "spiritualized matter"? That is what we are coming to. We are coming to apprehend that this universe is all spiritual throughout. It is just what Brother Abbot meant by "recognizing the manifestation of mind everywhere." And that religion we are coming to,—a condition that shall make religion the most solid, substantial, and real of all realities, by the inflowing and indwelling God, in whom we live and with whom we interact,—his own life, which is the life of universal benevolence, rounded out in universal beauty.

The first point is a religion that is substantial. Next, one that is inspiring, and works miracles of transformation, and lifts us up to that high level that Jesus exemplified and glorified,—by the indwelling God. You see, as clear as the day, it is the era that is coming. These experiences shall not be exceptional only. They shall not be only for high hours of prayer and inspiration, but our habitual, common life, when we shall live with the glory of the Father, and it shall be divine all around us, and we shall shine with that light.

The next is this—(I am following logically. I began at the centre, as you did not, Brother Abbot). The next step is a religion that is luminous,—thoroughly luminous,—that takes up all the laws of science, that takes up all the profoundest laws of philosophy, that takes up, what has not been spoken of this morning, the laws of history, and shows that this whole development of man has been unitary from the first; and when it has come to a centre, a centre like that of the Christian Church, or the Christian religion, and God's Beloved Son, it will not touch destructively that centre, but take it scientifically and critically and historically, and say that if God, the Mind of minds, the Will of wills, the Heart of hearts, sees that he can use this agency now, and that it is the very central channel and means through which his own life is poured into humanity, it is not for you and me to say we have outgrown it. No, no. It has grown into us. The world is yet to become Christian; and the scientific view of Christianity is to explain the actual facts of the Christian world. They thought at the end of the last century—Voltaire and Rousseau—that they had outgrown Christianity. What do you see now? Never since this earth ran on in its course, never in all previous periods, was there such concentration of thought upon the life of Christ as there is now,—life after life, everywhere, each entering into the inspiration of that glory of God. I am speaking not of heart now. I am speaking of the clear light of the intellect, of the clear law of development. When you tell me that the Catholic Church is Christianity, you ought to be ashamed of yourselves. You know perfectly well it is not. It is the symbol of the reality. It is the husk in which the bud was kept through the winter. Now the spring time has come, and we want it to break forth, like flowers and blossoms on the tree of life, that in due time the fruits may be ripened.

Now that is philosophical and scientific and historical, and it will stand the test. There is no other Centre on this earth.

Just one word more, and I have done. I have been in St. Louis lately, and Cincinnati, and Chicago, and Washington; and I have seen the most tremendous energies at work everywhere,—something sublimely at work, something that inspires one who loves this nation and its religion,—as God knows I do, though I am an unwilling exile from it,—something that thoroughly inspired me with a new hope. I will tell you what I have seen: that these grand, heroic spirits are longing, as for the very bread of life, for religion. I tell you, dear Brother Abbot, science will not satisfy them. It must be with deeper analysis of human nature, wider reach through the philosophies and religions. You have not touched it at all this morning. Science will not satisfy their wants. They are longing for something which lies behind it, something which will make a moral transformation, lift them up into the glory of the unknown, bring them face to face with the unnamable. They want to have that mystery of life, that sanctity of life, that sweetness of life, that shall make it heavenly. You will find it nowhere else except in this grand revival and new transformation of the Christian world, which is to give the inner secret to every man and every woman, that, just as Jesus was a Beloved Child, just so each one of us shall be a beloved child, in the great united family of the children of God,—one on earth and one in heaven. Now, if I understand it, that is exactly what Channing said; it is exactly what Theodore Parker said; and, dear Brother Francis Abbot, it is just exactly what you ought to say. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT.—It is eminently fitting and gratifying that in a hall commemorating the venerated Parker we should hear words in praise of that illustrious man. I have now the honor of presenting to you Rev. WILLIAM R. ALGER, who will speak of Theodore Parker.

Address of Rev. William R. Alger.

I think we have a very good proof here to-day that this is in truth, as well as in name, a Free Religious Association. And, when I get through, I hope our President, who is a Hebrew of the Hebrews, will exercise the same liberty of speech which we do, and give us all "fits," so far as we deserve them.

Brother Channing, with his radiant discursiveness of rhetoric,—a somewhat wandering orb,—has rolled around the horizon so extensively that I think his orbit has intersected that of the other two speakers somewhat. But let us all be a little lawless to-day,—that is, be a little free,—and all three of us speak on all three of the points, and what the first two don't say, the last one will.

It seems to me that the first step represented by Channing was, I will not say so much a protest as a living exemplification of a spirit in precise opposition to the spirit of mechanical formalism, not only in religion, but in the whole sphere of the conscious life of the individual man. What William Ellery Channing preëminently represents to me, while he represents a multitude of other things also, is directness of religious life in the individual, directly related to the divine realities in the whole universe. Therefore, his life was a protest against mechanical and dead formalism, in religion first, and afterwards in all other things. He held an immense mass of pure sensibility freely open to the mystic realities of the universe, the sphered spiritual realities of God; and he held it open, and sensitive, with such purity and patience that they all reported themselves therein, and brought out a reaction in expression so energetic and ardent, and so freshly and livingly sincere, that they have had power to kindle multitudes of souls with some degree of a similar experience ever since. That seems to me the chief central thing which he represented. While he always represented reform in society, and liberty everywhere, and careful thinking in all directions, yet that was the chief and greatest thing, it seems to me. That was the first step, then, we will say, speaking of our three.

Theodore Parker represented a good deal of that also. He always emphasized the immanence of God and the capacity of the human soul, in all its normal functions, to come into direct relationship with all that is divine in the truth, beauty, and good of being. But he represented, as it seems to me, more specifically and emphatically, a protest against the historical and literary and dogmatic rubbish, the false authorities of the Church, which have been so largely substituted in the place of the intrinsic authority of truth and beauty and good. He uttered, and lived more than he uttered, an heroic protest against the identification of history, and false history at that, with religion, and of the speculative theological notions of individual men with the eternal revelation of the will of God. He protested against all yokes of formal authority, and brushed away everything of that sort, as so much tyrannical and obstructive rubbish. That seems to me to be what he centrally and chiefly represented, and in that representation he was the next step on, in a sequence, after Channing, who did not especially protest against the authority of the Biblical record, or the belief in preternatural powers,—I will not say "supernatural," for I believe in supernatural things; but preternatural things and what we call monstrosities, or mechanical miracles. Channing did not fight that battle: it was not especially the historic moment for it. He had something else to do, and did it. But, when Theodore Parker arose, the historic moment had arrived for that, and the hero appeared,—a hero of the soul, infinitely more worthy of the admiration and applause of men than all the butchers who have waded through blood to thrones and presidential chairs. [Applause.]

Now I will not, by any means, limit what Theodore Parker stands for and represents to this point, any more than I would limit what Channing stands for and represents to the point I name. It seems to me that in the historic evolution that is precisely the one critical thing which he represented. And, friends, while I stand here and speak not of Theodore Parker as a personality or as a biography, but rather as a representative position and influence, I cannot resist the constraining power which leads me to turn aside for a moment for a personal word. I seem to feel the presence of that great, strong, brave, martyred spirit, who fell a sacrifice to his warfare against American slavery and the associated tyrannies, as much as though he had been shot on any of our battle-fields. I feel constrained to pay a single word of tribute to his memory; for I feel that even here, where he lived and wrote and should be so well understood, justice is not fully done him. I read all through carefully, yesterday afternoon, that letter which he wrote with dying hand, after leaving Boston never to return, and the pathos of it seemed to me something almost unparalleled. He says in it, "I may as well confess it: I am not much of a fighter, after all." The central thing in Parker really was his affection. It was because he loved so vehemently that he strove so uncompromisingly against that which threatened what he loved. He loved God, truth, humanity, justice, liberty,—everything divine and good; and, when he saw things hostile to them, the measure of his love for the one was instantly counterbalanced by the intensity of his hostility to the other. Now Parker was an intense flame of affection, more than he was a critical scholar; and it was that which led to his martyrdom; for he turned aside from "the still air of delightful studies," which was needful to his soul, to engage in the battle of the day, and in that battle he fell a martyr.

Let us remember Parker, therefore, not so much as an heroic fighter as a tender lover of everything beautiful, true, and good, who was drawn aside from his legitimate work for a side issue, by the terrible exigencies of the day in which he lived. He comes back to my mind, his eyes quickly filling with tears at anything that touched his sensibility, and yet his soul immovable in its loyalty to duty, so that the people misinterpreted him as a hard iconoclast. He seems to me like a granite flame, burning intensely against falsehood, tyranny, and wrong, and shining with luminous love upon everything genial to his spirit, or representing God to it.

Digitized by Google

So much by the way. Now it was suggested to me by the excellent lady, the faithful Dorcas who always stood at the right hand of Parker in his work, when she asked me to speak here to-day, in default of others who had been invited, that my point was to be what Theodore Parker would have been now, had he lived at the present moment. That is a delicate and difficult thing to say. And yet, to one who knew him well, it does not seem impossible to construct, by the necessary laws of sequence, from what he was, what he would have been. Having won the battle against the necessity, in order to stand in respectable religious society, of believing in the authority of the letter of any book, or bowing to any special dogmatic utterance, —having won that battle, I think, had Parker lived until to-day, he would have ceased to direct his artillery in that direction. It seems to me that the vigor and the energies that he devoted to the battle against slavery having been set at liberty by the final emancipation, he would have been free to have ceased toiling in that way. Whereto would he have turned his exuberant energy? What would he have labored for now? We have just come now to the full blossom, as it were, of that great doctrine whose vesper light was just creeping up the horizon when he passed away,— the doctrine of evolution. How would he have stood, from the necessities of his mind and thought, with reference to that doctrine? I seem to myself to see clearly that he would have accepted, fully and heartily, the positive affirmations of that doctrine, and then would have surrounded them with still other affirmations. He would have said, "This doctrine is a part of the truth, but not the whole truth." He would have affirmed God and the moral law and the immortality of the soul, just the same as he did before. He would have affirmed that evolution is not anything, in itself, which does anything; but it is only the way in which something has been done and is doing. It is the method of the Creator in his works, and is not itself the Creator. [Applause.] I suppose a law anywhere is not an entity. There is no substance in a law. It is only a form in which some entity acts and does something. Law, in its most abstract definition, is only a verbal statement; or, at least, the verbal expression for the word "law" is only an expression for this,—concert and identity of sequences in identity of coexistences. When all the factors which coexist are the same, all the facts that follow will be the same. That is the meaning of law, in its most abstract form. There is no entity in it. It is only the method in which an entity acts; and that Entity, Parker would have said, is God. It seems to me that every one who thinks down to the bare necessities of thought, and finds what they are, finds himself brought up to this: that one of the necessities of thought, when it is competent thought, when it goes far enough to be conscious all around, is that there is an infinite Being; that everything finite presupposes everything infinite, as its natural consequence. There is an infinite Being whom we call God. We may differ in our details of definition, but there is really no room for difference among competent thinkers as to the fact. Herbert Spencer calls it "the unknowable" and the "unknowable will." I don't care what he calls it. Let him be free, in this Free Religious Association, as we are. I call it "God," because it seems to me that another necessity of human thought is that consciousness begins, permeates, outruns everything else. To me, a necessity of thought is that consciousness is the beginning, end, and all-in-all of everything. There are plenty of things that are not conscious; but they are temporary, provisional,—means to an end. Transcendently, the one eternal thing is an absolute consciousness; and all finite consciousnesses, it seems to me, according to the thinking of Hegel, are closed circuits of thinking, into which nothing can ever break. So they are indestructible. They are infinitesimal correspondences of the Infinite One. And this outward universe is only a finitesimal theatre wherein we play our parts. God, the infinite Being, has put his attributes into the cosmos in fixed and unalterable procedure. It seems to me he has put his attributes also into every individual soul, in liberty; and each individual soul is a potential mirror of the whole, for God himself; and we have our careers, and run from world to world and from birth to birth; and the whole infinite spectacle is an endless drama. To my view, that is more satisfactory than any materialistic hypothesis.

And that brings me to the next step,—and I see, by the relentless hand of that clock, that I must stop, in order to allow the Hebrew of the Hebrews ample chance for his revenge, and also my Brother Bartol an opportunity for a good long benediction. That brings me to my next step. "What is the next step?" you ask. You remember that I said to you that we should all three of us gallop around the galaxy, hunting for each other's orbits. The first step was to get rid of formalism, and live freshly. The second was to throw off the tyrannical load of historical rubbish and dogmatic authority and preternaturalism, and come under the immanent laws of infinite order. Now what is the next step? What would Parker have done now, if he had been living and here? He would have done his chief work, it seems to me, in the battle against material selfishness,—the battle for a regenerated society. [Applause.] Parker all his life was an earnest advocate of temperance. He fought valiantly against the grog-shops, as centres of disease and crime and horror unutterable to the human race. He would also have been an earnest advocate for the "woman question," as we call it,—for the rights of women, for their freedom to take any position in life, to do any work for which they are fitted and to which they are attracted. He would still have continued to fight valiantly in those directions. And with his tender heart, which was so sensitive toward every living and even every inanimate object, he could not have kept outside of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. And when the next humane society, born out of that, was founded,—the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children,—he who preached those tremendous sermons on "the perishing classes" and "the dangerous classes" would have been an earnest champion there, too. And all through he would have stood, as he did at the beginning, to represent ideality against materialism, liberty against tyranny, universal humanity against all local and sectarian parties and distinctions everywhere. [Applause.] He, I believe, would have been profoundly interested in,—what it is as much as one's respectability is worth to-day to venture to look at without contempt,—he would have been profoundly interested in the speculative doctrine about the greenback as against the gold and silver mine. I know it is premature yet, but it will come one of these days. He protested against the despotism of the dollar, which, as he said, had "in our days more than taken the place of the old despotism by the sword. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] And how much that means there are not twenty men on this earth who understand to-day. ["Hear!"] And, when twenty years more have passed, a good many of you who are here will see more in that than you do now. The money power is the despotism of to-day. That is a great evil. We have a civilization which is based on money, obtained not as the honest reward for honest services, but won by speculation; that is, taking something for nothing, which is injustice. The whole fabric of Christendom to-day stands upon a colossal and unadulterated lie,—that a man has a right to all the money he can get, if he does not get into the State Prison in getting it. There is no heresy on the globe that more needs advocates than that truth. And Parker would have stood in the forefront of obloquy to maintain it, with the same heroism that he maintained other heresies, for which he is now, too early in his grave, covered with laurels and garlands. Yes, we must have a new civilization. Yes, this world is not going on a great while longer such a mass of discord and cruelty and misery as it is now. In place of a civilization built on money obtained largely by fraud, we must have a civilization founded on labor, inspired by love, and regulated in the distribution of its products by justice. [Applause.] I may say that, had Parker lived till to-day, he would have said such things as that, with much greater power than I can say them for him. And, if his spirit in heaven looks down upon us to-day, or, out of that ideal region beyond all time and space, is with us, may some gleam of satisfaction come to his heroic and martyred spirit from our recognition of his services at this late day.

We want a civilization which shall not be, as the present is, a moving equilibrium of hostile selfishnesses, but a civilization which shall be a moving equilibrium of co-operative sympathies. And I see, for one,— whatever doubts may fill the souls of timid folk,—I see auspicious signs of the coming of that day. There are great preparations going on in the world for a sudden and astounding change, which will gladden the hearts of the human race one of these days. You know preparations may be silent and invisible and slow, and yet the result come, in its perfection, in an instant, when the preparations are made. So Jesus of Nazareth said the coming of the Son of Man should be. I think the true coming of the Son of Man will be when humanity comes to its collective consciousness, as a unit and brotherhood. Now we are preparing for that in this way: that, by the construction of machinery and the perfecting of the apparatus of creation all over the earth, we are wonderfully increasing the productive power of the human race. Gladstone says that more wealth was added to England in the eighteenth century than in the whole preceding eighteen centuries. The earth at this moment is growing rich with a gigantic rapidity which is utterly astounding to those who know the facts.

Then, in the second place, we are wonderfully increasing the facilities for distribution, though selfishness and monopoly hold them yet for themselves. When they are completed, it will be the highway of God prepared for the incoming of the millennial kingdom.

And, parallel with those two modes of progress,— the increase of productive power and the increase of distributive facility,—is there not clearly, in every direction, a wonderful growth of human sympathy? Look at literature! Look at the innumerable forms in which philanthropic and protective energy and activity are breaking out everywhere! Outrages which once would have flourished for a century unrebuked are now crushed in twenty-four hours.

Let those three things (to say nothing of anything beyond) go on as they are going on, and it makes a millennium absolutely certain. And when men love one another instead of hating, and labor for one another instead of for self against each other, there will be a revelation of mystic glory, of which the greatest seers that have ever gone before us have not got a glimpse. I believe that there will be a collective consciousness of the human race, and that it will have a focal centre in every disinterested individual, and this earth, possessed by the consciousness of humanity, will sweep into the cosmic harmony, and open communication, throughout the whole material universe, with the whole intelligent family of God! [Repeated and continued applause.]

Address of Professor Felix Adler.

I am very glad that Mr. Alger has spoken. I think that his last point has been marked. "The Next Step" is to be taken. If Theodore Parker could have lived to-day, to speak from this platform, as we are speaking, I think the tenor of his words would have been in the direction last touched upon by the speaker that preceded me. What made Parker great, what took him out of the ranks of ministers and made him the American prophet, was the fact that he took into his great heart the great cause of practical freedom,— that he illustrated his religious principles, not by general speculations on truth and beauty and love, but that he took out of the heart of the times in which he lived the one burning injustice of the day, and preached against it. [Applause.] And he or they who would be successors of Parker to-day, who would lead on the movement which he began, and take the next step, must do as he did,—must take, not the temperance question specially (I beg to disagree with my predecessor on that,—not that I have any inclination to lessen the importance of the temperance movement), not the "woman question," perhaps, nor a dozen others that might be taken up; but it is necessary, in order to gain force, to concentrate force upon one main point. I therefore should say, to select one question which includes all other questions,—the one great social question upon whose solution depends the successful solution of the temperance problem and all other problems connected with it,—that the next step would be to take up the main wrong of the day, and preach social justice and right and humanity in the name of religion, in the name of Free Religion.

There were many points in some of the utterances which have been heard upon our platform to-day which would seem to indicate that we are still very far from the spirit of Free Religion. Not that I, for one, have the intention to imply that any religious conviction which may be held ought not to be profoundly respected, even because it is the conviction of an earnest man. But there was one point in the utterances of Mr. Channing which you will forgive my frankness in alluding to, which seemed to me wholly opposed to the spirit of Free Religion. Free Religion—a Free Religious platform, as I understand the term—does not mean a platform where any opinion shall be simply tolerated,—not merely that every one who has an earnest conviction may have the right to utter his conviction; but Free Religion, if I understand the term rightly, includes a wider and a larger tolerance. It means that all dogmatic convictions, of whatever nature they may be, shall be held subordinated,—not only that equal rights shall be accorded to them all, but that they all shall be held subordinated; that the dogmatic view of religion which any one may hold shall not be the characteristic one of his religion, but the life, the great moral intelligence and character of a man, shall decide the quality and the quantity of his religion. But it seemed, from the utterances which we heard, as if the speaker were almost convinced that, unless we, the sons of to-day, were to return once more to the mode of religious conviction which was taught eighteen hundred years ago, we are not religiously safe; that, unless we accept a certain dogmatic formula of religion, we are in the wrong path of development, and that our religious future will, in consequence, be clouded. So far from holding such convictions, I on the contrary maintain that the time has come when, from the very heart of Christianity itself, the dictum goes forth that the Christian name must be dropped; and what I mean by that will become evident the more heartily and strongly I profess my reverence for the person of Jesus of Nazareth. Revere him,—indeed I do. Conceive his greatness,—by all means I do that. But if I question my own conscience, and inquire into the grounds of my reverence for Jesus of Nazareth, what are those grounds upon which I revere him? Why is he so exalted? Why is he so adored? I will endeavor to answer this question presently, after briefly indicating, in their order, the reasons which impel me to make this broad and, it may seem to many, startling assertion,—that out of the very heart of Christianity goes forth the commandment that the Christian name should be disused. I make that assertion because I believe in honest names,—in names which wholly express our modern convictions. Now Dr. Channing the elder, and Mr. Channing, his trusted friend and kinsman, have certainly a right to retain the Christian name,—if they accept the one cardinal doctrine upon which the Christian Church rests its dogmatic system,—the doctrine of the infallible truth of the Biblical record. If it can be proved that the Bible is indeed divinely inspired, then the word of Jesus, or the word of the Deity, as contained in the Bible, must be accepted as the infallible guide of life. But, if Mr. Channing is willing to place himself upon the critical basis, as he has said,—if he is willing critically to examine the New Testament and the Old,—I think it difficult to understand by what system of philosophy he will harmonize the thousand contradictions which are evident on the face of those works. Those who have accepted the facts of science, those who accept the critical results of the investigation into the Bible and its records,—the results which are well-nigh unanimously offered to-day by the most competent critics of Europe, of France, of Holland, and of England,—those who have studied the works of these men and accept their results, must come to the conclusion that the Bible, the New Testament and the Old, rest for their authority, not upon the fact that they were supernaturally revealed, but upon the fact that they contain certain truths which appeal to the reason and the heart. But, if the Bible is valued because of its truths which appeal to the reason and to the heart, then the ground of our reverence is not the character of the Bible, but the human reason and the human heart; and in so far as the human reason and heart approve of the Bible, in so far do we accept the Bible. In so far as the human reason and the human heart disagree with what is contained in the Bible, in so far do we reject the Bible. Upon what ground, then, can we base our reverence,—our especial reverence for the Christian name and religion? It has been said by many who have rejected the inspirational theory—who cannot maintain that the supernatural character of Jesus was proved by the miracles, because they discredit miracles, in the face of the enormous testimony to the contrary,—in the face of the testimony of nature every day to the contrary,—in the face of the unbroken record of ages, as contained in the geological and astronomical records of the world—that miracles cannot happen, and cannot happen because, if a miracle were to happen once, the whole order of nature would be insecure every day; I say those who accept this evidence, and reject the theory of miracles and the inspirational theory of the Bible, maintain that they have a valid claim to the Christian name on other grounds. It is argued that it is because of the moral value of the life of Jesus,—because in his person humanity is illustrated in so high and lofty a manner as never happened before, and as can never happen again, making him a leader not to be outgrown. Now it is very wonderful how certain assertions, when they are once made, will be received. Certain phrases become stock phrases, and no one questions them, or ever thinks of questioning them. It is so with regard to the inimitable morality of the Sermon on the Mount. Even the most hardened unbeliever is accustomed to speak,—not with reverence alone, for we all do that,—but with something more than reverence, of the inimitable, the incomparable morality of the Sermon on the Mount. The Mohammedans say to an unbeliever, "Why, even you must believe our Koran." "Why?" "Because of the incomparable style in which it is written. It is so incomparably fine and beautiful that no mere human author ever could have composed such a work." Those of us who have read a little of the Koran, and are not Mohammedan, are inclined to wonder at the assertion, because, though it contains many beautiful things, it is by no means so attractive or beautiful as its believers fondly imagine and maintain. But the assertion passes for current on all hands among those believers. Somewhat similar is the assertion of the inimitable and divine morality of the Sermon on the Mount. By quibbling, by sophistry, by interpolating modern sentiments into ancient words, it is possible so to transform the meaning of words as to give them any interpretation we choose to give them. In this way, any document may be changed and falsified. But those who read the Sermon on the Mount with open eyes will see that, besides many really incomparable beauties, it contains certain points which we cannot at all accept into our ethical code at the present day. Even those beauties which it contains, and upon which the claims of Jesus to our admiration are so confidently rested, you will find in the contemporary, Talmudical writings of the Jews at that very period,—nearly every one of them. They were the stock of wisdom—of proverbial wisdom—of the people of the period. They were stated with greater beauty, with greater simplicity, by Jesus; but they are essentially the maxims of Hillel, and can be read, as I have stated, in the contemporary writings of the time.

Digitized by Google

Besides these admitted beauties, there is especially one point to which I would refer, and which, in my estimation, renders the Christian code of ethics unfit to be regarded as the highest or as the entire expression of our ethical standard at the present day. It is the little importance which is attached to intellectual virtue [applause],—nay, the almost disdain and contempt of intellectual virtue. And that is not only evident in the Sermon on the Mount, but it appears on every page of Christian history. Christianity is not a thing newly presented to the human reason. It will not do to tell us that for eighteen hundred years it has flourished, and only to-day its true meaning has been understood. Christianity is a term which is to be interpreted by the history of the past. For eighteen hundred years there have been Christian churches, and the Christian Bible has been in the possession of mankind. The Christian priesthood has had a power and supremacy which it will never have again, let us hope, in the history of the world. In all these ages, Christianity has flourished, and the modern Unitarians affirm that only now the true meaning of the Christian doctrine is beginning to be understood. Why, then, Christian teachings have been singularly unclear and vague, utterly failed of their meaning, if it took eighteen hundred years to make their simplest statements plain. The history of the Christian Church shows, as the Sermon on the Mount shows, that Christianity has esteemed the "poor in spirit" blessed. "Blessed are the poor in spirit," says the Christian code of morality; and Christian history echoes the word, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," at least in the estimation of the historical representatives of Christianity. The one thing which we have learned to-day is to see the *un*blessedness of poverty of spirit, to see how necessary it is that poverty of spirit should be removed. The one effort to which the minds of reformers, in every direction, are to be directed, is to remove this great obstacle to the progress of mankind, and give greater prominence to intellectual virtues, raise higher the love of truth for the truth's sake, and show the great importance, on every line of progress, of intellectual honesty. In this one particular, it seems to me that the Sermon on the Mount fails. It certainly does not emphasize intellectual virtue. However you may interpret the words I have quoted, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," it seems to me that, interpreted according to the natural meaning, and in the light of Christian history, the Christian Church throws contempt upon intellectual gifts, upon intellectual virtues.

How, then, in the light of these facts, if they be conceded, shall we maintain the Christian name, who have thrown aside the belief in miracles, and do not believe in the supernatural character of Christ? You have clung to the inimitable humanity of Jesus, and have deluded yourselves with ideals of your own minds. You have clothed this historical figure with your own beautiful ideals, and you worship your own ideals, in worshipping and loving Jesus of Nazareth. The object of your admiration is the ideal. The ideal is greater than any man. You say, "If Jesus were not divine, if Jesus were not indeed the very God, then he could not have lived the ideal, because no finite nature has ever reached that ideal, and certainly in Jesus of Nazareth it was reached." But, great as he was in sympathy, pure as he was in heart, he shared the feelings and beliefs of his time. Was his a supreme ideal nature? Did he not believe in the gross demonology of the Galilean Jews? Did he not himself seek to cast out devils? Did he not instruct his disciples to cure diseases by casting out devils? I know, indeed, that these words will be explained away. For eighteen hundred years, theologians have been busy in explaining away the simple words of the Christian scriptures, according to the theory they desire to prove. But evident it is, to one who reads the record with open and intelligent eyes, that Jesus did share the views and superstitions of the people by whom he was surrounded; that he never would have conceived of his Messianic mission, if he had not believed, as the people about him believed, that the world was about to be consumed by fire, and that a certain individual of the stock of David—believing that individual to be himself—was to come in the clouds of heaven and inaugurate new heavens and a new earth. We may speak with a certain lightness of this belief, and say that he "accommodated" himself to the beliefs of the age. But how will you prove that he accommodated himself to the beliefs of the age, when it is evident that he shared these beliefs,—when it is evident that, except upon certain preconceived notions of Jesus, as a supernatural character, it is impossible to believe that he did not share these beliefs? It would be just as right to say years hence, and undertake to prove, that Mr. Channing was not in sympathy with the views he has been uttering here to-day,—a supposition against which I am sure Mr. Channing will protest,—and that in speaking of Jesus in the way he did, and in maintaining the Christian doctrines, he was simply accommodating himself to the gross superstitions of New England which prevailed at that time. We take the words of Mr. Channing and of other loving disciples, we take the words of Jesus, we take the historical records which are the most trustworthy, and we obtain the picture of a man who was great, gloriously great, in one particular,—in his tender sympathy for human suffering, in his profound understanding of purity, whether purity came to him in the guise of childhood or of maturity,—and who found the one great method of charity, which consisted in recognizing the might of meekness and the power of love. In that, he was great,—in the method of sympathy, in the method of charity. But, for the rest, we find him, according to the historical records, a man who shared the views of his age and of the people among whom he lived, and who, perhaps, would never have laid the corner-stone of the Christian Church, had he not believed in the Messianic superstitions of the time; thus intimately are these superstitions and these views of the age interwoven with the beginnings and the development of the Christian Church.

(Continued on page 22.)

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 8, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in o her words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

PERSONAL NOTICE.

All personal communications for F. E. Abbot should be hereafter addressed to him at "Lake View Avenue, Cambridge, Mass."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The office of the Free Religious Association and INDEX has been removed to No. 3 Tremont Place (just in the rear of the Tremont House), where members and friends of the Association and patrons of the paper will find a pleasant room and cordial welcome. Mr. David H. Clark, besides being assistant editor of the INDEX, has been appointed General Agent of the Association, under the plan for which money has been raised in response to the circular issued last December, and will have charge of the office and of all business there. All communications pertaining to the business of the Association or of the INDEX should be addressed to "Free Religious Association, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass." Communications intended for the editor will reach him more directly, if addressed to him personally at New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y F. R. A.

OUR readers, we are sure, will enjoy with us the clear and handsome new type which our accomplished printer, Geo. H. Ellis, has provided for the "new departure" of the Index; and we have to thank him and all connected with the printing-office that, in spite of all the changes, the first number was issued with so little delay. After a few weeks, the eye of the reader, too, will have the relief of a wider margin. We did not allow enough for the clipping of the sheet,—a deed, however, which we trust the reader appreciates for other reasons.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200.00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10.00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	$10.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER,
Secretary F. R. A.

IS THE ALPHABET AT FAULT?

It is always interesting to note the closing proceedings of the colleges of our country each year, as bearing on the question of the influence of higher education in the religious, political, and social life of American communities. Hundreds and thousands of young men, by a law of natural selection having on the average the best blood of the country in their veins, are going out from these institutions every year, and in the course of a few years, wherever they may settle, will be taking their places among the leaders in public and private affairs. It is a question of the highest moment, What is the kind of influence they will carry with them? Judging from the tenor of a number of the baccalaureate sermons that have come under our notice, just given to graduating classes by college presidents and clergymen, there seems to be a general apprehension on the part of these watchmen of the students' welfare that natural science is working havoc in the religious faith of these young men. At several of the leading colleges, the closing sermons were arguments against the general agnostic philosophy of the day, and Herbert Spencer in particular; and the students were warned against the inroads of science upon the domain of spiritual beliefs and habits.

Doubtless, the undermining of the traditional creeds and observances of religion is in rapid process among the younger men; and this in a general way may be owing largely to the advance of science. But what is science? It is simply generalized and classified knowledge,—the very thing that colleges are established to teach; knowledge in all the departments of human life, if they are complete colleges, or universities. It would seem, then, to be a strange anomaly that the presidents and chaplains of colleges should feel it to be their duty to warn the students under their charge against the effects of that which it is the chief purpose of their institutions to foster and spread. The anomaly is explained by the fact that these worthy watchmen of the college Zions are confounding certain ecclesiastical creeds and customs, which seem to them all-important, and which have held a large place in the history of Christendom, with the substance of religion and the moral law; and, seeing that the former are clearly endangered by the progressive science of the day, they leap to the conclusion that the latter are also imperilled.

Not making a correct diagnosis of the case, they naturally do not prescribe the correct nor effective remedy. If they really think it so all-important to the young men to hold to the authority of the old theologies and ecclesiasticisms of Christendom, then their remedy does not begin half far enough back. They should at once use their influence to have the curriculum of their colleges curtailed by the excision of all branches of knowledge that tend in any way to discredit these old seats of religious authority. The Roman Catholic seminaries would furnish them the only safe models for selecting the courses of study. A hint of what they should do has been recently given in a convent-school of this country, in the case of a young lady of literary tastes and culture and of bright intellect, alive to all the questions of the day, who was seized with the self-consecrating impulse to devote herself to the work of a "Sister of Charity." She carried with her some of her favorite books, thinking probably that the convent would offer a delightful retreat for quiet study. But everything was taken from her,—every book, magazine, newspaper of the modern world being strictly prohibited,—and only a few ecclesiastical books of the most mediæval type were allowed as mental food to this young enthusiastic mind.

Indeed, it may be questioned whether even this example would go far enough to meet the danger which some of our college Doctors of Divinity appear to apprehend; for any awakening of the intellect whatever is liable to put old opinions in peril. The only effectual remedy, after all, may be to go back to the very alphabet, and prohibit the teaching of that. Only by keeping people in absolute ignorance can they be saved from all the possible dangers of knowledge. To prohibit the alphabet would be to smite the evil of modern Scepticism at its source. Moreover, the alphabet is itself heretical. It did not come of Christian origin.

But if it is not simply the authority of certain systems of theology and of certain religious institutions for whose safety our baccalaureate sermonizers are anxious, if their anxiety is really on account of a peril that seems to them to threaten the very substance of religion and morality, then we think there is a better remedy. It is to abjure wholly the mediæval methods, still prevailing in the colleges, in respect to the study of religion and morality, and to apply to these preëminent departments of human life, so far as they are themes of study, the same scientific method that is now applied in other branches of learning. If religion and morality are in jeopardy from science, it is because they have hitherto been taught as necessarily implicated with a theology which science is fast making obsolete. To ensure their stability, they must be put on grounds that science can recognize and accept.

FREE RELIGION AS A GOSPEL.

Foremost in the triple statement of purpose affirmed by the Free Religious Association stands its proposal "to promote the practical interests of pure religion." Fittingly, this comes first in its avowed aims. For, though not the result to be first achieved, it is first in its importance. It is the ultimate outcome and consummate flower of all else. Important as may be the scientific study of religion and profound fellowship, in its essential spirit (neither of which can be overestimated), they acquire their greatest worth as agents of religion's largest development and most effective working. Greater knowledge is to produce higher character and nobler living. Broader and deeper spiritual sympathy is to insure more successful and useful effort.

Free religion is not merely speculative or sentimental. It is, or should be, eminently practical. Its realm is this life. Its mission is to enlighten and elevate, to unite and improve mankind. The perfection of the individual, the highest welfare of the race, is its goal. It throws off all cumbrous forms, all restrictive systems, that it may be free to strike more effective blows for the right. It forms alliance with all earnest and sincere souls, of whatever name, nationality, or race, for the better unfolding and upbuilding of the good. Whatever enters into the process of human growth, it recognizes and fosters. Whatever helps to invigorate and exalt life, in any of its interests and activities, this religion seizes and wields as instrumental for the accomplishment of its work.

A familiar legend tells how once, when some of the chosen apostles of Jesus lay bound in prison for the preaching of their faith, an angel opened the prison doors, and led them forth, giving them explicit charge to "go and speak to the people all the words of this life." It is precisely the words of this life — all of them, the gospel of life — that free religion has to preach. Released from the fetters of ecclesiasticism and dogma, set free from the prison house of sect and system, it is to make this proclamation more effective, uttering its word more distinctly, putting the word into deed more thoroughly.

Digitized by Google

Free religion, then, is the gospel of life,—of all that makes the essence and effectiveness of life.

It is the gospel of health. It recognizes and enforces the physical laws of man's being. It enjoins "the use, not the abuse," of all the good things of the material world. It requires and exemplifies moderation and sobriety in the active work and the social recreations of life, "temperance in things useful, abstinence from things hurtful."

It is the gospel of intellectual veracity. It fosters the truth-loving spirit, ever seeking more knowledge. It exercises frankness of speech in the avowal of its convictions. As no church or creed, no book or man, restricts its field of vision or limits its acquisition, so no ecclesiastical decree, no professional propriety, no current clamor, restrains its expression.

It is the gospel of moral honesty. It sets forth a high ideal of personal character. It gives clear discernment of the right, and unfaltering obedience to its behests. It calls for uprightness of dealing, sincerity and faithfulness in all the industry and enterprise of life; begetting trustworthiness not to be impeached, and confidence never broken; rounded integrity, strong in the very wholeness which that word denotes. It includes, in the sweep of this moral impulse and purpose, all possible relations of life; filling the public service, no less than the private condition, with its presence and power.

It is the gospel of social purity. It demands the highest chastity in the individual, in the family, in society. Only the pure thought, the clean word, the worthy act, find justification before it. It affirms the divinity of love; the sacredness of true marriage; the duty of pure generation, transmitting sound moral health as well as physical vigor; and the necessity of a refining and elevating culture to give completeness to the moral character.

It is the gospel of justice and equity. It would promote these between all classes and conditions. It insists on fair play for all. It seeks to reconcile the conflicting interests of capital and labor, employer and worker. It aims at a more equitable distribution of the comforts and luxuries of life, and of the wealth that is to procure them. And all this, not so much by legal enactments and external compulsion as by the proclamation and diffusion of just and right principles.

It is the gospel of equality. It asserts no monotonous uniformity of natural capacity nor sameness of personal attainment. But it demands for all free opportunity for the full exercise of native power, and would secure to every one the largest possible growth and acquisition. In this equal opportunity is each sex, class, and race to be included.

It is the gospel of humanity. It is not philanthropy, as simply the sentiment of good-will toward mankind in general. It is the stronger purpose which makes its possessor to become thoroughly identified with and consecrated to the service of all human needs. It would strengthen the weak, reform the inebriate, raise the fallen, purify the licentious, regenerate the vicious and the criminal. It adds to these efforts ceaseless endeavor for the moral elevation of the community at large. Thus is its work preventive as well as remedial, comprehensive and not special alone. Its "enthusiasm for humanity" is chastened indeed, but it does not fail to be also strengthened by the knowledge that comes from thorough study of the facts of social life and harmonious working with the laws of social development.

Free religion thus becomes the truest life, bearing fruit in profound and practical morality; a morality that consists in the development of personal integrity and the fulfilment of social obligation.

Freedom and fellowship are the atmosphere in which it best accomplishes this practical fruitage. It brushes away the cobwebs of tradition from the windows of the human soul, letting in the clear sunlight of truth, not that man may bask with self-complacency in its rays, but that he may be invigorated and inspired by their life-giving power. As it would banish theology from the public schools that it may introduce morality there,—the morality not of set rules and formal precepts and external authority, but of essential principle, pervading spirit, and living influence,—so would it everywhere cast out dogmatism and superstition, that it may instal truth and right. It would bring all earnest and free spirits into quickening contact, that they may animate each other into co perative and triumphant effort for human welfare.

For such a Gospel of Free Religion, uttered on the platform, impersonated in living conduct, organized in societies, there may not be perhaps a large hearing, an eager following, an instant success; but there are, certainly, a place, a work, and an imperative demand. F. H.

CLEMENT D. NEWMAN.

The record of the worthiest lives is not that chiefly celebrated in our daily press. Our newspapers bring to us too often stories of misfortune, disaster, and crime,—evidences of the weak and sinful side of human nature. These are blazoned on their pages; while manifold deeds of kindness and humanity are forgotten. Even the good word "liberal" is in these days sometimes brought into disrepute by the unworthy lives of those who most blatantly claim and wear it. No worthier service, therefore, can be rendered the liberal cause than to make record of a life passed in its service; a life true, manly, honest, clean, and useful; a life consecrated to high ends, and pursuing them by none save worthy and honorable means.

Such a life was that of Clement D. Newman, who passed away from his home in Brooklyn, on Saturday morning, June 12. Mr. Newman was born in Brooklyn on the 17th of January, 1826. He came of sturdy American and Knickerbocker stock. His grandfather was a major in the army during the War of 1812, and his great-grandfather a general in the army of the Revolution. At the storming of Quebec, the latter stood by the side of Arnold,— whose name was then untainted by his subsequent treason,— and caught him in his arms as he fell wounded by a bullet of the enemy.

His mother belonged to the old Knickerbocker family, the Duyckincks,— a name always honorable in the local history and literature of New York,— and was known as one of the most intellectual and cultivated women of her day. From such ancestors, he inherited intelligent patriotic instincts, which made him always the best of citizens, and a strong liking for literary pursuits. He was educated at Bedford Academy, Westchester, and the Academy at Saratoga; and subsequently studied law at Norfolk, Va., and in the office of Messrs. Beach & Backus at Saratoga.

Very early, he was impressed with the enormity of the institution of slavery. His oration at graduation contained a strong expression of anti-slavery sentiments; and, while it was highly commended for its literary excellence, it was criticised by some of his more conservative friends for its radical political utterances. These early impressions were strengthened during his residence in Virginia, where he came in direct contact with the institution and its upholders. Even at that early day, the advocates of slavery were not disposed to submit to any criticism of their pet institution from Northern men. For a straightforward statement of his opinions in debate in the local Debating Club at Norfolk, Mr. Newman was threatened with a challenge; and, though in maturer years strongly opposed to duelling, he promptly intimated to the friend of his antagonist his acceptance of the challenge, and named rifles as the weapon. Upon this announcement, it being known that he was an excellent shot with the rifle, the subject was at once dropped by his opponent.

Although educated to the profession of law, Mr. Newman's early inclination was to enter the field of general literature, to which his education and refinement of nature strongly drew him. Financial misfortunes in his father's family, however, early turned him from his literary labors to the routine work of his profession. He commenced to practise law in 1843, and was admitted to practice in the Court of Chancery, June 1, 1847, by the late Chancellor Reuben Hyde Walworth. As an equity lawyer, he won the respect of the bench and the bar for his uprightness, probity, and gentlemanly dealing. "He was noted," says the Brooklyn Eagle, "for his integrity and candor of purpose, and enjoyed an enviable position in both business and social circles." As a probate lawyer, he had few equals in this country. The wills drawn by him were seldom attacked, and in some instances were successfully defended against counsellors like David Dudley Field, Richard O'Gorman, and James T. Brady. He was counsel in the celebrated Thompson will case, the Seymour case, and others of importance.

His early literary productions, including a number of poems published in the Literary World, Home Journal, and other papers, are tinged with a strong religious feeling. One of the best of these early pieces is a patriotic ode to the memory of the martyrs of the Prison-Ships. A song written by him on the occasion of the birthday of Robert Burns was selected from among many others, and sung on the same day, January 25, 1859, in New York, Canada, and Edinburgh, Scotland.

He was brought up in the Protestant Episcopal faith, and was baptized and confirmed in this church at Norfolk. The honesty of his intellectual nature and his strong reason, however, led him early into a broader and more liberal religious communion. At the age of twenty-four, after hearing a sermon by a Universalist preacher, Dr. Thayer, he was induced to investigate, and finally to adopt the views of that sect. For many years he was an honored member, and for twelve years superintendent of the Sunday-school, of the Universalist Church of the Restoration, in Brooklyn. Once having got wings, however, his rational nature continued to soar. Now, for several years, he has been connected with the Second Unitarian Church, being drawn thither by strong sympathy with the views of rational religion as presented by Rev. John W. Chadwick. For Mr. Chadwick's ability and sincerity, he had the highest respect. On his recent return from Bermuda, where he had spent some weeks in the vain attempt to recover his health, he said to the writer: "I have been an actor in an historical event since I saw you. I had the satisfaction of presenting one of John Chadwick's sermons to a descendant of Jonathan Edwards." He added, "He expressed himself very glad to receive it, too!"

Mr. Newman's religious life manifested a gradual and natural growth out of supernaturalism into the religion of reason. His utterances upon religious topics were always characterized by the utmost frankness and honesty. He scorned to pretend, even by his silence, to believe that which his reason rejected; and he respected no preaching which lacked this element of utter sincerity and truthfulness. With regard to a future life, he frankly said, "We do not know." Aware that his illness might have a fatal termination, he faced the unknown future without fear, in that most perfect trust that whatever was best would happen to him and to all. To the end, his religious life was a manifestation of that fearless faith, which in his early days he thus expressed in a little poem entitled: —

Digitized by Google

ONWARD.

Oh, never turn thy helm aside,
When noble is the goal.
Press onward! Destiny's the child
Of force within the soul.

Ne'er backward look, and thou shalt see
The star of triumph shine:
Despair's approaching gloom can make Hope's energy divine!

Mr. Newman was one of the founders and most interested and intelligent members of the Brooklyn Philosophical Society. His earnest face and kindly word will be greatly missed by all who have gathered at its meetings. A number of able papers were prepared and read by him before this society, the last being on the subject of "Advent Duties."

In the year 1856, at the age of twenty-nine, Mr. Newman married Miss Mary E. Bleecker, by whom he had six children, five of whom, with their mother, survive him. To them he has left the precious legacy of the tender memories of a life devoted to the highest ideals. No one ever entered his home without seeing that here was the centre of all his affections and hopes. His domestic life was, in the language of one who knew him long and well, "a consummation of ethical grace and beauty." Mr. Daniel M. Tredwell, of the Philosophical Society, writes of him: "I have known him nearly thirty years, and know that the home pleasures and enjoyments were the keenest of his life. His entire life was a complete moral structure of the most unexceptionable and unassuming purity."

The funeral sermon preached by his friend Mr. Chadwick was a merited recognition of these noteworthy traits in a character of remarkable beauty, sincerity, and worth. His wife and children, now bowed beneath the burden of a natural and inevitable sorrow, have the sincerest sympathies of his many friends. We cannot doubt that, when time has modified the sharpness of their grief, they will find help and healing and a chastened and thankful happiness in the contemplation of a life singularly true and noble, and worthy to be held up as an example to all who would build up the kingdom of truth and righteousness in the world.

L. G. J.

New York, June 19, 1880.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

The recent publication of The Life and Writings of Henry Thomas Buckle, by Alfred Henry Huth (New York, D. Appleton & Co.), bids fair to beget a renewed interest in the works of Buckle himself. It has become a fashion of recent years to decry Buckle, to say that he failed in his great attempt, etc. This may be true, but, if he failed, no one else has succeeded; and he certainly pointed out the pathway along which all his legitimate successors have since walked, and will continue to walk for a long time to come. Buckle, it should be remembered, worked without the help of the full light which has been thrown upon the problems he discussed by some of the wonderful generalizations of modern science. Perhaps it is not too much to say that he helped to make some of these generalizations possible. To admit his failure to comprehend the vastness of the task he had undertaken does not detract from the greatness of the work he really accomplished; and it is within the limits of possibility, moreover, that the chief part of his failure may have been in appearance only, for all that he has left us is, as Mr. Huth well says, but "a fragment of a fragment." No fragment was ever of greater service in suggesting new ideas to its readers. Buckle has been compared, as regards originality, with Comte and with several others; but comparisons of this kind are seldom satisfactory. A very large body of English readers undoubtedly received from him their first conceptions of right methods of historic research; and he first taught them to apply to human beings in the mass, in social groups, the same methods of investigation that apply to all other subjects,— from grains of sand to stellar systems. That European civilization depends primarily upon intellectual rather than moral advancement; that the individual may be disregarded in studying the law of the group; that even those affairs which seem to be most dependent upon personal caprice or passion — suicides, murders, marriages — are not so dependent, but are determined by comprehensive natural laws, — these, in their day, were wonderful generalizations, which subsequent investigation may have modified, but cannot set aside. They may not have been wholly original with Buckle,— some of them surely were not,—but he emphasized them and used them as no one else had done. He redeemed history and made it a science, no longer a compilation of biographies and court gossip. The man, too, was wonderful. Self-taught, he labored for fourteen years in silence, never indicating the nature of the task upon which he was engaged. A marvellous chess-player, a fascinating conversationalist, a very great linguist of rarely equalled power of memory, a sceptic and free-thinker in the best sense of these much-abused words, a devoted son and loyal friend,— as all of this and more he is shown to us in Mr. Huth's excellent biography. Mr. Huth, eighteen years ago, was one of the two boys in Buckle's company when the latter met his untimely death at Damascus; and the enduring influence of his great friend and tutor is exhibited in this first acceptable biography, which the boy, now an accomplished man, has just written.

Mr. Z. L. White, the excellent correspondent of the New York Tribune, in a recent letter from Washington, calls attention to Major Powell's ethnological researches among the North American Indians. The plan of the work in which Major Powell has now been engaged for ten years is very comprehensive. A discussion of the manners and customs of the Indians; their religions; their languages; a history of each tribe so far as it can be traced; an account of their dealings with the whites from the earliest settlements of the latter to the present time; and a collection of relics,— all are provided for. Moreover, an exhaustive bibliography of all literature relating to the Indians has been prepared, as a part of the same plan, by Mr. J. C. Pilling. An atlas, showing the location of all tribes at the time of the discovery of America, the subdivision of the linguistic stocks, the location of villages, all cessions of lands to the colonists, all removals of tribes, etc., has been made; and the value of these two works to ethnological students cannot be estimated. Material for a legislative history of the Indians has been gathered; a complete bibliography of North American linguistics has been prepared; and between fifty and sixty full dictionaries and grammars have been constructed, a large part of this last work being done by volunteers, — missionaries, army officers, employés of the Indian Bureau, contractors, miners, and others. The sign language of the Indians has been studied, and an introduction thereon prepared by Col. Garrick Mallory; and their picture language has been thoroughly investigated. A full account of Indian sociology will also be given. In this field, two volumes have already appeared; and eighteen additional volumes are in course of preparation. More material for the study of primitive man is said to exist in the western part of the United States than can be found elsewhere in the world. There are thousands of ruins, mounds, caves, refuse heaps, etc., containing an abundance of remains, all of which will soon be scattered as the country becomes settled, if immediate measures are not taken for their collection and preservation. The French government has already carried away whole ship-loads of valuable relics; and one of its exploring expeditions will, this season, go into Arizona for the collection of relics from among the Pueblos. Private enterprise cannot secure this valuable ethnological material; and Professor Baird, of the Smithsonian Institute, urges Congress, before it is too late, to appropriate a few thousand dollars in securing to-day that which will be of incalculable value twenty-five years hence.

An additional zest attends the study of the North American Indians because of the impression, daily deepening among students, that the human race is of extreme antiquity in the New World. Heretofore, there have been but two theories of Indian origin worthy of consideration: (1) That they are of independent origin, created or evolved in the Western Hemisphere,— a theory now practically abandoned; (2) That they are descended from Asiatic tribes who managed to reach America in some unexplained way,—possibly by way of the Behring Straits or the Polynesian Islands. But evidence is now accumulating from various parts of the United States, especially in the neighborhood of the Rocky Mountains, from Central America, and from the Pampas, going to show that man existed in those places as early as anywhere else on the face of the earth, perhaps even further back in time than the pleistocene geological period. His remains are now found associated with the remains of extinct animals of so great an antiquity that it is evident, says Professor Flowers to the London Royal College of Surgeons, that the data from which the problem of the peopling of America is to be solved are altogether changed. "Taking all circumstances into consideration, it is quite as likely that Asiatic man may have been derived from America as the reverse, or both may have had their source in a common centre, in some region of the earth now covered by sea." We hope to return to this subject soon, in a consideration of Professor Winchell's Preadamites.

R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Mrs. E. D. Cheney wishes to call the attention of our readers to the "Massachusetts School Suffrage Association," lately formed to carry into effect the law for school suffrage for women. Its object, she writes, is to promote the interests of education through school suffrage, by gathering and diffusing information in regard to the condition of the public schools throughout the State, and to encourage women to vote for school committees, and give them such help as will enable them to vote intelligently. A large and interesting meeting was held in Boston during Anniversary Week, at which important speeches were made by Col. Higginson, Mrs. Livermore, and others. The Association desires to enroll in its membership all who are interested in the subject, that it may extend its connections and make its work more thorough. In the city of Boston, committees have been organized in all the wards to call on those who registered last year, and see that they take the steps necessary for voting this year, and also to bring the subject to the minds of all the women in the ward, that they may act conscientiously in regard to it. Whether the result of this movement be to give a much larger vote than last year or not, it is certain to arouse a great deal of discussion and interest in the matter of education, and that is a great good in itself. The following paper of instructions has been carefully drawn up by a committee of the Association, and submitted to the criticism of both the assessors and registrars, and it is believed to give all the directions necessary to those wishing to vote in the city, in as simple and intelligible a form as possible: —

Digitized by Google

5 PARK STREET, BOSTON, June 15, 1880.

Instructions for women wishing to vote in the city of Boston at the election of members for the School Board, in 1880: —

1st. Every woman who last year paid a poll-tax or any other tax upon real estate or personal property, which was assessed in her own name, in any town or city in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, must go to the Registrars' office, 30 Pemberton Square (or to such place of registration in the suburban districts as shall be designated by the Registrars of voters, who will give notice thereof by advertisement), at any time until within fourteen days of the day of election. Every woman must there present her receipted tax-bill, and be registered as a voter for the present year.

2d. Every woman who, last year, did not pay a poll-tax, or any other tax, must make application in person, to be assessed at the Assessor's office in the City Hall, before five o'clock P.M., September 15, and, after such tax-bill is paid, must present it in person and be registered at the Registrars' office, 30 Pemberton Square, or at one of the sub-registration offices, under the conditions above mentioned.

These directions apply to all cities other than Boston, and all towns in the State, and the same officers, times, and places that apply to the assessment and registration of men apply to the assessment and registration of women; with this exception only, that the time of assessment for women is on or before the 15th of September, and for men until the first day of October.

THE English Factory and Workshop Act, passed in 1878, forbids the eating of meals in places where articles detrimental to health are manufactured. The Home Secretary has recently extended the prohibition "to every part of a factory or workshop in which dry powder or dust is used in any of the following processes,—lithographic printing, playing-card making, fancy-box making, paper-staining, almanac-making, artificial flower making, paper-coloring and enamelling, and color-making." The enactment is one that our State legislatures might copy with decided benefit to factory operatives.

IT is announced that an Anti-Duelling Society has been organized in one of the counties of South Carolina, of which Judge Kershaw, an ex-confederate general and one of the most respected men in the State, is president, and many other prominent men of the aristocratic class are members. This is one of the most encouraging signs of a moral reconstruction of Southern society that has appeared.

THE bill before Parliament in England, to grant the right for one to marry his deceased wife's sister, produces a good deal of agitation. It is understood that the Queen, the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Cambridge are in its favor; and that Mr. Gladstone has declared that it ought to be settled by letting each sect go its own way. Hence it is not strange that Sir Thomas Chambers should hope to get his measure passed this year. He has the Commons with him; and, though the Lord Chancellor is bitterly opposed to him, there is some reason to believe that Prince and Premier will persuade the Peers.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.— It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION. By John Caird, D.D., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glasgow, and one of Her Majesty's Chaplains for Scotland. New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.

Dr. John Caird, for many years distinguished as an eloquent preacher of the Established Church of Scotland, proves himself by this volume to be a philosophic thinker of far more than ordinary ability and a Christian theologian of the most Catholic spirit. In our assault upon what is base and superstitious in the religious orthodoxy of the time, we must not forget that such men as Caird exist and that such books as this are written. The man and his book are remarkable signs of the times. It is too frequently the vice of the radical protest that it makes no allowance for these significant phenomena.

Among the works to which Dr. Caird expresses his obligations are Pfleiderer's Die Religion and Religionsphilosophie—works highly spoken of by Prof. Everett in his address before the Ministers' Institute in Providence, last October—and Hegel's Philosophie der Religion. To the last-named book, Dr. Caird expresses himself more deeply indebted than to any other. The confession is superfluous for any one at all acquainted with the philosophy of Hegel. His influence is evident at almost every turn. And perhaps our faith in the "staying quality" of Dr. Caird's exposition is somewhat shaken by our recollection of the collapse of Hegelian orthodoxy in Germany and of Feuerbach's deduction from the Hegelian premises of his nihilistic creed.

Dr. Caird comes forward as the advocate of the scientific treatment of religion, but the word rational would express his meaning better. His method is not inductive and objective. It is deductive and subjective. He is nothing if not metaphysical. And our distrust of his method is not disarmed by his use of it. The value of his book appears to us to lie much more in what is incidental than in its general scope. Upon the topmost ranges of his argument, he breathes an air too thin for average mortals. In these laborious arguments to show that the finite and the infinite involve each other, we feel ourselves up in a balloon, and the solid earth of scientific investigation far down below us has a comfortable concreteness of aspect that affects us with a feeling of homesickness and a desire to come down and get out.

Dr. Caird's first chapter is mainly a criticism of Herbert Spencer's "unknowable." He argues that his theory of the relativity of human knowledge is conclusive of the non-existence of the Absolute. A similar criticism was made by Mr. Chauncey Wright in the last article he ever wrote. He insisted that Spencer's "unknowable" had no such positive character as his regard for it implied. What Dr. Caird says of the Unknowable as an object of worship is excellent. "It is not too much to say that almost any object of reverence would be more worthy than this."

A chapter follows on the intuitive character of religious knowledge. Denying to it any such character, Dr. Caird, nevertheless, gives an exceedingly sympathetic statement of the origin of the claim. His criticism, however, of the intuitive theory, leaves it in a miserable plight. Equally keen and fatal is his criticism of the idea that a positive revelation can communicate religious truth that is contrary to reason or above it. Nowhere is Dr. Caird's departure from the ancient and much of the current Orthodoxy more decided than here. He makes reason the ultimate test.

Chapter IV. treats of "The Necessity of Religion." It is a necessity of thought. Thought presupposes Absolute Intelligence. It is here that Dr. Caird's admiration for Hegel becomes conspicuous, and it is here that we begin to follow him with halting steps. But the chapter contains admirable matter on the weakness of ordinary refutations of materialism. These refutations represent God as an "Almighty Creator" or an "All-wise Designer and Governor of the world." Such a conception is essentially dualistic. "Not only is the God who is conceived of as an external Creator or Contriver reduced to something finite, but the link between Him and the world is made a purely arbitrary one, and the world itself is left without any real unity."

Chapter V. on "Proofs of the Existence of God" considers these proofs under three heads, cosmological, teleological, and ontological. The inadequacy of each in turn is shown, while yet a certain provisional value is accorded them. Wisdom is easy here after the exhaustive criticism of Kant. Chapters VI. and VII. are preliminary to the eighth, in which Dr. Caird develops his favorite idea of the presupposition of infinite by finite mind, and the necessity for infinite mind to reveal itself to and in the finite. At this point, we have not found him clear or conclusive. The fault may be in us, and not in him at all.

There is a profoundly stimulating chapter on Morality and Religion. As metaphysical as possible, we have yet noted many points of vital correlation with Mr. Spencer's Data of Ethics. But the attempt to show the superiority of religion to morality impresses us as an utter failure. The concluding chapter treats of the relation of the philosophy to the history of religion. Its ablest point is in favor of the organic development of religion in general, and of Christianity in particular, and in opposition to the notion that Christianity was interpolated from above because the world was growing worse and going to decay. The attempt to make out a case for Christianity as a supernatural religion is lame enough. What is meant by supernatural is not clearly defined. Evidently, nothing that would satisfy a high-and-dry conservative. At the lowest calculation, this book is eminently suggestive of the break-up of the old theology. It is especially a book for those who are prone to deal with Christian Orthodoxy, as if it were perfectly homogeneous and equally absurd in all its parts. In fact, nothing is more heterogeneous. The traditional labels mask a thousand and ten thousand varieties of thought and feeling.

FOREIGN.

DR. KENEALY has by his will left his library, which is said to be one of the richest private libraries in the country, and includes many valuable and rare works in classical and Oriental literature, to the British Museum and St. John's College, Dublin. He has left instructions as to how the library shall be divided between the two institutions.

AT the annual breakfast of the Scottish Disestablishment Association, held at Edinburgh on Saturday, the general opinion expressed was that Scotland had decided for disestablishment, and that the next election would determine the means to be adopted in carrying it on. The Rev. Principal Rainy said that at the last election the dissenters decided not to split the Liberal party; but at the next election, if the party was split on the subject, the blame must lie with Liberal Churchmen.

THE missionary world must begin to think of its morals. It assumes sometimes too much; and the recent proceedings of the Blantyre missionaries in Africa—who, by their own confession, flogged a negro that afterwards died—are likely to lead to a resolution calling upon the Government to subject missionaries in some way to the law. This is only fair. The missionaries and their friends sometimes lead us into a war, and they ought in return to be prevented from doing things which lead to war.

A PETITION has been extensively signed in Oxford, which, after recounting that the oath of allegiance has formed an integral part of the Constitution for six hundred years, prays that the said oath may be maintained intact, and not dispensed or done away with or exchanged for a simple declaration; and that nobody be permitted to take the oath who would be considered disqualified from taking an oath in the courts of law, or who shall have said in public anything in open disparagement of its binding force.

"WHAT papers off my writing-desk are you burning there?" cried an author to the servant-girl. "Oh, only the paper what's all written over, sir. I hain't touched the clean."

A BOSTON lawyer recently met his match in a witness who was giving evidence about an old lady's loss of mind. Lawyer: "Did she look as I am looking at you now, for instance?" Witness: "Well, yes, quite vacant-like!"

A GEORGIA colored debating society was lately discussing, "Which is the best for the laboring man, to work for wages or part of the crop?" An old "uncle" spoke the sense of the meeting when he said, "Bofe was de best, ef dey could only be brung togedder somehow."

Digitized by Google

(Continued from page 17.)

Upon what plea, then, will you rest your continuance in the Christian Church, and how will you justify yourself in retaining the Christian name. Christ, as a supernatural being, you do not believe in. Christ, as the perfect man, you cannot believe in. If you accept the view which I have endeavored to set forth, by what authority do you call yourself "Christian"? You call yourself by the name of Christ. Is it as the greatest leader? Yes, in one direction, although it may well be questioned whether Buddha was not equally great in the power of sympathy which he exhibited. But you cannot accept a leader in one direction only as a religious ideal. You cannot hold up the life of Christ as the absolute ideal which we are to follow. We must include intellectual virtue in our ideal. We must include freedom from all superstitions in our ideal. We cannot mould our own life according to the prototype which is set before us in the life of the Nazarene.

Then it is said by others that we must accept the Christian name because of Christian civilization,—because, after all, Christianity has given birth to this civilization under which we live,—and that we must therefore call ourselves "Christians" in the sense of belonging to this great civilization, in the sense of feeling ourselves called upon to further this great civilization,—"Christians," therefore, in the sense of "civilizers." But how little ground for this! The claim that Christianity has given us this civilization cannot be allowed. If you read the works of mediæval history and the contemporary history of the Christian Church during at least fifteen hundred years of its life, you see that Christianity, far from producing the civilization under which we live, retarded that civilization; that it was only when the power of heathen nations began to conquer Christian influence, in the time of the Renaissance, when old Greek and Roman writers began to be read, when science raised its head, and the spirit of inquiry took the place of the spirit of the Inquisition, when science began exploring the globe, and the new influence of ancient literature began to be poured in upon the spirit of the world,—it was only then that that was effected which has produced the civilization of the last fifteen hundred years. [Applause.] In all those years, what inventions and discoveries do we owe to the Christian influence? The invention of the rack, perhaps. Was not that a Christian invention? The invention of the Inquisition, perhaps. Was not that a Christian invention? I speak not here for a dogma. I have no individual cause to defend. I have no new sectarian name of my own to propose. I simply call for names which shall express our sincere convictions. I say the people, and the teachers of the people from the pulpit, should consider the question whether they can justly and in full honesty hold up the life of Christ as the ideal life,—whether they would desire that modern men should fashion their lives and should conform in their conduct entirely with the example set by Jesus. And, if they cannot do that,—if they can neither hold up Christ as the divine nor as the ideal life,—with what right, I repeat, do they retain the name of "the followers of Christ"?

I have spoken of the past. It is easy to go from the point of vantage which I have now gained, and say my word as to the future, and the Step Next to be taken. I do not hold it necessary, I do not believe it possible, that the whole world will speedily attain those views which we are here endeavoring to promulgate. The vast majority of men are governed by their emotions, not by their intellect. A man who feels so earnestly and strongly and tenderly as Mr. Channing feels,—such men, while they may, and will, I hope, concede the equal honesty and sincerity of conviction which inspires us, will never be able to meet on the same ground of opinion with us. The world, for ages to come, will still hold fast to dogmatic beliefs. The question for us to consider, however, the problem for us to conceive, is: Can we not, in spite of religious dogmatic views, find the point of union? The point of union, I believe, is "Practical Work." All I ask is, retain your dogmatic beliefs, if you must. Consider us wrong. Believe that we are transgressors. Believe that we are wholly on the false path. But retain, if you will, those dogmatic beliefs as private beliefs. Don't maintain them as the sine qua non of salvation. Don't urge them upon the world as that which can alone give a moral character to man. But unite, whatever shades of diversity you may have, unite with us in that which is to be considered the essential of all religion, in that which Dr. Channing preached as the essential of religion, as Mr. Channing himself has told us, to perfect society. Help us to introduce that perfect society. Earnestly teach what is necessary, in order to induce men to make those changes in modern society which are so very desirable. Clear the convictions of men. Instruct their consciences. State truths, though they be bold truths and unwelcome truths. Make this the tenor of your pulpit teachings, and then we can heartily meet it. This is the Next Step, in my opinion, to be taken,—the step which Free Religion endeavors to inaugurate. We will each endeavor to maintain our convictions, and endeavor heartily to prove the falsity of other convictions. But we will do so in the spirit of union, notwithstanding,—feeling that we still belong together, that we are united on the platform of practical, humanitarian work. For in that work all religions seem to concentrate; only that the majority believe that that work suffices not, and we believe that that work alone suffices, and is the essence of all faith and of all religion.

And now I want to say one word as regards Mr. Abbot's statement, with which I cannot wholly agree, though I also accept "Philosophy as the guide of life"; only that I do not believe that Philosophy or Science can ever give us that totality of which he speaks. Science is fragmentary, and Philosophy founded on Science is also fragmentary. He speaks of harmonizing our life, of bringing our individual life into harmony with the universal life. And that we must do. That is indeed the purpose, the substance, of all moral endeavor. But how shall we do that? Is not the pessimist right, after all? If we base our moral convictions merely upon fact, if we merely take Science and Philosophy as our guides, what do Science and Philosophy show us? Do they show us a harmonious world? Have not all the religions painted a Satan, as well as a God? And do not the facts show Satanic influences, as it were, in the world, as well as divine influences? How, then, shall we deceive ourselves as to facts, if we rest upon facts alone,—facts interpreted by Science and Philosophy! Here are the facts of goodness in the world, of beauty, of nobleness, of truth; and the philosopher would have us bring our lives into harmony with these facts. But, on the other hand, grimly and darkly stand forth the opposite facts,—the facts of evil, the facts of sin, the facts of insanity, the facts of despair, the facts of poverty, the facts of wrecked lives, the facts of hopeless troubles. Mr. Alger has likened the universe to a theatre, upon which our life is enacted, saying that the Divine Being has placed us here to enact our parts. I would not be the spectator of such a play as is enacted in this world, knowing that I had put the players in their places, and that but for me it might have remained otherwise! I think it must be with feelings of unutterable sadness, sorrow, and remorse that an omnipotent Being would contemplate such a tragedy. The facts of evil are just as much facts as the facts of good. And, if we are to bring our lives into harmony with the facts, the question remains, With which facts,—with the facts of evil or the facts of good? Theology steps in and says: "You can never reach the belief in infinite goodness, you can never reach the assurance of infinite goodness, except by faith. The one thing which religion must give us is the belief in infinite goodness,—the belief that, notwithstanding the evil in the world, there is infinite goodness at the heart." That is the essence of all religion. All the religions of the world have been attempts to solve this one problem: How can we believe in the ultimate triumph of good? How can we believe that in the issue of things goodness is not to be overcome? How can we have faith in the good, and not in the evil? The Persians endeavored to meet this difficulty by speaking of the conflict between the good principle and the evil principle, and saying that in the end good would triumph. Christianity has endeavored to solve it in the scheme of "the atonement," by which Satan and his works would be finally confounded. The Jewish prophets never speak with such power and millennial promise as when they speak of the time of universal peace, when nation shall never make war upon nation, but the earth shall be full of the goodness of God, as the waters cover the sea. But Philosophy will often fail,—philosophy that is based on facts, it seems to me, must fail,—because, as Mr. Abbot has wisely said, the belief of Philosophy must never go further than the evidence. And the evidence seems to me to be clearly and plainly,—I speak this from my knowledge of human sorrows, I speak this from my knowledge of despair which I have seen,—the evidence of facts is clearly the evidence of darkness and evil and woe and misery, as well as the evidence of beauty and goodness and love. And it seems to me that there is only one way in which we who cannot accept theology and its guidings will obtain that assurance which we so much need. We cannot say, "We will believe by faith." It is a mere play of children,—we arrive at a conclusion which we desire, and because we desire it we cling to it. But we say, "Not by creeds, but by deeds"; and that means not only that, looking aside from matters of dogma and of mere doctrinal religion, we should seek rather to benefit humanity, but something more profound than that. It means that by deeds of goodness do we learn the endless and infinite value of the good, and that in this manner we acquire an unconquerable confidence in the good, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary. Our confidence in the good arises upon good actions which we perform. In one word, I say, "Instead of standing idly and speculatively, and asking, 'How will it be?' 'Is it that the good will triumph or the evil will triumph?' Do the good, constantly practise noble actions. Then, by virtue of this experience which you have acquired, you will feel such a boundless trust in the good, you will so feel the direct influence of the tides of goodness which course through the world, that your doubt will be removed. For doubting men stand upon the brink of life as boys who cry out for bladders and life-preservers, with which to swim. These doubting men and women of our age cry out for some doctrine, some creed, some dogma of the letter, and say, "Unless we have this, we cannot support ourselves." The truth is that they need only to have courage and plunge in, into the tides of goodness, and they will find that it is natural for man to swim. We need only to strike out boldly, and trust the buoyant element.

The point to which I have arrived, and which I will not seek to illustrate further, is experience instead of faith,—not experience of outward nature, for that can never give us anything but dualism and antagonism and contradiction, but our own experience. Logically, we can never prove the ultimate triumph of the good. The question therefore remains for us, Shall we accept it on faith? Or, if we do not have faith, and cannot have it, how shall we obtain this necessary assurance of the triumph of the good? Logically, we cannot. I have not proved it. The fact that I have done good and noble actions does not prove logically that goodness will triumph in the world. But it proves it to me; for I have experienced the infinite, endless value of the good. I can doubt no longer, because I have become part of the good, and part of the divine has flowed into me, and I have become part of the divine. [Applause.]

It is in this manner that I seek to settle for myself what shall be the Step Next taken,—a great summons to the world to engage in larger works of philanthropy and morality,—some great cause, a cause which evokes enthusiasm,—and that will give to men new confidence in the good where they had lost confidence, so that they will believe henceforth in unselfishness as the only guide of life, and that which is at the heart of the universe. [Applause.]

The SECRETARY.—Before this meeting breaks up, I want to say that a lunch, or rather a substantial dinner, has been provided in the hall below, for all who desire, at reasonable rates. And now I think, before separating to partake of that, you will be ready to hear the Free Religious benediction from our friend Dr. Bartol, which will also serve as a kind of Free Religious "grace" for the lunch.

Address of Rev. Dr. Bartol.

The immediate benediction which, with his thankful spirit, Mr. Potter anticipates from me, I must not make a *male*diction, by continuing in any way this fight, if it be a fight. I observe in the morning, rising very early these summer days, that the voices of the birds on the trees, while the light is still struggling with the darkness, are short and sharp,— more screams than songs. And yet those screams, rather than songs, of the birds, are prophecies of the coming day. I detect something of the scream in listening to our friend, the honored President of the Association. I find in those screams (if I may without disrespect so call them) of the Free Religious Association prophecies. And, certainly, I humbly and frankly say that, having attended some of the anniversary meetings of this week, this is the liveliest time yet, beyond all calculation, that I have had the privilege to see and to hear; only, being an older man than our dear friend and brother, Mr. Adler, he will pardon me if I could wish for him (as I have to pronounce the blessing, will he let me pronounce one on him?) that with all his ability, his sincerity, and the noble, benevolent work which I know he is doing practically in the city and great metropolis of New York, he could only have a little more joy.

Digitized by Google

"Now to the Lord a noble song."

That is to Him always in order; and that is the best first line of a hymn that was ever written. And, though there will be a minor key, it is not in nature. Nature's minor key is only the echo of our minor key, when we have one. Though the minor key may be in place sometimes, I think the major key will prevail. I hope it will prevail a little more than it has done in this speech—so able and glowing—of Mr. Adler in his future speeches, and in his presidency of this noble Association. But this looks a little controversial: it is not meant so.

Let me say just a word, in passing,—for I know that my time is very short,—touching here and there upon the points brought to notice in the addresses of the morning. First, as to the tenderness—regarding which our Brother Alger spoke so truly—of Theodore Parker. It happened, shortly after Theodore Parker's death, that a noble woman, a woman of genius, who professed herself to be a spiritualist,—not in the way of the outward manifestations of spiritualism,—desired me to come and see her, because Theodore Parker had a message to communicate particularly to me. I went. She took my hand,—I am not pronouncing for or against the spiritualistic theory,—she took my hand, and the communication certainly was very touching and very striking. The spirit of Theodore Parker, as it purported to be, said: "My brother, I wanted peace. I saw that you had spiritual peace. I came to you for that gift. I had to brace myself against the world, to clothe myself in armor against the opposition to my views and to my course. I had been to the funeral of my affections,"—a phrase that I shall never forget,—worthy of Shakspeare,—"I have been to the funeral of my affections. But I came to you for peace."

One word about Dr. Channing and supernaturalism. In the latest period of Dr. Channing's life, I remember distinctly taking a walk with him about Boston Common. He said: "The miracles are not the great thing in religion. What is called 'the supernatural' is not the great thing. The works,"—lifting his eyes to the rising sun,—"the orderly and natural works of God are more for our instruction, in religion, than all miracles." So much for Dr. Channing.

A word about our Brother Abbot,— whose paper I was delighted to hear, and I sympathized mainly with the substance and the sentiment,—our Brother Abbot, who is going away from us. And if I have not, as I should crave, the privilege of saying a word at the dinner,—the feast that will be given to him by his friends,—let me say it here. I have known him well for many years,—a man of convictions, a man with the courage of his convictions, a man with indomitable perseverance in the maintenance of his convictions. There were points in his discourse I could not agree with; and against one statement—in the general form in which he put it, not in his intention—I wish to enter my protest. He said, speaking of love, in general, "Love is under law." No, sir. Appetite is under law. Inclination is under law. The human will is under law. But love—that name for God, and for all that is greatest and best in the human soul—is under no law. It made all the laws. All the laws are its servants. Everything in the world should be its minister. And every man and every woman here who have loved, who have had experience of this deepest sentiment, will respond I think to what I say, that love itself is the highest; and if it could, according to our brother's wish, be the prevailing power in the world, it would be the only law which all the other natural and spiritual ones would rejoice to serve.

In regard to Brother Channing, I shall be brief. I do not call myself "a Christian," I don't like to call myself by any good name; and, Mr. President, I don't like to call myself by what you think a bad one. I don't call myself by that name. Yet I respect that Christian movement which we call "the Church." But I wish to express frankly, on the point, without argument, my feeling as respects Brother Channing's statement. My view is this: It is a great mistake, a great philosophic, historic, and religious mistake, to suppose that the future increasing emphasis of the human mind is to be laid on that name, or ought to be laid on that individual whom we call "Jesus, the Christ." Everything is relative. The question with you is where you put your emphasis. If you emphasize one word in a sentence, you cannot emphasize every other word. You have no light and shade. You will not give the true meaning. And I believe that the extreme, perpetual, ever-repeated, multiplied emphasis, putting the creeds and catechisms and liturgies and prayers and discourses, "for the sake of Christ," "in Christ," "through Christ."—I believe that that emphasis—that emphasis, mind you—laid on that word, on that name, on that person, crowds out God,—crowds him out, puts him in abeyance to one who, however noble, beautiful, spotless, and pure, great as he has been, great as he will be, is, after all, our brother,—one of God's children. The emphasis, by the religious instinct, by the philosophic faculty, by the sense of justice to all God's offspring and all his works, will be surely withdrawn from that transcendent measure in which it has been laid on that name and on that person, and will be fixed on the Supreme, call him what you will. Even his name—if you make it simply the name "God" or "Allah" or what you will—must not be too often repeated. That, too, must be more an ineffable name, as the Jews had it, than a frequently spoken one. Now, if I have a hearer who hears this without sympathy,—if Brother Channing hears this without sympathy, or any one in the audience,—I am going to bring Scripture proof of my position; because I hold, Mr. President, that I have made a theological discovery. We designate the Church "Christian," "the Church of Christ." All the churches, orthodox and heterodox, Romanist and Protestant, have no other name for the Church than "the Church of Christ," "the Christian Church." Would you believe that the Church is never spoken of in the New Testament as "the Church of Christ"? Jesus speaks of "my Church." He says, "On this rock" (with his play upon the word "Peter") "will I found my Church." And in Romans Paul says, "All the churches of Christ salute you," i.e., the local churches. But, whenever the Church is spoken of in that large way as "the Church," you will find that it is uniformly spoken of in the New Testament as "the Church of God." Now I want that phrase, "the Church of God," to come into use, Scripturally; for I believe in the Church. That is to say, I believe not only in independent individual conviction, but that we must have sympathy. We shall die without sympathy. We must get the art, in politics, in general society, of getting along together: and I want to go into my grave at once when the time comes that we cannot get along together. Rich and poor, wise and ignorant, weak and strong, we must all get along together. So there must be a Church,—I don't care what you call it,—"the consensus of the competent" Brother Abbot would call it.

Mr. ABBOT.—Not at all.

Rev. Dr. BARTOL.—Or he would call it "the rule of life." Now I differ with Brother Abbot in one respect essentially,—in the prominence which he gives to the intellectual faculty as the guide and salvation of human life. We must have sympathy,—not only the "con-sentiment of the competent," but the con-sentiment of all men. I don't care a fig for your "competent." I do care for all mankind. And you never will get your "competent" together, to decide this question. We must have sympathy,—the sympathy of all. [Applause.]

Moreover, I differ very much from Brother Abbot (although I am no metaphysician or philosopher) in another respect. I do not believe that any faculty, called "intellectual," called "rational," called "the understanding," called "the reason," which if it were dissected from the whole mind would be helpless, even to discover the truth,—I do not believe that any pure intellect is the entire organon for the discovery, far less for the realization and application, of the truth. The same affections, the same sentiments—sometimes unworthily and sarcastically called "emotions," in connection with the understanding and the senses and the rational faculty—are part of the very organon for the search after and the discovery of the truth.

And, having said these things, I have indicated my points, in a very general way, both of agreement and of disagreement with the speakers who have preceded me. The moment we think of it, we find this: "the truth" is not a fact, is not a law, which Brother Alger says is a mere "mode of operation." It may have to do with facts: it may have to do with laws; but "the Truth" is a spirit,—a spirit of sincerity, a spirit of love. Did Judas Iscariot tell "the truth" when he told the chief priests and Pharisees where to find Jesus in the garden? Was he "a true man" when he did that? Nothing is, or may be, so false to your own soul, to your fellow-creature, to your God, sometimes, as the statement of a fact, which may belong to you, but does not belong to the man to whom you tell it.

Well, the hour has come; and I can only say that I may have, from old and friendly associations,—never otherwise than friendly,—some title to say this brief word on this platform. Candidly, you are prophetical, dear Brother Potter. The prophecy has not been yet fulfilled. Perhaps the years have not brought so much fulfilment of it as both you and I desired. May the future years bring it abundantly to us all. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT.—Our friends may be under the impression that that is the way we Free Religious people give a benediction,—by criticising each other. But, if the criticism in every case is as mild and genial as that given by Dr. Bartol, I am sure we have a right to consider such a criticism as a benediction.

Before we pass from the hall, Rev. Mr. Alger will offer a resolution, which I am sure you will all indorse, as a remembrance of our absent and dear friend Mr. Frothingham.

Rev. Mr. ALGER.—It seems fit that our session should end, not with creed, but with deed, and with a kind deed. I offer the following resolution:—

WHEREAS, Our late President, Rev. Octavius B. Frothingham, is wandering in foreign lands, with impaired health, and perhaps sometimes with depressed spirits,

The Free Religious Association hold in grateful and honoring remembrance his long record of historic services in behalf of every noble end, and desire to send him the assurance that they hold him tenderly in their hearts to-day, and wish him great enjoyment in his vacation, a speedy recovery of his strength, and a happy return to his home and work in America.

The resolution was received with applause, and was passed unanimously, the vote being taken by rising.

The Association then adjourned to 3 o'clock P. M.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

THE SERVICES at the Brooklyn Tabernacle yesterday morning were of much more than usual interest; and, notwithstanding the threatening weather, there was a large congregation present. At the conclusion of the sermon, Mr. Talmage said that, in compliance with his announcement of the previous Sunday, after the singing of a hymn, he would baptize by immersion eighteen persons who had signified their desire so to mark their entrance into the Church. He then retired to his private room to change his clothes. As soon as he had left the platform, several attendants cleared it of its furniture and carpet. A part of the platform on the left of the place where Mr. Talmage usually stands was raised, and the baptistery was exposed to view. It is a tank about seven feet in length, three feet in depth, and perhaps four feet in width. It was filled with water to within a few inches of the top. Mr. Talmage ascended the steps at the conclusion of the singing, and at once stepped into the baptistery. He wore a dark gown which enveloped most of his frame. Major Corwin stood on the steps leading to the platform; and, as the women advanced, took them by the hand and steadied them while they stepped into the tank. The congregation stood during the entire ceremony. The first candidate was a young woman tastefully and prettily dressed in white flannel, trimmed with white satin ribbon. She wore her hair closely braided to her head, and as she stepped into the tank she displayed a white satin slipper. Mr. Talmage stood facing the congregation, and the lady took her position in front of him with her side to the people. Then, taking hold of her dress at the back of her neck with one hand, and with his other hand on her back, he said: "In the presence of the Church on earth and in Heaven, and on the profession of your faith in Jesus Christ, I baptize you in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Amen." When he had repeated the words, he lifted the young woman from her feet, and, throwing her backward, placed her completely under water. She was patient and yielding up to the moment of immersion, but once under water she became flurried, and came to the surface in a way which led the congregation to believe that her immersion came a little sooner than she expected. Mr. Talmage lost no time in placing her upon her feet in the tank, and, having wiped the water from her face, handed her the handkerchief and placed her in charge of Major Corwin. This gentleman had a wrap in waiting, and, throwing it about her shoulders, conducted her to an anteroom temporarily arranged from the end of the hall-way on the right-hand side of the church. Immediately after the immersion, the organ played, the boy choir sang a baptismal hymn, and the music continued until the next candidate had entered the water. Twelve women and six men were baptized. Mr. Talmage varied slightly his language, but the ceremony was in substance the same. With the exception of the first, all the women wore black dresses. Candidate No. 13 was the first man. He wore a gown, but it did not hide from view a very tall starched collar. The proceeding in his case was the same as with the women; but, on leaving the tank, he walked to the opposite side of the church. No. 16 approached singing, and continued his vocalism after he had entered the water until the organ ceased playing. He did not join in the singing after leaving the tank. Mr. Talmage, after the last candidate had left the tank, still standing in the water, his head and shoulders only appearing above the platform, asked God to ratify in heaven what had been done on earth, and to help those who had been baptized to be faithful to the vows they had taken. From the same position he gave out the doxology; and, after it had been sung, he left the tank, having stood in the water for more than half an hour. —N.Y. Tribune, May 31.

THERE is no right faith in believing what is true, unless we believe it because it is true.—Archbishop Whately.

CASH RECEIPTS

OF THE (OLD) INDEX ASSOCIATION FROM JUNE 26 TO JULY 1.

Robert Heyneman, $6.00; Nelson Thwing, $3.00; Rev. L. Hamilton, $3.20; H. W. Wellington, $5.00; C. H. Langren, $3.20; Mrs. Fanny Palmer, $1.60; W. L. F. Smith, $2.00; F. E. Abbot, $6.40; Dr. A. H. Brockway, $5.20; Dr. D. S. Grandin, $1.50; D. B. Morton, $5.00; Eliz. G. May, $2.20; J. A. J. Wilcox, $3.20; Mrs. C. L. Ware, $3.20; Julia M. Baxter, $3.20; Cash, $1.00; Miss H. Ware, $1.65; Nathan J. Shattuck, $2.20; Mary E. York, $6.40; T. A. Hanson, $1.60; Cash, $1.40: Interest, $26.02.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	"	. . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51	"	. . .	6c. " "
" 52	"	. . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philauthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "International Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.

II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.

III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.

IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.

V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)

VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to address on the prepayment of 80 cents.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9) can be had on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; Volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF

THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass

A Brain and Nerve Food.

VITALIZED PHOSPHATES.

This differs from all other Tonics because it is composed of the Vital or Nerve giving Principles of the Ox Brain and Wheat Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 200,000 packages. It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease or overwork.

☞For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
666 Sixth Avenue, New York,
and 137 A Strand, London.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00. Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 551.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 3.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JULY 15, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

DO THOSE things which you judge to be beautiful, though in doing them you should be without renown. For the rabble is a bad judge of a good action. Despise therefore the reprehension of those whose praise you despise.—Pythagoras.

WHATEVER is beautiful is so merely by participation of the Supreme Beauty. All other beauty may increase, decay, change, or perish, but this is the same through all time. It is the splendor of the divine image, it is Deity itself. The end and aim of all things should be to attain to the First Good.—Plato.

IF thou workest at that which is before thee, following right reason seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee, but keeping thy divine part pure, as if thou shouldst be bound to give it back immediately; if thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to nature, and with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy. And there is no man who is able to prevent this.—Marcus Aurelius.

THE perfectly just man would be he who should love justice for its own sake, not for the honor or advantages that attend; who would be willing to pass for unjust while he practised the most exact justice; who would not suffer himself to be moved by disgrace or distress, but would continue steadfast in the love of justice, not because it is pleasant, but because it is right.—Plato.

THEY who know the truth are not equal to those who love it, and they who love it are not equal to those who find pleasure in the practice of it. He who attains to sincerity is he who chooses what is good, and firmly holds it fast.—Confucius.

EXAMPLE is more powerful than precept. People look at my six days in the week, to see what I mean on the seventh.—Cecil.

THEY wrong man greatly who say he is to be seduced by ease. Difficulty, abnegation, martyrdom, death, are the allurements that act on the heart of man. Kindle the inner genial life of him, and you have a flame that burns up all lower considerations.—Carlyle.

THE true use of a man's possessions is to help his work; and the best end of all his work is to show us what he is. The noblest workers of our world bequeath us nothing so great as the image of themselves. Their task, be it ever so glorious, is historical and transient: the majesty of their spirit is essential and eternal.—J. Martineau.

THOUGH I may be the feeblest and smallest of mortal men, my individuality is just as precious to me as nationality is to the largest nation, or humanity to mankind. This impenetrability and toughness of character is indispensable to all nobleness, to all sturdy manhood. It is the most masculine of virtues, the most feminine at the same time. It is fortitude of the flesh, chastity of the soul. But, while I keep the mastery of myself in my own hands, I must use the help of the great men and the little men by my side, and of humanity. I must touch everybody, not mingle and lose myself in any one. I must be helped and helpful, and not mastered and overcome. So I can be taught by all teachers, advised by all history, past and present, and yet keep my flag on its own staff, and never strike my colors to any man, however venerable, or any multitude, however great.—Theodore Parker.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AMONG the earliest records of Buddhism are certain edicts of King Asôka, 250 B.C., inscribed in rocks, in which he caused to be enumerated such teachings of Buddha as were to be regarded as authentic. These rock-inscriptions show that there was a sermon by Buddha on Falsehood, then in existence. Scholars, however, have not been able to find any trace of this sermon in India. But within the last year Professor Samuel Beal, author of A Catena of Buddhist Scriptures, has found the discourse in China in a Chinese translation, and has made an English version of it.

"THE substance of the doctrine" is getting to be a very convenient phrase for Orthodoxy, and is going to be used for covering a multitude of heretical sins. The Congregationalist, for instance, with regard to Professor Robertson Smith's assertion of the divine inspiration of Deuteronomy, in spite of his other assertion of its historical unauthenticity, says, "We have no doubt the substance of the doctrine is there," and, if it be, the decision of the Scotch Free Church Assembly in his favor is an issue "over which the most conservative portions of the Church may, some day, see reason to rejoice."

IT is pleasant to read in the Independent the following very fair notice of Mr. Weiss' posthumous book, The Immortal Life: "Those who wish to see how a theistic evolutionist, who rejects Christianity, keeps his hold on immortality, will do well to read this book. It is boldly and honestly written, shirking no fact, facing every argument, seeking to ground faith on a sure foundation. It is full of strong thought, often bursting into passionate eloquence; not without a sardonic tone sometimes, but yet truly reverent and humble and suggestive, as all honest thought will be."

A CLERK of Anthony Comstock is very critically sick in New York from "blood-poisoning," supposed to have been communicated through a box of some kind of offensive matter sent to Comstock's office. The presumption is that it was expected that Comstock would himself open the box, and that it was sent to him by some miscreant with whose infamous traffic he had interfered. Whatever blunders the agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice has committed,—and it is not to be denied that he has not always drawn the line between what he would deem unrighteousness of opinion and what public sentiment would justly deem criminality of action,—he is not to be put down nor his work stopped by any such dastardly attempts upon his life. Of all such means to silence him, there can be but one opinion among honorable men; namely, that they are as infamous as they are cowardly.

APPREHENSION is felt by many people for the future of religion, because of the new revision of the Bible, which is intended to take the place of the King James translation. In England, it is lamented that "the form in which 'the Lord's Prayer' is known of all men in England, and used in every church, will soon not be the form which passes current by authority." Whereupon, the London Athenæum says that "a greater calamity than such a change as rumor declares to be imminent it would be difficult at the present moment to imagine." When it is considered that this revised Bible is admitted to be a much more accurate rendering of the original than is the popular version, and that the original is regarded as a direct word from God, it is puzzling to simple and untheological minds to see where the "calamity" can come in. The real calamity is that people have been taught so to identify a certain form of words with a special message from heaven that it is feared their religious faith cannot bear the strain of now being told the truth about those words. It is a calamity when the safety of religion is thus made to depend on the perpetuation of a falsehood.

ONE of the veterans of American literary criticism has fallen,—George Ripley,—for the past generation the literary editor of the New York Tribune, and everywhere a recognized authority in his department. Mr. Ripley has been in failing health for the last few months, and died at the ripe age of seventy-eight, on the Fourth of July, at his home in New York city. Long as has been his career in connection with the Tribune, he had had before that began, another career, quite as distinguished, as a theological and social reformer. Beginning his public life as a Unitarian minister, he was one of the most thoroughly equipped scholars in the New England pulpit, and became one of the most prominent leaders in the Transcendental movement that agitated, and, we may add, saved New England Unitarianism forty years ago. Like Emerson, he withdrew from the pulpit, leaving it to others, especially to Parker, to carry on the contest there. He had set his heart on some practical realization in society of transcendental ideas; and the Brook Farm Community, of which he was the president and most active manager, was the result. Though short-lived, no experiment in socialism ever won a more honored place. Soon after its close, Mr. Ripley became connected with the Tribune, and began the other work, which has only ended with his life. In the mean time, too, he has been literary adviser of the Harpers' Publishing House, the projector and early editor of Harper's Magazine, and, in connection with Mr. C. A. Dana, editor of Appletons' American Cyclopedia. Earlier, he was one of the projectors and editors of The Dial, that classic of American radicalism in religion. As critic, he was just and thorough, but not caustic. He did not help to lift unworthy books into favor. To win his approval was a great thing for a young author: to be passed over in silence by him was a severe condemnation. As a man, he was thoroughly respected; as a friend, tenderly beloved.

Digitized by Google

ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

MAY 27 AND 28, 1880.

(Continued.)

FRIDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

THE Association reassembled at 3 o'clock P.M.

THE PRESIDENT.—It is my pleasant duty to introduce to you the essayist and first speaker of the afternoon, Mr. John H. Clifford, of North Andover, of whom some of us have heard much, and of whom, as may well be prophesied, we shall all be destined to hear more,—a man who, like Hans Sachs, left the shoemaker's bench, not to devote himself, like Hans Sachs, to mere poetry, but to a vocation which we also believe is a species of poetry,—the vocation of the teacher of religion,—who is essentially a poet, only that in place of merely expressing his ideals in words, the teacher of religion is called to express them in facts, in deeds, in life. Some of this poetry we expect to hear from Mr. Clifford, whom I have now the honor of introducing to you. The subject upon which he is expected and has been announced to speak, is "Liberal Principles as Opposed to Sectarianism in Education."

ESSAY BY REV. J. H. CLIFFORD.

The Stand-point.

In the search for truth, man arrives, sooner or later, at the perception that one spirit moves all seekers. Those profoundest words of the New Testament, "No man can come to me, except the Father draw him," suggest the secret of all spiritual attraction. In vain institutions for massing men in one aim, unless they work with a sense of this law. And this perception is strictly transcendental. Any large view of education must imply the transcendental principle. The idealist will never allow the pupil of science, the apostle of evolution, the votary of utilitarianism, in whatever refined sense, to expel from human thought, as a transient phase of philosophical development, that which is present in the mental processes of every thinker.

It is strange enough to see one whose whole life of religious teaching has been illuminated by its glow write the history of Transcendentalism, and finish with its epitaph. Like Socrates, it tells its friends, concerned about its funeral, "You may bury me—if you can catch me." Schools of materialism of every degree have died, and so must all their kind. But the transcendental principle is king of all philosophy, and the king never dies. It never was born. Like wisdom, it is a pure influence flowing from the Eternal, flooding human eyes that they may see. Science is not its dethroner, but its minister. Sects must submit to its universal dominion. Creeds must grow silent under its word. So long as your visible fact refers to some greater fact, not outwardly, but inwardly seen, so long will the transcendental principle endure.

It does not disprove this conviction that knowledge is relative, learning a task, science a progressive order of induction. Intuition is not explained away by confronting it with labors which it cannot perform. Over and above them all, it has perception of that which includes them all,—

> "A sense sublime
> Of something far more deeply interfused,
> Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
> And the round ocean, and the living air,
> And the blue sky, and in the mind of man."

Science, in the order of the world, reads the Eternal Name and Thought; but the light whereby it reads was never on the earth. Transcendentalism, if it is anything, is a higher science. It reads the meaning, not the bare expression, of the facts of the world. When John Stuart Mill declares that "our whole working power depends on knowing the laws of the world,—in other words, the properties of the things which we have to work with, and to work among, and to work upon,"—his vast generalization implies more than is ordinarily meant by "knowing," or else there is nothing inscrutable, and the whole philosophy of agnosticism refutes itself. What the mind sees as thing, it raises to the highest power as idea. Locke said, "There are millions of truths that men are not concerned to know." Let us say, then, that man is concerned not to know truths, but Truth.

Science, at its highest development, is transcendental. So is art. When Turner answered the critic who said, "I see nothing in nature like what you put into your pictures," with the sharp question, "Don't you wish you could?" what was that but insight rebuking dull sense, the eye that saw reality looking down the eyebrow raised at the name of it? Plato said, "God is truth, and light is his shadow." Some can see only the shadow, but there are also discerners of the substance.

Transcendentalism, then, however the name may be discarded, needs no reinstatement as a principle, because it is a principle; and principles last. It is known of those that seek it; and not less, under other conceptions, to such as think to avoid it.

Education.

Education must occupy this stand-point. It is more than any analysis of facts. It is more than any Baconian "Advancement of Learning." It is more than any modern science can compass. If Fichte rightly defines the end of the life of mankind on earth, "That in this life they may order all their relations with freedom, according to reason," then education is the sum of all means to this end. What but this, under the constrained forms of dogma, did Milton mean when he said, "The end of learning is to repair the ruins of our first parents, by regaining to know God aright, and out of that knowledge to love him, to be like him"? Each of these definitions rises to the full height of its author's conception of human existence. It is one thing to define education in its complete office, and quite another thing to define it in its lower functions. Thus, we may begin with Edward Everett, upon the lowest plane of learning, and say that a good education is to read and write well, and to master the first four rules of arithmetic; or we may begin with Milton upon the highest plane, when he says, "I call a complete and generous education that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war." And when education is defined so as to include all of science and art, thought and conduct, essential to man as a social being, all special definitions are thereby comprehended in one general conception.

To fit man for the supreme task of life is, then, to educate him. And, for this, education must respect, not only the race, but also the individual. Mind is unity of endless variety. Not to wipe out individuality, but to develop it in harmony with general laws, is the work of the teacher. He must recognize both the possibility of man and his limitations. An infinite sphere surrounds him, but a finite existence binds him. Education is the opening of the prison to faculties that are bound. It is not so much leading them out, as our strict etymology insists, as it is letting them out. The mind seeks its own paths. If the cosmos is "a becoming," so is the microcosm, man. The "chaos of the mind" falls into order, as man advances to perception of the world in which he lives and of its controlling laws.

The object of education commonly held up, some form of worldly "success," is demoralizing. The only worthy success is to change knowledge into character. The worst anarchies of the world to-day are those of thought and conscience, groping without a mental or a moral method. No science, no formal religion, gives a method. Does education fail without a text-book or a Bible? The best teacher of man is himself. In a world resplendent with Deity and with Divine Law, a world whose elements and seasons and populations "are but the varied God," man has a natural home and a natural school. The one thing needful is right use of himself. To know the functions of life, their places and proportions, and to fulfil them, is to realize all good. To establish existence upon its laws is to reach the highest aim. If knowledge bring not the wisdom for these results, it fails and vanishes away. An education of mere thrift in low utilities is not worthy of mankind. "Why," exclaims Schiller, "should man prosper in that which he has in common with the ant, while he fails in that which places him on a level with the gods?" The present conflict in practical life of material and spiritual puts our systems of education to the severest test. Will they stand it? It is but another form of the ancient struggle between optimism and pessimism. Education, to make man hope, to save him from despair, must refer to the purest spiritual standards. And these must be constantly and early impressed upon the learner. "If," says Goethe, "the world improves on the whole, yet youth must always begin anew, and go through the stages of culture from the beginning." Thus, we have every age of the world represented in the present age.

Mr. Emerson broadly divides the world of thinkers into materialists and idealists. But who are the great educators of man, if not the idealists of all ages? These are the minds that look down upon institutions, as from eternal heights, and see them, not as finalities, but as rudimentary organs, in the practical world, of ultimate principles.

Education must come with its opportunities, or with its compulsions, to all men. When the dream of Plato, that in the true Republic every one's child should be the child of every one else, becomes a moral reality, in the "federation of the world," we may look for an education founded on the principles which alone can lift man to his true sphere. As the old Hindu adored the river Ganges, saw it rising immediately from the feet of Brahma, and attributed to it all cleansing and healing powers, so the mind must see all knowledge as an emanation of the Divinity, to cleanse and refine man's earthly life. Man has risen, age by age, from the ground, to look into the heavens. "Gazing through long millenniums, upon the handwriting of God, and slowly spelling it out in the course of centuries," he is yet only in the primary school of his existence.

Relation to Nature.

And education must rest upon nature. It depends on man's interpretation of nature. Systems which divorce man from nature cannot educate him. His miseries come from conflict with nature. He has not yet learned her. To bring him to his natural state is a function of education. To return to nature is not to abandon society, for society is the product of nature. Why do men recoil from her, but because they have been estranged from her? How infinitely finer is her art than ours! Compared with her processes, how clumsy are our boasted mechanisms! How superfluous to rework her materials! Men think to perfect her perfections, to gild her gold and paint her lily. But what skill of man shall we compare with the secret force by which the seed germinates, the plant grows, the flower comes forth? Man's work is also nature's work. He is but an agent in the eternal commerce of matter and of mind. This does not belittle, but magnifies him. He is belittled by setting up as one greater than nature, to rule her. He is great only by serving. Let him learn that "nature is commanded by obeying her." The soul must be delivered from all non-natural modes. Man is no machine, depending for power upon priest or pedagogue. He, too, is a natural organism, self-acting, and self-directing, sustained by infinite powers. He may go whithersoever he will, so that he go not contrary to his own being.

Sectarian Limitations.

In judging sectarian influence upon human welfare, it is easy to do injustice to sects themselves, by not recognizing the conditions through which they exist. If "evolution" is the true philosophy of the world, and if that philosophy may be summed up as the perception that the world advances from one degree to another, and that, so far as concerns man, "each stage of progress is the outcome and result of the stage which immediately preceded it," and that "the whole series of stages represents a connected chain of sequences," then we can hardly deny the natural title whereby sects come into existence. Thus, Herbert Spencer finds that "a fundamental verity exists under all forms of religion. These various beliefs are parts of the constituted order of things, and not accidental, but necessary parts. They are elements in the great evolution, modes of manifestation of the infinite. This is their warrant." And Goethe observes that even false beliefs rest upon the conviction that the false is true. Even a sectarian conviction, then, however erroneous, must be respected to a certain extent.

But not beyond a just limit. Sects are commonly the after-growths of some great movement in human thought. But, even if the original movement were universal in its nature, the sects make it partial. And, if the beginning itself were partial, they make it narrower still. Thus genuine prophecy becomes petrified tradition. And what began in error becomes dangerous falsehood. A sect cannot be original, for that is to have an "original relation to nature," free from external derivation or authority. Sects, religious or other, are founded upon some special name or doctrine. If we speak universally, they cannot educate men. For knowledge is limitless, but the sect is itself a limit. Education demands a universe. The sect offers a formula and a foregone conclusion. Education lets conclusions take care of themselves. Human organization has no excuse, unless it exist to further man's advancement into all truth. But the sect inverts the true order. It does not serve, but demands to be served. No human institution shall thus reduce the general to service of the particular. Institutions that seek not to serve, but to be served, are a hinderance and a peril to man. Let the church that lives by this low motive give up pretensions to rule the human mind, and the claim of holding man's salvation in its hands. Let it learn of souls who speak for all, witnesses to man's primary and moral freedom in this world, whom no church, no sect, no age, was ever large enough to receive, who belong to all humanity, and to all time.

Digitized by Google

If sects come in the order of evolution, in that order they also depart. And it is the part of liberal minds to assist evolution by resisting whatever opposes human growth. Sects do not bear the root of man, but the root bears them, and when they have had their day they must cease to be. The same root will produce in their place some higher form of life. The free intelligence gladly accepts "the long result of time," of man's universal experience. It uses such of the aids of organized method as are not foredoomed hinderances. But man disappoints so far all schemes for general co-operation. Men co-operate, as a whole, not by agreement, but by antagonism, under the one power which no man can antagonize. It is thus that even the bad things work for good. But, when there is laid down a plan for universal action, men refuse to act, and the "gigantic phantom of collective power vanishes at the first attempt to put it into operation. The different apprehensions, the discordant passions, the jarring interests of men, will not permit that many should unite in one undertaking." And so there comes the incessant struggle between sects and opinions, the embodiments of partial aims, and free principles with universal aims.

Men may not altogether outgrow sects; but they must outgrow sectarianism, the spirit of sect that seeks to dominate the larger spirit of humanity. "Only that good profits which we can taste with all doors open, and which serves all men." Sects have sometimes been birthplaces and nurseries of character. But, however well cared for in infancy by the sect, the human mind requires a larger place in which to mature. The great man sweeps far beyond the range of his sect. Men are even greater than their own systems of thought. You cannot clothe Calvin in Calvinism, nor Edwards, nor Channing, nor Parker, in his ism. The sects prove this. Are they not always making new garments out of the whole cloth of human thought, to reclothe their masters? Do not the sects of Christendom so, even with their supreme master, Jesus Christ? Not much likeness to the ancient dogmatic Redeemer in the "perfect man" of "Liberal Christianity." But still the sect is a confinement. What Socrates said of men generally, that they "live in holes, and fancy that they are living in the highest parts of the earth," is most true of the sectarian, who will seldom come out of his hole to see how great the world is.

The liberal problem is, always, how to get the endless contrariety of social elements formed into a sane and practical unity, to make the jarring interests of men move peaceably together upon the highway of common welfare. That a portion of mankind unite upon some preferred opinions does not of necessity make a sect, in any bad sense. But the attempt to force their will upon the rest of the world does. The essence of sectarianism is the unsocial spirit which cuts people off from general aims, and severs men from mankind. It makes men "love their church more than their Christianity, their Christianity more than the truth, and themselves more than all."

The relation of sects to education within Christendom involves the entire history of the Christian religion, in its connection with the civil governments of the earth. From the very origin of Christianity, its adherents have claimed that "the saints" (Christians) should "rule the world." The attempts to make good this claim fill the annals of centuries. We are not called upon to trace here this line of history. But it runs quite down to the present moment, and leaves its mark upon American institutions to-day. Now when we speak of sectarianism, and mean the spirit and policies of Christian sects, it necessitates inquiry into the theory and aims of Christianity itself. Is it also a sect, and the mother of sects?

Christianity is eminently a "missionary faith." From the days of its first apostles until now, its work has been that of propagandism. It is founded, not on nature, nor on the soul, nor on knowledge, but upon dogma which teaches distrust of those powers and dependence upon a redeemer. And this foundation implies ignorance, and the necessity of perpetuating ignorance in order to make this dogma prevail. Is Christianity, then, fitted for the education of mankind? For education, it inculcates its own doctrines. All broader learning in its name shows where the mind has broken through its confines. From the first century until now, the churches have had schools, and have professed to educate the world. But Christianity and culture are natural foes. The culture which does not make for Christian "salvation," that religion must regard as "damnable." Its aim is not the real education of the world, but its conversion. The less education, the more conversion. Christianity does not make human development in this life the end of human effort here. Education does. Christianity looks for the grounds of its endeavor to another world. Education carries its warrant in itself. And yet with its object in a future world, Christianity has sought the empire of this world. In the words of a Unitarian divine, it "began with announcing a heavenly kingdom, and hastened to establish an earthly one." It still seeks to identify itself with civilization, which has long since outgrown it. It is still determined, as a faith at least, to possess the whole world. So far as education can be made subservient to its methods, it will educate. So far as science, true or false, can be made to support its doctrines, it will adopt science. So far as art accepts its protection and gives it renown, it is the patron of art. Literature it espouses, when it can fix its bounds. Beauty in all forms must serve its uses, or be under ban. Of a perfect human society on earth, it has no conception. It regards only the "church militant," in training here for the everlasting muster of the "church triumphant" above. A French scientific writer says that "the Christian system was invented in an epoch of ignorance, when man fancied himself in the centre of the universe, created God in his own image, and imagined that universal history was reduced to the proportions of an episode on an ant-hill." For "invented," say evolved, and is not this a strictly scientific judgment?

There is much endeavor just now, in certain quarters, to substitute for dogmatic Christianity a new ground for that faith in reverence for its founder as the spiritual and historical head of the race. And the great transcendental master of American literature is much quoted as giving countenance to this fresh change of base. But, against any later sayings of this teacher which may seem to contradict his former position, we may put, from his earlier utterances, as the verdict of the most thoughtful men to-day, the declaration that "by the irresistible maturing of the general mind the Christian traditions are losing their hold. The dogma of the mystic offices of Christ being dropped and [Jesus] standing on his genius as a moral teacher, it is impossible to maintain the old emphasis of his personality: and it recedes, as all persons must, before the sublimity of the moral laws." And, if the old emphasis cannot longer be maintained, is it likely that any new emphasis can take its place?

Sectarian Influence in American Education.

Christianity and its sects, entering with their peculiar methods into the affairs of many nations, have still great influence upon public instruction. Religious sectarianism is a phenomenon of the present age, which makes a most perceptible mark upon the world. The external forms of society are produced by the inward life of mankind, as the geologist says that the inequalities of the surface of the globe are caused by the action of heat within the earth, not without violent upheavals and depressions, the commotions which make new proportions. Above all others, America is the country whose social configuration is diversified by this internal strife of elements. Here sects and parties find their great field of conflict. The problem is to control all rival and turbulent factions by one general principle and authority. This is the task of the Republic. And in nothing is this task more difficult than in the direction of public education. From being held ideally, principles have to be brought down for practical application such as men can make of them. Education adapts itself to modes of government and of religion, and to private and local circumstances. In the republican order which now leads the world, it is reduced to definite modes of public administration. In America, this method of State education has its most typical character. Based primarily upon the necessity of intelligence to republican citizenship, and involving the correlative rights and duties of the individual and the collective man, the American system aims at the good of all. Of course, it can but imperfectly realize the ideal education. It can do little more than qualify the youth for the primary duties and privileges of citizenship. For the rest, education falls to private and voluntary care. And that they may serve the whole people, without unfair discrimination, the public schools must be free from all special religious teaching. But the demand for this impartial justice, which should satisfy all religious believers and non-believers, is made an occasion for bitter sectarian contention. Some aspects of this strife we must now consider.

Shall any form of religion be adopted into the public instruction by the State? Shall any sect modify that instruction by its peculiar tenets? Shall any sect ignore the public schools and neutralize their influence, to any degree, by exclusive training of its children in avowedly sectarian schools, in a sectarian form of religion, and with a sectarian attitude toward the country and its institutions? To this end, shall such a sect have its taxes for the support of the public schools remitted? Once more, can any sect or party, by resisting these tendencies, through organized action, secularize the public schools, hold all sects to their maintenance, and secure thoroughly liberal principles in American education? These are some of the questions just now in debate in this country. To these questions, I shall not undertake to give any categorical answers, but shall treat them from the broad ground of principles which I have chosen.

There can be no theological, no religious, no partisan discrimination in public education, consistently with common justice and welfare. The partisan, the sectarian, must learn the wisdom of the Stoic, that "that which is not good for the swarm is not good for the bee." If, as the Talmudic proverb says, "The world is saved by the breath of the school-children," they are the true saviors of society who lead the children where they can breathe the air of moral freedom. Can Christian sects, Catholic or Protestant, reform this nation? Can Satan cast out Satan? The name of God in the Constitution, that of Christ embodied in the laws, the Bible read in the public schools,—will these regenerate America? Or must she be born again out from these formal pieties into natural ones? Education is our seed-corn. If it is ground in the sectarian mills, wherewith shall we plant our fields? Let not the sects arrest the growth of our humanities. If Puritanism planted the school from the seed of the Church, republicanism fosters it.

> "When, driven by oppression's rod,
> Our fathers fled beyond the sea,
> Their care was first to honor God,
> And next to leave their children free.
> Above the forest's gloomy shade
> The altar and the school appeared:
> On that, the gifts of faith were laid;
> In this, their precious hopes were reared."

The hymn-maker did not dream that another generation would see that the best way to honor God is to make man free; and that the altar and the school, wedded in visible religious bands, would gradually, for the very sake of freedom, be divorced. Henceforth, Christianity and its sects must learn of humanity. The history of this change shall be a waymark to all coming generations.

But how shall present pressing circumstances be met? If the Protestant insists that the Bible shall be read in the public schools, he oppresses other citizens. If the Catholic withdraws his children from them, with priestly compulsion for contumacious parents, he menaces citizenship itself. But the Protestant will resign his unfair claim. And the Catholic already finds resistance to his arbitrary policy within his own household. If creeds and sects are incompatible with republican government, it is the worse for them. If the Catholic asks only to be "let alone," that is precisely what the South demanded, twenty years ago; and we have not forgotten what it cost to silence that demand. Let there be no secession from the duties and disciplines of citizenship. It is enough to have already a hundred empires within the empire of the Republic. Let us have no other, hostile to the rest, and to the Republic itself. Let the three million Sunday-school scholars in the United States suffice for the husbandry of the sects. The histories of the Sunday-school and the common school are singularly inverted. The Sunday-school began upon a practically secular basis. The common school began upon a virtually ecclesiastical basis. Now their positions are reversed. While Robert Raikes was planting the Sunday-school, Rousseau was demanding to have instruction transferred from the churches to the State, and Basedow and Pestalozzi were reducing to practice the ideas of the author of Emile, and developing the method of modern education. Thus, while Raikes was unconsciously laying the foundation of a powerful propaganda for the sects, the French philosopher and his disciples were delivering popular instruction from ecclesiastical bondage. How fatal any reaction from this emancipation! Let it rather be universally completed.

Digitized by Google

But let not any party of reform unwittingly oppose the unity which is sought in this work. Protestant, Catholic, Secularist, are these, in America, alone concerned in these matters? Where, then, is the State itself, the body politic, in all its civil and social capacities? Organized Secularism is as strictly a sect as any. The claim to represent a common interest does not make a party, as such, less partisan. Do not all parties, all sects, make that claim? Secularism, the spirit of the time and of the world, even in the most humane sense, undertaking to represent the grand principles of existence, attempts more than it can do. Some things we must secularize, adapt to the age. But, if we are to be secularized,—shut in to concrete things,—then we must give up ideas. No party founded on a negation, as a Secularist party must be, can lead a nation to comprehensive solution of many-sided problems. Partisan legislation to abrogate older partisanship is not what is wanted. Secularization—the bringing of civil matters under purely civil control, and the separation of all special religious forms from the functions of the State—is the desire of liberals in general. They differ only as to methods. But Secularism—the exclusion of religion, essentially regarded, as an implied element of all right human work, from any department of a nation's life—will injure man more than it will benefit him, though in the end it will be found to be impossible. To teach history, philosophy, or any great branch of study, without religious implications,—the moral and spiritual elements in thought and life—were to leave out the soul and keep only a body. Therefore, secularism, in its most definitive form, disappears in the necessary relations of mind. Instead, therefore, of looking to any party to settle the school question, the State must not know any party. It can only give an open field to all principles, and let them work themselves out through such methods as they may. The sun shining upon all, and no variable wind from this quarter or that, must make our prosperity, and "ripen justice in the common weal." Man cannot leap to his true social state. He climbs upon "altar-steps cut in rocks of ages." Those steps mean sacrifice as well as gain.

The Republic need not founder upon any partisan obstruction. She may steer clear of them all. With a fathomless element beneath her, fluent, yet coherent, like the ocean, she may find her way, by broad principles and methods, to a sublime destiny. We need not fear for her; for she carries a greater than Cæsar and his fortunes,—the freight of human welfare,—secure within the bulwarks of her great idea. If, like Shakspeare's sanctimonious pirate, who went to sea with the ten commandments, but scraped out that which forbids stealing, sectarians mutilate the charter of man's liberty in their own interest, still the great principles will vindicate themselves. And if, like the woman who stole the bishop's sermon, out of pure regard for religion, there are some who would steal the schools, or steal away from them, out of pure regard for education, and some who would steal the State, out of pure regard for free government, no fear but one thief will catch another, and the just law deal righteously with all.

Remove the Bible from the public schools, where it is and must be read, not as literature simply, but as dogma. This will satisfy liberals; and Protestants will yet agree to it, as some of them already demand it. Then let the Catholic send his children to those schools, or show that he educates them as well elsewhere. Let him pay the school-tax as the duty of the citizen to that which secures citizenship. And leave formal religious instruction to private or non-governmental agencies. Religion is essentially implicated in the whole of human learning and life. But, if Plato was right, it cannot be taught at all. If it is taught, it must be as form. As substance, it transcends form, and eludes all attempt to grasp it. As implicated in the life and conduct of human beings, it is developed by the whole process of existence. So, too, of morality, of which, at least, there is strenuous demand for formal teaching. Essential morality—granting that they are not one and the same—can no more be taught than essential religion. But it also is implicated in the whole of life, in the relations of men in families, schools, societies. And its practical cultivation through these relations is far more thorough and according to nature than any text-books of moral philosophy can give. Practical ethical culture is a constant result of human society. It begins for every individual at the cradle, and continues to the grave. All our teachings are but so much direct effort added to these natural and social means, and are good only as they are a part of them.

Warrant of the Public Schools.

Some years ago, Strauss, the religious radical and political tory, declared that "in America the air in the sphere of the leading classes was pestiferous with a rottenness such as in Europe was only to be met with in its most abandoned portions." This slanderous criticism was based upon a prejudiced view of our politics, which drew from obvious facts a most unfair inference. And some of our own citizens bring charges as grave and as calumnious against our public schools, which they declare to be not only "godless," but nurseries of immorality. And, if these imputations were not deniable, they would put us on the defensive as to man's capacity for self-government. But this country itself is to-day the answer to all such accusations.

It need not be denied that the popular regard for our public schools is somewhat of a superstition. Institutions are not ends but means. If the mind pause and rest in them, they are superstitions. The schools are not what they ought to be, what we hope they will be. They do not yet educate, however well they may instruct. Bacon prophesied a greater period of learning than any which had passed. And his prophecy has been abundantly fulfilled. But it is time to prophesy again, to announce an age of culture, which shall be as superior to all formal knowledge as knowledge is better than ignorance; a culture which means the development and refinement of man's "infinite faculties," for higher being as well as for nobler doing. At present, the ideal gives way to the "practical." But, when the rage for positive result has had its day, idealism will return again to a larger reception. Tuition is not education. So long as the school and the college rely upon the tutor, they cannot liberally educate. We still teach by prescription. When shall we teach by inspiration? Wordsworth thought that schools did no good. He complained that men were enlightened by superficial tuition more than they were restrained by moral culture. So it must be when mind is subject and method is supreme. "Soul is form, and doth the body make." Richter said that the infinite is "not reached by counting: we arrive there by wings, not by steps." From Richter's writings could be made a good hand-book for the nursery, and for the moral kindergarten, if we had one.

But the warrant of our schools is that, with all their defects, they aim to fit the young for life, such as it is in our age. If they are not organs of ideal aims, surely the age cannot condemn them for that. At once, they represent and raise the average of our attainment. And to represent America is no mean dignity; for America still means faith and opportunity for man. This moral foundation shall stand, when European Nihilisms are annihilated and ancient despotisms and papal authorities vanished forever. Popular education, which tyranny kills, thrives under free government. In Russia, the imperial power finds its strongest foe in the universities. Intelligence is the fierce light which beats upon the despot's throne, and shows it to be the relic of a barbarous time. What can the empire which comprises one-sixth of the globe do for its hundred million souls, representing a hundred nationalities, with forty tongues, if it cannot open for them the way, through political experience and universal education, to free junction with humanity in its advance? There were good judges who regarded the epitome of Russian education at the Philadelphia Exposition as superior to all rival displays. But what can the most clever instruction do for a nation founded, not upon the rights, but upon the wrongs of man? Nor can a mere Pan-Sclavic ambition lay the foundation of unity for this heterogeneous mass. No Greek Church can do it. Only free humanity can do it. And the only way to free humanity is to make man free. Neither can special excellence in science and art avail, where civilization is low, and persecution and proscription keep it low. Two hundred years of political history have not lifted Russia out of barbarism. Will two centuries more of the same kind do it? Ten years ago, she had scarcely a popular school. But three per cent. of her people could read. Charles XII., shooting down Peter's soldiers "like ducks," was a visitation of mercy, compared to the Romanoff absolutism. When we consider a case like this, what need to apologize for America's common schools, whose failures are better than barbarian successes?

Turn from Russia to Switzerland, and we find our nearest of kin, and in some things our example, in educational policy. There public education is in control of the separate cantons. Even in those which are Roman Catholic, comprising nearly one-half of the population, the schools are entirely distinct from the Church. America, with no greatly preponderant sect, should have little difficulty in administering this function impartially for all, and in the spirit of the most liberal ideas.

Sectarian Limits in Higher Education.

In higher education, carried on mainly by private and corporate means, sectarian limits follow from the fact that sects, or their members, found and foster most of the institutions designed for it. But what ground is there for interfering with this condition of things, so long as no attempt is hereby made to usurp the functions of the State? Still, the evil influence of sectarian academies, colleges, and seminaries, may be judged, if we consider their power to neutralize the broader tendencies of education, and to check the expansion of the common mind toward the largest learning and universal religious ideas. They also increase the strife of opinions, the hostile rivalry so unfriendly alike to culture and social unity. But these difficulties cannot be removed by law or force. We can only seek perfect impartiality in legislation, and rely upon the voluntary principle to which, for better or worse, America is committed to work out a higher result. Let liberal principles and sectarianism, like truth and error, grapple, and trust the better in the long run to prevail. What other can be done? The sect, like a larger individual, cannot escape from its own limitations, however it may desire or profess to serve all men.

Take a case which has recently caused much discussion. The Harvard Divinity School has lately appealed for endowment. The committee representing it lay great emphasis upon the claim that it is "the only prominent school in the country in which theology may be studied without sectarian bias or restriction"; that there theology "is studied as medicine and law, and the facts of Nature are studied in the schools devoted to them; that is, in the interest of truth only." Naturally enough, representatives of various sects have said that this claim is preposterous in the nature of the case, and likewise untrue in point of fact, since that school has always been virtually controlled by one sect, whose peculiar theology has there been taught. And, so far as concerns actual circumstances, these exceptions appear to be well taken. But, answers the School, if these things are so, it is because sectarianism itself has prevented a general use of our free opportunity, the sects not being ready to recognize a truly liberal school of theology. But there is an element of incongruity in the case, which perhaps the neutral spectator better than any interested party sees. However free from sectarianism in its purpose, the Harvard School has been compelled to a virtually sectarian position, by the utter impossibility that avowed sectarians should come to it without stultifying themselves.

But, if I admit that the Harvard School is unsectarian, I mean, of course, within nominally Christian limits. Beyond these, to the universal student, it is decidedly sectarian. It carries free inquiry and private judgment to their Protestant limit. Beyond that it cannot go, I think, without violating its charter. It is assuming something for the Committee to say that, "in the School of Divinity, the later and the earlier mottoes of the college, the Christo et Ecclesiae and the Veritas,* are harmoniously conjoined," simply because the first of these qualifies and antagonizes the second. In spirit, no doubt, this School is wholly free. It is the nearest approach in America, thus far, to a perfectly unsectarian school of theology. It is hampered by the ancient foundation of the college, and also by restrictions in its own special endowments. When it shall maintain a chair of universal theology or of the science of religion, without reducing these to Christian terms or dogmatizing in favor of one faith, then we may grant that it is absolutely unsectarian in principle and in practice. And, until they can found and equip a better school than that will then be, liberals may take pride in it, and wisely help it. One of the Harvard Alumni speaks of free inquiry at that school as a "policy." Deliberately chosen or not, "policy" is the right word. Policies are never thorough-going. Only principles are always so.

Digitized by Google

If theology is "Queen of the Sciences," it is because she rules impartially the entire realm of thought. Disuniting that sphere, she forfeits her sovereignty, and becomes but one of many pretenders to vassal thrones. No sect can teach theology as pure science, nor science at all, in its general relations, without perverting it in the interest of its creed, or else defaulting the creed. For what creed is there that science, at some point, will not refute? Who, for instance, could expect that at Andover a Professorship of Religion and Science would make science anything but nature's commentary and sign-manual upon Andover dogma?

Larger Views.

But, after all, "sectarian," in practice, is but a relative term. Suppose we had a non-Christian school of theology and religion, must it not still be sectarian to all the sects? Let us not then expect to establish anything absolute in education, not even in higher departments. An establishment is but something built firmly upon some idea. Above and below and all around it is the universe of ideas, which it can never comprehend. Let better and worse have free right to build as they can, to stand or fall, as they must. Sincerity gives a virtue to all human effort. It goes far to redeem even ignorance and bigotry. But let no one class of minds insist upon its mode for all. Below all our dissensions, and more potent for good than any special method, is the unconscious spirit, not to be fixed to any form, which works for human unity under the universal laws of being. In haste to produce a general harvest, men often sow mischief instead of benefit. It is easier to impoverish the world than to enrich it.

If theology cannot be universally taught, it is because it refers to infinite ideas. If religion cannot be essentially taught by any rule, it is because it embraces those ideas. Begin to define it, and you stammer. Say what you will of true or good or beautiful, and religion is all of that. It is the sum of spiritual powers, and of their source and end. It is the common ground under all feet. It is the air and light that surround the world. It is the heaven that arches over all. It is the thought and love and duty which constitute man's true existence. It is the infinite active in human energies. It is the moral necessity of the universe, demanding man's free devotion. It is that devotion leaping to its holy tasks. All this will be more or less perceived by all men, but most of all by those who look at it, not through the dim light of any tradition, but in the clear brightness whereby nature and truth are self-revealed.

The very laws of our nature and the needs of common life secure in man a moral brotherhood. Migration and commerce mingle races, and interweave the interests of nations, till they are no longer alien or strange. By subtle attractions, the grand principles are conveyed to all parts of the earth. For ages, commingling influences have been producing citizens of the moral world, friendly to all that is human. And nature means that their tribe shall increase. When man grows cosmopolitan, the world is one community. Ships, "like vast shuttles, run from shore to shore, and weave threads of civilization between continents." And so liberal thoughts and generous aims fly from mind to mind, from realm to realm, spreading justice, love, and faith among mankind. Not only in religion, but in everything, man will yet come out from sectarianism, to work for ideas. In politics, it will save us from the self-seeker and the party zealot; in reform, from the fanatic of method. The churches will learn how fatal it were to damn a man, the State how inhuman to hang him, what folly, in any case, to despair of the human soul. Education will learn to cure crime, not by torments and brutalities, but by wise social disciplines.

But some present tendencies cast a shadow upon this bright optimism, which yet cannot be eclipsed. If there is to be a "moral interregnum," the prophets of it do not indicate the real causes. It will not come because men neglect the forms of morality and of religion. It will not come because the churches are deserted. The preacher craving an audience, the disciple longing to see the kingdom come in crowds, may foretell it from those signs. But it will come, if it come at all, from the dearth of a true social spirit, from the want of perception of the significance of life, from the death of ideals, of spiritual emotions and endeavors, from the dropping of high aims, absorption in self, in material things, in low ambitions, without the glow of a religious aspiration or the impulse of a lofty self-devotion. No patent moral cement will hold men together for good action. Nothing can do it but the bond of a natural, free, and cultivated humanity.

Honesty in Teaching.

Above all do we want to-day an honest utterance on the part of moral and religious teachers. The two-fold method of esoteric and exoteric teaching,—one instruction for the initiated, and another for the multitude,—which may have been an innocent convenience among the ancient philosophers, becomes quite another thing when it is adopted as a mode of concealment for ulterior ends by the professed spiritual guides of men. Not only the Roman augurs, in the bad days of the Empire, but insincere oracles of every religion, have laughed in each other's faces while they imposed upon the confiding people who accepted their deliverances. The early Christians, no doubt with good purpose, though with bad effect, had their popular and their secret doctrines and modes of instruction. The subject for Christian discipline was first fed, upon the principle of Paul, and after the supposed example of Jesus himself, with milk,—or things which he could bear,—and gradually led up to a more substantial diet. But to what degrading uses has this method been put, as it is at present, by many professed teachers of mankind! Even some who are recognized as philosophers, of some degree,—men like Mr. Greg,* the English writer, and certain of our own thinkers of similar intellectual habit,—deliberately advocate duplicity for the sake of helping men in the inculcation of religious doctrines. Is there to be overcome anything more formidable than the conscious misleading of men by those who assume to lead them? They have more to answer for than any mere distrust of the human mind can excuse. Theodore Parker's arraignment of this thing was none too severe. In view of what may be seen almost everywhere, his words may be repeated to-day: "Alas for that man who consents to think one thing in his closet, and preach another in his pulpit! Over his study and over his pulpit might be writ 'Emptiness'; on his canonical robes, on his forehead and right hand, 'Deceit, Deceit.'" So be it said of the teacher, in whatever name or department of knowledge or of life he profess to instruct, who is not true to his best insight and belief, obedient to whatever heavenly or earthly vision of truth he is permitted to see. How can men be educated for larger views of life and duty, except they have things put before them undimmed by distrust of their faculties, unblurred by expediency or pretence? Who more curse man than mediators who separate him from truth? Conscious half-truth is a lie. And "the lie of an apostle," or of one whom men regard as an apostle of truth, "destroys a whole moral world."

Outlook.

Keeping to the ideal stand-point, we view the "untouched continent of Hope." We are concerned only with what is of permanent importance to man. The history of sectarianism cannot yet be written. But, when it shall be, it will fall into its subordinate place in the universal history of mankind. Mind is broken into diverse tendencies, whereof new unities are formed. The laws of disorder are overruled by the Law of Order. The laws of the world come to one result, in the individual and in the race. The "survival of the fittest" is at least a spiritual law. The untenable position must be given up. The impracticable ceases to be practised. The incredible cannot always be believed. Lines of thought and of action which deflect from nature and social reason must be abandoned. Names and sects and parties fall, because they do not rise with man, who never falls.

The sects of Christendom have contributed to the wealth of humanity. They have helped to produce saints whom mankind may well regard as generous compensation for their worst abominations. Such souls were worth producing, even at the cost of long agony. The sects, with all things, have ministered to man's needs. The fragrance of their charities outlasts the odor of their crimes, which exhales in the winds that blow us good instead. Whatever is broadly human is not sectarian. It is part of all humanity. Sectarian swords sever no bond that unites truth to itself. Science, art, poetry, religion,—where these come in, sectarianism goes out. When the sects are merged in these, as they will be, there will follow a unity of spirit whereof no Paul has ever dreamed. Religion is ever the true inspirer and the best exponent of humanity. No church can in the future, as in the past, assume eminent domain over the estate of man. Christianity relaxes its doctrinal hold upon the world. Its churches are now but self-assumed guardians of public moralities and worship, and refuges for the dependents of Authority. The dogmatic force of theology is suspended. The doctrinal side is under. The sentimental side is uppermost. Agencies called secular, but in fact religious, are more potent for directing social aims than those called religious, but which are in reality secular. More than in any other time, the special modes of life fall into the general stream of human tendency. The true student of life comes with no predetermined opinion. He comes as a free, unprejudiced, "God-like spectator, seeking that which is, not that which touches him." In vain shall a spent gospel ask for ears that would hear the oracles of existence. The highways and hedges and broad avenues of life furnish an education, a religion, a brotherhood, for which there is no formal substitute. Instead of looking to the churches to make a better humanity, we must look to humanity to make better churches.

And now that Christianity itself takes its place, for the best minds, as one among many religions, we may look for the gradual submergence of its special dogmas in the sea of Divine Ideas,

> "Which always find man young,
> And always keep him so."

In this new departure from dogmatic faith, the crude deism and the scornful rationalism, which in the last century were one loud denial, are superseded by a mature, synthetic science of the soul, which analyzes religions to recompose them into Religion. From Voltaire, the priest of the negative era, to Hugo, joining in old age the choir of the new Affirmation, singing the whelming of the partial in the universal, is a stage of spiritual growth which no other century can match. Between the Jesuit's latest clutch at the phantom of old Authority, and this gracious beckoning of man's benignest hope, lie the degrees of culture through which France and the world must yet pass.

But let man and all his institutions be open channels for the principles which seek free course through the world. By no narrowing of the lines of education, nor of work, nor of worship, let him cut himself off from the fulness of Divine Being. Let him move with the infinite tides which flood existence with the life of God. That completeness shall embrace all his broken endeavors. Everywhere he shall behold the reflex of his ideals. The social virtues shall build the temple of the soul, whose divinity shall gather to itself the sacred beauty of all household gods.

A LADY in Lowell, Mass., created quite a sensation among her friends, and caused some vexation to herself, on coming out of church Sunday morning, by opening her umbrella and showering herself and those near her with peanut-shells, which mischievous children had placed in it.

*As to the original significance of the first motto, the following statement from Josiah Quincy's History of Harvard University (1840: Vol. I., p. 48) is at least suggestive: "On the 27th of December, 1643, a college seal was adopted, having, as at present, three open books on the field of an heraldic shield, with the motto 'Veritas' inscribed. The books were probably intended to represent the Bible; and the motto to intimate that in the Scriptures alone important truth was to be sought and found, and not in words of man's devising." The same authority intimates that through the pressure of a more stringent evangelicism the first motto "was soon exchanged for 'In Christi gloriam'"; which in turn, "after many years," gave place to "Christo et Ecclesiae."

*See Enigmas of Life (J. R. Osgood & Co., 1873), VI., "De Profundis."

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 15, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in o her words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

PERSONAL NOTICE.

All personal communications for F. E. Abbot should be hereafter addressed to him at "Lake View Avenue, Cambridge, Mass."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The office of the Free Religious Association and INDEX has been removed to No. 3 Tremont Place (just in the rear of the Tremont House), where members and friends of the Association and patrons of the paper will find a pleasant room and cordial welcome. Mr. David H. Clark, besides being assistant editor of the INDEX, has been appointed General Agent of the Association, under the plan for which money has been raised in response to the circular issued last December, and will have charge of the office and of all business there. All communications pertaining to the business of the Association or of the INDEX should be addressed to "Free Religious Association, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass." Communications intended for the editor will reach him more directly, if addressed to him personally at New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y F.R.A.

WE want one thousand new subscribers right away. The summer weeks are not a good time for regular canvassing, but much might be done by our present subscribers, if each and all were to feel the obligation pressing upon them to extend the circulation of the Index. The very vacation season, with its travels and meetings with new people, may be favorable to their doing some work of this kind. Let them not risk the remorse that follows sins of omission by neglect of any such opportunities.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00

GENERAL DONATIONS TO F.R.A.

HENRY W. BROWN, Worcester	10.00
C. M. DENISON, New York City	5.00
MR. and MRS. EHRLITZ, New York City	2.00
MISS APPLETON, Roxbury, Mass.	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

ENTHUSIASM; IS IT OUT OF DATE?

It is getting to be quite the fashion to regard enthusiasm as a quality of mind to be repressed rather than encouraged, a weakness and effeminacy to be outgrown. A writer representing the circle where this growing fashion has its special seat of authority belittles, or attempts to belittle, the epoch of the anti-slavery struggle in this country by calling it "the sentimental period in our politics." To this class of writers, enthusiasm is only a sentiment; and sentiment they confound with sentimentality. They look askance at all activity of which moral enthusiasm is he primary impulse, and would oppose to it a cold, calculating philosophy of prudential utility. The philosophy of experience it is sometimes called. But is there any human experience, broad enough to be worthy of the name, which does not include, among its richest and most powerful elements, sentiments and impulses of the heart both moral and passional?

These sentiments and impulses, from which spring the enthusiasms of mankind, have led, it must be admitted, into many errors, and been a source of fierce tragic contentions and bitterness; and yet in them is the real impelling energy of civilization and of social welfare. They furnish the motive power by which all other human activities are to proceed and all other functions are to be vivified. That is but a mechanical philanthropy, and only at best a half-virtue, which has to consult precedents and consequences before it can move for human benefit, and never loses itself in a sublime unconsciousness of its own effort and of the service it will render. It is not, indeed, until integrity, generosity, honor, become the mind's instantaneous insight, and thence go by instinctive volition into human conduct, that we get their full effect in human benefit. From whatever primitive seed and by whatever process these moral principles have come into human cognition, they must act as immediate perceptions, in order to act most efficiently. They may previously have been the foresight of the understanding, peering into consequences, studying utility, learning slowly by the stern disciplines of experience; but not until the lesson has been so thoroughly learned that they have become intuitions, or, better yet, enthusiasms, asserting their authority without any conscious process of logical deliberation, do they find in man their ready servant, and do through him their best work for human society. The man who is thoroughly and most practically an honorable man does not have to stop at every personal emergency to debate with himself what honor requires: he acts, and the bystanders from his conduct get a higher definition of the word. So of every moral quality, as truthfulness, purity, honesty, benevolence: to impress society with their whole power, they must spring as it were spontaneously from a fresh and imperishable fountain in the individual mind.

What is wanted for our enthusiasms is not extinction nor repression, but balance, guidance, and direction. Heaven forbid that any genuine enthusiasms, mental or moral, belonging to the human race, should be lost! Ardor for truth and pursuit of it for its own sake, ambition for discovery, love of the right, admiration for the good, devotion to the beautiful, passion for an ideal, courage, persistency, heroism, self-forgetfulness,—these are elemental constituents of practical enthusiasm; and to take these qualities out of human nature is to take out the core of all great character and behavior, and to emasculate the race. If those whom we love, if our children, our friends, manifest any of these general characteristics of enthusiasm, or manifest them concentrated in some special direction, as for a particular art or study or occupation or philanthropy, let us rejoice and be exceeding glad; for herein are they insured against some of the worst perils of life. Given a genuine enthusiasm for any noble object, and it carries its possessor safely by the thickets where lurk a host of temptations that would entice the restless and unoccupied attention. It lifts the nature entirely above the region of the grosser vices into an atmosphere where mere animalism cannot live. And so it is a shield and shelter against manifold forms of evil.

Yet it must not be forgotten that enthusiasm brings temptations and liabilities to error peculiarly its own. Giving aim, direction, and motive power, it does not of itself give the goal nor the rational balance of self-control. It needs to be steadied and guided by other faculties.

And most prominent among these needed balances of enthusiasm and remedies for its excesses is knowledge. The errors and evils which have attended enthusiasm in previous ages of the world have sprung chiefly from ignorance and superstition. It has been associated with crude opinions, with irrational hopes, with fancies mistaken for realities, with mental arrogance and bigotry and intolerance. But better knowledge has been scattering the superstitions, clarifying the opinions, rationalizing the hopes, substituting facts for the fancies, and banishing the spirit of intolerance and bigotry. And, just in proportion as this work is done, is enthusiasm emancipated from its evil companionships and left free for its legitimate tasks. Is it too much to hope that by and by truth will attract the zeal and devotion which have heretofore, in religion, gone to the building up of sect and the propagation of theology? that even the great religions themselves, which have hitherto resisted and fought each other, will, under the influence of the discoveries which modern research is making in respect to the origin and growth of religious faith in various peoples, come to recognize their common ancestry and kinship, and join hands in a common consecration to larger truths than any of their provincial "revelations" have contained?

As another remedy against misplaced and misapplied enthusiasm, there is coming into human society, and especially into religious associations, a finer spirit of humanity. Christian missionaries to the devotees of other faiths are beginning to confess that theological indoctrination is mainly a failure; that the Christian hope of converting the adherents of other religions, so far as it has any validity, rests not so much on doctrinal conversion as on the slow processes of education and social improvement and the practice of the law of human kindness and brotherhood. The Christian Commission in our War of the Rebellion learned the same lesson. Organized for the special object of saving the souls of the soldiers, they had to adopt the older humanitarian methods of the Sanitary Commission, in order to reach the soldiers' hearts. Theologies everywhere, with their claims upon the consecrated zeal of men, are going to the rear. Philanthropy and humanity, with their claims for an equal zeal and consecration, are coming to the front. The members of the Howard Association, taking their lives in their hands, and going into the haunts of yellow fever, to nurse its victims back to health or smooth their path to the grave, showed a temper of consecrated devotion every whit as holy as that which ever drove an order of Catholic monks to their austere duties. And it is a most auspicious thing for the future progress and happiness of mankind thus to have zeal for humanity take the place of zeal for any special church or dogma. "Enthusiasm for humanity,"—by and by perhaps, by the law of the survival of the fittest, we shall have this left as the grandest and healthiest thing from all the ecclesiastical systems and theologies; and ample basis for a strong working society, the church of the future.

Digitized by Google

THE SADNESS OF UNBELIEF.

The New York correspondent of a newspaper, writing recently of Felix Adler's preaching, mentions "the extreme sadness which pervades Adler's so-called services, and the general air of discouragement which characterizes his public life," and seems to intimate that in the free-thought tendencies of Adler's belief is the cause of this peculiar sadness. Religious writers of all creeds are apt to speak of the gloom of unbelief, and of the cheerful tendency of their particular belief; and the majority of people, including free-thinkers themselves, let these influences and statements go as truth without question or cavil.

But a little thought will convince any candid mind that the sadness which accompanies free-thought is the sadness which accompanies deep thinking of any sort,—the sadness which is the lot of the thinker in any age, in any clime, of any faith. It is a melancholy resulting from the thinker's inability to reconcile the what is from the what ought to be. There is in all religious beliefs an attempt at comforting people with some hope more or less well defined; of some compensation in a future life for the mistakes, the miseries, and unsatisfactory meaning of the lives led upon earth. But no faith has yet been able wholly to satisfy the cravings of human nature for immunity from the many ills that assail us from the cradle to the grave. The Catholic Church, in teaching that happiness can only be purchased by unquestioning, unrepining obedience to the mandates of God (alias the Church), has come the nearest of any faith to giving contentment and cheerfulness to its votaries, by making it a supreme duty to banish all questioning in regard to the workings of the universe from the mind as a deadly sin. This is one grand secret of the power of the Catholic Church to-day. But no saint of any faith whatever was ever able, through that faith, to keep always upon the rapturous heights of ecstatic devotion. The grandest outbursts of devotional fervor have nearly always been preceded by plaints wrung from the depths of anguished despair over individual or humanity's woes. However, the human heart is too elastic to be bent forever in grief without any rebound, and so it finds in unreasoning faith a way of escape from what seems the inexorable necessity of the universe. Logic and reasoning are cast aside. The incubus of sorrow weighing so heavily upon all thinking human beings must be got rid of in some way, and religious faith is called to the rescue, and, in spite of reason,

> "Laughs at impossibilities,
> And cries, It shall be done!"

Those who doubt the truth of the statement that the most rapturous devotees have been also the saddest of men and women have not read very carefully the records of these gifted souls. The Psalmist David gives often as an interlude, between some of his triumphant songs of praise, the pathetic cries of his hours of anguish. "Save me, O God," he cries, "for the waters are come into my soul. I sink in deep mire where there is no standing. I am come into deep waters where the floods overflow me."

Thomas à Kempis, whose Imitation of Christ has for so many years cheered and strengthened the hearts of myriads of Christian souls, is not free from that sadness which comes from deep meditation from thought. He says, among many other things of like purport: "How can I bear this wretched life, unless thy grace and thy mercy sustain me? Hide not thy face from me, delay not to visit me; withdraw not thy consolation, lest my soul become as parched land before thee!" And again: "O Lord God, patience is very necessary, as I perceive; for there is much that goes contrary to us in this life. For, however much I may labor for peace, my life cannot be without sorrow and warfare." And so through all his devotional writing there runs this undertone of sorrow, which, though he is a devoted Christian, is as sad, although in a different way, as that which permeates the poem of "The Hindoo Sceptic." It is the same refrain which saddens the utterances of all thinking minds: —

> "'I think till I weary of thinking,'
> Said the sad-eyed Hindoo King,
> 'And I see but shadows around me,
> Illusion in everything!
> "'Can the finite the Infinite search?
> Did the blind discover the stars?
> Is the thought that I think a thought,
> Or a throb of the brain in its bars?'"

To the thinker, of any religion or of none, the evils that apparently cannot be helped or hindered in humanity must ever bring a sadness which is so far salutary that from this sadness spring all efforts to better man's condition,—a sadness which touches not only the hearts that suffer keenly from personal experience of these ills, but also the heart of any thinker who has eyes to see what the more helpless in the world are doomed to suffer; as in Edwin Arnold's beautiful poem, Siddârtha—the future Buddha—hears even in the plaintive strings of the instrument furnished to give him pleasure the voice of the great mass of the unpitied and unhelped,—that plaintive cry of sorrow which makes itself heard through all the music meant to stifle its moaning. It is the unspoken thought which makes all thinkers sad that is given voice to in the Light of Asia: —

> "Siddârtha turned
> Eyes gleaming with divine tears to the sky,
> Eyes lit with heavenly pity to the earth:
> From sky to earth he looked, from earth to sky,
> As if his spirit sought in lonely flight
> Some far-off vision, linking this and that > Lost - past — but searchable, but seen, but known.
> Then cried he, while his lifted countenance
> Glowed with the burning passion of a love
> Unspeakable, the ardor of a hope
> Boundless, insatiate, 'Oh! suffering world,
> Oh! known and unknown of my common flesh,
> Caught in the common net of death and woe,
> And life which binds to both! I see, I feel,
> The vainness of the agony of earth,
> The vainness of its joys, the mockery
> Of all its best, the anguish of its worst!'"

If "the belief of the unbelievers" is characterized by gravity and sadness, so also has been the early stages of all religions; for all religions are at first reformatory, and are the result of earnest thought on the part of those who inaugurate them. Christ himself is characterized by his followers as "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." No man who has the welfare of the race at heart, no one whose mind is disturbed with the unanswered questions which life forces upon the attention of all who pause to think at all, can be otherwise than tinged with melancholy and sadness. Only in active work for humanity and in earnest, thoughtful pursuit of the true answers to our questions as to "the whence, and the how, and the why," can this sadness be overcome; for it is the sadness of thought, and not of unbelief only. That is the lesson contained in The Light of Asia; that is the lesson taught by every true reformer's efforts and life. So it need not be considered as a slur thrown upon radical religion or free-thought that it induces sadness. It is among free-thinkers that we must look to find the thinkers who will work to make the world brighter and better than they have found it, because of the unutterable yearning possessing their souls to make the palpable wretchedness, ignorance, and sin of the world less by some work of their own. For their deepest thought is that of Buddha: —

> "'Yet there must be aid!
> For them and me and all, there must be help.
> Perchance the gods have need of help themselves,
> Being so feeble that, when sad lips cry,
> They cannot save! — I would not let one cry > Whom I could save!'"

S. A. U.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I recently passed a Sunday at Florence, and spoke from the desk of the Free Congregational Society. The society has never been in a more vigorous or promising condition than it is now. The intellectual and moral character of its members is a guarantee of its continued success and usefulness for years to come. The Sunday-school, in which, as the readers of the Index are aware, no dogmatic theology is taught, was largely attended; and the exercises were varied, interesting, and impressive. In the afternoon was given an entertainment in Cosmian Hall, which was opened with reading from Emerson by the accomplished teacher of the Sunday-school, who presided with rare dignity and grace, and included singing, declamations, dramatic pieces, etc. Several hundred were present, and the large audience appeared delighted with the entertainment, which was of a high order. Why can there not be hundreds of such societies as that at Florence in this country?

Last month I was in Canada, lecturing in various places. I had a new experience on the way there. A train on the New York Central, moving at the rate of thirty-two miles an hour, was wrecked at St. Johnsville, N.Y., several cars being thrown from the track and three badly demolished. A number of persons were hurt, but none killed. When, getting out of the car in which I had a seat, I first saw the wreck, it seemed probable a hundred or more were killed and wounded. It is the first serious accident that has occurred to a train on which I have been a passenger, although I have been travelling by rail almost constantly the past dozen years.

I gave lectures at Toronto, where freethought was first presented from the platform some six years ago, the opportunity being afforded by a debate between Rev. John Marples, Presbyterian, and myself. Reverend Messrs. Macdonald and Robb, the two most prominent Presbyterian ministers of the city, were on the committee of arrangement, and presided at the debate. Freethought had never had a public defence there, and Mr. Marples had impressed his ministerial brethren with the belief that he would achieve a brilliant victory for their common faith. The debate lasted four evenings. The clergy of the city were not satisfied with the result, for it awakened unexpected interest in liberal thought and led to the formation of a liberal society, under the auspices of which I delivered several courses of lectures. But Mr. Marples thought he had demolished "infidelity," and was surprised and indignant that his brothers in the ministry did not see and acknowledge it. He was well pleased with the published report of the debate, and sent for a hundred copies to circulate in Toronto and vicinity. But the synod forbade him either to circulate it, or to have any more debates with me or other "infidels." Being of an independent turn of mind, he disregarded the order, and in consequence lost his standing in the denomination, and, as he told me himself, was treated very shabbily by his ministerial brethren. He became sceptical, left the church, and adopted spiritualism. Two years ago, the treatment he had received from his former associates, and other causes, drove him to suicide. He was a man of many excellent qualities, and one of the most courteous and honorable opponents I ever met in debate.

Digitized by Google

The progress of liberalism greatly disturbs the clergy of Canada. In Toronto, a "ministerial association" has been formed, mainly to oppose free-thought. The Catholic clergy and the Protestant clergy seem equally zealous in their opposition to "infidelity." While I was in the city, Archbishop Lynch addressed a circular letter to the Catholic clergy, instructing them to see that their people neither read liberal books nor attend liberal lectures. Whoever does so, he says, "commits a grievous sin, the absolution of which we reserve for ourselves."

Since I left Canada, communications have appeared in the daily papers, one from a Catholic priest, declaring that anti-Christian lectures are in violation of the laws of Canada, since Christianity is a part of the law of the Dominion, and that men like Ingersoll and myself, as well as the proprietors of halls in which we speak, should be arrested and punished by the civil authorities. And this at a time when, as Froude says, "throughout Europe, throughout the world, the gravest subjects are freely discussed, and opposite sides may be taken without blame from society. Doctrines once fixed as a rock are now fluid as water." If lectures questioning the supernatural origin and character of Christianity can be suppressed in Canada, may not the circulation of books and periodicals of a liberal tenor also be prohibited? The lectures I give are not more antichristian than Spencer's Data of Ethics, Haeckel's History of Creation, Huxley's Lay Sermons, or Tyndall's Belfast Address; yet these and other similar works, as well as those of the old antichristian writers like Voltaire, Volney, and Paine, are now sold in Canada as they are in the United States.

At Medford, Ont., a beautiful village a hundred miles north of Toronto, delightfully situated on Georgian Bay, I addressed large audiences, and had a little opposition of a sort that led me to remark to one of the hot-headed fellows who mistook abuse for argument that, whatever his faith had done for his soul, it had done very little for his manners. I lectured one evening at Hamilton, under the auspices of an association recently formed in that city. It was the first freethought lecture ever given in Hamilton, and fairly attended. But few liberal lecturers have been in Canada, yet it offers a good field for agitation and discussion. Col. Ingersoll spoke in Toronto to a large audience a few weeks ago. All the efforts of the clergy to suppress doubt and disbelief and to prevent the growth of liberal thought must fail, although their position and influence in Canada enable them to carry out their schemes to some extent.

After I returned from Canada, I took a ride down Cape Cod, as far as East Dennis, where I passed a very pleasant Sunday with the people of that ancient town. The village is small, yet the lecture association for which I spoke numbers between seventy and eighty members, and the audiences that assemble to hear liberal thought presented are quite large. Mr. Frederic Hinckley was to be the next speaker to occupy the desk.

In a few weeks, I start West, going as far as Denver, Colorado, where I commence a course of lectures about August 1, and remain a month or more. I shall lecture at several places on the way, and am open to further engagements before I start.

B. F. U.

MAMMA: "Well, Johnny, I shall forgive you this time; and it's very pretty of you to write a letter to say you're sorry." Johnny: "Yes, ma. Don't tear it up, please." Mamma: "Why not?" Johnny: "Because it will do for the next time."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE doctrine of special providences or providential dispensations has been so abundantly ridiculed that the most conservative theologian advances it with caution. Survivals of the old idea continue to appear, nevertheless, in unexpected places. The Boston Journal, which cannot be suspected of any laxity as regards orthodoxy in theology, congratulates itself that no clergyman has ventured to refer to the recent steamboat collision on Long Island Sound as a dispensation of Providence, but in the same article is compelled to read a lecture to President McCosh of Princeton College for advancing this outgrown absurdity, with reference to the fatal epidemic at that college, spoken of in last week's Index. "Drain-pipes that led into a cesspool which was without outlet and never was cleaned; water that was saturated with sewage; and air that was poisoned with sewer gas,— these, in brief, were the causes of the epidemic." But Dr. McCosh, in his baccalaureate sermon, after mentioning the probable causes of the epidemic, and stating that effective steps had been taken to remove them, referred to the whole affair as "a dispensation sent to chasten and to humble us." "With all reverence," says the Journal, "we do not believe it was anything of the sort: it was bad plumbing, bad drainage, and a total disregard of common sanitary precautions. . . . The sense of accountability is not by any means so lively and pressing that we can afford to have it destroyed by this easy reference of all things to 'judgments' and 'dispensations' of the Deity. It should be kept steadfastly in mind, both as regards diseases and accidents, that the responsibility for whatever comes from preventable causes, whatever human negligence occasions, or human foresight might have averted, rests upon human shoulders, and is not to be ascribed to Providence." This is wholesome talk from a daily newspaper, and is a good illustration of the unconscious influence of scientific investigation upon theological dogmas.

IN a well-written article in the July Harper's on "American Colleges and German Universities," Mr. Richard T. Ely refers to "the discredit brought on higher education" by some of our Western institutions of learning as one cause of the alleged fact that the number of students in this country seeking a liberal education does not keep pace with the increase in population. We confess to a limited acquaintance only with Western colleges; but if the character of the instruction given in them is fairly represented by the report of a lecture on "Philosophy in America," by Professor Gabriel Campbell of the University of Minnesota, one might be pardoned for believing that, the smaller the number of students attending them, the better will be the educational acquirements of our future citizens. Professor Campbell is reported to have hinted at "the universal language of the future life," believing that "it will be music based upon some such principle as that governing the mathematical combinations of sound and color." The great mischief resulting from this kind of twaddle is that many persons feel obliged to receive it with respect, and even to regard it as scientific, because coming from one who is invested with the dignity of a university professor, and who, moreover, talksabout science in the same lecture. If he only explained to his listeners that this was a fantasy, an intellectual gimcrack, a ridiculous dream, or a low comedy suggestion, but little mischief would result, although in this case they might wonder that a college professor should deal in such vagaries; but when an attempt is made to palm it off as science, science suffers in the estimation of many excellent persons, who are misled into believing that scientific methods must be exceedingly mysterious, since no methods with which they are acquainted could possibly lead to such marvellous discoveries.

DO WE not need a new application of Professor Tyndall's once notorious "prayer gauge," applying it now not to the wards of a hospital, but to the proceedings of political conventions? A number of leading clergymen in New York city, in the latter part of May, issued the following "call": "In view of the fact that the nominating conventions of the political parties, in June next, will designate those citizens to whom the choice of the people for the Chief Magistrate of these United States for four years next ensuing will be restricted, the undersigned ask their brethren of all denominations to unite with them in making the Sabbath, the 30th of May, a special occasion for prayer to the Almighty God that he will vouchsafe to guide and direct these assemblies in the choice of men fit for the suffrages of the people." Among the signatures appended are those of Drs. Chapin and Bellows. Mr. Henry Ward Beecher read the call from his pulpit, and commented upon it, in part, as follows: "One thing is certain: both Conventions need praying for. While the prayers may do no good, they can do no harm. Praying for these men is perfectly safe. You will run no risk. We know so little of divine method in real exigencies, and prayer is offered at so little cost, that we might afford to pray, provided that we are not too much disappointed in the result." Cynical disbelief would have hard work to make a more characteristic statement. Most of the signers of the call preached sermons in defence of its propriety, and prayed as requested. And now that the Conventions have been held, we should like to ask some one of the estimable signers to furnish a candid statement of the probable effect of their prayers upon the selection of candidates, including in the estimate not only the effect of their own prayers, but of those made at the Conventions, from the dignified prayer of Mr. Wendte at Cincinnati to that of Mr. Ingalls at Chicago. From a reporter's point of view, the latter was certainly the most effective prayer. "The reverend gentleman," says a press report, "informed the Lord that the exalted and aristocratic preachers had declined to pray for the Convention, and when he added, 'Thou knowest, O Lord, that we come to Thee on our own hook,' the delegates actually applauded. A chorus of Amens greeted Mr. Ingalls' effort at stump oratory, and at its close the prayer was heartily cheered." But this is the only reference we have anywhere observed to the influence of prayer upon any one of the Conventions. Although we have read at least fifty different explanations of the results of the Conventions,— the reasons for the results being given by editors and politicians,— in no one of them was the practical effect of prayer taken into account. Was it of any account? or are we to conclude with Mr. Beecher, that it was only "safe," attended by "no risk," and did "no harm"?

R. C.

CAN it be true? I am told by an admirer of the monks of La Grande Chartreuse, who has just returned from a visit to them, that they are too indignant at the new laws in France against the religious orders to remain in the country. They talk of giving up their picturesque abode in the midst of the rugged mountains near Grenoble, with all the historical associations of nearly eight hundred years, and of coming to make their seductive and destructive liqueur in England. I am told they have secured their new home. At all events, there have been negotiations.—Correspondent Liverpool Mercury.

Digitized by Google

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

At the recent "National Conference of Charities" held in Cleveland, Mr. W. F. Spalding, Secretary of the Massachusetts Prison Commission, read a valuable paper on "Methods of Preventing Crime," of which the following is an abstract:—

The first idea advanced is that the prison should be the last resort in the treatment of criminals, for at the best a sentence to imprisonment often degrades and is always expensive. Therefore to keep out of prison those who can be restrained in any other way, and to keep in prison perpetually those who become persistent offenders, should be the aim of all changes in criminal law. Reference is made to the injustice of imposing upon those who are guilty of offences against morality, chastity, and decency the same penalties that are meted out to thieves, burglars, and other recognized enemies of society, and of treating occasional criminals just as those who make crime a profession are treated. The probation system of this State for petty offenders is commented upon and commended, and the fact that it is being extended is cited as a proof of its usefulness. The plan of binding out female convicts, who are supposed to have reformed, is said to have met with as much success in its year of trial as could have been expected; and from the change in the laws relative to drunkenness, providing for short sentences and light fines for first offences and long sentences for repetitions of conviction for the crime, it is said that good results are expected. Mr. Spalding remarks that much that can be done, much that is done, in the prisons for the reformation of convicts, is lost because of a failure to care for the reformed when they are discharged. He would therefore have an agency for their aid established and supported by the State, through which the man who has paid the legal penalty for his offence against the law may have that assistance, both moral and pecuniary, that will enable him to recommence life with some hope of success. He praises the work of the agency in this State, adding that the most careless observer can hardly fail to see that there should be such an agency wherever there is a prison of any importance. It will save to the taxpayer, wherever it exists, ten times its cost, if wisely administered. His paper closes with the following summarized points of a system of prevention of crime: 1. A careful inquiry into the cases of those who may be expected to reform without imprisonment, and their release upon probation, under the care of probation officers; 2. The release, under charge of probation officers, of the minor offenders, after a period of imprisonment sufficiently long, and so well used as to have effected reformation; 3. The binding-out of reformed female prisoners during a portion of their terms of sentence; 4. The imposition of long sentences for those addicted to such vices as drunkenness and offences against chastity, with provision for release upon tickets-of-leave when reformed; 5. Systematic, official aid for discharged convicts, including a temporary home for the women.

Philanthropists are very apt to ignore one very important fact associated with human development; namely, that the promulgation of no theological dogma, the inculcation of no moral precept, the preaching of no gospel, the organization of no philanthropic labor, has so great an effect upon the material and moral status of large communities as proceeds sometimes from apparently irrelevant or accidental circumstances. During the blockade of our Southern ports at the time of the civil war, the advance in the price of cotton made its cultivation enormously profitable in some of the East Indian provinces, and the resulting alteration in the condition of the people was remarkable. Mortgages which had existed for generations were paid off; tenants were changed into land-owners; and alterations of moral condition, which religion and government had striven in vain to effect, were brought about in an incredibly short space of time. The changes due to the invention of the printing-press, the steam-engine, the electric telegraph, and, to a lesser degree, the cotton-gin, the shoe-pegging machine, and many other mechanical inventions, have been frequently considered. Those connected with the introduction of the telephone are now in active progress. Others of even wider extent appear to be at hand from the successful application of electricity as a motor for railway trains. Almost simultaneously, Dr. Siemens at Berlin and Edison at Menlo Park appear to have built electric railways and established the certainty of their ultimate success. The Scientific American, which can rarely be accused of unnecessary enthusiasm, is full of hopeful prophecies regarding this new invention. The power, being generated by a stationary boiler and engine at a central station, will relieve all travellers by rail of any fear of danger from boiler explosions. The wish of a certain old lady passenger, that railroad companies would boil their water at home, seems to be in a fair way for fulfilment. The rails are utilized as conductors of the electricity. Economy is ensured by the increased efficiency of the stationary as compared with the locomotive engine, this increased efficiency compensating for the conversion of the power into electricity and its transmission from the generator to the engine. The new locomotive will be very light compared with the old one, comparatively inexpensive, and will require no fireman and no experienced engineer. The rails, also, may be lighter than those now in use. The wheels, moreover, can be given any desired traction on the rails, so that a light locomotive can pull heavy trains up a steep grade. The track, therefore, need not be nearly so level as at present, but can follow the grades of any ordinary road. For city use on elevated railroads, this invention seems to come forward at just the right time. The power that propels the cars can also light them, and the locomotives would no longer pour into the air sparks, cinders, and other offensive products of combustion. The Scientific American believes that electricity thus applied may soon supersede the use of horses on street cars, and even for general trucking purposes, the roadways being laid with innumerable flat rails for transmitting the power required. "The absence of noise, dust, friction, and the inevitable filth attending the use of horses, promises in the new dynamo-electric period a wonderful mitigation of the present evils of city life."

FROM OUR CANADA CORRESPONDENT.

The event of the week in Canada has been the French Canadian reunion at Quebec, to celebrate the festival of St. John the Baptist, their patron saint.

From near and from far, from the mills of New England, the backwoods of Minnesota and Maine, the fishing-grounds of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have flocked hundreds and thousands of French Canadians to the ancient and romantic capital, about which so many stirring historic associations linger.

The celebration began with a grand mass on the highest point of the Plains of Abraham, after which the vast concourse formed a procession and marched through the city. In the evening, a grand dinner was given, at which delegates and others to the number of five hundred sat down. The Governor-General, the Marquis of Lorne, greatly pleased his hearers by speaking in French, gently alluding to the desirability of those who had left Canada to dwell in the United States returning to their fatherland. The Marquis referred in terms of high praise to the share the Normans of old had in establishing the British nation.

The day following, a meeting was held at Laval University, when a series of eloquent addresses were delivered, among them one by Mr. Claudius Jeannett, professor of political economy in the Catholic University of Paris. This address created great enthusiasm; and at its conclusion, after the Parisian fashion, Mr. Jeannett was kissed by the Honorary President and the President of the Convention, Archbishop Taschereau and Judge Routhied.

All this demonstration goes to show the vitality and individuality of a noteworthy element of Canadian and American population. The first settlers in America from England were very different from those who sailed from France. Religious persecution exiled the one colony, while the missionary spirit impelled the other to brave the dangers of unknown rivers and streams, to endure the rugged climate, and to face wild beasts and still wilder men. Through all vicissitudes of political change, the French Canadians have remained ardent Catholics; and their clergy, generously treated by the British Government, look with no favorable eye upon the constant exodus of their people to the United States. There, cast into a vast caldron, they soon begin to take its flavor; and, like comers from other lands, they lose their former peculiarities, relax their devotion to the Church, and become as other American citizens are. This scarcely suits the priesthood, who enjoy privileges in Canada, which cease when they cross the line. For example, here, all Catholics engaged in agriculture must give one twenty-eighth the grain they raise to the Church, and the civil law can be employed to exact the payment. When a new church is built, the priest levies assessments on all the Catholic property surrounding it. These assessments take precedence over all other claims, so that a Protestant mortgagee sometimes loses seriously by a claim he had no means of foreseeing, and made for the purpose of propagating a faith he dissents from. Surely, in the Province of Quebec we have an Established Church, with very extraordinary wealth relative to the condition of the people at large, and with no less extraordinary privileges.

The French Canadian individuality is to be recognized in the Provincial Legislature, and in all legal proceedings. An immense mass of our law is of French origin, and all legislative business is transacted in French as well as English. The insistence of their individuality was very marked at the Quebec festivities. Banners and transparencies abounded, bearing the motto, "Our laws, our language, and our religion."

French-Canadian literature is worthy much more attention than it has yet received. It possesses many writers of originality and graceful style, who have treated the history and scenery of their country in attractive volumes little known beyond the province. Had Messrs. Chauveau, Garneau, and Frechette written in English instead of French, their fame would have extended far beyond Montreal and Quebec, and embraced the whole continent in its circle. Mr. Frechette recently had his poems crowned by the Academy of France, a high and well-deserved compliment.

The repatriation of French Canadians who have gone to the United States has been for some time an agitated topic in our local press, and aid in this direction is expected from the proceedings of the Quebec reunion,—expected without good ground, I cannot help thinking. Nothing but brighter prospects have made the French Canadians leave the old homes they love so well; and, as they are particularly fit for employment in manufactures, Canada with its limited home market cannot compete with the United States for their labor. In fact, the greater prosperity of the delegates from a distance over their home-keeping friends will, I fear, have a contrary effect from that looked for by the organizers of the celebration, and lead yet more than have already gone to try their fortunes in the Republic.

Montreal, June 26, 1880.

BOOK NOTICES.

Note.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the Free Religious Index, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

Delphic Days. By Denton J. Snider. St. Louis: Friedrich Roeslein.

This is a poem modestly seeking to win its way without prologue of any kind whatever. Its author, however, is widely and favorably known through his Shakspearian criticisms. Thoroughly versed in the language and literature of Greece, he has reproduced for us the genius of that people, upon whose soul was no burden of pain, that had not yet felt sin, that loved all fair things with frank enjoyment. "We shake hands across the centuries with those young-eyed, young-limbed, immortal children," half-inclined to regret that we have passed beyond that Hellenic ideal to struggle for a perfection that frets the flesh and fills the spirit with unrest. The Greek was nearer to a natural life than we: he was not cramped in his social cell by advancing civilization. In perfect health of mind and body, he carried within himself the measure of propriety. Beauty was his indefeasible domain. "To be really beautiful was to be an integral part of the world's symphony, to be developed fully in all parts, without an undue preference for the soul before the body or for the passions before the reason,—to maintain that rhythm and the measure and balance of those faculties which characterize man, nature's masterpiece." The spirit had not yet subordinated the body and cast it into the background. Aristophanes says, addressing the young men: "You shall spend your time in the gymnastic schools, sleek and blooming; you shall descend to the academy, and run races beneath the sacred olives with some modest compeer, crowned with white reeds, redolent of yew and careless ease, and of leaf-shedding white poplar, rejoicing in the season of spring, where the plane-tree whispers to the elm." Man is in harmony with nature, vital in every faculty, sensitive to all influences, satisfied with the conditions of temporal existence.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Snider's affinity with Hellenism is complete, deeper it would seem than could come of culture, however minute and severe. In a review of his poem, published in the April number of the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, and written by John Albee, who stands very high among American critics, it is said: "There is scarcely in Goethe or Landor a more natural affiliation with the antique than in Delphic Days. Study will go far toward this aptitude, this assumption of remote and ancient life; but also some genuine relationship and sympathy must give the color, the tone, the deep internal oneness, which alone can move the reader into the same realm." And we think it is Hegel who says that "Greece cannot be conceived from a central point, unless one brings as a key to the understanding of it an insight into the ideal forms of sculpture." This key Mr. Snider possesses. In Delphic Days, as in Greek art, the accord is perfect between the idea and the sensuous form. There is no aim at effect, no strong emphasis, nothing forced: gay and serene, the verse moves on, and you are pleased just as when you stop to pluck a wild rose or listen to the bubbling of a limpid stream. Nature is transfigured and glorified; the prose of life disappears like something accidental; released from the iron bonds of necessity, the soul rejoices in an atmosphere of freedom and beauty.

But, with the transparency of Hellenism, Mr. Snider combines, like Goethe, the subjectivity of the Romantic spirit. Goethe, it has been said, "holding science in his right hand as a lamp, fearlessly explored the world, and lived a Greek life in the nineteenth century."

> "Im Ganzen, Guten, Schönen, > Resolut zu leben,"

(To live with steady purpose in the Whole, the Good, the Beautiful) was his motto. In his artistic productions, he sought to unite the experience of the modern world with the breadth and repose of the antique. "Necessity," says Walter H. Pater, "is not, as of old, an image without us, but a magic web woven through and through us, like that magnetic system of which modern science speaks, penetrating us with a network, subtler than our subtlest nerves, yet bearing in it the central forces of the world." Must not art, then, so reflect life as to give the spirit what it needs in these bewildering toils,—a sense of freedom?

Mr. Snider has clothed his poem in a metrical form, the Greek elegiac, that subtly harmonizes with the thoughts and emotions expressed, distilling into verse as it were the perfume and colors, the lights and sounds of that "enchanted world," whose symbol he worships in the maiden Elpinike, whom he would fain bear away "over the breadth of the sea," to build her a home in his "land by the sunset." Now and then a sharper note is struck, that the music may beat out finally a profounder harmony.

The poem is divided into three books,—"Delphi," "In the Olives," and "Elpinike." The poet "glides into sleep" at Delphi to the "mild music of rain."

> "All my hopes, all my wandering thoughts, slip into the measure,
> Beaten by drops of the rain on the low roof overhead.
> Struggle has fled from the soul, and life is discordant no longer,
> The great universe glides into melodious hymns;
> So in slumber the deepest, softly I hear the low rainfall,
> And I sleep to its notes, wrapped in a garment of dreams."

We had marked many passages for quotation, but space is lacking, and removed from their setting they would lose half their beauty. The poetry of motion was never more felicitously wedded to language. Describing the flight of the raven,

> "Effort appears not, lost in the triumph and grace of his pinions."

But we are as little inclined to analyze the charm of Delphic Days as the poet is to question the beauty of Elpinike.

> "I desire not to seek for the deep-hidden reason of beauty,
> * * * * * * * * * *
> Simply I know thou art fair,—what of thee more would I know?"

"The Faith of Reason." A Series of Discourses on the Leading Topics of Religion. By John W. Chadwick. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1879.

Thinkers, there's a book for you. It is a long time since we sat down to such "a feast of reason and flow of soul" as this little volume of two hundred and fifty-four pages furnished, and longer, too, since we felt as though we had sipped of nectar, and, with the author, had broken of the bread from heaven. In this book, we have another testimony of the power of the American Unitarian pulpit, and of the intellectual appreciation of American congregations. The Rev. J. W. Chadwick is well known in the States for the lyrical productions of his pen; and among many Orthodox, Liberal, and Radical preachers of distinction in New York, he has qualities of intellect and heart which give him a place of honor among the greatest of them. It isn't every preacher's sermons that will bear printing week by week, or,—for there are those who act upon the gentlest request of their congregation to print,—better test still, that will demand a sale when they are printed. But these sermons have qualities which must rescue them from the mass of ephemeral literature. Made up of a compact body of thought, winged with devotion and poetry, tuned to the music of the spheres, and the still not sad but glad music of humanity, cast in an æsthetic mould, they are worthy of the pulpit in its best days.

Not only the discourses which fill this volume, but others which we have read, are honest, reverent, probing inquiries regarding not the Orthodoxies living, dying, or dead, of to-day, not the Liberalisms broad, narrow, or hard, but the great, deep, permanent questions underlying all religions and philosophies and the practical affairs of to-day's life and thought. And this, with a wealth of illustration, a firm grasp of principles, a masterly arrangement of material, and a glow of genius which make the reader feel the presence of a powerful personality. The author seems as familiar with the writings of Darwin, Spencer, Lubbock, and the great generalizations of modern science, as the ordinary preacher is with his Prayer Book and Creeds. This knowledge of nineteenth century thought has not only to do with Mr. Chadwick's success: it has to do with his method, and gives him the basis for his system of religious thought. Would that we could print in letters of gold, light, or any other device which would draw the attention of theological colleges, to the following weighty words of Mr. R. D. Darbishire: . . . "It does appear to me that some, at least, of the specializations of study which characterize our age, might advantageously yield a little time, and give place for new lines of thought and other education. For example, a systematic course on the profounder generalizations of physical science would furnish a training and a culture of the greatest importance as an addition to an exclusively literary course."

Another departure is being taken quietly and with great hope, in what we may term Unitarian theology. So quietly is the process going on that few people seem to be aware of it. It wants the attraction which a little newspaper or ministers' meeting persecution would undoubtedly give it. If it be true that war teaches the people geography, so is it true that persecution lets the world know who its thinkers are. However, failing this method of publicity, the nature of this new departure and its result may be accurately known by reading copies of the Boston Index, the sermons of the Rev. O. B. Frothingham, and his work entitled The Religion of Humanity, the Rev. J. M. Savage's Religion of Evolution, Dr. Fiske's Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, and the volume which suggests these lines of review.

This new departure sets religion fairly and squarely on the doctrine of evolution for its basis; and Mr. Chadwick finds in Utilitarianism a sound theory of morals. Revelation, authority, miracle, intuition, are cast aside, discredited and futile: nature, discovered law, history, and reason furnish the only basis of the new faith. That last and richest generalization of modern science, evolution, without claiming for it either the force of demonstrated truth, or interpreting or defining it in any dogmatic, precise sense, is the key to unlock the door of mystery everywhere,—from the growth of a solar system to the development of the simplest social institution or religious rite or belief. Growth, arrested development, organism, conflict with environment, survival of the fittest, heredity, and habit are words which suggest the meaning of the new doctrine. It gives significance and value to the earliest thought and rite of the undeveloped man: these it connects, vitally and causatively, with the latest and richest, and with all between,—one unbroken chain. One arm points backward, beyond record and investigation, to the beginning, shrouded in mystery; the other, forward and upward, to the end, cunningly hid too. Beginning, between, and end, held in the mighty leash of law; all things, all animals, moving upward, sometimes to the sad music of a Miserere, often, too, accompanied by the strains of paeans.

This new way of looking at phenomena does not call for the writing of the epitaph of any of the great theories of religion: it is a deeper and more suggestive way of having visions of the eternal. The religion of evolution is theistic through and through, although the new idea does suggest a different mental attitude towards God, the future, etc. The lips are often closed, God's name is spoken with 'bated breath, the thought of time is confessed to be inadequate and deformed, there is no inclination to define him, to babble about his nature, attributes, ways. Were the Infinite no greater than man's best thought of him, it is affirmed the intelligent would turn atheist, as some have done. On the other hand, the feeling for him and after him is more earnest and intense than ever. The inadequacy of language and power to fathom this immensity is an inadequacy which comes of faith, not infidelity. The more law, the more the conviction of God, the more faith in a stream of tendency, a power not ourselves making for righteousness; the force behind nature is the more powerfully borne in upon the mind as the supreme power, will, intelligence, the source of goodness, beauty, truth. Often is more real faith, simple and intense, found in the heart of the silent thinker than in the man who proves Deity from Scriptures, nature, and the soul, without a thought of difficulty or a motion of modest humility arising from the limits of the human and the absoluteness of the Divine.

The new faith emphasizes the capacity of human nature: the past helps it, the future calls it to expand into richer intellectual life and possessions, intenser conscientiousness, and juster doing. The social organism is the environment, conflict with which produces individual sympathy and the sense of right. The stream of tendency, in virtue of which all things fulfil the end of their being, makes moral expansion and progress perpetual; while the active force of heredity preserves for all time the influence of the best lives by organizing it in blood, nerve, and fibre of the individual, and in the social organism itself. Altruism, in which is the highest moral power, is encouraged by that test of right so much ridiculed, so little understood,—the highest good of the greatest number.

The new faith leaves for the soul, too, its life in God, the very essence of prayer. Prayer is no longer petition either for physical or spiritual things. Absolute faith in the divine order and wisdom destroys petition. The heart's desire for good, the look through "the soul's east window of divine surprise," bringing the gift of awe, reverence, entire trust to the altar, kindling the soul's highest sentiments at the shrine of adoration, realizing the bond of brotherhood with man and kinship with all things, letting the soul rest on the spirit of a loving submissiveness and trust in the eternal life and truth and power,—this is the evolutionist's view of prayer: enough to stay the life and lift it to higher levels.

Immortality has its place in the new faith. Consciousness, personality, is the lasting, deepest witness of it. Matter kindling into thought, conscious of itself, reading the alphabet of universal law and conforming to it, struggling with destiny, creeping towards the light,—matter become soul, with its persistency, its continuous, identical personality amid changes from babyhood to old age, greater than the change of death itself,—gives reasonable ground for the idea of immortality. Build on that, and pitch the life high, consecrate it to the noblest end, charge it with the fairest forces of thought and affection, and then feel how the hope grows stronger than conviction. Yet mystery hangs about the future, and well that it is so. This adds richness to life, and leaves man with the great hope, a sure and certain hope to many, a great and powerful one to some. Thus the great themes of religion are not destroyed: a new basis is found for them, a new intellectual atmosphere is created, in which the old beliefs must necessarily change. Religion itself, far from being destroyed, receives a new and universal interpretation. Religion remains the great fact of the past and the present, the supreme interest of man. Religions are relegated to their periods and circumstances which gave them birth. To speak of their absolute truth is to raise a useless and idle question. To estimate their relative value, and show how they fit in with differing human needs and stages of intellectual development, is the wise and practical work of the historian and thinker. Religious systems represent men's thoughts. Religion represents man's relation to the universe,—its life, law, forces. "To be impressed with its majestic order, to think with recognition of the tender grace and awful sweep of things, and to convert this passive recognition into a voluntary energy of devotion to the eternal order in which we find ourselves embosomed,"—that is religion. Go, meditate upon that thought, feel its sweep, width, height, meaning, and say if evolution kills religion.

Digitized by Google

It is not to be expected that this new departure will gratify or satisfy all so-called liberal thinkers. For many, it will be too baldly, entirely intellectual, without the glow, unction, and authority which seem to be born of the influence of great personalities. It will be said that the common people are not likely to hear this gospel gladly, as if the common people are in any sense competent judges of important religious issues. Some things will be missed, without which the bulk of religious people will find it for a while impossible to get on. Notwithstanding all this, such a conservative Unitarian as Dr. Bellows writes as follows of the movement, in review of Mr. Chadwick's book: "We have strong suspicions that, filled out, better ballasted, and more completely 'evolved,' the main views of the new school will command an increasing attention and respect, and will be the direction taken in the future of the liberal church."—Unitarian Herald (England).

FOREIGN.

A PARIS despatch to the London Times of June 21st says: "The election of M. Trinquet, the Communist, as municipal Councillor for the Père-la-Chaise Quarter, will be annulled even after the passage of the amnesty, as amnesty will not be retrospective. A fresh election will be necessary, and then M. Trinquet will be eligible for election." The Chamber of Deputies has passed the religious estimates by a vote of 390 to 66, the Extreme Left joining the majority.

ON the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the independence of Belgium, in September next, the Educational League will hold in Brussels an international teachers' congress. Many prominent teachers and professors have promised to take part in it. One of the most interesting features of this congress will be the international competition in the production of the best and cheapest educational objects for the use of primary schools, such as a collection of instruments illustrating the laws of physics and mechanics, a collection of surveying instruments, a portable chemical laboratory, a globe and projecting maps, historical tablets, and a book descriptive of the physical, mechanical, and chemical experiments performed with the simplest and cheapest instruments and materials, even with such as are to be found in every house. All objects for the competition are to be sent to the Educational Exhibition, Brussels.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT, M.P., presided at the annual public debate of the University College (London) Debating Society recently, the subject being the abolition of capital punishment. Mr. Bright said the infliction seemed to him a policy as unchristian as it was unphilosophical, which, so far as he could judge of the experience of other countries, had failed, so far and so long as it had been persisted in. It seemed to him that there could be no plan less opposed to teaching men the sacredness of human life than that of the ordinary and frequent sacrifice of human life to the law. He was glad they had resolved to discuss this subject, so that hereafter they might swell the public opinion which would compel Parliament at last to bring our practice up to our principles, and to the practice of some dozen other civilized nations. If human life was sufficiently guarded in many of the American States, in Italy, Portugal, and for the most part in Germany, surely there were no conditions in this country to make it impossible that we should adopt a milder system, and yet feel ourselves equally secure. In the conclusion of his speech, the right honorable gentleman made an eloquent reference to the case of Habron, the Penge case, and that of Edmund Galley, declaring that many innocent persons had been hung. He urged his hearers to give their attention to great public questions such as these, and said he would rather have a man whose heart was right on this subject than a man whose head was stuffed with Latin and Greek quotations. He believed the system was doomed, and he hoped that he might live to see its abolition. A vote in favor of the abolition of the death punishment, and of thanks to the bishop for presiding, were carried unanimously.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES was so well pleased with his visit to this country a few years since that he is to come again in August.

AN edition of John Stuart Mill's works has lately been issued in Leipzig. Mill has long been very popular in Russia, and all his works were translated into that language years ago; but the Germans are only now making his acquaintance.

MISS ALICE M. BENNETT, M.D., has received from the University of Pennsylvania the degree of doctor of philosophy. She is the first woman who has been honored with a degree of that institution. Miss Bennett has been elected female physician of the new hospital for the insane in Pennsylvania, and is the first woman who has been assigned to a duty of the kind. She has been a professor in the Philadelphia Medical College for about five years.

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON, the well-known philanthropist, who has been much interested for some years past in plans for colonizing the surplus population of our great cities in the West, is persuaded that a more inviting field for such emigration is presented in the "unoccupied lands that lie in abundance near well-favored settlements at the very doors of large and thriving cities." The objections urged against settlement in the South and West are the "great scarcity of water, long droughts, high winds, grasshoppers, etc." Mrs. Thompson instances Garden City and Vineland, N.J., as examples of the opportunities nearer home.

MR. ROWLAND CONNOR has recently published, in the New York Tribune, an elaborate argument in behalf of the reform of state legislatures, which has called forth considerable comment. There can be no doubt that our state and national legislatures need reconstruction in some important particulars. They are largely but the tentative systems of the political administration of a new country, and consequently cumbersome, ineffective in their operations, and ill adapted to the changed conditions, enlarged experience, and enlightenment of the present. It is not to be supposed that those who read Mr. Connor's fresh and earnest paper will accept all of his conclusions; but, if it serves to awaken more thought upon the subject, it may be presumed he will be satisfied.

AN appreciative audience gathered at the residence of Mrs. John Webster, Boylston Street, Boston, a short time since, to listen to another reading by Miss Selma Borg of the first Kalevala song, "Creation." This, the first rendering in English verse of the old Finnish rune song, held by scholars to be the most ancient myth in existence, has attracted much attention alike by its entire novelty and by the poetic charm of its graceful versification. It has been heard with warm expressions of interest and delight by Dr. Holmes, Dr. Hedge, Professor Longfellow, and many others, whose studies have made them familiar with the mythical lore of all nations. The completion of the translation of these folk-songs, which were sought out and transcribed with so much labor and care, would be a notable addition to literature for this patriotic daughter of Finland.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

THE METHODIST ministers of Boston recently passed the following resolution at their Monday meeting:—

Resolved*, That we protest against the action of the city council of Boston whereby band concerts are furnished by them for Sunday evening performances on Boston Common, South Boston Point, and elsewhere, as injurious to public morals and promotive of Sabbath desecration.

THE IRISH PILGRIMAGE.—After an absence of a little over six weeks, Mr. William Power of this town has returned home from a pilgrimage to the shrine of Knock, in Ireland. Mr. Power reports many marvellous cures effected in that now celebrated chapel, and among them many afflicted visitors from the United States. His own daughter, whom he brought to the shrine, is much restored in health. He states that the crowds daily assembling there are very great. It was estimated that there were at least sixty thousand people present on the exterior of that little country church edifice on May 25.—Woonsocket (R.I.) Patriot.

A PRIESTLY correspondent of a paper in Toronto, Canada, thus attempts to silence free thought as blasphemy: "Sir,—Blasphemy, as cognizable by the law of England, is described by Blackstone to be 'denying the being or providence of God, contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Jesus Christ, profane scoffing at the holy Scripture, or exposing it to contempt or ridicule.' 'The Christian religion is received as a part of the common law in the United States as well as in England, and to revile it or its author is deemed to be blasphemy, and an indictable offence.'—Burrill. Theologically speaking, blasphemy is essentially evil, —malum in se,—always evil and cannot be otherwise than evil. Its punishment by the Jewish law was death. In Catholic countries, it was punished by the civil power as a crime. In Canada, blasphemy is a crime as much as it is in England or the United States: consequently, American citizens coming into Canada to speak or lecture against God are committing a crime against the laws of their own country as well as against the laws of Canada, and should be dealt with as criminals. This is clear. It is also clear that no man or company or corporation can rightly or legally rent a hall or room to any one to enable him to commit the crime of blasphemy. Our Canadian courts have decided this question. And, as no man would speak against God, unless he had an audience, those who form an audience for such blasphemers are guilty participators in their crime. Newspapers also become aiders and abettors of those criminals by advertising or reporting their lectures. It is no palliation of the offence to say we publish their lectures, but we refute them afterwards. You have no right to help to commit a crime, and then try to undo the evil effect of it afterwards. It is not always in your power to do so. Lecturers against God—scoffers and ridiculers of the sacred Scriptures—have no right to complain of persecutions and bigotry and intolerance on the part of Christians, simply because the latter refuse to aid and assist them in carrying on their criminal work. If you refuse to lend the use of your paper to call together an audience, or if you refuse to give the use of your hall or house to hold an audience for what you consider criminal purposes, and which are criminal according to the laws of the land, what right has the blasphemer to complain? Bigotry! intolerance! persecution! How? Because you will not place your property at the disposal of a criminal, to help him to commit his crime? Singular persecution, indeed! Seeing that blasphemy is a crime against God and against the laws of the land, the very utmost the blasphemer can claim is to be let alone,—thus on his own grounds. He has no right to our property to help him. He has no right to our press. He has no right to our money. He has no right to our time. Let him carry on his war against God without any help from us. This is not persecution, but common-sense."

CASH RECEIPTS

OF THE (OLD) INDEX ASSOCIATION FROM JULY 1 TO JULY 10.

Ellen M. Wright, $3; H. T. Hedges, $1.85; T. B. Skinner, 25 cents; J. H. Mason, $3; W. C. Mundy, $4; Preston Day, $1.20; W. A. Leonard, $3.60; James Shearer, $3.20; E. F. Green, $1; Cash, $3.20; S. T. Chesebro, $1.50; A. W. Thompson, $3; E. W. Hopkins, $3.20; D. A. Butler, $1; M. T. Janes, $3; Rev. E. P. Gibbs, $3; John Curtis, $9; J. C. Kearns, $1.50; M. F. Whitehead, $3; J. F. Ruggles, $1.50; H. B. Clarke, 10 cents; Edw. B. Babcock, $3.20; F. M. Ehrlicher, $2; Geo. Lewis, $1; Geo. N. Fletcher, $5; E. Countryman, $3; David Newport, $3; Prof. Adler, $3; Andrew S. Waitt, $3; Rev. Photius Fisk, $3; Jonas Smith, $5.60.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c.	per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c.	" "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c.	" "
" 52	" . . .	5c.	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.

II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by Joseph Henry.

III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.

IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.

V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)

VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times. by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9) can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass

A Brain and Nerve Food.

VITALIZED PHOSPHATES.

This differs from all other Tonics because it is composed of the Vital or Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox Brain and Wheat Germ.

Physicians have found it so necessary that they alone have prescribed 200,000 packages. It restores lost energy in all weaknesses of mind or body; relieves debility or nervousness; gives vitality to the insufficient growth of children; strengthens the digestion; cures neuralgia and prevents consumption. It restores to the brain and nerves the elements that have been carried off by disease or overwork.

☞For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.00.

F. CROSBY,
666 Sixth Avenue, New York,
and 137 A Strand, London.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00. Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 552.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 4.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JULY 22, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

LET no man deceive another; let none be harsh to any; let none wish ill to his neighbor. Let the love that fills the mother's heart as she watches over an only child, even such love, animate all. Let the good-will that is boundless, immeasurable, impartial, unmixed with enmity, prevail throughout the world,—above, below, around. If a man be of this mind, wherever he moves, and in every moment, the saying is come to pass, "This place is the abode of holiness."—Buddhist.

THERE is a mirror in the heart, but the face is not visible in it: then only will the face be reflected there, when doubleness of heart shall disappear. No act of devotion can equal truth, no crime is so heinous as falsehood: in the heart where truth abides, there is my abode. The tree bears not fruit for itself, nor for itself does the stream collect its waters: for the benefit of others alone does the sage assume a bodily shape. The Hindu fasts every eleventh day; the Mussulman, during the Ramazan. Who formed the remaining months, that you should venerate but one? If the Creator dwell in tabernacles, whose residence is the universe?—Kabir (Hindu, sixteenth century).

FOR THESE, thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not covet, and every other commandment, are summed up in this precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—Paul.

O YE believers, stand fast to justice when ye bear witness before God, though it be against yourselves, or your parents, or your kindred, whether the party be rich or poor. God is nearer than you to both: therefore, follow not passion, lest ye swerve from the truth. Act uprightly: this will approach nearer unto piety.—Koran.

REVERENCE virtue, holiness, the upright will which inflexibly cleaves to duty and the pure law of God. Reverence nothing in comparison with it. Regard this as the end, and all outward services as the means. Judge of men by this. Think no man the better, no man the worse, for the church he belongs to. Try him by his fruits. Expel from your breasts the demon of sectarianism, narrowness, bigotry, intolerance. This is not, as we are apt to think, a slight sin. It is a denial of the supremacy of goodness. It sets up something, whether a form or dogma, above the virtue of the heart and life.—W. E. Channing, D.D.

MORALITY is the one thing eminently serious and true, and by itself it suffices to give meaning and direction to life. Impenetrable veils hide from us the secret of this world, whose reality is at once irresistible and oppressive. Philosophy and science will forever pursue without ever attaining the formula of this Proteus, unlimited by reason, inexpressible in language. But there is one foundation which no doubt can shake, and in which man will ever find a firm ground amid his uncertainties: good is good, and evil is evil. No system is necessary to enable us to hate the one and love the other; and it is in this sense that faith and love, possessing no seeming connection with the intellect, are the true base of moral certainty, and the only means possessed by man of understanding in some slight measure the problem of his origin and destiny.—Renan.

OUR whole life is startlingly moral. There is never an instant's truce between virtue and vice. Goodness is the only investment that never fails. In the music of the harp which trembles round the world, it is the insisting on this which thrills us.—Thoreau.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL paper that prints prepared lessons for each Sunday, and puts into each lesson what it calls a Golden Text of Scripture, gave this as the Golden Text for July 11, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin."

WE believe in liberty, but not in the liberty to commit suicide more than any other crime, and especially by the slow and shocking process of starvation, as "Dr." Tanner (if he be not a fraud) is now doing in New York; and, what makes it worse, doing it virtually in public, and, through the daily telegraphic bulletins, in presence of the whole American people. If there is no law to protect him from his own violence, the public at least should be protected from witnessing it, and not forced into the position of particeps criminis.

THE Concord Summer School of Philosophy opened auspiciously its second session on Monday of last week. A rustic chapel has been built for the accommodation of the school, through the liberality of the philanthropist, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, who is also enrolled as a pupil for the season. There are about fifty scholars for the full term, the majority of them being women, and from the West. Messrs. Harris and Jones, as last year, take the leading parts in the lecturing,—the former an American Hegelian, the latter an American Platonist. Several other lecturers give shorter courses. Mr. Alcott is the presiding spirit, and leads the conversations which follow the lectures. To him especially, the school must be a great delight, as realizing in his old age one of the dreams of his youth.

IN REFERENCE to the courteous liberality of the recent Methodist Conference at Cincinnati, in allowing the use of the hall, which it controlled, but did not wish to occupy at the time, to Col. Ingersoll for one of his antichristian lectures,—an act which some Evangelical ministers have condemned,—Professor David Swing has this fine plea for free speech. He says: "It will always be safe to temper with a sunshine of friendship the blasts that blow around the extremists of all schools, social, political, and religious. Our era should tolerate an immense amount of free speech. After tossing up the cap a hundred years in praise of freedom of speech, we would better let men speak on, even when they differ with us, and then, if possible, make amends for some bad speeches by showing the public what good thoughts also may come from the full liberty of mind and tongue."

THE TEXT of Mr. Bradlaugh's speech in defence of his right to his seat in Parliament, in spite of his refusal to take the official oath, has now come across the ocean. He was compelled to speak outside of the benches allotted to members, and this gave him really a certain advantage in appealing to the strong English sense of fair play. The speech, too, was an able plea for justice, and must have done something toward turning the vote in his favor, even if Mr. Gladstone had not determined to make his admission without the oath a cabinet question. Of the sober second thought of the English people in regard to the case, the London correspondent of the New York Tribune says: "It is perfectly true that atheism is unpopular in England, and that avowed atheists constitute an inconsiderable minority of the people of this kingdom. But there is something more unpopular and more intolerable to the English people than atheism itself, and that is the notion of political proscription on account of religious beliefs. Mr. Labouchere put it into an epigram, when he ridiculed the theory that a man was not to take his part in the affairs of this world because he did not believe in another."

IF IT be true, as reported, that the good people of Elmira propose to erect a monument to Adam in their city, Mark Twain must have been lecturing there on "The Innocents Abroad," or possibly a large number of the returned "Innocents" have settled there. It is said that they not only mean to build the monument themselves, but that they have petitioned Congress "to issue a decree restricting to Elmira the right to build a monument to Adam, and inflicting a heavy penalty upon any other community within the United States that shall propose or attempt to erect a monument or other memorial to the said Adam." Now we submit to the good citizens of Elmira that their filial action will be sadly marred, if they adhere to this latter purpose of securing an injunction against the right of other towns and cities to follow their pious example. The petition for the restrictive decree is neither democratic nor Christian. It is altogether too proudly exclusive and narrowly sectarian for the present age. It savors also too much of a commercial monopoly to suit the communistic tendencies of the time. It is to be feared that pilgrims from other towns and States, should such an injunction be granted, might even be tempted into unseemly acts against the monument, and hence bring dishonor upon our great common ancestor. Moreover, why in this free country should people from the towns of Maine and Oregon have to go all the way to Elmira to weep at the monument of Adam? Much nobler would it be, and much more consonant with the present sentimental era in ecclesiastical religion, to encourage among the different towns and cities a pious competition in building monuments to him. A new impulse would thus be given to art, as well as to the study of ancient Biblical history, in the competitive effort to exhaust the possibilities of sculpture and architecture for expressing the various shades of literal and allegorical theology. At any rate, we must plead for the equal democratic right of every Christian community, and every church, if need be, to have its own monument to the great federal head of mankind, "in whose fall we sinnéd all."

Digitized by Google

ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

(Concluded.)

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, May 28.

At the conclusion of Mr. Clifford's essay, the President introduced Mr. Rowland Connor, as the first speaker on the subject of the essay, "Liberal Principles as opposed to Sectarianism in Education."

Address of Mr. Rowland Connor.

We have had so much philosophic presentation and discussion to-day, that I think you will pardon me if I drop philosophy and talk simply upon one or two practical points of the subject presented this afternoon. I shall not attempt to formulate the proposition, nor to prove to you that it can be formulated. I desire to drop from the clouds, and come as near to the earth as possible during the few minutes that I speak to you.

There are, as you all know, two classes of schools,—roughly dividing all the schools in the United States at the present time,—private schools and public schools. All private schools are sectarian, to a certain extent: all public schools are supposed to be non-sectarian. With reference to the ill effects of sectarianism in private schools, I desire to present only a single illustration. Some time ago, the New York Independent (I think it was) stated editorially that nearly all the principal colleges in the United States to-day are teaching the doctrine of Darwin, or the philosophy of evolution, so far as that philosophy contains Darwinism. This statement was denied, I believe, by an evangelical paper. I think the Observer; and the editor of that paper sent to the presidents of the different colleges a communication, asking each one this direct question, "Do you teach Darwinism in your college?" And, almost without exception, the answer came back, in substance, "We do not teach it." The Observer immediately crowed over the Independent, and said, "Here are the college presidents almost universally stating that Darwinism is not taught in their institutions"; in other words, according to its view, that latent infidelity was not taught within the college walls. Then the Independent sent out its agents to make investigations; and it appeared that, while nearly all the college presidents had said that this modern philosophy was not taught in the colleges, yet in almost every one of those colleges the Professor of Philosophy or the Professor of Biology or the Professor of Philology was teaching it. The president might have been perfectly correct in stating that he did not teach it, that the college itself did not represent it; but, as a matter of fact, the only man competent to teach it, in almost every instance, was teaching it. In other words, the students were learning modern philosophy, modern science, were being educated in the new ideas. The college president stood forth as a regular evangelical figurehead, representing the old ideas, the old Orthodoxy, the old forms of religion, in order that parents might not fear to send their children within the college walls. In still other words, the colleges were playing double; the presidents professing one thing, the real teaching being something else.

Now, this is a practical illustration, right here in America to-day, of the evil influence of sectarianism in education. In nearly all of our colleges, we have to-day this double influence,—the college nominally Orthodox, nominally Christian after the old school, but many of the professors in favor of modern ideas, and more or less in an underhand way teaching them to the young men in the college. That is one of the practical facts to which I wish to call your attention.

You ask me what I propose to do about it. I do not propose to do anything about it, except to state the fact. The matter will right itself one of these days. I only desire to call your attention to it as an existing fact to-day.

Now, another point in regard to public education. There is going to be a very decided conflict at some time between the Catholics and the Protestants in this country. I think no one who has investigated the subject can doubt this statement. Precisely what form that conflict will take, I do not know; that it is coming in some form, I do not doubt. The Catholics everywhere are gradually withdrawing their children from the public schools, and putting them into parochial schools, with their own sectarian teachers. They are doing this as a matter of fact throughout the United States. Here in our own city of Boston, in Ward 23, for instance, in which I live, and concerning which I know most, I know as a fact that the Catholics are taking their children out of the primary schools, out of the grammar schools, out of the high schools, and are forcing parents to send those children into their parochial schools, to be taught generally only by some one of the numerous bands of "Sisters" supported by the Catholic Church. They are doing this, I understand, contrary to the wishes of Catholics themselves. For instance, I know that a poor washerwoman in my own family was asked recently by a member of the family, "Do your children go to the Sisters' school?" "Oh, no," was her reply. "And why do they not go there?" was the next question. "Because," said that very ignorant mother, "I found that my children were not learning anything at the Sisters' school, and so I took them out and sent them to the public school." There was a poor, ignorant Catholic woman wise enough, after all, to recognize the fact that the Catholic parochial school was but a parody of a real school; that our public schools were better than the Catholic schools. And yet, since she made that reply, she has been obliged by the priest to take her children away from the public school again, and put them back into the Sisters' school, there to learn Catholic prayers, Catholic ritualism, embroidery, music, French, but to learn nearly none of the things we desire our children to learn, and that our children are learning to-day in our public schools.

Now, I desire to call attention, very briefly indeed, to a very important part of this subject, which is generally omitted; and that is that the Catholic priest wishes Catholic children to be educated as Catholics, and not as American citizens. Now, please keep these two things distinct,—the Catholic as a Catholic, and the American citizen as a citizen. And please give heed to the statement I next make, which is that the pious, instructed Catholic cannot be a patriotic American citizen. The two things are incompatible. I do not say that no Catholic can be a patriotic American. Happily, there are abundant illustrations to the contrary. The reason is that they are not "instructed" and "pious" Catholics; and I say an instructed, pious Catholic cannot be a patriotic American citizen.

Now, look at it a moment. In the contemporary number of the North American Review, Cardinal Manning has an article which I think should be read, and very carefully read, by every Protestant in the United States. He states plainly that his article is expository, mainly, of one of the encyclical letters of Pope Leo XIII., in which the Pope states that the theory that all authority in government is derived from the people is false; that all authority in government is derived from the Church, comes from the Vicar of Christ, and never from the people. Cardinal Manning asserts that during the last three hundred years society has been going backward. Nevertheless, the ideal of the Church is retained,—that a church member and a citizen should be identical; that an outcast and a heretic should be identical. In other words, the aim of the Catholic Church is to make every American citizen a Catholic, or to make every Catholic an American citizen, and to refuse to recognize any government anywhere not derived from the Vicar of Christ.

Now, what is the American theory? We all know what it is. It is very simple indeed. We may state it in the words used first by Theodore Parker, I believe, and afterwards varied somewhat by President Lincoln on the field of Gettysburg: The government of America is "of the people, by the people, and for the people." Our government, in other words, receives its authority from the people. The Catholic says that that government is false: all government must receive its authority from the Vicar of Christ. I say, therefore, that a pious Catholic, who listens to the teachings of the Church and accepts them, cannot be a patriotic American citizen; and it is the aim of every Catholic priest to-day, by the education of the children of the Catholic Church, to keep them from being American citizens, in our sense of the word.

That is a positive fact. That is one of the influences of sectarianism in education, which we are all of us to face. In what form, I do not know; what shape the contest will take, I cannot prophesy; but that it will take some shape, I am positive. The Catholic by and by, undoubtedly, will very naturally ask for a division of the school fund, as soon as he is ready to make the request. "Here are our schools," he will say, "in which are all of our children: there are your Protestant schools, which contain exclusively Protestant children. Should I be compelled to pay for the education of Protestant children?" Certainly not, as Protestant. There is no reason why you should. But back of that, however, comes the other fact: that so long as our public schools are secular, and secular only; so long as they are unsectarian, neither Catholic nor Protestant; so long as they are established solely as American schools, to teach children those rudiments which are essential to the practice of American citizenship,—so long we have our argument against the Catholic, and can say to him, "We have nothing to do with your creed; we have nothing to do with the Vicar of Christ; we have nothing to do with your theology: we only demand that every man in America shall support the public schools of America." [Applause.] That is the only claim we have a right to make. The Catholic does not intend that that claim shall succeed: we must resolve that that claim shall succeed, whatever may be the position of the Catholic Church.

And yet remember, my friends, we cannot make this claim justly, if our public schools are sectarian,—if I put my special religion into them, or if you put your religion into them, or if Mr. Channing puts his religion into them, or if Professor Parker puts his religion into them. Our schools must be absolutely unsectarian. Are they so to-day? We all know that they are not. We boast, indeed, here in Boston that our schools are unsectarian. Substantially, that is so. There is no religion specifically taught in our public schools. But there is religion enough taught there for a great many people to quarrel with, provided they do not believe in it; and there is a great deal of religion taught in our public school with which I, for one, do not agree. For instance, here is a little book which I brought with me, called Poetry for Children. The pieces in it were selected by Dr. Eliot, Superintendent of Public Schools in Boston, and the publication is authorized by the School Committee, to be read in our public schools. Now, the School Committee is doing a very excellent work in attempting to do away with the old, methodical, dry, and senseless manner of reading from school-readers, and putting in the place of that old method something new, something alive. They have put the old nursery story of Jack, the Giant-killer, into some of the schools, and Robinson Crusoe; and there are some very amusing and very good works from which the children in our public schools are learning to read to-day, and more rapidly and after a better method than they ever learned to read before. But here is my criticism. The Superintendent of Education and the School Committee are authorizing for use in our schools this book, just printed, in the year 1880; and here is a selection I read in this book. A child represented as saying its prayers before going to bed makes use of this language:—

> "Four corners are around my bed,
> At every one an angel spread:
> One to lead me, one to feed me,
> Two to take my soul to heaven."

Now, this is a very definite, a very mathematical theology, from my point of view. Moreover, every father and mother will bear me out in saying that every child who reads that in a public school will remember it, and will have early implanted in its mind the idea that, whenever it goes to bed, there are four angels on the bed-posts; and that the duty of those angels, in each instance, is specified,—one angel to do this, another angel to do that, and, if the child should happen to die during the night, two angels to take its soul to heaven. Now, I do not want my children to learn any such stuff as that. I do not wish them to have that kind of twaddle put into them, in the public schools, when they are little. [Applause.]

The piece goes on to say,—for the little boy is represented as dying, as most of these goody children do, and as I think they ought to,—

> "And they will take it soon: I know
> I have not long to wait,
> Ere with those shining ones I go
> Within the pearly gate;
>
> "Ere I shall look upon His face
> Who died that I might live,
> With Him forever, through the grace
> That none save He can give."

That is wretched doggerel and about as bad grammar, but I am not quarrelling with the poetry nor the grammar: I am quarrelling with the theology of it. I do not wish my boy to believe that Christ is going to take him to heaven, and that he cannot get there without Christ. I am aware that there are a great many religious people in Boston who do not agree with me. Nevertheless, I pay my poll-tax, at any rate; and I have the same right to criticise the public schools as any one else in Boston.

Digitized by Google

Now, take another illustration. This boy, by the way, I am glad to say, died very soon. He was rather afraid to die. Though he loved Jesus, and desired to have his friendship in the other world, he was afraid that he should miss his parents and others, whom he had known in this world; and, after complaining a little bit, a Voice speaks to him,—

"Whom would'st thou have but Me?
Who in the heavens or with thee here
Hath owned such love for thee?"

Now here is another very pretty little piece for children to learn,—

"Sleep, baby, sleep!
Our Saviour loves his sheep:
He is the Lamb of God on high,
Who for our sakes came down to die.
Sleep, baby, sleep!"

Now take another illustration. The book is packed full of them.

"I heard an angel singing,
When the day was springing:
'Mercy, pity, and peace
Are the world's release!'

"So he sang all day
Over the new-mown hay,
Till the sun went down,
And the hay-cocks looked brown."

Another piece describes the beauty of heaven, talks about its "mighty king," its "rich jewelled shrines," its "gardens of flowers," its "sweet incense," and every thing else, precisely as an Arab, who believes in this kind of material heaven, might find it described in the Koran, and then says:—

"And, oh, if the exiles of earth could but win
One sight of the beauty of Jesus above,
From that hour, they would cease to be able to sin,
And earth would be heaven; for heaven is love."

Now, my criticism upon that is that it is a very definite theology; that it teaches a very positive, a very material kind of heaven, and has Jesus sitting there on a throne, and inspires all our children to wish for a sight of this Jesus, from whom we are all exiles,—otherwise the earth cannot be the abode of love. Is not that theology? No matter whether you agree to it or not, but is it not theology?

Now, take one more. You were all children once, and of course you all know the story of the "Children in the Wood," where the robin, that very mischievous bird, is supposed to have gone and covered the bodies of the children with leaves. In this book, the whole story is told. We have the dying father and mother (who were goody people, and of course they died) committing the children to the hands of their wicked uncle. Then we have the very wicked uncle saying to the dying father and mother,—

"God never prosper me or mine,
Nor aught else that I have,
If I do wrong your children dear,
When you are laid in grave."

Some more wretched doggerel, by the way; but I am talking about theology, and not about poetry. After a time, this very wicked uncle caused the death of the children, and felt very great remorse:—

"And now the heavy wrath of God
Upon their uncle fell;
Yea, fearful fiends did haunt his house,—
His conscience felt a hell.

"His barns were fired, his goods consumed,
His lands were barren made;
His cattle died within the field,
And nothing with him stayed.

"And in a voyage to Portugal
Two of his sons did die;
And, to conclude, himself was brought
Unto much misery.

"He pawned and mortgaged all his lands Ere seven years came about," and so on. But I think I ought not to quote any more of it. After the poor uncle has "pawned and mortgaged all his lands," we may let him go, especially when the entire piece is written for the purpose of showing that God inflicted upon him by special act the very things he had prayed that God would inflict upon him, if he should do his brother's children wrong.

That is the sort of stuff that our children are reading in our public schools, edited by Superintendent Eliot, and authorized by the School Committee of Boston.

Now, friends, so long as that kind of theology is in our public schools, what argument have we to face the Catholic with? None at all: we are teaching Protestant theology in our schools, and a very wretched kind of Protestant theology at that. Now, I do not doubt that the greater part of the parents in the city of Boston to-day would have that stuff taken out of the schools, if they could. Even Orthodox people know better than to wish to have their children read trash of that kind. And then, when we remember that very many of the parents of Boston are liberal in their theology,—Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, so-called Infidels, "Free Religionists,"—we must admit that they have a right to say that a theology which they have learned to despise, whether it be true or whether it be false, shall not be taught in our public schools. [Applause.] Strike out all this theology, and then we can meet the Catholic on this school question with a clean issue. The Catholic here in America is bound to make mischief. He means to do it. I do not mean the laboring man whom you hire to do work in your houses or upon your grounds, I do not mean the poor, ignorant woman whom you hire to assist in your washing; but I mean the Catholic priest. He means mischief here in America. He means to break up our public school system; and he will do it, unless our schools are made free of all sectarian influences, unless we cut this theology out of them, and conduct them in harmony with the principles upon which our government is founded. I do not desire to put my theology into the public schools; I do not desire to put my religious philosophy there: I desire simply that all theology be kept out of the public schools. I have especial reason for objecting to this kind of theology, because it makes an impression upon the hearts of little children, from which they are almost never wholly freed. I know that one very excellent, aged man, a professor in a theological school, told his class one day, although he had become very liberal indeed, that he still in his dreams saw before him the fiery flames of the hell in which he had been educated to believe when young, and woke up in terror, expecting to be cast within the burning lake. "My good Orthodox friends," said he, "tell me that that is a sign that I am not wholly given over; that there is still a chance for me to be converted and go to heaven. I regard it simply as a remnant of the terrible impression made upon my youthful mind by that which I was taught when young." And we all know that then the mind is most impressible, and takes ideas from which we can never afterwards wholly rid ourselves; and our children are learning to-day in our public schools those things from which we have striven for long years to free ourselves. We have a right to ask that they shall have a better chance than we have had; that they may grow up to face the problems of the world which they will be obliged to face, unhampered as we have been hampered, unprejudiced as we have been prejudiced, free in their religion as in their science. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT.—I can very heartily indorse the words of Mr. Connor. I have recently had the same experience that he relates, in New York. I have gone through the school-books which are recommended by the Board of Education in our city, and used in our public schools, and I found, if possible, matters still more objectionable than he has just read to us,—distinct Calvinistic theology, which, however, is not taught to the children as theology, but which is introduced into their minds under the garb of singing instruction. Certain books are given to the children by their singing-teachers, and those singing-books have been carefully crammed with theological songs, in order, evidently, to introduce these dogmas surreptitiously into the public schools. Now, I want to ask, before we go on, what is the use of such Conventions as ours, and what is the use of such remarks as those of Mr. Connor, and of mine just now? You hear these things, you give some attention to them for a moment, but presently it drops out of your recollection; and there is no result whatever, except, of course, such result as always remains when a good point has been well stated, as we have just now heard a good point well stated. But I should like to fix the impression a little by saying that this is the very thing which the Free Religious Association, under its more active policy, is endeavoring to do. We have two large cities, Boston and New York (and probably we shall find the same state of things in other cities of the country), in which we behold the evil influence of sectarian power over the schools in a manner which comes home directly to every liberal parent. As Mr. Connor has truly said, we have suffered too much ourselves from the influence of superstition and have been hampered too much in our own development, by the prejudices derived from our early training, to desire or to be willing that our children should continue in the same way. We want to make the emancipation of the minds of the next generation easier, if we can. All our work, however, is frustrated in great measure by the influence of the sects in our public schools.

Now, what can we do against this state of things? I believe the Free Religious Association is eminently capable of doing work in this direction; and, though we are a small body of men and women, we can multiply our influence, if we attempt it in the proper way. The proper way is, as I take it, to systematically memorialize the Legislatures all over the country, against this evil; to bring this matter before the public, and keep it before the public, and to discuss it and have it discussed until the attention of the whole people has been called to it. I believe that in this way, by a certain public propaganda of the idea of complete emancipation of the public schools from all sectarian influences, the Free Religious Association can do a very important work. And, so far as the city of New York is concerned, I will say that perhaps nine-tenths of all who have joined the Free Religious Association during the past year from that city,—not by any means a sufficient number have yet joined, not by any means so large a number as can be brought to join the Free Religious Association, after we have once had our Convention in New York, as we propose to have,—but of the few hundreds in that city who have joined the Association the past year, nine-tenths, I will say, have joined because they believed that the Free Religious Association was going to do some practical work in this direction,—the emancipation of our public schools and our statute-books from the influence of the sects.

We are always glad and delighted to hear upon our platform a lady's voice, and I am sure we shall be especially pleased to hear the voice of so refined and cultured a co-worker in our cause as that of Miss MARY F. EASTMAN, who will now address you.

Address of Miss Mary F. Eastman.

Mr. Chairman and Friends,—I think my education was perhaps unfortunate in one respect, but by being exceptionally fortunate. I count it one of the greatest blessings of my life that I have never known what it was to be burdened with superstitious beliefs. Of course, in my cup of blessing, I find some alloy, as we always do. Perhaps it is due to that that I am not so apprehensive as my friends of any organized sectarian movement in our country against our system of public education. It may be one of the results of my good fortune that I am sleeping, while I should be awake to a real, practical danger. However, I cannot yet get it into my belief that we are in any danger from any church, even the Catholic, in the way of organized resistance to our republican notions. I have, no less than my friends, a fear of—no, not a fear, but rather a shrinking from—the subtle influence which I find sectarian creeds and dogmas acquiring in our schools. Mr. Adler spoke of singing sectarianism into people. I was reminded, when he spoke, of being in Oberlin a couple of years or more since, and going into the President's class of theological students, when one of them asked President Fairchild in regard to some familiar line of a hymn commonly sung in the churches, "Is not that false?" "Yes, undoubtedly," he replied, "false as theology, but accurate enough for singing." It struck me as a fatal lack in morals when a man holding such a position could say that it was well enough for us to sing a lie. [Applause.]

I do not question the influence of sectarianism in our schools. But I do not know how it is going to be possible to exclude it from our schools, so long as it is so powerful in the community. The schools are an expression of the people, and why we should expect a book published by sectarians, as that book is from which Mr. Conner has quoted, to fail to express the common sentiment, I do not know. Who was it said, "Don't be anxious about the style: the style is the man"? We need not be anxious about mere expression so much as about the people who make the expression.

I think the subtle influence of sectarianism in our schools, from which those of us who hold what we count liberal views shrink, comes primarily from a false view of human nature. I am not half so much troubled for fear the Catholics will get some of the public money and put it into their schools (though I should be troubled, if I thought they would) as I am troubled that the whole tone of our schools is marked by the prevalent influence of sectarianism, in the view that is taken of human nature. As has been well said by the essayist, sectarianism is not founded on nature nor on the soul, but on dogma. So long as anything which is dogma, or springs from dogma, is taught in our schools, we are at least wasting time, we are working away from the purpose. We have not, it seems to me, so long as the prevalent views of human nature obtain, got at the true idea of what is education. So long as our children are trained as recipients of theories, as predestined by and for certain dogmas, our schools are not doing the work of education. This error now extends through every department: it marks the intellectual life; it marks the moral tone. The child is regarded too much as a vessel to be filled rather than a germ to be developed. If we believe, as we mostly do, in evolution, we believe in this opening out,—not leading out (I like the expression of the essayist), but letting out. It seemed a good thing to consider education a leading out. We have harped upon it; but I think we have got a new thought, and it is letting out. That means germination. Imagine a gardener going to his plants and undertaking to lead them up! Just imagine him taking the two sides of a bean as it came out of the ground, and, having a theory as to how beans ought to grow, suppose he should undertake to pull them up, so as to lead them up! What a fatal defect! Now, so long as this is our dogma, that the child is to be led up in any path,—I care not whether it be mine or somebody's else, whether it be the path of the wise or the foolish,—according to arbitrary theories of how they ought to grow, the result will be very much as it would with the gardener, if he undertook to develop beans according to a theory. Too much in that way, it seems to me, we are training the children in our schools. We are not letting the children grow. And it is all due to the fact that we have been dogmatists. We have had theories about development, and we chose to put our fingers into the machinery. It seems to me that the modern theory, the theory which comes of liberal thought, is the theory of "Hands off!" Why is it that we find so often men with no education as wise, if not wiser, than men with education? It simply shows that we have had no theory of education according to which we could make men wisely, and so they were unwisely made.

Digitized by Google

Under the common theory of human nature, we regard the child as the recipient of something which we have to give. We do not regard it as a vital force, which is to absorb in the way God meant it to do, while we only tend and serve and watch and guard it from harm.

The result of all this was hinted at in the essay read to us this morning. The result is a little being who accepts what is given to it without question. I stood this morning beside a carriage in which were two little children, left for the moment in the hands of the coachman, and, a little discord springing up between the children, the coachman undertook the required discipline; and it was very much the same discipline which is exercised everywhere, with untutored and tutored people. The child was told that it should and it shouldn't, it must and it mustn't; and when the child said, "Why?" the answer was, "Because I say so: that is reason enough." Our schools are conducted too much on that principle. The child is taught to accept facts, taught to accept all it receives, on the "I say so" principle. The result is that it comes not to have any intellectual life of its own, but a certain receptivity of whatever is poured into it. The farther result is, we get just such people in the world. In other words, the child does not come out from the school with intellectual stamina; does not come out with that better thing still, intellectual veracity.

And this brings me to another point where sectarianism is an evil in education: it is antagonistic to intellectual veracity. And this is the saddest criticism we can make on our schools. It is bad enough that the children are not wisely taught; but there is nothing in the whole category of criticisms upon our school system that I think can compare with this,—that we do not train to intellectual veracity. Just watch the average teaching in the average school. The teacher walks in with her theory of how to discipline, which means, how to keep still the active, restless children. Back of the teacher is the School Committee, who propose to judge her according to the quiet of her school-room. Back of the School Committee are the parents, who propose to judge committee and teacher exactly on the same basis. How many parents ever observe the child as it comes home and say: "Has my child got any clearer use of its intellectual powers? Is it getting any more loyal to absolute truth?" The aim of the child, therefore, is to meet the teacher's requirement. What is that? Memorize and keep still! That is the requirement of the average teacher, and the child has to meet the requirement of the average teacher. There is never in the average school one single question of the mental attitude of the child on the problems before it, or on the work of the school-room, or of any other place.

Now, I hold that this is due to the low point at which the community start. I wish, therefore, it were possible that we could, by lifting the community (and I confess I do not see any other way out of the trouble),—I wish, by lifting the community, we could lift our schools out of this unfortunate position. Let us feel that nothing else is of so much importance as the right attitude of the child to its work. What should that work be? Why, it seems to me it should be precisely the work which our President, Mr. Adler, has set before his trained mind. It should be precisely the work of the profoundest scholars,—the search for truth, only it is not the same grade of truth: it is not at the same point that the child studies. But, instead of training the child to accept dogmatic instruction, absolute instruction, out of the stores which the teacher holds, he should learn a quiet spirit of investigation. Let the teacher wait while the child investigates, let him know things at first hand; and then we shall get that attitude of mental veracity which, above all things, the child should have. It is the saddest fact in regard to our schools, as it seems to me, that they have never come to that simple aim,—intellectual and moral veracity. I do not need to define veracity. It is veracity. If you cannot make veracity the whole rule of the child's life, all the teaching of the school is lost. If you can put one teacher into the school who is simply a seeker for truth, and who understands human nature enough to recognize in the smallest child by her side another seeker for truth, if only so far as to know that four and one make five, not because the teacher says so, but by investigation and observation, we shall have a training that will bring to the surface, in ten or twenty years, a class of people who cannot be subjected to the churches, who cannot be made dogmatists.

The fact that Mr. Connor states in regard to the testimony of the two newspapers is significant. It tells us that, even in a class of people including editors and college presidents, there is not merely a discrepancy of statement, but a lack of clear investigation, a lack of intellectual veracity. Somebody failed to investigate on fair grounds. Somebody had, to say the least, a bad mental habit. The same thing is indicated by the fact that the same paper which he quoted stated, a few years ago, that a very small number of church members actually believed in the creeds to which they subscribed; and the very lightness with which it was passed over showed a lack of the proper sting which should have come with such a confession. That people should hold and subscribe to creeds which, upon close investigation, you find none of them really assent to, is a pitiful indication of this lack of mental veracity; and it is a lack which could occur, it seems to me, only in the line of sectarian religious teaching. So strong has been the hold of dogmatism upon people, that they have come to feel that, when they could no longer actually subscribe, there was yet a certain safety in seeming to subscribe, to certain dogmas.

Now, while I believe in every agitation we can bring to bear for memorializing Legislatures and bringing the subject under discussion so as to set people thinking, let us, above all, insist that our schools be taught upon what has come to be considered the new ideas,—they are the new ideas; and I believe that, if we can train children, as we are just beginning to train them, to this intellectual veracity, we shall develop a power which will in due time undermine every false institution. You cannot impose false institutions on people who have no element of falseness in them. Your institutions are the men; your institutions are the people. What the institutions are, you will surely find the individual supporters of those institutions to be. I think that our work of scientific study in schools is going very far to this end. If you will train little children not to say that they know a thing until they have found out about it from the closest possible investigation, you will have developed this very power that I am so anxious to see introduced.

My hope is, then, as the hope is so apt to be, with the young; and the only anxiety with me is how we are to arouse a people trained to believe that their safety is in repression, and that nothing is so safe in all the world as ignorance, to the belief that safety lies in quite another path. Any method that will meet that need will meet my cordial recognition. This lack of intellectual veracity, appearing first in the parents' theology, shows itself in the children, and reappears again in society. We find society failing us at every point, because we have not developed the solid granite rock of moral character. I do not care how much we train the memory, I do not care how much classical training we have, if we fail to develop character in our schools, we shall have nothing on which to build a social fabric that can stand. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT.—ROBERT COLLYER was announced as probably the last speaker, but he is not with us. I shall call upon Mr. JENKIN LL. JONES, of Wisconsin, who will give us some of the fresh thoughts and courageous words which we are accustomed to expect from the West.

Address of the Rev. Jenkin Ll. Jones.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I should be disloyal to the sense of gratitude and regardless of the indebtedness which I owe to this Association, were I to yield to any cowardly inclinations not to respond to this invitation. I came here as it were on a pilgrimage. I came into this room with reverence. I look at that bust above [THEODORE PARKER] with gratitude. Although it was not given me to know him in the flesh, it has been given me to know him largely in the spirit. And I am here also to say that across the distance my heart has always responded sympathetically to your word and your work as a Free Religious Association; and, if I have not always been enrolled upon your list of membership, it is because the remembrance of your need and my possibility of becoming such have not always come together at the same time. I also should be disloyal to myself, if I did not say that this first impression of you has been a little disappointing to me. I am a little sorry that I find you, on this your thirteenth anniversary, still wrestling with the dictionary. I am a little sorry that I have come all the way from Wisconsin here, and listened to your words, and have the impression left upon my mind that, if I have, in Massachusetts, anything to say, I do not know what words to use; if there is anything to do, I do not know what to call it; if there is anything in human nature to be moved, I hardly know where it is or how it is.

My great interest in the theme of this afternoon, friends, my earnest, warm word in this direction, given gladly, willingly, always, has been, not primarily to insist upon the right of Catholic religionists,—I am willing to do that, and, if need be, I will stand with flaming sword in front of the gate and keep out bigotry from our public schools,—but back of that, and more important than that, I would have every vestige of formal religion and formal ethics—ritualism, if that is what it is—swept out from our schools, in order that we may see more clearly that the vital problem of moral education is left in our hands elsewhere. And it is left in our liberal hands largely, for to our hands belong the most intelligent heads and the most advanced spirits of this generation. Not less, but more attention needs to be given in our schools to the moral training of the individual, not in form and word, but in deed; and I confess I have graver apprehensions for the future of America, when I think of the listless, nerveless boys and girls that are being turned out by our public schools to occupy American Protestant homes, than I have of any danger that will come from the work of Catholic priests, let them do their worst with their parochial schools. [Applause.] We do pay too much attention to the culture of our children in grammar, geography, and arithmetic, in proportion to the amount of attention we give to the cultivation of their moral natures. If I understood the essayist (I do not know whether I did or not on this point), I must differ from him when he would indicate that the moral nature of the child can be trained only by indirect methods. Doubtless, if a child is allowed to grow up without ethical training, the experience of life will develop him somewhat in that direction before he is sixty years old; but, in ethics as in mathematics, there are settled truths which the teacher can enforce on the child. I look forward to the time when ethics, instead of being crowded into one corner of our schools, and a few lectures devoted to it, will begin in the school where the A, B, C, begin, and will not be dropped until the child is fairly out of the hands of the teacher. I look to the members of the Free Religious Association, not only to see that our schools are liberated from bigotry and superstition, but that you, committed specially to the ethical culture of the people of America, will see that our schools become ethical schools of all that is manly and all that is womanly. [Applause.] I have believed and hoped, and I still will hope, that this Association holds in germ that mighty power that will speak the message of morality to the American people as it has never yet been spoken by catechism or dogma or creed. [Applause.]

Digitized by Google

I come from the far West, Mr. President, with a word, if I could but say it, in all earnestness and in all sincerity and friendliness. Please let the Orthodox alone a part of the time, while you take care of your own,—your own, that we have there in Janesville, for one place, too far advanced, as they think, for me to reach them. They will not listen to my superstition; they won't hang to your name and the externals of your constitution. But I blush to confess, for me and for you, that they are men oftentimes of such coarse fibre, such foul mouths, such limp consciences, that I would rush, if I had no alternative, into the arms of the Catholic Church for fellowship rather than to them. And there are all over the West hundreds and thousands of souls who have so far yielded to the discipline of American institutions and American ideas that they are forever freed from the debilitating influences of dogma, but are lazy, listless, and limp in all the great issues and questions of life. I could but think, friends, this morning, as I was permitted to listen to the refined voice and delicate sentences of this brother whom I have respected so long, but never have met, "I wish I could take him out West, set him up on some high place, and summon those who have sworn by FRANCIS E. ABBOT in their coarse denunciations and loud contempt of superstition and bigotry, and ask them to look in the face of their prophet and be shamed into purer and sweeter lives and more gentle habits of thought." [Applause.] But my heart has ached over and over again to think how you gentlemen here, scholars and philosophers at whose feet I am very willing to sit as a humble disciple, have all the while forgotten, as it seems to me, the great mass of the unwashed liberals that are lying loose upon our prairies, whom we cannot reach and do not reach; and I had hoped that the day had come when the Free Religious Association would hear the call which comes to you prophets to go forth and speak your positive and life-giving word. If, by throwing off even the last vestige of the forms that cling to religion, under any name, you can reach those who need you more readily and help them more earnestly, let that last remnant go.

But I will not take your time. I do not stand here as an unsympathetic critic. I recognize the needs of an accurate dictionary, and I also know that I am incapacitated to make one. I give it up, Brother Abbot. I do not know just the words to use. But I will hurry away as fast as I can, before I am smitten with any more doubts and discouragements as to words, not things (because, after all, I do not understand that there has been a particle of debate about principles or moral issues: it is simply about words),—I will hurry back, and I will work as best I can with the child, who is a something, bound for somewhere, with some sort of endowment, capable of some kind of influence, and who will grow into something, good or bad, as somebody or somewhat shall help to form it; and then, when this child is reborn, with fairer face and nobler brow, and cleaner heart (I guess it will be the heart as well as the head), I shall still be thankful if the Free Religious Society have by that time discovered the right name with which to christen that child. [Loud applause.]

The PRESIDENT.—I am sure we are all delighted, not less with the criticism than with the earnestness of our Western brother. I, for one, have been very deeply impressed with Mr. Jones' words. I have long felt the very point which he has put forward: that we have a duty, not only to those who have grown into Free Religion through hard thinking,—that is to say, to those who have come to us with complete intellectual approbation, and through intellectual work of their own,—but we have a great duty toward that larger class of liberals whom American institutions are educating into religious liberalism, and who have thrown off the Church and the Church's dogmas merely from a sense of independence. That class is a dangerous class,—dangerous, as some of us have had occasion to know, because the sense of independence,—not of profound conviction, but merely a democratic sense of independence,—which has induced them to throw off the restraints of the Churches, will also, as it has done in many instances, tend to induce them to throw off much more salutary and necessary restraints, which no human society can afford to do without. For this large and increasing class of liberals, if we may call them so,—a class of liberals which is considerably represented in New York City, which is largely represented in other cities, and which, as Mr. Jones tells us, is very largely represented in the Western States,—for this class of liberals, we must work; and the only true and only satisfactory way in which we can work is that which Mr. Jones has stated. He wishes he could take our friend Abbot here and plant him in the West. I say, I wish we could have a thousand Abbots to send; and then we should not want to let them go to the West, because we need them in the East so much. The one thing which Free Religion needs is Free Religious teachers; men who have not only good-will to do good work, but men who have also the necessary intellectual training for it. Why, it takes a physician to-day five years to prepare in the university for his vocation; and, in my judgment, it ought to take a teacher of religion not much less than five years at a university, after he has passed through his college, to prepare for his high vocation. But where do you find the men to-day? Where have you the teachers, the men really equipped to do the hard popular service of teaching Free Religion to-day? What we want is trained leaders to teach the people. We do not believe that every earnest man is a good popular teacher. No: only he can teach who has thoroughly matured his mind, and can so express the results of his thought in clear, lucid, and transparent language that even the common mind will understand him. The deepest, truest culture alone will lead to truest popular leadership. And so, if you want popular speakers to teach the principles of Free Religion to the people, your first care must be to have, not only hard-working and well-intentioned men, who will put shoulder to the wheel, but profound scholars in the first instance, ready to meet any question in history, philosophy, theology, and armed, of course, with earnestness of purpose and depth of conviction to carry out their ideas. How are we to obtain them? I say we can obtain them by picking out the best men in our universities here, whose thoughts turn to this kind of work, and specially train them for it. So long as we have no university of our own, no school for the science of religion of our own, as we ought to have; so long as the present divinity schools fail to answer our purpose, let us pick out those men who are intellectually and morally adapted to the work, and send them abroad to the European universities, there to prepare for their work on their return to this country. That is one thing which we ought to do, it seems to me. We must have teachers; we must have men prepared to give public instruction on the basis of this Association; we must have them in our journals and on our platforms; we must have them, if we wish to acquire the reputation and glory which this movement deserves, and if we want to spread it to that extent to which it ought to be spread.

I am happy to announce that a beginning in this direction has been made. In the course of the last year, I have been the happy recipient of the first Free Religious fellowship; that is to say, the first sum of money, consisting of a thousand dollars, to send out a young man of promise, who is willing to devote himself to the work of Free Religious teaching, to a European university, with the understanding that he is there to ripen his convictions, enlarge his culture, and return to this country to teach religion as his convictions may dictate. It is not a novel thing that money is given for the education of ministers: the Orthodox churches give abundant sums for that purpose; but I believe that this is the first time, in the history of this country, if not in the history of other countries, that a sum of money has been given, as this has been given, in the following manner: that the incumbent of the fellowship shall be selected purely on account of his intellectual and moral ability, and because he has solemnly declared that he means to devote himself to the function of religious teaching, but leaving him totally unaffected as to the convictions to which he arrives. He will have this fellowship, whether he returns to this country as a Catholic priest, as a Buddhist priest, as a teacher of modern Evangelical doctrine, or, as we hope and believe, as a teacher of Free Religion. We do not affect him at the outset; we do not mark his convictions at the outset: we give him absolute liberty of thought, in the spirit and according to the principles of the Free Religious Association. [Applause.]

I mention this fact, that the Free Religious Association has received this first fellowship, a thousand dollars, and that Mr. Robinson, formerly of the Cambridge Divinity School, has been sent out to Europe under this fellowship, there to prepare himself for the work of religious teaching according as his convictions and conscience may dictate,—I mention this fact as a hopeful and promising sign of the times. I mention it as an example to be followed here in Boston, where the Free Religious Association has dwelt for thirteen years, and is known. I trust that the example of New York will be followed here. I trust that Boston will not permit that New York shall get ahead of her sister city in such a matter. I trust that before our next annual Convention we shall have more such fellowships. If we do, I can say that the men are ready for them. I know myself of four men to-day in this community, able and earnest young students, who would be ready to go abroad, to fit themselves for the work of Free Religious teaching, if the means could be obtained to send them out and to give them that deep culture which they desire. The harvest is waiting. We need only the laborers,—young men of earnestness of conviction and capable of self-sacrifice, who will follow this work, and who will strive to bring it about that Free Religion shall not be merely a matter of talk, a matter of clever sayings and bright fancies, but that it shall become what it ought to be, an earnest and successful labor for the highest and greatest good of mankind. [Applause.]

Miss EASTMAN.—I am reminded by a remark that a friend makes to me, that I may have been misunderstood in what I said about our schools. It is a little matter in itself, but it is a big matter not to be understood. I am reminded that Boston is not subject to the charge to-day of repressing the children, nor of encouraging memorizing in the schools. The remarks I made were about the common average methods of education. None is better aware than I, and certainly none is more grateful than I, that a new departure has been made in Boston, with the entering of Dr. Eliot upon his work; and if any heart has responded more earnestly to the words he has uttered in his various essays, notably in his last report to the people in regard to school-work in Boston, I have not known it. I certainly grew warm with feeling when I found a school superintendent proving the barbarism of the old theories in regard to the proper work of the school-room, as I certainly think he has done, and taking a stand which made me say, "This position ought to be the outgrowth of a most liberal faith." If he is subject to criticism, as undoubtedly he is, for the book from which Mr. Connor quoted, it is the language of the sects, and has become habitual in such a way that people hardly are conscious that they are saying anything peculiar, or anything which combats the views of other people, in uttering such things. But from his last document I quote this; and it certainly shows a something which I wish sprang spontaneously in the minds of superintendents of schools everywhere. In speaking of the work of the school-room and of the intellectual life, he quotes Hamerton, who, in his book so called, The Intellectual Life, says, "Intellectual life is not erudition, but a state of the mind in which it seeks earnestly for the highest and purest truth." I think that might stand for a fundamental part of the creed of the "Free Religionists," if they had one. And here is Dr. Eliot: "It is the all-absorbing duty of every school and every system of schools to free the minds of its children." If he will do that work in Boston, I think the schools will convert the churches.

The PRESIDENT.—This Convention is now adjourned.

Social Festival.

In the evening, a Social Festival was held in the same hall, and gave great satisfaction to the large company assembled. Rev. M. J. Savage presided. Brief speeches were made during the hour from 8 to 9 o'clock, interspersed with pleasant music. Refreshments were provided for all who wished, and opportunity offered for social intercourse, as also, last, but not least, for offerings to the treasury of the Association. Thus ended the Thirteenth Annual Meeting.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 22, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

PERSONAL NOTICE.

All personal communications for F. E. Abbot should be hereafter addressed to him at "Lake View Avenue, Cambridge, Mass."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The office of the Free Religious Association and INDEX has been removed to No. 3 Tremont Place (just in the rear of the Tremont House), where members and friends of the Association and patrons of the paper will find a pleasant room and cordial welcome. Mr. David H. Clark, besides being assistant editor of the INDEX, has been appointed General Agent of the Association, under the plan for which money has been raised in response to the circular issued last December, and will have charge of the office and of all business there. All communications pertaining to the business of the Association or of the INDEX should be addressed to "Free Religious Association, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass." Communications intended for the editor will reach him more directly, if addressed to him personally at New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y F.R.A.

A CATHOLIC parochial school has been established in Milford, Mass. The priest who has established it says that it is "not intended to conflict with the public schools, but prove a reliable and useful auxiliary, and especially educate the young children." But this is Catholic cunning. The town authorities should not allow any grounds for the present excuse for the school,—that "the public primary schools are overcrowded."

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200.00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00

GENERAL DONATIONS TO F.R.A.

HENRY W. BROWN, Worcester	10.00
C. M. DENISON, New York City	5.00
MR. and MRS. EIDLITZ, New York City	2.00
MISS APPLETON, Roxbury, Mass.	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

IMPORTANT ISSUES.

WE hope none of our readers will fail to read the portion of the report of the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association which appears in this number of the Index. The discussion touches vital questions of special practical interest. Mr. Clifford had opened the subject in his broad and comprehensive essay printed last week, entitled "Liberal Principles as opposed to Sectarianism in Education." But he necessarily left it to the speakers who came after him to develop some of the special salient points of the theme. And it so happened that each of them, without any concert or intimation from without, did take up for special consideration a very important point, yet each a different point. Mr. Connor spoke particularly of the conflict between the Roman Catholic Church and our American public schools. He urged the necessity of the schools being purged of all Protestant sectarian theology and ritual, so that the Catholics could make no objection to them on that score, and then made a very incisive critique on the subtle as well as open ways — using the Boston schools for illustration — by which sectarian doctrines are now inculcated on the minds of the public school children.

Liberal people are not wholly agreed as to the imminence of this conflict between the Catholics and the public schools; nor again as to the best way, perhaps, of meeting the conflict, assuming it to be approaching. Yet one thing, nay, two things are certain: first, that the Catholic Church, as such, does not favor our public school system, that the Pope in his Encyclicals has condemned it, that it is seen to be a system opposed to the hierarchical power of the Church; and that, therefore the Church, in the interest of self-preservation, is logically bound to keep the education of its children in its own hands. And, secondly, it is equally certain that this theoretical and logical antagonism to our public schools on the part of the Catholic Church is becoming every year more practically active and pronounced. Local conflicts between the Catholic priests and the school authorities are of more frequent occurrence. Parochial Catholic schools are becoming more numerous, and into them Catholic children are being withdrawn from the public schools. In some cities, where the Catholics are very strong, they are making the demand that certain of the public schools shall have Catholic teachers and be brought virtually under the power of the Catholic Church, though nominally still under the local school authorities.

Now, these two facts, the theoretical and logical opposition of Catholicism to our system of public schools, and the increasing practical activity of this opposition, indicate clearly enough that a serious danger lies in the pathway of our public educational system. Just how rapidly the threatening peril is likely to culminate or how much it may be modified by the general freedom of American institutions and society, we may not be able to say. But surely it is not a danger to be most safely met with blindfolded eyes. The Catholics are the most shrewd and worldly-wise of sects. They set their ecclesiastical traps far ahead, and take whatever prey falls into them. But they are wary, and will avoid an open conflict where they see that their antagonist, being forewarned, is forearmed, and that the odds are strong against them. This, then, is one of the most important issues of the time; and it behooves the American people, if they would save and extend their public schools, first scrupulously to free them from all sectarian influences, and then vigilantly to guard them against any sectarian attacks upon their integrity.

Miss Eastman, in her address, touched another most important issue when she charged sectarian methods of education with producing intellectual inveracity. The want of intellectual honesty is one of the special evils of our age. It appears not only in church creeds, but in the platforms of political parties. It is a fault of which pulpit and pew are equally guilty,—the former too frequently using phrases which mean one thing to the speaker and another to the hearer, and the latter reciting articles of belief with the lips, which the mind only accepts with a large secret reservation. That the spirit of sectarianism, which is a spirit that puts the interests of a special creed or denomination or church above the pure, unadulterated interests of truth, is justly chargeable with no inconsiderable part of this evil, can hardly be denied. Mr. Clifford has a strong paragraph to the point, under the head of "Honesty in Teaching." And it is an evil which it is one of the special missions of "Free Religion" to meet and overcome. But it will not be overcome until a public opinion has been created which will demand honesty of opinion rather than uniformity, and make it impossible that any thoughtful and earnest man's honest convictions should interfere with his outward prosperity in life.

Another point quite as important and quite as much demanding serious consideration was referred to in the genuinely hearty speech of Mr. Jones,—a speech, by the way, to which, though made partly in criticism, was accorded an exceptionally welcome reception. Mr. Jones spoke of the large class of liberals, particularly in the West, who had broken with all ecclesiastical organizations and all systems of religious belief, and who with the restraints of religious belief were in imminent danger of throwing off the restraints of moral obligation. That there should be a danger of this kind would be natural, that there is a danger of the sort cannot probably be denied. But it may be doubted whether the class of people exposed to this peril are the descendants of the old generation of free and radical thinkers, or have been brought up on freethought food. More likely they are those who were educated in the belief that the moral law was given by direct revelation from God, but whose religious beliefs have now been disintegrated by the influences of the age. Their religious beliefs having gone, the morality that was based upon them is also in danger of going. This is a peril which is appearing in the churches no less than outside of them; for the creeds in the churches are honeycombed with doubts, and the doubters as well as the deniers have not yet adjusted their ideas of moral obligation to any new basis.

But this adjustment must come. The safety and continued progress of civilization demand it. And it is another of the special missions of "Free Religion" to help toward effecting it,—to render service in establishing both a logical and a practical basis of ethics, that shall stand impregnable after all existing theologies shall have vanished away. Of the old generation of freethinkers, it was a special boast and a justly claimed glory that, though infidel in respect to theology, they were sound in moral conduct. Against the church members' faith, they pointed to their good works. Admitting that they had nothing unless they had morality, they made it a special aim to have that: many of them were living incarnations of the moral law. Many of the so-called freethinkers are so to-day. But the example set by these should be the standard of all, and the standard especially for educating the young. If liberalism is to inherit the future, it must come to its inheritance by its high moral claims. And those claims must be twofold: it must furnish a more solid basis than theology has done for the moral law, it must reach a higher standard than the churches have reached in moral practice.

Digitized by Google

CO-OPERATIVE COLONIZATION.

It is obvious to every one that the condition and prospect of an immense mass of the people, even in this comparatively prosperous and favored country, as well as others, are far less cheering than they should be, in view of the progress that has been attained in intelligence, some of the characteristics of advanced civilization, and the facilities for comfortable living.

The spectacle which society presents is a growing tendency to centralization of power in the few and the subjugation of the many to a fixed and inexorable doom of abject dependence. It is for the most part rapid and vast accumulation set off against a well-nigh hopeless struggle for subsistence, or, at most, a small margin of excess above absolute requirements. It inevitably follows that so long as society is thus largely under the rule of the selfish instincts, and this enormous disparity exists in the relative chances and means of living, not only must the common lot of the multitude who toil for bread be one of much suffering and privation, but any sudden derangement of the industrial machinery must be attended with a greatly added aggregation of these ills. It is thus that the periodic commercial crises in this country and Europe, not to mention the constantly occurring more local collisions between capital and labor known as strikes, often due more to the greed and extortion of the former than to any real injustice or unreasonableness on the part of the latter, are always accompanied with a prodigious increase of pauperism and destitution. Through these causes, great numbers of the people are every now and then rendered unable to provide for their subsistence, and compelled to starve, unless cared for by others.

Furthermore, this precarious experience of the laborer, these fluctuations of his condition and means of support, tend to foster in him that reckless improvidence with which he is often so justly charged. Charity, though never so free or sympathetic, can afford but a temporary expedient for these evils. It cannot eradicate them. It cannot remove the cause or ensure the laboring man against their recurrence. The demand of our modern industrial life is the elevation of man above dependence to a self-reliant independence, in order that he may possess the opportunity of self-development and unfold the best possibilities of his nature. It is clear and telling evidence of the defectiveness of our existing industrial system that he shares so little in this opportunity at present. It shows the imperative need of its more equitable adjustment, and thus to the greater average well-being of the members of society. This can only be effected through a more general distribution of profits, a partnership of associated labor; in a word, the principle of coöperation among the workers.

This has already been tried in trade and various branches of industry with encouraging success. We see no reason why it may not be everywhere and in all lines of pursuit, under intelligent and discreet management. There is no more inviting sphere for the prosecution of such enterprise than in the cultivation of the soil. Especially is this true in our country, where the price of land is so cheap, and such vast areas remain unoccupied; the facilities for transportation so favorable, and the population spreading and increasing with such rapidity in all directions. Something has already been accomplished in the way of such experiments. That all which was hoped from them has not always been realized does not disprove their feasibility, any more than failure in any established business or pursuit shows this. It indicates only that they have too often been undertaken by persons lacking the requisite qualities for success, predisposed to visionary and impractical theories, and destitute of essential experience.

There is no inherent reason why business may not be conducted as effectively upon the coöperative as the competitive plan. Nor why agriculture may not be as well as others. Indeed there are many circumstances which render the effort much easier. The late period of business depression gave a new impulse to this form of coöperation. It was found that all the channels of industry were overflown with an idle population who could get nothing to do. It was seen also that, if these people could be transferred to the rich and arable lands of the West, instead of a burden upon society, they might ere long become self-supporting, and the future made brighter for them and their children. Accordingly, several movements, of more or less consideration, to further this end, were started, and are still in operation. In some instances, these were under the auspices and direction of particular religious bodies, as, for example, the Roman Catholic and Jewish. Others were of different nationalities. But, whatever may be the industrial gains of such exclusive associations as the latter, they must necessarily be narrow and circumscribed in their intellectual and higher aspects. It is for this reason that among the enterprises of the kind alluded to we have been particularly interested in the one which bears the name of the "Coöperative Colony Aid Association," of New York, on account of its exceedingly broad, enlightened, and philanthropic aims. The gentlemen who stand at the head of this organization are generally of distinguished position and character, many of them of profound acquaintance with social and benevolent problems. No regard appears to have been paid to religious affiliations in its inception or the projection of its work. The Rev. Mr. Frothingham was present at some of its initiatory meetings, before his departure for Europe, and entered warmly into sympathy with its object; and among its most earnest and valuable supporters have been the late Joseph Seligman, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, and Prof. Felix Adler. Its officers include the names of the Rev. R. Heber Newton, Fred. Law Olmstead, Rev. Robert Collyer, Rev. Chas. F. Deems, Prof. Felix Adler, Dr. E. H. Chapin, E. L. Godkin, and others of correspondent note, of various religious and theoretical sympathies. This Association has already been somewhat more than a year in existence. From the first annual report, we learn that it has not been able to carry out its plans on as extensive a scale as was at first contemplated, owing to the lack of the pecuniary support needed. Nevertheless, a very encouraging and substantial beginning has been effected. The Association has been much indebted to Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, who, with her accustomed interest in measures to benefit the people, generously met, for the first six months, its preliminary expenses. It has been enabled through the means thus supplied to open an office, as a centre of its operations. This office is designed for a bureau of information in respect to everything pertaining to the planting of industrial colonies, to aid those who are entering upon such plans with desirable knowledge as to the characteristics and relative advantages of different localities, and hints for the ensurance of their material and moral welfare. It is evident that through these means many of the misfortunes incident to the experience of the emigrant, in such instances, from unprincipled land speculators and sharpers of various classes, and the vultures that are likely to prey upon new settlements, may be largely avoided. In connection with the office referred to, a book has been opened to register the names of those who desire to colonize on the coöperative plan, in which one hundred and eight such applications are already recorded. For the furtherance of these objects, an extensive correspondence has been conducted, through which detailed descriptions have been obtained of unoccupied lands in the Western States and Territories, to the amount of several million acres. A few months since, Mr. John Fallows in the interest of a colony now forming, and Mr. E. V. Smalley in behalf of the Association, made a personal inspection of some of these lands, particularly in Eastern Tennessee. The utility of the work here indicated is shown in the fact that the Association is in frequent receipt of inquiries for this kind of information from those who contemplate emigration in different parts of the Old World. The Association report five colonies already organized that have made such application.

A number of persons, respectively possessing large tracts of land, have evinced their sympathy with coöperation by offers of large sections of these lands at reasonable prices for a term of years for the founding of colonies under the auspices of the Association. It has formed an important auxiliary to its endeavors in the publication of a monthly paper, to which the name of The Worker was given. Six numbers of this have been issued. Of these, ten thousand copies of the first were printed and distributed; and the subsequent issues have averaged about seven thousand. Several hundred copies were sent to England, and some to France and Switzerland. The interest which has of late been manifest in the United States in the subject of colonization is ascribed largely to the influence of this paper. But great changes in long-existing and widely prevalent usages and modes of life have always been slow, and must continue to be. All the more must this be the case, when such transitions are from the less to the more enlightened ones, from selfishness to disinterestedness. The principal obstacles which the Association has encountered in carrying out its plans have been financial ones. It complains, as we have intimated, that capitalists have not been so ready to respond to its appeals as was anticipated. It has, however, succeeded in recently planting one small colony in Salina County, Kansas. It is hoped that this may hereafter be enlarged, and that other colonies may follow. But the Association has not in any degree lost faith in its objects through discouragement. The single result of its experience has been to confirm the conviction with which it started, that coöperative colonization offers the only genuine escape for the surplus population of our great cities, and the disheartened and struggling poor everywhere, to better chances of life and a more favoring condition for progressive improvement. The present renewal of business prosperity is no argument against this, since depression is sure to follow again sooner or later, as sure as the ebb of the tide succeeds its flow. It is evident that communities formed on the coöperative plan can be self-protective. They can ward off the gambler's den and the dram-shop, and begin at once with the library and the school-house, and many of the advantages and appliances of older and refined societies. Here, then, is a solicitation to the wealthy and the benevolent that is worthy of all consideration. It is the opportunity to lighten the burden of life and infuse a greater joy into the experience of many of the toilers of this generation,—an opportunity in which even shrewd and calculating self-interest may subserve the cause of beneficence. Let us hope that there may be a growing appreciation among those who abound in such resources of the nobleness and blessedness of the service. D. H. C.

Digitized by Google

OUR LIBRARY.

I. Emerson and other Poets.

This series of articles is designed to show the readers of the Free Religious Index how our moral and religious views are taught by the best of current literature, and thus begins with the name which we must place above that of all other modern authors.

Emerson is in himself a whole library of free thought; and all his works are, in beauty of conception, poems. Among those which are poetical in form also, is The Sphinx, written to show that "Profounder, profounder,

Man's spirit must dive;
To his aye-rolling orbit
No goal will arrive;
The heavens that now draw him
With sweetness untold
Once found,—for new heavens
He spurneth the old!"

The same thought is put in more flowing metre in his Song of Nature, which declares that the true man is not yet born, not even

"In a Judæan manger."

The author of The Problem knows that

"Not from a vain or shallow thought
His awful Jove young Phidias brought;
Never from lips of cunning fell
The thrilling Delphic oracle;
Out from the heart of Nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old;
The hand that rounded Peter's dome,
And groined the aisles of Christian Rome,
Wrought in a sad sincerity:
Himself from God he could not free;
He builded better than he knew:
The conscious stone to beauty grew,
* * * * * * *
And yet, for all his faith could see,
I would not the good bishop be."

Nearly as thoughtful, fully as daring, and much more musical is Lowell, who says in Rhœcus that

"God sends his teachers unto every age,
To every clime and every race of men,
With revelations fitted to their growth
And shape of mind, nor gives the realm of Truth
Into the selfish rule of one sole race";

and who tells us how a bigot is rebuked by an angel's setting six crystal vases beside a brook,

"Saying, 'Ambrose, thou maker of creeds, look here!
As into these vessels the water I pour,
There shall one hold less, another more;
And the water unchanged, in every case,
Shall put on the figure of the vase.'
O thou, who wouldst unity make through strife,
Canst 'thou fit this sign to the Water of Life'?"

His condemnation of Bibliolatres,

"That with thy idol-volume's covers two Wouldst make a jail to coop the living God," is all the sterner for the declaration that

"Slowly the Bible of the race is writ;
Each age, each kindred, adds a verse to it."

We have nothing grander than The Present Crisis, from different verses of which are brought together these lines: —

"Then to side with Truth is noble when we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just.
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified;
And the multitude make virtue of the faith they had denied.
By the light of burning heretics, Christ's bleeding feet I track,
Toiling up new Calvaries ever with the cross that turns not back.
For Humanity sweeps onward: where to-day the martyr stands,
On the morrow crouches Judas with the silver in his hands.
Worshippers of light ancestral make the present light a crime;
Turn those tracks toward Past or Future, that make Plymouth Rock sublime?
New occasions teach new duties; Time makes ancient good uncouth.
They must upward still and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth;
Lo, before us gleam her camp-fires! we ourselves must Pilgrims be,
Launch our 'Mayflower,' and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea."

But Lowell is most truly our poet, when he tells us in The Search for Christ that "His throne is with the outcast and the weak"; and when he surpasses even the lovely description of June, which ushers in Sir Launfal, by the final revelation that the true sacrament is that of sympathy with suffering.

And, then, we have Whittier's grand hymn of Worship, to show us that

"The benignant Father
Requireth at his earthly children's hands
Not the poor offering of vain rites, but rather
The simple duty man from man demands.
For Earth he asks it; the full joy of Heaven
Knoweth no change of waning or increase;
The great heart of the Infinite beats even,
Untroubled flows the river of his peace."

We may well address to the fruitful and earnest Quaker poet what he says to Roger Williams in A Spiritual Manifestation: —

"Still echo in the hearts of men
The words that thou hast spoken;
No forge of hell can weld again
The fetters thou hast broken.

"The pilgrim needs a pass no more
From Roman or Genevan,
Thought-free, no ghostly tollman keeps
Henceforth the road to heaven!

"And slowly learns the world the truth
That makes us all thy debtor,
That holy life is more than rite,
And spirit more than letter."

This last truth it has been given Whittier to speak as no one else has done; and in his Vision of Eckard we hear him who

"In mercy or in judgment
Shall turn and overturn,
Till the heart shall be his temple,
Where all of Him shall learn," declare that

"I loathe your wrangling councils,
I tread upon your creeds;
Who made ye mine avengers,
Who told you of my needs?

"For the dead Christ, not the living,
Ye watch his empty grave
Whose life alone within you
Has power to bless and save."

Some of Whittier's best contributions to our cause are not to be quoted except in full, for instance, The Hermit of the Thebaid; The Brother of Mercy; The Cry of a Lost Soul; the sketches of Rousseau in The Chapel of the Hermits, and of Abraham Davenport, hero of the Dark Day of 1780; and the Prayer of Agassiz, which may well be mentioned last, because its theme has been more fully treated by two other poets.

Holmes, in his Wind-Clouds and Star-Drifts, makes the young astronomer say,—

"My life shall be a challenge, not a truce:
This is my homage to the higher powers,
To ask my boldest question undismayed!...

"This is the New World's gospel: Be ye men!
Try well the legends of the children's time,
The tree of knowledge in your garden grows.
Its branches lend you their immortal food,
That fills you with the sense of what you are."

So in his poem on Humboldt's Birthday he said,—

"We claim the food that fixed our mortal fate,—
Bend to our reach the long-forbidden tree!
The angel frowned at Eden's eastern gate,
Its western portal is forever free."

More characteristic, however, is the Doctor's advice about The Mind's Diet: —

"No life worth naming ever comes to good,
If always nourished on the self-same food:
The creeping mite may live so, if he please,
And feed on Stilton till he turn to cheese;
But cool Magendie proves, beyond a doubt,
If mammals try it, that their eyes drop out.
No reasoning creatures find it safe to feed
For their sole diet on a single creed:
It spoils their eyeballs while it spares their tongues,
And starves the heart to feed the noisy lungs."

The sublime lesson taken from the Chambered Nautilus I need not quote.

Similar views of the advantages of progress and scientific culture have been elaborately, and often beautifully set forth by Bayard Taylor in a dramatic poem named after Deucalion, the representation of man in Greek mythology. One of the grandest passages is that where the Church of Rome, imaged as Medusa, the Gorgon who turns to stone the souls over whom she sits enthroned, finds herself powerless before Urania, the muse of science; and the poet says,—

"The holy planets going and returning
Keep thy clear paths untangled in the sky:
Thy wisdom shall replace our hoodwinked yearning,
Thy living laws the mysteries that die."

In this nineteenth century, when

"Earth is red
With ebbing life-blood of the wounded faiths,"

Prince Deukalion enters the church of Calchas, the personification of Protestantism, singing,—

"Joy in thy world divine,
And the body like to thine;
Pride in the mind that dares
To scale thy starry stairs;
Freedom to seek and find
All that our dreams designed;
Patience to wrest from Time
Something of Truth sublime;
Or of beauty that shall live,—
We beseech Thee give!"

There he calls up a vision of heaven, and forces its saints to confess that they are

"Self-bound and over-blessed
In endless weariness of rest."

Finally, the Spirit of the new religion appears on earth, declares to Buddhism that man's duty is not to renounce, but to accept knowledge, beauty, and power, announces to Calchas and Medusa that their reign is over, and warns Urania that, though before her advance

"Earth's petty creeds fall off as withered leaves," yet faith must still belong, not to her, but to that Power, which "Stands alone too awful to be named."

Neither Bayard Taylor, Holmes, Whittier, Lowell, nor Emerson seems to me fully aware how thoroughly the faith of the future must depend on the scientific training already so general. All the five have paid rich tributes to our three sanctities, Freedom, Virtue, and Knowledge. So far as we can make any distinction, we may say that Liberty is peculiarly the theme of Emerson, Lowell, and Holmes; Morality that of Whittier and Lowell; and Culture that of Holmes and Bayard Taylor. But the poet of Science is yet to sing.

As we call to mind the famous dogmas which are passing away, we might say that Emerson's office is to disprove the old ideas of arbitrary election and natural inability of man by showing how we are all made for progress; that all fancies of the necessity of an atoning sacrifice must fade away before such revelations of the saving efficacy of practical goodness as Lowell gives; that fear of divine wrath and endless torments must be cast out by such a trust in the Eternal Goodness as Whittier's; that we have learned too much from Holmes about the duty of free inquiry to expect to be justified by faith only; and finally that no infallibility of any book or church can pass current with those who see, as Bayard Taylor does, that these forms of religion are transitory, and must all give place to the higher truth, as yet but dimly seen.

When we think of these five poets, of others whom there is barely space to mention here, like the Longfellows, Stoddard, Aldrich, Cranch, Chadwick, Hay, Stedman, Parker, and Thoreau, and also of European brother-bards, of whom I have still to speak, we may well call them our "goodly fellowship of prophets," whose voice is heard not only in the pulpit, but in the library, the nursery, the parlor, the kitchen, and the school-room, and whose word comes everywhere with power. F. M. H.

Digitized by Google

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

We called attention recently to the great wealth of material for ethnological research still existing among the North American Indians, and which Major Powell and his assistants are working hard to save and to systematize for the benefit of future scholars. A project kindred to the plan of Major Powell in some respects is that of Mr. Pierre Lorillard of New York, who for some years has entertained the desire of sending an exploring party to those parts of Central America which are known to be rich in remains of early Aztec civilization, and even to preserve remnants of civilizations prior to that of the Aztecs. Mr. A. T. Rice, editor of the North American Review, who recently went to Europe as agent for Mr. Lorillard, to organize the expedition, there learned that the French government was already engaged in a similar work, and succeeded in combining forces with that government, the French to furnish most of the necessary outfits and Mr. Lorillard to pay most of the necessary expenses, the combined expedition to be under the command of Mr. Désiré Charnay, an archæological student and experienced traveller. That part of Central America which the party will explore — from Tehuantepec to the Isthmus of Darien — is without doubt, from an archæological point of view, the most interesting portion of the Western Hemisphere. Although to-day it is almost unknown to the general reader, scholars are already at loggerheads with regard to the antiquity of its monuments and the source or sources of its civilizations. Architecturally, the remains of Yucatan (which place is supposed by Squier to be the centre from which Mexican and kindred civilizations radiated) exhibit interesting resemblances to those of the prehistoric civilizations of the Old World. According to Mr. Charnay, who has already visited both Eastern and Western remains, the pyramidal "Houses of God" of the Mexicans are almost identical in character with Japanese and Cambodian temples. Other buildings or monuments present Greek designs; others appear to be of Assyrian workmanship; others recall Egyptian characteristics; and others blend the artistic forms of China and India. It is said that the first Catholic priests who visited China found so many resemblances between the ceremonials of Christianity and the rites of the Chinese Buddhists that they were amazed, and could only account for them by supposing that the devil had been teaching the Buddhist priests to caricature Christianity. The day has gone by for analogous explanations with regard to the origin of Central American architecture, but rationally to explain these strange resemblances promises to tax the efforts of archæologists for a long time to come. The results of the expedition can hardly fail to prove of unique importance, and we hope that Mr. Rice's enthusiastic desire may be gratified; namely, that they may prove "a stepping-stone to something like a certain knowledge of the origin and chronology of the great Central American races."

Since the writing of this paragraph concerning the Central American expedition, Mr. Charnay has telegraphed from the City of Mexico that the Mexican government has officially granted him all the privileges and facilities necessary to make the desired explorations, and has appointed a representation to accompany him. He also telegraphs, as a first practical result of the expedition, the discovery of an important archæological station, abounding in tombs, vases, and other antiquities, at a height of four thousand metres above the sea.

May we add to the above paragraph a word, which, if not in strict keeping with the objects of this department of the paper, cannot be wholly irrelevant. We do not suppose that Mr. Lorillard, who is about to spend a small fortune upon the exploration of Central America, is himself an archæologist, or even much of a student of any kind. He is, if we mistake not, a member of that particular set of young men in New York City who are the progenitors of four-in-hand drags, of polo clubs, and of other similar institutions, which have called out the ire of goody moralists and furnished the texts of numerous homilies upon the degeneracy of our fashionable young men. We have no desire to defend the particular pleasures of young men of fashion; but, when we remember from whom came the initial impulse which resulted in the discoveries of Stanley and the opening of the immense territory of Central Africa to the agencies of modern civilization, the same man who is to-day attempting a solution of the mysteries of the North Pole; when we recall the name of the editor of the most famous of American reviews; and add to these the name of the projector of the investigations we have just mentioned, we are not yet ready to believe that our young men of fashion are on the high-road to destruction. Bennett and Rice and Lorillard may yet break their necks at polo or coaching, but they will have done at least as much for the advancement of science and religion, for the progress of civilization, as any three missionaries or statesmen or men of scientific attainments of equal ability. And this fact suggests the mention of a very important social function, which can be best filled by young men of wealth and leisure. There are numerous important undertakings demanded by our modern civilization (such as geographical explorations, costly and intricate scientific experiments, and labored sociological investigations) which belong to no particular profession or pursuit, and which are the business of nobody in particular, which governments have no legitimate right to engage in, and which cannot return immediate pecuniary profit, but which can be carried out successfully by young men of leisure and money. They will reap thereby at least the gratification of a genuine personal ambition, and the consciousness of service to mankind.

One marked gain from archæological discoveries has been an enlargement of view with regard to the origins of civilization and a corresponding decrease of theological dogmatism. Some recent important results bearing upon this point are mentioned by Chief Justice Daly in his address as President of the American Geographical Society. In the Old Testament, for instance, we read of the Hittites, who there appear to be an unimportant tribe with whom the Israelites had some dealings. From Assyrian and Egyptian sources, however, it has been ascertained that they were once a powerful commercial and trading confederacy of Southern Syria, ultimately overthrown by the Assyrians about 700 years B.C. The ruins of their commercial capital have just been discovered in a huge mound on the western shore of the Lower Euphrates, by Mr. George Smith, the explorer of the ruins of Nineveh, whose attention was called to the mound by Mr. Skene, British consul at Aleppo. The language of the inscriptions on the ruins is neither Assyrian nor Egyptian, but something between the two; and it is now learned that various scattered remains, the inscriptions upon which have been a puzzle to archæologists, are of Hittite origin. The Hittites possessed a civilization of great antiquity: and important discoveries will be made, without doubt, as soon as the language has been learned. The deciphering of these long extinct languages is an achievement in which archæologists may deservedly take great pride; for it is a literal bringing of the dead to life again. At Nineveh, Smith and Layard have found the remains of what was once an immense library, the material written upon being of baked clay. By piecing together fragments of these thin "bricks," Mr. Smith has recovered three thousand inscriptions in the old cuneiform language of the Babylonians, each inscription having been written at least 2000 years B.C., and has learned, among other things, that the Chaldeans catalogued the stars and named the constellations, divided time into weeks, months, and years, and the week into seven days, six being days of labor and the seventh a day of rest, to which they gave a name from which is derived our "Sabbath." They invented the sun-dial, the water-clock, and telescopes. Many of their customs with regard to lands and the use of money were analogous to those of modern nations; and the "bricks" contain also a distinct legend of the deluge, "substantially the same as the narrative in the Bible, except that the names are different." Archæology has already proven fully that the Old Testament contains a record of a tribe or nation whose laws and customs and superstitions and religions were paralleled by those of other tribes or nations around them; that scarcely anything was of distinctively Israelite origin; and that most of what has been supposed to be peculiar to that one nation was borrowed and adapted from others. R. C.

The little girl who was disappointed because her name could not be found in the Bible says: "Never mind! I will be such a good girl that, if ever another Bible is written, my name shall go into it."

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Labor Strikes.—Eleventh Annual Report of the (Massachusetts) Bureau of Statistics of Labor (Boston), January, 1880.—This is one of the series of interesting and valuable reports, regularly made for over ten years past to the Massachusetts Legislature of the Labor Bureau, of the State. These reports are of great interest from the subject with which they deal,—the condition of the laboring classes, who form so large a portion of the people, and with whose welfare that of every other class is more or less closely interwoven. They are specially valuable as setting forth the results of what is, or is designed to be, a careful, comprehensive, and discriminating study of facts, a rational and scientific method of investigation. The present report deals with five subjects,—Strikes, Convict Labor, the Statistics of Crime, Divorces, and the Social Life of Workingmen. Only the first of these, occupying some seventy pages of the report, will be considered in this paper, whose purpose is not any discussion of theories or philosophy of the general subject, but simply to present a brief summary of the facts gathered up, and of the conclusions drawn from them.

Extending over a period of nearly fifty years,—namely, from January 1, 1830, to November 1, 1879,—there were one hundred and fifty-nine strikes and lock-outs in the State. Fifty-nine of these took place among the mill operatives, thirty-four among the shoemakers, and ten among those engaged in building trades, making two-thirds of the whole. The remainder were divided among twenty-five different branches of labor, in numbers varying from one to seven strikes in each. They occurred in fifty-six cities and towns, extending from the sea-coast to the Connecticut River, and in several instances to North Adams, one of which, in 1871, became famous as the occasion for introducing Chinese labor into the shoe manufacture. Beside these, there was one strike on a continuous line of railroad extending out of the State. A classification, "not absolutely correct, but nearly so," of those engaged in one hundred and forty-six of these strikes, gives, as "the preponderating nativity": foreign-born, seventy-six; native, thirty-two; native and foreign, thirty-eight. The causes, or, rather the purposes sought to be effected, have been, in one hundred and eighteen cases, to prevent proposed reduction or secure desired advance in wages; in twenty-four instances, to reduce the hours of labor, especially, in the earlier years of the period named, to establish the "ten-hour system"; in fourteen, to enforce the rules of the trades unions or to resist those of the employers; while only three instances illustrated what the chief of the Bureau aptly terms "opposing the inevitable" in the attempt to resist the introduction of labor-saving machinery.

Of these various strikes, a few were quiet refusals to work. Others, more numerous, were accompanied by public meetings, street-parades, and noisy demonstrations on the part of the disaffected workers. Still others were characterized by violent assaults on property and persons, especially those laborers called in to fill the places made vacant in mill and workshop; the resolute purpose being avowed to compel all such by threatened or actual violence to withdraw. In some instances, an extra police force had to be employed to preserve the public peace, and the militia summoned to suppress the riots which ensued. The trades unions and other organizations of the workmen were charged with encouraging and abetting such violent measures. This was often denied on their part. But one thing seems evident,—that they were either indisposed or unable to prevent them.

The results of these efforts for the redress of their grievances on the part of the workers may be thus stated. Leaving out the one contest still pending at the time of writing the report, and nine whose results are not known, of the remaining one hundred and forty-nine, the strikers were successful in securing their object in eighteen cases; in six, they were partly successful; in sixteen, a compromise was effected between the employers and the employed,—leaving one hundred and fifty-nine in which they were entirely unsuccessful, either throwing themselves completely out of work, or being compelled to seek employment elsewhere, or consenting to return to their places under the very rules and on the very terms against which they revolted.

There were two places in which the frequency, extent, and violence of the strikes made them to stand out conspicuously and gave them notoriety far and wide. These were the cities of Lynn and Fall River. In the former place, the shoe manufacture had first and prominently established itself, employing large numbers of men and women, with heavy investment of capital. At one time, particularly, the organization of workers known as the Crispins, having acquired an extensive membership and influence, and virtually combining to dictate terms to the manufacturers, naturally provoked the determined resistance of the latter. The antagonism became more and more developed and persistent, and harmony of action was rendered impossible. All concession or compromise repudiated, the conflict could be closed only by the submission of one party or the other. So it was renewed and continued to the bitter end. On the side of capital, of course was power. There could be but one ending,—that which came at last,—the overthrow of the workers and the crippling of their organization. The intensity of the conflict in Fall River was owing to a combination of causes. The rapid and abnormal growth of the city; the exaggerated development of the manufacturing operations; the unreliable and irresponsible management to which they were committed, resulting in the criminal breaches of trust that have since become everywhere known; the necessary and sudden introduction of a large class of ignorant, impulsive, excitable operatives, the easy victims of the designing, through the force of numbers and passions soon dominating the more quietly disposed,—these and other causes produced a state of chronic distrust and suspicion between employer and employed. This, if aggravated, as it doubtless was, by the unreasonable demands and riotous violence of the latter, was as certainly fed by the supercilious contempt and despotic temper manifested by the former. This spirit is evidenced in the reply made by the manufacturers, when, prior to the last strike in that city, the operatives proposed an arbitration. "Such means of settling disputes between employers and employed are not in consonance with the methods of doing business in this country, and we do not propose to inaugurate the plan." On what basis of fact they placed the first part of their statement, it is hard to see. Certainly, a country which, like ours, professes to honor labor and respect man, one would think precisely the place where the rights of the laboring man should be recognized, and his participation in the determination of the terms of the contract between himself and his employer conceded. As to arbitration of their differences being contrary to American business habits, nothing is more familiar, we might almost say more frequent, than the determination of other business controversies by boards of referees, in which the very principle involved in the method of arbitration employed by some of the English manufacturing interests is adopted. Such arbitration has also been resorted to in several instances during the conflicts of the last fifty years, and not without favorable results; though, for appreciable reasons, these results were partial and temporary. But the spirit which prompted the latter portion of the reply above quoted it is not difficult to discern. It is the determination to dictate, unquestioned, the terms on which it will have the service of labor. This spirit is no more justifiable on the part of employers than the similar spirit so often exhibited on the part of the strikers. For, whether manifested by combinations of manufacturers, prescribing wages and methods without regard to the wishes or welfare of the employed, or by unions of wage-workers prohibiting the hiring of non-members and arbitrarily controlling the action of the affiliated, it is alike false in principle and mischievous in its effects. It is "not in consonance" with the genius of our American life; and it directly fosters and increases distrust, misunderstanding, and antagonism between employer and employed.

Digitized by Google

The facts thus summarily presented lead inevitably to certain conclusions.

These strikes have not benefited the laboring classes, certainly not to any desirable or satisfactory extent. More than two-thirds of them utter failures, about one in eight only attaining their object, and as many settled by mutual concession,—this is very far from an encouraging exhibit. But this is not all that can be said of their futility. Even in the few instances classed as successful, this was not always the result of the strike itself, but of other causes, already at work, which would of themselves, sooner or later, have accomplished the same result without it.

They have entailed fearful losses on those engaged in them. These losses were twofold. First, of work; and this not only for a few weeks or months, but often long-continued or permanent loss. Frequently, the participants, at least portions of them, have been deprived of the opportunity of again obtaining work, or have been compelled to remove elsewhere to secure it; and only then, perhaps, after much delay, expense, and difficulty. Sometimes the strike has had the effect to break up the business with which it was connected, or to transfer it to some other and distant locality. But most startling is the actual loss in wages inflicted by the strikers upon themselves and upon those willingly or unwillingly associated with them. The entire amount of this loss for the fifty years cannot be stated, as no definite statistics of some of the strikes can be obtained. The result, however, is given in numerous instances; and during the successive strikes in Fall River it is estimated that $1,400,000 was forfeited by the idleness of the operatives. From this, some general idea may be reached of the immense, wasteful sacrifice to the laboring classes of the State by the hundred and fifty-nine strikes in which they have indulged during the last half-century. What measures of arbitration might not have been wisely undertaken, even at the cost of the surrender of pride and self-will, and even the introduction of new measures not deemed altogether "in consonance" with usual business habits, to have prevented such sacrifice! What measures of coöperative industry and traffic, manufacturing or trading, might not have been successfully sustained by such an amount of wages saved instead of sunk! What months and years of steady working, even at the increased pay,—supposing it to have been secured, as in most cases it was not,—would be necessary to replace the amount thus recklessly thrown away!

A still more lamentable result of the strikes has been the demoralization produced. Besides the bitter animosity excited between the opposing classes, the passions aroused led often to infractions of the peace and to various forms of actual crime. What was reported of the riots on the Western Railroads in 1877 is but an extreme illustration of what in only less degree has been often seen nearer at hand. "Every large strike in this State," says our report, "has increased the criminal list of the city or town in which it has occurred," and confirms the assertion by reference to the last strike of the spinners in Fall River, and the arrest of a large number of them for various offences; the assaults by the mob in this and in previous strikes; and the injuries to persons and property committed during the Crispin strikes in the western part of the State.

In view of these facts,—the failures, the serious pecuniary losses, the personal demoralization, the public disorder, the increased hostility between employer and employed, which are the inevitable attendants of strikes,—the worker will do well to hesitate long before he adopt such method to remedy his grievances. Nor less essential is it for the employer to avoid inflicting any grievance; to remember that obligation is not all on one side; that the duty of consideration and forbearance is reciprocal; and that, above all, anything like a despotic use of power is to be avoided. Of such spirit, strikes are the natural fruit. With the prevalence of a different temper, they might be averted. "There are factories in the State in which strikes are unknown, and where the condition of the employed is made an object of care on the part of the employer." Says one of the latter, "Strikes are unnecessary, or, at least, can usually be avoided. . . . We have seldom failed to avoid them by meeting the operatives like men, and treating them with consideration." Mutual recognition of rights, mutual sense of obligation; all the more patience and forbearance on the part of the wiser and stronger party, because of the weakness and ignorance of the other; mutual concession and conciliation, instead of supercilious conceit, dogged obstinacy, and chronic hostility,—these alone can resolve discord into harmony and supplant conflict with reconciliation. F. H.

A MINISTER was questioning his Sunday-school concerning the story of Eutychus, the young man who, listening to the preaching of the Apostle Paul, fell asleep, and, falling down, was taken up dead. "What," he said, "do we learn from this solemn event?" when the reply from a little girl came pat and prompt, "Please, sir, ministers should learn not to preach too long sermons."

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE HISTORICAL POETRY OF THE ANCIENT HEBREWS. Translated and critically examined by Michael Heilprin. Volume II. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.

This second volume of Heilprin's Historical Hebrew Poetry comes forth, like its predecessor, Volume I., without preface or introductory note of any sort to indicate the author's plan or purpose or theological attitude. But it is a work in which one does not have to read far before discovering that the author is a master of his difficult theme; that he is thoroughly conversant with all the scholarship bearing upon it, and as thoroughly confident of his way to the goal he has set for himself. That goal is to cull all the historical poetry of the Hebrew Bible, determine as far as possible its age, and set it in true connection with the national events which it refers to or describes.

Nor does the reader proceed far in the book before discovering that he is in contact with a scholar who treats the Biblical record with the entire freedom of the most advanced scientific criticism. Here is no remnant of the old faith in a special divine inspiration, interfering with the intellectual liberty of treatment. The doctrine of divine inspiration is not argued, it is true: it is left behind, and the author proceeds quietly but firmly on the assumption that the Hebrew Bible is a collection of human productions, having all the marks of human authorship and editorship. There is always ample respect shown in the treatment, ample reverence of a genuine sort, but none of the awe that prevents the approach of the truth-seeking critic. The author belongs, indeed, to that increasing class of Biblical scholars who are revolutionizing the traditional doctrine concerning the Bible, by the very calmness of the well-equipped and well-poised scholarship with which they treat it as a human work, to be studied and judged like all other ancient literatures.

Mr. Heilprin's book is not intended for popular reading. It is a book rather for theological students, for preachers, for all who have anything to do with the teaching of religion. Yet it should be in all public libraries. The results of such books must go to the people in time. One effect of such books, and of this in particular, is to remove the veil of illusion through which, on account of the traditional theological indoctrination, Christian readers of the Old Testament read into it, especially into its poetical and prophetical parts, their own preconceived religious ideas. They see "Christ" and the "Christian Church," and the dominant doctrines of Christianity prefigured everywhere. This book breaks all the links in this chain of religious idealization, and sets the text before us in the real genetic relations it had with its own time, and with the meaning which the old Hebrew readers or hearers themselves received from it. And in the interest of truth, in the interest of a fair comparison between the Hebrew and other ancient religious records, this is just what we want.

The publishers have done their part well. The paper is of the thickest and whitest, the type of the clearest, the page of the handsomest, the whole volume comely.

The author's task evidently is not yet near its end. When it is, we hope he will give us not only an index, but a table of contents. The latter especially is much needed, since the chapters are as void of titles as are the whole volumes of a preface.

For the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

DUMB POETS.

All poets have not speech; nay, there are some Whose hearts are full of poetry; who yearn
To utter forth the earnest words that burn
Upon their lips, and yet the lips are dumb.
The subtle sense may thrill with ecstasy
At sight of nature's infinite beauty, hear
Her secret voices hymning sweet and clear,
Yet have no gift to pipe the melody.
As in some cloistered cave, where foot of man
Ne'er waked an echo, shapes of beauty grow,
Lustring the darkness with their own pure g'ow;
So some rare spirits, under hopeless ban
Of silence and of shadow, haply seek
To live the poetry they cannot speak.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. C. APLIN.

Digitized by Google

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, July 1, 1880.

The absorbing social topic to-day is the marriage of a mulatto to a white woman, and the subsequent adventures of the pair. The morning papers give the details. On Wednesday, June 9, Mr. Frank Skillman, a mulatto, after a courtship lasting over a year, married Miss Lizzie French, a young white woman of a respectable family in this city. The Saturday following the marriage, the lady left her mother's house and joined her husband. They lived happily together, until a white woman, who had been acquainted with Mr. Skillman many years, charged him with shortcomings, and the bride returned to her mother's home. On June 16, a brother of the bride called at the residence of her husband to obtain his sister's effects. A quarrel ensued, shots were exchanged, and a bullet from Mr. French's pistol killed instantly a little girl aged ten years, standing at a mirror beyond the intended victim. Mr. French was released on a $1,000 appearance bond, a coroner's jury having decided the killing to be accidental. On the 28th inst., the husband applied to the Superior Criminal Court for a writ of habeas corpus, asserting that John and Sarah French, the parents, detained his wife illegally at their residence. The family employed a lawyer, and the case was continued to 3 P.M. yesterday; but, owing to absence of parties as witnesses in another court, where the killing of the little girl was being investigated, it was not until 6 P.M. that the parties arrived at the private office of Judge Whitaker where the case was tried. There were present the judge, clerk, two attorneys, the parents and brother, the married couple, and members of the press. Skillman's petition was read; also the parents' answer, denying their daughter to be lawfully married or illegally held, and claiming their right to protect her. The daughter, being called to the stand, testified that she was the lawful wife of Mr. Skillman, having been married at the St. Louis Cathedral. She was, however, not restrained by force; but her parents, to whom she returned on condition of being forgiven, had not forgiven her, but threatened to cast her off if she did not keep away from her husband. She wanted to go to her husband, though her parents had treated her kindly. The judge asked, "How old are you?" Reply: "Twenty-four years." The judge then briefly advised the young lady that, as she was lawfully married, and desired to return to her husband, she was at liberty to do so. Nobody had any right to prevent her, and the court could force her to go with him. The law would protect her in living with him. The wife repeated that she would go with her husband, when Judge Whitaker said, "Then go." The attorney directed Mr. Skillman to take his wife, when the mother arose, threw up both hands, her eyes filled with tears, and said, "No, you shall not go with him." The young wife, however, arose; and her mother ordered her to give up her ear-rings. She was in the act of loosening them, when the brother rose, and fired two shots at the husband, who was standing at the door, waiting for his wife. He ran to the corner of the room, where his wife threw herself in front of him. Her mother tried to tear her from him, and was taken out of the room. The brother was at once seized, disarmed, and put under arrest. The wounded man was laid on a sofa, when his wife knelt beside him, and wiped away the blood from a wound in the right side of the head. A cab was sent for, and Mr. Skillman and his wife walked to the vehicle, as a large crowd in front of the building shouted, hooted, and yelled. Mr. Skillman is now in the Charity Hospital, where his wounds are pronounced to be slight, and his wife gives him due attention. The brother was released from custody to-day on a $1,500 appearance bond.

The above is the outline of the Times report, confirmed in every respect by other sources of information. It is the first affair of the kind brought prominently to the attention of New Orleans society. The wedded couple appear to have deliberately followed the dictates of their own consciences, in defiance of strong race-prejudices. They have acquitted themselves bravely, and it now remains to be seen whether the law is strong enough to protect them in the enjoyment of a peaceful wedded life. The readers of the Index will hold various opinions on the subject of marriage, and may approve or disapprove of what is usually called "miscegenation"; but most of them will probably admit that, as slavery is abolished and citizen-rights are equal, the law has been well administered in this case. When it is remembered that, during the slave period, race-prejudice was not powerful enough to prevent marriages in fact, though not in law, it may well be doubted that it will long hold out under the era of freedom to prevent a change from a species of Mormonism to lawful marriage. Representatives of Christian churches, contact with the Union army, and influences of education in operation since the war, have instilled in the minds of the blacks a fair regard for the institution of marriage. With the whites, however, the system of concubinage, an attendant evil of slavery, still prevails to a considerable extent. Astonishing as it may seem to readers of the Index, a bill to punish public adultery, introduced in the Louisiana Legislature, session of 1878, by Representative Routon, of Catahoula Parish, was voted down with jeers and laughter. It had been introduced to cover a special case (although general in its provisions), on the discovery that the statutes of Louisiana did not provide any adequate punishment for the crime of public adultery. One prominent legislator declared that it was a "most mischievous" bill, and, if passed, would seriously interfere with the social relations of several hundred respectable citizens in every parish of the State. I have read the bill carefully, and have seen the indorsement of a United States senator, then chairman of the judiciary committee, to an adverse report. I listened to his speech against the bill, and heard him assert as an objection to it the very reasons which friends of sound morality would urge for its passage. I refer to this incidentally with the "miscegenation" case, in order that the facts may have full weight in the formation of just opinion for all parties concerned. I think the weight of evidence favors the lawful marriage of the races, in opposition to the free-love sentiment, whether it be shielded by race-prejudice, tolerance of unlimited individual liberty, or cloaked by Mormon rites. If there is anything criminal, unnatural, or undesirable in "miscegenation," it is worse than folly for our excellent members of society to condone the unlawful participants, and then assemble in crowds to "shout, hoot, and yell" at those who have some regard for common decency, and demonstrate it by complying with the lawful forms. It is the boast of the late slave-holders that they have been instruments in the hands of Providence to take barbarians of Africa, and bring them in contact with Anglo-Saxon civilization: it is the boast of Unionists that they have broken the fetters and given citizen-rights to those "civilized" barbarians. The path of fraternal statesmanship may lie in the direction of amalgamation and obliteration of all race-differences. American ideas of liberty and religion seem to favor that final disposition of discordant elements. †

FOREIGN.

THE recent opening of new wards in the North Eastern Children's Hospital was attended by their Royal Highnesses, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. During the proceedings, which included the presentation by little girls of twelve purses in aid of the funds of the institution, it was announced that the Duchess would maintain in one of the new wards a cot to be named after herself.

WE clip from the Weekly Despatch's "Items of News" this little illustration of the majesty of British law: "It has been decided by the Home Secretary not to interfere in a case in which he had been memorialized with reference to the action of the Bristol magistrates in sending to an industrial school, for six years, Elizabeth Flowers, nine years of age, for stealing pansies which were handed to her from a private garden by younger children. The mother had to be forcibly pulled away from the child, when the latter was removed."

THE Queen of England's and Empress of India's government are at work figuring the cost of the Afghan war. They find that it foots up to a much larger sum than expected. A statement from India says: "We consider that it will be necessary to add at least £4,000,000 to our estimate of the cost of the war in 1880–81. We can only speak now with much reserve of the total amount which the war, apart from the frontier railways, will ultimately cost. The responsible officers in the military department still confidently expect that its cost will not be nearly so much as £10,000,000; but we are unable at present to reconcile this expectation with the actual outgoings from our treasuries."

A PASTORAL letter from Cardinal Manning, dated Rome, was read last month in the Westminster archdiocese. His Eminence wrote that every year made more urgent the duty of preserving the religious education of Christian children. Almost every European government claimed to exercise the right to educate which God had given to the Church, and in which no distinction was drawn between secular and religious education. Germany, Italy, Belgium, and France had united in a common policy of making themselves masters of the schools, and expelling Christianity and the pastors from the work of educating the young. It was impossible to find a subject in which all Christians and Catholics were so resolved as in preserving inviolate the Christian education of children. The whole conflict between anti-Christian revolution and the Christian Church would be decided in the schools.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

CARL PETERSON, the celebrated Danish explorer of the Arctic regions, is dead.

A SECOND and much-enlarged edition of Moncure D. Conway's Demonology and Devil Lore is in press, the first having been exhausted both in England and this country. The studies of epilepsy at Salpêtrière, as represented in Dr. Bourneville's reports, will be connected with the ancient belief in demoniacal possession.

REV. A. ST. JOHN CHAMBRE, of Franklin, Mass., a prominent Universalist clergyman, has severed his connection with the Universalist denomination to join the Episcopal Church. If we mistake not, Mr. Chambre began his ministry as an Episcopalian, and has always retained since strongly pronounced sympathies for the forms and spirit of his former fellowship.

IT is announced that Charles Reade, owing to his conversion, has abandoned writing for the stage. He is said to be a constant attendant at Bible-classes and prayer-meetings, and to contemplate preaching. It would seem as though there is reason to fear that a very able and effective playwright and novelist may be lost to the world in the zeal and piety of the new convert.

OF Thoreau's first work, only about two hundred copies were sold; and his publisher returned him seven hundred, which he was nearly five years in paying for. He was good-natured about it, for he wrote: "I have now a library of nearly nine hundred volumes, over seven hundred of which I wrote myself. Is it not well that the author should behold the fruits of his labor?" His books sell better and better every year now, but he has been dead ten or fifteen years. In his case, his works did not follow him.

JESTINGS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: "Annie, what must we do to be forgiven?" Annie: "We must sin."

A CHILD, being asked what were the three great feasts of the Jews, promptly and not unnaturally replied, "Breakfast, dinner, and supper."

A VAGRANT called at a house on a Sunday, and begged for some cider. The lady refused to give him any; and he reminded her of the oft-quoted remark, "that she might entertain an angel unawares." "Yes," said she, "but angels don't go about drinking cider on Sundays."

AT a camp-meeting, a venerable sister began the hymn:—

"My soul, be on your guard;
Ten thousand foes arise."

She began too high. "Ten thousand," she screeched, and stopped. "Start her at five thousand," tried a converted stock-broker present.—Omaha Herald.

CASH RECEIPTS

OTHER THAN DONATIONS, FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 17.

A. W. Balch, $3; Miss H. E. Stevenson, $1; Geo. Draper, 25 cents; J. L. Whiting, $1.25; E. W. Gunn, $4.25; M. P. Williams, $3; Dr. Edw. Evans, $3.60; A. L. Leuterbusch, $1; Chas. S. Knowles, $2.20; Andrew Jackson Davis, $3; Joseph Knight, $3.20; J. H. Clewell, $16; American News Company, $3.76; J. J. Dunlop, $3.10; J. W. Pike, $1.75; Smith Wright, $3; John S. Miller, $3; W. C. Preston, $3; F. F. Morrill, $8.50; Rev. W. H. Channing, $2; Chas. A. Allen, $3; Joseph Robbins, $3.20; J. W. Griffin, $3.20; Wm. M. Thorup, $3; E. S. Westcott, $3.25; Isaac N. Sterne, $3.20; J. E. Jester, 10 cents; Mrs. H. L. Watson, $1.50; L. G. Janes, $2; M. B. Edinger, $3; J. R. Hawley, 65 cents; Theo. Altschul, $3; I. W Graffam, $3.20; C. A. Greenleaf, $1.50; Wm. D. Pitt, $3.20; C. D. Presho, $3; A. Williams & Co., $5.40; Eben Turk, $3; Miss H. E. Stevenson, $3; Miss F. M. Cushing, $3.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 "	. . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51 "	. . .	6c. " "
" 52 "	. . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten sermons and practical prayers on speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, Frederic Henry Hedge, Charles Lowe, Octavius Brooks Frothingham, Samuel Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.

II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.

III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.

IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.

V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)

VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9) can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass

MR. MILLS' LECTURES.

1. The Advances of Science in our Time: What do they promise for Man?
2. The Birthplace and Cradle of our Civilization; or, The Indebtedness of West to East, to Asia.
3. The Labor Question.
4. The Mission of the New Thought not to Destroy, but to Fulfil.

STUDIES IN ANCIENT LITERATURE. — Four Lectures.

1. The Gnomic Wisdom of the East, India, Persia, etc.
2. The Poetic Thought and Religious Sentiment of the East.
3. Greek Wisdom, or Pythagoras and his Institution.
4. Greek Religion and Mythology.

REPRESENTATIVE MEN OF OUR TIME.—Three Lectures.

1. Huxley.
2. Max Müller.
3. Emerson.

For terms, etc., address
CHARLES DEB. MILLS,
Syracuse, N.Y.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00. Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." — LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 553.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 5.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, JULY 29, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

A MAN should say, I am not concerned that I have no place; I am concerned how I may fit myself for one. I am not concerned that I am not known, I seek to be worthy to be known.

Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles. If the will be set on virtue, there will be no practice of wickedness.— Confucius.

WHO honors truth in word and deed, O Mazda, he best serves and worships thee.

Come to me, ye high realities. Grant me your immortality, your duration of possession forever!— Zoroastrian Prayer.

WHEN the soul and the body are united, nature orders the soul to rule and govern, and the body to obey and serve; now which of these two functions is akin to the divine? and which to the mortal? The soul resembles the divine, and the body the mortal. But then, if the soul is really immortal, what care should be taken of her, not only in respect of the portion of time which is called life, but of eternity.— Socrates.

THE world-life is a struggle between the good and bright powers on the one side, and the offspring of chaotic matter, or nature's disturbing powers, on the other. This struggle reaches also into man's being. The spirit went forth from the good powers; the body belongs to the under-world: the two powers contend with each other for the dominion. Should the spirit gain the victory through virtue and bravery, man ascends to heaven after death, in order to fight in concert with the good against the evil powers. But if the body triumphs, and links the spirit to itself by weakness and low desires, he then sinks down after death to the under-world, and joins in with the evil powers in the combat against the good.

This struggle of the world-life shall end in a final battle, in which the contending powers mutually destroy each other, and the created world is involved in their destruction. But it shall come forth again, more glorious and purified. An eternal God, greater than all other powers, shall arise as its ruler, and as the judge of departed souls. Before his power shall evil depart forever, and the struggle end in the triumph of good.— Norse Religion.

I FIND then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members.—Paul.

NO CONFLICT is so severe as his who labors to subdue himself; but in this we must be continually engaged, if we would be strengthened in the inner man, and make real progress toward perfection. Assuredly, in the approaching day of universal judgment, it will not be inquired what we have read, but what we have done; not how eloquently we have spoken, but how holily we have lived.— A Kempis.

BEAUTY and Truth, and all that these contain,
Drop not like ripened fruit about our feet;
We climb to them through years of sweat and pain;
Without long struggle, none did e'er attain
The downward look from Quiet's blissful seat:
Though present loss may be the hero's part,
Yet none can rob him of the victor heart,
Whereby the broad-realmed future is subdued;
And Wrong, which now insults from triumph's car,
Sending her vulture hope to raven far,
Is made unwilling tributary of Good.— Lowell.

CURRENT TOPICS.

OUGHT not President McCosh, of Princeton College, to be arrested for blasphemy? Speaking of the recent fatal epidemic in the college, he called it "a dispensation sent to chasten and humble" the persons concerned. Of course he meant "sent by God." Yet in the same discourse he told the students that "effective measures had been taken to remove its cause."

THE letter of acceptance of Gen. Garfield is not in all respects just such a document as was hoped for by some who expect to give him their vote next autumn. It is weak in certain points where it should be strong, and vague where it should be clear and definite. Nevertheless, it is on the whole a more than average piece of such writing. The passage which refers to the importance of preserving the integrity of our school system will especially commend itself to the liberals of the country. It is evident that the prospective President sees "breakers ahead," and would prepare for them.

WILL liberals be as severely self-critical with regard to their conduct as the Christian Union is, with regard to the lives of professing Christians, in this paragraph? "The dangers that threaten the Church and the community to-day do not come from a single Professor Clifford, who does not believe that a creator is the best hypothesis to explain the creation, but from a hundred thousand professing Christians who have got God in their creeds, but no God in their lives; who believe in him with their reverence in church on Sunday, but rarely or never with their acquisitiveness in the store on Monday. They do not come from a Mr. Ingersoll, who believes that no one is totally depraved — unless he is an orthodox Christian; but from ten thousand orthodox believers, each one of whom is convinced that all the world is depraved — except himself. They come not from the small but select school who have expunged the divinity of Christ from their unwritten creeds, but from the great body of orthodox congregations who parley with him for half an hour on Sunday and leave him without the door of their lives all the week."

THE Christian Leader (Universalist) falls into this strain of meditation, in view of recent events: "When the editor of the Christian Register presides at a banquet given in honor of the editor of the frankest as well as ablest anti-Christian paper in the country, what does it signify? When the speeches and letters of the occasion come almost unanimously from gentlemen who are marked with a "Rev.," what does it mean? And when this Christian editor and these admiring reverends exhaust the vocabulary of compliment in praising the "great," "eminent," and "distinguished" services of the editor of the Index, what do they mean? Mr. Abbot is a gentleman and a scholar, though, as he insists, not a Christian. But the banquet was not tendered him for his politeness or his erudition. It is understood by everybody that he was complimented for his Indexism. The only services for which he is at all distinguished are those rendered in the attempt to overthrow Christianity. These are the services which so excite the enthusiasm of Messrs. Ames, Chadwick, Connor, Batchelor, Savage, and Longfellow." We shall not try to answer these conundrums, but leave them to those whom they concern more than ourselves.

WE are compelled to confess great astonishment at learning the terms of agreement by which Mr. B. F. Underwood has withdrawn the libel suit which he was to bring against the publisher of the Truth-seeker. We fully appreciate the difficulties and almost intolerable annoyances involved in such a suit, and that the temptation is great to escape one if possible. It is true, also, that Mr. Underwood secures a complete and unqualified retraction of the charges which had been made against his character, and that these charges are further shown to rest on no foundation whatever. This vital point is to be borne in mind with all the emphasis that belongs to it. But, to our thinking, Mr. Underwood has secured this only by allowing himself to be drawn into a partnership for whitewashing the character of the man who published the charges, and by giving to him, so far as he (Mr. Underwood) is concerned, as clean a bill of moral health as he claims for himself,—a position that looks to us sadly humiliating. Mr. Underwood has always been an excellent friend of the Index, and is one of its valued contributors. We shall be very glad to learn of anything that will change the present aspect of the case as our eyes see it.

IN Maryland the law requires that witnesses in Court shall swear on "the Holy Evangels of Almighty God," and kiss the Bible. Is it not quite time that this law was repealed, since it sometimes rules out the very witnesses whose testimony would be most conscientiously truthful? A case in point, of recent occurrence in one of the Courts of the State, is thus described in a local paper: "A witness, who had been summoned on a pending case, was challenged on the ground of infidelity, and, the charge being sustained by sworn testimony, the Court refused to receive his evidence. Being then allowed to make a statement, the challenged party, with uplifted hand, declared that he believed 'in a Great First Cause, —he did not know, nor could not tell what it was,' but said he 'did not believe in the Jewish Jehovah of which we read so much.' The scene was impressive: complete silence reigned, the members of the bar ceased writing, those in the jury box, the officers of the Court, and the large audience, all seeming to suspend breathing while this unusual scene was transpiring. After the Court adjourned, expressions of regret were heard on all sides; and one of the judges remarked that, during his whole professional life, he had never had a like experience."

Digitized by Google

For the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

DINNER TO FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

ON RETIRING FROM THE EDITORSHIP OF "THE INDEX," AT YOUNG'S HOTEL, BOSTON, JUNE 25, 1880.

A Complimentary Gathering of his Friends in Boston and Vicinity.

FULL REPORT OF ADDRESS BY THE CHAIRMAN, REV. CHARLES G. AMES, AND RESPONSE BY MR. ABBOT, AND OF SPEECHES BY REV. ROWLAND CONNOR, DR. EDWARD WIGGLESWORTH, REV. W. J. POTTER, REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR, DR. C. H. HORSCH, MR. S. H. MORSE, URIEL H. CROCKER, ESQ., AND REV. W. H. SPENCER.

Numerous Letters from Absent Friends in America and England.

The origin of the flattering testimonial of regard which was tendered to Mr. Abbot by his friends on quitting his editorial post, and which took the form of a Complimentary Dinner at Young's Hotel, Boston, on June 25, is sufficiently explained by the following circular:—

BOSTON, Mass., May 17, 1880.

DEAR SIR:—

With the last day of June next, the connection of Mr. Francis E. Abbot as editor of THE INDEX terminates. We who, like so many others, have been interested in the success and influence of that paper, who have observed how intimately blended with it have been Mr. Abbot's life and efforts for the ten years of its existence, and who have been warmly attached to him under the spell of his strong, manly, yet beautiful character, desire now to give him the honor and his many friends the pleasure of a social meeting and a dinner. The suggestion is a purely friendly and voluntary one on our part, and Mr. Abbot is as yet quite ignorant of the matter.

Rev. M. J. Savage has consented to preside at the dinner, and we hope to make the occasion one of rare enjoyment. We sincerely trust that you will find it convenient to attend, in anticipation of which we request you to send a note of acceptance to Mr. J. A. J. Wilcox, 8 Pemberton Square, Boston, Mass., as soon as possible.

The meeting and dinner will be at Young's Hotel, Boston, on the 25th June, at 6 P.M.

Very truly yours,

M. J. SAVAGE.
WM. J. POTTER.
E. WIGGLESWORTH, M.D.
F. V. BALCH.
H. K. OLIVER, JR., M.D.
CHAS. E. PRATT.
J. A. J. WILCOX.

In response to this invitation, about fifty gentlemen assembled at Young's at the time named, and after about an hour of agreeable social converse sat down to a banquet prepared with all the taste and elegance for which this well-known hotel is noted. Among those present were Rev. George A. Thayer, Alexander Foster, J. F. Barrett, S. P. Lord of Lynn, Seth Hunt, J. L. Cutler, Dr. A. Alexander of Dorchester, David H. Clark, John Curtis of Grantville, James Dillaway of Somerville, S. D. Bardwell of Shelburne Falls, N. T. Allen of West Newton, F. H. Buchanan of Amesbury, Charles Ellis of Essex, H. P. Hyde, S. S. Green of Worcester, George W. Park of Cambridge, Frederick Beck, the Rev. S. H. Winkley, J. A. J. Wilcox of Chelsea, H. W. Wellington and Cornelius Wellington of Lexington, Charles Nash of Worcester, George H. Ellis, Dr. Aldrich of Fall River, John L. Whiting, D. G. Crandon of Chelsea, John C. Haynes, the Hon. S. E. Sewell, William H. Hamlin, S. B. Weston of Leicester, Mass., T. L. Savage, George R. Taber, and others.

The Rev. Charles G. Ames, editor of the Boston Christian Register, presided. After the play of knife and fork had about ceased, he rose, called the company to order, and spoke as follows.

Address of the Chairman.

There is a point beyond which eating ceases to be virtuous; yet our banquet is not at an end,—the best is to come. We are to serve up a live man. We are all cannibals to-night. Confucius says, "All can eat and drink; but only a few can distinguish the flavor." Precisely because we think we can distinguish the flavor, we are ready for the next course of this entertainment, and every mouth waters for ABBOT. [Applause.]

As to the Chairman that has been put upon you for the evening, the question has been raised whether he might not be found in the position of the old German soldier in Pennsylvania, who fought in the American Revolution, and who, after being warmed up a little more than I have been, was brought forward on a Fourth of July, to tell stories of the war. "Did you ever see Washington?" they asked. "Nein, I never seen Vashington." "Why, how was that?" "Oh, I vos on de oder side." But, without pretending to any harmony of opinion which does not exist, I cannot admit that, in all the recent controversies, I was "on the other side." I hold it forever true that all honest men agree in a sense ten thousand fold more serious than their differences, and that, in standing for simple honesty, they are forever under the same flag. And we are not here to-night to fight over old battles, nor to rake open the embers of former controversies. We are here to pay a tribute to personal worth, because we believe in it and recognize it. Others will speak of Mr. Abbot's work: let me speak of himself. I want to use him as an argument for religious faith. Some of us, who hold fast to the old-fashioned notion that there is a God in Israel and in the universe, are very glad to find any sign of His presence in the human race, any evidence that He has been here; and what better proof can there be of the higher wisdom and goodness than to find a sample of it, some share of wisdom and goodness, in human form? The hardest point to get round in the theistic argument is to explain why such a father as we take God to be should have such a family as we find ourselves to be. We manage this difficulty by taking it for granted that His children are not brought up yet, that they are still in early infancy; and so, by following out the general conclusion to which evolution points, our faith finds rest and joy in hope. And when we light now and then on an honest and faithful man, with clear eyes in his head, we are ready to say, This is the kind of crop God means to raise; and it is well worth His while to make a world and run it for a few millions of years for the sake of such a harvest.

The test of virtue is in soldierly qualities,—in loyalty and capacity for resistance. In Francis Abbot, we honor a gallant soldier,—a man who has shown the courage of conviction and of fidelity under fire, the highest, finest form of courage tested by subtlest exposure. We honor also the poise and self-possession which help a man to keep his head amid moral contradictions and confusions, and, like the old classic heroes, "not to be frightened by the snorting of the horses." [Applause.] We have seen this man in the exciting conflict of opinions. When has he ever betrayed any concern for himself which qualified his concern for the triumph of truth? Who ever knew him to deal a foul blow or to use a poisoned weapon? The sword-cuts from an honest soldier's blows bring their own balsam; and who would not rather bear the smart and stanch the blood of fair and square fighting than wipe away the beslavering of cowardly flattery and pretended friendship?

Our gathering is something more than a reunion of those who have contended on the same side in recent controversies: it is a recognition of qualities which are praiseworthy wherever they appear, on every side of every question. The exchange of civilities between those who agree costs little and means nothing: the exchange of civilities between those who differ is one of the finest influences of the world, and is a power for uplifting society out of its debasing bigotries. When rebel and Yankee pickets exchanged tobacco across the lines, humanity spoke above the clangor of arms, and a pledge was given of the ultimate restoration of the Union.

But this occasion represents something still better than an exchange of signals between men who differ; for we honor to-night a soldier of universal principles,—a man who has a right to look around on the world without confronting a single enemy, for he has never given up to party what was meant for mankind. He has never thought it necessary to purchase peace, nor harmony, nor fellowship, at the cost of liberty or truth, because he looked beyond conflict to the time when the victories of righteousness would bring enduring peace.

I see in Mr. Abbot a passionate lover of truth and a passionate hater of lies. John Stuart Mill once said of the English, "They never feel safe, unless they are living under the shadow of some conventional fiction, some agreement to say one thing and mean another." Is not this insincerity the disease of society and of Christendom? But, if any institution wears a mask, it has never seemed possible for Mr. Abbot to keep his hands off. He is a born moral detective. Such service has its own peculiar peril, since a man runs the risk of becoming suspicious. There are ugly faces,—some of us come by them honestly; and I think he may sometimes have gone for an ugly face, imagining it to be a mask. But such a mistake is an indirect compliment to the Eternal Beauty, which his faith affirms has a right to shine out everywhere in God's universe. I think this instinct of the moral detective by divine appointment goes far to explain many points in his history. He is quite unable to look on human affairs with indifference, and quite unwilling to look off from such affairs.

Despite his professed renunciation of Christianity, I have actually caught him conforming to that precept of Jesus, "Call no man master, neither be called master"; for he is as averse to wearing the title as he is to conceding it. And, by warrant of another Christian principle, I feel authorized to pronounce that he is entitled to the applause of mankind. He is greatest who is servant of all; and, as Emerson says, "He serves all who dares be true."

But it is not my wish to monopolize the evening or its topics: there will be enough to say, and enough to say it. It is not easy to predict just where the lightning will strike, and I advise every one in the room to hold himself ready to respond or to run.

This is my contribution. The enemy of frauds and shams is every man's friend; the champion of purity is the defender of every household; the student and teacher of universal principles is the servant of all mankind; and the man who puts his life behind those principles is the "King of Hearts." As such, we salute him, and crown him with our love. God bless him! [Applause.]

Response by Mr. Abbot.

Mr. Chairman,—It is hardly fair to make a man officiate at his own funeral. I came here to be decently buried, and it was my chief ambition to conduct myself like a well-behaved corpse; and here you bring me up the first thing, and inform me that I am to be barbecued alive, which is a species of cannibalism not in order with corpses. [Laughter.] It is not easy to try to joke, gentlemen; I confess I feel very much touched at the exhibition of kind feeling which has come to me just now, when I am making a very marked change in my life, leaving an occupation to which I have given a decade, and going into something new, I hardly know what myself. You all step forward kindly, and with warm hands and warmer hearts and friendly eyes shake my hand, and bid me godspeed on my way. There is no doubt that your kindness comes to me with peculiar power just at this particular period in my life; and I can but thank you in all sincerity, with all the warmth of reciprocity, and assure you that the friendship which you here show to-night goes right straight home to my heart. At the same time, I find something in me refusing to accept this banquet as a merely personal act of kindness. We have all of us been drilled in the idea of avoiding man-worship, and steering clear of everything that looked like it; and it makes me feel so strange to be here, receiving a complimentary dinner, that I seek refuge from the very thought of it, and feel sure that what has really brought you together, my friends, is something that is very much larger than F. E. Abbot. Many of you I have never even met before to-night; some of you, perhaps, I have met but seldom; others are old, long-tried, and very dear friends. Now, it is very evident that there must be something more than any mere personal qualities of mine to bring persons here who never knew me, never touched my hand nor looked in my eyes. There is something more in it than just myself. If there were not something more, I could not deem myself quite an honest man to sit here, Mr. Chairman, and take what you have been saying to me. I think that this demonstration is an expression of moral support in the hard warfare that I have had to fight for two or three years back to vindicate the existence and reality in this world of an honorable liberalism. [Applause.] If it is not that, if that is not the real meaning of this gathering to-night, I shall go home, for one, sadly disappointed. I do not pretend to be wholly without vanity, but I have not got enough to accept this demonstration with eyes entirely blinded. I know perfectly well it means something more than any mere personal qualities can call forth. I take it, therefore, as an expression of your support in the very difficult task which has fallen to me in these late years; and I count it, therefore, as something more than of value to me. It is of value to your cause, it is of value to this community, that you here show that I have not been utterly alone in the conflict I have had to wage. To make this plain is of vastly more importance than to pay compliments to any man's record. To show the world that there is a strong longing among liberals themselves for an honorable liberalism, just, upright, and pure,—that is a public service which may well compensate you for the labor and the trouble of preparing this sumptuous feast. I hope that all who may hear or read of this gathering will so construe it, and that they will say: "It is not true that Abbot was alone. There were many friends who sympathized with him, though they had no way of expressing it publicly or collectively; and it appears now that they did in their hearts value the principles that Abbot stood for." [Applause.] If that is the meaning of this gathering, I feel that it will accomplish a good purpose, and be of great moral benefit to our common cause.

Digitized by Google

I do not think that anybody who has been in a situation other than that of an editor, in these recent years, can exactly or fully understand the overpowering necessity of this seemingly personal contest. I think it is true that some of my own friends have suspected me of having had after all, at the bottom of it, nothing more than a personal feud. As if it were anything to me what other papers did or what other editors said,—as if I cared the snap of my finger for the merely personal record of men who have nothing in common with me! I think that even some of my own personal friends have supposed that I was personally mortified and hurt at not being re-elected to the presidency of the National Liberal League two years ago. I have no doubt they did: that is the way men often judge each other. I doubt if it is easy for Americans to understand how one can go forward and say: "I nominate myself for this office. I offer myself as candidate, and solicit your votes, and ask to be elected." I don't believe that many people can understand how a man can do that, and yet not care at all personally for the office he seeks. Yet that was done: that was the truth of it. The cause of enlightened and pure-intentioned liberalism demanded representatives at that time, and it demands them still; and I look abroad with anxiety to find men willing to take up this work of defending a pure and upright and enlightened liberalism against the perfect avalanche of the sham. The world needs them to-day more than ever; and, I assure you, I don't run out of this fight voluntarily. If it were not a necessity thrust upon me, I would stay in this fight till I dropped dead in my tracks rather than abandon it; but there is no help for it.

Now I want to show you one little proof of this call to defend liberalism that I have spoken of. I hold in my hand a page torn out from the latest number of Scribner's Monthly, for July; and I want to read you one little sentence from it, to show you the pressing public necessity of just such work as the Index has been doing the past few years. This is what Dr. Holland says:—

"The great majority of the infidels of this country are heart and soul with Bennett." [By infidels, he means liberals.] "They have openly and blatantly confessed themselves to be sympathetic with the free-love doctrines of the man whom they have undertaken to make a hero and a martyr of. The Index makes one mistake. Mr. Bennett has not transformed his aiders and abettors in the infidel ranks into men and women like himself. He has only furnished them an occasion for the expression of their opinions and sympathies. He is not a man of such intellectual force and magnetic influence that he has been able to draw the great majority of infidels in the country after him, but he has been able to show, or rather the country has been able, through him and the sympathy manifested for him, to see that the prevailing infidel sentiment of this country is impure to the last degree, and is not to be trusted with any social interest or with any political influence whatever. The safety and purity of society rests, as it always has rested, with the believers in and professors of Christianity. The purer influences among the 'Liberals,' as they delight to call themselves, have been formally and effectually voted down."

The Index did not make the mistake here attributed to it, but I must sadly confess the substantial justice of Dr. Holland's conclusions from his premises. That is the kind of record which liberalism has been to all appearance making for itself by the inaction, by the silence, of those who ought to have rushed to my side and upheld with me the public standard of a pure and sagacious liberalism. It has been a very unfair representation of liberalism that has been given to the world for the last two or three years, but I cannot blame Dr. Holland at all for his scathing criticism. He has drawn logically correct inferences from the only facts before him; for the convictions of pure liberalism have failed to assert themselves publicly. Yet if it is true that the lower type of liberalism has got enough energy and self-assertiveness to come forward and declare itself to the world emphatically, squarely, strongly, while the better type of liberalism is too feeble to make any such self-assertion, too feeble or too wanting in public spirit, I think that Dr. Holland is substantially right, and that the liberalism of this country will go down before the overwhelming condemnation of the people. Let us try to rescue liberalism from such reproaches, really undeserved, yet justified by our own apathy, as these of Dr. Holland. He is a fair man; he does not mean to misrepresent at all, or to pervert; he has argued honestly from the facts he has seen. And it behooves us now to give public expression in every possible way to that higher and nobler liberalism which has purity, honor, truthfulness, justice, and integrity at heart. [Applause.]

That is the reason, gentlemen, why I value this demonstration. It pleases me as a man; I tell you sincerely, it goes right home to my heart; but it pleases me more that, as a representative of the liberalism you approve, you should be moved to give me the right hand of fellowship on quitting my post. I take it to be a certification to the world that your sympathies have been with me in the work I have been doing. I know we are here Unitarians and non-Unitarians, and I rejoice to stand with Christians, with Catholic and Protestant Christians alike, for justice and purity; and I will always do so. These things are more precious than our little differences of theological opinion. When it comes to the salvation of that on which all society rests, the sanctity and purity of our homes, then I say all good men must join hand to hand and stand shoulder to shoulder, and make common contest for the preservation of that which makes life most worth living. [Applause.] And so I sit down as I rose, thanking you much, as I must and do, for the kindness of your expression to me, but a great deal more for the expression you have here given of your sympathy with that which is dearer to me than even myself. [Applause.]

The Chairman then read letters from Messrs. Samuel Longfellow, Charles D. B. Mills, and E. W. Meddaugh, printed below, and called upon Mr. Connor to speak.

Address of Rev. Rowland Connor.

It seems to me that the phraseology with which our presiding officer began this evening is somewhat unfortunate. He spoke of a barbecue, which necessitated, of course, the introduction of a corpse. Then Mr. Abbot went beyond that, and proposed to have a funeral; and, if we keep along in the same direction, we must go beyond the funeral. The only way in which I can do that is to follow the lesson which the ancients gave in telling us that every feast needed its skeleton. I beg leave, therefore, to trot out the skeleton.

Mr. Ames.—I thought you were coming to the resurrection.

Mr. Connor.—No: the dry bones of the skeleton precede the resurrection. The resurrection will keep for somebody else. The skeleton I would introduce at this feast is this: that I am not very hopeful with reference to the future of—what shall I say here, with Free Religionists and Unitarians and I know not what else around me?—I will say simply with reference to the future of liberalism in theology. It is easy enough to be hopeful in this presence, where the line of thinking moves in one direction,—easy enough to be somewhat buoyant in spirit, after listening to such words as we have listened to, both in the speeches and in the letters which have been read to us; but, when we go away from here, and, forgetting those whose faces we have seen and words we have listened to, forgetting the letters that have been read, look at the real facts of the world, I do not think that any one can be very hopeful. The world is not yet ready for freedom in religion; it is not yet ready for liberalism in theology; it is not yet ready, I think, to take philosophy as the guide of life, although our friend Abbot asks us all to take it for a guide,—I mean the world as a whole. I believe that the world is a rather discouraging place to live in, unless we are willing to face the discouragements fairly and squarely. In this way only can we afterward recognize and ascribe due weight to what is encouraging. The world will not rid itself of superstition for a long time to come. All over Europe we can observe the influence of superstitions from which we are glad to fancy we have freed ourselves; all over the Asiatic continent there are innumerable superstitions of which we scarcely know the name, and which certainly that portion of the world is not yet ready to discard. Pass from Europe and Asia to Africa—that really new continent which has been recently introduced to us, with its teeming millions and fertile lands, destined to produce more and more millions of inhabitants,—and ask the question, What is to be the condition of the people of that continent? We are told that the negroes there are being converted to Mohammedanism with wonderful rapidity; and they are being converted to Roman Catholicism, to various superstitious forms of Christianity; and these superstitions, which are destined doubtless to assist in carrying them a long step upward in progress, will require, nevertheless, hundreds, perhaps thousands of years before they can be wholly thrown off. We know that the barbarians came down from the North and overthrew the civilization of old Rome. Who will dare to prophesy concerning the overturnings that may yet come to our modern civilization, to our most advanced theological and philosophical ideas, from the superstitions which are still in the world, and are apparently all powerful in the world to-day?

This is my skeleton, Mr. Chairman; and I believe in looking at the skeleton, whether we admire the appearance of the bones or not. Mr. Leslie Stephen, in a recent number of the North American Review, in a very excellent article, somewhat pretentiously entitled "The Religion of all Sensible Men,"—an article somewhat cynically phrased, perhaps, but a very readable article, nevertheless,—says, in substance, that we cannot tell by what superstitions we may be yet engulfed. Take any one of the old-time philosophers of two thousand years ago or nearly that, and put him, as some of them doubtless were put, face to face with the philosophy of Marcus Aurelius, on the one hand, and the superstitions—I think I may use this word to this company—of St. Paul, on the other hand, and ask him which would triumph, and he would sneer at the fancy that the theology of the fanatic would win the day; and yet it did. And hardly after two thousand years have we so rid ourselves of the superstitions of the fanatic (I am not speaking of the true things he taught, but of his dogmatism, his visions) that we can approach Marcus Aurelius with unprejudiced mind,—that we can go back to the old-time philosophy, and recognize its superiority to the theology which triumphed over it. The lesson of two thousand years ago may again come true here in our own country. We like to believe that we are very clever fellows, that philosophy is running full sweep here in America. And yet, even if it be so, some other things are running full sweep also; and some of these other things are more powerful, practically considered, than philosophy. The average intelligence of the American people is not greater than the average intelligence of the Athenians two thousand years ago, is not so great, I believe; and yet they were swept into nothingness. I do not believe that we are to be swept into nothingness; but I do believe, and my point is simply this, that America to-day, intellectually, is not in a condition to throw off old-time superstitions, is not ready to make philosophy the guide of its life, is not yet ready for the profoundest truths of liberalism in theology.

As an illustration of my meaning, consider for a moment what the bulk of our people are going to do during the coming four or five months. Two excellent men, Garfield and Hancock, have just been nominated for the presidency by their respective parties. And now we are going to lend ourselves to a great hurrah and controversy, which will roll from one end of this country to the other. We are going to spend our strength in talking, talking, talking. We will gather in political meetings. We will hire bands and listen to their playing. We will march through the streets; and we will print buncomeb speeches. And after it is all over, after an immense expenditure of time and money and strength, who will be one bit wiser than he is to-day regarding the respective merits of Garfield and Hancock? Nobody. Now, a people that can lend itself to anything so puerile as that is not a remarkably intelligent people; it is not a people, I mean, ready to make philosophy the guide of its life; not a people yet ready to rid itself altogether of religious superstition. I believe that one chief reason of the early growth of Christianity is the fact that it gathered within its embrace the prevailing sentiment of the era in which it was born: it took the good and the bad together, and therefore was adapted to the men then living. And, similarly, I believe that the religion which is most powerful here in America to-day, or which will become most powerful in the time just before us, is the religion which is most in harmony with a certain amount of superstition, which is not yet purified, and which will not be purified to-morrow or the next day.

Digitized by Google

Now, I am done with the skeleton. Let us clothe it with a little flesh and blood, and give it a more cheerful countenance. I am not hopeless; I am not discouraged, notwithstanding these facts which I desire to face. Although I believe that the problem with reference to the religion of the future is simply insoluble to-day, because we have not data enough to predict what it may be, nevertheless, there are some things which we do know,—we wise men, I mean, who set ourselves up a little bit above the rest of the world, and think we have gone along so far that we have earned a right to call back to others and tell them something of the nature of the road they are to travel. There is one thing which we all can unite in trying to do, and that is to remove morality from its close clinging to the superstitions of theology. In the minds of the greater number of the people of America to-day, morality and a certain kind of childish superstition in matters of religion are joined together inseparably. If the one falls, they believe that the other will fall also. It is a part of our work to do away with this great nonsense, and that for which I honor Mr. Abbot more than I honor him for anything else,—and sometimes I have not agreed with his methods, however hopeful he may have been with reference to them,—that for which I honor him more than for anything else is the fact that he has striven to divorce morality from dogmatic superstition, and to teach the people of America that the two things were not necessarily connected; that the old superstitions might die, but the purest of all pure moralities still remain. That is a work for us all to engage in, friends, whatever we may call ourselves, Free Religionists or Unitarians, or whatever else,—to endeavor to purify moral principles, to separate morality from its old associations, and, by keeping it apart from them, strive to deliver Americans from the superstitious dread now so prevalent, lest the decay of the old faiths necessarily involves any lessening of noble aspiration or any lowering of the standard of righteous living. I am not discouraged at believing that I am only a unit in an enormous mass, for the mass is made up of units; and, if each unit does its best, the whole mass will come out right,—at least, the unit will have done all that it can be held justly responsible for. I cannot penetrate the future, and I do not even pretend to guess in what way the religious future is coming out; but I know that, if we do what we can to keep the future morally pure, we may safely trust the dogmatism to take care of itself, assured that it will then take the least injurious form that the intelligence of the times will permit.

Dr. Edward Wigglesworth was introduced by the Chairman as one who knew Mr. Abbot in boyhood, and enjoyed the "Franking privilege"; and he was asked to tell the company what he knew about it. He said:—

Address of Dr. Wigglesworth.

I feel rather like a minnow among tritons, to get up here to say anything after the speeches you have already heard; and my only claim upon your favor is that to which the Chairman has alluded. I first made the acquaintance of Mr. Abbot at the Boston Latin School, when we were boys together. At that time, he was a member of one of the upper classes; but I remember the respect with which he was regarded, not only by the older members, but by the boys of the whole school. Whenever Mr. Gardner wished to take a little relaxation from his labors and would let some of the younger boys recite to the older ones, there was always a rush among them to get a chance to recite to Mr. Abbot,—not that he was easy in his discipline, but there was such a clearness in his explanations of the lessons that he always made them interesting and instructive. When Mr. Abbot graduated,—I say Mr. Abbot, although I am happy to enjoy the "Franking" acquaintance to which the Chairman has alluded,—he entered a class at Harvard, characterized now by very remarkable men. I need only allude to Colonel Stickney as one of them; and perhaps the typical man of the class was Mr. Abbot. I was not in that class, but had a sort of entrée into it, through several of my relatives; and I know that, among the very best men in it, he was regarded as one of the best morally and the finest intellectually in the whole class. I lost sight of him then for a great while, going away myself for many years, till about nine or ten years ago I returned, and heard of him in Toledo as engaged in the work in which you all know him, he having pursued it ever since, being connected with the Index and fighting in every way for the progress of truth and freedom and liberal principles. At that time, he had practically forgotten my existence, or nearly so; and I wrote, recalling myself to his mind. And since then I have had the pleasure, at longer intervals than I could have wished, of meeting with him in a more or less familiar way. I can only say that I have thoroughly enjoyed and profited by that companionship.

With regard to the sentiments which have been advanced this evening, as I am not at all a speaker, (hardly ever made a speech in my life), I do not say, "unaccustomed as I am," and so forth; but I feel a little as the man did who was stumping the State for himself, and was unable to make a good speech. A very fluent and eloquent gentleman was stumping for the opposition, and they were to make speeches together one evening. The eloquent gentleman had made a most brilliant peroration, setting forth every thing that would be done, if the candidate he represented was elected, and showing in every way the advantages that would accrue from voting his ticket; and at the end the other gentleman rose and said, "Gentlemen, what that gentleman has said I think." I entirely agree with what was written by Mr. Mills, and cannot entirely agree with the jeremiad of our friend Mr. Connor, although he endeavored to correct it subsequently. I think that we have hope for the future. I think the country is not quite ready yet for the fate which he has served up for it: it is much as if the servant said, "The master is not ready for the dinner." Of course he is not, for it is not ready for him. I think Mr. Abbot has transferred his natural modesty with reference to himself, in some degree, to the great ideas which he advances; and I think that he perhaps has not, and naturally has not, such confidence in their immediate growth and progress as those who sit on the outside. "The outsiders see the most of the game," as the proverb goes. I think that his ideas are like the roots of the tree Ygdrasil, which go down to the roots of every thing, and which, although they have not yet reached much above the ground, will overshadow the whole earth. This is more than enthusiasm: it is a hope, and a hope which I think is well founded. I had no idea, when I got up, of saying as much as I have. It occurred to me, when our Chairman spoke about serving up a man, that it might be desirable to serve him up on toast; and a little toast of a better man than I, and in better words than I could use, occurred to me at that time:—

"Yes: we know we must lose him, yet friendshipmay claim
To blend her green leaves with the laurels of fame:
Though fondly at parting we call him our own,
'Tis the whisper of love when the bugle has blown.

As the rider who rests with the spur on his heel,
As the guardsman who sleeps in his corselet of steel,
As the archer who stands with his shaft on the string,
He stoops from his toil to the garlands we bring.

So fill a bright cup with the sunlight which gushed
When the dead summer's jewels were trampled and crushed:
True prophet of freedom, our hearts hold him dear.
Love bless him! Joy crown him! God speed his career!"

In introducing Mr. William J. Potter, the President of the evening said: "The king is dead, long live the king! There is still to be an Index, and the late lamented shall have a successor in our next speaker, Mr. Potter." That gentleman spoke as follows:—

Address of Mr. W. J. Potter.

Mr. Chairman,—I think some of us who are in the habit of speaking every Sunday, and oftener, might envy the man who never makes a speech. I thought, sir, as I was hearing Dr. Wigglesworth, that certainly his was a most effective speech; and I wished that, at least, I might not come directly after him. I don't know, friends, how to speak to you to-night. A banquet should be a joyous occasion; but I cannot feel very joyous at this banquet, and I thought, when we were coming into the room to-night, that we all had a kind of melancholy tread, and a silence betokening not a joyous occasion, but one necessarily somewhat saddened. And yet I do not know as we ought to feel so Of course, there is the breaking of associations, and this I especially feel. I cannot claim to have known our friend Abbot as long as those whom the Chairman has alluded to, as having grown up with him in his youth, and having therefore "the Franking privilege"; but I have known him and stood very close to him through all these sixteen years that have been specially the public part of his life. I first saw him during the famous Syracuse Unitarian Conference, in 1866. Before that, I had known him only through certain articles of his in the North American Review and the Christian Examiner. It occurs to me now (I believe I never made an acknowledgment to him before) that from a certain article in the Christian Examiner I cribbed a considerable portion and used it in a sermon [laughter], making, however, acknowledgment to my hearers. I had not met Mr. Abbot then, but there was something in that article that brought him very close to my own heart and my own convictions, so that I found in its expression on a certain topic words that were more to my own thought than any I could choose for myself. I have never been able, however, to use the sermon since, because there was a special confession of Christianity in it, and, I believe, in that particular part that I quoted [laughter]: so it has had to go to the bottom of the barrel, and I am afraid never can be resurrected. At Syracuse, we met; and yet I was rather an observer than actor in that contest. I had not so much hope of Unitarianism or Unitarian organizations then as, perhaps, our friend Abbot or some of the younger men had. I was not born in that denomination. I do not know how I got into it. I have known better how I got out of it than how I got into it. [Laughter.] I think at that time, after the war, there was apparently a kind of new birth in the denomination, at least a struggling effort toward a regeneration, so that more practical humanitarian works might be taken up. I remember that the call for the first Conference in New York sounded like a bugle summons for a grand humanitarian effort. I went to that Conference. I was disappointed that, after all this bugle summons, there came out only a little creedlet, that produced immediately a theological discussion and very little humanitarian work. But it was at Syracuse, the next year, where an attempt was made, which has been mightier in its results than it was in itself, to change the form of the original constitution so as to strike out the objectionable theology, that our friend Abbot made his début, really, into the field of theological conflict, and it was there that I was drawn to his side. After that battle, which ended in a defeat, but in a Bunker Hill defeat, there was a gathering of the forces in the minority, though the minority was small; and, before we reached our homes, there seems to have been a kind of drawing together of hearts, sympathies, convictions, on the part of those who had been defeated, which finally culminated in the Free Religious Association.

From that time, I have stood by the side of this friend whom you have met to honor to-night, very closely,—our hearts touching each other,—in seasons of joy and seasons of sorrow; and it seems to me to-night as if a friend with whom I had been walking all my days as my twin companion were dropping away from me. And yet, friends, as I said at the outset, we ought not, perhaps, to bring these personal thoughts of sadness here, or to feel for our friend who is going away to another vocation any sadness at all, but rather to congratulate him that he is going out from the turmoil of conflict into a sphere of life where his talents, that are too fine to be wasted in this kind of contest and abrasion, can be brought to bear more effectively for the permanent welfare of mankind. [Applause.] And I believe, I cannot help believing, that in time that result will come. Our friend is going into the field of teaching. Dr. Wigglesworth has just given a most excellent testimonial to his capacity as a teacher. Those Latin School boys knew very well where they were to find a good teacher, when they competed with each other in order to get into his recitation-room; and I am sure that the boys who will come under his instruction in New York (and I hope there will be a good many of them) will find him to be the same just and fair and vivifying and inspiring teacher and helper that the boys in the Latin School found him to be. And I do not think that, because he is going into that work, he is going into retirement. He calls it, I know, "retirement from public life"; but it is utterly impossible for that man to retire from public life. [Applause.] Even if he himself for a time shall not be heard of in the personal conflicts of battle over these old questions, we shall hear of his work through some of those boys whose ideas he is to train so that they will be shooting into intellectual life, and who will before long be stepping into the field of conflict in public life. And he himself, I believe, after a few years will be drawn again into other work,—he cannot help it, the public will demand it,—he will be drawn again into work which will satisfy his own best aspirations, which we as his friends will be proud of, and which will lift his name higher even than anything he has yet done, noble as that is, and as beneficial as it has been for mankind,—lift his name into a permanent place where it shall shine among the intellectual stars in the firmament of our American scholarship forever.

Digitized by Google

The Chairman read letters from Messrs. Learned, Savage, Chadwick, Collyer, Curtis, and Bellows, and then called upon Rev. Mr. Batchelor, of Salem.

Address of the Rev. George Batchelor.

If I should speak, gentlemen, according to my feeling, I should take the rest of the evening; but, if I speak according to the necessities of the case, I shall only occupy three minutes. It is nineteen years since I have known our friend. It would be impossible for me, in the time which I may properly occupy, to tell all that I know about him, and all that I have received from him. But you will see that I have a peculiar claim to be here as his friend, when I tell you that we were in the same theological class together; that, when I was ordained as a Christian minister, he gave me the right hand of fellowship; that we went together to Syracuse, a week after my ordination; that we were at the same house; that we went through that controversy together; that I sympathized with my brother then. But we divided, and he went one way, and I went the other. He became the editor of the Index, and I became the secretary of the "National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches." But we have stood together ever since as friends, and more. I have sympathized with all his earnest work, although I have not agreed with all his propositions. I have doubted his premises, and therefore I could not accept his conclusions. One great mistake which he made, and which is illustrated by the speech of our friend Connor here to-night, I will take a moment to speak of; because it seems to me it illustrates not only principles, but the history of principles. Also our friend Abbot has referred to the same thing. At the first convention, called fifteen years ago in New York, by the Unitarians, it has been truly said that there was a bugle call of freedom in the name of humanity. Men were called upon to organize. The result was that those who issued the call, and who had the cause at heart, were defeated. That is true. They were defeated inside the ranks of Unitarianism; therefore, it seemed to some of our friends logical and right that they should go outside, and find outside this liberality which could not be found within the organization. They went outside, and what was the result? They issued their call, and they have been defeated. That is to say, there is no such amount of liberalism within the ranks of any Christian denomination, nor outside the ranks of any Christian denomination, as to justify the extravagant anticipations of a speedy success. There has been no great change in the world outside in these ten years. There has been no going backward. The simple fact is, they went outside, expecting to find there a paradise of liberalism; and they have found, scattered here and there, a few faithful ones who would stand by the banner, and a multitude who would not. I think the history is almost identical within and without.

Now some of us said, "We will stay where we are, and we will be true to this proclamation, and we will stand by this banner, till we have made it possible for it to have fulfilment in the place where we stand." And the years have passed; and to-day I profess that we have made advance toward that standard, in the fulfilment of our professions. I have no question whatever about the future. I have no doubt about the future of liberalism; its principles are founded in truth, and they are sure to prevail. When I came here, I understood that we were to sink the "shop," and to come together for a little good fellowship; but I have found, since I came here, that the "shop" would not be sunk,—that we had come here really to celebrate it; and so I must have my little word.

But, in regard to our friend, I have been in intimate relations with him during all this time; and, at this moment, this is the one thing that occurs to me as being better than anything else, as an illustration of his friendship: he is almost the only man I know of who can tell me I am a blank fool, without getting mad. Now I value a friend who can do that. [Laughter and applause.] He can tell me to my face, when he thinks my arguments are folly, that "it is discouraging to see"—and he does put it in a qualifying phrase, he does say "it is discouraging to see—what arguments an intelligent man can use." [Laughter.] He has a habit of that sort. If he sees folly, he calls it folly; and if he sees fraud, he calls it fraud; and he doesn't exactly see why it is that those whom he characterizes don't always take it kindly. [Laughter.] He simply states these things as he would any other fact in natural history; it is a part of his science; and it is not at all strange that other people, who don't understand him, think there is some rancor in him. There is not a bit; it is simply cool, quiet, scientific statement of fact as he understands it. And I am not a bit sorry that he is going to get out of this business that he is in, for this reason,—not because the cause of liberalism has by any means too poor work for such a man to do; but, by this plainness of speech, and by the peculiar relations he has come into with certain people, he has made it impossible for him to use his best gifts. I had occasion to remark, when I first heard of the change that was taking place, that St. Paul—(I don't think our Brother Conner did him quite justice. He said, speaking of his superstitions, that they had won the world; that we hadn't got far enough away from the superstitions of St. Paul to do Marcus Aurelius justice. The fact is, we haven't got far enough away from St. Paul's superstitions to do him justice),—but I was going to remark of him that he was very proud of having, on a certain occasion, fought with beasts at Ephesus; but he didn't have any idea of taking it up as a regular vocation. [Laughter.] I think our friend has too good gifts to be wasted in that warfare. Let the gladiators fight with beasts; but he is not of that sort, and he has not quite come to himself yet. There is a poet in him that he is not doing justice to now. By and by, when he gets into retirement, in the "still air of delightful studies" that has been referred to, the poet and the good fellow will come out again; and I think that in the course of ten years he will do far better work than he could do in any controversy, in any contest of this sort; and I believe that we shall all at last come into a substantial unity. We have been divided in theology,—we have been much united in our philosophy; I am sure we are wholly united in friendship, and I bid him God-speed. I am just as ready now, as fourteen years ago, to return the right hand of fellowship, which I think never has been taken back; although in the peculiar sense in which it was then offered it could not now be given. [Loud applause.]

The Chairman read a long telegram from Dr. Felix Adler, and letters from Judge Hurlbut, Rabbi Schlesinger, and Rev. Mr. Voysey, of London; after which he called upon Dr. Horsch, of Dover, N.H.

Remarks of Dr. Carl H. Horsch.

I was with our friend in that first fight in Dover; and ever since he and I have, as we call it in German, "Bruederschaft getrunken,"—drunk brotherhood together. Talent and scholarship, shrewdly and cunningly adapted to established conditions, to the rules and notions of society, and used for selfish ends, bring generally financial success and reputation from the masses, but not from developed minds. A scholar who advocates truth for the truth's sake, and is compelled by his honesty to criticise the so-called prominent men, and expose falsehood and wrong, has a hard task, because the masses do not understand him. The indifferent do not coöperate; and those who do or ought to comprehend and appreciate his efforts like their easy and lucrative positions too well. But we rejoice that a ten years' toil for the better conditions of humanity, which our dear friend Francis E. Abbot has carried out so well, finds more and more appreciation; and, if evolution and progress do not cease, posterity must accept out and enjoy the principles which the Index has pointed out, and which we sincerely hope it will continue to do. I therefore call our meeting this evening the "Holy Supper of the Nineteenth Century"; and I think, if those good men—Socrates, Jesus, and others—were living, they would be likely to be here with us.

Address of Mr. Sidney H. Morse.

Having done ample justice to two dinners this afternoon and evening, it may be supposed that I am pretty well wound up, and ready for the emergency. But one may be wound up in two ways: he may be wound up ready to go, or so wound up he can't go. Whichever may be my predicament at the present time, I can certainly say as much as this: I am truly glad to come here to-night, and take part in this "Farewell, God bless you!" to our friend. But I must also say that my presence here does not mean a desire on my part to endorse Mr. Abbot's course during the last three years, nor for any particular year. I take him in the lump; and not because I have agreed with him in opinion, for I have often found that I did not, and sometimes should have liked to go and fight it out with him. But he has a way of insisting upon reasons,—and it is not always easy to give a reason. [Laughter.] So I have adopted with him the same course which so well serves me with others from whom I differ. In this evolutionary epoch, one cannot go far wrong if he begins by admitting what everybody says, and then goes on with his own beliefs. [Laughter.]

I esteem Mr. Abbot as a man of convictions. I honor him as an able and an earnest worker. I like him because he will say squarely what he thinks: and that, I take it, is what we should desire of every man. We want a free and fearless expression of convictions on all subjects that may arise for our consideration. And we must remember, also, that no question can be held to be so settled and sacred that there may not be entertained in different minds more than one side. This is true not alone of theological or religious questions, but likewise of all social and moral questions. And what is always needed is that all people shall freely give utterance to their convictions, and also exercise the broadest charity towards one another. So, only, can we get at fact and truth. I have come to believe that there can scarcely be an opinion so abhorrent to my own sense of right but some honest man may hold it. Truly, there is no accounting for opinions. And now I am led to say that, if there is any one thing that may excite our fear (and I am not given to fear),—if there is anything we need to fear, it is this: that we shall get so into the habit of saying "we" and "us" that we shall not do justice to others who hold opposing views. It is the partisan spirit that needs to be crushed everywhere. We must not only listen to those who totally disagree with us in their intellectual convictions, but be as ready to respect and honor them as if they and we were in closest harmony. If there has been anything done helpful to theology, it is, I think, the getting rid of a Deity who would cast into a horrible place all unbelievers. We are taught that Deity is in some way enshrined in mankind. Our friend Mr. Potter has written of the "Divine Incarnation in Humanity." Now, if we have indeed got a better Deity,—better because he does not burn unbelievers,—and we are here to represent that Deity in our own conduct, why, we ourselves must not burn them. If we object to a hell for such offenders beyond, we must not make one here. On the contrary, we must so tolerate or appreciate all shades of conviction that we can enter into the thoughts and feelings of all people, and thereby be able better to judge of what they may say, and so fairly come to understand one another. The great mass of people, holding whatever opinions, mean to be honest, and are honest. We must come together as man with man, brother with brother, neither saying, "I am holier than thou," but each inviting the other with "Come, let us reason together." So only shall we get at the truth, and fitly serve each the other.

Let me say a word in regard to what was said by friend Connor. I was a little surprised at his speech; and yet I must honor him for making it, for that is the way he feels. If he had had two dinners, perhaps he would not have felt quite that way. [Laughter.] I cannot think the country is quite so badly off. I can't believe that even our Presidential contest, to which he looks forward without pleasure, is going to be so miserable a failure in all respects. I don't much care which man wins. That will not bother me. He deprecates the wrangling and confusion, the hurrahing and inconsequential strife. But there is this which all this tumult will secure,—a wide-spread discussion of important topics; not merely on the stump, but it will be all the people talking with one another, discussing the right and wrong of things. Thus, whichever party or man shall triumph, an educational process for all the people will be one of the results. I think there is a great principle lying somewhere between the two parties. I am myself half Republican and half Democrat. [Laughter.] I be-

(Continued on page 55.)

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, JULY 29, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

PERSONAL NOTICE.

All personal communications for F. E. Abbot should be hereafter addressed to him at "Lake View Avenue, Cambridge, Mass."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The office of the Free Religious Association and INDEX has been removed to No. 3 Tremont Place (just in the rear of the Tremont House), where members and friends of the Association and patrons of the paper will find a pleasant room and cordial welcome. Mr. David H. Clark, besides being assistant editor of the INDEX, has been appointed General Agent of the Association, under the plan for which money has been raised in response to the circular issued last December, and will have charge of the office and of all business there. All communications pertaining to the business of the Association or of the INDEX should be addressed to "Free Religious Association, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass." Communications intended for the editor will reach him more directly, if addressed to him personally at New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y F.R.A.

WE are receiving an encouraging number of new names on our subscription-list,—enough at least to encourage our friends to continue the good work towards the thousand that we want. The donation-list is not lengthening nor strengthening as it ought. Let not that be forgotten.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200.00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass.	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100 00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass.	10.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00

GENERAL DONATIONS TO F.R.A.

HENRY W. BROWN, Worcester	10.00
C. M. DENISON, New York City	5.00
MR. and MRS. EIDLITZ, New York City	2.00
MISS APPLETON, Roxbury, Mass.	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

WE give up most of our space this week to a full report of the Testimonial Dinner given to Mr. Abbot on his retirement from the editorial chair of the Index, preferring not to divide matter of such special interest. The number, therefore, is one which the many friends of Mr. Abbot will specially like, both to keep and to hand to others; and we print a larger edition than usual for the purpose.

SCIENCE AND CHRISTIANITY.

We have now before us the full text of Rev. Dr. Peabody's Baccalaureate sermon at Cambridge, which has already been referred to in these columns. It is an elaborate attempt to defend religion in general and Christianity in particular against the alleged agnostic tendencies of modern science. With regard to the theory of evolution, in alliance with which these agnostic and sceptical tendencies are commonly supposed to exist, Dr. Peabody does not take position for or against,—modestly disclaiming the ability to argue such an issue. But he announces himself as entirely ready to accept the theory if it be scientifically established, and indicates quite clearly, we think, that he believes the probabilities to be in its favor. In this discourse he makes the supposition that the doctrine of evolution is established, and then proceeds to inquire how the essential religious beliefs of Christendom will be affected. In the main part of this inquiry, which lies in the domain of natural religion, we go along harmoniously with the preacher, especially on the well-developed point that, since "a supra-material being," man, has been evolved by the cosmical process, therefore supra-material elements must have existed at the beginning of the process. Our only demur here would be that the argument comes to an extreme degree of tenuity before it reaches, as the preacher tries to extend it, to the doctrines of a personal Deity and of individual immortality.

But, when the discourse comes to the special claims of the Christian religion, the weakness of it, for a scholar of Dr. Peabody's ability, is amazing. It is a weakness that can only be accounted for by the utter hopelessness of the task to which he had set himself. To make Christianity, as Dr. Peabody and all conservative theologians of his type interpret it,—that is, as a special miraculously revealed religion,—harmonize with the scientific doctrine of evolution, is a task which, we are sure, no strict evolutionist would undertake. It requires a reconciliation of contradictions, of which the theory is incapable. The Baccalaureate preacher would have left the young men on a firmer basis of religious belief if he had not attempted to add this special plea for Christianity. Here it was absolutely impossible to continue the same line of argument, and yet reserve for Christianity a separate niche as an exceptional faith, and for Jesus the position of permanent headship to the human race. The evolution theory will not yield arguments for these religious postulates. Hence, when he came to this part of his theme, the preacher was compelled to drop argument, and resort to dogmatic assertion, appeals to sentiment, and suggestion of probabilities.

For instance, he asks, "If man is capable of rising toward the Supreme Archetype [a proposition argued in a preceding paragraph], what more probable than that this Archetype should have been placed before him so far as its attributes could be incarnated in a human form, and under such conditions as to become a central object of reverence, love, and imitation for all coming ages?" According to Dr. Peabody's theological prepossessions, such an event may have been very probable, but we have never seen any interpretation of the theory of evolution which could possibly have brought it to pass.

As an argument addressed to sentiment he points the young men to the experience of those who have proved the Christian religion to be divine by the unfailing guidance, consolation, strength, and hope they have found in it; an argument, of course, that has no scientific value whatever for the end he wished it to serve,—namely, the establishment of the claim that Christianity is a religion separated from all others by a peculiar origin and an exceptional divine authority. For we can conceive that a Mohammedan or Buddhist or Brahmanistic preacher might each say the same thing and with equal weight of the experience of the believers in his religion.

But more remarkable still are the specimens of dogmatic assertion which abound in this part of the discourse. Dr. Peabody admits that "Science does not prove Christianity," yet claims that "it more than leaves its area uninvaded." The argument would be stronger if this last assertion were supported by some kind of proof. It would be interesting to know in what particulars so learned a man as the preacher at Harvard College believes that science has strengthened rather than weakened the claim that Christianity is a supernaturally revealed religion. But he enters into no details. He only adds the further affirmation that, "as to its external and historical proof, suffice it to say, after passing through the severest criticism, it never rested, in the minds of such believers as have carried the strongest lights of reason and learning over the whole field, on so firm and impregnable ground as now"; and this notwithstanding the fact that the two traditional buttresses of the "external and historical proof"—prophecy and miracle—have been so far undermined that many of the best Orthodox scholars are preparing to abandon them for the more vague, and hence, for their views, safer ground of the internal proof. The above quotation is sufficiently surprising; but it is outdone in dogmatic positiveness, not to say audacity, by the following statement: "Christianity is the only permanent phase of belief or speculation that has come down to us from its birth-time." Then picturing "the long procession of theories and philosophies, each paraded as humanity's last word and ultimate irreversible truth," which have appeared, he says, only to pass away, he continues: "This one religion, this one theory of God, the soul, and eternity, this one philosophy, deemed by its believers divine, has remained undimmed, unchanged, unmoved." With most of the great religions of the world still in active organized existence, and none of them more subject to internal change than Christianity has been, what do such statements mean? If their author meant that Christianity is destined to be "permanent" while the other faiths are destined to vanish, that is the very question at issue, and he begs it. Or has he the miraculous gift of prophecy that he is able thus dogmatically to affirm that Christianity has spoken "the last word and ultimate, irreversible truth"? In this day of the study of comparative theology, we should say of such statements in some quarters that they are the result of ignorance. But when Dr. Peabody makes them, what can we say of them?

MR. F. A. HINCKLEY thus reports concerning a recent visit to East Dennis, Mass.:—

The friends of freethought and practical religion in this town organized about three years ago what they called the East Dennis Lecture Association. In their Articles of Agreement, they hold it to be the duty of every one to keep his mind and heart open to receive the truth, and to follow its guidance; recognize equality of human rights; ignore all theological tests of membership; and demand only unity of purpose in seeking and accepting the right and true, and making these the rules of life. They are now holding Sunday afternoon and evening meetings as often as pecuniary resources will permit. It was my privilege to address them last Sunday, and to become personally acquainted with some of their number. This is just such a movement as ought to be to us all an encouragement to greater effort in the much-needed work of local free religious organization.

Digitized by Google

CONCERNING the Free Congregational Society at Florence, of whose prosperity "B. F. U." recently spoke in the Index, Mr. Seth Hunt, one of its founders, writes further as follows:—

It may interest some of the readers of the Index to learn that, starting seventeen years ago, with a mere handful of members, who held their meetings in a small school-house, this Society has grown to a strong and prosperous organization, holding, free of debt, a spacious and beautiful edifice, costing about $40,000. We believe this Society has been a power for good. Its example and influence have tended to liberalize the whole surrounding region, softening sectarian asperities and cultivating charitable and humane sentiments.

On the last two Sundays of July, John W. Chadwick will occupy the platform. There will be a vacation during the month of August. On the first Sunday of September, Theodore D. Weld will give a discourse.

In view of the fact that this free religious organization was formed in the town which had been the home of Jonathan Edwards, the master-mind of the Calvinists, where he had preached and left the impress of his thoughts, to this day, on the whole community, one of the present members of the Florence Society wonders that there should have been found persons of sufficient courage (or audacity) to attempt the formation of such a society in such a place. The secret of the matter is that most of the founders had served in forlorn hopes under Garrison, in the anti-slavery conflict, and had thus learned that one person, with truth and right on his side, is a majority, and will at last overcome all opposition. In the contest with slave-holding despotism, they had been led to see and throw off the chains of church domination and superstition, and to uphold free thought and free speech.

Out of regard to the memory of my great-grandfather, who was a deacon of Jonathan Edwards' church, perhaps I ought to say, by way of apology for having had a hand in the forming of so radical a society in so orthodox a town, that the Florence platform is merely President Edwards' "Freedom of the Will," supplemented by the Freedom of the Won't.

For the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

TO THE BUDDHA.

O LIGHT of Asia, who didst lay aside
Thy crown, give up thy palace and thy bride,
And wander as a beggar, man to save,
We bless thee for the help thy teaching gave
To countless millions, making them shun sin,
Control their passions, rest and quiet win.
From all that's selfish, false, impure, and vain,
With truth's own force thou biddest us abstain.
And still we prize thy precepts; but we see
Around us clearer light than shone for thee.
Thy tender eyes saw naught but woes in life,
And bade man flee away from its vain strife.
But we can see that life has much to prize:
Thoughts come which make us strong and pure and wise;
Truth, Freedom, Virtue call forth mighty love;
Affections reign which raise us high above
All sin and woe; desires which aye have blest
Our race too richly e'er to be suppressed.
The Gospel of To-day saith, "Live and grow;
Give every spring of genuine joy full flow;
Love all that's lovely; in all truth delight;
Keep firm all ties which soul with soul unite;
Set this life free from ignorance and sin,
And no Nirvana shall ye need to win."
Having learnt from thee, O Buddha, to abstain,
We rise to enjoy, and so our life is gain;
Along the path which thou wert first to show,
To truth thou couldst not reach, we gladly go. F. M. H.

THE riddle which has gone the round of the smoking-room at the House is as follows: "Why did the Northampton shoemakers elect Mr. Bradlaugh?" and the answer is, "Because he did not believe in the immortality of their soles."—London World.

(Continued from page 53.)

lieve in centralization,—one way looking at it; and I believe in extreme State rights, looking at that in a certain way. There is a question herein involved yet to be settled,—a great question which lies deeper than any merely political movement. It is a question of the kind of civil life that shall prevail throughout the whole country. We ask, What shall become of the country? Shall the country be equal to its opportunity? Shall there be room for all people to live here and grow here,—for all, every man and every woman, to be himself and herself, and make the most of himself or herself, and the best? It is not, I say, a question of political fortunes, but a question involving the social life and growth of a great people.

Our friend does not hope for very much, at least in the near future. I may say that I have ceased to hope; and yet I am not without hope or its equivalent. I don't hope that this or that may happen. It really doesn't matter. I am not cast down if it does not, nor am I greatly lifted up if it does. For all the time I feel and know that there is something in the heart of the world that has got to come out of it, and will come out, in due season. In short, the universe has a meaning that must and will be expressed. The worlds—we—are in the process. So it does not signify whether the "millennium" come to-day, to-morrow, or a hundred or a thousand years hence. It can't come any faster than it can come. If I hadn't faith that this universe, this universal life, meant this successful evolution and achievement, I would end all thought on the subject at once. But I have the abiding, ever-present conviction that all this agitation, all this work, and all these plans,—all the joys, sorrows, all the manifold life we are passing through, means—in due season—the blossoming of the flower of humanity. The race can no more escape the achievement than it can escape the life it has begun.

So, you see, while I do not have hopes, I am not without hope, in what I believe to be the largest and best sense of the word.

And therefore I recognize in this work, in this Free Religious movement, in what our friend Abbot has achieved, in what others have done, in what all have done and are doing, good and helpful contributions. There was a time when I was much disturbed because the Unitarians adopted for a creed the "Lordship of Christ." But I have lived to see even their little creed become a dead letter.

MR. AMES.—No!

MR. MORSE.—No? The very presence of our friend here on this occasion testifies that it is so. [Laughter.]

Well, this was an entirely impromptu speech. Thoreau used to say that it takes a long time to make a thing short. [Laughter.] Perhaps if I had been better occupied during the day, I might have made it shorter, and have told you what I feel and think better than I have done. One word more, and I will stop. Let everybody say as he thinks, and, whether what he says be right or wrong, it won't matter; for if only the Spirit of Truth lead, it will guide into all truth. It is not of so much consequence whether you or I speak the truth to-day, but whether we try to speak it. Every one so trying, with charity and free toleration of one another, instead of dividing more and more into cliques, or sects, or associations, we shall come more and more to realize that we belong to the whole race, and have one common association round the globe. [Applause.]

Remarks of Uriel H. Crocker, Esq.

I did not expect to be called upon to-night. I am not a talking man, and there are so many here who are talking men,—clergymen and ex-clergymen,—that I supposed there would be no danger of my being reached; and I believe the hour has arrived, too, at which we agreed to adjourn. I will say, however, that I am one of the few here that have never met Mr. Abbot till to-night (I believe I had only known him through the Index, and through his published addresses); but I felt, from what I had known of him, strongly moved to come, and, by my mere presence as one, help to give expression to the feeling that I had of honor for the effort shown by him in his honest and earnest and self-sacrificing maintenance of what he believed to be the truth, in endeavoring to help to dispel the superstitions that were prevalent, and in trying to hold back the body of the liberals from rushing precipitately, after having given up certain superstitions, into the adoption of every new and crude idea as the truth. It has seemed to me that he was one of the few that had battled nobly to resist that tendency. For that reason I was glad, and am glad, to be here to help to honor him. [Applause.]

Remarks of Rev. W. H. Spencer.

It is too late now, Mr. Chairman, to make a speech; but I do want to say to Mr. Abbot what I never have said to him, and what I never said to any other man in the world, but what I did say to my wife,—that I felt under more obligation to Mr. Abbot for mental stimulus during the last ten years, since he has been the editor of the Index, than to any other living man in New England; and that is saying considerable. And I believe that Free Religion, too, is under more obligation to him than to any other man in New England. He has made Free Religion more rational; he has defended it, I think, with the best reasons; he has made it more free, in the best possible sense of that word,—never allowing freedom to run down into license or licentiousness; and we owe him an immense debt of gratitude, I think, because he has defended Free Religion from what, in his letter just read, Mr. Voysey well describes as "the dissolute section of the liberals." When she was assailed, when her principles were attacked, Frank Abbot, at considerable personal sacrifice, we all feel, drew his sword and defended her, and did it manfully. For that we ought to be very grateful. It may be that the result of all this may not be seen in a day; but, as another letter-writer says, it may be the stones which we have been sinking in the marsh, and which by and by will make a highway over which the religion of the future will travel safely. I do not feel so gloomy as Mr. Conner does, by any means. I feel very hopeful for Free Religion. I do not know that it will prosper as Free Religion, under that name. But I say that it is infiltrating itself everywhere; it is honeycombing all the Christian sects; they are adopting our ideas. Unitarianism finds it very difficult in many places in the West to establish her churches, because she finds already established there some orthodox church with a liberal minister, a minister who does not believe in eternal punishment, or in the deity of Jesus in any proper sense, any more than the Unitarian minister does; and he is preaching it to his people, and is outflanking Unitarianism in that way. Sometimes Unitarianism is reproached because she is making so little progress, establishing so few churches; but she is growing under another name. And our ideas are growing under another name; they are saturating Unitarianism; and I cannot agree with Brother Batchelor that Unitarianism, although it is liberal, does stand essentially where we do. It is not so broad, I think, as Free Religion. We invite to our fellowship not only all those who, as the Unitarians say, are "followers of Jesus Christ, or wish to be," but those who believe in truth as it is in Jesus, and truth as it is outside of Jesus,—those who are followers of truth wherever it may lead. I wish to say that to Mr. Batchelor, because, like my friend on my left here [Mr. Potter], I have felt that I was excluded from event he rather hospitable body of Unitarians. I am very happy to be here to express the love and admiration which I have for our friend. This, I trust, will not be our last supper, by any means. I hope he will have many more; and, although Mr. Abbot goes away from us, I think that that same spirit of truth,—what our Christian friends call the Holy Ghost,—which has filled him during the last ten years, will pursue him still, and so possess him that he will be obliged to take up the work which he now drops for a moment. [Applause.]

Mr. Connor desired to add a word of explanation, and said:—

I am not in the least bit "gloomy." I only stood on one side of the question, the other side of which has been so well talked about by those who have followed me. And I am very glad of that; I never recognized so much before the advantage of speaking early, and having a somewhat crude presentation whipped into shape.

The Chairman's Closing Words.

The hour for breaking up the assembly having arrived, Mr. Ames said:—

Gentlemen,—I think we part to-night with something of inward assurance that we belong to each other in a way we knew before, but never so well comprehended. It is not Garfield nor Hancock,—it is a fair election; and it is not your ism nor mine, but it is fair and honest methods in inquiry and in action.

Digitized by Google

Isn't that our platform and purpose? And isn't that the central impression of all we have said and tried to say, and mean to do and be? So help us Heaven, we will carry it out from this place, and help to make it a part of the public property of the world. [Applause.] And you, my friend, you have not only pointed out the way, but have walked in it; and our differences do not touch that central and radical agreement which is the most conservative thing in the universe. God bless us every one! Good night!

THE LETTERS.

From Rev. John C. Learned.

St. Louis, Mo., June 18, 1880.

Rev. M. J. Savage:

My dear Sir,—I am glad my friend Abbot is to have a dinner. Since 1865, he has been plentifully served with "gridiron"; now let him have a dinner! I only wish there was some way to make it perpetual. There is no man of my acquaintance who better deserves it.

Mr. Abbot was a classmate of mine at the Cambridge Divinity School. It was there that I first conceived an admiration for his scholarship, and for his high sense of honor. No man among us read Greek so well; and he was master of the rules of logic. His arguments on any question that interested him were always worth hearing,—though they did not always convince me then, and have not always done so since. Our premises were sometimes different. For example, I remember that once we argued the question of temperance. I was brought up on the total abstinence principle, and defended it. He did not believe in that doctrine or practice,—denied that it could properly be called temperance, and, to clinch the argument, cited the example of "our Lord and Saviour," who drank wine with his disciples! It was in vain that I quoted, in desperation, from an elaborate sermon of the Plummer Professor, recently preached to the Harvard students, showing that Jesus and the twelve used only the unfermented juice of the grape. (We both of us know that that argument was as weak as water!)

Though I am nearly as good a total abstinent to-day as I was then, yet I will now admit that, on "Christian" grounds, he had the advantage of me in the discussion. In other words, at that time, I feel sure, he was a better "Christian" than I was; and he knows how it was himself.

To speak more seriously, however, the man whom this festival was meant to honor by his presence, honors all who gain admission to the feast. I wish it were possible for me to be there, for old friendship's sake, for present congratulations, and for the "great expectations" we all cherish of his services to truth and humanity in new fields of thought and labor. It is a rare thing in any century that men meet to compliment such worth and work as is identified with the name of Francis E. Abbot. Heroism is of many kinds. Every age can furnish heroes of some sort. But the moral hero,—the man who can speak truth when others dissemble, who dares to trust the naked truth in the face of armed and overwhelming majorities, who stands for conscience and character in an age of immoralities,—rarest of all,—surely such a man deserves the right hand of our approval and fellowship.

"Such earnest natures are the fiery pith,
The compact nucleus round which systems grow;
Mass after mass becomes inspired therewith,
And whirls impregnate with the central glow."

Accept my thanks for the invitation to be with you, and my regrets that I cannot take my place at the table; and believe me,

Very sincerely yours, Jno. C. Learned.

From the Rev. Edward C. Towne.

Underbank Parsonage, Stannington, Near Sheffield, England.

Rev. M. J. Savage:

Dear Sir,—If I could possibly arrange it on so short notice, I should cross the Atlantic to join Mr. Abbot's friends in the greeting of affection and sympathy and honor which they will give him on the 25th.

The motion for keeping Unitarianism liberal and our Christianity free, which Mr. Abbot made at Syracuse, and made in vain, it fell to me to second. If that motion were to be made now, Unitarianism itself, not only by its younger leaders, but by its elder, would eagerly second it, and with an acclaim of pride and respect toward Mr. Abbot which few men ever win. The denial of the petition made at Syracuse by Mr. Abbot led to the founding of the club first called the Free Religious Club, and afterwards the Radical Club, and to the organization of the Free Religious Association. Every incident of that history is as fresh before me as if but yesterday; and I am confident that, from first to last, the grace and truth of Mr. Abbot's participation in it were singularly clear and pure and genuine. I believe there is no doubt that Mr. Abbot deliberately sacrificed a valuable and distinguished appointment at Harvard University to keep truth with his conscience by his Syracuse protest; and I know that a like appointment at Cornell University would have fallen to him, had not those who confessed his unexampled claims felt bound to conciliate prejudice by preferring a man who had the high candor to say, "Against Mr. Abbot I have no claim." Those who were responsible, at New York and at Syracuse, for an orthodox bolt on the door of Unitarian communion did wrong and injury in more than one case, as real and cruel as any ever done by persecuting vigor. There were wounds inflicted then which have not yet ceased to bleed. The best that courage and self-devotion and patient endurance could accomplish, to make a career outside the lines of inherited opportunity, has been done by Mr. Abbot during the decade of toils and trials which has now reached a close. Between a liberalism that was faithless and a libertinism that was shameless, Mr. Abbot had to stand doubly unsupported; but he has stood increasingly triumphant to the end, and he leaves his post without a stain.

My own experience shows me how extreme is the difficulty of making a great breach with tradition, and a great battle over untried ground for a new field and new lines of religious and humane activity. My conclusion has been that Unitarianism went outside of genuine Christianity, when it decreed to keep a survival of worship of the "Lord Jesus"; and I hold that the identical mind that was in Christ has remained unabated, undimmed, and illustrious in the character, the conscience, the career of toil and sacrifice and renunciation, for which your festival of affection and sympathy will make a sacramental celebration. I ardently hope that Mr. Abbot has another career yet before him, of noble study in many directions, and of counsels of wisdom and learning and consecration by which religion, social progress, morals, philosophy, and politics may greatly benefit. To whatever motion of honor to him may be made, I beg to give my most hearty second and most cordial applause, fervently trusting that the sweetness and light which Mr. Abbot has ever kept within himself may henceforth fall all about him to make bright and glad his every step.

I am, dear sir,
Yours faithfully,
Edward C. Towne.

From Mr. Charles D. B. Mills.

To Rev. M. J. Savage, Rev. W. J. Potter, and others of the Committee:

Dear Friends,—Your kind invitation to me to be present and participate in the enjoyments of the occasion that your circular describes, has been received. Be assured that nothing would give me greater pleasure than to unite with you, and others who may be there, in rendering this mark, slight token as it is, of honor to the name and services of the retiring editor of the Index. But to attend will be out of my power; I can be present, therefore, with you only in spirit.

There is no name, certainly, in our country, whom I more cordially esteem,—none that I more deeply love, and with all my heart would bless,—than Francis E. Abbot.

I knew of Mr. Abbot first in 1866 (I think it was), at the time of the holding of the National Conference of the Unitarian Churches, in this city. His brave and memorable protest in that Convention I have always remembered. I was not, however, at that time so fortunate as to have heard him on the floor of the Conference, or to have made his personal acquaintance. Later, I heard of and saw extracts from the sermons of the young preacher in Dover, N.H.; and later still, but not long after, I became acquainted with the projected enterprise of publishing the Index at Toledo, O.

The protest, the sermons, the withdrawal from the denomination he had stood connected with, prompted by deep, conscientious convictions, the prospectus of the Index, and the utterances of that paper,—these all, and increasingly as they came, won my respect and approval; and, from that first day to the present, I have marked the course of this Protestant, and earnest apostle of truth and liberty, with ever-deepening interest, and ever-growing admiration.

He has struck stalwart blows for freedom; he has borne invaluable testimony for a principle in religious faith which must have more and more recognition and cordial honor in ages to come, as the mind of man expands, becomes more thoughtful, wise, and free. His service in this behalf has been priceless. The cause of Free and Rational Religion in our country, and through the world, owes him a debt deeper than can ever be cancelled.

In the defence he has made latterly, especially of the principles of morality,—showing that liberty is not license, that the restraints and guidance of a just morality are not annulled or broken; they are rather confirmed and strengthened in the emancipation from a dogmatic and limitary religion,—he has done also an inestimable service. Here, too, we have occasion to hold him in high honor.

Our brother has stood for us, and for humanity. He has wrought, through all these years of toil and sacrifice, for liberty, and for interests in which we all have vital stake.

I offer, if in order for your occasion, my sentiment:

Our esteemed guest, whose clear perceptions have been equalled alone by his dauntless courage,—to whom truth was majesty supreme, with whom to see was to do, to be commanded of Heaven was to obey. His unswerving devotion we warmly honor, his work and example we cherish with deep gratitude and love,—we hold in remembrance, and commend them for quickening and inspiration. Our benedictions follow him. May his work, in whatever field in the future, be crowned with a success as complete, a recognition as wide and cordial, as his labors during the past in behalf of Free Religion, and the enduring claims of a true morality have been arduous, self-sacrificing, and untiring.

I remain, with sincere sympathy, and best wishes ever, Yours fraternally,
Chas. D. B. Mills.

Syracuse, N.Y., June 23, 1880.

From Mr. E. W. Meddaugh.

Detroit, June 23, 1880.

Gentlemen,—I briefly replied some days since to a note of invitation to be present and participate at a dinner in honor of my esteemed friend, Mr. Abbot; but I cannot permit the occasion to pass without adding a few words beyond the formal regret for my enforced absence.

As one of the Directors of the Index Association from its organization to its dissolution, and as his friend, I have had personal knowledge of some of the difficulties that Mr. Abbot has had to contend with in his work for the past nine years. Himself actuated by motives as high and pure as ever moved man to action, and filled with a spirit of zeal for helping his fellows to a higher and better life, he began the publication of the Index. He was young, and hope was buoyant in him. The future seemed full of promise—not of personal gain or advantage to himself (for of this he took no thought)—but of opportunity for the great work of reform to which he had dedicated his life.

He has met with reverses. He has not realized that full measure of success which he not only hoped for, but expected. The Index, which to most of its readers for the past ten years has been a synonyme for Abbot, which he created, and with which are associated in his mind the most cherished desires of his life,—is about to pass from his hands; and he is compelled to abandon this chosen field of labor and usefulness for another which is not of his choice, but is born of necessity. Such an occasion would be a trying one to any of us, and it is the more so to our friend from the profoundly earnest and deeply rooted purpose of his soul, which is thus temporarily thwarted of its object.

But, while tendering to Mr. Abbot the sympathy of our hearts in his disappointment, we should but poorly perform the friendly office if we failed to reverse the shield, that he may see the other side. In these years of editorial labor, he has accomplished a noble work. Both by precept and example he has helped many poor souls to a clearer perception of the duties of life, and to the strength for performing them. He has taught them that there is a foundation for pure ethics outside of the lex scripta, and by his example has demonstrated the practicability of living, not only by it, but up to it. The influence of his teaching and example will continue to bear abundant and rich fruit, through the lives and labors of his disciples, that will testify to the grand success of his life and work, though he should "end all here."

But, invaluable as has been his work of the past, it is, if life, health, and opportunity permit, but a preface to the great volume that is to come. The world cannot spare Francis Ellingwood Abbot from the field of philosophical thought; and there is a grave duty resting upon us, who know and appreciate his value here, to see to it that no circumstance within our control is suffered to drive him from it. Let us, then, avail ourselves of this social occasion, not alone to wish him a hearty God-speed in the business upon which he is entering, but to comfort and cheer him with the pledge of our substantial aid, should it be required, to the end that he may continue his philosophical studies, and labor for the furtherance of truth, and the well-being of mankind.

E. W. Meddaugh.

To Rev. M. J. Savage and others, Committee, etc., Boston.

From the Rev. Charles Voysey.

Camden House, Dulwich, London, S.E., June 7, 1880.

To the Rev. M. J. Savage:

Dear Sir,—I regret exceedingly that the wide Atlantic prevents my being present at the complimentary dinner to be given to my dear and esteemed friend, Francis Ellingwood Abbot. I have a grateful recollection of the years during which I served under him as a modest contributor to the Index. For kindness and courtesy to his staff, he could not be surpassed. But, apart from all personal considerations, I have admired Mr. Abbot as in every inch of him an honest, courageous, and pure-minded man. His attitude, of late years especially, towards the dissolute section of free-thinkers and so-called liberals, commands our warmest applause. "Abbot and the Index" will be remembered generations hence as the savior of the cause of true liberty of thought, by claiming and demanding that before all things it should be decent. I only wish that our common gratitude could find some solid expression in giving to our friend Abbot, for the rest of his life, absolute immunity from worldly cares. If any such testimonial is started, I beg you kindly to give me the earliest opportunity of subscribing towards it.

I am, dear sir, very faithfully yours,
Charles Voysey.

From Gen. Robert J. Turnbull.

Westchester, June 5, 1880.

The Rev. M. J. Savage and members of the Committee:

Gentlemen,—As your note of invitation was only received a few days ago on my return from the South, my reply has been necessarily delayed. I should be rejoiced to be one of the company on the occasion of the dinner to our admired friend, Mr. Abbot, but regret that family duties at that time render it impossible for me to be absent from home.

I cannot, however, at this time forbear recording my testimony to the expanding and enlightening influence that Mr. Abbot's editorship of the Index with its purity of moral sentiment and elevating tone free from all taint of superstition, has had upon my mind during the decade that I have been its constant reader. The paper was first brought to my notice by my valued friend, Mr. A. Warren Kelsey, also a frequent contributor to its columns, during the dark days at the South that followed the close of the war, when failure and ruin in that section seemed to follow every enterprise, however well conceived or faithfully executed. In the isolation of a bachelor's life upon a remote plantation, its advent was then like a ray of light from a brighter world; and its strong reliance upon natural resources and upon our own natural endowments, for the solution of all difficulties, was a tower of strength to the mind in dealing with the trials and disappointments of the situation, and I think in my own case has contributed much to a result which I think I may consider a partial success, where there has been little else than failure.

Digitized by Google

That this life is worth living for its own sake, and that as a duty, as well as a pleasure, we should live in action, has appeared so clearly from its pages and his pen, that the scene of labor has seemed invested with a new interest, and as leading to issues in a fruitful future, notwithstanding the encouragements which seemed to be wanting to the eye of faith.

In whatever channel the labors of Mr. Abbot may hereafter be directed, there is none, I am sure, where their spirit will be more missed, and where greater regret will follow their cessation, than as editor of the Index. Yours very truly,

ROBERT J. TURNBULL.

From EX-JUDGE E. P. HURLBUT.

ALBANY, June 14, 1880.

MESSRS. M. J. SAVAGE, W. J. POTTER, and others:

Gentlemen,—My time of life, and the distance (reckoned by miles) between us, prevent my attendance at the dinner to Mr. Francis E. Abbot. Yet the distance is only of miles, for I am near you in spirit, and shall be proud to be recorded as of the number who rendered due honor to the manly worth, the enlightened intellect and moral tone of the editor of the Index.

It is rare, in this world of ours, to find a man who combines the intellect to form, and the moral courage to avow and defend, in the face of all prejudice, opinions at variance with those of the large majority of his fellow-men, placing himself remote from the sympathies of his cotemporaries,— simply for truth's sake. Yet Mr. Abbot is such a man—one "quit of the priests and books," who has attained from the first to the fourth good rule of Gautama, "Right doctrine, right purpose, right discourse, and right behavior."

"Above life's weakness and its comforts too,"—

On two great points which he has made prominent in the Index and advocated with singular ability,—the correction of religious opinions by the light of science and the complete secularization of the State,—he will live, I hope, to find himself with the majority.

On another point,—the advocacy of a pure morality, based on the natural laws, amidst the wreck of ancient myths and superstitions,—Mr. Abbot has labored long and well, being all the while "the best-abused man" among us. Yet he and his paper have survived,—himself to flourish in some other field of usefulness to his fellow-men, and the paper to be still welcomed by the leading minds of America and Europe, which have hitherto appreciated it so highly.

I would write much more, but, on occasions like yours, brevity is a virtue; and I content myself with adding my kindest wishes for Mr. Abbot and those who honor him.

Very sincerely yours,

E. P. HURLBUT.

From MR. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

WEST NEW BRIGHTON, STATEN ISLAND, N.Y., June 21, 1880.

My dear Sir,—I am very much obliged by the kind invitation to the dinner to Mr. Abbot, and I am very sorry that I cannot accept it. It is a tribute of honor to a scholar who has resolutely maintained the three fundamental American rights—the three in one, and the only trinity which probably he would be willing to acknowledge: free thought, free speech, and a free press. All friends of moral and intellectual liberty who know how subtle, but how strong, are the influences arrayed against it, will gladly unite both in testifying their regard and sympathy for one who has served the cause so faithfully as Mr. Abbot, and in wishing him prosperity in his new career.

With great regard, very truly yours,

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

From REV. HENRY W. BELLOWS, D.D.

NEW YORK, 232 E. 15, May 30, 1880.

DEAR MR. SAVAGE:—

I shall not be able to join your dinner to Mr. Abbot, for I have just lost a very dear brother, and shrink from festivities.

I am none the less glad that Boston is ready to testify its respect for the manly courage and conscientious verity of my honored friend, Mr. Abbot—with whose special views I have no great sympathy, but with whose pure spirit and self-sacrificing fidelity I have boundless fellow-feeling. I wish you the greatest success in giving Mr. Abbot a hearty send-off from his editorial office. We shall welcome him in New York, where we hear he is coming, with lively expectations of his success in his new calling as classical teacher; and we hope to give him all the support he desires.

Very cordially yours,

HENRY W. BELLOWS.

From PROF. WILLIAM T. HARRIS.

ST. LOUIS, MO., June 22, 1880.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE:

Dear Sir,—It would give me great pleasure to be with you on the occasion of the dinner to Mr. Francis E. Abbot, but the necessity of visiting Missouri and Arkansas this week renders it impossible. I share with you in the desire to show some token of respect and regard for Mr. Abbot, who has given such a rare example of honest, manly character to the world. I trust he may yet long continue to be as helpful to us as in the past.

Respectfully yours,

W. T. HARRIS.

From REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY.

Dear Mr. Savage,—I regret that my departure for America this year will be a little too late for me to avail myself of the invitation with which your Committee have honored me. I have met many a worthy soldier of truth and justice at Young's, but none more valiant in a cause he holds true, than Francis E. Abbot. When he ran up his little paper-banner at Toledo, it was something like Garrison running up his small Liberator: the latter has become a historic flag of liberty, and the former will not be forgotten or unsung in the day when America wears as her jewels the names of those who set free her heart and brain.

Your honored guest is less known to me personally than to most of those who will gather around him. I have known him mainly through the Index; I have sometimes differed from his opinions, and he perhaps oftener from mine—if that isn't an Irishism; therefore it will not be thought the partiality of personal friendship, when I say that Francis E. Abbot appears to me to be one of the few distinctly religious men who have never drawn a line against freedom of thought. That which was called the Theistic movement in England is declining, as I think, simply because those who pioneered it came to a point beyond which they could not move in the direction of liberty. There are some who feel, with Spinoza, that to define God is to destroy him; whose only clear conceptions in that direction are such as are defined against such definitions. I am one of these, and must say that the more constructive Theists speak of us and our negative position in an unfriendly way,—some of them sharply enough to suggest that their deity is not far evolved beyond that earlier one supposed to be so anxious about human notions concerning him. Among the songs which the late Professor Clifford composed while at Cambridge, and which the students there still sing, one has a verse running:—

"If you and God should disagree
On questions of Theologee,
You're damned to all Eternitee,
Poor, blind worm!"

The song will no doubt be sung so long as even liberal minds are so often found defending certain views as if religion and moral life depended on them—which were as much as to say that one cannot fall in love without holding certain physiological or metaphysical theories of his sweetheart's nature. The little difficulty about this proposition is that it is not true. And Mr. Abbot has recognized that it is not. While meeting opinion with argument, he has not added any sting such as men use on each other when they are aiming to please God. He has spoken strongly when the interests of morality seemed to him at stake; but even in that controversy I cannot remember that Mr. Abbot has appealed to theological prejudice or claimed that the Index was an organ inspired by God. These appear to me rare merits. So long as human society and the human mind are left free to follow a natural evolution, I believe they will steadily gain in wisdom, truth, and virtue; no error or fiction will remain, there can be no survival of the unfittest, unless the arrest come through some phantasmal force not included among the factors of natural evolution. Our differences and discussions may all go on in a healthy human way, if only no man fancies he is dearer to God than the other man who holds another opinion. So long as that notion survives, even in the accents of discussion, our progression can never be perfect. We must cast away utterly that false weight perpetually insinuating itself into the balances of reason, turning the scale this way or that by playing upon the nerves (inherited from theocratic ages) of the hand which should hold the balances untremblingly true. I believe Francis Abbot has held them true. So steadily has he done so in instances where I could judge, that even in others where, to my distant vision, his case was not made quite clear, I have felt that he was honestly endeavoring to hold his balances true; and it is for this his equity, for his scorn of piously-poisoned weapons, as well as for his courage in taking the side of an unpopular truth and his patient working for it, that I am grateful for this opportunity of adding to the tributes of those nearer to him an old freethinker's appreciation of services which it will require further years to estimate. Ever faithfully,

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

INGLEWOOD, BEDFORD PARK, CHISWICK, England, June 7, 1880.

Telegram from PROF. FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, NEW YORK, June 25, 1880.

TO CHAIRMAN OF THE ABBOT DINNER:—

Warmest, heartiest, and affectionate good wishes to Francis E. Abbot, who has so long pointed the Index finger of liberty against all that is unfree, untrue, and unclean! I deplore his temporary retirement from the combatants, but shall be consoled in watching how the streams of his intellect, that have poured through the scattered channels of journalism, will unite in one broad flow, and bear a memorable tribute to the sea of deep philosophical thought.

Examinations take place in my Kindergarten to-day. I cannot be with you in person; I am wholly with you in spirit. Among all the appreciative words which you hear to-day, Abbot, there is none that expresses sincerer kindness than is felt for you by

FELIX ADLER.

From REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

BROOKLYN, May 28, 1880.

MY DEAR SAVAGE:—

I can see far enough into the future to know that it will be quite impossible for me to be in Boston, June 25. I am very sorry that it happens so, for it would give me great pleasure to attend the dinner which is to be given in honor of Mr. Abbot. I should be sure of meeting there many dear and valued friends, with whom I should like exceedingly to join in doing reverence to Mr. Abbot for his long and faithful service as editor of the Index. Service more faithful, more earnest, more conscientious, my imagination cannot conceive. Of how many editors of our American journals, secular or religious, could it be truly said that they have never once written an editorial or a paragraph which did not express their undermost conviction concerning the matter in hand? But I am confident that this might be said of Francis Abbot without a particle of exaggeration. The life of an editor, like that of a policeman, "is not a happy one," I fancy, under all circumstances. Its annoyances and anxieties cannot be few. But while Mr. Abbot has doubtless had his full share of these, his consciousness of always endeavoring to find and speak the highest truth on every pressing theme must have afforded him the purest consolation.

Precious as much of Mr. Abbot's editorial work has been to me, what I have valued most have been his elaborate essays upon the nature of religion and morality and other kindred themes. For these I cannot sufficiently express my gratitude. Here, it appears to me, the genius of our friend has its most natural home; and I am hoping that one effect of his retirement from the Index will be to furnish him with ampler opportunity for "beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies," and reporting to us the radiance which he has seen.

Absent from you in body, from my heaven-kissing hill in Western Massachusetts my spirit will signal across to you with kindliest fraternal salutation. May grace be given unto Mr. Abbot to listen patiently and sweetly to the truth concerning himself, in so far as it shall then and there be told! Assure him that, wherever he goes, our love will follow him, and that in the great battle for truth and freedom we shall still count on him for many a valiant stroke.

Yours ever faithfully,

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

TO REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

From the HON. FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

WASHINGTON, D.C. June 15, 1880.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE:

My dear Sir,—I give you my best thanks for the invitation. Few things, were it but convenient, would be more agreeable to my wishes than to be present at the dinner proposed to be given in Boston on the 25th in honor of Mr. Francis E. Abbot, a gentleman for whom I entertain sentiments of highest respect and esteem. He has not only done much to break the fetters of religious superstition, for which he is entitled to gratitude, but he has with singular ability and earnestness enforced those lessons of personal rectitude without the observance of which there can be no solid happiness in the world. I have often risen from the perusal of his editorials in the Index deeply impressed with their wholesome, bracing, and elevating tendency; and, with many others, I regret that his vigorous pen is soon to be withdrawn from its accustomed work. I am not quite sure that I cannot be with you on the 25th of June; but, if not present on that occasion, please express to Mr. Abbot my best wishes for his health, prosperity, and happiness, and for his speedy return to the field in which he has been a most sturdy and valuable laborer.

Very truly yours,

FRED'K DOUGLASS.

From MR. JOHN L. STODDARD.

AT SEA, on board S. S. "City of Richmond," May 31, 1880.

J. A. J. WILCOX, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—When, on the eve of my departure from America, I read your kind invitation to the Abbot Dinner, I thought I regretted as much as was possible my inability to be present. But after having been for a week tossed unmercifully on the reeling billows of old Father Neptune, amidst horrible visions of sloping floors, swinging lamps, and drunken state-rooms, enlivened only by the recollection of vile gruel and nauseating dishes served by short-waisted stewards slanting about at every possible and impossible angle,—under such circumstances, I confess, I realize my deprivation more than ever; for the thought of a quiet dinner at Young's, at a motionless table loaded with choice viands and surrounded by friendly faces, seems to me now the height of human happiness!

Truly did Virgil sing—"Coelum, non animum, mutant qui trans mare currunt,"—"They change the clime, but not the soul, who cross the sea." For, however far I may be in body on the evening of June 25, in spirit, in sympathy, in affection I shall be one of your pleasant company. Were I in reality to be with you on that occasion, I would gladly join in the sentiment which I know animates you all. I would gladly unite in uttering words (which yet are unneeded) to assure our beloved friend and guest of the evening of the appreciation and affection which we feel for him,—of the sorrow we experience that he is to change his residence to another city,—and, above all, of our keen regret that he has deemed it necessary to relinquish the editorship of the Index. For one, I cannot express in words my indebtedness to Mr. Abbot for his clear, thoughtful, and inspiring editorials.

Digitized by Google

There is no parallel in America to his course as the truth-and-purity-loving editor of the Index. All honor to him for it! For his bold leadership and self-sacrificing devotion, the liberals of America should have rewarded him by an enthusiastic and loyal following. They will one day bitterly regret their faithless desertion of him. Yet this is, after all, true only of certain cunning partisans and their deluded followers. In reality, Mr. Abbot has a countless host of loving, sympathizing friends, who, though obscure, are not disloyal. Indeed, where are not his friends? They have spoken in unmistakable accents from Australia, from Europe, and from every part of our country. We represent at this dinner-table only a minute fraction of those who at heart thank our beloved friend a thousand times for all that he has done, for all that he has spoken and written, yes, and particularly for all that he has suffered for us and the cause that we hold dear. No fragrant flowers, no dinners, speeches, or letters, acceptable though they may be, can ever even remotely express our debt of gratitude to Francis E. Abbot. But as we pledge him here our love and devotion,—as we wish him the best of fortune, and bid him a heartfelt farewell,—let us hope that he can at least detect a trace of what we feel in the moistened eye, the pressure of the hand, or the look of soul to soul.

With cordial regards, J. L. STODDARD.

From REV. DAVID A. WASSON.

WEST MEDFORD, June 24, 1880.

My dear Sir,—I regret that it will be impossible for me to attend the dinner to be given in honor of Mr. Abbot. But I beg leave to signify my hearty appreciation of the zeal, earnestness, industry, and constancy shown by him in the propagation of ideas which it required intellectual intrepidity to arrive at, and moral courage to profess. He and I have differed, and do so still, though less, it may be, than formerly. But I have never been blind—how could any one be blind?—either to his acumen or his uncommon personal qualities; and of late I have warmly sympathized with his contention against a wild liberalism (wild when not worse), and with his assertion of the authority of reason, represented by the great consensus of healthy minds, as opposed to the pretensions of an upstart individualism which would dissolve all the great unities, spiritual and social, into a dust of squeaking atoms. From his "scientific method" he hopes more than I; but I long to see a book in which he shall thoroughly test its capabilities as applied to the grand ideal interests of mankind; and I hope earnestly that he may have health and leisure to prepare such an addition to our serious literature. Yours very truly,

D. A. WASSON.

From REV. ROBERT COLLYER.

NEW YORK, June 21, 1880.

DEAR SIR:—

Your circular, which came this morning, thirty-five days after date of issue, leaves me no time to come to Boston to attend the dinner you propose to give Mr. Abbot on the 25th. I might not have been able to come in any event, but should have tried to be there, because I love Francis Abbot like a brother, and admire as I love him. I think we are all his debtors for the noble words he has spoken to this generation, and the truth he has bought at such a cost, but never sold. It has been laid on him to penetrate into regions of thought still dim to many of us, and remote from our life, and to report to us how divine they are, even as the little garden plots in which we have to labor. He sees the truth in its clear whiteness: we split the white shaft into prisms after our kind. We cannot help this. We must all be true to our vision. But the whole world of free thinkers must feel, as I do, what worth there is in such a rare gift, and in being faithful as Mr. Abbot has been to it, and will be even unto death. May God bless all true pioneers like my friend. Yours indeed, ROBERT COLLYER.

From REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.

MR. J. A. J. WILCOX:

Dear Sir,—I had hoped to be present at the Abbot Dinner, and in person express my appreciation of the brains and devotion which that occasion is to honor. But, so far from that, I have not now the time even to put on paper what I think and feel.

We honor ourselves in honoring such a man. It has never been my fortune to know a more complete and unselfish consecration to principle. The mind and heart of one such man is enough to save any cause from contempt; and no movement which develops such can be called a failure. Hercules cleansing the Augean stables must have presented a pitiable sight. I rejoice to see our Hercules set free from so disagreeable a labor. And now I only hope that some first-rate university will be wise enough to find or make a chair for one of the first philosophical minds of America.

Wishing you all a good dinner and God-speed, I am heartily yours, M. J. SAVAGE.

BOSTON, June 13, 1880.

From MR. OLIVER JOHNSON.

81 COLUMBIA HEIGHTS, BROOKLYN, N.Y., June 11, 1880.

MY DEAR MR. SAVAGE:—

I very much regret that it will not be in my power to accept your kind invitation to the dinner to be given to Mr. Francis E. Abbot in view of his approaching retirement from the Index. No one will have a place at your board on that occasion who cherishes a more hearty respect and admiration than I do for Mr. Abbot's character and attainments, or a higher appreciation of the personal independence which has marked his whole public career. If my opinions were in all respects the same as his, I might well suspect that my admiration for him was that of a partisan elated upon finding a strong champion of his own views; but, differing from him as I do upon some important issues, I feel sure that my admiration of him is genuine. Christianity, as I define it,—nay, let me rather say, as it is defined for me by our standard lexicographers,—imposes no yoke upon my freedom either of thought or speech, but furnishes me with a name of mighty power in the conflict with whatever tends to debase our noble humanity. Mr. Abbot is constrained to fight for liberty, purity and righteousness under another banner; but he is fighting in the same cause and for the same ends that I am, and fighting honorably and bravely; and I honor him not the less because he thinks his position and his weapons are better than mine. I say with Paul, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." When he has succeeded in reconstructing the world according to his aspirations, I am perfectly sure that what I call Christianity will be found enthroned in the minds and hearts of men, and the name of Jesus of Nazareth be honored and loved as never before.

And so, with all my heart, I crave a blessing upon your feast, and a perpetual benediction upon the noble man in whose honor it will be spread.

Yours for the largest liberty,

OLIVER JOHNSON.

From PROF. FRANCIS E. NIPHER.

ST. LOUIS, May 29, 1880.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE:

My dear Sir,—I greatly regret that I cannot participate in the pleasant occasion in honor of Mr. Abbot, as it will be impossible for me to reach Boston until a somewhat later date. I am in full sympathy with the objects proposed, and only wish it were possible to repay the debt which we owe to Mr. Abbot in a more substantial currency. I hope he will not feel discouraged by the present appearance of events.

When we build a road through a marsh, it is sometimes necessary to spend thousands of dollars in sinking stones and logs out of sight into the mud. Apparently there is nothing to show for the work; but the stones are there, and suddenly we have a road.

I think much of Mr. Abbot's work in the Index is of this kind. The issues have been bravely met. People are thinking about them, and the final result is not doubtful. Others besides Mr. Abbot are suffering, and for like reasons. The most essential thing is that we do not allow our individual troubles to annoy us unduly.

Thanking you most cordially for the kindness of your letter,

I remain very truly yours,

FRANCIS E. NIPHER.

From RABBI MAX SCHLESINGER.

ALBANY, June 22, 1880.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE, Boston:

Dear Sir,—You know that there is no wisdom in fretting because of the slavery in which we are held by circumstances. But sometimes the temptation to be unwise is too strong. How I would have delighted to vie with Mr. Abbot's friends in showing honor to him who deserves it so well! If the tyrant circumstances had permitted me to be with you, I might have drawn inspiration from the genial face and sparkling eyes of your honored guest, and perhaps succeeded in giving utterance to the love and reverence I harbor for the noble man and eminent thinker.

From the first time I ever read a line of Mr. Abbot, he became one of my ideals after which I endeavor to aspire. His intellectual vigor, unwavering earnestness, and outspoken honesty exerted upon me, at least, an irresistible attraction. It seemed to me as if I had been acquainted with him from my earliest youth; for his is a spirit kindred to that of our own Jewish prophets. With the same purity of heart and exaltedness of thought, he forestalls the future more or less clearly pointed out by the Hebrew prophets, when all men will worship the God of Truth only. With the same fervency, unmindful of consequences, he expounds the religion of humanity to which Judaism at all times aspired. It seems but natural that he, being one of the prophets of our generation, should be maligned and persecuted. But this fate, common to all great men, must endear him the more to the heart of all who are able to appreciate his greatness and the inestimable services which he renders to the development of religious thought.

Though I deeply sorrow over his retirement from the Index, which for years has been my most welcome friend, I am confident that Mr. Abbot will find a field for his untiring activity and zeal in behalf of enlightened religious sentiments.

Thanking you most heartily for your kindness which permitted me to express my sympathies with Mr. Abbot and Mr. Abbot's friends, I assure you that, though absent in body, I am with you in spirit.

Most truly and respectfully yours,

DR. M. SCHLESINGER.

From MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD.

THORNDIKE, June 24, 1880.

MR. M. J. SAVAGE:

Dear Sir,—I have been expecting till to-day the pleasure of meeting with Mr. Abbot and his friends in Boston to-morrow evening; but circumstances I could not foresee will prevent. The loss will be mine. Could I be present, I should wish to speak a few words, giving my estimate of Mr. Abbot's ability and of the value of his services. I am glad to know that others will be there who will speak more fittingly than I should be able to.

All honor to Francis E. Abbot, the clear-headed thinker, the conscientious editor, the scholarly representative of free thought, and the earnest advocate of equal and exact justice for all! His unwavering loyalty to his own convictions of duty, and the noble moral enthusiasm which has sustained him in his work, command the admiration even of his opponents. His character, without a vulnerable spot as large even as the heel of Achilles through which any arrow of malice could find its way, is valued most by those who know him best. Thousands who have become acquainted with Mr. Abbot through the Index will continue to feel a deep interest in his welfare, while they will never forget the heroic work he has done.

Regretting that I cannot be present, and wishing you a very pleasant party, I am

Very truly yours,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

From MR. CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

BROOKLINE, May 30, 1880.

MESSRS. M. J. SAVAGE, WM. J. POTTER, and others:

Dear Friends,—I rejoice to learn, by your kind note of invitation now before me, that the friends of Mr. Francis E. Abbot intend to give public expression to their high regard for him, and their appreciation of his work as editor of the Index, before he leaves Boston. Circumstances will prevent my presence at the dinner you propose to give on the 25th of June. But I am heartily glad to find this occasion of declaring the respect and reverence I feel for Mr. Abbot, and my sense of the practical value of his editorial work in promoting the public welfare, intellectually and morally. For ten years we, the readers of the Index, have recognized in Mr. Abbot an earnest search for truth, a candid estimate of conflicting opinions in regard to it, a frank and fearless expression of the conclusions at which he had arrived, justice in dealing with opponents, signal sweetness of temper under misrepresentation and abuse, confidence that free discussion is the right and the best means of finding truth, persistent labor, and self-sacrifice in behalf of principle, and a purity and nobleness of life which enhanced the value of his testimony.

I would especially mention in Mr. Abbot's praise that, when occasion arose, he emphasized the distinction between liberalism and libertinism, and did not shrink from the unpleasant duty of resisting those who would press liberty to the point of licentiousness.

Trusting that Mr. Abbot may meet the success he so well deserves in his next enterprise, and that all may go well at the pleasant festival you are arranging,

I am yours very truly,

CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

From PROF. ADOLPH WERNER.

NEW YORK, 339 West 29th Street, June 1, 1880.

MR. M. J. SAVAGE:

Dear Sir,—Please accept my thanks for your kind invitation. It would give me great pleasure to be able to join you in an expression of admiration of Mr. Abbot, for whose character, intellect, attainments, and work I have long had the highest respect. I regret exceedingly that the work connected with the close of the college year will detain me in New York.

I am very respectfully yours,

ADOLPH WERNER.

From REV. SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

GERMANTOWN, May 31.

DEAR SIR:—

My duties will keep me at home at the time of the proposed dinner to Mr. Abbot, so that I cannot accept your invitation. I should be glad, however, to say that, while I have often differed from the Index in thought and in methods, I have always respected its editor's ability, thorough sincerity, and good spirit; his devoted and eager knight-errantry in behalf of liberty and in the search for truth; and his earnest loyalty in keeping the banner of liberalism free from moral stain.

Sending my respects to him and the good company which will gather to greet him on the 25th.

I am, dear sir, cordially yours,

SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

From MR. GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

NEWCASTLE CHAMBERS, Essex Street, Temple LONDON, W.C., June 10, 1880.

My dear Sir,—A short illness overtook me in Scotland, else I should have replied to your letter at once It would be to me a pleasure, as well as an honor, to take part in the dinner to Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot, were it possible. Few persons whom I had the pleasure to meet in America impressed me more than he, with his bright earnestness and singleness of purpose in the advocacy of progressive opinion. His noble impetuosity in striving for the intrinsic integrity of free thought, alike in principle and conduct makes us all in every country his debtors, who care for the reputation of intellectual liberty. I trust that the great cause which he has so brilliantly carried forward will continue to prosper in the hands of Mr. Potter, his successor, and that Mr. Abbot will live long to witness, with pride and honor, the good seeds spring up a thousand-fold, which he has sown with so valiant a hand.

Digitized by Google

Not being able to write myself, my daughter Emilie writes for me, in the hope that these few words may reach you with the many others you will receive on the 25th.

Very sincerely yours,
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

The REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

From MR. CHARLES WATTS.

The "SECULAR REVIEW," 84 Fleet Street,
LONDON, E. C., June 8, 1880.

Dear Sir,—Many thanks for your kind invitation to be present at the dinner you intend giving to Mr. Abbot on June 25. I regret very much that I shall not be present, as it would afford me great pleasure to join in a manifestation of hearty appreciation of the labors of one who, like Mr. Abbot, has lived a noble and consistent public life. I have not the pleasure of personally knowing the gentleman; but, from his writings and the testimony of those who have the advantage of his acquaintance, it is evident that he is thoroughly worthy of the honor you are about to confer upon him. Mr. Abbot is undoubtedly a consistent worker for the public good, and one who has the courage of his opinions and a marked fidelity to conviction: a gentleman who has proved that he has a mind superior to selfish interests, and whose actions are governed by the principles of uniform rectitude and integrity. In his future career I earnestly wish him every success, and trust that your gathering on the 25th will be in every sense successful.

With sympathy for all who work for human improvement,

Believe me, yours very truly,
CHARLES WATTS.

The REV. M. J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.

From MR. NATHANIEL R. WATERS.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE:

Dear Sir,—Your missives reached me in Baltimore a few days ago, and I would gladly thank you for them in person and be present at the forthcoming banquet; but fate will not have it so. To honor Mr. Abbot at this time is to honor Truth and Right, and to uphold the Liberal cause upon its only safe and sound basis. We have crying need of men like him, and of the work they are fitted to do. Happy for society and the world, whose monster evils the spread of knowledge and righteousness alone can effectually redress, if the needed seers and doers shall speedily come, and if they shall be recoghized and honored as they ought to be wherever they appear. The Liberal name covers self-seekers and demagogues to a fearful extent; and the amount of small shot expended against the heaving sides of moribund church religion is shocking to an economist. But the "words fitly spoken," that will help us to avoid putting our own lusts in the place of our neighbors' superstitions, are indeed so rare as to be "like apples of gold in network of silver." For my part, I can hardly conceive of our Index without an ABBOT: but I heartily hope that the organ will flourish under the new auspices; for we require it still, and I know of no paper to take its place.

Let me in conclusion wish a useful, prosperous, and lengthened life-time to Mr. Abbot; to the Index abounding success and triumph; to all your good company, appetite, digestion, and fresh free-thinking fruits to follow.

I am, sir, respectfully yours,
NATHANIEL RAMSAY WATERS.

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 3, 1880.

From MR. LEWIS G. JANES.

BROOKLYN, June 23, 1880.

MR. J. A. J. WILCOX:

My dear Sir,—Contrary to my expectation, business engagements will prevent me from being present at the dinner to Mr. Abbot on Friday next. I had made all my arrangements to go, and am reluctantly compelled to alter my plans.

I shall be with you, however, in spirit and sympathy. My acquaintance with Mr. Abbot through the Index, since its earliest issue, has steadily heightened my respect for his sincerity, truthfulness, and ability. The cause of freedom and character in religion can ill afford to lose the labor of his brain and pen; and I can but hope—while wishing him all success in his new field of labor—that the cause to which he has already devoted so many of his best years may not wholly be deprived of his voice and pen.

Acknowledging gratefully my own personal obligations to Mr. Abbot, I am

Yours faithfully,
LEWIS G. JANES.

From MR. CHARLES M. CUYLER.

ALBANY, N.Y., June 23, 1880.

J. A. J. WILCOX:

Dear Sir,—Absence from the city, and other causes, have interfered to prevent an earlier reply to the kind invitation of yourself and others to be present at a dinner to be tendered our friend, Mr. F. E. Abbot, upon the occasion of his leaving the Index, over whose columns he has so long and so ably presided. I exceedingly regret that business engagements will not permit my attendance at an entertainment which cannot fail to be an extremely delightful one. My sympathies have been with Mr. Abbot throughout his connection with the Index, but more particularly during the last few years, when he has been obliged to struggle with a desperate effort to pervert to base uses and ends the cause he had so dearly loved and bravely and unselfishly labored for.

My kindest and best wishes go equally with our friend wherever duty may in the future carry him, and with the dear Index under its new management. I shall be pleased at any time to contribute my mite to any more substantial testimonial which Mr. Abbot's friends may see fit to tender him, and which I believe he deserves to receive.

I am yours very respectfully,
CHAS. M. CUYLER.

From MR. E. B. WELCH.

NEW YORK, 137 Broadway, June 24, 1880.

MR. J. A. J. WILCOX:

Dear Sir,—I have been hoping, ever since the receipt of the invitation that you kindly sent me, to be able to meet our mutual friend, Francis E. Abbot, at the dinner to be given in his honor to-morrow, in Boston, by a few of his numerous friends and admirers; but at the last moment I am reluctantly compelled to forego the anticipated pleasure. I know that the occasion will be a rare social and intellectual treat, and regret that I cannot enjoy it and express to Mr. Abbot the obligations that I feel under to him for the large measure of enjoyment and instruction derived from the Index while under his editorship.

Will you also do me the favor to present to Mr. Abbot a volume which I found to-day in a street bookstall, bearing the following title:—

"Antonii van Dale Dissertationes de Origine ac Progressu Idololatriae et Superstitionum," etc.

It bears the imprint of "Boom," Amsterdam, MDCXCVI (1696); so that booms are not a modern invention, as New Yorkers generally suppose. Whether the book has any special value except for its age and the subjects it treats of, I am not competent to judge —having dropped my schooldays Latin, together with my early Calvinistic education, along the road of life; but I think that Mr. Abbot, being a scholar as well as a philosopher, may find something in it that may give it some value to him.

Yours truly, E. B. WELCH.

From MR. WILLIAM GREEN.

WEST NEWTON, May 31, 1880.

MR. J. A. J. WILCOX:

Dear Sir,—I have before me your note of the 17th instant, inviting me to unite with some of Mr. Abbot's friends in giving him a social reception before he shall relinquish the editorship of the Index. Mr. Abbot deserves all the attention and honor and sympathy that will ever be given him, and I am pleased to hear of the proposed meeting of his friends. As long as I have known the Index, I have been much interested in it and in Mr. Abbot, and would be much gratified to become acquainted with those who sympathize with him in his reformatory labors. But my age, with its usual accompaniments, is such that I do not go out evenings, nor could I endure the fatigue that would attend it; and my hearing is such that I should hear very little of what would be said on the occasion, and consequently should be no companion. Therefore I am obliged to ask you to accept these reasons as my excuse for not joining with you and others on the proposed occasion. Please accept my thanks for the invitation.

Yours fraternally,
WILLIAM GREEN.

From MR. RALPH WALDO EMERSON, by his daughter.

CONCORD, June 23, 1880.

REV. MR. SAVAGE:

Dear Sir,—My Father duly received your note inviting him to the dinner for Mr. Abbot; but he does not feel able to come nor even to write a letter for the occasion. He for some time deferred answering your letter, thinking he might be able to write later; but he finds he is not.

Yours truly, ELLEN J. EMERSON.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE Conference of Charities and Correction which met at Cleveland, Ohio, a short time since, made F. B. Sanborn, of Concord, its president.

HON. FRANCIS M. FINCH, of Ithaca, N.Y., author of the well-known war-poem, "The Blue and the Gray," has had LL.D. conferred upon him by Hamilton College.

VERY few authors have contemplated and afterwards abandoned so few undertakings in literature as Mr. Carlyle. Early in life, he was beset by many schemes, misgivings, and don't-know-what-to-dos; but, after he got well into his work as a writer of books, he moved straight along, and finished what he took up with the thoroughness and directness of a true master. It is not generally known, and for these reasons is the most remarkable, that he intended many years ago to write a life of no less a man than King Charles II. But this he did intend to do, curious as it may seem; for Charles, to many minds, would appear to be the last man in whom Carlyle could find anything save the bad to employ his genius. His purpose, however, was to write of him "as one who was no sham or half-man, but the perfect specimen of a bad king." It is as odd that Macaulay should have contemplated a history of the French Revolution.

"THE LIMITS OF PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY."

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

YOUR excellent leader in the Index, of July 8, under the caption "Is the alphabet at fault?" brings to my mind a passage or two contained in an essay by Dr. Henry Maudsley, written in reply to an address delivered to the members of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, by William Lord, Archbishop of York, and entitled, "The Limits of Philosophical Inquiry."

It will be recollected that, in this address, the distinguished gentleman referred to made a general arraignment of science, and, with characteristic theological audacity, attempted to define the boundaries of scientific research. In the course of his remarkable performance, he also succeeded, in one or two instances, in exciting his audience to the pitch of laughter, by playing the role of the buffoon, and presenting a grotesque caricature of the men to whom the world is so immensely indebted for all that it knows of the laws by which the wonderful phenomena of nature are manifested, and the processes by which the Supreme Architect wrought out the marvellous structure of the universe.

In his reply to the arrogant assumptions and crude generalizations of the Archbishop, Dr. Maudsley proceeds with the pose of conscious power, the quiet dignity of speech, which is characteristic of the true scientist and so clearly distinguishes him from the clerical sciologist, to attack and turn in logical order the various positions occupied by his adversary, with all the deliberation which is conspicuous in the general who is confident that he commands the largest battalions and the heaviest artillery.

I should like to quote at length from this admirable essay; but the subjoined paragraphs, which seem to be peculiarly pertinent to the subject matter of the leader before alluded to, are all that I dare ask space for in the obviously crowded columns of the Index.

"Science, recognizing the measure of what it can impart to be bounded by the existing limits of scientific inquiry, makes no proposition whatever concerning that which lies beyond these limits; equally careful, on the one hand, to avoid a barren enunciation in words of what it cannot apprehend in thought, and, on the other hand, to refrain from a blind denial of possibilities transcending its means of research.

"A calm acquiescence in ignorance until light comes is its attitude. It must be borne clearly in mind, however, that this scrupulous care to abstain from presumptuous assertions does not warrant the imposition of any arbitrary barrier to the reach of its powers, but is quite consistent with the conviction of the possibility of an invasion and subjugation of the unknown to a practically unlimited extent, and with the most strenuous efforts to lessen its domain."

Farther on is this: "In withholding the Scriptures from the people, and shutting off philosophy entirely from the things that belong to faith, the Church of Rome occupies a strong and almost impregnable position: for, if there be no reading, there will be no inquiring; and, if there be no inquiring, there will be no doubt; and, if there be no doubt, there will be no disbelief."

DANIEL CONY.

WOBURN, July 10, 1880.

LORD HOWE gave the following account of one of his crew, an Irishman: "The fellow was brave, but a little too fond of a can of grog, yet never omitted to repeat this prayer every night as he went to his hammock: 'I never murdered any man, and no man ever murdered me. So God bless all mankind.'"

"DARWIN is right," said an awkward youth. "There are moments which come to the young man who doesn't know what to do with his hands, when he longs to climb a tree and be a monkey, and throw nuts at the old bipeds in the front seats. Man has never really tasted the benefits of true freedom since he was a monkey."

CASH RECEIPTS

OTHER THAN DONATIONS, FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 24.

Miss Milly Lehmaier, $3; Simon Aub, $3; A. C. Pierce, $3; H. D. Maxon, $9; Jona. Drake, $3.33; A. T. Lilly, $27.50; Aug. Huhne, $4; Jas. Laird, $11.64; W. M. Salter, $2; Julius Kirschbaum, $1; Anna E. Burr, $3; P. McGrath, $1; Margaret Huntington, $3; A. A. Levy, $1; Thos. M. Johnson, $1; F. W. Teulon, 15 cents; D. K. Boutelle, $3; Jos. York, $3; Mrs. C. D. Child, $3; Geo. C. Greenwood, $5; F. B. Hawley, $3; S. L. Bailey, $4.50; Rev. H. J. Hudson, $3; A. Frankfield, $6; C. B. Michener, $1; Mrs. M. T. Stevens, $3; S. B. Fuller, $3; J. H. Clifford, $3; Mary L. Stone, $3; Mrs. J. H. Barney, $3; H. B. Thomas, $1; Mrs. P. B. Sibley, $1.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.
II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.
III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.
IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.
V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)
VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7:—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, Nos. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to address on the prepayment of 80 cents.
Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9) can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass

MR. MILLS' LECTURES.

1. The Advances of Science in our Time: What do they promise for Man?
2. The Birthplace and Cradle of our Civilization; or, The Indebtedness of West to East, to Asia.
3. The Labor Question.
4. The Mission of the New Thought not to Destroy, but to Fulfil.

STUDIES IN ANCIENT LITERATURE. — Four Lectures.

1. The Gnomic Wisdom of the East, India, Persia, etc.
2. The Poetic Thought and Religious Sentiment of the East.
3. Greek Wisdom, or Pythagoras and his Institution.
4. Greek Religion and Mythology.

REPRESENTATIVE MEN OF OUR TIME.—Three Lectures.

1. Huxley.
2. Max Müller.
3 Emerson.

For terms, etc., address
CHARLES DEB. MILLS,
Syracuse, N.Y.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 554.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 6.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, AUGUST 5, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

A WISE man must faithfully discharge all his moral duties, even though he does not constantly perform the ceremonies of religion. He will fall very low, if he performs ceremonial acts only, and fails to discharge his moral duties. There are two roads that conduct to perfect virtue,—to be true, and to do no evil to any creature.—Hindu (ancient).

BRING no more vain oblations. Incense is an abomination unto me. Put away the evil of your doings. Learn to do well. Seek justice, relieve the oppressed, loose the bands of wickedness.—Old Testament.

SETTING out on thy soul's pilgrimage, unite to thyself what hearts thou canst. Know well that a hundred holy temples of Mecca have not the value of a heart.—Persian, eleventh century.

GOD is spirit; and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth.—New Testament.

ONE hour of justice is worth seventy years of prayer. —Koran.

WHY say I will go on pilgrimage to the holy city of Benares? Why long for the sacred wells? How shall the true Benares be attained by an evil-doer? Though we live in the desert, sanctity is not there; nor is it in the sky; nor on earth at the confluence of holy streams. Convert thy body into a temple, and govern thyself. Give up evil thoughts and see God with thine internal eye.—Hindu, seventeenth century.

LET us purge our minds, and lead virtuous and honest lives. The pleasure of Deity is not in the magnificence of temples, but in the piety and devotion of consecrated hearts.—Seneca.

WITHIN is the fountain of good; that is the life; that is the man. A good man is as a priest and minister of the gods, devoted to that Divinity which hath its dwelling within him.—Marcus Aurelius.

TO SEEK our Divinity merely in books and writings, is to seek the living among the dead; we do but in vain seek God many times in these, where his Truth too often is not so much enshrined as entombed. We must not think we have then attained to the right knowledge of Truth, when we have broke through the outward shell of words and phrases that house it up; or when by logical analysis we have found out the dependences or coherences of them, one with another. Divine Truth is better understood as it unfolds itself in the purity of men's hearts and lives.—Dr. John Smith.

IN private places, among sordid objects, an act of truth or heroism seems at once to draw to itself the sky as its temple, the sun as its candle. Nature stretcheth out her arms to embrace man, only let his thoughts be of equal greatness. Willingly does she follow his steps with the rose and the violet, and bend her lines of grandeur and grace to the decoration of her darling child. Only let his thoughts be of equal scope, and the frame will suit the picture.—R. W. Emerson.

TRUTH alone is my object in the world of thought; and, if necessary, I am willing to sacrifice to it every private hope and joy. Not without tears it may be, but yet with a deep faith that, be the truth what it may, it is more precious than the loveliest illusion, and must be identical with the wisest and best. Truth shall master me; if it comes a-begging my charity, I have none to give. The truth is never a beggar; it rules by divine right, and I will obey it if it ordains despair.—F. E. Abbot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

ONE of our religious exchanges says that there are eighty-five Episcopal churches and chapels in New York City, and that the number has doubled in the last twenty-five years.

THE Advance admits that "the sovereignty of the Westminster Catechism" is at an end among Congregationalists, yet claims that the "substance of its truths" is still firmly believed.

THE Canadian Deity is safe from Col. Ingersoll's defamation—at least in one town. When the orator applied for a hall in said town for one of his lectures, the mayor sent reply: "Maybe there isn't any God for the United States, but there's one for Canada, and you can't have any hall in this town in which to defame him."

ARE Monday newspapers to be tolerated? The work on them, of course, has chiefly to be done on Sunday. Sunday secular papers cannot be allowed, because they are read on Sunday. And it begins to be doubtful whether anything but religious papers should be permitted on Saturday, since many people are tempted to keep them over for Sunday reading.

AN EXCHANGE says that "the whole number of churches and chapels of all sorts in the city is four hundred and eighty-nine, and that it costs about $5,000,000 annually to sustain them; that there are ten thousand liquor-shops, great and small, the annual cost of which is $60,000,000." It would be an interesting question to inquire, further, how far the churches help to sustain the liquor-shops, and how far they work against them.

A MINNESOTA Congregational Association has been trying one of its ministers for teaching that future punishment is not endless. The charge was proved, but the Association leniently thought that it was a sin which might be repented of, and hence put the guilty brother on probation. It unanimously resolved "that the charges have been substantially sustained, but that, in consideration of his apparent honesty, final action be deferred until the next regular meeting in October; and that, in the meantime, a committee of two be appointed to try their powers of persuasion on the offender."

WE learn that ground has been broken for a Catholic parochial school in Malden, Mass. A motion made in the School Committee to appoint a sub-committee to consider and report what, if any, action the School Board should take in the matter, was voted down by a majority of six to one. Yet we see not why such a motion was not perfectly proper. School Boards, in such cases, ought to inquire whether it is from any neglect of theirs that the Catholics start a separate school. In Milford, Mass., where they have lately established a parochial school, the Catholics gave the reason that the town did not provide sufficient primary schools. Such an excuse certainly ought not to be allowed to exist; nor the grievance which the Catholics usually bring, that the public schools are inculcating sectarian Protestantism.

THE Christian Statesman is thankful for even the smallest favors that can be interpreted in any way as thrown for its pet idea of securing a literal recognition of God in the federal constitution. It says of Garfield's letter of acceptance, that "it contains in its closing sentence an acknowledgment of God which is becoming in a Christian man." But there is plenty of that kind of "acknowledgment of God" in the country. If salvation lay in that direction, we need have no fears from any of our national perils. But it is not saying God so much as obeying the law of truth and righteousness that the country needs at Washington. You may hear often enough there a verbal "acknowledgment of God," both piously and profanely; and, if it go no further than words, one is as useless as the other. President Buchanan was very scrupulous in his Sunday and prayer-book acknowledgment of God. But the American people would not, for that reason, be likely to make him President again, were he alive today. They prefer a man with a single eye for the discernment of moral principles, and with a moral backbone vigorous enough to stand by them, whether he say the right religious words or not. As to General Garfield—it is to be hoped that he has these requisites.

THE Swiss people quietly carry out a good many reforms which some of the larger and more conspicuous republics might well copy. The Nation thus summarizes a recent law adopted at Geneva: "The Grand Council of Geneva has passed a law, or rather constitutional amendment, which has still to be submitted to the people, abolishing the connection between Church and State in the canton. It provides that no minister of religion is hereafter to receive any salary from the State, and no tax can be imposed for the maintenance of any form of worship. Such churches as are the property of the communes are to pass into the category of other communal property, but are to be inalienable for thirty years from the passage of the law; but no Protestant church is to be used for Catholic worship, and no Catholic church for Protestant worship. The endowments now belonging to the Protestant church at Geneva are to be administered like those of charitable institutions. The bill was carried on the third reading by a majority of fifty-five to forty-six. The majority represent the rich Catholics and Protestants and freethinkers, and the minority the poorer Catholics and Protestants who think they cannot maintain any form of religious worship without State aid. There is a strong feeling out-of-doors, however, that the Catholic Church will be the only gainer by the change, and that the Protestant interest will be ruined by it, owing to its divisions and want of organization."

Digitized by Google

SOLDIERS' MEMORIAL SERMON.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE WM. LOGAN RODMAN POST OF THE GRAND ARMY, IN NEW BEDFORD, MAY 23, 1880.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

In a small pocket diary—three by two inches in size, and three days to a page—which made a part of my personal effects in Virginia in the year 1864, I find, in the week of May corresponding to that on which we enter to-day, such brief jottings as these:—

Sunday, 22.—Take boat [at Washington] for Belle Plain, 8.30 A.M. Walk thence with wagon train and escort to Fredericksburg. Sleep in wagon on Falmouth side.

Monday, 23.—Assigned to duty in Sixth Corps Hospital. O. W. Peirce, First Sergeant, Company D, Tenth Massachusetts Regiment. Tent No. 3, C line. [Something was to be done for the sergeant, the memorandum does not say what. Perhaps a letter was to be written for him; perhaps, from the particularity of the record, something was to be done for him through the War Department.] Two shirts and two pairs of drawers wanted in B line.

Tuesday, 24.—Attend tent [the Sanitary Commission tent] and nurse the wounded.

Wednesday, 25.—Death of New Jersey boy, Thomas Cook. Close his eyes, put a bunch of roses in his hand, and pin his blanket around him for burial. A part of the men removed to-day [in steamer for Washington].

Thursday, 26.—Hospital broken up. Saw the last man put in ambulance. One was left dead. He had moved on in advance. Take boat for Port Royal, on the Rappahannock.

Friday, 27.—Feeding wounded brought in temporarily at Port Royal. Making milk punch, lemonade, and giving out supplies of clothing. Dying soldier from New York; asked about his condition, and being told replied, "I am content, if that is my lot."

Saturday, 28.—Called up again in the night by another train of wounded and sick coming in from the front. Not much on duty during the day. Great activity on shore in preparations for again moving.

Sunday, 29.—Go aboard steamer "Kent," for White House. Anchor at mouth of Rappahannock at sunset. Service on board led by Rev. Mr. Briggs of California. Made by his request a brief address.

And then the month ends with these memoranda:—

Monday, 30.—Starting again at 3 A.M., arrive at White House 5.30 P.M. Great commotion on shore and in the river. Reinforcements arriving from Butler for Meade. Report of a battle near Hanover Court House.

Tuesday, 31.—Went on shore. The Sanitary Tent put up. The sick and weary fed; no wounded yet. Visited the Fortieth Massachusetts. Heard cannonading very distinctly. Reports of Grant being within seven or eight miles of Richmond.

And so the little record goes on, through June, through July, through all the hot weeks of a hot summer. Richmond was not so near as dame Rumor had reported. And, after all the hard fighting and heavy slaughter in the Wilderness, at Spottsylvania, at Cold Harbor, it was not to be reached from that side, it was not to be reached that year. It was the year, you will remember, when Gen. Grant, having assumed personal command of the armies in the East, began his famous Virginia campaign. The campaign began with great hopes, with great military and popular enthusiasm. The "On to Richmond!" cry was heard again, and people began to say, "Now the war is to end." It was the beginning of the end; but the end of the end was still a year ahead. Well do I remember the eagerness with which our soldiers set out from Washington on this last campaign. There was the glee of hope and victory in every movement, in every eye. And when the camps and forts around Washington had been depleted of their men bound for the front, feeling that the duties to which I had there been assigned during the winter were nearly finished, I asked to be relieved of them, that I might go with the army; and thenceforward I was on service in the Sanitary Commission, at the base of supplies for the Army of the Potomac, which at this time was a very changing base.

And this little record which I have been reading to you is the brief memoranda, jotted down at the close of the day, of that first week's service. Most vividly do I remember—for it was a scene, once impressed on the brain, not to be obliterated from it—that first Sunday evening after leaving Washington. We had walked across the country some seven or eight miles from Belle Plain, with the train of military wagons, among which was our wagon of sanitary supplies. Late in the evening we arrived on the Falmouth side of the river, opposite Fredericksburg, where the wagons were to remain for the night under military guard. After putting our wagon in order for the night, with three gentlemen of this city, who had gone down with various supplies collected here personally to superintend their distribution, I walked over the pontoon bridge (all the others had been destroyed) into the battered and deserted city of Fredericksburg,—deserted of its own inhabitants, save a remnant of women and children, and a few men, who were hiding in cellars, or keeping themselves closely hidden in the rear of their houses. Yet I venture to say it had a population numbering more than its own citizenship. But what a population! It was a population of our own wounded and dying and dead soldiers,—a population brought there within the last few days from those terrible slaughters in the battles of the Wilderness and Spottsylvania Court House. It was a population stretched upon narrow cots, or on blankets upon the floor, and often with not even a blanket, but only the blue uniform that showed what service had brought them there. And, as we walked up through the silent, dimly-lighted streets,—lighted only by the half-filled western moon,—and looked into the more dimly-lighted buildings through the open windows, or went in through doors left ajar, it seemed as if every store and warehouse and dwelling were thickly occupied with these silent sufferers. The Confederates had left after our wounded began to be brought in, but not without stripping the city of everything that could be eaten or worn. The shops were all emptied, and had become hospitals. What struck me most of all was the unearthly silence,—a silence broken only by some half-suppressed, involuntary groan of a restless wounded man, or the half-whispered voice of a night-watcher. Here and there the moonlight fell upon some pallid face, in which I could see written the determination to bear patiently and to do bravely. And there they lay, waiting for some form of relief,—waiting for beds, waiting for more nurses, waiting for hospital stores, waiting for the surgeon with his bandages and knife, waiting for transportation to Washington, waiting—perhaps to many the most welcome summons of all—for the messenger of death. The silence and the patience, under the weird, silent moonlight, are what my memory now recalls with special vividness. And silent death was the messenger that did appear to many before the hours of that night wore away, and to many more before we all, the wounded and the well, departed from Fredericksburg; for, in a garden on the outskirts of the town, we left long rows of thick-set graves, where wrapped in their blankets our boys were buried shoulder to shoulder, as they had stood in the battle.

And in this wounded and sick and dying and dead population of Fredericksburg, on that memorable night, were doubtless many whom I had seen a few weeks before in the regiments that passed through Washington, at the beginning of the campaign, with such buoyancy of step, and the gleam of coming victory on their faces. The hope was deferred; the victory was not yet won. And these opening, desperately contested battles had disclosed that the way to Richmond had got to be conquered inch by inch,—that there was a strong and well-handled army there to dispute every step of the road; an army to be overcome, not in one battle or two, but only by the slow abrasion of a year's contests. And so, as my little diary indicates, the work went on. The base of supplies shifted down from Fredericksburg to Port Royal, from Port Royal to White House, and from White House it took a sweep round to City Point on the James. For the army had now found that Petersburg was the key to Richmond, and began the siege of that city,—a siege not to culminate in triumph till another spring. And with the base of supplies went our sanitary tents, with all their comforts for the wounded and sick. And through the summer weeks the record continues,—of feeding and clothing and nursing sick and wounded men, of deaths and burials, of receiving new trains from the front and sending off convalescents further to the rear, of the disastrous explosion mid-summer of "Burnside's mine," of sickness and accidents and deaths among our sanitary agents, of incidents of personal tragedy, with the comic sometimes for relief intermingled. On one day, I count one hundred graves of men from our Ninth Corps Hospital in the neighboring cemetery. On another, a man brings to my tent his thumb which has been shot off, and asks for a vial and alcohol to preserve it in,—I presume for the resurrection-day. On another, a man shows me a bullet which went through his cheek a few days previous, and dropped quietly in his mouth. On another, I was summoned to the burial of a soldier of the Fourteenth Maine Cavalry, of which regiment one of my nearest and most loved friends was chaplain. The next day, I learned that my friend the chaplain had been instantaneously killed in the same battle in which this soldier received his mortal wound. Thus on the skirts of the bloody conflict we hovered, with such appliances of healing and comfort as were put by a generous people at our disposal, to stanch the blood and soothe away the pain,—messengers, as we were, between the soldiers in the field and the homes they had left in the North.

But why do I dwell on these reminiscences? I believe it is the first time that I have indulged publicly at such length in personal recollections of the little part I had in our great civil strife. I have a purpose in it now. This little diary, into which I have scarcely looked before for sixteen years, tells the tale of what was going on just in the rear of our armies throughout the whole field of the conflict, and through the whole four years of the war. This that I have read is but an infinitesimal glimpse of the struggle—only the small portion coming within the range of one pair of eyes for a few days. Thousands and thousands of similar diaries were kept; but more thousands of the actors kept none, and yet had none the less of experience. Look at one such record through all the days of the four years' conflict, and then multiply it by a number which I should not dare to guess, and we begin to get some idea of this phase of the struggle. And yet, as I say, this is only a glimpse of what was going on just in the rear of our armies. Of what was going on in front, throwing back its tide of mangled and suffering bodies to the welcoming embrace of the country's humanity, there are men before me who could tell much better than I. But the point I wish to make is, that you must multiply what each can tell of his own experience thousands, yea, a million-fold, before you can get the whole story of the war.

And now what did we have such a terrible contest for? Did we gain anything by it? Was it worth while to have had all this suffering, this agony of separation and bereavement, this drain on the country's vital resources, this premature death of so many brave and noble men, for anything that the war has achieved? In coming to the answer to these questions, I notice in the current talk of political newspapers and politicians two things which seem to me equally delusions. First, it is sometimes said that all the achievements of the war have actually been lost, or are in imminent danger of being lost, by our political blunders since. And second, there has been not a little talk, on the other hand, in the last few years, of such a fraternization and reconciliation between the two sides of the conflict that everything else is to be forgotten and forgiven, except the common valor, sincerity, and fortitude of both sides, reflecting equal glory upon the country. Now I cannot, for one, give my assent to either of these propositions.

In the first place, however far we may seem from having permanently and beyond question settled all the issues involved in the war, and whatever perils may threaten us in the future (and I do not say that there are not such), yet it cannot, certainly, at this hour be truthfully said that the war has been rendered a failure on account of its objects, once gained on the battle-field, having been squandered and lost in the political contests that have succeeded. What were the objects of the war? First, it was to preserve the country one and indivisible against armed secession and dismemberment. And this object was surely achieved, nor has it yet been lost; nor do I think that many persons will really claim that it is in any quarter now seriously imperilled. Here and there a United States law may be defied by personal violence, and individual blusterers may make angry threats of what they mean to do by and by. Nevertheless, the fact remains that we have one Government,—one Congress, one Executive, one system of Federal Courts,—and there is nowhere, in any of the States, any Legislature, or convention, or body of armed men, that is trying to take any one of the States out of the Union; nowhere any sign or intimation of such a movement. The country is, at this time, one and undivided. Secession was conquered, the Union preserved. This object of the war, then, was gained and still stands.

Digitized by Google

But it is objected that, while there is no open movement against the Union, the once seceded States, through their now legal position in the Union, are getting their old advantage in federal legislation, and are preparing to nullify and overturn the constitutional guarantees that were adopted at the close of the war for permanently securing its objects, especially those involving the question of slavery. With reference to this objection, let me say that, taking from the outset of the Rebellion the ground that, as slavery was the vital primary cause of the war, so there could be no vital and permanent peace save through emancipation, and still believing that this position was sound in logic, as it proved to be sound in practice, I should now be the last to overlook or make light of any action on the part of the seceded States which should appear even to look towards the immediate or the distant nullifying of that decree of emancipation, which, with the after constitutional amendment forever prohibiting slavery throughout the Union, made the glory of the war and the fitting crown of our triumph. And the outrages which have been committed upon the emancipated negroes in many of the States—the outrages upon their property, their personal liberty, their right to the ballot, their life—are to my mind not only a shame upon our civilization, but, if they cannot, as is perhaps the case, be wholly prevented under our present system of government, they indicate a serious defect in that system itself, which ought to be remedied. It is indeed a strange anomaly that the freest government on earth, and one of the strongest, too, cannot protect its own citizens in its own borders in all the rights of freedom; that it can lay its hand upon any of its citizens, illegally wronged in a foreign country, and lift them to their rights, but can only stand passively by and apologize if the same citizen is illegally wronged by the authorities of any of our States,—and this, too, in respect to rights which the national government has conferred upon him. I am in favor, therefore, of agitation to the end that the federal government shall have the constitutional right to protect all its citizens in all the rights and privileges of citizenship, wherever the stars and stripes float.

The consideration of the objection I am noticing brings us, in fact, to the second object and achievement of the war,—second historically, but first in importance,—the abolition of slavery. But, while I would denounce and resist the spirit which has tried to circumvent this achievement by such outrages as I have above referred to, I do not think it can be seriously claimed that the Emancipation Act has been so far nullified as to be truly called a failure. The freed race has not been reduced to bondage again, and, I venture to say, cannot be. The negroes may be the victims of wrong, but they are not slaves. Cruel as may be the cause of their exodus into more hospitable States, they still can leave, and no slave-hunters nor bloodhounds follow their tracks to force them back. No fugitives have to flee from New Bedford or Boston to-day to save themselves from the hand of kidnappers. No United States Court House is surrounded with chains to keep back the indignant citizens from rescuing an arraigned negro within from the clutches of a United States Fugitive-Slave Commissioner. Schools are spreading among the colored people in the South, taught by educated men and women of their own race, who were born slaves; and this, certainly, was not an element of the old-time slavery. Property is increasing among them, personal and in real estate,—and this, again, was not a condition of slavery. And, though by various kinds of intimidation and fraud their right to vote and to an honest count of their votes has been shamefully curtailed and annulled, they nevertheless do vote, still, to a greater or less extent, in all the States; and in many local elections their vote is beginning to be appealed to as holding the balance of power between rival factions of their old masters' party,—a thing undreamed of in the old days of bondage. They hold political conventions, too, and send their delegates to national conventions, and behave, I am sorry to say, very much like white politicians—again, not a feature of "the peculiar institution" as it existed in the times when Toombs and Yancey and Preston Brooks were representative politicians in the South.

Here are facts which cannot be denied; and they surely do not bear out the complaint frequently heard, that the Emancipation Amendment of the Constitution is nullified, and the negro virtually reduced to slavery again. No, the war in its two great objects was not a failure. Its two special achievements have not yet been overthrown nor annulled. The Union still stands undivided, and the Emancipation Act still stands uncancelled,—even though much still remains to be done to unfold politically and harmoniously from these two great achievements all the beneficent results involved in them. But what remains to be done is, I contend, to be done on the political field and in the field of education, and not in the contests of armed hosts in physical battle. Whatever perils threaten the future of these two accomplishments of the war, there is no sign as yet, certainly, of concerted military resistance to them. The perils are political. The contest is to be one of brains, not of muskets; a competition of political sagacity and courage and vigilance, rather than a measure of swords. And in such a struggle the States that saved the Union and gave freedom to the slave, if only intellectually alert and morally firm, should be able to keep what they have gained. Eternal will be their shame, overwhelming in its condemnation the sentence which history will pronounce against them, if they now allow the political cunning and persistence of their old foes, or the blandishments of any sentimental reconciliation, to snatch these dearly bought prizes from their blood-stained hands. They have won their country; they have won liberty for all men in it,—objects worth all the precious cost of the war to have gained; but eternal vigilance—vigilance of intellect, vigilance of the moral sense, is the price they still must pay to hold these treasures.

In considering the question whether the results of the war adequately compensate for all the pain and loss and helpless agony of those four years of armed conflict, it is time that I turned to consider that other phase of recent opinion to which I have referred, which discloses itself in such talk as this,—that, in the era of reconciliation and fraternity to which we have now come, it is time to forget the antagonistic opinions and objects that divided the two sections in the war, and remember only the common valor and bravery and fortitude of the American citizen, which were displayed alike on both sides. Now I have respect for the soldierly magnanimity which recognizes the valor of a contending or fallen foe. Should there chance to be, among the graves that you will decorate next Saturday, one in which rests a soldier who wore the gray, lay, for this sentiment's sake, the tribute of flowers over him, too. I have respect, also, for the judgment which declares that we are not to ask or expect that those who fought so bravely and persistently on the other side will now confess that they were intellectually and morally wrong, and will humiliate themselves with apologies. It is enough if they acquiesce in the changed condition of things, and show that they mean honorably to abide by it in practice. So far the issues that divided the country and brought on the war may be passed over, and forgivingly committed to the slowly modifying influence of silence. What has been settled by the sword need not be opened for the acrimony of debate, for the sake of producing mental conviction. But this is a very different thing from saying that, in the fraternization of the divided sections and of the mutually magnanimous armies, nothing is now to be remembered but the military virtues of the two sides. Was it for this, then, that we went to war, just to show our prowess? Did a million men on each side of Mason and Dixon's line stand up to fight each other merely to prove their courage and fortitude? Why, even the professors of the pugilistic art have pluck and valor and endurance. Were our armies only pugilists? No,—these men who are before me would resent the imputation of such a question. If only the valor of brave men is to be recalled as the justification of our contest, then we committed the most gigantic crime in all history. But it is not so. Both armies fought for a cause, for a conviction, and only displayed their valor and endurance because of their faith in their cause.

But again it is said there was the same sincerity of conviction, the same earnestness of conscience and faith, on one side as the other. Yes,—but not the same rightness of conviction, not the same righteousness of conscience. Sincerity and earnestness of conviction, admirable qualities in themselves, have yet been frequently displayed in the most unjust and cruel wars that were ever waged; and it is too late a day in the progress of civilization to attempt to justify any war on the ground of sincerity of conviction alone. Below sincerity of conviction there is an essential difference of convictions based on their rightness and wrongness; and before the august tribunal of history, to which our case must go for final judgment, it is only this distinction that can stand. The case as adjudicated there will be, "Prowess, valor, heroism,—yes, alike on both sides; sincerity and earnestness of belief,—yes, the scales may balance there, too; but which side was contending for the right?" And though we on our side, it may be said, cannot answer this question impartially any more than they on the other, yet let us not, in any gush of fraternal sentiment, confound the two causes for which the two sections were respectively contending, and, declaring that there was no essential difference between them which need now be remembered, throw away the very case on which we must make our appeal to history for justification. And what is that case? I have already practically stated it under the preceding head. We fought, first, for the integrity of our country. But that is not enough,—for the integrity of a country may mean despotism. We fought then, further, for the integrity of a country whose government was founded theoretically on the equal rights of all its people; and, still further, we fought, as the contest went on, to carry this constitutionally guaranteed liberty practically to all the inhabitants of the land. That is our case. The war on our side was for our country and its impartial liberties. Nor did we enter the war until our foes had begun their armed rebellion against the country's integrity and peace. And what was their cause? To establish a separate government that they might keep unmolested the institution of slavery,—to found a Confederacy on the corner-stone of human bondage. Can it be stated otherwise than that? Was not this their own confession—nay, their boasted claim? Did secession have any other motive, any other cause? Not, then, until slavery and liberty mean the same thing, until treason and loyalty are defined in the same way, until wrong and right can change places and be the same as before, not until to fight for one's country and for liberty is the same thing as to fight against one's country and for slavery, can we forget, or ought we to forget and confound the great issues which divided the country so tragically, for four years, into two warring armies. Only by remembering the eternal difference of cause, and impressing it upon the page of history, will our posterity read our justification.

And now, friends and veterans of the Union army, who are gathered before me, I have essentially finished the purpose I had in view. But I cannot close without one word of special application. If I had put a text at the head of this discourse, it might have been this: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. . . . And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise; God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect."

There is a startling force in that last sentence. Our army, the living and the dead, were seeking a country; and they had glimpses of, and faith in, a better country than that which we had had before the great struggle began. And yet, though obtaining a good report, they received not the promise. We were all apt to think, as the struggle went on (and it was then a comforting and encouraging thought), that, when it was all ended, and the great evil which was the cause of the war and the source of so many of our national troubles should be eradicated from our political system, we should then enter upon a career of great material and moral prosperity. But our fair hopes have not yet been fulfilled. The bright promise has not yet been received. And it could not be. Such gigantic evils are not rectified in a day, nor in a generation. The generations are linked to each other in the work of removing them. They that fought, they that died, did their work well. Yet they received not the promise. It is reserved for us and our posterity, that they without us should not be made perfect. But for us also it is reserved as the reward of deeds. We must take up the unfinished work which their hands dropped with their muskets, and carry it forward to completion. But ours to-day are civil, not military obligations. Let us see to it, each at our post of civil duty, wherever it may be, that we do all in our power to promote general education,—the best permanent security of the ballot against intimidation and fraud; that we guard well the equal rights and liberties of all classes and sections of the people; that, so far as in us lies, only men of moral uprightness and intellectual competence be put and kept in public office; that we labor incessantly in behalf of the interests of public and private morality, and to bring in that righteousness which is the strength of national as of individual character, and which peace at last shall kiss in token of a regeneration complete and enduring. Let the voters of to-day be as faithful to all their civil obligations as were our soldiers to their duties on the field of battle, and the fulfilment of the promise of a better country shall not long be delayed. Their work, which could not alone bring the reward, will be perfected through ours, and the "better thing" they toiled and fought and died for we shall help to bring, and some of us live to see.

Digitized by Google

FROM OUR BROOKLYN CORRESPONDENT.

The Brooklyn Philosophical Society, of which the Index published an account about a year ago, has recently concluded a very successful season. The meetings have usually been well attended, and the membership has more than doubled during the winter, now numbering about one hundred. The chief labor and responsibility connected with the management of the meetings have fallen upon Gen. Lewis M. Peck; and he is to be congratulated upon the large measure of success that has attended his efforts, which have been ably and unceasingly directed to the promotion of the Society's welfare. A brief sketch of the work accomplished during the year may be of interest to your readers.

The season was opened Oct. 30, 1879, with a carefully prepared paper by Mr. Daniel M. Tredwell, on "Immortality and Science." The speaker, in his scientific argument, maintained the position of Büchner and the materialists, assuming that the acceptance of the philosophy of evolution involved the conception that the development of organic life, even to the highest forms of consciousness and mental activity, was a purely material process; that thought was caused by and conditioned upon the molecular changes of the brain; and that, consequently, when the brain ceased to act, and the physical organism was no longer endowed with life, all thought, consciousness, and individuality came to an end. The statement of this view was made in the most fearless and radical terms possible. Indeed, it seemed to some of us that the speaker asserted his radicalism and personal idiosyncrasies of belief sometimes at the expense of that calmness and strict attention to logical sequence in the development of his argument that are so essential to the production of conviction in minds trained to philosophical reasoning.

On Nov. 7, another able paper on "Immortality" was read by Wm. H. Boughton, Esq. The arguments herein presented were rather of a speculative and metaphysical than a scientific character, though the conclusions were also adverse to any probability of conscious existence after death. The statement, however, was clothed in such beautiful language, and the whole tone of the paper was so genial and optimistic,—so hopeful for the race, if not the individual,—that the essay was generally considered one of the ablest and most interesting of the season.

The next paper, Dec. 4, was an instructive statement, by John Henry Hull, Esq., of "The Law of Husband and Wife"; giving some account of the origin and development of the laws governing the marriage relation, and their present status in enlightened communities, particularly in our own State. It appears that, under the enactments of New York, the wife has now many privileges which are denied the husband; and that our legislators have "stood up so straight" for the equality of woman in the marriage relation that they have sometimes "leaned over backwards." Mr. Hull's paper was an able plea for genuine equality, based on an identity of privileges for both husband and wife.

"The Persian (Zoroastrian) Influence on Judaism and Christianity" was the title of a paper read by Lewis G. Janes, Dec. 11, 1879. It aimed to set forth one leading characteristics of the doctrines of the Avesta, and of the Hebrew faith prior and subsequent to its contact with Zoroastrianism during the Babylonian captivity, showing that in its later development it was materially modified by the Persian influence. As the paper will be given to your readers in full, I will make no farther analysis of it here.

Wm. E. S. Fales, Esq., gave an interesting history of "The Devil," Jan. 8, 1880; a sketch of the development of the belief in his Satanic majesty, in Judaism and Christianity, with illustrations from mediæval literature of the vivid conception of this personage held through many Christian generations. On the following week, Daniel G. Thompson, Esq., read a carefully prepared paper upon "English Philosophers"; a subject which his recent sojourn in England, and acquaintance with Spencer and others of whom he spoke, qualified him to treat most acceptably.

Mrs. Imogene C. Fales, the first lady who has read for our Society, gave us, Jan. 22, an exceedingly thoughtful and well-written paper upon "European and Asiatic Thought." It is impossible to do justice to Mrs. Fales' essay in a brief report. She drew a parallel between the doctrine of metempsychosis, which is characteristic of the leading religions of Asia, and the philosophy of evolution, which she held to be the most noteworthy and significant product of European thought, and endeavored to show that the essential elements in these two beliefs corresponded with and were complementary to each other, as spirit to body. The religion and philosophy of the future, she thought, would seize and appropriate the truths that underlie both these conceptions.

Messrs. F. B. Hawley, in his able paper on "The Economy of Capital," and Chas. Frederic Adams, Esq., on "The Murder of an Axiom," presented opposite views of the financial question. Mr. Hawley's paper has been printed in a late number of the National Quarterly Review, to which I refer your readers for further information. The views presented by both the disputants were original and instructive. N. McGregor Steele, Esq. (Feb. 12), read a paper on "Greek and Roman Civilization before the Time of Plutarch," including a comparison with modern "Christian" civilization, not always to the credit of the latter.

On the Thursday evening following, Dr. R. L. Dugdale, author of The Jukes Family, gave us a valuable paper on the treatment of crime, entitled "Deterrence: its Confession of Failure." It was a thoughtful and noteworthy plea for greater humanity in the management of our penal institutions, and for efforts to reform the criminal classes rather than execute vengeance upon them. It was illustrated by a wealth of facts and statistics respecting the reforms introduced in England and Australia, and was an exceedingly strong and convincing statement of the importance and necessity of a change in our system of criminal management.

Dr. James L. Farley presented a very hopeful view of "The Protestantization of France," giving many facts illustrative of the decay of Romanism in that country. Dr. F. B. Green followed with an instructive essay on "Physical Aspects of Death"; his view, based upon observation in his practice as a physician, and upon the facts of physiology, being that the closing moments of life are usually painless, the provision of Nature being that pain shall cease when its warnings are no longer competent to arouse the system to a hopeful conflict with disease.

Wm. M. Ivins, Esq., March 11, read a carefully prepared paper on "Comparative Jurisprudence." The next week, Gen. L. M. Peck followed with a severe criticism of Herbert Spencer's doctrine of "The Unknowable." March 25, Mr. Tredwell gave us an interesting ethnological paper, entitled "Nomads of the Sea." This being his favorite field of study and investigation, Mr. Tredwell's ethnological discussions are always full of instruction and varied information. In this essay, he elaborated the theory that civilization originated on the American continent, and travelled west across the Pacific to Asia. He believes that there are evidences of what was once a high order of civilization among all the Malay peoples, and that in prehistoric ages the ancestors of these peoples—"the nomads of the sea"—were instrumental in planting the germs of civilization upon the Eastern Continent. Mr. Tredwell, who has maintained this theory for years, in able papers before the American Ethnological Society, and elsewhere, is not alone in his belief. Recent discoveries in Bolivia, and translations, by Prof. Rudolph Falb of Germany, of inscriptions in the ancient Aymara tongue, spoken by a race older than that of the Incas, whose language was the Quicha, lead him to suggest the question, Did the Semitic peoples originate in South America? The characteristics of the Aymara dialect are, he declares, closely akin to those of the so-called Semitic languages of Asia. Like them, it is reducible to three consonantal roots. An inscription found in an Aymara temple, four miles from Lake Titicaca, prove the temple to have been erected as a memorial of a great flood. There are also references to a legend of the creation, similar to that discovered on the cuneiform tablets of Assyria, and to the familiar Bible story. Doubtless, like the Asiatic stories, when fully understood, the Aymara legend will be identified as a fragment of an early solar mythology, which, as is well known, was a characteristic feature in the primitive religion of South America as well as of Central Asia.

Thursday evening, April 1, the Society held a delightful social reunion, listening to a bright and admirable paper by Miss Anne Sheldon, on "The Essential Characteristics of Modern Poetry"; and to excellent music and recitations by some of the lady members and friends of the Society. April 8, Prof. P. H. Van der Weyde followed with a very radical defence of "Scepticism," as the proper mental attitude for truth-seekers, rather than an unquestioning faith in authority.

The week after, Mr. Andrew McLean, of the Brooklyn Eagle, read a thoughtful essay on "Scotch Philosophy"; maintaining that the "common-sense" doctrine was an essential characteristic in the writings of all the leading philosophers of Scotland, however widely apart they might be in some of their conclusions, and justified their identification as members of a distinct metaphysical school. Instead of the usual lecture, Dr. Farley closed the April meetings with an admirable recitation of "Hamlet," which was listened to by a large audience of the members and their friends.

In a paper entitled "Evolution and Immortality," Lewis G. James gave a sketch of the genesis and development of the doctrine of a future life, according to the philosophy of evolution; and some account of the essential characteristics of the belief as held by the leading religions of the world, with illustrative quotations from their sacred writings. He examined the bearing of scientific discoveries upon the belief, arguing in favor of its rationality, and against the positions taken by Messrs. Tredwell and Boughton, that the doctrine was scientifically and philosophically inadmissible. Dr. R. L. Dugdale followed with an exhaustive exposition of "The Preventable Causes of Pauperism," a paper of great value, which ought to be printed and read by every thoughtful citizen.

Daniel G. Thompson read, May 20, a philosophical essay on the "Summum Bonum," an able exposition and defence of the Epicurean philosophy as a guide for life. The season closed May 27, with a critical essay on "Spiritism," by W. E. S. Fales, Esq., and a delightful poem by Miss Sheldon, reviewing the work of the season, and hitting off the characteristics and foibles of the different speakers in a way that was thoroughly appreciated by the audience. In subsequent letters, I hope to give your readers some account of other intellectual and religious movements, of a liberal tendency, in our city. Brooklyn is gradually but surely awakening to a larger and freer intellectual life.

J.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

STRANGE STORIES. By Erckmann-Chatrain. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

This little book, translated from the French, is one of Appletons' "New Handy-Volume Series." Like others of its fellows, it will help while away the tedium of a long car-journey or of a rainy day at the sea-shore or among the mountains. The series is rightly named and is well edited.

RHINE ROAMINGS. By Lucy A. Hill. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

One never tires of following the tourist among the old castles, the historic, romantic, and picturesque interest, that distinguish the famous river here described.

The "roamings" recorded are those of half a dozen girls, still in their "teens," from as many different countries, whom chance has brought together, in a very engaging spot upon its bank, for a term of study and travel. The preceptress, Frau von Heine, appears to have been judicious, and, by the slender thread of her gentle authority, and their own excellent sense and tractable dispositions, to have held them, with all their contrasts, in affectionate and harmonious fellowship. Of course, one does not look for very profound or subtle reflections in such a book, nor does it make pretension to them. It is a girls' book, though not designed exclusively for this class of readers; a simple and unaffected account of the sights and experiences the title indicates, written in a style of lively and buoyant grace, with faultless taste and purity of tone. Four finely executed illustrations serve to give to the sketches additional distinctness. It is a book of attractive appearance, printed on heavy, clean white paper, and clear type of more than the ordinary size of the class to which it belongs.

Digitized by Google

MIND IN THE LOWER ANIMALS IN HEALTH AND DISEASE. By W. Lander Lindsay, M.D. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.

If, as many believe, theology is, in its last analysis, a department of psychology; and if, again, as many also believe, the fundamental data of human psychology cannot be discovered by an analysis of the mental processes of the adult human being, but involve a careful consideration of the physiological basis of mind, then no book should hold out a better promise of good things than a labored work upon mind in the lower animals. That, physiologically, we are allied to the lower animals, very few persons now venture to dispute: that a certain psychological analogy exists is also a fact of universal admission: but the character of this analogy, its extent, its limitations, and the inferences necessarily deducible from it, are matters of intense interest, concerning which we really know very little, but toward which the thoughts of many persons are now turning, as one of the most promising among the many newly opened fields for scientific investigation.

Expectation of good things may easily make the student's mouth water, as he takes up Dr. Lindsay's two handsome octavo volumes of eleven hundred pages, and runs through the appetizing table of contents. But, with the table of contents, a great deal of the expected enjoyment, alas! will end. The promise of the book is magnificent; the bill of fare is tempting; the repast (to continue the figure) is admirably served: the odor of the sauces and gravies is tantalizingly delicious; but, oh, the cooking of the viands!

It is a little bit difficult to state in few words the reason of the disappointing effect of Dr. Lindsay's work, although the disappointment is fully felt before the reader has read two pages. Plainly, the work is scientific only in appearance; but so thoroughly are appearances kept up from beginning to end, and so well are they supplemented by qualities of genuine excellence in the writer, that one naturally hesitates to believe that it is so radically defective. The work is the result of years of preparation, of patient, laborious research, of careful writing, of earnest devotion to the subject and thorough belief in its importance, but is nevertheless of as little value as possible consistently with these excellences. It has all the ear-marks of a work of science, without being scientific; and its author goes through all the motions of a man of science, without having any scientific ability. The work is therefore only a huge ghost or simulacrum of what it ought to be. This judgment may seem harsh; and it goes greatly against the grain to make it, for no one can read the volumes without acquiring great respect for the purpose of the author and for his indomitable industry. He has collected a huge mass of material, at great cost of time, and has put it into shape with immense expenditure of labor; and all this of course increases the difficulty of saying that no reliance can be placed upon any of his conclusions. One or two illustrations will confirm this verdict. He says, for instance, "We know that military horses and elephants are great sticklers for rank, insisting upon occupying that place in processions and pageants to which they believe their own rank or that of their masters entitles them." Now, as matter of fact, the very thing which Dr. Lindsay says "we know" is precisely the point at issue, and is the very thing we should like to know something about. That military horses and elephants will insist upon taking the places to which they have become accustomed, we know; but that this insistance involves any idea of rank, we do not know, and very few persons are ready to believe. Nor are many persons ready to believe that a Scotch shepherd's dog is influenced by religious sentiments, when he attends church with his master, and remains quiet during the services. Nor can we admit that the feigning of death by an insect in presence of its enemies argues, on the part of the insect, a knowledge of death and its attendant circumstances, and a deliberate simulation of the appearances of death for the purpose of deception, involving altogether a marvellous display of intellectual ability, when we know (1) that, as Mr. Darwin tells us, in no case under his observation did the attitude in which the animal shammed dead resemble that in which it really died; (2) that the animal may simply suffer from a fear which paralyzes the muscles; and (3) that the instance may have been originally only an accidental adjustment of the organism to its surroundings, subsequently confirmed by natural selection; and, therefore, (4) that the practice may be fully explained consistently, with no display of the reasoning faculty.

Not only are our author's conclusions unreliable, even when he reaches definite conclusions, but he has, moreover, the most exasperating method imaginable of arguing all around and about a subject, and coming to no definite conclusion at all. The various divisions of a special subject are sometimes divided and redivided with a marvellous ingenuity, surpassing in result the most distressing discriminations of the Rev. Joseph Cook, and excelling the worst catalogues of some of Walt Whitman's poems. Again and again a hair is carefully divided between south and south-west side, and we do not know which is south or which is south-west side, or why the hair was thought worthy of being divided. This pretentious inconclusiveness is indeed a main defect of the work. The author appears to perceive a certain mark, calls attention to it, and then undertakes a lengthy course of intellectual posturings. He tells us what qualities are necessary in a good marksman; what should be his physical, physiological, psychical, hygienic, mental, intellectual, moral, and spiritual qualifications; what kind of clothes he should wear, the number of his boots, why he should not use a popgun or a bean-blower or a horse-pistol or a revolver or a double-barrel shot-gun or a breech-loader or a muzzle-loading cannon; or why he should employ gunpowder instead of dynamite or gun-cotton or dualin or giant powder or nitro-glycerine or oatmeal and ginger; whether he should put his gun to his shoulder or his breast or his kneepan or the back of his head; discusses the angle of elevation at which the gun should be held; the manner of sighting, whether the little finger of the left hand should appear upon the right or left side of the barrel or be hidden beneath; whether one or two fingers should be employed in pulling the trigger; tells how the feet should be planted, how many inches the heel of one foot should precede the great toe of the other foot, etc.; and then, as he calmly obeys every injunction himself, we watch in suspense until the climax is reached, and, "Well, he hits the mark, doesn't he?" Bless you! no: he calmly puts aside his rifle, and seats himself with the satisfied air of a man who has filled his mission.

We criticise with some severity (though not unjustly, we believe) because of the pretentiousness of the book, and because the author's extravagant claims with regard to animal intelligence will only prejudice inquiring persons concerning the facts affecting our knowledge of the true relations between animal and human intelligence. Frankly, we accept the author's main position; namely, that animal intelligence is similar in kind to that of man, differing in degree only. But the utmost candor and discretion are required in the consideration of a subject so enticing, so intricate, and so wide-reaching. Comparisons may be odious, but any one desiring a good illustration of the difference between scientific and unscientific discrimination applied to the same subject cannot do better than compare Dr. Lindsay's bulky volumes with a short article entitled "Animal Intelligence," in a recent number of the Westminster Review, and reprinted in the Living Age of June 12.

Patient industry has succeeded in producing a work indispensable to all students of animal psychology, although its methods are unreliable, and its conclusions unsatisfactory. The volumes have a good bibliography and an excellent index. They are everywhere disfigured by a too copious use of italics. Of Dr. Lindsay's style, we need only present one illustration. In attempting to say that he has had special practice with insane patients, he goes through the following performance: "As a physician, it has been the special business of my professional life to deal practically with the phenomena of abnormal mentalization in man,—a circumstance that has naturally involved a careful study of his normal mentalization, and of the whole range of phenomena exhibited by the nervous system in health and disease."

TOO MUCH MARRIED FOR A BISHOP.—The church paper which attacked Bishop Ryle for marrying three times has understated the case. A clergyman has forwarded to the Archbishop of York a protest, in which he says: "Having read an announcement in the newspapers that your Grace proposes to consecrate Dr. John Charles Ryle a bishop on St. Barnabas' Day, I venture to draw your attention to St. Paul's express statement that a bishop 'must be . . . the husband of one wife' (I. Tim. iii., 2), on which I would respectfully remark that, if this apostolic law does not mean one absolutely, and one only, and not one after the other, it has no meaning at all; for it would then imply that a person not a bishop might have two or more wives at the same time. Now, as Dr. Ryle has married four wives in succession, it appears to myself, and to many others, that your Grace, as guardian of the truth in the province of York, might, with no impropriety, interpose your high authority, and desist from consecrating that clergyman because of this undoubted bar."

THE effect of a strong sermon was marred recently by an old sea-dog, who insisted upon having a full explanation of the preacher's maritime adventures. The incident is described by the Portland Advertiser. While illustrating the need and efficacy of prayer, the preacher drew upon his own experience. He was out on a lake in a boat, when by a mischance he lost both oars. The wind was rising, night was coming on, and he was in imminent danger of being swamped and finding a watery grave. What could he do? Evidently nothing of himself; so he knelt down and prayed long and fervently for deliverance. He placed himself in the hands of the Lord, and so was saved. So he passed from one thing to another, and at last the sermon was finished. He raised his hands to pronounce the benediction. The audience stood with bowed heads, waiting for the gracious words, when old Captain Sweetsir, of North Yarmouth, cried out, "Say, Mr. Preacher, I want you to tell me how you got ashore." The audience broke into a roar: and it was five minutes before the minister could explain that a man saw him from the shore, and put out in another boat and took him off.

POETRY.

THE following hymn, written for the occasion by Professor Adler, was sung at the Social Festival of the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association:

FREEDOM.

Ye friends of freedom, rise! awake!
Wage now your holy battle:
The cruel chains of falsehood break,
The yoke of bigots shatter.
Let not old forms of wrong
Their hateful reign prolong;
Up! let the good unite!
Up! let us fight the fight
For Truth, for Light, and Glory!

Now fear not, tho' the war of hate
Around our pathway rages;
We march beneath the flag of fate,
We bear the hope of ages.
What tho' our band be few,
If but our hearts be true?
What tho' the goal be far?
See! every sacred star
Sheds golden hope to cheer us.

Lift up your souls, make broad the way,
Spurn meaner paths alluring;
Oh, consecrate your lives to-day
To what is great, enduring.
The heart's hopes cannot lie,
The heart's trust cannot die;
True reign th' eternal laws,
To serve them be our cause;
We will! We cannot falter.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 5, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

IN accordance with the vote at the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, the following persons have been appointed Trustees for the financial management of the Index, and have become incorporated, under the general statute of Massachusetts, by the title of "Corporate Trustees of the Free Religious Index": John C. Haynes, Cornelius Wellington, George W. Park, Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, John Curtis, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, and Wm. J. Potter.

THE Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, for the current year, according to previous announcement, is published in the first four numbers of the new series of the Index, instead of in pamphlet form, as has hitherto been the custom. It has been intended to send these numbers to all members of the Association and contributors to its funds. But as we have not the addresses of all such persons, or may have incorrect ones, we shall be pleased to furnish the numbers to those they have failed to reach, upon notice to this effect.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass.	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100 00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass.	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.	18.35
MRS. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass.	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00

GENERAL DONATIONS TO F.R.A.

HENRY W. BROWN, Worcester	10.00
C. M. DENISON, New York City	5.00
MR. and MRS. EIDLITZ, New York City	2.00
MISS APPLETON, Roxbury, Mass.	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

FIVE POINTS OF FREE RELIGION.

Those who take the view of religious and ecclesiastical problems, which has come to be known as Free Religion, have, it is well understood, no creed. As Mr. O. B. Frothingham used to be fond of saying, "their creed is creedlessness." By this it is not meant that they may not have, individually, very definite and positive beliefs; it is not meant that they are void of convictions, nor of earnestness in holding and expressing their convictions, nor of even a desire to impress other people with the importance of their convictions. It is only meant that they have no creed which they agree to hold in common, and as the final truth; no convictions which they think it important to impress on others by any other power, physical, mental, social, than the power of reason. As Colonel Higginson once pointed out, they may each use the word creed, in the indicative mood, present tense, first person, singular,—credo, I believe; but they do not and cannot use it, after the ecclesiastical fashion, in the imperative mood, second person,—crede, believe thou.

Yet Free Religion has a very definite philosophy. It is capable of being put into a succinct, logical statement of thought. Making its appeal to reason, it were strange, indeed, if it could not be expressed in rational shape. We propose in this article to name five points of chief importance, which seem to us—and we speak for no others—logically to mark and determine the free religious movement.

1. The germ, the starting point, of the whole movement, is mental liberty; the free attitude of the human mind in the presence of all religious beliefs, institutions, and claims which are externally set before it. This is in direct antagonism to the ordinary theological position, which is, that the true religion, with all its beliefs and institutions, was given to man by supernatural revelation from the heavens; and that, therefore, since the human reason had nothing to do with the discovery and introduction of it, the same reason is now incompetent to sit in judgment upon it. Said a Catholic priest to a cultivated lady, who expressed some mental difficulty in accepting certain doctrines of the Church,—"The Church, madam, does not ask for the conviction of your judgment, but for the submission of your will." To give up all inquiry, all thought of one's own, was the demand, and to accept the authority of the Church both for mental and moral guidance. And this principle of external authority has prevailed to a greater or less degree in all religions. The authority is vested in a book or in a prophet or in a creed or in the Church itself or in some special dignitary of the Church. But wherever vested, it is held to be superior to human reason. The free religious movement starts in a protest and reaction against this principle of authority. Its genesis is in the self-assertion of mental independence. Free Religion means, for one thing, that the mind shall be as free in its religious thinking as in all other thinking; that human intelligence shall not be mastered by any other authority than that of reason; that there is no master of reason except reason itself.

2. As both the logical and practical result of this principle of freedom in religion, there comes a new stand-point for regarding the special religions of the world, and a new method of studying them,—the stand-point and the method of science. All the special religions come before the bar of human reason—human reason, of course, enlightened to the highest possible degree—on a perfect level as to their claims, to be judged impartially by just what they are in their history and character. From this method there is arising a new branch of science,—the science of comparative theology, or, more briefly, the science of religion; which, in future, will take the place of the old dogmatic theology, falsely called a science. By this method of impartial historical study of all the religions, it is seen that, while in their peculiar elements they differ, and in their special claims are mutually antagonistic, there are yet certain universal elements that are common to them all, and in the fundamentals of moral and spiritual sentiment a remarkable resemblance and sympathy among them. From this point of view, in fact, the special religions are linked together by natural human kinship, and linked back to a natural origin.

3. It follows from this scientific treatment of man's religious nature and history, that religion falls into entire harmony with science in general,—simply because science is in harmony with itself. The ecclesiastical and dogmatic types of religion, always in theoretical conflict with science, since the one appeals to miraculous authority, the other to reason, have generally been in actual conflict with science. Until science became strong enough to take care of itself, ecclesiastical religion, the religion of Christendom especially, tried its utmost to exterminate it by persecution. But Free Religion comes into natural and friendliest alliance with science. Science is only generalized and classified knowledge; and Free Religion welcomes knowledge on all subjects, and counts it as one of the chief instrumentalities of human progress. So far from making faith and knowledge antagonistic, it would join them in perpetual marriage.

4. There cannot be full mental liberty unless civil government, in its laws and administration, is absolutely impartial in regard to religious opinions. If government grants or denies any kind of civic privileges to any class of citizens because of their opinions on religious questions, it offers a premium for certain beliefs and puts opprobrium upon other beliefs. And where this is the case, the conditions of mental liberty are violated. Free Religion demands, therefore, that the civil government shall not, directly or indirectly, sustain one set of religious opinions or one sect or one church or one special religion rather than another, but give all an equal and just chance, maintaining the rights of each and all citizens against the encroachments of any. In other words, Free Religion asks for the thorough separation of Church and State. It would trust religion entirely to the voluntary support of its believers. It would free the statute books and the public schools from all sectarian influence, and purge them of all favors shown to the religious opinions of one class of citizens over those of another class. It says to government, in the whole domain of religion, "Hands off! Your concern is with secular, not spiritual things."

5. Finally, the natural outcome and expression of Free Religion is in practical works of philanthropy and social amelioration. Religion needs to be free, not simply for the sake of being free, but for an ulterior purpose towards which freedom is a condition: and that ulterior purpose is the moral, mental, and physical improvement of mankind. The liberty demanded for mental inquiry, the impartial receptivity of the mind to whatever is true and good in all the special religions, the alliance of religion with science, the emancipation of the State and the school from all sectarian bias—these are only ways leading up to something greater and better than any one of them,—and that is the elevation of humanity. If Free Religion stops in any stage short of this, it is an unshapely truncated pyramid. It lacks the cap-stone, that not only completes the structure, but gives it all its meaning, symmetry, and grace. Free Religion, if it is to accomplish its mission, must meet this final test: It must do solid work for human good. It will not spend itself in speculation or discussion, profitable as these may often be, nor in establishing its disputed claims, necessary as that work may be; but will offer the best proof of the validity of its claims and the worthiness of its discussions by giving practical specimens of what it can do for the moral and social welfare of any community where it has a foothold. If religion itself is good for man, then free religion should be better for him than enslaved religion; and it will show itself better by doing something better for the education of individual character, and for the moral and material well-being of society.

Digitized by Google

THE Secretary of the Free Thinkers' Association of New York sends us the following notice: —

The New York State Free Thinkers' Association has appointed its third annual convention to be held in Hornellsville, N.Y., the first four days of September next. And the Association has invited the Free Thinkers of the other States and of Canada to meet with them, and make it a general convention of the Free Thinkers of North America. There will, probably, be congregated there two or three thousand people known as "Infidels"; and, from a Christian standpoint, I should think it would be considered good missionary ground. And this is what I am authorized to propose to the orthodox churches of New York State. These churches are invited to select one of their ablest ministers to attend the convention as a missionary; and we promise to give him two hours on the platform at any session of our convention, of either of the first three days that he may choose, to defend the Christian Church and demolish "Infidelity." And we further agree to pay the actual expenses of the said missionary in attending the convention, and treat him in all respects in the most decorous manner. When the orthodox people of the State have appointed this missionary, they are requested to send his name to H. L. Green, Corresponding Secretary N.Y.S.F.A., Salamanca, N.Y.

This State Association of Free Thinkers is a body that gathers large conventions. Unhappily, its reputation has suffered not a little from the same evil influences that have brought the National Liberal League into disrepute. But we are satisfied that the great majority of the people who make up the constituency of the Association are morally sound. It is to be hoped that these will make their power felt in the coming convention, and drown the voice of the unworthy spokesmen who now misrepresent them.

A WRITER in the New York Observer says that the Society of Socialistic Free Thinkers, in France, has (or claims) fifteen thousand members in the city of Paris alone; that they are very active as a propaganda society, hardly less so than the Jesuits, their special foes; and that, like the Jesuits, their aim is to get control of the public educational institutions. He adds that

The movement now being made to secularize the schools in France means more than the word would suggest in America. It means not simply the neglect or exclusion of distinctively religious instruction; it means, in too many cases, the teaching of scepticism, infidelity, atheism. It means the denying of the supernatural, the immortality of the soul, the divinity of our Lord, the personality of the Holy Spirit, the very existence of a personal God. One of my friends has a son in the College Chapital, one of the largest of the boy's colleges in Paris. He was present at a recent commencement, when a member of the Municipal Council presided, and made an address in which the boys were openly taught to despise Christianity and glorify the Gospel of Free Thought. My friend tells me that the speech was so outrageously atheistic, so profanely blasphemous, such an insult to the religious sentiments of the Christian public, that the college authorities were ashamed of it, and took pains to keep it out of the papers, lest it should create prejudice against the college. But the one thousand, five hundred boys heard it, all the same. Can Protestant Christian parents send their sons to such schools? It is the question which at this moment stirs the souls of many to their very depths.

So, in France, it seems the shoe begins to pinch on the other side! Yet apparently it does not once occur to these Evangelical believers that the Free Thinkers have any grievance, if the schools which their children attend are used for the inculcation of theological superstitions which are to them intellectually and morally abhorrent. The Evangelicals would keep the religious instruction in the schools whether the Liberals want it or not. The only fair thing is to exclude both theology and antitheology.

THE Fête of Liberty, on the 14th of last month, in Paris, was an occasion of immense enthusiasm, and appears to have been participated in by nearly all classes of the people. It was designed to celebrate the storming and destruction of the Bastile, an event which occurred July 14, 1789, and the anniversary of the Fête of Federation, of the same date the following year. Incidentally associated with the celebration, yet calculated to greatly swell its jubilant feeling, was the amnesty bill, which had just been agreed upon between the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, in respect to the Communistic revolutionists, and the completion of the necessary subscription for the erection of the Statue of Liberty in New York harbor. One hundred and eighty-one towns and a hundred thousand subscribers contributed to this testimonial of the regard of the French people for the American Republic. There was certainly enough material, under the circumstances, to fire the French heart, always quickly responsive to the sentiment of liberty, to a high degree of transport. The unveiling of the Statue of the Republic in the Place de la République, the distribution of flags to the army, reviews, martial music, illuminations, and gayly floating, vari-colored decorations and banners combined to render it one of the most brilliant spectacles and successful festivals witnessed in Paris in modern time. It shows very distinctly the strength and progress of the republican idea in that country. A very notable peculiarity of the occasion was the entire absence of all religious services.

ARE THE SPIRITS PLAGIARISTS?

It is true the spirits sometimes hit upon choice phrases, but the plague of it is they so seldom turn out original. On inquiry, one finds they come from the earth, usually from the company of the poets. With all their opportunities, the spirits have never said such fine things themselves as have been said for them by Dante, Swedenborg, and Gautier. Are there imitators even in heaven? It would appear so from Dr. Bartol's account of a spirit message communicated to him as from Theodore Parker, in which the phrase, "I have been to the funeral of my affections," impresses Dr. Bartol as "worthy of Shakspeare," and one he never shall forget. Most readers of English classics have never been able to forget that phrase, not only on account of the magnificent context, but the pathetic application to a great name disgraced. Theodore Parker has no need to be a plagiarist, as man or spirit. But we are glad of evidence that he may be, in heaven, keeping company with Bacon. It is no more than we had a right to expect. The spirits have not that selfish institution of copyright, and, no doubt, borrow and lend their gems of thought and speech freely.

J. A.

THE RELIGIOUS EDUCATION OF THE YOUNG.

One of the best words in the admirable lecture of Prof. Adler, printed in the first issue of the Free Religious Index, is his suggestion respecting the religious education of our children. We believe with him that we should not only give our young more systematic moral instruction, but also that we should cease to teach them or allow them to be taught, even provisionally, theological notions which we do not ourselves heartily believe. We will consider this last thought first.

The idea which too many liberals entertain that if we only give our children a thorough rudimentary letting-alone, as regards theological or antitheological teaching, they will naturally grow up into rationalistic views of religion, is not altogether warranted by facts. It is a confidence born of a false, optimistic theory of human development,—a theory which complacently folds its hands and looks for the goddess "Nature," or the new god "Evolution," to do for us what we must do for ourselves. We need to get rid of this latter-day fiction that almighty evolution, or science, or progress, or any other abstraction is pledged to bring the millennium, and to learn that we must get up and go to work for it, like earnest, brave men, or we will die a long way this side of Jordan.

There would be some plausibility in adopting the let-alone policy as regards theological ideas, Christian or anti-Christian, which our children should be profoundly ignorant of, if indeed the policy could be carried out; but this is impossible in our state of society. We cannot keep our children from theological bias if we would. Even though they be not drawn into orthodox Sunday-schools where they are systematically taught the dogmas of supernaturalism, they are picking up more or less of them from their daily associates in the public or private schools, from the street and the play-ground; and before the parent is aware of it, the little one of six or eight has imbibed notions about God, Christ, heaven, hell, "the world the flesh and the devil," which the parents regard as superstitious.

It seems to us that it is not merely the right, but it is the sacred duty of every liberal to guard his child against such insidious indoctrination. Let us not be lulled into indifference by this specious talk about religion being a mere matter of reverence for larger or smaller symbols, and that children must have the lesser to start with, and will naturally and inevitably grow out of the lesser into the larger as they grow out of childhood, etc. We do not think that it is necessary for a child to believe in the devil first, in order to believe in evil afterward, nor to believe that Christ died to save him, before he can learn that he must now and ever "work out his own salvation."

We believe that it is unnecessary, nay, more, it is often cruelty, and it is always unwise, to suffer our children to be led into religious convictions, which, in after years, if they think, they must struggle out of with pain of doubt, and bloody sweat. Why allow our children to be led, when we know they are misled, or to learn what they must surely unlearn? All the social pleasures of such Sunday-schools are poor compensation for the mental blood-poisoning which threaten our children there. They may recover from the effects of the Sunday-school picnic in a week or so, with good nursing, but it will take them a lifetime almost to get rid of the theological ideas which they imbibed from the catechism on Sunday. They stick in the soil of the mind like Canada thistles in the farm-land of the mind-owner.

Let us not bequeath to our children such pre-

Digitized by Google

possessed minds. Not only would we guard our young from such theological bias, by keeping them away from evangelical Sunday-schools, but we would do more,—we would teach them positively what we disbelieve as well as what we believe respecting Christian theology, Christology, and Bibliolatry. We would fortify their minds against the approach of doctrines which we believe to be false. Let us illustrate: —

Take the Christian doctrine of creation,—"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This conception of the genesis of the cosmos is found in the Christian Bible, is preached from Christian pulpits, is taught in Christian catechisms, and is stamped upon the plastic mind of youth in Christian homes, and Christian Sunday-schools everywhere. In the number of the "International Sunday-school Lessons," published July 4, of the current year, the doctrine is explicitly taught that "in the beginning" God "created the world out of nothing." Even in a publication sold by the American Unitarian Association, for use in their Sunday-schools, the same gospel of creation is taught.

Now it may be, to the eyes of the Christian, this ancient Semitic conception of creation is marvellously beautiful and true. Rev. Dr. Gibson goes into raptures over it. After quoting the expression "In the beginning," he exclaims, "How grand and true in its vagueness!" It is, indeed, as grand and true as a fog-bank, and about as much light comes from its "vagueness."

For our part, we should not wish a child of ours taught any such holy nonsense. We do not wish him to get a conception of God as a being, a kind of big man, an awful giant somewhere up above the clouds, who, before time was, sat silently upon nothing, away off nowhere, brooding from eternity upon what he was going to do by and by, and finally, all at once, after he had got a good ready, taking a "lot of nothing" and moulding "the heavens and the earth" out of it. Such a conception of "creation" we believe to be as unscientific as it is ridiculous and absurd. And yet it is this very idea of "creation" and a "Creator" which is earliest taught, and makes the corner pillar of the vast superstructure of Christian superstitions that stand in the world to-day. We believe there is no dogma of Christianity which is so basic, no conception of Christians which is so fruitful of misconceptions, as this doctrine that the worlds sprang into existence by the "fiat of the great Creator." For given to start with a God who can make a world "out of nothing," and you have a God who can create "life" on the globe by fiat, make the first man just as miraculously, damn him as arbitrarily, or save him as supernaturally. When we let God come in, in that hocus pocus way in creation, he is already an actor in the first scene in the Christian drama of the Fall of Man, and he has a right to play his part in the whole scheme of redemption which Christianity has assigned to him.

There is no getting around it,—the moment we assume that God performed such a miraculous deed "in the beginning," we might as well assume that he can do all the other little wonderful jobs,—to enlighten, console, and save man, which the thirty-nine articles ascribe to him. This idea of God as "Creator" is the first and fundamental error instilled into the minds of our children, and the mother of a brood of them. Let us prevent it,—in the literal sense of the word, come before it,—with instruction in the truth. Let us fortify their minds against the approach of such cosmological vagaries, by teaching them that there is no reason whatever for believing that there ever was a "creation" in the sense spoken of in the text, but that, so far as we know, or any one knows, the "heavens and the earth," in some form, have always existed.

The tendency of the discoveries of science leads to the belief in the self-existence and eternity of matter and force. Let our children very early be taught that it is not to Genesis, but to geology and other scientific sources that we must go, if we would learn about "in the beginning." If the only idea of God we can give our children is that of a "Great First Cause," we can well dispense with it. He was indeed "least understood" in Pope's time, and he is no less so to-day. To pursue the topic further, however, and answer the questions,—what shall we teach our children about God, or about Providence, heaven, hereafter, and the like, would occupy too much space. We reserve these for another time. We feel hearty sympathy with Prof. Adler when he says, "We have determined to be truthful with ourselves and to deal truthfully with our children; we have made up our minds that, come what will, under no pretence will we teach them even provisionally that which we ourselves do not believe." Their questions we shall answer truly when we can answer them at all, and when we are not able to answer we will frankly confess our ignorance, and bid them wait patiently for further light. But of more importance than theological or anti-theological education is the ethical culture of our children. We should lay stress upon this without ignoring the other. And for this purpose we sorely need text-books. The Unitarians especially have been doing some good work in this line. But the age yet awaits the Bible we need. Let us hope for it, work for it until we get it.

W. H. S.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Scribner's, for August, contains an article on "The Mormon Bible," maintaining that it was taken in substance from an old historical romance, never published, but written some years before the origin of Mormonism, and often read aloud to friends, by the Rev. Solomon Spalding, a gentleman of education and literary tastes, an investigator of the Indian mounds of Ohio, and a writer of short stories and novels. The article is of no importance, as it adds nothing to what was before known, and omits many interesting particulars. Mormonism, in its origin, was an unmitigated humbug. The testimony of Rigdon (Smith's only associate and the man who stole a copy of Spalding's manuscript), of Spalding's widow, and of other persons acquainted with the facts of its origin, are sufficient to settle this point to the satisfaction of any reasonable inquirer. But the important fact connected with the history of Mormonism is the fact of its acceptance. Notwithstanding the sworn testimony of numerous witnesses of Smith's rascalities,—his acknowledged intemperance, laziness, lying, and thievishness,—he became a prophet, and died a martyr. Notwithstanding newspapers and railroads and telegraphs,—those merciless detectives of sham,—Mormonism has survived and prospered. Within the past fifty years, we have seen born in the centre of American civilization a religion with a divinely appointed leader or prophet, distinctive theological doctrines, a peculiar sociology, and its own morality and priesthood and churches. It has been a builder of towns and cities, has numbered its martyrs and sent forth its missionaries, and its followers have exhibited many of the characteristic virtues of religious fanatics in all ages. Its redemption of Salt Lake Valley—previously so barren and unpromising that engineers had declared it could never support one hundred men, and an old trapper had offered one thousand dollars an ear for all the corn raised within its limits—was a marvel of industry and faith. In some respects, the history of Mormonism is more striking than the early history of Christianity, or Mohammedanism. With its amazing story right before us, no one dare affirm that we are yet secured against the origin and survival of other equally baseless superstitions. So long, in fact, as the idea of supernaturalism, or the miraculous, including the theological dogma of revelation, is allowed place in religious teaching, so long will analogous delusions from time to time appear and gather believers. The "scientific study of theology" can alone put an end to them. Nothing in religious teaching should any longer be regarded as worthy of respectful consideration which cannot be subjected to scientific investigation. Protestants ridicule the belief in the miraculous, so prevalent in Catholic countries, giving birth to yearly visitations of the Virgin, and to such absurd pilgrimages as those to Lourdes or Knock; but a great deal of ordinary Protestant preaching is of a sort which logically justifies these puerile superstitions. We read recently, for instance, in a daily paper, the report of a sermon by a distinguished Unitarian clergyman, popularly classed as a liberal, which, in underlying philosophy, was as superstitious—that is, as unscientific—as some of the teachings of Joe Smith.

THERE can be little better proof of the statement, often made of late, that insanity is on the increase in this country, than the excitement created by Dr. Tanner, who, as all our readers are aware, in a public hall in New York City, appears to be carrying out his intention of living forty days without food. Should he continue until this paper reaches its readers, he will have nearly reached that limit. Before this paragraph is in print, however, he may have been exposed as a humbug; or he may be dead from starvation; or he may have voluntarily withdrawn from, or be still persevering in, his self-imposed task. We do not care much in what way the show ends, but shall certainly rejoice when the contents of Dr. Tanner's daily mail,—a precious tank of lunacy,—are no longer poured by the reporters into newspaper columns, and supplemented there by vapid remarks of the editor, and by "letters from the people." The length of time that a person may live without food is as yet undetermined, and will probably remain undetermined for a long time to come, since it must vary greatly in different instances, according to climate, race, temperament, age, etc. But if a frail person, fighting against the inroads of an acute disease, can live with little or no food, except water, for two or three weeks at a time,—a common fact in the experience of every physician, and within the experience also of most grown men and women,—we know of no reason why a healthy man, of strong constitution and phlegmatic temperament, or of abnormal tenacity, should not live for a much longer time without food. Our amazement is not expended upon Dr. Tanner, but upon those who write to him and talk about him, and especially upon the fact of the vast importance apparently attaching in popular estimation to every word concerning him which may be spoken by some other "doctor." Let us say here, to avoid possible misconception, that we have the utmost respect for physicians as a class, the profoundest conviction of the excellence and necessity of their profession, and that we share in none of the feeling which prompts sneers at physicians as either ignorant or dishonest; but we know of no good reason for regarding them with superstitious reverence, or for hailing their platitudes as scientific revelations. Physicians, as a rule, are not scientific men. For the most part, they are educated and intelligent, and know more than other persons with regard to physiological subjects, precisely as every man who follows a special pursuit knows more than other persons who have not followed it. But, in popular estimation, this is not all. A man is suddenly seized by alarming illness. He does not know the cause, nor do any of his family. The physician is sent for in haste, recognizes at a glance the symptoms of a familiar disease, prescribes a familiar remedy, and the man recovers. The knowledge of the disease and of its appropriate remedy alike seem mysterious, and a glamour conceals the simplicity of method. In reality, nine-tenths of ordinary doctoring is only the practice of a trade, involving but little more science than the housewife's knowledge of the chemistry of cooking. It is only in exceptional instances that a doctor, any more than a lawyer, or banker, or farmer, is a man of scientific tastes or attainments or judgment; and no triumph or discomfiture of "regulars" or "eclectics" can come from Dr. Tanner's success or failure. Dr. Tanner is said to hold peculiar religious ideas,—whatever that may mean; and some persons are fearful that he is attempting to discredit certain old-fashioned miracles,—a fear which indicates the kind of foundation upon which the religion of some persons rests. We fear only that nothing will be learned from his experiment beyond the fact that the fool-killer has yet much work before him.

Digitized by Google

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Congress has asked the members of the National Academy of Sciences, soon to meet, whether they know of a better way of killing a criminal, sentenced to capital punishment, than by hanging. Without discussing the question of capital punishment,—remarking only that, as matter of fact, there appears to be at present very little disposition to abolish it, less even than existed twenty or twenty-five years ago,—it is evident that the desire to abolish hanging is almost universal, and that its longer retention is inexcusable. Professor Bain some time ago advised the use of electricity in nearly all prison punishments, and especially in cases of capital punishment. The mystery of the operation of electricity, he believed, could not fail to affect the imaginations of the ignorant persons who are chiefly to be influenced by the death penalty: and, at the same time, its absolute certainty, instantaneousness and painlessness, and absence of all possibility of revolting spectacle, rendered it the most humane and most scientific method of punishment. Dr. Hibberd, of Indiana, in a recent address before the American Medical Society, suggested the use of prussic acid or electricity in capital cases. Either of these would be a great improvement upon the present method. In New York, stray dogs are drowned in about four minutes; in Boston, they are poisoned, and death ensues in less than a minute. Our criminals, with much outrageous bungling, frequently, and always with a great deal of irreverent bathos, sometimes live for twenty minutes after the fall of the drop. There need be no unnecessary sentimentalism in the demand that human criminals be treated as humanely as stray dogs.

The Anti-Duelling Society recently formed in one of the counties of South Carolina, of which we spoke in a late number of the Index, is being put to a severe test by the Cash-Shannon duel. Shannon was killed, and the better moral sentiment of the State, represented in the Anti-Duelling Society, is demanding that Col. Cash be tried like any other murderer. The old-time "chivalry" protests and blusters, and threatens shooting and cowhiding for the reformers. The latter, however, seem to stand manfully to their guns. The publisher of the Carolina Sun of Cheraw, which has been very outspoken in the demand that the crime be punished, has been shot at in a public street by a son of Col. Cash,—the latter, who was standing by at the time, throwing off his coat, drawing a pistol, and declaring that he was going to "see a fair fight"; whether with the intention of siding with his son or with the publisher, who was shot at when his back was turned, is not clear. Some friends hustled the publisher, however, into a doorway, and the other party adjourned, after a volley of high words, to a neighboring bar-room. Young Cash had not, at last accounts, been molested by the law-officers for this dastardly attempt at assassination. Col. Cash is really under arrest for murder, and his trial is set down for September. But he is admitted to bail on the paltry sum of $3000. He will not, however, run away. He and his friends will spend the intervening time in working against the reform sentiment of the State, so as to secure a jury of the old-fashioned type. The Charleston News and Courier ably and courageously leads the other side. It closes a recent article in this vigorous fashion:—

> The persons, on both sides, who were concerned in the duel defied the law in the most aggravated and public manner. If they are not to be punished, the law against duelling is a farce, and might as well be repealed. There is no question as to the guilt or innocence of anybody. The law has been violated, and everybody knows who the violators are. The only question is, Will solicitors, judges, and juries, have the courage to do their sworn duty?

If the best proof of practical religion is the ability to make two blades of grass grow where only one blade grew before, by analogous reasoning a religious work is performed by the man who makes a million of eatable fish swim where only one fish swam before; and this must be our excuse, if excuse be needed, for calling attention in this place to the great development of fish cultivation in this country in recent years. Not only are ponds and streams all over our country now stocked with choice fish of many kinds, thus increasing our food supply, but the methods of hatching and breeding some of the most useful kinds of fish—shad and cod, for instance—are now so well understood that our future supply seems to be as definitely subject to control as our supply of cotton or corn. Besides this remarkable command over what was only recently a matter of chance, new varieties of fish are added each year to our table-supplies, from discoveries of their places of resort, or the invention of new instruments for fishing; and many varieties heretofore supposed to be worthless as food are now known to be palatable and nutritious. The Duke of Argyll, in the Contemporary Review, speaks of the numerous varieties of fish consumed by continental nations, the recognition of the excellence of which has been prevented in the two great English-speaking countries by prejudice or ignorance or thoughtlessness. He enumerates carp, tench (a species of carp, we believe), the skate, the ova of sea-urchins, and various kinds of cuttle-fish or squid. A brave effort to overcome prejudice on this score is now making by the Ichthyophagus Club, of New York City, which, at its first annual dinner, recently, partook of such objectionable dishes as shark-fin, bull-frog, razor clams, horse-shoe crabs, moonfish, squid, wolf-fish and gar-fish, sturgeon and sea-robins, the purpose of the club being, we understand, to demonstrate the harmlessness and excellence of these dishes, and thus add to our food supply,—a purpose we may commend as heartily as we now commend the unknown man who ate the first oyster, and thereby overcame our natural prejudices against this great delicacy. At the International Fishing Exhibition, at Berlin, recently closed, the United States surpassed all other nations in the extent, variety, and usefulness of its exhibit, and, in the person of Professor Baird, was awarded the first prize of honor—a result, we may suppose, not anticipated by the projectors of the Exhibition. The special catalogue of our exhibit on that occasion—a large octavo pamphlet of two hundred and sixty-three pages—equalled in size the official catalogue of the whole fair, and our exhibitors received no less than sixty honors of various kinds, in addition to the chief prize. The United States exhibit was peculiarly rich in piscicultural apparatus, one object of historical interest being the first hatching-box used in the United States, in 1851, by Dr. Garlick. In fish-catching apparatus, also, —from primitive Indian fish-lines of seaweed or strips of hide, with clumsy wooden hooks, to the purse seine, which catches six hundred mackerel at once, and the bomb-lance for whale-fishing,—our exhibit was remarkably complete. In this connection, we may mention the fact that Professor Earle, of the Fish Commission, has just discovered the long-sought method of hatching artificially that splendid fish, the Spanish mackerel; and it is estimated that at least one hundred millions of young Spanish mackerel will be "turned out" this season

It is encouraging to note any success in the common-sense and practical method of meeting the evil of intemperance, of which the following clipping from a late number of the English Unitarian Herald gives an example:—

> The cheering announcement in the late Chancellor of the Exchequer's budget that the revenue from spirits and malt liquors had decreased during the last year by more than two millions led some of us to hope that intemperance in England might really be slightly on the wane. Even though depression of trade, no doubt, had had something to do with the diminished sale of intoxicating liquors, it may also fairly be supposed that the multiplication of coffee-taverns throughout the country has not been without its influence in decreasing the consumption of alcohol. We are glad to welcome every new effort, public or private, in the direction of temperance, and report with pleasure the opening of the Rainbow Coffee Tavern, Lever Street, City Road, London, the establishment of which has been largely promoted by members of the Unitarian body. This coffee-house occupies the basement floor of the set of model dwellings next to the London Domestic Mission buildings at George's Row, Lever Street: and although in no way connected with the Mission, since its character must necessarily be secular and unsectarian, the two useful institutions will no doubt work well side by side. The Rainbow was opened at two o'clock on Saturday, May 22, with an appropriate speech by the Hon. A. H. Grosvenor, followed by short addresses from Mr. T. Chatfeild Clarke, the honorary architect of the building; Mr. W. Shaen, one of the trustees; and Mr. Corkran. A lively trade was done during the whole of the afternoon and evening, and there seemed to be a general feeling among those who came to make a trial of the refreshments that there was great need in that, as in other neighborhoods, of more of these innocent houses of entertainment. It may be hoped that there will be no difficulty in making these coffee-taverns a financial success; since, of the numerous coffee palace companies established, nearly all are paying a dividend on their shares of from five to ten per cent., and already upwards of seven hundred houses have been opened in England.

The Lord of Life should not be worshipped with faded flowers. Those that grow in thine own garden are far better than any other. With the flowers that are gathered there must be reverence,—itself a flower. —Hindu, tenth century.

Digitized by Google

FOREIGN.

A "SUNDAY Shakespeare Society" in England holds regular meetings each "Lord's Day" for the reading of the great dramatist's plays, and takes "tea" at the close.

THE French Government has allotted M. Pasteur the sum of fifty thousand francs for the purpose of enabling him to carry out his researches on the contagious diseases of animals.

THE Government of Vienna has prohibited the circulation of a large number of anti-Jewish publications, in accordance with Article 305 of the penal code, which refers to agitations.

AT Venice the Clerical party has gained a great victory in the municipal elections, ten out of the list of candidates proposed by the Veneto Cattolico having been returned, and only five Liberals.

THE Agamemnon of Æschylus was presented June 4, in the original Greek, to an English audience at Baliol College, Oxford. The thoroughly Hellenic costumes and stage accessories rendered the representation, as far as possible, a fac-simile of the marvellous dramatic masterpiece which the poet placed on the Athenian stage in an age of dramatic masterpieces, in the fifth century before the Christian era.

ALMOST all the German papers contained leading articles on the great festivities in France last month, in which they express their sincere sympathy with the Republic. The semi-official Nordeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung concludes its editorial on the subject as follows: "Germany only wishes to live at peace and in friendship with all other nations. She feels neither prejudice nor jealousy in regard to the great festivities in France. The more comfortable and agreeable the French make their home, the more advantageous and effective it will be for the maintenance and strengthening of the general peace."

IT seems, after all, that Louise Lateau, the Belgian Stigmatic, has been excommunicated. What are we to think of the Court of Rome, which thus dares to visit with an ecclesiastical censure one upon whose body the Deity periodically performs a most extraordinary miracle? If the Church believes in the Stigmata, it must regard her as one possessing a certain divine mission. How, then, can it venture to treat her as a flagrant sinner? The truth, however, is that, if Jesus Christ were alive, and found resisting the will of the Vatican, he would be thundered against quite as vehemently as was Martin Luther.—Secular Review.

ARCHDEACON DENISON has at last found it "well-nigh impossible" not to despair of this country. In 1870, he says, Mr. Gladstone's government destroyed the Church school, while in 1880 Mr. Gladstone's government "destroys the church-yards," alluding to the recent passage of the "Burial Bill." Little by little the old power and influence of the parish priest, or "parson," are being curtailed. It seems that in proportion as the clergy are vesting themselves with the long-discarded ecclesiastical vestments, so are the people depriving them of the relics of their former authority. All this speaks well for the future. We can tolerate a system of church histrionics, provided that the Church can advance no claim to interfere with our secular concerns.—Secular Review.

M. JOHN LEMOINNE, in the Débats, thinks that, though England is the exemplary and classic country of civil liberty, she has no similar title to religious liberty, as regards which France may claim to rank before her. In France, a century ago, the Revolution proclaimed freedom of conscience, and declared citizens of every religion admissible to public functions and political rights, while it is only in our own days that in England laws of exclusion against Catholics and Dissenters have been abolished, and it is only some fifteen years ago since the Jews obtained their emancipation. Even at the present session of Parliament, a member who has asked to be relieved from the religious oath is kept waiting at the door because of his opinions on religion. The question seems to him to be outside the province of the Legislature. The rest of the article is devoted to the Burials Bill. How he treats it may be judged from the conclusion. All countries, he winds up, have religious difficulties, and they are always created by the monopolizing pretensions of the churches.

THE OPENING OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM ON SUNDAY.—A deputation from the Sunday Society recently waited upon the trustees of the British Museum to present a memorial praying for the opening of the Museum on Sunday. Lord Dunraven, who introduced the deputation, said he was president for this year of the Sunday Society, and he and those associated with him hoped the trustees would be able to open the Museum to the public on Sundays. The movement had worked well in the country, and the opposition to it had died out. He was of opinion that, from a moral, social, and religious point of view, it was better for the people to have some place to go to on Sunday than to spend their time in idleness. He urged the trustees to open the Museum as an experiment, if only for one day, in order that the government might have some facts to go on. With regard to the expense, that might be met by closing the Museum one other day in the week. Mr. Mark H. Judge then read the memorial. Sir A. Hobhouse, in supporting it, said that his recent experience as a candidate for Westminster showed him that the opening of the Museum would be a benefit to the people. As a young barrister, he himself had felt the want of somewhere to go on Sunday, and he was sure that if the Museum was open it would be greatly frequented on Sundays. Professors Godwin and Flowers also addressed the trustees. The deputation then withdrew. Among those who wrote expressing their great regret at being unable to accompany the deputation were Mr. P. A. Taylor, M.P., Mr. Alexander Macdonald, M.P., the Dean of Westminster, Rev. A. H. Mackonochie, Sir Henry Thompson, Professor Williamson, F.R.S., Professor Max Müller, Mr. Moncure D. Conway, M.A., and Dr. W. E. H. Lecky.

THE Weekly Despatch thus comments upon the measure known as the Burials Bill, introduced into Parliament to regulate interments in national cemeteries: "With every desire to think and speak well of the ministry, we find it impossible to be very enthusiastic about its measures of domestic reform, so far as they have been divulged. Last week its intentions were declared with respect to an important question affecting large sections of the community. In the House of Peers, the Lord Chancellor introduced a Burials Bill, which is in some respects an improvement on Mr. Osborne Morgan's proposals, but which, if it is persevered in, will be spoiled by one unfortunate piece of bigotry. By it, Non-conformists are to be permitted to bury their dead, both in church-yards and in cemeteries, either in silence, or with such 'Christian and orderly services at the grave as they may think fit.' This means that Jews, and all other non-Christian persons, are to be excluded from the benefits of the concession. A Jewish and orderly service, or a Secularist and orderly service, is, we are left to infer, either inconceivable or abominable. In any case, Jews and infidels must bury their dead in silence, or not at all. Now, this we conceive to be palpably unjust. A non-religious funeral is not necessarily an irreligious funeral. 'Infidel' harangues, that should 'endeavor to bring into contempt or obloquy the Christian religion,' are very properly made a misdemeanor, and that ought to suffice. An open grave is not a place for theological controversy; but it is a place where the full heart, whether of Christian, Jew, or infidel, ought to be allowed reverent expression. It is so in the national graveyards of Scotland, where the people are not generally supposed to be indifferent to religion; and why should it not be so in England? To such a query, the Government can have no reply but this: to please ecclesiastical bigotry, it is still necessary to deprive certain defenceless classes of citizens of the most elementary of their civil rights."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MISS CATHARINE NAGLE, of Davenport, Iowa, a convert to Judaism, was married on the 24th ult. to Mr. Samuel Herman, by Rabbi Schaner.

REV. GEO. BRADBURN, one of the early anti-slavery agitators, and prominent in literary, political, and religious circles, at one time, has just died at Melrose, Mass., aged seventy-three years.

AN appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars has been made by the government for the erection of a statue of the late Prof. Henry, in the grounds of the Smithsonian Institute, with which his name was so long and honorably associated.

A. BRONSON ALCOTT stated the other day, at the Temperance picnic at Walden Pond, that he drank nothing but water; seldom tea and coffee, and then very weak. He has not touched animal food for fifty years, his fare being fruit, vegetables, and grains.

MRS. JULIA WARD HOWE gave last week a brilliant lecture before the Concord School of Philosophy, on "Modern Society," of which she may be regarded, in a certain sense, one of the most distinguished representatives. There are few who have had opportunity equal to this gifted lady's to qualify them for the discussion of the theme.

MRS. DEGROOT, who has built a church in Newark at her own expense, has had a clause put in the deed to the effect that if fairs, festivals, or other entertainments are held therein, the property shall revert to the original owner. It is evident that this good woman's benevolence is contracted by the traditional conception of the exclusive sanctity of such edifices, and would draw a sharp line between what she regards their godly and ungodly uses.

MR. CHARLES BARNARD proposes a new idea for professional readers. In the entertainments conducted by them, instead of the endless repetition of a few familiar pieces, he suggests that they should confine themselves to original ones written for their exclusive use or conditional rendition. This, it is maintained, would bring the author into more direct relation to that portion of the public that are attracted to his productions, and enable him to better understand its judgment of them, besides greatly quickening the critical faculty and sharpening the intellectual perceptions of the listener in such instances.

JESTINGS.

A PREACHER at Chicago advocates the introduction of lady ushers in church, to make the young men attend.

GROWING UNCERTAINTY.—Squire: "Fine weather this, Farmer; will raise things nicely." Farmer: "Ees, Squoire; but I hopes so be as it won't raise the rents agen."—Fun.

"BUT, Freddy, how could you think of calling auntie stupid? Go to her immediately, and tell her you are sorry." Freddy goes to auntie, and says, "Auntie, I am sorry you are so stupid."

PEDESTRIAN (who has dropped half a crown in front of "the blind"): "Why, you humbug, you're not blind!" Beggar: "Not I, sir! If the card says I am, they must have given me the wrong one. I'm deaf and dumb!"

A LAWYER once rushed up to Jerrold in the street, and said, with a flushed face, "Mr. Jerrold, I've just met a scoundrelly barrister." Jerrold looked at him with a bland smile, and simply answered, "What a coincidence!"

A GENTLEMAN was staying at a country-house in England, when, hearing a great clatter below one morning, he looked out and saw a couple of grooms holding one of the servant-maids on a horse, which they led with difficulty once round the yard. He asked them what it all meant. "Well, you see, sir," said they, "we're going to take the horse to market to be sold, and we want to be able to say he has carried a lady."

A BAPTIST clergyman, well known in Providence, was one day dining with a friend, a Jew. Among other good things passed to the clergyman was some very nice ham. With a surprised look upon his face, our Baptist brother turned to his Jewish friend with the remark, "How is it that you, being a Jew, can partake of this meat, when the eating of all such meat is strictly forbidden by the old Jewish laws?" "True," replied his friend, "but when those laws were made they didn't have our fine Cincinnati cured hams."—Providence Journal.

AS A rule, it is difficult to get the official mind to bow to correction; its aversion to owning itself in the wrong being as great as that of the Suffolk clergyman, who, misled by a farmer's pronunciation, christened his boy "Joan" instead of "John," and registered the youngster as a girl. On the blunder being discovered some time afterward by the parish clerk, the vicar was implored to alter the register or perform the ceremony anew. "I will make a memorandum of the circumstance," said he; and he kept his promise by writing at the foot of the register: "Mem. The girl baptized on the 10th instant by the name of Joan proved, a fortnight afterward, to be a boy."

Digitized by Google

THE Rev. Mr. Spurgeon is a funny man. On one occasion, he was much annoyed by three young men persisting in wearing their hats. He appeared for the time not to notice them, but proceeded to tell his audience of a visit he had paid to a Jewish synagogue. "When I entered," he said, "I took off my hat, but was informed that the great mark of respect was to keep it on. I did so, though I can assure you I felt very strange wearing my hat in a place of worship. And now, as I paid this mark of respect to the synagogue, may I ask those three Jews in the gallery to conform equally to our rules, and kindly uncover their heads?" The young men "collapsed."

AN eminent dean, having preached an assize sermon in Ireland, was invited to dine with the judges; and, having in his sermon considered the use and the abuse of the law, pressed somewhat hard upon those counsellors who plead causes which they know in their consciences to be wrong. When dinner was over and the wine began to go round, a young barrister retorted upon the dean, and, after several altercations, asked him, if the fiend were to die, whether a parson might not be found who, for money, would preach his funeral sermon. "Yes," replied the dean: "I would gladly be the man, and would give the fiend his due, as I have this day done to his children."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

THE Episcopal Register adds its voice, too, against what it calls Sunday desecration: "It seems to us a mockery; but we may be wrong. In our judgment, a communicant has no business to go to Coney Island, or any other beach on Sunday. The Lord gives man six days in which to work, and have pleasure. If he is unwilling to give up one of these days, which are his own, he has no right whatever to that which belongs to God,—the Lord's day,—and to devote it to secular or worldly purposes. It is God's day, and not man's, and should be kept holy to the Lord."

ONE of the Boston dailies thus reports: "The work which the Massachusetts Sabbath Observance Committee has laid out for itself is a large one, and, in some respects, almost a hopeless one. The committee does not seek to secure any changes in the laws, but to prevent, under existing laws, the running of all passenger and freight trains on Sunday; to prevent the demand on the part of any and all employers that those in their employ shall do any labor whatever on Sunday; to stop all Sunday work in railroad repair shops, on the road and on bridges; to stop the Sunday issue and sale of newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals; to stop all sales on Sunday except of medicines, and to restrict the Sunday sales of bread, milk, and other necessaries to the hours previous to 9 A.M.; to stop all Sunday evening entertainments, excepting "concerts of sacred music"; and to prevent all games and sports on Sunday."

AMONG the latest "missionary news" comes the following information. With the example of the primitive apostles as a guide, how will the missionaries meet Chet Ram's superstitions? "In Northern India, a native named Chet Ram is attracting considerable attention just now as the leader of a peculiar sect which claims the Christian name. The man, who is ignorant, and willing to remain unlearned, has a company of about fifty disciples, rough, fanatical fellows, some of whom believe Chet Ram to be the Christ. He, however, makes no such claim for himself. He visited Lahore, last autumn, and created a stir by proclaiming himself a Christian. Rev. C. B. Newton, of the Presbyterian Mission, describes him as an elderly man, of pleasing features and serious demeanor. Occasionally he is moved to a sort of frenzy, which both he and his disciples regard as an indication of divine inspiration. He manifests on all occasions a strong feeling of love and reverence for Christ, on account of which he undergoes much persecution from both Hindoos and Mohammedans, which he always takes meekly and cheerfully. He likes to hear the New Testament read, but says that he does not need instruction from the written Word, having it directly from the Holy Spirit, and the twelve apostles. Last September, Chet Ram, and sixteen of his followers, 'stalwart, well-fed fellows, with a minimum of clothing, and having faces variously expressing the frenzy of madmen, the ferocity of brigands, and the vacancy of idiots,' went to Buchhoke with Mr. Newton, and built a small church. On the journey, Chet Ram was sometimes beaten for praising Christ, and was visited by sick people, who came to be healed, and to whom he would give a rag torn from his clothes, in the name of Christ, who, he told them, would heal them. Among his disciples are some men of respectable appearance and sensible behavior. One of them has dedicated a bed to Christ, and gives travellers a night's lodging, in the name and for the honor of the Savior. He and his followers have evidently been impressed and attracted by the truth which has reached them, and the missionaries are laboring to give them the needed instruction to lead them fully into the light. Several have already desired to enter the Christian Church, but they have been advised to wait, and learn more of the gospel before making a public profession of their faith."

A RELIGIOUS journal thus describes a society called "The Bible and Prayer Union": "Its object is to conduce to the regular reading of God's Word and to prayer. Its members engage to read 'through the Bible, chapter by chapter, consecutively, one chapter daily, asking God's blessing upon the chapter read and upon the Union. A calendar is furnished to each member. The Bible and Prayer Union was founded by fifty Christian workers, in London, Jan. 10, 1876. On the 1st of April, 1880, the membership had increased to ninety-three thousand. Extending beyond Great Britain, it has branches in France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, Sweden, Turkish Empire, South Sea Islands, etc. The American branch was organized the past March. It now contains some seventeen hundred members.

"We should put honor upon God's Word, if we would have God honor us. We should feed upon the food God provides, if we would grow strong. Many a Christian will read this article with a consciousness that he is wronging his own soul by a neglect of Bible-reading. Such a one needs the stimulus that this Union will afford. After the habit shall be well formed, he will rather read five chapters than omit to read one.

"No fee is required. If the reader will hand to the General Secretary three cents (to cover postage, printing of cards, etc.), his name will be enrolled and a card of membership (containing a calendar) will be furnished. Or he can send three cents with an application to Rev. T. S. Winkoop, Washington, D.C. Let us add that no Christian should confine himself to the consecutive method of Bible-reading, taking the whole Bible all through, one chapter daily. Some portions of the Old Testament are in these days useful chiefly for historic and only indirectly for spiritual purposes; many readers derive from them no spiritual food in the mere reading. Perhaps, however, it would be difficult to find an entire chapter in which we should fail to find at least a few verses highly profitable for meditation. Any chapter will enlighten us, if we will follow out some of its marginal references. But, if one should read a chapter and feel that he was not fed (as, for instance, a chapter containing a genealogical table),—and this will not occur often, we trust,—let him read a Psalm or a portion of the New Testament additionally."

IN 1835, there were in the six New England States only 40,082 Catholics, 27 priests, 22 churches, and 50 other ecclesiastical buildings unfinished. Ten years later there were in four of those States, omitting Connecticut and Rhode Island, 66,196 Catholics, 30 priests, 37 churches, and 32 chapels and stations. Now there are in all 736,100 Catholics. 516 priests, 502 churches, and 154 stations.

IN lieu of cash receipts acknowledged here from week to week, subscribers will find their payments duly recorded on the mail-tags of their papers. But receipted bills will be sent, if requested. All other money received, unless sufficiently acknowledged by supplying the order for which it is sent, will have special personal acknowledgment.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. CLARK is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	"	. . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51	"	. . .	6c. " "
" 52	"	. . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.

II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.

III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.

IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.

V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)

VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath." by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

E BOUND VOLUMES

SX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 18 nd 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9) can ou application at this Office. olumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; vo 4, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sen at the purchaser's expense. Ad RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tr ce, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass

MR. MILLS' LECTURES.

1. The Advances of Science in our Time: What do they promise for Man?
2. The Birthplace and Cradle of our Civilization; or, The Indebtedness of West to East, to Asia.
3. The Labor Question.
4. The Mission of the New Thought not to Destroy, but to Fulfil.

STUDIES IN ANCIENT LITERATURE. — Four Lectures.

1. The Gnomic Wisdom of the East, India, Persia, etc.
2. The Poetic Thought and Religious Sentiment of the East.
3. Greek Wisdom, or Pythagoras and his Institution.
4. Greek Religion and Mythology.

REPRESENTATIVE MEN OF OUR TIME.—Three Lectures.

1. Huxley.
2. Max Müller.
3 Emerson.

For terms, etc., address
CHARLES DEB. MILLS,
Syracuse, N.Y.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 555.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 7.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, AUGUST 12, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THERE is one supreme mind which transcends all other minds. It may move, but cannot be moved; distant, yet near; it pervades the system of worlds, and is yet infinitely beyond it.—Hindu (ancient).

THERE is an Infinite Being, which existed before heaven and earth.
How calm it is! how free!
It lives alone, it changes not.
It moves everywhere, but it never suffers.
We may look on it as the mother of the universe.
I—I know not its name.
In order to give it a title, I call it the Way.
When I try to give it a name, I call it Great.
After calling it Great, I call it Fugitive.
After calling it Fugitive, I call it Distant.
After calling it Distant, I say it comes back to me.
—Chinese (ancient).

WHITHER shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in the depths of the earth, behold, thou art there.—Hebrew.

GOD appears in the best thought, the truth of speech, and the sincerity of action, giving, through his pure spirit, health, prosperity, devotion, and eternity to this universe. He is the father of all truth.—Zendavesta.

GOD dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands as though he needed anything. . . . In him we live, and move, and have our being.—New Testament.

IN my heart I place the feet,
The golden feet of God.
If he be mine, what can I need?
My God is everywhere.
Within, beyond man's highest word,
My God existeth still;
In sacred books, in darkest night,
In deepest, bluest sky;
In those who know the truth, and in
The faithful few on earth.
—Hindu (tenth century).

RABIA, foot-sore and weary, followed the pilgrims to Mecca; but, when she saw them praying around the holy temple Kaaba, she beat her breast and cried, "O heart! weak follower of the weak! Thou hast traversed land and sea to seek in this far-off place the God who had long ago come to thee!"—Persian.

COMMUNICATE to me the least name of God, and I will return to thee his greatest. Every day he is in action. O thou whose light manifests itself in the vesture of the world! thy names are manifested in the nature of man; thy knowledge shows itself in the science of thy prophets; thy bounty is manifested in the bounty of great hearts. Recognize the mark of God in every place. The world is the image of God. —Sufi Oracles: Persian.

WHERE is this all-perfect reason, so near me, yet so different from me? Where is it? Where dwells this supreme reason? Is it not God himself? I have within me a clear idea of a perfect unity, far superior to what I can discover in my own soul. . . . It is doubtless this idea of a perfect and supreme unity in my own mind that makes me desirous to find a unity in the soul, and even in matter. This idea of what is simply and indivisibly one can only be the idea of God.—Fénelon.

THERE are two temples of God: the one the universe, the other the rational soul.—Dr. Henry More.

CURRENT TOPICS.

YAZOO COUNTY is reported sure for Hancock.

IT is New York City that is reported to have four hundred and eighty-nine churches.

IT seems that, after all, John Morrissey did not die rich. It would have been against public morals if he had. His estate has been declared insolvent.

AN Illustrated Campaign Life of General Garfield, written by Major Bundy, editor of the New York Evening Mail, is announced as nearly ready. Who is writing General Hancock's?

IT is reported that the Marquis of Ripon, the new Viceroy of India, spends one hour every day in prayer. We hope he does not forget the Mohammedan precept, that "one hour of justice is worth seventy years of prayer."

SIR BARTLE FRERE has been recalled from South Africa. It was time. He is a religious fanatic, and believes in converting the heathen to Christianity by the sword. It is now well understood that he brought on the Zulu war for the sake of extending the area of the true Church and the dominion of "the true God."

THE Social Science Association, as its years increase, gives evidence of growing vigor and systematic and practical work of great importance. Its annual meeting is to be held this year at Saratoga, from Sept. 7 to 11, and is expected to be one of unusual interest. Its work is conducted under the five divisions of Education, Health, Finance, Social Economy, and Jurisprudence. At the head of each of these departments are persons of eminent distinction in connection with the special subjects which they include.

PROTESTANTISM is making quite rapid progress in Italy. It is only twenty years since Protestant preaching was allowed there. Now there are one hundred and thirty-eight Italian Protestant churches whose members are converts from the Church of Rome, and fifty churches of foreign Protestant residents. These, however, are Evangelical churches. A good deal of the liberal thought of Italy does not organize new churches: it only breaks from the old,—perhaps does not nominally take the trouble to do even that.

AN Irish correspondent, from this country to a "Home" paper, gives this excellent advice to those who are looking to the United States in the hope of improving their condition: "If you want to be independent in America, acquire, first of all, a part of the American soil. In other words, let all farmers or farm laborers make their way as soon as possible to the great West. The country west of the Mississippi is indeed their land of promise. Besides being unsurpassed in healthfulness, its resources are beyond limit, and defy exaggeration. Mechanics and artisans will naturally seek those centres of employment where their respective crafts are most in demand; but even these should make an effort not to be the tenants at will of any one, but rather their own landlords, owning their own homes."

IF the old doctrine of the inherent evil of matter is true, it would seem that it must be particularly applicable to Farmington, Conn. This State has never been conspicuous for heterodox opinions; but there appears to be something in the soil of Farmington that renders it fertile in heresy. It was the former home of the Rev. Mr. Merriam, of Springfield, who caused considerable exercise of mind to his brethren of the Congregational body, some two or three years since, on account of his doubts as to the doctrine of eternal punishment. And now the Rev. Mr. E. P. Adams, of Dunkirk, N.Y., is suspended by the Presbytery of Buffalo,—has been suspended for the same grievous offence,—who is also reported as once a resident of the same little Connecticut township. Mr. Adams is described as a scholarly and conscientious person, whose views are substantially like those of Canon Farrar, who startled the religious world, not long since, by his frank and scholarly strictures upon the usual interpretation given by Evangelicals to certain texts of the Bible in relation to the doctrine now in question. It is said that all but four of Mr. Adams' church members stand by him in the stiff little breeze which it has been his fortune to raise in the section of his recent ministry.

TWO WEEKS ago we expressed our astonishment at the terms of the settlement by which Mr. B. F. Underwood had withdrawn his libel-suit against the publisher of the Truth-Seeker. We have since learned that Mr. Underwood did not see the arbitrators' report until it was printed in the Truth-Seeker; that he had only received assurances from them that the evidence wholly vindicated his character against the charges in question, and that they should so report, with the recommendation that both parties should hereafter maintain silence on these personal matters; that on this understanding only he signed the agreement to abide by the decision; and that, therefore, he does not consider himself committed to anything which the arbitrators say in their report on the extraneous matters that were not in the question submitted to them. We most willingly make these statements in Mr. Underwood's behalf; but, if the case is thus, then we think Mr. Underwood owes it to himself and his friends to make a statement, over his own signature, repudiating the arbitrators' report on these other matters which they adroitly weave into the case so as to make it appear to the public that he is committed to the whole.

Since writing the above, we have received from Mr. Underwood the letter which we are most glad to have in print in another column. We let our paragraph stand, however, further to emphasize the important facts which Mr. Underwood now confirms over his own signature.

Digitized by Google

For the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

FOREVER: IMMORTALITY.

Read before the Philosophical Club of Brooklyn, N.Y.

BY W. H. BOUGHTON, ESQ.

I.

It is a matter of common observation that the mass of mankind take whatsoever they assume to be their opinions from others. And the most superficial examination of this subject will lead us to suspect that the masses have prejudices, not opinions, and by no means convictions. Especially is this true of the great questions which have always challenged the attention of the greatest and the meanest minds respecting cause, consciousness, God, and immortality. Nearly every man assumes that he has an opinion, yes, a belief; but a moment's reflection will convince him that he has never made any examination of his mental state upon these subjects. He has made an examination into the mysteries of his handicraft, and he knows that such examination was indispensable to mastery, and that mastery was indispensable to success. These are convictions; but, notwithstanding the experiences which lead to such convictions, he unhesitatingly assumes that he has a conviction of an equal degree of certainty respecting cause, consciousness, etc., and that such conviction may be, and has been, reached by him without recourse to anything which he himself would presume to dignify by such words as examination or investigation.

Still, we should not hastily condemn the workman because he is not logical; because he fails to see that a conclusion is never logical except when all its antecedent premises are established by inductions of equal certainty, and because he is tempted to call upon his imagination to reflect back an ideal which he mistakenly assumes to be his opinion respecting a God, a Cause, a Hereafter. It is not the fact that he is illogical, and therefore presumably wrong, and therefore self-harmful, that I would emphasize; but out of this disorder let us evoke beneficence, and ask Professor Huxley to tell us how.

"The great mass of mankind," said he, "have neither the liking nor the aptitude for either scientific, or literary, or artistic pursuits; nor indeed for excellence of any sort. Their ambition is to go through life with moderate exertion and a fair share of ease, doing common things in a common way. And a great blessing and comfort it is that the majority of men are of this mind; for the majority of things to be done are common things, and are quite well enough done when commonly done. The great end of life is not knowledge, but action. What men need is as much knowledge as they can assimilate and organize into a basis for action; give them more, and it may become injurious. But a small percentage of the population is born with that most excellent quality, a desire for excellence, or with special aptitudes of some sort or another."

Now, when we reflect that we know the good by its contrast with the bad, it is easy to discern that Prof. Huxley really intended to depict the horrors of the blight which would fall upon mankind were we all equally talented. And in order to prevent or at least to postpone such an undesirable social equilibrium, let us range ourselves with those uneasy spirits who are not contented with doing common things in a common way, and honestly, conscientiously examine into the great so-called mysteries of self-contemplating consciousness: and to one of these great questions, the question of Immortality, I ask your attention to-night.

The speculations upon this subject of many of the ancient philosophers, and notably of Plato, of the scholastics, and the theologians are familiar to many of you. But not until our day, and never until now has there been a sufficient body of accumulated, formulated, digested knowledge in the world to enable the mind to form the most empirical generalizations upon the subject. But in the near future all that the mind can know or may reasonably predict of immortality will be formulated, limited, and rounded into an idea of the same order and of an equal degree of certainty with the idea that matter is indestructible. It will have a history not unlike that of the theory of the attraction of gravitation, which was more than a century in conquering acceptance. And, although many years have now elapsed since the question of its truth or its falsity has passed out of the field of disputatious discussion, the significant fact for us to observe, in passing, is that the theory of the attraction of gravitation is wholly indefinite to most minds; and the more significant fact, the fact for us to dwell upon, is that, however indefinite the popular conceptions of gravity may be, the fact of the attraction of gravitation has ceased to be discussed.

As it has been with gravitation, so it will be with immortality; and I think that my meaning will now be plain when I say that an indefinite conception of immortality is upon us; that its indefiniteness will not serve to retain it in the field of discussion, but that future discussion will be limited, and directed to the making of the indefinite more and more definite. As a whole, a new idea of immortality will be recognized by all. Not a few there be who already see the penumbra of the coming shadow; and, when the shadow shall appear, then will every eye be strained to catch the first glimpse of the new idea as it rolls into the field of the mental vision. And the only cloud which obscures this new world is that remarkable element of the mind which dreads the solution of a disputed question.

So long as the heat of dialectical discussion warms the disputants, few of them welcome an approaching agreement. "Thought," says Mr. C. S. Peirce, "(has) for its sole . . . function (the production of) belief, and whatever does not concern that purpose belongs to some other system of relations. The action of thinking may incidentally have other results. It may serve to amuse us, for example; and among dilettanti it is not rare to find those who have so perverted thought to the purposes of pleasure that it seems to vex them to think that the questions upon which they delight to exercise it may ever get finally settled; and a positive discovery, which takes a favorite subject out of the arena of literary debate, is met with ill-concealed dislike. This disposition is the very debauchery of thought."

Now, while we may join Mr. Peirce in characterizing by so harsh a term that mental state which prefers the exhilaration of kicking a dead doubt to the melancholy ceremonial of burying it; while we may laugh with Goldsmith at the pedagogue who, "though vanquished, yet could argue still," our amusement should not blind us to the fact that there is a reason, and a good one, too, for the indisposition to cease discussion. The rationale of a dread of a solution is found in the reluctance to give over the pleasures of pursuit. These are real and rational pleasures; and an exhaustive examination of the pleasures of pursuit will point us to the paths which lead up to immortality, and to all other facts of consciousness. If pursuit is attended by pleasure, then is it natural, rational, and desirable; and when it ceases to be natural and rational, it will not long remain pleasurable. The end attained, the knowledge gained, then pursuit, with its accompanying pleasurable exhilaration, ceases; and then, to such as permit confusion of thought, comes regret that the race is won. This confusion of thought is found in the fact that mystery is regarded as the object of pursuit. But mystery is no substitute for knowledge, and furnishes no objects of pleasurable pursuit,—for pleasure of pursuit is pleasure of pursuit of knowledge. Now, in order that we may gain some knowledge of that which immortality is, it will be desirable to contrast it with that which immortality is not; and that we may know what immortality is not, let us examine the popular notions upon this subject.

II.

It is generally assumed that after death we shall join such of our friends and relations as have preceded us, and await the coming of such of them as we have left behind. When these shall join us, then our company will be complete, and with them we shall pass an eternity of the joys of kindred and friendship. So far, the conception has some degree of definiteness; but, notwithstanding the assumed importance of the subject, few persons manifest any desire or even curiosity to inquire or even to speculate upon such matters as how we shall spend our post-mortem eternity; whether our enemies, our creditors, our art critics, and our bores will be with us, or will be assigned to some other and more inhospitable quarter of the happy land.

In general terms, it may be stated that the hope of the millions is that they may join their friends and lead a never-ending life of joy and ease, without sorrow, without wants, without work. It will be seen that this hope is twin brother to the wish, which many still indulge, that this present life might never end; that they might never die; and, at the bottom of this wish, we find a like hope of freedom from pain, sorrow, and toil.

Analyzing these states of mind, we find that when men say immortality they mean conscious immortality; and, reducing their notion of conscious immortality to its lowest terms, we find a single residuum,—the faculty of memory. And not all of memory; for they would desire oblivion of all that was harmful, hateful, sorrowful in the past. Pausing a moment in their reflections, they begin to doubt whether a recollection of the joys of the past would be at all prized; whether these would not be excluded by the greater joys of a never-ending present; and they finally conclude that their idea before death of that which is indispensable to their happiness now, and to their happiness after death, will be the ability to recognize in the spirit before them the wife, the child, whom they loved upon the earth. They know that the wife and the child are indispensable now, and they draw the hasty conclusion that a recollection of them will be indispensable hereafter. But should they lose both wife and child, and not lose consciousness, then would they realize that intensity of grief was conditioned by activity of memory. Time loosens the clutch of memory. As memory fades, grief weakens, and is finally supplanted by the pleasures of memory. We remember with a softened, serene pleasure the dear ones who have left us. A still closer examination awakens the suspicion that it is not recollection of the dear ones which gives this pleasure; but that, while this is the ultimate cause, our pleasure proximately proceeds from the contemplation of the ideal wife and the ideal child which the mind has built up for itself,—not from recollection of the real wife and the real child. And as time lengthens, this pleasure strengthens; but it strengthens because memory weakens. We see that the laws of nature here again lead up to beneficence. Now let us kindle the torch of memory and feed its flames so that they may shine with uninterrupted and undiminished glare upon the upturned faces of the dead,—and another law, another beneficent law, whose beneficent office is likewise to extinguish memory, throws down the reason. Do not let us hastily conclude that the madman has no pleasures; and well may we suspect that, could the insane tell of the pleasures of insanity, those of memory would not be among them.

As age creeps upon us, memory is the first of the faculties to weaken; and, just so soon as memory fades, the sunset of serenity lights up the old man's brow.

The fallacy of the popular idea may be illustrated by the vivid consciousness in the child's mind that he loves his little companions, and his conviction that his future happiness will largely depend upon life-long relations with his little friends. He does not suspect that he will and that he must grow out of them, grow away from them, that his happiness depends upon his growth in those very directions, and that recollection of his childish friendships is by no means the condition of his adult happiness.

There is one phase of the popular belief which is sufficiently significant. Immortality is conceived as relating wholly to the future. The reason is plain. Recollection of states of consciousness begins with this life. We know that our happiness in this life is not augmented by recollection of what we might have been before we were born; and it probably never occurs to the most strenuous advocate of post-mortem memory to regret the absence of ante-natal memory. Excluding all help which evolution may render, and relying wholly upon history, most men believe that their ancestors, even in historic times, were barbarians. This belief prevents immortality from travelling backwards. The comfortable citizen of our day, leaning back in his velvet-padded pew and listening to a sermon upon immortality full of harps and thrones and wings and lambs, would resent the intrusion of memory should she turn her mirror upon the second century, and discover him gnawing a bone as he herded his pigs. And he is by no means certain that he would be pleased to recognize in the gentle woman beside him the blear-eyed drab who is disputing a husk with the swine. He resents the officious obtrusiveness of ante-natal memory, and is eager to believe in so much of evolution as dates his personality.

Instance might be piled upon illustration, but we have now progressed far enough to cause us to suspect that an undue emphasis of memory is not a blessing.

Digitized by Google

Another popular fallacy is the notion that a belief in conscious, personal, immortal memory is an essential element of religion. Abstract religion, that which is common to all concrete religious systems, may be defined as man's efforts to attain his ideals, and his longing after such of his ideals as he thinks he cannot attain. The important words in this definition are the words "efforts" and "longing"; for these imply pursuit, and the pleasures of religion are the pleasures of pursuit of the unattained ideals. As fast as we overtake our ideals, and reduce them to possession, our attitude of mind towards those appropriated ideals is not religious, but moral; for this is the prize, the fruit of religion. Morality is the ideal realized. The religious man is he who first recognizes and then gladly and with bounding step pursues his ideals; the irreligious man is he who turns his back upon his ideals; and the non-religious man is he who thinks that, upon the whole, he should rather admire his neighbor's ideals, and would like his neighbor to go out and capture a few and bring them in for his inspection.

Abstractly considered, then, all such special concrete matters as cosmogony, trinity, personality, conscious immortality, etc., which distinguish religious systems and phases of individual belief one from another, are no part of religion. But it is evident that the most inevitable and necessary corollary of religion, as we have defined it, is the fact that religion is wholly subjective and personal to each individual mind. And, as individual minds differ one from another in clearness or confusion of thought, in strength and weakness, it follows that individual ideals will be strong or weak, clear or confused,—but, quoad the individual, none the less ideals, none the less religions. In other words, there are religions for the strong and religions for the weak; and it is the failure to recognize the fact that there is a weak religion for the weak which leads to a fundamental error in the minds of such as have eliminated from their conceptions of their own ideals all such extraneous and confusing matters as environ the religion of the weak. So long as weakness shall characterize religion, just so long will the popular notions of immortality form an integral and necessary part of it. "Take away my total depravity, and you take away my religion," said the old lady. Take away my conscious immortality, and you take away my religion, is the thought of the average citizen. And while we would advise the average citizen not to laugh at the old lady, we would also advise the rational religionist not to laugh at either of them. Both are religious; she simply mistakes total depravity for an ideal, and he mistakes conscious immortality for an ideal.

Among the stock arguments for persistent, personal, post-mortem memory, the most general and the most plausible may be stated in these terms: Earthly joys and sorrows are unequally distributed. Strength seizes all the temporal pleasures and sensuous gratifications. Strength is not contented with such conquests as excite the admiration of weakness in the winning; but, denying to weakness even such pleasure as lies in admiration, strength rends from weakness its own peculiar, pitiful pleasures, and even its substance, and battens upon distress. Therefore, runs the argument, compensation after death must be made to weakness for the ills suffered in the flesh.

But, when we came to consider weakness's idea of compensation, we find that weakness would have the trophies of strength, without its prowess. And we further find that weakness desires to become strong. This would be commendable, should it stop right here. But, should weakness stop here, it would use some other word than compensation; and, in order to measure out a full meaning to this word, weakness would bare the back of strength and lay on the bloody stripes with willing hand. Weakness wants the pleasure of compensation, and finds it in revenge. But the pleasure of revenge depends upon memory; and therefore memory is the necessary condition of post-mortem compensation. And so, again, is illustrated a result of persistent, personal memory. And to those gentle spirits who would bury revenge, and who believe that post-mortem happiness would not be compensatory, and would therefore be incomplete, if the privilege shall be denied them of contrasting such happiness with ante-mortem misery,—to such minds let us suggest that present happiness in this life may be diminished and may be extinguished by memory, by revived recollection of the pains of the past. And another thought, weakness is never wholly weak; in some direction weakness is strong.

The current idea of compensation took form at the period when the world contained but two classes, the oppressors and the oppressed. Its genesis was despair of liberty. This despair settled down upon but one class, the oppressed; and out of it they abstracted their idea of compensation; namely, a like liberty, a liberty to oppress. But the other class, having full liberty of oppression, felt no need of compensation. The idea did not originate with them. As liberty spread through the world, despair gravitated towards hope; intensity of meaning faded paler and paler out of oppression-born, post-mortem compensation, and it exists to-day simply as a survival of barbarous habits of thought. It died of too much liberty.

Now when we consider nature's compensation, we find it wholly pleasurable. We find the back strengthened for the burthen, and we hear the pilgrim singing as he carries it along. It is the positive strong back which gives the pleasure, and not the negative absence of the pains it once endured. Neither pleasure, nor pain, nor anything else proceeds from the absence of anything. Nature's compensation; but why must nature compensate? Because action and reaction are opposite and equal. Being equal, neither can destroy the other. Being opposite, they must interplay. Interplaying, they must be rhythmic. Being rhythmic, they must be beautiful. Being beautiful, they must give pleasure.

Still in pursuit of that which immortality is not, let us finally glance at that last infirmity of noble minds, fatalism. Fatalism is the goal of all who intellectually assent to the general theory of evolution, but fail to see all of its implications. Full of wonder, admiration, and awe for this new sun which has risen above the intellectual horizon, they gaze full-eyed into the face of this glowing orb, and so are dazed and blinded to the fact that all its rays are not luminous; that it not only dazzles, but also warms and cheers; that its invisible heat-rays knock upon the buried shell of the seed of consciousness, call it up to the sunlight, push out its arms, swell its veins and arteries, wreathe it with blossoms and laden it with fruit,—fruit full of new seeds, not full of old seeds.

The attitude of mind of many honest, earnest men towards evolution differs little from the mental state of the Brahmin, wrapped in stolid resignation, waiting for the heavens to fall. Analyzing the thoughts of such a man, we find nothing which approaches to an understanding of what evolution is. His mental state is this: Truth above all things. We thirst. Science is the fountain of truth. Its waters are oblivion. Let us drink. Let us drink the truth. Let us drink—nepenthe. Science is the temple of truth. The truth is beautiful. Therefore let us enter. But whoso enters here leaves hope behind!

Now this man claims a share of our respect, because of his fidelity to his ideal of truth. He excites in us a certain sort of admiration, because it seems to us that it seems to him that he is logical. We have toward him a feeling akin to that which we have for the red-skin in the rapids, who is sufficiently logical to cease all unavailing paddling of his canoe, and, folding his arms, goes stolidly over the falls. But there is another type of mind which is not so admirable: he who knows that he must go over the falls, but insists on taking hope along with him, hope that he will not be drowned, and therefore pierces the air with his cries, and keeps up a furious paddling. The mental state of such a man is something like this: Truth above all things. We thirst. Science is the fountain of truth, and, notwithstanding, we know that her waters will not quench our thirst, let us drink. Science is all that we have. She gives us no hope of conscious immortality. We must accept her utterances. But all the science in the world, and all possible systems and schools of philosophy cannot expel from the heart of man the innate, comforting, glorious hope of a conscious immortality.

I think it will not be difficult to recognize in this man a disciple of the intuitionalist school. And we see that his belief, pretending to be rational, ends where the belief of the Brahmin and the savage ends, in fatalism. And the point for us to observe is that neither is this word, nor are the mental states which we have been considering, discriptive or illustrative of anything which may be called a belief, or dignified by the name of a philosophy. The only thing I have ever met which fittingly suggests the howling confusion which characterizes them all is the formula of the genial John Brougham when he said that "What will be, will be, as what has been was."

III.

Before proceeding to any examination of that which immortality is, let us look at the matter à priori from the stand-point of logic.

"The theory of probabilities," says Mr. Peirce, "is simply the science of logic quantitatively treated. . . . There are two conceivable certainties with reference to any hypothesis, the certainty of its truth and the certainty of its falsity. The general problem of probabilities is from a given state of facts to determine the numerical probability of a possible fact. This is the same as to inquire how much the given facts are worth as evidence to prove the possible fact. Thus the problem of probabilities is simply the general problem of logic." And finally he concludes and demonstrates that "it is an indisputable result of the theory of probabilities that every gambler, if he continues long enough, must ultimately be ruined. The same thing is true of an insurance company. All human affairs rest upon probability, and the same thing is true everywhere. If man were immortal, he could be perfectly certain of seeing the day when everything in which he had trusted should betray his trust, and, in short, of coming eventually to hopeless misery. He would break down at last as every great fortune, as every dynasty, as every civilization does. In place of this, we have death. There exist no reasons, and a later discussion will show that there can be no reasons, for thinking that the human race or any intellectual race will exist forever." And Mr. Peirce means beneficence when he says that "he who would not sacrifice his own soul to save the whole world is, as it seems to me, illogical in all his inferences collectively. Logic is rooted in the social principle. To be logical, men should not be selfish." And should we ask him which of the two words, "egoism" or "altruism," he finds in the popular notions of immortality, we need not doubt of his reply.

IV.

The hasty glance which we have now taken of that which immortality is not, the facts to which we have called attention and the doubts which they imply, the danger signals which we have put up as we hurriedly passed along, will, if duly regarded, be sufficient to warn us in our quest of that which immortality is; and to a brief examination of this subject, let us now direct our thoughts.

Upon the threshold of this question, let us remember that our knowledge of immortality differs in no respect from our knowledge of any fact or event which depends upon the future or upon knowledge of the past for its solution. Knowledge and experience go down with this day's sun, and ignorance of the morrow reigns until to-morrow's sun shall rise with to-morrow's experience. We do not know that the sun will rise to-morrow. We do not know that there is any such thing as immortality.

Impliedly assuming the continuance of oft-repeated past experiences, there are some who assume that the rise of to-morrow's sun is a fact of a far greater certainty than the fact of immortality. Amplified, this assumption amounts to this,—that the daily risings of the suns of past years are experiences of a far higher degree of certitude than the experiences upon which any experience-conditioned, and therefore rational, belief in immortality rests. But the remarkable fact which we shall presently appreciate is that belief in immortality has many more degrees of reasonable certainty, has far more experiences underlying it, than the belief in the rise of to-morrow's sun. In order to make this plain, it will be necessary to examine the grounds of a rational belief in immortality. And when we have ascertained what we mean by this word, then I shall ask you to test our conclusions, not solely by contrast with that which we have found immortality is not, but by the suspicion which I hope shall awaken in our minds that immortality as it is, so far from ending in fatalism and despair, includes and postulates all that there is of hope; that hope is coextensive with time and space, and that these are infinite. And if our minds shall be pointed in this direction, then may we follow the path of Hope until the guide-boards tell us that its name is changed to Faith; and then may we retrace our steps and find that Faith is Hope,—two names for the same path which leads back to the door of the reason, and thence leads on—forever.

Digitized by Google

We have already found that the belief in conscious immortality has for its origin a single spring: the unreasonable hope of the projection into the future of the harmful memories of the past. Passing the harmful character of memory, the fact remains that the hope of persistent personal memory is the only ground for a belief in conscious immortality. No attempt is made to harmonize this belief with all the other or with any other facts or fact of consciousness. And when our attention is called to this fact, then it is our duty to suspect that no theory of immortality is worthy of a thought which fails to sustain this harmony.

A belief, then, a reasonable belief in immortality must rest primarily upon some fact which shall be in harmony with all the facts of consciousness; and such a fact we find in the indestructibility of matter.

And now, to note how easily confusion of thought may enter the unwatched mind, let us observe that indestructibility of matter is asserted by all thinkers, and by nearly all who leave their thinking to others; and that such as deny it in terms assert it or assume it in their every thought. But, notwithstanding such unanimity of opinion, there are some who assert indestructibility of matter, but deny immortality. And while this is sufficiently remarkable, it is by no means so significant as that other fact, that some there be who assert indestructibility of matter and also immortality. The fact that they both think alike, so far as they think at all, never enters the mind of either; and it certainly never occurs to him who asserts both indestructibility of matter and immortality that he is far more illogical and far more unreasonable than he who asserts the one and denies the other. Both betray confusion of thought; but the mental state of him who asserts indestructibility of matter and denies immortality is characterized by very much less confusion than that of him who asserts both. For the latter, while asserting both, assumes that he distinguishes between them; assumes that he knows the one by its difference from the other; sometimes assumes that both are different facts of an equal degree, or of unequal degrees, of certainty; sometimes assumes that the one is a fact and the other is its necessary corollary. And here the necessity for investigation, and the undesirability of doing uncommon things in a common way are again illustrated. For investigation shows that indestructibility of matter and immortality are not two things, but one and the same thing. The one term has no meaning which the other lacks. In other words, the terms are not even convertible. It is not solely an error of fact and of logic to refer to indestructibility of matter and immortality by using the word they, but it is also an error of grammar to use any word except It—an all-inclusive masculine, feminine, and neuter It.

If matter is indestructible, then is it immortal; and the immortality of matter still persists, not solely when matter is contrasted with spirit; but of far deeper significance is the fact that when matter is so contrasted it shares its immortality with spirit. So, sharing its characteristic quality of indestructibility, the illogical mind presently assumes that finally spirit gets it all, and that spirit alone is immortal. And now, to again illustrate the fact that all disputes among men are disputes about terms, and to evoke a harmony similar to that which we shall presently see obtains between the terms "indestructibility of matter" and "immortality," and the ideas sought to be expressed by those terms, let us note the fact that in a last analysis the postulated spirit of the unphilosophical mind is the absolute of the philosopher, the materialist. Both assume the relative, and both intend the same identical non-relative when they call it by different names. There is no difference in the object which both of them postulate: the difference lies in their mental processes. The diagnosis of their respective mental states is not difficult to make; and, as anything which approaches to an understanding of the subject of this paper depends upon it, let us endeavor to clear it up.

Man is capable of but two states of mind: conception and consciousness. [And to any psychologist who may object to the use which I shall make of these words, and especially of the word "consciousness," let me say that any analysis of or any reference to perception, to association, to the ego, to consciousness of sensations, to cognitions whether presentative or representative, to any of the tools with which the psychologist works, would distract attention from the subject of this paper. This is not a paper upon psychology. It cannot be treated psychologically; it must be treated philosophically. The highest generalizations of each of the concrete sciences are the factors of philosophy. The highest generalization of psychology is conception. And when psychology is entirely through with conception and consciousness, then I use them to establish harmony with so much of consciousness as lies outside of psychology.* To express those subjective mental states which are conditioned proximately by experience, and such as are not so conditioned, I have searched in vain for better words than conception and consciousness. Such better words have not yet been coined. Language does not keep pace with advancing thought; and long before newer or wider ideas are formulated into new words, some old words expand to take on wider meanings, and other old words contract to narrower meanings. Throwing this tub to the psychological whale, let us return to conception and consciousness.]

Speaking very roughly and for the purposes of emphasis only, we may say that conception is comprehension, and consciousness is apprehension. Conception is definite consciousness. Consciousness when definite includes conception, and when indefinite transcends conception. If the indefinite can be the object of consciousness, then it must have a positive side; in other words, must be an object; and for that positive object no name can be so fittingly selected as that positive term, The Absolute. Regarding the relative as the peculiar object of conception because of its positiveness, we may in like manner regard the absolute as the peculiar object of consciousness, again because of its positiveness.

[And now, to prevent misconception of the terms "absolute" and "relative" in the limited sense in which we are using them, let us note, in passing, that by the relative we mean that positive thing and those positive things with which we can establish a recognized conscious relation. The result of the establishment of such a relation is a conception. Anything, however vague, which is consciously recognized as limited takes from consciousness its characteristic incoherence and indefiniteness, and becomes conception; coherent now, definite now, characteristically coherent and definite to the extent of the limitation. By the absolute we mean that positive thing and those positive things with which we cannot establish a recognized conscious relation. This is the object and these are the objects of incoherent, indefinite consciousness; and we shall presently find that the absolute is simply an extension of the relative.

So defining our terms, we will avoid the confusion of thought which arises from the definition of the metaphysicians when they tell us that anything, no matter how concrete, definite, palpable, sensible it may be, is absolute, and its manifestations are the relatives. This metaphysical definition is confusing, because it excludes from the idea of the absolute everything which has no manifestations; namely, which does not consciously manifest itself, which does not evoke sensible recognition. In other words, for the purposes of this paper, absolute is used as the antithesis of relative. But, to such as may desire to examine this matter further at their leisure, let me suggest that they challenge the statement of the Scottish school, that consciousness of the absolute is a pure negation. On the contrary, I think they will find, not negation, but negation of all negation the widest possible definition of an affirmation. Believing that it is wholly unnecessary at this time to make any examination into the relation of concrete parts to abstract wholes, having no time for the curiosities of literature, and leaving Sir William Hamilton to gather whatever of comfort he may by contrasting the absolute, defined as the unconditionally limited, with the infinite, defined as the unconditionally unlimited, let us press on in search of immortality.]

Always using the positive in our search for the true objects of both conception and consciousness, we will avoid the errors which inevitably arise from the confused employment of a negative in the sense of a positive. Then we will not attempt to define the indefinable, and notably we shall not regard indefiniteness as a definition; and we shall find that we have a very much better idea when we say "the absolute" than we have when we try to gather a positive meaning from such negatives as the in-finite, the in-de-finite, the un-knowable, the non-relative. This careless habit of mind accounts for nearly all of our erroneous conclusions; and we are tempted to indulge it through a misconception of the true offices of those tools of thought,—likeness and difference.

Difference stops where conception stops, and conception stops where concrete objects stop. Up to a certain point, the multiplication of differences enables the mind to get a more definite and therefore a better concept of any concrete object. In like manner, the multiplication of likenesses supplements differences and aids conception. But, just so soon as we reach the limit of recognized experiences, we reach the limit of conception and the limit of the office of difference. In other words, the office of difference is to point out specific characters, such as form, density, color, odor, taste, etc.; and likenesses travel along with these differences. In regarding the form of a man, difference points out his dissimilarity to other animals and objects, and likeness points out his similarity to other men.

But likeness does not end where difference ends, and this will be plain if we extend our illustration. We know John by difference from George, but by such difference we know him simply as John. Regarding him as a man, we do not know him by his difference from George; for in this respect he is like George. Distinguishing John and George from the grass on which they stand, we know them by difference so far as animal and vegetable are concerned, but by likeness just as soon as we regard animal and vegetable as matter manifesting life. Add the inorganic earth beneath their feet, and a like analysis gives like results. And the point for us to observe is that the wider the generalization the greater the dependence on likeness; until, reaching the highest generalization, the mental effort to realize the absolute lying beyond experience, we find that we must rely wholly upon likeness to that of which we have experience; and the result of such reliance is consciousness, not conception, of the absolute.

Conception, being definite consciousness, is knowledge. But indefinite consciousness is not knowledge; still it is something; and this will be plain if we analyze our idea of space.

Space is not the matrix of matter, as many seem to suppose; and space is not a sea of nothing, in which matter as something floats, as many more seem to suppose. Space is matter,—matter extended. Definite space is measurable extension,—extension limited by the microscope, the telescope, and the eye; and within the range of these we have conception of extension. Indefinite space lies beyond the reach of the senses, beyond experience, but is precisely like definite space in being matter extended. We cannot think of matter extended beyond the field of our telescope, for it sends to us no signal, no limitation; but we know that indefinitely extended matter must lie beyond us; for a limitation of space, a point beyond which there is no space, is unthinkable. But, while we cannot think of indefinite space, while it is not the object of conception, we can think of our idea of it, and therefore it is the object of consciousness. Consciousness is thinking of the idea of the absolute.

And what is our idea of it? That it is like the relative, like that of which we have experience; for what kind of a proposition is that which affirms that anything of which we have no experience is different from anything else? The absolute, then, must necessarily be an extension of the relative. This is the true unknowable. And I cannot conceive of a greater confusion of thought than that which characterizes some thinkers who, postulating the absolute as unknowable and inconceivable, yet assert that they know it, and that they know it by difference from the relative. For this is a statement that the absolute is different from the relative, and this is a statement that it is not unknowable nor inconceivable if it can be asserted of it that it is different from anything.

And now we feel the premonitory throb of an approaching idea converging upon our lines of thought. Now the bell strikes nine; and it is nine hours of the clock not solely in this our home, but also nine in Sirius, and away down the depths of space.

Turning to confront the meaning of space, we find it in the fact that definite and indefinite extensions of matter are indestructible. And the indestructibility of matter merges in meaning into the immortality of matter just as soon as we subject time, the abstract

*And such as shall find the way to immortality through Scotch metaphysics will win the lasting thanks of a waiting world.

Digitized by Google

of all sequences, to the same analysis to which we have subjected space, the abstract of all coexistences. Indestructible time, a limitation of time, a point beyond which there is no time, is also unthinkable. In like manner, we have conception of definite time and consciousness of indefinite time, in like manner conditioned, the one by difference, the other by likeness. Finally it dawns upon us that extension is not confined to space. Time is extended.

And now the path of extension of time begins to wear a familiar look. Now the guide-boards tell us that its name is Time and Space, Indestructibility and Immortality, as well as Hope and Faith. Six names for the same path which leads back to the door of the reason, and thence leads on—forever. Six names for the same thing! Yes, more than sixty and six; and yet one word includes them all. What is it which is indestructible? Matter. We have no better word. Space and time, spirit and soul, life and light, and love and immortality are not different things, but different phases of the same thing. This is matter; and it has but one synonyme, and that is—everything. Everything past,—every brave, forgotten deed, every savage deed forgotten, all unseen blushes of the desert flower, all songs and hymns and sobs and sighs and hopes and faiths and fears of the long-gone ages which have never reached our ears. Everything present,—not alone "the buds of future bloomings, but ripening seeds of ancient sowings," lies and curses of the long ago, not less than deadly fumes and gases, stripped by the air of all their poison,—ripples in the laugh of children. Did anything ever die? Did everything ever die? Everything future,—all our tears of pity, love, and sorrow, and all of anger, hate, and anguish, purified, clarified,—shall fall, with the rain, upon the just and the unjust who shall dwell in our land, but who shall never know our name. Is not matter beautiful? Need we hesitate to own ourselves materialists? I think not. Materialism is the faith of the future; and shall any one now shrink from the word, we may at once quiet his nerves by substituting everythingism. He will rather admire everything. He will, if he can, patronize it.

There is a certain all but universally prevalent habit of mind which prevents any adequate idea of matter, and shuts out most of its implications. I refer to the temptation to regard matter and force, and even motion, first as statical, then as dynamical. Remembering that inevitable confusion of thought will be set up if matter shall not be regarded as including both motion and force, let us observe that nearly all men, including many Spencerians, tacitly assume that such ideas as they have of force are very different from such ideas as they have of persistence of force; that force is the essence, and persistence is one of its qualities; that the thing is very different from the thing manifesting itself, from the thing in motion; that not only is there a point of difference between the two, but that the status, the statical, the stand-still thing, is somehow clothed with greater dignity than the δυναμις, the power-exerting, active thing. We have no time to further demonstrate the fallacy of such crude conceptions. This must be left to your own working-out: and shall you do this, then your reward will be the conviction that statical is dynamical; one thing, not two things; and, in this instance, not even two names for the same thing, but simply fictions, terms which have been imported into discussions of abstract things to serve a single purpose,—and that is nothing but convenience.

With the disappearance of the terms and the differences which they are assumed to imply, will disappear all differences assumed to exist between time and eternity, matter and force, matter and mind, matter and soul, matter and spirit. Strike out the differences, and there remain the likenesses. When likeness shall be recognized, then shall we call its name harmony; and just so soon as we shall set the crown of harmony upon the brow of matter, then will matter burst into song.

If I shall be able to arouse the suspicion in anybody's mind that matter sings, always has sung, and always will sing, then I shall leave him to study the scores by himself, and wait until he shall find the overture to immortality. And when he shall have mastered this, then will he find that all the tunes in the book may be played at the same time, and for all time; and that all of them simply add their voices to the swell of the crescendo in the majestic symphony of the spheres.

What, then, makes matter sing? What paints the roses and the sunset clouds? What calms the spirit in the gloaming, rouses with the trumpet, marches with the drum, strings the lyre, and puts up a prayer? Rhythm; matter; matter in motion. All motions of matter are rhythmic. The material basis of beauty, of life, of light, of warmth, of grace, of love, of hope, of the hope of immortality—is rhythm; immortal matter stirred with rhythmic pulses. All of grandeur,—the lifting of the craggy peak, the rush of the torrent, the burst of the storm, the death of the hero, the brave deed and word. Shall grandeur ever die? All of beauty. Shall beauty ever die? All of goodness,—all that is conditioned by unselfishness. Shall self-sacrifice ever die? Shall ever the forces of nature cease converting selfishness into love? and shall not her methods and her processes, when so benignly employed, be beautiful? And will the ends of nature and the means to those ends become unlovely when they shall blossom into knowledge? Is there anything in nature which need lead us to fear that widening knowledge will not offer us other objects of pleasurable pursuit?

Now it is entirely clear that neither everything nor the immortality of everything can be analyzed or even formulated; and surely not in the brief hour allotted to me this evening. I have not attempted it. I believe that no man—however clearly his thought on this great subject may be conceived by him, however clearly expressed by him, however interested, intelligent, responsive, and receptive his audience may be, however happily he may publicly analyze his mental processes—can convey that thought to his audience. He may offer incentives, he may awaken interest; but he can furnish to no one of his auditors any substitute for the necessity of patient, eager, careful, intelligent, hopeful, personal investigation. And I will have accomplished my object to-night, if I shall induce any one to ask himself the question, "What is matter?"

And if I shall so succeed, then I know that fatalism, in all its forms, will be banished from thought; and that belief in unconscious immortality will certainly do one thing,—it will strengthen earthly ties. No longer, then, shall countless thousands mourn man's inhumanity to man. Then will it, then must it, lend a new light to the eye, a deeper tone to the voice, a better, sweeter, holier meaning to love. For then shall friendship merge in this, and hither shall tend all the graces and beatitudes, all of comfort and serenity.

Unconscious immortality! Oh, no! Conscious immortality. But, as in this life we find that we are, so, in each successive future life, let us hope that we shall be unconscious of the pains of a past personality, and, all-unadapted to future conditions, mercifully spared the present pains of present consciousness of a coming glory.

To the hopeful, I think I have demonstrated the infinite hope and restful comfort of material immortality. If not so much as this, then I have pointed to the solid earth, whereon we may put up a shrine and consecrate it to that radiant spirit which springs eternal in the human breast. But a further word should be spoken to such as regard the immortality of philosophy as a desert waste where they can never make their homes; to such as regard it as an Eden whence they are forever expelled; to such as indulge the lingering suspicion that the so-called supernatural is always to be preferred to the natural; in a word, to such as do not want a philosophy, but do want a prophecy.

If George Washington loved his country, he hoped for it a future of transcendent freedom, happiness, and glory. The father of his country, he felt a father's solicitude for the welfare of his offspring; and out of this solicitude there no doubt came to him the thought that, could he command the future, his country should develop along the lines of his highest ideals. But what kind of an 1879 would George Washington have made without the railroad, without the steam-ship, without the telegraph, without Herbert Spencer, and with John Knox and John Calvin? And, however conspicuous the failure of George Washington in determining for himself or for us this year of grace, think of the infinitude of his failure when dealing with infinity. And think of the conditions surrounding George Washington in 1776, if imposed by his savage ancestors. And the fact to which I desire to call attention is that the failure to find anything of hope in the immortality of philosophy is largely due to the perpetual recurrence of the old, old notion that all we need is simply the power to vastly improve on nature's future.

Experience tells us that the things which happen are, as wholes, as generalities, always the things which are expected to happen, but, in detail and in method of appearing, are never the things which are expected to happen. Some unnoticed, disregarded phase or factor changes and denominates the whole. Some sleeping potentiality is the first to hear the summons to awaken, and presses to the front.

Using language for the purposes of emphasis, and not of strict accuracy, we may say that among the things which all men expect will happen is immortality: and if matter is indestructible, then all men are right; but as to the details of immortality and its method of appearing, these are the things which will not happen when immortality happens. And the significant fact is that upon the subject of details there is no such unanimity of opinion. What this flower of the future shall be, at any given point of time, will blossom into knowledge when the sun of that day shall redden the eastern hills. We do not know it now. It has not yet arrived. We should not know it now, because we cannot know it now.

And what may we reasonably predict of the consciousness of the future? Simply this: that it will be a segregation and natural selection of all the best elements of consciousness as now we know it.

Here may we spread the pinions of the imagination, and mount from height to height just so long as our pinions shall carry our material bodies with them. That is what pinions were made for. The flights of fancy which crack the skull against a projecting rock are taken in the belief that the imagination is all wings and no eyes. Taking note, then, of the fact that during life we are gathering experiences and developing our powers,—educating some, educing some, evolving some,—and that not infrequently, and just at the period when we feel the serenity of strength and the consciousness of ability to command the world, and are conscious also of special attainments, whether in art, in science, or philosophy, laboriously acquired and never used, and conscious, too, of latent powers first to be recognized, then to be developed, and then to be used,—death comes upon us while fittest to live; noting these, and noting also that nothing is wasted and nothing destroyed, and that development takes place along the lines which lead from good to better on its way to best; noting all these "grossly material" things,—let us imagine that all our sacrifices upon the altar of culture, whether of heart or mind, are not thrown away. But, as the leaflets drinking up the sunbeams liberate, not dissipate, all their heat and motion, making the sun of Abraham to shine upon us now, so the atoms or the molecules into which we shall be resolved may be storing up our personality, to be liberated for another, and, becausea future, let us hope a better life. In other words, let us imagine the splendors locked up in potentiality, and hasten to read the word upon his banner, RESURGAM.

THE Board of Trustees of the Wooster University, Ohio, have compelled Prof. W. G. Scott to resign the chair of Mental and Moral Philosophy, because, as the Christian Union puts it, his "teachings do not harmonize with the Presbyterian Confession of Faith. They decline to state wherein consists his heresy, refuse his application for an investigation, and maintain their absolute right to dismiss any professor without being subjected to questioning. Probably this is their legal right; but, if college trustees should generally act upon it, civil service reform would be needed in our colleges more than in our national administration."

POETRY.

For the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

THE DEAD PAST.

O pedant dull, who with thy bucket fain
Wouldst living water from the dead past draw,
The dead were wise for their own day; in vain
Of a new time you make their lore the law;
Art not a'ive thyself with soul to know
And more of truth than men had long ago?
Not with the eyes wherewith dead nations saw
The world look thou, but thine own vision use;
Nature herself forevermore renews,
And comelier generations brings to light;
With swift despatch her crude assays from sight
Hiding, wholly intent upon the breathing Now;
Not stumbling with reverted glance move thou,
But forward, kindling at the Future's glow.

B. W. BALL.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 12, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

WE trust our readers will not omit the essay by Mr. Boughton, on Immortality, on account of its length or on account of its apparent abstract treatment. Its conclusions will not satisfy all: we cannot say that they appear to us to be the final word on this subject, which is of such universal interest. But the treatment is thoughtful, reverent, tender, and the question is one that is more and more attracting the attention of thinking, reasoning people. Mr. Boughton is a lawyer, accustomed to sift evidence; and his word, written con amore, deserves to be heard.

THE Evangelical movement for stricter Sunday observance appears to lag. Are its promoters taking a vacation? We have not even seen a "resolution" on the matter for some time. Meantime, Sunday excursions are at full tide. The summer is passing, the harvest will soon be over, and still the Sunday is not saved.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old INDEX stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass	18.35
MRS. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on INDEX stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo (yearly)	25.00

GENERAL DONATIONS TO F.R.A.

HENRY W. BROWN, Worcester	10.00
C. M. DENISON, New York City	5.00
MR. and MRS. EIDLITZ, New York City	2.00
Miss APPLETON, Roxbury, Mass	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

THE UNITARIANS IN CAMP.

The Unitarians—perhaps we should say the more missionary section of them—have been holding an eight days' camp-meeting on the shores of Lake Winnipiseogee, in New Hampshire. This is the third year that the meeting has been held. The first year it was a local and almost impromptu gathering of members of Unitarian societies in New Hampshire, who came together in this delightful spot, where the Methodists have an annual camp-meeting, to be refreshed by a few days' communion with nature and meantime to take counsel with each other as to the needs of their cause in the State. They had so good, and, as they thought, so successful a time that they resolved to try the experiment the following year on a larger scale. They accordingly invited all Unitarians throughout the country, who were so disposed, to join with them, arranged a more definite programme, and engaged speakers who appeared best adapted to the kind of work required, wherever they could find them. And this, too, was successful in a different way. The country people for many miles around, most of whom had never before heard liberal preaching, came to the meetings, and the interest in them was beyond expectation. So this year the same method has been tried again, and, if we may judge from the satisfaction of the Committee of Arrangements, with a still additional measure of success. It was estimated that an average of four hundred and fifty to five hundred people from abroad were there the greater part of the week, nd that on Sundays the congregations in the grove numbered from twelve to fourteen hundred. On the last three days we were present, not by any special invitation, but by our own choice, and mainly with a view of personally observing this new instrumentality of Unitarianism.

And, thus observing, we can testify to a genuine healthy interest manifested in the meetings; to the ability, in the main, of the speaking so far as we heard, and we did not hear what was by general consent regarded as the best; to the prevailing spirit of good cheer, hopefulness, and earnest desire to help humanity in practical ways; and to the hospitality shown to different and even opposing phases of thought. As evidence on this latter point, it may be said that Rabbi Gottheil, of New York, gave by invitation an essay at one of the sessions, which was everywhere spoken of as one of the best utterances of the week, that at the close of the essays and sermons opportunity was offered for free discussion by any persons, and that the few words we spoke on one of these occasions appeared to be most cordially received, and that more were asked for.

This experiment of camp-meeting by Unitarians does not appear to be looked upon with entire favor by the older and more conservative members of the denomination. We were struck with the fact that the great majority of the speakers were in the section of the younger ministers; and with the further fact that a considerable number of them were not educated for the Unitarian ministry, but have changed from some form of Evangelical faith to Unitarianism, since their ministry began. Perhaps the older ministers have a fear that the new method will detract from the traditional dignity of the denomination,—that it will tend to popularize their liberal faith at the expense of exactness of thought and quiet scholarly culture,—that perhaps it may lead imperceptibly and unconsciously to other evils inherent in the emotional and sensationally demonstrative forms of faith. So far as anything has yet occurred, we should say that such fears are at least very nearly groundless. We think there was apparent some tendency to extravagance of expression, some falling into the ad captandum populum style of argument beyond what clear thought would warrant, some little tendency also to use strength of lungs and voice in place of strength of reasoning; and these are temptations to be guarded against. But beyond these, and they were not very marked, we heard nothing that might not have been equally in place in a hall in Boston. The religious zeal was not so excessive as to interfere with excursions on the lake and among the neighboring mountains. On Friday and Saturday, two as glorious days as were ever made for lake or for mountain, we are glad to report that not so many of those who were there for the week attended the meetings as went off to get some grander or more beautiful view of nature. It would have been sad if they had wasted an opportunity which might never come again, while a religious meeting may be had anywhere. But we do not believe that Unitarians are in any immediate danger of running into the Methodistical kind of dissipation by which time and opportunity are wasted in excess of zeal for religious meetings.

As to the use of the instrumentality of the camp-meeting (or grove-meeting, as this, perhaps, may more properly be called) for the spread of liberal religious views, we see not why, with requisite precautions and regulations, it is not perfectly legitimate. Grove mass-meetings were held in the interest of the anti-slavery cause, with good effect: they have been held to advantage in the temperance cause; and why may they not also be put to use in behalf of religious reform? It may be added that those who have had most to do with the arrangement of these meetings each year at Lake Winnipiseogee claim that a new impetus has been given by them to the cause of liberal religion in the State,—which was certainly not a very promising field. It may be that the individual zeal and enterprise which inaugurated and successfully conducted the meetings is the primary impetus, and that, with this zeal and enterprise of a few individual ministers,—and there are only a few of them in the whole State,—the greater activity would have come, even without the meetings. However this may be, it is certain that there is a rather remarkable Unitarian revival in New Hampshire. Within two years, we were told, three new societies have been organized on apparently very stable foundations, as many more have certainly been saved from going to destruction, and one has come over bodily, with its minister, meeting-house, and all other appurtenances, from Orthodoxy; and these seven societies make more than twenty-five per cent. of the whole number of Unitarian societies in the State. There are other towns which are said to present nearly or quite as good an opportunity for liberal societies, which are only waiting for the right organizing moment.

All this work, of course, is within Unitarian limits,—and Unitarianism has its limits,—and therefore the movement may not be of a nature to interest all our readers. It was apparent at this grove-meeting, in spite of the hospitality to speakers not counted as Unitarian, that the speakers who would be reckoned as Unitarian had a common underlying creed as a boundary of fellowship. This creed, perhaps, could best be expressed thus: allegiance to Jesus as the natural moral and spiritual leader of the human race. And this is the one article of belief that may now be said, we think, to mark the boundary of the Unitarian denomination on the side toward free thought. By this they call themselves Christians, and claim their connection with the Christian Church. They will shake hands with those who are over this line, and to a certain extent work with them; but within this line is their denominational fellowship.

Digitized by Google

And this is the last vestige of authority for Jesus. It seems to us inevitable that it should be pushed aside by advancing knowledge. The Unitarians will not be able to keep it as a permanent bound. It is too frail a structure. But this is a point to which we may return. Meantime, and always, the denomination is one of great interest to us, both for what it has done for freedom and for the direction in which it is headed. It is now in camp. But before long it will have broken camp and be on the march again.

A NOTE FROM MR. UNDERWOOD.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The Index recently stated that D. M. Bennett had made a complete retraction of certain slanders he had published concerning me, but that the retraction seemed to have been secured by my entering into a sort of co-partnership for whitewashing the man who had slandered me. This, I think, is the substance of the paragraph. It calls for a correction.

The retraction of D. M. Bennett, through two of his intimate personal friends who examined his accusations, was accompanied by a statement extenuating his offence, and reflecting upon Mr. Savage, myself, and others in connection with the exposure and censure of him published some months ago. But the report (which I did not see till it appeared in the Truth-Seeker) neither claims nor implies that the statement referred to is indorsed or approved by me, as it certainly is not. Had it contained such a claim or implication, I should have repudiated it as soon as it came to my notice. The report, so far as it has given the impression that my vindication and Bennett's retraction were obtained by an acknowledgment or admission on my part that I had done him some injury by word or deed, or that I had joined him or his friends in condemning either myself or others with whom I have been associated, has given an impression that has no foundation in fact. I will only add that, before the report was published (probably before it had been written), I was assured it would contain a denial and retraction of the slanderous statements; and, with that assurance, I agreed to abide by it as a final disposition of these purely personal matters. Thus much I deem it due to myself and others to say; and, but for severe illness, it would have been said before.

Respectfully,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

THORNDIKE, MASS., Aug. 7, 1880.

A RELIGIOUS PANIC.

It is natural for people to think that their conceptions of things are the essential truths of existence, and hence to renounce them would be to give up its very foundations and suffer chaos to come again. It is thus that great transitions of intellectual and social life, and especially of religious faith, are always attended with signs of alarm. This is particularly noticeable at present. It is true the same alternatives are not resorted to now, to strengthen and confirm old beliefs, that were once in vogue, but like apprehensions show themselves to those witnessed all along the path of evolution in the conflict between conservatism and progress. We constantly hear expressions of solicitude for the safety of inherited convictions and concerning the dangers which threaten. Of course there is always some reason in this. There is always more or less danger in these changes,—in letting go the old, of yielding much that is of permanent value and important to the actual interest of society. The progressionists, or those who claim to be such, need to be often held back and subjugated, as well as the obstructionists to be overcome and the stationary advanced. In repudiating what is erroneous and the more intelligent and thoughtful have outgrown, there is moreover great risk to many of the loss, for a time at least, of all moral securities. It thus requires what approaches infinite wisdom and discrimination to so guide intellectual advancement that society shall preserve a sufficient equipoise and save the car of progress from rushing to destruction. Nevertheless, much of the clinging to long-cherished ideas and persuasions is a childish and unreasoning attachment, and the evils feared in consequence of their rejection are purely imaginary. This is the continual lesson of history. The old conceptions are slowly abandoned, sometimes apparently too slowly. The old ideals fade out, the old habits are lost. The intellectual environment becomes changed. The mind shifts its attitude and direction, acquires more expansive sympathies, new interests and aspirations. The Old World still maintains its poise in the system, and rolls onward into the light, bearing humanity forward to new and wider realms of truth and intelligence. The alarm that is manifest in our day, to which we have adverted, in respect to the perpetuity of prevalent religious ideas and existing institutions, and the consequences of discarding them, is variously indicated. It was exhibited by the former Pope of Rome in a direct opposition to all modern intellectual and scientific attainments. According to the view enunciated in his latest syllabus, the world was irresistibly nearing the verge of an awful catastrophe. The Spirit of Evil had got the reins in his hands, and was driving us all to universal ruin. The present Pope, while he evidently entertains the same fears, is wiser in his day and generation, and proposes tactics adroiter and better adapted to the conditions of the nineteenth century, to avert the calamity of a seeming compromise with progress,—the adoption of a pseudo-science, for the capture of science and intellectual tendencies, thus to render them subservient to the aggrandizement and claims of the ecclesiastical rule which he wields and represents. The same alarm and the same modes of preparing against the impending evil is visible in Protestantism, though less definitely. There are some in the Protestant Church who recognize and frankly acknowledge the radical antagonism which exists between modern knowledge and the creeds. There are others who seek to effect a compromise between them. They maintain that no such antagonism exists; that science, rightly understood and interpreted, but confirms the old doctrines of religious faith. Of these two classes or representatives of the different modern religious tendencies noticed, we do not hesitate to say that the former seems to us a more logical and honest position than the latter.

There is a necessary and direct hostility between science and religion, or the historic faiths that have passed for religion. But whether this is a just occasion for the dangers attributed to unbelief, or whether it justifies that paltering with the truth and easy-going mode of dealing with their contradictions, and pretensions of their harmonies when no harmonies exist, which to so considerable extent is common, admits of a strong doubt, to say the least. This reluctance to abandon old systems of faith and modes of thought, which advancing knowledge and intelligence steadily tend to consign among the obsolete things of the past, and fear of dreadful consequences that must inevitably ensue, distinguishes somewhat largely even the higher ranges of the intellectual life of our time. It appears among the devotees of science and philosophy in a timid spirit of accommodation and shrinking from legitimate conclusions, in dealing with the great questions which the enlightenment of the age forces upon us, and especially in their departments of thought and investigation. It betokens an absence of intellectual faith and courage. It is an effort to patch with new cloth old garments, which one of the world's great teachers long ago referred to as a poor expedient in such instances, and hence inevitably results in a combination of but rags and tatters. Such methods cannot serve more than temporary ends. They cannot prove permanently satisfactory. In fact, they lead simply to bewilderment and confusion.

There seems to be in the religious world signs that the alarm which we have endeavored to indicate as commonly associated with the parting with old beliefs, and that is peculiar to our time, has already reached that stage which may justly be regarded a panic. The old distinctions which once kept the sects apart, the old sincerities and force of conviction which so greatly stimulated their zeal and inspired their hope, and were at once the signal of their origin and aims, are becoming extinct. At the same time there never was more commotion in the Church than at present, more of what is termed activity; but it is easy to be seen that much of it is a make-believe enthusiasm, with little clearness of aim or purpose or promise of strengthening or perpetuating the distinguishing ideas that have moulded its history. There is, with this outward show of desperate energy and stir, an immense amount of that languor and complacency which an army exhibits when the battle has been decided against it. The words of the new policy of the sects are agreement and reconciliation. It is the era of unions and alliances, which simply means in the main non-committalism and neutrality, the pell-mell huddling and rushing together into fraternal embrace of hitherto divided parties, differing sympathies, and mental characteristics. Of course, so far as this proceeds from the growth of broader spirit of toleration, a more genial and kindly hospitality toward those who differ from others in their convictions, it is deserving of all praise and congratulation; but, so far as it results from a disposition to evade the intellectual issues of the time, from impotence and cowardice in the face of them, a selfish desire for the preservation of that which may not be worth preserving, it has little claim to respect.

One of the most notable signs of the present religious panic is the frequency and ease with which the clergy of different communions break their denominational fellowships and pass from one to the other. In England of late years there has been a strong setting of Protestantism toward Roman Catholicism. And in this country, not to mention increasing examples of such changes in the Evangelical sects, men who have grown gray in writing and preaching against the Trinity, and in endeavoring to show the fallacy of the doctrine of endless punishment, suddenly startle the public and their friends by gliding into the very sects toward which they have hitherto necessarily during their whole ministry maintained the attitude of opponents, consent to hold their peace in regard to things which they have been accustomed to teach and imply were of supreme importance, and thereby discredit the worth of their former labors.

Explain these manifestations as we may, give to them whatsoever interpretation, it is plain that they show the breaking-down of that discipline and regimen of the Church which has been so largely its characteristic, and the secret of its conquests and power.

They show that the demoralization is taking possession of it which comes of the sense of its departing glory,—the result of doubt, distrust, and fear; that its present condition is in no small degree of the nature of what may properly be regarded a panic.

Digitized by Google

But how groundless, in the ultimate issue of things, are all such fears and apprehensions as we have alluded to! What though all our systems and preconceptions crumble and dissolve! Is there not a stable, eternal order ever surviving, though all other divine revelations perish, and assuring us that the only safety and endurance are in facing and following the truth and the light? If the high ideals of character survive, the great primal moralities of life remain, we need not fear, though the thoughts and theories which have been longest cherished and most endeared to the heart of man, and interwoven with his experience, pass forever away,

"And, like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind."

D. H. C.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

We wonder how many generations must yet pass away before the popular mind will be able to understand that the records of the rocks are as reliable, to say the least, concerning the early history of the human race, as the literary records of a superstitious and semi-barbarous race, and that they furnish, indeed, far more of a "revelation." A new verse from this most ancient of records is translated by Mr. F. C. J. Spurrell, for the Archæological Institute at London. He gave an account, as reported by the Athenæum, of implements and chips from the floor of a palæolithic flint work-shop at Crayford, Kent, and showed, in the clearest manner, from the flint objects which he exhibited, that he had found a spot where a palæolithic man sat down on the then sandy foreshore, and fashioned his weapons. Having done his work, the man appears to have been disturbed,— either by an enemy, a storm, or beasts,— and never returned to claim his property. The evidences of his handicraft are skilfully brought together by Mr. Spurrell, who showed not only the manner of the man's proceeding, but also the tools he worked with, which were found on the same site. There is a text for a sermon well worth preaching in these records of a man whose weapons and implements are found to-day just where he left them, on the shore of an unknown sea, some hundreds of thousands of years ago.

That a scientific label or title is sometimes as little worthy of trust as the manufacturer's "prime butter" on a tub of oleomargarine, is absurdly shown by a recently published book, entitled The Wandering Naturalist, by J. A. Lawson. It is a record of Munchausen adventures in Northern India, most of the adventures being originated, in all probability, in the author's study. We make this supposition without any hesitation, because the same author, some years ago, attempted to palm off upon an adventure-loving public a fictitious narrative of travels in New Guinea. The kind of "bosh" which the author now hopes may be accepted as religion or science — we cannot tell which — may be understood by the following extract from a description of the ascent of Mt. Everest, the highest mountain in the world: "Our view of the snow-capped mountains and ranges was sublime; but a mass of dark-colored clouds hid the valley below from sight. About four o'clock in the afternoon, we observed that the sun, reflected on these clouds, lit them up with all the colors of the rainbow. The sight was marvellous, wonderful, grand! I am not exaggerating when I say that the effects of it on my mind were such as to inspire a gravity I had never experienced before. I was, at this time, a very young man, not gifted with much wisdom, and holding the doctrines of an atheist; but I came down from that mountain a firm believer in a Supreme Being, the majesty of whose wisdom was inexplicable and awful; and my conviction was permanent. No greater test, I think, can be given of the grandeur of the scene which met our view." We accept the author's assurance that he was "not gifted with much wisdom." The above extract certainly proves that he has not acquired much.

If Buckle were alive, he would find fresh proof of his theory that a superstitious theology has been the bane of Scotland, in the treatment accorded Professor Robertson Smith, a distinguished Scottish divine. He wrote for the Encyclopædia Britannica several critical articles on Old Testament subjects. For expressing, in these articles, views which some of the most conservative theologians of this country would regard as only mildly heretical, he called down upon himself a torrent of indignant abuse from his ecclesiastical brethren, and, after a long and bitter trial, barely escaped conviction for heresy. Unfortunately for Professor Smith, but fortunately for good literature, an article from his pen, on the "Hebrew Language and Literature" (which, by the way, rumor says he sought to suppress after his acquittal), was already in print, and has since been published in a new volume of the Encyclopædia, and contains, as of course it had to contain, a reiteration of some of his heresies; and at once the ecclesiastical hue and cry was again raised against him. His gentle heresies — as, for instance, a doubt whether Moses left in writing any other laws than "the Commandments on tables of stone," a belief that "the Pentateuch is the production of more than one writer," an assertion that "the story of the early fortunes of the nation presents characteristics which point to moral tradition as its original source," a reference to the historical books as "finally shaped after the fall of Jerusalem," etc. — show simply that he accepts, as every instructed person must accept, some of the necessary results of modern investigation, or scientific criticism, regarding the history of the Old Testament. The Edinburgh Presbytery has just voted, forty-two to nineteen, to prosecute Professor Smith, the motion being made by an ignorant nobleman, Sir Henry Moncrief, who naively stated that he had not read the articles complained of. Another of Professor Smith's accusers — Dr. Begg — believes that this new publication is "a marvellous providence" to allow the church to reconsider the question which it had before decided wrongly. These Scotch heresy-hunters bring to mind the often-repeated story of the man who, during our civil war, was determined that his church should not elect an abolitionist for pastor, but gave up at last, having learned, he said, that he must put up with either a —— abolitionist or a —— fool; and of the two he preferred the former. These Scotchmen seem to prefer the latter. But, after all, we must admire their consistency.

Mr. Rice, in the August North American Review, supplements the letter which he wrote from Europe, concerning the Lorillard expedition to Central America, by an article on the same subject, giving many details of what is known regarding Central American antiquities, and mentioning many curious theories of the origin of the native American races. Most of these theories show the effect of the Biblical hypothesis of the creation in misleading early investigators. Very many attempts have been made to prove, for instance, that the Indians — that is, all the native races — are descendants of the lost tribes of Israel,— the same theory which, in our day, is at the bottom of the Mormon gospel. If they were not degenerate children of Israel, they must at least be descended from the Biblical pair, Adam and Eve; and, consequently, attempts have been made to show that the line of descent ran through the Chinese or Japanese, or the Cymric or Gallic Celts, or the Basques, or the Hellenes or Pelasgians. Indeed, there is scarcely an existing people with whom some affinities have not been discovered. The Abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg found philological resemblances between the Maya and Quiche tongues, on the one hand, and Greek, Latin, French, German, and English, on the other. Dr. Paul Felix, in a commentary on the first report of the ruins of Palenque, sent to the king of Spain in 1786, maintained that the Indians were derived from the Egyptians. Others, with ingenious reasonings, have derived them from Noah, or from Noah's sons, or from the builders of the Tower of Babel, who were dispersed after the confusion of tongues. A theory which has had recent defenders derives them, or some of them, from the Welsh. The Rev. Morgan Jones, who was captured by the Tuscaroras in 1740, and condemned to death, indulged in a soliloquy in his native Welsh tongue, and, being overheard by the Indians, was understood by them, and consequently set free; and he afterwards preached to them in Welsh. The route of the exploring party will lie through Oaxaca, Tehuantepec, and Guatemala, terminating in Yucatan, in which last are probably the most ancient ruins to be found in America.

R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Cold Water vs. Whiskey.— From an exchange we clip the following item of New York news, as a hint to the benevolent in other places:—

A good notion of New York philanthropists is the establishment of free ice-water fountains in convenient places for the working-people of the city. These fountains, it should be said, do not give that liquid abomination usually known as ice-water, in which the water is brought almost to the freezing point by direct contact with the ice. They are constructed on a better principle. The water passes through a coil of pipe inside a box in which the ice is placed. Thus it is cooled to a refreshing degree, while it has none of the deathly iciness characteristic of the ordinary variety of ice-water. The experiment has many good results. Not the least of these is the damage it does to business at the rum-shops. Liquor-dealers in the immediate vicinity of these fountains complain that their business is affected to a degree which is very unpleasant for them. This shows that many drink whiskey merely because they can get it easier than they can cold water.

Boston is going to do likewise, according to a recent newspaper report of a Board-of-Aldermen meeting: —

A meeting of the Board of Aldermen was held yesterday afternoon, Chairman O'Brien presiding. A communication was received from the mayor, enclosing a communication from the secretary of the Boston Memorial Association, with a letter from a member of that association, who does not wish his name known, offering to give to the city two or more cold-water fountains, if the city will place them in position, keep them in order, and supply them with water and ice. The gentleman suggests that fountains be placed on Washington Street, at the corners of Hanover, State, Milk (or Summer and Boylston) Streets, and also on Tremont Street, at the corner of Pemberton Square and School Street. They will be of iron or marble. The communication was referred to the Committee on Water.

The "special providence" that is interposing to save Memphis from another visitation of the yellow fever is thus described:—

Under Colonel Waring's system of drainage, twenty miles of sewer-pipe and thirty miles of drain-tiles have been laid at Memphis since March, at a cost of $150,000. No rain-water is admitted to the sewer-pipes. A company has been incorporated at New Orleans with a capital of $1,500,000 to try the system there. Colonel Waring's plan there is to discharge the flow into two wells in the lowest part of the city, from which the contents are to be pumped into the Mississippi River. In London, England, the sanitary reformers have established a permanent exhibition, so that all the appliances for healthful drainage may be seen by the people.

Digitized by Google

THE London Spectator finds both good and evil in the effect of club life in England:—

There is no doubt that the standard of comfort and luxury in England has been considerably raised during even the last quarter of a century, and there is no doubt that our club life has had much to do with this. Two shillings a day, which is said to be the average expenditure on alcoholic drinks of those members who use the coffee-room of the London clubs, speaks of a moderation in drinking which would have astonished our grandfathers, and even our fathers. In fact, Englishmen have a tendency to make a home of their clubs, and, paradoxical as it may sound, the home influences of the club are considerable. On the other hand, club life has a tendency to make men, and especially young men, intellectually subservient to what is called "society," over-particular and exigeant at home, to prefer club luxuries to family comfort, and to develop into selfish and fastidious old bachelors, instead of becoming self-denying fathers of families. But, after all, Pall Mall is not Utopia, and no institution in this world is perfect.

THE Peabody London Homes now number 2355 separate dwellings. The trustees have just bought nine acres of land in Glasshouse Street, and to cover this with buildings they have obtained a loan of $1,500,000 from the fund; and the whole is to be repaid in fifteen years. This will probably provide homes for 10,000 persons. The weekly earnings of the father of each family in the Peabody buildings last year was about six dollars, and the average rent of each dwelling about one dollar.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MILWAUKEE, July, 1880.

Before entering formally upon the pleasant duty of recording events and movements taking place in the North-west, allied to the movement which the Free Religious Association represents, I trust I shall be pardoned a word concerning the "parting of the ways," which has given the Index into a new keeping, to be conducted by new leaders.

The announcement of the contemplated change, when it first came to my knowledge, gave me, I must frankly confess it, a shock. The Index had been a constant visitor to my home from its first published number. It was ever an inspiration to the loyal utterance of truth as I found it. To its columns, I could always turn, when thought desired the free expression denied it elsewhere.

Would this condition obtain under the new administration? This was my anxious mental query. I must as frankly confess that, if I entertained fears with regard to this, they have been vanquished by the attitude which the Free Religious Index has already assumed. I have confidence that the conduct of this much-prized journal will be broad and healthy; that its leaders, though changed in name and methods, will still pilot us through clean ways up toward "Liberty and Light," to which has now been added "Right."

If we, who have tried to sustain Mr. Abbot and support the Index, believe, as I think we must do, that he has inspired us through these long years of his self-sacrificing and loving labor with something of his own brave spirit, we shall be false to that inspiration, if we allow any personal feeling or narrow prejudice to stand between us and the cause we have loved in common with our beloved leader, Mr. Abbot. If we wish to prove our devotion to him, our friend, we must love the cause even better than we do him. We must extend to his successors the hearty right hand of fellowship, trusting in good faith that they will keep the dear old Index up to the noble standard of breadth of thought, loyalty to conviction, and fearlessness of expression, which has been its glory under Mr. Abbot's strong, stanch, intrepid guidance. We must with our best endeavors, in all directions, substantially assist the Free Religious Association to carry out its proposed plans for the liberation of mankind from dogmatism and ecclesiasticism and the promotion of the welfare of humanity, which will be the aim of its activities.

The circular containing the programme of the twenty-sixth annual session of the Western Unitarian Association, held in Milwaukee June 15–17, was prefaced with the words "Basis of Fellowship," followed by this resolution:—

"WHEREAS, we feel the great need of rallying the liberal minds of the West around one common centre, therefore,—

"Resolved, That the Western Unitarian Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all thereto who desire to work with it in advancing the kingdom of God."

This resolution partakes of the flavor of Western liberalism. Western Unitarianism aims honestly to "promote religion without binding people with the special religious creeds of the past." Its representative men and women are actuated by pure impulses, and possess great intellectual ability. They earnestly desire, as set forth in the resolution, to see the "liberal minds of the West rallying around one common centre." Liberal minds outside of the Unitarian societies do not, however, rally in response to the liberal invitation. The "centre" does not stand to them where it does to the Unitarian. It is most generous of them to invite the outside liberal element into the fold, but the element still remains aloof. The fold needs the accession. The liberal element needs a fold, but cannot rally, be the shepherds never so urgent, never so cordial. This is true, and "pity 'tis, 'tis true."

Why cannot they meet around a common centre? The answer is plain to any one who is watching with painful interest the scattered forces, especially in the West, that, combined, would be a grand movement toward the emancipation of mankind from creeds and superstition, and its elevation to freethought and ethical superiority.

Take, for example, Milwaukee, with whose status I am most familiar in relation to religious and non-religious activities. The liberal element of this city is large. It contains some of the representative men and women, people of standing, of culture, of integrity. Some of these are what we are pleased to call old-time infidels, who have stood for rationalism for forty or fifty years. Some of them are the newer school of liberals, educated in orthodoxy, but illumined by the light of modern thought and the teachings of natural science. Some have been Unitarians, and departed from that body because they cannot consistently linger where the forms and ceremonies are conserved which they have come to consider as useless,—at least useless to themselves. This class get intellectual food occasionally from the able ministers who fill from time to time the Unitarian pulpit, but they have lost interest in the methods of the society, in the forms of its service, and so cast not their lot with it. Then there is the indifferent class, which possibly would not rally around anything that meant restraint or effort; which will enjoy Col. Ingersoll, but will not move a finger to sustain such a lecturer as B. F. Underwood or C. D. B. Mills, yet they call themselves liberal. Then the spiritualistic people count themselves on that side also, and a few—of not so reputable name. These, all told, would outnumber the most prosperous church organization in Milwaukee. This, no doubt, is the condition in all cities and the larger towns. The unchurched are more numerous everywhere than the churched. The church laments it, and makes strenuous efforts to call in the wanderers. But they do not return, nor turn that way. The church is liberalizing itself, but the effect seems only to educate its members to drop out, and not to induce any to drop in.

On the other hand, the liberal element laments the total lack of organization. If they had but a "common centre!" Then there would be little need of extra exertions to rally people around it. Now what is to be done? The question stares us in the face. What shall constitute this common centre?

It seems to me that Felix Adler has proved practically what this centre shall be. "The cause of humanity is our cause, and we as individuals and we as a society have signed our own death-warrant the moment that we desert that cause," he says. And the key-note to the success of the Free Religious Association will be struck in a clause of the prospectus of both the old and new Index, which reads, "The welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities."

We liberals can never rally around any other common centre, but purely philanthropic work, ethical culture, and the pursuit of the study of social science. We are now looking toward the Free Religious Association for some aid, of some sort, in the organization of our forces. We in Milwaukee would be a strong support to its movement, if once a beginning could be made. We want such a simple organization as would leave the individual untrammelled in opinion, but bound by association to promote the cause of humanity. The Society of Ethical Culture presents the ideal. We cannot hope to equal that in successful organized work. We may make a beginning however, and we must make it.

It is useless for us to try to affiliate with Unitarians, howsoever liberally they may invite, while they retain eves so "attenuated a supernaturalism," as Prof. Adler styles it. It is a drag we cannot endure. When such vital interests abide in our midst, we can waste no time in prayer and ceremonial. When forms of evil are all about us, sapping the life, the beauty of humanity, we need to be up and doing, "as if not a day were to be lost, at once to change this earth into the fair abiding-place it should be: only then will the waste places of the earth become a garden." Yes, indeed, Mr. Adler is right, and also in saying still further, "If we feel that we have a message of glad tidings to bring to the world, which means change from misery to happiness, change from shame to honor, from vice to virtue, then the spirit of propaganda that animated the early Christian Church will begin to animate the members of liberal societies."

Rev. G. E. Gordon, the present pastor of the Unitarian Society of Milwaukee, is a pioneer of the people in social reform and philanthropic endeavor. He is gifted and public-spirited. He has the executive ability possessed by few men in the world, and a strength of determination in his efforts that overcomes discouragements. He is an organizer and a worker. I shall in my next letter give a sketch of a plan proposed by him for work of Associated Charities. He is widely known in the phases of prison reform and charity problems.

It may be a partial view which I take of the matter; but I cannot help believing that, if this philanthropic and reformatory effort were the pivot of his society, the common cause of the Unitarian Church of this city, it would become the "centre" around which Liberals and Unitarians could together rally.

If the necessity of retaining the religious sentiment in organizations is urged, then let the blossom of it be works, not words. Effort is better than ecstasy. To teach the poor and suffering the laws of life, of sanitation, of domestic economy that does not mean pinching and poor victuals, of the simple ethics that can make family life and social life sweeter and purer,—such teaching is better than sermons and service,—better, infinitely better, than even to pray for the poor or to provide for their immediate needs. This, as I understand it, has been the work of the Ethical Society in New York, with results which are now bringing praise all over the land. With such work for a centre, there will be a swift rallying of the now scattered forces. Organization is the need of the hour. It is the demand of every sincere freethinker. I every hour feel the lack of a place to work in, a people to work with; and others are sensible of the same want.

B.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

FATE OF REPUBLICS. Boston: Estes & Lauriat. 1880.

This book has an excellent subject, and the discussion is especially timely. The treatment does not lack at all in vigor. The author, whose name is not given, but who speaks of himself as "an officer in the federal volunteer army during the Rebellion," appears to be sufficiently well acquainted with the history of his theme, so far as history means facts. He shows, too, a considerable range of cognate reading. Yet we cannot say that the treatment seems to us very successful. It is too intense to be philosophical, too narrow to be always faithful to the whole truth. The writer evidently wrote because he must. He felt that he had a moral mission in his work, an alarm-bell to ring in the ears of his fellow-countrymen. He is a religio-political prophet; a prophet of the Cassandra type. But his point of view is so narrowly sectarian his treatment so partisan, that we fear his warnings, even when needed, will not be listened to as they would, if he could have proclaimed them from a broader platform. The book, however, is well worth reading. It says what many thoughtful people are beginning to think.

Digitized by Google

The plan of the book is to give a survey of all the republics that have ever existed in ancient or modern times; as those of ancient times have fallen, to show why they fell; and then, in describing the administration and condition of existing republics, to point out the dominant tendencies that may bring upon them or save them from a like fate. The republic of the United States is the last considered. The author discusses the perils, political, social, and religious, which beset it, in a way to indicate that he has very little faith in their being averted. He seems, in fact, to be a thorough pessimist with regard to the future of our own country. Switzerland and the little republics of Andorra and San Marino may stand; but, for the United States, he has scarcely a hope that the government will continue republican. He sees here the same ripening of tendencies which have sealed the doom of all the old-time republics. To be sure, he prescribes a remedy. Yet he avers very positively that there is but one way of safety; and with nearly as much positiveness he affirms that the people will not adopt this way.

And at this point the sectarian bias, as well as weakness of the book, becomes evident. "The only thing," he says, "that can save the United States from the fatality of historic republics is Biblical Christianity among the masses of the people." He would have Evangelical Protestantism the controlling power in the State, fighting with about equal zeal Roman Catholicism on the one hand, and Freethought on the other. In short, his prescription for saving the republic, could it be adopted, would be, in fact, its doom; for it would be the establishment of a religious oligarchy. If these different types of religious thinking cannot be united under one free and impartial system of government, on equal civic terms, then is our republic already a failure.

THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE By Alfred Henry Huth. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Mr. Buckle's biographer is one of the two boys who figure pleasantly in the account of his Eastern travels. The death of the other is tenderly recorded in the preface, with a regret that he did not live to revise the pages which were almost ready for the press at the time of his premature death. At the time of his companionship with Mr. Buckle, the writer was too young to have any very deep appreciation of his intellectual force and training; but the outcome of that companionship was, on the part of the boy, a great reverence and affection, which has since made him an earnest student of Mr. Buckle's life and writings, and now a sturdy vindicator of his fame. He does not evince any special aptitude for the task he has undertaken. This biography will never take its place among the best biographies that have been written. It is not even second-rate. It is clumsily and loosely put together. Its estimate of Buckle is not severely critical, and is by no means final. It is an estimate colored throughout by the loyalty of friendship and the glow of personal admiration. Mr. Buckle's fame and influence are much exaggerated. The future that awaits his reputation is certain to be much less brilliant than is here imagined. But, as the fullest biography of Buckle that we have yet had, the book is exceedingly welcome. It contains a large amount of interesting information in regard to the habits of Buckle's life, the methods of his work, his personal qualities. Those who have known him heretofore only through his History of Civilization will like him better after reading this volume, even if they do not or cannot admire him more.

The impression which is given here is of a life isolated and solitary to a lamentable degree; too little mixed in general society or with the ablest contemporary thinkers for that attrition which is so wholesome, and so necessary to enable a man to take a correct measure of his powers. If he had any extensive correspondence with the leading spirits of his time, or considerable intercourse with them, neither the one thing nor the other leaves any trace worth mentioning. The man's self-consciousness was dreadfully diseased. He was much given to speculating on his fame, to rating himself. He allowed Mill to be a greater man than himself, but with this exception considered himself the greatest of his generation. And he was great in his industry, in his grasp of facts, in his insight into political and social laws, in his power of vivid presentation. He knew the value of style,—that, as Bancroft says, whose own style is lumbering enough, it is "the gossamer on which thought floats round the world." Buckle worked hard to perfect his style, and his success repaid his efforts. But it is impossible to read this life of the man and not feel that there was something little in his greatness. His appetite for reading was immense. It required three books a day for its satisfaction. On a month's journey of pleasure, he took with him a considerable library. He dreaded the influence of natural scenery upon his mind, and endeavored to fortify himself against it. But he was childishly vain of his much reading. His acquirements did not sit easily upon him. He was not to the manner born. And all along there was a feverish restlessness about him that marred his intellectual dignity, and was sadly ominous of a too speedy ending of his remarkable career.

In his personal relations, the one thing that stands out conspicuously beautiful is his relation to his mother. The relation of parent and child resolved itself into a friendship as tender and noble as any that the history of friendship boasts. She lived to see his first volume published. Its dedication to her was a surprise that was almost too much for her failing strength. Buckle missed her everywhere, and his own health declined more rapidly from the day of her death. He was never married. He would have been, to a cousin who was very dear to him, but for the conventional prejudice against the marriage of cousins,—a prejudice denounced by his biographer, who has made a special study of this subject, as irrational and superstitious.

The verdict of the reading public is much less favorable to Buckle's permanent value than the verdict of his biographer. May not the true and final judgment lie somewhere between the two? It probably will. The introduction to Buckle's History resembles the introduction to Lecky's European Morals, in being the weakest part of the book. There is exaggeration or misstatement of the laws of physical influence upon social development; there is worse misstatement of the relative value of the moral and the intellectual elements in civilization; there is an insistence upon circumstances as everything and upon heredity as nothing, that is strangely out of keeping with the scientific tendencies of the present time. His biographer comes to his rescue on these points, but makes a lame defence. If the value of Buckle's writings was inextricably involved in the considerations which he regards as fundamental, his "fragment of a fragment" would have little claim upon the present generation. But the value of hundreds of his pages is quite independent of his introductory considerations. So that not only can we praise his book for having been exceedingly suggestive and inspiring in its day; we can praise it for being still a treasury of valuable and impressive thought. Who has written more justly of the "proximate causes of the French Revolution"? Who more effectively of the curses that the ecclesiastical and theological spirit have entailed upon mankind? But his best service has been as a critic of the protective spirit, in its broadest sense. And as this spirit—the spirit of the governmental interference—finds many apologists and advocates to-day, where in Buckle's time it found but few, his magnificent indictment of it for the ruin of States and individual character is more pertinent to-day than it was when it was written. We cannot return to him too often when this spirit is his theme.

Mention must not be omitted of the appendix, in which Mr. Stuart Glennie's Pilgrim Memories of Mr. Buckle are characterized in terms of vigorous but well-merited reproach. Those especially who have been fooled by Mr. Glennie's book should pay particular attention to Mr. Huth's effective showing of its careless and immoral work.

MR. L. W. MASON, formerly the supervisor of music in the Boston schools, who went to Japan for the purpose of introducing the study of music in that empire, reports that he has met with much encouragement. Liberal means have been provided, a special department for normal schools has been created, and he looks for the establishment of a national conservatory at a not distant day.

FOREIGN.

THE great annual fair at Nijni Novgorod, Russia, has been opened.

THE ex-Khedive has purchased for 150,000f. the Villa Maiano at Florence, and will take possession of it in November.

FRENCH Jesuits have requested the permission of Spain to establish a colony in the Island of Fernando Po. The request is receiving the consideration of the government.

TWENTY-ONE individuals will be tried on the 26th inst. before the Military District Court of Kieff on a charge of forming an illegal society with the object of overthrowing the existing order of the State.

THE Canton of Schweitz, in Switzerland, has reëstablished capital punishment, and has enacted that executions be public. This makes the fourth canton which has restored the punishment of death.

IT is never too late to marry as well as to mend. A Paris telegram on Saturday announced that on the previous day the Mayor of Cannes married M. Bruery, a Catholic priest, aged ninety-three, converted two years ago to Protestantism, to Mlle. Vernet, a Protestant, thirty-three years of age.

ATHEISTS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Mr. Bradlaugh has given notice that, on the motion of Sir J. Eardley Wilmot against the admission of atheists to the House, he would move, "That this House will not directly or indirectly sanction the opinion that any particular faith in matters of religion is necessary to the proper discharge of duties properly political."

AT Cardiff, Wales, the Non-conformists invited the clergy of the Established Church to join with them in a demonstration in celebration of the centenary of Sunday-schools. They declined, whereupon the Rev. A. S. Russell addressed them a letter, as follows: "Although I am the junior incumbent of the town, I venture to ask you, my older brethren, to consider whether we have acted in a brotherly and Christian-like spirit in refusing to join in a united demonstration."

BELGIUM.—The anniversary of Belgian independence was celebrated at Brussels and in other parts of the country on the 18th ult. with great rejoicings. The monument erected at Laeken in memory of King Leopold I. was unveiled on Wednesday at three o'clock. All the members of the royal family, the Austrian Crown Prince Rudolph, the entire diplomatic body, and the Belgian high officers of State were present at the ceremony. The royal family were enthusiastically cheered by the immense concourse.

WHETHER free trade or protection is the soundest national policy is differently regarded by the most eminent and competent authorities. There can be, however, little doubt that the free-trade principle is gaining ground in England. Certainly not, if we may judge by the sanguine and jubilant spirit manifest at the Cobden dinner some two or three weeks since. This club, as is well known, is devoted to the distinguishing doctrine of the great reformer whose name it bears. Its motto is "Trade, Peace, Good-will among Nations." Of the fourteen present Cabinet ministers, it counts twelve among its members, beside many converts in the ranks of the opposition. In the late general election, it is affirmed, no politician was bold enough to proclaim himself a protectionist. Having accomplished some important results in the reduction of special taxation, it is now engaged in efforts to procure a renewal on better terms of the commercial treaty with France. But its chief attention for some time to come is likely to be concentrated upon the land question, or free trade in land as it is termed. At the recent dinner, Mr. Baxter, one of its members, threatened that Her Majesty's ministers would not be invited to the next annual gathering of the club, if the land question is not then settled. Mr. Baxter declares that he wants "no pottering, tinkering, half-hearted compromise; nothing in the shape of Lord Cairn's Land Bill, but such a scheme as would effectually emancipate the land of England, in the same manner as it has been in other countries." The Cobden Club does not confine its sphere or aims to England, but hopes to diffuse its influence through other countries, and bring the whole world eventually to an acceptance of its doctrine. Among those who were present at the banquet this year were the French ambassador and M. De Lesseps, both in cordial sympathy with its aims.

Digitized by Google

It is to the New World especially that the club is looking for the growth of its ideas. The Chairman, Lord Spencer, maintained that there was no good reason why free trade should not be adopted everywhere, and in the United States more than everywhere else.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

PROF. WM. DENTON has recently been lecturing in Minnesota.

IT costs the Queen of England $40,000 a year to ride between England and Scotland.

THERE are now three Hebrews in Congress,—Messrs. Jonas, Morse, and Einstein.

JUDGE TOURGEE, the author of A Fool's Errand, has received a LL.D. from the University of Rochester.

IT is reported that W. H. H. Murray is doing a large commission business in Liverpool, and expects to come back to this country to straighten out things.

THE female students at Swiss universities have this year carried off nearly all the honors, not only in philosophy, but chemistry and medicine as well.

THE original wagon in which John Brown emigrated from Pennsylvania to Kansas has been purchased by a Mr. Grasheiler, of Lawrence, Kansas, and will be presented to the State Historical Society.

REV. GEO. W. COOKE, late of Indianapolis, Ind., who has earned an excellent reputation as a radical preacher in the West, is spending the summer at Concord, where he regularly attends the School of Philosophy.

THEODORE MOMMSEN, the distinguished German professor and antiquarian, lost forty thousand rare volumes by the burning of his villa at Charlottenburg, a suburb of Berlin, recently. Professor Mommsen was himself severely injured.

GREENE SMITH, the only son of the late Gerrit Smith, died on the 25th ult., at the family home, Peterboro, N.Y. He had an ardent fondness for ornithology, and his collection in this department of natural history is said to be very extensive and valuable.

THE will of the late James Lick, of California, has at last been settled. The compromise gives the son, John Lick, just $285,000 more than his father intended, and diminishes to that extent, if it does not wholly nullify in some instances, the bequests contemplated when the document was written.

WE clip this: "The audacious New York Evening Post talks irreverently of the Concord School of Philosophy, and predicts that the things it leaves in a muddle will all be cleared up when Joseph Cook again resumes his Monday lectures." There must be a prodigious development of the organ of hope, as the phrenologists say, on the Evening Post cranium.

SUPERINTENDENT HARRIS, of St. Louis, at the recent meeting of the New England Superintendents, said that the high schools had faults in two directions: he did not believe that geology and botany should supplement Latin and Greek, or vice versa; and he thought "there should be a spirituality introduced into the schools." There is reason to fear that this might be a little like furnishing capacities to order.

THE Methodist ministers of Boston, it is said, have formally requested the city authorities to cease giving free concerts on Sunday in the public parks, on the ground that such music is "promotive of Sabbath desecration and injurious to public morals." Perhaps this helps to answer the question which the Rev. W. C. Steele, a Methodist minister of Danbury, lately made the subject of a discourse: "Is Methodism a Failure?"

JESTINGS.

CONDUCTOR (declining a tract which was offered to him with his fare): "Very much obliged, mum, but we ain't allowed to take any perquisites whatever, mum."

WE learn that Edison is inventing a lemonade without either sugar or lemons, for the convenience of circuses and Sunday-school picnics. That man never drank either, or he would know that those two ingredients are never in them.

AN old lady visiting the Antiquarian Museum in Edinburgh, the other day, on inspecting the old weapons very earnestly, and failing to find what she was apparently looking for, asked a visitor if he could tell her whereabouts they kept the Axe of the Apostles.

AT a recent Sunday-school session the superintendent was talking about idols, when, to ascertain whether the children were understanding what he was saying, he asked, "Children, what was an idol?" "Being lazy," was the loud and quick response of one of the juvenile class.

A CLERGYMAN asked his Sunday-school, "With what remarkable weapon did Samson at one time slay a number of Philistines?" For a while there was no answer, and the clergyman, to assist the children a little, commenced tapping his jaw with the tip of his finger, at the same time saying, "What's this?" Quick as thought, a little fellow innocently replied, "The jaw-bone of an ass, sir."

THE Harvard Advocate gives this as a specimen of the conversation of Fitz Abbatross van Ambrossial, an "unmatriculated student in Harvard College for one year": "Miss Tank said, as I bowed, 'Are you a materialist, or an idealist?' 'Yes, rather,' I replied. 'I'm so glad,' she rejoined. 'Aw, too much pleasure, I assure you,' I continued. 'Don't you think Daisy Miller is too overdrawn to be the typical representation of the best æsthetic production of Boston culture, or do you prefer the ideas of Joseph Cook?' she ventured further. 'Yes, James is quite too awfully clever, yes, indeed,' I added. 'Do you attend the Summer School of Philosophy at Concord?' she murmured confidingly. 'No, not to-day, no,' I stuttered, getting a little flurried. 'Oh, I see you are one of those interesting atheists,' she continued. 'Yes, I will get you some,' I uttered, as I slid away."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

IN Italy, assassins—who can be hired to commit any murder for a sufficient sum of money—will not strike their victims with a dagger whose handle makes the form of a cross.

ACCORDING to the legends of the Catholic Church, the Virgin Mary was born on Saturday. A celebrated bandit, who had long been the terror of travellers in Italy, defied all the efforts of the police to arrest him. At last they were informed that he had made a vow to the Virgin to shed no blood on her birthday, and not even to arm himself. Accordingly, they attacked him on Saturday, and he surrendered without resistance.

LOUIS XIV. made very liberal contributions to the treasury of the Church, and was a scrupulous observer of all its forms. When he met with some reverses of fortune, in his latter days, he exclaimed: "Dieu donc a oublié tout ce que j'ai fait pour lui (God has then forgotten all I have done for him).

THE celebrated Anselm, who A.D. 1093 was Archbishop of Canterbury, wrote a book, in which he maintained that the work of Christ was to pay a debt man owed to God; and that this debt was paid by Christ's perfect obedience, even unto death. Not long after Anselm's time, such language as the following was frequently used in theological discussions concerning the atonement: "God was actually injured by the sins of men; he was angered and enraged, in the strict sense. It was necessary that he should be propitiated, and that his robbed honor should be restored. He could not be moved to compassion till he saw blood flow."

JOHN BUNYAN, the author of The Pilgrim's Progress, was born in 1628. He was wild and dissipated in his youth, but during the civil war in England he fought on the Puritan side, and became deeply imbued with their doctrines. He suffered terribly under a severe conviction of sin, and uncertainty concerning his salvation. One night, especially, he was in such an agony of despair that he could get no rest, but spent hours praying earnestly that he might obtain a hope. At last the thought came to him that if he opened the Bible the first verse his eye rested on would be a message from on high. He obeyed the impulse; and he says the verse he read conveyed such an inexpressible consolation and inward peace that it seemed as if an angel had spoken. When he woke in the morning, he was eager to read the passage again. "But, oh," says he, "what was my horror to find it was in the Apocrypha!"

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. CLARK is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.
II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.
III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.
IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.
V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)
VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

Council Duplex Steam Pump

K & PIPER,

COUN[illegible]ORS AT LAW,

48 Co[illegible]t., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER.

TO BOOK BUYERS.

BOOKS SENT BY MAIL AT

PUBLISHERS' PRICES!

No Extra Charge for Postage.

Any obtainable book that may be desired will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash. Orders are respectfully solicited from all friends of the Index. Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 556.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 8.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, AUGUST 19, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE ONE, better than intellect, from whom all things flow, and to whom they all ultimately tend, is The Good. He is the Original Life and Force of all things, in the ethereal regions, upon the earth, and under the earth. He is the Being, the Unity, the God. He is preëminently the same in the invisible world that the sun is in this visible world. He is truth; and light is the reflection of his truth.—Plato.

THERE are many inferior deities, but only One Mover. This is the genuine doctrine of the ancients, which has happily escaped the wreck of truth and the rock of vulgar errors and poetic fables.—Aristotle.

SINCE nothing exists better than reason, and reason is the common property of God and man, there exists a certain primeval, rational communion between the divine nature and the human.—Cicero.

IN God are the beginning, the end, the measure, and the destiny of everything. He is by nature the Father of men; and the best men he calls his sons.—Plutarch.

WHATEVER the soul longs for, whatever the hands attain to, whatever the reason reflects upon, these, O Lord, are thy forms. I am pervaded by thee. Thou containest me. Thou art scriptures and laws, planets and suns, the formed and the formless. Those who possess knowledge and whose minds are pure see the whole world as the form of thy wisdom.—Hindu (tenth century).

OF the divine poem, the first word is Reason, and the last is Man; and whoso shall trace the words from the first to the last shall find them an unbroken series,—the varied names of divine Love. . . . In mines gleam the gems, and the earth hath its green vestures; but deep within me shall the highest harmony be found singing praises, with the revolving spheres, to the Fairest and the Best.—Persian (fifteenth century).

AS FLAME ascends;
As vapors to the earth in showers return;
As the poised ocean toward the attracting morn
Swells; and the ever-listening planets, charmed
By the sun's call, their onward pace incline:
So all things which have life aspire to God,
Centre of souls! Nor doth the mastering voice
Of Nature cease within to prompt aright
Their steps; nor is the care of heaven withheld
From sending to the toil external aid;
That, in their stations, all may persevere
To climb the ascent of being, and approach
Forever nearer to the life divine.—Akenside.

NOT only to Hebrew Moses, but to all humankind, God speaks in every burning bush; and the rising of nature's song wakes new morning in the soul of man. This perpetual renewal of vegetation, this annual wonder of blossoming,—what a religious revelation it offers to us! How it fills us with admiration, trust, and love! Every flowering bush burns with God, and is not consumed. With neither trick nor miracle, he changes water into wine, on all the vine-clad hills of Italy, France, and Spain, and fills not five thousand men, but five thousand times two hundred thousand, —a thousand million men,—every day; and on the broken bread of this meal supports the multitudinous armies of beast, bird, fish, insect, reptile. . . . Compared to this wonder of law, the miracles of the Old Testament or New are no fact, but poor poetry. They are like ghosts among a market-full of busy men and women.—Theodore Parker.

CURRENT TOPICS.

AND now the commentators can rationalize another of the miracles of the New Testament.

MR. ALCOTT said in the "Concord School," the other day, that it was "not only a school of Philosophy, but a school of Theosophy as well."

THE grand jury of New York, in the "Seawanhaka" disaster, have brought indictments for manslaughter against the government inspectors and the owners and chief officers of the steamer, to whose "criminal negligence" they trace the catastrophe. This has a wholesome sound. We hope the indictment is not so sweeping that it will end in sound. We comment on it again elsewhere.

THE publisher of the North American Review announces that the September number will contain an article on the ruins of Central America, by M. Charnay, the leader of the expedition now exploring Central America under the auspices of the American and French Governments; also a paper on the trial of Mrs. Surratt, containing many new facts, written by the only surviving member of her counsel.

THE Nation, commenting upon Tanner's fast, says: "In the religious world, opinions seem to be divided about it. One paper objected to the fast as throwing a slight on one of the New Testament miracles; but others, the Rev. C. S. Williams, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for instance, rejoice in the victory of Tanner's will over his stomach, as showing the superiority of the immaterial over the material, the power of cold water, the folly and ignorance of the doctors, and as rebuking the spirit of gluttony."

IT is officially announced that the National Liberal League will hold its annual Convention in Chicago, Sept. 17, 18, and 19. The chairman of the Executive Committee states that "the most important work of the Convention will be the selection of a presidential ticket, or the indorsement of one of the present nominations." We submit, in view of the record which the League made for itself at its last two Conventions, that a still more important work, this year, will be to show that the League is worthy of the moral confidence of the American people.

THE summer "fashionables" at Newport are at their "fox-hunting" again,—a sport as mean and despicable, since a fox has first to be caged and then let loose for the express purpose of being hunted down again, as anything we can conceive possible for men and women of average intelligence, to say nothing of humanity, to engage in. Whether they know it or not, these people are proving themselves to be only second-class fashionables,—cheap imitators of some of the surviving barbarism of English sports. If they would only go down to the wharves of Newport and hunt rats, they might exercise their "love of the chase" to some good purpose and be a real benefit to humanity.

ONE of the closing lectures before the Concord "School of Philosophy" was on Ghosts; and some of the wicked people are saying that it was very appropriate. And, if the dominant purpose of the school is to resuscitate departed philosophies and vanishing theologies, perhaps the wicked people are not far from right. It is to be hoped, however, that the speaker who said that the soul may be most open to spiritual communion in sleep, and that "it may be doubtful whether, when we are awake, we are in full possession of our faculties," did not voice the sentiment of the philosophical faculty of the school. The philosophy that is needed to-day is one that is wide-awake to all the facts of to-day.

THE Hartford Religious Herald hits one ecclesiastical nail on the head as follows: "Pettiness is coming to characterize the religion of our times quite too much to leave in it the power of conviction and the energy of a diffusive force. Little matters of taste and etiquette; new methods of pleasing and attracting the thoughtless and gay; style and manner and attitude; a thousand and one petty incidents,—are made so much of as to leave God, eternity, righteousness, and the eternal principles of justice, equity, punishment, redemption, and free grace no opportunity to awaken fear or kindle love or beget conviction." To this, with a slight change of phraseology in the last sentence, we can give a hearty Amen.

PRESIDENT HAYES made a very sensible speech at the ex-Soldiers' Reunion at Columbus. Along with other good things, he said: "The soldier of the Union has done his work, and has done it well. The work of the schoolmaster is now in order." And, in connection with this terse remark, he made a strong plea for the appropriation of funds by the national government, for educational purposes. Quoting from Hon. A. H. H. Stuart's recent memorial to Congress, in behalf of the trustees of the Peabody educational fund, that "two millions of children in the Southern States are without the means of instruction," and that, "where millions of citizens are growing up in the grossest ignorance, it is obvious that neither individual charity nor the resources of impoverished States will be sufficient to meet the emergency,"—that "nothing short of the wealth and power of the Federal government will suffice to overcome the evil,"—the President forcibly and, to our thinking, justly argued that "the principle applied by general consent to works of public improvement is in point." If the general government may appropriate funds to improve rivers and harbors that are important to the national commerce, much more may it appropriate funds to furnish a certain necessary knowledge to those who are to be national voters and hold the sovereignty of the republic in their hands with their ballots.

Digitized by Google

FOR THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

THE ZOROASTRIAN INFLUENCE ON JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

A PAPER READ BEFORE THE BROOKLYN PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, DECEMBER 11, 1879.*

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

Present Status of Comparative Religion.

The science of comparative religion, to a single illustration of which I desire to direct your attention, is yet in its infancy. One century ago, the materials for its study were few and incomplete. The marvellous achievements of modern scholarship have already revealed a vast store of facts and information bearing upon this topic, which are awaiting classification and orderly arrangement. Wonderful indeed have been the labors of investigators in this field of research. Buried cities have been resurrected; languages, dead so many centuries that their alphabets, grammars, and relationship to other tongues, were alike lost and forgotten, have been reconstructed; inscriptions and manuscripts in the ancient Egyptian, Chaldean, Sanskrit, Pahlavi, and Avestan tongues have been patiently studied and triumphantly rendered, until we are now able to trace dimly the features of the ancient cults, and the character of their environments, out of the interaction between which have been evolved the faiths and dogmas which the world holds dear to-day.

Following the recovery of the Sanskrit language, through which the vast literature of India is revealing its secrets to the modern understanding, and aided by it, came the study and final comprehension of the languages of the Zend-Avesta, the scriptures of the ancient Persians. For this achievement, the world owes a debt of gratitude to Du Perron, Spiegel, Burnouf, Haug, Müller, and other scholars who have devoted their energies to its accomplishment.

The purpose of this paper is to consider the relation which this literature bears to the Jewish and Christian religions.

Early Contacts of the Hebrews and Persians.

If it were my task to trace the relationship between the religion of Zoroaster and that of the Vedas, its execution would be comparatively easy; for I need only appeal to the conclusive testimony of comparative philology, which points irresistibly to a common origin of their respective languages and religions. With the Bible and the Zend-Avesta, the case is entirely different. Here is no such steady development of languages, issuing from a common tongue. The relationship of the Hebrews to the Persians is not that of the child to the parent, or even of sister peoples to a common parent, but rather that of a pupil to a teacher. The task, therefore, becomes a far more complex and difficult one.

Efforts have indeed been made by some scholars to trace the Hebrews and Persians to a common ancestry before the time of Abraham, and to account thus for the resemblances between their religions. Prof. Spiegel, the translator of the Zend-Avesta, considers Airyana-Vaêja,† the reputed birth-place of Zoroaster, to be synonymous with Arran, and identifies it with Haran, which was the source of the Hebrew people; deeming Zoroaster and Abraham to have been contemporaries. By Haran, he does not mean the town in Syria‡ where Abraham is said to have tarried for a time on his way toward Canaan, but the alleged son of Zerah by that name; a designation which he considers impersonal, representing a place rather than an individual.

Resemblances between Hebrew and Persian Chronologies.

Certain alleged resemblances between the chronologies of the early Hebrew patriarchs and those of the Zend-Avesta have been held to support this view. Dr. Windischmann, a German scholar, affirms that as there are ten generations from Adam to Noah in the Bible, so also there are ten generations from Yima to Thraêtaona in the Zend-Avesta. There are also twelve generations from Shem to Isaac, and twelve from Thraêtaona to Manuskitrâ; there are thirteen from Isaac to David, and thirteen from Manuskitrâ to Zoroaster.* This argument, however, does not appear wholly satisfactory. Yima was not represented in the earlier Zoroastrian writings to be the first man, like Adam; neither is there any resemblance between Thraêtaona and Noah, or Zoroaster and David, save that both are reputed to be composers of sacred songs. To make his reckonings agree, he counts Thraêtaona twice, but Noah only once, beginning his second comparison with Shem. It cannot be denied, however, that there are somewhat similar and manifestly artificial systems of chronology in both the Biblical and Avestan records, and likewise in the sacred writings of Egypt and Babylonia. It is probable that the early Bible chronology was derived, together with many of its legends, from Chaldea or Babylonia† rather than from Persia; and this argument in favor of the theory that Abraham was contemporary with Zoroaster seems wholly fanciful and inconclusive.

Early Relations of Persia and Assyria.

Sir Henry Rawlinson argues with greater probability in favor of a very early relationship between the Zoroastrian religion and that of Assyria. He supposes the name Zoroaster, or more properly Zarathustra, to have been of Semitic origin, it being the nearest practicable form of Zira-Ishtar,—"the seed of Ishbar," the Assyrian Venus; and deems Zarathustra to have been a priest of the goddess Ishbar under the religion of the Magi, who became a prophet and lawgiver, claiming to receive inspiration from Ahura-Mazda, his god, and reforming the religion of his people.‡ The worship of Ishbar is undoubtedly of very early origin, and is traceable in the religions of both Aryan and Semitic peoples. Ishbar, Asteria, and Astarte, Semitic names of this goddess, are evidently identical with the Teutonic Ostera or Oestre, whose festival, celebrated at the same season, bestowed its name upon the Easter festival of the Christian Church.

There is abundant evidence of an early amalgamation of the Zoroastrian and Magian creeds. The name Zarathustra, however derived, came ultimately to signify "fire-priest." It was a title common to a succession of priests or prophets, to the greatest of whom it finally came to be solely applied. The family name of the great Zarathustra was Spitâma; and he is usually addressed in the Avesta as Spitâma Zarathustra, the former word having been unfortunately mistranslated "holy" or "pure" by many of the early European writers on the Avesta, who followed one of the errors of Anquetil du Perron, the first modern student of the religion of the Parsis.§

Archdeacon Hardwick also supposes an intimate connection between the Persian and Assyrian religions, and ascribes an Assyrian origin to the title "Zervân-Akeranâ," or "unbounded time," which was bestowed upon the supreme Deity in some of the later books of the Zend-Avesta. He conceives it to be related to Ziru-banit of the Assyrian inscriptions, which was a designation of Bel, the principal god of the Assyrians or Chaldeans. Ziru-banit is supposed to correspond with Bel-itan, or "Old Bel," as this deity was commonly addressed in Babylonia, and thus involves the same idea of "infinite time" which is expressed in Zervân-Akeranâ.‖ From Assyria and Babylonia, the name probably passed over to the Median Magi at an early day, where it was used to harmonize the dualistic notions which had gradually arisen after their acceptance of the religion of Zoroaster, and represented the Infinite Creator of both Ormuzd and Ahriman. It is not found in the earlier Avestan writings. The writer of the Book of Daniel, borrowing this figure, styles Yahweh, or Jehovah, "the Ancient of Days."

There are other points which indicate an early contact of the Persian and Assyrian religions, and mutual influence; but, for many centuries prior to the conquest of Babylonia by Cyrus the Great, they were widely different in their leading characteristics; the one being a lofty monotheism, antagonizing all idolatry, though with a later development of marked dualistic tendencies, while the other was, from the beginning, a system of polytheistic idolatry. There are abundant evidences, however, that both the Persian and the Assyrian or Babylonian religions were developed out of a preëxisting and possibly common system of Sabaism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, and probably derived thence the similarities of their nomenclature.

The Hebrew Religion before the Captivity.

In considering the influence of the Persian religion upon Judaism, our starting-point must be from the first historical contact of the two peoples, at the period of the Babylonian captivity of the Jews. As a preliminary, we must briefly consider the characteristics of the Hebrew faith, prior to the captivity.

From the time of the exodus from Egypt, we behold the leaders of the stricter Hebrew or Mosaic party engaged in a fierce and constant struggle with the gods of the surrounding tribes and nations, which ultimately became a contest against all idolatry. The chief result of this conflict had been the development of a true though anthropomorphic monotheism out of the monolatry of Moses and Samuel and David, the first clear statement of which is found in the writings of the prophets of the eighth century B.C.* There is abundant evidence that the earlier leaders of the Hebrew nomads were not pure monotheists, but recognized the existence of the gods of other nations; insisting merely on the superior might of Yahweh, their own deity, and commanding his exclusive worship by his "chosen people." Even the language of the Ten Commandments, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," tacitly recognizes the existence of other, though subordinate deities. A large portion of the people, even after the monotheistic teachings of the eighth century prophets, still remained polytheists; and some of the kings of both Israel and Judah were found among those who "went after strange gods." Yahweh, the accepted Deity of the Hebrew prophets, was represented as a stern, anthropomorphic being, who commanded the exclusive worship of his chosen people, and insisted upon certain ceremonial observances and the doing of righteousness.

No ideas of a conscious future existence, or of post-mortem rewards and punishments, seem to have existed prior to the captivity. Some writers, among whom I may name Rev. Wm. R. Alger, the accomplished author of the History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, hold that these notions are not clearly stated anywhere in the writings of the Old Testament. The Hebrew sheol, or under-world, was a dark and cavernous abode, where the departed person maintained a sort of torpid existence, which did not include consciousness or activity.† Neither had the Hebrews any very distinct conception of angels or higher orders of spiritual beings. By the earliest known Hebrew writers, the eighth century prophets, angels are barely mentioned. In their writings, they appear and are described simply as men. Neither did the Israelites or Jews at this time believe in any devil, or personal being who was the author and worker of evil. They taught that evil, as well as good, was often wrought at the bidding of Yahweh, their god.‡ Sickness and affliction were considered as his chastisements, and were not referred, as in later time, to "possession" by evil spirits. Their thoughts ran chiefly upon the affairs of their every-day lives. They had no well-defined cosmogony, or theory respecting the origin of the universe, or their relation to the world around them.

The Messianic idea, which formed so prominent an element in their later speculations, had not so much as begun to occupy their attention. Not questioning about the future life, they had no belief in the resurrection of the body or a final judgment. They had no vision of Paradise, either as the dwelling-place of the first-created man or as a dream of the future. Their religion was severe, earnest, practical. Its joys and sorrows were of this world. Its highest virtue consisted in the emphasis which it placed on righteous living.

In this sketch of the religion of Israel before the captivity, the views of Kuenen and the liberal school of critics, as to the age of the various Old Testament writings, have been accepted as the most rational and trustworthy.§ Very few texts could be cited from the older writings, which would even appear to conflict

---

*Also read before the Newark Liberal League and the Brooklyn Society for Ethical Culture.

†The seed of the Aryans.

‡Spelled Harran.

Zoroastrian Studies*, by Dr. Windischmann.

†The Chaldean Account of Genesis, by Geo. Smith. See also articles in the Allgemeine Zeitung, by Prof. Sepp, of the University of Munich.

‡Journal of the Asiatic Society, xv., 254.

§The Religion of the Parsis, by Dr. Martin Haug.

‖Christ and Other Masters, by Archdeacon Hardwick.

Introduction to the Old Testament*, vol. iii., by Samuel Davidson, D.D.

The Religion of Israel*, by Dr. Abram Kuenen.

†History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, by Rev. Wm. Rounseville Alger.

‡Amos iii., 6; Isaiah xlv., 7.

§See Religion of Israel, by Dr. Abram Kuenen; Bible for Learners, by Drs. Oort and Hooykaas; Religion of Israel, by Rev. J. Knappert; and Bible of To-day, by Rev. John W. Chadwick.

Digitized by Google

with this conception; and these upon examination will be found to harmonize with it, under a rational and unstrained interpretation. The following passage from Job* is popularly supposed to teach the doctrines of a future life and bodily resurrection, as well as the coming of a Saviour:—

"I know that my redeemer† liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin, worms shall destroy my body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Rationally interpreted, this text contains no hint either of a Saviour, a future life, or a resurrection of the body. It means, simply, that though the plague which had afflicted Job should destroy not only his skin, but the very substance of his body, yet he knew that God, who was the vindicator or "redeemer" of the upright, would relieve him of his afflictions and justify him before he died.‡ The author of this book evidently held the common Hebrew belief concerning the nature of sheol, the under-world, or place of departed spirits, for he characterizes it elsewhere as "a land of darkness, like the blackness of the death-shade, where is no order, and where the light is as darkness."§ The true date of Job is yet an unsettled question, some critics placing it subsequent to the captivity.

Probable Age of the Avestan Writings.

Before passing to a consideration of the leading characteristics of the religion of the Zend-Avesta, a few words seem to be necessary concerning the probable age of the sacred writings of the Zoroastrian religion. The Zend-Avesta, or, more properly, the Avesta (the Zend being simply a later commentary on the Avestan text), comprises a series of documents of different dates, the oldest of which are the Gathâs, a collection of five sacred songs or poems, the composition of which is described by Haug,‖ Spiegel, and the ablest writers upon the Avestan literature, to Zarathustra himself, and his immediate disciples. Their language is different from that of the rest of the Avesta, except a few disconnected fragments, and much older; having become already a "dead" or unspoken dialect when the remainder of the Avesta was written.

The other Yasnas (among which writings the Gathâs are included), as well as the Vendidâd and other documents, are in a dialect proven, by comparison with the inscriptions of Darius and other sources of information whose date can be accurately determined, to be at least as old as the fifth or sixth centuries B.C. This would place the date of the composition of the Gathâs, and older fragments, in the opinion of Dr. Haug, certainly as far back as the year one thousand B.C., and the probability is, considerably farther. Pliny, Aristotle, and other Greek writers, fixed the age of Zarathustra as early as five thousand years before the time of Plato. Haug seems to think it not unreasonable to assign him a date as early as from fifteen hundred to two thousand B.C. The latter date is accepted by Rawlinson, Spiegel, and other writers, as the most rational and probable; though all admit that it is impossible to determine it with absolute accuracy. It is at all events certain that the religion of Zoroaster had taken form, and its leading doctrines had been committed to writing, long before the time of the Jewish captivity.

Doctrines of the Older Zoroastrian Writings.

What were these doctrines? Our answer to this question must be sought in the older documents of the Avesta itself, as interpreted by the ablest scholars who have made them the subject of their investigations.

If we follow the guidance of Dr. Haug, one of the most careful translators and students of the Avestan literature, we must conclude that the religion of Zarathustra was, in its inception, a pure and lofty monotheism. Certainly, there are passages in the Gathâs, attributed to Zarathustra himself, which conflict with the later dualistic tendencies, and will hardly bear any other interpretation. Thus, we read:—

"I will believe thee to be the powerful benefactor, O Mazda! for thou givest with thy hand filled with helps, good to the righteous man as well as to the wicked."

Here is no hint of Ahriman and the later dualism. And again:—

"Thus I believe in thee, O Ahurâ-Mazda! as the furtherer (of all things); because I beheld thee to be the primeval cause of life in the creation; for thou who hast rewards for deeds and words hast given evil to the bad and good to the good."*

We read also in the Yasnas:—

"He who created, by means of his wisdom, the good and evil mind in thinking, words, and deeds, rewards his obedient followers with prosperity. Art thou, Mazda, not he in whom the final cause of both good and bad intellects exists?"*

These and other passages of like character would seem to support the testimony of Haug and Spiegel that Zoroastrianism was originally a pure monotheism. The dualistic notions which were so prevalent at the time of the captivity and later were of subsequent growth. They were probably a development from certain philosophical speculations of Zarathustra and his disciples concerning the origin of good and evil.

Dosabhoy Framjee, a learned scholar of Hindostan, writing upon this subject, declares:—

"The religion propounded by Zoroaster is a simple form of theism, recognizing but one God, the Creator, Ruler, and Preserver of the universe, without form, invisible. To him is assigned a place above all, and to him every praise is given for all the good in this world, and all the blessings we enjoy. Zoroastrianism does not require any image of God to be made for the purpose of worship, as to him is attributed no form, shape, or color. He is an immense light, from which all glory, bounty, and goodness flow. He is represented as the mightiest, the most just, the most benevolent. His mercies are as boundless as his being. The worship or adoration of any other being is blasphemous."†

Early Dualistic Conceptions.

The earliest philosophical statement of dualism, from which the personification of the good and evil principles or powers was subsequently developed, is also found in the Gathâs, and ascribed to Zarathustra or his immediate disciples:—

"In the beginning there was a pair of twins, two spirits, each of a peculiar activity: these are the good and the base, in thought, word, and deed. Choose one of these two spirits! Be good, not base!

"And these two spirits united composed the first things: one, the reality; the other, the non-reality. To the liars (the worshippers of the devas or false gods), existence will become bad, while the believer in the true God will enjoy prosperity."‡

Zoroastrian Origin of the Devil.

Out of this purely philosophical speculation was gradually developed, by that process of pictorial personification common to all early peoples, the conception of a personal spirit of evil, Angrô-Mainyûsh, or Ahriman, who was at war with Ahurâ-Mazda, or God, from the beginning. There can be little doubt that this dogma exerted a powerful influence in the development of the notion of a personal devil, which entered into the later Talmudic and Christian theology. The word devil is not to be found at all in the Old Testament. Its plural meaning, "evil spirits," is to be found a few times only, in the later writings. "There is no devil in the Old Testament," says Mr. Chadwick. "The serpent in Genesis is his Satanic majesty only by a long, long afterthought; and, even at this, the story is quite possibly of Persian origin. The Satan of Job is one of the 'sons of God,' an accusing angel, not at all the devil of the later creeds. Before the rise of Christianity, the Persian 'adversary' had taken full possession of the Hebrew mind; and he passed from thence, unchallenged, into the Christian consciousness, where for seventeen hundred years he has played a fearful part."§

In the Avestan word dev or deva, we see probably the origin of our word devil, which, in its evil signification, if so derived, would carry conclusive evidence that it came to us through the transforming influence of Zoroastrianism; since in the Vedas, and earlier Sanskrit, the word deva means "god," the beneficent instead of the evil power.

Persian Legends of the Serpent, the Creation, the Temptation and Fall of Man.

The identification of the serpent with Ahriman or Angrô-Mainyûsh, the "adversary," is also a characteristic of the Zoroastrian religion, and was undoubtedly derived thence by Judaism and Christianity. We read in the Vendidâd, one of the books of the Avesta:—

"I am Ahurâ-Mazda, I am the giver of good things. When I found this dwelling-place (the earth), . . then the serpent beheld me. Thereupon, the serpent, Angrô-Mainyûsh, who is full of death, created, in opposition to my creation, nine sicknesses, and ninety and nine hundred, and nine thousand, and ninety thousand."*

The early Persian legends into which the serpent, Ahriman, enters, bear a strong resemblance to the familiar Bible stories. In their account of the creation, Gayomard or Kaiomarts, the prototype of the human race, was created out of the four elements, pure and holy. He was assaulted by Ahriman, and finally destroyed by the machinations of the devs or evil spirits. From the vital force inherent in him there sprang up a plant, the "tree of life," the fruit of which were Meshia and Meshiane, the first created of the two sexes, and the true progenitors of the whole human race. They were at first devoted to the service of Ahurâ-Mazda, and destined to enjoy perfect happiness; but Ahriman descended to the earth in the form of a serpent, plotted their corruption, and finally, by means of a fruit which he created, he seduced them from their allegiance to Ahurâ-Mazda. They then became as wicked as himself.

This character of the serpent as tempter seems to correspond with that of the dragon Tiamat in the inscriptions of Assyria and Babylonia,† the Thalatth of the historian Berosus, and is akin to the conception of Vritra in the Hindu mythology, and Typhon or Set (from whence comes the name Satan) in the mythology of Egypt.‡

A similar legend of the temptation and fall of man seems to have been current in Assyria and Babylonia at a very early day, as indicated by ancient sculptures discovered in the ruins of Nineveh and Babylon, wherein the man and woman, tree, fruit, and serpent are represented. Whether this was derived from Persia, or the Persian legend was borrowed from Babylonia, is yet undetermined. There seems to be little doubt, however, that the Jews first became acquainted with it during the period of the captivity.

Lofty Monotheism of the Earlier Avestan Writings.

The Zoroastrian conception of Ahurâ-Mazda was an exceedingly lofty and spiritual one, much more so than the Hebrew idea of Yahweh previous to the captivity.

The name Ahurâ, which is identical with the Vedic Asura, seems to have been the earliest Zoroastrian designation of the Deity. It is derived from the Sanskrit root âs, which as a primitive substantive means "the mouth," and secondarily, as a verb, "to breathe." From this comes the verb meaning "to be" or "to live," derivatives of which are preserved in the Latin es, est; the Greek εἰς, ἐστί; the French est, and the English is. Asura or Ahurâ, therefore, represents primarily absolute being or life.§ The word Mazda, or Mazdaô, which is usually combined with it, is interpreted as meaning "I am who I am,"‖ which would make it the same as the Egyptian Nuk-pu-nuk, and the Hebrew Yahweh, or Jehovah. This would substantiate the assertion of Dr. Haug, that "Spitâma Zarathustra's conception of Ahurâ-Mazda as the Supreme Being is perfectly identical with the notion of God or Jehovah, which we find in the books of the Old Testament." I think, however, that the unprejudiced student of the Gathâs and earlier Avestan writings must admit that the Zoroastrian conception of Ahurâ-Mazda was much freer from an admixture of irrational anthropomorphism than was the earliest Hebrew idea of Yahweh.

Archangels and Spiritual Beings in the Avesta.

As the pure monotheism of Zarathustra became corrupted by contact and assimilation with surrounding polytheistic systems, which resulted in the development and personification of its latent dualistic elements, certain other notions are presented in the writings of the Avesta. Among these was the belief in a celestial hierarchy of archangels or counsellors, to

---

*Job xix., 35.

†Better translated "vindicator."

‡History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, by Rev. W. R. Alger.

§Job x., 22. See also iv., 19 20; vii., 7, 10; xiv., 10, 12; xxxiv., 15; etc.

‖The Religion of the Parsis, by Dr. Martin Haug.

Gathâ Ushtaivaiti, Zend-Avesta, translated by Spiegel and Bleeck.

*Yasnas, xlviii. 4; Avesta, translated by Spiegel.

†The Parsis, by Dosabhoy Framjee, pp. 250, 251.

‡Gathâ Ahunavaiti, translated by Haug (Religion of the Parsis, pp. 149, 150).

§Lecture on Zoroaster, by Rev. John W. Chadwick.

*Vendidâd, Zend-Avesta, translated by Spiegel.

†The Chaldean Account of Genesis, by George Smith.

‡Demonology and Devil-Lore, by Moncure D. Conway.

§The Principles of Greek Etymology, by Dr. George Curtius (Leipzig).

‖"The Modern Parsis," by Prof. Max Müller (Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i.).

Religion of the Parsis, by Dr. Martin Haug, p. 302.

Digitized by Google

whom the government of the universe was delegated, as well as other minor spiritual intelligences, both good and evil. The celestial counsellors were seven in number, and were termed Amĕsha-Spentas, or "immortal benefactors"; a word which afterwards became corrupted to Amshaspends. The first, Vohumano or Bahman, represents the vital force or principle of all life. The second, Asha-vahista or Ardibahist, represents brightness, light, or splendor of any kind. The third, Kshâthra-vairya or Shahrivar, presides over metals and is the giver of wealth. The fourth, Spenta-Armaiti or Spendarmad, represents the earth as the servant of man, ready to yield an abundance of food. The fifth, Haurvatad or Khordâd, and the sixth, Amerĕtad or Amardâd, preside over vegetation, and produce all kinds of fruit. Their names indicate "health" and "immortality."

The seventh, Srâŏsha or Srosh, is the mediator or angel who stands between God and man, the instructor of the prophet in the good religion. He shows the way to heaven, and pronounces judgment on human actions after death. Srâŏsha alone seems to have been represented as a personal being by Zarathustra; the others being treated in the Gathâs as impersonal principles, which only became actual personalities under the subsequent dualistic corruption of the Avestan religion. We read in the Gathâs:

"This very man, the angel Srâŏsha, may go and lead us to Paradise; he who has shown us the right paths of happiness both in the earthly life and in that of the soul, in the present creation where thy spirit dwells, the living, the faithful, the generous."*

Not until after the captivity do we find the conception of a celestial hierarchy of archangels recognized in the Hebrew scriptures, and the ablest scholars now acknowledge that it was borrowed from the Zoroastrian religion. In the Book of Daniel, written, according to the best authorities, about 165 B.C.,† we find the names of four archangels: Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Uriel. In the Jerusalem Talmud, Rabbi Simeon Ben-Lachish says:—

"The names of angels went up by the hand of Israel out of Babylon. For before (the captivity) it is said, 'Then flew one of the seraphim unto me'; 'The seraphim stood before him' (Isa. vi.); but afterwards 'the man Gabriel' (Dan. ix., 21), and 'Michael, your prince' (Dan. x., 21)."

Dr. Donaldson, an eminent Orthodox writer, declares with reference to the Book of Daniel:—

"In this book we find the celestial hierarchy of Amshaspends fully recognized."‡ Dr. Davidson coincides with this opinion.§

The critic Hengstenburg says:—

"Bahman, the first of the Amshaspends, stands in about the same relation to Ormuzd as Gabriel here does to the Lord."‖

In the Apocrypha and New Testament, the identity of the archangels and the seven Amshaspends is still more evident. In the Book of Tobit, Raphael describes himself as "of the number of the seven holy angels who enter in before the glory of the Holy One" (xii., 15). In the Apocalypse, they are spoken of as the "seven spirits of God" (Rev. viii., 2), the "seven stars" (Rev. i., 4; iv., 5), and the "angels of the seven churches" (Rev. i., 20).

The designation "the seven stars" suggests the undoubted origin of the Amshaspends in the primitive Sabaism out of which grew the purer religion of Zoroaster. They were unquestionably originally the spirits of the seven heavenly bodies,—sun, moon, and five planets,—whose worship entered into all the early religions of Central Asia. In Zechariah, they are referred to as "the seven eyes of God, which run to and fro through all the earth."

The Avesta is full of passages which suggest the relationship of Zoroastrianism to the primitive Sabaism out of which it was originally developed. In one of the hymns of the Yasnas, we read:—

"I celebrate, I invoke Ahurâ and Mithra,—the elevated, the immortal, the pure beings; and the stars, holy and celestial creations; and the star Tistrya, luminous, resplendent; and the moon; . . . and the sun, sovereign, and rapid courser, the eye of Ahurâ-Mazda."††

*Gathâ Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xliii.), translated by Dr. Haug.

† The Bible of To-day, by Rev. John W. Chadwick; see also Kuenen, Davidson, Stanley, etc.

‡ Christian Orthodoxy, by Dr. Donaldson.

§ Introduction to the Old Testament, by Samuel Davidson, D.D.

‖ Hengstènburg on Daniel, p. 40.

 Zech. iv., 10.

†† Hymns of the Yasnas, translated by Eugène Burnouf.

This primitive belief was revived under the corruption of the subsequent development of dualism, and mingled its phraseology and ideas with the purer faith in the later books of the Avesta, bestowing them, finally, on Judaism and Christianity.

The Apocrypha contains other indications of Persian influence. In the Book of Tobit, we have references to the evil spirit Asmodeus, who, in name and character, is identical with Aêshma-daêva, the spirit of concupiscence, who is several times mentioned in the Avesta as one of the devs or evil spirits.* The Persian influence observable in the Apocrypha and New Testament may be in part of later growth than the immediate period of the captivity, before the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem; and can be traced, probably, to the commingling of Zoroastrianism and the Hebrew faith in Alexandria, where, during the third century B.C., both the Old Testament and the Avesta were translated into Greek;† thus establishing a historical contact of the two faiths later than the time of the Babylonian captivity.

(Concluded next week.)

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

ENGLISH CONFERENCES OF ERNEST RENAN. Translated by Clara Erskine Clement. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1880.

We have in this volume five "conferences" or lectures, four of which were delivered in London in April last under the auspices of the "Hibbert Foundation," while the fifth, Marcus Aurelius, was delivered before the "Royal Institution." The lectures were delivered in French, and those who can read them in the original should do so. There is a bloom on Renan's style, which even the best translation possible could not preserve. And the translation here is not the best possible. It contains many awkward constructions. Renan himself is always sure to make his meaning plain. Here there is some obscurity, and occasionally a sentence which entirely falsifies the author's meaning. The translator is evidently unfamiliar with the subject of which the lectures treat, and consequently she leaves many words and phrases and proper names quite untranslated into the ordinary speech of English historical studies.

The delivery of these lectures in England under the most distinguished auspices marks one of the most significant occurrences of the current year in the theological and religious world. Renan is a radical of the radicals, and he lectured on a foundation the trustees of which include Stanley and Martineau and others of less doubtful orthodoxy. The lectures were not delivered in Westminster Abbey, as was at first expected, Max Müller's on the same foundation having been delivered there two years ago; but, if they had been, the evidence would have been little, if any, more positive of the advance which liberty of thought and speech have made in England during the last few years.

For these lectures bring to the treatment of early Christianity a method absolutely impartial, purely scientific. There is no onslaught on the supernatural. It is quietly ignored; and in the mean time it is shown that the Christianization of the Roman Empire can be accounted for at every step, without resort to any supernatural factor in the problem at any point of its development. The critical estimate of the New Testament writings, which underlies these studies, is of the most rational stamp. Renan is not a whit less assured than F. C. Baur of the importance of the divisions between the Petrine and Pauline parties in the early Church. "Divisions," he says, "so broad that all the differences which to-day separate the orthodox, the heretics, the schismatics of the whole world, are nothing compared with the dissensions of Peter and Paul." There is no quibbling here; and yet, to any candid student of the facts, the statement will not seem extravagant.

The subject of the first conference is "The Sense in which Christianity is a Roman Work." Passing rapidly in review the Roman religion, he asks, Was ever a religion less suitable than this to become the religion of the world? As little suited for universality was Talmudic Judaism. Even the Christianity of Jerusalem would have been doomed to almost absolute sterility, if it could have developed itself logically. It would even have absorbed the wider Pauline Christianity into itself, and returned with it into the bosom of Judaism, if the Roman arms had not come to its aid, and, destroying Jerusalem and its baleful prestige, made Rome the capital of the new faith. M. Renan shows how much there was in the structure of the Empire and the special circumstances of the time that contributed to the spread of Christianity. He also shows how much preparation there was for a religion almost as different as possible from the decaying Roman cultus. He has not a word of comfort for the regular Christian theory, which Uhlhorn has just restated, that Christianity triumphed because of the utter degradation of the Roman world. He might have shown, as our own Prof. J. H. Allen has recently done, that even the worship of the Emperor as God embodied a higher spiritual sentiment, and made it vastly easier for a religion which made a god of Jesus to find acceptance.

The second conference—upon the Peter and Paul and the legend of the Roman Church—concedes that Peter may have been in Rome at some time, but for a very brief period and not long before his death. Both Peter and Paul, says Renan, probably perished in the Neronian persecution, an account of which is the most brilliant episode in the book. Renan is always stronger when he can enter somewhat into detail than when he confines himself to generalizations. But, if the Roman Church was not of Peter's founding, still less was it of Paul's. Certain Jews of the lowest class brought Christianity to Rome with them, with their vermin and foul odors, some time before the arrival of either Peter or Paul. Renan falls easily into his besetting vice of sentimentalism in talking of these first Christian missionaries, and accords to them an importance which is without any scientific basis. But the methods by which the claims of Peter and Paul were harmonized, and the Church of Rome built up upon a Petro-Pauline foundation, are admirably set forth. This is the principal subject of the third conference, in which the limitations of Jerusalem Christianity are treated in the frankest manner, and the fall of Jerusalem is shown to have its principal historical significance in its liberation of Christianity from the Jewish swaddling-clothes which were endangering its life. The fourth and last conference shows by what natural and inevitable steps the Roman Primacy was developed, and how the constitution of the Empire reproduced itself in the constitution of the Church. M. Renan has given many years to these studies. He has written volumes on the subjects which these lectures cover. Everywhere there are the step and gesture of a man easily at home. And, when his sentimentalism or his love of paradox does not betray him, he is always sensible and just. Rapid and brilliant generalization is impossible without the omission of many modifying clauses that are necessary to a complete expression of the truth. In reading lectures of this sort, this is always to be borne in mind. The principal value of this volume consists in its inclusion, in a compact shape, presented in a fascinating style, of a great deal of homely truth which is to be found elsewhere only in the scattered pages of many different volumes. Those of our readers to whom the theme is fresh will do well to supplement the treatment with Gibbon's famous chapters, and still better with Lecky's European Morals and Seelye's Roman Imperialism. We mention these as not only valuable, but easily accessible.

The concluding conference, on Marcus Aurelius, appeared, nearly or quite complete, in the Index a few weeks ago. It is not a very satisfactory lecture. It is too seriously impaired by Renan's unfortunate habit of stating general propositions exceedingly flattering, which the particulars of his discussion do not bear out. Much that is said is excellent, but the final impression is that the goodness of Marcus Aurelius was somewhat tainted with goodiness; that it was not so masculine as it might have been; that it was not duly tempered with common-sense. All of which may be true, but it does not harmonize with M. Renan's glittering generalities. The essay of Matthew Arnold on Marcus Aurelius is a much more valuable contribution to a correct impression of the man.

INGERSOLL IN CANADA. A Reply to Wendling, Archbishop Lynch, "Bystander," and others. By Allen Pringle. Price, 10 cents. Napanee, Canada.

If Col. Ingersoll's object in his lecturing tours is to excite discussion, he certainly accomplished it in Canada last spring. The priests, aided in some cases

*Vendidâd, c. 10.

† Christ and Other Masters, by Archdeacon Hardwick.

Digitized by Google

by government officials, tried to silence him. The press tried to ignore him. The theologians tried to answer him. But all in vain. The result was an unwonted agitation of the public mind pro and con. Mr. Pringle, in this pamphlet of fifty-six pages, reviews, in vigorous fashion, some of the doughty lecturer's opponents, and proves himself a well-equipped champion of freethought and of materialistic philosophy. The pamphlet, we presume, can be obtained by addressing the author at the place of publication.

THE North American Review for the current month has been tardy in reaching us. The opening article has been very properly placed, as it will be, no doubt, to most of the readers of the Review, the first in interest. It is by the editor, and has already been referred to in the Index, as the introduction to a series of articles which are soon to appear in the North American, pertaining to the operations of the expedition that has been fitted out under the joint auspices of the governments of the United States and France, for the exploration of the so-called "ruined cities" of Central America. The expense of this expedition is to be partly borne by Mr. Pierre Lorillard, of New York, its projector, and in part by the government of France, and will be in charge of M. Désiré Charnay, a distinguished archæologist, who has had already experience in the contemplated exploration. The papers which are to report and describe the results of this enterprise will be from the pen of M. Charnay. All the noteworthy features of the ancient cities, the buildings, as well as their more interesting details, will be illustrated with engravings from photographs taken on the spot.

Among the other interesting and valuable articles in this number of the Review may be specially mentioned: "The Law of Newspaper Libel," by John Proffatt, defining what constitutes the true ground of such indictment under different conditions; the "Census Laws," by Charles Johnson, which throws much light upon the work and methods of collecting statistics by this department of the civil service; and "Prince Bismarck as a Friend of America and as a Statesman."

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

NEW ORLEANS, August 1, 1880.

The statutes of Louisiana provide for temperance legislation on the principle of local option. The attempt to secure a general Sunday law, made by representatives of Protestant denominations and temperance leaders, failed at the last session of the Legislature. The measure has been persistently brought up and defeated at several succeeding sessions. In addition to opposition from those interested in the sale of liquor, the chief obstacle to its adoption comes from the large foreign element of the State, accustomed to the observance of Sunday as a day of recreation and pleasure. The Jewish people oppose it for the reason that, if adopted, they would be compelled to stop their business pursuits for two days of each week; namely, their own Sabbath, which is Saturday, and the Christian Sunday. A considerable portion of the native American population is disposed to be tolerant on the subject, and to regard with disfavor any Legislature savored with the spirit of an austere Puritanism. Liberals prefer general to special legislation, and sturdy blows at immorality on all days of the week, without regard to any man's religious views.

The local-option law in respect to temperance authorizes police juries and incorporated towns to enact ordinances which shall have equal force with State legislative acts. At the importunity of organized Christian influences in a number of parishes, Sunday ordinances have been passed, and are now being enforced. The friends of the Sunday temperance movement are loud in praise of the practical working of these ordinances, as police measures. They say that on Sunday the negroes, who form the bulk of the laboring population, crowd into the towns and the country stores, and indulge in disgraceful, riotous excesses, tending to the increase of the criminal calendar. The opponents assert that the Sunday law is an unconstitutional restriction of the liberties of the licensed store-keeper and his patrons; that its chief supporters are not guided by their regard for the public morals, so much as by peculiar rival interests. They explain that it has become customary for many of the large planters to keep upon their places small stores, in which are sold provisions, dry-goods, fancy articles, and the meanest kinds of liquors; as the large plantations, towns, and villages are far apart, laborers who work from daylight to sundown are likely to purchase from the plantation stores at higher prices, and often as an offset to their wages, rather than at the distant village stores. Many of the negroes are poor accountants, and are often astonished on pay-days to find that their store account has balanced or exceeded their wages. They naturally, because of their ignorance, fall a prey to sharp practices, and on discovering it would be likely to keep clear of the plantation stores, and seek better bargains among the numerous competitors for their trade in the villages and towns. Hence, on Sundays the villages and towns are crowded with laborers, who, in many instances, attend the churches, and afterward call at the stores to make desired purchases previous to returning to their homes. They are tractable offenders, easily disposed of by officers of the law; and no good reason exists why they should be singled out by the planter class for special moral protection. The colored voters may always be safely appealed to on direct issues of public morality, and number among them many most earnest temperance men.

A store-keeper of Iberville Parish was recently fined $250 for opening his establishment on Sunday.

The ordinance of Ascension Parish is being stoutly resisted by merchants of Donaldsonville. One of them addressed this note to the police jury:—

Gentlemen,—Having an illustrated copy of the Declaration of Independence, I respectfully ask leave to hang the same on the walls of the principal room of the Court House, in order that the members of your honorable body may have an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the provisions of that important instrument.

Respectfully, GEORGE A. FEIG.

Judge Sims, attorney of the Town Council, advised his clients to open their stores on Sunday, but not to sell liquor. This was probably based upon a Supreme Court decision on the Baton Rouge Sunday law, which affirmed the right of municipal authorities to restrict and regulate the barter and sale of liquor. So says the Chief of that town. This appears to be a proper course in making up a test case, and to eliminate the odious religious feature of the Sunday laws. The whole subject will be reviewed by the Supreme Court.

E. B.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

COL. INGERSOLL is on the stump.

Prof. R. A. Proctor is lecturing in Australia, upon astronomy, with his usual popularity.

MR. AND MRS. CHAMPNEY, of artistic and literary repute, are travelling in Spain in the interest of Harper's and Scribner's monthlies.

THE reported marriage of Lady Burdett-Coutts, the distinguished philanthropist, to Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, is pronounced unfounded,—and again that it is to be.

MR. SANTLEY, a noted London vocalist, formerly a member of the Unitarian Congregation of Notting Hill, and a teacher in its Sunday-school, is a convert to Roman Catholicism.

HERE is a text for lecturers on Temperance: "The Quaker missionary, Mrs. Elizabeth Comstock, says that, of the 150,000 persons in prison visited by her, 105,000 were brought there by strong drink."

JOHN G. SAXE, the playful fancy of whose lyrics have provoked so many to mirthful emotions, is in great affliction. The death of his wife occurred recently, and he is now bedridden. He has also a daughter who is a helpless invalid.

PRESIDENT PORTER, in his baccalaureate sermon at Yale, this year, warned the young men against the rationalistic tendencies of the time. This is precisely the warning that Pio Nono, of blessed memory, was accustomed to send forth every now and then.

IT is said that Col. Robert G. Shaw, who was killed at the head of his colored regiment in the late war, is to have a monument in Boston. Some $3,000 was raised for the purpose a short time before his death; but, owing to a disagreement in respect to the artist, the money was invested, and amounts now to nearly $13,000.

IT is evident that the Chinese in this country are not all the hopeless nuisances that some represent them. We submit the following in proof of this: "Tau Phow Lee, of China, gained the highest rank in this year's graduating class from the Hopkins Grammar School at New Haven, Conn., and won the first prize in English composition."

REV. GEO. CHAINEY, whose renunciation of Christianity for Ingersollian radicalism a short time since at Evansville, Ind., has been one of the sensations of that place, has just been expelled from the Masonic Lodge there on account of his infidelity. It has been claimed and quite generally supposed that Masonry left the members of its order free in respect to their religious opinions, but this action seems to tell a different story.

REV. THOMAS FARRELL, a noted Roman Catholic priest, who died a few days since, was about as much of a Free Religionist as it was possible for him to be in the illiberal communion in which he lived and labored. He appears to have had a natural love of republicanism, and appreciation of liberty. Some years since, he participated in a public demonstration of sympathy with Italian independence, thus provoking the censure of those of the more rigid ecclesiastical temper of his brethren. His will directs that his funeral expenses shall not exceed one hundred dollars, and that these words shall be inscribed upon his tomb-stone: "And now I beseech you to love liberty and to love intelligence, and try to extend their blessings to every member of the human family; hate tyranny, oppression, wrong, and slavery; but, above all, hate ignorance, the fruitful parent of evil to the human family." It also provides that a part of his property shall be devoted to the religious instruction of colored people, and another to charity, without regard to race or religion.

THE Christian Statesman has this way of saying uncomfortable things to some of its readers. It asks the question, "Can the steward, deacon, elder, vestryman, or church member hope to render a good account at the judgment day, if he spend more money for self-destroying tobacco than for the gospel?"

AS DEFINITION becomes sharp, devoutness disappears. The soul places God in the background of existence, not in the foreground; as the centre of mystery, the quickener of awe and trust, the inspirer and minister of the devout affections, the object towards which faith strains its eye, on which hope beams, beneath which patience sits, as the sum of possibility, the goal of perfection.—O. B. Frothingham.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

THE ONE TRUE CHURCH.

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

Oh, not in temples made by hands
Dwells our Eternal Lord!
The vestured earth his witness stands,
Reveals his perfect word.

The mighty hills his strength impart,
The vales his beauty show.
He dwells in man's responsive heart,
And in the sunset glow.

Soft floating clouds in azure sky,
The mountain's rounded calm,
Are touched with his infinity,
And breathe a wordless psalm.

How idle seem the creeds of man
In these cathedral aisles!
Our church,—the world! We bless its plan
Of mingled tears and smiles,—

Its rugged heights, its silent vales,
Its changing days and years:
Through all, his goodness never fails,
In all his grace appears.

Dear friends! who here our Sabbath keep Close, close to his dear heart,
Its sacred memory, till we sleep,
Shall never from us part.

In friendship's close-commingling band
Build we our Church to-day.
Sure and eternal may it stand,
Strong as his love alway!

Under the trees, EAST WINDHAM, CATSKILL MOUNTAINS, July 25, 1880.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 19, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

WILL each one of our subscribers please look at the mail-tag on his paper and note to what date his subscription is paid up, and, if delinquent, remit what is due as early as possible. We want all the money that is owing to us—and a good deal more; but we especially want our just dues.

A SUBSCRIBER writes that we should oblige many readers, if we would give the publishers' address and price for the books we review. We would gladly give the price, if the publishers would give it to us, which they seldom do. Their address is sufficiently given in connection with the title of the book.

THE American Association for the Advancement of Science will hold its annual meeting in Boston the latter part of this month. It includes among its members the foremost scientists of the country. A cordial and hospitable greeting awaits it.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass.	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass.	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.	18.35
MRS. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass.	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00
V. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo.	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00
Mrs. S. W. RATHBONE, Princeton, Mass.	5.00
FRANCIS SPRINGER, Columbus City, Iowa	10 00
DANA B. HUMPHREY, New Bedford, Mass.	25.00
Pledges.
F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessme t on Index stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock, and the same annually for 4 following years	50.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

EQUALITY IN HUMAN CONDITIONS.

One of the watchwords of modern social agitation is Equality. And when we look over the surface of human society and see the vast differences in external condition that exist,—the unequal distribution of wealth, the disparity in respect to advantages by birth, the luxury here, and the pinching, crushing poverty there, the heights of social opportunity and enjoyment on the one hand, and the depths of social degradation and misery on the other,—it is not surprising that the first proposition of a superficial philanthropy should be to produce a level by an equal division of property. But such a remedy, on reflection, would be seen to be only superficial and temporary, and, at best, could reach but a part of the evil, and therefore be no real remedy.

A communistic Irishman, who was arguing for an equal division of property, was asked if he did not think that, after a few years, some people would have lost and some have acquired, so that the same inequality would again exist, and naïvely answered, "In faith I believe it would be so." "And what then?" said his questioner. "Why, that is easy: have another division!" This answer indicates the weak point of communistic doctrine,—the assumption that the inequalities of human condition are so entirely an arbitrary matter that they can be remedied by an external mechanical method; whereas, these inequalities are involved so deeply in the forces and laws of social development, and depend to so large extent on mental and moral differences, on temperament and effort and will, that they can only be thoroughly remedied by that large and far-reaching culture which goes into the internal conditions of life, and down to the roots of organic social forces and laws.

But the point to which we wish specially to call attention in this article is that life in its deepest experiences is not so unequal as are its superficial conditions,—that the elements that enter most vitally into human life, the elements whence come its good and evil, its joy and sorrow, its happiness and prosperity, and its trials and adversities, its hopes and faiths and trusts, as well as its temptations and tragedies, are distributed with surprising evenness through all grades of society, irrespective of outward condition. When we strike the average of human virtue and happiness and usefulness, we do not find so much deflection from this line on account of differences of external lot as these differences would at first seem to indicate. The essential elements of human life appear, whatever the condition.

Sir Francis Galton, who has made a special study of the laws of heredity, discovered, a year or two ago, a curious fact in the art of photography. Getting together as many copies of family portraits as possible, he passed them in rapid succession through his photographic instrument and obtained an impression of each upon the same plate, one directly over another. The result was, not, as we might suppose, a blurred, indefinite image, nor an image of the last portrait passed through, nor even of any one previous, but a distinct, perfectly formed face, representing no one of the faces copied, but having some features from all of them, and a face to which each of them bore a more or less strong resemblance. It was, in fact, as Sir Francis Galton says, the family type of face,—which may never have existed in any single person, but was the average face of all the persons within certain limits of blood kindred. The same experiment was tried with the portraits of a large number of noted criminals, bringing out again, not a copy of any one of them, but a new, distinct face, having some resemblance to them all, and looking, it is said, like the incarnation of pure villany. The same experiment, of course, might be tried with a gallery of portraits of people distinguished for their virtues, producing the abstract type of the moral face.

This curious discovery affords a new illustration of the human equality that underlies external differences. No differences in the portraits thus copied, one impression upon another, have yet been discovered sufficient to prevent the impressions blending into a distinct image, the average face of them all. Let the faces to be copied be taken from whatever condition in life they may, and the differences be as great as they may, there will be enough features in common to bring out in the joint impression a genuine human face. It is, therefore, a novel and unique testimony to the solidarity and brotherhood of the human race; to the strong underlying human likeness that exists amid whatever separations of external lot and surroundings. It illustrates the fact that in the things that make up the deepest realities of human experience there is a close family resemblance, which no inequalities of outward condition are able to neutralize. The likeness is deeper than the difference. The equality, after all, even in the present condition of society, is more, and reaches down farther into the foundations of life, than the glaring inequalities. The inequalities are on the surface, and, in whatever respect they are evil, they may in time be outgrown and overcome. The equality is a vital principle, an inherent condition of temperament and stock existing in the very constitution of mankind, and hence running through all classes and grades of society; a condition of growth and progress as well as of unity.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

We find in the Sunday School Times, of the issue of August 7, an exceedingly interesting and ably written contribution to its columns from Bishop Huntington, entitled "The 'Summer School' at Concord." It traces with clearness, and the evident signs of a familiar acquaintance with the events and persons recalled in its résumé, though not without some coloring, as it seems to us, of the Bishop's ecclesiastical spectacles, the rise of the Transcendental movement in New England. But the conclusions to which he comes are not likely to pass unquestioned outside the sphere of those that he addresses.

The Bishop considers the "significant feature" of the Concord School "one of encouragement,—encouragement to Christian hope." The Christian hope doubtless which he has in mind is his own peculiar theological one. Of Mr. Emerson, repeating the assurance of the Rev. Joseph Cook, it is said that he, "as we understand him, can no longer be counted among pantheists. Taking his public and private utterances together, we make no doubt that he is a believer in one personal God, and wishes so to be understood. Beside this pure and absolute theism, we must also attribute to him a firm and positive advocacy of Christian morality." According to Bishop Huntington, and other Orthodox testimony, Mr. Emerson's religious views have undergone an important change in these later years. They are not at present, he contends, what they have hitherto been. But, in reply to these reports, Mr. Emerson's son declares in public print that his father's religious views, in respect to the points in discussion, remain the same that have always been expressed in his writings.

It would seem as though this ought to be conclusive, unless those whose statements conflict with the evidence are better informed as to the facts of the case than even Mr. Emerson's own family.

Digitized by Google

If there has been no change of Mr. Emerson's stand-point in regard to religion, it is at least sure that he is either a theist or a pantheist. If a theist, then it is evident that the Church has greatly misrepresented him during most of his life. If, on the other hand, he is a pantheist, it is now an equal misrepresentation to call him a theist. Whichever horn of the dilemma may be taken, it is plain that there has been all along, as there seems to be at present, a greater effort to glorify the popular religion than to do exact justice to a great thinker and philosopher.

As to the Christian morality of Mr. Emerson's teachings, there is also room for a difference of opinion. As to their morality, there can be no reasonable doubt; nor that it is of the highest quality. But whether it is the Christian morality as conceived by the Rev. Mr. Cook and Bishop Huntington is not quite so certain. It seems to us more like universal morality.

D. H. C.

THE Catholic Pilot makes a point on the Protestant Congregationalist thus:—

> It is not a mere opinion of the Pilot, but an absolute certainty, that should Catholics come in this country to a control equal to what Protestants possessed in the "last generation," there would be "allowed" not only equal liberty to that exercised by Catholics up to this time, but a far fuller liberty, in fact complete religious freedom, instead of the flagrant illiberality even still existing. For instance, no Protestant child should then be compelled to read anti-Protestant books in public schools; no unfortunate Protestant prisoner should be compelled to attend Catholic services; no Protestant, because of his creed, should be debarred from public office, as Catholics have hitherto been in New Hampshire, etc.

But still the Congregationalist might ask whether the Pilot has authority to speak for the Catholic Church.

THE decision of the United States grand jury, in New York, concerning the "Seawanhaka" disaster, has been swift and sweeping, and is calculated to qualify the popular impression in respect to the invariable corruptibility of the courts of that city, and the facility of the influential and wealthy to escape the due penalty of their misdeeds and shortcomings. The report rendered is one of great interest, not alone in relation to the present case, but also on account of its important general recommendations and suggestions. It affirms the belief that the calamity referred to was due to criminal negligence and carelessness. It also indicts all responsible — the inspectors of life-boats and boiler machinery, the captain and engineer of the "Seawanhaka," and its entire list of directors and owners — for the crime of manslaughter. It denounces the overcrowding of steamboats, and recommends severe laws for the punishment of careless and reckless pilots. The President and Congress are appealed to for a revision of the regulations pertaining to steamboat inspection. All inspectors, it is maintained, should have experience as engineers and builders before their appointment to the office, and the laws in regard to such service should be more definite and stringent. No person should be regarded qualified for a steamboat officer until he has had ten years of preparatory experience. The crew and deck hands should be examined before employed, and reëxamined once a year, and undergo a fire and boat drill every day, and once a month before the inspectors. There should be a daily inspection of the life-preserving apparatus of the vessel, and the provision of a requisite number of life rafts and deck hands; employés severely punished for intoxication; the engineer forbidden to leave his post, and one fireman remain in the fire-room when the vessel is under way. These provisions, if carried into effect, would revolutionize the conduct of steamboats, and greatly secure the safety of those who intrust their lives to this mode of travel.

WHAT SHALL LIBERALS TEACH THEIR CHILDREN ABOUT "GOD"?

This is preëminently a practical question. It is one, too, which we cannot well ignore. Sooner or later, your little child, surrounded as it is with an atmosphere of Christian doctrine, is going to ask you some questions about "God." This unknown Being it has heard of, and probably will hear of, in spite of the silence or precaution of its parents. God! who is he, where is he, what is he, how came he, whence came he, and the world, and themselves, etc.? All these questions, and a score of others akin to them, the little one is going to ask, and it behooves the parent to be prepared to answer them frankly, sincerely, and as wisely as possible. The Romanist and Evangelical Protestant are supposed to have established theological convictions and ready-made answers for all such questions. They can easily reply through the lips of Moses or Jesus or Paul, or refer the youthful truth-seeker to the priest or the preacher, to the Bible or the catechism, and the inquirer is satisfied, at least for the present. But to whom, or to what can we liberals refer our children, when they eagerly ask us "all about God"? How few of us are prepared with rational answers to their rational questions! We have drifted away, or, let us say, we have grown away, from the old beliefs about God: but how few of us have grown into any new religious beliefs which seem naturally and logically to take the place of the old! Our observation has led us to conclude that the vast majority of people, who are classed as "liberals," have extremely chaotic notions about what is called "God." They appear, for the most part, to have completely dethroned the old gods of Christendom; but whether the throne in the heavens is entirely vacant and the royal line extinct, or whether a new and grander Ruler has been invested with sovereignty up there, — as to this, they are quite unprepared to express an opinion. They are, in fact, all at sea on this subject. They do not know really what they do believe. We are by no means finding fault with such people. They certainly are not to blame for their doubts and disbeliefs. Nor are we at all alarmed at the unsettled state of the public mind. It seems to us very natural and good, as every transition state is good. Better be unsettled than be settled wrong. For ages, the minds of men, in religion, have been settled on bottomless assumptions; and they must be unsettled from them before they can rest on the eternal truth.

But, if the present chaotic condition of thought on this subject is not alarming, it is often extremely embarrassing. So long as we are all unsettled in our convictions about Deity, one thing, at least, would seem to be clear,—that we must be entirely unprepared to give any definite and positive instruction on this subject to our children. How can we teach clearly what we believe vaguely, if at all? How can we lead the little confiding ones to rest their feet of faith on doctrines as granitic, which we more than suspect are nothing but quicksand? Right here is our embarrassment. How shall we instruct our children? In the first place, we would say, Let us firmly resolve that we will never teach—and so far as we can prevent it, we will never allow our children to be taught—as true what we believe to be essentially false; taught, as the holy commandments of God, what we believe to be nothing but the fables and fictions of men. To this end, let us never put on any pious pretences before our children. If we believe, say so. If we disbelieve, say so. If we are in doubt, say so. If we know nothing about it, say so. Let us not be ashamed nor afraid to confess our ignorance on some questions—indeed, on a good many questions —to the child. Let him understand that there are mysteries surrounding us which neither father nor mother has fathomed, and so far as we know nobody has sounded. Encourage him, however, to inquire into them, and to hope that perhaps some time he may learn all about them.

If you are a liberal, how can you excuse yourself for permitting your child to attend the ordinary Christian Sunday-school? And yet this is just what many are thoughtlessly doing. But a few days ago, in the capacity of an interviewer, we asked a lady, a woman of unusual intelligence and liberality, what instruction she was giving her little girl about "God." With the most charming frankness, she exclaimed,—

"Oh, please don't ask me! I don't know what to teach her. I'm so perplexed to know what to say and do."

And yet, when the minister's daughter runs over Sunday mornings to get little six-year-old Daisy for the Methodist Sunday-school, the good mother, though with some secret misgivings, permits her to go. To us, it seems extremely inconsistent for a woman who frankly confessed that she had no idea of God sufficiently positive and definite to be able to teach it to her child, yet to allow that child to attend regularly a Methodist Sunday-school, to be enrolled in the infant class, and to be drilled in Methodist fashion in the infant catechism, by no one knows whom,— perhaps by a gum-chewing maid of sixteen, who knows no more about "God" and the "vast forever" than Daisy knows about the "politics of the moon." We submit, no liberal parent can hold himself blameless for suffering his children, especially little children, to be brought under such mind-warping influences.

We are by no means blind to certain social delights which the child may receive from its Sunday-school associations, but neither can we blind ourselves to the subtle theological indoctrination, also, which the little one is receiving there. Indeed, the mother above mentioned is latterly awakening to this fact. But a Sunday ago, after recitations, her child, like a genuine little theologian, began to catechise her mother thus: "Mamma, don't you think I ought to love Jesus more than I do you or papa? Just think how they put nails in his hands and nails in his feet! Would you have done that for me, mamma?" The mother could only look into the face of the child with blank amazement at such an unexpected question: she knew not what to say, and she said nothing. Of course, it may be said that the mother should have proceeded to correct the wrong impression about the nature and service of Jesus' death, but that is not such an easy thing to do: besides, why should she impose upon herself such a gratuitous task? Is our life so long or so worthless that we can afford to spend a good part of it in trying to root out from our children's mind false notions which our own indifference has rooted into them? For our part, we should not wish our child to think that it was its duty to love anybody in all the wide world, living or dead, on earth or in heaven, more than father or mother. We wish the child of six to love its own dear mother better than the angels, follow her as its Christ,—yes, adore her as its God. This is the natural affection and reverence of the child, and anything which dares thurst itself in between such a child and this supreme love is committing outrage,— yea, sacrilege.

Let us guard our children against the insidious approach of these doctrines, which put confusion

Digitized by Google

into the brain and bid the young heart bow down before imaginary saviours. Let us not flatter ourselves that any fiction, however wide-spread and venerable, is half so good for our child as the simple truth. Let the little ones have their fairy stories, but let them know they are fairy stories. If, in your own mind, Christian theology has passed over into Christian mythology, and Jehovah like Jupiter has retreated from the chapel to adorn the gallery of art, or to parade in a flourish of rhetoric, let it so appear to your child. Don't attempt to humbug her. If you do, she may detect the sham, like a bright little child of a certain Unitarian minister, who, upon hearing some improbable story, exclaimed: "Mamma, it isn't true, is it? It's like God and Cinderella and all that." We repeat, no pretty fiction is so good for the child as the simple truth. Do you say, you don't know what is truth, any more than Pilate? Very well! Say so to your child. Confess frankly, humbly, your ignorance. He will love you, some time, the better for it. "What shall we teach our children about God?" Why, all we know about him; and what is that! Boil down the vast mass of your misinformation, and what is left at the bottom! That is what most people call "God." Poor stuff to feed children on? Yes, and so let us give them something better. If we can educate our children to reverence their conscience as their king; to listen to its "voice," as to the voice of their saviour; to obey the command of the Eternal Right, as the command of God himself; and with unfaltering step to pursue virtue in this world as the path to heaven, then shall we have no cause to fear lest they die — "godless." But more on this subject anon. W. H. S.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Mr. Mallock's last article, entitled "Atheism and Repentance," in the July number of the Nineteenth Century, is attracting some attention, partly because of the odd framework in which his views are presented, and partly because it is a serious attempt on the part of a clever writer to show the inability of scientific or natural morality to furnish any adequate motive to justify an ordinary man in repenting of wrong-doing, or to present him with a sufficient stimulus for good conduct. An abnormally "smart" young collegian, who has ruined a young woman and driven her, heart-broken, into a religious retreat, and whose intimate friend has driven the young woman's sister to murder and suicide, coolly discusses the abominable affair with a pretentious but unsophisticated and good-hearted blue-stocking, who is assistant editor of the Agnostic Moralist and writes upon "Functional Amusement" and "The Cellular Character of the Individual." The young man fails to find in her enthusiastic presentation of the duty she owes to humanity any inducement to repent of his crime, and manages, moreover, to vanquish her in argument, although kind enough at last to drop a tear of sympathy at her disappointment when the editor refuses her articles. Mr. Mallock's purpose in writing such a paper can only be surmised. Perhaps he fancies that somebody will be frightened by him into religious faith. His teaching seems to be that if a clergyman (as in the case of the blue-stocking's husband), or anybody else, studies science, he must abandon all religious belief; and that the ordinary man of the world who thus loses his religious faith will be sure to follow his evil inclinations, because without motive for right living. Mr. Mallock does not intimate that science and religion can be reconciled in any way, or that science is untrue in its conclusions: he simply dresses up a scarecrow, and seems to expect that scientific men, agnostics, atheists, et id omne genus, will become white in the face and run tremblingly toward — Mr. Mallock may know what, but he doesn't tell. The article, with all its cleverness, is wretchedly pessimistic, is a caricature of the real position of the scientific moralist, and, to our thinking, is successful only in leaving a bad taste in the mouth.

The Boston Herald, in a eulogistic article on the Concord School of Philosophy, asks, "Why should it [Concord] not help us to the philosophy of religious belief for the incoming generation?" There are two good reasons for believing that it will not do so: (1) The data necessary for the establishment of a philosophy of religious belief are not yet in form for a permanent foundation, and there is no probability that this generation will be able to put them in a lasting shape. (2) The new Concord movement is, thus far at least, a movement backwards, and not a forward one. With utmost respect for the philosophical speculations of Plato, and a reverent admiration for the knowledge and wisdom of Aristotle, and admitting that speculative philosophy attained a remarkable development in Hegel, we believe, nevertheless, that the foundations of successful philosophical speculation have been altogether reconstructed since the time of Plato, have been so essentially modified indeed since the days of Hegel, that any attempt to construct a philosophy of religion upon a revivification of their beliefs is to build a house upon the sand. The Herald commends the Concord philosophers because they did not "tilt" against science. This is a commendation for not doing what they ought not to have done: it is not a justification for not doing what they ought to have done. If they did not tilt against modern science, they sneered at it or ignored it. "We are not in the habit here of discussing other schools of thought. We do not arraign, we affirm," said one of the leaders, in reference to this very subject,— an assumption of infallibility which to outsiders bears an appearance of superciliousness only next door to positive ignorance. Many of the world's leaders believe to-day that philosophy, as well as religion, is only a ghost of the imagination, unless founded upon the ascertained truths of science; and many of the affirmations of the Concord philosophers, because ignoring these truths, seem to us to be as purely visionary as most of the dogmatic superstitions of the popular religion, and destined to the same fate. The attention which the school has attracted gives cheering assurance, however, that interest in philosophic subjects is not likely to become extinct. We cannot omit, moreover, in this connection, an expression of sympathy with Mr. Alcott. Few men ever realize so fully in old age the dreams of their youth.

It is not too late to call attention to the establishment of a new weekly paper,— Science,— edited by Mr. J. Michels, and published at 229 Broadway, New York. It is intended to serve as a medium of communication between scientific men, and also as a reporter of scientific progress; thus occupying in this country the position so well filled by Nature in England. We have seen two numbers of the new publication, and each one contains several good articles as well as interesting notes. The editor states that his arrangements for conducting the paper are not yet completed,— a fact which probably accounts for some obvious defects in its general make-up. The Smithsonian Institution will coöperate, and so will many well-known scientific men whose names are given. The subscription price is four dollars per year.

We venture to take advantage of the opportunity presented in making the above announcement to recommend to each one of our readers the serious study of some branch of natural science. No one is either too old or too young to heed this suggestion, nor is any one so situated that its adoption is impracticable. Botany or entomology may be studied at any season, and at almost any time or place, and without expensive apparatus. Inorganic chemistry may be pursued also with simple apparatus and at slight cost. Charles Kingsley wrote a book entitled Town Geology, one object of which was, as its name implies, to show that geology is not a forbidden pursuit even to city dwellers. As a relaxation from business cares, the pursuit of some science may be heartily recommended; and parents who desire their children to acquire habits of accurate observation and correct speaking cannot do better than to buy a science primer, and supplement school studies with a daily hour of natural science at home. Not all the Sunday-school literature in existence can do as much for "young people's" morals as the acquirement of an interest in the study of a natural science. If parents would foil that devil who is supposed to "find some mischief still for idle hands to do," let them furnish the children as early as possible with an object of interest to which they will turn naturally in what would be otherwise idle moments. No man or woman who may read this paragraph but can add immensely to life's enjoyment by a little less newspaper or magazine or novel (if something must be given up to gain time), and a little more genuine scientific study. The mental discipline would come of itself, and would be invaluable.

Apropos of Dr. Tanner's fast,— for any reference to which in this place we feel like apologizing, —a comic paper has published a picture the central object in which is the beaming face of Bob Ingersoll, who stands behind a lecturer's desk and cheerily cracks a joke with his audience upon the subject of the miracles. The picture is significant of the readiness with which some weak points in the defences of supernaturalism in religion are not only perceived, but are deliberately "chuckled" over by those who make a business of furnishing "hits" for public amusement. The sensitiveness of sectarian papers, also, with reference to the inferences which may be drawn from this notorious fast, would be very ludicrous, were it not very pitiable. The Watchman has already discovered, for instance, that "Christ's fast was a natural one,— he refused to work a miracle for his relief,"— and adds, "The credibility of the Scriptures is not staked upon Dr. Tanner's physical capacities,"—a very consoling reflection perhaps, but one which might tempt an unfeeling inquirer to ask some troublesome questions. A New York clergyman, moreover, who preached upon the fast the Sunday following its conclusion, asserted that it had demonstrated "the supremacy of the immaterial over the material,"—an assertion which, probably, none of the reverend gentleman's hearers understood, but which was certainly vast enough and vague enough to impart a goodly amount of spiritual comfort. R. C.

Mr. Horsley, the zealous chaplain of Clerkenwell Prison, has written to the Guardian, stating that among fifty boys brought to the gaol, aged from nine and a half to sixteen, forty-eight had been Sunday scholars (forty-two having been regular in attending school on the "Sabbath"), twenty were still on the books of certain Sunday-schools, and twenty-nine had taken prizes in these religious institutions. After this, who shall wonder at the quasi-canonization of Robert Raikes? What a pity that Mr. Horsley did not speak at the Centenary Jubilee at the Guildhall, where the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other unctuosities, so devoutly thanked "Almighty God" for the establishment of Sunday-schools.—Secular Review.

Digitized by Google

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

THE following report from the New York Tribune graphically portrays one of the good works which Professor Adler's Society for Ethical Culture is doing:—

A VISITING NURSE'S DUTIES.

EVENTS OF A SINGLE DAY'S ROUND.—A SYSTEM INTRODUCED BY THE SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE.—VISITING NURSES ATTACHED TO THE DEMILT AND NEW YORK DISPENSARIES.—WHAT WAS SEEN AND HEARD BY A REPORTER WHO ACCOMPANIED ONE OF THEM.

"I have received my list of calls, and we can start now," said the visiting nurse at the Demilt Dispensary.

The system of visiting nurses was introduced at the Demilt Dispensary by the Society for Ethical Culture, of which Professor Felix Adler is the head. While the poor could formerly obtain gratuitous advice from physicians, and medicines at the dispensaries, there was no way by which the sick could receive care except by the hasty visits of the physicians. To a person living alone, or with the other members of the family engaged in work, nursing of any description was practically impossible. This induced carelessness in taking medicine and in observing proper hygienic regulations. The Society for Ethical Culture, which, though founded largely for philosophical and ethical researches, is connected with many works of benevolence and charity, took up the matter, and, raising sufficient money, obtained an educated and carefully trained nurse, who, with the approval of the physician, was attached to the Demilt Dispensary. The dispensary physician on his daily rounds notes down the invalids who are without sufficient care. The list is handed to the nurse, who visits each case, taking medicines, delicacies of various kinds, and even money and clothing, all provided by the Society for Ethical Culture, which are bestowed upon the poor and deserving. The nurse gives the patient all necessary attention, and takes care that he or she is left in as comfortable a condition as possible. This plan has proved so successful that a visiting nurse has also been attached to the New York Dispensary. Both are graduates of the Bellevue Training School for Nurses. In addition to direct pecuniary aid, the Society constantly endeavors to procure work for its protégés and render them independent and self-supporting.

The nurse was just beginning her morning round of calls as she spoke. "The first case that we shall see," she continued, "is not really a patient. He is a very old, helpless man, whose wife died last fall. I took care of her. He was formerly butler in a family here, and the lady for whom he had worked paid his rent and supported him. A little while ago, I found him one morning on the street corner, apparently in great trouble. I asked him what the matter was, and the poor old man burst into tears. 'Me only frint is did,' was all that he could say. The lady who had been so kind to him had just died, and he was utterly alone and destitute. The Society interested itself in him, as soon as the case was made known; and he has been provided for up to the present time, when arrangements are being made to secure him a place in a Home."

By this time, the nurse and her companion were at a house at First Avenue and Twentieth Street. Knocking at a door on the third floor, a white-haired man, neatly dressed in spite of his apparent poverty, opened the door and broke out into exclamations of pleasure at the sight of the nurse.

"Ah! it's welcome ye are, miss, as violits in spring."

"How are you getting along?" asked the nurse.

"Pretty well, miss, thanks to you. Please excuse the looks of things, an' it's sorry I am I have but one chair. Sit down on the bed, sur."

"You have not been working for some time, have you?"

"Ah, no, thir's nothin' for an old man like me to do. But it's not that I haven't done well when I've had the chance, sur," and, going to his dilapidated bureau, after fumbling in its depths, he took out a time-worn package of letters that he had preserved for many years. The first letter was written at Cork, Ireland, in 1826, and stated that he had proved an honest, faithful, and sober servant. There are others to the same effect by employers in Ireland, with one of whom he had travelled extensively on the Continent, and from families in which he had served as butler in this country.

"They're all I have left now, but they show I've done what I could, sur," said the old man, with a touch of pathetic pride.

"Have you heard anything from the Home lately?"

"No, miss, but I'm expectin' to hear every day. I know it's the best thing for me, but there'll be a dale of common people there that I'll have to be with. But I'll mind their rules an' make no trouble. I'd like you, miss, an' you, sur, to come an' see me when I'm at the Home."

The visitors left the room, and the old man took up again the paper he was reading.

While climbing the four flights of dark stairs leading to the little rooms in the top of the tenement-house No. 421, East Nineteenth Street, the smell of disinfectants constantly grew stronger.

"There are three children here sick with scarlet fever and diphtheria," said the nurse. "The father, a plasterer by trade, has been out of work for some time, and only gets odd jobs to do occasionally."

A tired, haggard woman was walking up and down the bare room, with a gasping child in her arms. The doctor and nurse first gave their attention to the children.

"Where is your husband to-day?"

"He's workin', sir, up at Eighty-sixth Street. He walks up an' down. He hasn't the money for car fares."

"You must have a great deal of care with these children?"

"I do, sir. I've not had my clothes off, nor hardly slept a wink for eight days and nights."

"Your children are better," said the doctor.

"It's thankful I am for that, sir. I'm sorry I have no clean clothes for the baby, sir."

"I have something that will fit him," said the nurse, and in a moment the baby rejoiced in the possession of a clean gown. Leaving some delicacies and medicines behind, the next place on the list, No. 206, Avenue A, was visited. In the common living room, from which opened two small bedrooms, the father, mother, and four children were seated around a table at their frugal noonday meal. Two more children were bolstered up, one in a crib, the other in a chair, sick with scarlet fever.

"Any more trouble with the landlord?"

"We owes him for half of last month and for this month. We pay $7 a month, an' he's said he'd turn us out, but now he's waitin' till next week."

"Are you at work now?" addressing the man.

"I'm workin' in the woodyard. My hands show it," holding up his scarred hands from which two or three fingers are missing. "I get $6 a week, but it costs us $4 for food, and with the rent it comes hard."

"At No. 645, East Sixteenth Street, where we are going next," the nurse said, "the man has rheumatism, and his wife is in the last stages of consumption. The child is sickly too."

"I'm badly off to-day," said the man, as the visitors entered. "I've been doing the washing, and my rheumatism is worse. My wife has drunk the wine you brought. She was so gone, it seemed to be the only thing she could take."

"How long have you been in the country?"

"Seven years." "An' it was a sorra day we came," broke in the wife.

"I'm an Englishman and a machinist by trade. I worked in Limerick, and then I was engineer in the Neuchatel Paving Company for awhile, but it failed and I haven't had anything to do. We pay $5 a month for these rooms, and my son has left us and got married; and I don't know what we would do, if it wasn't for this help from the Society."

"I will tell you about the people in the next place, No. 654, East Sixteenth Street, after you see them," said the nurse, as she entered a light, warm room, in which a German matron and a pleasant-faced girl were sewing and pressing coats. Their faces beamed with smiles as the nurse entered, and they pointed out their new sewing-machines with a pride which the husband, who sat sewing in the next room, seemed to share.

"Oh, yes, we have plenty of work," they said. "We do ten or a dozen coats a week, and we get seventy-five cents a coat, and then we pay out about twenty cents for button-holing."

They all seemed as happy and prosperous as possible. "A short time ago," said the nurse, after leaving the room, "they had no work, and were in danger of being turned out of their room. The girl who went around without shoes picked up their only fuel in the streets. The Society found some work for them, and one of the members presented them with this sewing-machine. Then two weeks ago the baby died, and the father had no money to bury it. His acquaintances wouldn't lend him any, but he was unwilling to have it buried in the Potter's Field. Finally, he found an undertaker who would take charge of the burial for $5 cash and give credit for the rest. He couldn't get the $5 at first, but the Society provided it. As you see, they are getting along nicely now, and the girl is going out to service soon."

This visit was the last on the list, but the nurse for the remainder of the day held herself in readiness to answer any sudden calls.—N. Y. Tribune.

GEORGE RIPLEY—BROOK FARM.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS ON MR. RIPLEY AND THE FARM.—MR. RIPLEY'S PROPOSED HISTORY OF THE INTELLECTUAL CULTURE OF BOSTON.

The life of George Ripley was divided into three distinct epochs. He was a clergyman from 1826 to 1841, a practical social reformer from 1841 to 1847, and a professional man of letters from that time until his death. But he was always a remarkable scholar, of great range, of singular accuracy and thoroughness, and always a man of entire modesty and total freedom from ostentation of every kind; reticent about himself, but with a cosmopolitan sympathy and gay humor which made his society delightful. He was born in Greenfield, Mass., on the 3d of October, 1802, when Jefferson was President. Jefferson is called the father of American democracy; but Ripley's democracy was of a kind of which Jefferson did not dream, and it was absolutely free from personal ambition. It was founded upon faith in man, and contemplated an ideal society. He was an apostle of freedom, moral, mental, and political, and his sympathies were always with "the liberators of humanity." He graduated at Harvard College in 1823, and was a tutor there from 1825 to 1826, when he graduated from the Divinity School in Cambridge, and in 1828 he was settled over the Unitarian Church in Purchase Street, in Boston. . . . The great Unitarian division from the older Congregational form and dogma had taken place some years before, and Dr. Channing was in the flush of his fame and influence. He was preaching in Federal Street, in the same quarter of the city in which Mr. Ripley was settled, and not far from Mr. Ripley's church. The younger man, with the ardor of a scholar, his vigorous mind forecasting the contest in which he was to take a chief part, went to Europe, and returned deeply grounded in German and French philosophy and theology. He was one of the first among thorough German scholars in this country. He knew the views and differences of the great masters and leaders of contemporary thought, and his acquirements, already very large and unusual, were thoroughly digested and serviceable. There was no fog in his mind, and no burr upon his tongue, and no evasion in his heart. Urbane and gentle and friendly, he was yet full of energy and vigor, and he was an amply equipped champion of the liberalizing movement before his power and skill were suspected.

The "transcendental" agitation in New England forty and more years ago was a spiritual revival. Its leaders had been students of Coleridge, and, mutatis mutandis, they disturbed that scholarly and elegant repose of Unitarianism, of which, perhaps, Mr. Everett may be cited as a representative, very much as the Oxford Methodists disturbed the decent calm—which they called stagnation—of the English Church of the last century. The transcendental spirit questioned every existing form of thought and society, and conservatism uncomfortably felt itself to be driven to its defence. The younger men of the new school had sat at the feet of Channing, and his study was still their grove and their academy, in which the master heard, sometimes doubtless with surprise, but never with fear, the speculations of the minds that he had trained. Among the conspicuous figures of that time Mr. Emerson is the chief; but it was a remarkable group that gathered around him. There were Margaret Fuller, and A. Bronson Alcott, and Theodore Parker, and William Henry Channing, Frederic Henry Hedge, and Elizabeth P. Peabody, and John S. Dwight, and Henry D. Thoreau, and many more, while the outer circle of intellectual sympathizers included George Bancroft and Orestes Augustus Brownson. Hawthorne, who was a friend of Bancroft and of the Peabody family, was curious rather than interested; while many of the more scholarly Unitarian clergy, like Dr. Frothingham, Dr. Francis, and Dr. Lamson, without leaving their pulpits, maintained a friendly literary and personal relation with the transcendental leaders. The religious or theological form of the controversy became more aggressively marked after the delivery of Mr. Emerson's address at the Divinity School in 1838, which was construed as an insidious attack upon received religious conclusions; and Professors Andrew Norton and Henry Ware, Jr., replied, —Professor Norton in a discourse upon the latest form of infidelity, and Professor Ware in a sermon upon the personality of God. Norton and Ripley had already crossed swords over some of the German theologians, and in the controversy which now arose there was no abler combatant than Mr. Ripley. In 1838 he had begun the publication of a series of Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature, which introduced the German and French philosophy and belles-lettres to American readers; and The Dial was also established at this time,—a quarterly magazine which appealed to the most cultivated minds, and of which Mr. Emerson and Miss Margaret Fuller were the editors, and Mr. Ripley one of the chief contributors. Meanwhile, Mr. Ripley still preached; but the traditions of his pulpit discourses are of a severe thinker and student, rather than of an orator. The meetings of the transcendental leaders were held at Mr. Ripley's house in Bedford Place, and there was a strong desire to try the experiment of a purely democratic society, based upon intelligent co-operation instead of competition, the Christian ideal, and the dream of generous minds in every age. This desire finally took form at Brook Farm.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Bancroft's history, of which the publication was already begun, showed his sympathy with what are called Jeffersonian principles, and his intelligent, trained, and catholic mind, with his political philosophy, were in complete accord with those of Mr. Ripley. Dr. Brownson was already perplexed in the toils of his own dialectic, and was writing alone a whole quarterly theological and metaphysical and political review, drifting gradually toward the Roman Church; while Theodore Parker had so alarmed the older Unitarian clergy that they abandoned the "Thursday lecture," which had descended from the first settlement of Boston, rather than give Parker the chance of preaching it again. These three men were intimate friends of Mr. Ripley, but they did not share his desire to try the Arcadian experiment. He had decided, however, with a band of other friends, that the attempt should be made. They formed an association, took a farm of about a hundred acres, some seven or eight miles from Boston, and three or four from Dedham, upon a retired road called Brook Farm, from a brook which flowed through it; and Mr. Ripley, taking leave of his church in 1841, entered upon a new career.

It is a very common error to suppose that the conspicuous transcendental leaders of that time were Brook farmers. Mr. Ripley, John S. Dwight, the musical critic, and Warren S. Burton, a clergyman and an author, were, we believe, the most eminent names among the pioneers. Emerson and Alcott, Margaret Fuller, Dr. Hedge, W. H. Channing, Thoreau, Theodore Parker, Bancroft, Brownson, were never residents at the Farm, although some of them were frequent visitors; and Hawthorne, who was there for a few months, was not in sympathy with the peculiar views and purposes of the pioneers, and has left some droll pictures in his diaries of the life that he saw. "I expected to be in Arcadia," he said, "and found myself up to the neck in a barnyard." His relations with Arcadia were not very friendly, and his recollections of it were not happy. His Blithedale Romance is not a picture of Brook Farm. It is a fantasy peopled with figures partially suggested by persons that he met there, and with one or two scenes drawn from his memory of the farm. But Zenobia is possibly a blending of two characters who were not residents, and the catastrophe is founded upon an event which occurred elsewhere. In sending this story to an old Brook farmer, Hawthorne told him that he would see that it was not a tale founded on fact. Theodore Parker preached at West Roxbury, a mile or two away, and his strong rustic figure was often seen moving rapidly across the fields to a council with his friend Ripley, who was his chief adviser during the contest with the Boston Association of Ministers. Brook Farm was a coöperative agricultural and educational association, of which the cardinal principle was the union of mental and manual labor. In its earlier days it was a refined and happy society, simple and idyllic, and those who knew it at that time recall it with unalloyed pleasure, and owe to it the most permanent and delightful friendships. It was not a community, in the usual technical sense of the word; and only toward the end was it a "Phalanstery," or a Fourier association. Mr. Ripley was the head of the society, and he gave himself unreservedly to the arduous and incessant duties of his position. He had implicit faith in the principle of the enterprise, and he had put everything at stake. He knew that in a certain way the whole movement of thought in which he had been so prominent would be tried by the fate of the experiment. It was, he knew, regarded as the practical result of "transcendentalism." If it failed, that had failed, and its leaders were blind guides. To his companions, failure might be the end of a pleasant episode, the falling of the curtain upon a pastoral drama; but to him it must be a sore blow, as seeming to prove the hopelessness of that purer and better society to which his words and hopes and efforts had so long pointed. But the failure came. More than thirty years ago that Round Table, like so many others, was dissolved. Those "goodly knights" were dispersed; and King Arthur, hiding his sorrows under a smile, sought a new realm.

[From a recent letter by Mr. George Bancroft.]

"In the spring of this year, I received my last letter from him. He announced in it his design of writing the history of the intellectual culture of Boston from the period when he first knew it; and, as I was to pass through New York in June, he made a special request to me to spend a morning with him on my way. I did so, and found him full of his subject, having in his own mind formed the plan of his work, both generally and in detail. He explained to me the outline of what he intended to write of Mr. Norton, and every one of Mr. Norton's friends should regret that he did not live to complete his design; for he would have done him better justice, and would have left his memory in a better position with the public, than any one who has treated of him. Among the foremost persons whom Ripley intended to commemorate was Kirkland, that marvellous man who passed his early life in the wilderness, and heard more Mohawk spoken than English, and on coming to Boston fell as by natural right into the position of first in manners, first in liberal scholarship, first in the mastery of English style, and first in the direction of thought and culture. Of course Mr. Ripley was preparing a full tribute to Channing, whom we all looked up to with admiration and reverence and affection. While I was with him, I saw an increase in the difficulties with which he moved, but no other impairment of his health. His mind was clear and brilliant; his conversation cheerful and sparkling; his intellect as acute and as bright as in middle life. It is a cause for deep and general regret that he did not live to complete this chapter in the history of Boston; for he has left no one who can write so justly, so tenderly, and with such knowledge of the subject and candor and skill as he would have done."

In a sketch written some time ago, Mr. Bancroft alludes to Mr. Ripley's controversy with Professor Norton as follows: "In 1839, Mr. Ripley published Discourses on the Philosophy of Religion, to which Andrews Norton, in the same year, made a very elaborate reply in A Discourse on the Latest Form of Infidelity, followed by a letter from Mr. Ripley to Mr. Norton, and a further reply by Mr. Norton in the same year. Mr. Ripley took the ground that in the possession of reason man has the faculty of perceiving truth, and that religious truth is coincident with his higher nature, and carries with it its own evidence, and can thus be received by all, and held with certainty. Mr. Norton, on the other hand, maintained that 'truth is the expression of a fact'; that 'there is no absolute certainty beyond the moment of consciousness' (p. 30); that 'there can be no intuition, no direct perception of the truth of Christianity, no metaphysical certainty.' In a second letter to Andrews Norton, published in 1840, Mr. Ripley gave a luminous and candid exposition of the system of Spinoza; and in a third letter, published in the same year, he discussed at large and with critical exactness the theology of Schleiermacher."—Harper's Weekly.

VICTOR EMANUEL is to have a monument at Vercelli. It will be nearly sixty feet high, and at the base of the column there will be placed female figures representing the three most eventful periods of Italian history,—1849, 1859, and 1876.

FOREIGN.

LOUIS BLANC has recovered from his recent dangerous illness, and has left Paris for Bellevue, where he will remain until October.

ERNEST RENAN'S promotion to the grade of officer of the Legion of Honor brings to mind the fact that Marshal MacMahon refused, in 1878, to sign the decree authorizing this distinction, which the author of the Life of Jesus had awaited for twenty years.

TUESDAY was Victor Hugo's fête. It was celebrated very simply in the quiet mansion in the Avenue d'Eylau by a family dinner, followed by a reception to which all the old poet's friends went. Hugo bears the weight of his seventy-eight years very gallantly.

A FANATIC named Herika, at Napier, N.Z., put an old blind and deaf Maori, named Heriona, into a native copper, with the object of boiling an evil spirit out of him; and, when the old fellow resisted, sat upon him to keep him well down on the stones. The victim was rescued.

THE REV. MR. GOLDRICH, formerly of Sydney, now minister of the Ballarat Hebrew congregation, while making a funeral oration at the grave of his father-in-law at Melbourne cemetery, entered into a disquisition on the grammatical structure of a verse in the Bible. It was not much appreciated by the crowd, who had to listen to it for two hours.—Sydney (Australia) Bulletin.

DR. BROCA, the senator, who died recently, was a distinguished anthropologist and almost the father of anthropology in France. He was born in 1824. His researches have been directed principally to the study of tumors and aneurisms and to the malady known as aphasia. After blows on the head, falls, and attacks of paralysis, certain patients while preserving the plentitude of their intelligence lose either wholly or in part the faculty of pronouncing and writing certain words. Dr. Broca discovered by some curious anatomical experiments that aphasia was due to a lesion of the third circumvolution of the left cerebral hemisphere.—Parisian.

THE Unitarians, having been refused permission to unite with the Committee of the Raikes Centenary Celebration, have resolved to erect a memorial of their own in the forecourt of Essex Street (London) Chapel. It will bear the following inscription: "Erected to commemorate the Christian efforts of the originators of Sunday-schools (members of various churches), from the time of Cardinal Borromeo, 1580, to that of Theophilus Lindsay and Robert Raikes, 1780; in gratitude to God for his blessing on Sunday-school labors during the past century; and in fervent hope that the time may soon come when differences of opinion will no longer separate disciples of Christ in works of usefulness."

HERE is an incident of Sunday's session of the Socialist Congress which merits especial mention. Mademoiselle Eugénie Pierre, a delegate from a Woman's Rights Society, climbed into the tribune and made a speech in favor of sending women to the Chamber of Deputies. The fair speaker did not indicate exactly how this could be done. "One thing is certain," said an interrupter; "we have the candidate already. She is Mademoiselle Hubertine Auclert!" "Not a bit of it," answered Mademoiselle Pierre: "we must nominate Louise Michel!" And then uprose a clamor, and it was evident that the fair disputants would never agree. They are more divided in their opinions than the male members of the Congress are, if that be possible. Even the divisions of these socialists are divided. We hear now of an anarchist abstentionist revolutionary group!—Parisian.

THE late meeting of the General Committee of the National Federation of Liberal Associations, at Birmingham, passed, among others, the following resolutions: "That, considering the important political principles involved in the measures introduced by Her Majesty's ministers, and the character of the opposition by which they have been met, this meeting desires to record its opinion that government will receive the hearty support of the Liberal party throughout the country in resisting to the utmost all attempts to delay, mutilate, or defeat their proposals." It was further resolved, on the motion of the chairman, that a copy of the following resolution should be forwarded to the Premier: "That this meeting views with satisfaction the efforts of Her Majesty's government to establish the civil right of non-conformists to interment in parochial churchyards; but, while cordially accepting the principle of the bill passed by the House of Lords, it thoroughly objects to the following clauses: First, the first clause, which limits the application of the measure to parishes and ecclesiastical districts where there is no unconsecrated burial-ground or cemetery in which the parishioners or inhabitants have rights of burial; secondly, the provision in the third clause under which no burial can take place on Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas day; thirdly, the sixth clause, which provides that the burial service conducted at the grave shall be 'Christian and orderly.'" It was resolved that a form of petition embodying the substance of the resolution should be sent to all the associations in the federation for adoption.

Digitized by Google

MR. ROCHEFORT plunges into active journalism with a will. His newspaper, the Intransigeant, appeared on the morning after his return from exile. The early numbers of this new radical publication do not display any peculiar brilliancy. The leading editors are Mr. Oliver Pain and Mr. Edmond Bazire. Mr. Rochefort announces in a long article that he is overwhelmed with letters asking whether he is in favor of or against the scrutin de liste, and he does not seem ready to give a very clear answer. He thinks the worst feature of the scrutin is that Mr. Bardoux presented it; and he adds, with a touch of his old malice, "Timeo centre gauche et dona ferentem." In addition to his political editorials, the author of the Lanterne is contributing feuilleton called "Mademoiselle Bismarck" to his journal. The other amnestied exiles of consequence seem to be but rarely sought after by their former adherents and worshippers. Paschal Grousset has been but little heard of since his return; Jules Valles is a contributor to La Justice; Lissagaray and Felix Pyat are the star contributors to the Mot d'Ordre; Arthur Arnould writes occasionally for the Intransigeant. Mr. Rochefort is the only one of the lot who received popular applause on his return. Avrial, who was a member of the moderate minority in the Commune, and who is a workman of much inventive capacity, reached Paris a few days ago. Pillitol, the noted artist and designer, came over from London on the day of the festival, but remained only one day to enjoy the privileges of amnesty. During his exile, he has acquired a large fortune in England, and proposes to remain there and enjoy it, rather than to come back into the perturbed atmosphere of Parisian politics. Alavoine and Okalowicz, who were also two very noted Communists, came from Geneva as soon as the amnesty was declared, but returned to Geneva after a short visit.—Parisian.

JESTINGS.

A BOSTON theatrical company recently played a scene laid in a church so naturally that to many of the audience it seemed so real that they went to sleep.

"WHAT do they always put D.C. after Washington for?" asked Mrs. Quilp of Mr. Quilp. "Why, my dear, don't you know that Washington was the Daddy of our Country?"

MARK TWAIN, lecturing on the Sandwich Islands, offered to show how the cannibals ate their food, if any lady would lend him a baby. The lecture was not illustrated.

A LITTLE girl, attending a party, was asked by her mother how she enjoyed herself. "Oh," said she, "I'm full of happiness. I couldn't be any happier, unless I could grow."

A LEADVILLE deacon ran a man three miles up a hill and then rolled him back in a barrel, for the offence of calling a church a Joss-house. They're bound to have religion respected in Leadville.—Boston Post.

"SEMPER PARATA," the doctor's daughter: "Janet, are you never going to leave off that unbecoming old bonnet?" Aged villager: "Well, miss, I've worn it for thirty years, and the vicar says I may be took any hour."—Punch.

THE minister was reading about the woman of Canaan. His daughter entered the church just then, with an agreeable young man at her side. As they went up the aisle the unconscious father uttered the words, "My daughter is grievously vexed with a devil." The effect may be imagined.

"WHAT is the worst thing about riches?" asked the Sunday-school superintendent. And the new boy in the bad class under the gallery, who only came in last Sunday, stood up and said, "Their scarcity." And in his confusion the superintendent told the school to rise and sing, "Don't be weary, children."—Burlington Hawkeye.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

AN ATHEIST IN THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

THE contest over this case has ended, and Mr. Bradlaugh has been permitted to take his seat. The traditions and usage of centuries have been reversed in an hour not of calm deliberation, but of partisan excitement. The oath required of members of Parliament formerly was such as to exclude both Jews and Roman Catholics, both of whom have been admitted successively, while the formula "So help me God" remained as a barrier which ought to have been sufficient against the admission of any one who openly denied the existence of a Supreme Being. The privilege of affirmation was rightly interpreted to apply to Friends or Quakers whose consciences did not permit them to take an oath, but who, by reason of that very tenderness of conscience, were men who could evidently be trusted upon a solemn affirmation to enter the most responsible stations. But now, by deliberate decision of the Parliament, the privilege of affirmation is extended to atheists. We much regret this decision, and we must remind the American people that this is the same position which this nation took nearly a hundred years ago, in the adoption of the national Constitution, in which it is expressly declared that "no religious test shall be required" of any officer of the United States, and the name of God is omitted even from the oath prescribed for the President. The ineligibility of atheists to positions of authority, heretofore recognized by nearly all Christian nations, is based on the profoundest principles of jurisprudence. Since all law in the last analysis is simply the expression of the reason and the will of God, the man who denies the being of God is incapable of conceiving the very idea of law. With him there is no standard of right and wrong, beyond his own fallible judgment, no rule but his own caprice. It were as reasonable to set a blind man, seeing neither compass nor stars, to steer a ship, as to commit national interests into the hands of an atheist. The soundness of this principle is recognized implicitly in the Constitution of Pennsylvania, in a clause which has stood through all successive revisions of that instrument: "No man who acknowledges the being of God, and a future state of rewards and punishments, shall, on account of his religious sentiments, be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under this Commonwealth." The Constitution of North Carolina expressly disqualifies "all persons who deny the being of Almighty God"; and the legislature acted upon it a few years ago by expelling a member for his published atheistic sentiments.—Christian Statesman.

[The italics above are our own. We have been told by one who knows Mr. Thorne, the North Carolina member referred to, that he was not an atheist, but held peculiar religious views. He was expelled by the votes of ignorant negroes; and there were probably few in that legislature who were at once so honest and so thoughtful, or who could so ill have been spared.—ED.]

A KEY WEST paper says:—

The colored people in the upper part of the city are very much excited, owing to repeated statements made by a colored woman, named Chacey Thomas, of the appearance of a spectre in the house of Lynn Thomas. She alleges that, since the night of the severe thunder storm two weeks ago, an apparition in the shape of a black woman dressed in white has regularly, at the bewitching hour of midnight, made its appearance in a particular part of the house, and has called for her brother by name on each visit. The people in the neighborhood have turned out and kept watch during the night to give the ghost a welcome, as the girl says it is impossible to sleep after that hour. On Wednesday, however, the spirit concluded to make a visit at noon. The house was crowded with these beguiled people; but the ghost did not keep its engagement, and large numbers concluded to return to their houses and wait until the midnight visit. The whole thing is a complete farce, and can only be accounted for in the overheated imagination of the woman, who has lately gone through the trying ordeal of a revival, with the thermometer ranging in the nineties almost day and night.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. CLARK is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

Cornell University Library

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	"	. . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51	"	. . .	6c. " "
" 52	"	. . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.
II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.
III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.
IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.
V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)
VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER.

TO BOOK BUYERS.

BOOKS SENT BY MAIL AT

PUBLISHERS' PRICES!

No Extra Charge for Postage.

Any obtainable book that may be desired will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash. Orders are respectfully solicited from all friends of the Index. Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England, "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 557.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 9.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, AUGUST 26, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

THE law imprinted on the hearts of all men is to love the members of society as themselves. The eternal, universal, unchangeable law of all beings is to seek the good of one another, like children of the same Father.—Cicero.

IN loving service to others forget thy sins, and the angels will forget the debt thou canst not pay. Heaven's gate is shut to him who comes alone. Save thou another soul, and it shall save thine own.—Talmud.

A MAN'S true wealth is the good he does in the world. When he dies, mortals will ask what property he has left behind him; but angels will inquire, "What good deeds hast thou sent before thee?"—Mohammed.

WHENEVER you speak, watch yourself: repentance follows every word which gladdens no heart. Let every thorn which people sow in thy road bloom in the lustre of thy smiles.—Persian.

ABRAHAM would scarcely break his fast for a week, lest some hungry traveller might pass, who needed his store. Daily he looked out upon the desert; and one day he beheld an aged man, with hair white as snow, tottering toward his door. "Guest of mine eyes!" exclaimed Abraham, "enter with welcome, and be pleased to share my bread and salt." The stranger entered, and the place of honor was given to him. When the family gathered round the board, each one of them said, "In the name of God!" but the aged guest uttered no word. Abraham said, "Old man, when thou eatest food, is it not right to repeat the name of God?" The stranger replied, "My custom is that of the Fire-worshippers." Then Abraham arose in wrath, and drove the aged man from his house. But, even as he did so, a swift-winged spirit stood before the patriarch, and said: "Abraham! for a hundred years hath the divine bounty flowed out to this man in sunshine and rain, in bread and life. Is it fit for thee to withhold thy hand from him, because his worship is not thine?"—Saadi.

THE world is my country. To do good is my religion. . . . I believe in the equality of men, and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy.—Thomas Paine.

FOR the distant still thou yearnest,
And behold the good so near!
If to use the good thou learnest,
Thou wilt surely find it here. —Goethe.

TO BE happy is not the purpose of our being, but to deserve happiness.—Fichte.

TO FILL the hour, and leave no crevice for a repentance or an approval,—that is happiness. Spend yourself on the work before you, well assured that the performance of this hour's duties will be the best preparation for the hours, or ages, that follow it.—R. W. Emerson.

THE stimulus to exertion which radicalism gives lies in its transference of the main emphasis from the future to the present. Religion ceases to be a means of salvation from an imaginary hell, and becomes identified with the struggle for character and for human welfare here on earth. In my ethics, the welfare of each individual soul is part and parcel of the universal welfare of the race; and the individual cannot realize his own private ideal, unless he consecrates himself to universal ends.—F. E. Abbot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE current topics are largely political in these days. Religion is taking a vacation.

NEW ZEALAND has a freethought newspaper. It is to be presumed that its editor is too tough for the cannibals.

THE Carlist Ultramontane troubles in Spain are attributed chiefly to recent arrivals of Jesuits from France, in the country. These devout souls have always shown a remarkable gift for that line of business.

THE Democratic newspapers are counting a very large soldiers' vote for Hancock. But why should the ex-Union soldiers vote for General Hancock more than for General Garfield? The latter was a volunteer like themselves, and as brave a commander as the Democratic candidate. The rebel soldiers will vote almost to a man for Hancock. The Union soldiers will be divided as usual by their political preferences.

IT is clear that the Jewish Tribune does not hold Lutheranism in very high esteem, if this little specimen of its paragraphing may be taken as evidence: "The Lutherans celebrated this week the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of their 'Augsburg Confession.' What a fossilized orthodoxy this church now represents! No progress; no life in it! But no wonder. Its main food for reflection is the Diet of Worms! And that is too poor a bill of fare for a would-be vigorous constitution."

DR. TANNER, according to the Congregationalist, has other tasks to do before his fasting can be admitted to have any religious bearing. It evidently does not think the forty days' fast of Jesus in the wilderness much of a miracle anyway, and declares that "when Dr. Tanner shall have cleansed lepers, calmed the seas, healed the sick, and raised the dead, it will be time enough to begin to consider how his acts ought to affect our understanding of the miraculous works of Christ." We would advise him to begin on the lepers.

REV. W. W. NEWTON, in the Independent, recently admitted that it was in vain now to try to put down the Sunday excursions, and declared it to be therefore the duty of Christians to go after the excursionists and try to convert them. Missionaries, he said, should be on the spot at all the popular sea-side and country resorts, with "sacred music" and an attractive "religious service" adapted to draw in the crowds that flock thither on Sundays. We notice that Col. Ingersoll is "after the excursionists," too, with his kind of Sunday service.

THE Presbyterian Church in Ireland is violently agitated over the question of the introduction of instrumental music in religious service. The General Assembly recently voted, but by a majority of only one in a vote of three hundred and one, that the congregations be appealed to, in the interests of "Christian charity and peace," to abstain from the use of instruments. The matter is to come up again next year, and the feeling in the congregations has become so intense and embittered that it looks as if there would be another sect in Ireland before long.

THE Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland has been having its "agitation," too; and over the equally momentous question whether during prayer at the communion-service the worshippers shall stand or keep their seats,—a discussion following the introduction of this question which "lasted to midnight." The Synod finally decided that the posture was a matter of indifference. It might have decided more wisely, and settled the question more permanently perhaps, by obeying a certain precept of Jesus, whereby nobody would know whether his neighbor during prayer sits or stands.

WE have twice violated Massachusetts law lately by going on Sunday excursions, by steamer on both occasions. But the crowds of passengers did not look like law-breakers. They were, with hardly an exception, orderly and well-behaved, and were largely of the class of people who could not get out of the city on any other day. Yet we suppose that, if any catastrophe had occurred for which the proprietors of the steamers could be held responsible, not one of these passengers, however much injured, could recover "legal damages," because of that old law on the statute-book forbidding a Sunday journey except of "necessity or charity." How long will such an anachronism of a law be allowed to remain? Or, if it is to stand, how long before a judge will appear with the justice and courage to decide that the running of a Sunday train or steamer, as the only means by which the hard-worked people of cities can escape for one day in seven into the pure air of the country or on the sea, is a work of "charity"?

ACCORDING to a recent speech of Mr. Mundella, in the House of Commons, the progress in education in England has been very gratifying since the Elementary Education Act came into force, ten years ago. The condition of things, in this respect, up to that time, was one of deplorable neglect and inefficiency. A large majority of the children of the country never went to school from one year's end to the other. They were not only without schooling, but the number of schools and teachers were greatly inadequate to meet the requirements of the population, and there were no legal obligations resting upon parents or anybody to effect better results. Since 1870, the increase of children on the school register has been upwards of two millions, and the average of actual attendance reaches nearly a million and a half. But there still remain, Mr. Mundella declares, some four or five hundred thousand children whose elementary education is uncared for. The Times maintains this estimate is altogether too low. It finds evidence that the number would be more correctly placed at something like a round million and a half.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

THE ZOROASTRIAN INFLUENCE ON JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

A PAPER READ BEFORE THE BROOKLYN PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, DECEMBER 11, 1879.*

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

(Concluded.)

Avestan Doctrine of the Future Life.

Belief in immortality, in future happiness for the good, and future punishment for the bad, was also a characteristic of the Zoroastrian religion, wanting, as we have seen, in the earlier Hebrew faith. The belief in immortality is very distinctly expressed in the Gathâs, the oldest books of the Avesta. We read:—

"Immortality, righteousness, wealth, health, all these gifts, shall be granted in consequence of good actions, words, and worshipping."† And again:—

"How may I come, O Mazda, to your dwelling-place, to hear you sing? Aloud I express my wish to obtain the help of the angel of health, and that of immortality, by means of the hymn which is the treasure of truth."‡

And elsewhere: "All that have been living, and will be living, subsist by means of his bounty only. The soul of the righteous attains immortality, but that of the wicked man has lasting punishment. Such is the rule of Ahurá-Mazda, whose the creatures are."§

The Avestan name of heaven is Garo-demâna, "the house of hymns," because the singing of hymns is believed to be the occupation of the angels and redeemed spirits; an idea which Christianity accepted, and in some degree has retained to the present day. Hell is called Drûjô-demâna, "the house of destruction." Between earth and heaven is Chinvat-peretu, "the bridge of the judge," which the soul of the pious alone can cross in safety, while the wicked fall from it down into hell. This conception passed ultimately into the Mohammedan religion, which has a similar bridge of judgment, Al-Sirât, "fine as the thread of a famished spider, and sharp as a scimetar."

It cannot be doubted that the Persian beliefs in immortality, and in dualistic conditions of future existence, exercised a marked influence on the development of these ideas in later Judaism and Christianity; though the disasters which befell the Jewish people, and the captivity itself, may have prepared for their reception, by turning the hopes of Israel from this world, where they had been so sorely disappointed, to a future world, and thus stimulating the dormant germs of these beliefs which are latent in all religions.‖

Avestan Belief in the Resurrection of the Body.

Together with the belief in immortality, the fancy of a future bodily resurrection was also introduced into the Hebrew faith. It is doubtful, however, whether this conception is entirely due to Persian influence. It seems to have been an early notion of the ancient Chaldean faith, as well as that of Persia; and was, to a degree, germinant in the Hebrew conception of sheol, or the under-world, in which the departed yet embodied souls maintained a dormant and hardly conscious existence, but whence they could be called by express permission of Yahweh, in which case they appeared in bodily form. The vision of Ezekiel, of the resurrection and rehabilitation of the dry bones, though avowedly presented as a figure of the return and restoration of Israel, probably borrowed its imagery from Babylonian sources, and contains the germ of the future fancy of a bodily resurrection.

Spiegel, the translator of the Avesta, holds that this belief was a corruption of the original Zoroastrian doctrine. Haug, on the contrary, says that "there can be no doubt that this important doctrine is a genuine Zoroastrian dogma, which developed itself naturally from Spitáma Zarathustra's sayings."†† We have a phrase in the Gathás, "frashem kerenaon ahûm," which is translated, "they make the life lasting"; and on which a substantive, "frashô-kereti," meaning "the perpetuation of life," is formed; and this is used throughout the later books of the Avesta, as referring to the resurrection.

This belief was common among the Magi long previous to the Christian era, and seems to have been a perfectly natural development, both in the Persian and subsequently in the Hebrew religion, which, by long isolation from contact with other faiths, had retained the more archaic conceptions of the future state. It is also characteristic of the more primitive and materialistic notions of a future life among other peoples, where there can be no suspicion of its genesis from external contacts. With the doctrine of angels, it was germinal in the Hebrew faith, and needed only the contact with a religion in which it had already obtained completer development, to become vitalized and perfectly unfolded. Beliefs are rarely conveyed bodily from one creed into another. The process is rather comparable to the fertilization of previously existing germs, through contact with a more positive and highly organized faith. All civilization has advanced according to this law: gaining in richness and completeness with each intermingling of nations and peoples, from the first rude family organization up to the most complex national life.*

Purgatory a Zoroastrian Belief.

The Catholic doctrine of Purgatory also seems to have been foreshadowed in the Persian religion, in their Miçvana, or mid-world, which is described as a place situated midway between heaven and hell, in which souls are placed whose good and bad deeds are so equally balanced that their ultimate destination is uncertain. Here they are compelled to suffer alternately both cold and heat; a conception quite similar to some of the ancient Catholic notions of Purgatory.

Avestan Belief in a Saviour or Mediator.

Another notable Zoroastrian belief is the anticipation of the coming of a saviour or deliverer, called in the Avesta Saoshyâs, and in later Persian literature Sosiôsh. This word is derived from the verb su, "to profit," and means, therefore, the profiter or benefactor. We read in the Vendidâd:—

"Base Angrô-Mainyûsh, I will smite the evil creation that is fashioned by the dævas . . . . until Saoshyâs, the victorious,† is born out of the water Kansaôya, from the eastern clime."‡

The coming of this saviour was to be preceded by a period of fearful calamities and woes. Saoshyâs would finally be born of a virgin; he would approach "with noiseless step," or unheralded by the ordinary exhibitions of worldly power, and evince the reality of his mission by conquering Angrô-Mainyûsh, or Ahriman, and all his evil creation, finally destroying even death itself. He would raise the dead, judge the world, separate the righteous from the wicked. The earth would be purged with fire by means of a blazing comet. Ahriman would be destroyed, the whole family of man would finally be restored to blessedness, and a heavenly Paradise would be established on the earth.

At the resurrection, the prototype of the human race, Kaiomarts, would rise first; next, Meshia and Meshiane, the original pair, and afterwards their descendants. They would then all receive immortality by drinking the sacred Homa. Between this period and the final restoration, an indefinite time would elapse, during which the righteous would enjoy the delights of Paradise, while the wicked would suffer torture. The under-world, or hell, was thus represented as a place of purification, where the soul is purged from sin.

It is claimed by some Orthodox writers that this conception of Saoshyâs, the Saviour, was a late development of Zoroastrianism, and derived, possibly, from the Hebrew religion rather than the reverse. But the fact seems to be that it did not arise in the Hebrew faith prior to the captivity, and was held in no personal form until certainly as late as the Maccabean period, in the second century B.C.;§ while the germ of this belief appears to be contained in the description of the person and office of the angel Sráôsha, who is mentioned in the earliest writings of the Avesta, attributed to Zarathustra himself. The names are strikingly similar,‖ their offices of mediator and deliverer are identical, and the later and more definite conception of Saoshyâs seems to be a perfectly natural development out of the earlier belief.

The identity of the name Meshia, which is applied in the Avesta to the first man, with the Hebrew designation of the Saviour, is certainly curious, but the natural inference therefrom may not be wholly trustworthy.

Mithraic Rites: Baptism, Communion and Incense-burning.

At the time of Cyrus and Darius, the worship of the sun-God, Mithra, had become general throughout the dominion of the Medes and Persians. He was never raised to an equal position with Ahurà-Mazda, but his office was subordinate and mediatorial. His worship involved the observance of certain rites, now known as the Mithraic mysteries. In the initiation to this worship, water was poured upon the head of the aspirant by the presiding priest,—a ceremony strongly suggesting Christian baptism. A sort of communion-service was also celebrated, in which the holy bread, called Draôna, was first blessed and then eaten by the priests, in connection with draughts of the sacred beverage, Homa. Before drinking, the goblet was raised in the hands of the celebrant, precisely as the Catholic priest elevates the host,* the eucharistic bread which is believed to be the actual body of Christ.†

Mithra, the mediator, was often represented, pictorially, with a halo about his head, similar to that so familiar to us in representations of Jesus, and which in both cases is suggestive of its origin in primitive sun-worship. Here are certainly strong indications of Persian influence on Christianity. We can but remember also that Jesus has been called "the true sun," "the sun of righteousness," and "the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world,"—expressions traceable, probably, to a similar origin. The Mithraic rites also preserved another custom originating in sun-worship,—the burning of odoriferous woods, or incense, which is described in the Visperad, a sacred book of the Avesta. The principal Mithraic festival was celebrated on the 25th of December,—a day also commemorated by later Judaism in connection with their "Feast of Lights," ‡ and subsequently adopted by Christianity as the supposed anniversary of the birth of Jesus.

The rites of ceremonial purification, as described in the Avesta, are similar to and often almost identical with those of Judaism; which, if not originated by Zoroastrian contact, were undoubtedly stimulated and augmented under its influence. The early prophetical writings contain no trace or hint of the existence of many of these rites. Another special contribution of this religion to Judaism was its feast of Purim, the introduction of which was probably forwarded by the publication of the Book of Esther.§ This writing contains other indications of its Babylonian origin; the name Esther being simply the Hebrew form of Ishtar, the Venus-goddess of the Chaldeans, while Mordecai is correspondingly related to Merodach, a designation of one of the deities of Babylonia.‖ The story of Esther is probably wholly fictitious and unhistorical.

The Talmud, which grew out of the oral commentaries of the scribes subsequent to the captivity, is full, also, of indications of the Persian influence. "Every kind of philosophy known at the time of its compilation," says Dr. Barclay, "is more or less introduced into the Talmud, and all more or less tinged with Magian superstition. From this superstition grew the mysticism of the Jewish schools."

The Avesta and the New Testament.

The New Testament inherits from the religion of Zoroaster its devil and evil spirits, its doctrines of demoniacal possession and bodily resurrection, it may be in part, as well as the belief in a future state of rewards and punishments, and some of the noblest elements in its representation of the character of God. The name "Father," as applied to God, seems to be

---

* Also read before the Newark Liberal League and the Brooklyn Society for Ethical Culture.
† Gathâ Ahunavaiti (Yasnas, xxxiv. 1).
‡ Gathâ Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xliv. 17).
§ Gathâ Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xlv. 7).
‖ The Religion of Israel, by Dr. Abram Kuenen, vol. iii.
 The Religion of Israel, by Kuenen.
†† The Religion of the Parsis, by Dr. Martin Haug, p. 313.

* The Study of Sociology, by Herbert Spencer.
† The name Jesus, Greek Ἰησοῦς, Heb. Jo-shua, signifies "Yahweh (or Jehovah), the victorious."—See History of the Israelites and Judeans, by N. G. De Groot.
‡ Vendidâd, Farg. xxi. 16, 19 (Avesta).
§ Judas Maccabæus, by Claud Reignier Conder, M.A.
‖ S-aôsh(y)â(s) differs less from S(r)aôs-h-a than the latter does from its later form, Sosiosh. Similar variations in orthography are observable in other words.

* From Latin hostia, "a victim"; a survival of the sacrificial rite.
† Childhood of Religion, by Edward Clodd, F.R.A.S. These customs seem to have originated in the earlier "religion of the family altar," before the division of the Aryan peoples; but their Christian form so resembles the Persian that it seems probable that they entered Christianity through the Persian cult, rather than directly from their later Roman development. The worship of Mithra had been introduced into Rome long prior to Christianity.
‡ First inaugurated on the 25th of the month Chisleu, corresponding nearly with our December.
§ The Religion of Israel, by Kuenen, vol. iii.; The Bible of To day, by Chadwick.
‖ History of the Jewish Church, vol. iii., by Dean Stanley.
 The Talmud, by Joseph Barclay, LL.D.

Digitized by Google

an Aryan contribution to the vocabulary of religions.* In the Gathâs and the later books of the Avesta, God is called "Father"; and even more than in the Hebrew scriptures is he represented as the "Eternal Power that makes for righteousness."

"When my eyes beheld thee," says Zarathustra, "the essence of truth, the creator of life, who manifests his life in his works, then I knew thee to be the primeval spirit, thou Mazda! so high in mind as to create the world, and the Father of all good life."†

"Whoever thinks the idols, and all those men who think mischief only, to be base, and distinguishes such people from those who think of the right, his Friend, Brother, Father, is Ahurâ-Mazda."‡

The Deity is repeatedly addressed as the creator of all things and the friend of the righteous, "who dwells in the spiritual world." Here are the very ideas of the New Testament, often almost in their familiar language:—

"May thy kingdom come," says Zarathustra, "wherewith thou makest good for the right-living poor. . . . My heart wishes that I may know thee, O Mazda! . . . All that have been living, and will be living, subsist by means of his bounty only."

"He maketh his sun to shine upon the evil and upon the good," says Jesus. "I will believe thee to be the Powerful Benefactor, O Mazda!" says Zarathustra; "for thou givest with thy hand, filled with helps, good to the righteous man as well as to the wicked, by means of the sun which strengtheneth all things."§

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," says Jesus. "He who in words and works knows purity, he knows Ahurâ-Mazda,"‖ says Zarathustra.

"Standing among thy worshippers who pray to thee, I will be mindful of righteousness as long as I shall be able. Thus mayst thou grant me righteous desires. Then I shall call myself, if accompanied by the angel of piety, a pious, obedient man."

"Whoever of two lords, of two yeomen, of two bondsmen, behaves himself well toward a righteous man, and furthers the works of man by tilling the soil, the same will inherit Paradise."††

Thus, in harmony with Jesus, does Zarathustra teach that God is "no respecter of persons," and that he who "doeth the will of the Father" shall be sure of his just reward.

> "At the last dissolution of creation through thy virtue,
> At this dissolution will come thy kingdom,
> O holy, heavenly Mazda! through good-mindedness,
> Through whose deeds the world increases in purity."

Thus sings one of the hymns of the sacred Yasna: in sentiment, how like the assurances of the New Testament!

In the nineteenth Yasna, we have the thought and almost the phraseology of Christian writers:—

"He who recognizes him as Lord and Master, who teaches him,—Ahurâ-Mazda,—to the creatures who are first in understanding;

"He who resigns himself to Him who is greatest of all, he teaches also his people to know him as the greatest.

"As he declares enjoyment in Mazda, . . . thus he gives himself to the Spirit.

"As he makes it a teacher for the soul, so he applies it in good deeds.

"Here in this world, O Mazda! if he teaches the good law to the creatures, he becomes an immortal being.

"He brings the kingdom of Ahurâ. So doing, he will also give food to the poor."

"An attentive reading of the Zend-Avesta," says Dean Milman, "reveals new and striking points of contact between Jewish and Christian notions on the one hand, and the Zoroastrian on the other, at nearly every page."‡‡

How lofty is the spirit of this selection from the Avesta!—

"We worship Ahurâ-Mazda, who created the spirit of earth, and righteousness, who created the good waters and trees, and the luminaries, and the earth, and all good things. . . .

"We worship him with our bodies and our souls. We worship him as being one with the spirits of righteous men and women."*

With a similar exalted consciousness of identity with the truth he taught, and with the source of all truth, spake Jesus, when he said, "I and my Father are one." In these selections, and others of like character which might be quoted from the Avesta, if I mistake not, we find, at least germinal, those beliefs in the fatherhood of God, the sonship of man, the unity of man's soul with God, and the influence of the Holy Spirit, which even so candid and liberal a scholar as Dr. Hedge deems to be the peculiar and exclusive expression of Christianity, among all the religions of the world.

In its ritualistic and ceremonial development, Zoroastrianism, as well as Judaism, presents much that is puerile and absurd; and its doctrines, as we have seen, are not all of this lofty and spiritual character. Later Judaism and Christianity inherited from it somewhat of the fanciful and irrational, as well as a strong impulse toward a lofty monotheism, and purity and righteousness in thoughts, words, and deeds. Among the Jews, the sects of the Mehistanites and Essenes, and also the Pharisees,† arose under the Persian influence, and embodied in their creed the leading Zoroastrian beliefs; while the Sadducees were the inheritors of the traditions of the ancient Hebrew religion.‡ "The Sadducees," we read in the Acts of the Apostles, "say there is no resurrection, neither angels nor spirits." The synagogue worship was also probably suggested by similar meetings held by the followers of Zoroaster in Babylon.

Resume and Deductions.

If the points in our discussion thus far have been clearly presented, several facts become evident, which, when generally accepted, must greatly modify the popular conception of Christianity, as a religion originating by miraculous and infallible revelation, rather than a natural and orderly evolution out of previously existing beliefs. Its leading doctrines—belief in a spiritual monotheism; in a future life; in a resurrection of the body and a final judgment; in the ultimate destruction of the world by fire, and a future state of rewards and punishments; in angels and archangels, and a personal devil; in the advent of a saviour or mediator—are seen to have been identified with the religion of Zoroaster, and inscribed in the Avesta, centuries before the advent of Jesus and the birth of Christianity. Historical contacts between the Hebrews and Persians, in Babylonia and Alexandria, prior to the rise of later Judaism and the origin of Christianity, have also been established.

It follows, either that the Zoroastrian writings were themselves given by miraculous inspiration,—a conclusion fatal to the current belief in the exclusive sanctity of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures,—or that Zarathustra and his followers, by the unaided action of their own intellects, were enabled to announce doctrines of which the Jews and Christians were ignorant, until they learned them from inspired teachers,—a conclusion which is not complimentary either to the theory of inspiration or to the mental calibre of Jewish and Christian writers,—or, discarding wholly the conception of miracle and supernatural revelation, these doctrines, originally evolved in the religious systems of the Persians and Babylonians, derived thence the impulse which led to their subsequent development in Judaism and Christianity. It can hardly be questioned that the latter hypothesis is the most natural and rational.

Our Indebtedness to Aryan Nations.

Accepting it, as I think we must, it becomes evident that the religious debt of Judaism and Christianity to Aryan sources is much greater than has commonly been suspected. Compared with any purely Semitic literature, that of the Aryan peoples in India, Persia, and Greece, is far richer in its store of mythology, history, philology, and other materials which illustrate the genesis and development of religious systems, social customs, and governmental forms. A pardonable pride in our own Aryan ancestry, as well as a sense of justice and reverence for the truth, should impel us to recognize this long ignored and forgotten indebtedness, and to seek in the Sanskrit and Avestan literature, and in the classics of Greece and Rome, the outlines of a history of man's progressive social and religious evolution, which are as full of encouragement as the Semitic dogmas of depravity and degeneration have been replete with discouraging and humiliating influences. And the study of the Bible, also, in the light of the evolution philosophy, can but be productive of similar beneficent results.

Later Zoroastrian Survivals: The Parsis.

It is related of Goethe, whose writings abundantly prove his acquaintance with the Zoroastrian religion as perpetuated by its modern inheritors, the Parsis, and whose poem addressed to them may be read in Weiss' English translation of the West-Easterly Divan, that in early youth "he devoted his chamber in his father's house to a rite which was the first religious movement of his imagination. A pretty altar, ornamented with golden flowers, held a porcelain urn, in which at sunrise he burned aromatic pastilles in honor of his first Divinity, the coming Light."* If one must have a symbol of that which cannot be represented or conceived to the imagination except through limitations which destroy its infinity,† perhaps nothing could better hint the glory and power and beauty and beneficence manifested in the universe than the rising and conquering sun.

In the tradition of the pilgrimage of the Magi, the priests of the religion of Zoroaster, to the infant Jesus, with their gifts, though wholly unhistorical, there may be a veiled recognition of the great gifts of this ancient faith to infant Christianity.

The modern Parsis, though comparatively few in numbers, are a people who do honor to their religion of purity and righteousness, in the thrift, honesty, simplicity, and purity of their daily lives. Like the Jews, they eat no pork. Like them, they respect always the integrity of the marriage relation, which is the basis of all stable civilization. There is no pauper class among them, and they give generously to the poor of other faiths. Their charity is not even limited to those of their own neighborhood, but they practise upon the principle of brotherhood set forth in the parable of the Good Samaritan. We, in America, have reason to remember them with especial good-will and gratitude for their gifts to our Sanitary Commission during the late civil war.

There is so much that is good and exalted in this ancient religion that we wonder, perhaps, that it should now possess such feeble life, while others, less rational and noble, have endured and grown. But the good that came thus into the world has not died, cannot die; neither could it be most widely communicated while localized and monopolized by a single name and creed. Much of its best life has been bestowed upon other religions. It endures in them, until they in turn shall yield up their treasures to the free and universal fellowship of the future, which, recognizing the continuity of religious development, from its lowest to its loftiest manifestations, from the earliest to the latest age, inheriting the best elements of every faith, shall be the Messiah of coming generations, leading the world onward to a more perfect recognition of the brotherhood of man, and the immanence of the one all-bountiful, ever-working Power, that makes for beauty and order and righteousness and peace through all the world.

> "An atom of the self-same fire
> That burned in Zoroaster's soul
> Kindles the humblest heart's desire,
> And beacons our eternal goal!"

Conclusion.

Imperfectly as I have performed my task, may I not hope that it has not been wholly impotent in directing attention to the vast importance and significance of the revelations of this new science of comparative religion? If it appears destructive of some views which mankind, through the inheritance of ages, has come to deem venerable and sacred, believe me that out of decay and disintegration shall grow something far nobler and worthier of our respect and belief than that which is thus destined to pass away. Pure iconoclasm—destruction without substitution—is no longer the accepted method of reform. The beneficent influence of the evolution philosophy is felt here, no less than in its treatment of other topics. Society, like individual man, is seen to be an organism, feeling in every part the influences which affect its several members. Social forms, like the special manifestations of government and religion, have likewise their similitude to organic genesis, development, and decay.

Persistence and Survival of Fundamental Truths.

But if we are forbidden to hope for eternal duration and universal acceptance for particular forms of relig-

---

*Prof. Max Müller.
†Gathâ Ahunavaiti (Yasnas, xxxi. 8), translated by Dr. Haug.
‡Gathâ Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xlv. 11), translated by Dr. Haug.
§Gathâ Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xliii.).
‖Gatha Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xliv.).
Gathâ Ushtaivaiti (Yasnas, xliii.).
††Gathâ Ahunavaiti (Yasnas, xxxiii. 3).
‡‡Article "Zoroaster," Chambers' Ency., vol. x., p. 362; see also Milman's History of Christianity, vol. i., p. 72, seq.

*Yasnas, xxxvii.
†The similarity of the words P(h)ar(i)see and Parsee is noteworthy and suggestive.
‡Judaism and its History, by Rabbi Geiger.

*The West-Easterly Divan, notes, by John Weiss.
†"To define God is to deny him."—Spinoza.

Digitized by Google

ion; if, in the pregnant phrase of George Jacob Holyoake, we are led to abandon "the vain attempt to open the oyster of the world with a Hebrew knife,"—we are enabled to discover more clearly than ever the substance, the life, the essential reality, that underlies all forms, and endures with ever-increasing beneficent influence when they are stricken and pass away, finding its raison d'être in the religious nature of man. As we realize how, by contact, combination, and assimilation, religions, like societies and nations, have grown and improved; as we recognize our debt to other faiths than those which alone we have heretofore deemed ancestral,—a wider horizon of sympathy opens all around us, invisible cords unite us with people of other lands and other creeds, and that which, in its destruction of the entire basis of supernaturalism in Christianity as well as in other religions, seems, to the partial vision of the believer, to threaten the annihilation of religion itself, becomes, in reality, the most powerful influence ever known in promoting that practical recognition of social unity and human brotherhood, which was the loftiest ideal of the founder of Christianity.

To-day, the walls of the sects—and by the sects I mean not only divisions within Christianity, but all the manifold forms of religion in the world, of whatever name—constitute the most substantial impediments to the realization of this ideal. To remove these walls, and invite all peoples to walk in the common sunlight, is the noble office of comparative religion. May the day be not far distant when none may fear to enter into this universal fellowship of seekers for the truth,—a fellowship in which honest differences of opinion and conviction, based on faithful and intelligent research, shall be, not tolerated, but welcomed and respected; and which shall be founded, not upon the shifting sand of any name, however venerable, but upon that common manhood which is more sacred and reverend and enduring than any sectarian designation.

It is as puerile and foolish as it is idle to fear the results of the scientific investigation of the foundation of religions. The Japanese, after generations of study and experiment, are able to dwarf a pine-tree to the dimensions of a house-plant: but how wonderfully useless and inadequate seems the result of all this marvellous patience and skill! And so worse than useless are all efforts, however honestly made, to confine the human mind to dogmatic statements of religious truth. Those "phrases men are accustomed to repeat incessantly," says Goethe, "end by becoming convictions, and ossify the organs of intelligence."

Recognizing, in all humility, how small is that fragment which we call the known, yet wrested, by long ages of patient toil and struggle, from the infinite unknown, but beholding the universe broader and more beautiful to our vision for every achievement of science, does not a profound faith in the integrity and beneficence, everywhere underlying and indwelling,—manifesting itself in the orderly and progressive evolution of physical nature and the life of man,—forbid us to halt or hesitate, but bid us, rather, go forward, joining reverently with the followers of Zoroaster, and the dying Goethe, in the invocation for MORE LIGHT?

Works consulted in the preparation of this paper:—

The Zend-Avesta, translated by Prof. Spiegel and A. H. Bleeck.
The Religion of the Parsis, by Dr. Martin Haug.
Christ and Other Masters, by Archdeacon Hardwick.
The Religion of Israel, by Dr. Abram Kuenen.
The Bible for Learners, by Dr. Oort.
Judaism and its History, by Rabbi Geiger.
Introduction to the Old Testament, by Samuel Davidson, D.D.
History of the Israelites and Judeans, by N. G. De Groot.
History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, by Rev. W. R. Alger.
Progress of Religious Ideas, by L. Maria Child.
Ten Great Religions, by Rev. Jas. Freeman Clarke.
Zoroastrian Studies, by Dr. Windischmann.
The Bible of To-day, by Rev. John W. Chadwick.
Lecture on Zoroaster, by Rev. John W. Chadwick.
Essay, "The Avesta" (Oriental and Linguistic Studies), by Prof. W. D. Whitney.
Essay, "The Zend-Avesta" (Chips, vol. i.), by Prof. Max Müller.
Essay: "The Modern Parsis" (Chips, vol. i.), by Prof. Max Müller.
Childhood of Religions, by Edward Clodd, F.R.A.S.
Journal of the Asiatic Society, article by Sir H. Rawlinson.
The Parsis by Dosabhoy Framjee.
Demonology and Devil-Lore, by Moncure D. Conway.
Christian Orthodoxy, by Dr. Donaldson.
On the Book of Daniel, by Heng-tenburg.
The Study of Sociology, by Herbert Spencer.
The Evolution of Morality, by C. Staniland Wake.
History of the Jewish Church, by Dean Stanley.
West-Easterly Divan, by Goethe, translated by John Weiss.
The Chaldean Account of Genesis, by George Smith.
The Bible: Job, Ezekiel, Daniel, Apocrypha, Gospels, Revelation.
The Talmud (with translations), by Joseph Barclay, LL.D.
Essay on The Talmud, by Emanuel Deutsch.

For the Free Religious Index.

PANTHEISTIC VIEWS.

BY S. H. MORSE.

[From an essay read last winter to some friends in Cambridge.]

I am aware that many good people are adverse to a proclamation of Spiritual or Pantheistic views, because they seem to them to lack a practical bearing on the present hour's need. They feel as though mankind were to be bereft, left, as they phrase it, "without God in the world." Mr. Emerson appears to have fallen into something of that strain, though I doubt if it be more than an appearance. He says in his recent discourse on "The Preacher," "I see movement, I hear aspirations; but I see not how the Great God prepares to satisfy the heart in the new order of things." He hears "a thousand negations, but the oracle does not yet emit any light on the mode of individual life." He exclaims, "Unlovely, nay, frightful is the solitude of that soul without God in the world." You are aware of the claim of the Monday lecturer, who has, as I hear, been contemplating the missionary effects of his own speech both upon the Concord sage and his friend and neighbor, Mr. Alcott. He says, the latter tells him that "Mr. Emerson has become a thoroughgoing Theist;" wishes it to be understood that he is "even a Christian Theist." Mr. Emerson does not speak for himself otherwise than in his public utterances. And, in this latest to which I have referred, there are indeed some things which need interpreting or balancing with other parts, not to be misconstrued. When he says, "Christianity, wholesome, sweet, and poetic!" the eager Orthodox cries, "Ah! at last a confession!" leaving out the words that follow—"It is the record of a pure and holy soul," with not a word about trinity, atonement, or other distinctively Christian tenets. Mr. Emerson asks, "Why not put the best construction on the Christian tenets?" But what he does is to set them quite aside, and, innocently introducing his own philosophy, rebaptize it as Christian. As, for instance, to make the fact more apparent, in the following: "Christianity taught the capacity, the element, to love the All-perfect without a stingy bargain for personal happiness," which declaration is, as you may see, only partially true at the most; for all through the teachings of Christ runs the refrain, "And my Father shall reward you openly;" while the Christian Church has achieved much of its success by quoting Paul's words, of which this is the substance, "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard the glories that await the faithful." But it is of small consequence that Mr. Emerson is thus gracious, since the same discourse abounds in emphatic utterances that have been as it were the Alpha and the Omega of his whole life-long discourse. "Religion"—the quotation is pertinent—"does not grow thin or robust with the health of the votary"; and the following is witness that in this present case the votary is no less robust now than in the earlier years: "We are in a transition from the worship of the fathers which enshrined the law in a private and personal history, to a worship which recognizes the true eternity of the law, its presence to you and me, its equal energy even in what is called brute nature as in what is called sacred history."

While that sentence stands as the last spoken, whatever winds may blow within or about "the Old South," we may still enjoy the felicity of believing that the friend we honor, as he himself hath sung it, doth yet well

"Obey the voice at eve obeyed at prime,"

His life repeating day by day,—

"Lowly faithful, banish fear;
Right onward drive, unharmed.
The port, well worth the cruise, is near,
And every wave is charmed."

In regard to the theistic tendencies of Mr. Emerson, there is the same kind of reassurance. He emphasizes of late the fact of God possibly more than formerly, when his high strain was self-reliance and self-respect; but there is in reality no antagonizing thought. Self-reliance, in his mind, never meant cutting loose from the divine traces, but rather a courage to travel in them, despite the opinion of any or all others that you were following some foolish individual whim or insane idea. The emphatic assertion of God he now makes is a corrective not of himself, but of certain materialistic sentiments that may perhaps be said to "wander all day in the sunlight, among the tribes of animals, unrelated to anything better." And, when he speaks of God as person, it is to get as far away as possible from the individualized deity, and is not at all, as I interpret him, intended as a theistic expression. But I do not strive to "speak by the card." Mr. Emerson himself would probably not be able to draw the line of Theistic vs. Pantheistic to the dividing of a hair, and say, "I stand as a rock," in the one place or the other. One has to use terms, but he need not swear by them until he is black in the face. Let them serve to denote tendencies rather than cast-iron pillars for the universe.

And, then, the question is, after all, not where this or that man thinks he stands, or whether he stand or fall. Ties of friendship make us hope this or that in regard to persons, but the great universe is oblivious; and we, whether joyfully or sorrowfully, must turn to the facts it portrays, and let our hopes come "full circle" or disappear. We are bound up in the "method of nature," and not in any one man's perception of it.

As to whether what I have termed pantheistic views are practical, it were enough to answer: That is hardly our business. We must accept the reality as the practical, having faith in that alone, else we are all at sea; adrift then, sure, without God in the world, and dire vengeances overtaking us.

A word, however, as to the practical side I see. Like the reading of history, which shows us our place in the vast procession of events political and social, so must the reading of the spiritual cosmos, which shows us the God striving everywhere as within ourselves for liberation into fullest expression, have the effect of enlarging and ennobling our natures. To dispense with a God as *over*seer, and find the God as inter-seer, if I may coin the word, is to relate us so intimately with Godhead, that we feel a personal implication, and God-duty, so to speak, running through our lives. Creation, God's creation, becomes our business. We may not shirk the things to be done, and trust providence; while, on the other hand, we are enabled to see the things to be done in their true light, because related to all things. Thus we get, out of spiritual pantheistic philosophy, a sense of law, order, priority of event or circumstance, relative importance of past and present, with the divine energy and purpose inseparable from all manifestation whatever in all times. "Without God in the world?" Indeed, no! not even if the solitary individual think so, and "wander among the tribes of cattle." From the omnipresent there is no escape. The God cannot be lost.

One hears of the "consolations of religion;" and it is a good phrase. We want energy, and this we get by feeling the God-necessity within; we want enterprise, and this we get by sharing the divine vision; we want also to satisfy the heart in each new order of things, while they are still uninterpreted to the intellect. No God can help us who is apart from us, by simply and forever assuring us that he knows what he is about, while we as ignorant menials toil or flounder. We should be, we are, participators. The assuring voice is not from without, but within. Hence the "consolations of religion" are the utterance of the Eternal in our own souls, which effaces all private disappointment and sense of personal loss by the everlasting life that takes all into its bosom for sacred and undying service. Our lives may seem a surrender, and not a triumph: the consolation is that the God in us is not defeated.

So, to be practical, it is best to let the God be active, the God ever intent on universal aims, while we do hold our other selves in such due bounds of obedience as we may or can. There is much philosophy in the Scripture "Wait on the Lord, and be still." A sense of the vast creative effort stretching through all time subdues ambition, and directs our steps with discretion.

"No ray is dimmed, no atom worn,
My oldest force is good as new;
And the fresh rose on yonder thorn
Gives back the bending heavens in dew."

Digitized by Google

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE MODERN REVIEW. A quarterly magazine, January, April, and July. Agent for the United States, Geo. H. Ellis, 101 Milk Street, Boston.

We take great satisfaction in calling the attention of our readers to this admirable Review, of which three numbers have already appeared. If the standard of excellence can be kept up to the point which these numbers reach and maintain, the Review will not be second in ability and attractiveness to any published at the present time in Europe and America; Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, the enterprising printer of our own paper, and the publisher of the Unitarian Review and Christian Register, has taken the agency for America: and we sincerely trust that his efforts to put the Review easily within reach of the American reader will meet with wide appreciation.

The editor of the Review is Mr. Richard Acland Armstrong, who is favorably known already to many of our readers as the translator of Knappert's Religion of Israel, an admirable condensation of the results of Dr. Kuenen. His enterprise is undertaken with a firm conviction that the interests of religion have nothing to fear from the most thorough-going scientific investigation into the records of man's religious life in the past, the course of his development in prehistoric times, or the most fundamental relations of matter and spirit. The reviews already in the field are more or less deeply pledged to traditional orthodoxy, on the one hand, or to agnosticism or atheism, on the other. In the mean time, types of belief at once spiritual and rational find no adequate expression. To furnish a medium for such expression, the Modern Review has been established. Apparently, it will devote much less space to the discussion of current political questions than the other English reviews and magazines. Its contributors will not all be Englishmen, but among them will be the most eminent liberals of America, Germany, France, Holland, and Switzerland. So promises the prospectus, and the promise has been made good by the three numbers that have already appeared. It will attempt to revive the flagging interest of the more thoughtful in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, by naturalizing the reconstructive criticism of the continent. Individual writers will be responsible for themselves alone, and the Review will be kept entirely free from all sectarian taint.

It would be quite impossible for us to give any adequate idea of the contents of the numbers that have been so far published, without exceeding the limits proper for such an article as this. Hereafter, we shall call attention to each separate number at the time of its appearance. So far as the Review has gone, it is exceedingly free and candid, bold and strong. Doubting too much for some, with too much of positive faith for others, in the concreter doctrines of religion, there is abundance here which both the more sceptical and the more orthodox will find profitable and instructive.

The initial number contains a history of Nineteenth Century Reviewing, which is so apt and interesting that the wonder is the task has never been performed before. Two of the most notable articles that have appeared so far are by Philip Henry Wicksteed, the translator of the Bible for Learners. Their subject is "The Miracles of the New Testament." So far as the sentiment of the leading writers is Christian, it is so without any supernatural implication. Farrar's St. Paul is carefully reviewed, and fairly blamed for its uncritical method. An article in the April number on "Science, Theology, and the Evolution of Man," while taking issue with the dogmatism of Haeckel, finds nothing in the Darwinian theory of human origins that is inconsistent with the most spiritual conception of human nature that can be framed. A review of Dr. Martineau's Hours of Thought by Dr. Edwin A. Abbott of Philochristus and Oxford Sermons fame, is a sad example of that obscurantism which is the bane of so much modern thought. Here is a man who rejects every New Testament miracle, as such, and yet contends for the worship of Jesus as "very God of very God." The same pitiful tendency appears again in an article on "Prayer in the Name of Christ" by J. Allanson Picton, a writer who is as eminently unsatisfactory in some of the concreter aspects of his thought as he is satisfactory in some of the remoter. In truth, the best words we have yet found in the Modern Review are in a rejoinder to Picton, from the most Orthodox contributor who has, so far, spoken. Here are a few of his most pungent sayings: "The looseness, shiftiness, and vagueness of the language of the pulpit, have become a stock subject of contemptuous sarcasm. . . . Rationalism once had this cardinal virtue, that it could and would express itself intelligibly and clearly. But we have fallen upon a day when rationalism seems to have lost its frank and fearless mien, to have turned coward and traitor, and to be disposed to hide itself under unsuspicious looking phrases, to put on a mask of Orthodox verbiage, to clothe itself in well-worn garments of conventional respectability, and, when challenged with its deceit, to explain that all this was only a concession to the demands of the religious instincts and affections, and that the rationalistic convictions were unchanged, though for the moment out of sight. So much the worse for rationalism, and, it may be, for religion also."

The April number contains an appreciative sketch of William Lloyd Garrison. The July number has two valuable articles on the expulsion of the Jesuits from France, both insisting on the justice of such expulsion, but not agreeing as to its expediency. Dr. Kuenen has an effective article on "the Critical Method"; and Robert Collyer, in a capital paper on "The Monks of Bolton," fails to obscure the carefulness of his researches by the fascination of his style. Many of the critical notices are excellent. From one of Merx's Joel, it appears that Merx places the book as late as 450 B.C., and Kuenen concurs in this opinion. Reuss has reached the Pentateuch in his Old Testament studies, and confirms the results of Kuenen at every important point. More valuable confirmation could not be had.

THE September number of the North American Review (D. Appleton & Co., New York), just received, has a table of contents of unusual interest. It is as follows: I. THE RUINS OF CENTRAL AMERICA. Part I. Désiré Charnay. II. THE PERPETUITY OF CHINESE INSTITUTIONS. S. Wells Williams. III. THE TRIAL OF MRS. SURRATT. John W. Clampitt. IV. THE PERSONALITY OF GOD. Professor W. T. Harris. V. STEAMBOAT DISASTERS. R. B. Forbes. VI. INSINCERITY IN THE PULPIT. Rev. E. E. Hale. VII. RECENT WORKS ON THE BRAIN AND NERVES. Dr. George M. Beard.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

PROF. HUXLEY favors compulsory vaccination.

GEORGE ELIOT is writing the life of her late husband.

COL. INGERSOLL, it is announced, will deliver a lecture at the Boston Theatre, Sunday evening, Aug. 29.

ONE of the Japanese students in Asbury University at the recent Commencement took the first Latin prize, in a competitive examination.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT is quietly passing the summer, with members of his family, on the well-known breezy island of Hull, Boston harbor, in planning for future literary work and in recreation.

PROF. HENRY M. PAUL, a graduate of Dartmouth College, sailed recently from San Francisco for Tokio, Japan, where he is to have $4,000 a year and a dwelling for three years as a teacher of astronomy.

IN General B. F. Tracy's law-office in Brooklyn, a placard is nailed up, bearing the following words: "The Lord helps those who help themselves, but the Lord help those who help themselves to anything in this place."

MR. JOHN DICKSON, believed to be the last representative of the famous regiment of the "Scots Greys," who charged so gallantly with the heavy cavalry at the battle of Waterloo, died at Nunheadlane, Surrey, Saturday, July 24, at the age of ninety-one.

MISS MARGARET HICKS, who graduated in architecture at Cornell University at its last Commencement, is said to be the first woman in this country to enter her chosen profession. A contemporary remarks that great things in the way of closets are to be hoped for, if women architects become frequent.

THE widow of the late John C. Green has given $100,000 to the American Sunday-school Union, for the purpose of developing a high order of Sabbath-school literature. It would be pleasant to think that some Free Religionist of wealth, who has nearly reached the outer edge of this "brink and shoal of time," might be influenced by the above example to make a like provision for the liberal religious education of the young.

IT is announced that Herbert Spencer intends to make a tour next year round the world by way of the United States and Japan. He will devote two years to it, taking sociological observations at the more important points on the route. One or two scientific friends and one of his secretaries will accompany him on the tour, which will be the immediate preliminary to the completion of his philosophical system as originally planned.

PROF. SAMUEL A. NEALE, fifty-five years old, and one of the most distinguished colored men in the country, has just died at Frederick, Md. He was one of the faculty of Avery College, Allegheny City, Pa., teaching music, mathematics, and other branches. He was a member of the Republican State Central Committee of Pennsylvania, and well known throughout the State. During the Tilden-Hayes campaign, he made speeches in various parts of the country.

MONCURE D. CONWAY who arrived in this country but a few days ago is already much talked about in the papers. We find among others this allusion to him. It is stated that he "went to London eighteen years ago to preach freedom of belief in spiritual matters, and returns to New York now a man forty-eight years old, though he looks to be sixty. His long, untrimmed beard is snow-white, and lines of age are deepening; yet his hair is brown, and his complexion clear and healthful. He says that his London congregation numbers over five hundred now, and among them are many bright, vigorous intellects, graduates of the great universities. The music is said to be the best in London. 'The hymns we sing are from the works of Dante and Goethe and of other great poets. Above the platform where I sit are to be built three arches, with the name Jesus over the central arch, with Buddha over the left arch, and Shakespeare the right. Then on a brilliant frieze running around the chapel are to be painted in brilliant colors the names of Zoroaster, Socrates, Confucius, Pythagoras, Plato, Marcus Aurelius, Seneca, Mohammed, Socinius, Servetus, Swedenborg, Channing, Theodore Parker, and other great religious teachers.'"

AMONG the contributions to the interest of the late wedding party of Prof. Willard Fiske of Cornell University, and his bride, at the residence of Minister White in Germany, was the following little gem of a speech from Dr. Berthold Auerbach, the great German author: "We have witnessed to-day the formation of an American union; but it has been concluded upon German soil. Our friend Fiske has devoted himself to the investigation of the Germanic north, and as a representative of the literature of the world, of which Goethe prophesied to us, but which, after all, is best cultivated by the maintenance of each one's nationality. But, while each nation is bound to cultivate its own literature, those who interpret to it the literatures of other nations render a great service; and this is the service which Prof. Fiske has so well rendered to his own country. I am also reminded here that this is a somewhat Homeric and classical episode. As Ulysses came forth from Ithaca, wandered about the world seeing many noted cities and famous men, so may our friend, the bridegroom of to-day, having found his wife on foreign soil, return like Ulysses to Ithaca and find a happy and prosperous home." The happy couple are expected to reach home during the holidays.

POETRY.

Selected.

THE STRANGERS.

Each care-worn face is but a book
To tell of houses bought or sold;
Or filled with words that men have took
From those who lived and spoke of old.

I see none whom I know, for they
See other things than him they meet;
And though they stop me by the way,
'Tis still some other one they greet.

There are no words that reach mine ear;
Those speak who tell of other things
Than what they mean for me to hear,
For in their speech the counter rings.

I would be where each speech is true,
Each eye sees what it looks upon;
For here my eye has seen but few
Who in each act that act have done.

—James Very.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 26, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

THE proof-reading in the printing-office of the Index is exceptionally good. But in an essay like Mr. Janes's it would be a wonder if some typographical errors should not occur. So last week Ishtar was printed Ishbar, and Spitama was not always spelled right. And possibly some other errors will have to be excused.

THE Florence (Mass.) School Suffrage Association petitions the school-board of the town for a division of the primary schools. It proposes that one section of each school shall attend in the morning, the other in the afternoon. It is claimed that this would enable teachers to give more individual training, the children would be more actively employed while in school, and hence have less opportunity to acquire listless habits, the air of the school-room would be purer, and a great gain effected every way.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200.00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass.	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.	18.35
MRS. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass.	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo.	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00
Mrs. S. W. RATHBONE, Princeton, Mass.	5.00
FRANCIS SPRINGER, Columbus City, Iowa	10 00
DANA B. HUMPHREY, New Bedford, Mass.	25.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock, and the same annually for 4 following years	50.00
ELIZABETH S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

TWO NEEDS.

Liberalism has a great cause to defend,—a cause, too, as sacred as any that exists on earth. Its object is to secure and maintain the freedom of the human mind. The claim is often made in these days, we are aware, that the battle for mental liberty is already won, and that now the main thing is to learn how to use liberty. But the question how to use liberty is always in order. Liberty is not something that is first to be sought for itself, and then to be put to use for some other thing; but it is to be sought always and solely because it is the one essential condition by which the human mind can do its legitimate service of thinking and acting for human welfare.

We notice, too, that the claim that the battle for mental liberty is already won is made chiefly by those who, having found all the freedom they want for their own thought, think that precisely that is the safe limit for their neighbors' thought,—that anything beyond is only dangerous vagary not worth contending for; a principle not essentially different from that upon which the opponents of freethought have acted in every age. But the contest for intellectual freedom is not won so long as a scholar of the acknowledged ability and character of Professor Robertson Smith, of Scotland, is pursued in his studies by a band of ecclesiastical detectives, compelled to stand a harassing ecclesiastical trial for the published results of his scholarly inquiries, and made liable at any time to suffer therefor in his pecuniary estate and in the opportunity for farther prosecuting his investigations. Mental liberty is not secured while a man like our own Francis E. Abbot, admitted to stand among the foremost minds of the country in philosophical talent, and admired everywhere for his moral purity, is debarred because of his theological opinions from the professor's chair to which his gifts naturally call him, and which many a college would be glad to honor itself by conferring upon him, were he of Orthodox faith. The battle for liberty of thought is not ended so long as the statute-books have respect for persons on account of religious beliefs,—so long as they still retain laws for Sabbath observance, and exclude from juries and the witness-stand or impose any other civil disability upon persons who do not accept certain theological tenets. There is therefore a vast contest still to be waged ere complete liberty of thought is secured and all honest thinkers stand on equal ground both before the civil law and the law of public opinion.

But the conditions of this contest change with the changing generations; and to-day there are two special needs which must be kept in the forefront, if the battle is to be conducted most effectually.

First, there is special need of a broad and profound culture. Two or three generations ago, the battle for freethought was fought on different ground and in ruder style than are required in our time. It was then Deism against a special plenary inspiration of the Bible, or natural religion against revealed; and it was comparatively easy, so far as logic was concerned, to demolish the Orthodox theory of revelation by showing up the intellectual and moral absurdities that may be found almost without number in the Bible. The simple, vigorous appeal to common-sense, the rough ridicule, the sharp sarcasm, in which such writers as Paine and Volney abounded, were then in order; and the service required little further mental equipment. This work was well done in its proper time. As the result of it and of the more general enlightenment which has since come, the old theory of revelation is now only advocated here and there by a few fossil theologians. It may still be retained in the verbal creeds, but it has ceased as a vital and growing power. The ruling brains, at least in the Protestant branch of the Christian Church, have taken up a new position with regard to revelation, hold new views of the Bible and of the origin of religion, interpret the doctrine of inspiration and of the divine education of mankind quite differently from their ecclesiastical progenitors. They have very materially broadened the theological vision. They have greatly enlarged the scope of theological scholarship. They have entrenched themselves within a wider and more natural religious philosophy. And, in consequence, Liberalism is only to a large degree wasting its strength when it continues to direct its chief assault, as so many of its organs and spokesmen are still doing, against the old positions with the old weapons. Some of this work may still need to be done. There are certain obscure corners of Orthodoxy where the old mode of warfare may be yet demanded. But it is a crude, narrow mode; and, as it is adapted to the condition of a half-educated community, so it is rapidly coming to be regarded as indicating the imperfect education of those who use it. Colonel Ingersoll, we think, is tempted in his popular lecturing to fall too much into this method for his own best efficiency. His shafts are pointed against a creed already obsolescent; but not many of them reach the positions of the new Orthodoxy. Adequately to cover the demands of this time, Liberalism must prepare itself to meet scholarship with scholarship, to match the learning of the Church with a learning more comprehensive and more accurate, to put against the philosophy of the Church a philosophy at once more broad and more profound.

Second, and not less but even more important, there is special need that Liberalism should present to the world to-day a thoroughly vigorous and pure morality. Morality has been so long and persistently implicated with certain systems of theology that there is danger, when these systems fall, lest people who have been taught to put their trust in them should come to believe that there is no standard of morality left. A part of the prevailing immorality of the times can perhaps be justly traced to this source. The old sanctions of the moral law among those who have had an Orthodox theological education are to large extent undermined. The new sanctions are not yet seen and felt in their place. Meantime, people are asking if the individual human being, in his natural instincts and dispositions, be not a law unto himself; and not a few in the ranks both of Orthodoxy and Liberalism are acting as if this theory were true. Now, the burden of proof rests upon Liberalism, which denies the old theological basis of morality, to show that this theory is not true. The obligation presses upon it—and it is an obligation which it will refuse to take up at its peril—to set forth a system of ethics more solid than the old theological system,—a system, namely, founded in the nature of things, below all theologies, independent of them, and seen to inhere in the necessary relations of human beings with one another in the mutual bond of society. In accord with such a system of ethics, Liberalism will proclaim that, for every individual right justly claimed or accorded, there is an individual duty assumed toward some other individual or society; that the essential condition of morality is the maintenance of the equation of rights between human beings in their relations to each other. And not only does the obligation rest on Liberalism to show theoretically that the true basis of the moral law stands, though the theologies fall, but to illustrate the same truth practically. The illustration in practical conduct will be in fact a better educator of the popular mind than any philosophical elaboration of the theory. It is not enough that Liberalism should have as good actual morality as the churches. It should have a better. It should show itself more honest, more pure, more generous and aspiring. Then, whatever doubt people may entertain about its philosophy, they will see that it is in fact promotive of human welfare.

Digitized by Google

To sum up, the two requirements of Liberalism in religion to-day are, first, thoroughly to meet the scholarship that is striving to reform the old theologies, and to bury it beneath a larger culture; and, second, to shame the churches by a higher and more stable standard of morality than their own, and by a purer practice.

It is announced that Mr. Thomas Hughes, the distinguished author of Tom Brown at Rugby, has arrived in this country upon an errand of singular social and industrial interest. Mr. Hughes comes as the leader of an enterprise that has sprung up in England among what may be called well-to-do or middle-class people,—to lay the foundation of a new, select, local community in America. The choice of Mr. Hughes for the responsibilities which he assumes in initiating and putting into operation the plans of the movement is a most fortunate one. His well-known sympathy with young persons, and experience in coöperative unions and in efforts for the improvement of the working class, admirably qualify him for the undertaking. The site chosen is an elevated plateau known as the table-lands of Tennessee. It comprises an elevated area of one hundred and twenty-five miles long, and about half as wide, or a large part of the State, which is described as "a series of natural parks, with deep gorges cut by mountain streams, shaded and fringed with verdure," environed by impressive and picturesque scenery. The climate is said to be unsurpassed, the soil abundant in minerals and timber, rich in fertility, and adapted to the growth of fruits, grains, and a great variety of products. Mr. Hughes writes of the proposed colony that it is hoped "to make it in all respects a very fine specimen of the 'town of the future.' In this connection, I may state my own opinion that we can scarcely be too liberal in reserving sites for the purposes of recreation, and have already provided for a cricket-ground and English garden and public parks. In the end, we shall be repaid in all ways for keeping a pretty tight hand, developing the place as we should wish to have done, were we to be called fifty years hence, by a jury of our grandchildren, to give account of our stewardship to those who are to be then possessing, let us hope, one of the most lovely and honest habitations of the children of men."

On the "Empire State" last Sunday, in her excursion to the Isles of Shoals, there were certain emissaries of the Church who were apparently trying the new tactics of following up the excursionists with "religious services." They had very solemn faces, and, during nearly the whole of the beautiful day, kept very close to the ladies' saloon, singing the Moody and Sankey hymns. One of their "services" was brought, however, to a premature close by an enthusiastic, jolly Democrat, a son of Erin evidently, who became greatly excited in singing "Hold the Fort," and extemporized a final verse for Hancock. The crowd laughed and cheered. The leader of the meeting summarily closed the piano, and squelched this Sunday political meeting.

In Chicago there is a journal printed in the Bohemian language,—the Svornost. We see that it is talking about Dr. Tanner, Garfield and Hancock, Temperenc-larsky Neal Dow, and Tajemnik Schurz's speech at Indianapolis. We recognize also a familiar cut of a sewing-machine in one corner, and the face of a hop-bitters man in another column. It contains, too, in a recent issue a notice of the Free Religious Index, which we gladly assume is complimentary, and—reciprocate. At least if "svobodomyslny" is not a compliment, we don't know what it can be. But we must, nevertheless, candidly confess our opinion that a language which has such words as "srozumitelnĕji" and "nejvymluvnĕjsim" has certain natural obstacles to encounter. After studying this interesting sheet, we no longer wonder that "bohemian" has come to mean in the newspaper-world a certain rough recklessness of adventure. Yet we welcome Svornost to our exchange list.

LETTER FROM MRS. CHENEY.

AGAMENTICUS, Me., Aug. 15, 1880.

Dear Editor:—

I suppose even the readers of the Index like to relax a little in dog-days, and so I will send you a rambling letter from this interesting place, wishing it might carry the refreshment of air and sea and the strength of the rocks to the weary toilers of the earth who cannot be partakers of these blessings which bountiful Providence seems to have spread so lavishly.

We are in the township of York, once Agamenticus, one of the earliest settlements on the coast of Maine. The coast is as wild and rugged as can be found anywhere in New England, and nowhere have the convulsions of past ages written their stories more broadly on the face of nature. The Igneous and Aqueous schools of geology might fight out their battles here with ammunition ready to their hands; for, on one side, the strata lie as regularly and smoothly side by side as the stripes of a ribbon, and, close by, the fire seems to have melted all manner of substances together till the rocks look like the slag of a furnace.

Full of scientific interest, they are not less tempting to the artist, for their varied composition gives a boldness and variety of outline and a wealth of color not often found among our granite ledges. Here, too, are caves in which pirates or smugglers might hide their ill-gotten gains, and spouting horns which resound from afar. The zoölogist has his share. The tide-pools abound in the sea-anemone, slowly opening out its brilliant fringes; while their bottoms are carpeted with star-fishes and sea-urchins without number. We can sit on the rocks for hours, watching the long sea-weed sway to and fro with the swelling of the tide about the low outlying rocks. The rich coating of barnacles makes the rocks beautiful with fretwork; while the sturdy golden-rod, the Solidago sempervirens, plants itself between the barest rocks close down to the verge of the sea, and, the very Dr. Tanner of flowers, proves itself able to live and blossom on moisture alone. The rough pastures above are covered with the largest and sweetest of berries,—at least five or six kinds of blueberries and huckleberries, with a sprinkling of cranberries and blackberries. These furnish a sufficient dessert for dinners "of the abundance of the sea and treasures hid in the sand," with which our hostess regales us.

But Agamenticus has also a remarkable spiritual history. John Adams in his letters speaks of the wonderful ministry of Samuel Moody, which Mr. Tenney has wrought into his story. Although tradition has surrounded him with many mythical stories, even in so short a period as two hundred years, yet there was doubtless a wonderful work done here in the reformation of a wild, idle, pleasure-seeking, drunken community. Parson Moody was very like the man "after God's own heart," in energy of character and quickness of temper; but, in whatever form of speech he phrased it, his one thought and purpose seemed to be to persuade his fellow-citizens to live the life of men, and not of beasts. He used the terrible imagery of hell to enforce his meaning, but his meaning was a change of life here and now.

His work seems to have been thoroughly done; for the population here is as sober, industrious, and thriving as any in the land, although all their wealth is wrung from a hard soil or a stormy sea.

An important question to those who love "to tempt the briny wave" is the temperature of the water, and it would be interesting to have statistics on this point from the various watering-places. Here for ten days past the thermometer has ranged from 16° Centigrade to 20°, or from about 60° to 68° Fahrenheit. On the coldest days, the wind has been north or north-west, on the warmest day it was from the east. But this cold bathing to those able to bear it is extremely exhilarating, and it is a luxury to feel the glow on the surface while a delicious coolness pervades the whole body, as if every drop of blood had been washed and aired.

Michelet closes his beautiful, poetic rhapsody La Mer with an account of a sea-side sanitarium for poor children. Happily, his words have found an echo in our country. Blessings on Mr. Hale, and all those who have aided him, in taking the poor little children out of the crowded city for the restoring sea-breeze. This is a work of religion and humanity, and every one who has the privilege of a rest by the sea ought to do his part in helping it on. For a brief time, this utter rest in the bosom of Nature is good, but only for a little time. Back to the scenes of work and struggle, we must all come. May it be with greater strength, more loving hearts, and tenderer forbearance for one another!

E. D. C.

OUR LIBRARY.

II. British Poets.

In order of time, Burns stands first; but his Holy Willie's Prayer, Holy Fair, Address to the Unco Guid, and other satires, contain too many personalities and vulgarities to be properly called poetry. Byron, too, bitterly as he hated despotism, has given us no complete work which need be referred to here, except the Vision of Judgment, where he ridicules the old-fashioned fancies of St. Peter at the gate and the recording angel, and represents himself as afraid of being damned for hoping that no one else will be so.

When we consider not only freedom of conception and earliness of date, but beauty of form and diligence in execution, we must place Shelley before any other poet. He is our pioneer upon Parnassus. Especially remarkable is his Prometheus Unbound, if only for its influence over Bayard Taylor's Prince Deukalion. Both dramas are in four parts or acts, both sing the fall of superstition and the reign of freethought, and both are richest in choral passages. Shelley's poem has more unity, the leading personages being few, and the time of action but a single day, while Bayard Taylor's throng of characters roam on from the third century indefinitely, far beyond the nineteenth. But the American poet has a clearer style and a command of history and science which makes him more forcible than his shadowy forerunner, though the latter is the grander and also much the more musical.

Prometheus, the ideal philanthropist and emancipator, is tortured by nothing so much as by the vision the Furies show of him, to whom he says:—

> "Thy name I will not speak,
> It hath become a curse. I see
> The wise, the mild, the lofty, and the just,
> Whom thy slaves hate for being like to this."

Digitized by Google

At last, the terrible mystery, called Demogorgon, rises from the throne where it has sate, shrouded in darkness, and before it falls Jupiter, who represents all anthropomorphic conceptions of God. Then all political and religious tyrannies cease at once, and man's nature becomes its own divine control.

This same idea, that all evil comes from submission to tyranny and superstition, and all good is to be expected from freedom, is further to be found in his magnificent Ode to Liberty, The Masque of Anarchy, and The Revolt of Islam, a long narrative, opening with the author's account of his devoting himself in boyhood to the emancipation of his race. All these works show bitter hatred of which he attacks with great severity in his early poem, Queen Mab, especially in the sixth and seventh parts, but seldom reprinted. The sweetest utterances of his love of liberty are to be found in the wondrous chorus at the beginning of his drama, Hellas.

"The Galilean serpent,"

No American poet has shown such faith in freedom; and, indeed, we might think it due to Shelley's having been born just before the French Revolution, if a double portion of his spirit had not descended on one of the younger of our bards. Swinburne has not only all Shelley's love of liberty, boldness of speech, and command of rhyme and rhythm, but also just that clearness of conception and correctness in proportion, which were all his forerunner lacked to be a great poet. Is it because these two are the boldest of all the bards who have sung on our side, that they have been the most melodious?

In Swinburne's Songs before Sunrise may be found a number of grand poems, dwelling mainly on the liberation of Italy from political and religious tyranny, and full of hope that both kinds of despotism are soon to fall everywhere. Thus, in his Halt Before Rome, he says to the "Chosen of Freedom,"—

"The sheep of the priests and the cattle
That feed in the penfolds of kings,
Sleek is their flock and well fed;
Hardly she giveth you bread,
Hardly a rest for the head,
Till the day of the blast of the battle
And the storm of the wind of her wings.

"She, without shelter or station,
She, beyond limit or bar,
Urges to slumberless speed
Armies that famish, that bleed,
Sowing their lives for her seed,
That their dust may rebuild her a nation,
That their souls may relight her a star."

Equally grand is the appeal of Liberty to slumbering England in Perinde ac Cadaver:—

"Why wilt thou hate me and die?
For none can hate me and live."

His most remarkable theological poems are: Hertha, which may be called an adaptation of Emerson's Brahma to advanced thought, Christmas Antiphonies, Before a Crucifix, and the Hymn of Man. The latter is an eloquent appeal to worship Humanity, because "He hath stirred him, and found out the flaw in his fetters and cast them behind;

His soul to his soul is a law, and his mind is a light to his mind,
The seal of his knowledge is sure, the truth and his spirit are wed;
Men perish, but man shall endure, lives die, but the life is not dead.
Who are ye that would bind him with curses, and blind him with weapons of prayer?
Your might is as night that disperses when light is alive in the air."

His deepest and strongest words about theology seem to me, however, to be in the Birthday Ode to Victor Hugo, one of the four Songs of the Springtides:—

"Yea, even at night's full noon
Light's birth-song brake in tune,
Spoke, witnessing that with us one must be
God; naming so by name
That priests have brought to shame
The strength whose scourge sounds on the smitten sea;
The mystery manifold of might
Which bids the winds give back to night the things of night,
Even God, the unknown of all time, force, or thought,
Nature or fate or will,
Clothed round with good and ill,
Veiled and revealed of all things and of nought,
Hooded and helmed with mystery, girt and shod
With light and darkness, unapparent God."

Gerald Massey might well be placed, on account of the zeal for liberty he shows in such stirring pieces as Onward and Sunward and The People's Advent, beside Shelley and Swinburne, if he were their equal in versification. He and Swinburne may be called poets of the dawn, as Shelley sang ever in moonlight. But we pass into full day as we find Hood, in An Open Question, making fun of those who are "Putting too much Sabbath into Sunday."

I know of no sunnier shaft against any Sabbatarian and bigot than his matchless Ode to Rae Wilson, Esq. And his thrilling appeals for the down-trodden, for instance The Song of the Shirt, The Bridge of Sighs, and The Lady's Dream, show that those who think of him only as a humorist do great injustice to his merits as a free-thinker and a philanthropist.

From his daylight, we sink back into the shadows, as we take up Clough and Matthew Arnold. For both, the dawn of freethought is darkened by fear that men may discard too much of the old morality with the out-grown theology. Clough's most characteristic poem is The New Sinai, where he pictures God as sitting in the gloom of atheistic systems and sceptic darkness, waiting to reveal himself as soon as idol forms and idol thoughts shall have passed away. Very peculiar and suggestive, though not very cheering, are also his Dipsychus, The Latest Decalogue, The Shadow, and Easter Day.

Matthew Arnold's most earnest strain is this:—

"Hath man no second life? Pitch this one high.
Sits there no judge in heaven our sins to see?
More strictly then the inward judge obey.
Was Christ a man like us? Ah, let us try
If we, then too, can be such men as he.

The same thought runs through his poem on Progress. Somewhat brighter is the sonnet on Religious Isolation, written to rebuke the childish craving to have others agree with us. And East and West comes like a gleam of sunshine, with its legend of the two saints, one from the east, bright with "the sun's fronting ray," and the other from the west, with "unsunned face," and its declaration

"Ah, now 'tis changed! In conquering sunshine bright
The man of the bold West now comes arrayed;
He of the mystic East is touched with night."

Some of the darkness of the mystic East is still to be found in Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia, much as this interesting account of the Buddha is doing to spread abroad the grand truth of the essential equality of the great religions. The poet has, certainly, not exaggerated the lack of faith in God and immortality, that is so remarkable in a system which has fed more souls than any other. Indeed, he is charged with not having done this peculiarity full justice. Its pessimism he reproduces with painful accuracy, and without venturing to go beyond his originals so far as to point out the fact that, while some of our desires are harmful in their tendencies and need suppression, as the Buddha enjoined, there are others full of happiness, not only for the individual, but for the race. With the doctrine of the miseries of life must join that of its possibilities, and to the duty of self-control must be added that of self-culture, in order to make a system which shall be a light for us.

Darkest of all the authors here to be considered is Palgrave, seven of whose Lyrical Poems complain that science is sweeping away all faith in God, the soul, and immortality, and urge us to try to base these doctrines on the unstable foundation of individual intuition.

Bright enough, but somewhat faint and scanty, considering the decided views and high ability of the author of The Spanish Gypsy, are the protests against intolerance she gives us there; but her lofty aspiration, has been found the most fitting farewell with which the freethinker may be laid to rest.

"Oh, May I join the Choir Invisible,"

It is cheering to find that Tennyson, Charles Kingsley, and Robert Browning, while holding positions less advanced than most of the writers already named, have now and then flung forward to us flowers of song, which deserve to bloom on the crests of our foremost champions. Especially should we be grateful to Tennyson for his Higher Pantheism, and his denial that doubt is devil-born, which is one of the best known passages of In Memoriam: to Kingsley, for his stirring prophecy of the coming of the Day of the Lord; and to Robert Browning, for The Confessional, Bishop Blougram's Apology, with its admission that no one can "Blot out cosmogony,

Geology, Ethnology, what not (Greek endings, with the little passing-bell
That signifies some faith's about to die)," for the demonstration that the Setebos, whom Caliban is represented as clothing with all his own malice and caprice, is far inferior to

"Something quiet o'er his head,
Out of his reach, that feels not joy nor grief,
Since both derive from weakness in some way," for the comparison of St. Peter's Church to a scorpion, with both arms spread out to take in the advance of heads and hearts, and finally for Holy Cross Day, where the persecuted Jews call upon Jesus, to see that they have made full atonement for all sins against him, and to take sides with them against those who are as much his enemies as theirs.

Such even, under this hurried survey, is the richness of British poetry, that American authors should do their utmost to have freethought as boldly and musically expressed among us.

F. M. H.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

An argument which has been used with some force in opposition to the development hypothesis of the origin of the human race is that very few human bones have been found in those strata of the earth which, according to this theory, must have been deposited during the lifetime of the race or of the race's immediate ancestors. This is, it is true, only a negative argument, and at best an appeal to ignorance, and has been answered heretofore chiefly by a reference to the fact that only a very little of the earth has been thoroughly explored; but it can be better answered hereafter by the recent discovery that human bones are much more destructible than we have been wont to believe. Haarlem Lake, which the Dutch government drained in 1853, had been the scene of many shipwrecks and naval fights, and thousands of bodies are known to have been deposited beneath its waves; and yet, in the canals and trenches dug to a considerable depth in the rescued land, aggregating thousands of miles in length, not a single human bone has been found. Coins, weapons, and fragments of vessels are found, but no bones. Inasmuch as the lake was originally formed by an inundation in the latter part of the sixteenth century, the deposit dug through is only three hundred years old. It is possible, of course, that some peculiarity in the chemical character of the formation may account for this quick disappearance of human remains, but the fact of their complete disappearance is nevertheless significant and worthy of record.

Digitized by Google

THE dispute with regard to the origin of the human race—whether it came from a single pair, or, as Agassiz believed, had several centres of independent origin—is a question which has lost much of its interest, since those best qualified to pronounce an opinion have begun to believe that neither position can be strictly correct; but an allied subject, the variations producible in the human race by natural causes, has lost none of its interest, and is daily discovered to be of unexpected practical importance. It is now generally believed, for instance, that climate alone can modify the human race to a remarkable degree. Respiration, pulse, the kidneys and skin, temperature, weight, and strength are all affected, and may be permanently changed, by a removal from tropical to temperate or from temperate to tropical climates. In the matter of respiration, for instance, there is, it is said, in the tropics an increase in the capacity of the chest for air, but a decrease in the number of respirations. The lungs, therefore, contain more air, but less blood in tropical than in temperate climates,—the blood being in part diverted to the skin and liver; and they eliminate less carbon, to the extent of half an ounce in twenty-four hours. This relation of climate to respiration and the consequent elimination of carbon—a fact which might once have been thought important only from a hygienic point of view, and to be used, if at all, in regulating diet—will eventually be recognized, we believe, as a not unimportant factor in investigating the origins of systems of civilization, of morals and religion.

ANOTHER fact, suggesting inferences analogous to those drawn from the one just mentioned, is that the blood of the Bengalee contains fewer red corpuscles than the blood of the European; and the difference is believed to be due chiefly, if not wholly, to the circumstance that the Bengalee is an inhabitant of swamps and jungles, and necessarily, therefore, of lower organization than an inhabitant of breezy and well-cultivated uplands. "According to this theory," says a London journal, "the moral elevation of the Bengalee must depend largely upon some method of treatment which may tend to increase the amount of red corpuscles, and this is a problem which ought not to be difficult of a solution in a period of extended physiological discovery like the present." And thus corpuscles and swamps, physiology and morals and religion, climate and civilization, are gradually proven to have intimate relations with one another, which a few generations ago it would have been thought blasphemous even to hint at.

It is rather an odd coincidence that, since writing the above lines, we have come across the announcement of a paper entitled "Effects of Certain Drugs in Increasing or Diminishing Red Blood-Corpuscles," by Dr. Cutter of the Harvard Medical School.

THE Lippincotts have for sale in this country, and Sonneschein & Allen publish in London, An Elementary Text-Book of Botany, translated from the German of Dr. Prantl and revised by S. H. Vines. We should be glad of a large circulation for this book (which, by the way, is not at all "elementary" in the sense of being a science primer), because, as we learn from the Athenæum, it is virtually a digest of the Lehrbuch of Professor Sachs, to whom, perhaps, many persons believe, more than to any one else, we are indebted for giving a new aspect to botanical science. English investigators hold their own, without doubt, in systematic botany; and Mr. Darwin, aside from the new light thrown upon botany as upon other branches of natural science by his wonderful theory, has written several remarkable works upon plant action, and Mr. Spencer, also, some years ago made positive contributions to botanical science; but, with these exceptions, nearly all, or at least the most important, recent advances in chemical and physical questions connected with vegetable physiology have been made by the Germans. One very important generalization, connected with the alternations of generation in plants, is that a spore at one time or in one group of plants will grow into something very different, and thus groups of plants supposed to be remote from one another are found to be closely linked together. This fact transfers to "environment" a portion of the emphasis which has of late been placed upon "heredity," and will without doubt eventually simplify some of the problems of the theory of development. (Perhaps we should not leave this part of our subject without mentioning the fact that one of our own botanists, Professor Farlow of the Bussey Institution, has discovered that several algæ of different varieties, making the green scum of stagnant water, all belong to the same family, and that a certain cedar-tree fungus is only one stage of the plant's development, the same plant appearing in its second stage as an apple-tree fungus.) A more important generalization, however, has been derived by the Germans from the study of the molecular nature of cell membranes and the discrimination and definition of particular layers of cellular tissue. No reader of Professor Haeckel's Evolution of Man can ever forget his masterly handling of the cellular tissue of the embryonic membranes of animals, or the overwhelming force of his argument, derived therefrom, regarding the evolution of the human race. But three such layers in the developing embryo of flowering plants have now been successfully correlated with the cellular layers of the embryonic membranes of animals. This is really one of those great generalizations of which we do not expect more than one in a generation. A perception of its vast importance is of course beyond the popular ken, and even thoughtful students will fail to take in the length and breadth of the vista which it opens before us. A very little reflection, however, suffices for the conviction that no theory of vitality is henceforth complete which ignores the vegetable world, and that many cherished theologies and philosophies are destined to fade into nothingness, because unable to assimilate this apparently insignificant but really sublime discovery. How puerile indeed appear the thaumaturgical tales which men have put into Bibles and accepted as revelations, when compared with some of the real revelations which the microscope is now silently disclosing to patient seekers!

R. C.

"ARE you prepared for death?" the clergyman asked, with a tremor of emotion in his voice, as he took the sick woman's hand in his own. A shade of patient thought crossed the invalid's face, and by-and-by she said she didn't believe she was: there was the bedroom carpet to be taken up yet, and the paint upstairs had hardly been touched, and she did want to put up new curtains in the dining-room, but she thought if she did not die until next Monday she would be about as near ready as a woman with a big family and no girl ever expected to be.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Arbitration in Labor Difficulties.

The essential feature of the method of arbitration is the consideration and settlement of points in dispute between employés and employers by a council or board of representatives from both parties. This arrangement may be special and temporary, designed to meet a particular case and dissolving when that is settled; or general and permanent, maintaining a continuous existence and ready for any emergency. The advantages of the latter mode may be readily appreciated. Organized before any serious difficulty has arisen or been prolonged to an unmanageable extent, its form may be determined, its rules adopted, its members and officers selected in calm judgment and careful oversight. It can take up any question of controversy in comparative freedom from excitement and passion, and possibly come to some satisfactory result.

Some time since, the Governor of Pennsylvania, under the authority of the Legislature of that State, appointed a commissioner to visit England, personally investigate the practical operation of the methods as there adopted, and make report thereon. The agent seems to have been fitly chosen, and his report comprehensive, thorough, and discriminating. This report,* published last year, lies before us. From it we glean these salient facts. The year 1860 marks the establishment of the first permanent board of arbitration in England. (Temporary arbitration had been previously tried with some success in certain instances.) This began with the hosiery and glove trade at Nottingham, in the efforts of Mr. A. J. Mundella, M.P. A few years later, a similar organization was effected in the building trades at Wolverhampton, the lace trade of Nottingham, the North of England manufactured-iron trade, the coal trade in Northumberland, Durham, South Wales, and elsewhere, as well as various other miscellaneous industries, scattered throughout the country. These boards differ in unimportant details and to some extent in essential features. The best judgment and largest experience have decided upon the following as the necessary elements of successful working.

I. An equal representation of employers and employed, each party choosing its own. Where there are several companies of the former, or different branches of work are carried on by the latter, each company and each branch are to be distinctly and proportionately recognized in the election of delegates.

II. An annual meeting for choice of officers, and regular semi-annual or quarterly meetings for business and consideration of the interests of the trade; also, special meetings, whenever necessary or called for.

III. A president, secretary, and other necessary officers to be chosen by the board from its own members; also, an umpire not of its own number, who may be either an expert in the trade, or one reliable for general judgment and worth of character.

IV. All grave differences, and all disputes involving the general interests, to be referred first to a sub-committee for friendly consideration and amicable arrangement. This mode of settlement is that known as conciliation. By this, too, all minor questions, and all differences between individuals, are to be alone determined. In the graver cases, should an agreement not be reached in the *Report of the Practical Operation of Arbitration and Conciliation in the Settlement of Differences between Employers and Employed in England. By Jos. D. Weeks, Special Commissioner of the State of Pennsylvania, etc.

Digitized by Google

sub-committee, the matter is then referred to the full board for arbitration. If possible, a written statement, presenting the case for both parties, is offered; if not, one from each side. Sometimes a further hearing is had from special delegates who are allowed to state their case in person to the board. The subject is then fully and freely discussed, and eventually a vote taken. Should the board fail to agree, the case is then referred to the umpire, who, after careful examination of all that has been offered, renders a final decision. The enforcement of this decision is, in some cases, left to the good faith of all parties; in others, it is rendered obligatory and provision is made for it.

V. These boards to be voluntary in their character. Although Parliament has passed various acts, at different periods, under which boards of arbitration may be legally organized, providing for compulsory enforcement of their decisions, and enacting penalties for refusal to abide by them, yet these acts remain virtually dead letters, it being, in the judgment of those best informed and most interested, essential to the successful working of the method that it should rest upon the mutual agreements of both parties. Such agreements are made beforehand, and embraced in the standing rules of the board. One of these agreements thus made is to the effect that there shall be no discharges on the one side or stopping from work on the other, without previous notice for a time fixed upon in the engagements. A further agreement pledges both "masters and men not to interfere with any man on account of his being a society or non-society man." These societies—unions of employers or of employed—are recognized as legitimate, and made available for the election of delegates to the board. The delegates, however, never represent the societies, nor are they to be confined to them.

The above are simply the general features universally requisite: other special features will characterize particular organizations, according to the demands of the trades which they respectively represent.

The practical question, of course, with regard to these attempts at arbitration, is, How do they work? Variously, it must be frankly confessed. The award may be rejected, and the difficulties continue. Again, though just and equitable, the best possible under the circumstances, it may be disappointing to the workmen, and so occasion more or less complaint at first, and be somewhat grudgingly accepted afterward. Or it may be welcomed at once by both parties, and faithfully carried out. All these results have followed in the cases under consideration. When faith in the method, confidence in the delegates selected, and especially in the fairness and ability of the umpire chosen, have attended the effort, it was most successful. So, too, the continuance of the habit of arbitration, the improvements made in the rules of proceeding, the substitution of better methods for those proved insufficient,—all help to more satisfactory results. These results, all things considered, have been often better than, under existing circumstances, were to have been expected. The successful settlement of particular subjects of dispute is not the only or the highest result of arbitration. Its best consequence has been an improved feeling between employer and employed, their more cordial relations, the removal of old suspicions and hostilities, and the introduction of mutual trust and coöperation. It is the substitution of reason for force; a slow process, liable to frequent failures, but ever advancing to better success. Hence it is regarded as full of promise by those who have most experience in it. These speak very hopefully of its future under fair and faithful trial. As a help to a more amicable state of feeling, and a step toward the radical readjustment of the relations between capital and labor, the system of arbitration challenges attention and demands encouragement. F. H.

LIBERAL ORTHODOXY IN BROOKLYN.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

The great movement toward a free and universal religion is something more than the separate organization of its conscious advocates and abettors outside the walls of existing sects. It is a world-wide and deeply penetrating tendency, which is felt also within the sects, finding its expression in the manifestation of a larger charity toward antagonistic forms of belief, in the gradual emancipation from dogmatic tests, in new and more liberal constructions put upon old statements, and finally in a frank recognition that honest differences of opinion are consistent with a worthy life, and that no one is to be condemned on account of his intellectual convictions.

Those who see the tendencies of the times clearly enough to stand frankly upon the platform of free religion do not always recognize, it seems to me, the immense progress which is taking place within the boundaries of existing sects. They see the inconsistencies involved in the attempted adjustment of new perceptions of truth with old creeds, without taking note of the real progress indicated by these movements, and of which they are the necessary temporary expressions.

In our goodly city of Brooklyn, the prevailing type of religion is strongly "Evangelical" or "Orthodox." The Unitarians have only three churches of our nearly three hundred, none of them large. It is noteworthy that Rev. John W. Chadwick, who represents the most advanced rationalistic tendencies among Unitarians, addresses larger congregations than either of his denominational colleagues. The Universalists have only two societies, neither of them very large or vigorous. The Swedenborgians have one, and the Spiritualists two societies, the latter apparently quite active and growing.

Very many of liberal and even rationalistic tendencies are drawn to the ministrations of the talented and erratic preacher of Plymouth Church. With a large nominally and sometimes really Orthodox membership are mingled Spiritualists, Unitarians, rationalists, and even so-called "infidels." A Spiritualist friend of mine, of very radical theological bias, was recently invited to take a class in Plymouth Sunday-school. Objecting that his belief was totally opposed to that of Orthodox Congregationalism, the reply was: "Oh, never mind that! We take anybody." My friend quietly remarked that he might prefer to choose his company.

In his Sunday evening lectures upon the Bible last winter, Mr. Beecher advanced many of the views held by the most radical critics of the new school; holding that the Jewish religion was a growth or evolution out of primitive barbaric conditions, ridiculing the story of the fall of man, scouting the ordinary conception of the doctrine of total depravity, and declaring much that is ordinarily received as historical truth in the early Scriptures to be purely legendary. On one occasion, he is reported to have designated Moses as "a cowardly sneak." He declared that Abraham was a barbarian, and "could not teach us," who are more civilized. This is strange language for an "Orthodox" pulpit. If we might be permitted a suggestion, it would be this,—that, whether Abraham may be considered an historical personage or a mythical tribal ancestor, there is one thing in his story as told in the Bible that might serve as a valuable lesson, even to Mr. Beecher. When Abraham ceased to accept the religion of the idolatrous tribes among whom he grew up, he did not teach his heresy sub rosa, while claiming to be as good a sun-worshipper as any of his Orthodox Chaldean neighbors. He came out from among them, and, though his followers were few, he emphasized boldly his separation from a creed and cult which he had outgrown. Possibly, he might have been one of the most popular of the Chaldean magi, abounding in wealth and jewels, had he remained among them, and followed the tactics of the Plymouth pastor; but it is safe to say that this generation would never have heard his name.

Mr. Beecher's sermons, like the editorials of the New York Herald, argue very fairly for both sides of the question. The Tribune, which is his recognized expositor among our daily papers, reported him, in a recent sermon, as denying the doctrines of the fall of man, total depravity, and the atonement, in no gentle or hesitating terms. The press was quick to note and criticise his position, accusing him of being a rationalist in disguise. The following week he "explained his position," planting himself squarely on the Apostles' Creed, which he recited in full, giving it his unreserved indorsement. Doubtless, in spite of inconsistencies and tergiversations, Mr. Beecher's influence has not been small in promoting liberal thought among Orthodox believers. There are those who think his real convictions approximate those of Col. Ingersoll, for whom, on more than one occasion, he has spoken a good word in the pulpit. A recent cartoon of Puck represents the two in most affectionate juxtaposition; the advances, however, having evidently been made on Mr. Beecher's side.

The genial and accomplished pastor of our leading Episcopal church, "Holy Trinity," may also be ranked among the liberal Orthodox preachers of Brooklyn. Dr. Hall often appears and speaks a friendly word at gatherings of "liberals." In his sermons last winter, he took decided ground against the doctrine of eternal punishment. At the Channing Centennial, he spoke very acceptably and reverently of the great apostle of Unitarianism, declaring his belief in "the superiority of an illuminated personal conscience against the tyranny of an objective sacerdotal church." He alluded to Jonathan Edwards as "that magnificently terrible man, whom none of us can honor or differ from too much." The spirit of his preaching is indicated in the following extract from a recent address before the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn:—

"Religious outgrowths, all the machineries of faiths, the forms and usages coined under European skies and modelled under first pagan and then feudal necessities, are withering up and dropping off. American Christians are waking slowly, and with many yawns and murmurings at the rude disturbance of their sloth, to the fact that many of their formulæ are obsolete; that, while truth itself is changeless, the forms of truth are all the more ephemeral because of their connection with that which claims this divine attribute. I sympathize with those who, like Laban of old, mourn the loss of their teraphim, and deplore the agitations of their families. But I sympathize more with all who believe that God is not necessarily in the teraphim." Disclaiming his sympathy with those who are alarmed at the equalizing tendencies of the time, he said, "We shall go on, inevitably, to remove the remaining barriers, built up by enormous wealth and privilege, to a righteous and natural equality among men."

The speeches at the Channing Centennial meetings abounded in liberal expressions, though a majority of the speakers were nominally of the "Orthodox" faith. Rev. Dr. Thomas, of the First Baptist Church, said: "No man was ever more earnest than Dr. Channing in the opinion that the principal thing in a man is not the specific intellectual conception of truth that he has, but his devotion to the truth as truth; that a man should be true to the truth,—not that he should accept my opinion or your opinion, but that he should maintain his own opinion until he gets a better one, and that he should be seeking always for a better one. This I apprehend he put above any external relation. This, I take it, he thought would bring the world along, rather than any mechanical process. . . . And this I sympathize with."—This, he might have added, is the very ground principle of Free Religion.

The Channing Centennial meetings, though avowedly devoted to a specific purpose, constituted, really, a very good Free Religious Convention. Not only "liberals," but Orthodox of various sects; not only Christians, but Jews and rationalists, were invited and participated in these meetings. Dr. Putnam, though counted among the most conservative of Unitarians, and unwilling to tolerate the heresy of some of the more radical of his Unitarian brethren in his pulpit, is, it seems to me, justly entitled to the credit of gathering the first Free Religious meetings which have been held in Brooklyn. We hope he will not be shocked at this interpretation, but persevere in well doing.

The proper limits of this letter are already exceeded, and I must reserve for my next some account of the most noteworthy sermon ever preached in an Orthodox pulpit in Brooklyn, and its preacher. J.

BROOKLYN, Aug. 6, 1880.

Digitized by Google

FOREIGN.

PRINCE BISMARCK has just bought, for the sum of 320,000 marks, an agricultural estate in the environs of Hamburg.

A SEVERE earthquake, accompanied by volcanic disturbances, has caused great destruction of property and some loss of life in Manila.

A STATUE of Pascal will be inaugurated at Clermont-Ferrand on September 5. The French Institute will be represented by Messrs. Mezières, Paul Janet, and Cornu.

A WALTER RALEIGH memorial window, for which Americans have been liberal contributors, is soon to be placed in Canon Farrar's church at Westminster, London.

THE JAPANESE CODE.—The Japanese Government has determined that the Japanese code of laws shall be translated into French and English, so as to be accessible to foreigners.

PAUL SOLEILLET, the intrepid explorer, recently left Paris for another journey in Africa. A complimentary dinner was tendered him at the Gare d'Orléans on the eve of his departure.

ONE hundred and fifteen amnestied communists who arrived by the "Tage" at Brest on Sunday, August 1, arrived in Paris on Monday afternoon. The usual fraternal reception was extended to them by their political friends, both on landing at the port and on reaching the capital.

SOME interest has been excited among archæologists and antiquaries by the discovery in the vicinity of West Harptree, near Wells, Somerset, of enormous natural caverns, one of which is said to be six hundred feet in length. Explorations and investigations are being actively pursued in these immense caves.

THE telephone is getting to be pretty generally laid between churches and chapels and the houses of the well-to-do bedridden. "Chants, hymns, and lessons are distinctly heard, but only a very little of the sermon." This, I fear, will prove a great temptation to some people to stop at home; when we consider, too, that the collection plate cannot be sent by telephone —but, there, I will impute no motives.—Parisian.

IT is announced from Karlsruhe that, at Guendlingen am Kaiserstuhl, Dr. Wagner, the Conservator of Antiquities, has opened a pre-Roman tumulus, 32 mètres in diameter and 1.80 mètre in height, in which were found the remains of two skeletons, and under a stratum of mould a number of clay vessels, some of which are ornamented, and several articles of bronze. There was no trace of iron in the tumulus. The objects found are to be consigned to the Grand Ducal Exhibition of Antiquities. The Hereditary Grand Duke was present at the opening.

A LONG FAST BY A DOG.—Mr. W. Brankston Richardson, of 61 Sutherland-gardens, Maida-vale, writes to the Times: "Concurrently with the forty days' fast of the misguided American doctor, another fast has been in progress in our own country, for the truth of which I myself can vouch. A friend of mine who lives in Devonshire left home some weeks since on a series of visits to his friends in distant parts of the country. A few days after he left, his servants wrote him that a favorite Skye terrier was missing. My friend, after every search had proved fruitless, considered that the dog had been stolen. On his return home, after an absence of one month and five days, he unlocked the library, the doors and windows of which had been bolted and barred during his absence, and to his astonishment the missing dog crept out into the light, a living skeleton and totally blind. He was well cared for, and has now quite recovered his health and sight. But his existence was wonderful. He had had no food and no water, and had not gnawed the books or obtained sustenance from any source whatever."

ALLEGED FORTUNE-TELLING.—At Leicester, on Monday, an extraordinary case of fortune-telling came on for hearing. A woman named Eliza Kenney was charged with unlawfully pretending to tell fortunes. It appeared from the evidence of two young women, named Brown and Streetham, that they visited the house of the defendant in Leicester, and asked her whether she would tell them their fortunes. She told them to call again, and they did so, when the defendant said, "I suppose you want to hear about your future husbands." After some preliminaries, she pretended to fall into a mesmeric sleep. A number of questions were then asked about a soldier in India, whom the defendant characterized as deceitful. Other questions, chiefly relating to the probabilities of the marriage of one of the young women, were put to the defendant, and were answered by her. After the fortunes of both witnesses had been told, the defendant made a charge of 3s. 6d. each, which was paid. It however turned out that the questions which were put to the defendant were of purely imaginary things, and that the girls had been instructed to visit Kenney by the police. For the defence, Mr. Fowler stated that the woman had been servant to two doctors, who had found that she was possessed of second-sight. He submitted that the prosecution had failed, because the defendant never pretended to tell fortunes, but only to answer questions while in a trance, and that to support the charge it was necessary to prove that she had defrauded or deluded the witnesses, which clearly she had not done. The bench fined the woman 40*s.* and costs, with the alternative of one month's imprisonment.—Lloyd's Weekly.

JESTINGS.

THE most thoughtful of journalists will now allow contributors to the waste basket to write on both sides of the sheet.

"THE dust on your window isn't gold-dust," said a visitor to our office the other day; "for, if it were, it wouldn't stick to me."

A NEGRO teamster in Nashville declares that he must either give up driving mules or withdraw from the church, the two positions being incompatible.

THE poor old negro preacher was more than half right when he said, "Bredderin, if we could all see into our own hearts as God does, it would mos' skeer us to death."

JUSTICE: "Do you know if the prisoner had any provocation before he committed the assault?" Witness: "Well, sir, I cannot be certain on that point, exactly; but I dare say he might have had a glass or two."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL scholar to the teacher: "Did you say the hairs of my head were all numbered?" Teacher: "Yes, my dear." Sunday-school scholar: "Well, then [pulling out a hair and presenting it] what's the number of that one?"

A DOWN-TOWN man went fishing the other day, and returned with three small trout. He carried them through the street boldly, and, when asked if those were all he caught, frankly admitted that they were. The neighbors gave him a surprise party last night, and presented him with the beautifully carved motto, "An honest fisherman is the noblest work of God."—New Haven Register.

A DANBURY man tells a good story of his aunt, who is a model housekeeper and a scrupulous stickler for a good table. The clergyman called, near the dinner hour, and was pressed to stay to the meal. At the table there was a good supply of well-prepared food; but the lady felt compelled to make many apologies for imaginary deficiencies. In the grace, the clergyman asked our Heavenly Father to "bless the frugal meal." This made the lady very mad.

"HOW ARE you this morning, Deacon?" "Oh, tolable, tolable." The deacon had just brought a nice load of three and a half foot wood, "just right for the old fireplace," he said. "But I've got a four-foot fireplace," said Jones, "and I like to have the wood go way out to the end." "I called at the doctor's about my rheumatiz as I came along," said the deacon; "and he said my cords were very much contracted, and he gave me a liniment to remedy it." "Where did he say to put it?" queried Jones. "I'll tell you where to put it, Deacon,—pour it right over that load of wood. There's where your cords are most contracted."

"THAD" Stevens, while a young lawyer in the Pennsylvania courts, once lost his case by what he considered a wrong ruling of the Judge. Disgusted, he banged his law books on the table, picked up his hat and started for the door with some vigorous words in his mouth. The Judge, feeling that his dignity was assailed, rose impressively and said, "Mr. Stevens!" Mr. Stevens stopped, turned, and bowed deferentially. "Mr. Stevens," said the Judge, "dô you intend by such conduct to express your contempt for this court?" And Stevens, with mock seriousness, answered, "Express my contempt for this court! No sir, I was trying to conceal it, your honor!"

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. CLARK is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	"	. . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51	"	. . . 6c. " "
" 52	"	. . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object—"the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"—will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,—why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.
II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.
III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.
IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.
V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)
VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PARK[illegible]ER,

COUNSELLOR[illegible]W,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. [illegible] PIPER.

TO BOOK BUYERS.

BOOKS SENT BY MAIL AT

PUBLISHERS' PRICES!

No Extra Charge for Postage.

Any obtainable book that may be desired will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash. Orders are respectfully solicited from all friends of the Index. Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

For 1879, complete for the past year, are now ready for delivery at this Office. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Price $3.00, in advance. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WEST NEWTON ENGLISH

AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL. 27th YEAR. A family and day-school for both sexes. Boys and girls fitted for Harvard, Smith's, or other Colleges, and for Scientific Schools; also for teaching, business, and home life. Pupils distributed in four families. Board and tuition from $350 to $450. For Circular, address NATH'L T. ALLEN, West Newton, Mass.

Liberal Thought and Culture.

PAPERS FOR THE TIMES

on Literature, Philosophy, and Religion, edited by WALTER LEWIN. To American readers, this work has especial interest as a singularly able exponent of one of the best phases of liberal thought and culture in England. "written," as the Inquirer says, "in the interests of a Rational Religious Faith and a Spiritual Philosophy." Quarterly Parts, 30 cts. each; Yearly Subscription, $1.00 Vols. I. and II. (forming the First Series), boards, $1.25; half calf, $1.75; calf, g.e., $2.25; Russia, g.e., $2.50 each; or the two vols. bound in one, $2.40, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00 respectively. In all cases, carriage free from MR. LEWIN, 135 Bridge St., Berkenhead, Eng. Prospectus and Lists post-free. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, U. S. Currency Notes, or Post-office Money Order.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY.

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each: complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

FOUNDATION STONES.

A VOLUME OF

SERMONS by GEORGE CHAINEY.

Handsomely bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Pamphlets: "Head and Hearts," 5 cts.; "Iconoclasm," 5 cts.; "Ecclesiastical Lynch Law," 10 cts. All four will be sent postpaid for $1.00. Card Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 20 cts.; Cabinet Photographs of Mr. Chainey, 40 cts. Address

G. C. SMITH,
129 Main St., Evansville, Ind.

"Your sermons stir me like trumpets. 'Iconoclasm' is the best sermon ever delivered in an American pulpit."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 558.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 10.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HE who wishes to secure the good of others has already secured his own. One forgives everything to him who forgives himself nothing.—Chinese.

IT is the determination of the spotless not to give sorrow to others, and not to do evil to those who have done evil to them. The punishment of those who have done you evil is to put them to shame by showing great kindness to them.—Hindu.

HE who neglects to perform the duties of this life is not fit for this world, much less for any higher world. —Hindu.

ONCE, when some pilgrims journeyed to Mecca, they found themselves in a fruitless valley, beholding Kaaba, a lofty house of stone. They sought with zeal to find God, but they found him not. Long they encircled the house of stone with their march, when a voice from within was heard, saying: "Why stand ye here to worship stone? Go and worship in God's true house, the house of truth, the home of the heart! Blessed is he who enters there!" Tebrisi, leaving the desert, made a pilgrimage to his own home, and found it a temple.—Persian, thirteenth century.

GOD that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing that he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things.—Paul.

NATURE says to all men: You are born weak and ignorant. Being weak, help yourselves; being ignorant, get knowledge. I have given you arms to cultivate the soil, and a glimmer of reason to guide your steps. And I have put into your hearts a germ of sympathy, that you may help one another to support life. Stifle not that germ, neither corrupt it: know that it is divine.—Voltaire.

THE living God is disclosed in the activities of the human mind more impressively than in any material operation. An ounce of mind outweighs a million tons of matter; the leap of an affection distances the spring of lightning: the thought of a Newton goes out beyond the confines of the universe; the love of a Fénelon gives music to the morning stars. The winds of intelligence, that come we know not whence, and go we know not whither, but which are always blowing where human minds are alert; the waves of feeling that rise and swell and advance, and make the ocean of existence sparkle with foam,—these are better evidence of a Living Spirit abroad than the stars that gem the heavens or the laws that speed light from orb to orb.—O. B. Frothingham.

THE soul of God is poured into the world through the thoughts of men. The world stands on ideas, not on iron or cotton; and the iron of iron, the fire of fire, the ether and source of all elements, is moral force. As cloud on cloud, as snow on snow, as the bird rests on the air, and the planet rests on space in its flight, so do men and their institutions rest on thoughts.—R. W. Emerson.

BEAUTIFUL it is to see and understand that no worth, known or unknown, can die, even in this earth. The work an unknown good man has done is like a vein of water flowing hidden underground, secretly making the ground green. It flows and flows, it joins itself with other veins and veinlets: one day it will start forth a visible perennial well.—Thomas Carlyle.

CURRENT TOPICS.

MR. MOODY has issued a call for a convocation for prayer "for a new enduement of power from on high," to meet in Northfield, Mass., in September.

COL. INGERSOLL'S lecture at the Boston Theatre on "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," last Sunday evening, brought together an audience which nearly filled the building, though people were compelled to go through a pouring rain that "providentially" occurred, no doubt, at the time.

CANADA law was invoked by Protestant bigots and Catholic priests, last spring, to suppress Col. Ingersoll's so-called "blasphemy." It is said that there is a law in Canada against lotteries. We wonder if it will be used to suppress a lottery announced by the Catholic bishop of Rimouski, at which, with many other attractions, the bishop advertises that "six hundred masses for the living and dead will be at the disposal of holders of tickets."

THE nomination of General Phelps, of Vermont, as a candidate for the Presidency, does not appear to be making much political agitation. We doubt if all our readers are aware that such a candidate is in the field. But we can assure them that it is the fact. General Phelps is the candidate of the Christian-amendment-to-the-constitution party. There are four generals among whom voters can divide their ballots for President. But they are all Union generals. To complete the circle of political opinion, a fifth is needed,—a "rebel brigadier."

ONE of the Paulist Fathers, at their church in New York, recently laid down one of the fundamental principles of Catholicism in the following clear and emphatic terms: "The Catholic Church allows no real authority, either to govern or to teach in spiritual matters, to any who are not enrolled in the ranks of the clergy by at least the ceremony of tonsure, which is the door of entrance to the clerical state. Laymen, who have not entered that state, and women, who cannot enter it, have always been and always will be excluded from any share in teaching or governing the Church."

A SOUTHERN Baptist church was recently visited by a sacrilegious dog. The congregation was engaged in the communion-service; and, just as the clergyman was about to bless and administer the elements, the impious animal slipped up slyly by his side, seized the bread, and made off with it. We surmise, however, that some of the communicants were much relieved; for we have noticed that the wine generally slides down much more easily than the bread; and we have heard of some pious people who, with the most devout intentions, could not swallow the bread at all, and were obliged to take it home in their pockets.

THE great cathedral at Cologne is at last finished; and the devotees of—art will everywhere be glad. Religion began it, in 1248; but in this nineteenth century it was only devotion to art that completed it. It has been so long in building that, grand as is its design, even the name of its original architect has been lost. But as late as 1830 his plans were found among some old musty and dust-covered documents, and the edifice has been finished substantially in accordance with them,—an interesting fact, by the way, that will serve preachers for some time with a new illustration. It can be used by both conservatives and radicals. But we are not going to tell them how.

A CASE of baptism under peculiar difficulties, which should excite the sympathies of all Christian people, is reported from Texas: "A condemned murderer named Wright desired to be baptized. A Baptist clergyman was sent for, and Wright was taken to Trinity River. But the sheriff had his suspicions. To him, it seemed more likely that Wright was after a chance to commit suicide; and so he, too, accompanied the procession. When they reached the river, the sheriff tied a rope around the condemned man; and, when the ceremony finally took place, the sheriff stood like a fisherman on the bank with the line in his hand while the minister proceeded with the baptism."

DR. DEXTER, in his History of Congregationalism, is not disposed to make it easy for heretical ministers to remain in the fellowship of the Orthodox Congregational body. He says, according to a reviewer in the Independent, that no one can "honorably claim to be, and remain, one of the Congregational body" at the present time, while advocating something less and other "than those clauses in the Burial Hill Declaration of Faith (adopted among the Puritan graves at Plymouth in 1865) which affirm, in the exactest terms, that Congregationalists believe in the Godhead of the Second Person of the Trinity, and the everlasting punishment of those who fall under condemnation in the final judgment." The reviewer demurs at Dr. Dexter's fence.

THE Secretary of the Irish Catholic Colonization Association reports, as the result of his observations on a recent visit, that the colony which was inaugurated a year ago in Nebraska is in a prosperous condition. The colony consists of one hundred and fifty families, who came from nearly every State in the Union. Many of them came "without a dollar more than was necessary to enable them to commence work." "Even the poorest are doing well, and gradually adding to their stock, and paying in instalments for their land." Another town in the same county is to be started this fall by the Association. The work is an excellent one, since it removes the indigent Irish from the great cities, and sets them to work on the soil. The only evil about it is that it is not well, especially in our Republic, that any one religious sect should form a community by itself.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

FICHTE,

AND THE EMPHASIS OF THE MORAL EGO.

A Lecture given to the Chicago Philosophical Society, December 6, 1879.

BY MRS. C. K. SHERMAN.

It is well known that when David Hume attacked the certainty of all knowledge, and proclaimed scepticism as the only tenable ground, Kant came to the rescue, maintaining that a system of knowledge transcending experience exists in the mind.

Hume had imbibed the principles of the sensational school, had declared all our ideas to be dependent on the senses; and, sound logician that he was, he carried these principles to their logical results, coming to the inevitable conclusion that, as our knowledge is limited to experience, and as experience must of necessity be limited, we can have no valid knowledge of phenomena, and no confidence in our ideas of God, freedom, and immortality.

Kant clearly saw the position of Hume,—saw that a knowledge of the pure object unmodified by the subject is absolutely impossible, yet at the same time he was conscious of a class of truths not found in experience. He therefore determined to change the mode of investigation,—to seek in the mind that which Hume had vainly sought in the empirical world. The result of Kant's critical investigation was that, while we have not and cannot have any knowledge of noumena, we have not only the knowledge of phenomena, but we have also a priori transcendental elements of knowledge, found in the perceptions of sense and the laws of the understanding.

Thus, in place of Hume's world of matter and his consequent scepticism, Kant gives us the world of mind,—gives us a knowledge of things as related to us, gives us ideas of God, freedom, and immortality.

Kant reached these bold conclusions by a keen, critical analysis, which was as patient in research as it was exhaustive in detail. It is not our purpose this evening to enter into the nature of this analysis. A single hour would afford hardly the slightest glance into Kant's philosophy; a brief abstract of Kant's abstractions would chill the most ardent lovers of philosophy; and any quotations from his weighty "seven by nine" sentences, as De Quincey chose to style them, would do little toward lighting the minds of an audience, even though that audience be composed exclusively of philosophers. Our purpose this evening is to accept gratuitously from Kant the world of mind, the Ego, which he wrested from Hume with such fearless daring, and to follow the Ego as seen in its transformations by Kant's most enthusiastic disciple, Johann Gottlieb Fichte.

Fichte was born in Rammenau, a city in Upper Lusatia, in 1762. His father was a linen-weaver. His mother was the daughter of a tradesman, who thought his daughter married below her station. The daughter thought so too, and did not hesitate to manifest toward her husband that superiority which necessarily arises when one makes the nice social distinction between a linen-weaver and a linen-draper. Not only did the mother of Fichte boast of higher social position than that of her husband, but she manifested a stronger will; and, while we would not speak of her as a Xantippe, it is plainly evident that our philosopher inherited from his mother that Emphasis of the Ego, which not only characterized him as a boy, but became the essential feature of his philosophy.

Eldest of eight children, the boy Fichte had but little promise for an education. He must help his father at the loom or tend the geese. He gradually learned to read and write, though books were few. What wrought most powerfully upon the mind of the boy was the preaching of the village pastor. This preaching met no passive response from the boy. After hearing a sermon, he was not only able to repeat it verbatim, but was able to deliver it with an earnestness which comes from serious conviction. These superior qualities in the boy attracted the attention of a wealthy nobleman, who decided to care for his education, committing him first to the care of a clergyman, then placing him in the High School.

In his eighteenth year, we find Fichte at the University of Jena, for the purpose of studying theology. But theological dogmas could not long confine him. His spirit was too restive for any restraint but its own. Profoundly religious as he was, he could not be chained to any formulæ of the Church.

Philosophy attracted him, especially that of Spinoza; but it is plainly evident that Fichte, who could recognize no power but will, and who was himself will incarnate, could not be a disciple of Spinoza, who not only denied freedom of will to man, but denied it also to God.

Fichte left Jena without the theology which was to have secured him meat and drink. He had as yet no system of philosophy. His patron was dead. From his humble home, he had not even sympathy; for his mother's letters were full of reproaches. She had fondly dreamed of seeing her son officiating at the altar. Disappointed in this, she did not hesitate to increase the bitterness of his life by taunting words. For a time, Fichte suffered the biting pangs of poverty, and felt all the pitiable degradation which poverty knows so well how to inflict.

Jean Paul somewhere humorously complains of his own condition, saying that it was worse than a prisoner's. "The prisoner," said he, "is allowed bread and water, but I have only the latter." Fichte had not Jean Paul's humor, neither could he set off poverty with flowers, and make it attractive. Poverty was poverty with Fichte; and I have sometimes thought that the poorest of all poverty is that of the German student, who is filled with high, ambitious purposes, who is conscious of the divine power within him, but is doomed to one of the bitterest curses that can befall humanity,—the curse of poverty. Such was Schiller's doom. Such was Fichte's. Obtaining a situation as teacher in a private family, Fichte gained at least the means of existence. Applying for a situation as country clergyman, he was refused on account of his religious opinions, or, as the Church would have termed it, for want of religious opinions. Fortune then seemed to open the door a little for him. He became tutor in a wealthy family in Zürich. He remained here scarcely two years; for he wished to educate the children from his own broad stand-point, while the parents, naturally enough, chose to dictate to the pedagogue. Fichte's proud spirit could brook no restraint, could acknowledge no authority but his own. He could endure poverty, but not submission.

It was while he was in Zürich that he met his future wife, the niece of the poet Klopstock. It was not physical beauty which lured him to this lady. She was four years his senior, and he was already twenty-eight. Nor had she the superior intellectual qualities, which might commend her to a man of genius; but she understood his nature, she recognized his individuality, she reflected to him his greatness, and he loved her as the mirror of himself. We might, indeed, say that she was to him the non-Ego by which he became conscious of the Ego.

At this time, our philosopher was without definite aim or purpose. He was conscious of Titanic strength, but he had no point of support by which to make that strength most available. He could not and would not preach, at least in Saxony, "where a rational religion," he said, "was a greater object of horror than the Spanish Inquisition." By chance, a student came to him for instruction in Kant's philosophy. This sent him to the study of Kant, and in that study his troubled soul first found rest. In his early enthusiasm over it he writes: "I have now found rest for my weary spirit. I have given myself to the study of a philosophy which bridles my extravagant imagination, which gives emphasis to reason, and which exalts the mind far above earthly things. I have a nobler purpose; and, instead of devoting myself to objects without me, I look only within. I will give some years to this philosophy. It is difficult beyond conception, and must be made easier."

Then he purposes to make its fundamental principles more widely known, and by his eloquence to make it effective on the hearts of the people. Later he writes: "I threw myself into the Kantian philosophy, which is as soul-elevating as it is head-breaking. I found therein occupation which filled head and heart. My Titanic, aimless pursuits found a centre. From one day to another at a loss for bread, I was nevertheless one of the happiest men on the wide earth."

What was it that Fichte found in Kant's philosophy which made him forget the ills of life, to which hitherto he had been so painfully sensitive? It was chiefly Kant's assertion of the moral freedom of the Ego. Kant limited causality to phenomena, the Ego as noumenon was morally free. To Fichte, who could tolerate neither dogmatism in theology nor determinism in philosophy, this moral freedom of the Ego was hailed as a new revelation. Like a slave whose fetters are unloosed, Fichte's joy was exultant. His first act was a grateful tribute to his liberator in the form of a Critique of all Revelation, intended as supplement to Kant's Critique of Judgment. Although written in less than five weeks, this treatise was at first thought to have been written by the master-hand of Kant himself. It attracted great attention, and procured for Fichte a call to the Chair of Philosophy in the University at Jena.

But it was not Fichte's nature to be a disciple of any master, however great; and soon we find him giving an emphasis to the Ego, of which Kant had never dreamed. Kant had declared that the laws of thought are dependent on the Ego, but that the material of thought comes from the object. Fichte, more truly logical than Kant, will not go out from the Ego. He makes that supreme, declaring it is the activity of the Ego which produces both matter and form. The Ego, according to Fichte, can posit itself; and what is usually regarded as a limitation of the Ego by eternal objects is the self-limitation of the Ego which Fichte calls the non-Ego.

1. The Ego posits itself.

2. The Ego posits the non-Ego, thinking as yet this non-Ego to be not itself, but an antagonist. Through these first two principles, opposite ideas are given, to be united into one consciousness; and we have,

3. The Ego posits itself as determined by the non-Ego. By this process of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, we have expressed in scientific form the statement that consciousness, or the finite Ego, is a pure productivity of the Absolute Ego.

The good people of Germany received Fichte's abstractions with little favor. Heine tells us that the great multitude thought that the Fichtean Ego was the ego of Johann Gottlieb Fichte, and that this individual ego denied all other existences. "What insolence!" cried they. "This man does not believe that we exist,—we, who are far more corpulent than he, and who as burgomasters and office-holders are decidedly his superiors." And the women curiously inquired, "Doesn't he even believe in the existence of his wife? No? And does Madame Fichte allow all that without saying a word?" Jean Paul made Fichte's idealism the subject of severe ridicule in his Clavis Fichtiana; and, in other of his works, he introduces a character Schoppe, who is crazed with ideal philosophy, insane over the idea that he has lost his individuality. Even Kant, who at first received Fichte with great favor, said that the construction of the world out of self-consciousness produced on him a ghostly impression. Jean Paul afterward acknowledged and rectified his mistake; and Kant, in spite of the ghostly impression he received, made important additions to his philosophy in consequence of Fichte's logical demands.

The great mistake usually made in discussing Fichte's idealism is that the Ego referred to is the individual Ego instead of the pure Absolute Ego. Nor is it strange that this mistake is so frequent, for Fichte sometimes uses the Ego as individual, sometimes as absolute. Certainly, the Ego he accepted from Kant was the individual Ego; the consciousness he maintained we could not transcend was individual consciousness; but Fichte, in his loud emphasis of the individual Ego, makes it, by a process of intuition, cognizant of the Absolute Ego, and then makes this absolute Ego the fundamental principle of his reasoning.

Fichte, in assuming this, brings the Absolute within the compass of the finite Ego, makes the less contain the greater, which is a serious fault in his reasoning. It will be seen that the Absolute Ego which Fichte assumes is not unlike the God or Substance which forms the basis of Spinoza's philosophy; but, while Spinoza refused activity, design, or purpose to God, Fichte makes activity the sine qua non of existence and consciousness. It was through action that the absolute, by positing itself and the non-Ego, came to finite intelligence. This self-conscious finite intelligence by positing itself ascribes to itself free activity, which implies an external world; for, if it has activity, it must necessarily posit an object toward which this activity is directed. The free activity of the conscious being implies other rational beings; for, without these, it would never be conscious that it was free.

Thus we see that Fichte's free individual Ego is based upon an Absolute Ego, and that his so-called denial of the existence of the world is virtually no denial. It is simply a refusal to ground our knowledge upon the assumption of an external world. From such a dreamer as Fichte thus far seems to be, we would hardly expect the practical man; and, from such apparently barren speculation, one would look for little fruit. But who would ever divine the oak from the acorn, the harvest from the seed? And he who would censure speculative philosophy as mere speculation has yet to learn the relation of thought to action. Unquestionably great as the deed may be, it is only servant: thought is master. One of our German writers truly says, "Mark this well, ye proud men of action: ye are, after all, only the unconscious instruments of the men of thought." Condemn speculation as we may, many of our common daily acts are dependent on the speculations of philosophers, who little dreamed themselves, perhaps, what grand results would follow,—speculations which to the idle crowd must have seemed ridiculous fancies. Condorcet well observes: "The sailor whom an exact calculation of longitude preserves from shipwreck owes his life to a theory conceived two thousand years ago, by men of genius, who were thinking of nothing but lines and angles."

Digitized by Google

But Fichte constructed as well as analyzed, acted as well as thought. You remember that, according to Fichte, it was by action that the Absolute Ego becomes the conscious finite Ego. Consciousness of acting implies consciousness of others, consciousness of others creates rights and duties; or, in other words, the Ego strives not after an individual limited freedom, but after an absolute freedom.

The Ego, with all its activity can approximate absolute freedom only in a moral direction. This striving of the individual after absolute freedom is the moral determination or destiny of the individual. Hence Fichte's reiterated command, "Always fulfil thy destiny." This destiny is never any self-aggrandizement. It is always the merging of self into the great selfhood of activity. The individual is to act with reference to the Absolute. Hence any selfish scheme or private ambition is utterly contrary to the great destiny of man. The progress of reason and virtue should be the sole interest of man, and that, too, purely for the sake of progress. The individual in his self-abnegation is to go so far as to be indifferent whether he is the instrument of this progress or another, whether it is his act which succeeds or is thwarted. The individual is to love and honor himself only as an instrument of a rational design. He is to be indifferent to all vexations on account of personal mortifications, against all exaltations on account of personal merits; for he is to have no individuality: that should be lost in the Absolute Ego.

This self-abnegation which Fichte preaches is in no wise the self-annihilation of Schopenhauer, Von Hartmann, and Leopardi. One is the dead annihilation, utter nothingness: the other is the rapt, transcendent beatitude, which in its divine intoxication knows nothing of self, wills nothing of self, but is absorbed in Deity, or, as Emerson expresses it,—

"Lost in God, in Godhood found."

But as for any Brahmanistic contemplation of God, a losing of self by incessant thought upon God, that is not at all Fichte's doctrine. He denounces those who spend their time in pious self-contemplation and reflection. "Not for study of thyself, nor for brooding over emotions of piety, but for action alone," said he, "was existence given thee. Thy actions, and thy actions alone, determine thy worth." Even knowledge is valued only as it results in action.

Since Fichte knew and acknowledged nothing but the Ego, conscience, and conscience alone, is the infallible guide to duty. Whatever, then, is antagonistic to conscience, no matter on what chain of evidence it may be supported, the conscience is to reject, and that, too, for conscience' sake.

Religion, therefore, must come from within, and not from without. It cannot be enforced. It creates itself through virtuous sentiments. All that the teachers can do is to call attention to this faith of religion, which accompanies all moral consciousness, and neither needs nor is capable of proof, because it announces itself as the most original part of our being. As religion cannot be taught, no more can the existence of God be taught. We can know God only immediately, not by any laws of logic, nor by any profound explanations.

As may be inferred from what has already been said, God is the Absolute Ego; or, since Fichte chooses to express himself in terms of activity, God is the comprehensive, moral order, living and active. The living and operative moral order is itself God. "We need no other God," says Fichte, "and can apprehend no other."

God is of course impersonal. Fichte considers all personality as limitation, and whatever is limited cannot be God. Nor will Fichte ascribe to God any attributes by which we may form any conception of Deity. We could ascribe to God only our own limitation, and framing God after our own image would be idolatry.

Fichte remained at Jena but seven years. He was accused of atheism, and on this account was obliged to leave the university. The accusation of atheism was about as inapplicable to Fichte as it was to Spinoza. Both of them founded their systems of philosophy on the sole assumption of a God, and both of them refused an anthropomorphic God. Both of them made bold to ignore the popular conception of God, and all the more earnestly that true religion should come to honor. The charge of atheism appeared strikingly incongruous to Fichte. When informed of it, he said, "The question whether a philosophy may be atheistic or not sounds to a philosopher as strangely as it would to a mathematician to be asked if a triangle is red or green."

Fichte left Jena for Berlin. Immediately on his arrival, there was a hesitation among the State officials as to whether they should allow him to remain, both his political and religious opinions being of a questionable character. The matter was laid before the king, who replied: "So long as Fichte is a peaceable citizen, let him remain. If he has fallen out with the good God, then the good God must settle that. That is his affair, not mine." Fichte remained in Berlin lecturing before large audiences of educated men, and exerting a powerful influence on public opinion, chiefly in the direction of morality,—a morality based upon individual freedom, a morality which opposes the divine right of kings and traditions.

It was at this time that France was convulsed. She had been revelling over liberty, freedom, and equality. Riotous in her furore, the liberty she had demanded was license and insolence. Then Napoleon came, and by the emphasis of his demonic Ego thrilled the people with his glory, till they lost all thought of their own freedom in their eagerness to destroy the freedom of others. When Germany was invaded, Fichte's moral enthusiasm would show itself in acts, not words. "Wait," said the king, when Fichte proffered his services as soldier,—"wait. Your eloquence is needed after the victory."

Fichte waited, but not passively. By his speeches to the German soldiers, he did indeed fulfil his wish of making "swords to speak and lightnings flash." The king had said, "Wait till after victory." The day of victory for Germany was a long way off, the day of submission near at hand. Resignation seemed to the Germans the only resort. But Fichte, who could acknowledge no triumph but a moral triumph, would not accept Napoleon's victories as final. His faith in the divine right of humanity transcended any disasters. Full of conviction, he made stirring appeals to the German nation. And he spoke as one having authority. He spoke as a prophet, who saw clearly the horoscope of the future.

These enthusiastic appeals did not fail to produce their effect upon the German people, rousing them to exert every energy to repulse Napoleon. And finally they did unite in a common cause for a common good; and the results obtained were largely due to Fichte's soul-stirring addresses, based on the philosophy of the moral freedom of the Ego.

Fichte died at the age of fifty-two, from a fever contracted at the sick-bed of his wife, who had overtaxed herself in the care of the sick and wounded in military hospitals. He had lived to bring his system of philosophy to a tolerable completion. He had seen rich fruits of that philosophy, both in a moral and political direction. He was ready to live on, working for the progress of virtue; and he was equally ready to die, fully assured that it mattered not whether good was effected by his instrumentality or through that of another. With this beautiful resignation he died, as becomes the philosopher.

There is one of the German poets, doubtless familiar to all of you, whose mission as a poet was strikingly like that of Fichte. I have already alluded to Schiller. Schiller was greatly influenced by Kant's philosophy, influenced especially by the moral freedom of the Ego. Liberty in one form or another is the peculiar characteristic of Schiller's dramas; and the liberty which Schiller sought was the liberty which Fichte claimed,—the liberty to be right, the liberty to do right, and the liberty to enforce the right.

Schiller as well as Fichte was a born moralist. The world presented itself to both in the form of duty. Schiller could not work for art alone: art must serve morality. Fichte could never have been satisfied with a theory of rights. He must compel men to act as well as to know. Action was the substance of Fichte's Egoism.

Both Schiller and Fichte, with all their high ideals and too often attenuated poetry and philosophy, met the common people on the broad level of humanity. No poet has entered so many humble homes as Schiller. No philosopher has stirred the entire nation in the cause of freedom, as Fichte has done. And in both were seen that same enthusiasm and faith in humanity. No ideal was too lofty for Schiller's heroes to attain; and Fichte went so far as to plan what would be the work of mankind after the entire race had reached perfection. If in their enthusiasm Fichte and Schiller believed infinitely better of mankind than the race will ever deserve, it is an error for which humanity should ever hold them in grateful remembrance.

This faith in humanity, this "trust that somehow good will be the final goal of ill," requires no little heroism on the part of its advocates. If it be true that they only can accept Calvinism who have the boldness to face a frowning God as well as a frowning world, it is also true that it requires a soul no less heroic, who, in spite of all the sins and woes of humanity, can still maintain his courage to battle single-handed, if need be, against a world of error, confident of ultimate success, because a divine power is working through him. 'Twas thus the Transcendentalists of New England believed and acted. They reflected the principles of Fichte with singular clearness, and the results of their heroic dreams and darings testify to their moral worth. It is true their dreams were sometimes Utopian, their heroism sometimes led to rashness. Knowing no rights but moral rights, these men did not hesitate whenever legal and moral rights conflicted. If law permitted slavery, justice did not; and they did not question the right of the individual to execute his idea of justice. The world is the better for their enthusiasm. The undue emphasis they gave to the Ego worked infinitely better than any wail of despair.

Age and experience have somewhat modified their tone; for, while they found that individualism worked admirably, provided each man was morally and intellectually great, yet the majority of individuals who compose the masses cannot be a law unto themselves, cannot take justice into their own hands and execute it, even when directed by conscience. Individual conscience ought indeed to be recognized; but it cannot be recognized as isolated individual,—not even perhaps in matters of religion. The only recognition it can receive is as one of many. The freedom it can obtain is a freedom governed by necessary laws, without which restraint it could have no support.

Shall we say, then, because individualism cannot be carried to the extent which Fichte and the Transcendentalists fondly hoped, that it is a failure? By no means. The individual can never again be the insignificant atom lost in the mass of humanity that it was before so emphatic a stress was laid upon the Ego. This attainment gained shall serve as vantage-ground for still higher attainment,—an attainment which can be made by no sudden bound, but only by careful experiment and honest endeavor.

An English gentleman, while in the mountains of Switzerland, becomes acquainted with a Frenchman and his wife, and it is agreed that they shall travel down the valley of the Rhone in a carriage together. On the way, the lady is seized with a frightful toothache. After she has suffered twenty-four hours, Geneva is reached, and a dentist is immediately sought out. The tooth which has caused the trouble is extracted; and the husband, with a good deal of satisfaction, shows it to his English acquaintance. "The tooth might have been saved," says the latter. "How do you know?" "I'm a dentist." "A dentist! And you said nothing, did nothing, to relieve my wife?" "I never exercise my profession during my vacation."—French paper.

Digitized by Google

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

INSTITUTE ESSAYS. Read before the Ministers' Institute, Providence, R.I., October, 1879. With an introduction by Rev. Henry W. Bellows, D.D. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis, 101 Milk Street. 1880. In cloth, $1.25; in paper, $1.00.

The publication of this volume is one of the great tide-marks of theological progress in the United States. Some of the later steps of that progress may be thus stated: since Theodore Parker's time, it has appeared that a considerable number of Unitarian ministers contemporary with him silently held, to a greater or less extent, the peculiar opinions, the open utterance of which brought such vituperation and hatred upon his head from Unitarian as well as Orthodox sources; as these men gradually acquired the courage of free speech, they liberalized the formula of summons to their annual gathering by inviting "Unitarian and other Christian ministers"; when, in one of these annual meetings, a small majority had so far departed from Unitarian tradition as to adopt a creed, declaring the Lordship of Jesus Christ, these progressives were strong enough to supplement that vote by another, declaring the creed to have no binding force; by the year 1876, these men, with such as their teaching and example had educated, were ready to form a "Ministers' Institute," comprehensive and flexible enough to welcome all competent assistants in the promotion of critical and independent studies in theology and religion; and now, in the introduction to a full report of the proceedings of the Institute in 1879, that typical Unitarian, Dr. Bellows, declares that the Association has no creed,—that it does not except even the Christian religion, its authority or its origin, from the themes which may be reinvestigated, and on which new light may be thrown,—and that it cordially welcomes the testimony of earnest religious minds of all faiths.

From the introduction in question, it further appears that the Ministers' Institute proposes not to proclaim fixed results, but to exhibit the best methods of study in theology and religion, to stimulate inquiry into matters still unsettled or unknown to the bottom, and to encourage and aim at a scientific mode in treating them; and that by the scientific method it understands the employment of all the best means for discovering or testing truth,—the use, in the treatment of every department of knowledge, of the means that are appropriate to that department.

The variety of opinion thus sought was measurably attained in the meeting reported in this volume, papers being read by several Unitarians, one anti-Christian, and one Jew. That Orthodox Christianity was not represented there was owing, no doubt, to the dislike of ministers of that class to such measures and such representatives of freethought, certainly not to lack of invitation or of hospitality on the part of the officials.

The plan of the Ministers' Institute is to have a session of four days every other year. This second session was opened by a sermon by Rev. S. R. Calthrop, of Syracuse, N.Y., in which a Unitarian rendering was given to the formula "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." The remainder of the volume is occupied by eight papers, in which four subjects are treated, each by two authors, thus further securing variety of thought and expression.

Prof. Charles C. Everett writes on "The Relation of Modern Philosophy to Liberalism," and Mr. Francis E. Abbot on "The Influence of Philosophy upon Christianity."

Dr. Gustav Gottheil discusses "Monotheism and the Jews," and Rev. John W. Chadwick "The Idea of God."

Prof. Ezra Abbot gives an elaborate critical dissertation on "The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel," confidently ascribing it to the Apostle John; and Rev. Francis Tiffany, treating of "The Gospel of John," thinks with equal confidence that both its date and authorship are hidden beyond discovery.

Rev. J. B. Harrison treats of "Methods of Dealing with Social Questions," and Rev. George Batchelor of "Ethical Law and Social Order."

All these papers are exceedingly interesting, and each contains thoughts worthy not only to be recorded, but carefully pondered. One feature of the work, particularly interesting to the present writer, and entirely corresponding to his expectations, is the following: while these essayists hold it a duty as well as a right to be free thinkers and free speakers upon religion and all the matters included in it, not less than upon the affairs called "worldly," they confidently expect religion to gain instead of losing by this freedom of investigation. As Prof. Everett states it, "The essential truth of religion will come from the fires purified and glorified." Again he says: "Religion must be recognized as one of the essential and fundamental facts of life. It is a fact that does not ask either of philosophy or science leave to be. It is a fact to be recognized both by philosophy and science." And again, "Religion is an eternal factor in the life of the soul."

Controverting the claim that the progress of liberalism is due to science alone, Prof. Everett says: "It is philosophy that has been the great instrument in the growth of the liberal thought of modern times, and that has given to modern theology the naturalistic direction which it is now to so large an extent taking. . . . Science is a product, not the cause, of the tendency we are considering."

He proceeds to emphasize the matter thus: "It is important that this point should be fully understood. Many, considering that it is physical science which has given the great impulse to the present tendencies of theologic thought, look upon it as being in some way the arbiter in regard to all questions relating to spiritual things. If a man be distinguished as a scientist, if he be familiar with the laws that control the relations of matter, it is taken for granted that he has some special authority in regard to spiritual matters, and his utterances on these themes are listened to as oracles. One might as well interrogate the sailor, on the look-out at the bows, as to the course which the ship is to follow."

The essay of Mr. Francis E. Abbot, thoughtful, acute, and in most respects admirable, defines Christianity as consisting of those doctrines which the Catholic, Protestant, and Greek churches agree in recognizing as fundamental. Of the Protestant Reformation, he keenly says, it "was less a revolution in theology than in Church government; for the great features of the system of thought known as Orthodoxy have not been substantially altered by it." And, of what is called liberal Christianity, he says as keenly, "It is evidently a new and very modern system of thought, created by combining certain beautiful ethical teachings of Jesus with the enlightened views of modern science and philosophy."

The very instructive paper of Dr. Gottheil, Rabbi of the Temple Emanu-el, New York, points out three distinctive periods in the history of his people: Hebraism, represented by Moses; Israelism, by Samuel; and Judaism, by Ezra. Of the reputed Mosaic authorship in the Hebrew Scriptures, he confidently says that Deuteronomy is first in chronological order, and also first in historic significance. Of this book, he does not feel sure whether it was discovered or composed by Hilkiah. Of the utterances of the prophets concerning future events, he says: "We do not know of many of their predictions that came true. They were true in their moral essence, but politically, perhaps, worth no more than would be a philosopher's advice to the Americans how they should govern themselves." He points out the respective merits and defects of the priestly class and the prophetic class, and enumerates important services rendered to the Judaic faith by the Scribes and Pharisees.

The essay of Rev. George Batchelor on "Ethical Law and Social Order" is, in the main, a critique on Herbert Spencer's Data of Ethics, which, in his judgment, does not furnish such an explanation of ethical evolution as would give us a complete history of the past, nor such an exposition of ethical principles as might furnish a sufficient standard for the future. After various details of criticism, the author says:—

"The final and fatal objection to Mr. Spencer's system as a standard of conduct is that pleasure cannot be made the direct object of action, either by the individual himself, or by society at large, without moral danger." And he directs attention to the following points, as defects in Mr. Spencer's system:—

"1. It reverses the common moral judgments of mankind, in regard to the higher forms of conduct, instead of confirming them.

"2. It sets up a standard of conduct which cannot, without moral danger, be made the rule of conduct for the individual.

"3. It disparages the sense of moral obligation, when it ought to strengthen it.

"4. It fails to give any adequate account of the righteous conduct which has necessarily inflicted suffering.

"5. It confounds happiness with well-being, and, making this to consist in adaptation to the external environment, narrows the moral outlook of the race, and causes the moral ideal to vanish."

Mr. Batchelor's own conclusions are given in his closing sentence, namely:—

"The course of human life upon this earth has been such that man has been led to love his life, and defend it; has enjoyed his life, and labored for happiness in it; has seen the opportunity and undertaken the duty of enlarging his life, multiplying its resources, improving the quality of his powers, and of seeking constantly for higher incentives to action for nobler ends: and that, by this course of living progress, he has been brought to contemplate the limit of terrestrial life and the bounds of human desire, with a distinct longing for that unbounded life, unbroken happiness, and unlimited progress which this earthly life can suggest, but cannot supply." C. K. W.

THE LIFE, SPEECHES, AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF GEN. JAMES A. GARFIELD. By Russell H. Conwell. With an Introduction by Rev. Mark Hopkins, D.D. Boston: B. B. Russell & Co.

Of lives of presidential candidates in the present campaign, there appears to be no end. It must, however, be regarded on the whole as creditable to the popular intelligence. If it devolves upon the people to decide who are to hold the reins of power, it is important that they should know as well as they may those who are to assume the trusts. It must be granted, however, that these campaign biographies do not always serve this purpose so effectually as might be desired. The likeness, like a highly finished photograph or portrait, is too flattering, if it does not serve to even obscure or disguise the original. But, however true this may be in some instances, it does not wholly apply to this volume. The story of Gen. Garfield's life has in truth much that is fascinating; an element of romance that is not always found in the biographies of presidential candidates. His humble origin, early struggles, energy, and manly aspirations and crowning achievements throw into relief his remarkable characteristics, in the hand of the most artless delineator. It is well, therefore, apart from all political considerations, that the story of so meritorious a life should be written. It affords an inspiring example to the youth of the republic, and is a credit to the democratic principles of society, which constitute its great distinction. The present Life of Gen. Garfield, we believe, was one of the first of those issued, which accounts, it is to be presumed, for the evidence of haste in its preparation, and a sort of monotony of style that runs through it. The slur which some of its opening paragraphs contain on the doctrine of heredity will not commend it to those to whom the teachings of modern science are more authoritative than the prejudices of traditional training. It is, in spite of these defects, as intimated, an interesting book, handsomely illustrated and published, and contains Gen. Garfield's account of the Credit Mobilier affair, which, it is claimed, makes it exceptional in this respect to other lives of him that have been given to the public.

For the Free Religious Index.

PROSPER MERIMEE.

I have been re-reading lately Merimée's Lettres à une Inconnue, published in 1873. It is not known to whom these letters were addressed; but the correspondence extends from 1840 until 1870, the last letter being written two hours before his death. He and his fair correspondent are not personally acquainted at first; but finally, in answer to urgent entreaties, she grants him the required interview. They are mutually impressed with each other; and a friendship springs up between them, that, to Merimée at least, seems the only reality in a world of forms and conventionalities.

Merimée was the son of a French painter, and was born in Paris, Sept. 28, 1803. He entered the College of Charlemagne, and turned his attention, first to law, then to literature. His activity expended itself upon different fields and in a variety of ways. He had a clear, vigorous style, and could infuse into his stories fire and life,—the quality that his historical sketches lacked. He was thoroughly instructed on a wide diversity of topics. A finished classical scholar, he was well acquainted with the language, history, and literature of England, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Russia. Descended from a family of painters, he had inherited their taste for art: his sketches and water-colors were above mediocrity. He did nothing superficially, and yet failed to reach the highest point of success. A man only produces all of which he is capable when, having conceived some form of art, some method of science,—in brief, some general idea,—he finds it so beautiful that he prefers it to everything else, even to himself, and adores it like a goddess whom he is too happy to serve. Merimée also could adore; but, at the end of a little while, the critic awoke in him, he judged the goddess, and discovered that she was not altogether divine. All our methods of science, all our forms of art, have some weak point; it is only the illusion of love that can find them perfect. Merimée's scepticism penetrated everywhere.

Digitized by Google

Gracious, loving, delicate, as his letters represent him, a vein of cynicism is apparent.

"There are so many contradictions in you," he writes, "that I am troubled to arrive at an exact conclusion; that is to say, the sum total, + so many good qualities — so many bad qualities = x. This x puzzles me."

"In all that you say or do," he continues elsewhere, "you substitute the conventional for the real. . . . You cherish many absurd ideas, pardon me the word; and I sometimes reproach myself for taking them from you, as you have nothing to put in their place."

Again: "It seems to me that you grow egotistical every day. . . . There are two persons in you. One, which is the best, is all heart and soul. The other is a pretty statue, polished by the world, draped in silk and cashmere, a charming automaton whose springs are arranged as skilfully as possible. I think to address the first, and perhaps encounter the statue. Of course you must remain what you are, but the first ought to command the automaton."

"You are one of those chilly women of the North," he complains: "you only live by the head. Our characters are as different as our races."

His correspondent was evidently born in England, and possessed a nature as restive and independent as his own. He analyzes it curiously, and somewhat sadly: "a lioness, though tame," is what he calls her.

"It is a pity that we cannot meet the day after a quarrel," he writes: "we should be perfectly amiable toward each other. . . . Assuredly, my greatest enemy, or, if you wish, my rival in your heart, is your pride: even in the slightest details, you are guided by your own opinion. Pride with you conquers tenderness. The first sentiment is to the second as a pygmy to a colossus. And this pride itself is at bottom only a variety of egotism."

Yet they remain friends in spite of quarrels and criticisms, and this friendship endures until Merimée's death. The last letter was written as mentioned two hours before he expired.

"Dear friend," he writes, "I am indeed sick, so sick that it is difficult to write. There is a little improvement. I shall write you soon, I hope, more in detail."

Taine describes Merimée as pale, straight, and dignified, with a cold, distant manner that prevented in advance all familiarity. His face was impassible: one felt that he had gained a complete mastery over self. Saint-Clair, in the story entitled Le Vase étrusque, might be taken as a picture of himself. "He was born with a tender, loving heart; but, at an age when one easily receives impressions that endure throughout life, his extreme sensibility attracted the ridicule of his companions. From that time, he made a point of concealing what he came to regard as a dishonoring weakness. In the world, he obtained the sad reputation of insensibility." He looked upon life, as Taine says, with the eye of an amateur: one that possesses a nature so critical can hardly do otherwise. By force of turning and re-turning the tapestry, he came to see it habitually on the wrong side.

He entered public life early, became a senator in 1853, commander of the Legion of Honor in 1860, and was one of the ten free members of the Académie des Inscriptions. To travel, to study, to watch and criticise men and things,—these were his occupations; nor was he restrained therein by his official duties. It would hardly be possible to approach organized bodies with a more serious exterior and less inner deference than he. Grave, dignified, when he made an academical visit or improvised a public discourse, his manners were irre roachable; but there lurked a mocking sprite behind, that turned into ridicule both orator and listeners.

A candidate for the French Academy, he writes: "I am making visits conscientiously. I find people very polished, very much accustomed to their rôles, and taking them seriously. I do my best to take mine as gravely, but it is difficult. It is droll to say to a man, 'Monsieur, I believe myself one of the forty wisest men in France.' Of course this is translated into various polite terms, according to persons."

Toward the last, an under-current of pathos runs through his correspondence, distrust leads to melancholy. His health fails little by little; he feels that death is approaching, but takes all possible care of himself; his letters assume more and more the character of bulletins from a sick-chamber. By the order of the physician, he goes out daily to shoot with bow and arrows, and to divert himself paints a little occasionally. He may be encountered in the country with two old English women, walking in silence: one carries his bow and arrows, the other his box of paints. He has other pensioners also,—a cat in a deserted cabin, half a league distant, that he nourishes; a lizard that he feeds with flies, carefully caught and preserved. When a friend arrives, he is cheered and animated, his conversation becomes charming: his letters are so always. But he is not happy. The future of his country seems shrouded in black, and its overthrow occurs just before his death, Sept. 23, 1870.

Through fear of being deceived, he was suspicious in life, in love, in friendship, in science, in art. The poison of distrust distilled itself everywhere, embittering his life and character, diminishing the greatness of his work.

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

SYRACUSE, N.Y., Aug., 1880.

FOREIGN.

NORWAY has taken a step forward in the path of religious equality. Jews, and in general all who do not belong to the Established Church, will now be admitted to certain public functions from which they were formerly excluded.

CARDINAL MANNING has decided that an English pilgrimage to Lourdes shall leave England the first or second week in September, so as to arrive at the shrine on the Feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, which falls on the 8th September, or within its octave.

IT is rumored that Leo XIII. is bent on enlarging the Papacy's sphere of action in America, and with this view has invited all the archbishops, bishops, and priests in America to gather information and transmit it to Rome. These statistics will form the basis of a formal project for extending the influence of the Papal Church there.

TELEGRAPHIC communication with America is certainly cheap enough at present. A gentleman sent a message which cost only three francs to a friend in New York recently. He was much surprised, a few hours after he had sent the despatch, to receive the visit of a messenger, who politely said, "We were unable to deliver your message in New York, because your friend has gone into the country and left no address." And all this without any extra charge. Verily, great is competition.—Parisian.

WE invite the attention of the Lord's Day Observance Society to the fact reported in the papers that on Sunday the Grosvenor Gallery was visited by many "persons of quality," among whom were the Princess of Wales and her children, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, and the King of the Hellenes. Workingmen who emulated their superiors in point of rank and fortune by following the Sunday Society to the Hanover and Graphic Galleries on the same day will please note that, if by so doing they have incurred eternal perdition, they will go into the land of brimstone in excellent society.—Secular Review.

JOYOUS BÉRANGER, the poet of Lisette and Frétillon, has not been forgotten amid the general gayety. On Sunday, the twenty-third anniversary of the death of the merry chansonnier, the Béranger committee organized a pilgrimage to his tomb in Père-la-Chaise Cemetery. Numerous deputies and municipal councillors, and many persons who knew the great man intimately and who cherish most tender memories of him, joined in this pious remembrance. Béranger was the firm friend of Rouget de l'Isle, the author of the patriotic hymn which has been sung, bawled, and played in and out of tune by the patriotic thousands during the recent festal period; and it was Béranger who was the first to announce to the author of the "Marseillaise," in 1830, that the government had accorded him a pension and the cross of the Legion of Honor. "My dear fellow," said Béranger to Rouget de l'Isle, "your 'Marseillaise' has been recognized as a work of public utility, and has therefore been subsidized."—Parisian, July 16.

AN OLD ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—On Sunday, an extraordinary scene took place in Irvine parish church. During the singing of a hymn, previous to the commencement of the sermon, an elderly man of singular appearance entered the church, and attracted general notice by his strange demeanor. Clutching by the middle an old umbrella, he walked with a determined aspect up the area of the church, claiming audibly that he intended to occupy the minister's seat. This pew, which is situated well to the front in the area of the church, was completely filled, but nevertheless he crushed himself into it, compelling one of the occupants to seek another seat. Having hustled himself into this position, he waited patiently until the conclusion of the hymn, but no sooner had the minister arisen to announce his text than the man arose, and, taking from his pocket a paper, he addressed the minister by name, and commenced to read a long statement purporting to be an interdict forbidding certain lawyers and others in Irvine from proceeding with the sale of certain property. The document occupied about five minutes in reading, and minutely described the situation of the property down to the square yards it measured; but, as he apparently did not consider the statement sufficiently explanatory, he took out an extremely long handkerchief from his pocket, and began a practical demonstration of the measurement. When the man had finished, the minister quietly asked some of the office-bearers to remove him, which was accordingly done without any disturbance taking place. He stated that what he had done was in pursuance of an old ecclesiastical law, entitling people to claim publicly in church any property of which they were threatened to be dispossessed by legal action. The police afterwards conveyed him home.—Lloyd's Weekly.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

"QUIEN SABE?"

We are waiting for the coming
Of that bright and glorious day,
When the clouds that dim our vision
Will have rolled at last away;
And the light that now is hidden
From our sad and weary eyes
Breaks beyond the deep, dark river,
Where the solemn secret lies.

Shall we find those gone before us
Standing on the other shore,
With their hands stretched out in welcome,
Glad to clasp our own once more?
Shall we leave loved ones behind us
But to meet again on high,
In a realm all peace and beauty,
Far above the summer sky?

Or shall we, when life is over,
But lie down to quiet rest,
With our brains unvexed forever,
Folded hands upon the breast?
In a sleep that knows no waking,
Where no suffering or pain,
Through the coming of the ages,
Shall disturb our dreams again?

None can tell us. And the questions
That we ask have no reply.
Let us live our lives with patience,
Do our duty till we die;
For we know, whatever follows,—
After-life or endless rest,—
He who gave us hearts for loving
Must do all things for the best!

YSOLDE DE QUELSI.

CLARENS-MONTREUX, July 29, 1880.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 2, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

ANY of our subscribers wanting to purchase any book reviewed in the Index can procure it by sending to our Business Agent at this office. We hold ourselves in readiness also to forward other books to our patrons at the market rates, when desired to do so.

WE have been notified that the "Liberalists" of Michigan and Northern Indiana will hold their annual "Grove Meeting" at Schoolcraft, Mich., on Sunday, Sept. 12, in "Island Grove," and that Col. R. G. Ingersoll and Prof. O. A. Phelps "will positively be present and address the meeting"; also that James Parton, Esq., is expected. The railroads are to run trains at low excursion rates from all points, and a great crowd of people is anticipated.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200.00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10.00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass	18.35
MRS. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00
Mrs. S. W. RATHBONE, Princeton, Mass	5.00
FRANCIS SPRINGER, Columbus City, Iowa	10 00
DANA B. HUMPHREY, New Bedford, Mass	25.00
ELIZABETH S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
JAMES W. BARTLETT, Dover, N.H. (10th assessment)	20.00
Miss S. E. DUNN, Dover, Mass	5.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock, and the same annually for 4 following years	50.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

THE "MISTAKE" OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.

In the last International Review, Mr. Rowland Connor had an article concerning Foreign Missions. The New York Independent, in an editorial (Aug. 19), takes grave exception to the article, charging that it was written without any inquiry into the facts of the case. We have not as yet been able to read Mr. Connor's paper. But, as he is not in the habit of writing without taking pains to inform himself of the facts about which he writes, we take the liberty to doubt whether he has done so in this matter. We doubt, too, whether the International Review would publish an article that sinned in this way so egregiously as the Independent intimates.

But our concern is not now to defend Mr. Connor or his article. He is abundantly able to take care of himself. If we should feel a call to defend his essay, we should certainly inform ourselves of the facts about it beforehand. Our attention has now been chiefly attracted to the desire expressed by the Independent, in the closing words of its article, for "a good history and criticism of missions from a Free Religious stand-point." This desire we can most cordially second. A vigorous and pretty searching effort in this direction was made several years ago by our predecessor in the editorial chair; and we remember that the Independent did not like it. Mr. Abbot's article did not suit the views of that journal more than does Mr. Connor's. Possibly, the attempts in these two articles, though adequate for their purpose, were not so thorough as they might have been; at least, it may be allowed—their authors themselves would probably allow—that they were not utterly exhaustive of the subject, which has become a vast one. Let us, therefore, have a third effort,—by some one with ample time and all the possible resources of knowledge and the requisite mental ability to sift facts, and to arrive at just the results the facts warrant,—a third effort to treat this important theme in a thoroughly finished review from the Free Religious stand-point. To such a treatment, we should extend a most hearty welcome. We believe it would be a most valuable addition to the effective weapons of human knowledge for the promotion of religious progress; in fact, for the attainment of just those objects which "Free Religion" has most at heart.

Yet we doubt if such a review would suit even the liberal Orthodoxy of the Independent,—to say nothing of conservative Orthodoxy,—more than do the attempts already made. The truth is, it is the stand-point itself that Orthodoxy of every type really objects to in these attempts at reviewing the work of foreign missions. It objects to what "Free Religion" sees as the results of Christian foreign missions, because it objects to the point of view from which "Free Religion" takes its observations. The one purpose of the foreign missions of the Christian Church is the doctrinal conversion of the heathen. The impulse in which the system of missions had its origin, and which is still the ruling motive in the work, is to save the souls of the heathen in the future world by bringing them to accept the one alleged mode of salvation; namely, the gospel of Christ's cross. The object is not civilization, not education, not social amelioration here on earth,—not one nor all of these objects as such,—but primarily and singly and all through "to save souls" by a certain process of theological indoctrination. This point is made clear by an elaborate lecture on "The World of Missions," printed in the same issue of the Independent, and to which the editorial article refers as containing "an outline of the facts" which its desired historian and critic needs to know. The lecturer, after reciting some of the indirect results of missions, such as benefits to commerce, education, science, society, etc., adds that "the Church of Christ looks upon all these and other material results" as "incidental." "The single aim of missions is the conversion of souls, the value of which no man can estimate. . . . If missions have brought one soul to the knowledge, love, and worship of the one true God, they have done that over which the angels in heaven rejoice." If therefore, according to this writer to whom we are referred as competent authority on the subject, none of the "results" spoken of and passed by as "incidental" were to follow, as sometimes they do not, and the "conversion of souls" should follow, the end would be accomplished and all the expenditure of means amply justified.

Now, from the Free Religious stand-point, this cardinal primary assumption that any one religion, even though it be the Christian, has some exclusive possession in a knowledge of "the one true God," which it is absolutely necessary that the devotees of other religions should receive in order to "save their souls," is the one cardinal primary mistake in the whole system of foreign missions. This main object, the one thing which Orthodoxy sees as all-important, and for which such enormous expenditure of money and moral energy is now made by the Christian Church, is, in the view of Free Religion, theoretically wholly irrational and practically wholly unessential. The results of foreign missions, therefore, which Orthodoxy claims as chief, as the only ones essential for the accomplishment of their purpose, Free Religion will pass by as of little or no importance; as absolutely of no importance, except so far as it is an intellectually educating process to displace one error in the mind by the inculcation of another error regarded for the time as truth. Such a process doubtless serves to awaken thought; and the awakened thought may ultimately throw off the second error. But this is not the kind of "salvation of souls" that the missions have in view. It is only one of the results admitted to be incidental and unessential. To Free Religion, on the other hand, these "incidental results"—though they are by no means the result of missions to the extent claimed—are the only results that are essential, the only ones worth working for. When the Christian Church shall lift these indirect results—civilization, education, social improvement—to the dignity of chief objects, it may then justify its system of foreign missions to the modern world. But it will then have abandoned its central doctrine.

PUNCH AND JUDY.

Some years ago, in a Western city, we "attended service," if the expression may be allowed, one Sunday morning, with a German Freie Gemeinde. After the sermon,—which, by the way, was given by a Harvard Unitarian of German birth,—the Superintendent of the Sunday-school announced that the school would go upon an excursion to a well-known "park" that same afternoon, and, as an inducement for all to be present, stated that the Japanese jugglers had been engaged to perform for the amusement of the children. The announcement of the Superintendent was made by him, and received by all present, with no suspicion of any incongruity between it and the religious services which had just taken place; and, indeed, in that German community, which continued to observe all the customs of the "Fatherland," no incongruity really existed. The habit of life for many generations had been to "attend church" Sunday morning, and seek for amusement the same afternoon: but to one fresh from New England life, as we then were, the announcement did seem a little odd, and we did not repress a smile as we reflected upon the probable effect of a similar announcement in some staid

Digitized by Google

New England "meeting." But the world moves in some things faster than our fancies, and we find to-day in the news column of our daily paper proof that we underestimated the rapidity of religious "progress" of which New England is capable. A convention of the New England Sabbath-school Associations is in session at South Framingham, in this State, as we write; and, in the report of the proceedings of the first day, we find that there were provided for the amusement of the Christian crowd: (1) the presence of Sankey, the noted singing evangelist; (2) a Turk (with a Dutch name), who performs in national costume and exhibits a "Biblical museum"; and (3), last, "a grand pyrotechnical display."

Between an exhibition of Turkish trousers and fireworks, on the one hand, and Japanese jugglers, on the other hand, choice becomes an affair of taste; but when we consider that the latter were provided in the above instance simply as an amusement for children, while the former were used as incentives to exertion in bringing souls to Christ, we think the taste of the jolly Germans is much to be preferred.

We observe in our daily paper, also, that an "evangelist," now preaching in Boston, is illustrating his sermons with chalk sketches on a blackboard, and the novelty of his performances is attracting a crowd. We admit the possibility of a man's drawing chalk lines, or lighting sky-rockets and pin-wheels, or performing à la Turk, or standing on his head—"all for Christ"; but we should like to ask some of our evangelical friends to reflect a little upon the probable state of a religion which needs sweetening with this sort of confectionery, or which tries to make converts by pleasing with a rattle and tickling with a straw! But perhaps we should not be fastidious with regard to the signs which indicate a waning faith, but rejoice instead that so many persons can find pious satisfaction in these harmless amusements.

R. C.

THE POLITICS OF REFORMERS.

Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage in her paper, The National Citizen and Ballot Box, says that "the National Woman Suffrage Association has but one end in view; i.e., SECURING THE POLITICAL RECOGNITION OF WOMAN. This is a 'principle'; and to attain the acknowledgment of this principle is not only the ultimate object of the National Woman Suffrage Association, but toward it all its energies are bent. To those who ask 'if there are no other rights than the right of suffrage for woman,' no other 'considerations than those of suffrage,' we reply, None that are primal. Without suffrage for woman, ordinary governmental questions can neither be fairly presented nor justly settled."

"The question of finance, civil service, tariff, Chinese immigration, secular schools, sumptuary laws, sectional questions, the laboring, manufacturing, commercial, and business interests,—in fact the general material prosperity of the country,—are as chaff before the wind, in comparison with the great underlying foundation principle of the rights of one-half the people."

But many Liberals think that the reform on which all friends of freedom and justice should now unite is that of State secularization; and the chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, in a recent address to auxiliary leagues, says the members of that organization "should first resolve that they will vote together," name their candidate, and then "every friend of the Liberal League should acquiesce in the decision, and all should vote the same ticket."

Mrs. Gage declares that no other wrong equals in magnitude that of withholding from the women of this country (since the government professes to derive its powers from the consent of the governed) the right of suffrage. She thinks justice, fairness, and liberality demand that all the friends of woman suffrage shall support the party and candidates that will give this movement, without regard to others, the greatest encouragement and the most help. Mrs. Gage is a woman of liberal views on all subjects, and is an advocate of State secularization; yet if, of two or more parties, one favors woman suffrage, but is indifferent to State secularization, and the others favor State secularization, but disregard woman suffrage, she deems it her duty to support the first. But many there are, friends of State secularization, who are unconvinced of the wisdom of extending suffrage to woman, while not a few are stubbornly opposed to it. Mrs. Gage complains of Col. Ingersoll, because, as she says, he refused to address a woman suffrage meeting, "on the ground that women, if enfranchised, would unite Church and State." I had supposed Col. Ingersoll in favor of woman's voting; but, be that as it may, the reason which it is said he gave for not speaking at a certain meeting is the reason many Liberals give for being indifferent to the reform Mrs. Gage so earnestly advocates. They think the extension of suffrage to woman would strengthen the political power of Orthodoxy, and lead to a revival of restrictive and proscriptive legislation, making the success of State secularization for half a century or more impossible. On the other hand, quite a large proportion of those who have become converts to woman suffrage the past ten or fifteen years are Orthodox Christians, and are opposed to and would solidly vote against the taxation of church property, the removal of the Bible from the public schools, and the other "demands of Liberalism." How, then, can it be reasonably expected that the adherents of State secularization and the adherents of woman suffrage will unite as reformers in sustaining the same party and candidates? There are many, like the writer of this article, who are in favor of both these reforms; and, when no others on which there is a difference of opinion are involved, such can easily agree and vote the same ticket (if there be no doubt as to the position of the parties in regard to these movements); but their combined vote would not probably exceed the vote that either of these classes would be able to poll separately.

Then there is the Prohibitionist, who is convinced that intemperance is the greatest curse of the world, and that it is his duty to sustain the party which, whatever its attitude toward other reforms, is in favor of the most stringent legislation for the suppression of this vice. And the Greenbacker thinks that great and wide-spread distress, and perhaps revolution and bloodshed, can be averted only by getting rid of our present financial system. He declares that banks and bondholders are amassing wealth by legalized, systematic robbery of the toiling millions, among whom poverty, wretchedness, and crime are daily increasing. He thinks perhaps all other reforms secondary in importance to "the Ohio idea." But many Liberals there are who are in sympathy with neither the methods of the Prohibition party nor the principles of the Greenback party. Then there are the two great leading parties of the country. The mass of Republicans think the best interests of the country will be promoted by keeping the Democratic party out of power. Freethinkers who belong to this party call attention to the fact that the whole Catholic priesthood and church are back of the Democratic party; and they declare that whatever its professions, or the character of its candidates, or their views or pledges in regard to State secularization, they will never support that party. There are many Liberals who are in sympathy with and active supporters of the Democratic party, the number having greatly increased, I think, since Greeley was nominated for the Presidency. They declare that the Republican party has outlived its usefulness; that it is largely controlled by demagogues and plunderers; that it is the party now of the Methodist Church and of Orthodox Churches generally, which favor Puritanical legislation; and that every friend of State secularization and of liberal views should help defeat it by voting with the Democratic party. Some of the old Garrisonian Abolitionists say that their vote this year shall be given for Hancock.

About a year ago, a convention was called to consider the advisability of forming a new party. It was held at Cincinnati, and the result is known. Its leading spirit was Col. Ingersoll, who has recently stated that he thinks Garfield "entitled to the support of liberal people"; but there are some who still think that the new party should be organized, and that it should nominate independent candidates to represent the principles of secular government. But it is safe to say that but few men of liberal views can be persuaded to throw away their votes on a candidate who cannot be elected, when they can help to elect men and support parties that will secure important reforms in which the Orthodox and the heterodox are alike interested. Indeed, it is folly to expect that in the coming election anything like a solid vote can be obtained from any class of reformers in favor of any one of the presidential candidates now before the people or any that may be hereafter nominated.

However positive and firm our convict ons as to which political party is the most deserving of support, we cannot be ignorant of the fact that there is the same diversity of opinion on this subject among Liberals that there is among the Orthodox; and, since people generally are as sensitive and as prejudiced in regard to their political as they are respecting their religious views, the bringing of party politics into liberal societies and conventions is introducing an element of discord and division, and is likely to have about the same effect that would follow the introduction of religion into a Republican, Democratic, Greenback, Prohibition, or Woman Suffrage league or convention. Organizations, to accomplish anything, must have a well-defined purpose, and adhere to that purpose. It is true that every reform bears some relation to all other reforms; but the relation may be indirect, remote, or difficult to comprehend, and but comparatively few can harmonize and cooperate in supporting all the good movements of the day, while opposing or ignoring the impracticable schemes and wild vagaries that always find adherents among well-meaning men and women. To single out one reform, and to expect that all progressive minds will subordinate to that one every other movement is to expect the impossible.

Every year the people are becoming more tolerant; and the time will come, it is hoped, when in all enlightened nations every subject can be discussed in the cool, unimpassioned light of reason, without anger or resentment, without bigotry or prejudice, without ill-will or intolerance. It is not so now. It is not so with all who are called Liberals. The world cannot be regenerated, society cannot be remodelled, by conventions in which no limits to debate are recognized, or in which, from many reforms, real or imaginary, one is selected with the expectation that the great mass of Liberals are to concentrate their energies upon that, and vote, "Independent," Greenback, Democratic, or Republican, as the conventions may "resolve," especially when the parties and candidates are all un-pronounced on some one or more of the various reforms to which different degrees of importance are attached by those whose coöperation is sought. Such a political "consensus of the competent" will hardly find favor among independent thinkers.

Digitized by Google

B. F. U.

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

The great intellectual event of the past week—or, perhaps it may be more properly said, of the year—in Boston has been the annual session of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. This distinguished body of students and eminent persons in all departments of science, embracing members in every part of the Union, though it dates back to but 1845 as a distinct organization, has had an illustrious history, and exercised an important influence upon scientific progress in this country. But, though its origin is thus recent, the interest in science here began much earlier. Several societies devoted to such pursuits had previously existed, some of them taking their rise nearly with the formation of the government. The credit of the conception of a general communion of this kind of the devotees of science within one comprehensive organization, must be awarded to Germany, that land of almost peerless scholars and investigators, where the German Association for the Advancement of Science was formed in 1822. This was followed, some eight or nine years later, by the British Association, upon the same plan; and subsequently, as has been seen, by the one in this country whose session has just closed. These associations may be regarded as landmarks in their respective countries of the march of progress. They grew naturally out of the exigencies of the time,—the increasing recognition of the inter-relation of all branches of science, and a sense of the need of an intimate and a fraternal fellowship among its different classes of workers. It is the custom of the American Association to hold its annual meetings in various sections of the country, and to have on these occasions a certain number of papers presented, adapted, so far as may be consistent with its general purpose, to the intelligence of the public; aiming in this way, and through the press reports of the proceedings, to stimulate in some degree an interest in science in the localities where it assembles.

It seems a little strange that the meeting of the Association last week should be the first ever held in Boston; more especially in view of the fact that so many of its foremost representatives have been of this city, or associated with its neighboring ancient university. It has certainly been from no lack of the assurance of a cordial welcome. In no city or region of the country could such a gathering count upon a greeting of greater honor or attention. In no city are learning and intellectual pursuits held in higher esteem. This was conspicuously shown in the provision made for the Association and the entertainment of its members. As might be expected, the committee of reception was composed of Boston's most prominent citizens,—the presidents of its colleges and the names of the more noted in letters, social rank, commercial and public station, some of whom extended the hospitable courtesies of their homes to the distinguished guests. The Mayor and the Governor put aside for the hour all other claims, to participate in the greeting of the introductory meeting; while formal invitations from numerous institutions and societies poured in on every hand to the members of the Association to the privileges of whatsoever they possessed to interest them.

There was a very interesting appropriateness in assigning to Prof. W. B. Rogers, one of the most venerable and esteemed of the scientists of the country, and the President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where the meetings were held, the opening words of salutation. The high aims of the Association were very definitely and broadly stated, as follows:—

It is an association for the advancement of science, and it is expected and required of all those who become its members that they shall do whatever is in their power to quicken scientific thought, to accumulate scientific facts, to investigate scientific laws, or, in other words, to advance the progress of science throughout the world. But this term "advancement" necessarily implies diffusion; and, while it is an association for the advancement of science, it is no less an association for its diffusion, and this justifies in the highest degree the comparatively popular character of the meetings of the American Association. How can we best advance science but by sowing the seeds of science as widely as possible through the world, wakening up in all quarters where the Association assembles those latent springs, those unborn talents and tendencies, which will hereafter blossom and fructify to scientific results?

The addresses of Mayor Prince and Governor Long were both models of their kind, dignified, finished, and in all respects befitting the occasion.

Of the numerous and various papers submitted, upward of two hundred in all, it would be impossible for any one person to pass judgment on more than a small number of them, as those of different sections of the Association frequently occupied the same hour.

It is safe to say that for those who are thinking upon the problems of psychological science, which run into modern philosophy and freethought in religion, one of the most interesting addresses of the week was that of Mr. George E. Barker, the retiring President, upon the question "What is Life?" It afforded a very strong array of convincing evidence in behalf of the supposition of the physical basis of all life. It showed that many of the phenomena of the body may occur outside of the body, as well as within it, and require no intermediate or primary vital agency for their production. It furnished fresh evidence in support of the theory that mind is the transn ission of physical energy in the organism. It was shown by Prof. Barker that not only could different actions of the mind, such as that of imagination, emotion, and reason, be determined by degrees of force, but also the amount of force expended by different persons in the same mental operation, as in a mathematical calculation, the translation of a passage from a classic author, or by the same individual. But, as this essay may receive further notice hereafter in the Index, we refrain both on this account and from want of space to dwell upon it at present.

The exceedingly interesting report given by Mr. A. Graham Bell of his and Mr. Sumner Taintor's experiments in regard to the photophone, or the discovery of the power of conducting sounds, at any distance, upon rays of light, is the latest and most extraordinary marvel of science. The address of Prof. Mayer commemoratory of the life and achievements of the late Prof. Henry was a tender, judicial, and comprehensive estimate of the character and services of the eminent scientist by one of special qualifications for the trust. The address of Prof. Agassiz, to which we had the pleasure of listening, as well as some of the papers of the section of anthropology, should also be mentioned as among the more notable of the occasion.

That this meeting of the Association for the advancement of science must serve to emphasize the value of scientific studies, and give a new impetus to the interest in them, not alone in Boston, but in New England, we cannot doubt. It is thus that the event is one for congratulation, since its influence must be altogether beneficent,—to increase our knowledge of the world we live in, to enable us better to use its resources, perceive its wonders, and rejoice in our existence.

D. H. C.

CLASSICS OF FREE RELIGION.

John Milton.

II.

Atonement is a doctrine of the imagination. It has a high, poetic use, being the supreme affection of one for one, or of one for many. We recognize its beauty when seen between two persons; and when extended between one and many, although the actual piacular fact may be questioned, nevertheless we have an instinctive reverence for the symbol. It represents an ideal relation, human or spiritual. In the case of mediation of one for one, the mediator assumes a heroic and an affecting character, but remains a human, or, at most, semi-human, personality. But, when the mediation is of one for many, the being who acts that part becomes, soon or late, divine, possessing the attributes of a god, and, after long worship and a gradual confusion of ideas respecting divinity, is popularly considered co-essential and even numerically one with God.

This seems to be the natural and simple explanation of one prominent feature of most of the mythologies and religions that have prevailed in the world. Let us try to state fairly Milton's characteristic attitude toward this particular dogma of the Church.

We say characteristic, because in nearly every other direction, civil, literary, or theological, he manifested the same independence of opinion. Milton believed in the mediatorship of Jesus, but not in his equal eternity and power with God. This was his heterodoxy on a cardinal faith of all the churches, Roman, Presbyterian, Puritan. This is the "visionary theology" of all his reverend biographers, in whose hands, for the sake of averting the noxious influence of his opinions respecting Church and State, he has, until recently, been relegated. They have commended his poetry and pious spirit and scholarship; without pretending to controvert him, they have called his errors the usual aberration of a great mind, blinded by "excess of light." Could they, has there ever been any mortal who could, teach Milton anything of the mysteries of religion or the foundations of morals and human freedom? Must we, with such guides as Milton, and a long line of similar thinkers in all ages and countries, still throw ourselves into the arms of the credulous, the unreasoning, the unilluminated? We have heard enough of that sentimental doctrine of wisdom being withheld from the wise and revealed only to babes and fools. It belongs to the same age that believed in the inspiration of idiots and insane, when an unintelligent populace must be led by its senses. Intelligence is the only true foundation of the highest spirituality.

But before Milton there were those who held similar ideas, and who, like him, had been stigmatized with certain odious names. It is indeed wonderful what light has always existed in the Christian Church, and how invariably it has been called darkness! The Church glories in its martyrs, but those it has itself crucified are a more glorious company. They were the seed of modern freedom.

> The right
> Of privately judging means simply that light
> Has been granted to me, for deciding on you,
> And, in happier times before atheism grew,
> The deed contained clauses for cooking you, too.

In investigating the grounds of revealed religion, Milton professed to take the Bible as his sole guide. To many, this would seem to be foreclosing the very door of truth. And Milton forgot to apply his fine intelligence and erudition at the basis of the structure. However, accepting it, he proceeded to interpretation according to his lights; and the results were sufficiently remarkable, and, if carried to logical conclusions, would undermine the whole traditional belief of Christendom. In some respects he was more Orthodox than any modern theology, which saves its Biblical history from reproach and from imitation by an apology for the necessities of the times. In this way, it has given up many ancient customs and ideas, and, emphasizing as much of Jesus' teaching as it considers practicable, rejects nearly the whole of what was most characteristic in his life as a Utopian ideal. Paul and Peter are its preachers in the Protestant Church. In the Romish, the Virgin Mary stands for the totality of religion; and as, fortunately for it, she delivered no oracles, idolatry, not obedience, is all that is required of the devotee.

Digitized by Google

Milton, taking the Bible for his guide, did not flinch when it led him to the unity of the Divinity, and polygamy. He had not freed himself from the idea that God had never spoken to man except in the Hebrew tongue. He accepts that single revelation as meant for all mankind. But his greatness consists in the independence of his interpretation, and in his constant assertion of the superiority of the spirit and the unwritten word over the recorded, over the opinions of forefathers and the authority of the Church. He says, "The pillar and ground of the truth has not uniformly been the Church, but the hearts of believers"; "even on the authority of Scripture itself, every thing is to be finally referred to the spirit."

In his poetry, he employs the Christian scheme as an epic motive, but with such liberties and imagination as are the prerogatives of the poet. An earlier time would not have tolerated such usage; and it prophesies the ending of the reign of our religious traditions, and the future triumph of spiritual freedom in the substitution of morals and right living for creeds and authority.

The poet is always a seer, not only in what he sees and expresses, but much more in the unconscious absorption of the deeper intellectual and spiritual tendencies of his age and race; and there is nothing strange or very new in our day, to one who has long been intimate with Milton. J. A.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

We are confident of the sympathy of every reader in an expression of regret for the death of Gen. Albert J. Myer, Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army. About ten years ago, Congress passed a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to take meteorological observations in order to give telegraphic notice upon the sea-coast and lakes of the approach of storms; and Gen. Myer, then in charge of the signal service at Washington, was intrusted with the execution of the task. Congress, in passing the resolution, was "wiser than it knew." It is doubtful, indeed, if any advocate of the measure conceived the important results which were to flow from it, unless Gen. Myer himself were its original instigator,—a point upon which we know nothing, but which is naturally suggested because of his manifest foresight with reference to the possibilities of the undertaking. The commercial value of the weather reports, to which many persons have already acquired the habit of turning first in the daily paper, has now become apparent to the whole world. Their scientific value is equally great, although of course very different in kind; and we cannot help adding that their theological value (in helping to do away with a multitude of superstitions concerning the weather, in illustrating the futility of prayers for rain, etc., and in showing that a mass of mysterious phenomena will be reduced at last to scientific control) is also as great of its kind. Gen. Myer is said to have attended faithfully to every detail of the work of the Weather Bureau, his fatal illness being produced in part, doubtless, by overwork, and he was engaged upon plans for enlarging its scope and making it more perfect,—an additional cause of regret for his death.

Some time ago, Mr. Max Müller received from a friend, Mr. Wylie, a copy of a vocabulary called A Thousand Sanskrit and Chinese Words, compiled by I-tsing, about A.D. 700, and brought to Japan by a Japanese priest in 847. The edition which Mr. Wylie bought in Japan was published in 1727, and in the preface the editor says that there are treasured in the temple Horivzi, in Yamato, two Sanskrit documents (we omit the long titles), "written on two palm-leaves, handed down from Central India." Horivzi is one of eleven temples founded by a prince who died in 621. Mr. Müller, in a paper on "Sanskrit Texts in Japan," published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, March 10, suggested that, "if the temple were still in existence, some Buddhist priest might be induced to go there, to see whether the palm-leaves are still there, and, if they are, to make a copy and send it to Oxford." A friend of one of Mr. Müller's Sanskrit pupils acted upon this suggestion, and, in the latter part of April, went to the designated place, and there learned that the priests had recently surrendered their valuables to the Imperial Government, and that the ancient palm-leaves had been presented to the Emperor. In a chronicle kept at the monastery of Horivzi, it is stated that these palm-leaves, and other Buddhist valuables, a list of which is given, were once the property of Chinese Buddhist priests, and were brought to Japan from China during the Sui dynasty (from 589 to 618). "They may therefore be supposed to date from at least the sixth century, and be in fact the oldest Sanskrit manuscripts now in existence." The above facts connected with this interesting discovery are the substance of a recent communication to the Athenæum from Mr. Müller, who, in conclusion, expresses the hope that the manuscripts themselves may be soon copied or photographed.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science will have held its regular meeting in Boston before this number of the Index reaches its readers, and reports of the proceedings will have appeared in newspapers throughout the country. Comment upon the proceedings, therefore, we defer until some other time. One hundred and thirty-two papers are to be read. Judging by the titles only, nearly all of these promise to be of genuine scientific interest. If very few, on the one hand, appear to be of great importance, on the other hand very few appear to be only curious, and none are in any sense trivial. They indicate an amount of labor in scientific fields which should compensate somewhat for the great amount of energy we expend in money-getting pursuits. Allowing for some errors in attempting to classify these papers, we reach the following results: Upon physical and mathematical subjects, including physics proper, chemistry, astronomy, and mathematics, no less than sixty-one papers will be given,—an extraordinary proportion, when we consider the difficulties of these subjects and the comparatively little interest they possess for people in general, although it is to be remembered that chemistry and physics enter more or less into manufacturing industries and mechanical inventions. The next largest list is upon ethnological and archæological topics, having reference chiefly to American Indians and the mound-builders,—thirty papers. Eighteen papers are upon geology, including mineralogy, mining, and physical geography. Biology (including anatomy and physiology, zoölogy, and entomology, and all subjects connected with natural history) furnishes only fourteen papers,—a comparatively small number, considering the impulse given to these pursuits by Agassiz, the present popularity of Riley and Packard and their well-known co-laborers, the existence of summer schools in natural history, the reputation of the work of our Fish Commission, and the fame of the Cambridge Museum. There are nine papers on botany.

Since the foregoing paragraph was written, additional papers have been received, making the above classification already obsolete,—a new illustration of the difficulty of keeping pace with the progress of science.

The following lines from Browning's new volume have so many applications to science and religion that they surely belong in this department of the Index:—

"You are sick, that's sure!" They say.
"Sick of what?" They disagree.
"'Tis the brain," thinks Doctor A.
"'Tis the heart," holds Dr. B.
"The liver—my life I'd lay!"
"The lungs!" "The lights!"
Ah me!
So ignorant of man's whole,
Of bodily organs plain to see;
So sage and certain, frank and free,
About what's under lock and key,—
Man's soul!

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

The total number of paupers in London, exclusive of lunatics in asylums and 797 vagrants, on the last day of the week ending July 17, was 82,994. As compared with the corresponding weeks in each of the three previous years, these figures show an increase of 2,581, 6,493, and 6,048 respectively.

Lloyd's Weekly (England) says: The returns of the Inspectors of Mines show that there is still a very large employment of women and girls in metalliferous mines. Out of 18,795 persons employed above ground about the metalliferous mines, 2,193 are women and girls; and in addition there are 317 males of the tender ages of between 8 and 13. Of girls, 36 are employed between 8 and 13 years old, 32 of whom are in the Cornwall and Devon district. Of girls between 13 and 18 years, there are employed 792, Cornwall and Devon employing 645, and the North Wales district 106, the only other largely employing district being that of Ireland, where 27 are at work. Of girls above 18 years old, there are 1,385 employed, 1,111 in the district of Cornwall and Devon, 176 in North Wales, 41 in Ireland, 16 in Glamorgan and neighboring counties, and 8 in the North-east Lancastrian district. The north-east of England is remarkably free from the employment of women, only 5 being returned as employed in the whole of that part of the country.

Under the question, "Are Good Times an Evil?" a New York journalistic correspondent states the following facts that have a special interest to temperance people: "A striking evidence of the increased spending power of the country is found in the fact that the United States imported during July no less than 13,500 cases of champagne from abroad,—an increase of 3,000 cases over July, 1879, and nearly double the importation of July, 1878. All other kinds of foreign wines show a marked increase, though not to such a degree as champagne, which is emphatically the popular wine of America, just as port and sherry are of England. The internal revenue derived from spirits foots up to the enormous amount of $75,000,000, —an increase of some 15 per cent. over the previous year. The internal revenue receipts from all sources for the coming year are estimated at $125,000,000. These are alarmingly suggestive figures for the temperance folks, and go to show that, when the people have plenty of money to spend, they will drink in spite of all the moral suasion brought to bear. Under these circumstances, will the total abstainers be justified in praying for a return of the hard times and comparatively forced sobriety?"

At the Trocadéro, Paris, on a recent Sunday, Victor

Digitized by Google

Hugo presided at the distribution of the prizes presented by the Society for Elementary Instruction to the most deserving of the pupils at primary schools in Paris who underwent the examination instituted by the Society. Victor Hugo made a speech, in which he said: "Our Society pays its chief attention to history, geography, morals, literature, cosmography, hygienics, arithmetic, geometry, algebra, common law, chemistry, physics, and the great arts of reading and writing. While ecclesiastical education, fearful for the fate of the errors of which it is the apostle, utters cries of rage, this Society, profoundly calm, turns toward children, mothers, and families, becomes imbued by a serene sense of what is necessary, and works. What does it effect? This year it gives away fifty-one medals of various classes, over two hundred 'honorable mentions,' and nearly sixteen hundred certificates of studies. You will call this a great success. I call it a great, a noble, and potent effort. No man ignores the advance of humanity, and the sum of progress is the total of our efforts. I am one of those passers-by who go wherever there is advice to be given or received, and who stop deeply moved before those sacred objects, childhood, youth, hope, work. A grand century is drawing to an end. It has bravely and ardently produced the first-fruits of that mighty revolution which, even when it has become the revolution of humanity, will always be known as the French Revolution. Old Europe is at an end, and New Europe commences. It will be a Europe of peace, labor, concord, and good-will."

FROM OUR MONTREAL CORRESPONDENT.

The readers of the Index may remember the turmoil we Montrealers were kept in for three years, through the legal disputes between the Roman Catholic Church and the representatives of one Guibord, a printer. Guibord was a member of L'Institut Canadien, an Institute of French Canadians, possessing a good library and hall, together with the only free reading-room in the city. As the Institute refused to come under the absolute control of the Church, the Church excommunicated the adherents of the Institute; so that, when Guibord died, his remains were refused burial in the lot he had paid for in the Roman Catholic Cemetery. The Institute sued, and carried the case to the last appeal, the British Privy Council, where it was decided that Guibord be buried in his lot forthwith. The Bishop, to save his ecclesiastical prestige, deconsecrated the few feet of ground wherein the vexed bones of the poor printer were to lie,—only those certain few feet, and no more; for underneath were the mortal remains of Madame Guibord, who had died during the progress of the suits, a faithful daughter of the Church.

The Institute, ever since its victory in the Guibord case, has languished under the redoubled attacks of its powerful enemy. The subscription used to be a small annual one, such as the rank and file of supporters could easily pay. The management, however, saw that, if this continued, the Institute could be at any time betrayed through the accession of a few scores of ultramontanes who might vote for church control. Therefore, the old rule of subscription was changed; and only life-members were received and given votes, their payment on entrance being a sum too large to obtain from the class who would otherwise have gladly helped the little citadel of freedom. The end of the matter is that, with a mortgage on its property, declining revenues, and feeble support, the Institute, after an existence of nearly thirty years, has to succumb. Its volumes and works of art will probably form part of the new Fraser Institute, which will be built when the legatees and lawyers of a certain Mr. Fraser come to terms.

Freethought makes small headway among French Canadians. Education is so largely in the hands of the clergy, and so preponderant is the social and business influence of the Church, that heresy is scarce, and where it exists is carefully suppressed. Sometimes, the head of a family loses all faith in his religion, absents himself from mass, does not go to confession even at Easter, and after years of neglect of spiritual things comes to die. Then, with his weeping family around him, fully persuaded that endless pains will follow persistence in his unbelief, what is the poor man to do? Become reconciled to the Church of course, and pass away with its last sacrament upon his lips. Then it goes forth that although freethinking may do very well in health and strength, yet that it is only in the Church that one can die with peace and safety.

It has always seemed to me profoundly wise in Mr. Abbot that he should hold Catholicism to be the most consistent and logical form of Christianity. Either truth in religion is fully known or not. If fully known, then we must submit to authority. If not, if truth only is reached as we think and live for it, if our approximations to it are only vital and valuable when we seek it on our individual account, using judgment and investigating powers according to our best lights, then are the Protestant Churches as far from deserving adherence as the Church of Rome. The main issue, I think, lies in this: Is truth a fixed, finished product, completed in far distant times, to be had for the asking from its duly authorized custodians? Or is truth the ideal which we can approach only as we are honest, sincere, and independent users of our own faculties?

In Montreal, we are wearied with controversy about Rome and Methodism, or Rome and Presbyterianism, or what not. So far, the discussion has not been broached between dogma and reason, broadly. I think that, as in Europe, the Roman Catholics here are vastly more susceptible to rationalistic teaching than to the lectures and denunciations of dogmatic Protestantism.

FROM OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENTS.

OZARK, Mo., Aug. 10, 1880.

Editor Free Religious Index:—

In reading the speeches delivered at the dinner given to Mr. Abbot, together with the letters sent by absent friends, I was much pleased with the generous appreciation which the character of the late editor of the Index received. That so many persons in different parts of the country should have been so deeply impressed by the same noble traits in Mr. Abbot's character is a cheering proof that honor is still esteemed in this age of toil and bustle. That a man in so short a time, through the medium of his pen, should have drawn so many unseen readers into such a fellowship of esteem, is an honor of which the greatest mind and largest heart might well be proud.

In honoring F. E. Abbot, you were paying respect to the highest manhood of the nineteenth century. Mr. Abbot does not belong to the cause of liberalism. Humanity in its highest sense claims such as he. The world is his country, and honor his religion. For several years I have felt that Mr. Abbot was drawing to himself just such ardent friends and admirers as the speeches and letters delivered and read at your dinner show that he has; and I am glad to know that his character and labors are so well appreciated. When liberalism was represented by the most contemptible of bigots and demagogues, when freedom was being disgraced by a rabble of vulgar fanatics, F. E. Abbot stood bravely up in the might of his dauntless manhood and proclaimed the difference between liberty and license. His chivalric soul and heroic labors cannot be too much honored by the friends of enlightened freedom and the lovers of virtue.

May the name of our late editor long live in the hearts of the many readers of the Index whom he has so often cheered and strengthened, and may the noble ideals of truth and duty which he has so grandly held aloft from year to year become the lodestar of many a life. H. CLAY NEVILLE.

BROOKLYN, N.Y., Aug. 11, 1880.

To the Editor of the Free Religious Index:—

Will you kindly permit a spiritualist to express his appreciation and approval of the grand thought of that profound thinker and ripe scholar, Francis E. Abbot,—namely, "the Scientific Method in Religion"? Mr. Abbot clearly foresees, as the result of his thought in its practical application, the speedy destruction of all that is baneful in current systems of theological and religious thought and the sure survival of everything in them worthy of preservation. The solid strength of his position will ere long, I think, be clearly apparent to all rationalists and spiritualists. It is a marked coincidence that the Religio-Philosophical Journal (the best spiritualist paper in the country) persistently advocates the "scientific investigation and accurate reporting" of alleged spiritual phenomena. While religion, so called, has been and is (disguise it as she may) the implacable foe of science, genuine spiritualism courts, nay, demands, the most critical and searching investigation of all its phenomena. That there are to be found, even among liberals and spiritualists, objectors to the "Scientific Method," indicates, I think, on the part of such objectors, an incomplete emancipation from former orthodox methods of thought. As in religion superstition and priestcraft have, from time immemorial, had everything pretty much their own way, so in the ranks of spiritualism, where better things were expected, I regret to say that sometimes boundless credulity and designing knavery lock arms, take sweet counsel together, and walk to the house of fraud in company; and it is from elements such as these that by far the most bitter hostility to anything savoring of the accurate methods of modern science is reasonably to be expected; and I sincerely hope the contest for the adoption of the "Scientific Method" will not end, until all liberal thinkers unite in favor of its application to the departments of religious and spiritual activity, where it would be sure to accomplish its perfect work of eliminating all irrational faith and blind bigotry,—thus hastening the glad day when mankind shall worship only at the shrine of that august and adorable trinity, nature, science, and reason.

Yours very truly,

W. C. BOWEN.

Freethinking in Russia.

To the Editor of the Index:—

SIR,—The St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Standard telegraphed recently as follows to that paper:

The Bereg to-day, in the course of a leading article, makes a somewhat remarkable admission. It says: "To judge from the home news published by the papers, the inner life of Russia manifests itself by nothing but a series of robberies, murders, and suicides, varied by ravages of locusts and corn-beetles, cattle plague, cholera, and diphtheria. In reality, all this does not exhaust the phenomena of our home life. The moral and religious progress of the people, for instance, is left quite out of sight, though of late years, particularly in South Russia, those walking in darkness have made many efforts to enter upon the right path of Christian life,—the path, too, of sobriety and prosperity. Most unhappily, these efforts manifest themselves in a divergence from Orthodoxy, and a seeking after salvation here and hereafter in the so-called Stundism." The Bereg attributes this in great part to the lethargy of the country clergy, who sleep while the enemy sows the tares among the wheat. As a matter of fact, as I can testify from personal observation, the Russians have begun to search Holy Writ for themselves, and in it to seek their rule of life. Last year, in the course of a voyage through Russia, I spoke with many of these reformers, and among other questions I asked, "But why do not your pastors seek to restore you to Orthodoxy?" "Because," was the reply, "if they do, we break openly with the Church, and the priests lose not us only, but our contributions." The miserable poverty of the Russian priests makes this an irresistible argument.

Yours very truly,

THEODORE STANTON.

BERLIN, Germany, August 7.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JOHN SWINTON of the New York Sun lately arrived in Paris.

THE funeral of E. V. Wilson, a well-known lecturer on Spiritualism, occurred at Lombard, Ill., his late residence, Aug. 11.

TENNYSON is worth nearly a million dollars,—a big fortune for a poet; but then why shouldn't he get rich on thirty dollars a line?

MISS NELLY HOLBROOK is announced to speak with Hon. Galusha Grew, Gen. Kilpatrick, and others, at a Republican meeting soon to be held in New York.

MR. C. D. B. MILLS has been seriously ill at his home in Syracuse, since his late trip to Boston. It is pleasant to know that he is now in a fair way to recovery.

GEN. ABBOT, of the corps of engineers, U.S.A., a brother of Francis E. Abbot, has been favorably mentioned as a fitting successor to Gen. Myer for chief signal officer at Washington.

AN obelisk of Hallowell granite, an exact reproduction in form of Cleopatra's needle as it stood at Heliopolis, is soon to be erected over Charlotte Cushman's grave at Boston's Mount Auburn cemetery.

Digitized by Google

"Bill Arp," Charles H. Smith, a Southern humorist, is an elder in the Presbyterian Church. The fact is worth noting, as humor and Presbyterianism make a strange amalgamation, even for that country.

Mr. Frederick A. Hinckley, resident speaker of the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I., has returned to that city from his summer vacation. His society will resume its Sunday meetings Sept. 12.

The President of the French Republic receives six hundred thousand francs, or $120,000 a year, and as much again for travelling and household expenses. We can fill the bill for a good deal less in this country.

It is noticed that, when Ingersoll addresses political gatherings, the politicians and Republican papers refer to him as Col. Ingersoll, R. G. Ingersoll, Esq., etc.; but, when he delivers one of his infidel lectures, he is simply "Bob" Ingersoll.

Prof. Swing, of Chicago, in a discourse at a recent meeting of Western farmers, told them that their lank bodies and sorrowful faces came of too much work, too little sleep, and too little good food, and that the same is true as to their boys.

Mr. Samuel Smiley, M.P., reports the melancholy fact that there are forty thousand young women employed in London whose earnings do not meet the ordinary requirements of life. He points out the great social danger existing in such a condition of affairs.

An elegant gold badge, set with diamonds, is now on exhibition at Tiffany's, New York, which has been presented to Mr. Henry Bergh as "a mark of the personal esteem and friendship of the gentlemen comprising the Executive Committee of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals."

The death of Gen. Albert J. Myer, chief of the United States Weather Bureau, is a great loss to meteorological science, not alone in this country, but to the world at large. He had not only scientific genius of a very high order, but also a remarkable power for putting into organized and practical operation scientific ideas, and quickening enthusiasm in respect to them. The Weather Bureau, with its associated system of signals, was wholly his creation; and the reports issued under his supervision were acknowledged to be far more accurate than those of any other country.

Rev. J. W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, has a summer residence at Chesterfield, Mass., one of the quiet, staid old "hill towns" of Western Massachusetts. In the last number of the Christian Register, he describes his ride to Ashfield to attend the late dinner there in behalf of the Sanderson Academy, and, among other allusions to the occasion, has this to say of one whom many of our readers, in common with all those who read his wholesome and pleasant books, will feel an interest: "I had some pleasant talk with Mr. Howells about his own books and other men's. I was glad to learn that his Foregone Conclusion was his own favorite, and to tell him of my enjoyment of its one most perfect scene. 'I never expect to do so well as that again,' he said. But I am sure he will. Some of his million readers may like to know that Mr. Howells is short and thick-set. A more wholesome-looking man it would be hard to find, or a more pleasant face."

JESTINGS.

"Never mistake perspiration for inspiration," said an old minister in his charge to a young pastor just being ordained.

A young lady, on being asked where her native place was, replied, "I have none: I am the daughter of a Methodist minister."

Perhaps it is wrong to go fishing on Sunday; but, if the fish are wicked enough to bite on Sunday, they ought to be made to suffer for it.—Hawkeye.

Now doth the smiling candidate improve each shining hour: he shaketh hands, he kisseth babes, in hopes to rise to power.—Prairie City Herald.

A religious body having resolved to build a new church, the pastor went about begging very zealously, accepting not only the widow's, but the child's mite. In the Sunday-school a few days afterward, while instructing the children, he compared himself to a shepherd, and then inquired what the latter did with his flock. One bright-eyed little fellow promptly replied, "He shears them."

A Jackass that wouldn't Scare.—Says the San Antonio Herald: "A vagrant ass stood beside the track of the Sunset Railway at the depot, a few mornings ago. An engine moved slowly up; it stopped within a few feet of the ass; the engineer blew one of those terrible screams, prolonged and ear-piercing,—such a blast as makes a sleeping Millerite dream of the day of judgment. Did the ass scare? Not worth a cent. Did he shake the sloth from his limbs, erect his tail, and speed away like the asses of Bassorah, faster than the Bedouin coursers run back to the chapparal? No, he didn't. He turned one ear toward the engine, just as a deaf man uses his tin ear-trumpet, and caught every particle of the sound. And, when the steam-blown whistle ceased its notes and all the echoes died away, the animal straightened out his neck, opened his mouth, and in a voice that deafened all the railroad men, and caused the freight clerk to drop his pen, roared: "I can't! I can't! I can't! I can't be beat! be beat! be beat! I c-a-n-'t be-be-be-be beat!"

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

The Catholic Review prints each week an ecclesiastical calendar, which, besides giving the "Sacred Festivals" for the week, includes brief biographies of the saints to whom the days of the week are respectively consecrated. These are published, it says in a general heading, as "examples to be imitated" by people "of this age." We clip the two following from the last week of July:—

July 27.

St. Veronica Giuliana.

From her birth in 1660, Veronica was wonderfully devout to the Passion of our Lord. In the cradle, she refused food thrice a week, on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; and when only three years old, in imitation of the martyrs, she thrust her hands into the fire, and kept them there till the smell of the burning flesh brought the inmates of the house to her side. After she had taken the habit of St. Clare, she underwent a mysterious ceremony of espousals with our Lord, and ever afterwards there floated continually before her a mythical overflowing chalice, of which she had to drink, and which filled her with anguish as she drank it. Our Lord crowned her with a crown of thorns, which seemed to pierce into her brain, but of which nought was visible but the scars. Lastly, in his love he stamped her with the marks of his five blessed wounds. Often in an ecstasy she went through and suffered the agony of the cross, her body writhing and her bones cracking with the fearful torments. Through all her pain, her only love was the cross. "Satiate me with the cross," was her cry; and she embraced the very trees in the garden, because they reminded her of it. An agony of three hours closed her long but beloved martyrdom, her very death being, like her Lord's, an act of obedience, for she could not die until her superiors had given her leave.

July 30.

St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi.

St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi, of an illustrious house in Florence, was born in the year 1566, and baptized by the name of Catharine. She received her first communion at ten years of age, and made a vow of virginity at twelve. She took great pleasure in carefully teaching the Christian doctrine to the ignorant. Her father, not knowing her vow, wished to give her in marriage, but she persuaded him to allow her to become a religious devotee. It was more difficult to obtain her mother's consent, but at last she gained it; and she was professed, being then eighteen years of age, in the Carmelite monastery of Santa Maria degli Angeli, in Florence, May 17, 1584. She changed her name, Catharine, into that of Mary Magdalen on becoming a nun, and took as her motto, "To suffer or die"; and her life henceforth was a life of penance for sins not her own, and of love of our Lord, who tried her in ways fearful and strange. She was obedient, observant of the rules, humble and mortified, and had a great reverence for the religious life. She loved poverty and suffering, and hungered after communion. God raised her to high states of prayer, and gave her rare gifts, enabling her to read the thoughts of her novices, and filling her with wisdom to direct them aright. She was twice chosen mistress of novices, and then made superioress, when God took her to himself, May 27, 1607. Her body is incorrupt.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

President.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

Vice-Presidents.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

Secretary.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

Assistant-Secretary.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

Treasurer.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

Directors.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 Tremont Place Boston (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. Clark is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at New Bedford, Mass.

Wm. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, . . . 10c. per line.
" 13 " 25 " . . . 8c. " "
" 26 " 51 " . . . 6c. " "
" 52 " . . . 5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,— all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"— together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,— why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.
II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.
III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.
IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.
V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)
VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

NOW READY:

INSTITUTE ESSAYS,

BY

Rev. S. H. Calthrop,

Prof. C. C. Everett,

F. E. Abbot,

Dr. Gustav Gottheil,

Rev. J. W. Chadwick,

Prof. Ezra Abbot,

Rev. Francis Tiffany,

Rev. J. B. Harrison,

Rev. George Batchelor.

A "solid and meaty" volume of 280 pages, 8vo.

"This volume is entitled to the cordial attention not only of students in theology, but also of all those interested in high truth. Those who know enough, and those whose religious system has been completed, had better not approach a volume which to a seeker after facts is wonderfully grateful and stimulating."—Boston Advertiser.

Price, in cloth, $1.25; paper, $1.00.

Sent, postage free, to any address, on receipt of the price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

101 MILK STREET, BOSTON.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER.

TO BOOK BUYERS.

BOOKS SENT BY MAIL AT

PUBLISHERS' PRICES!

No Extra Charge for Postage.

Any obtainable book that may be desired will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash. Orders are respectfully solicited from all friends of the Index. Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 559.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 11.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

HE that speaketh the truth from his heart shall never be moved.—Hebrew.

ONLY they who carry sincerity to the highest point, in whom there remains not a single hair's breadth of hypocrisy, can see the hidden springs of things.—Chinese.

THE sacrifice of a thousand horses has been put in the balance with one true word, and the true word weighed down the thousand sacrifices. No virtue surpasses that of veracity. There are two roads which conduct to perfect virtue: to be true, and to do no evil to any creature.—Hindu.

SEEK truth by thought, not by searching for it in mouldy books. Look up to the sky to see the moon instead of seeking for it in the pond.—Persian.

HIDE not the truth, when ye know it; and clothe not the truth with falsehood.—Koran.

TO LOVE truth for truth's sake is the principal part of human perfection, and the seed-plot of all other virtues.—John Locke.

IT is only when one is thoroughly true that there can be purity and freedom. Falsehood always punishes itself.—Auerbach.

A STRAIGHT line is the shortest in morals, as in mathematics.—Maria Edgeworth.

IN the midst of abuses, in the heart of cities, in the aisles of false churches, alike in one place and in another,—wherever a just and heroic soul finds itself, there it will do what is next at hand; and, by the new quality of character it shall put forth, it will abrogate the old law or school in which it stands, before the law of its own mind. . . . The objection to conforming to usages that have become dead to you is that it scatters your force. It loses your time, and blurs the impression of your character. But do your own work, and you shall reinforce yourself.—R. W. Emerson.

THE power that lives in and works through the universe is on the side of right; that is, the keeping of its own laws. Man is not alone. By studying and obeying the laws of the world, he may put the universe at his back as an omnipotent helper. He may launch his little boat on "the stream of tendency" that moves ever toward the better future and by its almighty current feel himself swept on.—M. J. Savage.

OH, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence: live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues. So to live is heaven:
To make undying music in the world,
Breathing as beauteous order, that controls
With growing sway the growing life of man.
. . . This is life to come,
Which martyred men have made more glorious
For us who strive to follow. May I reach
That purest heaven; be to other souls
The cup of strength in some great agony;
Enkindle generous ardor; feed pure love;
Beget the smiles that have no cruelty;
Be the sweet presence of a good diffused,
And in diffusion ever more intense.
So shall I join the choir invisible,
Whose music is the gladness of the world.

—George Eliot.

CURRENT TOPICS.

SIX Japanese Commissioners are in the United States, inspecting our prison systems.

MAX MUELLER has published his translation of the old Sanskrit sacred books, The Upanishads.

THE latest scientific definition of emotion is "the sensibility of the vesicular neurin to ideas." Some forms of religious emotion which we have witnessed we should judge to be just about that—excepting the "ideas."

THE Independent, in the matter relating to Mr. Rowland Connor's article on Missions, to which we referred last week, prints a note of correction from Mr. Connor, and handsomely confesses its own misreading of the article.

THE Christian Union says of the Modern Review, from which we reprint the paper from Dr. Carpenter for our leading essay in the present issue, that, "if it maintains as a regular thing the exceptional excellence of its first few numbers, its future is secure."

THE Unitarian Churches are appointing delegates to "The National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches," to be held in Saratoga the latter part of September. The "other Christian Churches" do not as yet swell the list to unwieldy proportions.

NEAR Court Square, Boston, there is a colored boot-black, with the placard "Prof. Allen, the Great Champion Shiner." We may expect to see "Prof. Allen" announced with the other "Professors" who, in these days, figure so prominently in Western Conventions of Liberals.

ONE of the latest sins of Professor Robertson Smith, according to Sir Henry Moncreiff, is that he has been calling Eber, the venerable ancestor of Abraham, names. He called him "an ethnological abstraction"; and very likely, too, he may have prefixed the epithet "old," if not something worse.

THE Harvard College Library is to be opened for the use of students on Sunday afternoons; another good move against the Sabbatarian superstition. The Museum of Comparative Zoölogy is already open to the public free of charge, on Sunday afternoons, with results very gratifying to the officers.

THE Catholic Review says: "In another week, the schools will open; and there remains but little time for the consideration of a question over which some Catholic parents are weak enough to hesitate. There ought to be only one answer possible, and that should be, 'I will send my child to a Catholic school.'"

IN Middletown, N.Y., Rev. Dr. Marvin, an Orthodox Congregational minister, has got so far as to put John Brown alongside of St. Paul, and to quote with approval Emerson's words of him while the old hero was yet in prison,—"He is a saint, whose fate yet hangs in suspense, but whose martyrdom, if it shall be perfected, will make the gallows glorious like the cross."

THERE is no doubt that the educated native classes in India have lost faith to a great extent in their own religion, while they have not adopted any other. Yet, unfortunately, they have adopted too many of the immoral customs which "Christian civilization" has brought to them, but from which they were comparatively free before the foreign contact. As an attempt to stem this tide of immorality, the Brahmo Somaj, the native reformed Church, has established an organization called the "Puritan Brahmo Club." Its four vows are: 1. I will abstain entirely from liquor. 2. I will shun the company of women of loose character. 3. I will not countenance or encourage flirtation. 4. I will treat as an excommunicated outcast every one guilty of systematic fornication or adultery. Can the missionaries in India do better than to urge the English "Christian" residents there to join this club?

WE think we can detect a dangerous rationalizing tendency in the following method of dealing with the miracle of Lot's wife, as given in the "International Bible Studies" for Sunday-schools, and printed in the Milwaukee Christian Statesman: "His wife looked back from behind him. She possibly could not see what particular need there was of being in such haste; and she tarried behind, looking back, it may have been from curiosity to see if all things continued as they were, or regret for the loss of home and all their property. Then the storm caught her, suffocated her, incrusted her, and possibly burned her to a cinder." But the Bible says, "She became a pillar of salt"; and it is no miracle for us, if you don't follow the letter of the Scripture. Isn't it for this very thing — trying to explain obscure places in the Bible by his own reason — that Professor Robertson Smith is getting himself and the Church into so much trouble in Scotland?

MR. GEO. W. COOKE has had two thoughtful articles in the Christian Register on the Concord School of Philosophy. He writes from an inside view, having been a member of the school through the session this summer. He praises, but he also criticises. He notes especially the shortcomings of the school in its attitude toward science, and speaks of the dogmatic character of the main part of the teaching in this fashion: "The real significance of the 'School of Philosophy' cannot be understood until it is recognized that its spirit is one of propagandism. Its aim is not that of an independent search after truth. It does not aim to furnish its students with a method of free research, by which they can arrive at and test the truth. Inquiry, in the truest sense, is not its purpose: it has a system to elucidate, a dogma to defend, a creed wrought out to teach. It cannot appreciate, it does not even know, the meaning of the statement of Emerson, 'that the world is not old enough yet by several thousand years to make a creed.'"

Digitized by Google

THE FORCE BEHIND NATURE.

BY WILLIAM B. CARPENTER.

Some thirty years ago, I enjoyed opportunities of discussing with John Stuart Mill (whose younger brother had been for twelve months an inmate of my house) many questions of philosophy in which we both felt the deepest interest. Among these was the Doctrine of Causation set forth in his recently published System of Logic. "We may define the cause of a phenomenon to be the antecedent, or the concurrence of antecedents, on which it is invariably and unconditionally consequent." I pointed out to my friend that, when this assemblage of conditions is analyzed, it is uniformly found resolvable into two categories, which may be distinguished as the dynamical and the material; the former supplying the force or power to which the change must be attributed, while the latter affords the conditions under which that power is exerted. Thus, I urged, when a man falls from a ladder because (as is commonly said) of the breaking of the rung on which his foot was resting, the real or dynamical cause of his fall is the force of gravity, or attraction of the earth, which pulls him to the ground when his foot is no longer supported; the loss of support being only the material condition or collocation, which allowed the force previously acting as pressure on the rung to produce the downward motion of the man who stood upon it.

To this Mr. Mill's reply was that the distinction is one of metaphysics, not of logic. I ventured, however, to press on him that, to whichever department of philosophy this point is to be referred, it is one of fundamental importance; that, assuming experience as the basis of our knowledge, we recognize the downward tendency of every body heavier than air, by our sense of muscular tension in lifting it from the ground, or in resisting its descent toward the earth; and that our cognition of force through this form of sensation, being thus quite as immediate and direct as our cognition of motion through the visual sense, ought to be equally taken account of.

The promulgation about the same time of the doctrine of the "Correlation of the Physical Forces," by Professor (now Sir William) Grove, and the researches of Mr. Joule on the "Mechanical Equivalent of Heat," seemed to me to bring this view of dynamical causation into yet greater importance, by showing that what is true of that form of Force which produces or resists mechanical (or what is now distinguished as molar) Motion may be legitimately extended to those other forms which are manifested in the molecular changes that express themselves in chemical action, or impress us with the sensations of heat, light, etc. Partaking of the general ignorance at that time prevalent in this country, of the doctrine of "Conservation of Energy," already promulgated in Germany by Mayer and Helmholtz, I myself endeavored to carry Professor Grove's principle into the domain of biology, by showing that what physiologists have been accustomed to call Vital Force may be regarded as having the same "correlation" with the various forms of physical force as they have with each other.* And, in the introduction to the fourth edition of my Human Physiology (published in 1853), I thus explicitly defined my position:—

"When this assemblage of antecedents is analyzed, it is uniformly found that they may be resolved into two categories, which may be distinguished as the dynamical and the material, the former supplying the force or power to which the change must be attributed, while the latter affords the conditions under which that power is exerted. Thus, in a steam-engine we see the dynamical agency of heat made to produce mechanical power by the mode in which it is applied: first, to impart a mutual repulsion to the particles of water; and, then, by means of that mutual repulsion, to give motion to the various solid parts of which the machine is composed. And thus, if asked what is the cause of the movement of the steam-engine, we distinguish in our reply between the dynamical condition supplied by the heat and the material condition (or assemblage of conditions) afforded by the 'collocation' of the boiler, cylinder, piston, valves, etc. . . . In like manner, if we inquire into the cause of the germination of a seed,—which has been brought to the surface of the earth after remaining dormant through having been buried deep beneath the soil for (it may be) thousands of years,—we are told that the phenomenon depends upon warmth, moisture, and oxygen; but out of these we single warmth as the dynamical condition, whilst the oxygen and the water, with the organized structure of the seed itself and the organic compounds which are stored up in its substance, constitute the material."

The subsequent general recognition by the scientific world of the "correlation" between the forces of Nature (under whatever form expressed) has thus given a breadth of foundation to the dynamical doctrine of Causation which it previously lacked; and the doctrine, having been afterwards formally developed by Professor Bain, was summarized by J. S. Mill in the later editions of his Logic, almost in the very terms in which I had originally propounded it to him in conversation, and had publicly expressed it in the extract just cited: "The chief practical conclusion drawn by Professor Bain bearing on causation is that we must distinguish in the assemblage of conditions which constitutes the cause of a phenomenon two elements: one, the presence of a force; the other, the collocation or position of objects which is required in order that the force may undergo the particular transmutation which constitutes the phenomenon."* Mr. Mill himself still preferred, however, to express the principle in terms of Motion rather than in terms of Force: "If the effect, or any part of the effect, to be accounted for consists in putting matter in motion, then any of the objects present which has lost motion has contributed to the effect; and this is the true meaning of the proposition that the cause is that one of the antecedents which exerts active force." As this mode of expressing the facts is sanctioned by high authorities at the present time, it may be well for me to explain more fully the basis of my original contention, that our cognition of force is quite as immediate and direct as our cognition of motion; in fact (as I think I shall be able to prove), even more fundamental, inasmuch as our cognition of matter itself is in great degree dependent upon it.

It has been recently well said that "all true science involves both the knowledge of Nature and the knowledge of man: it includes the study of mind as well as of matter. A philosopher may pursue either, but he can have no complete knowledge of what he investigates without borrowing from the other department of investigation."† Many of the Nature-philosophers, who affirm that we have no knowledge of anything but the matter and motion which lie within the range of "experience," show themselves very imperfectly acquainted with what "experience" really means; unhesitatingly ranking as actual objective facts their own mental interpretations of the sensory impressions they receive from external objects. Many metaphysicians, on the other hand, have reasoned as if our concern were with mental operations alone, and as if the abstractions in which they deal had an existence per se, without any relation to the phenomena of Nature. But among the ablest thinkers of the present time there seems to be now a pretty general recognition of the necessity for the replacement of the abstract definitions of metaphysics —so far, at least, as they relate to the external world —by psychological expressions of the modes in which the human ego is affected by its changes. Thus the ordinary metaphysical definition of "matter" is that which possesses "extension." But, for this definition to convey any definite idea to our minds, we must know what "extension" means; and this, we are told, is the "occupation of space." Now, the conception of "space," in the opinion of most psychologists, is ordinarily derived from our interpretation of visual sensations; and yet these may be altogether deceptive. When we look at a window from a short distance, we cannot tell by the use of our eyes alone whether the space included by its frame is void or is occupied by a perfectly transparent and colorless glass. A glass globe is held up in front of it, and we cannot tell by looking at it whether it is empty or is filled with pure water or some other transparent, colorless liquid. And we can take no cognizance by our vision of the atmosphere which surrounds us, unless its transparence is interfered with by mist or fog. Clearly, then, our visual sense cannot per se furnish us with a satisfactory definition of Matter.‡

Now that we have got rid of the fiction of "imponderables," we might fall back on a definition of matter—in use before that fiction was invented—as that which possesses "ponderosity" or weight. But what is weight? The downward tendency, it may be replied, in virtue of which all unsupported bodies fall to the earth. But what is this "tendency"? We might see any number of bodies falling to the ground, and might frame a correct law of their motion, without having the remotest conception of their possessing that downward pressure which we at once recognize when we take a lump of lead or iron into our hands; and it is obviously on our cognition of this pressure that our idea of weight or ponderosity is based. Now the instrumentality through which we take cognizance of it seems to me to be threefold. In the first place, we have the sense of simple pressure on the tactile surface; as when, the hand passively resting on a table, a weight is laid upon it. Secondly, we recognize it by the sense of tension which we experience when a weight is attached to a pendent limb, and which we refer to the muscles and ligaments which are thus put on the stretch; or when, the hand resting on the top of a cylinder of glass placed over an air-pump, the air is exhausted from beneath, so as to make us feel the downward "pressure of the atmosphere." In these two cases, the mind is the passive recipient of the sensory impressions. But, thirdly, when we determinately lift a weight or hold it suspended by our hands, we experience, in addition to the sense of pressure and the sense of tension, a sense of effort, which we recognize as an immediate revelation of consciousness, not referable to any physical impression, but of the same kind as that which we experience in a purely mental act, such as the fixation of the attention. And a little consideration will, I think, make it clear that it is on this "sense of effort" in resisting downward pressure that our cognition of weight is essentially based.

For, in the first place, the continuance of a moderate pressure on the cutaneous surface, like other sensory impressions that become habitual, soon ceases to affect us sensorially; for we cognosce rather the changes in the states of our sense-organs than the states themselves. Or, again, we may suffer under a temporary or permanent paralysis of the cutaneous sense, that may prevent our feeling the contact of the body we are lifting or supporting; and yet, recognizing its downward pressure in other ways, we can put our muscles into action to antagonize it. But, secondly, this paralysis may extend to the muscular sense, so that the feeling of muscular tension is wanting, as well as that of contact-pressure; and yet none the less can a weight be lifted or sustained by a conscious effort, provided that the deficiency of the guiding sensations ordinarily derived from the muscle itself is supplied by the sight. A woman whose arm is sensorially but not motorially paralyzed can hold up her child as long as she looks at it; and a man affected with the like paralysis of his legs can stand and walk while looking at his feet. But, thirdly, since the mental sense of effort is experienced in every determinate exercise of our muscular power, and is, as all experience teaches, a necessary condition of that exercise; since, again, it is proportioned to the exertion we put forth, and continues as long as that exertion is sustained,—it is in this, and not in the cutaneous or muscular impressions, which are (so to speak) accidental, that (as it seems to me) we find the real basis of our cognition of the "ponderosity" of matter.

But "ponderosity" cannot be considered an essential property of matter, being merely the "accident" of the earth's attraction for bodies lying within its range. This attraction varies with the distance of a body from the centre of the earth; and a body occupying the common centre of gravity of the earth and sun would be equally drawn toward both, and would consequently have no "weight." We must therefore seek a satisfactory definition of matter elsewhere; and we find the clew to it in the consideration that the sense of effort we experience in antagonizing the downward pressure of a body is but a particular case of our more general cognition of resistance. When we project our hand against a hard and fixed solid

* "On the Mutual Relations of the Vital and Physical Forces" in Philos. Transact. 1850.

* System of Logic, 8th ed., vol. i., p. 406.

† Natural Theology of the Doctrine of the Forces, by Professor Benjamin Martin, of the University of the City of New York.

‡ According to Professor Bain, the conception of space is essentially based on the sense of muscular tension which, according to him, we experience in the ordinary movements of our eyes. But I am satisfied that this is physiologically erroneous. These movements are ordinarily guided, as Professor Alison long ago contended, and as Professor Helmholtz and I myself have since experimentally proved, by the visual, not by the muscular sense; and it is only when we put the muscles to an unusual strain—as when our visual axes converge on an object brought nearer and nearer to the eyes, or when we entirely exclude light from the retina—that we experience any sense of tension in their muscles.

Digitized by Google

body, our consciousness of its resistance to our pressure is exactly that which we experience when we try to raise a weight that we have not strength to lift; while, if that solid be either yielding in its parts or movable as a whole, we measure its resistance, as in lifting a weight, by our sense of the effort necessary to overcome it. When we move our hand through a liquid, we are conscious of a resistance to its motion, which is greater or less according to the "viscosity" of the liquid. And, when we move our open hand through air at rest, we are still conscious of a resistance, our sense of it being augmented by an extension of the surface moved, as in the act of fanning; while, if the air is in motion, we feel its pressure on the sail of a boat by the "pull" of the sheet we hold in our hand, or on the sails of a windmill by the rotation it imparts, the force of which we can estimate by the effort we must put forth to resist it. Attenuate any kind of air or gas as we may, its resistance can still be made apparent by the like communication of its own motion to solid bodies. Thus, in Mr. Crookes' wonderful radiometer, a set of vanes poised on a pivot within a globe of glass exhausted to a millionth of its ordinary gaseous contents is whirled round by the movement excited in the molecules of that residual millionth, either by the heat of the radiant beam falling on the surface of the globe or by the passage of an electric current across its interior; and the mechanical force required to impart that motion can be measured with precision, by bringing it into comparison with some other force (as that of gravity) of which we can take immediate cognizance. And thus, as Herbert Spencer remarks, by the decomposition of our knowledge of any form of matter into simpler and simpler components, we must come at last to the simplest, to the ultimate material, to the substratum; and this we find in the impression of resistance we receive through what we may call our "force-sense."*

Such being the teachings alike of general and of scientific experience, I cannot but feel surprised that any persons claiming the title of philosophers should affirm that we know nothing except matter and motion, and that force is a creation of our own imagination. One might suppose such persons to be either destitute of the "force-sense," or to have based their philosophical system upon the movements of the heavenly bodies which they can only see, instead of upon those mundane phenomena in the cognition of which they can bring their hands to the assistance of their eyes. How essential this assistance is to the formation of correct conceptions of the solid forms and relative positions of the objects around us is known to every one who has studied the physiology of the senses. Should we not think it absurd on the part of any one who possesses in the use of his hands the means of detecting the error of his visual perceptions, if he were to base a superstructure of reasoning—still more to found a whole system of philosophy—upon the latter alone? Yet such appears to me to be the position of those who deny our direct cognition of force.

Let us suppose (if possible) a man who had enjoyed the full use of his eyes, but whose limbs had been completely paralyzed from infancy, looking on at a game of billiards. He would see a succession of motions connected by regular sequence,—the motion of the arm of the player, the stroke of the cue, the roll of the ball, its contact with another ball, the movement of the second ball, the change of direction or the entire stop of the first, the rebound of balls from the cushion in altered directions, and so on. And he might frame a statement in "terms of motion" of all that passes before his eyes, thinking this all he can know. But suppose the limbs of such a man to be suddenly endowed with the ordinary powers of sensation and movement; let him take the cue into his hands and himself strike the ball; let him hold his hand on the table, so that the rolling ball shall strike it and make him feel its impact; let him hold the second ball, and feel the shock imparted to it by the stroke of the first. Can any one deny that he would thus acquire a dynamical conception linking together the whole succession of phenomena, which he was previously quite incapable of forming; that this dynamical conception is quite as directly based upon the experience derived through his "force-sense" as his kinetic expression was upon that derived through his visual sense; and that this cognition of the force producing the motions is, therefore, fully as much entitled to be introduced into a logical doctrine of causation as the visual cognition of the motions themselves? If it be replied that we have no proof that the movement of the ball we strike is produced by the force which we consciously exert in striking it, I simply reply that we have as much proof of it as we have of anything which rests upon universal experience, and which we can verify experimentally as often as we choose to try,—quite as much as we have of the existence of anything whatever that is external to ourselves.

Let us take, again, the simple case of magnetic attraction. A man who knows nothing of magnetism sees a piece of iron, brought within a certain distance of what looks like a horse-shoe bar of the same metal, suddenly jump toward its approximated ends; and might, as before, correctly express the fact in "terms of motion." But let him take the piece of iron in his hands, so as to feel the "pull" upon it when brought sufficiently near the magnet, and he then becomes conscious, through his force-sense, of a power of which he was before utterly ignorant.

Thus, as it seems to me, an analysis of those psychical experiences, on which all our cognitions of the physical universe around us are really based, irresistibly lands us in the conclusion that, as Herbert Spencer expresses it, "all the sensations through which the external world is known to us are explicable by us only as resulting from certain forms of force"; the direct derivation of our conception of force from our own experience of muscular tension (or as I should myself say, from our own sense of effort) being "a fact which no metaphysical quibbling can set aside." In the words of the able American writer I have already quoted, "The conception of force is one of those universal ideas which belong of necessity to the intellectual furniture of every human mind." By no one has the principle for which I am contending been more clearly and more authoritatively expressed than by Sir John Herschel, a philosopher who united to his wonderful grasp of nature-phenomena a profound insight into the action of the mind of man in the interpretation of them:—

"Whatever attempts have been made by metaphysical writers to reason away the connection of cause and effect, and fritter it down into the unsatisfactory relation of habitual [unconditional] sequence, it is certain that the conception of some more real and intimate connection is quite as strongly impressed upon the human mind as that of the existence of an external world, the vindication of whose reality has, strange to say, been regarded as an achievement of no common merit in the annals of this branch of philosophy. It is our own immediate consciousness of effort, when we exert force to put matter in motion or to oppose and neutralize force, which gives us this internal conviction of power and causation, so far as it relates to the material world."—Treatise on "Astronomy" in Lardner's "Cyclopedia," p. 232.

Man's position as the "Interpreter of Nature" may be not inaptly likened (as it seems to me) to that of an intelligent observer of the working of a cotton-factory, with whose mechanical arrangements he is entirely unacquainted, and of whose moving power he knows nothing whatever. He is taken into a vast apartment,* in which he is at first utterly bewildered by the number and variety of the movements going on around him; but, by directing his attention to the several machines seriatim, he is able to arrive at a classification of them, according to the kind of work which each does. Thus he finds one set carding the cotton-wool supplied to it, so that its confused tangle gives place to a parallel laying of the fibres. He would see another taking up the bundles of carded wool, and drawing them out (after repeated doublings to secure uniformity) into a long soft cord. This cord he would then trace into the roving machine, which, by a continuation of the drawing process, further reduces its thickness, at the same time giving it a slight twist to increase its tenacity, so that it admits of being then wound upon bobbins. Thence he would trace the cord into the spinning-machine, which at the same time stretches and twists the cord, producing from it a yarn whose fineness might vary considerably in different machines. Finally, he would see the spun yarn carried, some as weft and some as woof, into the power-loom, from which it emerges as woven cloth,—the final resultant of the whole series of operations.

Concentrating now his attention upon any one of these machines, he studies its wheels, levers, and other moving parts, and tries to comprehend their several actions and the bearing of these upon each other. By long and scrutinizing observation, he masters the whole series of sequences, and traces the distribution of motion from a single large axis, through the hundreds (it may be) of separate pieces of the machine directly or indirectly connected with it; and he might thus frame a description of the working of the machine, which might be perfectly correct so far as it goes, and which yet would be defective in one most essential particular,—the statement of the force or power by which it is moved. For, so far as mere visual observation could teach him, the machine might be self-moving; and he might thus attribute to each kind an inherent power of carding, roving, drawing, spinning, or weaving, as the case might be.

Carrying his observations further, and noticing that one or another of these machines comes to a standstill, but resumes its motion after an interval, he may include this occasional suspension also in his general expression; but, perplexed by the want of any regularity in its intervals, he will seek some farther explanation. Continuing his patient watch, he will see that the stoppage of the machine follows the pulling of a handle by the man in attendance upon it, and that, when the handle is pulled the other way, the machine goes on again; and thus he will be led to introduce a certain position of this handle as one of the antecedent conditions of the machine's action. Still pursuing his inquiries, he finds out that the axes of the several machines are all in mechanical relation with one great longitudinal shaft, being connected with it either by continuous bands passing round pulleys or by trains of wheel-work; and at last he discovers the important fact that the movement of the handle which stops the machine breaks the continuity of that relation, shifting a shaft from a "fast" to a "loose" pulley, or throwing the wheel-work "out of gear"; while the converse movement, which restores that continuity, is followed by the renewed action of the machine, which goes on until the continuity is again broken. Thus he will be led to regard its maintenance as essential to the working of the machine; but nothing that he has yet learned explains to him why it is essential. He has only got at the material collocation which his educated vision enables him to recognize; and, for anything he knows to the contrary, the change in that collocation may be in itself adequate to determine the result.

But let him lay hold of the band which stretches between the main shaft and the axis of one machine, or attempt to stay with his hand the rotation of the train of wheels which connects it with another, he then at once becomes conscious, through his "force-sense," of the power which the band or the wheel-work is the instrument of conveying; and as he finds that the "pull" upon his hand is just the same whether the machine is in motion or not, provided that the band or wheel remains in mechanical connection with the main shaft, he comes to the conviction that the source of the power is in the shaft, and that, so far from any one of the machines having an inherent power of movement, its motion entirely depends upon the force supplied to it from the shaft. And when, under the guidance of this conception, he again examines the working of the several kinds of machine, he finds that, while the power is the same for all, the diversity in their respective products is traceable to the diversity in their construction; that is, to the material collocations through which the one moving force exerts itself in action.

But, having thus acquired the notion of moving power, and having satisfied himself of the derivation of the force that gives motion to each of the entire aggregate of machines from one main shaft, our inquirer finds himself again posed. Has this shaft itself an inherent power of motion, or does it derive that power from any ulterior source? He sees the shaft apparently terminate in the two end walls of the building; and, finding no evidence of its connection with anything else, he may feel himself drawn toward the conclusion that it moves of itself,—that is, by the "potency" of its own material constitution. But, before adopting this rationale, he sees all the machines stop at once, and finds that the shaft also has ceased to revolve. Here is a new and startling phenomenon. After pondering on it for an hour, and carefully looking out for an explanation, he sees the shaft and its connected machines resume their motion, and yet is certain that no agency visible to him has had any

* Herbert Spencer considers the cognition of resistance to be essentially derived from the sense of muscular tension. I have already expressed my reason for now dissenting from this view, which I myself formerly held.

* In one of the flax-spinning mills belonging to the Marshalls of Leeds, the whole of the work is done on one floor, covering (I believe) two acres of ground, instead of in the usual building of several stories.

Digitized by Google

concern in that renewal. By continued watching, he finds this suspension and renewal to be periodical, so that he can frame a law that shall express them in terms of time. Thus he might give a complete phenomenal account of the action of the shaft, which should be perfectly consistent with the assumption of its "inherent potency," and which might be sufficiently satisfactory to his mind to justify him in believing that there is no more to be learned about it. But, not wishing to leave anything uninvestigated, he goes round to the other side of the wall. There he finds that one end of the shaft comes through it, and is in mechanical connection with either a steam-engine or a water-wheel; and, by watching what occurs when its motion is checked and renewed, he sees that the engineer shuts off or turns on either the steam generated in the boiler of the steam-engine or the descending water whose motion drives the wheel.

I shall not weary the patience of such readers as may have followed me thus far by tracing out in like detail the farther steps of the inquiry, but shall land them in the final conclusion now accepted by every man of science, that the power exerted in both these cases is drawn from solar radiation, the fall of the water which gives motion to the water-wheel being merely the return of that which has been pumped up as vapor by the sun's heat; while the combustion of coal, from which steam-power is derived, reproduces, as active force or "energy," the sunshine that exerted itself during the carboniferous period in dissociating carbonic acid and water into the hydrocarbons of coal and the oxygen of the atmosphere, whose recombination gives forth heat and light. And, if we look still farther back for the source of the sun's radiant energy, we should find it perhaps in the progressive consolidation of the primeval "fire-mist," nebular matter.

But whence nebular matter? And whence the force which draws its particles together, and which manifests itself as light and heat during their consolidation? Here we come to a wall, to the other side of which we seem at present to have no access.

But is there no other side? Does not the whole course of the preceding inquiry show the unsatisfaction (if I may revive an obsolete word) of resting in any inherent "potency" of matter as the ultima ratio of the existing kosmos? If we think the man foolish who supposes the main shaft of a cotton-mill to turn of itself, merely because he sees it apparently end in a wall which conceals from him the source of its motive power, are we not really chargeable with the like folly if we attribute self-motion to the ultimate molecules of matter, merely because the power that moves them is hid from our sight? The mere physicist may see no possible way further. But there is a philosophy which has fully as true and as broad a basis in man's psychical experience as can be claimed for the fabric of physical science; and, in the admirable words of the great master I have already quoted (Sir John Herschel, in his Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects, p. 460), I shall sum up an argument which this paper is intended rather to illustrate and enforce by an appeal to the familiar facts of consciousness than to present in strict logical form:—

"In the mental sense of effort, clear to the apprehension of every one who has ever performed a voluntary act, which is present at the instant when the determination to do a thing is carried out into the act of doing it, we have a consciousness of immediate and personal causation which cannot be disputed or ignored. And, when we see the same kind of act performed by another, we never hesitate in assuming for him that consciousness which we recognize in ourselves; and in this case we can verify our conclusion by oral communication." "In the only case in which we are admitted into any personal knowledge of the origin of force, we find it connected (possibly by intermediate links untraceable by our faculties, yet indisputably connected) with volition, and by inevitable consequence, with motive, with intellect, and with all those attributes of mind in which personality consists."

As a physiologist, I most fully recognize the fact that the physical force exerted by the body of man is not generated de novo by his will, but is derived from the oxidation of the constituents of his food. But holding it as equally certain, because the fact is capable of verification by every one as often as he chooses to make the experiment, that, in the performance of every volitional movement, that physical force is put in action, directed, and controlled by the individual personality or Ego, I deem it just as absurd and illogical to affirm that there is no place for a God in nature, originating, directing, and controlling its forces by his will, as it would be to assert that there is no place in man's body for his conscious mind.—The Modern Review.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

TALKS ABOUT JESUS. By M. J. Savage, author of Light on the Cloud, The Morals of Evolution, etc. Boston: George H. Ellis, Publisher, 101 Milk Street. 1880.

This little book of one hundred and sixty pages has a modest title, but there is much meat in it. We took it up, thinking to glance through it in half an hour and get the essence of it. And that, probably, we might have done, for to one versed in the recent literature of the subject it contains nothing new as the result of independent research, and does not profess to; but we found ourselves caught by the fascinating clearness and vigor of Mr. Savage's style, and thus carried along to read every word of the nine chapters. These chapters, we understand, were originally extemporaneous discourses, given to Mr. Savage's congregation in Boston, and they have all the vivacity and simplicity of familiar "talks"; and yet there is every appearance of the most careful preparation. They utterly escape the danger to which extemporaneous preaching is especially liable,—that of diffuseness and repetition. Their special merit is point and compactness in statement. The clearness is not alone in the style, but in the thought. Mr. Savage is preëminently a clear thinker. In this book, particularly, his thought is crystal-cut in the sharpness of its outline. His convictions never—or "hardly ever"—halt half-way. He does not raise a question for the sake of discussion, or for showing what others have written about it, but for the sake of a decision. And he comes to a decision. The temper of his mind is not that of doubt. All questions of doubt and uncertainty, apparently, he puts in a chamber by themselves and closes the door upon them; so that practically they do not exist for him. He does not let any of them out to trouble him or his readers, until he has a conclusive decision ready for them.

Indeed, we are not sure but that in a sense the very "clearness" of Mr. Savage's thought might be charged as a defect in this particular book. The topics treated are, of course, those which have been warmly debated in the Christian Church for centuries, and upon which the scholarship of Christendom is variously divided to-day. But, as we were reading, we found ourselves frequently asking: If it is all as clear sailing as this, why have not all come to the same port? If the argument is so lucid and conclusive as here appears, how can there be any other side to argue at all? And these questions led to the further question, whether the logical clearness which Mr. Savage's intellect demands does not tend to exclude from his range of vision any elements of uncertainty that may exist in the premises, even though such elements actually inhere in the subjects he discusses and are consequently a legitimate part of the premises.

But, however this may be, Mr. Savage is perfectly explicit as to the stand-point from which he gives these views of Jesus and his mission. He tells us in the introduction his precise method of proceeding with the Gospel narratives; in other words, just what he accepts and what he rejects in order to get a tolerably sure biographical platform from which to start. He takes the ground adopted by many of the most learned modern critics, and especially advocated by Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, in his article on the Gospels in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, that, though none of the first three Gospels was originally written as it now stands, Mark is the oldest of them,—less legendary, therefore, than the others, and to be used as a guide in constructing from the three a common story of what Jesus said and did. The fourth Gospel, of course, Mr. Savage leaves out of view as entirely unauthentic history, however valuable it may be for other reasons. But from the common element in the first three, representing that portion of the oral tradition concerning Jesus which "had already become so fixed that neither of the writers felt at liberty to change it," he thinks "a complete life of Jesus can be constructed by using only those words and phrases which all three of them use." In this "triple tradition," he says, "if anywhere, we shall be able to find traces of what Jesus really was and did and said. This takes us back as far, and as near to his person, as we can ever hope to go."

From this point of departure and with this method, Mr. Savage proceeds to his theme,—and proceeds, we think, in the main, consistently. If any protest is to be made, it must be made (with one exception to be afterwards noticed) against the premises, and not against the argument itself. The subjects of his several "talks" are "Sources of our Knowledge"; "The Miraculous"; "Birth and Childhood"; "Public Life"; "Death and Resurrection"; "The Messianic Idea"; "Jesus and the Church: or, was Jesus a Christian?" "Jesus and Humanity: or, Christianity among the Religions." That the utterances are very radical need not be said to anybody who knows Mr. Savage's present theological position. He does not believe that Jesus, by birth or faculty or inspiration, was any other than a natural human being; the loftiest, indeed, of all past religious teachers, yet subject to the limitations of his time, and teaching many things that have been both intellectually and morally outgrown. He does not believe that Christianity is of supernatural origin, but that it is "a natural religion in precisely the same sense as is any other historic religion"; only, in a natural way, "the highest and best" of them all. He is not at all strenuous to keep the title of "Christian,"—says distinctly, "We will not grasp after the name of 'Christian' as at present defined,"—yet apparently he would consider himself entitled to the name by virtue of what he would regard a more correct definition, though his hold is by so slender a thread that we may expect to see it snap any day in his own hands.

Indeed, on this point, the last that the Talks treat, Mr. Savage seems to us to lose his habitual clearness of thought, and to leave also the straight line of his method. He sees clearly and says explicitly that "you cannot possibly deduce historic Christianity from the life and words of Jesus." He considers the Messianic idea so "all-important" in its relation to the origin of Christianity that he says, with his usual emphatic positiveness, "It is unquestionably true that but for the Messianic idea, wrought out and organized by the thought, the genius, and the energy of Paul, there would have been no historic, instituted Christianity in the world." He thinks that Jesus himself claimed to be the Messiah, though not in the Jewish sense of the term, and that he was under the delusion that he himself would miraculously appear to establish the Messianic reign. He further affirms that "the one single point that separated Christians from the Jews, at the first, was simply here: the Jews denied that Jesus was coming again as the Messiah, and the Christians asserted it"; and that "the one grand thing which the early preacher of Christianity set out to do was to convince the Jews that Jesus was the "Christ,"—that is, the Messiah. Now it strikes us that these affirmations give us, with as much explicitness as anything can, the true definition of the word "Christian." We leave aside the later definitions made by the Catholic and Protestant Churches, even that of the Evangelical Alliance, by which Mr. Savage easily enough proves that Jesus himself was not a "Christian" (a point, by the way, which, however practically effective, does not advance his argument in its proper line), and we come back to the earliest primitive traditions, or to the time when the name "Christian" was first taking shape and meaning, and we inquire there the significance of the term. And what do we find? Why, that "Christian" meant simply and solely one who accepted Jesus as the Messiah, and not at all one who only accepted him as a great moral and religious teacher, even though possibly the highest the human race had ever had. To be a Christian was to confess Jesus to be "the Christ."

And in all after definitions in the Christian Church, however much of credal appendage has been added, this original confession has been uniformly regarded as the one essential and vital point of departure, until we come to the small fraction of radical Unitarians in our own day, who desperately clutch their one remaining shred of connection with the Christian Church by going behind this uniform and original definition of the term "Christian" to the moral and spiritual teaching of Jesus for a new and more generic definition which they can accept. But, in our opinion, Mr. Savage, by the strict method of interpretation of the New Testament which he has adopted, is precluded from this resort. He says, for instance, in the first of the quotations above made, that from the life and words of Jesus we cannot possibly deduce historic Christianity; by which we must suppose him to mean that Jesus as a general moral and religious teacher alone could not have originated historic Christianity. For, if we include in Jesus' "words" what Mr. Savage thinks he plainly claimed and taught about his own Messiahship, then this sentence, taken in connection with those after quoted, would appear to have no meaning. What Mr. Savage believes and what he means to say, we take it, is that Jesus—appearing only in the rôle of a moral and spiritual reformer, a great prophet, even though preaching with new and wonderfully clear emphasis the divine fatherhood and a morality entering into the very springs of the heart—would never have become the head of the historic Christian Church; that it was the Messianic claim made for him which placed him there, and without that claim, used as an organizing instrumentality, there would have been no Christian Church and no "Christians."

Digitized by Google

But is it not equally true, must not at least Mr. Savage admit it, that this claim would never have been made for Jesus, by Paul or any of the rest of the apostles, if Jesus had not made it for himself, and had never said anything about a Messianic realm? Was it not his own claim to be "the Christ," and what he himself taught concerning his coming to establish the Messianic kingdom, that gave to the apostles the essential seed-germ, which in their hands produced the "Christian" name and the beginning of historic Christianity? If, therefore, we are to go back to Jesus himself for a definition of "Christian," we shall not, if we follow Mr. Savage's method, find it in any part of the general moral and spiritual teachings of Jesus, from which, as he affirms, we cannot possibly deduce historic Christianity, and which equally could never have given us such a word as "Christian"; but we find it in just that specific part of Jesus' teachings concerning his Messiahship which Mr. Savage considers a delusion, and rejects. In fine, following Mr. Savage's logic,—and he will excuse us, if we catch somewhat of his own positiveness,—it is our opinion that he, and those who agree with his view of the Gospels, have not a single etymological, historical, logical, or moral right to the name of "Christian."

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. July, 1880. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

With the removal of its editor, Mr. Wm. T. Harris, from St. Louis, this publication has also removed from that city of its birth, and is now to be issued by Appleton & Co., in New York. It is remarkable that it should ever have appeared in a Western city, and remarkable that it should have been sustained so long in American soil anywhere. We do not suppose that it can have had a pecuniary success, but surmise that it has been kept in the field by the devotion of its editor and the band of fellow-workers in speculative philosophy that somehow congregated in St. Louis. The numbers have not always appeared regularly on their nominal month, as the last has not. They have apparently waited to get full with something worthy. But the full complement for each year has finally come, and the current volume marks the fourteenth year. Though we must confess we have not always read it, that the leaves of some of our back numbers are still uncut, yet we have always been glad that this magazine is published, and glad that we have it entire; and some day we hope to have leisure to turn back and read some of the solid articles it contains, which we now know only by their titles. In the strong tendencies of modern science on the materialistic side, it is well to have the side of speculative philosophy so ably represented as it is here. This last number contains: (1) A Criticism of Kant's Main Principles, by J. H. Stirling; (2) Atomic Collision and Non-Collision, by Payton Spence; (3) Kant's Anthropology (Translation), by A. E. Kroeger; (4) Grimm on Raphael and Michael Angelo (Translation), by Ida M. Eliot; (5) Notes and Discussions; (6) Books Received.

THE UNITARIAN REVIEW AND RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE. September, 1880. 101 Milk Street, Boston.

The Unitarians, after returning from the vacation season, are greeted with an unusually strong number of their Review. We would like to give a notice of some extent to each of the articles in turn, but must content ourselves with just mentioning their titles. I. History of the Psychology of Religion, by Rev. Francis Greenwood Peabody; II. Theodore Parker, by Rev. John W. Chadwick; III. Dr. Horace Bushnell and the Quandaries of our Theology, by Rev. C. A. Bartol, D.D.; IV. The Gospel of Liberalism, by Rev. J. H. Allen; V. The Messianic Hope, by Rev. Chas. W. Wendte; VI. Editors' Note-Book.

The latter by its shrunken proportions, and the lack of the usual book notices, alone betray the vacation season. Most of the articles named grew in an invigorating intellectual climate.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. JOHN L. STODDARD, the lecturer, has got back from Europe.

MAX MUELLER will publish Professor Palmer's new translation of the Koran in his Sacred Books of the East.

MONCURE D. CONWAY has been in this city the past week. He intends to sojourn in and about Boston for a little while.

S. RUSSELL FORBES, Roman archæologist, will arrive in America about Sept. 20. He proposes lecturing upon "Ancient and Modern Rome."

RELIGIOUS excitement caused by a recent camp-meeting at Cadnan's Neck has made Miss Carrie Alden, of Westport, Conn., a raving maniac.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN, the radical speaker of Revere, Mass., addressed the Cape Cod Spiritualist Camp Meeting, Aug. 29, on "The Old Faith and the New."

DORA YOUNG, the daughter of Brigham, has renounced the system which he gave his life to build up. She is described as a handsome and an intelligent woman.

IT is reported that Prof. Hiram Corson of Cornell University has become a convert to Spiritualism. Professor Corson was recently bereaved of a daughter to whom he was very deeply attached.

MRS. ELIZABETH L. COMSTOCK, the Quaker philanthropist, has now taken up the cause of the Kansas refugees. She claims that there are forty thousand of them, two-thirds of whom are utterly destitute.

GEN. JULES BERGERET, one of the founders of the central committee of the French commune, and military commandant of Paris during the commune, has arrived in New York. He refuses to accept the amnesty of the French government.

EDWIN ARNOLD, author of the Light of Asia, is forty-eight years old. He graduated at Oxford with high classical honors, and soon after went to India as principal of Deccan College, Poona. He is not, as has been stated, a brother of Matthew Arnold.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH expects to make a little money out of the notice which he has of late attracted. He proposes accordingly to improve the time before the next session of Parliament by a short lecturing tour in this country. His appointments have been already arranged for him.

CARLYLE is a grand-uncle, and, it is said, is very much pleased about it. A private letter from Chelsea says that he is so dazed with the novelty of a baby in the house—it is almost his sole experience of such torments and wonders—that he sends for the infant when anybody calls, and remarks upon the perfection of the finger-nails and the little toe-nails and all the rest of the wee body. He turns it up and down and over, and explains the mysterious and wonderful anatomy; in short, acts like a child over the first baby it has ever seen.

IT appears that they do not all write "just like copperplate" in Australia any more than in some other parts of the world. This is the irreverent way in which the Sydney Bulletin speaks of the Rev. Dr. McGibbon's penmanship, a distinguished clergyman of that city: "No religious compositor (and there are a few) is ever intrusted with Dr. McGibbon's manuscript. One sheet of it engenders more profanity than a barrel of whiskey. The recipient of a letter from him on one occasion wrestled with it for a week, and then submitted it to all his friends. None of them could decipher it, so they sent it back to the doctor himself, and even he could not make it out."

REV. PHOTIUS FISKE—we presume he would prefer that we should drop the "Rev."—is one, as many can testify, whose generous sympathies are wont to overflow in helpful deeds. Among the various objects of his benevolent interest for some years has been the colored school of Leesburg, Va. The teacher of this school recently enjoyed, chiefly through his favor, an overland trip, with a pleasure party, to California. On her return, she gratefully wrote as follows: "What a splendid new world your golden key unlocked for me to roam through with boundless satisfaction and delight! And how shall I ever return to you or to 'the universal good' any equivalent for the happiness you so unselfishly bestowed!" Miss Putnam (the lady referred to) passed a few days at Iowa Agricultural College, as the guest of President Welch and his wife, and earnestly expresses the desire that her benefactor may visit it. "My hope is," she says, "that, if you come here, you will find a happy environment of active young life, learning, improving, growing, and at the same time a quiet, restful home for yourself, such as you spoke of your desire to find; and a worthy institution which you would love to endow with your exquisite collection of pictures and gems of art, a monument of unsurpassed educational opportunities,—and, what your soul will delight in, all as free as air to women, colored folks, Chinese—anybody that wants to learn!"

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

DO YOU KNOW?

"Yesterday we buried my pretty brown mare under the wild cherry-tree. End of poor Bess."—Letter from a friend.

When a human being dies,
Seeming scarce so good or wise,
Scarce so high in scale of mind
As the horse he leaves behind,
"Lo," we cry, "the fleeting spirit
Doth a newer garb inherit;
Through eternity doth soar,
Growing, greatening, evermore."

But our beautiful dumb creatures
Yield their gentle, generous natures,
With their mute, appealing eyes,
Haunted by earth's mysteries,
Wistfully upon us cast,
Loving, trusting, to the last;
And we arrogantly say,
"They have had their little day;
Nothing of them but was clay."

Has all perished? Was no mind
In that graceful form enshrined?
Can the love that filled those eyes
With most eloquent replies,
When the glossy head, close pressing,
Grateful met your hands caressing;
Can the mute intelligence,
Baffling oft our human sense
With strange wisdom,—buried be
"Under the wild cherry-tree"?
Are these elements that can spring
In a daisy's blossoming?
Or in long dark grasses wave
Plume-like o'er your favorite's grave?
Can they live in us, and fade
In all else that God has made?

Is there aught of harm, believing
That, some newer form receiving,
They may find a wider sphere,
Live a larger life than here?
That the meek, appealing eyes,
Haunted by strange mysteries,
Find a more extended field,
To new destinies unsealed;
Or that in the ripened prime
Of some far-off summer time,
Ranging that unknown domain,
We may find our pets again?

HELEN BARRON BOSTWICK.

DEAR are thy girls and thy boys, my beautiful, opulent neighbor,—
One on thy bosom reposes, another looks up from thy knee;
Calm is thy face and gone the passion of youth's fierce endeavor:
All thy heart closely once hid, hold now thy arms, open and free. JOHN ALBEE.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 9, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SEPTEMBER is here. Work begins again. Our friends must now remember the Index with renewed vigor. We need donations. We need new subscribers. Look at the lists below, and see if you cannot put your name there. Look among your neighbors and correspondents, and see if there is not some one who would take the paper, if you called his attention to it in the right way.

OUR readers, we know, will thank us for sharing with them the welcome letter from Mr. O. B. Frothingham, printed in another column. We use the privilege he gives us to print it entire. We can but regret his decision not to resume his work as a preacher and lecturer, though we rejoice that he can speak so satisfactorily of his health as to be able to promise his great abilities to the cause of Free Religion in other ways.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia.	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston.....	200.00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10.00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford.....	10.00
JACOB HOEFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock.....	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.....	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston.....	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grandville, Mass.....	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston.....	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York.....	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston.....	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York.....	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass.....	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.....	18.35
Mrs. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass.....	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge.....	100.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo.....	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn.....	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford.....	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00
Mrs. S. W. RATHBONE, Princeton, Mass.....	5.00
FRANCIS SPRINGER, Columbus City, Iowa.....	10.00
DANA B. HUMPHREY, New Bedford, Mass.....	25.00
ELIZABETH S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock.....	10.00
JAMES W. BARTLETT, Dover, N.H. (10th assessment)	20.00
Miss S. E. DUNN, Dover, Mass.....	5.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years....	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years....	10.00
SETH HUNT, Northampton, annually for 5 years.....	5.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years..	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on Index stock.....	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on Index stock.....	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years....	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston.....	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock.....	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo (yearly).....	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock, and the same annually for 4 following years.....	50.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

THE GOOD OF MISSIONS.

In our article last week, we spoke of the indirect results of Foreign Missions (or those consequences which the Christian Church counts and yet holds to be subsidiary and non-essential) as the only results which, from the stand-point of Free Religion, would be regarded as having any importance. Among these ends, such as general enlightenment, education, higher civilization, etc., not aimed at, but in a degree indirectly accomplished, there is one which we are sure the Christian Church does not yet count among its trophies, but which to Free Religion has a special interest and value. We refer to the fact that it is to the foreign missionaries that Christendom very largely owes its acquaintance with the literature of the foreign religions.

When broad-minded, scholarly men have gone out as missionaries, they have soon discovered that the heathen religions were not wholly idolatrous; that they had sacred books worthy of study, moral codes surprisingly pure and regarded as authoritative, prophets revered as Heaven-sent teachers, traditions that had at least an interest to the student of religious history; and some of these missionaries have set to work at once to acquaint themselves with the language and religion of the natives where they have been located, and to translate the native religious literature into their own language, as a means of giving other missionaries and the churches at home an understanding of the religious character of the people with whom they had to deal.

The result has been a surprise to Christendom. Leaving aside the special dogma which the Christian missionary is sent out to preach as essential to salvation, and which of course is not found—at least, in his form of stating it—in the heathen religions, it is discovered that all the great ethnic religions contain enough of practical religious and moral truth to save all their adherents from any serious evil in life, if they would but live up to it. The missionaries who have been doing this work of studying and translating the sacred books of the so-called heathen religions have been in fact enlightening and converting Christendom even more rapidly than they have converted the heathen. They have been furnishing the materials for the new scientific philosophy of religion, which is gaining swift headway everywhere, and which treats all religions alike as links in a natural order of historical genesis and development. The missionaries may not have made many converts among the people to whom they have gone,—among the more intelligent heathen, marvellously few indeed,—but they have been paving the way for a broader and freer religion in Europe and America. Dr. Legge, by his laborious translation of the Chinese classics, is doing the work of Free Religion. It was a Wesleyan Methodist missionary who brought us one of the first fair and full statements concerning the Christ of India, Gautama Buddha. Bishop Colenso's eyes were first opened to the irrationality of his old theory of Biblical inspiration and infallibility by a searching question put by his quick-witted Zulu interpreter. And who shall say how many converts Bishop Colenso's books, which originated in that Zulu's question, have made—we will not say to Zuluism, but certainly away from the old dogma that Christianity contains the only infallible and saving truth—to a broader platform, above both Christianity and Zuluism, where converts from both can meet on equal ground? At present, we think Bishop Colenso's converts from Christianity toward Free Religion would largely outnumber his converts to Christianity from the Zulu faith. It is not indeed an unheard-of thing for missionaries to become so affected by the moral and spiritual truths which they find in the religions they have been commissioned to annihilate as to retire from the field full converts to the idea of the natural origin and brotherhood of all religions; in other words, to the ground of free and universal religion.

Now, we feel almost like saying that this one good that missions have done, which is not at all the thing they meant to do but is entirely contrary to that, is enough to justify all their cost. Of course, all the good work that has been done in this direction within the last generation has not been done by missionaries, but much of it has been done by or through them; and the beneficent effect of such work in modifying religious opinion and breaking down the old religious walls of sectarian arrogance and bigotry cannot be overestimated. We can but rejoice that so much of the money which Christian zealots, with devout but narrow and mistaken intentions, have poured into the missionary contribution-boxes, has somehow got into that potential "stream of tendency" which we hear so much about in our time, and which is bearing the gifts on beyond the power of the givers now to recover them, and to broader and better ends than anything they themselves conceived. Some day, they will perhaps themselves rejoice that the petty providence which they trusted safely to escort their contributions to a certain goal was overpowered by some larger providence, and went down out of sight in this deep stream.

But the thing that follows most logically to be said is this, that this one unsought and unexpected good which missions have accomplished points to the one radical reform that is needed in missionary work. Let missionaries abandon the idea of conversion from one authoritative dogmatic form of faith to another, and work on the idea of conversion from any present form of practical ignorance and vice to what is truest and best in all or any of the faiths, especially in the faith professed by those whom it is sought to help. Let the wonderful results produced by the comparative study of the religions be a guide to some common ground of departure, and to sympathetic methods. Missionaries from Christendom who should openly work on the lines indicated by free and universal religion would appeal advantageously to the more enlightened and intelligent classes of the foreign religions. Now, it is a confessed fact that these classes are not much affected by missionary work. The converts that are made are from the lowest and most degraded of the population, as a usual thing; and their characters are not very much changed by their change of faith. An educated observer of the missions in South Africa, one who went there in sympathy with them, informed us that it had become customary there to use the word "Christian" to designate the meanest and most contemptible type of the native population; and this, not because of a prejudice against conversion in itself, but because, first, it was the most shiftless and lazy, those who were attracted to the mission-houses by the charity food and clothing there given out, who were mainly the converts; and, secondly, because, after conversion, their moral habits generally suffered for the worse from the fact that in their change of faith they lost their old standard of morality, and did not soon, if ever, gain the new Christian standard,—so that morally they fell between the two stools. Mr. Carroll, whose lecture on missions we referred to last week as, according to the New York Independent, an authoritative document on the subject, speaks of missions among the Christian population of the Turkish Empire as being most sadly needed. "Their Christianity," he says, "is of a very corrupt character, and their morals are no better than those of the Turks who regard them with contempt." Nothing, in fact, is more evident than that the "conversion" of a people means a much greater thing than the Christian Church has ever made it to mean. The change from one form of doctrinal belief to another, even if it be the beginning of it, is but a very small part of the process. Quite as often the doctrine is dragged down and corrupted as that the convert is lifted up. The "conversion" that is availing is a long process of mental and moral education.

Digitized by Google

In view of these facts, the sympathy and help of the best classes among the native populations are very essential to genuine success in missionary work; and, to secure this sympathy and help, the work must be put on the broad grounds of universal religion: it must become, instead of a propagandism in behalf of any one religion conceived to have special divine authority, a common mutual effort to make use of what is good in any of the religions, in order to lift up and benefit humanity.

We commend these views to the various mission societies and their missionaries.

A WELCOME LETTER.

St. Moritz, Engadine, Switzerland,
August 14, 1880.

Dear Mr. Potter:—

A kind friend sends me the Index of July 8, which contained a report of the morning session of the Convention in Boston of the Free Religious Association, and a copy of the tribute paid to me as the former president of the Association. The sentiments expressed in Mr. Alger's resolution, I most cordially reciprocate. The Free Religious Association commands my respect and sympathy as sincerely as ever it did; and it is a real pleasure to think that its interests are in such good hands. Mr. Adler's speech interested me exceedingly by its clearness, freshness, and vigor. His criticism of the New Testament and "Christianity" was, in my judgment, sound and convincing; and the high moral tone of the address gave it a singular ring of eloquence. It is unfortunate that time was not allowed him to give the philosophical basis for his moral earnestness, which, after his trenchant criticism, seemed rather to hang in the air. He is, I think, a Kantian, having given, in Germany, a profound study to the works of that famous thinker. And doubtless, in the ideas of his great master, he finds abundant support for his zeal and enthusiasm. At all events, he is giving to the Free Religious Association a practical impulse which was wanting before, as its former president felt deeply.

What Mr. Alger said about Parker struck me as admirably conceived and expressed, and his contrast between Parker and Channing was excellently well stated. Nothing could have been better.

Mr. Channing's eloquent rhapsody was, to me, "dark from excessive bright." I cannot but think it in some respects unfortunate that the Unitarian denomination should have had such a precursor as Dr. Channing, a man whom it now never will comprehend, whose mental tenebrosities afford so vast a region for groping speculation, and whose moral earnestness is so easily evaded, or resolved into "glittering generalities." Whether his nephew's interpretation of him be correct or not,—and of its correctness there is room for much doubt,—Dr. Channing's theological views cannot be regarded as of authority, or as of interest, save in an historical aspect. Channing-worship is as impious as any other man-worship, as he would have been foremost to maintain. And I was glad that the Free Religious Association launched a shaft or two at that adored image.

Let me add that the Index, under its new management, has my full sympathy. Not that it had not before. Mr. Abbot richly deserves the tributes that have been paid to him for ability and nobleness. I wish I could have been present at the dinner given in his honor, and been permitted to speak an honest word in his praise. May his paper stand, as it always did, for the highest standard of truth, sincerity, and moral purity! I am sure that it will.

Respecting myself, there is nothing of interest to tell. It is pretty well understood by this time that I have finally relinquished my post and abandoned my profession,—that neither pulpit nor platform will know me again. This resolution is due to no considerations of health. My health is satisfactory, as good as it ever will be,—good enough. But I want more leisure than the ministry affords for the pursuit of certain lines of thought which have interested me since I have been in Europe, and the life of a man of letters will be more satisfactory to me. In another career, I can be as useful as in the old one, perhaps more so. My absence will be prolonged a year more, in order that the gulf may be wider between my past and my future. Then I hope to come back better than new.

Give my kindest wishes to such of our mutual friends as you may see, especially to the supporters of my beloved Free Religious Association; and believe me to be still, as always,

Heartily yours,

O. B. Frothingham.

WHAT SHALL LIBERALS TEACH THEIR CHILDREN ABOUT "GOD"?

In a former communication on this subject, we urged liberal parents and teachers to be absolutely sincere in the religious instruction of their children. This means that we shall not only not teach them, even provisionally, but we shall, if possible, not suffer them to be taught, doctrines about "God," or any theological dogmas whatever, which we disclaim belief in for ourselves. It means that we shall be as free and frank in the expression of our disbeliefs before them as in the assertion of our beliefs, in the confession of our doubts and ignorance as in the affirmation of our convictions about Deity. If Liberals may be reproached with believing we know not what, let us at least not lay our characters open to that far deeper reproach of professing with our lips to believe what our secret hearts repudiate. Let us first and above all things be sincere.

What shall we teach our children about "God"? Answering for ourselves, we say. We should consider ourselves most fortunate if we could keep our children's minds entirely free from infection with any of the ordinary ideas of "God," including not only the Christian, but the usual theistic and pantheistic conceptions of Deity. Of course, most of us who are classed as Liberals have long ago given up, if we ever held, the common Christian conception of God. We no longer believe in a Supernatural Being; i.e., a God super, or above, nature. We cannot conceive of an "above" in nature. To us, nature seems to be infinite in all directions. There are no vacant rooms in her attic marked "To let," in which the supernatural can hide. All seems to us natural. Every room is already "let." Law occupies them all.

But perhaps you take the position of the theist, not that there is a God above nature, but that there is a God in nature. Ah, how many of us were caught and held for years in the metaphysical meshes of that little "in." "God in nature,"—as though there were somewhere an inside of nature. But by and by we disentangled our thoughts, and came to see that there is no more reason for talking about a God in nature, as the theist does, than about a God above nature, as the Christian does. Then, perhaps, we took refuge in pantheism. We said: "God and nature are identical. God is nature: nature is God. They are one and indissoluble, now and forever." But we soon saw the logical inconsistency of calling one thing by two such different names. Why confuse our ideas by confounding words? Why not call nature nature, and done with it? Besides, if nature is God, what is there in nature higher than human nature? And, since we cannot believe that Jesus is the perfect man, what person or thing in all nature is worthy of our supreme reverence? Nothing in the shape of flesh; and, as to "spirit," we knew it not. Where, then, was our God? We hunted for him, but could not find him. We cried, some of us, like Mary of old, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." But by and by we saw that we had all of "God" we needed still left to us. We had lost something, it was true; but we had gained more: we had gained a clearer vision of the ideal. Above the grave of the dead gods, we could see all that was essential in the old thought rising, as on immortal wing, and shining before our mental vision, resplendent as the pure ideal, uneclipsed by any human personality. No more will we read this ideal into Scripture, and call it "Christ"; no more read it into the "Bible of nature," and call it "God." But we will read it where it is, in the mind; see it as a form of thought, a mental image, a splendid vision of what we should be and should do. This is the moral ideal; and we do not need to spell it with a capital I, and project it in imagination upon the pages of the Bible or the blue canvas of the heavens, in order to love it, reverence it, obey it, follow it as truly as ever did Christian follow his Saviour.

What, then, shall we Liberals teach our children about "God"? We—of course we only answer for one—could teach them that nature is nature; not the machinery of "God," nor the hiding-place of "God," nor another name for "God," but nature simply.

As scientists, we can explore her wonders; as poets, we may revel in them on the wings of fancy; but, as religionists, we neither find in her any objective "God" to worship or a "Christ" as exemplar. As we would teach our children that nature is nature, so would we teach them that the good is good, and in its largest and best sense must always be spelled with two o's. We would teach them that better, far better, than the "good" that any people has ever yet worshipped in the material heavens is the conception of the supremely good enthroned in the heavens of their own thoughts. Through moral precept, through inspiring biography, and still better through the inspiration of a living example before our children, let them see the good incarnate again and again, until by a law of moral evolution, which we yet imperfectly understand, the mind shall abstract for itself the finest elements of all the noble characters that pass before the eye, and out of these selected virtues fashion the supreme one, which rises before the mental vision like a spirit-form. And lo! only yourself transfigured. No, not yourself, but a sight of what you would be, and also an earnest of what you may be. What diviner, holier thing can we give our children than this vision of the ideal good? If it is not the "God" of the creeds, it is because it is infinitely more and better. W. H. S.

INSINCERITY IN THE PULPIT.

The paper of the Rev. Mr. Hale in the September North American Review upon "Insincerity in the Pulpit" will not be found to add very much of value to the discussion of the theme. All that is said has been said before quite frequently, if not so well, of late years, and even by those who are supposed to occupy a less advanced theological position. Mr. Hale does not seek to evade the charge, apparently, but treats it in a rambling and discursive way, which affords but little aid toward clear and satisfactory conclusions. According to his view, the pulpit is not specially the place for argument. It is chiefly for the statement of truths already ascertained. This is rather comforting to the preacher who has become unsettled in his opinions, and imagines it his duty to endeavor to give the whys and wherefores for the change that he has thus experienced to his hearers. It is perhaps true that the predominant aim of the pulpit should not be argument.

Digitized by Google

Yet it is difficult to see how it can very well avoid a large share of this, if it is to attain real vitality and power. Even upon the plane of moral inculcation and persuasiveness, a certain amount of argument must go with its teaching, if it is to rise above verbiage and commonplace, or produce any real effect upon reasonable people. Nor can the preacher afford to wait always until all evidence is in as to truth, or truth has become established, before he ventures to speak of it. Should he not be in some good degree, on the other hand, the prophet of truth, the one to hail it from afar,—to announce its approach and dawning? Says Mr. Hale, "Nobody goes to church to hear a man tell what his doubts are." Now, it seems to us that there are a very large number of people, and a growing one, who desire just as much to know the preacher's doubts as his convictions.

All the more is this true in proportion to the trust they repose in him, or his utterances carry weight with them. They would, in other words, greatly prefer from him frankness to concealment. They want him to take them into his confidence, to set them to thinking no less than to be the recipients of the truth which he has to deliver, to know how far he has got in the solution of the problems upon which they, too, it may be, are pondering.

Mr. Hale recognizes the subtle and important changes that are very largely going on in the popular mind at the present day, under the influence of new knowledge and more critical tendencies. The majority of the preachers, the better informed at least, he thinks, are aware of this, and that the old religious positions and terms are no longer tenable. These he would hold to a stricter sincerity. But it must not be forgotten that there is also a vast number of people beside these, both within and without the Church, upon whom modern enlightenment and criticism have scarcely any perceptible effect. Whence, otherwise, the astounding credulity and superstition which exist,—the Moodys and Sankeys, the salvation armies, the chalk-sketching evangelists, the Talmages and Spurgeons, and innumerable like phases of religious irrationalism and literalism that survive?

There are hosts of people to whom the preacher is still the oracle of a Heaven-sent wisdom, who regard him when he speaks as moved with a sort of divine inspiration. Of course there is little to be said to such as these in regard to sincerity in the pulpit. Probably, their preachers, as a general rule, are as sincere as they know how to be. They are what they are in consequence of the poverty of their intellects and the crude systems to which they belong. Doubtless, the uncritical habits of their minds, and of those within the sphere of their influence, are largely due to the absence of greater sincerity in the pulpit among the more enlightened, those who should be their teachers. Mr. Hale instances the Bible as one of the points in regard to which there is need of more honest dealing. It is useless, he thinks, to speak of it in the old way, or to imply that every text in it is of equal authority. How far Mr. Hale himself would go in this direction, we do not know. But it seems to us that the custom which still prevails so largely, in even liberal churches, of treating it as the only book that is worthy of use in religious services, of putting it in conspicuous display on the top of every pulpit, and a text from it at the head of every sermon, necessarily encourages insincerity and false views as to its character.

But there are points of graver importance than the one just noticed, to which the more rationalistic modes of thought inevitably lead the preacher in our day, if he is logical and courageous. How shall he meet these? How far shall he conform to the common standard of a sect to which he belongs, after faith in it has all but departed? Shall he pray in public, simply because it is the usage of his church? Shall he speak with positiveness of God and immortality, when the evidence of their existence to his mind has become faint and unsatisfactory?

These are questions to which the essay referred to gives no answer, though we conjecture there are not a few who are waiting it. We hold, therefore, that sincerity in the pulpit demands in our day great intellectual daring: it demands that the preacher shall face consequences, that he shall confess his doubts as well as his beliefs, and refrain from proclaiming uncertainties for certainties; that, instead of following in the rear of mental progress, he shall strive to be, so far as he may, its leader, to be the exponent of the latest truth and knowledge, and show their application to the existing and practical needs of the time. Thus shall he pursue no obsolescent calling, but one charged with the utmost utility, and his sincerity become vindicated. But this is the preacher to which evolution is to lead,—the preacher of the future. D. H. C.

"FREE RELIGION" has a very wide range, as witness the totally different impression made on two of our regular contributors, as shown in this week's Index, by President Barker's address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

A NEW magazine is to enter the field; a bimonthly, to be called "Education"; "international" in its list of contributors, and to be devoted to "the science, the art, the philosophy, and the history of education." Thos. W. Bicknell is to conduct it, and the New England Publishing Co., Boston, Mass., to publish it. Terms, $1.00 a year. Among the contributors are announced President McCosh of Princeton, President Eliot of Harvard, President Porter of Yale, Dr. Thos. Hill, Dr. Mark Hopkins, Canon Farrar, Wm. T. Harris, Anna C. Brackett, and other distinguished educators. The first number is to appear in September, with an attractive list of writers.

THE SOUL CORNERED AT LAST!

Such is the welcome announcement of President Barker to the American Association for the Advancement of Science. He asks, "What is Life?" and replies that he cannot answer just now, but give him a short time, and the mystery—no, he does not permit himself to use so lofty a word as that—the "ignis fatuus of life," that is his term, shall not much longer elude his investigation. There are to be no more "inexplicable phenomena." The secret places of emotion, memory, reflection, reason, and will, are already found out. It is really only excessive modesty on the part of President Barker that restrains him from a downright categorical answer to the question, What is life? He could, and if he would. But at present he prefers to play with the cornered human spirit, like a cat with a mouse. Sure as he is of the game, why not enjoy the sport of a little more chemistry, a little more weighing and measuring of intellectual and emotional energies? Do not suppose he needs to deal directly with the aforesaid articles to know all about them. By no means. A plant or a guinea-pig are their experimental equivalents. Is it not provoking to know the human body evolves energy enough in a day to raise itself six miles into the air, and yet here we remain, our feet glued to the globe? But soon all this will be changed, when the Association no longer buries its secrets and hides its light. At the next meeting, at farthest, the soul will have capitulated, and, having expiated its long resistance, will be handed about for the inspection of members, preserved in a bottle of alcohol. J. A.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

THE two hundred and eighty papers presented at the recent gathering of the American Association (all but about a dozen of which were actually read) furnish a very creditable contribution to scientific literature. If they represented the whole, instead of only a small part, of one year's scientific work in America, no one could complain of any lack of national activity with regard to scientific study. The papers, moreover, fully justified our conjecture of last week with reference to their character. They were genuinely scientific, the fruits of patient investigation and discriminating thought. Many of them, if presented singly, would have attracted a great deal of attention; and some of their results will undoubtedly be brought again to public notice, however temporarily obscured by the few papers of that rare or brilliant character which necessarily eclipses for a time the merits of all others brought near to them. The meetings were, moreover, a good anti-pessimistic tonic. No country can easily "go to the dogs," despite lugubrious stump oratory, while possessing a thousand men and women so wholesomely employed as are the members of the American Association. The session was without doubt, and from several different points of view, the most successful in the history of the Association.

THE key-note of the meetings of the Association was successfully sounded by Mr. S. H. Scudder, of Cambridge, at the annual meeting of the Entomological Club, the evening before the formal opening of the American society. Mr. Scudder concluded his presidential address by a reference to a besetting temptation of American entomologists,—that of studying only new forms and of cultivating descriptive work, to the neglect of choicer and broader fields; a temptation begotten, to use his own language, of "the spreading territory of the United States, the penetration of its wilds, and the intersection of its whole area by routes of travel, the wider distribution and greatly increased number of local entomologists, as well as the demand for our natural products abroad." In opposition to this temptation, he urged that more attention be paid to general laws, and especially "to the study of insect embryology, the habits of insects, and their relations to their environments, insect morphology, and the finer anatomy and histology of insects." All real entomological science, as distinguished from mere discovery or description or cataloguing, lies in the direction pointed out by Mr. Scudder, the essential principle of whose advice would be equally applicable to a successful pursuit of all the natural sciences. If American entomologists will now mix a little German plodding with their Yankee quickness of observation, we may hope for a bright future for this department of American science.

Digitized by Google

THE most striking paper before the Association was read by Professor A. Graham Bell, in which he described his new invention, the photophone. The principle of this invention, up to which Professor Bell and Mr. Sumner Taintor were led by a long series of experiments and discoveries, cannot be fully described in a paragraph. It is really an apparatus for the production and reproduction of sound by light. Practically, it may be spoken of as an invention for the transmission of messages by means of a beam of light in place of the ordinary telegraph wire. A broad and important generalization from their experiments is that all substances are sensitive to the vibrations of light, and may be made thereby to produce sound, the pitch of the sound depending upon the frequency of the vibratory change in the light. When, therefore, we control the form or character of the light vibrations, we control the character of the sound, and may thus obtain all varieties of articulate speech. We may thus speak from station to station, wherever we can project a beam of light. Selenium appears to be the substance most sensitive to light vibrations, although sounds have been produced in a very large number of substances experimented upon, positive failure being encountered only with carbon and microscopic glass. We regret that our limits forbid a description of the apparatus by which sounds are practically transmitted. The future developments of this brilliant discovery and invention are beyond conjecture.

PROFESSOR GEORGE F. BARKER'S address on "Some Modern Aspects of the Life Question," delivered at the opening session upon his retirement from the presidential chair, was the most broadly philosophical paper read, and created the most profound impression. We hesitate to speak of this essay with only a newspaper report at hand, but we believe it to be worthy at least of the very high praise of mention in the same sentence with Professor Tyndall's famous Belfast address and that of Professor Huxley on "The Physical Basis of Life." A thousand earnest seekers after truth seem to be slowly approaching a solution of the great question, What is life?—life being here defined as "the sum of the phenomena exhibited by a living being." The "life principle" is only "all that cannot be explained by chemistry and physics,"—a comparatively small amount to-day as compared with what it once included, and an amount, moreover, which is rapidly lessening. As a first result of recent work, according to Professor Barker, "the living organism has been brought absolutely within the law of the Conservation of Energy." The whole of the energy of the living animal is derived from food. An animal, like a machine, only transforms its energy. Again, muscular contraction can be explained without the assumption of vital irritability; "and muscular force has, just as probably, a purely physical origin." Mental action, moreover, has a physiological representation, which is known and can be measured both as regards quantity and rapidity of action. An interesting description was given of an ingenious machine, contrived by Dr. Mosso, of Turin, for measuring the volume of an organ, and by which the relative amounts of mental power exerted by different persons in performing the same mental process, or by the same person in different mental processes, can be accurately determined. Another important step is the demonstration of the identity of animal and vegetable protoplasm. Again, action at a distance is no longer regarded as possible; and, consequently, attraction and potential energy are disappearing from the language of science. In place of "attraction," a conception is formed of the sun's action exerted through the properties of the ether, which, although, on the one hand, so tenuous that a cubic mile of it would weigh only one thousand-millionth of a pound, is, on the other hand, so powerful that, if an amount of it equal in weight to a cubic inch of air be enclosed in a cubic inch of space, its reaction outwards would be upwards of seventeen billions of pounds. Enormous physical force is therefore in perpetual exertion at every point throughout all the immensity of space. The logical conclusion of the essay is that "every action performed by the living body is sooner or later to be pronounced chemical or physical."

THERE is genuine poetry in Professor Barker's concluding paragraph, and a very comforting morsel of theology (already eagerly clutched by Orthodox newspapers) for all who are disturbed by the supposed "materialism" of his deductions:—

It is a beautiful conception of science which regards the energy which is manifested on the earth as having its origin in the sun. Pulsating awhile in the ether-molecules which fill the intervening space, this motion reaches our earth and communicates its tremor to the molecules of the matter. Instantly, all starts into life. The winds move, the waters rise and fall, the lightnings flash and the thunders roll, all as subdivisions of this received power. The muscle of the fleeing animal transforms it in escaping from the hunter who seeks to use it for the purpose of his destruction. The wave that runs along that tiny nerve-thread to apprise us of danger transmutes it, and the return pulse that removes us from its presence is a portion of it. The groan of the weary, the shriek of the tortured, the voiced agony of the babeless mother, all borrow their significance from the same source. The magnificence of the work of a Leonardo da Vinci or a Michael Angelo; the divine creations of a Beethoven or of a Mozart; the immortal Principia of a Newton and the Mécanique Céleste of a Laplace,—all had their existence at some point of time in oscillations of ether in the intersolar space. But all this energy is only a transitory possession. As the sunlight gilds the mountain-top and then glances off again into space, so this energy touches upon and beautifies our earth, and then speeds on its way. What other worlds it reaches and vivifies, we may never know. Beyond the veil of the seen, science may not penetrate. But religion, more hopeful, seeks there for the new heavens and the new earth, wherein shall be solved the problems of a higher life.

R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

ONE of the circulars issued by the National Bureau of Education gives the following views of Mr. Ruffner, a superintendent of schools in Virginia, which, stated evidently with care, and coming from a Southerner, have a special value:—

The Negro.

Coming as I do from a Southern State, Mr. President and brother superintendents, you will expect me to say something specially about the negro, whose fate is to be determined largely by what the Federal Government does for him or leaves undone.

It is just ten years since I entered upon my present work; and I have studied nothing so much as the negro, because he is an enigma, and yet a part of my work. I have seen him in all sections of my own State. I have read everything I could find in regard to him everywhere. I have listened to everything pro and con that anybody had to say about him. And my impression in regard to his spirit and capacity is just this:—

(1) He wants to do right, and he is the most amiable of the races. He is also the most religious of human beings, and the character of his religion is improving. It controls his daily life more than formerly. Among these people there are many centres of great moral power.

(2) The negro craves education, and I believe that this desire has increased. It certainly has not diminished. He makes fully as great sacrifices to send his children to school as the laboring classes of whites.

(3) The civilization of the race is progressing, and even faster than his thoughtful friends anticipated.

(4) The negro is fond of politics, and he has just one principle of political action, and that is, to go with those who will do most, or lead him to think they will do most, to advance his interest. He has an eye to the past, but a much sharper one to the future. He has no strong faith in men or parties, and he will go hither and thither according as his confidence is gained at the moment. He is most suspicious of those who have heretofore formed the controlling element in Southern society and politics. There are occasional divisions of political sentiment among the negroes, but the great body of them move in mass, thus giving an illustration of "the unanimity of ignorance."

(5) But finally, as a class, they are, in character, weak and ignorant, and hence, to that extent, a dangerous element in society. We cannot expect that the mass of them, any more than the mass of ignorant white people, will be controlled by high and broad views while in their present condition; and there is no way of making them safe members of society but by educating them. The negroes are a highly improvable race. A surprising proportion of enlightened, right-thinking men have already risen from their ranks,—men who have taken a respectable position, some in the learned professions, some in editing and printing newspapers, and some in the management of business; and, what is not less commendable, great numbers are living worthy lives in the humble occupations. The colored children learn well at school, and show good effects promptly. But the kind and amount of education they are receiving or can receive with our present means are wholly inadequate to the great work of fitting them as a race for duties laid upon them by the Federal Government. And the race, generally, is far below the demands made upon it. No stronger claim to education ever existed than the claim of the negro race in these Southern States upon the Government which set them free and made them citizens; and this claim will be rung in the ear of Congress, until it is responded to. It is a great plea, of so much force in itself and supported by collateral reasons of such tremendous weight that it must prevail.

TOBACCO SMOKE PRODUCTS.—MM. Le Bon and Noel presented, the other day, in the French Academy, three flasks containing the following products extracted from tobacco smoke: 1. Prussic acid; 2. An alkaloid of agreeable odor, but dangerous to breathe and as poisonous as nicotine; 3. Aromatic principles still undetermined, but contributing, with the alkaloid mentioned, to give tobacco smoke its perfume. The alkaloid in question is thought to be identical with a compound—collidine—the existence of which has been observed in distillation of various organic substances, but whose physiological and toxical properties have been overlooked.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

MILWAUKEE, August, 1880.

The Milwaukee Sentinel, dated June 28, contained an article entitled "Consolidating Charities," which was introduced with these words: "A desire is evinced by a number of leading clergymen and business men of the city to procure some means of doing away with professional pauperism and imposition upon the charitably inclined."

After setting forth the objections to the usual methods of bestowing charity, and their failure in reaching the most worthy objects and their success in fostering mendicancy, the following sketch of a plan matured by Rev. G. E. Gordon was briefly stated. This plan is not intended to supersede, but to aid the various charities, and enable them to assist worthy objects only. A society is proposed, to be called "the Associated Charities of the City of Milwaukee, for the purpose of bringing into harmonious coöperation the overseer of the poor, churches, charitable agencies, and individuals, thus checking the evil of overlapping incurred by independent action; to investigate thoroughly all applications for relief; to place gratuitously the investigating machinery of the society at the service of all charitable agencies and persons; to obtain from the proper charities suitable and sufficient relief for deserving cases; to assist from its own funds, and, if possible, in the form of loans, cases for which relief can be obtained from no other source; to repress mendacity, and promote, as far as possible, the welfare of the poor by means of social and sanitary reforms, and by inculcating habits of providence and self-dependence." The plan proposed is essentially the same as that which now is in operation in

Digitized by Google

London, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, and other places.

These associated charities and similar methods of temporizing with a great and growing evil are necessary, but the greater necessity of a very different solution of the perplexing problem presents itself to every thoughtful person. Back of this, meanwhile, there lies a deeper study than either alleviation or systematic sympathy; namely, the investigation of the causes and the prevention of pauperism. First among the efforts which aim to elevate humanity stands this investigation, as now carried on by some of the best thinkers in Europe and America, who no longer cling to the idea that "the poor ye shall always have with you." The study of the social life of communities is pursued with a view to institute the spirit of self-help, and to cure the cancerous spirit of dependence.

"The history of our race," says a writer on the subject of "State Education," "shows us that men will not do things for themselves or for others, if they once believe that such things can come without exertion on their own part. There is not sufficient motive as long as the hope endures that the shoulders of some second person are available, who will offer his own shoulders for the burden. It must also be remembered that, unless men are left to their own resources, they do not know what is or is not possible for them."

George Jacob Holyoake presents the practical results of coöperative industry as the solution of the problem of pauperism. Co operation is no longer a speculative theory. It has been proven that its instinct is self-help. "It does not," as Mr. Holyoake says, "depend upon government for help, nor upon the sympathy of the rich for charity, nor upon the pity nor the prayer of the priest. As wild beasts retreat before the march of civilization, so pauperism will retreat before the march of co perative industry. The day of self-help has come, and this will be the complexion of the future. Coöperation is organized self-help." To admit the truth of this is easy, to anticipate this future complexion is encouraging. Still pauperism is here, is increasing year by year, and must be met by vigorous practical efforts. This consolidation of charities is a step in the right direction, including as it does the effort to promote social and sanitary reforms and to inculcate habits of providence and self-dependence.

A movement in Michigan, to which my attention has been lately called, is worthy of notice, and leads in the way of reform. In 1874 there was established a public school in Coldwater, Mich., for dependent children, which is simply a temporary educational home, not at all a reformatory one. It is a group of cottages, where family life is maintained and where every boy and girl is taught bread-earning. Examples of industry are ever before them, and they expect to find a home in some good family after a few months. It is pronounced a perfect success; and the principal advantages are that these children have never been herded among paupers nor been considered as criminals, but have been brought up under good examples, and then given a chance to gain a livelihood. No child is kept there a moment after a suitable home can be found; and the children turn out well, especially those of healthy parents. People are satisfied with the experiment, and the school is growing in popularity. This is a limited but very practical solution of the problem, and prevents the vagrancy and crime inevitable in the associated life of poor-houses or poverty-stricken localities.

Industrial schools are also steps in the way of reform. Habits of industry are created, but these reform schools are open to the serious objection which obtains in all institutions where the inmates of every grade of viciousness or disease are massed together. The ideal institution, whether it be hospital, asylum, reformatory, or public school, is based upon the plan which can approach the nearest to family life. It has sometimes occurred to me, when looking at the two large structures in this city known as the "Industrial School" and the "Old Ladies' Home," how happily they might be combined. Cosey cottages, which would cost more, but be infinitely prettier and more healthful, might contain a certain number of those unhappy children who most nearly were assimilated in age and condition, where something like home life might be enjoyed, and in each such home have at least one "grandma" who could perform the pleasant little duties that prove so acceptable from the real grandma of our homes.

Many of the old ladies in the "Home," who are bereft of all family ties and relieved from all family duties, are still active, with the motherly, housewifely instinct still strong in their dear old hearts. How comfortably it might be arranged, so that in each little nest there could be the possibility for the motherly heart to tuck the little ones up at night, patch the little trousers and dresses, croon a lullaby to those poor little homeless, motherless babies, some of them not above two and three years old, who are now obliged to be associated with older, vicious children, and ruled with the most rigid discipline. For each and all ages and classes, it cannot be denied that the home-influence would be beneficial in all directions.

Women have been admitted upon our State Boards of Charities and Reforms in Wisconsin. Mrs. Wm. P. Lynde, of Milwaukee, has been an earnest worker in this capacity. Mrs. Lynde will read a paper on Representation of Women upon Boards of Charities at the Woman's Congress to be held in Boston in October. Upon Mrs. Lynde's presentation of the condition of poor-house and county hospital, several years ago, to the Ladies' Local Aid Society of Milwaukee, an interest was awakened, which has never since died out. Investigations by the ladies of the city were carried on, which have resulted in contributing to the comfort of the unfortunates in that institution. Weekly visits have been made by these ladies, who carry with them many tokens of their thoughtful kindness, and are ever received with expressions of delight.

Milwaukee is an eminently charitable city. It, however, indicates the increase of pauperism in our country to find a city scarcely a half century old overrun by it to such an extent that steps are necessary to be taken to prevent imposition upon the generous people. It emphasizes the importance of an early and a serious consideration of measures to prevent professional pauperism.

B.

FOREIGN.

Sir Hercules Robinson has been appointed Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, in place of Sir Bartle Frere, and will be succeeded as Governor of New Zealand by Sir A. Gordon.

A certain number of nuns of the Convent of the Sacred Heart in the Rue de Varennes, Paris, have migrated to the United States, in order to anticipate their expulsion by the French Government.

Pope Leo XIII. is thinking of a series of books for children to be used in the schools of Rome, and is not unlikely to take the works of the Catholic Publication Society of New York as their model.

The Normandy Society of Antiquaries are now celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the introduction of printing at Caen. The National Library at Paris possesses an edition of Horace, printed at Caen in 1480 by Durandas and Quijone.

The Remains of Columbus.—The rector of the University of Pavia has received a gift of some of the ashes of Columbus. The ashes are enclosed in a crystal pyramid, and will henceforward be visible to the curious in the library of the University. It was at the University of Pavia that Christopher Columbus studied.

The Annual Conference of the British Secular Union was held Sunday, Aug. 1, at Sheffield. Mr. G. J. Holyoake presided, and addressed the meeting. The attendance was good; and the report of the Secretary showed that important work had been done by the Union during the year, and that it was in a prosperous condition.

Celine Chapuis is the sort of serving-maid whom one would not care about having in the house. This gentle creature has just been sentenced to ten years at hard labor for having tried first to throw her mistress out of the window, and then to kill her by kneeling on her and strangling her. Céline had been excited to this brutality by an accusation of theft which her mistress had brought against her.—Parisian.

Jerusalem will soon be a centre of winter fashion, if matters go on as they are going. Not only has it now a German sanitary inspector and other officials to attend to the supply of water, street cleaning, etc., with a view to making it a pleasant abode; but it is announced that Lothair, otherwise the Marquis of Bute, has bought a villa near the Mount of Olives. "The Wizard Bendisraeli," as Punch called him some thirty years ago, proved his prophetic soul when he concluded Tancred with the announcement that the "Duke and Duchess of Bellomont had arrived at Jerusalem."—Jewish Times.

On a recent Sunday, in the chapel in the Rue Rochechouart, Father Hyacinthe gave his congregation an account of his recent visit to England, and the lively sympathy for him and for his work which was manifested there by all who are desirous of promoting Catholic reform in France. A meeting will soon be held in Lambeth Palace, London, under the direction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to secure aid for the construction of a Gallican Church in this city. Meantime, Father Hyacinthe, who is very sanguine about the future, means to make an effort to secure the Church of the Assumption. In his sermon, he told his hearers that he was especially desirous of impressing upon their minds the principles that, even were Church and State to be separated, religion must remain the basis of the national life.—Parisian.

The Peace Society has reprinted a letter from a contemporary on the manner in which the "military element" is suffered to preponderate among "some of our religious societies." It seems that, in a certain part of London, a retired officer has lately been lecturing at ladies' schools and other institutions on the Zulu War. We read that "the lecture was for a pious object, and had the sanction of the Evangelical clergy." From first to last, the lecturer treated the Zulu War as a laudable and righteous enterprise; and when a picture was shown, in illustration of the muster at the Tugela, the well-known hymn, "Forward, Christian soldiers! Onward as to war!" was given out and sung. On another picture of a battle-field after a victory, the young ladies sang, "Abide with me! Fast falls the eventide!" In commenting upon this, we may not follow the Peace Society in characterizing it as unchristian, because, in sober sooth, we opine that nothing could be more in accordance with the whole current of Christian history. Blood and religion, sword and cross, go naturally side by side. "Deus vult!"—God wills it!—shouted the sanguinary monsters who deluged Syria and Palestine with blood, and who, after the capture of Christ's sepulchre, put tens of thousands of the inhabitants of Jerusalem to the sword. Humanity turns with disgust from the very mention of Christianity.—Secular Review.

The following is a portion of the letter of E. de Pressense to the Times, in reply to the strictures of Abbe Martin (Professor in the Catholic Faculty of Paris) upon him in that paper: "I have certainly nothing to learn from Abbe Martin on the subject of religious liberty. I am one of those who, under the commune of 1871, exposed themselves to very real dangers in protesting against the incarceration of the Archbishop of Paris. I have steadily opposed in the Revue des Deux Mondes, in the Journal des Debats, in the Revue Politique et Litteraire, and in the Revue Chretienne, the attacks made upon the liberty of Catholics, whether in Germany or Switzerland. When Abbe Martin would have us believe that French Ultramontanism, of which he is the champion, is favorable to freedom of worship, he forgets not only the creed of his Church, which formally condemns it, and the protest of Pope Pius IX. in 1869 against the principle of the Spanish Constitution which recognized it, but also the bitter and determined resistance which his friends, headed by the Senator Chesnelong, offered from the tribune of the National Assembly to the proposed law for securing religious liberty to all citizens, when it was my honor to advocate it in the Assembly. At that time, the Ultramontanes in their great meetings spoke only of liberty for the right (la liberte du bien); that is to say, they urged that they should enjoy a liberty denied to all others. This is their one idea, and I trace it clearly through all the fine-drawn distinctions of the Abbe Martin; and it is their invariable practice, wherever they have the power. The Abbe must surely presume very unwarrantably on the ignorance in England of the recent history of France, when he ventures to assert that the Ultramontane party, of which the Jesuits are the masters, has kept quite aloof from politics; while the truth is that it has never ceased to anathematize and assault our institutions, heaping maledictions on the Revolution of 1789 and on the existing Republic. The last serious attempt to overthrow it, on May 16, 1877, emanated from them; their clergy are arrayed in line against it; and the charges of the bishops have seconded the electoral circular of the Anti-Republican Coalition. It is just this blending of politics with religion which makes it so difficult to deal with the unrecognized religious bodies in France under the system of the Concordat. I deprecate as heartily as anyone a 'Kulturkampf' which must be fraught with peril, and for this very reason I plead for fresh legislation. But the fact remains, nevertheless, that the initiative in the present contest between the Ultramontane Church and the State was taken by the former. The decrees of the Vatican Council were long prior to those of the 29th of March, 1880; and what they did was to stifle all that was liberal and compatible with the conditions of modern society in old Catholicism."

Digitized by Google

JESTINGS.

During a lesson on the life of King David, a class of girls was asked, "Who killed the giant?" Whereupon, one replied, "Jack."

"James, did you divide your paper of chocolate with your brother?" "Yes, certainly, mamma. I ate the chocolate, and gave him the motto: he is so fond of reading, you know."

The scene passes between two married men on the Stock Exchange: "Bonjour, cher! How is your mother-in-law?" "Much better, thank you. And yours?" "She's dead, thank you."—Parisian.

Very Likely.—Serious gentleman (to youthful cart wheelist): "Youngster, the devil's in that little heart of yours." Youthful cart wheelist: "Is 'e? Then I gues 'e gits pretty well shook, ole boy."—Judy.

Be moderate in your eatin', sensible in what you drink, an' doan' 'spect dat de Lawd kin porshun you out jist de kind of weather you want, and leab de crumbs to your nayburs, was a sensible negro's exhortation.

An American girl who marries an Italian marquis gets on very well until his serene highness begins to spend all her money and talk of her "father, ze shopkeepair." Then she fires up, and gives him a little fourth of July.

It is said that a minister in a country kirk in Scotland stopped in the course of his sermon, to ask a member who was deaf, "Are ye hearing, John?" "Oh, aye," was the response: "I am hearing, but to verra little purpose."

A certain Boston deacon lately formed his Sunday-school in line, and marched them along the aisles, himself in front, singing "Hold the Fort." The consternation which seized all parties at the second stanza can better be imagined than described:—

"See the mighty host advancing,
Satan leading on."

The deacon has objected to new methods ever since.

"Is your husband out?" inquired a gentleman lately of the wife of a cabinet-maker on the boulevard Montmartre, Paris. "No, sir. He is in the back-shop, working," and at that moment there came the report of a fire-arm from that quarter. "Gracious!" exclaimed the visitor. "What is the matter?" "Oh, it is nothing, sir: he is only finishing a gothic cabinet, and was firing small-shot into it to give an appearance of worm-eaten antiquity."

The review passed splendidly through all of Job's afflictions, and the exercises had reached the question, "Who comforted Job?" which was confidently put by the pastor and as fearlessly responded to by a little bright-eyed girl in the assembly, whose raised and agitated hand expressed her anxiety to answer. The pastor's eye caught the zealous activity of his little scholar; and, pleased to gratify the child's desire, he said, "Well, Gracie, speak up loud now: who was it comforted Job?" And the response came clear and with sincerity: "His sisters and his cousins and his aunts."

Last Sunday afternoon, the superintendent of a city Sunday-school was questioning the pupils on the subject of the lesson. Among the questions asked was, "When God found out that Adam and Eve had sinned in the garden, what did he do?" A little fellow in the rear of the room was just too anxious to reply. His glistening eye and excited frame attracted the attention of the questioner; and, unfortunately, he was greeted with a nod, indicating that he might answer. With a voice, the echoes of which could be heard far off on the distant commons, he shouted, "Gave 'em the g. b." To most of the school, this was perfectly intelligible and satisfactory; but to a few it had to be explained that it was street Arabic for "grand bounce,"—that is, removal from the garden.

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

A portion of the Free Church of Scotland, on threatening to secede if Professor Robertson Smith was allowed to remain in good fellowship, put forth a manifesto of reasons, which, in their desperate tenacity of adherence to the dogma of Biblical infallibility, deserve only a place in this department. They are as follows:—

"(1) Because its [the Free Church's] professors and ministers are now allowed to teach, admittedly contrary to all historical evidence, that there are interpolations in the Book of Deuteronomy; and there is no reason why they may not assert the same thing of the Acts of the Apostles or any other book of the Scripture, if they choose.

"(2) Because it is now allowable to teach that the Song of Songs got into the Canon of Scripture by mistake, through the Church erroneously supposing it to be allegorical.

"(3) Because it is now allowable to teach that the Books of Jonah and Esther have poetical inventions of incidents in them, which destroy their credibility as trustworthy historical documents.

"(4) Because it is now allowable to teach that "the Synoptical Gospels are non-apostolic digests of spoken and written apostolic tradition." In other words, they were not written by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, but some party or parties at the beginning of the second century.

"(5) Because it is now allowable to teach that the Gospel of John is an "unhistorical product of abstract reflection." In other words, it is not an historical account of words spoken or actions done by the Saviour.

"(6) Because it is perfect insanity to suppose that men will attend church now to hear sermons on such books as Deuteronomy, Song of Songs, Esther, Jonah, or the Gospels, any more than they would to hear sermons on Tobit or Bel and the Dragon.

"(7) Because this is already clearly evidenced in Germany, where not above five per cent. of the whole so-called Protestant population attend church on the Sabbath, and where Socialism and Nihilism are the natural results.

"(8) Because, as it is only by the aid of State funds that rationalism is able to live in Germany and Holland, and as it will only be by the Sustentation Fund it will be able to exist here, it is the imperative duty of every friend of the truth to withdraw from supporting such a bulwark of deadly error.

"(9) Because these doctrines are a breach of the Mutual Eligibility Act, and warrant the United Presbyterian, the Irish Presbyterian, and the English Presbyterian Churches in raising the question of its continuance.

"(10) Because, by allowing these teachings, the Free Church has sunk beneath the level even of such Unitarians as Lardner and Channing, who would have repudiated them with horror.

"(11) Because they are founded only on conjectural criticism,—a principle repudiated by all sound critics and scholars,—and are maintained only by the profoundest ignorance of the plainest Bible facts."

Unity Hymns and Chorals

FOR THE CONGREGATION and THE HOME.

EDITED BY

W. C. GANNETT, J. V. BLAKE, F. L. HOSMER.

253 Hymns, 66 Hymn-Tunes, with some elements

OF

Choral and Responsive Service.

"We have tried to give in our little book two hundred and fifty hymns likely to be loved by congregations whose simple feeling in religious service is that of children seeking the Father."

Bound in paper-covered boards. Single copy, 35 cts.; per dozen, $3.00. For sale at

"UNITY" OFFICE, Room 57,

75 Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

"Unity Clubs,"

OR

Mutual Improvement Societies

IN TOWN AND CHURCH.

By Mary E. Beals.

Helpful suggestions for those who are planning social and educational meetings for the winter in their town or church. 21 pages.

One copy, 5 cts.; per dozen, 25 cts. For sale at

"UNITY" OFFICE, Room 57,

75 Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

President.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

Vice-Presidents.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

Secretary.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

Assistant-Secretary.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

Treasurer.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

Directors.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 Tremont Place Boston (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. Clark is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at New Bedford, Mass.

Wm. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A.

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c.	per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c.	" "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c.	" "
" 52	" . . .	5c.	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

Miss FITZ'S SCHOOL for GIRLS AND BOYS, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, will re-open Sept. 20, 1880. Pupils admitted at any time. For particulars, send for circular.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,— all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Mo[illegible].

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,— why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; one hundred, $1.5[illegible]

II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE.

III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS. Higginson. Enlarged editio.

IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore [illegible] ker. Never before published.

V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)

VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $3.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

NOW READY:

[illegible]TITUTE ESSAYS,

BY

Rev. S. R. Calthrop,

Prof. C. C. Everett,

F. E. Abbot,

Dr. Gustav Gottheil,

Rev. J. W. Chadwick,

Prof. Ezra Abbot,

Rev. Francis Tiffany,

Rev. J. B. Harrison,

Rev. George Batchelor.

A "solid and meaty" volume of 280 pages 8vo.

"This volume is entitled to the cordial attention not only of students in theology, but also of all those interested in high truth. Those who know enough, and those whose religious system has been completed, had better not approach a volume which to a seeker after facts is wonderfully grateful and stimulating."—Boston Advertiser.

Price, in cloth, $1.25; paper, $1.00.

Sent, postage free, to any address, on receipt of the price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

101 MILK STREET, BOSTON.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER.

TO BOOK BUYERS.

BOOKS SENT BY MAIL AT

PUBLISHERS' PRICES!

No Extra Charge for Postage.

Any obtainable book that may be desired will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash. Orders are respectfully solicited from all friends of the Index. Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, MASS.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT, LIBERTY, RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 560.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 12.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

TRUTH which is mighty, righteousness which is strong, consecration and dedication to holiness, sustain the world. May the world, the mistress of the past and future, give us free room!—Hindu.

ALL men have in themselves the feelings of mercy and pity, of shame and hatred of vice. It is for each one by culture to let these feelings grow or to let them wither. They are part of the organization of men, as much as the limbs or senses, and may be trained as well. The mountain Nicon-chau naturally brings forth beautiful trees. Even when the trunks are cut down, young shoots will constantly rise up. If cattle are allowed to feed there, the mountain looks bare: shall we say, then, that bareness is natural to the mountain? So the lower passions are let loose to eat down the nobler growths of reverence and love in the heart of man: shall we therefore say there are no such feelings in his heart at all? Under the quiet, peaceful airs of morning and evening, the shoots tend to grow again. Humanity is the heart of man, justice is the path of man. To know heaven is to develop the principle of our higher nature.—Chinese.

WISDOM exalteth her children. Whoso giveth ear unto her shall judge nations.—Hebrew.

VICES and virtues the sons of mortals bear in their breasts mingled: no one is so good that no failing attends him, nor so bad as to be good for nothing. The heart alone can buy the heart, the soul alone can discern the soul.—Scandinavian.

I INVOKE the angels that reach us,—the angels of good conscience, exalted piety, love of excellence, high and perfect thought; the angels of comfort and of joy.—Persian (ancient).

VIRTUE is shut out from no one: she is open to all, accepts all, invites all,—gentlemen, freedmen, slaves, kings, and exiles. She selects neither house nor fortune: she is satisfied with a human being without adjuncts.—Seneca.

THE way to subject all things to thyself is to subject thyself to reason: thou shalt govern many, if reason govern thee. Wouldst thou be crowned the monarch of a little world? Command thyself.—Quarles.

THERE is no trifling with nature: it is always true, grave, and severe; it is always in the right, and the faults and errors fall to our share. It defies incompetency, but reveals its secrets to the competent, the truthful, and the pure.—Goethe.

IT is not enough that we swallow truth: we must feed upon it, as insects do on the leaf, till the whole heart be colored by its qualities, and show its food in every fibre.—Coleridge.

THE love of truth is the stimulus to all noble conversation. This is the root of all the charities. The tree which springs from it may have a thousand branches, but they will all bear a golden and generous fruitage.—Orville Dewey.

IT is not only incorrect, but injurious, to shut off from the common soul any merit, or say it can only be imputed or imparted, never indigenous. As if goodness were not native to the mind, but only immigrant or an import. Superhuman is it? Then certainly I shall not try for it! Why should a man strain after something beyond his manhood?—C. A. Bartol.

EVERY heroic act measures itself by its contempt of some external good. But it finds its own success at last, and then the prudent also extol.—R. W. Emerson.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Russian government has made an important concession to the Nihilists in the abolition of what is called the "third section" of the executive, which was in substance a secret police system directly responsible to the central government, and charged with the duty of the summary arrests and punishments that have made so prominent a part of Russian politics.

THE Springfield Republican of August 30 says: "The sermon which Rev. J. J. McDermott preached at the church of the Sacred Heart yesterday morning, called out by the opening of the public schools, as well as his parochial school to-day, contained some noteworthy things. He told his congregation at the start that, though it was wrong, they could, if they chose, send their children to the public schools; but he warned them in strong terms against saying that public schools were better than the parochial school. If any did so claim, he said he would read their names in church, show from the school-rolls the stupidity of their children, 'and make them wretched.'"

IT seems nowadays that if a person succeeds in getting the public attention, no matter in how unworthy and foolish a manner, he straightway betakes him to the lecture platform to add to his gains and prolong the sensation. It is not strange, therefore, that Dr. Tanner, as it was conjectured during the progress of his starving exploit would be the case, is now perambulating the country with a lecture entitled "What I know about Fasting." It can hardly be doubted that he knows a good deal about it,—more than most of us would care to. But it may be questioned whether the lecture-platform will gain much in dignity or the public in knowledge of value by his professed effort to enlighten us.

THE editor of the Springfield Republican has been reading the tract concerning which there has been a good deal of curiosity and speculation of late,—by Jonathan Edwards, on the Trinity, just published for the first time,—and this is what he says of it: "The theologians may gloss this theory of Edwards as much as they will, it shows to us a conception not of three persons in one, but of three Gods, one of whom is the superior and in fact originator of the others." It is a very common view of "Free Religionists" that the Trinity and certain other features of Christianity are direct offshoots of the polytheistic religions, but they have not been accustomed to look for quite as definite proof of this in the immediate precursors of New England theology as the above testimony supplies.

IT is reported that the Chinese Embassy, which has been for some time in this country, for the purpose of effecting certain negotiations with our government, have been very rudely treated in New York. They complain that their stay there has been a continual experience of insults and annoyance, that they have been constantly followed by crowds, and jeered at in the streets, and shall be obliged to abandon the business for which they came here, unless they are protected. If this be true, we would respectfully suggest that our foreign missionary societies suspend for the present operations in heathen lands, the fundamental principle of some of the religions of which is hospitality and civility to strangers, and try their labors for a while upon the native heathens of this nominal Christian country.

THE Catholics have opened a large parochial school in Lowell, Mass., of which the Boston Advertiser of Tuesday, last week, gave the following account: "The new Immaculate Conception Parochial School opened for the first time yesterday morning in Belvidere, Lowell. It is a large brick building with eight school-rooms, each capable of seating seventy-two pupils. Six Grey Nuns of New York are teachers, and two more have been telegraphed for. There is a large attendance. About two hundred and twenty-five boys and nearly three hundred girls joined yesterday. One public primary school will have to be closed on account of the lack of pupils, caused by their being drawn to the parochial school; and the attendance on other public schools will be considerably decreased. This is the first parochial school opened in Lowell, but another is being erected." The Catholics, as new facts show every week, are determined to withdraw their children from the public schools as fast as possible.

A MOST encouraging and creditable fact with regard to the Oneida Community, New York, has been lately brought to light. It appears that the abrogation, last year, of the peculiar views with regard to marriage which had existed in the Community, was not effected, as was then supposed, by the outside pressure brought to bear upon the Communists by certain clergy in the vicinity, but by an internal rebellion on the part of the younger and more intelligent members of the Community against these degrading views and the practices growing out of them. It was in deference to these aggressive reformers that Noyes, the President of the Association, had the "revelation" changing their doctrine in this particular. But he was suspected of not being sincere in the change, and very likely was not; but the reforming party were determined to hold him to his word. The result was that he became panic-stricken, and fled some time ago to Niagara, where, on the Canadian side, he is said to be renewing the attempt to establish the system of "complex marriage," which the very victims of the system became enlightened and strong enough to destroy in New York. This event in the Oneida Community is new and effective testimony to monogamous marriage as the system which the experience of the human race has proved to be soundest and best.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

GENERATION AND DEGENERATION IN RELIGION.

A Discourse delivered before the First Congregational Society, New Bedford, Mass., June 20, 1880.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

I propose to speak this morning on the two antagonistic processes of growth and degeneration in religion, and with special reference to our own time.

We are apt to speak of the present age as a "transition-period" in human history; as if that phrase would account for much of the unrest and uncertainty, the sense of incompleteness, and the vague apprehensions concerning a safe connection between past and future phases of faith, which to so large extent pervade and perplex modern society. Yet I suspect that every age is to itself more or less a "transition-period"; for there is never a time when the human race, since it began a career of conscious historical development, has been absolutely in a state of stagnation. Even what are called the Dark Ages, though, compared with the previous mental condition of mankind in Southern Europe, quite fittingly styled "Dark," yet, historians are now agreed, were not so wholly void of light, not so absolutely passive and dead, as has been popularly supposed. They marked, in fact, a long transition-period between the overthrow and decay of the old civilizations of Greece and Rome with their religious faiths and the rise of modern civilization with the Protestant form of Christianity. And it has become easy now to trace, under the more accurate investigations of modern historical methods, along with the processes of degeneration and decay that were going on, the processes of life which were also there in operation,—processes deep under the soil and in the darkness, but which came finally to the surface and the light in the Renaissance and the consequent new civilization with its essentially new religion. Deep in the dark, we can now see that thoughts were astir, that sentiments were kindling, that the seeds of ideas were slowly germinating, sometimes in monasteries, sometimes in the breasts of solitary philosophers, sometimes in royal minds,—that thoughts, sentiments, ideas, through wide reaches of territory and different nationalities, and the product of a variety of old faiths, were beginning to stir with vitality, and were preparing the way for the great Reformation, political, social, mental as well as religious, which came in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

So, too, and in not an entirely different way, the era of the advent of Christianity was a transition-period, and not such a sharp, absolute beginning of a new religion as is commonly believed. Old forms of faith, old civilizations and philosophies, old nationalities, were then, too, going to seed; and they were scattering their seeds far and wide. And from these seeds, as well as from the seeds of newer sentiments and thoughts which in the new and more mobile conditions of society were generated, sprang and slowly grew the new faith; and it was many years, centuries in fact, after its vitality and advent were apparent, before it brought forth the products of institutions, creeds, a sacred literature and tradition, which marked and named it as an organic, specific religion and church.

We might look again for illustration at the political history of almost any nation at any time. If it be a young and growing nation, full of fresh blood and vigor, then it is clearly in the stage of youth-transition from the era of birth to the era of maturity. If it be at the supreme height of greatness and power, as were Persia, Greece, Rome, at certain epochs in their history, so that no possible new achievement can destiny crown it with under its actual conditions of existence, then can a keen historical eye detect already, amid its luscious, stagnant ripeness, the taint of a decay that surely marks it for the grave in which so many nations have been buried, unless, by the graft of some fresh and healthier life upon it, it shall catch the electric vitality of a new purpose, and begin the growth of a new career. Italy, Germany, France (the latter as yet not quite so certainly), illustrate in their recent history the truth of this latter principle, —the arrest of the decay that follows naturally the completed maturity of national life, by the graft of a new and more invigorating political purpose. So nations, like individuals, are sometimes regenerated. Russia, and possibly England, to-day appear to have reached that ripeness in one stage of their national existence, from which decay is inevitable, unless they shall be touched with the magic wand of some new idea, which shall transform their internal economies, give larger individual opportunity, and so be to them the elixir of a new era of national life. Turkey is sinking to her national dissolution, apparently already past help, either external or internal. Greece is getting ready for a resurrection. But all the nations, whatever their condition or stage of national existence, are and have always been in a transition-period. They are and have always been either passing to something better or something worse; or if any seem to have absolutely stopped on the way, to have fully matured, so that no further growth or progress or ripening is possible with them, then that stage of stoppage of growth, or stagnation of the vital processes which bring increment and richness, is the pretty sure precursor of decay and death. The truth is, the collective life of human society, in whatever phase we view it, is, like the individual human being, a vital developing organism: and hence to be in a state of transition, to be passing from one stage or phase of vital activity to another that is higher and completer, is its normal healthy condition.

The only difference between periods, in regard to this matter of transition, is a comparative, not an absolute one,—a difference only of greater or less rapidity in the processes of change. In some eras, we are able to see the changes, so marked and conspicuous are they; and these we are apt to call specially transition-periods. In other times, the changes are so slow and obscure that the lifetime of an individual may not be able to measure them, or take any note of them, and these we are apt to call stable periods, and somehow to think them safer than the others; and yet they may not be safer in reality.

In our own time, it is evident, the changes are very swift and preëminently marked. There is hardly a subject, political, economical, social, religious, on which any conclusion regarded as sound and stable in the past, is not called in question to-day. The most venerable traditions are subjected to the scrutiny of an historical investigation that shows them no sympathetic mercy. The holiest and most ancient faiths are summoned to the bar of reason, to show cause why they should not be put to death as superstitions. Sacred books that have come down out of the dim mysterious past with the alleged stamp and seal of the special hand of God upon them, and that have become really sacred by the personal associations of domestic memories and human tenderness which have gathered about them, are taken down from their place of authority, brought under the same process of literary and rational criticism as are the most recent issues of the printing-press, classified as human productions, and put on the shelf side by side with the rest of the class. Science penetrates with its formulas for the generalization of knowledge into all the arcana of nature and man, and even into the Holy of holies of the Most High. In short, there is not a belief, nor institution, nor custom, nor law, nor opinion, nor intuition, with whatever lineage of high ancestry behind it, that is not liable at any moment to be dragged from its once reverently guarded enclosure, and confronted face to face with reason, with the demand that it give a good reason for its existence. Even the very basis of the moral law, and the origin and validity of conscience, are questioned; and social ethics as well as religious sentiment and faith are going a-begging for some philosophical theory that shall vindicate their right to be.

Nor as yet do any very clear intimations appear when and how this period of transition is to cease. At least, the intimations are not as yet grasped and understood by a sufficient number of leading minds to give to such minds a determining power in settling the future of institutions and beliefs. It is evident that at present the processes of generation and degeneration, with regard to religion especially, are both going on together, with a good deal more of apparent activity, however, in the latter than in the former. Few will venture to prophesy what is coming. More apprehend the worse. Among these various commingled and confused elements which are held by modern thought in solution, not many persons see as yet any tendency to precipitation into a solid substance, capable of furnishing a safe platform for the feet which have wandered from the old landmarks or from beneath which the old foundations of faith are slipping away. All the religions and all the sects are in this state of flux. Even the Roman Catholic Church, anchored though it be by the solid continent of institutions nearly two thousand years old, is yet partially afloat and dissolving. It, too, has its two parties, the fixed and the movable. All the leading religions—the Hebrew, the Christian, the Mohammedan, the Hindu, the Confucian—have been breeding in the last fifty years a race of souls too large or too free to stay within them. They all have their ex-members or those just ready to step out. And all the denominations are in commotion, a part of the membership going backward, a part forward, and a part trying in vain to stand still between the two parties.

As specimens of the confusion that exists in the religious realm, note a few facts of recent date; trifles that you may pluck any day out of the air, but which are the straws telling that the theological wind bloweth where it listeth. One fact is that you may hear in several of the Protestant sects, even those called Evangelical, all the faiths preached, and a good many of the non-faiths. Eternal punishment for a few, eternal punishment for many, the annihilation of the wicked, the ultimate restoration of all,—you may hear all these phases of the doctrine of retribution preached in different pulpits of the same denomination. You will hear likewise different views of the nature and mission of Christ, different views of the doctrine of the atonement and of the inspiration of the Bible, in several of the Evangelical sects that profess to have one uniform creed. You go into a Quaker meeting; and, if you have not been there of late or heard what is going on in that staid and sober body, you expect the quaint impressiveness of the old silence, to be broken only by the movement of the Spirit. But no. The performance of speech begins before the congregation is fairly assembled; and Scripture reading, with explanatory exposition, prayer, perhaps even singing, sermon, exhortation, and closing prayer follow in regular and close sequence, according evidently to previous arrangement among the speakers. A distinguished Professor in the Free (that is, Presbyterian) Church of Scotland has been on ecclesiastical trial for several years for heresy. The heresy consisted in his having, in an elaborate essay on the Book of Deuteronomy, taken the ground that the book, contrary to its purport, was not contemporary with Moses, but very much later, and that it was not therefore in all respects to be regarded as authentic history. The trial has had varying fortunes, pro and con, chiefly on technical grounds; but finally it has been closed (until some new charge shall reopen the controversy) by the decision,—reached, however, only by a majority of seven in a vote of nearly six hundred,—that the Professor should retain his chair and his pulpit, but be "admonished" by the Presbytery to be more careful in the future to express his views so as to avoid being misunderstood; an admonition which seems to have been needed, since the Professor claims that, though the evidence has clearly led him to the conclusion that the book is post-Mosaic, and therefore not wholly authentic, he yet has not intended to say anything against the Presbyterian doctrine of its special divine inspiration, in which doctrine he still professes to believe! Here, besides a specimen of the theological confusion of the time, is food for a lesson in intellectual integrity. In our own country, again, a so-called Christian land, the public lecturer who has had the last few years the greatest financial success, is an avowed antagonist to all the churches and all the creeds and all the old faiths in sacred books and divine revelations, and makes his religious disbeliefs the subject of his lectures. Yet ministers in Evangelical pulpits go to hear him, enjoy hearing him, and shake hands with him on the platform after the lecture.

Now, what do such facts as these indicate? And many more might be found similar to them, and in the Liberal sects (though they do not have so much significance there) as well as in the Evangelical sects. I know, indeed, of no denomination whose boundary line is more hopelessly confused than the Unitarian; a condition of things that would be all right, if it were not for the fact that they have tried to draw a line somewhere,—attempting to draw it between the man who is willing to call himself a Christian and the man who does not so call himself. But what do such facts, wherever found, indicate? Clearly this for one thing: that the old rigorous lines that once divided the sects apart from each other by their beliefs are vanishing away. And more than this. They indicate that the lines which have rigidly divided belief from disbelief are getting confused and obliterated. In fine, they indicate that religious belief as such—what has been known as religious belief in the past, and clung to as the sheet-anchor of all man's hopes and the sole pledge of his welfare in the future world—is in process of degeneration. And it is no evidence against this statement to affirm that the Church as a whole is prosperous, that even those special institutions and administrations of religion which grew directly out of certain religious beliefs that are now vanishing away are still in active operation. The augurs in Rome went about the streets on their solemn office, laughing in the sleeve at each other as they met, long after the religious belief which appointed their service had died out from all the intelligent classes of the population. This insincere tenacity of the forms of religion is indeed one of the saddest proofs of the decay of belief; and there is not a little of it in our own day.

Digitized by Google

In addition to this mental insincerity, it is another evil result of this degeneration of religious belief that the churches are compelled to self-maintenance on a much less wholesome and invigorating diet. In the days a century ago when the old creeds were believed devoutly and fully, and even Calvinism with all its logical and horrible rigor was preached without flinching, there was a robust virility in the New England pulpit which stimulated intellectual activity in the pews, and furnished a discipline in logical thought that sharpened the wits of a whole parish. It was a severe ordeal, but the result was a mental masculinity in religion, which secretly fostered independent thinking and made strong character; and the after-results came in the patriots and soldiers of the Revolution, and in the energy that has cut down the wilderness and stretched a row of civilized, self-governing commonwealths across the continent from New England to the Pacific. Instead of these virile demands for thought and logic, will be found largely in the pulpit to-day appeals to sentiment. Christ's goodness and power to save are talked about, and people are urged emotionally to come to him, and find all their troubles removed; but we seldom hear any logical argument, such as the pulpits used to ring with, to prove the doctrinal points which must be believed in, to make him an efficacious Saviour. Evangelists of the Christian Associations are instructed to-day not to argue with an unbeliever, but to throw their arms about him and show him how they love him. Give me Calvinism, pure and unadulterated, with its stern appeal to logic, rather than this gushing sentimentalism, which tries to smuggle its converts into heaven, past the gates of their own reason, by the artifice of its whimpering tears! Under the influence of this degeneration of religious belief, and this consequent loss of intellectual treatment of religious themes, the churches, instead of places where people are to be mentally instructed in the saving doctrines of faith, are fast becoming social clubs. Sensationalism in the pulpit, the latest worldly fashions flaring in the pews,—these are among the modern dominant conditions of church-success. Sunday-school concerts, musical entertainments, strawberry festivals, lawn parties,—something weekly, and perhaps two or three nights in the week, to keep the church in the people's thought and make it the centre of their social attractions,—these are the methods now resorted to for filling pews and the church pocket-book. On some of them our grandfathers would have looked as the instigation of the evil one. Yet they are not for that reason wrong; and I only speak of them as indicating the change that has come in the internal policy and life of churches, since the substitution of sentiment and social satisfaction as the church bond, instead of the old creed with its five or thirty-nine articles, every one of them a problem for the intellect to settle. Such methods are wrong only, or chiefly, in that they slur over the intellectual side of religion, while they minister to its more subordinate wants. They furnish milk for babes, strawberries for young men and young women, but little meat for strong men; and thus they are in danger of doing irreparable harm to the religion of the future, by separating it from that alone which can keep it abreast with the age and vindicate its right as a necessary factor in the world's best life,—namely, rational thought. The church may flourish for a time on sentiment, its pews may be filled by its deftly advertised social entertainments; but only the power of thought can save it as a dominant instrumentality toward the higher civilization of the coming century. The final test of its success is not numbers, but the awakening of truer thinking and the inspiring of nobler character.

But amid this confusion of doctrines, this loss, so to speak, of the intellectual sense in religion, this confounding and obliteration of denominational lines, this sickening effeminacy of sentiment, this fevered strain after excitement and social entertainment, this reactionary movement, often running to the excess of theatrical and spectacular display, against the proprieties and dignities of the old modes of parish administration,—amid it all, may we not at least descry the generation of nobler forces that are in time to bring a worthier and more satisfying expression of religion? I believe that we can.

And, first, we may note the place that is beginning to be demanded for reason in religion. The demand is now largely outside of the Church: in the Church, it is as yet mostly ignored in the wasteful effusion of sentiment. But it is beginning to be heard even there; and the wise are coming to see that in no other way than by giving reason full hearing can that manly virileness be brought back to the public administrations of religion which shall make it important for men and women of cultivated intelligence and native intellectual strength to give them their countenance and support. Something must come to take the place of the religious beliefs which are surely vanishing. Sentiment cannot do it; social festivals cannot do it; theatrical demonstrations cannot do it, either in church-parlors, or pulpits. These beliefs, when vital, were an appeal to thought, and satisfied man's mental nature; and nothing can take their place, that does not equally demand and satisfy thought.

Now there is a kind of knowledge on religious problems which Science is unfolding and constantly extending, that is precisely adapted to perform this service, and will perform it, I believe, in the church of the future. It is knowledge concerning nature and man; knowledge of their relation to each other's being, and to the primal source of life, or unity of being, in which both are included. It is knowledge of the modes in which the mysterious vital cause of all things is manifested in the world of phenomena. It is knowledge of Power as revealed in the law, order, beauty, sequence, abounding life and energy of this material nature around, on whose bosom we live and draw our physical sustenance. It is knowledge of the same power and life coming into human history, as evidenced in the advancing intelligence and growing civilizations, and better moral order and higher ideals of happiness, which have marked the progress of the human race on this planet. It is knowledge of the various religions of man, as honest though often short-sighted attempts to express this human relation to a higher than human parentage and protectorship, and as linked together by a common ancestry and kinship to the common possession of the substance of the same ideas and sympathies and aspirations. In a word, it is knowledge of Divine Power, not as an irruption into the world of nature and humanity, but as the constantly pervading and vitalizing energy that each instant sustains and gives worthy law and aim and purpose to the being of both.

Again, amid all the confusion of the sects and the creeds, we descry, I think, a tendency to make more account of character as an element of religion,—as indeed the sum and substance of it, or the final product which all means and methods are to keep in view. This, however, is so constantly the theme of my discourses that I need not enlarge upon it to-day. When the mental force, the logical acumen, the elaborate argument which the pulpit once brought to bear upon the pews in behalf of the creed, shall be wholly released from this service and be put to use for the production of sound conduct and character,—in behalf, for instance, of integrity in business, justice in politics, kindness, benevolence, purity, temperance, magnanimity in daily life, noble living of every sort,—then will one of the safest and most durable planks be laid in the platform of the coming church; and one, too, for which we can find ample authority, if that be required, in all the Scriptures of all the faiths.

And, finally, we may descry signs that the coming religion is to be one more devoted to active deeds of humanity. All sects are beginning to work more efficiently in this direction. Some of the very efforts of which I have spoken, perhaps rather depreciatingly,—those for more social life in the churches,—are tentative experiments toward this end. They recognize, at least, the rights of enjoyment in religion, the needs of recreation and amusement; but they have not always been chosen judiciously, and have yet to be greatly amended, and their very purpose indeed, to a great extent, revolutionized. They are now too much adapted to the exclusive object of giving the membership of the church a good time, and of thereby baiting outsiders into the church to swell its numbers and its prosperity. But the more pressing object, and that which must enlist the full sympathies and the supreme devotion of the church that is to be, is to reach that vast multitude which is needing help outside of all churches; and, further, to carry the benefit to them without awakening any suspicion, or giving ground for any suspicion, that they are to be entrapped under any ecclesiastical cover. Not the entertainment of "my" church particularly, not to bless "my" church, but to carry some blessing to that outlying and lowlying portion of humanity which has not an opportunity to go to any church, or even as yet so much as an aspiration to go to any, or for any kind of noble living,—that must be the motive. The membership of the church must learn self-sacrifice for the good of the world outside the church. There are wrongs to be righted, rights to be vindicated, wretchedness to be alleviated, ignorance to be enlightened, suffering to be soothed, poverty to be lifted out of its dread necessities, oppressions and cruelties and vices, body-killing and soul-killing, to be fought against and overcome. There are vast sections of humanity to be lifted up out of their gross ignorance to the very capacity of an intelligent thought, out of their degradation and brutality to the very condition of a spiritual aspiration, out of their moral obliquity and obscuration of conscience to the very possibility of a sense of moral obligation. To meet with any adequate remedy these deep-seated disorders, not charity alone is needed, not alone the kind heart and willing hand, but the wise head, the well-grounded knowledge, the accurate adjustment of means to ends. Benevolence, working hand in hand with Social Science, is needed; working not only for alleviation, but for a cure, by searching out and eradicating the causes whence so many social evils spring.

The church that sets itself resolutely to this task of educating and humanizing humanity, and accomplishes the most work in the practical solution of the problem of evil in its own neighborhood, will, other things being equal, distance all competitors in winning in the coming century the genuine prizes of religious leadership. It may have no faith in the Hebrew story of the Garden of Eden six thousand years ago, and it may have little to say about saving the souls of men from torments in a future world; but it will give evidence of a better faith, by the fact of doing its utmost to make a paradise in human society here on earth and now. And such a church, working for the present practical improvement of human society, and giving full liberty to human reason, and aiming at soundness of personal character as the one essential condition of salvation whether here or hereafter,—such a church, with its trinity of reason, character, brotherhood, will be indeed a church of humanity; but, and because a church of humanity, it will be also a living church of the living God.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF RELIGION AS ILLUSTRATED IN THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT. By P. Le Page Renouf. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 743 and 745 Broadway. 1880.

This book by Renouf, on the Religion of Ancient Egypt, which the Scribners have wisely reprinted for American readers, consists of the lectures given by the author in London last year on the "Hibbert Foundation." A few weeks ago, we noticed here the English Conferences of Renan, which were lectures on the relations of the Roman Empire to primitive Christianity, given this year under the same auspices; and the two books show to what broad and valuable uses the Hibbert endowment is being put. Renouf's book, though perhaps less brilliant and less readable by great numbers of people than Renan's, is an equally valuable contribution to the literature of comparative theology.

Egypt holds, indeed, in the history of religious development, whether we consider the undoubted antiquity and genuineness of its records or the intelligence of the people who made them, a supreme place. Three thousand years before the Christian era, it had a civilization which, in some respects, was not surpassed by the splendid civilizations of Greece and Rome. The relation of the people who founded and for a long series of centuries perpetuated that civilization, to other primitive peoples in the dim morning of human history, is one of the most interesting and pregnant questions at present in the whole field of archæological investigation. That in the purest days of their faith, they were monotheists, is plain. That they had a standard of morality which, without appearing to disadvantage, can be placed side by side with the moral code of the Hebrews, if not, indeed, with that of Christianity, is equally plain. One of their texts, put into the mouth of Supreme Being, says, "I am yesterday, I am to-day, I am to-morrow," which corresponds with the Hebrew's "Thou wast, and art, and art to come." In the following hymn, we can detect the resemblance, if not the close kindred, to some of the Hebrew hymns of worship, as well as their anthropomorphic ideas of Jehovah: "O God, architect of the world, thou art without a father, begotten by thy own becoming; thou art without a mother, being born through repetition of thyself. Thou drivest away the darkness by the beams of thine eyes. . . . It is by thine own strength that thou movest; thou art raised up by the might of thine own arms. Thou weighest upon thyself, kept firm by the mystery which is in thee. The warning of thy voice is in the cloud; thy breath is on the mountain-tops. . . . Heaven and earth obey the commands which thou hast given; they travel by the road which thou hast laid down for them; they transgress not the path which thou hast prescribed to them and which thou hast opened to them. Thou restest, and it is night. When thine eyes shine forth, we are illuminated. . . . Oh, let us give glory to the God who hath raised up the sky, and who causeth his disk to float over the bosom of the heavens, who hath made the gods and men and all their generations, who hath made all lands and countries and the great sea, in his name of 'Let-the-earth-be!' "

Digitized by Google

Notwithstanding the resemblance and sometimes even identity of thought and expression, M. Renouf does not think the Hebrews borrowed from the Egyptians, but that the same things originated independently among both peoples.

Another hymn, written, it is stated, for the harp, and applied to the worship of the Nile, runs thus: "Bringer of food! Great lord of provisions, creator of all good things! Lord of terrors and of chiefest joys! all are combined in him. He produceth for the oxen, providing victims for every god. He filleth the granaries, enricheth the store-houses; he careth for the state of the poor. He causeth growth to fulfil all desires: he never wearies of it. He maketh his might a buckler. He is not graven in marble, as an image bearing the double crown. He is not beheld; he has neither ministrant nor offerings: he is not adored in sanctuaries; his abode is not known; no shrine of his is found with painted figures. There is no building that can contain him. . . . Unknown is his name in heaven. He doth not manifest his forms. Vain are all representations!"

There are numerous hymns that show that this Supreme One was conceived as paternal and compassionate, especially such as were addressed to him under the name Amon; for example, the following: "Hail to thee, Lord of law, whose shrine is hidden, . . . maker of men, giving them life, listening to the poor who is in distress, gentle of heart when one cries to him, deliverer of the timid man from the violent, judging the poor, the poor and the oppressed! Lord of wisdom, whose precepts are wise, at whose pleasure the Nile overflows; Lord of mercy, most loving, at whose coming men live; opener of every eye, proceeding from the firmament, causer of pleasure and light!"

Corresponding to this character attributed to the Supreme Power of the universe, the most ancient of the Egyptian writings lay down ethical commands for mankind, which M. Renouf thus sums up: "These books inculcate the study of wisdom, the duty to parents and superiors, respect for property, the advantages of charitableness, peaceableness, and content, of liberality, humility, chastity, and sobriety, of truthfulness and justice; and they show the wickedness and folly of disobedience, strife, arrogance, and pride, of slothfulness, intemperance, unchastity, and other vices."

The story of the degradation of such a faith as this to the condition of a corrupt and an insincere idolatry, such as existed in Egypt in the early Christian centuries, would be a most interesting and instructive narrative, if we could by any means recover it. But the hope of such a thing seems almost in vain, as probably wholly in vain is the hope that we shall ever be able to discover the steps by which this remarkable people climbed to their eminence of moral and religious perception. Certain it is that not centuries merely, but decades of centuries, were required for either process. We commend M. Renouf's book to all who wish to learn what is now known about the religion of ancient Egypt.

"Unity Clubs," or Mutual Improvement Societies in Town and Church. By Mary E. Beals. Single copies, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents. Unity: 75 Madison Street, Chicago, Ill. 1880.

This little pamphlet of twenty-one pages is issued as No. 2 of Unity Leaflets. The matter came originally in the form of a report read at a meeting of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society. But it contains nothing sectarian or even, in any narrow, technical sense, religious. Liberals of any class, whether living in the city or country, may find some excellent hints here with regard to organizing for mutual improvement or for public benefit. Two types of the club are given: "(1) The club for the individual culture or amusement of its members; (2) The club for the improvement and aid of town or city enterprises, either by raising money for the support of different charities, or the introduction of new schemes of improvement for the city population at large." Of each of these types, an illustration is furnished by a sketch of what has been actually attempted and successfully achieved; Janesville, Wis., offering an example of the first kind, and the city of Cincinnati one of the second. Practical suggestions are given by the writer for people who want to know how to begin such organizations, and a good deal of other useful information on the subject. We commend the Leaflet to all people who, now that the vacation season is over, are beginning to ask, "How can we set to work to do something better than we have yet done for the mental and moral improvement of ourselves and neighbors?"

Immortality, and our Employments Hereafter: With what a Hundred Spirits, Good and Evil, say of their Dwelling-places. By J. M. Peebles, M.D. 8vo, pp. 296. Boston: Colby & Rich, Publishers, 9 Montgomery Place. 1880.

This volume undertakes to describe, through the utterances of certain "mediums," the future homes, dwelling-places, occupations, features, dresses, marriages, journeys, communication with mortals, angels, and planetary spirits, and the manners and customs in detail, of deceased human beings. To give a single specimen of these details, the personal home of the martyr Giordano Bruno is said to be known as "Balmy Cot," at the foot of "Chastity Hill," in "Pure Love City," near "Sunshine River," which falls into "Angel Lake." Giordano Bruno informs us, among other things, that when he develops higher in the golden future he shall leave this home, where his next successor will be Hugh Latimer, who is now a devoted student in "Curiosity Museum."

The author seems to accept all these statements as perfectly trustworthy, and seems not to be aware, either for himself or his readers, that things intrinsically improbable demand minuteness, accuracy, and fulness of evidence, in proportion to their improbability.

The Vote Map, as it is designated, of the Congressional Districts of the United States, prepared by Mr. F. B. Perkins, and issued by James R. Osgood & Co. of this city, will be found a very ingenious and serviceable appliance at this time. It is designed to show the strength of the respective political parties in every Congressional District, State, and Territory of the country. This is done by a system of colored bars of one inch long for each twenty-five thousand votes, or one twenty-fifth of an inch for a thousand. The bars are colored according to the parties for which they stand. The red indicate Republican, the blue Democrat, while white is adopted for the various third parties. Accompanying marginal tables give in figures the exact vote in each District during the election of 1878, in every State and Territory of the Union. For those who are active participants in the present campaign, or are specially interested in politics, as well as for the intelligent citizen in general, this map cannot fail to prove very desirable.

The Atlantic Monthly for September lies on our table. Its contents so far as read and examined appear to be of more than average excellence. They are in the following order: "The Stillwater Tragedy," XXIII.–XXVIII. (which concludes the story), Thomas Bailey Aldrich; "Twoscore and Ten," a poem by J. T. Trowbridge; "Sir Walter Scott," Thomas Sergeant Perry; "Political Responsibility of the Individual," R. R. Bowker; "The Perpetuity of Song," a poem, James T. Fields; "Au Sérieux," Ellen W. Olney; "Unaware," a poem, Maurice Thompson; "Intimate Life of a Noble German Family," Part I.; "Woman in Organization," Kate Gannett Wells; "Each Side the Bridge," a Dutch painting (a poem), Alfred B. Street; "Reminiscences of Washington," VI.; "The Harrison Administration, 1841"; "Mrs. McWilliams and the Lightning," Mark Twain; "West Wind," a poem, Celia Thaxter; "Oxford and Cambridge," Richard Grant White; "Progress of the Presidential Canvass"; "Such Stuff as Dreams are made of"; "Music"; "Recent American Fiction"; "Goldwin Smith's Cowper"; "Mr. White's Books"; "The Contributors' Club."

MR. WEISS ON IMMORTALITY AND EVOLUTION.

To the Editor of the Free Religious Index:—

Is not this passage from John Weiss' The Immortal Life worthy of a place in the Social Science columns of the Index? "We want to teach society how to be more humane, and to make its inevitable distinctions opportunities for harmonic combinations, picked from the bottom to the top of the scale; we want, for instance, to engage the wisest brains to contrive, upon the basis of the law of coöperation, an adjustment of labor and capital. The law might have been suspected, if it were not already discovered. Like other laws, it dwells with men, and waits to be put to service. It will be a sublime day for religion, that shall dawn over a whole republic farmed, mined, forged, riveted, bridged, and aqueducted, shoed, clothed, and tinkered by coöperation." (p. 213.) And again: "Who is the statesman ambitious to put a late posterity into his fame, to outlast with it his country's monuments of stone and brass? Let him descend not lower in politics than some device to persuade the forces of the world to work in amity, so that tyranny shall be a mutual blunder, and concert a mutual success. . . . We want some system that shall press monopolies to find themselves unprofitable, at the same time that it checks unscrupulous competition." (p. 214.) And questions of this sort Mr. Weiss would not have allowed to be alien to the main thought of his book. It is the worth, the value of man, which on any other than sentimental grounds makes us even raise the question of immortality. Is there any such worth in selfishness and greed as to make it a matter of concern whether they survive the death of the body or not? And, that life may be immortal, must it not take hold of some principles worthy of immortality,—principles essential to the integrity and harmony of any society, whether here or hereafter? If so, if there is a subtle moral environment, as Mr. Weiss hints, according as we meet or fail to meet whose demands our souls live or die, then is our concern for justice and humanity, our resolute loyalty to them, though in connection with the humblest and most material ends of life, not merely suggestive of immortality, but that out of which alone any worthy immortality can come.

A word as to a question of language, though possibly involving clearness or obscurity of thought. Mr. Wasson in his preface speaks of Mr. Weiss as "a decided evolutionist"; and in your notice (of July 1) you say, "He accepted the theory of evolution." Does not "evolution" involve the notion of a strict continuity between the phenomena of one period of the world and those of the preceding? Evolutionists are not bound to deny that there are actually gaps in the evidence,—e.g., as to the descent of man from the animal creation; but they are bound to say that, if all the facts were known (which yet may never be), their theory would be confirmed. But Mr. Weiss says, "That [i.e., the consciousness of right and wrong] is an intrusion into the animal line, and not an evolution from it." (p. 37.) On p. 129, he exhibits some appreciation of evolution-ethics, but in his closing chapter urges strong considerations against its sufficiency, saying, "Logically [i.e., according to the empirical method], that average is insurmountable; but practically it is constantly surmounted, and society is compelled to assume a higher average by men of a forlorn hope, who propose a conception of religion, of worship, of human rights and happiness, which nowhere exists, and which could not therefore be suggested by empirical sensations." (p. 221.) And, again, he speaks of "a latent tendency of conscience to repudiate inheritance and every experience of utility, to fly in its face with a forecast of a transcendental utility that supplies the world with its redeemers," etc. (p. 226.) In another connection, he plainly says, "The double creature has arrived, by ascent from the animal and descent from the spiritual." (p. 46.) The essential idea of creation is, then, one which Mr. Weiss seems to have believed in, and the word occurs frequently in his pages; yet there is no idea (or word) which is more repugnant to a genuine evolutionist, involving as it does a radical change in his general method of thought,—namely, a concession that phenomena are not altogether to be explained by causes of their own order, i.e., phenomena, but in part, at least, by ideal or transcendental causes. If we are going to be accurate in our use of words with religious associations, shall we not also in the use of philosophical terms? W. M. S.

Digitized by Google

Sept. 5, 1880.

LIBERAL ORTHODOXY IN BROOKLYN.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

Rev. George C. Miln has been for some years the pastor of the East (Trinitarian) Congregational Church in our city. His affiliation has been with the more liberal wing of the Congregational body. He preaches to a society considerable in numbers, and evidently in sympathy, generally, with his views.

During the last season, he preached a series of sermons upon theological questions, the opening discourse of the series, which lies before me, "printed for the Church," being entitled "Shifting Lights, or Recent Changes in Theological Belief." It is this sermon which, in my last letter, I characterized as "the most noteworthy sermon ever preached in an Orthodox pulpit in Brooklyn." After re-reading, I am not inclined to qualify that statement. It is a sermon remarkable in many ways. Sentences could be culled from the discourses of Mr. Beecher, and others of our "Orthodox" preachers, perhaps equally emphatic upon every one of the points treated by Mr. Miln, but they would have to be chosen by a process of "natural selection," resulting in the "survival of the fittest."

Here, every word is frank, manly, and clear. There is no mistaking the meaning of the preacher, and there is no obscurity of language behind which to retreat in future explanations and apologies. Neither did Mr. Miln plant himself upon any alleged finality of belief beyond which he would decline to advance in the future. His outlook is progressive and hopeful. In an introductory note prefixed to this discourse, he says: "I cannot forego this opportunity of saying that the changes herein pointed out are, in my estimation, only prophetic of still greater changes in the near future,—changes, too, which will eventuate in clarifying human thought of divine things, and ennobling human nature."

This sermon is noteworthy also in its utter freedom from "damaged phraseology." The tone of "cant" is wholly absent from it. "Convinced as I am," says Mr. Miln, "that great and radical changes are constantly taking place, I cannot feel that it would be perfectly honorable for me to remain mute when asked to speak, or to continue the use of theologic phraseology out of which the very essence has evaporated."

Let us note the spirit in which he approaches his subject in a few of his introductory remarks:—

"There is a very wide divergence between the current theological beliefs of to-day and those of twenty-five years ago. . . . There is, with many, a very great difference between their conventional and their actual beliefs. . . . I believe that great numbers of the clergy to-day are restless beneath the restraint of dogmatic statements which no longer voice their sincere belief. . . . Recent theological discussion has been chiefly provoked by those outside the theological arena. Huxley, Spencer, the crusty Ruskin, the earnest and learned Darwin, as well as the sincere and painstaking John Tyndall, have acted the part of angels descending into the theological Bethesda, to stir its turpid if not stagnant waters! Thanks be to them, say I!"

He quotes and indorses the statement of a "New York journal of wide influence," that "the tables are turned upon the churches, and it is now in them that the real scepticism is chiefly found, whether it take the form of doubt of theological or evolutional creeds."

The first point of divergence from old beliefs which he notes is that "the current view of the divine character is a long way off from the view held in Orthodox circles twenty-five years ago." Instead of the "inexorable judge, . . . the features of whose face were stern, the tones of the voice judicial, and the light of whose eye was the flash of wrath," we have now held up the picture of a loving Father. "They are no longer sacrificing the Father in their attempt to exalt the Son."

He finds a no less striking divergence in the views now held concerning the doctrine of the Trinity. He quotes from the Athanasian creed, "So the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet there are not three Gods but one God," and comments thus: "Three times one is no longer three! . . . We are forbidden the privilege of recognizing the existence of three Persons of whose existence there is no possible doubt according to this statement itself. From any such view as this, there has been a decided departure. . . . The tri-personality of the divine nature is passed by as impossible in reason and unnecessary in faith. Men are willing to say that a whole may have three parts; but to affirm that each of these parts is a whole, and then say that these three are not three but one, is an idea to which the modern mind does not readily give hospitality."

In regard to past and present estimates of the Bible, he says: "An immense distance lies between that conception of inspiration which held that everything in the Bible is true and equally valuable because it is there and that discrimination which regards the truth of the Bible as inspired because it bears on its face the birthmarks of truth." He quotes Dean Stanley as saying that "the crude opinions which prevailed twenty years ago on the subject of inspiration have been so completely abandoned as to be hardly anywhere maintained by scholars. Of the eleven thousand English clergymen who set their hands to a declaration in favor of these crude notions fifteen years ago, probably there are not fifty who would do it again."

Doubtless, the progress of the new translation of the Bible, which has resulted in expunging entire and familiar passages as interpolations, and in the exposure of gross errors in the old translation, has done much toward giving the death-blow to the old notion of verbal inspiration. Surely, every liberal mind may give thanks that this long stride toward the principle of Free Religion—"Truth for authority, not authority for truth"—is being rapidly taken by the leaders of thought in all branches of the Christian Church.

Mr. Miln also finds that "the theory of the atonement as held to-day is widely different from the theories of the past. . . . The theory—shall I call it the physical theory?—of the atonement, which regards the work of Christ as the payment in physical pain of your debt and mine to God, is not so tenaciously held by any, and not at all by some. Salvation is moral and spiritual health, the harmony of man with God!"

Concluding with a notice of the great change which has taken place regarding future punishment, he says: "Men are now won by love. Penalty for sin is now held to be remedial in its end. The Kolasin Aionion —an age-long pruning—has for its end the ennoblement and purification of the pruned. In a word, it is believed by many that the doctrine of an everlasting hell side by side with an eternal heaven is a system of dualism which denies the sovereignty of God; and men now dare to believe in the divine sovereignty to the full."

"Your duty and mine," he concludes, "in view of these facts, is to keep our windows open toward the sky, that the light of heaven may flow in to enrich our lives. We may not at our own peril seek to stay the tide of thought. Progress demands a clear field and liberty. It must have it. It should have it. . . . Let us rejoice in all its changes. . . . If we refuse to do so, we shall be false to the traditions of our fathers, who made advances upon the thinking and convictions of their fathers,—false to all history, which is a record of continuous emergence from darkness into greater and greater light!"

The daily papers of yesterday intimate that Mr. Miln has resigned his pastorate "on account of changes in theological belief." His resignation is to be considered next Friday by his church. It is to be hoped that so frank and manly a teacher of religion may continue to speak the truth as he sees it from some free platform, wholly unhampered by the bondage of sect and creed. The world needs such men, and cannot afford to lose them. May we not hope to hear from Mr. Miln on the platform of Free Religion? J.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 8, 1880.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

NIRVANA.

HAIL, Nirvâna, sovereign, king!
Thou whose praises millions sing!

Light that, like a rising star,
Erst on Buddha shone from far!

Sun, beneath whose genial beams
All the smiling Orient gleams!

Toilers on the distant sea
Speak thy name on bended knee;

Toilers on the far-spread land
Hear it, and uncovered stand,—

Hear it not in fear and awe,
Forfeits of a broken law;

Broken in the ancient time,
Still imputed as a crime;

Not as conscious of offence,
But in love and confidence.

Nearer draws the close of life,
Nearer comes surcease of strife.

Nearer comes the day of rest,
In thy soothing presence blest.

When the final hour shall come,
Smooth the passage to the tomb;

Dissipate this earthly dream;
Bathe my soul in Lethe's stream,

Lethe's stream, whose waters bless
Mortals with forgetfulness!

As the infant sinks to rest,
Nestled on its mother's breast,

Let me on thy bosom lie,
Loved and only Deity!

Let me there a refuge find
From the motions of the mind;

From the strifes of men and brothers;
From a life all borne for others;

From night-vigils dark and lonely,
Shared with doubting demons only;

From the flames of passion's fire;
From the gnawings of desire;

From the tortures of despair;
From the black companion, care;

From the slumber couched with sorrow;
From the waking on the morrow.

What to me are pathways golden
In some heaven of legends olden,

Harps and crowns, and garish show,
Modelled on the life below?

Life, still life, however varied;
Still a burden to be carried.

Naught of this, Gautama, give,
If to share it is to live!

What to me are time-worn creeds;
Web of barbarous names and deeds,

Woven threads of childish story,
Far-descended, crude, and hoary,

Crimped to superstitious phases
In the infancy of races;

Born of fancies weird and elfish;
Nursing aspirations selfish;

Gilded with a specious learning;
Cankering life with futile yearning

For a destiny supernal?
Better, far, the rest eternal:

Rest untroubled, tranquil, deep,
Where no souls their vigils keep;

Rest in sleep that knows not waking,
Thirsting, hunger, or heart-breaking;

Where the pain to be shall cease,
In Nirvâna, perfect peace.

GEO. W. CHAPMAN.

MILWAUKEE, August, 1880.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 16, 1880.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

WE are sorry to learn of the increasing physical feebleness of Mrs. Lucretia Mott. She has reached, indeed, a great age, and for several years we have had no right to expect that her slender body could do the work of her ardent spirit much longer. But we have grown so accustomed to see in her the soul overcoming all weakness of the flesh that we had almost come to think that she was to be spared to us perpetually as pure spirit, which had transfigured the flesh into its own likeness. Not least among the valuable lessons of her long life has been this: that she has shown how little of body we actually need, if we will only use it aright, in order to do life's work well.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBESON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass.	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass.	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass	18.35
MRS. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass.	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo.	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00
Mrs. S. W. RATHBONE, Princeton, Mass.	5.00
FRANCIS SPRINGER, Columbus City, Iowa	10.00
DANA B. HUMPHREY, New Bedford, Mass.	25.00
ELIZABETH S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
JAMES W. BARTLETT, Dover, N.H. (10th assessment)	20.00
Miss S. E. DUNN, Dover, Mass	5.00
SETH HUNT, Springfield, Mass.	25.00
Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.	5.00
Mrs. BENJAMIN CUMMINGS, New Bedford, Mass., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock, and the same annually for 4 following years	50.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

BOSTON'S TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS.

Boston may be called one of the institutions of our country. She has been popularly supposed to furnish ideas to at least half the States of the Union. Some of the most momentous movements in our national history have certainly been born and nursed in her borders. She is sometimes sneered at for her literary pride, yet she is admired; is sometimes laughed at for her social reserve, yet is secretly honored; jokes are bandied on her claim to be the Athens of America, yet her opinion in all matters of culture is waited for.

And Boston is now becoming one of our antiquities. She is really growing venerable. On Friday of this week, she celebrates her two hundred and fiftieth birthday. And she will do it with the thoroughness, the good sense, the unstinted hospitality, the self-restrained enthusiasm, that are her habitual characteristics. Boston has reached the point where she is proud of her years. Two hundred and fifty years, to be sure, is not very old for a city. In Europe, it would be comparatively young. And in this country there are several cities and towns that are older. Even New York is older, though it may be doubted if many New Yorkers are aware of it. Manhattan Island was settled and had a governor several years before Boston was born. But we always think of New York with all the dapperness of youth. Apparently, she does not care when she was born. Her first settlers and all their ways and traditions were dead long ago. Present New Yorkers seem to have forgotten all about them, and live and act as if they themselves were the first occupants and governors of the island. But Boston forgets nothing. It would not much surprise us to learn that some of her first settlers are still living as active citizens, and will appear in the procession next Friday, and at the ballot-boxes at the coming Presidential election.

But Boston's two hundred and fifty years are full of a great history. No city of the Union has a greater. She is at once both conservative and radical. She is fond of the old, preserving it and revering it sometimes even when it is not the truest and best, yet she welcomes the new. No city has been quicker or bolder to champion new views of the demands of truth and justice. In the three great mental and moral movements of our country, she has stood among the foremost.

It may be doubted whether the Revolution would have come so soon by many years, if it had not been for Boston's conviction, pluck, unconquerable determination, and audacity. It was she that really nursed that great initial movement of our national life, and rocked its cradle; she that stood sponsor at its baptism in the blood of her best-born. She was magnificently radical then, and had the perfect courage of her convictions, yet in her most daring deeds showed the sobriety and staidness of her most conservative years.

Again, the anti-slavery idea found in Boston one of its earliest homes and best protectorates. At first, it was resisted and even mobbed; and yet it stayed. It had found strong friends, and had to be allowed to stay. Gradually, it came to be cherished, defended, adopted, and at last petted. Boston more than any other city was the head-quarters of the anti-slavery reform. Thence the abolition-sentiment went out in its moral struggle through the country, and to its triumph in the conflict of arms; and nobly again in that conflict did Boston defend its convictions with the valor of deeds.

But, prior to this, Boston had been the centre of another great reform, a theological and an ecclesiastical reform. It was the same spirit of liberty that nursed the Revolution and roused and fostered the anti-slavery movement which also, in the interest of the rights of the human mind, rebelled against the Calvinistic creeds of the old Puritan churches, and introduced a more rational theology and a freer form of church polity. The Unitarian movement, with its completing wave of Transcendentalism, had its source and chief strength in Boston.

In view of such a history, it would be interesting, and is logically in order, to inquire whether Boston, on its two hundred and fiftieth birthday, still holds its position of leadership in political, moral, and religious progress. On political and moral questions, it would not be difficult, perhaps, to make good the claim that Boston is in the van; that at least it has not yet lost the prestige of its old and honorable place. But, in matters of religion, we fear it must be admitted that the city has fallen into a reactionary era, and is not keeping its position as leader of the advance-guard. The best expression, in organization, of the most advanced religious views of our time, will probably not be found in Boston. Unitarianism barely holds its own here in the number of its churches; relatively to the increase of population does not at all hold its own. Nor do any other of the liberal denominations appear to be increasing. On the other hand, the Catholics, Episcopalians, Methodists, and Trinitarian Congregationalists have been making large gains.

Of Theodore Parker's grand work of fifteen years, so far as any organized representative of it is concerned, there remains a Hall indeed, erected to his memory (but laboring, we believe, yet under a mortgage), with a struggling society of almost invisible membership, compelled to grapple with the chronic question whether it is better to be or not to be. Of course we do not say that this is the whole result of Theodore Parker's work in Boston. That is one of the things which Boston has sent out through the country and around the globe. Yet we cannot help thinking that it would be more creditable to Boston's religious liberalism, and more in logical keeping with its history, if there were somewhat more of the results of Theodore Parker's work in visible, solid, organic, working shape in the limits of the city to-day. There are liberal and radical thinkers enough in Boston, but they seem to have sunk into indifference as to the spread of their views, and—what is worse—into scepticism as to there being any advance upon their views or any possible united organization for bringing them to bear constructively on the problems of society and life. After the birthday celebration is over, we would commend to these liberal and radical thinkers that they earnestly put to themselves the question, What kind of institution or society ought Boston to have, in the two hundred and fiftieth year of its existence, worthily to express the utmost advance of its religious thought and sustain its good repute of being at the same time the nursery of ideas and the conserver and organizer of principles?

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT has gone to New York, where he proposes to open, on the 20th of September, a private school for boys. He has secured, through the kindness of certain excellent friends, —who have interested themselves in his behalf, though heretofore strangers to him,—a most eligible school-room at 64 Madison Avenue. Several scholars are positively engaged, and more are expected. A peculiar feature of the school will be that it will be kept so small that all the pupils will come directly under Mr. Abbot's care, and the teaching be done wholly by himself. The special purpose is to fit boys for college, particularly for Harvard. Mr. Abbot is a born teacher. The gift for teaching is hereditary in his family, and he possesses it in a remarkable degree. He has already had experience in the kind of teaching he now assumes as a vocation, and always with the highest success. His scholars have gone into college thoroughly prepared. His methods of instruction awaken mental ambition even in dull minds, and the personal magnetism of his fine character draws his pupils to him by cords of strong affection and holds them under the purest of moral restraints. The vigorous battle he has fought in the theological field will doubtless for a time stand in his way in securing patronage. But we are sure that New York parents of broad culture, in whatever denomination, who have ample means to devote to the education of their children, will not be long in finding out that, if they would give their sons the very best mental and moral discipline in preparation for college, they cannot do better for them than to put them under Mr. Abbot's care.

Digitized by Google

THE New York Independent gives, we think, better law than some judges. It says:—

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has recently decided that if a man travels on Sunday, except for the purpose of going to or from church, he cannot recover damages for injuries which he may receive on the highway, owing to defective bridges or roads. If he were travelling to or from church, which is lawful, then he could recover such damages; but, travelling on Sunday contrary to law, he forfeits the right of such recovery in the event of injury by defective bridges or roads. This, with all due respect for the learned court, strikes us as not being good law. The traveller on Sunday in violation of law may be punished for his offence; but his offence ought not to excuse others for the non-performance of their legal duty. If it be the legal duty of a town or city to keep its roads and bridges in proper repair; and if, in the event of injury to the private citizen, by its omission to do so, a suit may be maintained for a recovery of damages, then we do not see why this duty and this right of recovery should not apply to Sunday, as well as to any other day. The fact that the traveller is violating a Sunday law should not withdraw from him the general protection of law, and surely cannot change the duty of a town to keep its roads in a good and safe condition for all travellers, and ought not to cancel its liability in any case, if it fails to do so. If a robber were to meet the Sunday traveller, and commit an assault and battery upon him, it would be a sorry excuse for his crime for the former to say that the latter was violating a Sunday law at the time of the assault and battery. The common-sense view of the case is to punish the Sunday traveller as the law directs, and hold all other parties responsible for their offences or omissions to perform their duty. The Sunday traveller, though an offender, is not outlawed.

THE speech of President Hayes, at the reunion of Ohio soldiers at Canton, elaborated the point on education made in his speech at Columbus, which we quoted at the time, and dealt rather more in facts and figures than the average of even the better class of political addresses. The President emphasized with especial force the importance of popular education to a country like ours, and presented some telling statistics upon this point. Owing to the neglect of education in the late slave-holding States, no less than four million persons of school age, and above that age, were growing up in 1879, unable to read and write; and there are more than a quarter of a million who will be unable to read their ballot at the approaching election. The latest available statistics show that in 1878 the total school population, white and colored, was 5,187,584, and that only 2,710,096 were, during that year, enrolled on the school-list; leaving 2,477,688, almost two and a half millions, of the young who are growing up without any provision for their education. The number of those in the Territory of New Mexico in 1870, of ten years old and upward, who could not read and write, was 52,220, or more than half of the population. The present school population is over 30,000, of whom but about one-sixth have their names on the school register. To the above estimate there may be added 200,000 Indians, almost all of whom are uncivilized, and for whom there is no other future than extinction or absorption into American citizenship.

The increase of our population by immigration from foreign countries is greater than ever before. Although a very large proportion of those who comprise this accession have been more or less educated in their native countries, there is a considerable number who have not shared in such privileges. It may be reasonably estimated that from twenty to twenty-five per cent. of this immigration belong to the latter class. It is quite probable that in the present decade we shall receive from abroad more than a million of people, of school age, and upward, who are unable to read in any language. When we reflect upon the important relation which education sustains to a republic, that intelligence is the essential guarantee of its stability and prosperity, we see that there is no greater interest in our keeping, nor end of more vital moment to the national welfare, than the advancement of education and the diffusion of enlightenment among the people. To this aim, Free Religion and freethought should lend all possible sympathy and support, since they thrive only in an atmosphere of intelligence. Superstition and dogma are the companions of ignorance.

"INSINCERITY IN THE PULPIT."

This is the title of an exceedingly readable paper by Rev. E. E. Hale in the September number of the North American Review, which most of our readers have doubtless already seen. Dr. Hale makes the sad confession that the modern pulpit is resting under public suspicion of more or less insincerity, which is growing more rather than less. He is apprehensive of the consequences. The only remedy he sees is for the preacher to speak out his honest conviction, fully and freely. "The danger for America," says he, "is that the pulpit shall be degraded even to a lower level, if the preachers do not bring and give the very best they have, know, and believe to the people. It may excuse me in conversation, from refraining to allude to the starvation in Libby Prison, that I am talking to a reconstructed rebel officer. But, when I am in the pulpit, it is not etiquette which is at issue. I am then to say what is, and I must not stop short. The whole tangle of authoritative creeds is, at the best, embarrassing. They lead a man to try to continue in a belief which he once thought he had. They give a fossil form to what should be pliant, elastic, and alive. But no matter what they do elsewhere, when the preacher ente s the pulpit, he is free, or he is nothing. He is then to say what he believes, not what he wishes to believe or thinks it would be well to believe. . . . The preacher is to go as far with his congregation as he has gone with himself." The italics are ours. Such language from Abbot or Adler, or indeed any Free Religionist, seems commonplace enough; but, coming from a man who is pastor of one of the most respectable Unitarian Churches in most respectable Boston, it excites no little surprise and delight.

But it was not so much this article as an editorial commentary on it which appeared in the Boston Sunday Herald, of Aug. 29, to which we wished to call especial attention. It is but just to say that the usual contributor of the religious editorials of that paper is off duty just now, and his wise and witty pen has fallen into other hands. "It must be conceded," says this evidently Orthodox critic, "that there is a growing conviction in the community of the inefficiency, if not the insincerity, of preaching. The preachers of the day do certainly say on Monday what they do not say on Sunday; they hold opinions in regard to the inspiration of the Bible and a hundred other points which they do not freely discuss before everybody." Which, no doubt, is all true. But, instead of rebuking them for their moral cowardice, he proceeds to justify them on the ground that lawyers and doctors keep the same "befitting silence" and "reserve of opinion," etc. Admitting they do, have preachers got so low that they must sneak behind the insincerity of lawyers and doctors to overlook their own? "The preacher is supposed to know what to teach when he is ordained," continues our critic. Yes, indeed, "supposed" to know; but, unless he is a natural-born idiot, he is quite certain in these times to modify his convictions more or less. The simple question is, Shall he confess to his people frankly his mental changes? It is not safe, urges this writer.

The idea "that the preacher must make a clean breast of his mind to his congregation, that he must fearlessly preach what is, whether or no, hit or miss"! Why, "if Dr. Hale were to try this upon his own or any other congregation, he would scatter it to the four winds in less than three months." Whether Dr. Hale is guilty of the insincerity here imputed to him, he only can answer for himself: but we believe that it is because the Christian pulpit has taken counsel of just such timid time-servers as his critic that they have justly fallen under the suspicion of "insincerity in the pulpit."

One great reason why Robert Ingersoll is so popular with the honest-thinking common people in this country is not merely because of his eloquence, wit, and humor, and his straight, hard hits at the fables and follies of Orthodox Christianity, but because people have confidence in his absolute sincerity. He hates with all his soul hypocrisy, humbug, and holy shams; and he says so squarely and manfully, and the amphitheatre rings with the plaudits of his admirers.

Sincerity! that is what the age is beginning to demand of the pulpit, or nothing. Unless the clergy can rise to this demand, can come forward and stand square abreast with the age, can make themselves felt as public educators, grappling manfully and mindfully the newest vital problems of life and society, giving the results of their research and reflection to their people without fear or favor, then the vocation of the preacher will rapidly degenerate to that of undertakers and grave-diggers of a dying faith. We say a "dying faith," for the old religion is dying in the best minds of the age. What care we that they point us to their massive churches and great congregations! A religion does not survive in stone and brick and mortar. It lives in the heart; and, if sincerity is not there, religion then is dead.

And we may add here that the same hateful "dry-rot" which so infects, according to Dr. Hale, the modern pulpit, is also committing fearful ravages among the pews. Look at our modern churches! Take the largest and wealthiest in any city. What is the congregation? Are they people of conviction? Are they earnest seekers for more light on the great problems of civilization, education, and social amelioration? Far from it. The Christian Church is no longer a body of earnest thinkers, sincere believers, as once it was, but is rapidly degenerating to a mere social club for the men and boys,—"Our set, you know,"—a fashionable and "dress" circle for the ladies, and a make-believe "worship" on Sunday, with the chief attraction an operatic accompaniment, including a "sacrifice" to charity and for nursing the children in a faith called "holy," but which perhaps not one first-class man in the congregation believes in When this is so, and to a very large extent it is so, is it any wonder that there is a rapidly growing feeling and conviction outside the Church, if not inside, that the Church, as a religious institution, is doomed, unless it be speedily baptized with the spirit of truth and truthfulness?

Digitized by Google

A grand "dress-parade" the Church may furnish on Sunday, but that is not religion. An occasion for social intercourse the Church may provide, but that, good as it is, is not religion. A patron of music and architecture the Church may be, but that is not religion. A provider of entertainment and amusement the Church may be, but that is not religion. A gossip-factory the Church may be, but that is not religion. A splendid opportunity for the mother to bring her blooming daughter out "in the market" the Church may offer, but that is not religion. If the Church, as an institution, is to live, it must stand for religion in the best sense of the word. Unless it does, it will surely go down before other competitors. For, as a "dress-parade," the opera and concert can outshine the Church. As a social club, the hundreds of "secret societies" in the community are clipping the wings of the Church. As a patron of music and art, the Church can no longer monopolize the honors; for special societies are everywhere springing up outside, devoted to this culture. As a provider of social entertainment and amusement, the Church can but poorly compete with special agencies in this line; while, in her chosen field as public almoner, the Church, at best, is but auxiliary to the State. She is making desperate efforts to stay her sinking fortunes by all these artificial props. But, one by one, they are weakening and giving way. The Church of the Future, if there is to be a Church of the Future, must rest on something besides musical, dramatic, or any other kind of social attraction and entertainment. It must rest on conviction, as it was first planted on conviction. It little matters how high she rears her shining steeples or how loudly she sounds her organ-notes, if insincerity is honey-combing her foundations, she will go down, and she ought to go down. We repeat, if the Church as a religious institution is to stand, she must teach and illustrate religion; and religion, in our opinion, means character; and, of character, the very heart and soul is sincerity. Rob a minister of that, rob a people of that, and they are rotten at the core, and little worth. If our churches are only to be saved at the sacrifice of the preacher's intellectual honesty, we care not how quickly the spiders weave their webs over the pulpit-cushions and the bats and hoot-owls take possession of the place emptied of that Holy Spirit.

"Scatter the congregation to the four winds in three months, if the preacher makes a clean breast of his mind to his congregation!" exclaims this critic of Mr. Hale. Be it so! Then the worst fate that can befall a congregation is not to be "scattered": a far worse than to be scattered is to incur the unpardonable sin of insincerity. If Truth scatters, Truth will bring together again on a higher moral plane, for a nobler purpose.

"Insincerity in the pulpit!" It trickles in the droppings of the sanctuary, overflows in the communion-cup, and runs out and poisons every channel of business life. A lie in the pulpit is a blood relation of the lie behind the counter, in store and shop and factory. The minister who palms off fictions for truths has no right to rebuke the merchant who sells fading colors for fast or shoddy for sound goods, or the operator who puts false rumors afloat or secretly waters his railroad stock. It is the same moral or rather immoral fibre running through society.

We grant that the minister's temptation to insincerity is simply tremendous. But the more merit, then, in resisting it. Let him be a man out of his pulpit, if he cannot be one in it. But a responsibility also rests upon his people. They should help him to be true, as he is trying to help them. Let them ask themselves: "Is our minister sincere? Is he trying faithfully to learn truth and duty, and to speak the one and do the other? Is he a man of intellectual and moral integrity?" If so, stand by him. This is the way the modern Church may make her ministers men of sincerity. Any other policy tends to corrupt them. Any other policy may perhaps fill a church, but it will be filled, not with serious believers, but largely, at least, with make-believers; not with earnest truth-seekers, but with shallow pleasure and "society" seekers. Any other policy may indeed fill the pulpits, but not with the highest type of men,—not with real truth-lovers and truth-seekers, not with grand prophets and intellectual leaders of the people; but it constantly tends to fill them with truckling time-servers, hypocrites, and social "goody-goodies," who have prostituted a high and holy office to the practice of a star-actor in a grand religious farce. Perish the pulpit, if it sinks to that! Demand sincerity there, or nothing. W. H. S.

THE SOCIAL SCIENTISTS AT SARATOGA.

The meeting of the Social Science Association, just held at Saratoga, if we may judge from the printed reports, was one of great interest.

A report upon the Kindergarten in Education, which appears to be pushing its way more and more into notice in this country, was submitted by Col. T. W. Higginson, at the opening session. It was maintained that Froebel's methods need many modifications, in order to adapt his system to American conditions and characteristics. Some difference of views was developed in the discussion that followed, as to the time when children should begin school. President Gregory, of the Illinois State University, claimed that children who were kept out of school until eight or nine years of age excelled those who began earlier. Col. Higginson remarked that some of the best scholars he had ever known went to school young. The tendency of leading educators seems to incline at present to the former view, which, if the true one, doubtless admits of exceptions. Moncure D. Conway gave some interesting information in regard to the progress of coeducation in England, which he reported to be steadily gaining ground through the example set by so many of our schools and colleges.

Mr. J. M. Gregory of the Illinois State University had a good word for the American newspaper, which he considered, with all its admitted imperfections, essential to the conditions of modern life, of immense practical importance to its manifold interests, and as an agent of popular education.

"Recreations for the People" were taken up in a forcible and interesting paper by Mr. G. B. Bartlett, of Concord, Mass., who noted with pleasure some of the signs of their growing appreciation. The annual vacation, now so common, of persons in almost all occupations, is a comparatively recent custom, and confirmed this. The improvement in physical health and strength, of which there is well-attested evidence, he thought should be largely credited to the greater attention given of late years to athletic exercises. In commenting upon the drama, he expressed the opinion that even the wearisome repetitions of "Pinafore" had been beneficial in turning the popular taste from pieces absolutely pernicious. "Let the play-wright," said he, "remember that his influence is often greater than that of the preacher, for many hear more plays than they do sermons; and let the public learn to encourage their efforts, now turned in the right direction."

The earnest and thoughtful paper of Miss Anna Hallowell, of Philadelphia, upon the "Care and Saving of Neglected Children," contained some valuable suggestions for those interested in this class of philanthropic problems. Miss Hallowell assigns the first place to the home in the work of reforming and training the young. The first step in this direction, she contends, is to improve the family life. This is the great insurance against vice, the safeguard of virtue. But even when the institution, as an asylum or for reformatory purposes, becomes indispensable, homes by adoption should be found, so far as possible.

Dr. Walter Channing, in his paper on "Insanity," observed that, notwithstanding the moral and intellectual progress of our day, insanity is on the increase, and that cures result less frequently than formerly, and even when made are more apt to end in impaired mental faculties. Dr. Channing recommended to physicians special attention to psychology, and in the treatment of the insane, as the only hopeful or effectual mode of dealing with such maladies.

Among the other papers of special interest were those of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe on "Changes in American Society"; of Frederick Law Olmstead on "Public Parks"; of George T. Angell of Boston, on "The Adulteration of Foods" (provoking one of the most animated discussions of the session); and, in the department of charity, that of Mrs. F. B. Lockwood, of New York city, on "Volunteer Service, or the Distinction between Volunteer and Official Service in such Work, and their Respective Merits"; the Rev. Oscar C. McCulloch, of Indianapolis, Ind., on "General and Special Methods of Operations in Associations of Charity"; and Robert Treat Paine, Jr., on "Visiting the Poor."

President Gilman, of the Johns Hopkins College of Baltimore, in his address on "The Purposes of the Association," urged the formation of local societies for the promotion of the study of social science,—a suggestion which we especially commend to Liberal or Free Religious Societies as a work which may be very legitimately included in the sphere of their interests and aims.

The following persons were chosen as officers of the Association for the ensuing year: Francis Wayland, of Rhode Island, President; Prof. Benjamin Peirce, Cambridge, first Vice-President; F. B. Sanborn, Concord, Mass., Secretary; and F. B. Kingsbury, Waterbury, Conn., Treasurer. Moncure D. Conway, of London, was elected one of the foreign corresponding members. D. H. C.

ANOTHER WITNESS.

The editorial in last week's issue on "The Good of Missions" is refreshingly clear and most timely. I have a little fact that came to me a few days since, illustrative of what is said therein of the low morality of many Christian converts from so-called paganism. In the anthropological section of the Association for the Advancement of Science, which held its meetings here in Boston a few days since, Mrs. E. A. Smith, who had read several papers upon the Iroquois Indians, one day spoke of the games of chance to which the Indians were very much given, as passionately as their white brethren at Baden-Baden and elsewhere,—"that is," she said, "the unconverted ones." The Christian Iroquois gave up all their national games. Toward the close, however, she very quietly remarked that these converted Christian Iroquois were not considered as of much account in the community. Their morals were not good, and they were not to be trusted. Whether in this case dogmatic conversion took possession of the meaner sort only, or whether in the process of change the old standard of morals was lost and no new one supplanted it, did not appear. F. H.

Digitized by Google

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

A FEW weeks ago, we gave some account of the trial for heresy of Dr. Robertson Smith, of Scotland, who, although cleared upon his first trial, seemed to have "put his foot into it" again,—"providentially," as his accusers believe,—by the publication of another heretical article in the Encyclopædia Britannica. Since our last mention of the affair, the Free Church Commission (the word "free" has a strictly limited signification here) met at Edinburgh, and reopened the case of Professor Smith. No less than fourteen presbyteries sent up memorials asking the Commission to reopen the case; and, after a warm discussion, a motion to appoint a committee to consider the matter and report at a special meeting, October 27, was carried by a vote of 210 to 139, which looks bad for Smith. We are sorry to observe that Professor Smith's friends assert in his defence that the objectionable article was written long before his former trial, and that since the trial he has cancelled his engagements with the editor of the Encyclopædia. In other words, Professor Smith is willing to eat humble pie, and write no more heresy. Scotch Presbyterians must be terribly bigoted, indeed, to ask more than this. With us, as is well known to-day, the most successful denominations allow their ministers to believe what they please, if they will only "keep quiet about it."

"SCRIBNER'S" has been discussing the vivisection question; an article entitled "Does Vivisection Pay?" in the July number being followed by "The Value of Vivisection" in the September number, the latter being written by Dr. H. C. Wood. The question has recently excited a great deal of attention in Germany and England. Its agitation, in fact, seems to be periodical, the last occurring, we believe, some five or six years ago. In this country, it has been brought to public notice more than once by Mr. Bergh and other sentimentalists. We use the word "sentimentalists" in this place with reference only to the mental methods of the objectors to vivisection, and with no lack of respect for Mr. Bergh and his associates, to whom we cheerfully admit a great indebtedness. But we cannot allow this feeling of indebtedness for a good work courageously done to persuade us into acquiescence with a fancy, which, if carried out, would be productive of infinite harm. Mr. Bergh's "humanity" is in danger of degenerating into a mischievous fanaticism. It is the welfare of humanity which demands the continuance of vivisection, and no details of cruelty on the part of vivisectors, or painful descriptions of flagrant abuses by demonstrators before classes, can justify the namby-pamby sentimentalism which would stop vivisection, or even subject it to that panacea of the incompetent,—government control. We agree with the poet: we would not number on our list of friends the man

"Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm";

but we heartily respect the man who sets his foot on worms or any other animals, when needful. And vivisection is needful, so long as the origin and cure of some of the worst diseases which afflict mankind are unknown, but may be discovered by experiments upon living animals. Vivisection is the foundation of nearly all we know of physiology. It has already revolutionized some medical methods. It has given us our only accurate knowledge of the nature of many diseases; and to it, moreover, we are to be still more indebted hereafter. Let any one, whose feelings may have been outraged by stories concerning the cruelties of vivisectors, read the temperate paper of Dr. Wood, or that of Dr. Dalton published a few years ago, in confirmation of what we have said.

MARSH-FEVER has long been supposed to be of fungus origin, and proof of this supposition seems at last to be furnished by Professor Klebs: "This, it appears, was ascertained by him and Professor Tommasi, after several weeks of research and inquiry, during the spring season in Agro Romano, a locality notorious for the prevalence of this particular kind of fever. They examined minutely the lower strata of the atmosphere of that district, as well as its soil and stagnant waters; and, in the two former, they discovered a microscopic fungus, consisting of numerous movable shining spores of a longish oval shape. This fungus was found to be artificially generated in various kinds of soil. The fluid matter obtained was filtrated and repeatedly washed, and the residuum left after filtration was introduced under the skin of healthy dogs. All the animals experimented on had the fever with the regular typical course." The cause having been ascertained,—(and will objectors to vivisection please observe that demonstration of the cause would be impossible without the sacrifice of dogs or other animals?—the remedy will in due time follow; and, if the great curse of malarial fever can be removed from the catalogue of human ills, who would not be willing to sacrifice every dog in Italy? No shivering or burning victim of malaria, we venture to assert, will utter a word in condemnation of this sentiment. R. C.

THE Hornellsville free-thinkers' meeting of last week, it is claimed, was a "grand success." Of course there are different ideas of what constitutes a grand success. The principal speakers were T. B. Wakeman, Elizur Wright, R. G. Ingersoll, the Rev. Geo. Chainey, and Parker Pillsbury, all of whom are now appearing to the world as allies of the Bennett and Heywood type of liberalism.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Chippings; Mostly about Uses of Sunday.

THE Christian Leader urges the poor to stand out against the turning of Sunday into a day of amusements, because the next step will be to turn it into a day of labor. They will then have the whole seven days instead of six for a week's work. But this is not the first question. Fairly stated, the question is, Shall the people be as free on Sundays as on Mondays?

WHAT shall happen to the day-laborer, if Sunday loses its legal authority and Christian significance is, nevertheless, a question of real importance. It is well known that there are very many people whose earnings are so scanty that six days of toil do not make their seventh day's idleness a very enjoyable thing. Such people may be led to decide that, if they can't get more pay, they must add more time. They "can't afford" once every seven days to take a vacation.

YET one day of seven, at least, ought to be reserved for play. All work and no play makes a dull time of it for everybody. There should be such a recurring day when all people, instead of delving for the means of living, could have a chance simply to live. It should be a day sacred to social life, free from burdens and cares. It should be a let-up, a halt, a rest, a frolic, a revival of good cheer, and the flow of good spirit. People dragged down and tired out forget that they are spirits. They go about as dray-horses, and not to doff their harness of a Saturday night would indeed be a sad and perilous thing. But to be shut up in a church all these blessed summer Sunday days—alas! Or go about with cautious feet and solemn faces, feeling that it is God's day, not theirs'—alas! No: what they need is to be let loose with never so much joyous freedom as on this very day.

HOW LITTLE chance most people get for knowing what manner of souls they are! Children know, when they start, and that without ever thinking about it. But the sorry part is, as soon as they are grown up a little, they are "disciplined" into the ruts of a traditional propriety, therein to go jogging, if they are to prosper and go to heaven, the rest of their mortal lives. Whereas, before, they were natural and free, now they are artificial and proper,—so "proper,"—that is, so bereft of their proper selves. And, when the Sabbath comes, it is, "Fix yourselves for church." That is the proper thing. This sort of discipline, however, has much less force now than formerly. The children, and also the grown-up people, break away from it. Says the Rev. Mr. Newton in the Independent: "The churches are deserted, services are dull, church work languishes. Excursion boats and trains and eligible seaside resorts are crowded." And the picture this gentleman sketches is as sad as it is true: "Weary, tired artisans, who have one breathing-day in seven; shop-girls and mechanics, who stand all the week behind counters and in factories, with never a week's vacation to lighten the load of life, with tired nerves and systems depressed by our excessive heats; and poor mothers with sick and languishing infants,—have to choose between a Sunday spent in the boarding-house or the tenement-house and the cheap and winning Sunday excursion." All along, it has been thought the proper thing for such people to suffer either at home (?) or in church. But human nature invents ways of relief, and, denying that there are only two possible things to do, cries: "This is the way. Walk ye in it." And now it is discovered by the Church that it must "go to the mountain." In plainer words, it must follow the crowd. It is observed by a late reading of the Scriptures that "Christ welcomed them [the crowds] in places where there was 'much grass'"; and so a "new religious departure" is made to Manhattan Beach, where there is much sand. "The proprietor of the hotel, in his large-hearted way, enters thoroughly into the spirit of the movement," which "has already secured that verdict of approval which is so hearty, and is in the best sense so American." Now, no one can object to such a "movement" on the part of the Church. It is a clear right and privilege. The only thing to be said is, Let the Church thrive on Manhattan Beach, if it can; but let it not assume that the day is in any special sense its own, that it has any private mortgage on it. Other things are just as legitimate. Ingersoll may go there. The people may stroll by themselves where they list, let the waves and the winds preach for them. The Church may use Sunday, but it can't any longer own it. For our own part, we would say, No Church for us in the early spring, summer, and the early fall,—none, from May to November. Out of doors, when we can get out, during all that interesting season.

BUT I hear some doleful, unbelieving voice crying: "It will never do. So much freedom! The common people must have the restraints of well-ordered religious society, or they fall into excess and run to riot." And thou, excellent and right-meaning friend, what is it that keepeth thee straight? I query if the thing which startles thee, and which thou callest "excess," be a real grievance, or has only the fault of being unusual. There's the old saying, "It's nothing after you get used to it." And it has much significance for these days. Last Sunday, I saw somewhat unusual,—boats, filled with gayly dressed, merry youth and maidens, rippling the waters of the pond in the Public Garden. Hitherto, when I had passed along there over the bridge of a Sabbath evening, they had all been fastened to their moorings, seeming to say: "This is the Lord's day. We mustn't stir." But now they were let loose, all unmindful of any competition with the pulpits, by which they were keeping children away from their souls' Sabbath meal of "Thoughts for the Young." And the children didn't seem to mind it. Like the flowers and the birds, they were quite oblivious of the solemnity of the day; yet they did conduct themselves as though they thought it a very sacred day—for fun! I had a premonition on the way of what was happening. I heard an urchin cry: "Hurry up, and let's git a boat. You can have more fun there 'n anywhere else in the city." And on he scampered from his less excited chum. Fun! Yes, and very innocent fun for this special day of all the week. A sight very grateful to the eyes of older children gazing from the earth, or gazing from the heavens, if in some upper realm there are eyes viewing the scenes here below.

FOR the benefit of the church-goer and Sunday-school believer, I must report as near as I can a conversation I could not well help overhearing, as it took place between two young people, sitting in such close proximity to my own seat that their words would fall on dullest ear. I could just distinguish in the darkness of evening that they were two young men, probably newly launched into their twenties. My attention was attracted when one asked the other in a loud, brusque manner:—

Digitized by Google

"Have you seen any of the picnickers?"

"Not a one. Have you?"

"No, not since. I went down to the church this morning, and saw a few. Not one of our class was there but the teacher. I tell you, she's nice,—good-looking, and as good as she looks. Besides, she knows something."

"There you're right. She's just boss."

"I was ashamed, to tell the truth, to see her there deserted. And she felt it. She said she didn't know as she should come again in the fall. But I told her, if she didn't, we'd never forgive her. If she'd come, we'd all come again, and get more fellows. I smoothed it over to her about the picnic,—told her some were out of town and others had to work, which was my case."

"And mine."

"And she felt better, and said she would be there in the fall, if she thought any two or three or even one took an interest. I told her I knew one, yes, two, that did. Ain't it so, Jack?"

"Yes, that's so. It isn't so much the Bible lessons as it is her. She's a saint, if ever there was one."

"That's the truth. We must brace up and go this fall regular, and begin and try and make something of ourselves."

"There you're right."

"Well, I'm a d——m sight better'n I was 'ain't I? Haven't I improved in the last six months? I don't drink. I've quit that square. And I don't smoke as I used to. Dang it! I wish I could get rid of the weed!"

And he gave his cigar a toss into the grass.

Then the other:—

"There goes mine! I'm with you. Here's a shake. And let's stick to it now, old boy, and in the fall tell her we did it of ourselves, and just from thinking about her."

"Well, we'll tell her we did it because we made our minds up we ought, and thought afterwards it would please her to know it. We don't want to get spooney, you know, Jack."

"No, of course not."

"Where'll I see you to-morrow night?"

"Oh, here in the garden as well as anywhere."

They rise and turn out of the gateway near by, and I catch these words as they disappear:—

"It's a bargain?"

"Sure!"

And, left to my own thoughts, I said: "What a mending world it is! Everybody in their own way. May the teacher and her class prosper!"

As to the poor people losing their day of rest, the remedy is to create so great a revolution in public sentiment that the poor—the industrious poor—shall have ceased to be "with us alway." In other words, ought not a time to arrive when all working people can afford to live? "Worth the living?" Oh, yes: just give one another a chance! S. H. M.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A new edition of the speeches of Wendell Phillips is soon to be published.

Mr. B. F. Underwood has recovered from his recent illness, and is filling lecture engagements in the West.

Miss Sarah Brown is a county school superintendent in Kansas, having been elected as an independent candidate.

Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer gave two interesting addresses last week, in Boston, upon Woman Suffrage in Education.

The Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin, the eminent Universalist preacher, is in so feeble health that there seems to be but little prospect of his recovery.

Andrew D. White, our Minister to Germany, it is reported, will resume his duties as President of Cornell University during the coming year.

Miss Helen Gladstone, the daughter of the Premier, is one of the successful candidates in this year's class list of Cambridge University examinations.

John Banvard, the veteran artist and traveller, has painted a picture of the obelisk as it appeared when standing in its glory in old Alexandria. He intends to repeat the work on a larger scale.

Rev. M. J. Savage will sail for America on the 16th. He has travelled extensively in Great Britain and on the continent; and the Home Journal says, "He has gained in might and grown his beard, and looks fierce as an Italian bandit."

Gambetta, by general consent, is given the first place among the orators of France. His greatest enemies intently listen to him, from pure love of art; and hesitating friends find all scruples swept away by the torrent of his demonstration.

Epes Sargent is about to publish a new work on Spiritualism, considered from a scientific stand-point. There are those who may question whether Mr. Sargent is the person for such a treatment of the subject, but this makes no material difference to those who are wedded to a theory.

Moncure D. Conway, while attending the meeting of the Social Science Association at Saratoga, was gracefully complimented by Col. T. W. Higginson for useful labors in England. An invitation was also tendered to him to participate in the discussions of the occasion, which he accepted.

Mr. C. C. Hazewell writes as follows of Indian matters in the Boston Traveller: "The Southern Utes have signed the Treaty. What the terms of the Treaty are we do not know; but this we do know, that the Treaty is formed to be broken. Indian treaties are like glass; for they can be seen through, and they are made to smash.

Herbert Spencer, the English philosopher, is sixty years old. Having been privately educated, he was at first a civil engineer. His forehead is high, and he is quite bald. His face is long; and, although his features are not small, he has an unpractical and almost effeminate appearance. His portraits represent him as resting his head against his hand, in the Washington Irving style.

It is said that it was the worry and long anxious nights spent in the House of Commons over the Irish disturbance bill which brought on Mr. Gladstone's illness; and there is no doubt but that this was one of the causes, if not indeed the main cause. But now comes the other and curious side. When the lords were to vote on this same bill, Miss Gladstone was despatched to the peers' chamber to watch progress and come home and report. When she reached her father's bedside, about three o'clock in the morning, and communicated the fate of the bill to him, Mr. Gladstone turned on his couch and almost immediately sank into a sound sleep; and from that moment there was no longer any doubt as to his recovery, although the rapidity with which it has proceeded has been such as to take even his medical advisers by surprise.—London Letter in Troy (N.Y.) Times.

FOREIGN.

The unveiling of the statue of Spinoza at the Hague has been fixed for the 14th of September.

A new issue of the revolutionary paper, Will of the People, dated September 3, has been put into circulation at St. Petersburg.

Herr Bennigsen, the German national liberal leader, has been designated minister of the interior and vice-president of the Bundesrath.

An international postal Congress will meet in Paris on the first of October, to complete certain matters left unfinished by the Congress of 1878.

William Thompson, alias "Bendigo," once a prize fighter, and of late years a revivalist preacher, died on Monday at Beeston, Notts, aged sixty-nine.

The banquet annually given at the Mansion House in honor of Her Majesty's Ministers has been abandoned for the present year in consequence of the recent illness of the Premier.

A Limerick paper records the miraculous appearance in mid-air of the figure of the Blessed Virgin, which was witnessed by two hundred children in the convent grounds of that city.

Mr. Gladstone is about to leave London on a short sea trip round the English coast in one of Donald Currie's African mail steamers, the "Grantully Castle." Mr. Gladstone will be accompanied by Mr. Currie, and they will touch at some of the most interesting ports in North Britain.

The Cobden Prize at Cambridge.—The Cobden Prize, founded by the Cobden Club, and awarded triennially for the best essay on a subject connected with political economy, has been adjudged to be equally divided between Mr. Alfred Caldecott, B.A., scholar of St. John's, and Mr. Joseph Shield Nicholson, B.A., scholar of Trinity, the merits of whose essays are declared equal by the examiners.

Nihilism not Dead or Sleeping.—A St. Petersburg despatch to the London News says: It must not be supposed that the revolutionary spirit is exorcised. A large proportion of the Nihilist leaders have been captured or driven abroad, and the intelligent classes are more hopeful and contented under Gen. Melikoff's wise and liberal rule; but the roots of the social malady are deep-seated; and that the Nihilists have not lost either hope or energy is shown by the appearance of a new number of the Narodnia Volia newspaper, covering six pages of close double-columns octavo.

Cardinal Manning has issued a circular explaining the rules of the Roman Catholic Church in reference to mixed marriages. When a Roman Catholic and a Protestant are married, it is requisite not only that they should have the ceremony performed by a Roman Catholic priest, but that they should abstain from subsequently going before a Protestant minister, such an act being denounced as "mortal sin," "illicit," and "sacrilegious." The logic by which that conclusion is arrived at is thus stated: A Romanist, in going before a non-Catholic minister, as a minister of religion, and making the marriage contract before him, thereby unites him to a heretical ritual, from hence would arise an implicit adhesion to heresy.

The miracle season at Lourdes sets in about August 10, and lasts five or six weeks, terminating toward the end of September. Miracles may be achieved at other times, but they are generally of secondary quality. Miraculous centres vary with fashion. Formerly, La Salette and Paray le Monial were in favor; but now Lourdes is all the rage. A Spanish paper lately complained bitterly that France has almost the monopoly of miracles, and that Spaniards go to the shrine of Lourdes, whereas native saints—St. James of Compostella, Our Lady of Atocha, and the Black Virgin of Pilar—amply sufficed during centuries for their fathers. Lourdes, however, has a small rival in Saint-Bertrand-de-Commingues; and last Sunday a party of Toulouse pilgrims at the Montryean station came into collision with the populace, from words proceeding to blows. M. de Lacroix, the leader of the pilgrimage, and several of his companions, were locked up all night.—Parisian.

The British Association opened its annual meetings at Swansea, on Wednesday, August 18, under the presidency of Dr. A. C. Ramsay, the Director-General of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom. The subject of the president's address was the recurrence of certain geological phenomena, his object being to show that all known geological formations have been produced under physical circumstances closely resembling, if not identical with, those with which we are now more or less familiar. Through the various geological epochs, he traced this identity of operations in respect to the metamorphism of rocks, the products of volcanoes, the upheaving and denudation of mountain chains, the deposit of great inland areas of salt, the recurrence of fresh-water conditions in lakes and estuaries, and glacial influences. His conclusion was that, from the Lauretian epoch down to the present day, all the physical events in the history of the earth have varied, neither in kind nor intensity, from those of which we now have experience. Nearly all the sections commenced work on Thursday morning; but in one or two cases the proceedings were deferred for a day, as a very attractive excursion was arranged to visit the Dowlais iron-works, near Merthyr Tydvil.—Lloyd's Weekly.

JESTINGS.

The tramp question: "Madam, will you please give me some old clothes? I am so hungry I don't know where I shall sleep to-night."

"How dare you say 'damn' before me?" severely inquired a clergyman of a loafer. "How did I know you wanted to say 'damn' first?" retorted this bad man.

It is suspected that the three-cent piece was invented to deceive the deacons. It can be slipped into the contribution-box as ostentatiously as a dime.—Boston Transcript.

A good brother in a recent prayer-meeting, not a thousand miles from Boston, spoke of po-ig-nant grief, to the quiet amusement of the young people. It is sometimes well to consult Webster, even before taking part in meeting.

Digitized by Google

A GENTLEMAN, just returned to America from a tour in Europe, was asked how he liked the ruins of Pompeii. "Not very well," he replied: "they were in such shocking bad repair!"

THE explanation given by an excited Celestial in Vicksburg: "Me playee poker with Melican, alle same me glettee flo aces: me bettee ten dollar, nobody clum in. Me glettee flo flushee: me bettee fifteen dollar, evly son of glun clum in. Me cleanee out."

CLERGYMAN (to newly wedded pair): "The marriage state imposes various duties. The husband must protect the wife, while the wife must follow the husband wheresoever he goes." Bride: "Lor', sir, can't that be altered in our case? My husband is going to be a letter-carrier."

THE Buffalo Courier has this heading over an article: "From Buffalo to Heaven; Sufferings and Death of Jacob Terwiliger; the Kick of a Mule, and its Final Results." That settles it. The mule that can kick a man from Buffalo to Heaven is the champion long distance kicker.—Boston Post.

THE baker's cart was standing by the door, minus the baker. Little cherub climbed up, and, looking into the boxes, feasted her eyes on cookies and jumbles innumerable. "Oh! I'se a good mind to take a cookie!" "But that would be very wrong," said nurse, reprovingly. "The baker won't see me." "But God will," solemnly. "I know, but He'll never tell the baker."

REFUGE OF SUPERSTITION.

A NEW poet has appeared, who has discovered a use to which to put Niagara. He is going to confound infidels with it. He calls himself "The American Poet." His name is R. Rice, and he lives in Cambridge, N.Y. His poem (?), entitled "Cataract of Niagara," is dedicated to Bishop Simpson, and closes thus :—

Ye blood-bought, and Hell-bound Infidels! by
This Cataract God is speaking to you.
These tones of thunder, and all the dirges
Of nature, call for your belief in God!
But something more warns your souls to action!
It is the stable,—the manger, and the Crucifixion! More, it is the Son of God in Joseph's tomb! his ascension to Heaven, after giving up the Ghost on
The cross, and his cries for your Salvation,
At the right hand of God. Why then reject
The Saviour, and make sure the wails of the Lost! where no mercy shall ever greet the Ear! and no Jesus set free the pris'ner.
Awake from your slumber! run for life! and
The bonus of the Crucifixion share.

THE miraculous in Ireland has changed its base from the parish church of Knock to the Church of Mount St. Vincent, in the suburbs of Limerick. On the western side of the building is a large figure of the Blessed Virgin, carved in Caen stone; and underneath is a window which gives light to an oratory of Our Blessed Lady, situate in that part of the convent. This statue is thirty feet from the earth, and in front of it are the play-ground and an open field extending to the boundary wall, the land thus enclosed being quite level and including about one acre or more in extent. On the feast of Our Blessed Lady, says the local chronicle, the weather was fine, yet the thunder pealed with crashing sound and the lightning flashed with startling vividness. On the evening of that day, the orphans left the convent to play in the grounds in front of the new buildings; and they were told not to be alarmed by the thunder, but to pray to Our Lady of Succor, should they be frightened. With whole faith of Our Lady's protection with which the little ones, like their elders, are possessed, they passed into the grounds, and proceeded in their innocent amusements in the usual manner. Soon children at once piously offered up their prayers for after, the thunder rolled along the sky, and the safety to the Blessed Virgin. Then they raised their voices and sang the touching hymn, "Look down, Mother Mary"; and, while the beautiful music of their young fresh voices was ascending, one of the children suddenly called out, "Oh, look there!" And instantly the eyes of two hundred others, her companions, were turned toward the belt of trees to the north of the convent, and in the air above them the figure of the Blessed Virgin was beheld by all, attired in a white robe, with a blue sash around her waist. The infant Saviour was borne on her right arm, and a rosary depended from her left. She seemed to rest on a white cloud, upheld by two angels who carried in their hands branches of some description covered with foliage. The children were spellbound, and involuntarily offered prayers to the Blessed Virgin. After they had gazed at the vision for about ten minutes, some of them ran to the convent to acquaint the nuns; but before the good ladies had arrived at the spot the Divine Apparition had gone, the Virgin disappearing in the heavens. So much for Sunday evening, but on Monday evening the manifestation was still more decisive. While the children were again at play, one of their number called out to look at the Blessed Virgin, and instantly almost fainted. All eyes were directed toward the statue on the top of the building, and above it in the air the children saw the Immaculate Mother vested altogether in white, her hands raised as if in the attitude of invoking or expressing a blessing or prayer, her eyes cast down, and a silvery light surrounding the beatific figure. Some of the children again hastened to the convent to communicate what they saw, and one of the nuns who arrived first on the spot beheld the Virgin also. These details are of course given by the sisters of the convent.—New York Tribune.

Mr. Abbot's Classical School in New York City is intended to fit boys for the best Colleges by thorough individual instruction. It will open, Sept. 20, in the "Mott Memorial" building, No. 64 Madison Avenue, cor. 27th Street. Terms, $500 a year; number of pupils limited to twelve. For further information, apply on or after Sept. 13, between 3 and 6 P.M., to Francis E. Abbot, on the premises.

References: Pres. C. W. ELIOT, Harvard College.
JOSEPH H. CHOATE, Esq., New York City.
GEO. WM. CURTIS, LL.D., " "
Rev. H. W. BELLOWS, D.D., " "
EDWIN L. GODKIN, Esq., " "
Dr. AUSTIN FLINT, " "
Prof. EDW. CURTIS, M.D., " "
Prof. CHAS. F. CHANDLER, " "
Rev. W. H. WARD, D.D., " "
Rev. ROBERT COLLYER, " "
CHARLES STORRS, Esq., " "
Col. ALBERT STICKNEY, " "

Unity Hymns and Chorals

FOR THE CONGREGATION and THE HOME.

EDITED BY

W. C. GANNETT, J. V. BLAKE, F. L. HOSMER.

253 Hymns, 66 Hymn-Tunes, with some elements

OF

Choral and Responsive Service.

"We have tried to give in our little book two hundred and fifty hymns likely to be loved by congregations whose simple feeling in religious service is that of children seeking the Father."

Bound in paper-covered boards. Single copy, 35 cts.; per dozen, $3.00. For sale at

"UNITY" OFFICE, Room 57,
75 Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

"Unity Clubs,"

OR

Mutual Improvement Societies

IN TOWN AND CHURCH.

BY MARY E. BEALS.

Helpful suggestions for those who are planning social and educational meetings for the winter in their town or church. 21 pages.

One copy, 5 cts.; per dozen, 25 cts. For sale at

"UNITY" OFFICE, Room 57,
75 Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

was organized in 1867. Though having its headquarters in Boston it is a national organization, and has members and officers in various States of the Union. It has the following

CONSTITUTION.

I. This Organization shall be called the Free Religious Association,—its objects being to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering, in any other way, with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being. Any person desiring to coöperate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, twelve Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and not less than six nor more than ten Directors; who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. The officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings. Five members of the Executive Committee shall constitute a quorum.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions, as the Executive Committee may appoint; of which at least one month's previous notice shall be publicly given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These Articles may be amended at any Annual Meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

Officers for 1880-1881.

PRESIDENT.

FELIX ADLER, New York City.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, Concord, Mass.
LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia, Pa.
OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
LYDIA MARIA CHILD, Wayland, Mass.
GEORGE W. CURTIS, Staten Island, N.Y.
EDWARD L. YOUMANS, New York City.
FREDERICK SCHUENEMANN-POTT, San Francisco, Cal.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Cambridge, Mass.
GEORGE HOADLY, Cincinnati, O.
NATHANIEL HOLMES, St. Louis, Mo.
ROWLAND G. HAZARD, Peacedale, R.I.
BERNHARD FELSENTHAL, Chicago, Ill.

SECRETARY.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

ASSISTANT-SECRETARY.

HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston, Mass.

TREASURER.

JOHN C. HAYNES, 451 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DIRECTORS.

REBECCA N. BUFFUM, Lynn, Mass.
EDNAH D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
WILLIAM C. GANNETT, St. Paul, Minn.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY, Providence, R.I.
HELEN M. IRESON, Lynn, Mass.
EDWARD LAUTERBACH, New York City.
CHARLES D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
MINOT J. SAVAGE, Boston, Mass.
ANNA GARLIN SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

The office of the Association is at 3 TREMONT PLACE BOSTON (directly in the rear of the Tremont House),—where is also the publication-office of the Free Religious Index.

Mr. D. H. CLARK is the General Agent of the Association, and all letters pertaining to the business of the Association (payment of membership fees, orders for its publications, etc.) should be addressed to him, or "Free Religious Association," at the office. He will also gladly welcome any members or friends who may call at the rooms.

Communications intended specially for the Secretary, as well as his personal correspondence, should be addressed to him at NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary F.R.A

Digitized by Google

THE PATRONAGE of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX. Though the paper must not be held responsible for any statements made by advertisers, the attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages in entire harmony with its general character and principles. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,	. . .	10c. per line.
" 13 " 25	" . . .	8c. " "
" 26 " 51	" . . .	6c. " "
" 52	" . . .	5c. " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made.

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

EDITOR,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

Secretary of the Association.

For list of co-laborers, see editorial page.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is the continuation of THE INDEX, which was founded and has been for ten years edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Efforts will be made to keep the same high standard, and merit the same honorable distinction. As the late editor expressed it, the paper will still aim—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

It may be further stated that, as voice of the Free Religious Association, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX will endeavor fairly to represent all the phases of the movement, in all their breadth, for which that Association stands. Whatever pertains to its threefold object— "the practical interests of pure religion, the increase of fellowship in the spirit, and the encouragement of the scientific study of man's religious nature and history" —will here find a fitting place. The relations of Religion to Modern Science, and to Social Science and Philanthropy, the relations of Universal Religion to the Special Religions, and the relations of Religion to the State, will receive particular attention. Book Notices and Correspondence will be secured from competent writers. As a

SPECIAL FEATURE,

which will commend the paper to many new subscribers, the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is to publish a lecture by Dr. FELIX ADLER, before his society in New York, once a month during the season of his society labors. The Editor will also print within the year several of his discourses.

TERMS.

The price of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance, which includes postage, and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

Miss FITZ'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND BOYS, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, will re-open Sept. 20, 1880. Pupils received at any time. For particulars, send circular.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,— all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,— as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,— together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. William R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five Cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five Cents at the office.

Proceedings of Eleventh Annual Meeting, 1878. Contains essays by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., on "The Religion of Humanity," and by Wm. H. Spencer, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism,— why it should be disorganized, and how it may be done"; addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Maurice Ellinger, and a poem by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith; eleventh annual report of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc. Price 30 cts.; packages of five or more, 20 cts. each.

Proceedings of Twelfth Annual Meeting, 1879. Contains the essay by John W. Chadwick (with an abstract of the speeches thereon by Messrs. Savage, Tiffany, and Potter) on "Theological and Rational Ethics"; the address by the new President of the Association, Felix Adler, on "The Practical Needs of Free Religion," and briefer addresses on the same topic by F. E. Abbot, F. A. Hinckley, and C. D. B. Mills; together with the Reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer, and other proceedings of the business meeting. Price, 30 cents; packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

Free Religious Tracts.

I. TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, by James Parton. 5 cts.; ten, 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.
II. THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE, by John Weiss.
III. THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS, by T. W. Higginson. Enlarged edition.
IV. TRANSCENDENTALISM, by Theodore Parker. Never before published.
V. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL QUESTION, as understood by a Catholic American citizen (Bishop McQuaid) and by a Liberal American citizen (F. E. Abbot). (Two Horticultural Hall Lectures, Feb. 13 and 20, 1876.)
VI. HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY? An Answer in Four Parts: 1. Sunday in the Bible. 2. Sunday in Church History. 3. Sunday in the Massachusetts Laws. 4. The Workingman's Sunday. By Charles K. Whipple, Minot J. Savage, Charles E. Pratt, and Wm. C. Gannett.

Nos. II., III., IV., V., VI., 10 cts. each; ten for 60 cts.; one hundred, $5.

REASON AND REVELATION, by W. J. Potter. 5 cts. (Ten for 30 cts.; one hundred, $1.50.)

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed, "Free Religious Association," 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F.R.A.

INDEX TRACTS.

These Tracts, several of which have attracted so great attention, will now be furnished by the Free Religious Association.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." This especially has received great commendation from most distinguished men for the logical clearness of its statements. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Sixth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot, discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

NOW READY:

INSTITUTE ESSAYS,

BY

Rev. S. R. Calthrop,

Prof. C. C. Everett,

F. E. Abbot,

Dr. Gustav Gottheil,

Rev. J. W. Chadwick,

Prof. Ezra Abbot,

Rev. Francis Tiffany,

Rev. J. B. Harrison,

Rev. George Batchelor.

A "solid and meaty" volume of 280 pages 8vo.

"This volume is entitled to the cordial attention not only of students in theology, but also of all those interested in high truth. Those who know enough, and those whose religious system has been completed, had better not approach a volume which to a seeker after facts is wonderfully grateful and stimulating."—Boston Advertiser.

Price, in cloth, $1.25; paper, $1.00.

Sent, postage free, to any address, on receipt of the price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

101 MILK STREET, BOSTON.

PARK & PIPER,

COUNSELLORS AT LAW,

48 Congress St., Boston.

GEO. W. PARK. GEO. F. PIPER.

TO BOOK BUYERS.

BOOKS SENT BY MAIL AT

PUBLISHERS' PRICES!

No Extra Charge for Postage.

Any obtainable book that may be desired will be forwarded as promptly as possible on receipt of orders accompanied with the cash. Orders are respectfully solicited from all friends of the Index. Address

THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 cents. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

SINGLE BOUND VOLUMES

of THE INDEX for the years 1871, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878 (Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, can be furnished on application at this Office. PRICES: Volumes for 1871 and 1872, $2.50; volumes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, $3.00. Sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Address FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, 3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

PHOTOGRAPHS

OF

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
T. W. HIGGINSON,
F. E. ABBOT,
W. H. SPENCER,
F. W. NEWMAN,
CHAS. VOYSEY,
A. W. STEVENS,
R. H. RANNEY,

Are now for sale at the office of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION and INDEX, and will be mailed postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Single Photographs, 25 cents each; complete Set of Nine Photographs, $1.50.

Address,

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,
3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX

LIGHT. LIBERTY. RIGHT.

"TRUTH FOR AUTHORITY, NOT AUTHORITY FOR TRUTH." ✧ LUCRETIA MOTT.

VOL. XII., OLD SERIES.—NO. 561.
VOL. I., NEW SERIES.—NO. 13.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1880.

THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.
SINGLE COPIES SEVEN CENTS.

Entered as Second Class Mail-Matter.

ESSENCE OF ALL FAITHS.

WHEN any one identifies his interest with those of sanctity, virtue, country, parents, and friends, all these are secured; but, whenever he places his interest in anything else than friends, country, family, and justice, then all these give way, borne down by the weight of self-interest. For wherever I and mine are placed, thither must every living being gravitate. If in body, that will sway us; if in our own will, that; if in externals, these. If, therefore, I rest my personality in the will, then only shall I be a friend, a son, or a father, such as I ought. For, in that case, it will be for my interest to preserve the faithful, the modest, the patient, the abstinent, the beneficent character; to keep the relations of life inviolate. But, if I place my personality in one thing, and virtue in another, the doctrine of Epicurus will stand its ground, that virtue is nothing, or mere opinion.—Epictetus.

WHERE your treasure is, there will your heart be also.—Jesus.

THERE is a treasure that man or woman may possess, a treasure laid up in the heart,—charity, piety, temperance; a treasure secure, impregnable, enduring; the one treasure that will follow man after death. —Buddhist.

THERE is a class of men who indulge in error,—who indeed receive the law, but in some peculiar and erroneous sense. They wrongly say: "The law commands us to keep our hearts pure from pride, envy, hatred, anger, and dissimulation; but this is a thing which it is impossible to do,—for the soul has been created with these qualities and affections, and human nature cannot be changed. It is just as impossible to make a black material white by scraping it as for the human heart to be free from these qualities." These ignorant men do not know and understand that the law does not command that these qualities should be entirely effaced and expelled from the heart, but rather requires that they should be brought under subjection to the heart and the reason, to the end that they may not act presumptuously, go beyond the limits set by the law, and indulge in mortal sins. It is possible even to change these qualities by doing only what reason requires, and by respecting the restrictions of the law. Many devout men in past times have secured this change of the affections of the soul.—Ghazzali (Mohammedan).

THE higher feelings, when acting in harmonious combination and directed by enlightened intellect, have a boundless scope for gratification: their least indulgence is delightful, and their highest activity is bliss. They cause no repentance, leave no void, but render life a scene at once of peaceful tranquillity and sustained felicity; and, what is of much importance, conduct proceeding from their dictates carries in its train the highest gratification to the physical propensities themselves, of which the latter are susceptible. At the same time, it must be observed that the sentiments err, and lead also to evil, when not regulated by enlightened intellect; that intellect in its turn must give due weight to the existence and desires of both the propensities and sentiments, as elements in the human constitution, before it can arrive at sound conclusions regarding conduct; and that rational actions and true happiness flow from the gratification of all the faculties in harmony with each other; the sentiments and intellect bearing the directing sway. —George Combe.

CURRENT TOPICS.

ONE of the famous "characters" of the fashionable ecclesiasticism of New York has vanished,—Sexton Brown, of Grace Church. It is said that he is sketched in George William Curtis' Potiphar Papers.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, New York, announce among their fall publications new and cheaper editions of O. B. Frothingham's Life of Theodore Parker and History of Transcendentalism in New England.

THE Pan Presbyterian Assembly meets this week in Philadelphia. It consists of stalwart Orthodox representatives from all parts of the world, eager to defend and perpetuate the faith,—their faith,—and will continue into October.

A SECTION of the National Liberal party in Prussia refuses to be beguiled any longer by Prince Bismarck, and proposes to organize by itself, on the original principles of the party platform, prominent in which were the Falk laws, restricting the power of the Church in matters of State and education.

THE result of the Maine election has been a surprise to both parties, and leaves things in that State about as much mixed morally as they are politically. Partisan newspapers on both sides throughout the country claim, too, that it is going to stimulate their party to renewed vigor, so as to make victory sure in the presidential election.

BOSTON'S birthday celebration was a triumph, as it must needs be, being Boston's. Judging from the glowing descriptions in the daily press, not only the Hub, but all its spokes, to the utmost perimeter of the globe, were thoroughly alive that day. Now the question is in order for Liberal thinkers which we propounded in our leading editorial last week.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury recently entertained at his palatial residence six hundred of the poorer class at Lambeth, and sent each visitor away with a bunch of beautiful flowers. That was certainly very kind and generous on the part of his grace. But it was a good deal easier for him than it would have been for many of his brethren, since he has, we believe, an income of some $20,000 a year, more or less.

THE difficulty of regulating the weather by prayer has been recently illustrated in Arkansas. A congregation of colored people in one locality was praying for rain, while at the same time a congregation in a neighboring town was praying for sunshine. The minister of the wet district wrote to the people of the dry: "You folks oughter be ashamed of yourselves. This cross-cut prayin' is enough to get the Lord so bothered that he don't know what to do."

THERE are a good many people in this world, and no doubt it is rather hard for all to find useful outlets for their energies; at least, this may be inferred from the useless ways in which so many, with more piety and zeal than wisdom, expend theirs. One of the most notable examples of this is the foolish effort which still continues to get the name of God in the Constitution. A convention for this purpose is announced for next month, at St. Johnsbury, Vt.

Dr. DEXTER, in his History of Congregationalism, recently published, reconstructs Pastor John Robinson. He thinks that the famous sentence in Pastor Robinson's farewell sermon to the Pilgrim Church at Leyden, wherein he prophesied that "more light would yet break forth from God's Holy Word," does not refer at all to doctrines, but solely to the inferior questions of church polity. With all due respect for Dr. Dexter's learning in this field, and his patient investigation of his subject, we do not think the context bears out this new interpretation of the Pilgrim pastor's claim to honor.

THE opponents of Sunday concerts find their way easier in Canada than in the United States. The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench at Toronto have unanimously sustained the decision of a police magistrate who had prohibited the concerts. A manager of an Opera House, who had been committed for violating the Sunday law, appealed to the court, on the ground that the law was an ancient English one, and had been superseded by Canadian legislation. But the court declared the law still in force. What honesty and humanity alike now require is the repeal of such laws.

THE Christian Church appears to be quarrelling over dividing the spoils of its missionary triumphs in Madagascar. The Jesuit priests who are there in force have been intriguing, it is reported, for the possession of valuable property, and have even resorted to violence against some of the Protestant societies, breaking up their schools, interrupting their worship, flogging their teachers, and in one case even pulling down a chapel. Altogether, the example of the converters is not a wholesome one for the converts, and is not calculated to make very clear to the simple mind of the natives what is meant by discipleship to the "Prince of Peace."

IT is sometimes said that radicals want to throw away the Bible. We have yet to meet with the first competent representative of this class who entertained any such desire. But, be this as it may, it is certain that some radicals have a very intimate acquaintance with the book. As an illustration of this, we recently sent to a delinquent subscriber a notice of the fact. A few days after came a postal with the following message: Card received, see St. Matthew xviii., end of verse 29. We may mention for the information of those whom the Bible Society has not yet visited that the passage reads: "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." Of course we had patience; and our friend, true to his assurance, has since paid us all. And thus the words of Scripture were fulfilled in the treasury of the Index.

Digitized by Google

For the Free Religious Index.

CONCORD SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

Aside from its historic and literary fame, Concord would attract the lover of nature. Its quaint old houses whose coloring harmonizes with the landscape, its elm-shaded streets, its soft green meadows and undulating hills, and above all its sleepy river, which dreamily suggests, "There is no joy but calm," make up a picture that will linger long in the memory of many visitors. The main street of the town is nearly parallel with one branch of the river, and the gardens and back-yards of the houses that face it slope to the water. Over this picturesque highway glide the boats of the villagers, and picnic parties frequently voyage to romantic spots along its shores. I did not wonder that Concord poets should sing its praises, or that, gazing into its lucid depths, one should grow uncertain as to whether the water floated the land or the land held the water in its bosom, so mirror-like it reflected the above in the below; though it perhaps required, as Thoreau thought, a more free and abstracted vision to see the reflected trees and the sky than to see the river bottom merely.

"A man that looks on glass
On it may stay his eye,
Or, if he pleaseth, through it pass,
And the heavens espy."

Once, at early dawn, I saw a vision never to be forgotten,—myriads of water-lilies, kissed by the sun, flash open their snowy petals, their breasts aglow like stars. Was diviner miracle ever wrought by love? Another time, at sunset,—"so rich a sunset as would never have ended but for some reason unknown to men,"—I floated with the current, Tennyson's words in my thought:

"How sweet it were, hearing the downward stream,
With half-shut eyes ever to seem Falling asleep in a half-dream."

Concord is hallowed ground; its hills, woods, and river are sacred to genius; a mystic sense of the past blends with the present, and invests its natural charms with fresh significance. From its river port, Thoreau sailed, the last day of August, 1839,

"New lands, new people, and new thoughts to find."

What need to cross the seas in search of adventures? Thoreau's Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers is a voyage of discovery. Touched by his thought, the most familiar object is suddenly set in a frame of ideal remoteness and perfection. If he but climb the banks for a glass of water, there is a suggestion of Arcadia in the New England dwelling at whose door he knocks, a faint breath of the Orient in the Yankee housewife, "whose small-voiced but sincere hospitality, out of the bottomless depths of a quiet nature, has travelled quite round to the other side, and fears only to obtrude its hospitality." So, too, when far in the night he hears some tyro beat a drum, these sounds relate him tothe stars, and he stops his habitual thinking, "as if the plow had suddenly run deeper in its furrow through the crust of the world.

"Then idle Time ran gadding by,
And left me with Eternity alone:
I hear beyond the range of sound,
I see beyond the verge of sight."

Other memories are linked with Concord River. Here in this secluded spot are the hemlocks that Hawthorne describes in his Mosses from an Old Manse, "declining across the stream with outstretched arms, as if resolute to take the plunge." Many have fallen to make room for the new railroad, against whose unsightly intrusion artist and poet have actively protested by planting willows to hide the desolation wrought. Half a mile farther is a lovely spot, shut in like a lake, consecrated to "Floating Hearts," by the pen of a Concord poet.

But not only the river, the very stones in Concord are eloquent. Along this Lexington road marched the British soldiers on that memorable day in April, 1775, when the first faint tide of war rolled over the country. Here, by the "rude bridge," since swept away, but now replaced,

"The embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world."

A bronze statue of the Minute Man, face and figure expressing heroic vigor and an ideal beauty of character wholly American, commemorates this event.

One is not surprised that the serene atmosphere of Concord has been conducive to literary and artistic activity. The din of the world is shut out; the material pursuits of life do not distract attention from its higher interests; man can step here to the measure of the universe. A gracious geniality characterizes social intercourse, a hospitality that includes not only persons, but ideas. Toward Mr. Emerson, all hearts are turned with reverent affection; and it is beautiful to see how the scattered seeds of his wisdom have sprung up and blossomed into fruitful deeds. Scarcely less honored is Mr. Alcott; and the names of Hawthorne and Thoreau are guarded with jealous love. So, too, the poet Channing, though living in hermit-like seclusion, finds here that "audience fit, though few," who can appreciate the delicate, elusive charm of his genius. Other Concord celebrities are the author and philanthropist, F. B. Sanborn; Judge Hoar, of national reputation; G. P. Lathrop, whose genius as poet and author is marked with rare sincerity; Miss Elizabeth Peabody, widely known through her literary labors and unselfish devotion to the cause of kindergarten education; Miss Louisa Alcott, beloved of children; O. C. French, the young sculptor, whose Minute Man and bust of Emerson reveal new possibilities for American art; F. M. Holland, author and scholar, known to readers of the Index; George Bartlett, active in various departments of literature and philanthropy; and many of whom space forbids mention.

But, leaving unnoticed other Concord attractions, the subject of this article claims attention. It was a unique experiment, that of founding in the summer of 1879 a School of Philosophy in Mr. Alcott's orchard. But its institution is a solid fact, not to be gainsaid. Last year as is known, its sessions were held in the library of the Orchard House; this year, in an unpretending little structure a few yards distant, called "The Chapel," the gift of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson to the school. Rustic seats are placed under the trees, and shady paths lead to the hill-top. The term lasts five weeks, the method of instruction is by lectures and conversations. The subjects treated cover a wide field of thought, art and literature being touched upon as well as philosophy. No direct teaching in physical science is given; but its relation to philosophy is indicated, the one being employed upon the outer, the other upon the inner, of the universe.

In 1868, Prof. Wm. T. Harris wrote in the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, "All past systems of philosophy are true now, if we seize them as ratios. When we change one term of the ratio, we must likewise change the other; when we substitute one national life for another, we must likewise change the form of solution, or the other term of the ratio. This substitution is only possible to him who knows the constant or the index value of the ratio, for by this he is able to make the requisite change in the consequent term. The constant in human history is the activity which has for its aim the production of rational self-consciousness."

In a later number of the same journal, he wrote: "The depth of a system of thought has an infallible test in the manner it disposes of institutions. When one man, or set of men, get up on the house-tops and proclaim a new doctrine for all mankind, civilization answers back, 'What do you make of my creations,—the institutions of realized intelligence,—the family, society, the state, and religion?' If the answer comes again, 'Try my experiment of doing away with all these or of substituting contrivances of individualism for them,' no heed is given to the pseudo-prophetic voice. For the forms of civilization—the laws and usages which constitute the warp and woof of its institutions—are not the vain thought o fabstract theorists, but the grim necessity in which the human will has made possible the exercise of its freedom. For necessity and freedom are harmonized in institutions alone, and without institutions man is a savage and nothing more. The form of freedom is to the child and uncultured adult a constraining necessity; to the partly cultured man, it becomes an ethical or a moral law; to the clearest insight and highest culture, it becomes spontaneous independent choice and volition, what Spinoza and the Mystics call Love."

These utterances are introduced here to answer in advance those who object to the subject-matter of speculative thought, asserting that it has no bearing upon practical activity. "Let us turn our backs," they say, "to the problems of God, Freedom, and Immortality; let us give up all vain inquiry into the why, whence, and whither of the universe; let us keep to the logic of facts, and leave to idealists the realm of pure thought." But how are we to accept the facts upon which they so confidently rely, how discriminate between the essential and the unessential? Facts are not of equal significance: science neglects one and preserves another. What is the ultimate test of truth? "The verdict of consciousness," says Lewes. The final appeal is to thought. There all men are idealists, and only vary in the amount of insight they possess, what is partial to one being whole to another. The simplest fact comprehended in its entirety reveals the secret of the universe.

Dr. Maudsley, in his Physiology of Mind, alludes to the little favor in which metaphysics is held at the present day, and the very general conviction that there is no profit in it, dividing those who cultivate it as a science into three classes: professors in colleges, whose business it is to do so, who have little occasion for observation, and much leisure for introspective contemplation; ambitious youths, who, like children with the measles, go through an attack of metaphysics, and escape similar affections thereafter; and metaphysical philosophers, who, never having been trained in the methods and work of a scientific study of nature, have not submitted their understandings to facts, but live in a more or less ideal world of thought. In what world, then, do the physicists live? Have they not dissolved the universe into ghostly abstractions, ideal forces and laws? Are they not holding asunder dead results, instead of grasping all together in one living organic unity? "Truth," they say, "cannot be known: a science of universals is impossible." Yet the very statement presupposes the identity of subject and object in a universal, the Ego. The "I" in every moment is "I," that is the ground which connects everything in it universally. Otherwise, two representations which I have in different points of time can never be the same.

"The thinking thinks itself," says Aristotle, "through participation with that which is thought by it: it becomes this object in its own activity in such manner that the subject and object are identical. For the apprehending of thought and essence is what constitutes reason. The activity of thinking produces that which is perceived: so that the activity is rather that which reason seems to have of a divine nature. Speculation (pure thinking) is the most excellent employment. If, then, God is always engaged in this, as we are at times, He is admirable, and, if in a higher degree, more admirable. But He is in this pure thinking, and life, too, belongs to Him; for this activity of thought is life. He is this activity. The activity returning into itself is the most excellent and eternal life. We say therefore that God is an eternal and the best living being. So that life and duration are uninterrupted and eternal; for this is God."

To this quotation from Aristotle, I add another from Emerson's Plato: "Having paid his homage as for the human race to the Illimitable," says Emerson, "Plato stood erect, and for the human race affirmed, 'And yet things are knowable!'—that is, the Asia in his mind was first heartily honored, the ocean of love and power, before form, before will, before knowledge, the Same, the Good, the One; and now, refreshed and empowered by this worship, the instinct of Europe, namely, culture, returns; and he cries, 'Yet things are knowable!' They are knowable because, being from one, things correspond. There is a scale; and the correspondence of heaven to earth, of matter to mind, of the part to the whole, is our guide. As there is a science of stars called astronomy, a science of quantities called mathematics, so there is a science of sciences,—I call it Dialectic,—which is the Intellect discriminating the false and the true. It rests on the observation of identity and diversity; for to judge is to unite to one object the notion which belongs to it. . . . I announce to men the Intellect. I announce the good of being interpenetrated by the mind that made nature; this benefit, namely, that it can understand nature which it made and maketh. Nature is good, but intellect is better, as the lawgiver is before the lawreceiver. I give you joy, O sons of men! that truth is altogether wholesome, that we have hope to search out what might be the very self of things."

Thus, in Plato, in Aristotle, are found the truths taught in this summer School of Philosophy. Old do you call them? They are not of time: they are forever old, forever new, the Eternal Verities that underlie all philosophy and all religion. Because the Concord School—recognizing this—seeks to dissolve into its own thought the solutions of the world's great thinkers, it has been called a backward movement. But surely, if we would approximate to absolute truth, we cannot ignore the thoughts of other men, which are objective phenomena demanding explanation as much as physical facts. The past must be studied, that we may find the permanent beneath the transient in human history, the ideal manifested in its constant succession of changing forms. The philosophy of to-day must include in itself all past systems and phases of thought, recognizing more and more the whole universe, spiritual and material, as its mirror.

Digitized by Google

Some account of the lectures and of the method pursued at the school may be interesting to readers of the Index. Come with me, then, this morning to Hillside Chapel, and I will attempt a faint reproduction of the scene. Here at the gate is the barge, the euphonious name of the vehicle that conveys students to and from the village. Exchanging friendly greetings, we pass up a winding path that leads through Mr. Alcott's grounds. The dream of a life is realized here: faith has wrought its own fulfilment. Under the trees, students are loitering, engaged in earnest discourse, or absorbed in meditation, or enjoying simply the beauty and freshness of the morning. From a window of the Orchard House, occupied this summer by Prof. Harris, the face of a fair-haired, blue-eyed little girl looks out shyly. Has Mr. Alcott laid a spell upon us, or does her wise little smile seem to say that she has mastered all philosophies? We must discipline fancy: we have reached the chapel over whose gabled porch Mr. Alcott's favorite grape-vine wanders. Entering, we are in an oblong room, with an open fireplace at one end, and a platform in the centre, occupying an alcove with a convenient door for exit. The walls are unplastered, but brackets are attached here and there, holding busts of Plato, Pestalozzi, Emerson, Thoreau, etc.; and behind the speaker's table hangs an engraving of Raphael's "School of Athens." The plainness of the interior is further relieved by occasional festoons of evergreen and vases of flowers. The seats are pine chairs and benches, strictly logical in every sense of the word. No yielding to sentiment here: the stern relentlessness of duty is rigidly enforced. Many of their occupants are women,—hence bodily discomfort is soon forgotten in the pursuit of ideal truth. At the right of the platform sits Mr. Alcott, the Dean of the Faculty, dignified and benign; at the left, Mr. Emery, the director of the school, a true descendant of the old Greeks. He came to Concord over a year ago, sacrificing to his love of philosophy and literature a flourishing business in Quincy, Ill. His words are pertinent and to the point whenever he speaks, which is but rarely. Other members of the Faculty present are Dr. Jones, Prof. Harris, Dr. Kidney, Mr. Sanborn, and Mr. Snider. Mr. Alcott is the lecturer: his subject is Boehme. This lecture is the fourth in a course of five upon Mysticism. Though eighty years old, the spirit of eternal youth is in his face and voice. A mystic among mystics, he dwells in a serene but stimulating atmosphere, influencing others through his high discourse and moral purity even more than through his writings. Of his lecture, I can give but an imperfect outline.

Boehme's first principles are light and darkness; for all production depends upon the harmonious strife of two contraries. These two principles dwell in God from eternity. In a state of union, they constitute an infinitely perfect good; separated, they manifest two worlds, one of which is evil. The evil world exists in God potentially, not actually. The separation of the two principles does not impair the unity of the divine essence. God is the sum of the universe, the original nothing and all. But nothing to us, and nothing in itself, are different things. Bring a lamp into a dark room, light is manifested; extinguish it, darkness is manifested. To hell, God is nothing, as light to darkness, as life to death. "Everything," says Boehme, "longs after the other,—the upper after the lower, the lower after the upper; for they are separated from each other. Thus the earth is full of hunger after the constellation and spiritus mundi, so that she has no rest." Or, in other words, the unresting succession of the universe is the struggle to express the infinite in finite facts. Boehme saw clearly that, in thinking God, the identity of two contraries must be thought. Boundless affirmation is a dead, unconscious nonentity. Limit is necessary to the realization of extension, negation to that of affirmation.

An interesting conversation followed. Prof. Harris traced the historical descent of theosophy as distinguished from philosophy. The mystic or theosophist uses poetical tropes and metaphors, brings up matter into spirit, and makes the highest realities correspond with those below. His peculiarity is freshness of insight. Theosophy is the test of philosophic knowing: the philosopher should be able to penetrate the mystic's hidden meaning, and translate it into his own technique.

Prof. Harris then explained the nature of evil clearly and forcibly. I do not recall his words, and can give but an adumbration of their meaning. Evil must be ascribed to passivity. There is no such thing as a created perfect in so far as it is merely passive. Material things are passive, negative, limited from without: spiritual things are active, positive, self-limiting. Fate prevails everywhere in nature: each natural thing is constrained to be what it is by surrounding circumstances. Man is a twofold being, natural and spiritual. So far as he belongs to the world of nature, he is limited from without, constrained by animal impulses and appetites. But, as a spiritual being, he is self-determining, able to rise into the realm of freedom through his own activity. He can negate animal selfishness, abdicate the natural self, and realize the rational self,—an image of God,—the self that lives through participation with mankind, each for all and all for each.

Mr. Alcott, Miss Peabody, and others joined in the discussion. Mr. Snider alluded to the difficulty of accounting for the negative. Whence does it come? Was God the author of evil? He compared the Eastern and Western philosophies on this point, and showed how the Hebrew differed from other Oriental theories, as it begins with life, although chaos existed before. He considered the matter to some extent incomprehensible. Prof. Harris had one word to offer in reply to an intimation that his view of the Absolute was deficient in love. He affirmed that, on the contrary, it presents love from beginning to end. God stands self-loving, and all things and beings that he creates in space and time stand related to love as the final cause. Love is the ideal, the result even of the coldest philosophic thought.

An effort was made to induce the ladies to contribute more freely to the conversation. Mrs. Thompson, of Indianapolis, wittily responded that, since philosophy enjoins self-restraint, silence on the part of those who are accounted so fluent and willing to talk indicates the practice of the highest virtue. A brilliant speaker herself, Mrs. Thompson might safely disregard the practice of such virtue. For, though dulness in a woman is as respectable as dulness in a man, it certainly inflicts a greater hurt on the sensibilities of an audience. The world styles woman the weaker sex, but does not like to be taken at its word, and bored by this weakness. Parenthetically, it may be mentioned that, notwithstanding the chivalrous homage paid to woman in this school, there was more than one indication that man finds a distance drawn across his way, difficult to pass, when he seeks to fathom the secrets of her nature. The higher ground upon which he meets her intellectually implies mutual recognition, a tacit rather than expressed acknowledgment of her peculiar excellences.

To this slight sketch of a morning's work at the School of Philosophy, I will add that of an evening's, the evening of the day described. Prof. Wm. T. Harris, of St. Louis, is the lecturer. The subject is Aristotle. A steady rain is falling, but the audience room is crowded as usual when he speaks. Nor is this remarkable. For what American university gives in its course of study so comprehensive an exposition of speculative philosophy as Prof. Harris's? The present course includes lectures on Plato, Aristotle, Kant, Fichte, and Hegel. An earlier course treated of Philosophic Knowing, Philosophic First Principles, Immortality, and Philosophy in its Relations to Art and Religion. The lecturer's clearness and depth of insight illuminate the abstrusest topics. He leads his listeners up the dizzy heights of thought, so that rays of light grow visible where the path seems darkest, and inspiration is given to follow and persevere. To a winning manner, a pleasant voice, and the real humility of genius, he adds wonderful patience,—a patience so untiring that he forgets himself, his physical well-being, in his willingness to help others.

Before attempting an outline of the evening's work, it may be interesting to give, so far as I am able, his explanation of the first principle of the universe, starting from the idea of dependence. A being is either dependent or independent. If it is dependent, it implies another being upon which it depends, and to which it belongs as a part to a whole. To say that something is independent is to say that it is a whole. Reciprocal dependence makes an independent including whole as a system. But independent being must have determinations (Bestimmungen), otherwise it would be an empty void, a pure nothing. If its determinations are from without, external, they are limitations and modifications. An independent being cannot have external modifications. Yet it must have determinations. Hence it must be self-determined. Self-determination implies that the constitution or nature be self-originated. Thus it exists dually, as subject and object of itself. How is the contradiction solved? Each side becomes identical, returns into itself: as determining or active, it acts only upon its own determining; and, as passive or determined, it is the self-same active itself. To comprehend self-determination, one must be able to seize identity and difference, and annul both. Its movement is a movement of self-recogniiton. Hence the true first principle of the universe is self-conscious being. Its activity must be in accordance with its own nature. Activity is expression. The activity of self-consciousness would tend to express itself in the object, to assimilate the object more and more to itself. If the first principle of the universe is free and personal, nature, emanating from such a source, must close its series in a final product that will transcend nature, and reflect the highest principle through its own self-activity. Self-recognition, on the part of the Absolute, implies the existence of immortal beings. "God, as self-conscious reason, separates Himself from Himself in the act of knowing Himself as object, thereby creating all forms of chaos and the chaotic; and in the recognition of Himself as object annulling the chaos and chaotic, creating the rising spiral of nature, and resting from creation with the contemplation of His image,—self-conscious intelligence in man." To accuse such an idea of anthropomorphism is misapprehension. The absolute perfection or infinity of God is not in any way limited by attributing to him personality.

With this imperfect statement, which I hope will be found intelligible, I pass to the subject of the evening's lecture, Aristotle. Even had I space, I could not hope to do justice to its profundity of thought,—the result of long-continued study and research.

Introductory to the theme, the lecturer briefly reviewed his preceding discourse on Plato. Socrates was the first great thinker who discovered firm ground for speculation in the universal and necessary ideas of reason which underlie all thought as its logical condition. These ideas are objective as well as subjective, not an attribute of the individual, but the constitutive nature of all individuals. All other principles go down in the dialectical process, but these remain firm. What Socrates began, Plato completes. He recognizes only the universal,—the idea,—the good as the essential. The true is not the sensuous existence, but that which is self-determined. The intellectual world is therefore the true, the eternal, potentially and actually divine.

Plato would call the whole year the "total form" or the "idea," and he would speak of a day as participating only one three hundred and sixty-fifth in the year. So, too, he would say that spring participates in the year. The totality of the phases of a being is unfolded in its history. If a being were to realize all of its potentialities at once, you would have Plato's Absolute idea, or an eternal being, because it could not change by realizing some new potentiality. Differences are not what endures, but what exists only in a state of change. The Absolute of Plato is a movement which returns into itself, in itself one and self-identical.

Plato and Socrates expend their strength on the world of man instead of on the world of nature. A new spirit with regard to nature begins with Aristotle. He is the discoverer of almost all the sciences. He clearly saw chief elements or principles, giving them their technical names which hold to this day. According to his view, the totality of the possibilities of any one thing involves other things, perhaps all things; hence natural science will be synthetic, and continue to trace out the unity not only of particular things in a common process, but also of entire departments of nature. When science exhausts the potentialities of a thing, it will possess a definition of the "idea" of that thing,—its eternal archetype, its essential nature. "Whoever assumes an accidental origin of things denies," says Aristotle, "in so doing, nature and the natural order of things; for the natural involves the possession of a principle in itself, by means of which a continual progress is made until the attainment of its end or aim." Leaves, blossoms, roots, are produced by the plant, and it by them. They produce the seed, and yet they presuppose the seed as their own origin. The changes of a thing will circle forever within the round of its possibilities, and the final cause of the whole process will be revealed in the definition of its "idea." The circle of its potentialities includes the entire circle of its dependence, and hence of its moving principle and resulting motion. Thus the "idea" must be a self-determining form. Aristotle here comes into formal accord with Plato and Socrates.

The necessary existence of each idea in its reality as an individual is either a system of interdependent things, or the soul of an organized living being. Substance is, therefore, not an abstraction: it is concrete and individual; it is the union of matter and form (ideal totality); it can possess true individuality only because it contains the total of potentialities, and hence is identical under all changes that fall within it.

Aristotle's doctrine of first and second entelechies is an important thought. Neither is mere potentiality: first entelechy is a being who has the "idea" within itself, and can realize it, but has not done so; second entelechy is a being who has realized it through its own activity.

The lecturer explained with remarkable force and clearness Aristotle's distinction between the active reason and the passive reason. But as Christendom, with the assistance of Mohammedanism, devoted two centuries toward obtaining an insight into this thought, I cannot hope to make it intelligible. I shall therefore leave Aristotle, and attempt a brief description of other work pursued at the school.

A course of ten lectures on Platonism, and its Relation to Modern Civilization, was delivered by Dr. H. K. Jones, of Jacksonville, Ill. Having studied Plato patiently and minutely for many years, he is able to speak with authority on the topic, and to apply the insight more toward a solution of the problems that meet us to-day. Plato, he affirms, is yet master of the world's thought. Humanity is one through all its æons. The only absolute primordial is spirit. Nature is the mere panorama of the supernatural. The secret of matter is well-nigh divulged in the light of modern science. It justifies the proposition that there are no ponderable, fixed, alternate particles or atoms. All matter is resolvable into force. Different forces are but manifestations of one persistent force, which creates and destroys its particular phases or determinations. The so-called creation, the genesis of nature, is a perpetually fresh evolution of the central power of the universe. Human society must have two priesthoods,—one in the temple of nature, the other in the temple of spirit.

But any adequate presentation of his doctrines would be impossible in the space at my disposal. Nor can I hope in what follows to indicate more than the general drift, perhaps not even that, of the lectures noticed.

The Rev. W. H. Channing, in a series of four lectures on Oriental and Mystical Philosophy, gave a sympathetic interpretation of Buddhism and the earlier religions, and explained his own peculiar doctrine in regard to the law of ascension by the spiral. This he considers the divine mode of action everywhere, revealed in the sap of the plant and the dust of the highway as clearly as in spiritual development. Man's being is fourfold, bringing up always the three into the One.

The Philosophy of the Beautiful and the Sublime was ably treated by the Rev. Dr. Kidney, of Minnesota. Beauty is visible to reason alone. Its existence is an express acknowledgment of rational mind. Why should we be affected by vapor, color, space, and extent? The facts are inadequate to explain the impression produced. Beauty is the sensuous manifestation of the infinite. "Nature," says Carlyle, "is the time-vesture of God, and reveals him to the wise, hides him from the foolish."

Mr. F. B. Sanborn, Secretary of the School, presented the Philosophy of Charity, its nature and ground, in a brief but interesting discourse. Charity in its essence is nothing less than love, a thought beautifully illustrated by Mr. Sanborn. "In charity," says Lord Bacon, "there is no excess: neither can angel or man come to danger by it." Why, then, has the term "philanthropist" become almost a reproach? What do we mean by the evils of charity? These questions led from its theoretical ground to its practical aspects, which were discussed in the conversation that followed.

In the department of literary criticism, Mr. Denton J. Snider, of St. Louis, gave a course of five lectures on Shakspeare. He is the author of Snider's System of Shakspeare's Dramas, a work commended by Prof. Harris as containing "a scientific method of criticism, a profound system of ethical philosophy, a science of æsthetics, an insight into the literary method and intellectual and moral point of view of the greatest literary genius that has yet appeared in human history, and a view of the reasons why criticism has pronounced Shakspeare to be the greatest of literary men."

Discriminating between the criticism of form and the criticism of content, Mr. Snider interprets Shakspeare chiefly through the latter. "Why is Shakspeare the greatest of poets?" he inquires. "Not because of his language, or of his imagery, or of his constructive ability, or even of his characterization. These are all very wonderful indeed; but they have been reached by lesser minds. His supreme greatness lies in his comprehension and embodiment of the ethical—that is, institutional—world. Its profoundest collisions he penetrates with his inevitable glance. He knows too their mediation and final solution. . . . The importance of the institutional element is not confined to the study of Shakspeare. It is the deepest moving principle of that which is vital and permanent in all literature, from the Homeric epos to the modern novel. Men will cherish and hold on to what is highest in themselves; and the work of art must adumbrate something which is of eternal interest. Such are the conflicts of the family, state, society, and institutions generally."

To prove that Shakspeare was a philosophic thinker, Mr. Snider cites the drama of Troilus and Cressida, wherein Ulysses insists upon subordination as the primal law of institutional life. Take but "degree" away, and the realized world of right would crumble to ruin.

> "Strength should be lord of imbecility,
> And the rude son should strike his father dead:
> Force should be right,—or, rather, right and wrong,
> Between whose endless jar justice resides,
> Should lose their names, and so should justice too.
> Then everything includes itself in power,
> Power into will, will into appetite,
> And appetite—an universal wolf,
> So doubly seconded with will and power—
> Must make perforce an universal prey,
> And last eat up itself."

The whole philosophy of sensualism is here burnt to ashes. Man is resolved into appetite, a universal wolf, that must of necessity make a universal prey, till it finally comes back and eats up itself. The negative result is precisely drawn, and, strangest of all, in the very manner of the Hegelian dialectic.

One may protest against Mr. Snider's interpretations, but it would be difficult to find a flaw in the chain of logical reasoning by which they are supported. To justify dissent, one must appeal to another standpoint.

A unique feature in the way of criticism was an imaginary conversation on "The Literary Art," between a poet, artist, and philosopher, by Mr. John Albee. There was an element of the unexpected in it that added to the delight of those who listened, charmed by its unobtrusive eloquence, its quaint mixture of wisdom and simplicity. It is to be hoped that Mr. Albee will add other conversations, and publish all in a book, that may take its place by the side of Landor and Friends in Council. He is one of the few who have succeeded in this difficult but delightful style of composition. I quote a few passages:—

Artist.—Poetry deals in the self-evident, in things no sooner said than seen to be true. Philosophy assumes the self-evident, and employs itself in proving it, picking up on the way many truths. I value it, not so much for its noble intention as for the freedom and light which have ever unawares accompanied its exercise.

Philosopher.—Let us not claim too large results for any species of intellectual activity. We ought to feel that there is no work of the reason or imagination which is yet complete and perfect, and not content ourselves with writing their biographies.

Poet.—Are there not perfect models in poetry?

Philosopher.—There may be, but no one is permitted to follow them. One of a kind, not two, is the rule in the ark of the arts. Do you not see what room and hope this leaves, instead of exclusion and despair? One ought to be deeply thankful that he is not permitted to repeat himself even, without loss of reputation.

Poet.—How can he help it, if he gives himself to one kind of work?

Philosopher.—By choosing the right kind. The path by which you enter literature or art is as important as that by which you enter life. It has as deep moral significance and results. Begin so that you can

> "Obey the voice at eve obeyed at morn."

The literary art will come swiftly to your aid. How much can you hold? Of certain things, you may fill and refill yourself, and become no greater; of others, if you fill, you become continually enlarged and more and more productive. It is not now as in former ages, when men unconsciously absorbed the ideas and images of their time and country, and spontaneously reproduced them. But with us there is no longer simple faith, positive symbol, and prescribed form to direct the artist and assure public attention. For us there is absolute freedom in choice of subject and manner of treatment. Hence the importance of the choice, and the dangers of caprice and dilettanteism,—the danger, while we reject ancient models, of forgetting the fundamental principles on which they were based, and on which we must be based to be secure of rightly interesting and delighting mankind.

Both Mr. Albee and Mr. Snider unite poetic to critical insight: both are poets as well as critics. One embalms the memory of the Indian race: the other interprets the Delphic oracle. But their fresh and spontaneous verse betrays no conscious art: they apparently sing, like Goethe's bard,

> "Wie der Vogel singt,
> Der in den Zweigen wohnet."

The spiritual significance of the poetic thought of the East was interpreted with rare force and beauty by a lecturer whose Oriental scholarship is well known to readers of the Index, Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N.Y. "Loose the knots of the heart," says Hafiz. Then thou shalt learn that the soul in thee is the soul of all, that the sounds thou oughtest to hear vibrate from East as well as West.

Of the remaining lectures, I can give the titles only: Aristocracy, by Ralph Waldo Emerson; The Personality of God, and the Relations of Religion and Philosophy to Christianity, by the Rev. Dr. Elisha Mulford; The Philosophy of History, by Mr. D. A. Wasson; Color, and Early American Art, by Mrs. Ednah Dean Cheney; Modern Society, by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe; Ghosts, by the Rev. Dr. Hedge; Conscience and Consciousness, by Prof. Andrew P. Peabody; God in Nature, by the Rev. Dr. Bartol; and a reading from Thoreau's manuscripts by his friend, Mr. H. G. O. Blake.

Outside of the school were genial gatherings, where one might drink tea in the shadow of the Old Manse; or hear Mr. Alcott recount "The Chase" with youthful ardor; or some poet talk of Greece, with the sunlight flickering between the trees; or listen to reminiscences of Brook Farm Community, of Hawthorne or Thoreau or Margaret Fuller,—an element of the ideal blending with the actual, and broadening life's horizon.

But here this record of the school must close. Inspiration and help have flowed from its teachings into the lives of many. It has given an impulse to thought that must inevitably express itself in action. So far as I might in a sketch like the present, I have sought to render its spirit faithfully. I leave to others the task of criticism.

THE REV. LYMAN ABBOTT tells of Puritans who wouldn't eat an egg laid on Monday; "for presumptively, in the order of nature, the hen had prepared it on the Sabbath day."

AN ANSWER TO THINON'S QUESTION:

What is done with the Income of Trinity Church, New York?

1104 L STREET, WASHINGTON, D.C.,
Sept. 8, 1880.

Dear Mr. Editor:—

Your issue of July 1, 1880, contained a question which I have tried ever since to find time to answer. But, as it is a standing question in certain circles, I hope you will let me answer it partially now. Your New York correspondent, estimating the value of the property owned by Trinity Church Corporation at $60,000,000, asks: "What is done with the great income of this great estate, that can justify public policy in permitting such dangerous ownership of property? Some one can tell, but who?"

It occurred to me, as I should think it might to "Thinon," were his charity as fervent as his zeal, that the "who" in this sentence referred either to the Comptroller of Trinity Church Corporation or to the Rector of Trinity Church. To one of these I wrote, therefore, and received the Year-Book of Trinity Parish for 1879. I found an amount of work recorded therein which would gladden your correspondent, for I respect his anxiety for the beneficent use of property.

According to the Comptroller of Trinity Church Corporation, its property is worth not $60,000,000, but $7,000,000. Its income is about $500,000. It pays the city of New York about $100,000 in taxes; and it gives to eighteen poor parishes, outside its own limits, about $50,000 a year. Trinity parish includes seven churches, of which the chapels of St. Chrysostom on Seventh Avenue, St. Augustine on Houston Street between the Bowery and Second Avenue, and St. Cornelius on Governor's Island, are entirely free. St. John's Chapel, on Varick Street above Beach, is also almost entirely free; and St. Paul's Chapel, on Broadway between Fulton and Vesey Streets, is free, with the exception of a few pews owned by individuals, which are not under the control of the vestry. Besides six or seven other charitable organizations and guilds, each of these seven parishes, save the military chapel, St. Cornelius, contains an industrial school and a daily free school. I do not find the cost of each of these given. I find that the industrial school of Trinity Church employs sixteen teachers, and receives two hundred and thirty-five scholars, and expends $1,000 a year in purchasing materials and paying for their make. Trinity parish school has six teachers and three hundred and thirty-one scholars; "is maintained by the vestry at an annual outlay of $6,000. Boys are taught all the ordinary English branches; also, if it is desired, Latin, French, German, and instrumental music. There are no charges whatever."

St. John's Chapel has three teachers and two hundred and thirty-eight scholars, maintained at a yearly cost of $3,300. It holds, every Saturday, an industrial school, open to children of all religions, with forty teachers and about one thousand scholars. The daily free school of Trinity Chapel has three teachers, one hundred and thirty-seven scholars. Annual cost, $2,770. Like St. Paul's, St. Chrysostom's Chapel maintains a free school for girls. Teachers, two; scholars, one hundred and forty-eight. Annual cost, about $1,500. St. Augustine's industrial school has forty teachers and five hundred and fifty-four children. They are taught hand-sewing, machine-sewing, crocheting, and embroidery. The Corporation of Trinity maintains, at an annual cost of $7,200, an infirmary for the sick poor of the parish, and as many more as they can make room for. Of the one hundred and forty-five in the house, December, 1877, there were, by December, 1878,—

Discharged, well,		85
"	improved,	32
"	unimproved,	7
Died,		9
Remaining in the house,		12

All the deaths were from incurable diseases. The infirmary garden "is an unfailing source of delight and gratitude, which can be understood only by those living in this section during the heats of midsummer. Once, the old women from Trinity Home for the Aged came to spend the afternoon among the flowers. Another day, some of the children from St. Mary's Hospital were brought down; and it was touching to see the delight of the little ones, even of those who could only lie under the trees and watch the rest."—(Report of Sister Eleanor, Superintendent.)

The infirmary is in charge of the "Sisters of St.

Digitized by Google

Mary"; for thus these bands of disassociated women like to enroll themselves in alliance with the benign departed. If you would like to know what sort of women they are, here is a short sketch of one of them:—

"At the infirmary, the memory of Sister Ruth will ever be sweet and precious. She had been there for about a year; and, in addition to her duties inside, she visited the outside sick. She was loved by all who knew her. One summer afternoon she gave a little party in the garden, to the poor children with whom she had become acquainted in sick calls. Observing others from the street looking wistfully through the railings, she went out, and fetched them in to her little feast. . . . In August, when the awful news came from Memphis, and the Sisters there sent for help, she volunteered to go. She left the infirmary August 31, and on the 18th of September a telegram came, announcing that she was dead of the pestilence."

The Corporation of Trinity gives $2,000 a year to provide beds in St. Luke's Hospital.

I am encroaching upon your time; but, if you will glance at the year-book of Trinity Parish, you will see that its some sixty educational organizations, guilds, sisterhoods, brotherhoods, and various reliefs, must require a great deal of money to carry on their works, as well as an incalculable amount of energy, thought, and solicitude. It would be felt in New York, were all these quietly flowing little fountains of purity and healing, comfort, and intelligence, dried up.

I have dwelt especially upon Trinity's physical charities, knowing well that you do not consider her spiritual work acts "directly and wisely for the ameliorations of" men's low estate. But this view is that of the minority of the servants of humanity, and you could not consistently ask the majority to be ruled by the convictions of the minority. You may think D. L. Moody too wild a fanatic to be able to tell the truth, when he says to the anti-church men of Baltimore: "You know that, if all the churches in Baltimore were abolished to-morrow, you would take your business, your wives and your families, and get out of Baltimore, as quickly as Lot got out of Sodom."

But you will not accuse Hippolyte Adolphe Taine of raging fanaticism, even though he says: "Whatever be the religion of a country, church is the place to which men come, after six days' toil, to freshen in themselves the sentiment of the ideal." How real and valuable is this office of the church, they only know who have entered by deep sympathy into hard and dull lives, especially of the young.

I trust to your sense of justice and love of humanity to give space to this most imperfect record of the good works of the accused Trinity Parish.

Yours truly, MARY STACY WITHINGTON.

BOOK NOTICES.

NOTE.—It is proposed to make this a carefully prepared department of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX, and the favors of publishers are respectfully solicited, especially in respect to books that concern the general purpose of our paper.

REMINISCENCES OF REV. WM. ELLERY CHANNING, D.D. By Elizabeth Palmer Peabody. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1880.

It is never too late to recommend the reading of a good book. And these personal reminiscences of Dr. Channing which Miss Peabody has given to the public—though printed at the time of the centennial celebration of Channing's birthday last April—are certainly sufficiently good to find readers for many a month and year to come.

Indeed, so long as Dr. Channing is a subject of biographical study, or his name has an interest as a representative one in the progress of religious ideas, will Miss Peabody's book have a special value. For the last twenty years of Dr. Channing's life, she probably had better opportunity of gaining a personal knowledge of him and of the workings of his thought than any other person beyond the circle of his immediate family,—a circle, however, it should be added, which included his nephew and biographer, Wm. H. Channing. Miss Peabody, at this time, was carrying on her school in Boston; and the daughter of Dr. Channing was for seven years her pupil. From this relation grew the intimacy between the father and the teacher. Dr. Channing was much interested in Miss Peabody's methods of education. But, from problems of education, they progressed to the discussion of philosophical, religious, and philanthropic questions. The teacher became a pretty regular visitor on afternoons in the Channing family. She read to him, and after a time became a copier of his sermons for printing, he reading philosophy to her while she copied his manuscripts. She brought him news from the intellectually active circle in which she moved, but from which he was mostly detained by his chronic invalidism,—news of new-comers into the circle, of topics of conversation there, of the intellectual work individuals of note were doing, etc.; and thus she had unusual facilities for getting within the boundary of that personal reserve which Dr. Channing permitted few to pass, and for studying his character and mental methods.

It must, however, be admitted that, if Miss Peabody had not been so much of an intellectual force herself, if she had been a less original and independent thinker, these exceptional facilities might have enabled her to give a more trustworthy report of Dr. Channing's intellectual attitude and ways. She was at this time in a state of intense mental activity. Her vigorous mind was at a period of exuberant development and growth. She was a speculator in all the realms of thought. And she had already her mental and moral theories to maintain. At any period of her life, moreover, her mental temperament has been of too subjective a cast for a good biographer. She is not able sufficiently to separate her own consciousness from the objective facts she reports upon. Dr. Channing had occasion to warn her against the danger of mistaking her own impressions or inferences for outward facts. And where in the Reminiscences she reports his conversations, which she often does at length, from notes written out in her room afterward, it is evident, though she may give perhaps most of his prominent words, that it is essentially her style, and not his. And so we cannot help questioning whether the thought was not, to some extent, transformed also in passing through the medium of her own active brain.

Nevertheless, this consideration does not detract from the great value and interest of Miss Peabody's Reminiscences, though, of course, it diminishes their value as absolute testimony. But, properly, it should be taken only as a caution not to depend too exclusively on them in a biographical estimate of Dr. Channing. They must be used with other sources of information. With this proviso, Miss Peabody's book will have lasting worth to the student of Dr. Channing's life and work. It should be said too that the book itself gives ample evidence of the perfect honesty and sincerity of the author in her effort to portray Channing. She does not "star" his letters to escape publishing his occasionally depreciative opinion of herself.

And the book derives additional interest from the fact that of necessity it is, to considerable extent, autobiographical, and also from its many glimpses of persons and events of note that made a part of the intellectual life of New England during a period teeming with the germination and growth of many new ideas. Miss Peabody herself was one of the historical figures of the Transcendental movement, and still survives to advocate its essential truth. And we can but thank her that, in her reverent attempt to set Dr. Channing before us as he appeared to her vision, she has given us also a portrait of no small value of herself, and lifelike sketches of that important thought movement in New England of which she was herself no small part.

THE October Atlantic presents a rich assortment of entertaining and valuable matter. The poetry includes a poem from Whittier and also one from Aldrich, and there are four more from authors of less distinction, all good, and one or two of special excellence. There is no serial story in this number; but instead two finely written sketches, entitled "A Florentine Experiment," by Constance Fenimore Woolson, which occupies nearly thirty pages, and "Deodand," by W. H. Bishop, the author of "Detmold." The article with the title "Business Issues of the Presidential Canvass" is very timely, and discusses in a clear and forcible manner the perils incident to the success of some of the financial theories which are advocated and the overthrow of the existing national policy. The article by Dr. William James, brother of Henry James, Jr., will be especially interesting to radical minds. Though professedly in harmony with the doctrine of evolution, it indicates in a way that affords much food for reflection what seems its limitations and inadequacy to account for a large amount of phenomena, or the occurrences of the world. A paper bearing the title "People of a New England Factory Village" presents an impressive picture of the growing evils of our industrial system. James Henry Haynie reviews "Socialistic and other Assassinations," and alludes to the peculiar influences, in connection with the unsettling of the present European political systems, that conspire to engender crimes of this nature. "The Intimate Life of a Noble German Family" affords an interesting insight into the life of the upper classes of Germany, seldom so fully obtained in ordinary accounts of this country. Richard Grant White shows in his article, "A National Vice," the deplorable extent to which intemperance prevails in England. The "Reminiscences of Washington" continue as good as the preceding.

Several notable recent books are discussed in the concluding pages of the magazine, among which is Miss Peabody's late one on Channing. The view advanced in respect to this eminent man corresponds with that of Mr. Frothingham in his allusion to him in the last number of the Free Religious Index,—that his worship has gone far enough, and will now admit of some modification.

The Contributor's Club possesses the usual interest and vivacity.

THE Journal of Speculative Philosophy for October contains two lengthy articles about Kant. The first is a criticism of some of his fundamental positions by Hutchinson Stirling; and the second is a defence, in which Sterling is combated. The third article is by Dr. H. K. Jones, and is one of the lectures he gave in the summer to the Concord School of Philosophy. He calls it "Philosophic Outlines," but it is an interminable rhapsody of very little real value. The only other article is one by Geo. S. Bowers, on "The Philosophical Element in Shelley." It is a very readable and interesting account of the growth of Shelley's philosophical conceptions from materialism to a profoundly intellectual idealism. Mr. Bowers claims that Shelley was a philosopher as well as a poet, and that he was capable of equally great results in either field of effort.

THE great earthquake at Smyrna on the 29th and 30th of July seems to have been especially anti-religious, judging from the number of mosques and churches it destroyed. One Turk was killed in his oratory; and at Menemen all the religious edifices, both Mohammedan and Christian, were thrown down. At Horokeui, where Orthodox Greek pilgrims are wont to resort, the havoc was very great, and many pilgrims were killed. So impartial, however, was this convulsion of mother earth that it seems it will be impossible for either the disciple of the camel-driver or the follower of the carpenter to point to the earthquake as an illustration of God's preference, and as an evidence of the true religion. Had matters been so fairly conducted when the world was young, it is probable that Cain would never have invented and used the first shillelagh.—Secular Review.

POETRY.

For the Free Religious Index.

THE EARTH AND MAN.

The theatre in space and scene
Of human struggle grim with fate,
The old earth rolls unchanged, serene,
Since Clio penned her earliest date.

The heaven's azure still roofs o'er
Her rolling orb with blue unworn;
Her oceans heave from shore to shore,
As fresh a surge as in her morn.

Man, whom through space she swiftly buoys
In bright gyration round the sun,
Ideal longing urges on
From change to change; him old truth cloys,
And ever new truth must be won;
Still Freedom claims him for her son,
And waves her banner bright to lure
Him up to Reason's daylight pure.

From Superstition's orgies wild
And brutal force she weans her child,
With gradual enticement mild:
Her final triumph is secure.

B. W. BALL.

Digitized by Google

The Free Religious Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 23, 1880.

The FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX is published every Thursday by the Free Religious Association, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Boston. Terms: Three dollars per year.

THE OBJECTS of the Association are the objects of THE INDEX; namely, "To promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history"; in other words, Righteousness, Brotherhood, and Truth. And it seeks these ends by the method of perfect Liberty of Thought. It would subject the traditional authority of all special religions and alleged revelations—the Christian no less than others—to the judgment of scientific criticism and impartial reason. It would thus seek to emancipate Religion from bondage to ecclesiastical dogmatism and sectarianism, in order that the practical power of religion may be put more effectually to the service of a higher Morality and an improved Social Welfare.

THE Editor of the FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX has no responsibility for any opinions expressed in its columns except his own.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, ... Editor.
DAVID H. CLARK, . Assistant Editor and Business Agent.

☞ ALL communications intended for the editor should be addressed to New Bedford, Mass.; all business communications to the Business Agent, 3 Tremont Place, Boston.

Among the regular or occasional contributors are:—FELIX ADLER, FRANCIS E. ABBOT, JOHN ALBEE, JOHN W. CHADWICK, Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, ROWLAND CONNOR, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), FREDERICK MAY HOLLAND, ALBERT W. KELSEY, C. D. B. MILLS, MINOT J. SAVAGE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, BENJAMIN F. UNDERWOOD, and Mrs. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Some of our friends have been in the habit of subscribing for an extra copy or more of the Index, for persons who would not be likely themselves to take the paper and yet would be interested in reading it. This is a double benefit, and is an act to be encouraged. We therefore make the offer that, if any one will send us Ten dollars, with the names and post-office address of four persons to whom the Index may be thus sent, we will put such names on our subscription list for one year. The papers will be mailed by us, without trouble to the friends who may send the money and names.

SPECIAL DONATIONS

TO THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, FOR THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS INDEX.

Paid.

LUCRETIA MOTT, Philadelphia	50.00
JOHN C. HAYNES, Boston	200 00
Mrs. C. P. CURTIS, Boston	10 00
Mrs. C. A. TUCKER, New Bedford	10.00
JACOB HOFFNER, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. E. P. ROBERSON, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
GEO. W. ROBINSON, Lexington, Mass.	100.00
Rev. PHOTIUS FISK, Boston	100.00
JOHN CURTIS, Grantville, Mass	25.00
WM. LLOYD GARRISON, JR., Boston	25.00
THEO. ALTSCHUL, New York	2.00
MATTHEW LUCE, Boston	100.00
A. FRANKFIELD, New York	10.00
Mrs. M. T. STEVENS, North Andover, Mass	10.00
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass	18.35
Mrs. D. R. GREENE, New Bedford, Mass	7.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, Mass., one year on pledge	100.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo	25.00
Miss A. B. BUFFUM, Lynn	7.00
T. H. MATHEWS, New Bedford	5.00
EDW. GREENE, New York	7.00
Mrs. S. W. RATHBONE, Princeton, Mass	5.00
FRANCIS SPRINGER, Columbus City, Iowa	10.00
DANA B. HUMPHREY, New Bedford, Mass	25.00
ELIZABETH S. MILLER, Geneva, N.Y., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
JAMES W. BARTLETT, Dover, N.H. (10th assessment)	20.00
Miss S. E. DUNN, Dover, Mass	5.00
SETH HUNT, Springfield, Mass	25.00
Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.	5.00
Mrs. BENJAMIN CUMMINGS, New Bedford, Mass., 10th annual assessment on old Index stock	10.00
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain	5.00

Pledges.

F. W. CHRISTERN, New York, annually for 5 years	25.00
R. B. STONE, Bradford, Pa., annually for 5 years	10.00
S. G. MORGAN, New Bedford, annually for 5 years	25.00
G. F. MATTHES, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
SAMUEL L. HILL, Florence, annually for 5 years	100.00
JOHN L. WHITING, Boston	50.00
ROBERT MOORE, St. Louis, Mo., 10th annual assessment on Index stock	10.00
M. B. GREENSFELDER, St. Louis, Mo. (yearly)	25.00
CLARA M. ROTCH, New Bedford, 10th annual assessment on old Index stock, and the same annually for 4 following years	50.00

WILLIAM J. POTTER, Secretary F. R. A.

LIBERTY UNDER LAW.

Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, in his interesting and graceful address at the meeting in Faneuil Hall on the evening previous to Boston's birthday celebration, quoted the saying of his famous ancestor, Governor Winthrop, that, in dedicating the Massachusetts colony to liberty, it was "liberty to do that only which is good, just, and honest." The saying is a good text for some considerations that are applicable to the cause of Liberalism at the present day.

The sentiment of liberty has been proclaimed almost as a gospel in this country. The word "liberty," by itself, without any defining phrase, is so often on the lips of American citizens, and so deeply engraven in their hearts, that there is some danger that the true relations between liberty and the objects of human life may be overlooked. It is well, therefore, to be reminded of old Governor Winthrop's added clause, that liberty is not to be sought for its own sake, but for ends beyond itself.

What, then, precisely, does liberty signify, when we speak of it as the natural right of human beings? Is it liberty of animal passion, liberty of appetite, liberty of material acquisition, that is meant? It will be said at once that these are low and grovelling meanings (however in a sense they may be included) for a conception so central and grand as that which has been preached for a century in this country as the gospel of human liberty. It need hardly be asked, then, if it is liberty of revenge, liberty to aggrandize one's self at others' cost, liberty in any way to harm one's neighbors; for with indignant promptness the response would come from the mouth of every sane person that the bare suggestion of such a possibility is blasphemy against the fair word and its idea. Is it, then, liberty of life and limb, liberty of the body from all slave-owners in human flesh of whatever sort? Yes: it is this, but more. And so we come to those defining phrases that are oftenest heard, "liberty of thought," "liberty of conscience." Yes, and more quickly, is the reply, this is what it means: it is liberty of these finest, highest functions of our natures, the moral and the intellectual, so that these shall guide and control all the rest. And this answer is so near right that we might stop here.

Yet, on reflection, we remember that intellect has sometimes ignored the natural and rational demands of the body, and that conscience has not infrequently been a tyrant, a bigot, a persecutor, enslaving mind and body and soul to its fanatical behests. And so we must say more exactly, that what is meant is liberty for human beings to grow and develop according to the full intent of their natures, morally, mentally, physically, to the stature of perfect manhood.

That is, liberty is not an object in itself, but a necessary condition for reaching an object; and that object is rightness of living. Mere liberty of action is intellectually and morally meaningless. The action must be for a purpose. And the purpose, as we have already seen, must not mean malice to any creature: it must not mean any pleasure that is harmful to one's self or others: it must not mean any form of vice or injustice or dishonor. The purpose must be beneficent and right, a legitimate object of human nature and human living. There is no other liberty permissible for man than liberty of action for such a purpose. Man ought to be free in body, mind, heart, and soul, but free only because this is the best condition for doing the service and attaining the measure of a true man.

Liberty, therefore, is under law. It is not a condition of reckless and lawless activity, but it is ability to acquire and to keep a condition of activity which is directed by rational intelligence toward a beneficent end. Liberty is duty. Liberty is obligation. Liberty is moral necessity. Liberty is active, unrestricted loyalty to truth and virtue. Liberty is the unfettered service of reason and humanity.

A noble locomotive, clamped safely to its solidly bedded track, guided by the skilled intelligence of an engineer with his hand at the throttle-valve, and thus carrying in triumph its freight of passengers or merchandise to their destined goal, aptly illustrates the true conception of human liberty. The same locomotive off the track, with full steam on and no engineer, rushing recklessly over the ground, to the certain destruction of whatever it comes in contact with, and finally of itself, is an illustration of human liberty when it becomes mere freedom of action, with no principles to guide its action. Liberty under law is order, development, growth, successful accomplishment, peace. Liberty without law is anarchy and ruin.

The liberty, too, that is mere activity, that is not held inflexibly to any worthy aims, degenerates into mental and moral bondage. The liberty that runs to habitual indulgence in low pleasures and vices soon binds its victims to certain grooves of thought and emotion, felt to be degrading and ruinous, yet from which they find it almost impossible to escape. Their liberty ends in the most pitiable and hopeless of slaveries. Liberty under law is mastery of the highest realms of life. Liberty without law is enslavement to life's lowest impulses.

MR. RICHARD GRANT WHITE has been writing in the New York Times a most extravagant tirade against our public schools. The public schools are by no means perfect educational institutions. We have of late years been spending too much time in boasting of them: time that would have been more profitably spent in improving them. But they do not at all deserve the castigation which Mr. White gives them. He has entirely overshot the mark. The public at large will feel the injustice of so sweeping an indictment, and give no heed to his really just criticisms. And just at this time the Catholics will make skilful use of such a Protestant judgment, however unfair it may be, to push their scheme of establishing parochial schools and gathering all Catholic children into them. The Catholic Review reprints Mr. White's article entire, and calls special attention to it as notable testimony that the American public school system is a "hollow sham." It says, "Nothing can be more emphatic and decided than Mr. White's trenchant exposition of the complete failure of our American common schools to make good citizens, honest workingmen, or just employers."

WE not only think it fair, but we are more than willing, to print the vigorous defence of Trinity Church, New York, printed in another column; and we are glad that "Trinity" can make so good a showing in humane works, even though they be subordinated to the ecclesiastical idea of infecting the beneficiaries with a certain theological faith.

THE annual meeting of the National Liberal League just held at Chicago appears to have been the scene of stormy discussions, resulting in another split. At least, Col. Ingersoll, first on the list of Vice-Presidents, and Mr. H. L. Green, Chairman of the Executive Committee and most active officer of the organization, are reported to have announced that they should leave the League, if a certain resolution was adopted; and it was adopted. Whereupon, Col. Ingersoll resigned his office, and withdrew; and it is to be presumed Mr. Green also did, if the report of what he had said be true. But the telegraphic despatches we have seen are meagre, and we wait for a more complete report before making farther comment.

Digitized by Google

"THE POLITICS OF REFORMERS."

How Woman Might, Could, Would, or Should Vote, Secondary Questions to whether she has the Right to Vote at all.

In the Index of Sept. 2, in an article on "The Politics of Reformers," the writer lays down many propositions in which all reasonable men and women must agree, such as: "Political parties cannot be based on special reforms"; and "Special reforms can only be carried by adhering to one well-defined purpose."

The one objectionable feature in the article is the comparative estimate of the importance of woman's enfranchisement with other reforms. And here the writer makes two points that demand consideration.

1. He places the civil and political rights of one-half the citizens of this Republic on a par with temperance, greenbacks, and theological abuses,—the inalienable rights of the individual on a par with what he shall drink, what kind of money he shall carry in his pocket, and what religious superstitions he shall defend or deny!

Religion is a blind sentiment, whose vision grows steadily clearer in the wake of science and civilization; temperance is a question of heredity and dietetic; finance, a riddle, a cunningly devised system of legislation, by which nine-tenths of the human family are doomed to endless labor and taxation, that one-tenth may enjoy ease and luxury. But the political rights of woman involve the acceptance or denial of every fundamental principle on which our republican institutions rest.

My right to doubt or believe the Christian religion, to drink wine or refuse it, to accept or decline the silver trade-dollar, are minor questions to my inalienable right to protect my person and property, my life, liberty, and happiness under government, by having a voice in making the laws and choosing the rulers under whom I live. The founders of our Republic said, "No just government can be formed without the consent of the governed"; but who would have the audacity to say that no just government could be formed without a temperance pledge, a gold basis for our currency, or faith in some theological dogma?

Though all questions of political economy are important in carrying on a government, the primal question is, WHO constitute the government,—the people, all men, and women, or a male aristocracy? And this is the so-called woman question, the most momentous and far-reaching ever under consideration.

2. The writer refers to the oft-repeated assertion that, "if women were enfranchised, their influence would be thrown against the secular nature of our government," in favor of rigid Sunday laws, God in the Constitution, the Bible in our schools, and the exemption of church property from taxation, etc.

It is a legitimate question for women to ask, Who made the laws by which all these abuses exist to-day? Men! Who uphold them by pen and tongue in every pulpit and legislative hall and popular journal in the nation? Men! Who go to Washington year after year, urging a sixteenth amendment recognizing God and the Christian religion in the Constitution? Men! By what process of logical reasoning, then, is it proposed to keep women in political slavery, because it is feared that in freedom they would do precisely what their fathers, husbands, and brothers have already done? Men have been the spiritual guides and teachers of women: they have written, interpreted, and expounded the Bibles, the creeds, the confessions of faith, the catechisms longer and shorter. All women know of the eternal past and future and of the great first cause they have learned from the lips of men. And now, having connived with the priesthood and played upon the religious element in her nature, to her own complete subjection and degradation, in all ages and under all forms of religion alike, would men in the advance-guard of liberal thought in this day perpetuate her spiritual bondage by denying her political liberty? How often in conversation with a husband, when, expressing the most liberal sentiments on religion, suddenly hearing his wife's footsteps, he will say, "But I never talk on this subject with Mary. I think religion is a good thing for women and children. A wholesome fear of something keeps them docile and virtuous. Mary is happy in her faith. I would not unsettle her." To keep woman in ignorance has been the policy in the long past, and we are reaping the evil results to-day. If the husband's love for Mary were not sufficiently strong to rouse him to try and lift her out of her superstitions, his duty to his children should have impelled him to the effort.

Let liberal men remember that fanatical mothers, all over our land, are insidiously training the minds of the Johns and Josephs in their own false ideas; and these sons will bear the scars, all their lives, of the cruel theologies they are instilling to-day. Woman's influence is not less dangerous because it is permitted no expression at the ballot-box, but infinitely more so; for, by denying her all interest in politics, you intensify her enthusiasm for the Church,—the only outlet, outside the home, now vouchsafed, on which she can expend her forces.

In the education of woman, let thinking men now substitute patriotism, the most exalted of all virtues, for religious devotion. Recognize her duty to the State as well as the Church, and she will readily learn the new lesson,—that the affairs of this life which we can comprehend and control are as sacred and important as those of the life hereafter, of which we can have no positive knowledge whatever.

Over the barren deserts of the past, down to the valleys of darkness and death, woman has ever followed the footsteps of fanatics and bigots, earnestly fanning the fires of persecution by the way, though ever bearing the heaviest burdens of superstition on her own shoulders; and why will she not, by the same eternal law of her being, as readily follow the lead of wise men to the promised land of light and liberty, of religious freedom? where there is no funeral pyre for widows, no sacred crocodiles to feed on the flesh of her newborn children, no car of Juggernaut to grind their bones to powder; where women are not hung for witchcraft, and where no Sir Oracle from sacred altars shall dare to say, "I suffer not a woman to speak in the churches," "Wives be in subjection to your husbands," "As Christ is the head of the Church, so is the man the head of the woman." It will not take much liberalizing to induce the women of this Republic to repudiate all such religions.

E. C. S.

OUR LIBRARY.

III. The Germans.

Here we enter so large a region that we can notice only a few of the most striking points.

Goethe towers up above his neighbors, like a lofty peak. His Faust shows all the mental brilliancy of scepticism and all its moral dangers. It is wonderful to see Margaret forced by the keen, cold intellect of Mephistopheles and the fiery fervor of Faust himself to grow up from a mere child into a tragic heroine. How could a girl fail to be ennobled intellectually by a lover, who, when she asks if he believes in God, answers?—

> "Who dare express Him?
> And who profess Him,
> Saying: I believe in Him!
> Who, feeling, seeing,
> Deny His being,
> Saying: I believe Him not!
> The All-enfolding,
> The All-upholding,
> Folds and upholds He not
> Thee, me, Himself?
> Arches not there the sky above us?
> Lies not beneath us, firm, the earth?
> And rise not, on us shining,
> Friendly, the everlasting stars?
> Look I not, eye to eye, on thee,
> And feel'st not, thronging
> To head and heart, the force,
> Still weaving its eternal secret,
> Invisible, visible, round thy life?
> Vast as it is, fill with that force thy heart,
> And when thou in the feeling wholly blessed art,
> Call it, then, what thou wilt,—
> Call it Bliss! Heart! Love! God!
> I have no name to give it!
> Feeling is all in all:
> The Name is sound and smoke,
> Obscuring Heaven's clear glow."

Who can fail to see that this view is grander than that to which Mephistopheles does simple justice, when, personating Faust, he tells the young student, who thinks he is asking the latter's advice about studying theology, that it contains too much poison, and that this is scarcely to be distinguished from the medicine, so that the best way is to hear only a single teacher, and then swear by every word of his, for by such a gate may we enter the temple of certainty!

Another remarkable passage is that near the close of the much undervalued Second Part, where the hero, just before his death and redemption, says:—

> "The sphere of earth is known enough to me;
> The view beyond is barred immutably:
> A fool who there his blinking eyes directeth,
> And men above the clouds to find expecteth!
> Firm let him stand, and look around him well!
> This world means something to the capable.
> Why needs he through Eternity to wend?
> He here acquires what he can apprehend."

These extracts show how well worth study is the whole poem, of which we have several excellent English versions, one of the best being that of Bayard Taylor, from which I have taken the above quotations, changing only a single line for the sake of greater literalness.

Among the Minor Poems, translated by John S. Dwight and his friends, are two versions of that on The Godlike, in which Goethe declares that Nature is unfeeling, and that Man alone is able to reward the good, punish the guilty, and perform what is useful. And in Tyndall's Fragments of Science there is a grand rendering of the Proœmium of the series of poems entitled God, Soul, and the World and dedicated > "To Him who, seek to name Him as we will,

> Unknown within Himself abideth still!
> Strain eye and ear till sight and sense be dim,
> Thou'lt find but faint similitude of Him.
> What were the God who sat outside to scan
> The spheres that 'neath His finger circling ran?
> God dwells within, and moves the world, and moulds,
> Himself and Nature in one form enfolds!"

Schiller is much less advanced; but in Don Carlos there is a fine passage, where its real hero, Marquis von Posa, bids Philip II. to grant freedom of thought, and among his Votive Tablets there is the famous couplet, which Bulwer translates thus:—

> "What thy religion? those thou namest—none?
> None why—because I have religion."

The same vigor with which Lessing attacked bigotry and superstition, and revealed the real value of the Bible and the laws of human development, subjects fully treated of in his Replies to Goeze and his instructive and inspiring account of The Education of the Race, under a series of religions each of which has led to a better, forms the main charm of his greatest poem. This is the famous drama which presents the Moslems, Jews, and Christians who met at Jerusalem, during the reign of Saladin, as ennobled by philanthropy and tolerance or else degraded by bigotry.

Digitized by Google

The hero, Nathan the Wise, on being required by the sultan to pass judgment on the three rival religions, tells this story. A ring which has the property of making its wearer beloved of God and men comes, after being handed down for ages from father to child, into the hands of a man who has three sons equally dear; so that he promises the jewel privately to each in turn, and is finally obliged to have two fac-similes of the original made in secret, that he n ay appear to satisfy all expectations. The dying father gives each son a ring in private, and the holder of each gift claims that his own is genuine. The rings are so much alike that there is no way of telling who is in the right. At last, the case comes before a wise judge, who bids each claimant behave as if his own ring was genuine, and prove its value by winning what love he can from his fellow-men.

Among many other German poems on our side must be mentioned Heine's satires,—for instance, the Songs of Creation and the Disputation, which shows what disgraceful arguments and epithets rabbis and monks are able to launch against each other.

Better service to our cause than that of such poetry has been rendered by novelists like Auerbach. His romantic biography of Spinoza paints, on a dark background of Jewish and Christian bigotry and superstition, the glorious figure of the young philosopher breaking every yoke and giving up wealth, kindred and love, in order to achieve freedom of thought and knowledge of his own luminous philosophy, which shines above him like a guiding star. And, in The Black Forest Village Stories, we find Ivo, the Divinity Student, with his rich, vigorous soul so cramped in the seminary that he can save himself only by flight. Villa Eden contrasts clerical and secular education, to the latter's decisive advantage. Most remarkable of all these novels is On the Heights, where the beautiful and high-spirited countess expiates fully the greatest of sins, without any help from Bible, church, or priest, but by years of lonely toil and meditation, so that finally her soul is saved through its own unaided strength.

And then we have Freytag's Lost Manuscript, a romance whose popularity has been compared to that of Uncle Tom's Cabin, and whose hostility to all despotism is no less uncompromising, though less manifest. A German professor, strong and happy in his reverence for the order of nature and the moral laws, while searching vainly for a lost codex of Tacitus, wins the heart of a devout country girl, whose vigorous intellect, aided by the silent influence of his character, ultimately brings her into complete harmony with his views, much as these astonish her, when during their early acquaintance he replies to her expressions of sympathy with human suffering:—

"We might almost doubt whether the terrible doom of such millions is a divine judgment, or a proof that there is no God who cares for mortals. But we are able to live under this cloud, and feel such fresh strength as neither the heathens nor the Christians before us could possess. It is the greatest happiness of man, and the most indestructible, to have power to look with trust on what is going on and with hope on what is to be. Amid all that is weak and perishable grows an endless fulness of new strength. The roots of our national life are sound,—devotion to the family, reverence for justice and morality, diligent labor, mighty activity everywhere. That is our joy and honor in these modern times."

The stories of Mrs. E. John, better known as Marlitt, are interesting on account of the art with which the rigor and ambition of Puritanical pietism are put in contrast with the philanthropy and love of culture natural to Liberal views. This comparison is nowhere made so prominent as to repel the readers, but it is all the more likely to impress them on this account. Thus, The Old Ma'amselle's Secret is such a fondness for music and such a treasure of rare manuscripts as must be kept concealed from the stern, scheming bigots around. So the under-plot of Gold Elsie shows what cruelty to a fallen sister can be indulged in by a woman who has the Bible ever on her lips, and who nsists on taking her little children to church, despite the death of her infant son resulting from her keeping him there a couple of hours in the cold.

These seven writers, Marlitt, Freytag, Auerbach, Heine, Lessing, Schiller, and Goethe are among the most accessible of all Germans to people who read only English, and they form a constellation whose brilliancy will lead the student on to galaxies which lie more remote. The recent poetry is, indeed, rather scanty and tame compared with that of England; but, in novels, Germany takes a high place, though lower than that which she holds in philosophy, science, and Biblical criticism. F. M. H.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

WHILE the treatment of questions of party politics is rapidly degenerating into the acrimonious forms which it regularly assumes before presidential elections, it is pleasant to find a recent speech by the President which may be considered from a strictly statesmanlike or scientific point of view, and the subject of which is not at present involved in party politics. Upon the subject of education, the President furnished the following facts: (1) In the late slave-holding States, in 1878, nearly one-half of the school population—that is, children of school-age—were unable to read and write. These numbered nearly two and a half millions out of a total of over five millions of children. Again (2), in the Territories of the United States, there are over two hundred thousand uncivilized Indians. (3) The people of the Territory of New Mexico, moreover, have never been publicly provided with the means of education. In 1870, there were in New Mexico over fifty thousand children, of ten years of age and upwards, who could neither read nor write,—much more than one-half the entire population of the Territory. And (4), last, there will be added probably to the population of the United States during the current decade, from immigration alone, nearly or quite five millions of people. Possibly, one-fourth of these are illiterate. After giving these facts, Mr. Hayes spoke of the necessity of universal education, mentioning the truism that, in our country as everywhere else, "ignorant voters are powder and ball for the demagogues." But the conclusion of the address, and in fact its assumption all the way through, that "in the present condition of our country universal education requires the aid of the general government," we are by no means ready to subscribe to, not at least until we are furnished with weightier reasons than any which appear in the presentation of the above facts. The illiteracy mentioned is undoubtedly a wretched fact, and public attention cannot be called to it too strongly; but, if the general government ever undertakes to furnish and control public education, we may find ourselves soon in so hot a fire that, in comparison, the illiteracy to be cured would be a very comfortable frying-pan. We are heartily glad to record a President's speech on a vital and non-partisan subject, but sorry that he could not suggest for the trouble a better remedy than government subsidy.

"NATURE" gives an account, from a German publication, of a new investigation of the influence of sewage on drinking-water, by Mr. R. Emmerich. Daily, for a long time, he has drunk nearly a quart (from a half to one litre) of water from one of the Munich brooks which receives sewage of every kind. He has satisfied himself that there were cases of typhoid in some of the houses draining into the brook; but, no bad effects having followed the drinking of this delectable beverage, he now invites other experimenters to pursue similar investigation. Perhaps "other experimenters" might wish to know, first, with what other drinks Mr. Emmerich modified the effects of his wholesome soup. A small quantity of Mr. Emmerich's "broth" produces death in rabbits, when injected subcutaneously. He proposes (a proposition which no consistent opponent of vivisection can consider for a moment) to test suspected water by injecting a specified amount under the skin of a full-grown rabbit. If only a very slight rise in temperature occurs, or if death does not quickly follow the injection, the water would probably not be injurious to human beings drinking it.

AS VIVISECTION is alluded to in the above paragraph, we may mention here—a fact forgotten when writing before on that subject—that Mr. Gladstone has been "memorialized" against vivisection, the paper being signed, among many others, by Cardinal Manning, Prince Bonaparte, Mr. Froude, Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Burne-Jones, the artist, and the poet Tennyson. It is safe to say that not one of these eminent men knows anything whatever about vivisection, and that, of necessity, they must consider it from a purely sentimental point of view.

OF importance to all persons interested in the discoveries now making in America with regard to the ancient races which once peopled it is the announcement by the St. Louis Republican of the discovery of some remarkable remains in Franklin County in Missouri. Some iron miners unearthed, at a depth of eighteen feet, a human skull with some ribs, the vertebral column and collar bone, and with these were two flint arrow-heads of very primitive type and some pieces of charcoal. Some days after, at a depth of twenty-four feet, were found a thigh-bone and part of the vertebra, these bones apparently belonging to the first-found skeleton and some charred wood. Both "finds" rested on a fibrous stratum, supposed at first to be the remains of a coarse matting, but subsequently supposed to be a layer of twigs or rushes used as a bed. The second "find" was in a sort of cave formed by two large boulders of hard iron ore, standing on edge at an angle of forty-five degrees, the upper ends leaning against each other, thus forming a cavity which was filled with blue specular and hard red ore and clay, resting upon a floor of solid red hematite. "The ore bed in which the remains were found, and part of which seems to have formed after the period of human occupation of the cave, lies in the second sandstone of the Lower Silurian." Dr. R. W. Booth, the owner of the mine, fully aware of the importance of the discovery, endeavored to preserve all the remains as found; but the skull crumbled into dust, and some of the other bones broke or crumbled, but enough was preserved to prove their human origin.

Digitized by Google

We are glad to observe in the English Nature a warmly commendatory notice of some government reports upon the meteorology of Alaska made by Lieutenant W. H. Dall. It is not too high praise to say that "Mr. Dall is evidently one of the most valuable scientific servants of that [the United States] Government." The report comprises an abstract of all accessible meteorological material relating to Alaska, widely scattered through numerous annuals, proceedings, and transactions of learned societies, and difficult of access because in the Russian or some other foreign language, and also collected from the United States Coast Survey, the Medical Department of the Army, the Signal Service, and from private sources. The list of charts, maps, and publications relating to Alaska and the neighboring regions, and occupying something like two hundred quarto pages, is spoken of as "a wonderful piece of well-arranged work." We do not wonder that Nature calls attention to the first sentence in the letter of transmission accompanying these reports, in which Mr. Dall coolly informs the Superintendent of the Survey that he has "the honor to turn in the results of an inquiry into the meteorology of Alaska and the adjacent regions," and adds, "The results of which Mr. Dall speaks in this irreverent manner must have cost him stupendous labor; indeed, they might very well have taken years of research by a small international staff of inquirers." R. C.

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND PHILANTHROPY.

Moral Education.

Under this general title, though with a specific meaning, there is a modern movement which deserves serious attention. Its distinctive aim is to stay the tide of sensual license and social corruption that has been setting in upon the community. Associations bearing the name were formed about eight years since in Boston and Washington, and subsequently in Philadelphia, New York, Brooklyn, and elsewhere. They are composed of women of all classes, maidens, wives, and mothers; among whom, on the boards of officers particularly, are quite a number of educated physicians. They are, moreover, frequently and freely assisted by earnest men sympathizing with their purpose. These associations, two of them certainly,—probably all of them, directly or indirectly,—owe their existence to the efforts of a noble woman, Mrs. L. B. Chandler, who called her sisters together in private parlors and in church vestries, wherever she could get an opening. In these familiar circles of friends and neighbors, she laid open the social evils frankly and simply, and called on them to labor for their removal and especially for their future prevention. One of these meetings was held in the house of the writer, then a resident of Washington. This was quickly followed by others in different parts of the city. A few weeks before, similar meetings had been held in Boston. Out of these gatherings came, at about the same time, the organization of a society in each of the two cities. The others followed not long after. The original object and present aim of these societies is so well expressed by the Washington society, whose first and eighth reports lie before me, that I quote from the latter a statement which may be taken as correctly representing the views and purposes of the whole.

"This society was established by a few women in the interests of purity, who were shocked by the revelation of the efforts being made to educate school children and others in the direction of impurity and depravity, by the sale and distribution to them of obscene literature, pictures, chromos, etc. Desiring to learn to how great an extent this evil existed, we organized ourselves into a society for that purpose. In endeavoring to control and counteract its effects, and to meet the necessity for a proper instruction to children whose inquiring minds are early questioning in regard to their physiological nature, and the elaborate and beautiful structure of the human mechanism, we were led into a sphere of work much beyond our original conception,—that of endeavoring to instil into the minds of men and women the responsibility of parentage to so carefully and conscientiously, through prenatal as well as later influences, imbue their children with the instincts of purity that it will be impossible for impure thoughts or acts to find lodgement."

The closing words of the foregoing statement clearly affirm the emphasis of the present effort. The Washington society has sought and secured the passage of laws prohibiting the sale and circulation of obscene literature in the District. Indirectly and collectively, it has protested with persistent zeal against repeated attempts to enact laws to "regulate the social evil," energetically coöperating with others elsewhere for the same purpose. It was represented in the "International Congress on Public Morality," held at Geneva, Sept., 1877, where an able paper was read by its president, Dr. Caroline B. Winslow, on the "Attitude of the Medical Women of America" to such laws, their earnest and unqualified opposition to them. It has spoken frequently and searchingly of the influence of current fashions and social practices in promoting impurity. But the stress of its endeavor has come to be laid, more and more, on what may well be called the "Previous Question." It has seen very clearly that education does not begin at birth. The germs of character are implanted before that event takes place. By both voluntary and involuntary action, the parents determine the proclivity or direction of impulse, in the very begetting of offspring. Its chief work, therefore, has been to enlighten men and women to the fact, and to impress them with the sense of the responsibility of parentage. And this not merely for the training of character, but even more for its original implanting. In its first report, it quotes with earnest commendation such words as these:—

"Society mourns over vice, but takes no means to prevent the growth of the vicious. . . . What is wanted is a higher endowment of the race at birth. . . . Attend to the generation, and we may let regeneration alone. . . . The greatest of all reforms, then, will care primarily for the birth of the individual. . . . It will endeavor to procure good lives rather than numerous ones."

In a memorial setting forth some of the ideas which the society desires to disseminate, it says:—

"The history of humanity reveals the law of transmission of qualities by parentage. . . . The first obligation of man and woman as partners in parentage is to make the best possible conditions for the child. The first necessity is that the child shall come because desired. . . . The mother has the inherent right to control the parental function, as she alone is responsible for the safety of the new life, her own life being pledged to its successful arrival, and her entire energies to its safe conduct through the perilous stages of infancy. . . . The right of the child to be invoked by parental love, and to be well born, is the key to human progress, to a release from 'dangerous classes.' . . . The first duty of the husband and wife to-day is to conform selfish desire to the welfare of the coming child, as the only possible guarantee of further progress and improvement socially, and a diviner human life."

Through such enlightened, elevated, and mutually respectful exercise of their partnership of love and duty are parents to give birth to healthy and pure offspring, fitted to perform the duties and to withstand the temptations of life.

No remedial measures—no regulative or prohibitory statutes, no seizure and destruction of corrupting literature—can effect the result which such preventive work will eventually accomplish.

These views, which later physiological science has been developing, this society has undertaken to bring home to the convictions of all whom it could reach. Equally removed from prudish silence and reckless vulgarity of speech, its tone has been clear and cleanly, fitted not only to instruct, but to elevate; to give not only more correct, but more respectful views of life's highest functions. Its methods of dissemination have been mainly meetings, such as those out of which the society originally sprung, and publications. Five years since, it commenced the issue of a monthly journal, significantly called the Alpha. This bore at first the motto "The Basis of Moral Education is Loyalty to Truth"; more recently the double legend, "Human Rights before all Laws and Constitutions," "The Divine Right of Every Child to be Well Born." In its pages, all the various phases of the work have been discussed. A number of valuable papers have appeared in it from N. E. Boyd, Augusta Cooper Bristol, F. A. Hinckley, and others, and been subsequently circulated in pamphlet and book form. That recent work Prenatal Culture by A. E. Newton, favorably noticed in the Index and other public journals several months since, was first published as a serial in the columns of the Alpha.

The society has also held itself ever ready to extend protection and relief to the young and friendless.

We have given so much space to the Washington society because of its central position, its national influence, and also its typical character. It stands for the rest. What it has done, they have also, to some extent, attempted, except that no other has undertaken a periodical. Coeval with, if not prior to it, was the Boston Association. This cherishes kindred purposes, and works by similar methods. Year after year, it keeps up its parlor and hall meetings, at which essays are read by some of the most thoughtful and earnest women and men; and free conversation is had on all questions pertaining to education and life in its earlier or later stage. It holds an annual meeting during Anniversary Week in May, when report is made of its doings, and words of explanation, counsel, and encouragement spoken by its members and friends. In the same line of effort and by corresponding methods, the societies in Philadelphia and New York pursue their work.

The general purpose recognized by these organizations and labored for with various degrees of interest and effect at different points is one that challenges the attention of the true philanthropist. Its importance is to be estimated, not by the small number of its active adherents, the inconspicuousness of its meetings, the quietness of its usual methods, or its slowly attained results, but by the magnitude of its aim and its penetrating insight. It is a profoundly radical yet eminently constructive movement. It reaches to the root of the matter, and proposes to start from first principles. Its work is slow, but thorough. It accepts no palliation for social evils. It asks of human law little more than that it shall give no measure of encouragement or sanction to them. It finds their source in the inborn propensity, the native instincts, which ignorance and indulgence have transmitted, and which corrupting influences have fostered and increased. To enlighten the young as to the laws of their being, especially as to those functions which come to their only legitimate and safe uses in a true and loving marriage, a wise and regulated begetting of children; and to inspire them with the holy ambition to make the best of themselves and to bequeath the legacy of their own purity and goodness increased to their children,—this is the profound and far-reaching purpose of this movement. Like begets like. Only from the pure fount flow forth living streams of purity. So it would purify both fount and streams, that the latter shall have no attraction for the corrupting agents that would pollute their waters. F. H.

FROM OUR REGULAR CORRESPONDENT.

New York, Sept. 10, 1880.

It is a piece of pleasant information to all who are interested in the Society for Ethical Culture, and especially to those who listen to Dr. Adler's eloquent words and thoughts, to be notified, as was your correspondent to-day, that the regular meetings of the society will be resumed on Sunday, October 18. Chickering Hall is again to be occupied. A pleasant feature of the renewal of intercourse and teaching is the fact that Dr. Leopold Damrosch, the well-known conductor and composer, is to be conductor of the music for the next year. The choir will be greatly strengthened; and the musical part of the services will without question be equal, in its way, as fitting accompaniment to the earnest harmony of Dr. Adler's speech and thought.

The work of the society has scarcely been intermitted during the recess. Its larger activity commences at once, and will be steadily enlarged. The scope of labor has greatly improved; and, during the heated season, the system of district nurse visiting and care, which has grown out of the Ethical Society's training hospital, has been found very valuable in alleviating much distress, and oft-times in preventing suffering among the poorest classes. There is great heartiness of support, and I may fairly say that Dr. Adler and the active members all feel greatly encouraged in the work of secular righteousness which they have so devotedly undertaken. The Ethical School, it is announced to members, will admit all children from the age of twelve upwards, for whom application is made by October 1. In many ways, it is apparent that the large sweep of Dr. Adler's influence is becoming more distinctly apparent; and we may expect to find that even Chickering Hall will be too small to hold those who may desire to hear him.

Digitized by Google

Recently reading the Free Religious Index, as I faithfully do, my attention was attracted to an editorial on socialism, in which the note was pitched upon the idea that what is so expressed is, after all, the struggle for equality. May I make a suggestive comment, which will in part not be out of tune with what further I design to say in this letter? As a close student of the socialistic discussion of this and past days, I am constrained to put its aim in different language. I say that it is not, after all, equality that is so desired: it is equity. The competitive system, as now organized, is so grossly unjust that keenly sensitive and suffering minds and souls grow bitterly indignant, and would, in their desire to right wrong, perhaps seem to tear down and destroy. The socialists in this land place themselves at a disadvantage by using the revolutionary terms, when in reality it is an evolutionary purpose they desire to attain. I therefore think that it is not equality, but equity, they seek. A law of equitable distribution in economics is as much a necessity at this day as the law of political equity or just distribution of political power was at the time of the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. Let us use the word "equity," and not that which misleads. Men are not specially seeking the latter: they are striving for the former. More than that, society is going to obtain it. I recently had the pleasure of again meeting Mr. Thomas Hughes, whom I last saw as presiding officer of the Co-operative Conference held at Manchester in the year 1867. He has grown considerably older since then, and his subsequent visit to this country. The enterprise in which he is now engaged—that of building up an English colony in the eastern part and high table-lands of Tennessee—does not commend itself to my judgment as one likely to succeed, but that is with the men who undertake it. Like most Englishmen, however liberal, even wise, as is Tom Brown, Mr. Hughes has little real appreciation of the startling sociological differences wrought through the institution of slavery between the people of the North and of the South. Mr. Hughes and his associates are in no sense "radicals." He is a liberal,—not even as pronounced, on the political side, as, taking a French type for illustration, we should regard the Girondists to have been. On the socio-benevolent side of Mr. Hughes, as of Abou Ben Adhem, it could be written,—

"He loved his fellow-men."

As a sturdy worker for coöperation, two forces have operated on him, one being his keen sense of the inequities that prevail as competition now exists, and the other—and perhaps his keener sense—is the conviction that, unless some evolutionary remedy is found for the accumulating ills of poverty, there will quite likely be brought about some revolutionary process of throwing off the burdens. Mr. Hughes is far in the sunshine, out of the sombre hues of Carlyle's pessimism, but not far enough to escape the chill the shadows make. He is near enough to clasp hands with Ruskin, in both his sweet power and its limitations of temperament and insight. Mr. Hughes is a fine combination of "sweetness and light," largely altruistic in character and action; but he is, after all, an exclusive,—not an equal dispenser, but a bestower and a patron. There is little of genuine democracy—the undeniable divinity of human life—in Tom Brown's mental expression, though there is a great deal of it in his acts. I should not be accused of misjudging, for I have elsewhere and more permanently spoken of him in terms of high eulogy, as he deserves. He believes in the King Man. I believe in Men who are kings, equal with all and with each. So, as to his English colony, he cannot see, except by experience and at cost of some failure, that the South is nowhere in this generation an appropriate place for the thriving of such an experiment; nor is the creation of a farm tenantry a desirable experiment.

By the way, it seems not to have struck our economic writers and statists that there is a remarkable series of changes occurring in emigration and its methods. Emigration is no longer so fully individualized as, from twenty to fifty years since, was the rule. A large body of the laboring men, especially, who travel on the ocean in the steerage, are mere birds of passage. In this city, for instance, the building trades, when active, are supplied with labor by men from Scotland and the north of England, who return hither as the snow flies. Of course, a considerable proportion of our new residents come here to become one with us; but there is not so much as of old of that aspiration for a freer life which once animated—however rude the expression and narrow the vision—the larger majority of the emigrant people who came here between, say, 1830 and 1870. Another curious fact is the increasing proportion of Southern Europeans who are coming. And, to the north and east of us, along your New England lines, the French Canadians are pouring in, drawn by the prospect of better work and that dumb spirit of change which is the mark of an aspiration for better things that everywhere touches the heavy soul of the toilers. Is it observed also that the Anglo-Canadian is finding his way to the far West, by Detroit and Chicago, in great numbers? By the way, following the civil war and the beginning of reconstruction, there was quite a movement of Canadians of the middle class toward Virginia and further south. If I am not misinformed, they soon found that there was no congenial social life in the States selected. The white South was as inhospitable as to actual nearness and contact toward the Canadian as to the Yankee. Nothing but the regenerative influences of education—school, artistic, social, moral, and political—will change the generations affected by slavery and war. It was Mrs. Cheney, I believe, who first called a large attention to the need of Southern regeneration. This reflection has been called out by the Hughes colony movement.

But, returning to the change in the character of emigration from the Old World, I say nothing of Chinese migration. That is only the swarming of hungry bees to find the means for the honey they cannot extract at home. It is purely migratory in spirit, eating, and moving on, like the swarming of locusts. Mr. Hughes and his colony recall the fact that it is by no means the first effort of its kind. The National Miners' Association of Great Britain, of which Mr. Alexander Macdonald, M.P. for Stafford, is president, has, through its leader, successfully inaugurated at least two important and thriving farm and village communities, one being in Central Illinois and the other in Southern Kansas. Several thousand families have been taken from the English and Scotch collieries, and planted on the prairies as farmers and workers. There has been no fuss about it either. Of course, the Mennonite colonies are remembered. They are, however, sui generis. I think that the Mormon emigration, with its remarkable and well-adapted organization, has not been unnoticed by other sacerdotal agencies in Europe. Within the past four years, I have several times met, here and in the West, the agents of the Catholic hierarchy in Ireland and Belgium, inquiring for land suitable for colonies. A large body of land was purchased at one time in Virginia by agents of Cardinal Cullem and the Archbishop of Tuam. The intention was to remove and place thereon a large body of the better class of tenant farmers, planting Catholicism, with priest, chapel, and school, in their midst at the same time. I do not know whether this project was or not pushed to any success. If it has been, there is wisdom in making no fuss about it. I know of other tracts—eighty thousand acres in one body—bought in Kentucky. An agent of a Belgian banking-house was here two years since, and in conversation stated that his principals were acting for the order of Jesuits in that State, who had determined to organize an associated migration to the United States. By this, they expected, of course, to extend Catholic influence here; but, more than that, they anticipated relieving the labor market at home,—reduce the bitter competition, and so, by making the workers more contented, prevent the present rapid growth of ultra-socialistic and radical views and tendencies. I learned of large negotiations; but, whether they were consummated, I do not know. The Church of England influence even has not been idle. About the same time a Mr. Boyle, of England, was purchasing lands in Tennessee for the avowed purpose of planting just such a colony in character and membership as that of Mr. Hughes, under Anglo-Episcopal patronage and influences. Has the author of Tom Brown, who is a devoted Broad Churchman, aught to do with this? Are not these signs of the times—the bringing together the ends of the earth—worth noting? THINON.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MR. WILLIAM DENTON is about to sail for Australia to lecture there.

PROF. ALEXANDER AGASSIZ'S summer residence at Newport has been burned. The loss is said to be $20,000.

DR. B. W. RICHARDSON, the eminent English Physician and scientific writer, is president of the British Medical Temperance Association.

REV. GEO. W. COOKE has nearly ready for the press a book which he has had in preparation for some time. It is a study of the writings and genius of Emerson.

A STATUE of Burns, by Sir John Steele, which has met with special praise in Scotland, has arrived in New York, and will soon be placed in Central Park.

SARAH E. STARR, the aunt of Thomas Starr King, of revered and beloved memory, has just died at Lynn, Mass. She was much esteemed, a hearty and active sympathizer with the cause of reform and philanthropy.

MR. EDWIN D. MEAD, whose lectures upon German religious thought were so well received in Boston last spring, will accept engagements for the delivery of his popular lectures upon "The British Parliament," "Gladstone," etc.

MAYOR PRINCE always acquits himself well on public occasions. His anniversary address at the Old South last week is acknowledged on all hands to have been an exceedingly able, scholarly, and eloquent production, every way worthy of the event and the renown of Boston for such forensic efforts.

MR. GEORGE BANCROFT expects to complete his History of the United States (which is to close with the beginning of the constitutional period, in 1879) in October of the present year. He began work on the history in 1825, at the age of twenty-five. The venerable Dr. John G. Palfrey, now in his eighty-fifth year, is at work on the fifth and last volume of his History of New England.

ONE time last winter Col. Ingersoll came very near changing his views on future punishment. He roomed on the same corridor with a young man who was learning to play the cornet; and he said one morning there were some things in the Old Testament prophecies and denunciations that were full of the sweetest comfort to a man of a revengeful nature, who had suffered greatly, and he would not deny it.

A PASTORAL letter from the archbishop was read at the Basilica in Quebec recently, deploring the continued emigration from the province to the United States, and appealing to the generosity, charity, and patriotism of the people to take steps to check the movement. Of course it is better that the Roman Catholics of Canada should remain there, subject to consequent impoverishment and pecuniary disadvantages, than the church should become weakened in that region by the loss of its members.

MISS ELIZABETH ANDREWS has brought suit against the Rev. Edward James Warmington, rector of St. Albans, Dengie, for refusing to administer the sacrament to her. Some difference as to a school had occurred between the rector and his parishioner; and the former read the rubric against persons coming to partake of the sacrament who were not in a proper frame of mind, and used the feminine instead of the masculine pronoun, from which people naturally inferred that he meant Miss Andrews. When that lady presented herself for communion, the rector deliberately omitted to administer the bread and wine to her. Such an incident needs no comment.—Woman's Journal.

FOREIGN.

THE Parisian freethinkers have a weekly journal, which is called La Pensee Libre.

HENRI ROCHEFORT is to publish the collection of lanternes which he wrote under the Empire.

THE manager of the Evenement Parisien has just been condemned to six months' imprisonment and a fine of five hundred francs for the publication of a grossly immoral article. The announcement of the verdict was greeted with loud applause.

THE Jesuit schools in France were closed on Wednesday, Sept. 1, as establishments belonging to the religious order in question, in pursuance of the March decrees. Generally, the authorities found no difficulty in carrying out their orders. The Jesuits had gone, and left the schools to laymen and civil societies. At Poitiers, however, and at Marseilles, some resistance was offered; and at the latter place force had to be exerted to eject the occupants of the building from the chapel, the closing of which they resisted. The remaining unauthorized congregations, according to a statement in a Bordeaux paper, are likely to make their submission.

Digitized by Google

A DECLARATION was published at Berlin, on Monday, Aug. 30, signed by twenty-eight members of the German Parliament or Prussian Diet, announcing their secession from the ranks of the National Liberal party. They declare their intention to uphold the political liberties already achieved, and to adhere to the principles of freedom of commerce and reform of the Imperial system of taxation, rejecting unnecessary burdens and indirect taxes, especially those which press heavily upon the poorer classes. They also insist upon ecclesiastical and religious freedom being guaranteed by independent State legislation, protecting the inalienable rights of the State.

A NEW law on education has been promulgated in the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, which, while permitting religious instruction to figure in the list of studies, forbids the masters, in a special article, from teaching any subject which might wound the feelings and sentiments of the members of another community. This act of justice has greatly incensed the Ultramontane journals, one of which, in the midst of its lucubrations, remarks: "So the teachers may no longer speak of the crucifixion of the Lord by the Jews, because the Israelites will feel offended. In this manner, many leading points of the Catholic religion will have to be banished from the curriculum of instruction."

THE Paris Socialists held, Aug. 24, a formidable meeting at the Salle d'Arras, to bring, as was stated, the notorious "affair Marceron" before the people of France, M. Marceron being a certain police commissary, whose name is associated with the repression of the Commune, and who has been a kind of scapegoat with the Communists ever since. An idea of the tone of the meeting may be obtained from the order of the day. It was as follows: "The citizens gathered in the Salle d'Arras, their hearts rent by the cries of the tortured women and children, cannot refrain from expressing their despair in the presence of a government that, in the face of Europe, proclaims its solidarity with hangmen by shamelessly proscribing their accusers. A curse on the hypocritical assassins who get themselves borne in triumph by imbecile dupes, and shame on the imbecile dupes who so bear the hypocritical assassins. They call on their fellow-citizens to multiply their meetings and hold up to public scorn the complicity of the Government."—Weekly Times.

JESTINGS.

THE members of the bicycle club always date their letters "B.C." This will astonish future antiquarians.—Punch.

PORTER, pounding on the door: "Get up, right off, I say, or you'll be too late. The train's been gone this last half-hour."

MISS FENNELL says her minister's sermons are "a little obscure"; but, she says, "I do love to set and watch the lineages of his face!"—Andrews' Queen.

A CRITIC, in noticing a discourse on "The Sayings and Doings of Great Men," remarks: "It is sad to observe how much they said and how little they did."

AT a recent Western funeral the clergyman more pithily than pleasantly began his address with, "Our esteemed brother, who last Tuesday exchanged his winter flannels on a treacherous spring day for an April shroud, was—"

A CREATURE who respects nothing, not even the Pentateuch, observes that if, instead of listening to the "blarney" of old Abraham, Agar had been married to Ferdinand de Lesseps, she would still have had an isthme à elle.—Parisian.

VOITURE and Arnauld were one day amusing themselves in guessing the profession of the passers by their dress and bearing, when a carriage passed, the occupant of which was oddly attired. Quoth Voiture, "That's a Councillor of the Court of Aids." Arnauld wagered that the passer was not; and, to decide the bet, Voiture approached the carriage, and, explaining to the gentleman the circumstances, asked if he were not such a functionary. "Monsieur," said the gentleman, coldly, "go round and bet that you are an ass. You will never lose. Drive on, coachman." The bet was decided a draw.

